P R E F A C E.

THE claims of the BIBLE to be regarded as the first of books, both in authority and value, are readily admitted by all consistent Protestants. They receive it on evidence which commands assent, as the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever;—they refer to it with satisfaction and delight, as the source of their hopes and consolations;—and they accept it, with gratitude, as the means which Eternal Wisdom has provided for making men “wise unto salvation.” Its exclusive sufficiency for this purpose is asserted in the maxim which has been adopted and illustrated in their most valuable writings—“The Bible, and the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants.”

THE antiquity of the Sacred Volume, the manner in which its contents have been transmitted to our own age; the obscurities inseparable from the compositions of remote times, written in a language the idioms of which cannot be explained by reference to existing usage, and requiring for their elucidation a knowledge of manners and customs which cannot be viewed in their original living connection;—these, to say nothing of other sources of perplexity, are sufficient to convince any person of common understanding, that information on such subjects is essentially necessary to the student of the sacred Scriptures; while the number of works through which this information is scattered, too frequently places it beyond his reach.

PREFACE.

THE pious and laborious Author of "THE DICTIONARY TO THE HOLY BIBLE" has brought together from various sources, and arranged in regular alphabetical order, much valuable information on the above topics. The estimation in which this Work has been long held by the religious public is best proved by the immense number of copies which has yearly issued from the press. It is now published, for the first time, in one Octavo Volume, by which, as its price is greatly reduced, its circulation, it is hoped, will be proportionably extended.

SKETCH

OF THE

LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

THE REV. JOHN BROWN was born in the year 1722, in a little village called Carpow, in the county of Perth, Scotland. The narrative of his experience which he left behind was as follows:

The more I consider the dealings between God and my soul, I am the more amazed at his marvellous kindness to me, and at my ingratitude and rebellion against him.

I reflect on it as a great mercy, that I was born in a family which took great care of my Christian instruction, and in which I had the privilege of God's worship both morning and evening. This was the case in few families in that corner; and it was the more remarkable, considering that my father had not got any regular instruction in reading.

About the eighth year of my age, I happened in a crowd to push into the church at Abernethy, on a sacrament Sabbath. Then it was common for all but intended communicants to be excluded. Before I was excluded, I heard one or two tables served by a minister, who spake much to the commendation of Christ; this in a sweet and delightful manner captivated my young affections, and has since made me think that children should never be kept out of the church on such occasions. At this period of life, my thirst after knowledge was great, and indeed pride often instigated me to diligence. My parents' circumstances were such, that they were not able to afford me any great length of time at school for reading, writing, and arithmetic. I had a particular delight in learning by heart the Catechisms published by Vincent, Flavel, and the Westminster Assembly, and was much profited by them. One month at school, without my parents' allowance, I bestowed upon the Latin.

My father dying about the eleventh year of my age, and my mother soon after, I was left a poor orphan, and had nothing to depend on but the providence of God;—and I must say, that the Lord hath been “the father of the fatherless, and the orphan's stay.”

In the thirteenth and fourteenth years of my life, the Lord by his word, read and heard, did often strive with my soul for its good. The perusal of Alleine's “Alarm to the Unconverted” contributed, in some measure, to awaken my conscience, and to move my affections. However, some of his hints, made worse by my corrupt mind, occasioned my legal covenanting with God. I made much the same use of that excellent book, Guthrie's “Trial of a Saving Interest in Christ.” Indeed, such was the bias of my heart, under its convictions, that I was willing to do any thing rather than flee to Christ, and trust to his free grace alone for my salvation.

I had no small pleasure about this time, in reading religious books, such as the Bible, Rutherford's Letters, Gouge's Directions how to walk with God, &c. By means of attention to these, I was led into some measure of tenderness in my external behaviour. The impressions which were made on my mind, by the sermons which I heard, and books which I read, were on certain occasions very great, and sometimes continued for several days. Under these I was much given to prayer, but concealed all my religious exercises to the utmost of my power.

Within a few months after my mother's death, I was seized four times with fevers, which succeeded each other rapidly, and which brought me so low, that almost every person who saw me lost all hopes of my recovery : though I did not expect immediate death in these troubles, yet apprehensions of eternity exceedingly affected me. A serious friend told me, after I was recovered, that, when she was praying in my behalf, these words, "I will satisfy him with long life, and I will show him my salvation," were so impressed by God on her heart, that she was perfectly easy under all my distress.

Deprived of my parents, I was obliged to leave a small religious family, and to enter into a larger. This was attended with much practical apostasy from the Lord. My former attainments were lost, and religious exercises were often omitted. Even secret prayer was not always regularly performed; but I in my folly pleased myself, by making up the number in one day, in which I had been deficient in another.

After many changes in the frame of my heart, Providence again afflicted me with a fever in the nineteenth year of my age : this in some degree awakened my concern about eternal salvation.

After my recovery, I heard a sermon on John vi. 64 ; "There are some of you that believe not." This, though delivered by one that was reckoned a general preacher, pierced my conscience, as if almost every sentence had been directed to none but me ; and it made me conclude myself one of the greatest unbelievers in the world. My soul was thrown into a sort of agony, and I was made to look on all my former experiences as effects of the common operations of the Holy Ghost. In this manner I viewed them for many years afterwards, till at last God showed me, that I was wrong in throwing aside all my attainments, as having nothing really gracious in them.

Next day I heard a sermon on Isa. liii. 4. "Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows."* This enlightened and melted my heart in a way that I had never before felt. I was made, as a poor lost sinner, as the chief of sinners, to essay appropriating the Lord Jesus, as having done all for me, and as wholly made over to me, in the gospel, as the free gift of God ; and as my all-sufficient Saviour, answerable to all my folly, ignorance, guilt, filth, slavery, and misery. —Through this, and other ordinances, the pleasure which I had enjoyed in some former years, was not only remarkably returned, but I attained far clearer views of the freedom of God's grace, and the exercise of taking hold of, and pleading, the promises of the gospel. I had not been much above a year in this happy condition, when I was exercised with a new trial of five years' continuance. In consequence of my anxious pursuit after learning, as opportunity was given, and especially by the gracious assistance of God, I had acquired some knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages ; and was resolving to use them in the service of Christ, if he should open a regular door. My learning of these languages, without a master, except for one month, occasioned my obtaining the favour of some, and my meeting with the malice of others. By the last it was represented, that I had certainly got my learning in some sinful way ; and this groundless calumny spread far and wide. The reproach was exceedingly distressing to me ; however, God was gracious, for I enjoyed remarkable mixtures of mercy with the affliction. At the beginning of the trial, these words, "The Lord will command his loving-kindness in the day-time, and his song shall be with me in the night, and my prayer to the God of my life," were peculiarly sweet to my soul.

The members of the praying society, to which I belonged, continued my steady friends, and were more kind to me now than before. My acquaintance with the world being extended, many others also manifested remarkable sympathy. But, my chief support under the calumny was the words of truth, which the Lord enabled me to believe. At sacramental occasions at Dunfermline, Burntisland, and Glasgow, he marvellously refreshed my soul, and made these years the most pleasant that I ever had, or perhaps ever shall have on earth.

* Preached by the Rev. Mr. Gibb, late of Edinburgh.

Discourses on these texts, Heb. x. 37.—“Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come;” Ezek. xxxvii. 12.—“Behold, O my people, I will open your graves!” and Psalm xci. 2.—“I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge;”—and a meditation on Psalm v. 7. “But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy;” were peculiarly ravishing. Meanwhile the Lord, by the reproach which was cast upon me, led me out to ponder my own heart and way, and made me to see myself before him as a devil, and much worse. This excited me to submit to my lot, and kept me from exposing my slanderers. Micah’s words much affected my heart. chap. vii. 8—10. “Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy; when I fall I shall arise; when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me,” &c. Then, and ever since, I have found that the Lord hath most plainly vindicated me when I have made the least carnal struggling for mine own honour. I could not but remark too, that the sting, which I had found in my learning, tended to keep me humble under what I had attained; and the false reproaches which I then met with, have made me all along less credulous of what I have heard charged upon others. On these, and other accounts, I have since looked upon that affliction as a kind providence to my soul. By a wonderful variety of dispensations, the Lord graciously opened a way for my getting some regular instruction in philosophy and divinity; and I was licensed to preach the everlasting gospel in the year 1750. I could not but be affected that about this time, if not the same night, in which I was licensed, my primary calumniator was excommunicated by his supporters.—Behold, O my soul! “the goodness and severity of God,”—towards him severity, and towards me (perhaps ten thousand times worse) goodness. Let me never be high-minded, but fear.

On the morning before I was licensed, that awful text was much impressed on my spirits. Isa. vi. 9, 10. “He said, Go and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes, lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert and be healed.” Since I was ordained at Haddington, I know not how often it hath been heavy to my heart, to think how much this scripture hath been fulfilled in my ministry. Frequently I have had an anxious desire to be removed by death, from being a plague to my poor congregation. Often, however, I have taken myself, and have considered this wish as my folly, and begged of the Lord that if it was not for his glory to remove me by death, he would make me successful in my work. As to transportations, I never had a good opinion of the most of them; and I always looked upon it as so far a mercy that my congregation was small. After all, I dare not but confess, that Christ is the best master I ever served: he hath often laid matter before me, and enabled me with pleasure to deliver his mind.—Any little knowledge which I have had of my uncommonly wicked heart, and of the Lord’s dealings with my own soul, hath helped me much in my sermons; and I have observed, that I have been apt to deliver that which I had experienced, in a more feeling and earnest manner, than other matters.

No sermons that ever I preached were, I think, more sweet to my own soul, than those on the following texts: Psal. cxlii. 7. “Bring my soul out of prison;” Isa. xlv. 5. “One shall say, I am the Lord’s.”—Chap. xlv. 4. “Even to your old age, I am he.”—Chap. lx. 20. “The days of thy mourning shall be ended.” 1 Tim. i. 15. “This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.”—Rev. iii. 21. “To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne:”—and John xi. 28. “The master is come, and calleth for thee.”

Now after near forty years preaching of Christ, and his great and sweet salvation, I think that I would rather beg my bread, all the labouring days of the week; for an opportunity of publishing the gospel on the Sabbath, to an assembly of sinful men, than without such a privilege to enjoy the richest possession on earth. By the gospel do men live: and in it is the life of my soul. O the kindness of God! Many, whose parents have been spared with them far longer than I had mine, are now in deep poverty, or what is infinitely worse, are abandoned to all manner of wickedness; while by strange means the Lord hath preserved and restrained me. From low circumstances, God hath, by his mere grace, exalted the orphan to the highest station in the church; and I hope hath given me some success, not only in preaching and writing, but also in training up many for the ministry. He chose me to be his servant, and took me from the sheepfold, from following the ewes great with young; he brought me to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. "Lord, what am I, and what is my father's house, that thou hast brought me hitherto!"—Upon a reflection on God's outward providence, I look upon it as a mercy, that, considering the dreadful pride of my heart, God did not make my talent to lie so properly, in a quick and extensive view of things at first, but rather in a close, persevering, and unwearied application, to that in which I engaged. In the former respect, I was always much inferior to many of my brethren. I cannot but remark it also as a kindness in Providence, that though, when I commenced a preacher, my imagination sometimes led me to use flighty expressions in my sermons, the Lord made me ashamed of this, as a real robbery from him, to sacrifice to my own accursed pride. Since that time, notwithstanding my eager hunting after all the lawful learning which is known among the sons of men, God hath made me generally to preach, as if I had never read another book but the Bible. I have essayed to preach scriptural truths in scriptural language.

When I consider my earthly-mindedness, I admire the almighty grace of God, in so disposing my heart, that it has rather been my care, to manage frugally what God provided for me, than greedily to grasp at more.

I think with respect to my congregation, that I have aimed at seeking them, and not theirs; and I am convinced their charitable belief of this hath disposed them along to regard me, and to afford me sufficient subsistence: yet "It was not I, but the grace of God, which did all." I have looked upon it also as a gracious over-ruling of my mind, that though I have often grudged paying a penny or two for a trifle, the Lord hath enabled me cheerfully to bestow as many pounds for pious purposes; and, owing to kind Providence, my wealth, instead of being diminished by this means, is much increased. From experience I can testify, that liberality to the Lord is one of the most effectual means of making one rich: "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty."

Reflecting upon my own external conduct, I lament that I have been so deficient in effectual fervent prayer for my congregation, and for the church of God. "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh in vain."

I lament that my discourses, and conversation in my family and with others, have not been more spiritual. A sense of sinful weakness, and unskilfulness in pushing religious discourse, hath made me averse from keeping much company; and when at any time I have been in company with others, unless some serious discourse hath been introduced, I have left them with grief and shame. It is a divine command, "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt."

I lament that I have not attended more frequently societies for prayer and spiritual conference; and that I have not been more diligent, in catechising and exhorting children in my congregation. I am persuaded that these exercises are some of the best means which ministers can use for promoting the welfare of souls; and it would be happy for the church, if the zeal and care of teachers were chiefly manifested about things of this nature.

In learning, Mr. Brown's attainments were eminent: they corresponded with the insatiable ardour of his young mind after general knowledge. His acquaintance with European languages will astonish our minds, when we consider, that, excepting the space of one single month, he was his own teacher. He relished the beauties of the Latin poets; but of the Greek, and especially of the Hebrew language, his knowledge was extensive, accurate, and critical. He could read and translate the French, the Italian, the German, the Arabic, the Persian, the Syriac, and the Ethiopic. Though he understood the Newtonian system, and was not unacquainted with the different theories of the human mind, connected with the science of morals, his favourite study was Divinity; and in subserviency to this, the history of nations, and of the church of God. He made an abridgment of the whole of the Ancient Universal History. In Divinity, he perused chiefly the writings of the best old Divines, as Turrentine, Pictet, Mastricht, Owen; and of the moderns, Boston, Erskine, and Hervey. But, above all, he studied the oracles of God. Indeed, his acquaintance with the Bible was singular. Seldom was a text quoted, but he could accurately repeat it, explain its meaning, and state its connexion.

In piety, he was eminently heavenly-minded: prayer was his delight. Besides the regular devotions of the closet, he appeared often engaged in ejaculations to his Father in Heaven; particularly, when he was composing or meditating on his sermons. He frequently set apart a morning for extraordinary prayer, and often called together his domestics to family-fasting or thanksgiving. Though few more tenderly sympathized with the afflicted, yet he was scarce ever seen to weep, except from the deep impressions of divine truth on his own heart, or from compassion for perishing souls. Bodily pain, and the death of relations, he endured without shedding a tear; but when he was warning sinners of their danger, and beseeching them to be reconciled unto God, the emotions of his heart generally overcame his firmness, and frequently checked his utterance.

He was a conscientious observer of the Lord's day. To converse on the common affairs of life, or even on the mere externals and trivial matters of the church, he considered as unsuitable to the spiritual exercises of the day, and offensive to God. As he would not allow himself to say or do what he conceived to be inconsistent with the sanctification of that holy day, so he endeavoured to restrain all within his house from such practices.

In conversation, it was evident to every body that his constant aim was to reform, and to edify. He seldom gave an opinion on political subjects, or at all intermeddled with them. The remarks which he made, when others introduced subjects of that nature, were usually religious. Instead of expressing approbation, or of passing censure on the conduct of our rulers, he tried to lead the attention to the operations of Providence, which manages all things for the honour of God, and the welfare of his church. The subject of ministers' stipends he also studiously avoided in conversation; knowing that they who officiate in sacred things, lie too frequently, however undeservedly, under the odium of being mercenary men; and that few things tend more to hinder the people's edification, than a suspicion that their minister's leading object is worldly gain. The proceedings of the ecclesiastical courts he seldom spoke of to private Christians; and the imprudent behaviour of any of their members, he carefully concealed. He could not see how the mentioning of these things could any way promote the real spiritual profit of his people.

Through steadfast faith in the divine promises, he seems to have attained to an habitual evenness of mind, so as never to be much transported with joy, or much depressed with sorrow. In him the promise was evidently fulfilled; "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee." On one occasion, hearing a most tremendous peal of thunder, he said, with much pleasant serenity, "That's the love-whisper of my God."

For some years before his death he took peculiar delight in reading and abridging the Lives and Experiences of serious Christians.

During his last illness he discovered a remarkably thankful frame of mind for the smallest favour or assistance given to him: and so entirely satisfied was he with the dispensations of Providence, that for three or four months before he died, he was never heard to utter a peevish word.

In diligence he was unwearied. In summer, he rose between four and five in the morning; in winter, at six; and prosecuted his studies till eight in the evening. The hours which thousands waste in sleep, he busily employed in prayer, in reading, or writing. Formal visits he disrelished; and often said he would much rather compose a sermon, than spend an hour in these. His people knew his disposition: and seldom invited him out, or called on him, without some errand of importance. The number of his publications is a proof of his diligence; especially as he was accustomed to write his manuscripts several times over, and never employed an amanuensis: nor were his ministerial labours ever relaxed.

Besides expounding a part of Scripture, he preached three sermons every Lord's Day, excepting a short while, in the depth of winter. During the months, when, as Professor of Divinity under the Associate Synod, he was engaged in teaching the students, and his pulpit was supplied by his brethren, he frequently went a considerable number of miles, and preached to a congregation for whom no sermon had been provided. He visited, ministerially, every family of his church once a year, and twice a year catechised them ; besides his frequent instructions, often weekly, given to the children.

In charity he was exemplary. His income was indeed small ; but with what he had, it was his aim to do good to all, especially to the household of faith. It was his opinion, that every man is bound to devote at least the tenth part of his income to pious uses ; and, though he had a numerous family, he often exceeded this proportion. He exercised a degree of economy in expences on his own person, which some of his brethren thought to be extreme. It appeared clearly however, that his sole object in this frugality of expenditure on himself, was, that he might be the more enabled "to give to him that needed." His aims were frequently accompanied with good counsels, that while the body was supplied, the salvation of the soul might not be neglected. To poor congregations who requested a collection from his people, rather than burthen them (being small in number, and generally poor) he several times sent considerable sums out of his own pocket. Frequently did he cause the widow's heart to sing for joy ; while the stream ran in a channel so concealed, that the spring was never discovered, save by the family whose withered garden was refreshed by its waters.

As a minister, he was a faithful and humble servant of our Lord Jesus Christ. He possessed a peculiar talent in preaching discourses which tended to awaken the conscience and search the heart. But his greatest pleasure was to publish the glad tidings of salvation, and the free access which sinners, even the chief, have to the Saviour. His urgent reasonings with sinners, on God's behalf, will not soon be forgotten by those who heard them. He possessed a happy turn of mind in choosing subjects of sermons that suited the special occurrences of Providence towards the nation in general, or the circumstances of his own congregation in particular. Though his learning was very considerable, he never made a shew of it in the pulpit. His object was not to exalt himself, but that Saviour whom God delighteth to honour ; and to bring down, as far as possible, the great truths of religion to the level of common capacities. He often repeated Archbishop Usher's saying ;—"It will take all our learning to make things plain." Great was his boldness and fidelity in addressing immortal souls. A respectable English divine, who about thirty years ago heard him for some time in his own meeting-house, says, "I well remember a searching sermon he preached from these words, 'What went ye out for to see?' &c. Although at that time I had no experimental acquaintance with the truth as it is in Jesus, yet his grave appearance in the pulpit, his solemn, weighty, and energetic way of speaking, used to affect me very much. Certainly his preaching was close, and his address to the conscience pungent. Like his Lord and Master, he spake with authority and hallowed pathos, having himself tasted the sweetness, and felt the power of what he had delivered." If the style of his printed sermons should not please the more polished reader, his own congregation will attest, that such was the earnest manner of his delivery, as to make it scarcely possible to hear him, and not be deeply and seriously affected. Avowed infidels have sometimes been struck with this ; and though they laughed at others,—when they heard him, were forced to listen with gravity and deep attention. He was never backward to preach, if sinners were willing to hear. Instead of reckoning it a burden, he accounted it a grace given to him to preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. It was his usual practice, both before and after he came from public worship, to retire to his closet and pour out his heart in prayer. Trifling conversation at any time, but especially after being engaged in the solemnities of Christian worship, he peculiarly detested. In visiting the sick, he was very industrious. His visits were never tedious ; but, according to his opportunity, frequent. When any of his people were in affliction, he visited them immediately, if possible, on being informed : nor was he backward to shew sympathy to those of other denominations, when told that his visit would be acceptable. His public prayers were commonly short, except on days of fasting and thanksgiving; and then he prayed with such fervour and importunity, as had a remarkable tendency to elevate the devotions of his fellow-worshippers.

None more earnestly wished the spreading of the blessed Gospel. He gladly undertook many long and severe journeys to congregations destitute of pastors, where he might have access, to preach the glad tidings of salvation. He greatly rejoiced in the success of Brainerd, and other Missionaries; and often in preaching, when his subject would admit, descanted with much pleasure on Missions to the Heathen world. Of this he was peculiarly fond, a few years before his death. Meetings for prayer and religious conversation, he laboured to encourage, not merely by recommending them from the pulpit, but by frequently attending them himself. Those in the town, he visited, if possible, once a-week; those in the country, as often as he had opportunity. Persons weak in knowledge, who attended them, he kindly encouraged, by shewing respect to such remarks as they made on divine truths.

Early religion he warmly pressed. Sometimes he preached a sermon, or a course of sermons, to the young; and, in the application of his other discourses, he frequently introduced an exhortation to them. He often catechised them, either in the schools, or in the meeting-house; and seldom met with young persons but he introduced some observations respecting the misery of their natural state, and the method of recovery by the Redeemer. Several of these hints seem to have had a good effect. For some years, a meeting of seven or eight children was held in his manse,* for prayer, praise, and spiritual conference; and though it was commonly on Saturday evenings, he frequently left his studies for half an hour, went into the little religious society, conversed familiarly with them, and, after giving them good counsels, recommended them to God, in prayer, while the dear young ones were kneeling around.

He met with trials from the irregular behaviour of some few members of his church; but when any fell into open and heinous transgressions, it grieved his spirit so much, as not unfrequently to deprive him of his night's rest. When he understood that differences existed between members of the church, he made it his business to have them speedily removed; and was particularly active this way, especially in view of the dispensation of the Lord's Supper.

His success in the ministry was very considerable. In his own congregation, it is hoped, that a number claimed him for their spiritual father; and that others acknowledged him to be the helper of their faith and joy. Nor was it at home only that he was instrumental in doing good to souls: in various parts of the country where he had access to preach, there were seals of his ministry. It is true the success was frequently hid from himself; and while his Master secured the honour of making the word efficacious, he left the servant to cry, "I have laboured in vain; I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain." His natural modesty prevented him from cultivating acquaintance with many who valued his writings. He was honoured, however, with the correspondence of the late Rev. Messrs. John Mason, of New York; Annan, of Boston; Archibald Hall, of Well-Street, London; with that also of the Rev. Mr. Philips, late of Sarum; the Rev. Mr. Simeon, of Cambridge; the late Countess of Huntingdon, and others. He received a kind and earnest invitation from the Dutch church in the province of New York, to be their Tutor in Divinity. This invitation, as well as his correspondence with the excellent personage last mentioned, he modestly studied to conceal from the knowledge of all.

As a member of society, he endeavoured to know the mind of God in regard to every particular part of his duty; and having found the truth, he avowed and acted upon it without disguise. When truths of importance were opposed, zeal for his Master and regard to mankind, brought him forward in their defence. This gave rise to such of his writings as were controversial. His peculiar principles, as a Seceder, never appear in his practical treatises. From conviction of duty, he first joined the Secession, and continued its steady friend as long as he lived; while, at the same time, he discovered the strongest affection to gospel ministers and private Christians of the established church, and other denominations. His prayers were always liberal and catholic. He seemed peculiarly concerned for the Anti-Burgher congregation in the neighbourhood, and for the parish-church, especially at the time of their sacramental solemnities. In regard to what is called Church-communion, he was strict; but as to the communion of saints, as distinguished from it, he was truly liberal. For years, a praying society met in his house; some of the members of which belonged to the Established Church, and some to the Secession.

He manifested singular readiness to forgive his enemies. Notwithstanding the abuse which he received while he was a student, it was remarked that he was never heard to open his mouth against the authors of it, or so much as mention the affair.

To certain writers who reviled him from the press, he meekly replied, "Whatever they wish me, my heart's desire is, that they may obtain redemption through the blood of Christ, even the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace. Whatever they call me, may Jehovah call them the Redeemed of the Lord, Sought out, and Not forsaken." To a minister of another denomination, who had treated him with much incivility, he was enabled, by the grace of God, to afford supply in the day of his brother's poverty, by secret remittances of money; and after his decease, he offered to take one of his destitute orphans, and bring him up with his own children.

On the settlement of any of his students, as fixed pastor to a congregation, he usually sent him a paper of excellent counsels in regard to the exercise of his ministry. There are many valuable letters in the possession of the children of deceased ministers and private Christians, full of scriptural and suitable comfort and advice, which he sent on the death of their parents. Many a time did he wipe off the tear from the widow's face, by leading her faith to the promises of the covenant, and ministering to the supply of her necessities. He was singularly backward to believe ill reports of any, but especially of those who fill public stations; being convinced that such reports have very often no foundation, and produce the very worst effects. Therefore, as he would not suffer others to attack characters in his presence, he himself most conscientiously avoided the defiling practice.

As tutor to candidates for the holy ministry, his care was to give them a connected view of Gospel-truth, both doctrinal and practical; and that they might be able to support and illustrate the several articles of our holy religion, he endeavoured to render them mighty in the Scriptures. In his System of Divinity and Cases of Conscience, the public have a view of the particular topics which he used to explain to his pupils at large. It was his concern also to make them acquainted with the history of the church; and what he published on this subject he had compiled chiefly for them. He urged with great earnestness on their minds, to make themselves well acquainted with the oracles of God in the original tongues. Next to these, he recommended the Compendium of Turretine; Owen's Works; Fisher's Work on the Assembly's Catechism; the Writings of Boston, and the Erskines; the Marrow of Modern Divinity, with Boston's Notes; Marshall on Sanctification; Cole on God's Sovereignty; Hervey's Theron and Aspasio, with his Defence against Wesley; Beart's Vindication of the Law and Gospel; Halyburton's Defence of Revealed Religion; his Memoirs, together with those of Alexander Archibald, published at Edinburgh in 1768. He earnestly warned his students against a merely philosophical way of studying divinity; and strenuously pressed on their minds the absolute necessity of heart-religion, that they might make proficiency in their studies. His address to them, prefixed to his system, clearly evinces that he regarded this as a matter of the very last importance. No man could bear more patiently with the imprudence and weakness of some of them; and yet when there was occasion, he most faithfully admonished them. His admonitions indeed deeply impressed the consciences, and were long and gratefully remembered. He was, in truth, among them, as a father among his children: he loved them, and studied their good; and they loved him, and regarded his counsel. No season of the year was so pleasant, either to the professor or to the students, as the time of attending the Divinity-Hall. The serious and solemn addresses which, on particular occasions, he made to them, and especially when they parted, were affecting indeed, and calculated to leave the best impressions. Many of his sayings at those times, it is believed, will never be forgotten by those who heard him. The many able, useful, and acceptable ministers, both in Great Britain and Ireland, whom he trained up for the sacred office, evince the ample success with which the Lord crowned his labours.

For some years before Mr. Brown died, he was troubled with a weakness in his stomach, brought on likely by his severe studies and labours. In the months of February and March 1787, this weakness increased. His friends observed it with grief, and accordingly desired him to desist at least from part of his public work. Eager to warn sinners of their danger, and to commend his Lord, he told them I am determined to hold to Christ's work as long as I can. How can a dying man spend his last breath better than in preaching Christ? On the 25th of February, which was his last Sabbath in the pulpit, he preached from Luke ii. 26. "It was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, till he should see the Lord's Christ." In the close of his sermon he took a solemn farewell of his own congregation, and plainly intimated, that in the pulpit they would see his face no more. Though now he was scarcely able to support himself, yet he continued his evening sermon, and seemed to preach with more correctness than ever. He preached his last sermon from Acts xiii. 26. "To you is the word of this salvation sent." As in the afternoon he had addressed the people immediately connected with himself, in the evening he, in a very affecting manner, bade adieu to his hearers, mostly members of the established church.

He uttered the following expressions during his last illness at different times, If Christ be magnified in my life, that is the great matter I wish for. Often we read history as Atheists or Deists, rather than as Christians. To read events without observing the hand of God in them, is to read as Atheists; and, to read and not observe how all events conduce to carry on the work of redemption, is to read as Deists. A piece of history hath often amused me when my natural spirits were low; but now I find no pleasure except in meditating on the promises of God.

The doctrine of grace reigning through righteousness, is good to live with, and good to die with. Oh! what a happy life a Christian might have, if he were always persuaded of the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord! If there were any such thing as exchange of learning, I would willingly quit with all my knowledge of languages and other things, were it a thousand times more extensive, experimentally to know what that meaneth—"I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I love by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." I think that this evening, I am no worse; but do not wish to have a will in the matter: only I would not desire to live, and not be able for Christ's work; though perhaps, were God so ordering it, he would enable me to bear that too. No doubt I have met with trials as well as others; yet the Lord hath always been so kind to me, that I think if he were to give me as many years as I have lived in this world, I would not desire one single circumstance in my lot to be changed, but that I had less sin. I have often wondered at the favour which men have shewn to me; but much more at the favour of God to such a great transgressor. Oh! to be with God! to see him as he is! to know him even as we are known! It is worth not merely doing for, but dying for, to see a gracious God.

About the year.—, God said to my soul, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love;" and oh! how faithful he hath been to me since. There would not have been more grace shewn in the redemption of the chief of devils, than in saving me. The same price would have ransomed them; the same strivings would have overcome them. Men may talk against the sovereignty of redeeming love as they will; but had it not been sovereign, infinitely sovereign, I should as certainly have been damned as if I were in Hell already. Were it not that God foresaw our provocations from eternity, he never could have continued his love towards me, the great transgressor, the arrant rebel. Yet, I hope, he is now preparing me for being ever with himself.

Oh! how these words—"He loved me, and gave himself for me," once penetrated my heart, and made me cry, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name." Notwithstanding all my wickedness, God hath put a bridle in my mouth; and though I have been a most perverse sinner, yet he hath strangely restrained me. This he hath done chiefly by his loving kindness and tender mercy.

I desire to depart, and be with Christ, which is far better than life. Though I have lived sixty years very comfortably, yet I would gladly turn my back on you all to be with Christ. Oh! how pleasant to enjoy fellowship with Christ! Any little acquaintance I have had with him, deeply convinceth me of this. And, oh! how much more pleasure might I have had, but for my own folly and wickedness! I now think that I could willingly die to see "him, who is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand."

Addressing himself to his two sons in the ministry, he said, with peculiar earnestness, Oh! labour, labour for Christ, while you have strength. I now repent that I have been so lazy and slothful in his service. Oh! commend Jesus. I have been looking at him for these many years, and yet never could find a flaw in him, but what was of my own making; but he has seen ten thousand faults in me. Justly may he say of me,—"Sixty years long have I been grieved with this rebel;" and as justly may I add, "where my sin hath abounded, God's grace hath much more abounded." Oh! how comely and gracious a personage hath Jesus been in my sight! Many a kind friend I have had, but none like Christ in loving-kindness and tender mercies. I know not if I shall ever see you together again; but oh! labour to win souls to Christ. There is none like Christ. I am sure, a poor worthless wretch he has had of me; but a precious, superlatively precious Christ I have had of him. Never grudge either purse or person for him. I can say I was never a loser by any time spent, or by any money given for him.

At another time—Oh! the pains, said he, God has been at to save me, and the pains I have been at to destroy myself! But he hath partly gained, and, I hope, he will completely gain the victory. I find reading tires me, walking tires me, riding tires me; but were I once with Jesus above, fellowship with him will never tire. "So shall we be for ever with the Lord." If doubting, disputing, and trampling on his kindness, could have made him change his love, it would never have been continued to me. Though I have never been left to commit gross crimes, yet he knows the outrageous wickedness of my heart; such wickedness as would have provoked any but a God of infinite love, to cast me into hell. Yet lo! instead of casting me thither, he takes me to his bosom, and says, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." How hath the Lord borne and carried me! He hath indeed visited me with stripes; but never except when I richly deserved them.

I was young when left by my parents; yet their instructions, accompanied with God's dealings, made such an impression on my heart, as I hope will continue with me to all eternity. I have served several masters; but none so kind as Christ. I have dealt with many honest men; but no creditor like Christ. Had I ten thousand hearts, they should all be given to Christ; and had I ten thousand bodies, they should all be employed in labouring for his honour.—Repeating these words; "Thou art my God, I will prepare thee a habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt thee,"—he added, we should reckon him a madman who would throw away a father's estate; but he is infinitely more foolish who would cast off a father's God. Oh! what kindness God has heaped upon me since the year.—! Oh! what kind strugglings! what kind smiles! what kind overlookings of my outrageous wickedness! Of a truth, he hath shewed himself to be God, and not man, in his dealings with me. In my mad attempts, he hath often stopped me; my mad wishes he hath often refused to grant; and my mad words he hath often seemed to overlook. Under the pressure of bodily pain, he would repeat these lines of Watts with much feeling:—

"Soon may the storms of trouble beat
The house of bondage down,
And let the prisoner fly!"

and add, I wonder I have so much health as I have. Many of my fellow-sinners, and many who have never sinned to my extent, are now in the place of torment, without any hope of deliverance, while my heart is in a measure filled with God's praise.

Hearing of the more enlarged spread of the Gospel—Well, said he, may it spread! It is the alone source of my comfort, and every sinner is as welcome as I. How pleasant, that neither great sins nor great troubles can alter these consolations! These words were once sweetly impressed on my heart—"Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." How it delighted me to see God taking advantage of my great sinfulness, to make manifest his greater grace. Oh! the sovereignty of God! I think he hath used more means to subdue the enmity of my heart, and its rebellion, than he hath used for a hundred besides. How astonishing, said he, as he was taking a little wine, that God's Son should be obliged to take gall and vinegar to drink, when his thirst was great, and I have wine when my thirst is by no means excessive! How I long to drink of the new wine of my Father's kingdom, which will hurt neither head nor heart!—Oh! that I had all the world around me, that I might tell them of Christ! Had I ten thousand tongues, and ten thousand hearts, and were employing them all in the commendation of Christ, I could not do for his honour what he hath deserved, considering his kindness to me.

"He hateth putting away." I am sure I have found that to be true: for oh! the provocations I have given to God to cast me off; and yet, to this day, he crowneth me with loving-kindness and tender mercies! How astonishing the necessity of the love of the Son of God! once, I thought, I got a ravishing sight of the necessity of his loving me, the sinner. He said, "Other sheep I have; these also must I bring." Oh! his kindness! his kindness!—I have shared of his frowns as well as of his smiles—little frowns in comparison with what I deserved. Yet, whenever I abused those frowns, as well as his smiles, he hath ever overcome me with tender mercies. I am weak, but I am well, considering I am such a sinner. Truly I may say, "Goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life;" and I hope to dwell in the house of the Lord for ever. Oh! to be where they hunger no more; neither thirst any more; but are filled with the fatness of God's house!

To one of his younger children he said with great earnestness, Now cry to God, "Thou art my Father." I do not think I was older than you when God caused me to claim him; and oh! God has been a good Father to me! It is long since God said to me, "Leave thy fatherless children with me, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widow trust in me." As I know not but I am dying of this illness, I have endeavoured to cast you on the Lord. But see also that you cast yourself upon him.—At another time, Were it not that the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin, damnation would be my lot; but "in him I have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sin, according to the riches of his grace;" and if Christ be glorified to the highest, and I ashamed to the lowest, I am content.

I remember that, about the year —, I was breathing out slaughter against the Lord, "but I obtained mercy;" and had I been offered the crown of Britain, instead of the fellowship with Christ, which I soon after enjoyed, I should not have hesitated a moment about choosing the latter. How strange a kind of debt is the debt of grace! Were I even now two or three hundred pounds in debt to any man, it would considerably distress me; but my views of my debt to free grace, greatly refresh my heart. God hath been heaping favours on me these forty years past; and I will say, to his honour, that he hath made days of affliction always the happiest. Indeed, I think, I have seldom had very sweet days except when I met with affliction, one way or another. I do not expect to see it; yet it is the joy of my heart, that the time is coming when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." Dead churches shall yet be quickened; apostate churches shall yet be recovered; and churches be planted where there were none before. I could wish to live and die a deep, deep debtor to mercy; and that none of my works should ever be mentioned but as manifestations of mercy, and as means of promoting the work of mercy in the welfare of others. Though pride prevail much in my heart, yet I think I would trample it thus far under my feet, as that I should be glad to see my students, and not only they, but all the faithful Ministers of Jesus, bringing hundreds or thousands of souls with them into Heaven, though I should have but five or six. Oh! how happy should I be, when I depart to Heaven, were I able to tell this news to the redeemed millions, that the Holy Ghost had been remarkably poured down on East Lothian, and that there was not now a family in which the worship of God was not observed! It must greatly delight the redeemed above, to hear of Christ's glory being displayed, and of souls being saved on earth. Ever since God dealt savingly with my heart, I have never had any comfort in the thought that my sins were small, but in the belief that "the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin;" and in the consideration of God's mercy being higher than the Heavens. It might be written on my coffin, "Here lies one of the cares of Providence, who early lost both father and mother, and yet never missed them." I should not wish there should ever be the least appearance of avarice of the world in me. I can trust my family to Providence; and if, when I am in heaven, it shall appear that one has been converted by means of any thing I ever wrote, I shall mark down one hundred pounds; if there should be two, I will say there is two hundred pounds; and if twenty, there is something of more value than two thousand pounds. That is the reward I wish for of my writings. God deals so tenderly with me in my afflictions, as if every stroke went nearer to his own heart than to mine. The command is, Owe no man any thing:—what a mercy is it that there is no such precept as this, Owe a Saviour nothing—or even this, Study to owe him as little as possible.—I confess that I should not like to stand at the market-cross, with a paper on my breast, declaring I was a bankrupt to men: but oh! I think I should love to stand in the most public place in all Heaven, having all the redeemed pointing to me, as the greatest sinner that ever was saved.—On hearing the usual demonstrations of joy on the King's birth-day, he said, Blessed be God that "unto us was born, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord;" on account of that event, the gospel-bells have been sounding for ages past, and they will ring louder and louder still.

On being carried out of his chaise,—How strange, said he that I, a poor cottager's son, should have a chaise to ride in! but what is unspeakably more strange, that God should provide the chariot of the New Covenant for my soul! In the former case, he hath raised me from the dunghill, and set me with men of name and family on the earth; but in the latter, he hath exalted the sinner, and made him to sit with the Prince of the kings of the earth. No doubt, I should love to be at my public work again; and had it been any other than God who has restrained me, I should not have taken it well: but as it is the Lord, I desire to submit. No doubt, but I feel a deep concern for my wife and children; but when my heart enters properly into these words, "Be for ever with the Lord," the leaving of them diminishes into a very small point; and although my natural affection for them be as strong as ever, I hope that, when I am away, Christ will far more than supply my room to them; and then we shall be better on all hands. I wonder at the kindness of men to me; but am especially amazed while I reflect, that it is all the kindness of my God to me, through them.

June 17. He was now become exceedingly weak, and spake little; but the solid joy of God's salvation, and the peace that passeth all understanding, continued with him to the end. On one occasion at this time, he said to a brother in the ministry,—O Mr. —, the Lord is my strength and my song, and he is become my salvation. God is an everlasting Rock.—The last words he was heard to utter were "My Christ!" About four hours after, he fell asleep in Jesus, June 19, 1787.

N. B. These sayings of his, grave and heavenly as they are (and many more such he uttered) lose much of their energy by the occasions not being mentioned which gave rise to them.

A DICTIONARY

OF THE HOLY BIBLE.

A A R

AARON, a Levite, the son of Amram, and brother of Moses and Miriam. He was born in the year of the world 2430, about a year before Pharaoh ordered the male infants of the Hebrews to be slain. When he was grown up, he married Elisheba the daughter of Aminadab, a chief prince of the tribe of Judah, and had by her four sons, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar. Exod. vi. 20, 23. He was a holy and compassionate man, an excellent speaker, and appointed of God to be spokesman for his brother Moses to Pharaoh, and the Hebrews; ch. iv. 14—16. Along with his brother, he intimated to his distressed kinsmen, God's gracious purpose of their speedy deliverance; and, in the name of God, demanded of Pharaoh an immediate allowance for them to go into the wilderness of Arabia, to serve the Lord their God. Pharaoh ordered Aaron and Moses to be gone from his presence, and increased the Hebrews' servitude, by denying them straw wherewith to make their bricks. Aaron and Moses were hereupon upbraided and cursed by their brethren, for asking their dismissal, and so occasioning an aggravation of their labour and misery. ch. v. 21.

About two months afterwards, while the Hebrews, newly delivered from Egypt, fought with Amalek in Rephidim, Aaron and Hur attended Moses to the top of an adjacent hill, and held up his hands, while he continued encouraging the struggling Hebrews, and praying for victory to them. ch. xvii. 10—13. At Sinai, he, with his two eldest sons, and seventy of the elders of Israel, accompanied Moses part of his way up to the mount; and, without receiving any hurt, had very near and distinct views of the glorious symbols of the divine presence, when the Lord talked with Moses, ch. xxiv. 1, 2, 9—11. Almost immediately afterwards, he and his posterity were divinely chosen to execute the office of priesthood among the Jews, till the coming and death of the promised Messiah. ch. xxviii. 1. Scarcely was this distinguished honour assigned him, when, to mark his personal insufficiency for recommending others to the favour of God, he himself fell into the most grievous crime. The Hebrews having solicited him to make them gods, to be their directors instead of Moses, who still tarried in the mount, he ordered them to bring him all their pendants and ear-rings. These were brought, perhaps more readily than he expected; and having collected them into a bag, he caused them to be melted down into a golden calf, in imitation of the ox Apis, which the natives, and probably too many of the Hebrews, had adored in Egypt. This idol he ordered them to place on a pedestal, to render it the more conspicuous: he also appointed a solemn feast to be observed to its honour, and caused to proclaim before it, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt." While he was thus occupied, Moses descended from mount Sinai, and sharply reproved him for this horrid offence. Amidst the deepest confusion, he attempted to excuse himself, by laying the blame on the wickedness of the people; and by a false and stupid pretence, that he had but cast the ear-rings into the fire, and the golden calf had been formed out of them by mere chance. ch. xxxii.

Aaron heartily repented of this scandalous crime; and, with his four sons, was, about two months afterwards, solemnly invested with the sacred robes, and consecrated by solemn washing, unction, and sacrifices, to his office of priesthood, Lev. viii. He immediately offered sacrifices for the congregation of Israel; and while he and his brother Moses blessed the people, the sacred fire descended from heaven, and consumed what lay on the brazen altar. ch. ix. 24. His two eldest sons, perhaps intoxicated with wine drunk at their consecration, instead of taking sacred fire from the brazen altar, took common fire to burn the incense with on the golden altar. Provoked with their inattention and disobedience, God immediately consumed them with a flash of lightning; and ordered, that henceforth no priest should taste wine when he was going to officiate in holy things. Aaron was entirely resigned to this just but awful stroke; nor did he and his surviving sons make any lamentation for them, except forbearing to eat the flesh of the people's sin-offering that day, id. x.

It was perhaps scarcely a year afterwards, when Aaron and Miriam, envying the authority of Moses, rudely upbraided him for his marriage with Zipporah the Midianite; and for overlooking them in the constitution of the seventy elders. Aaron, whose priestly performances were daily necessary, was spared, but Miriam was smitten with an universal leprosy. Aaron immediately discerned his guilt, acknowledged his fault, begged forgiveness for himself and his sister; and that she might speedily be restored to health, Numb. xii. It was not long afterwards, when KORAH and his company, envying the honours of Aaron, thought to thrust themselves into the office of priests. These rebels being miraculously destroyed by God, the Hebrews reviled Moses and Aaron as guilty of murdering them; the Lord, provoked herewith, sent a destructive plague among the people, which threatened to consume the whole congregation. Aaron, who had lately, by his prayers, prevented their being totally ruined along with Korah, now generously risked his own life for the deliverance of his ungrateful and injurious brethren: he ran in between the living and the dead, and, by offering of incense, atoned for their trespass, and so the plague was stayed. To reward this benevolent deed, and prevent future contention about the priesthood, God confirmed it to Aaron, by making his rod all of a sudden when laid up before the mercy-seat, blossom and bear almonds; while the rods for the other Hebrew tribes continued in their withered condition. Numb. xvi. and xvii.

We hear no more of Aaron, till at Meribah he and his brother Moses sinned, in not sufficiently expressing their confidence in God's providing water for the congregation. To punish this, and to mark the insufficiency of the Aaronic priesthood, for bringing men to the heavenly inheritance, Aaron was debarred from entering Canaan. About a year before the Hebrews entered that country, and while they encamped at Mosera, he, at the commandment of the Lord, went up to mount Hor; and his sacred robes being stripped off him by Moses, and put on Eleazar his son and successor, he suddenly expired in the Lord, aged 123 years, A. M. 2552: his own sons and brother buried him in a cave, and all the Israelites mourned for him thirty days. Numb. xx. Deut. x. 6. His offspring were called Aaronites; and were so numerous, as to have thirteen cities assigned them out of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. 1 Chron. xii. 27. and vi. 64—69. Josh. xxi. 13—19.

Some good authors think the story of the Heathen Mercury to have been fabricated out of Aaron's. But may we not, with far more edification, consider him as a personal type of Jesus Christ? Heb. v. 4, 5. His call to his office of priesthood, was seasonable and divinely solemn: an unmeasurable unction of the Holy Ghost, and perfect purity of nature, prepared him for the execution thereof: miracles unnumbered; the destruction of his Jewish and other enemies; the marvellous budding of his gospel rod, in the conversion and sanctification of men, abundantly confirm it. He is the leader of his people from their spiritual bondage; and he guides, justifies, and sanctifies them in their wilderness journey. He is their great prophet, who can speak well to their respective cases and doubts. He is their distinguished High-priest, and the spiritual Father of all the innumerable company of men, who are made priests unto God. With unequalled purity, patience, pity, courage, and labour, he, amidst inconceivable injuries and temptations, faithfully executes his work. At the expense of his life, he averted the burning plague of endless vengeance from his unreasonable foes: and having finished his work of obedience, he publicly and willingly, on Calvary, surrendered himself unto death; bequeathing his robes of finished righteousness to his spiritual seed.

AB, the eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of their sacred. It answers to the moon that begins in July, and consists of thirty days. On the first day, the Jews observe a fast for the death of Aaron: on the 9th, a fast for the debarring of the murmuring Hebrews from the promised land, and for the burning of the first and second temple: on the 18th, a fast for the extinction of the evening lamp during the reign of Abaz; and on the 24th, a feast in memory of the abolishment of the Sadducean law, which required sons and daughters to be equal heirs of their parents' estate.

A-BAD'DON, which signifies destruction; and APOLYON, the destroyer, is the name of the king and head of the apocalyptic LOCUSTS, under the fifth trumpet. His name is marked both in Hebrew and Greek, to intimate, that he is a destroyer both of Jews and Gentiles. But who he is, is not so universally agreed. Some think him the devil, who goes about seeking whom he may devour. Without excluding Satan, who was a murderer from the beginning, we suppose the Spirit of God, by this king of the locusts, this angel of the bottomless pit, directly designs the Popes, those sons of perdition, who, at the head of their numerous clergy, and other agents, ruin the souls and murder the bodies of inconceivable multitudes of men;—and Mahomet and his inferior agents, who, partly with delusion, and partly with ravage and murder, have destroyed infinite numbers. It would be shocking to relate, what thousands and millions were murdered by Hejajus and Abu Moslem, Saracens; Tamerlane the Tartar; Bajazet, and Mahomed II. Turks; Shah Abbas the Persian, and other heads of the Mahomedan party. Rev. ix. 11. See in ANTICHRIST, ARABIANS, SCYTHIANS.

AB-ANA and PHARPAR, two rivers of Syria, which Naaman the leper thought more fit to cure him of his unclean disease, than all the rivers of Israel. Abana is probably the same with Barrady or Chrysorroas, which springing from mount Lebanon, glides pleasantly towards the south; and, after running some leagues, is divided into three streams: the middlemost and largest runs directly through the city of Damascus, and the other two run one on each side of the city, and fertilize the gardens to an uncommon degree. The streams uniting to the southward of the city are, after, a course of about five leagues, lost in a dry desert. Benjamin of Tudela will have that part of the Barrady which runs through Damascus, to be Abana, and the streams which water the gardens without the city to be Pharpar; but perhaps the Pharpar is the same with Orontes, the most noted river of Syria, which taking its rise a little to the north or north-east of Damascus, glides through a delightful plain, till after passing Antioch, and running about 200 miles to the north-west, it loses itself in the Mediterranean sea. 2 Kings v. 12.

AB'A-RIM, a general name given to a ridge of rugged hills on the east of Jordan, on the south and north of the river Arnon. They reached into the territories of both the Kenhenites and Moabites. It is likely they had this name from the ABARIM, or passages, between the noted hills of PISGAH, NEBO, PSOR, &c.; all which were part of them. Near these mountains the Israelites had several encampments. Numb. xxxiii. 44-48. and xxvii. 12.

ABASE, signifies to treat with contempt; to reduce to meanness and poverty. Dan. iv. 37. Job xl. 11. One is abased when deprived of honour and wealth, and laid under poverty, affliction, or contempt. Phil. iv. 12. One abases himself when he behaves in a humble and debased manner, as Paul did, when he, though a preacher, laboured with his hands for his daily bread. 2 Cor. xi. 7.

ABATE, to grow lower, less. Gen. viii. 3. Deut. xxiv. 7. to make less. Lev. xxvii. 18.

AB'BA, a Syriac word signifying father. It being the same whether we read it backward or forward, may perhaps hint to us, that God's fatherly affection to his people is the same whether he smile on them by prosperity, or chasten them by heavy crosses and sore adversity. The Spirit of adoption making the saints to cry ABBA, FATHER, imports, that by his influence, both Jews and Gentiles, as one united body, have the most assured faith in, love to, and familiar intercourse with God. Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 6.

AB'DON. (1.) The son of Hillel an Ephraimite. He succeeded Elon, A. M. 2540: and judged the Israelites eight years; after which he died, and was buried at Pirathon in the land of Ephraim. He left forty sons, and thirty grandsons, who rode on ass-colts, according to the manner of the great men of that age, Judg. xii. 13. (2.) The son of Micah, one of JOSIAH's messengers sent to consult HULDAH, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20. (3.) A city which belonged to the tribe of Asher; and was given to the Levites of Gershon's family. Josh. xxi. 30.

A-BED'NE-GO. See SHADRACH.

ABEL, the second son of Adam and Eve, was born, perhaps with a twin sister, A. M. 2d or 3d. It seems his parents, by this time were sufficiently convinced of the vanity of all created enjoyments, and hoped but little from him; and so marked his name with cavity. When he was grown up, he became the shepherd of his father's flock. At the end of days, that is, on the Sabbath, or on the beginning of the year, he by faith in the divine institution of sacrifices, and in the promised Messiah thereby prefigured, offered unto God the best of his flock. By consuming his oblation with a flash of fire from heaven, or by some other visible token, God marked his regard to him, and to it. No such honour being done to Cain, who at the same time, offered the fruits of his field, he conceived an implacable grudge at Abel, on account of his holyconduct, and the peculiar regard which had been shewn him by God. He rested not, till he murdered him in the field; and it seems secretly buried him in the earth, about A. M. 128. His murder was divinely resented with distinguished vengeance on the head of Cain, who, together with his seed, were cast out from the church of God. Gen. iv. 2-10. Heb. xi. 4. Abel being dead yet speaketh; his example teacheth us to live by faith on a crucified Redeemer; and to behave soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, to whatever persecution it may expose us. Heb. xii. 4. His blood cried for vengeance on Cain the murderer. Heb. xii. 24.

Was our adored Jesus prefigured by this first martyr? He grew as a root out of a dry ground, appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh, and had his name covered with the basest and vilest reproach. He is the great shepherd of his Father's flock of ransomed men. In the faith of his Father's call and assistance, he offered the infinitely excellent sacrifice of himself. The horrid murder of him, by his malicious brethren the Jews, issued in the terrible judgments of Heaven on them and their seed. And he yet speaketh to men in his example, oracles, and ordinances.

2. ABEL, otherwise called the field of Joshua, was a place near Bethshemesh, so called, to commemorate the mourning of the Hebrews for their friends who were struck dead for looking into the ark. It seems a great stone was erected in memory of that wrathful event. 1 Sam vi. 18, 19.

3. ABEL-MIZRAIM, a place otherwise called the threshing floor of Atad. It was so called from the great mourning of the Egyptians over Jacob's corpse, as they carried it to Machpelah. It is thought to have been situated between Jordan and Jericho, where the city Bethoghlah was afterwards built: but we can hardly think it was so far east. Gen. i. 11. See JOSEPH.

4. ABEL-SHITTIM, a place seven or eight miles eastward of Jordan, over against Jericho, in the country of Moab, and near the hill Peor. Here the Hebrews encamped a little time before the death of Moses, and fell into idolatry and uncleanness through the enticement of the Moabitish, and chiefly the Midianitish women; and were punished with the death of 24,000 in one day. It was probably their mourning over this plague, that gave the name of ABEL to the spot. Numb. xxv.

5. ABEL-MEHOLOH, a city or place on the west of Jordan, pertaining to the half tribe of Manasseh. 1 Kings iv. 13. Jerome will have it ten miles, but others think it to have been about sixteen miles south from Bethshean. Not far from this city did Gideon miraculously defeat the MIDIANITES, Judg. vii. 22.; but its chief honour was from its being the native place of Elisha the prophet. 1 Kings xix. 16.

6. ABEL, ABEL-BETH-MAA-CHAH, ABEL-MAIM, a strong city somewhere about the south frontiers of mount Lebanon. It probably belonged to the tribe of Naphtali. Sheba the son of Bichri fled here, when pursued by David's troops. To free themselves from Joab's furious siege, the inhabitants, advised by a prudent woman, beheaded the rebel and threw his head over the wall. 2 Sam. xx. 14—22. About eighty years afterwards, Benhadad king of Syria took and ravaged it. 1 Kings xv. 20. About 200 years after which, Tiglathpilezer took it, and carried the inhabitants captive to Assyria. 2 Kings xv. 29. It was afterwards rebuilt, and became capital of the canton of Abilene.

To ABHOR. (1.) To loathe, detest. Deut. xxxii. 19. Job xlii. 6. (2.) To despise, neglect. Amos vi. 8. (3.) To reject, cast off. 1 Sam. lxxxix. 38. God's abhorring his anointed, if referred to Christ, imports his hiding his face from him, and executing the punishment due to our sins upon him. Psal. lxxxix. 38. God's not abhorring the affliction of the afflicted, imports his not overlooking it, but sympathizing with, and helping and comforting them under their troubles. Psal. xxii. 24. Job's clothes abhorred him, in marking the loathsome disease which his sins had brought on him. Job ix. 31. The carcases of the rejected Jews; of the ruined heathens under Constantine, &c.; and of the Antichristians and Mahometans, about the beginning of the millennium, are an abhorring to all flesh: vast numbers of slain did, or shall, pollute the very air. Such Jews as remain, since the destruction of their city and temple, are hated and contemned by all nations. Under and after Constantine, the heathens and their idols were detested by multitudes; and such shall, in a little time, be the condition of both Papists and Mahometans. Isa. lxvi. 24.

A-BI'A-THAR, the tenth high priest of the Jews, and fourth in descent from ELI. When Saul murdered AHIMELECH, his father, and the other priests at Nob, Abiathar escaped to David in the wilderness, and joined his party; and by him David consulted the Lord at Keilah and Ziklag. 1 Sam. xxii. and xxiii. 9. and xxx. 7. Saul had placed Zadok, a descendant of Eleazar, in the high-priesthood, instead of Abiathar; but when David came to the throne, he made Abiathar, and Zadok next to him the chief priests; and thus matters continued while David reigned. 2 Sam. xx. 25. Abiathar and Zadok designed to have attended David with the ark as he fled from Absalom; but he advised them to return with it, and procure him proper information. 2 Sam. xv. 24—29. Just before the death of King David, Abiathar treasonably conspired to render Adonijah his father's successor; and was by Solomon, forbidden the execution of his office, on that account; and confined to his city of Anathoth; and Zadok was put in his room. 1 Kings i. and ii. Thus was the family of Eli wrathfully put from the high-priesthood for ever. 1 Sam. ii. 29—36.

It is not Abiathar, but his son, that is called AHIMELECH, or Abimelech. Nor is it Abiathar's father, but himself that is mentioned, Mark ii. 26; for it is certain he then lived, and might have a great hand in procuring the shew bread for David: Nor does that text insinuate, that Abiathar then executed the office of high-priest.

A'BIB, or NISAN, the name of the first sacred and seventh civil month of the Jewish year. It contained thirty days; and answered to our moon of March. This word signifies green ears, or ripe fruit; and was given to this month, because in the middle thereof the Jews began their harvest. On the 10th day of this month the Paschal lamb was taken: on the evening of the 14th day they ate the passover; and on the seven days following they kept the feast of unleavened bread, the last of which was held as a solemn convocation. Exod. xii. xiii. On the 15th day they gathered their sheaf of the barley first-fruits, and on the 16th they offered it; after which they might begin their harvest. Lev. xxvi. 4—14. On the first day of it, the modern Jews observe a fast for the death of Nadab and Abihu; on the 10th a fast for the death of Miriam; on the 27th a fast for the death of Joshua: on the 29th they pray for the latter-rain. Their Megillath Taanith, however, takes no notice of any of these superadded solemnities; which to me is an evidence that they never universally obtained.

AB'I-GAIL, (1.) the sister of King David, wife of Jether, and mother of AMASA. 1 Chron. ii. 17. (2.) The wife of NABAL. She was a woman of great prudence and wisdom; but, perhaps by the covetousness of her parents, was married to a rich sot. When his rude behaviour to David's messengers had brought him and his family into the utmost danger, Abigail hearing of it by some of her servants, loaded several asses with provisions, and went to meet David. In the most polite and prudent manner, she tendered him her present. Her prudent address not only disarmed his rage, but procured him his highest esteem for her virtue. Returning to her husband, she told him the danger they had been in by his folly; and how she had prevented their ruin. He quickly died of a stupid melancholy; and she, not long after, was married to David. She bore to him two sons, Daniel, and Chileab; if these two names do not rather denote the same person. She was taken captive by the Amalekites when Ziklag was burnt; but in a few days was recovered by David her husband. 1 Sam. xxv. and xxx. 2 Sam. iii. 3. 1 Chron. iii. 1.

ABIDE, (1.) To stay; tarry. Gen. xxii. 5. (2.) To dwell, or live in a place. Gen. xxix. 19. (3.) To endure; suffer. Jer. x. 10. (4.) To continue. Eccl. viii. 15. (5.) To wait for. Acts xx. 23. (6.) To stand firm. Psal. cxix. 90. Christ and his Father make their abode with any one, when they bestow frequent and familiar influences of power, kindness, and inward comfort on his soul. John xiv. 23. Men abide in Christ, and his love, when, being united to him by faith, they continue cleaving to his person, believing in his love, and walking in his ways. Joan xv. 6, 10. Christ's word, or doctrine, abides in men, and they in it, when the knowledge and faith of its truth and excellency, the experience of its power and an open profession and careful observance of it, are continued in a fixed and constant manner.

A-BIJAH, ABIJAH, or ABIA, was the son of REHOBOAM, by his wife MAACHAH. He succeeded his father in the throne of Judah, A. M. 3046. He married fourteen wives, by whom he had twenty sons, and sixteen daughters. He reigned but three years; and imitated the impiety of his father. He was almost constantly at war with Jeroboam King of Israel. Once he took the field with 400,000, against Jeroboam: and 800,000. The armies being drawn up very near to each other, Abijah got him up to the top of mount Zemaraim, and harangued the troops of the enemy, to persuade them to return to their wonted subjection to the house of David, and to the true worship of God. Meanwhile, Jeroboam detached a part of his army around the hill, to attack the rear of Abijah's. Abijah and his forces, seeing themselves surrounded, cried to the Lord for help, and the priests sounded the silver trumpets. Such a sudden panic seized the host of Jeroboam, that Abijah's army cut off 500,000 of them on the spot; and pursuing the victory, took Bethel, Jeshanah, Ephraim, and a multitude of other places, from the ten tribes. 1 Kings xv. 1—7. 2 Chron. xi. 20. and xiii.

2. ABIJAH, the only gracious son of JEROBOAM. When he fell sick, the prophet AHLJAH told his mother that he should certainly die, and be the only one of Jeroboam's family who should die a natural death, and be dignified with funeral honours. He died the very moment of his mother's return to her house, and was greatly lamented by the people. 1 Kings xiv. 1—18.

3. ABIJAH, the wife of Ahaz, and mother of King Hezekiah. Some suppose her the daughter of Zechariah the high-priest, who was slain by King Joash: but nothing is more groundless. If she had been so, she must have been about ninety years of age, when Ahaz, a boy of ten years, married her, and had by her a child. 2 Chron. xxix. 1.

ABJECTS, most despicable persons. Psal. xxxv. 15.

AB'ILE'NE, a small canton in Hollow Syria, between Lebanon and Antilibanus. It appears to have been situated westward of Damascus; and to take its name from Abila, which probably was the same with Abelmiam. Lysanias was governor here in the 15th year of Tiberius. Luke iii. 1.

A-BIM'E-LECH, King of the Philistines, who dwelt in Gerar. Captivated by the beauty of SARAH, and informed by Abraham that she was his sister, he took her into his palace, intending to make her his wife. God permitted him not to take her to his bed; but appeared to him in a dream, and threatened him with a sudden death, if he did not immediately restore her to her husband: nay, already he had smitten him, and the women of his family, with a distemper, that rendered them incapable of procreation or child-birth. Abimelech excused himself to his Maker, from Abraham's pretence, that Sarah was but his sister. He nevertheless restored her the next day, severely chiding the patriarch for imposing on him. Abraham confessed she was indeed his wife; but was likewise his sister, by a different mother. Abimelech gave Abraham a number of valuable presents, and offered him a sojourning place in any part of his kingdom. He too, begged his prayers for the healing of his family; and cautioned him to beware of like dissimulation for the future. He also gave Sarah a thousand pieces of silver, or about 115*l.* sterling, to purchase a veil for covering her face, which still at ninety years of age, was comely and sparkling: thus she was publicly instructed and reproved. Abraham prayed for Abimelech's family, and they were cured of their distemper. About fourteen years afterwards, Abimelech, dreading danger to himself or posterity from the increase of Abraham's power, came with Phicol his chief captain, and begged he would enter into a covenant of friendship; which was readily granted. Gen. xx. and xxi. 22—32.

2. ABIMELECH, the son and successor of the former, was near being imposed on by Isaac, in the same manner as his father had been by Abraham: but happening from his window to espy some sportive familiarity between Isaac and Rebekah, he immediately concluded she was his wife, not his sister, as both Isaac and herself had pretended. He immediately sent for Isaac, and reproved him as guilty of what tended to involve him and his subjects in sin and punishment. Fear of losing his life, for the sake of his beautiful consort, was the only thing which Isaac pled in his own excuse. Abimelech, therefore, immediately issued orders that none of his subjects, under pain of death, should in the least injure Isaac or Rebekah. Abimelech, finding that his subjects, were terrified at, and mightily envied, the great prosperity and power of Isaac, he politely required him to leave his territories, because he was become mightier than they; or much increased at their expence. Some time afterwards, Abimelech, mindful of the league his father had made with Abraham, and dreading danger from the increase of Isaac's power and wealth, took with him Ahuzzath his friend, and Phicol his chief captain, and repairing to Isaac, solemnly renewed the covenant with him at Beersheba, and were there entertained by him with a splendid feast. Gen. xxvi.

3. ABIMELECH, King of Israel, was the bastard son of GIDEON, by his concubine at Shechem. He was a most wicked, aspiring, and cruel wretch. To procure the government for himself, he insinuated to the people of Shechem, how much better it would be for them to have him, their own citizen and relation, to be their governor, than to have all the threescore and ten sons of his father to rule over them. His Shechemite friends took for him out of the temple of their idol Baalberith seventy shekels of silver, or a little more than eight pounds sterling. With these he hired a band of vagabonds, who assisted him to murder, on one spot, at Ophrah, all his seventy brethren, JOTHAM, the youngest, only escaping. The Shechemites then made him king. It was on the occasion of the coronation, or soon after, that Jotham, from the top of mount Gerizim, an adjacent hill, pronounced his parable to the men of Shechem: importing, that their bestowal of the government on the most unworthy person in Gideon's family, and the ungrateful murderer of the rest, should issue in the speedy ruin of all concerned. The event quickly verified his prediction. Abimelech had not reigned above three years, when a disagreement took place between him and the men of Shechem. While, it seems, Abimelech removed his residence to Arumah, a place near Shechem, and left Zebul to inspect the city, Gaal the son of Ebed, and his friends, excited and headed the conspiracy. At one of their idolatrous feasts, they, in the most outrageous manner, contemned and cursed Abimelech. Informed of this by Zebul his officer, he marched his troops by night, in four bodies, against the Shechemites: Gaal and his friends, having no time to prepare themselves, were easily routed. On the following day, when the men of Shechem came out to the field, perhaps to the reaping, Abimelech and his troops fell upon and murdered them. He next took the city by assault, slew the inhabitants, and demolished the buildings. A thousand of the Shechemites fled to the temple of Baal-berith, hoping to defend themselves, or expecting the sanctity of the place would protect them: but Abimelech and his troops carried fuel from an adjacent wood, set fire to the temple, and consumed it, and all that were in it. He next marched to Thebez, a place about nine miles to the eastward. The inhabitants fled to a strong tower built in the midst of their city: Abimelech assaulted the tower with the utmost fury, and was just going to set fire to it, when a woman from the top of it struck him with a piece of a millstone, and brake his skull. He ordered his armour-bearer to thrust him through with his sword, that it might not be said he had been killed by a woman. His orders were executed, and he died, A. M. 2796; and his troops were dispersed. Judg. ix.

4. ABIMELECH. See ACHISH, and ANIMELECH.

A-BYRAM, (1.) the son of Eliab the Renbenite. He, with his brother Dathan, and KORAH, conspired to divest Moses and Aaron of the powers conferred on them by God; on which account he with his whole family and substance, were swallowed up alive by the earth. (2.) The eldest son of HIZEL the Bethelite: he lost his life, as his father founded the walls of Jericho. 1 Kings xvi. 24.

A-BISHA-I, the son of Zeruiah, the sister of David. He was a noted warrior, an early assistant, and steady friend to his uncle. Entering Saul's tent along with him, he insisted upon leave to despatch that tyrant, but was not allowed. 1 Sam. xxvi. 7—11. He served in David's wars with Ishbosheth, and vigorously pursued the flying enemy. In the war with the Edomites he cut off 18,000 of them in the valley of Salt. In the war with the Syrians and Ammonites he commanded the troops which engaged with, and routed the latter. In the war with the Philistines he killed Ishbubenob, a noted giant, who was about to murder his uncle and king. At another time, he alone attacked a body of three hundred, and killed the whole of them. Highly provoked with SHIMEI's railery, he begged his uncle's leave to cut off the insolent wretch, but was not permitted. He commanded a third part of the army which defeated Absalom, and headed the household troops who pursued Sheba the son of Bichri. 2 Sam. ii. 18—24; x. 10—14; xvi. 9—11; xviii. 2; xx. 6, 7; xxi. 15—17; xxiii. 18, 19; 1 Chron. ii. 16; xi. 20, 21; xviii. 12.

ABLE; of great or sufficient power, wisdom, or wealth. Heb. vii. 25; Numb. xlii. 30; Exod. xviii. 21; Lev. xiv. 22. ABLITY; (1.) Measure of wealth, Ezra ii. 69; (2.) Sufficiency of wisdom and prudence. Dan. i. 11.

ABNER the son of Ner. He was the uncle of king Saul, and the general of his army. Being mostly in the camp, and in a high station, it is not surprising that he knew not David at Ephes-dammim: but it was more culpable, that he guarded his master so ill in the camp at Hachila, when David and Abishai entered it, and went off without being perceived, 1 Sam. xiv. 50. xvii. 55—58. xxvi. 5—14. After Saul's death he made Ishbosheth king; and for seven years supported the family of Saul, in opposition to David; but in most of his skirmishes came off with loss. While Ishbosheth and David's troops rested near one another, hard by Gibeon, Abner challenged Joab to advance twelve of David's warriors, to fight with an equal number of his. Joab consented: the twenty-four engaged; and, taking each his fellow by the beard, and thrusting his sword into his side, they together fell down dead on the spot; a fierce battle ensued; Abner's troops were routed; and he himself was hotly pursued by Asahel: he begged him to stop his pursuit; and on his refusal, he killed him by a back-stroke of his spear. He was however, still pursued by Joab and Abishai, till he, who in the morning sported with murder, was obliged at even to beg that Joab would stop his troops from their hostile pursuit. 2 Sam. ii.

Not long afterwards, Abner being much displeased with Ishbosheth for charging him with lewd behaviour towards Rizpah, Saul's concubine, vowed he would quickly betray the whole kingdom into the hands of David; he had scarcely threatened it, when he commenced a correspondence with David, and had an interview with him at Hebron for that effect. Abner had just left the splendid feast wherewith David had entertained him, when Joab, informed of the matter, warmly remonstrated to his uncle that Abner had come as a spy. At his own hand he sent a messenger to invite him back, to have some further communication with the king. Abner was just come into Joab's presence, when he, partly from jealousy that Abner might become his superior, and partly to revenge his brother Asahel's death, mortally stabbed, while he pretended to salute him. Informed hereof, David heartily detested the fact, exclaimed against Joab, and honoured Abner with a splendid funeral, and a mournful elegy. 2 Sam. iii.

ABOARD, into the ship. Acts xxi. 2.

ABOLISH; (1.) To do away; make void; annul the obligation of. 2 Cor. iii. 13. Eph. ii. 15. (2.) To destroy; make to cease. Isa. ii. 18. 2 Tim. i. 10.

ABOMINABLE, ABOMINATION; a thing very hateful and loathsome, as unclean flesh and things offered to idols. Lev. xi. 10, 11. Isa. lxvi. 17. Sin is called abominable, or abomination: it is the reverse of the divine perfections and law; it defiles persons in God's sight; and ought to be hated, detested, avoided, and opposed by us. Jer. xlv. 4. Isa. lxvi. 3. False doctrines, and horrid or indecent practices, contrary to the very light of nature, are called abominations: they are hated and loathed by God and his saints. Rev. xvii. 4. Idols and their worship are called abominations. Not only is the worship of idols hateful in itself, rendering men odious to God, but is often attended with a variety of base and indecent ceremonies. 1 Kings xi. 7. Deut. vii. 26. and xii. 31. Idols are called abominations of the eyes, because the eyes of their worshippers are often amused with, and in adoration lifted up to them. Ezech. xx. 7, 8. Idolaters and proud persons are an abomination, being detestable to God and to all good men. Isa. xli. 24. Prov. xvi. 5. Incense is an abomination to God, and the solemn meeting is iniquity. The observance of the Jewish ceremonies, without dependance on Christ by faith, and an universal endeavour after conformity to his moral law; or the mere observance of these ceremonies after their abolishment by the gospel, was in God's account highly detestable and criminal. Isa. i. 13. and lxvi. 3. The sacrifices and prayers of the wicked are an abomination, because their principles, manner and ends are sinful, Prov. xv. 8. and xxviii. 9.—Probably shepherds were an abomination to the Egyptians, because a band of foreigners, called shepherds, from Ethiopia or Arabia, had just before invaded and tyrannized over the country; or because the land was sorely plagued on account of Abraham and Sarah his wife. Gen. xlii. 34. The Hebrews sacrificed the abomination of the Egyptians, i. e. their sacred animals, oxen, goats, lambs, rams, which the Egyptians adored, and thought utterly unlawful to offer. Exod. viii. 26. The abomination that maketh desolate, may denote, (1.) The image of a swine on the brazen altar; and that of Jupiter Olympius in the Jewish temple, which Antiochus Epiphanes erected to stop the worship of God, Dan. ix. 31. (2.) The Roman armies, composed of heathenish idolaters, who had the images of idols and emperors painted on their banners; and who, highly detested by the Jews, entered and burnt their temple, and spread ravage and desolation through their country. Dan. ix. 27. Matth. xxiv. 15. (3.) Antichrist, who horribly defiles and wastes the church of God. Dan. xii. 11.

ABOVE; (1.) High; overhead. Gen. vi. 16. (2.) Upwards. Exod. xxx. 14. Lev. xviii. 7. (3.) Beyond. 2 Cor. i. 8. (4.) More than. Gen. iii. 14. (5.) Higher than. Neh. viii. 5. It is used metaphorically, to denote the dignity or excellency of persons or things, Psal. cxlii. 4. Matt. x. 24.; or rank, authority, and rule. Numb. xvi. 3. Deut. xxviii. 18. It also denotes what is spiritual and heavenly, Gal. iv. 26. Col. iii. 1; nay heaven, or God himself, who is above all in dignity and authority. James. i. 17.

ABOUND; (1.) To grow great or numerous. 2 Pet. i. 8. Matth. xxiv. 12. (2.) To increase, and have plenty of temporal or spiritual benefits, Prov. xxviii. 20. 2 Cor. ix. 8. God abounds in grace towards us, in all wisdom and prudence, in graciously choosing a fit person to be our mediator; in appointing him his proper work, in its whole form and periods; in ordering the circumstances of his incarnation, debasement, and glory; and of all the mercies, afflictions, and deliverances of his people, to the best advantage. In forming and publishing the gospel of our salvation, and thereby rendering men, naturally foolish and rebellious, wise, circumspect, and prudent, he eminently displays and exerts his infinite mercy and grace, wisdom and prudence. Eph. i. 7, 8. Men abound in the work of the Lord, when, with noted and increasing pleasure and activity, they perform a multitude of good works. 1 Cor. xv. 58. Men abound in transgression, when, with increasing activity, they proceed from one evil way to another, or worse. Prov. xxix. 22. Sin abounds inwardly, when it renders our rational powers more vigorous, active in, and delighted with sin: it abounds outwardly, when the number of sinners, or of sinful acts, and the number and degrees of their aggravations increase; it abounds relatively, when its facts, criminal nature, power, and pollution, are more fully and convincingly manifested. Matth. xxiv. 19. Rom. v. 20. Grace in God much more abounds in saving the chief of sinners, and forgiving, conquering and destroying the greatest sins in them that believe; grace in us much more abounds, in resisting and mortifying the strongest corruptions, and taking full possession of those inward powers where sin had been superlatively strong and active. Rom. v. 20. The truth of God abounds, when his revelations are clearly and widely displayed; when his promises are eminently fulfilled, and his word rendered effectual for the conversion of vast multitudes; and when it is boldly professed by them. Rom. iii. 7.

ABRAM, the son of Terah. Though mentioned before his brethren, Nahor and Haran, he appears to have been the youngest, born in the 130th year of his father's life, and A. M. 2008. The first seventy years of his life, he resided in his father's family, in Ur of the Chaldees; and no doubt concurred with them in their idolatrous worship. After the death of his brother Haran, God appeared to him; doubtless hinted at the detestable nature of idolatry; and it is certain, ordered him to leave his native abode. He and his father's household removed to the north-west of Mesopotamia, and settled at Haran or Charran, a place so called, perhaps to commemorate his deceased brother. After about five years' continuance here, Terah died; and God appeared again to Abram: he assured him of a numerous seed, who should be a blessing to the nations around: he ordered him to leave his father's family and travel to a land to which he would direct him. All obedient, Abram took with him Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother Haran's son, and all their substance, and went toward Canaan, neither knowing the country, nor the way whither he went. Gen. xi. 26-32. and xii. 1-5. Deut. xxvi. 5. Josh. xxiv. 3, 3. Isa. xli. 2. Acts vii. 2-4. Heb. xi. 8.

A. M. 2063, he entered Canaan, crossing the Jordan, south of the Galilean sea: he pitched his tent at Shechem, and there erected an altar to the Lord. Here God again appeared to him, confirmed his former promises, and assured him that Canaan should one day be the property of his seed. He had scarcely received this promise, when a famine obliged him to leave the country: and without consulting his Maker, he went southward to Egypt. Sarai was now sixty-five years of age, but retained beauty enough to endanger the man's life who passed for her husband, especially in Egypt, where the women were none of the loveliest. Abram and Sarai therefore agreed, that both should pretend she was his sister, wherever they should come. They had not been long here, when her beauty charmed the Egyptians, and at last captivated Pharaoh himself. Abram received vast numbers of sheep, oxen, camels, asses, men-servants, and maid-servants, besides gold, silver, and other precious things in compliment for the sake of his pretended sister: and Sarai was in imminent danger of being taken into Pharaoh's bed. To prevent this, God inflicted on him and his family such plagues as clearly manifested the cause. Pharaoh sent for Abram; sharply rebuked him for his dangerous imposition; returned him his wife undefiled, and gave orders for their safe departure from his dominions. Gen. xii. 6-20. Psal. cv. 14, 15.

The famine in Canaan having ceased, Abram returned thither, and on the altar which he had built near Bethel and Hai, offered a sacrifice of thanksgiving for his safe return. Contentions between his herdsmen and those of his nephew Lot, obliged them to separate. Abram made a peaceful proposal, by giving his nephew the choice of his residence in future. Lot had scarcely departed for the plain of Sodom, when God re-assured Abram that his seed should possess the whole country in his view. Abram removed southward from the environs of Bethel, and pitched his tent in the plain of Mamre, which is in Hebron. There he erected an altar to God; and contracted a friendship with Mamre, Aner, and Eshcol, the chief men of that place. Before he had long enjoyed this agreeable situation, news was brought him, that Chedorloamer and his allies had ravaged the country of Sodom and Gomorrah, and carried Lot prisoner. Abram immediately armed 318 of his own servants; and with these, and a few allies headed by his friends, Mamre, Aner, and Eshcol, he pursued the conquering potentates; surprised them by night at the springs of Jordan; routed and pursued them as far as HOBAB, northward of Damascus; recovered Lot with all his family and substance, with the rest of the captives, and the plunder of Sodom. In his return, MELCHIZEDECK met him at Salem, entertained him with provisions, blessed him, and received from his hand the tithes of his spoil. The young king of Sodom generously offered him all that he had recovered, excepting the men and women: but Abram more generously refused the least share of it. Gen. xlii. and xiv. Graciously to reward Abram's generosity and dependance on God, the Lord immediately after assured him that he was his shield, and his exceeding great reward; and repeated to him the promise of a numerous seed, and of Canaan for their inheritance. By an horrible darkness, and by a fiery meteor passing between the pieces of the heifer, the she-goat, the ram, turtle, and pigeon, he confirmed the covenant, prefigured the affliction of his posterity, and hinted, that at last their salvation should go forth as a lamp that burneth. At the same time he assured him his seed should sojourn four hundred years in a land not their own, and part of that time be terribly oppressed: and that in the fourth generation, they should be brought with great wealth from the land of their bondage, and take possession of Canaan, from the Euphrates on the north-east to the border of Egypt on the south-west. Gen. xv.

Hearing that a child of Abram's own body should be heir of Canaan, Sarai imagining it impossible for one of her age and circumstances to be the joyful mother, advised her husband to make her maid Hagar his concubine, and procure children by her. Without consulting his God, Abram too rashly complied. Hagar no sooner found herself pregnant, than she behaved to her mistress in a haughty and surly manner. This occasioned bitter but unjust reproaches to Abram from his wife, as if he had encouraged his maid in her pride. Hard treatment from her mistress provoked Hagar to flee the family; but being advised by God, she returned and submitted herself. She brought forth a son, whose name was ISHMAEL. For thirteen years after his folly with Hagar, God appears to have denied Abram the more noted tokens of his favour and presence; but A. M. 2107, he repeated the promise of a numerous seed, and of the land of Canaan for their possession. To confirm this covenant, to separate Abram and his family from the rest of the world, and to seal to them the blessings of grace, he ordered himself, and all the males of his family and seed, to have their foreskin cut off. He changed his name to ABRAHAM, which signifies the father of a multitude. Sarai's he changed to SARAH, which signifies the lady or mistress. He assured him that Ishmael should live, and have a numerous issue; and Sarah, now ninety years of age, should bear a son, in whose seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed. Immediately after this vision, Abraham and all his males were circumcised. Gen. xvi. and xvii.

Not long afterwards, the Son of God, attended by two angels in human shape, passed by Abraham's tent in their way to destroy Sodom and the cities adjacent. Upon Abraham's kind entreaty they entered his tent, and were entertained by him as travellers. The Angel JEHOVAH, asking for Sarah, assured her and her husband, that after nine months she should bring forth a son, called ISAAC. Abraham accompanied his guests part of their way toward Sodom. To reward him for his religious education of his family, the Lord disclosed to him their intention to destroy these wicked cities. Moved with compassion, chiefly to Lot, Abraham interceded for their preservation. God granted him whatever he asked. He offered to save them, if fifty, if forty, if twenty, or even ten gracious persons should be found therein; but as there was none save Lot, only he and his daughters were preserved, Gen. xviii. and xix. Scarcely had Sarah conceived, when her own and her husband's dissimulation at Gerar, issued in her being forced from him by ABIMELECH the king. She was, however, quickly restored, without receiving any stain of disloyalty to her marriage-bed. Gen. xx.

In A. M. 2108, Isaac was born, to the no small joy of Abraham and Sarah. The first circumcised, and the other suckled him. When Isaac was weaned, Abraham made a splendid feast for his household. On that occasion, Ishmael marked his contempt of Isaac. Sarah observing it, begged her husband to expel Hagar and her son from the family, as she would never allow him to inherit Canaan along with Isaac. This request was extremely disagreeable to Abraham; but being admonished by God he readily complied therewith. Abraham now dwelt at Beersheba; thither Abimelech king of Gerar came to make a covenant of friendship with him, moved, perhaps, with the report of the promise of Canaan to his seed. Abraham reproved the king concerning a well which his servants had taken by force: that being restored, a covenant was made between them, and ratified by oath. Abraham also built an altar here to the Lord. Gen. xxi.

Isaac was but twenty-five, or perhaps thirty-three years of age, when God ordered his father to offer him a burnt sacrifice on a distant hill. All obedient, he rose early next morning, set off with Isaac and some servants, and a knife, fire and wood for the offering. After travelling three days he came to Moriah, the destined mount. The servants and asses being left behind, Isaac bore the wood, and his father the knife and fire. By the way, Isaac asked where the sacrifice was? Abraham replied, God would provide it. They came to the appointed spot; an altar was reared: Isaac was bound, and stretched thereon. Abraham stretched his hand with the knife, to plunge it into the throat of his son; but the Lord himself stopt the blow, and told Abraham he had now sufficiently discovered his fixed faith in his promise, and regard to his precepts; meanwhile the patriarch, looking behind him, observed a ram caught by the horns in a thick bush: him he caught, and offered instead of his son, and called the place JEHOVAH-JIREH; importing, that God chiefly manifested his favours in perplexing straits, and would provide for his people whatever they needed. After God had renewed his promises, and confirmed them by oath, Abraham rejoined his servants, and returned home to Beersheba; and was there informed that his brother Nahor had a numerous issue. Gen. xxii.

Abraham's next work was the burial of his beloved Sarah. She died at Hebron, where her husband it seems then dwelt. He requested of the Hittites who resided there, to sell him a burying-place: they offered him room in any of their sepulchres, but he desired the cave of Macpelah. Ephron the proprietor begged he would take it in compliment; but Abraham insisted to give the full value, and paid for it 400 shekels, which amounted to forty-six pounds five shillings, or according to Prideaux, to sixty pounds sterling; and there he buried Sarah his wife.

Three years after, he resolved to provide a match for Isaac his son. He called Eliezer his principal servant, and after giving him his instructions and binding him by oath, to take for his son a wife out of his own kindred, and to avoid every step calculated to make Isaac return to Mesopotamia, he sent him away with a suitable train, and a number of presents. Rebekah was obtained for Isaac. Next year Abraham himself espoused Keturah, and his body being invigorated by the influence of God, he had six sons by her. Their names were Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. These Abraham in his life-time portioned and sent eastward into ARABIA the Desert, where they became heads of numerous and potent tribes. A. M. 2183, Abraham died in the 175th year of his age: his sons Isaac and Ishmael, who now lived at a small distance from each other, buried him in the cave of Macpelah, beside Sarah his wife. Gen. xxiii. xxiv. xxv.

Abraham is famous in the stories of the ancient Heathens, and of the Mahometans, Indians, and Jews, as a king of Damascus; as a teacher of arithmetic and astronomy to the Egyptians, &c. It is probable human sacrifices took their rise among the Canaanites, from his intended oblation of Isaac. Severus the Roman emperor reckoned him one of his deities, along with Jesus Christ. The sacred volumes represent him as the friend of God; as the father and pattern of the faithful; as one who, with joy unspeakable, foresaw the coming of the promised Messiah; and as a noted possessor of the heavenly glory: hence a share of it is represented as lying in Abraham's bosom. Rom. iv. Heb. xi. John viii. 56. Matt. viii. 11. Luke xvi. 20.

Was Jesus Christ typified by this venerable patriarch? How astonishing was his meekness, his love and kindness to men; his intimacy with, fear of, obedience to, and trust in his God! He is the chosen favourite of heaven; the Father and covenant-head of innumerable millions of saved men. To him were all the promises relative to the evangelic and eternal state of his church originally made. At his father's call, he obediently left his native abodes of bliss, and became a stranger and sojourner on earth, not having where to lay his head. At his Father's call he offered himself an acceptable sacrifice to God. By his all prevalent intercession and supernatural influence, he delivers his too ungrateful friends from the hands of their foes. After long patience he obtains a numerous seed in the Jewish and gospel church. In his visible family are many professors, children of the bond-woman, the covenant of works; who in the issue, are like the modern Jews, rejected and cast out into a state of wickedness and misery: others are children of the free-woman, who like Isaac, are, by the powerful influence of the promise, begotten again unto God.

ABSA-LOM, the third son of king David: his mother was Maacah, the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur. He was one of the most comely men that ever breathed: every year he cut the hair of his head, and it weighed 200 shekels, or above six pounds English weight: or perhaps, rather, was valued at the rate of 200 shekels of silver; which at least is about twenty-three, or, according to Prideaux, thirty pounds sterling. He had three sons, who all died in their childhood, and a beautiful daughter called TAMAR. 2 Sam. iii. 3. xiv. 25—33. xviii. 18.

When Tamar his sister was ravished by Amnon, she complained to him of the injury done her. Absalom resolved on a thorough revenge. Bent to execute it, he entirely concealed his resentment. After two years he invited his brethren to a shearing-feast at Baal-hazor. When Amnon had drunk hard, Absalom ordered his servants to kill him; and then fled to his grand-father at Geshur in Syria. He had continued three years in exile, when Joab, observing David's desire after a reconciliation, prompted an artful widow of Tekoah, by a feigned speech concerning the danger of her son, who, she pretended had in a passion killed his brother, to solicit it. Absalom was recalled; but lived two years at Jerusalem without entering into his father's presence. Stung with grief and indignation, he sent for Joab, with a view to engage him to be his advocate with the king. Joab at first refused to go; but Absalom, by burning of his corn, obliged him to it. On coming, Joab understood his intent, and went directly to king David and procured his admission to court. Scarcely was this reconciliation effected, when Absalom prepared to usurp his father's throne. He procured a number of horses and chariots, and fifty men to run before him. By kind usage of those who came to his father for judgment, by indirect hints that their causes were good, but that his father neglected to do them justice: and by wishes that it were in his power to do them right, he won the hearts of the people.

About Whitsuntide, A. M. 2080, in the fortieth year after David's unction by Samuel, and the fourth after Absalom's return from Syria, he, under pretence of fulfilling a vow, solicited his father's permission to repair to Hebron, a city southward of Jerusalem. Two hundred persons of note attended him thither, without suspecting his designs. He immediately opened his mind to them; and caused it to be proclaimed in all the cities of Israel, that he reigned in Hebron. Ahithophel, David's principal counsellor, upon invitation, revolted to him with the first: the body of the Israelites followed his example. David, with a handful of such friends as he could depend on, fled from Jerusalem. Ahithophel, after making him publicly defile ten of his father's concubines, advised Absalom without delay to give him the command of 12,000 chosen troops, and he would directly pursue his father, and apprehend him before he had time to recover from his fright. This advice was extremely proper to answer his end. But Hushai was also consulted: he pretended that Ahithophel's counsel was not seasonable, as David and his friends were brave and desperate fellows, and would readily spring forth from pits, or other hiding places, and suddenly cut off some of Absalom's forces; and so dispirit the whole party before it was firmly established. To flatter Absalom's vanity, and give David time to put himself in a posture of defence, he advised that they should assemble every man of Israel capable of bearing arms, and that Absalom should command them in person: he pretended that with this huge host they should, without fail, ruin David and his party, whether they found him in a city or in the field.

Hushai's advice was approved and followed. Absalom collected his troops; marched over Jordan to attack his father; a battle was fought in the wood of Ephraim: but his raw undisciplined host was easily defeated, by the providence of God and his father's veteran troops. The wood tore vast numbers of them to pieces, or otherwise occasioned their ruin. David had ordered his warriors to spare the life of his rebellious son; but riding through the wood, an oak branch caught hold of his highly valued hair, and hung him by it instead of a halter, while his mule went away. Informed hereof, Joab hastened to the place, and put an end to his life. Absalom had erected a proud monument to perpetuate his fame; but he had not the honour to be buried therein. His corpse was put into a pit, as the carcass of an ass, and a great heap of stones thrown over him. Whether his father, who so lamented his death, removed it to a more honourable sepulchre, we know not. 2 Sam. xiii. xvii.

ABSENT, out of one's sight or presence, Gen. xxxi. 49. Col. ii. 5. The saints on earth are absent from the Lord; they enjoy not the immediate vision and fellowship of Jesus Christ, and of God in him, as those in heaven do. 2 Cor. v. 6.

ABSTAIN, to forbear using. ABSTINENCE is strictly a forbearing of the use of food. Acts xxvii. 28. During their sacred ministrations the Jewish priests were to abstain from wine and grapes, or any thing produced by the vine. Lev. x. 9. So were the Nazarites during the term of their vow. Numb. vi. 3. The whole Hebrew nation were to abstain from the flesh of animals declared unclean by the law; and from the fat of such as were sacrificed to the Lord; and from the blood of all. Lev. xi. and lvi. 17. and vii. 23. To commemorate the shrinking of the sinew of Jacob's thigh, when touched by the wrestling Angel, they voluntarily forbore eating of the correspondent sinew in animals. Gen. xxxii. 25. To avoid giving offence to Jewish or weak Christians, the apostles enjoined the Gentile converts to refrain from eating of blood, and things sacrificed to idols. Acts sv. 28. 1 Cor. viii. 7-10; but Paul declares it the doctrine of devils to abstain from any wholesome food, under pretence of intrinsic holiness and devotion. 1 Tim. iv. 3, 4.

ABUNDANT; very large, as an overflowing stream. 1 Pet. i. 8.

ABUNDANCE; a great deal of anything. 2 Chron. ix. 9. Rom. v. 17. 2 Cor. xii. 7. Great plenty and wealth. Deut. xxviii. 47. The abundance of the seas, imports plenty of fishes, and of profits arising from sea-trade. Deut. xxxiii. 19. See ABOUND.

ABUSE; to use persons or things from wrong ends or motives; or in a sinful and dishonourable manner. Judg. xix. 25. Men abuse themselves with mankind, when they commit the horrid sin of Sodom, that brought ruin on that and the cities around. 1 Cor. vi. 9. Men abuse the world, when they use the good things of it to dishonour God, and gratify their own lusts. 1 Cor. vii. 31.

ACCEPT; (1.) To receive favourably. Mal. i. 10-13. (2.) To take pleasure in. Jer. xiv. 10. (3.) To esteem highly. Luke iv. 24. To be accepted of God, is to be received into his grace and favour. Acts x. 35. The saints are accepted in the beloved: through union to the person and imputation of the righteousness of Jesus Christ, they are received into the divine favour, and entitled to all the blessings of eternal life. Eph. i. 6. The sinful accepting of persons, is the shewing them partial respect in judgment or otherwise, on account of some carnal circumstances and motives. Prov. xviii. 5.

ACCESS; free admission; unhampered entrance. Our access to a gracious state, and to God, is through Christ, as our ransom and way; by the Spirit, as applying to us the person and fulness of Christ; and by faith, as the means of receiving and improving Christ as the Lord our righteousness and strength. Eph. ii. 18. Rom. v. 2.

ACCHO, was a city of Galilee, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, about 23 miles south of Tyre. It was built on a plain, but had mountains surrounding it on all sides, excepting towards the sea: on the south was Carmel; on the east the mountains of Galilee; and on the north, the ladder of Tyre, about twelve miles distant. It had a fine harbour, and on the north of it the river Belus. The sea-shore afforded great quantities of sand for making of glass. It was given to the tribe of Asher; but they suffered the Canaanites to continue in it. Judg. i. 31. It made no great figure till Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt rebuilt it, and called it PROLEMAIS; after which it often shared in the distress of the Syrian wars. The Christian religion was early established here; and here Paul visited the saints in his way to Jerusalem. Acts xxi. 7. Church history informs us, that here were bishops in the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries of the Christian æra. In the 12th and 13th centuries it was a place of great strength, and was the object of no small contention between the Mahometans and the Europeans in the sacred wars. It began about that time to be called St. John de Acra; and here the knights of St. John of Jerusalem fortified themselves a long time. It has for about 300 years been subject to the Turks, and is still remarkable for several magnificent ruins of palaces, castles, and about 30 churches. It is now poorly built and inhabited; scarcely a mile in circumference and without walls; as the Arabs will not allow it to be inclosed, lest they should lose their power over it. It has an old church, and a bishop of the Greek church. The Popish monks have an inn which serves them instead of a convent.

ACCOMPLISH; (1.) To perform; fulfil; fully execute. Jer. xiv. 25. (2.) To bring to pass what is desired, purposed, or promised. Prov. xiii. 1-9. (3.) To finish; so days are accomplished. Acts xxi. 5.

ACCORD; of its, or his own accord; freely, without pains or constraint. Lev. xxv. 5. 2 Cor. viii. 17. With one accord, with universal harmony and agreement. Acts i. 14. ii. 46. v. 12.

ACCORDING; (1.) Agreeably to. 2 Tim. i. 9. (2.) Even as; in proportion to. Acts iv. 35. God rewards all men according to their works; that is, agreeably to the nature of their works. 2 Cor. v. 10. Rev. xxii. 12; but deals not with his elect according to the merit of their works, whether good or bad. 2 Tim. i. 9. Tit. iii. 5.

ACCOUNT; to reckon; judge; value. Deut. ii. 11. The Hebrews made account for the paschal lamb; every eater paid his share of the price. Exod. xii. 14. To put a thing to one's account, is to charge it on him as his debt; or reckon it to him as his good deed. Phil. iv. 17. To take account, is to search into and judge a matter. Matt. xviii. 23. To give account, is to have our conduct tried, whether it be reasonable and lawful or not. Rom. xiv. 12. Heb. xiii. 17. 1 Pet. iv. 5. God giveth not account of his matters: he does not ordinarily inform his creatures of the reasons and circumstances of his conduct; nor is he under obligation to do it. Job xxxiii. 13.

ACCURSED. The Hebrew word HRHEREM, and the Greek ANATHEMA, which our version often renders accursed, signify things set apart or devoted; and with Jews and Christians marked the highest degree of excommunication. They generally imported the cutting off one from the community of the faithful, the number of the living, or the privileges of society: and of a thing from existence and common use. The cities of king Arad, the seven nations of Canaan, the sacrifices of false gods, were accursed, or devoted to destruction. Numb. xxi. 2, 3. Deut. vii. 2, 26. Exod. xxiii. 19. The Hebrews devoted to a curse such as did not assist in punishing the Benjamites, Judg. xxi. 5. Jephthah devoted whatever should first meet him from his house. Judg. xi. 30. Saul devoted such in his host as should taste any food before sun-set, while he pursued the Philistines. 1 Sam. xiv. 24. Above forty Jews devoted themselves under a curse, if they did eat or drink before they had killed Paul. Acts xxiii. 12, 13. Nothing devoted to the Lord, under the form of a curse, could be redeemed. Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. The wealth of Jericho was accursed; the gold, silver, brass, and iron, were under the form of a curse, set apart to the service of God, and the rest devoted to ruin. Josh. vi. 16, 19. vii. 1. The hanged malefactors were accursed of God, devoted to public punishment, and emblematic of Jesus dying under the curse. Deut. xxi. 23. To promote the salvation of his Jewish brethren, Paul could have wished himself accursed from Christ; not cast into hell, and for ever under the power of sin, and employed in blaspheming God, but cast out of the church, and made a temporary monument of God's wrath. Rom. ix. 3. Moses too is thought to have offered himself to ruin for the preservation of Israel; but I suppose he only wished that he might not outlive the destruction of his people. Exod. xxxii. 32. Haters of Christ, and preachers of righteousness by the works of the law, are accursed. Isa. lxxv. 20. Gal. i. 8, 9. To be Anathema, Maranatha, is to be finally separated from Christ and the saints, and devoted to everlasting punishment by him at his second coming: the one word is Greek, and the other Syriac, to import, that neither Jews nor Gentiles shall be accepted. 1 Cor. xvi. 22. To call Jesus accursed, is to account him a deceiver, and act toward him as such in our profession or practice. 1 Cor. xii. 3.

ACCUSE; to charge with a crime. Dan. iii. 8. ACCUSATION, is the act of charging one with a fault; or the charge itself. Luke xix. 8. 1 Tim. v. 19. Men's thoughts accuse them, when their conscience charges their sins on them, and fills them with pain, shame, and fear on account thereof. Rom. ii. 15. Moses accused the Jews in Christ's time; his law pointed out and condemned them for the defects and irregularities of their practice. John v. 45. Satan is the accuser of the brethren before God day and night: without ceasing, he by his agents, accused the primitive Christians before the civil magistrates; and towards God, to the world, and to their own conscience, he in every age, charges the saints with manifold crimes, real or feigned. Rev. xii. 10.

A-CEL'D-A-MA; a field; said to have lain on the south of Jerusalem, just north of the rivulet SHILOAH. It is said to have been the same with the fuller's field, where they whitened their cloth. Isa. vii. 3. It is certain it was the potter's field, whence they digged their materials: its soil being quite exhausted by them, it was of very small value. When Judas brought back the thirty pieces of silver, which he had received for betraying his Master, the high-priest and rulers pretended it was not lawful to cast it into the sacred treasury, as it was the price of blood, and therefore purchased with it this field to bury strangers in; and so it came to be called Acel'dama, or Hakeldama, the field of blood. Zech. xi. 12, 13. Matt. xxvii. 8. Acts i. 18. Travellers assure us, that it is now covered with an arched roof, and will consume a corpse in two or three days.

A-CHA'IA, a country of the Greeks in Europe. Sometimes it was taken largely, and answered to GRECIA proper, now called Livadia: but Achaia Proper was a very small canton on the south of Greece, and north of the Peloponnesus or Morea. Its capital, and only city of note, was Corinth. Gallio was the Roman deputy here when Paul preached the gospel, and founded various Christian congregations. Acts xviii. 1—12. 2 Cor. i. 1.

A'CHAN, or A'CHAR, a descendant of Judah by Zerah, Zabdi, Carmi. At the taking of Jericho, he, contrary to the express charge of JOSHUA, coveted part of the accursed spoil. Having seized a Babylonish garment, a wedge of gold, and two hundred shekels of silver, he concealed them in his tent. Offended with this crime, and to deter others from secret wickedness, God marked his indignation by permitting the defeat of three thousand Hebrews before Ai, and the slaughter of thirty-six. Pained with grief, Joshua and the elders of Israel rent their clothes, and cried to the Lord for help. The Lord informed Joshua, that one of the people had taken of the accursed spoil, and had hidden it among the stuff; till the discovery and punishment of whom they should have no assistance from him. By the direction of God, the whole assembly of Israel sanctified themselves, and prepared for a solemn search on the morrow: the search was referred to the determination of the lot; first the tribe of Judah; next the family of Zerah; next the family of Zabdi; and lastly Achan himself was taken. Admonished by Joshua, he candidly confessed his offence; and, it is hoped, truly repented of it: the stolen goods were brought, and publicly exposed to the view of the assembly. Then he and his children, who probably concurred in the theft, and all his cattle, were, for the terror of others, publicly stoned to death; and the dead bodies, with his household furniture, burnt to ashes in the valley of Gilgal, called from that event ACHOR, that is, trouble; and a great heap of stones was cast on them. 1 Chron. ii. 5—7. Josh. vii.

A'CHISH, or ABIMELECH, king or lord of the Philistines of Gath. To avoid Saul's persecution, David retired to Gath. The courtiers represented to Achish that this David had killed Goliath, and been celebrated as a noted destroyer of their nation. Informed of these insinuations, David, to secure himself, meanly counterfeited madness. Achish hinted to his servants that they had no reason to be afraid, and himself had no need of a fool to make sport to him: he ordered them to expel him from the city. About four years afterwards, David returned to Gath. Achish, the same who had formerly contemned him, or perhaps his son, gave him a friendly reception. He assigned him and his warriors Ziklag, one of his cities to dwell in. Almost two years after this, he required David and his warriors to assist him and the Philistines against Saul and the Hebrews, and promised to make them his lifeguard. The other lords of the Philistines absolutely refused to allow David and his men to serve in their army. Achish, therefore, discreetly dismissed them to their home. Psal. xxxiv. title. 1 Sam. xxi. xxvii. xxix.

ACH'ME-THA. Some think it signifies Ecbatana, the capital or chief city of Media, built by Dejoccs or Phraortes, and surrounded with a sevenfold wall of different colours and unequal height. But perhaps it signifies but a strong box or press, in which the old rolls of the Medo-Persian court were deposited. Ezra vi. 2.

A'CHOR, the valley near Jericho where ACHAN was stoned. The valley of Achor being a rest for flocks, and a door of hope, imports, that under the gospel, chiefly during the thousand years' reign of the saints, the issue of discouraging troubles, and the ordinances and influence of God's grace, shall afford resting pasture to his people, and encourage their solid hope of the heavenly bliss; even as the Hebrews' first encampment in the valley of Achor was to them an hopeful pledge of their complete possession of the promised land. Josh. vii. 26. Isa. lxxv. 10. Hos. ii. 15.

ACHSAH, the daughter of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh. To excite some brave warrior to wrest Kirjath-sepher from the Canaanitish giants, Caleb proffered Achsah as his reward. On these terms, Othniel her cousin quickly obtained her. In her way home to her husband's residence she alighted from her ass, threw herself at her father's feet, and begged that as he had portioned her with a south, or dry land, he would give her some moist field abounding with springs of water: he gave her one, or perhaps two fields, thoroughly moist. Josh. xv. 16—19. Judg. i. 12—15.

ACH'SHAPH, a city about the foot of mount Tabor; Joshua conquered the king of it, and gave it to the tribe of ASHER. In Jerome's time, about 400 years after Christ, it seems to have been a small village called Chasalus. Josh. xii. 20. xii. 25.

ACH'ZIB, a city pertaining to the tribe of Asher. It is thought to have been the same with Eedippa, now Zib, which stands on the shore of the Mediterranean sea, about half way between Tyre and Ptolemais. Josh. xix. 29. There was another city of this name in the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 44. The houses, forts; or families of Achzib, were a lie to the kings of Israel; disappointed them, or proved unfaithful to their allegiance, during the Assyrian invasion. Mic. i. 14.

ACKNOWLEDGE; (1.) To own or confess. Gen. xxxviii. 26. (2.) To observe; take notice of. Isa. xxxiii. 13. (3.) To esteem and respect. Isa. lxi. 9. 1 Cor. xvi. 18. (4.) To approve of. 2 Cor. i. 13. Philem. 6. (5.) To worship, profess, and own as a God. Dan. xi. 39. We acknowledge the Lord in all our ways, when in every matter we request and wait for his direction and assistance; when we observe what direction or encouragement his word and providence afford us in our affairs, temporal or spiritual. Prov. iii. 6.

ACQUAINT; to get a familiar knowledge and intimacy. Psal. cxxxix. 3. To acquaint one's self with God, is by repeated endeavours to get a spiritual knowledge of, and intimacy with him. Job xxii. 21. ACQUAINTANCE, persons to whom one is familiarly known and intimate. Job xix. 13.

ACQUIT, to clear from charge of guilt. Nah. i. 3.

ACRE. The English acre is 4850 square yards, the Scotch 6150, the Roman 3200, and the Egyptian 4000; but the Hebrew Tzedek appears to mean what one plough tilled at one time. Ten acres of vineyard yielding one bath, and the seed of an homer an ephah, imports excessive barrenness; that the best ground should scarcely produce the tenth part of the seed. Isa. v. 10.

ACT, ACTION, a deed; particularly a more noted one. Isa. lix. 6. Deut. xi. 8.

ACTIVITY, an alert briskness, attended with wisdom and prudence, in doing business. Gen. xlviii. 6.

ACTS of the Apostles, are an inspired history of their actions and sufferings, at or after the ascension of their adored Master. It chiefly relates those of PETER, JOHN, PAUL, and BARNABAS. It gives us a particular account of Christ's ascension; of the choice of Matthias in place of Judas; of the effusion of the Holy Ghost at the feast of Pentecost; of the miraculous preaching of the gospel by the apostles, and the success thereof, and their persecutions on that account, chap. i—v; of the choice of the deacons, the prosecution and murder of Stephen, chap. vi. and vii.; of a more general persecution, and a dispersion of the Christian preachers into Samaria and places adjacent; of the baptism and baseness of Simon the sorcerer; and of the conversion and baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, chap. viii.; of Peter's raising Dorcas to life, preaching to and baptizing the Gentiles of Cornelius's family, and vindicating his conduct herein, chap. ix. 32—43. and x. and xi. 1—18: of the spreading of the gospel among the Gentiles by the dispersed preachers; and the contribution for the saints at Jerusalem in the time of a dearth, chap. ix. 19—39; of Herod's murder of James; imprisonment of Peter; and fearful death, chap. xii.: of the council held at Jerusalem which condemned the imposition of Jewish ceremonies; and advised, to avoid offence of the weak, to forbear eating of meats offered to idols, or of things strangled, or blood, chap. xv. The rest of the book relates the conversion, labours, and sufferings of Paul, chap. ix. 1—31, and xiii. xiv. and xvi. to the end. It contains the history of the planting and regulation of the Christian church for about 30 years. Nor have we any other, for 250 years after, that deserves our belief. This chasm betwixt inspired history, and that of human authority which deserves credit, Providence, no doubt, ordered, that our faith and practice relative to the concerns of the church should stand, not in the wisdom of men, but in the authority of God.

Luke the Evangelist was the penman of this history; he wrote it as a continuation of his history of Christ. The Marcionites and Manicheans (heretics of the early ages of Christianity) utterly rejected it. The Ebionites translated it into Hebrew, and grossly corrupted it. Other heretics attempted to obtrude on the church a variety of forged imitations of it; as Abdias' Acts of the Apostles, the Acts of Peter, Paul, John, Andrew, Thomas, Philip, Matthias, &c.

AD'AM. This name was given by God to both the original parents of the human race, to import their earthly original, their comeliness, and affectionate conjunction, Gen. v. 2: but it is ordinarily appropriated to the man. On the sixth day of the creation, when God had fitted the earth for his residence, he formed man's body of the dust of the ground; he breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and endued him with a rational soul, resembling himself in knowledge, righteousness, and holiness: for his exercise and refreshment, he placed him in the garden of Eden, to keep and cultivate it. Though perfect obedience was due from him to his Maker, and could properly merit no valuable reward, God, in rich condescension and grace, made a covenant with him; importing, that upon condition of his perfect obedience to every precept of the divine law, he and all his posterity should be rewarded with happiness and life, natural, spiritual, and eternal; but, in case of failure, should be subjected to death; to which he consented. This, doubtless, was the shortest, easiest, and most probable method of securing happiness to mankind. Adam was also the fittest person, and lay under the strongest obligations to perform the condition. To render him the more attentive, to keep him mindful of his fallible nature, to teach him that his happiness consisted only in the enjoyment of God, and to try his obedience in the easiest point, he was prohibited, under the penalty of immediate death, to eat of the fruit of a certain TREE called the tree of knowledge of good and evil. Gen. i. 27; ii. 7-9, and 15-17.

That same day God constituted him lord of the fish, fowls, cattle, and creeping things, vegetables, and other things on the earth: the fowls, cattle, and creeping things, he convened before Adam as his vassals; and Adam evinced his wisdom and authority, by assigning to each its proper name. None of these animals being a fit companion for Adam, God cast him into a deep sleep, took a piece of flesh, or a rib, from his side, without the least pain, and formed it into the body of a most beautiful woman. God endued her also with a reasonable soul, and brought her to Adam, who received her with the utmost affection as his wife. There being no inclemency in the air, and no irregularity in their nature, they both went naked; and were neither hurt nor ashamed. Gen. i. 26-31, and ii. Psal. viii. 4-8. Rom. v. 12-19. Soon afterwards, Satan, who had been banished from the heavenly abodes, conceiving the strongest envy at the happiness of mankind, resolved to accomplish their ruin. To effect this, he entered into a serpent, the most subtle of the animal tribe. Thence, finding the woman all alone, he conversed with her, tempted her to suspect the meaning and certainty of the divine prohibition, and to eat of the forbidden fruit. Solicited by her, Adam followed his wife's example, received part of the fruit from her hand, and ate thereof. He, no doubt, hoped for happiness, at least impunity, in so doing; for it is quite absurd to imagine he wittingly threw himself into endless woe, from affection to her. Guilt immediately seized on their conscience; and irregular passions awaked in their soul; they were ashamed of their nakedness, and used fig-leaves for a covering. In the cool, (or afternoon) of the day, they heard the voice, the WORD, or Son of God, walking in the garden, and fled to hide themselves amidst the thick bushes or trees. God called for Adam, and inquired why he fled? how he became ashamed of his nakedness, and why he had eaten the forbidden fruit; Adam, laid the whole blame on Eve; whom he said, God had given him for an assistant and comfort. Eve blamed the serpent, as her deceiver. After passing a sentence of ruin upon Satan and his agents, by means of the Seed of the woman, and of affliction on the serpent, the instrument of his deceit; of sorrow, painful childbirth, and further subjection to her husband, on the woman and her female offspring; God threatened Adam and his whole posterity with a curse on their fields; with scanty crops; with sorrow and toil; and finally, with death, and a return to dust.

The threatening on Satan implied a promise of mercy and redemption to mankind, by the blood of God's Son: God therefore now instructed Adam and his wife in the mode and signification of typical sacrifices. To denote their having degraded themselves to the rank of beasts by sin, and to intimate their recovery by the imputed righteousness of the great atonement, God clothed them with the skins of animals, slain as sacrifices. To testify his displeasure with sin, and to prevent their vain attempts to procure happiness and immortality by eating of the tree of life, God expelled them from Eden, to cultivate the fields, whence their body had been formed. The symbols of the divine presence hovered on the east of the garden; some angels, and perhaps some fiery meteor there placed, rendering it impossible for mankind to re-enter. Just before his expulsion, Adam had called his wife EVE, because she was to be the common mother of men, particularly of those appointed to everlasting life. Now he knew her, and she conceived and bare CAIN, and soon after ABEL. These Adam taught to sacrifice to the Lord; but both, in the issue, proved a source of trouble and grief to their parents. Soon after the death of Abel, Adam, in the 130th year of his age, had Seth born to him: he had also a great many other children. After he had lived 930 years he died. A number of fancies concerning him are reported by heathen and Jewish writers: but he is represented in scripture as a covenant-breaker; as a coverer of his transgression; as a source of guilt and death to all his posterity; and as a figure of the promised Messiah. Gen. iii-v. Hos. vi. 7. Job xxxi. 33. Rom. v. 12-19. 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, 45-49.

Jesus Christ is called the second ADAM, because of his similitude to the first. He is in a peculiar manner the Seed of God, the express image of his person, and brightness of his glory. He is a new thing created in the earth, by the overshadowing influence of the Holy Ghost. He is the glorious fruit of the earth; the product of the chief counsels of God; and the ornament and centre of all his works. He is the head and representative of his people in the second and last covenant: he is their common parent, who communicates to them his spiritual image, and entitles them to all the fulness of God; he is their great prophet, priest and governor. All things, without reserve, are subjected to him for their sake. Having by his blood regained the celestial Paradise, he resides in it, and cultivates the whole garden of his church; and bath, and gives men, power to eat of the tree of life. Being by the determinate counsel of God, cast into the deep sleep of debasement and death, his church, in her true members, was formed out of his broken body and pierced side: divinely is she espoused to him; and to her he cleaves, at the expense of once leaving his Father in heaven, and now leaving his mother, the church and nation of Judah. 1 Cor. xv. 22, 45-49.

AD'AM, AD'A-MAH, AD'A-MI, a city pertaining to the tribe of NAPHTALI. It was situated near the south end of the sea of Tiberias: near it the waters of Jordan stood as an heap till the Hebrews passed over. Josh. iii. 16. and xix. 33, 36. Perhaps Adami was a different city from Adamah.

AD'A-MAH, or AD'-MAH, the most easterly of the four cities destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven. Some think the Moabites built a city of that name, near to where the other had stood. Gen. xiv. 2. Dent. xxix. 23. To be made as Admah, and set as Zeboim, is to be made a distinguished monument of the fearful vengeance of God. Hos. xi. 8.

AD'A-MANT, the same precious stone which we call a diamond. It is the most valuable of all gems, and is remarkable for its extreme hardness and the purity and splendour of its appearance. It is extremely various in shape and size; the larger being deemed the most valuable, as they are seldom met with. Louis XIV. of France purchased one at the amazing sum of £130,000: which was placed in the French crown; but was stolen with the whole of the royal jewels, by the Parisian mob on the memorable 12th of August, 1793. A much larger diamond was purchased by the late Queen of Portugal for £100,000 sterling, and an annuity of £1000 per annum. Diamonds are found in the East Indies, and the Brazils.

The Adamant, or diamond, was the third jewel in the second row of the high-priest's breast-plate. Exod. xxviii. 18. Ezekiel's forehead was made like an adamant; he was endued with undaunted boldness in declaring God's message to the Jews. Ezek. iii. 9. Wicked men's hearts are as an adamant; neither the threatenings nor judgments of God can break, nor his mercies, invitations, or promises, melt them, till they be sprinkled with Jesus' blood, and have his love shed abroad in them by the Holy Ghost. Zech. vii. 12. The sin of Judah was written with a pen of iron, and a point of a diamond; their corrupt inclinations were deep rooted and fixed in their heart: and all their crimes were indelibly marked by God. Jer. xvii. 1.

AD'AR, the twelfth month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, and the sixth of their civil. It had 29 days, and answered to our February and part of March. On the third day of it, the second temple was finished and dedicated. Erra vi. 15. On the seventh, the Jews fast for the death of Moses: on the thirteenth, they commemorate the fast of ESTHER and Mordecai; on the fourteenth, they observe the feast of PURIM. Esth. iv. and ix. 17. On the twenty-fifth, they commemorate the release of JERHOIACHIN. Jer. lii. 31. Every third year, there was a second ADAR added, consisting of thirty days.

ADD, (1.) To join or put to. Deut. iv. 2. (2.) To increase. Prov. xvi. 23. (3.) To bestow. Gen. xxx. 24. (4.) To proceed to utter. Deut. v. 22. They added nothing to me; they gave me no new information or authority which I had not before. Gal. ii. 6. To add sin to sin, is to continue and become more open and active in the practice of it. Isa. xxx. 1. To add to faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge, &c. is more and more to exercise and abound in all the graces of the Divine Spirit, and the virtues of an holy conversation in their proper connection. 2 Pet. i. 5-7.

ADDER, a venomous animal, brought forth alive, usually called the viper. It is considerably smaller and shorter than the snake, and has black spots on its back; its belly is black. We find the word ADDER five times in our translation, but I suppose always without warrant from the original. Shepiphon, Gen. xlix. 17. is probably the blood-snake, a serpent of the colour of sand, and which lies among it, and, especially if trampled upon, gives a sudden and dangerous bite. Pethen, Psal. lviii. 4; xci. 13; and cxi. 3. signifies an asp. Tziphoni, Prov. xxiii. 32. signifies that dreadful serpent called the Basilisk.

ADJURE. (1.) To bind one by oath, as under the penalty of a fearful curse. Josh. vi. 26. Mark v. 7. (2.) To charge solemnly, as by the authority and under pain of the displeasure of God. Acts xix. 13. Matth. xxvi. 63.

ADMINISTER, to manage and give out as stewards. 2 Cor. viii. 19.

ADMINISTRATION, a public office, and the execution thereof. 1 Cor. xii. 5.

ADMIRE, to wonder at any thing for its greatness, excellency, rarity. 2 Thess. i. 10.

ADMONISH; to instruct, warn, reprove. 1 Thess. v. 14. The admonition of the Lord, is instruction, warning, and reproof, given in the Lord's name from his word in a way becoming his perfections, and intended for his honour. Eph. vi. 4. Heretics are to be rejected, or cast out of the church, after a first and second admonition, i. e. solemn warning and reproof. Tit. lii. 10.

A-DO-NI-BE-ZEK, the king of BEZEK. Just before Joshua entered the land of Canaan, Adonibezek had waged a furious war with the neighbouring kings; seventy of them he had taken captives; and cutting off their thumbs and great toes, had caused them, like dogs, to feed on the crumbs that fell from his table. After Joshua's death, the tribes of Judah and Simeon, finding themselves pent up by the Canaanites, resolved to clear their lots of these accursed nations: among others, they fell upon Adonibezek; took his capital, made him a prisoner; and cut off his thumbs and great toes: he thereupon acknowledged the just vengeance of Heaven upon him, for his cruelty towards his fellow princes. They brought him along with them to Jerusalem, where he died, about A. M. 2579. Judg. i. 4-7.

A-DO-NIJAH, was the fourth son of King David, born at Hebron. When his two elder brothers, Amnon and Absalom, were dead, Chileah perhaps weak and inactive, and his father languishing under the infirmities of age, Adonijah attempted to seize the kingdom of Israel for himself. He prepared himself a magnificent equipage of horses and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him: this displeased not his father. His interest at court waxed powerful; JOAB the general of the forces, ABIATHAR, the high-priest, and others, were of his party; though Benaiah, Zadok, Nathan the prophet, and the most of the mighty men, were not. To introduce himself to the throne, he prepared a splendid entertainment at ENROGEL: to this he invited all his brethren, except Solomon, (whom he knew his father had designed for his successor on the throne,) and all the great men of Judah, except such as were in Solomon's interest.

While they were making themselves merry, and wishing Adonijah a happy reign, Nathan the prophet got intelligence of their designs. He and Bathsheba immediately informed king David, and applied to him in favour of Solomon. Orders were immediately issued to anoint Solomon with the utmost solemnity. Adonijah's party were alarmed with the shouts of applause: and being informed of the cause by Jonathan the son of Abiathar, they dispersed in great terror and amazement. Deserted by his friends, and sensible of his crime, Adonijah fled for protection to the horns of the altar, probably that in the threshing-floor of Araunah. Solomon sent him word that his life should be spared, if he behaved himself circumspectly for the future. He came and presented himself on his knees before Solomon; and then, at his orders, returned to his own house. Soon after his father's death, he made Bathsheba his agent to request, for his wife, Abishag the Shunamite, who had been his father's concubine. Solomon suspected this a project to obtain the kingdom; and being perhaps informed of other treacherous designs, ordered Benaiah his general, to kill him. His death happened about a year after his attempt to usurp the kingdom. 1 Kings i. 5—53. and ii. 13—25.

A-DON-I-RAM, the principal receiver of Solomon's tribute, and director of the men sent to cut timber in Lebanon, for building the temple and other magnificent structures. 1 Kings v. 14.

A-DON-I-ZE'DEK, king of Jerusalem, A. M. 2553. Being informed that Joshua had taken Jericho and Ai, and that the Gibeonites had submitted to Israel, he entered into an alliance with Hoham king of Hebron, Piram king of Jarmuth, Japhia king of Lachish, and Debir king of Eglon, to attack and punish the Gibeonites; and thus deter others from submission to the Hebrew invaders. The Gibeonites besought the protection of Israel, and quickly obtained it. Joshua encountered the troops of the five allied Canaanitish kings, and easily routed them: hailstones of a prodigious weight killed vast numbers of the flying enemy, even more than were slain by the sword. The sun stood still a whole day, till Joshua entirely cut off these desperate opposers of heaven. The five kings hid themselves in a cave near Makkedah. Its mouth was stopped with large stones, till the Hebrews had leisure to execute them. In the afternoon, Joshua, returning from the pursuit, caused them to be brought out. After making his principal officers trample on their necks, he slew and hanged them on five trees: at the setting of the sun, he ordered their carcasses to be thrown into the cave where they had hid themselves. Shortly after, the cities belonging to them, Jerusalem excepted, were taken, and the inhabitants slain. Josh. x.

ADOPTION, is either, (1.) Natural; whereby one takes a stranger into his family, and deals with him as his own child: thus the daughter of Pharaoh adopted Moses; and Mordecai Esther. In this sense the word is never used in scripture. (2.) National; whereby God takes a whole people to be his peculiar and visible church, exercises his special care and government over them, and bestows ordinances and other privileges upon them. This adoption, for 1500 years, pertained to the Jews; they being the only visible church of God on earth. Rom. ix. 4. (3.) Spiritual; in which sinful men, by nature children of Satan, disobedience, and wrath, are upon their union with Christ, graciously taken by God into the invisible church; and have spiritual communion and intimacy with Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and with angels and fellow-saints; and are loved, taught, governed, corrected, protected, helped and provided for; and are entitled to his promises, salvation, glory, and fulness, as their everlasting inheritance. This adoption the saints have received; and of it, the Holy Ghost dwelling in them as a Spirit of grace and supplication, and their holy conversation, are the undoubted evidence. Rom. viii. 15—17. Gal. iv. 6. Jer. iii. 19. John i. 12. (4.) Glorious; in which the saints, being raised from the dead, are at the last day solemnly owned to be the children of God; have the blissful inheritance publicly adjudged to them, and enter, soul and body, into the full possession of it. This the saints now wait for. Rom. viii. 23.

A-DORAM, (1.) King David's general receiver of the tribute. 2 Sam. xx. 24. Whether he was the same with ADONIRAM, we know not. (2.) ADORAM, or HADORAM, King REHOBOAM's chief treasurer, and overseer of his works. His master sent him to the ten revolting tribes, to persuade them to return to their allegiance. Suspecting him to have been the encourager of the oppressive taxes, or from fury at his master, they stoned him to death on the spot. 1 Kings xii. 18. 2 Chron. x. 18.

ADORN, to deck; to make beautiful, 1 Tim. ii. 9. Holiness of nature and practice are an adorning. Much care, pains, and attention to the glass of God's word are necessary in attaining it; and it renders our nature and character truly amiable and glorious. 1 Pet. iii. 4, 5. 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. By an holy conversation we adorn the doctrine of God; practically shew to the world the purity, power, glory, and usefulness of his truths, laws, promises, threatenings. Tit. ii. 9, 10. The church is adorned, when her ordinances are pure and efficacious, her officers faithful and zealous, her members clothed with the imputed righteousness of Christ, and his sanctifying grace. Isa. lxi. 10. Rev. xxi. 2.

A-DRAM'ME-LECH and A-NAM'ME-LECH were two idols of the men of Sepharvaim. In the Hebrew language, and probably in the Assyrian, the first signified magnificent king, and the last gentle king. In the Persian, the first signifies king of flocks; and the last in the Arabic has a similar meaning. Possibly both were worshipped as the preservers of cattle. The Jewish Rabbins tell us, that the first was represented as a mule, or peacock; and the second as a pheasant, quail, or horse. It is more probable the first represented the sun, and the other the moon, which many of the heathens took to be the great rulers of the world. 2 Kings xvii. 31.

A-DRAMME-LECH and SHA-REZER were sons of SENNACHERIB. It is possible the former was named after the above mentioned idol. Dreading their father's intention to sacrifice them, or conceiving some furious prejudice against him, they murdered him as he worshipped Nisroch, his idol, and then fled to the country of Armenia. Isa. xxxvii. 38. 2 Kings xix. 37.

AD-RA-MYTTI-UM. (1.) A city on the north coast of Africa, west-ward of Egypt. (2.) A city on the west coast of Mysia in Lesser Asia, over against the isle of Lesbos. It was in a ship belonging to this place that Paul sailed from Cesarea to Myra. Acts xxvii. 2.

ADRI-A. At present, the Adria, or Adriatic Sea, comprehends only that sea on the east of Italy, which is otherwise called the Gulf of Venice; and seems to have taken its name from Adria, an ancient city, which stood somewhere in the territory of Venice, on the north-east of Italy: but from Ptolemy and Strabo, it appears, that the whole sea adjacent to the isle of Sicily, and even the Ionian or Tuscan Sea on the south-west of Italy, was anciently called Adria. Somewhere in this sea, the ship that conveyed Paul to Rome, was terribly tossed. Acts xxvii. 27.

ADVANCE, to raise to a higher station or rank. 1 Sam. xii. 6.

ADVANTAGE. (1.) Profit, gain. Job xxxv. 3. (2.) A fair opportunity to prevail over one; or actual prevalence over him. 2 Cor. ii. 11.

ADVENTURE, to do a thing by exposing one's self to danger. Judg. ix. 25.

ADVERSARY, one who, justly or unjustly, sets himself in opposition to another; so Peninnah is called the adversary of Hannah. 1 Sam. i. 6. The adversary to be agreed with in the way, is not only human opposers, to whom we ought quickly to be reconciled, but chiefly God, with whom we ought to make peace, by receiving his Son, while we are in the way to eternity; lest by death and judgment he suddenly cast us into hell-fire. Matt. v. 25. Luke xii. 58, 59. Satan is emphatically called the adversary. With the most obstinate and implacable malice he sets himself to defame and dishonour God; to reproach, accuse, and harass the saints; and to ruin the souls and bodies of men. 1 Pet. v. 8.

ADVERSITY, distress and trouble, spiritual or temporal, which withstands and checks our attempts, like a furious wind blowing in our face. Psal. x. 6.

ADVERTISE, to inform beforehand. Numb. xxiv. 14.

ADVISE; to give, or take counsel or advice. 1 Kings xii. 6.

A-DUL-LAM, a most beautiful city; and hence called the glory of Israel. Some place it in the south-east of the territory of Judah, near the Dead Sea; but it rather appears to have stood in the plain, south-west of Jerusalem, near Jarmuth and Azekah. Josh. xv. 35. It had anciently a king of its own, whom Joshua killed. chap. xii. 15. Near to it, David concealed himself from Saul in a cave; and hither his parents, and a number of valiant men, resorted to him. 1 Sam. xxiii. 1. Rehoboam rebuilt and fortified it. 2 Chron. xi. 7, 8. Sennacherib's army took and plundered it under Hezekiah. Micah i. 15. Judas Maccabeus and his army solemnly observed the Sabbath in the plain adjacent to it. It was a place of some note about 400 years after Christ; but is long ago reduced to ruins.

ADULTERER and ADULTERESS. (1.) Such men and women as commit fleshly impurity. Psal. i. 18. (2.) Such as indulge an excessive love for the things of this world. Jam. iv. 4.

ADULTERY is either natural, which largely taken, comprehends all manner of unchastity in heart, speech, and behaviour, whether fornication, incest, and all unnatural lusts, &c. Exod. xx. 14. But strictly taken, it denotes uncleanness between a man and woman, one or both of whom are married to another person: thus we must understand it, where death is constituted the penalty, and the persons were not nearly related. Lev. xx. 10. In case one of the persons was betrothed, the crime and punishment was the same as if married. Deut. xxii. 22-27. Reuben's incest with Bilhah is the first act of adultery we read of. Among the heathens it was long held an horrible crime. Gen. xx. 9. For about 500 years we read of few or no instances of it in the Roman state. Nor does it appear to have been common, till the poets represented their gods as monsters of lusts.

God appointed for the Jews a method of discovering it, however secret. When a man suspected his wife's fidelity, he warned her to avoid private intercourse with the suspected paramour: if she obeyed not, she was brought before the judges of the place, and the presumptions of her guilt declared. If she continued to assert her innocence, she was tried by the water of jealousy. She was carried to the place of the tabernacle, or temple, and examined before the great council, or sanhedrim. If she persisted in her denial, she was brought to the east gate of the outer court, and before vast numbers of her own sex dressed all in black. The priest solemnly adjured her to declare the truth; and represented her danger in drinking the water of jealousy if she were guilty. She said AMEN; importing a solemn wish, that vengeance might light on her if guilty. The priest wrote the adjuration and curse on a piece of parchment, or bark: he then filled a new earthen vessel with holy water from one of the sacred basins, or perhaps with the water of purification: he mingled therewith some dust, taken from the pavement of the tabernacle, or temple:

and having read the writing to the woman, and received the return of her second AMRW, he washed out the ink, wherewith the adjuration and curse were written, into the mixture of dust and water; meanwhile another priest tore the upper part of her clothes, uncovered her head, dishevelled her hair, girt her half torn garments below her breast, and presented her with about a pound and an half of barley meal in a frying-pan, without either oil or incense, to mark how disagreeable to God the occasion of this offering was. The priest, who prepared the bitter water, then caused her to drink it; put the pan with the meal into her hand, stirred it a little, and burnt part of it on the altar of burnt-offering.

If the woman were innocent, this draught confirmed her health, and rendered her fruitful: but if guilty, she immediately grew pale, her eyes started out of her head, her belly swelled; her thighs rotted, and she was hurried out of the court, that it might not be polluted with her inominous death. It is said, her paramour, however distant, was at the same time affected in like manner: but, in case the husband was guilty of whoredom, it is pretended the bitter water had no effect. Numb. v. 12-31.

A woman taken in the act of adultery was brought by the Jews to Jesus Christ, to try if he would ensnare himself by acting the part of a civil judge in passing sentence against her; or contradict the law of Moses, in dismissing her from punishment. He bade the accuser who was innocent of the like crime, to cast the first stone at her: their consciences, awakened by his divine power, charged home their guilt, and they stole out ashamed. Jesus, finding that none of them had condemned her, to testify that the end of his coming was not to condemn but to save sinners, and to instruct his ministers not to meddle in civil judgments, condemned her not, but warned her to avoid the like wickedness for the future. John viii. 1-13.

The divine authority of this history of the adulteress has been much questioned. It is wanting in several of the ancient translations, and in not a few of the Greek copies: some copies have it at the end of the 21st of Luke; others at the end of John; others have it as a marginal note to John viii. Not a few of the Greek fathers appear ignorant of its authority. But the evidence in its favour is still more pregnant. Tatian, who lived A. D. 160, and Ammonius, who flourished A. D. 220, have it in their Harmony of the Gospels. Athanasius, and all the Latin fathers acknowledge it. It is found in all the sixteen manuscripts consulted by Robert Stephen, in all but one of the seventeen consulted by Beza, and in above 100 consulted by Mill.

ADULTERY, in the prophetic scriptures is often metaphorically taken, and signifies idolatry and apostasy from God; by which men basely defile themselves, and wickedly violate their ecclesiastical and covenant relation to God. Hos. ii. 2. Ezek. xiv. and xxiii.

A-DUMMIM, a mountain and city near Jericho, and in the lot of the tribe of Benjamin. It lay in the way from Jerusalem to Jericho; and is said to have been much infested with robbers; and hence perhaps it received its name, which signifies the red or bloody ones. Josh. xv. 7. xviii. 17. Here Jesus lays the scene of his history or parable of the man that fell among thieves. Luke x. 20, 36.

ADVOCATE, a pleader of causes at the bar of a judge. Jesus Christ is called our Advocate with the Father; By his constant appearance in the presence of God for us, he renders our prayers and service acceptable; he answers all the charges that the law or justice of God, that Satan and our own consciences can lay against us; he sues out our spiritual title to the benefits of the new covenant, and procures our actual and eternal enjoyment thereof. 1 John ii. 1. The Holy Ghost is called an advocate. In opposition to the suggestions of Satan, and of the world, and our lusts, he pleads the cause of Christ at the bar of our conscience, and insists for his obtaining due honour and property in our heart and life; by inditing our prayers and directing and enabling us to prosecute them at God's throne of grace, he maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered. Rom. viii. 26.

AFAR; (1.) At a great distance of time or place. John viii. 56. Jer. xxxi. 10. (2.) Apparently estranged in affection, indisposed and unready to help. Psal. xxxviii. 11, and x. 1. (3.) Not members of the church, not in a gracious state of friendship and fellowship with God. Eph. ii. 17.

AFFECT, to stir up; influence. Lam. ii. 51. Men's AFFECTIONS, are their desires and inclinations; such as love, fear, care, joy, delight, &c. Col. iii. 1. Vile affections, are inclinations to wallow in shameful, beastly, and unnatural lusts. Rom. i. 26. Inordinate affections, or the affections of the flesh, are irregular desire, care, joy, fear, &c. that spring from and tend to gratify and support indwelling sin. Col. iii. 5. Gal. v. 24.

AFFINITY, a relation between persons and families constituted by MARRIAGE. Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh, by espousing his daughter. 1 Kings iii. 1. Jehoshaphat joined in affinity with Ahab, when he took his sister Athaliah to be the wife of his son Jehoram. 2 Chron. xviii. 1.

AFFIRM, (1.) To maintain the truth of an opinion or report. Acts xxv. 19. (2.) To teach. 1 Tim. i. 7.

AFFLICT, to distress, vex, pain. Gen. xv. 13. AFFLICTION; all manner of distress, oppression, persecution. Job v. 6. Exod. iii. 7. Mark iv. 17. When laid on reprobates it is proper punishment, as it springs from God's wrath, and tends to their hurt. Nah. i. 9. When laid on the saints, it is fatherly chastisement, springing from God's love to their persons, and is merited by the death of Christ, secured by the new covenant, and works for their good. 2 Cor. iv. 17. When laid on the unconverted elect it is wrathful in its nature, but overruled to promote their union with Christ. Job xxxiii. The saints are represented as an afflicted people: they in every age endure manifold trouble from God, from Satan, the world and their own lusts. Psal. xviii. 27. Zeph. iii. 12. They fill up what is behind of the afflictions of Christ, and partake of the afflictions of the gospel.' Though Christ completely endured the wrath of God for them, yet he hath allotted various distresses to be borne by them, as proceeding from his hand; coming in the gospel channel of kindness and love; as means of conforming them to his image; and borne for adherence to his interests, and the truths of the gospel. Col. i. 24. 2 Tim. i. 8.

AFFRIGHTED, AFRAID, filled with fear, terror, and dread, Luke. xxiv. 37. Dent. i. 7.

AFRESH, anew; another time. Heb. vi. 6.

AFTER, (1.) Behind. Job xxx. 5. (2.) Later in time; at the end of. Gen. xxxviii. 24. (3.) According to the direction and influence. Isa. xi. 8. Rom. viii. 1, 4, 13. To inquire after, go after, walk after, follow after, is to search, imitate, seek for, serve, worship. Gen. xviii. 12. Exod. iii. 20. Job x. 6, 14. Dent. vi. Hos. xi. 10.

A GA-BUS, a prophet, who foretold the famine that happened in the days of Claudius Caesar, A. D. 44. Acts xi. 28. About A. D. 68, he visited PAUL at Caesarea, and foretold his being bound at Jerusalem. Acts xxi. 10. It is said he suffered martyrdom at Antioch.

A'GAG, seems to have been a common name of the kings of Amalek: it appears they had a mighty king of this name as early as the time of Moses. Numb. xxiv. 7. One of this name governed them in the days of Saul. He was extremely cruel and bloody: his sword had bereaved many mothers of children. Saul, when he was appointed by God to cut off that whole nation, spared him with the best of the flocks. He appeared before Samuel the prophet with the most delicate airs, expressing his hopes that he had no reason to fear a violent and tormenting death: but the prophet with his own hand, or another by his order, hewed him to pieces before the Lord at Gilgal. 1 Sam. xv. 8, 20, 32, 33. Haman is called an Agagite, probably because he was an Amalekite, and of the blood-royal. Est. iii. 1.

AGAIN, (1.) A second time. Gen. viii. 21. (2.) Backwards. Prov. ii. 19.

AGAINST, (1.) In opposition to. Acts xxviii. 22. (2.) Directly facing. Numb. viii. 2. (3.) By the time when. 2 Kings xvi. 11.

AGATE, an almost transparent precious stone, variegated with veins and clouds, composed of crystal, debased by a small quantity of earth. It is not formed by incrustation round a nucleus, nor made up of plates; but appears to be the effect of one concretion, and variegated merely by the disposition which the fluids in which they were formed gave their differently coloured matter. Agates are excellent for burnishing of gold, and for seals. Some of them have a whitish ground, as the dendrachates, or mechoa-stone, the phasachates, and another sort: The hemachates, sardachates, &c. have a reddish ground: The cerachates and leontoserres have a yellowish ground. The jaspachates and some others, have a greenish ground. The sardachates is most esteemed. The agate was the second stone in the third row of the high-priest's breast plate. Exod. xxviii. 19. The Syrians traded with agates in Tyrian fairs. Ezek. xxvii. 16. The windows of the gospel-church are of agates; her ministers and ordinances which enlighten her are pure, precious, and diversified in form and gifts. Isa. liv. 12.

AGE, (1.) The whole continuance of one's life. Gen. xlvii. 26. (2.) The time of life, when a woman is fit for conceiving of children. Heb. xi. 11. (3.) The time when men's natural powers and faculties are at their perfection, or near it. John xi. 21, 23. Heb. v. 14. (4.) Long continuance of life. Job v. 26. Zech. viii. 4. (5.) A period of time, past, present, or future. Eph. iii. 5, ii. 7. (6.) The people living in such periods. Col. i. 26.

The duration of the world has been divided by AGES. The patriarchal age continued 2518 years from the creation of the world to the departure of the Hebrews from Egypt. The ceremonial age 1491 years, from the mission of Moses to the incarnation of Christ. Of the Christian age, from the birth of our Saviour, according to the common calculation, 1833 years have elapsed. The whole period, from the creation till now amounts to 5267 years; but the East Indians reckon it 15,115,236. The chronology too of the vulgar Chinese, and of the ancient Chaldeans and Egyptians, far exceeds our reckoning. By adding an hundred years to the age of a great many of the patriarchs before Abraham, prior to the birth of their succeeding children, the Greek version of the Old Testament extends the period before the flood to 2242 years; and the period thence to Abraham's entrance into Canaan, to 1106. Probably, the author or authors of this version, ascribed to the Seventy, used such freedom with the sacred oracles, that, under pretence of taking the ancient years for months, they might reconcile the longevity of the patriarchs to the common standard of life in their time. Vossius and Pezron have zealously attempted to establish this chronology, under pretence that it agrees better with profane history, and accounts for the multitudes of men in the earlier ages of the world. That pretence is entirely groundless; for at a moderate calculation there might be 80,000,000,000 persons in the world in the year of the flood, which was A. M. 1656. The sixteen grand-sons of Noah might produce many thousands against the building of Babel, even though we should place it at the birth of Peleg, in the 101st year after the flood. And if, with the authors of the Universal History, we place it 252 years later, there might be still many thousands more. We have no authority for the vast multitudes of men in the early ages after the flood, but that of Ctesias, who has not the character of exactness in his statements. Stillingfleet, in his Origines Sacrae, Bedford in his Chronology, and Shuckford in his Connections, have shewn how well the chronology of our Bible agrees with such profane history as deserves credit. Sir Isaac Newton, in his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms amended, has shewn it to be sufficiently probable, that the states mentioned in the history of the Greeks were not by far so early founded as was generally thought. The duration of the Old Testament may be more particularly divided into, (1.) The Antediluvian age, which ended at the flood, A. M. 1656, Gen. v. (2.) The age of the dispersion, consisting of 427 years, and ending with the call of Abraham, A. M. 2063, Gen. xi. (3.) The age of sojourning, from the call of Abraham to the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egypt, consisting of 430 years, Exod. xii. 40. and ending A. M. 2513. (4.) The age of the tabernacle, consisting of 480 years, and ending at the foundation of Solomon's temple, A. M. 2993, 1 Kings vi. 1. (5.) The age of Solomon's temple, consisting of 424 years, and ending with the burning of it by Nebuchadnezzar, A. M. 3416. (6.) The age of Zerubbabel's temple, consisting of 388 years, and ending at the commencement of the Christian era, which is supposed to be two or three years after the birth of Christ A. M. 4004.

The duration of the New Testament period may be divided into, (1.) The age of the seals, ending at the opening of the seventh, A. D. 333. (2.) The age of the preparations for Antichrist, under the four trumpets, Rev. viii. and ending about A. D. 606. (3.) The age of Antichrist, containing 1260 years, besides 75 years of extirpation, Rev. xi. 2. Dan. xii. 11, 12. (4.) The millennium, or thousand years, reign of the saints. If we date the rise of Antichrist from the Pope's assuming an universal dominion over the church, we hope the millennium will begin about A. D. 1940, or sooner: But if we date the rise of Antichrist from the Pope's commencing a civil lord, about A. D. 756, we cannot hope for the beginning of the millennium, till after A. D. 2016.

AGONY, painful conflict; racking or tormenting trouble in soul or body. Luke xxii. 44.

AGREE, (1.) To bargain with. Mat. xx. 2, 13. (2.) To approve, consent to. Acts v. 40. (3.) To be like to. Mark xiv. 56, 70. (4.) To conspire, resolve together. John ix. 22. (5.) To be reconciled to. Mat. v. 25.

A-GRIPPA, the son of Herod Agrippa. He was at Rome with the emperor Claudius, when his father died, A. D. 44. The emperor was inclined to bestow on him the whole dominions possessed by his father; but his courtiers dissuaded him from it. The next year the governor of Syria thought to compel the Jews to lodge the ornaments of their high-priest in the tower of Antonia, under the custody of the Roman guard; but, by the influence of Agrippa, the emperor allowed them to retain them. A. D. 49, Herod, king of Chalcis, his uncle, died, and he was by the emperor appointed his successor: but four years after, that kingdom was taken from him; and the provinces of Gaulonites, Trachonites, Batanea, Paneas, and Abilene, were given him in its stead. To these, soon after, Nero added Julius in Perea; and a part of Galilee on the west of the sea of Tiberias. When Festus was made governor of Judea, A. D. 60, Agrippa and his sister Bernice, with whom he was supposed to live in incest, came to Cesarea to congratulate him. In the course of their conversation, Festus mentioned the affair of Paul's trial and appeal to Cesar. Agrippa was extremely curious to hear what Paul had to say for himself. And on the morrow, Festus gratified him and his sister with a hearing of him in the public hall. Paul, being desired by Agrippa to say what he could in his own defence, rehearsed how he was converted from a furious persecutor into a zealous preacher; and how he had, according to the ancient prophets, preached the resurrection of the dead. Agrippa was so charmed with the good sense and majesty of the discourse, and with the apostle's polite address to himself, that he declared he was almost persuaded to be a Christian. Paul expressed his earnest wish that king Agrippa, and all the audience, were altogether such as himself, excepting his bonds and trouble. Agrippa signified to Festus, that he might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Cesar. Acts xxv. and xxvi.

About two years after, Agrippa deposed Joseph Cabei the Jewish high-priest, for the great offence which he had given to the people in the murder of JAMES the brother of Jude, whose distinguished meekness and sanctity were universally respected; and he made Jesus, the son of Damneus, priest in his room. Not long after, he allowed the temple-singers to wear linen robes as the common priests. He restrained, for some time the rebellion of the Jews against their Roman government. At last, rendered desperate by the oppression and insolence of their governors, they openly revolted; Agrippa was obliged to take part with the Romans. After the destruction of JERUSALEM, he and his sister Bernice retired to Rome, where he died, aged 70, A. D. 90.

AGUE, a periodical disease of the fever kind, consisting of a cold shivering fit, succeeded by a hot one. It is occasioned by want of perspiration; and is said to be most obstinate in the harvest season. Its common cure is a vomit of ipecacuanha, and afterwards repeated doses of Jesuits' bark. A burning ague, is one of the most terrible kind. Lev. xxvi. 16.

A'GUR, the son of Jakeli, is imagined by some to be Solomon: but Solomon had no reason thus to disguise his name; nor could he pray against riches; nor is his style and manner of writing similar to Agur's; who, under inspiration, uttered the xxxth chapter of the Proverbs to his two friends, Ithiel and Ucal. In it he professeth his great ignorance of the unsearchable greatness and marvellous works of God; his esteem of God's word, and desire of a moderate share of worldly things: he mentions four kinds of persons very wicked; four things insatiable; four things wonderful; four small, but wise; and four comely in going. Prov. xxx.

AH, ALAS. It generally expresses great distress and sorrow. Jer. xxii. 18. but in Psal. xxxv. 25. and Isa. i. 24. it signifies the same as AHA, which denotes contempt; derision; insult. Psal. xxxv. 21.

A'HAB, the son and successor of OMRI. He began his reign over Israel, A. M. 2066, and reigned 22 years. In impiety he far exceeded all the kings of Israel. He married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Zidon, who introduced the whole abominations and idols of her country, Baal and Ash-taroah; and vigorously prompted her husband to every thing horrid. To punish their wickedness, God, by the prophet Elijah, first threatened, and then sent above three years of continued drought; a terrible famine ensued. Charging this to the account of the prophet, Ahab sought for him in his own and the kingdoms adjacent, to murder him. At last, Elijah, by means of Obadiah, a courtier, informed Ahab where he was. Ahab hastened to the spot, and rudely charged him as a troubler of Israel. The prophet replied, that the king himself and his family, in forsaking the true God, and following Baalim, had brought these judgments upon the people. He required Ahab to assemble the Israelites, and all the prophets of Baal, to mount Carmel. This was done; and Elijah having, by the descent of fire from heaven which consumed his sacrifice, demonstrated ИЖОВАН to be the true God, ordered the people to slay the prophets of Baal, to the number of 450: and quickly after by his prayers procured an abundance of rain. 1 Kings xvi. 20—24. and xvii. xviii.

About A. M. 3108, Benhadad, king of Syria, who besieged Samaria with a powerful host, sent Ahab a message importing, that his silver, gold, wives, and children, were his property. Ahab immediately consented. By a second message, Benhadad ordered him to deliver up his silver, gold, wives, and children, and threatened that, upon the morrow after, he would send his servants to plunder the city and palace of every thing valuable. The elders and people dissuaded Ahab from hearkening to this. Hearing of the refusal, Benhadad outrageously swore, that his troops should ere long demolish Samaria, till not a vestige was left. Offended with the Syrian's pride, God by a prophet instructed Ahab in his measures, and assured him of victory. Ahab ordered his small army of 7000, with 232 pages, or young noblemen, at their head, to march out of the city at noon-tide. Benhadad ordered his troops to bring the young commanders directly to him, whatever they intended: but the Hebrew host still advanced, and killed all that opposed them. Benhadad and his army were entirely routed, and left a prodigious booty. This victory was gained by raw unexperienced commanders, that it might appear wholly of God.

The prophet informed Ahab that Benhadad would invade his kingdom the next spring: and advised him to take heed to his steps. The invasion took place with a powerful host. Ahab, assured of victory by the prophet, drew up his small army seven days successively before the Syrians, and on the last gave them battle. An hundred thousand Syrians were killed on the spot. The rest fled to Aphek, where the walls, being overturned by an earthquake, killed 27,000 more. Benhadad threw himself on the mercy of Ahab, and was kindly received. A treaty was concluded on these terms: that Ahab should have all the cities restored that had been taken from him and his father; and that Ahab should be allowed to make for his own use, streets, market-places, or rather citadels, in Damascus. This kindness to a horrid blasphemer and murderer, whom Providence had put in Ahab's power to slay, greatly provoked the Lord. A prophet, as he returned home, assured him, that since he had suffered Benhadad to escape, his life should go for his life, and his people for his. Ahab was at first considerably vexed; but the impression of the prophet's words quickly wore off. 1 Kings xx.

Intending to make himself a kitchen-garden, near to his palace in Jesreel, Ahab demanded of Naboth to sell him his vineyard, or exchange it for a better. Naboth absolutely refused to violate the divine law by an unnecessary alienation of the inheritance of his fathers. Stung with this refusal, Ahab went home greatly displeased, threw himself on his bed, and would eat nothing. Informed of the cause of his disorder, Jezebel, to comfort him, assured him, that she would quickly put him into the possession of Naboth's vineyard. By sending orders to the elders of the city, and suborning false witnesses against Naboth, she got him murdered, as guilty of blasphemy and treason. Informed of his death, Ahab went and took possession of his vineyard. In his return home to Samaria, Elijah met him, and assured him, on the divine authority, that for his murder of Naboth, and seizing of his vineyard, dogs should lick his blood on the spot where, or because, they had licked Naboth's; that Jezebel his wife should be eaten of dogs by the wall of Jesreel; and that the rest of his family should be devoured by the dogs in the city, or wild beasts and fowls without it. Terrified with this prediction, Ahab rent his clothes, put on sackcloth, and mourned for his conduct. To reward his repentance, though not evangelical, God deferred the full execution of the stroke till after his death, in the reign of Jehoram, his son; and possibly alleviated some circumstances thereof. 1 Kings xxi.

A. M. 3107. Benhadad not fulfilling his treaty by restoring to Israel their property, Ahab prepared to retake Ramoth-Gilead, a strong city near the south-east confines of Syria, by force. Jehoshaphat happened just then to pay a visit to Ahab, and consented to assist him; but desired that some prophet might be first consulted whether the Lord would favour the attempt. Four hundred prophets of Baal were consulted. They, as with one voice, assured the kings, that the Lord would deliver the city into their hand. Suspecting their fraud, Jehoshaphat inquired for a prophet of the true God. Ahab informed him of one Micaiah; 'But,' said he, 'I hate him, for he always prophesies evil concerning me.' Being sent for at Jehoshaphat's request, and consulted, he bade Ahab go up to Ramoth-Gilead, and prosper. Ahab, discerning the ironical air wherewith he spake, adjured him to speak nothing but truth. Micaiah then seriously assured him, that his army should be scattered, and return without him as their head; and that, by the divine permission, a lying spirit had seduced his false prophets to entice him to go up and perish in the attempt. Enraged at this, Ahab ordered Micaiah to prison, there to continue half-starved till he himself should return in peace. Micaiah replied, that if ever the Lord spake by him he should never return in peace. To avoid his predicted exit, Ahab treacherously persuaded Jehoshaphat to put on royal apparel, while he himself went to the field of battle in disguise. In consequence of this, all the Syrian captains, as directed by their master, attacked Jehoshaphat, suspecting him to be Ahab. At last God delivered Jehoshaphat; but Ahab, notwithstanding his precaution, met with his fate. A Syrian shot a random arrow, which, entering by the joints of his harness, pierced him to the heart; and made him order his charioteer to carry him out of the host, for he was sore wounded. The battle continued, and Ahab bleeding in his chariot, faced the enemy till night, and then died. His army were immediately warned to disperse and shift for themselves. Ahab was carried to Samaria in his chariot, and buried. His chariot and armour being washed in the pool, the dogs licked up his blood; and his son Ahaziah reigned in his stead. 1 Kings xxii.

2. A'HAB, the son of Kolaiah, and ZEDEKIAH, the son of Maaseiah, were two false prophets, who about A. M. 3406, seduced the Jewish captives at Babylon with hopes of a speedy deliverance; and stirred them up against JEREMIAH. The Lord threatened them with a public and ignominious death before such as they had deceived; and that their names should become a curse: so that men should wish their foes might be made like Ahab and Zedekiah, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had roasted in the fire. Jer. xxix. 21, 22.

A-HAS-U-E'RUS, or Astyages the Mede. Dan. ix. 1. He was the son of the brave Cyaxares, who assisted Nebuchadnezzar to overturn the Assyrian empire, and ruin the city of Nineveh. He succeeded his father on the Median throne, and reigned 35 years; but did nothing of importance besides repulsing an inroad which Evil-merodach king of Babylon made on his territories. He died A. M. 3444, leaving children, Darius the Mede his successor, and Mandane the mother of Cyrus.

1. A-HAS-U-E'RUS, or Cambyses king of Persia. He succeeded his father CYRUS, A. M. 3475, and reigned seven years and five months. He had scarcely mounted the throne, when the Samaritans requested him to put a stop to the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem. He did not, and perhaps could not formally revoke the decree of his father. The building, however, was stopped during his reign. He was notable for nothing but violence, foolishness, and cruelty. His fits of passion often hurried him into downright madness. In the second year of his reign he entered Egypt, reduced the revolted, wasted their country, killed their sacred ox, and carried off thousands of their idols. Here he continued five years, and ruined a great part of his army in the dry deserts of Lybia, in a mad attempt to invade Ethiopia; and daily sacrificed some principal Persians to his fury, his own brother and sister not excepted. Informed that Patizithes the Magus, whom he had left to govern Persia in his absence, had placed his own brother Smerdis on the throne, pretending he was Smerdis the brother of Cambyses, he hastened to his kingdom. It is said that he wreaked his fury on the Jewish nation as he passed their territories. Near mount Carmel he mounted his horse with such precipitancy, that his sword dropped from its scabbard, and desperately wounded his thigh. The wound appearing to be mortal, Cambyses convened his principal nobles, and informed them that his brother Smerdis had been murdered by his orders; and begged that they would not suffer the Magian impostor to translate the government to the Medes; and quickly after expired. That Cambyses is the Ahasuerus, and Smerdis Magus the Artaxerxes of scripture, who hindered the rebuilding of the temple, is sufficiently plain. None but these ruled in Persia, betwixt Cyrus, who gave the edict for building, and Darius who renewed it. Ezra iv. 6, 7.

3. A-HA-SU-E'RUS, the husband of Esther. Who he was is not universally agreed; Scaliger, Gill, and others, will have him to be Xerxes, the fourth king of Persia after Cyrus: his wife Amestris, they suppose to have been the same with Esther; and that the report of her cruelty took rise from her concern in the execution of Haman and his sons, and the death of the 70,000 opposers who were slain by the Jews in their own defence. The authors of the Universal History, Prideaux, and others, assert that he is the same with Artaxerxes Longimanus, the son of Xerxes, who greatly favoured the Jews, particularly in the seventh year of his reign. Compare Ezra vii. Neh. i. and ii. with Esth. ii. 10. Josephus also calls him by this name. The seventy interpreters, and the apocryphal addition to Esther, constantly call him Artaxerxes. Atossa, the beloved wife of Darius Hystaspis, according to Herodotus, was never divorced, but lived with him till his death: both she and Aristone, his next beloved wife, were the daughters of Cyrus. These hints would effectually command our assent, if we did not remember that Artaxerxes began his reign A. M. 3548: the seventh year of it, when Esther was taken to his bed, was therefore A. M. 3555; betwixt which and A. M. 3405, when Mordecai was carried captive to Babylon with king Jeholachim, (Esth. ii. 5.) is an interval of 155 years. How incredible that he should be then alive, or capable to manage the affairs of a large empire! How improbable that his cousin Esther could be so young as to attract the king's affection, above all the beauties of Persia! We are therefore obliged to accede to the sentiment of Archbishop Usher, Calmet, &c. that this Ahasuerus was Darius Hystaspis. He, first of the Persian kings, reigned from India to Ethiopia above Egypt; and was noted for his imposition of tributes, and hoarding of money. Esth. i. 1. and x. 1. We should reckon even him too late, could we possibly fix upon any before him. ATOSSA, the name of his beloved wife, is easily formed from HADASSAH, the Hebrew designation of Esther. Herodotus might very easily be mistaken concerning her lineage, when she so long concealed it herself; and the Persians would naturally claim her as one of their royal blood, rather than assign her to the Jews, their captives.

A-HAS-U-E'RUS, (if Darius Hystaspis) was a Persian of royal blood, a descendant of Achemenes, and an attendant upon Cyrus in his warlike expeditions. Soon after the death of Cambyses, he and other six Persian lords, killed Smerdis the usurper. They agreed to meet next morning on horseback, at an appointed place, before sun-rising; and that he whose horse should neigh first should be acknowledged king by the rest. Hearing of this agreement, Darius' groom caused his master's horse to cover a mare in the same place the night before. The conspirators no sooner met next morning, than Darius' stallion neighed for his mare. The rest immediately alighted, and acknowledged Darius their sovereign, A. M. 3483. To fortify his royal claim, he, according to Herodotus, espoused Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, who had been first married to her brother Cambyzes, and afterwards to Smerdis the usurper; and Aristone her sister. In the second year of his reign, the Jews, encouraged by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, resumed the rebuilding of their temple. The Samaritan governors, by means of whom the work had suffered about nine years' interruption, demanded their warrant. The Jews referred them to the edict of Cyrus. The governors informed Darius hereof, and begged he would inquire if such an edict was ever granted, and return them his orders. Upon search, the edict was found at ACHMETHA, among other ancient records. Darius confirmed it, and ordered his Samaritan governors to assist the Jews, if necessary, and to furnish them with every thing needful for sacrifices; he also devoted to ignominious death and ruin the persons who should refuse to obey. Ezra v. and vi.

When his empire, containing 127 provinces, and extending from India to African Ethiopia, was fully established, and his new palace of Shushan finished, he made a very splendid entertainment for his nobles. It lasted six months; at the end of which he made a feast of seven days for all the people of Shushan. His queen VASHTI at the same time feasted the ladies and other women in the most splendid manner. Upon the seventh day, Ahasuerus, inflamed with wine, ordered his principal eunuchs, Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Biztha, Abagatha, Zethar, and Carcas, to bring Queen Vashti to the assembly of the men, for the display of her charms. She refused to obey. Enraged at her refusal, Ahasuerus, by the advice of Memucan, and his other six counselors, gave Vashti an irrevocable divorce. A war with the revolting BABYLONIANS, which issued in the ruin of most of them, and the reduction of their walls, employed his thoughts for above two years. He now heartily repented of his rash divorcement of Vashti. His servants advised him to search out all the fine virgins of his vast empire, and choose one from among them to be her successor. The virgins were collected at Shushan; and, after a year's preparation with fine spices, were, in their turn, admitted to his bed. None of them pleased him equally with Esther the Jewess, who was made queen in the seventh year of his reign. Whether his fruitless expedition against Scythia happened during the purification of the women, or afterwards, we know not.

No sooner was Esther made queen, than Bizthan and Teresh, two of his chamberlains, resolved to murder the king; disgusted perhaps with his treatment of Vashti. Mordecai informed against them; the crime was proved, and the traitors were hanged. Ahasuerus made HAMAN his chief minister of state shortly afterwards; who, enraged that Mordecai denied him the honours he desired, obtained an edict, to have the whole Jewish nation cut off in one day, and their estates confiscated to the king. To prevent the execution, Esther, advised by Mordecai, risked her life, by approaching the royal presence uncalled. Melted with affection, Ahasuerus held out to her his golden sceptre, as a token that her life was in no danger; and asked her request. She only invited him and Haman to a splendid treat. At the banquet, he again offered her whatever she asked, to the half of his kingdom. She only begged they would come to-morrow to a second entertainment. That very night the king could take no sleep: he therefore ordered the records of the empire to be read to him. The reader opened on the passage of Mordecai's information against the treacherous chamberlains. Finding that Mordecai had hitherto been neglected, the king resolved now to reward him. Haman, who had just entered the palace to ask leave to hang Mordecai on the gallows which he had prepared, was called in and asked, what was proper to be done to the man whom the king delighted to honour? Haman, expecting the honour was intended for himself, advised that the man should be dressed in the royal robes; crowned with the royal diadem; mounted on the king's horse, while one of the chief courtiers should lead his horse through the streets, proclaiming all along, 'Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour!' The king ordered Haman immediately to honour Mordecai the Jew in the manner which he had suggested.

On this very day, at Esther's banquet, the king, for the third time, offered to grant her whatever she would request, to the half of his kingdom. She then begged he would interpose for the life of herself and her people; as, to the king's hurt, they were sold to be murdered. Informed, that Haman was the projector of this horrid scene, Ahasuerus flew into a rage, and retired to his garden. On his return, he found Haman at the feet of queen Esther, begging his life. His passion, it seems, made him imagine Haman had intended to force the queen on the bed whereon she sat at the banquet: he therefore ordered his face to be covered as a signal of death. One of the pages present informed Ahasuerus, that Haman had in his house a gallows to hang Mordecai, the preserver of the king's life. Ahasuerus ordered Haman himself to be hanged thereon; and gave Haman's whole power and honours to Mordecai. Though, according to the Persian law, he could not revoke the decree against the Jewish nation, he allowed Mordecai and Esther to write to all the provinces, that the Jews should stand up in their own defence; and in such manner as tended to discourage the heathen from attempting the massacre. Esth. i-ix.

Soon after Mordecai became his chief minister, Ahasuerus laid a tax on his inland territories, and on that part of Lesser Asia, and the islands, which belonged to him. About A. M. 3495, he invaded India, and obliged the inhabitants to pay him yearly 300 talents of silver. He had serious contentions with the Greeks in Lesser Asia, and with the Athenians and others in Europe, which generally ended in his disgrace and loss. A little before his death, the Egyptians revolted from his yoke. He died A. M. 3519, after a reign of 56 years; and was succeeded by Xerxes his son.

A-HA'VA a small river of Chaldea or rather Assyria. Here Ezra, with his attendant Jews, observed a solemn fast, for direction and success in their return to Judea. Ezra viii. 15—21.

A'HAZ, the son of Jotham, king of Judah. About the tenth year of his age, he espoused Abijah the daughter of Zechariah, by whom, he, the following year, had his son Hezekiah. When twenty years of age, Ahaz succeeded to the crown, A. M. 3265, and reigned sixteen years. In imitation of the kings of Israel, he abandoned himself to the most abominable idolatries. One of his sons he sacrificed to the idol Moloch; and, perhaps, caused the rest to pass through the fire for lustration. He did not merely connive at the people's offering sacrifices in high places, as several of his predecessors had done, but he ordered sacrifice and incense to be offered in high places, on hills, in groves, and under green trees. Toward the end of his father's reign, the Syrians under Rezin, and the Israelites under Pekah, began to harass Judah. Perceiving Ahaz to be a weak prince, they agreed to dethrone him, and make a son of Tabeal, their deputy, king in his stead. Their armies invaded his kingdom at one time. He and his people were seized with the utmost consternation. The prophet Isaiah assured, that none of their projects should prosper; and that, since the Messiah was not yet come, there was no reason to fear the departure of the sceptre from Judah. Isa. vii.

This stroke was averted; but Ahaz continuing weak in government, and wicked in his conduct, the two kings made a fresh attack upon him. Rezin marched to Elath, a noted sea-port on the Red sea, and peopled it with Syrians. Pekah attacked Ahaz's army and killed 120,000 of them in one day, besides Maaseiah his son; and carried off 200,000 prisoners, men, women, and children. Moved with the remonstrance of Oded the prophet, the princes of Israel, Azaria, Berechiah, Jehizkiah, and Amasa, persuaded the troops to dismiss their prisoners: and they liberated them with many tokens of humanity.—Meanwhile the Edomites from the south, ravaged the country, and carried off a number of the people for slaves. The Philistines from the west invaded the low country adjacent to their territories and the south; and took Bethshemeth, Ajalon, Gederath, Shochu, Timnah, and Gimzo, and peopled them with a colony of their nation.

In his distress, Ahaz grew more and more wicked: he sought not to the Lord; but, stripping the temple and city of all the gold he could find, he sent it for a present to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria: he acknowledged himself his vassal; and begged his assistance against his enemies. By cutting off the Syrians that were a barrier against the eastern powers, and by imposing on his kingdom a tribute, Tiglath-pileser injured rather than helped him. Ahaz went to Damascus, to congratulate the Assyrian monarch on his victory over Syria: he there observed an idolatrous altar, which mightily suited his taste; and sent off a plan of it to Urijah the high priest, to form one similar. Urijah had it finished before Ahaz returned to Jerusalem; and Ahaz ordered it to be placed in the room of the brazen altar erected by Solomon; and commanded that all the sacrifices should be offered thereon. To gratify the king of Assyria, who, it seems, returned his visit, he turned about the royal entrance to the court of the temple; took away the covert of the Sabbath, where it seems the priests stood to read the law, or the royal family to hear it: defaced the brazen lavers and sea, by removing their pedestals; and set them on the earth, or upon a pavement of stone. Proceeding in his wickedness, he sacrificed to the idols of Syria, who, he imagined, had been the authors of his calamities, in order to render them more favourable; he broke in pieces the sacred vessels; shut up the gates of the temple; and erected altars in every corner of Jerusalem and city of Judah, for burning of incense. He died in the sixteenth year of his reign, and was buried in Jerusalem; but had not the honour of interment in the royal tombs. 2 Kings xv. 38. and xvi. 2 Chron. xxviii. Isa. vii.

A-HA-ZIAH, the son of Ahab. He was made his father's associate in power, when he went to the war at Ramoth-Gilead; and reigned about a year after his death. He imitated his parents in the worship of Baal and Ashteroth, and in their other crimes. He and Jeshoshaphat fitted out a fleet at Ezion-geber, to trade to Ophir for gold; a storm dashed their ships to pieces, almost in their going out from the harbour. Ahaziah intended to fit out a second fleet; but JESHOSHAPHAT refused to have any concern therein. The Moabites, who, till now, had continued tributary to the ten tribes, revolted, and refused their yearly tribute of sheep. Ahaziah was rendered incapable of reducing them. Falling from one of his windows, or from the balcony of his house, he was dangerously hurt. He sent messengers to Baalzebub, the idol-god of Ekron, to inquire if he should recover. Elijah met the messengers, and asked them, if it was for want of a God in Israel their master had sent them to inquire of Baalzebub? He, moreover, assured them, that for this reason he should certainly die of his disease. They returned, and reported to the king what they had heard. By the description they gave, he quickly perceived it was Elijah who had met them. He ordered a captain, with his troop of fifty horse soldiers, to fetch him immediately: the captain of of the band addressed Elijah with rudeness, and at the prophet's desire, fire from heaven consumed him and his troop. A second troop was sent on the same errand: the captain of which behaving with the haughty airs of him who preceded him, and he and his company of fifty were in like manner consumed: As both companies were idolaters, they deserved this treatment. A third troop was sent: warned by the fate of his brethren, this captain addressed the prophet with reverence and awe; and begged him to spare his and his soldiers' lives. It was done; and Elijah accompanied them. On entering the chamber of Ahaziah, he boldly assured him, that for his sending to consult Baalzebub, the idol of Ekron, he should certainly die of his distemper: nor was it long before he expired; and his brother Jehoram reigned in his stead. 1 Kings xxii. 40. 2 Chron. xx. 36, 37. 2 Kings i.

A-HA-ZI'AH, A-ZA-RI'AH, or JE-HO A-HAZ, the grandson of Jehoshaphat, and son of Jehoram and Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab. In the twenty second year of his age, and the forty second of the royalty of his mother's family, he succeeded his father on the throne of Judah. By the advice of his mother ATHALIAH, he formed his conduct after the pattern of Ahab his grandfather, worshipping Baalim and Ashtaroth; and requiring his subjects to do the same. He had scarcely reigned one year, when he repaired to Jezreel, to visit Jehoram, his uncle, king of Israel, who had returned thither from Ramoth-Gilead, to be healed of his wounds. At that very time JEHU, the destroyer of the house of Ahab, came to cut off Jehoram. Not aware of his intentions, Jehoram and Ahaziah went out to meet him: Jehoram was immediately struck dead by an arrow; and Ahaziah fled to Samaria and hid himself: but he was found by a party which Jehu sent after him. They brought him back part of the way to Jezreel; but at Gur, near Ibleam, a city of the Manassites, they, by Jehu's orders, mortally wounded him. His own servants posted away with him in his chariot, till they came to Megiddo, where he died. His corpse was taken thence, and interred in the royal sepulchres of Jerusalem. About the same time, forty-two of his brethren, or rather nephews, (his brethren being all before slain by the Arabians,) had gone to visit Jehoram: these Jehu involved in the common ruin of the house of Ahab. What children, or friends, remained to Ahaziah, were all, except JOASH, murdered by his mother about the same time. Ahaziah, his son Joash, and his grandson Amaziah, are excluded from Matthew's genealogy of Christ. Such ruin and shame, was the consequence of Jehoshaphat's marrying his son into the wicked family of Ahab. Let parents and others observe, 2 Kings viii. 24-29; ix. 27-29; x. 12-14; xi. 1; and 2 Chron. xxii.

A-HIJAH, a prophet of the Lord who dwelt at Shiloh. Perhaps it was he who encouraged Solomon while building the temple; and who threatened him with the rent of his kingdom, after his shameful fall. 1 Kings vi. 11. and xi. 6. Meeting with Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, in a field, he rent his garment into twelve pieces, and gave him ten of them, as a token that he should be king over ten tribes of Israel. About twenty years after, Jeroboam's only pious son fell sick. Fearing to go himself, Jeroboam sent his wife in disguise to consult Ahijah, whether he should recover. She, according to the manner of the times, carried to the prophet a present of ten loaves, some cracknels, and a cruse of honey.

Though blind by reason of age, Ahijah being instructed of God, told the queen at her entrance, that he knew who she was. He assured her, that her diseased son should die on her return; and that the rest of her family should have a miserable and ignominious end. 1 Kings xi. and xiv. Ahijah wrote part of the history of Solomon's reign. 2 Chron. ix. 20.

A-HIKAM, the son of Shaphan, and father of GEDALIAH. He was one of the princes of Judah; and was sent by JOSIAH to consult Huldah concerning the threatenings of God against the nation for their wickedness. 2 Kings xxii. 12. He mightily exerted himself to protect Jeremiah's life. Jer. xxvi. 24.

A-HIM'AAZ, the son and successor of Zadok the high-priest. He and Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, performed a very important service for David, during the progress of Absalom's rebellion. Their parents and Hushai, all fast friends of David, continuing in Jerusalem, unsuspected by Absalom, the two young men waited near Enrogel, without the city, to convey proper information to the king. Informed from Hushai, by means of a maid, what had passed in Absalom's privy council, they posted off to inform David. Absalom, being apprized of this, by a young man who had seen them, detached a party to pursue and apprehend them. To avoid these pursuers, Ahimaaz and Jonathan retired to a friend's house in Bahurim. The man had a deep well in his court: thither they went down; while the mistress spread a cover on the well's mouth, and laid ground corn thereon. Her work was scarcely finished, when the pursuers came up in quest of them. The mistress affirmed they were gone. The pursuers not finding them, returned to Jerusalem. The young priests then pursued their way to king David, and informed him of the counsel of the rebels; and that Hushai advised him to pass the river Jordan with the utmost expedition, that he might be out of their reach.

Not long after, Absalom's troops were entirely routed. Ahimaaz's importunity prevailed with Joab, to allow him to run with the tidings to David. Running by the way of the plain, he arrived before Cushl, whom Joab had sent off before him. When the sentinel of Mahanaim warned David of the approach of a single messenger, the king immediately concluded that he brought good tidings; for if the army had been defeated, the people would have come flying in crowds. When Cushl was come within sight, and Ahimaaz was plainly discerned, David suggested, that, as he was a good man, he hoped he brought agreeable tidings. Ahimaaz came up and informed the king that all was well; and, falling down at his feet, blessed the Lord who had cut off his enemies. David asked, if Absalom was safe? Ahimaaz prudently, if truly, replied, that just before he and Cushl were sent off, he saw a great tumult, but knew not what it meant. He stood by till Cushl came up, who plainly informed the king of Absalom's death. Some years after, Ahimaaz succeeded his father in the high priesthood; and was succeeded by his son Azariah

2 Sam. xv. 27—30; xvii. 15—22; xviii. 19—32; 1 Chron. vi. 8, 9.

A-HIME-LECH, the son of Ahitub, great grandson of Eli, and brother of Ahiah, whom he succeeded in the office of high-priest. During the government of SAUL, he, with a number of other priests, resided with the tabernacle at Nob. To him David repaired in his flight from Saul's court; and representing that Saul had sent him and his attendants on a most pressing errand, which required the utmost despatch, begged he would give them some food. Ahimelech assured him that he had none but the shew-bread, which was allowed only to the priests; but which he believed David and his servants might eat, if for a given period they had abstained from women. David assured him they had touched none for at least three days. Ahimelech then gave them some loaves. David further asked of him a sword or spear; and Ahimelech gave him the sword of Goliath, which had been hung up in the tabernacle for a trophy.

Doeg, the Edomite, the chief of Saul's herdmen, happened to be waiting at the tabernacle upon some purification, and witnessed the whole. When Saul was afterward complaining to his servants, that none of them were affected with his misfortunes, nor were disposed to inform him of David's treasonable plots, Doeg related what he had witnessed at Nob. Ahimelech and eighty-four other priests were immediately ordered to appear before Saul. He rudely demanded of them, why they had conspired with David against him, and had given him provision and arms; and had enquired of the Lord in his favour? Ahimelech meekly replied, that he always regarded David the king's son-in-law as one of his best friends; that he had always prayed for him; and knew nothing of any rupture between them. Regardless of this sufficient vindication, Saul sentenced Ahimelech, and all his relations to death. He ordered his guards immediately to butcher the eighty-five priests that were present. But they declined the horrid and murderous task: Doeg, on the king's order, slew them to a man. A party was immediately sent, probably under the direction of Doeg, to destroy every man, woman, child, and the very cattle of Nob, the city of the priests. These infernal orders were so punctually executed, that none but Abiathar, Ahimelech's son, who fled to DAVID, escaped. This happened about A. M. 2044, and was part of the terrible vengeance that pursued the family of Eli, for his indulging his sons in their profane-ness. Compare 1 Sam. xxi; xxii: ii. 27—36.

A-HIME-LECH, or A-BIME-LECH the son of Abiathar. He and Zadok, whom Saul had made high-priest after the murder of the former Ahimelech, were second priests, or sagans, about the latter end of the reign of king David. Before him, and many other persons of note, Shemaiah the scribe wrote down the orders and divisions of the priests, singers, and Levites; and cast lots for their turns of service in the temple of God. 1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 6, 31; xviii. 16. and 2 Sam. viii. 17.

A-HITHO-PHEL, a native of Giloah in the tribe of Judah. He was so renowned a statesman and counsellor, that his advice was generally received as an oracle of God. Disgusted with David for his defilement of Bathsheba, who is said to have been his grandchild, or for some other reason unknown to us, he, to the no small vexation of David, early revolted to Absalom's party. David earnestly prayed God to confound his counsels; and advised Hushai to join Absalom in appearance, and oppose himself to Ahithophel's advice. Ahithophel first urged Absalom publicly to defile ten of his father's concubines that had been left to keep the house. This, he averred, would shew the breach between him and his father to be irreconcilable; and so attach his party more firmly to his interests. In compliance with this horrid and shameful advice, Absalom, in a tent spread on the top of the house, defiled the women in sight of his followers. Next, Ahithophel advised that 12,000 chosen forces should be given him that very night, and he would pursue after David, and slay him before he recovered his fright; and then all his party would be scattered, and never more be brought together. Absalom and his princes mightily extolled this proposal; and indeed, nothing could more effectually have accomplished their designs.

But Hushai's mind being asked, he replied, that, however sensible and prudent Ahithophel's counsel might be in itself, it was not suited to the present occasion. To confirm his view of the matter, he represented in the most striking manner what mighty heroes David and his attendants were; that the king was too prudent to lodge all night with his friends; but would be hid in some pit: that he and his party being so valiant, and besides enraged and desperate, it was hard to say what slaughter they might make of Ahithophel's 12,000 in the night; and what terror might seize Ahithophel himself; and so small a loss at the first, magnified by report, might discourage Absalom's whole party, and ruin the cause before it was firmly established. Hushai therefore proposed, that every Hebrew able to bear arms should be assembled; that Absalom himself should take the honour of commanding this prodigious host; and fall upon his father, as the dew falls on the ground; quite overwhelm him with numbers; and even draw the city whither he might flee, with ropes into the adjacent river. This humorous proposal, designed for their ruin, so gratified the pride of Absalom and his nobles, that they preferred it to that of Ahithophel. Ahithophel, partly from a proud indignation that his advice was not followed, and perhaps partly from foresight that Hushai's measures effectually tended to reinstate David, saddled his ass, rode home to Giloah, arranged the affairs of his family, and then hanged himself. 2 Sam. xv. 12; xvi. 20; and xvii.

A-HITUB, the son of Phinehas, and brother of Ichabod. His father being slain in that unhappy engagement, in which the ark of God was taken by the Philistines, he succeeded Eli his grandfather in the high priesthood; executed that office under Samuel; and was succeeded by his sons; first by Ahiah, and then by Ahimelech. 1 Sam. iv. and xiv. 3. There were two other Ahitake, both fathers of Zadoks, and descended of ELIAZAR. But it does not appear that the first of them could execute the office of high-priest. 1 Chron. vi. 8-11.

A-HOLAH and A-MO'LI-BAM, two feigned names, whereby the prophet Ezekiel represents the kingdoms of Israel and Judah: the first, signifying, a tent, denotes Samaria and the ten tribes; the second, signifying my tent is in her, denotes Jerusalem and her subjects. Both are represented as of Egyptian extraction, because of the Hebrews sojourning in Egypt; and as prostituting themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians; imitating their idolatries, and relying on their help. For which reason the Lord threatens to make these very people their oppressors, and the means of their captivity and cruel servitude. Ezek. xxiii.

A-HUZZATH, a friend of the second ABIMELECH, who reigned at Gerar, and who, with Phicol, attended him when he came to establish an alliance with Isaac. The Chaldaic Targum, and such versions as follow it, render this name a company of friends. Gen. xxvi. 26.

AI, A'-ATH, A'-JA, HA'I, a city about nine miles north-east of Jerusalem, and one eastward of Bethel. Near it Abraham some time sojourned, and built an altar. Gen. xii. 8, and xiii. 3. After the taking of Jericho, Joshua sent spies to view Ai; they represented that 3000 chosen men would be sufficient to attack so small a place; and no more were sent. To punish the transgression of ACHAN, they suffered a repulse, and thirty-six of them were slain. That crime being expiated by the death of its author, Joshua, according to the direction of God, marched to attack Ai. Two bodies, one of 25,000, and another of 5000, he placed in ambuscade. He himself with the main army openly marched towards the walls. The king of Ai, proud of his late inconsiderable success, sallied forth against the Hebrews: they retreated, as in flight, till they had drawn the men of Ai, and their assistants of Bethel, into the open plain. Joshua then, raising his shield on the top of his spear, gave the appointed signal to the forces that lay in ambush on the other side of the city. They immediately rushed in, and set it wholly on fire. This done, they came up with the rear of the Canaanites, while Joshua and his forces turned on their front; and enclosing them, cut them to pieces, without suffering one to escape. The king was taken prisoner, and brought to Joshua. After the inhabitants of this city were utterly destroyed, and the city burnt to ruins, the king was hanged; and before sun-set, his corpse was taken down, and thrown into the entrance of the city, and a heap of stones raised over it. The work of the day was finished by the division of the spoil. Ai was some time after rebuilt by the Benjamites; and long after taken by SENNACHERIB. Josh. vii. and viii. Isa. x. 28. It was rebuilt after the captivity in Babylon. Neh. xi. 31.

2. AI, a city of the country of Moab, taken and pillaged by the Chaldeans. Jer. xlix. 3.

AFJA-LON, (1.) A city of the tribe of Dan, assigned to the Levites descended from Kohath, but the Amorites kept possession of it. It stood between Timmah and Bethshemesh. It appears to have been taken by Uzriah, or some other potent king of Judah. It was wrested from them by the Philistines under Abaz. Josh. xiv. 42. and xxi. 24. Judg. i. 25. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18. Perhaps it was here that Saul's army stopped their pursuit of the routed Philistines. 1 Sam. xiv. 31. (2.) A city in the tribe of Benjamin, about three miles eastward of Bethel. It was fortified by Rehoboam. 2 Chron. xi. 10. (3.) A city of the tribe of Ephraim, about two miles south of Shechem, and assigned to the Kohathites, is referred to by some authors; but others doubt of the existence of this place, and suppose it to be no other than that in the tribe of Dan, which might come into the hands of the Ephraimites. Compare Josh. xxi. 24 with 1 Chron. vi. 69. (4.) Another in the tribe of Zebulun, where Elon the judge of Israel was buried. Judg. xii. 12. It is not certain over which of these AIJALONS Joshua desired the moon to stand still. The first lay south-west, the second north-east; the fourth north-west of him. Josh. x. 12.

AID; to help; assist. Judg. ix. 24.

AIL; to distress; displease. Gen. xxi. 10.

AIN, a city first given to the tribe of Judah, and then disposed of to the Simeonites. Josh. xv. 32. 1 Chron. iv. 32. As AIN signifies a fountain, it often forms a part of the compounded names of places, and pronounced EN.

AIR, a thin, fluid, transparent, compressible, and dilatable body, surrounding our earth to a considerable height; perhaps to the extent of fifty miles. Atmospheric air consists chiefly of light and fire flowing into it from the celestial bodies; and of vapours and dry exhalations from the earth and its productions. Whether the simple and elementary air would refract light without this mixture, we know not. The air is fluid, allowing a passage for other bodies: hence hearing, smelling, &c. are strong or weak, as the air is gross or thin; and on the tops of high mountains these senses are of very little use. Air is of a considerable weight. At a medium it may be reckoned the thousandth part of the weight of water: about 2160 pounds weight of it presses on every square foot; and allowing the surface of a human body to be fifteen square feet, the pressure of air on it must amount to 32,400 pounds weight. With this pressure, not perceptibly felt, till the internal air be exhausted, God inwraps our world, as with a swaddling band. Its elasticity, or power of contracting itself when pressed, and expanding itself when free, is quite astonishing. The air, inhaled by the human body at each respiration is by its own weight contracted into the 15,679th of part the space it could occupy in vacuo; and some imagine it may be condensed or pressed together, till it become heavier than gold. The air is much altered by the vapour, smoke, and other exhalations, which arise from the earth.

The AIR is the region where fowls fly, and the means by which animals breathe. 2 Sam. xxi. 10. Job xli. 16. To beat the air, or to speak to the air, imports, acting in the most vain and unprofitable manner. 1 Cor.

ix. 26. and xiv. 9. The air darkened at the sounding of the fifth trumpet, may signify the church and scripture, which are the means of conveying light and grace to men; and the scripture is the breath of God, whereby he communicates his influence to us; and both which, by the abounding of error and delusion, by the concealment and misinterpretation of scripture, under Antichrist and Mahometism, are darkened. Nor is it unworthy of notice, that just after the rise of this double delusion, the natural sun was so darkened from June to October, A. D. 626, that but a small part of his light appeared. Rev. ix. 2. The AIR of the Antichristian kingdom, into which the seventh angel pours his vial of wrath, may denote the last remains of Antichrist's power; after which his form and life can no longer subsist. Rev. xvi. 17.

ALABASTER, a beautiful bright stone, allied to the marble, but more brittle; it ferments with acids, calcines in the fire, but gives no flame when struck by steel. If finely powdered and placed on a fire, it will appear in rolling waves like a fluid. There are three kinds of it; the whitish, called by the ancients Lygdin marble; the yellow-whitish, called Phengites; and the yellow-reddish, called simply, Alabaster; and sometimes ONYX. The ancients called boxes that contained precious ointment alabaster boxes, though not made of that stone; and with reference to this, a measure containing ten ounces of wine, and nine of oil, was called alabaster. In which of these three senses the box of ointment wherewith Mary anointed Jesus is called alabaster, we cannot peremptorily determine; though, most probably, the box was of alabaster stone. Matth. xxvi. 6, 7.

ALARM, (1.) A broken quivering sound of the Hebrews' silver trumpets, by which they were warned to take their journey in the wilderness, and to attack their enemies in battle. Numb. x. 5—9. (2.) A noise or bustle, importing the near approach of danger and war. Joel ii. 1.

ALAS, woe is me! It expresses terror, perplexity, and grief. 2 Kings vi. 5. Rev. xviii. 10, 16, 19.

ALBETH, though. Ezek. xiii. 7.

A-LEMETH, or ALMON, a city pertaining to the tribe of Benjamin and given to the priests. It stood near Anathoth, and possibly had its name from Alemeth, the son of Becher, or the son of Jehoahab. Josh. xxi. 18. 1 Chron. vi. 60; vii. 8. and viii. 36.

ALEXANDER and Rufus, two noted Christians, were the sons of Simon the Cyrenian, who assisted our Saviour in bearing his cross. Mark xv. 21. Rom. xvi. 13. (2.) Alexander Lysimachus, the brother of the famed Philo. He was Alabarch of Alexandria; and reckoned the richest Jew of his time. He made several very valuable presents to the temple. He was at length cast into prison by Caligula, probably for refusing to worship that impious monarch: and remained in confinement till the Emperor Claudius set him at liberty. He is thought to be the same Alexander, who was in company with the chief priests and elders when they imprisoned the apostles for healing the impotent man. Acts iv. 6. (3.) Alexander the coppersmith; who for a time espoused the Christian faith: but apostatising from his profession, Paul delivered him over to Satan. This enraged him still more; and he did the apostle all the hurt in his power. 1 Tim. i. 20. 2 Tim. iv. 14, 15. It is uncertain whether he was the same who ran some danger of his life, by attempting to quell the mob which Demetrius the silversmith raised at Ephesus: nor is it so much as certain, whether that Alexander was a Christian. Acts xix. 33.

ALEXANDRIA, a celebrated city in Lower Egypt, situated between the lake Marcotis, and the canopic and western branch of the Nile, at a small distance from the Mediterranean sea. Alexander the Great was its founder; and a few years after was interred there in a coffin of gold. It was built in the form of a Macedonian clock; and occupied about fifteen miles. The palace, which was a fifth part of the city, stood by the sea, and contained the palaces, the museum, and royal sepulchres. The principal street, which extended the whole length of the city, was a hundred feet wide. The Ptolemies, who succeeded Alexander the Great in Egypt, made it their residence for more than two hundred years; by which it became the metropolis of Egypt. Its nearness to the Red and Mediterranean seas, drew to it the trade of both East and West, and rendered it, for many ages, the mart of commerce to the greater part of the known world, and one of the most flourishing cities, second to none but Rome. It was famed for a library of 700,000 volumes, which was wholly destroyed by fire by the Arabs or Saracens, A. D. 642. To relate its various sieges and captures by the Syrian-Greeks, the Romans, Persians, Saracens, Turks, and others, would be improper for this work. When the Arabs took it, it contained 4000 palaces, 400 squares, and 12,000 persons that sold herbs and fruits. It is now dwindled to a large village, with nothing remarkable but stately ruins, the remains of its ancient grandeur, and some considerable trade. Vast numbers of Jews resorted here from the time of Alexander; sometimes 100,000 at a time. The Jews from this city, being at Jerusalem, raised a furious persecution against Stephen. Acts vi. 9. Here Apollos was born. Acts xviii. 24. Fifty thousand Jews were murdered here under the Emperor Nero. When the Arabs took it, they found 40,000 Jews who paid tribute. In a ship belonging to Alexandria, Paul sailed for Rome. Acts xxvii. 6. Christianity was early planted in this place. Mark the Evangelist is said to have introduced it. Clemens, Origen, Athanasius, and a vast number of other great men flourished here. The bishopric of this place was for many ages held by one of the four chiefs of the Christian church; having the churches in the eastern part of Africa under his jurisdiction; nor is it long since the bishops here had the prerogative of consecrating the chief bishops of the Ethiopian church.

ALIEN; a stranger; a foreigner. Exod. xviii. 3. Job xix. 15. To be aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, is to be without interest in the true church, or new covenant of God. Eph. ii. 12.

ALIENATE. (1.) To become strange to or verse from. Eph. iv. 18. (2.) To put a thing to a common, strange, or wrong use. Ezek. xlviii. 14.

ALIKE. (1.) Without any difference. Rom. xiv. 5. (2.) After one and the same manner. Psal. xxxiii. 15. (3.) Equally troublesome. Prov. xxvii. 15.

ALIVE, possessed of LIFE. One is alive, (1.) Naturally. Gen. xliii. 27. (2.) Supernaturally, when raised from the dead. Luke xxiv. 23. (3.) Spiritually, when justified, regenerate, and sanctified. Luke xv. 24, 32. This is to be alive unto God, to his honour and service. Rom. vi. 11. (4.) In opinion only, when men vainly imagine themselves capable of good works, holy, righteous, and entitled to eternal life; so men are alive without the law, i. e. without the convictions of it. Rom. vii. 9.

ALL. (1.) Every creature. Prov. xvi. 4. Psal. cxix. 91. or every part. Cantic. iv. 7. (2.) Every man. 2 Cor. v. 10. (3.) Plentiful, perfect. Rom. xv. 13. 1 Cor. xiii. 2. (4.) Some of all nations, ranks, and degrees. 1 Tim. ii. 4. Tit. ii. 11. (5.) Many, or the greatest part. Matt. iii. 5. Phil. ii. 21. Thus it is said, ALL the cattle of the land of Egypt died: the hail brake EVERY tree of the field, Exod. ix. 6, 25. ALL the people brake off the gold ear-rings which were in their ears, Exod. xxxiii. 3. ALL the beasts of the nations lodged in the lutelets of Nineveh. Zeph. ii. 14. The fame of David went forth into ALL lands. 1 Chron. xiv. 17. ALL Judaea and ALL the region round about Jordan, went out to John, and were baptized of him. ALL men held John as a prophet. The apostles were hated of ALL men. Matth. iii. 5, 6; xxi. 26. and x. 22. ALL men came to Jesus. John iii. 26. There were at Jerusalem Jews of EVERY nation under heaven. Acts ii. 5. See WORLD. Hence we perceive the folly of such as found the doctrine of universal redemption on this word that must be so often restricted; and which is frequently limited by the context; by the nature of the thing spoken of; or by the objects of it. Thus servants are required to please their masters well in ALL things. Tit. ii. 9; the Lord is said to uphold ALL that fall, and raised up ALL that are bowed down. Psal. cxlv. 14; the ALL men of Asia that turned away from Paul, denote a great many professed Christians there, 2 Tim. 1. 15; the elect part of mankind may be called ALL, or EVERY MAN; ALL THE ENDS of the earth; ALL THE WORLD; because they are redeemed from all nations, Jews and Gentiles; dwell in all places; are of every rank and condition; and are the substance of the earth, on whose account it is chiefly preserved and favoured; see Rom. xi. 32. Heb. ii. 9. Psal. xxii. 27. 1 John ii. 2.

ALLEGE; to affirm; to prove. Acts xvii. 3.

ALLEGORY, a metaphorical discourse, such as the Song of Solomon; or an illustration of some doctrinal point by an historical event; thus the two wives of Abraham were emblems of the two covenants of works and grace; and of the two dispensations, the Mosaic covenant and the gospel of Christ.

Hagar is an emblem of the former; Sarah of the latter.—Ismael an emblem of those attached to the law as a covenant, and the ceremonies; and Isaac of those attached to the covenant of grace, and the gospel dispensation. Gal. iv. 24—31.

AL-LE-LUIA, or HALL-LE-LU'JAH. This Hebrew word, signifying, praise ye the Lord, is met with at the beginning and end of divers Psalms, chiefly towards the close of the book. Psal. cxi. cxii. cxiii. cxvii. cxxxv. cxlvi. cl. It is the burden of the saints' song at the fall of Antichrist, Rev. xix. and may import the eminent concern of the Jews, in that event; and the universal ascription of all the praise to God.

ALLURE, to engage by fair means. Hos. ii. 14. 2 Pet. ii. 18.

ALMS, any thing given in charity to the poor. Matt. vi. 1—4. In the Hebrew it is called righteousness. It is to be given of things lawfully gotten, and as a debt due to the poor; not for their own, but for the Lord's sake. Luke ii. 41. and xii. 33. In the Greek the word signifies mercy: it is to be given from a principle of true love and compassion to the needy objects. Acts x. 2, 4. and xxiv. 17.

ALMIGHTY, able to do all things; an attribute of God. The Hebrew word for it signifies one who has all sufficiency in himself; all communicative fulness at his disposal; and all power to destroy his opposers. In the early ages of the church, God chiefly manifested himself by this character, to encourage men's dependence on him alone; and to excite their expectation of the full accomplishment of whatever he had promised. Gen. xvii. 1. Exod. vi. 3.

ALMOND-TREE, a tree whose flower is of the rose kind, composed of several petals, arranged in a circular form; and the pistils arise from the cup, and become an oblong, stony fruit, covered with a very hard coat, containing an oblong kernel. They are of five kinds; but more ordinarily distinguished, from their sweet and bitter fruit, into two. They thrive equally in dry and wet fields; and are propagated by the inoculation of an almond-bud into the stock of a pear, peach, or almond-tree. The Hebrew name of the almond-tree is derived from Shaked, which signifies to watch; and imports that it keeps its station; being the first that blossoms in the spring, and the last that fades in harvest. Its fruit is precious and nourishing. Jacob sent a present of it to Joseph. Gen. xliii. The bowls of the golden candlestick being formed like almonds, imported the flourishing and soul-nutritive virtue of gospel-light. Exod. xxv. 33. The almonds that grew on Aaron's rod, when laid up over-night before the Lord, imported the splendour and duration of the typical priesthood in his family; the duty of the Hebrew priests, and other ministers to be early and useful in their work; the speedy approach of vengeance on their opposers; but especially the success, and nutritive virtue of the gospel, the rod of Christ's strength, and the speedy destruction of every opposer. Num. xvii. 8. The almond-tree shewn to Jeremiah in his vision imported that the judgments of God would quickly be ripe, or ready for execution on the wicked Jews of his time. Jer. i. 11. The head of an old man is said to flourish as the almond-tree, as his hoary hairs resemble the white blossoms thereof. Eccl. xii. 5.

ALMOST; in a great measure; next to wholly. Exod. xvii. 14. One is but ALMOST persuaded to be a Christian, whatever knowledge or experience of the truth of the gospel he may possess, or conversation becoming it he may manifest, if his state and nature are not changed by a union with, and reception of Jesus Christ by faith, as the Lord his righteousness and strength. Acts xxvi. 28.

ALMUG, or ALGUM-TREE; not coral; which cannot be formed into stair-cases or musical instruments; but either ebony, plenty of which grows in India: or Brazil-wood, or citron-tree, or some gummy sort of wood, perhaps that which produces the gum-ammoniac, or Arabic; and so is thought by some to be the same with the Shittah-tree. 1 Kings x. 11. 2 Chron. ii. 8. and ix. 10.

ALOES. The LIGN-ALOES, or aloe-tree, according to Linneus, is of the hexandria monogynia class of plants, having no calyx. The corolla is oblong, and formed of a single petal, divided into segments at the extremity. The tube is bunch-backed, and the limb straight. The stamina are six subulated filaments, of the same length with the corolla, and inserted into the receptacle: the antheræ are oblong and bending; the bud irregular in shape; the style simple, and of the length of the stamina; the stigma obtuse and trifid; the fruit is a three furrowed case, formed of three valves, and containing three cells; the seeds are numerous and angular. Aloes are now produced in all the four quarters of the world. One in Europe rose twenty-three feet high, and at once bore 12,000 flowers. Even in Sweden, an aloe flourished in October 1708, and continued in flower through the following winter, though excessively severe. Tournefort enumerates fourteen kinds of the aloe-tree. The American aloe is remarkable for its fine flowers of the lily kind; the Asiatic for the useful drug prepared from it. The aloe drug is formed of the juice of the leaves, fresh plucked and squeezed, and then left to harden in the sun. The succotrine aloe is made of the thinnest at the top; the hypatic of the next; and the horse aloe of the coarse sediment. This drug is famed for its purgative virtue. Both the wood and drug have odoriferous and preservative qualities; and were anciently used for embalming dead bodies, and for perfuming beds and clothes. John xix. 30. Prov. vii. 17. The graces of the Holy Spirit in Christ and his people are likened to aloes, because of their agreeable savour; their tendency to prevent or purge away sinful corruptions, and to keep their subjects from decay. Psal. xiv. 8. Sol. Song iv. 14. The Hebrews are compared to LIGN-ALOES, to import their wonderful increase, flourishing estate, and eminent usefulness. Numb. xxiv. 6.

ALOFT, on high. Psal. xviii. 10.

ALONE. (1.) Solitary; by one's self; without friends to help or comfort. Gen. ii. 18. Exod. xviii. 14. (2.) Safe; without hurt; none seeking to rob them of any part of what they enjoy; separated to be the peculiar people of God; enjoying his special favour and protection, and behaving in a manner different from other nations. Deut. xxxiii. 28. Num. xxiii. 9. To let one alone is to forbear further urging, distressing, or dealing with him. Exod. xiv. 12. and xxxii. 10. Job x. 2.

ALOOE, far off. Psal. xxxviii. 11.

ALPHA and OMEGA, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet. Christ is so called to denote, that he is the beginning and the ending; the deviser, the author, the preserver and upholder of all things; and his glory the end of them. Rev. i. 8. xxi. 6. and xxii. 13.

AL-PHEUS, the father of the apostles James and Jude. Mary his wife, it is thought, was the sister of the holy virgin: and hence his sons are called the brethren of our Lord. Gal. i. 19. Mark vi. 3. He is considered to be the same with CLEOPHAS. Matt. x. 3. (2.) The father of Matthew, or Levi, the evangelist. Mark ii. 14.

ALTAR, the place on which the sacred offerings were presented to God, and, at least, partly consumed with fire to his honour. We read of no altars before the flood: possibly the sacrifices were burnt on the ground. Between the flood and the erection of the Mosaic tabernacle, and afterwards on extraordinary occasions, the altars were built of rough unhewn stones, or of earth. At the dedication of his temple Solomon hallowed the middle of the court, as an altar to burn his numerous offerings. Gen. viii. 30. Exod. xx. 24, 25. 1 Kings xviii. 30. and viii. 64. These prefigured Jesus in his firmness and self-sufficiency to endure his Father's wrath; and in his low debasement and sufferings; and intimated, that in his worship God more regards inward purity and affection than outward pomp. From the erection of the tabernacle, there were but two altars to be used in ordinary cases; the one for burning sacrifices, and the other for the burning of incense. Moses' altar of burnt-offering was a kind of chest of shittim-wood, overlaid with plates of brass to defend it from fire: it was about three yards in length, the same in breadth, and about five feet and a half high. At every corner it had a spire, or horn, of the same materials with the rest. On its top was a brazen grate, through which the ashes of the offering fell into a pan below. This altar was portable, and was carried, with a covering over it, on the shoulders of the Levites, by staves of shittim-wood overlaid with brass, and fixed in brazen rings in its sides. Solomon made a brazen altar for sacrifice of much larger dimensions; but whether wholly of brass, or whether there were stones, or if it was hollow within, we know not. It was about thirty-seven feet in length and breadth, and half as much in height; with an easy ascent on the east side. After the captivity the altar of burnt-offering seems to have been a large pile of stones, about sixty feet on each side at the bottom, and forty-five at the top. Exod. xxxvi. 1-9. 2 Chron. iv. 1.

The altar of incense was a small table of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold, about twenty-two inches in breadth and length and forty-four in height. Its top was surrounded with a cornice of gold; it had spires, or horns, at the four corners; and was moveable by staves of shittim-wood overlaid with gold. Both these altars were solemnly consecrated by sprinkling of blood and anointing oil; and their horns yearly touched with the blood of the general expiation. The altar of burnt-offering stood in the open court, at a small distance from the east end of the tabernacle, or temple; on it were offered the morning and evening sacrifices, and a multitude of other oblations. To it criminals fled for protection. The altar of incense stood in the sanctuary, before the inner veil; and on it sacred incense, and nothing else, was offered and burnt every morning and evening. The brazen altar of burnt-offering prefigured Jesus, as our all-sufficient atonement, and refuge from divine justice; and the altar of incense prefigured him as our Advocate within the veil, who ever liveth to make intercession for us. Exod. xxx. Heb. ix. 21.

The heathens too had their altars, on which they presented oblations to their gods. The Jews had idolatrous altars in such numbers, that they were like heaps in the field. Hos. xii. 11. These altars and groves their children remembered, delighted in, and imitated their parents' idolatry. Jer. xvii. 2. It was common to plant groves of trees around these altars; therefore God would have none planted near his. Deut. xvi. 21. The Athenians erected an altar to the unknown God; for what reason, whether they were afraid there might be an unknown deity who might hurt them, if his service was neglected; or whether they had a view to the God of Israel, to whom the heathens were strangers, we know not. Acts xvii. 23. The Jews' covering God's altar with tears and weeping, denotes either their hypocritical profession of repentance in his courts; or rather, that the abuse of their wives forced them there to pour forth their mournful complaints to God. Mal. ii. 13. Jesus Christ is represented as the altar which Christians have. In his divine nature and person he presented his humanity as an atoning sacrifice to God; he supported it under all its grievous sufferings, and rendered the oblation of infinite value; and thus he still presents and renders prevalent his intercession. Through his person, death, and advocacy, our persons, and sacrifices of prayer, praise, and other good works must be presented to God; and are rendered acceptable in his sight. Heb. xiii. 10. Christ's standing at the golden altar to offer much incense, denotes his perpetual readiness, and constant activity, in appearing in the presence of God for us, and pleading our welfare, on the foundation of his own infinite merit. Rev. viii. 3. The glorified souls of the primitive martyrs are represented as under the altar: they died as sacrifices for the cause and interest of Jesus: in heaven they are near to him, and are eternally happy through the influence of his blood and intercession. The altar in the midst of the land of Egypt, and pillars in the border of it, denote not the temple of Onias, built in rebellion against God's law, but a stated and public dispensation of the gospel, and a Christian church at Alexandria, and other places of Egypt. Isa. xix. 19.

ALTER; to change; exchange. Lev. xvii. 10.

ALTOGETHER; wholly; in every respect. Numb. xvi. 13.

AL-VA'H, or A-L'AH, a descendant of Esau, and prince of the Edomites. Gen. xxxvi. 40. 1 Chron. i. 51.

AL-VAN, or AL-I'AN, the son of Shobal the Horite. Gen. xxxvi. 23. 1 Chron. i. 40.

ALWAY. (1.) Continually, without ceasing. Gal. iv. 18. (2.) While the world lasts. Matt. xxviii. 20. (3.) A very long time, already 1700 years. Rom. xi. 10. (4.) During life. 2 Sam. ix. 10. (5.) Frequently; on every proper occasion. Luke xviii. 1. Eph. vi. 18.

AM. See To BE.

AM'A-LEK. Eliphaz, the son of Esau, by his concubine Timna, had a son of this name, who succeeded Gatam in the government of the Edomites. 1 Chron. i. 36. Gen. xxxvi. 16. He is by many supposed to be the father of the AMALEKITES, a powerful nation which dwelt in Arabia the Rocky, between Havilah and Shur, between the Dead and Red seas; and who are supposed to have been separated from the other Edomites on account of his spurious birth; and to have hated the Israelites because of Jacob's depriving their ancestor of his birthright and blessing. But when we consider that Moses represents the Amalekites as existing in the days of Chedorlaomer, perhaps 200 years before this Amalek was born; that Balaam represents them as the first, or beginning of the nations, Gen. xiv. 7. Numb. xxiv. 20; that the immediate children of Amalek were probably alive when the Hebrews came out of Egypt, and therefore very unlikely to be so numerous as was requisite to conflict with that vast multitude; and further, that the Amalekites' attack of the Israelites is never represented as made upon brethren; and that the Edomites never seem to have assisted the Amalekites; we are therefore persuaded that they were not the descendants of Esau, but a tribe far more ancient; probably descended from Ham, as the Arabic writers suggest.

About A. M. 2091, Chedorlaomer ravaged the country of the Amalekites. Gen. xiv. 7. It was then probably that vast numbers of the natives left it, and settled themselves in Egypt; and were the pastors whom Manetho mentions as terrible ravagers and oppressors of Egypt. About 420 years after, they perhaps in league with the Egyptians, and excited by the hope of booty, attacked the Hebrews at Rephidim, near the north-east point of the Red sea, and smote such as were weary and weak-handed among them; but by means of Moses' prayers, and Joshua's bravery, they were repulsed. This ungenerous attack provoked God to swear, that he would gradually waste the Amalekites, till they should be utterly ruined; and he charged the Hebrews to revenge it upon them. Exod. xvii. Deut. ix. 14. and xxv. 19. About two years after, they assisted the Canaanites to cut off a number of the rebellious Hebrews at Hormah. Numb. xiv. 29, 30. They, many years after, assisted Eglon, king of Moab, and some time after that, the Midianites, to oppress and murder the Israelites. Judg. iii. 13. and vi. 6.

Their wickedness at length increasing rendered them ripe for destruction. About A. M. 2030, God charged SAUL to invade their country with the whole force of Israel; and to destroy them utterly, and all that they had. He ravaged their territories, and slew vast numbers of them; but, contrary to the commandment of the Lord, spared AGAG their king, and the best of their cattle and moveables. 1 Sam. xv. 9. The Amalekites after this never made any great figure. While David was in exile at Ziklag, he and his soldiers invaded their country, and slew as many as he could find: in revenge of which, they, in David's absence, burned Ziklag, and carried off his and his servants' wives and children, and wealth; but he pursued them, slew a great number, dispersed the rest, and recovered the booty with considerable advantage. 1 Sam. xxvii. and xxx. About 160 years after, they joined the grand alliance against Jehoshaphat; but it issued in their defeat. Psal. lxxiii. 7. In the days of Hezekiah, 500 Simeonites cut off the remnant of them, and possessed themselves of their land. 1 Chron. iv. 43. About A. M. 3498, Haman an Amalekite in the coast of Persia projected the universal destruction of the Jews. His plot was defeated, and ended in the ruin of himself and his friends. After which the name of Amalekite is no more mentioned in history, but is perished for ever. Esth. iii. and ix; Numb. xxiv. 20—22; Exod. xvii. 14—16.

AM-A'NA, either the mountain Amanus, which separates Syria on the north-east from Cilicia; to which the dominion of David and Solomon extended, or rather a mountain beyond Jordan, in the lot of the half-tribe of Manassah, Sol. Song iv. 8. See LEBANON.

A-MA'SA, the son, of Jether, or Ithra, and Abigail the sister of David. He was general of the Israelites who revolted from David, and joined Absalom; but David, displeased with Joab for killing Absalom, easily pardoned Amasa, and made him general of his army instead of Joab. When Sheba the son of Bichri seduced the Israelites to a new revolt, Amasa was ordered to assemble the men of Judah, and to pursue the rebels with all expedition. As he took up more time than was necessary, Abishai was despatched with the household troops to attack the rebels before the rest came up. Joab accompanied his brother as a volunteer. They proceeded northward to the great stone of Gibeon, when Amasa and his army came up with them. Joab, with seeming kindness, inquired after Amasa's health, and took him by the beard to kiss him: but treacherously stabbed him under the fifth rib, by which he instantly died. As the soldiers stopped as they passed, to gaze upon the body of their general, Joab caused the body to be covered with a cloth, to conceal it from their sight. 2 Sam. xvii. 25. and xviii. and xix. 13. and xx.

AMASA, the son of Hadlai. See AHAZ. A-MA-SAI, the son of Elkanah; the same probably who was chief of the captains of Judah and Benjamin under Saul, and came to David in his exile, with a number of his friends. Informed of their approach, David went to meet them; assuring them that if they came peaceably, his heart should be knit to them; and wishing that God might rebuke them, if they intended to betray him into the hand of Saul. Prompted by God, Amasai replied in their name, 'Thine are we, David; and on thy side, thou son of Jesse; peace be unto thee, and to thine helpers.' David immediately received them, and gave them the command of some troops. 1 Chron. xii. 16—19.

AMAZED; filled with wonder, or perplexity. Acts ix. 31. Judg. xx. 14.

AM-A-ZIAH, the eighth king of Judah, and son and successor of Joash. In the twenty-fifth year of his age he began his reign, (A. M. 3165,) and reigned twenty-nine years. In the beginning of his reign he behaved well, but had not an upright heart. He executed just punishment on the murderers of his father; but according to the law of Moses, and contrary to the then bloody custom of many countries, did no harm to their innocent children. Intending to reduce the Edomites, who about fifty-four years before had revolted from king Jehoram, he levied 300,000 of his own subjects, and with an hundred talents of silver, or £34,218, 15s. sterling, hired 100,000 men of Israel. A prophet of the Lord remonstrated with him, telling him, that the idolatrous Israelites would bring a curse on his undertaking, unless he dismissed them. Though he deeply regretted the loss of the money he paid them, he sent them home. Proceeding against the Edomites, he attacked their army in the valley of salt; and killed 10,000 on the spot. He next made himself master of Selah, their metropolis; and cast ten thousand of his prisoners from the top of the rock, on which the city was built, thus dashing them to pieces. He changed the name of the place to Joktheel, which, it seems, was its name before the Edomites took it from Judah. He also carried off their idols, and became a worshipper of them. A prophet sharply rebuked him for worshipping the idols, which as he had seen, could not deliver their votaries out of his hand; he threatened to punish the prophet, except he desisted. The prophet forebore; but told him, that for his obstinacy in his idolatry, the Lord had determined to destroy him.

The Israelitish troops offended by their dismissal and disappointed of the spoil they expected from the conquest of the Edomites, on their way home fell upon the cities of Judah, burned several of those situated northward from Bethlehem; slew 2000 of the inhabitants, and carried off much spoil. Proud of his victory over Edom, Amaziah demanded satisfaction for the injury done; which not being given, he challenged JOASH, or Jehoash, king of Israel, to decide the dispute by battle. Joash returned him an answer by a parable of a wild beast treading down a proud thistle, that demanded the daughter of a strong and stately cedar in marriage; and advised him to forbear war, if he consulted the welfare of himself or his subjects. Enraged by this haughty but sensible answer, Amaziah immediately marched his troops to Bethshemesh. There Joash gave him battle, defeated his forces, and took him prisoner: he carried him to Jerusalem; demolished the wall of that city to the extent of 240 yards; carried off all the wealth of the temple and palace, and a number of hostages to secure the peace. After this, Amaziah reigned fifteen years; but never returned to the Lord; his own servants were therefore permitted to form a conspiracy against him. When he discovered this, he fled to Lachish; but they despatched a party after him, and slew him. His corpse was brought back and interred in the royal sepulchres. He was succeeded by Azariah, or Uzziah, his son. 2 Kings xiv. 2 Chron. xxv.

AMAZIAH, the idolatrous high-priest of the golden calf at Bethel. When Amos the prophet predicted the ruin of the palaces of Israel, and the utter extirpation of the family of JEROBOAM the son of Joash, Amaziah accused the prophet to the king as a traitor, who discouraged and troubled the people; and advised the prophet to get home to his own country, if he consulted his own safety, and to prophesy no more at Bethel, where king Jeroboam had his chapel and court. The prophet boldly assured him, that his persecution of him would be punished severely by God; that his wife, through baseness or poverty, should become a common prostitute; his sons and daughters be murdered; his inheritance become the possession of his enemies; himself die in exile, and Israel certainly go into captivity. Amos vii. 9—17.

AMBASSADOR; a messenger sent by a king or state to carry important tidings or to transact affairs of great moment with another prince or state. 2 Chron. xxxii. 31. The Apostles properly style themselves ambassadors of Christ, 2 Cor. v. 20. They were commissioned by their divine Master to announce to a guilty world the terms of reconciliation to and communion with him: in their writings we have the substance of their embassy; and though dead, they yet speak to men, and beseech them, in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God. Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah, the servants of king HEZEKIAH, are called ambassadors of peace. In their master's name they earnestly solicited a peace from the Assyrian monarch; but met with disappointment and refusal. Isa. xxxiii. 7.

AMBASSAGE; a message sent by an ambassador. Luke xiv. 32.

AMBER; a yellow transparent substance of a gummy form and consistency, of a resinous taste, and a smell like oil of turpentine. It is dug up in many parts of Germany, Poland, &c; but that found about the coasts of Prussia is the best. It must be originally in a liquid state; as leaves, insects, &c. are sometimes found encrusted by it. It is of considerable use in medicine; and in other arts. There is also an artificial kind of amber, made of gold and fine brass. Bochart and Le Clerc will have this to be the chamaal, or amber, mentioned in scripture. Ezek. i. 4. and viii. 2. By it may be shadowed forth the union of Christ's two natures; the preciousness of his person; the greatness of his majesty and power. But others render the word a coal fully fired; and so it may represent Jesus as the brightness of his Father's glory; as burning with zeal for his honour, with love to our souls, and wrath against his enemies.

AMBUSH, or AMBUSHMENT; a company of soldiers stationed in a secret place, that they may fall unexpectedly on an enemy; or the act of lying in wait to attack unexpectedly. Josh. viii. 2. Jer. li. 12. 2 Chron. xiii. 18. and xx. 22.

AMEN; (1.) True; faithful; certain. Our translation often renders it certainly; and especially when repeated it approaches toward the solemnity of an oath. John. iii. 3. (2.) So be it: or so shall it be. Jer. xxviii. 6. Rev. i. 18. Christ is called the AMEN; he is the God of truth; is the substance of revealed truth; the infallible prophet, and the faithful and true witness, Rev. iii. 14. All the promises are yea and amen in Christ; they are infallibly established by his word and oath; are irrevocably ratified by his death, and sealed by his Spirit. 2 Cor. i. 20.

AMEND, (1.) To make better. Jer. vii. 3. (2.) To grow better. John iv. 52. To make amends, is to make restitution; to give the value of. Lev. v. 16.

AMERCE; to fine; to condemn to pay. Deut. xvii. 19.

AMETHYST; a precious stone of a violet colour, bordering on purple. There are divers sorts of amethyst; those of Asia are of a deep purple colour; and are the hardest, scarcest, and most valuable: some of them are of a pale, and others of a white colour. The German amethyst is the colour of a violet. The Spanish are some of them, of a dark violet; others white; and some few tinged with yellow. Some amethysts are colourless, and all may be made so: in which case they are hardly distinguishable from diamonds, but by their softness. Various imaginary physical qualities have been ascribed to it by the ignorant and superstitious, without the least foundation. It was the ninth in the high-priest's breast-plate, Exod. xxviii. 19; and is placed twelfth in the foundations of the new Jerusalem. Rev. xxi. 20.

AM'MAH, a hill opposite to Giah, not far from Gibeon, which had a pool of water at the foot of it. 2 Sam. ii. 24.

AM'MI, my people. This name being given to the ten tribes after their rejection, imports, that in the latter days, or millennium, God shall redeem them from their misery and bondage, and bring them into special covenant-relation with himself. Hos. ii. 1.

AMMON, or BEN-AM'MI, the son of Lot by his younger daughter. He was the father of the Ammonites who dwelt on the south-east of Gilead, and northward of the country of Moab. Gen. xix. 38. They destroyed an ancient race of giants called Zamzumims, and possessed their land; their capital city was RABBAH; they were noted idolaters; their chief idol was Moloch, supposed to be the same with Baal, Milcom, Adrammelech, Anammelech, and Chemosh. They were dispossessed of part of their territories by Sihon king of the Amorites; but God permitted not the Hebrews to seize on any part which they retained. They were, however, excluded for ever from possessing any rule in Israel, because they joined in hiring Balaam to curse that people. Deut. ii. 19; xxiii. 4. They joined Eglon king of Moab against the Israelites, and shared in the success of that war, Judg. iii. About 150 years after, they invaded the land of Israel, and for eighteen years sorely oppressed the inhabitants, especially those who dwelt on the east of Jordan. At length Jephthah, being chosen general by the Gileadites, sent an expostulatory message to the king of the children of Ammon relative to his conduct. That monarch replied, that he insisted upon the restoration of what the Israelites had seized as they came out of Egypt. Jephthah remonstrated, that the Hebrews took no territories from the Ammonites on that occasion; and that, if they had taken any, sufficient time had elapsed during 300 years to settle these claims. The Ammonitish king being bent on war, Jephthah fell upon him near Aroer, routed his host, and took twenty cities from him. Judg. x. and xi.

About A. M. 3009, Nahash, the king of the Ammonites, revived the old claim to the land of Gilead: he ravaged a great part of the country; the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead defended themselves against him; but upon his laying siege to their city, they offered to acknowledge his authority. He refused to grant them any terms unless they would consent to be deprived of their right eyes, as a reproach to their nation. He however, allowed them seven days to consider his terms. On the eighth, when he expected they should come forth, Saul, with a powerful army, attacked him in his camp, and entirely routed his host, that scarce two could be seen together. 1 Sam. xi. This Nahash, or more probably his son, had shewed some favours to David, when exiled by Saul: David, therefore on occasion of his death, sent a message of condolence to Hanun his son. Instigated by his servants, Hanun took them for spies, and rudely affronted them. To resent this abuse, David attacked the Ammonites in war; in which he defeated them and their Syrian allies; conquered the whole country: and used their chief men with great severity. They continued tributaries of David and Solomon, and probably of the kings of Israel till the death of Ahab. 2 Sam. x—xii. 1 Chron. xix. xx. They constituted a part of the alliance formed against JEHO-SHAPHAT, but were slaughtered by one another. 2 Chron. xx. 1—28.

While the Syrians continued to oppress the ten tribes, the Ammonites inflicted the most inhuman cruelties in Gilead. Amos i. 13. Uziah king of Judah at length subdued them. Under his son Jothan they rebelled; but were again obliged to submit; and for three years paid a tribute of a hundred talents, and about 40,000 bolls of wheat and barley. 2 Chron. xxvi. xxvii. When Tiglath-pileser carried into captivity most of the Reubenites and Gadites into the east of Assyria, the Ammonites seized on their country; but, probably, with their neighbours of Moab, felt the fury of the Assyrians. Long after, Baalis their last king entered into a league with Zedekiah against the Chaldeans; but when Jerusalem was destroyed they exulted over the calamities of the unhappy Jews. For this, and former injuries to that nation, the prophets threatened them with judgments and ruin. About five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar's troops ravaged their whole country; burnt Rabbah their capital; and carried the remnant into captivity, leaving the land desolate. It appears that Cyrus allowed them to return, and re-inhabit their land. In Nehemiah's time, one Tobiah was their chief. During the contests between the Grecian kings of Egypt and Syria, they were subject sometimes to the one, and sometimes to the other. Antiochus the great, took Rabbah their capital, demolished its walls, and put a garrison in it. During the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Ammonites cruelly oppressed the Jews in their neighbourhood. To revenge this, Judas Maccabees attacked them, routed their forces, burned their cities, and carried away their wives and children. In the second century of the Christian era, Justin Martyr, in mistake, terms them a numerous nation; for it is certain, that within a short period they were so blended with the Arabs, that their remembrance ceased from among men. Amos i. 11—14. Jer. ix. 25, 26; xxv. 21, 27. and xlix. 1—5. Ezek. xxi. 28—32. and xxv. 1—7. Zeph. ii. 9—11.

AM'NON, the eldest son of David by Ahinoam his second wife. Having conceived a violent passion for Tamar his half-sister, he, by the wicked advice of Jonadab his cousin, feigned himself sick; and begged his father would allow Tamar to visit him, to make him cakes in his sight, and give him to eat out of her hand: his request was granted. Tamar prepared the cakes, and brought them to him. He refused to eat, until every one but Tamar was gone out of the room. He then stated to her his odious design. Tamar remonstrated against it, as foolish and wicked; and either ignorant of the law, forbidding the marriage of brothers and sisters, or stupefied with terror and perplexity, she proposed he should desire her from their father in marriage. Deaf to all her entreaties, he accomplished his wicked purpose; when his pretended love was immediately changed into as violent hatred. He commanded her to hasten from his presence. She being unwilling to expose herself to public view, in such evident grief and confusion, he ordered his servant to thrust her out by force, and to bolt the door after her. When David heard of this affair he was extremely afflicted; but as a sinful indulgence of his children made him, reluctant to take violent measures with his eldest son, ABSALOM, the full brother of Tamar, met her all in tears, as she was driven out by Amnon: he advised her to keep secret the abuse she had received: he also appeared as kind towards Amnon as ever, but was resolved on revenge, which he fully gratified, about two years afterwards, at a feast given at the shearing of his sheep, to which Absalom invited his father and brethren. David excused himself; but allowed his sons to be present. Absalom had previously ordered his servants to murder Amnon when they should see him merry with wine: these orders were punctually executed, and Amnon died about A. M. 2974. 2 Sam. xiii.

AM'ON, (1.) A governor of Samaria, whom Ahab ordered to imprison the prophet Micalah, till he returned safe from the war against Ramoth-Gilead. 1 Kings xxii. 26. (2.) The son of Manasseh by Meshullemeth, the daughter of Harnz. He was the fourteenth king of Judah. He began his reign in the twenty-second year of his age, and reigned two years: he was a monster of wickedness, nor did he, like his father Manasseh, repent, but still waxed worse and worse. His own servants slew him in his house; and were, in their turn, murdered by the people. Amon was buried in the garden of Uzza, and was succeeded by Josiah his son. 2 Kings xxi. 18-26. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20-25. (3.) Amon, or Ami, a noted chief of the Jewish people on their return from the captivity. Ezra ii. 57. Neh. vii. 59.

AMO-RITES, a tribe of the CANAANITES, which sprung from Emor the fourth son of Canaan. Many of them were GIANTS, like cedars in height, and oaks in strength. Amos ii. 9. They consisted of two powerful kingdoms on the east of Jordan, governed by Sihon and Og. The former had seized on a great part of the territories of Moab and Ammon; but Moses conquered their whole country, and gave it to the Reubenites, Gadites, and half-tribe of Manasseh. The Amorites, were also scattered along the south of Canaan, westward of Jordan: these routed the Israelites at Hormah; but about forty years after were subdued by Joshua, and their land divided among the tribes of Judah, Simeon, Dan, and Benjamin. Numb. xxi. xxxii. Deut. i. 44. Josh. xii. 15. and xix. As the Amorites were the most powerful tribe, the whole of the Canaanites were sometimes called by their name. Judg. vi. 10. 2 Kings xxi. 11. The parents of the Jewish nation are represented as Amorites and Hittites; they were as unworthy before God, and as wicked in themselves, as the two worst of the Canaanitish nations; nay, Judah's wife, the mother of Shelah, and Tamar, the mother of Pharez and Zerah, were both Canaanites. Compare Gen. xxxviii. with Ezek. xvi. 3.

AMOS, the fourth of the minor prophets. He was originally an herdsman of Tekoah, a city belonging to Judah, and a humble gatherer of sycamore-fruit. God sent him to prophesy to the ten tribes during their great prosperity, under Jeroboam the son of Joash, two years before the earthquake, and so in the latter part of Jeroboam's reign. He began with predictions of ruin to the Syrians, Philistines, Tyrians, Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites, chaps. i. ii. He next inveighs against the idolatry, the oppression, security, wantonness, selfishness, and obstinacy of Israel and Judah; and threatens them with distress, war, captivity, and desolation, as divine judgments for their sins; and particularly, that the family of Jeroboam, though then prosperous, should be quickly cut off by the sword. By representing him as a traitor to the government, and a troubler of the people; and by threatening him if he staid at Bethel, Amaziah the idolatrous priest thought to intimidate him, and stop his mouth. He boldly averred to the priest, that sudden ruin should seize the family of Jeroboam, and the kingdom of the ten tribes; and added a prediction of woe to AMAZIAH's own family.

Amos ii-vii. H proceeded to threaten them with unavoidable ruin and captivity for their oppression, their fraud, profanation of the sabbath, and their other sins; and closes his message with a prophecy of the Jews' return from Babylon; of the gathering of the Gentiles to Christ; and of the conversion of Israel and Judah; and their return to their own land. Chaps. viii. and ix.

Amos lived, most probably, to see a great part of his predictions fulfilled, in the civil wars, and captivity of the ten tribes. It has been pretended by some that the style of this prophet is of the low and vulgar kind; and that he was rude in speech: but scarce can language be more lofty than his description of God: 'Lo, he that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind, and declareth unto man what is his thought; that maketh the morning darkness, and treadeth on the high places of the earth, the Lord, the God of hosts, is his name.' chap. iv. 13. How pitiful are the raptures of Homer to those of the herdsman!

AM-PHIPO-LIS, a city of Macedonia, on the confines of Thrace, surrounded by the river Strymon. It was built by Cimon, the famed Athenian, about 470 years before Christ, who peopled it with 10,000 of his countrymen. It was taken from the Athenians by Bresidas the Lacedæmonian. As it was an object of great dislike, and a source of some inconveniences to the Macedonians, Philip, the father of Alexander, seized on it. Paul and Silas passed through it in their way from Philippi to Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 1; but we do not read of any noted Christian church being formed there. It is now called Emboli by the Turks, and is a place of very small consequence.

AMRAM the son of Kohath. He married Jochebed his cousin, or rather his aunt, the daughter of Levi; and had by her Aaron, Moses, and Miriam: he died in Egypt, aged 137 years. Exod. vi. 20.

AM'RA-PHEL. See CHEDORLAOMER.

A'NAB, a city in the hill-country of Judah, south of Jerusalem; where Joshua cut off some Amoritish giants. Josh. xi. 21. It is perhaps the same as Nos.

A'NAH, the son of Zibeon the Horite, a duke of Mount Seir, and father of Aholibamah, the wife of Esau. While he attended the asses of his father Zibeon, he, according to our English version, found out the way to produce mules, by the coupling of asses and horses; but the word YEHIM is never used to signify MULES; nor does it appear, as some have explained it, to denote medicinal springs of warm water; but rather the EMIMS, a gigantic race that dwelt in the neighbourhood of Mount Seir. These ravagers, in all probability, Anab attacked and defeated. In this sense, the Chaldean and Samaritan versions understand the text, Gen. xxxvi. 24. Nor is it forcing the passage to take matzah, or found, in this sense. See Judg. i. 5. 1 Sam. xxxi. 5. Psal. xxi. 8. Isa. x. 10.

A'NAK, the son of Arbah, and father or chief of the Anakims: his sons were She-shai, Ahinam, and Talmi. These Anakims, or children of Anak, were very numerous, dwelling in Hebron, Debir, Anab, and other places. Josh. xi. 21. Their fierce looks and extraordinary stature terrified the unbelieving spies whom Moses sent to view the promised land. Num. xiii. 33. About forty-five years after, Caleb begged to have their residence to be his portion in Canaan, that he might have the honour of rooting them out. Obtaining his desire, and assisted by his brethren of Judah, he cut them off from Hebron; and Othniel, his nephew, and son-in-law, expelled them from Debir. Josh. xiv. 6—15. and xv. 13—19. Judg. i. Bochart supposes that the remains of the Beneanak, or children of Anak, retired northward to the territories of Tyre and Zidon, and gave thereto the name of Phœnicia.

AN'A-MIM, or A'NAM, the second son of Mizraim. His posterity peopled part of Africa, probably that to the westward of Egypt, where was a temple sacred to Jupiter Ammon; and where the Nasamones, or men of Amon, lived, and from whom probably sprung the Amilans and Garamentes, or foreign and wandering Amans. Gen. x. 13.

AN-A-NIAS and SAP-PH'I'RA, his wife, were among the first professors of Christianity at Jerusalem. They sold their estate, and pretended to place the whole price in the common stock of the church, but retained part of it for their own use. Though he knew that the apostles were qualified by the Holy Ghost to discern secrets, he affirmed to Peter he had paid in the whole price. Peter sharply rebuked him for his dissimulation; telling him, that, he might lawfully have kept the whole, but as he had pretended to devote all to the service of Christ, and had yet retained part to himself, he had, in effect, lied unto God, who would punish him for his impiety. While he spake, Ananias was struck dead, and was carried to his grave. About three hours after, Sapphira came in; and being interrogated whether their land was sold only for so much as her husband had said, she affirmed it was not sold for more. Peter rebuked her for agreeing with her husband to tempt the Lord, and put him to the trial if he could discern and punish their fraud; he told her, the persons who had just interred her husband would immediately carry her to the grave; and she was instantly struck dead in his presence. This happened A. D. 33, or 34, a little after Christ's ascension; and made a deep impression on both friends and foes of the Christian faith. Acts v. 1—11.

ANANIAS, a disciple of Jesus Christ, perhaps one of the seventy. He preached the gospel at Damascus; and being directed in a vision to inquire at the house of Judas for SAUL of Tarsus, who was recently come to the place, he objected; as he was informed Saul was an outrageous persecutor, and had come with orders from Jerusalem, to imprison all the Christians he could find in that city. The Lord silenced his objections, by assuring him, that whatever Saul had been, he was divinely chosen to be a preacher of Christ to the Gentiles, and an eminent sufferer for his sake. Thus encouraged, Ananias repaired to the house; found Saul blind; put his hand on him; and in Jesus' name bid him receive his sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost; whereupon there fell scales from his eyes, and he recovered his sight, was baptized, and received the Holy Ghost. Acts ix. 1—18.

ANANIAS, the son of Nebedens, about A. D. 48, succeeded Joseph the son of Camith in the Jewish high-priesthood. Quadratus, the Roman governor of Syria, having quelled some disturbances raised by the Jews and Samaritans in Judea, during his priesthood sent Ananias to Rome to give account of his behaviour amidst these commotions. Having cleared himself to the content of Claudius the emperor, he was honourably dismissed. Some years after, Paul being apprehended and brought before this high-priest, had begun, in the most respectful manner, to speak in his own defence; affirming, that he had lived in all good conscience before God to that day. Ananias, in a furious manner, ordered some of the by-standers to smite him on the mouth. Not knowing him to be the high-priest, or not acknowledging him to be so, Paul replied, 'God shall smite thee, thou whited wall! (thou hypocritical person) for sittest thou to judge me according to the law, and yet commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?' Ananias, too, and others, encouraged a number of assassins to murder Paul secretly: but this being prevented by the apostle's transportation to Cesarea, Ananias went thither to persecute him. Paul having appealed to Cesar, the affair was remitted to Rome. Acts xxiii. 1—5.

When Albinus succeeded Festus in the government of Judea, Ananias, by ingratiating himself into his favour, procured impunity for a number of his friends who had plundered the country. At the same time vast numbers of outrageous assassins infested Judea: whenever any of their party fell into the hands of the governor, they apprehended some of the high-priest's friends, and upon occasion, Eleazar his son; that, to obtain the rescue of his friends, he might procure from the governor the enlargement of their associates. At last Eleazar putting himself at the head of a body of mutineers, who seized on the temple, and prohibited the offering of sacrifices for the emperor, the assassins joined him. They pulled down Ananias' house, and finding himself and one of his sons hid in an aqueduct, they killed them both.

AN'A-THOTH, the son of Becher, and grandson of Benjamin. Possibly he gave name to the city of ANATHOTH, which stood about three miles north from Jerusalem, and which was given to the priests by the tribe of Benjamin. 1 Chron. vii. 8. and vi. 60. Here Solomon confined Abiathar, the deposed high-priest. 1 Kings ii. 26. It was besieged by Sennacherib. Isa. x. 30. Here the prophet Jeremiah was born; and for their persecution of him the inhabitants were terribly punished by the Chaldeans. Jer. i. 1. xxix. 27 and xi. 23. One hundred and twenty-eight of the former inhabitants returned from Babylon. Neh. vii. 27. Ezra ii. 23. and rebuilt their city. Neh. xi. 32.

ANCESTORS; those from whom one is descended; ancient fathers. Lev. xxvi. 45.

ANCHOR, an instrument for fastening or stopping the course of a ship at sea.

The most ancient anchors were made of large stones; such were the anchors of the Argonauts, who made their voyage up the Hellespont, about the time of Asa. They were afterwards made of wood, with great weights of lead, or basket-fulls of stones at the end of them; and such to this day are the anchors of the Japanese. The anchor with two teeth or barbs was devised by Eupalamius, or Anacharis the Scythian philosopher, not long after the Jews returned from Babylon. In large vessels they had three or four anchors; one of which, never used but in cases of extreme necessity, was called the sacred anchor, and is now called the sheet anchor. The anchors were anciently cast from the stern or hinder part of the ship. Acts xxvii. 20. The modern anchor is a large piece of iron in the form of a hook, that on which side soever it fall, it may fix in the rock or earth; this is fastened to a large beam of wood, which, by a strong cable-ropes, is fastened to the prow or fore-part of the ship. Hope is the anchor of our soul, sure and stedfast, entering into that which is within the veil; by laying hold of Jesus and unseen things; by fixing on the deep and hidden promises and perfections of God, it effectually secures our soul from being tossed to and fro amid storms of trouble, and keeps it settled in the dark nights of temptation and desertion; or Jesus by his ascension to heaven infallibly secures the safety and happiness of his people. Heb. vi. 19.

ANCIENT. (1.) Old; of former times. 1 Chron. iv. 22. (2.) Very old men. Job xii. 12. ANCIENTS are either men of former times, 1 Sam. xxiv. 13. or governors civil or ecclesiastic. Isa. iii. 14. Jer. xix. 1. God is called the Ancient of days, because he existed from all eternity. Dan. vii. 9. The Lord's ancients, before whom he will reign gloriously, are his ancient people of Judah and Israel, whom, in the glorious Millennium, he will convert to the Christian faith, and rule over as a glorious church. Isa. xxiv. 23.

AND, is a connective particle; but it were to be wished that our translators had sometimes given us another word in its stead, which might have better expressed the sense of the original. It signifies, (1.) BECAUSE; FOR. 1 Cor. viii. 4. Col. i. 14. (2.) BUT, NEVERTHELESS. John vii. 30. Very often it ought to be so rendered, particularly when it is a translation of the Greek particle DE. (3.) EVEN; THAT IS, John iii. 5. Thus, The great God, AND our Saviour, ought to be rendered The great God, EVEN our Saviour Jesus Christ. Tit. ii. 13. In like manner the texts, 2 Pet. i. 1. 1 Tim. i. 1. Jude 4, &c. ought to be read and understood. (4.) THEREFORE. Mark iv. 26. And they were astonished, should have been translated, THEREFORE they were astonished.

ANDREW, the brother of Simon Peter, a native of Bethsaida, and an apostle of Jesus Christ. He was originally a fisherman. When John Baptist commenced his ministry, Andrew became one of his followers. Hearing him one day speak of Jesus Christ as the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world; he, with another of John's disciples, followed Jesus, and continued with him all that night. Next day he met with his brother Simon, and introduced him to Jesus. After passing a day with him, they returned to their ordinary employment of fishing. Some months after, Jesus found them so employed on the sea of Galilee; and called them to be his followers, when he promised to make them fishers, or gainers of the souls of men. They immediately left their nets, and followed him; nor did they ever abandon him. John i. 25-44. Matt. iv. 18-20. About a year after, when Jesus asked his disciples, how he should find bread for the 5000 people who had attended him three days? Andrew replied, that a lad of the company had five barley loaves and two small fishes; but what, said he, are these among so many? John vi. 9. Just before our Saviour's passion, some Greeks applied to Philip to procure them a sight of his master. Philip and Andrew informed Jesus of their desire; and the Greeks were, doubtless, admitted. John xii. 22. Two or three days after, Andrew, and some others, asked Jesus concerning the time of the destruction of the second temple, and the signs of his coming. Matt. xiii. 3, 4. After Christ's ascension, Andrew preached some years at Jerusalem. It is said that he afterwards preached the gospel at Scythia, and was crucified at Patræ of Achaia.

A'NER, ESCOL, and Mamre, were three Canaanitish princes, who accompanied Abraham in his pursuit and defeat of CHELDORLAOMER and his allies. Not imitating the generosity of that patriarch, they took their share of the booty which had been taken from the Sodomites, and recovered. Gen. xiv. 13-24.

ANER, a city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the west of Jordan. It either was the same with Taanach, or was exchanged for it. 1 Chron. vi. 70. Josh. xxi. 25.

ANGEL, (a messenger;) is the common name given to those spiritual and intelligent beings by whom God partly executes his work of providence and who are ever ready and active in his service. Reason itself leads us to conjecture the existence of such beings; but scripture renders the fact indubitable. In vain a great many of the fathers, Socinians, and other modern authors, pretend that they were created long before the foundation of the world: Moses assures us, that the hosts of heaven were created during the first six days mentioned by him. Gen. ii. 1. Exod. xx. 11. When God founded the earth they sang together, and shouted for joy. Job xxxviii. 6, 7. They were endowed on their creation with eminent wisdom, holiness, and purity; and placed in a most happy and honourable state; but capable of change. Their knowledge is great, but not infinite: they desire to look into the mystery of redemption and to learn from the church the manifold wisdom of God: nor can they search the hearts of men, or know future things, but as they are instructed by God. 1 Pet. i. 12. Eph. iii. 10. Jer. xvii. 10. Matt. xxiv. 36. We cannot understand the manner in which their knowledge of things corporeal and visible is acquired; nor the way in which they influence human beings; or their method of communication among themselves. Their power is also very extensive; but it is, strictly speaking, incapable of working miracles. Their number is very great, amounting to many millions. Psal. lxxviii. 17. Matt. xxvi. 53. Rev. v. 11. Dan. vii. 10: and the names of archangels, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers, by which they are distinguished, suggest that distinction of rank, and subordination prevail among them. Col. i. 16. The elect angels kept their first estate. Those holy and blessed beings are employed in attending upon God, and are subjected to Christ, as Mediator; are by him reconciled to the saints; and sent forth to minister to, teach, reprove, comfort, direct, and protect, them that shall be heirs of salvation; and to transport their souls to heaven at death. How useful they are to the saints, in suggesting good thoughts, in restraining Satan, in averting danger, and in assisting and providing for them, we can hardly conceive. Psal. xxxiv. 7. Heb. i. 24. Matt. xviii. 10. Angels were stationed to prevent fallen man's approach to the tree of life. Gen. iii. 24. Two of them appeared to, and ate and drank with ABRAHAM in his tent, consuming the provision in a manner we know not: these two, being courteously invited by LOT, lodged with him, smote the abandoned Sodomites with blindness; warned LOT of the approaching overthrow of Sodom; directed and assisted him to escape from it. Two companies of angels attended Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia, to protect him from the fury of Laban and Esau. Angels smote the first-born of Egypt, and assisted the Hebrews in their going out of that country, and in their march through the wilderness. Thousands of them attended JEHOVAH at the giving of the law from Sinai, and perhaps spoke in that audible voice in the air, by which it was expressed. Gen. xviii. and xix. and xxxii. Exod. xii. and xxiii. 20. Numb. xx. 16. Psal. lxxviii. 17. Acts vii. 33. Gal. iii. 19. Heb. ii. 2. When God offered to the Hebrews an angel as their guide, MOSES declined such assistance, sensible that nothing less than the patience of God himself was able to endure such perverseness as was in Israel. An angel of the Lord supplied food to ELIJAH in the wilderness of Judah; and afterwards angels carried him, without the separation of soul and body, to heaven. Troops of them protected ELISHA at Dotham. To punish DAVID's numbering of the people, an angel slew 70,000 of them in one day. An angel, in one night cut off 185,000 of Sennacherib's army, and delivered Jerusalem from his fury. Angels frequently conversed with Daniel, Zechariah, and John. Exod. xxxiii. and xxxiv. 1 Kings xix. 2 Kings ii. 11. vi. 7. and xix. 35. 2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 17. An angel, at stated periods, troubled the waters of the pool of Bethesda. John v. 4. An angel foretold the birth of Jesus Christ, and of John Baptist. Multitudes attended our Saviour's birth, and published it to the shepherds of Bethlehem. An angel warned Joseph and Mary to flee into Egypt with Jesus when an infant; and to return thence into Judea. Angels ministered unto our Lord, after his temptation in the wilderness. An angel comforted him in his bloody agony. Two of them rolled the stone from the mouth of his sepulchre, and informed the women, that he was risen from the dead. Multitudes of them attended him in his ascension; some of whom informed the gazing disciples, that they should in like manner see him return from heaven. An angel liberated the apostles at Jerusalem; brought Peter from the prison of Herod; and liberated Paul and Silas at Philippi. An angel assured Paul of the safety of himself and of those that were with him in the ship. Matt. i. 20, 21. ii. 13, 19. iv. 11. and xxviii. 25. Luke i. ii. xxii. 43. and xxiv. 45. Acts i. 10, 11. v. 19. xii. 7—10. xvi. 26. and xxvii. 8.

Some writers assert that every person has an angel to attend him; and every kingdom its particular guardian angel; if not the elements of fire, water, &c. particular ones to manage them: but none of these opinions are sufficiently warranted from scripture. One angel is sometimes represented as acting on multitudes: and multitudes of angels are represented as protecting one. The mode in which they account to God for the fulfillments of their respective commissions, cannot be determined. It is, however, certain, that their ministration to men no way interferes with their enjoyment of God; that all of them are ineffably delighted with the work of human redemption; and celebrate the same in their highest anthems of praise; and that at the last day, all their unnumbered millions will attend the Redeemer to judgment; shall gather the elect from the four winds of heaven to his right hand; and consign the damned to the horrid regions of eternal misery. Acts xii. 15. Dan. x. 20. Rev. xiv. 18. and xvi. 5. Isa. xxxvii. 36. Psal. xxxiv. 7. Gen. xxxii. 1. Job i. 6. and ii. 1. Matt. xviii. 10. xxv. 31 and xiii. 39, 40.

Vast numbers of angels, quickly after their creation, fell from their happy state; but whether pride, envy of man's happiness, or some other crime, was the cause, we are not clearly informed. These are ordinarily denominated devils, unclean spirits, Satan, &c. Upon their sin, they were immediately excluded the heavenly mansions, and irrevocably condemned to endless misery. They were not, however, confined to the prison of hell; but suffered to rove about in our world, for the trial and punishment of mankind. Such is their desperate malice, that, although they know that every injury they inflict on mankind will certainly increase their eternal torment; and that every trial of the saints will issue in their welfare, and in their own aggravated misery; yet they never cease going about seeking whom they may devour. 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude 6. 1 Tim. lii. 8. John viii. 44. 1 Pet. v. 8. These apostate spirits appear to have a chief; in whom, perhaps their apostacy began; or who, perhaps, had been an archangel in his happy estate. The rest are represented as angels or servants to him; and he is called the Devil, Satan, Beelzebub, Prince of the power of the air, Prince and God of this world. It was probably he, who, in the form of a serpent, seduced our first parents, and received an additional curse on that account, to be inflicted chiefly through our redemption by Christ. It was probably he, who assaulted our Saviour in the desert, and elsewhere, and grievously tempted him. Matt. xxv. 41. Gen. iii. Matt. iv. Luke iv. John xiv. 30.

These evil angels perpetually deceive, or harass, the children of men; and have, under different forms, been worshipped by most nations. They enter into familiar correspondence with diviners, wizards, &c. deceiving them, and enabling them to impose on, or injure their fellow-men. These evil angels often assume the appearance of holiness, and warmly excite men to the profession of religion; but it is always to promote some wicked and sinful design. God employed a number of these angels to harass the Egyptians. One or more of them were permitted of God, by means of robbers, lightning, storms, &c. to destroy the substance and family of Job, and smite his body all over with boils. They tempted king David to number his people; and seduced the prophets of Baal to persuade Ahab to go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead. Vast numbers of them were permitted to take possession of the bodies of men during Christ's personal ministry on earth, that his power might be rendered conspicuous in casting them out. In every age, these spirits have, by means of Heathen and other persecutors, and of subtle heretics, harassed the Christian church. During the glorious millennium their power shall be greatly restrained; at the end thereof, they shall again deceive the nations; and soon after be publicly condemned, and shut up in everlasting perdition. 1 Pet. v. 8. Eph. ii. 2. Dent. xxxii. 17. 1 Cor. x. 20. 2 Kings xxi. 6. 1 Cor. xi. 14. Psal. lxxviii. 49. Job i. and ii. 1 Chron. xxi. 1. 1 Kings xxii. Acts x. 28. Rev. ii. 10. and xii. and xx.

The holy angels, in their disputes with devils, bring no railing accusation against them; but act with mildness and meekness, as we ought to do with the worst of men. 2 Pet. ii. 11. Jude 9. The angels, for whose sake women ought to be covered in worshipping assemblies, are the good angels, in whose presence nothing immodest is proper; and the evil angels, to whom none ought to furnish occasion for temptation to levity, especially in the worship of God. 1 Cor. xi. 10.

Jesus Christ is called an ANGEL. He was sent by his Father to publish and fulfil the work of our redemption; and to him hath he committed all judgment. He appeared to Hagar; to Abraham; to Jacob; to Moses; to Balaam; to Joshua; to the Hebrews at Bochim; to Gideon and Manoah; to Daniel; to Zechariah the prophet; and to the apostle John, in the character of an angel. Gen. xvi. xviii. xxxii. Exod. iii. Num. xxii. Josh. v. Judg. ii. 6. and xiii. Dan. x. Zech. i. 1—6. Whenever one in this character is represented as speaking in the manner of God, or as sovereign of the church, we are to understand him of our Redeemer. He is called the Angel of the covenant: he publishes the plan; he fulfils the conditions; he executes the promise of the covenant of grace. Mal. iii. 1. He is the Angel of God's presence, or face; he is the Son of his love; the desire of his eyes; and the mirror by which his glory is displayed; he came from his bosom, is always near him, sits at his right hand, and appears before his throne, interceding for us. Isa. lxiii. 9.

Ministers are denominated ANGELS. They have a commission from God to publish his message, and to execute his work, in bringing men to his Son; and, as the angels in heaven, so ought they to excel in knowledge, humility, holiness, harmony, zeal, and readiness to serve Jesus Christ and his people; and in searching into the mysteries of redemption; in praising God, and rejoicing over the conversion of sinners. Rev. i. 20. and xiv. 6—8. A plurality of ministers are represented as one ANGEL, to denote their union and harmony; and their having one to preside in their judicative assemblies. Rev. ii. 1, 8, 12, 16. and iii. 1, 7, 14. They are, perhaps, the angels that come from the temple and altar, and who have power over fire. They serve in God's church and worship; they denounce God's fiery judgments, and the fall of Antichrist; and by their prayers and preaching accelerate his ruin. Rev. xiv. 16, 18. The Angels which gather Christ's elect, are either ministers who gather them to Christ on their conversion, or proper angels, who will gather them to his right hand at the last day. Matt. xxiv. 31.

The ministers of God's judgment against his enemies are called ANGELS. The Turks are represented as four angels loosed from the river Euphrates, and appointed for a year, a month, a day, and an hour, to slay the third part of men. Though the Turks had, in the eleventh century, established four sultanies, or kingdoms, near the river Euphrates, yet the invasion of the Tartars, the sacred war of the Franks, or Popish croisades, and their own civil broils, for a long time restrained them. At length about A. D. 1281, or according to others 1302, Ortogrul, and his three sons, passed the Euphrates to the westward, ravaged a great part of the Roman empire, and cut off prodigious numbers of Saracens, but chiefly of nominal Christians, in Asia, Europe, and Africa, for 391 years, i. e. from 1281 to 1672; or 396 years, reckoning from 1302 to the peace of Carlowitz, in 1698. Rev. ix. 14. The instruments of God's vengeance against the Papists and Mahometans, whether proper angels, ministers, magistrates, or armies, are represented as seven angels, pouring vials of wrath on the earth, waters, rivers, sun, air, &c. Commissioned by God, they sufficiently execute his vengeance; and, with great activity and success, will entirely, but gradually, ruin these enemies of Christ. Rev. xv. 6, 8. and xvi.

To ANGER, to provoke to anger. Rom. x. 19. ANGER is a violent displeasure, attended with an inclination to hurt, or destroy. When directed against sin, it is holy and lawful. Eph. iv. 26. When pointed against the person of our neighbour, or against the innocent creatures of God, it is wicked and sinful. Matt. v. 22. When it becomes very strong, it is called WRATH. When it renders one outrageous, and almost mad to destroy, it is called FURY. When it is more calm and fixed, it is termed HATRED. When fixed, violent, and even pointed against such as have not injured us, it is MALICE. When anger, hatred, wrath, or fury, are ascribed to God, they denote no tumultuous passion; but merely his holy aversion to, and just displeasure with sin and sinners; and the evidence thereof, in his terrible threatenings, or righteous judgments. Psal. vi. 1. and vii. 11. The Hebrews thought anger chiefly indicated by the nose; and so represented readiness or slowness to anger, by the shortness or length of the nose. Deut. xxix. 20. Joel ii. 12.

ANGUISH; severe inward pain; torment or perplexity, as of a travelling woman. Exod. vi. 9. Jer. vi. 24.

ANISE, or DILL, is a species of the pentandria, digynia plants, and seldom thrives but in warm climates. Its flower is of the rose kind, being composed of several petals arranged in a circular form, and placed on a cup, which afterwards becomes a fruit, composed of two seeds of an oval figure. The leaves are like those of fennel. Aniseed has a fine aromatic smell, and is much used by confectioners and perfumers. Oil and water distilled from it, are an excellent cordial, and carminative. It seems to have grown plentifully in Judea. Matt. xxiii. 23.

ANNA, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher; she had been early married, and lived seven years with a husband. After his death, she devoted herself to the service of God; and, at the morning and evening sacrifices, regularly attended the temple, to pour forth her prayers. When she was fourscore years of age, she found the blessed Virgin, with the infant Saviour at the temple, and Simeon blessing God for him. Inspired by the Holy Ghost, she praised the Lord, and commended the child, as the promised Messiah, to such as waited for his coming, and expected the redemption of Israel by him. Luke ii. 36, 37.

ANNAS or ANANUS, the son of Seth. He filled the office of high-priest eleven years, and is considered to be the only one having five sons, who successively exercised that office. When deprived of the priesthood, he still retained a great share in the management of public affairs. When Christ was apprehended, he was first carried to Annas, and then Caiaphas, his son-in-law, who was high-priest, or perhaps no more than sagan to Annas that year. John xviii. 13. Both were malicious persecutors of the apostles on account of their testifying to the resurrection of Jesus. Acts iv. 6.

ANOINT; (1.) To pour oil upon one. Dan. x. 3. (2.) To set apart to some noted service. 1 Kings xix. 15. (3.) To make ready. Isa. xxi. 5. (4.) To daub, besmear. John ix. 6, 11. The anointing of persons or things under the law, imported the setting them apart to the service of God, or to some important office, as prophet, priest, or king; and was typical of the communication of the Holy Ghost to Christ and his church. Exod. xxviii. 29. The Holy Ghost is called an UNCTION, or ANOINTING. By him persons are separated from the world to the service of God; have their nature and works made holy and lovely; are fitted to run in the ways of God, and to fight the good fight of faith. 1 John ii. 20, 27. God's anointing of our Redeemer, imports his appointing him to the office of Mediator, Prophet, Priest, and King; his giving him a human nature, fully furnished with all the gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost dwelling in him. On this account, he is called Messiah, Christ, or Anointed. Dan. ix. 24. Rom. i. 1. Psal. lxxiv. 9. 1 Sam. ii. 35. He is anointed above his fellows; called to higher offices; and more abundantly filled with the Holy Ghost than his people are. Psal. xlv. 7. God anoints his chosen people, when he endues them with the gifts, graces, and comforts of the Holy Ghost; and bestows spiritual prosperity on them. 1 Cor. i. 21. Psal. xxiii. 5. and xcii. 10. They anoint their eyes with eyesalve, when they apply to the word and Spirit of God for saving instruction in the things of God. Rev. iii. 18. Saul, David, Zedekiah, and Cyrus, are called the Lord's anointed, because set apart and furnished by him for the kingly office, and the particular work assigned to them. 1 Sam. xii. 3. and xvi. 6. Lam. iv. 20. Isa. xlv. 1. Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm; hurt not the Hebrew patriarchs, or their seed, whom I have chosen and called to my particular friendship and service. Psal. cv. 15. The yoke shall be destroyed because of the anointing; the bondage and misery of the Assyrians shall be removed on account of the covenant of royalty made with David; for the sake of Christ, the promised Messiah; and by means of the Holy Ghost poured down from heaven to reform the land. Isa. x. 27.

ANON; instantly; by and by. Matt. xiii. 20.

ANOTHER. (1.) A different person or thing. Gen. xxx. 24. (2.) More excellent. Caleb had another spirit than the unbelieving spies: one disposed to acquiesce in the will of God, and to trust in his power and promise. Num. xiv. 24. Saul, when anointed king of Israel, became another man and had another heart given him; his spirit was rendered more intelligent, sagacious, majestic, bold, and fit for government, than before. 1 Sam. i. 6, 9. Another Jesus, spirit, or gospel, is one equally or more excellent than that preached by Paul, or communicated by means of his ministrations. 2 Cor. xi. 4. False doctrine, chiefly in fundamental points, is another gospel, and yet not another; though it be different from, and subversive of the gospel of Christ; yet in itself it is no gospel; no good tidings at all to sinful men. Gal. i. 6, 7.

ANSWER; (1.) To reply to a question, or call. Prov. xxvi. 4. (2.) To make a defence or apology before a judge. 2 Tim. iv. 16. (3.) To speak after another. Deut. xxvii. 15. (4.) To begin to speak. Dan. ii. 26. (5.) To witness for. Gen. xxx. 33. (6.) To obey a call. Isa. lxxv. 12. (7.) To grant what is prayed for. Psal. xxvii. 7. (8.) To account for. Job ix. 3. and xl. 2. (9.) To render a suitable punishment. Ezek. xiv. 7. (10.) To suit; correspond to. Prov. xxvii. 19. Gal. iv. 23.—Answerable, correspondent to, meet for. Exod. xxxviii. 18. Matt. iii. 8. An answer of peace, is one importing peace, prosperity, or happiness. Dent. xx. 11. Gen. xli. 16. The answer of a good conscience, necessary towards baptism, is a conscientious profession and practice of the gospel, by which the engagements in baptism are fulfilled. 1 Pet. iii. 21. A fool is to be answered, and yet not answered, according to his folly: his folly is to be exposed, but not in his own foolish and furious manner. Prov. xxvi. 4, 5.

ANT, or EMMET, a very provident insect, which in the summer and harvest lays up provision for the winter. It is said, that ants are ashamed to return empty to their nests. With prodigious toil and care they convey the corn to their abodes. When the rain moistens their upper chambers, they convey their provision to deeper repositories in the earth. If it be wet, they dry it in the sun by day; but if their nests be near a haunt of birds, or doves, who devour it, they dry it during a clear moon by night: they gnaw off the ends of their grain, that it may not bad. They are said to be extremely careful in the education of their young. Solomon recommends their example to be considered and imitated by singards. Prov. vi. 6.

ANTI-CHRIST, an adversary of Jesus Christ. Heretics who denied the doctrine of the Trinity, or the divinity or incarnation of Christ, &c. were called Antichrist; of this sort there were many in the time of the apostle John. 1 John ii. 13, 22. iv. 13. But one particular class of wicked persons, principles, and practices, is chiefly so designated; in the daily fear of which the primitive Christians lived. The scripture represents this ANTI-CHRIST as the man of sin, and son of perdition; as a strong delusion overspreading the whole Roman empire; as a terrible judgment introduced by ignorance and hatred of the truth and apostasy from it; as springing from the bottomless pit, amid terrible smoke of superstition and error; as sitting in the temple, or church, of God; as exalting himself above magistrates, angels, and every thing called God; as a contemner of the gods of the idolatrous Heathen, and the God of his professed fathers,—in the primitive church, and setting up a new class of Mahuzzim, deities to protect his different dominions; as given to the vilest blasphemy, error, cruelty, and persecution; as possessing a civil and ecclesiastical power over the ten parts of the Roman empire, and seizing upon three of them for his proper domain; as establishing his abominations pretended by miracles, and lying wonders; as excluding from civil commerce such as do not, more or less, acknowledge and submit to his power.

United under one head, the destructive angel of the bottomless pit, the promoters of this delusion were to be many and mischievous, as locusts and scorpions; ruinous to such as had not the true grace of God; having their conscience seared as with a hot iron; speaking lies in hypocrisy; propagating the doctrines of devils; forbidding to marry; or, on occasions, to use lawful and wholesome meats;—while their bearers, having itching ears, would heap up teachers, and give heed unto fables: they were to be lovers of themselves, covetous, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection; truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, wallowers in all manner of uncleanness, intemperate, fierce, despisers of those that are good; traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, creeping into houses, and leading captive silly women laden with sins. The chief residence of this monster was to be Rome: its name, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth. The NUMBER of his name is 666, whose numeral letters constitute Latinus, or Romish; and whose square root is twenty-five, the number of the articles of faith, and of many other things, in the Romish church. This antichrist began to work in the apostolic age, but was checked by the power of the Roman empire, till that was destroyed, and a fearful apostasy from the faith happened in the church. His duration is 1260 years; during which he promotes idolatry, lies, and blasphemy, treads the church under foot, and persecutes the saints, who all along bear witness against his abominations; nor do the terrible ravages of the Turkish angels, loosed from the Euphrates, in the least make his subjects repent of their idolatries, murders, sorceries, fornications, thefts. At the end of his reign he shall, with both craft and fury, almost entirely silence faithful witnesses for Christ: but suddenly, by the pure preaching of the gospel; by the effusion of sevenfold plagues, or vials of divine wrath; and by the revolt and opposition of his own subjects, he shall be terribly destroyed, to the consternation of his adherents, and the great joy of the saints, both Jews and Gentiles. Dan. vii. 8—12, 20—26. and xi. 36—40. 2 Thess. ii. 3—12. 1 Tim. v. 1—3. 2 Tim. iii. 1—7. and vi. 3, 4. Rev. ix. 1—11, 20, 21; xi. xiii—xix.

The above characters, drawn from the scripture, cannot with justice be applied to the heathen emperors of Rome; much less to the fanciful Danish Antichrist of Popish writers, the Armillius of the Jews, or the Daggial of the Mahometans. The Mahometan system may indeed be considered as Antichrist, in a less and more improper sense; but many of the above characters are inapplicable to it. It sits not in the church; nor does it make any pretensions of power equal to God's; allows of no idolatry; nor is it noted for persecution of the saints; nor was it established by lying wonders, but by the power of the sword.

But every part of the above character is clearly applicable to PAPACY. In the apostolic age it began to work in the ambition and false doctrines of the pretended apostles; in the succeeding ages it operated more and more in the growth of error and superstition, and in the aspiring temper of the clergy, especially of the Bishops of Rome. The power of the emperors was long a check upon the pride of the Roman bishops; but when the seat of the empire was removed to Constantinople, about A. D. 330, when the western empire was entirely dissolved by the barbarians, A. D. 476; and, finally, when in A. D. 586, the emperor Justin deprived Rome of her consuls and senate, and made it subject to the Exarch of Ravenna, they had full opportunity to exert their ambition.

Seven forms of government, (viz. by kings, consuls, decemvirs, tribunes, dictators, emperors, Heathen and Christian, and by Gothic kings, had severally prevailed in Rome; when the empire was, at length, divided into ten different sovereignties. The Christian clergy had assumed the unscriptural dignities of lordly bishops, archbishops, metropolitans, patriarchs, &c. They still wanted a head to unite them into one body. The bishops of Rome, by encouraging appeals to their bar, by pretended acts of council in their favour, and other fraudulent methods, aimed at the sovereignty; nor were the patriarchs of Constantinople idle. Gregory the Great filled the Romish see about A. D. 600. In opposition to John of Constantinople, he loudly maintained, That whoever claimed a universal headship over the Christian church, was doubtless the forerunner of Antichrist, if not actually нѣ. Meanwhile, he laboured with all his might to increase the fooleries of superstition: the multitude of which, connected with their attendant errors, now darkened the face of the Christian church. To procure preferment, Boniface, the third Bishop of Rome, by flattering Phocas, the emperor of Constantinople, one of the vilest traitors and murderers, and one of the most inhuman and wicked wretches that ever breathed, procured himself the title of Universal Bishop, about A. D. 606, or 608. Deputies were immediately despatched through the western churches to introduce the new superstition, and procure submission to the Romish yoke. These deputies were often very ignorant, and quite incapable of officiating in the language of the countries to which they came. A remedy was found: about A. D. 666, it is said Pope Vitalian appointed all religious worship in public to be performed in Latin. This at once concealed the ignorance of the deputies, and marked the churches with an implicit submission to Rome.

The Popes exerted their newly acquired power to promote the idolatrous worship of images, relics, saints, and angels; adding to the former superstition, by erecting new offices and orders of monks, till the nations groaned under the load of the numerous and oppressive clergy; who, by crafty and base means, appropriated to themselves most of the wealth and power of the Christian world. Not content with ecclesiastical authority, the Popes grasped at the civil power also. About 750, or 756, they became princes of Italy, lords of the three sovereignties; viz. the dukedom of Rome, the exarchate of Ravenna, and the region of Pentapolis. They gradually proceeded to claim supreme authority over all the kings and emperors in Christendom; deposing the emperors of Germany, kings of France, England, &c. at pleasure, and absolving their subjects from their allegiance. They pretended to dispose of the countries in Asia, Africa, and America, to the Portuguese and Spaniards, who conquered them. They extended their power to the angels; charging them to conduct to the celestial mansions such departed souls as they pleased; and ordering devils to leave the bodies which they had possessed. They impiously laid claim to authority over God himself:

they pretended to form and divide the glorified body of Jesus at pleasure: by issuing pardons, and indulgences in sin, and cancelling the obligation of oaths, &c. they virtually overturned the divine laws. What ignorant, proud, blasphemers, Atheists, enchanters, murderers, whoremongers, incestuous and perjured persons, many of the Popes were; and how ignorance, superstition, idolatry, and every other crime, abounded by their means, is well known to every one acquainted with their history.

In the tenth and eleventh centuries, things were in a most deplorable condition. The greater part of the Romish Christians were buried in sensuality, and blinded by impiety. In the subsequent age, scholastic learning began to pervert and obscure the scriptures, rendering the Christian doctrines quite unintelligible, and to support the abominations then practised. To render it impossible for the laity to discover the errors and horrid villainies of the clergy, their reading of the scriptures by any but the priests was represented as extremely dangerous, and declared to be highly criminal. To silence every murmur against their conduct, courts of inquisition were erected, by means of which, the least suspicion of pretended heresy, or even the most false accusation, exposed the wretched victim to confiscation of goods, imprisonment, tortures, and death.

In every part of the Antichristian period God had witnesses for the truth; who were terribly persecuted and murdered by the Papists. The Waldenses of Piedmont, in France, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; the Wickliffites of England in the fourteenth; the Bohemians in the fifteenth, were the most noted: and nearly two millions, if not more, were murdered on that account. In the sixteenth century, the shocking impiety, fraud, and oppression of the Romish clergy provoked vast numbers to throw off their yoke. The Pope's authority was abolished in Britain, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and a great number of States in Germany and Switzerland. Multitudes in France, Poland, Hungary, and even in Italy and Spain, were convinced of and rejected the Popish delusions. By an establishment of their abominations in the council of Trent, but chiefly by murderous wars and persecutions in Germany the Low Countries, and France; by horrid massacres in France and Ireland; by bloody persecutions in Poland, Hungary, England, Scotland, Savoy, &c. the Pope's agents, for about one hundred and fifty years, attempted to regain the influence they had lost.

Some writers on the subject have supposed that Antichrist's general slaughter of the witnesses, and their death of three years and a half, have already happened. Some things similar indeed have taken place. After the council of Constance, which about 1414, sat three years and a half, to establish Popery, the Bohemians remarkably prevailed. After the affairs of the Protestants had been about three years and a half in a ruined condition, Maurice, who had formerly betrayed them, took arms in their favour, and recovered their liberties about A. D. 1551. After several persecutions, each of which continued about three years and a half, the protestants of Savoy more than once obtained relief. Three years and a half the protestant religion seemed almost ruined in England, under Queen Mary; and again under King James II. but at the end thereof was re-established by Elisabeth and King William: nor was it much above three years and a half, when relief from the massacres began to be granted to the Protestants in France and Ireland. But it is observable, all these slaughters were particular; nor are the kingdoms of this world yet become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ. We must therefore believe the last and most grievous conflict with Antichrist to be yet to come.

The Antichristian power has already been plagued of God. About A. D. 713, the Saracens, who hated the Papists for their idolatry, poured themselves into Spain, and rendered it almost a desert. They went on, ravaging the south of France, till Charles Martel cut off Abdilrachman their general, and 30,000 of his troops, A. D. 734.—From 880 to 980, the contentions between the descendants of Charles the Great, emperor of Germany and king of France, and the ravages of the Hungarians and Saracens in Italy deluged these countries with blood.—From 1090 to 1290, prodigious multitudes were cut off in the croisades which the Popes, for the establishment of their power at home, instigated the Christian princes to wage with the Seljukian Turks and Saracens, for the recovery of Palestine. Scarcely a kingdom in Europe but suffered exceedingly by this mad exploit.—From 1200 to 1270, the contentions of the Guelphs and Gibellines, or the Pope's and Emperor's party, deluged Italy and Germany with blood. From 1370 to 1447, the schism of the Popes occasioned terrible wars in Spain, France, Germany, and Italy. The Bohemians too, for a considerable time scourged the Papists by successive wars. Between 1406 and 1534, a sweating sickness and other pestilential disorders carried off vast multitudes in England, Germany, and France. From about 1570 to 1698, the Ottoman Turks proved a terrible scourge to the Antichristians who inhabited Hungary, Poland, the east of the Adriatic sea, the isles of the Mediterranean, Italy, and Germany.

These disasters, the judicious Lowman, Doddridge, and Guise, suppose to comprehend the first five vials of wrath appointed for Antichrist: we rather, with Newton and Gill, suppose them all to be future, and to happen immediately after the slaughter of the WITNESSES; though we readily grant the events above referred to and other similar occurrences to have been harbingers thereof.

An attentive observer of the events of the last century, and especially those connected with, and resulting from the French Revolution, must conclude, that the prophecies relating to the punishment of the Antichristian powers have been most remarkably fulfilled in part, though not yet fully accomplished. Those countries in which the authority of the Pope was the most deeply rooted, and where to question his absolute supremacy was to expose the daring individual, of whatever rank, to certain destruction, have been terribly shaken, and literally deluged with blood. The Pope, who laid claim to universal sovereignty, is reduced to a mere nominal dominion over a very limited territory; and his spiritual domination has received a check equally effectual. The sword of war has prepared the way for the pacific sceptre of the Lord Jesus; and though, with respect to the exact period when the reign of papal superstition, or of infidel impiety, shall wholly cease, be covered with a veil too thick for human penetration, we are excited to exertion, and encouraged to hope, by the promises of Scripture:—It is not for you (said the Saviour to his too curious disciples,) to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power—but ye shall be my witnesses unto the uttermost parts of the earth. Acts i. 7, 8.

AN-TIOCH. Sixteen cities of this name were founded in Western Asia, by Selencus Nicator, the first Syro-Grecian monarch, to perpetuate the memory of his father: but the scripture speaks only of two viz. (1.) ANTIOCH, the capital of SYRIA. This is thought to be the same with Riblah, in the land of Hamath, where Nebuchadnezzar spent some of the time during the siege of Jerusalem; and where he slew Zedekiah's children, and put out his eyes; and also put to death some other chief men of Judah. It stood on both sides of the river Orontes, about twelve miles from the Mediterranean sea; and near it was the famed temple of Daphne. It was about ten miles in circuit; was the residence of Alexander's Syro-Grecian successors, and one of the most flourishing, rich, and trading cities in the world. Here the Jews held equal privileges with the Greeks. Vespasian, Titus, and other Roman emperors, loaded the city with honours and privileges. Here Paul and Barnabas preached a considerable time: here Peter dissembled, in refusing to eat with the Gentiles; here the followers of our Redeemer were first called Christians, a few years after his ascension. Acts xi. 19–27. xiv. 26. and xv. 35. Gal. ii. 11. The church founded here continued famous for several ages; and here one of the Patriarchs had his seat; here also the famed Chrysostom, in the end of the fourth century, preached with amazing applause and success. This city was thrice in the fourth century nearly destroyed by earthquakes, and as often in the fifth. In A. D. 543, the Persians took it, burnt the city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. The emperor Justinian rebuilt it more beautiful and regular than ever; but the Persians quickly retook it, and demolished its walls. In A. D. 588, 60,000 of its inhabitants perished in an earthquake. The city was again speedily rebuilt; but the Saracens took it, A. D. 637; since which, Christianity has dwindled to the lowest state. Nicephorus, the Greek emperor, retook the city from the Saracens, A. D. 966; but not long after the Saracens or Seljukian Turks, regained the possession. In 1098, the croisades wrested it from them; but, in 1188, they retook and utterly demolished it. At present it is scarcely better than a heap of ruins.

(2.) AN'TI-OGH, the capital of Pisidia. Here Paul and Barnabas, permitted by the ruler of the Jewish synagogue, preached the gospel with considerable success, till the Jews raised a persecution against them, and obliged them to leave the place. Acts xiii. 14—51.

AN-TI-PATRIS, a city of Canaan, situated in a pleasant valley, near the mountains, in the way from Jerusalem to CESAREA; and about seventeen or eighteen miles distant from Joppa, forty-two from Jerusalem, and twenty-six from Cesarea. It was embellished and enlarged by Herod the Great; and from his father Antipater it received its name. Here Paul and his guard halted in their rout to Cesarea. Acts xxiii. 32.

ANTIQUITY, existence a long time ago. Isa. xxiii. 7.

ANVIL, a smith's tool for placing his work on, to be beaten out and forged. The face or uppermost surface of the anvil, ought to be very hard and smooth: it has often a beak or horn at the end, for rounding of hollow work; the whole is ordinarily mounted on a wooden block. Isa. xli. 7.

APACE, swiftly, speedily. Psal. xviii. 12.

APART, aside from others. Matt. xiv. 23. To set apart, is to separate from others to a private place, Lev. xv. 19; or to a sacred use. Exod. xiii. 12. God sets apart the godly for himself: in astonishing grace, and by means of an astonishing ransom, he sets them apart from the world, to enjoy his favour and fellowship, and to honour and serve him. Psal. iv. 8.

APE, or monkey, a four-footed animal, somewhat resembling the human figure. Its face is naked, and its claws are like the nails of a man. Of all the diversified kinds of apes, the satyrs most resemble mankind; and, of old, were worshipped as gods; they have no tail, and are not very unlike an unhandsome old man. The ourang outang, or black-faced monkey, called the savage, is next in resemblance to mankind; and next to it is the baboon, or whiskered ape, with a short tail. The other kinds of monkeys, do not so much resemble the human species; but as they are very tractable, they are taught to perform many tricks, in imitation of men. This disposition to imitate the actions of men, frequently leads to their capture by them. By washing their own eyes with strong gum-water or putting on shoes filled with glue, left near them for the purpose, they are easily taken. Anciently the Egyptians worshipped apes: and they are still adored in many places of the East Indies. Among other rarities, Solomon's fleet brought from Ophir ivory and apes. 1 Kings x. 22.

ATH-PHAR-SACHI-TES. See SAMARITANS.

APHEK, (1.) A city in the tribe of Judah, where the Philistines encamped when the ark of God was brought from Shiloh and taken; and which is possibly the same with APHE-RAH, mentioned 1 Sam. iv. 1. Josh. xv. 53. (2.) A city in the tribe of Issachar, and valley of Jezreel, near the mountains of Gilboa, where Saul and his sons were slain. It was probably the king of this city whom Joshua slew. 1 Sam. xxix. 1. Josh. xii. 18. (3.) A city of Asher, on the border of the Zidonians, and where they suffered the Canaanites to remain. Josh. xix. 30. Judg. i. 31. It was probably one of the two last into which Benhadad's defeated army fled and were destroyed, to the number of 27,000, by the fall of the walls on them: some writers consider the place of their retreat to have been Aphek, near Bilibos in Syria; where there was a temple of Venus, infamous for the most notorious lewdness. 1 Kings xx. 26.

APIECE: every one; for every one. Numb. vii. 86. and iii. 47.

A-POCRYPHA, a number of books generally placed between the Old and New Testaments, or otherwise bound up therewith. They were at least partly read in private by the ancient Christians, as useful; but were not admitted into the canon of scripture. None of them were ever received by the Jews, to whom the oracles of God were then committed. Nor are they found in Melito's catalogue of the canonical books in the second century; nor does Origen in the third, or Epiphanius in the fourth, in the least acknowledge their authenticity. Few of them were allowed to be canonical till in the ninth and tenth centuries, when the ignorance of the people, and the craft of the clergy, were so great as to allow any thing to pass for divine; nor was their authority ever established, until the Popish council of Trent, and by a few of the Papal dupes at Florence. Every attentive reader must perceive that these books want the majesty of inspired scripture; and that there are in them a variety of things wicked, false, and contrary to the oracles of God.

The first book of Esdras is generally nothing but a bad extract of the two last chapters of Chronicles and the book of Ezra. The author falsely makes Zerubbabel a young man in the days of Darius Hystaspis, and Joakim to be his son, chap. v. 5; whereas, he was the son of Joshua the high-priest. Neh. xii. 10. He calls Darius, king of Assyria, long after that empire was utterly dissolved; and represents some things to be done under Darius which were done under Cyrus. Compare chap. iv. xlviii. lvii. lviii. with Ezra i. and iii. 1.—The second book of Esdras never appeared so much as in Greek, only in Latin; and is a collection of fables, dreams, and visions, so bad that even the council of Trent were ashamed to acknowledge it as divine. From abundance of passages therein, the author appears to have read the New Testament; and hence speaks of the signs of the times, and of the third trumpet.

Whether the book of Tobit was originally written in Hebrew, we know not; but are rather inclined to think the Chaldee, from which Jerome made his translation, was the original. The Grecisms observable in Castalio's copy, or in the Hebrew copies published by Munster and Fagius, plainly prove them to be no originals, but versions from the Greek. The book is perhaps entirely a fable. It is not probable, that in the time of Sennacherib and Esarhaddon, the father should live one hundred and fifty-eight years, and the son one hundred and twenty seven. It is certain, no angel of God could falsely call himself Azarias, the son of Ananias, as that writer affirms. The fabu-less story of Sarah's seven husbands being successively killed on their marriage-night by an evil spirit; and of that spirit's being driven away by the smell and smoke of the roasted heart and liver of a fish, and bound in the uttermost parts of Egypt; of the cure of Tobit's blindness by a touch of the gall of a fish; and of his and the angel's making a hearty meal of the rest; and of the angel Raphael's presenting to God the prayers of the saints, fully prove it to be a collection of old wives' fables. Chap. v. 12. and ii. 8. and viii. 2, 3. and xi. 8—13. and xii. 16.

The book of Judith is a romantic history of a great deliverance wrought for the Jews by a woman of this name, who craftily cut off the head of Holofernes, the Assyrian general. It seems to have been written in the Chaldee language; from which Jerome translated it. But where to place this history consistently with itself, we know not. This noted deliverance is said to have happened after the Jews returned from their captivity, and after the temple was rebuilt; and yet about the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar, and after it they had no trouble for eighty years, or more. Chap. ii. 1; iv. 3; v. 18, 19. and xvi. 20—25. It is impossible to reconcile these things with one another or with truth. It is, at best, extremely improbable that Bethulia, a small town, should stand out against so powerful an army; or that the death of the general should cause the whole of his troops to betake themselves to a shameful flight! It is wholly inconsistent with the purity and piety of the sacred volume, to commend a woman as one who possessed the fear of the Lord, who was guilty of notorious lying; of licentiousness and impurity; of profane swearing; of murder; and of speaking in praise of that murder committed by Simeon. Chap. ix. xi. and xiii.

The addition to Esther contains almost seven chapters, which are not at all better than the book of Judith; they were evidently never written in the Hebrew language. It is contrary to the inspired history to affirm, as this author does, that the eunuch's attempt to take away the life of Ahasuerus was in the second year of his reign; that Mordecai was at the very time rewarded for his discovery; that Haman had been advanced before this event, and was provoked with Mordecai for his discovery of the eunuchs' treason; that Haman was a Macedonian, and intended to transfer the government of Persia to the Macedonians. Compare chap. xi. 2. and xii. 1. with Esth. i. 3. and ii. 16—21; chap. xi. 3. and xii. 5. with vi. 3. and chap. xii. 6. and xvi. 10, 11. with iii. 1—5. How stupid to represent Ahasuerus as looking upon Esther like a ferce lion, and yet with a countenance full of grace! chap. xv. 7, 13, 14.—to represent him as calling the Jews the children of the most high and most mighty living God, chap. x. 16;—and as ordering the heathen to keep the feast of Purim.

The book of Wisdom was not penned by Solomon, as its author falsely pretends; nor was it ever found in Hebrew. It appears this author had read Plato and the Greek poets; and borrows expressions from them, as Ambrosia, the river of forgetfulness; the kingdom of Pluto, &c. Chap. i. 14; vii. 13. and xix. 20. Some expressions in it seem to be taken from the prophets, and even from the New Testament. Compare chap. vii. 26. with Col. i. 15. Heb. i. 3. Some suppose Philo the Jew to be the author of it; but the writer rather seems to have been an apostate Christian. He condemns the marriage-bed as sinful, and excludes bastards from the hope of salvation; represents the souls of men as lodged in bodies according to their merits in a former state of being; makes the murder of Abel the cause of the flood; represents the Egyptians as plagued by their own idols, though it is certain they never worshipped frogs, locusts, or lice; calls the Divine Logos, or second person of the Trinity, a capour and stream. Chap. iii. 13, 18; viii. 20; x. 3, 4; xii. 23, 24. and vii. 25.

The book of Ecclesiasticus is a much more valuable work than the former. One Jesus, the son of Sirach, by reading the scriptures, and other good books, attained to a considerable share of knowledge. He collected the grave and short sentences of such as went before him, and added many of his own. His book was originally written in Hebrew or Chaldee; but Jesus, his grandson, translated it into Greek, during the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, about two hundred and forty years before our Saviour's birth; and begs pardon if he had done any thing amiss; which plainly shows, that he was not inspired. Though it be admitted to be the best of all the apocryphal books, yet it contains many things contrary to sound doctrine. It represents the divine Logos, or Son, as created by God; it speaks of honouring parents, and giving of alms, as an atonement for sin; it affirms that Samuel prophesied after his death, and shewed Saul his end; and that Elias the Tishbite was ordered to pacify the wrath of the Lord, and to turn the father to the son. Chap. xxiv. 9. and iii. 3, 30. and xii. 4, 5. and xlvii. 20. and xlviii. 10.

The book of Baruch deserves no better title than an arrant romance. It pretends to have been written by Baruch at Babylon, when the probability is, that he never went thither; that it was read to Jeconiah at the river Sud, which is nowhere else mentioned; nor could Jeconiah hear it there, as he was confined in prison. It mentions a collection to purchase sacrifices, made by the captives in Babylon, and sent to Joakim the priest, along with the sacred vessels which Zedekiah had made; but, how could the captives, newly enslaved in Babylon, be able to collect a considerable sum of money? How could they send it to a high-priest that did not then exist? How could the sacred vessels which Zedekiah made be returned from Babylon, when it does not appear that he made any? Or, how could they be returned before they were carried away, along with himself? The author borrows a variety of expressions from Daniel; and so must have lived after Baruch was dead. The epistle ascribed to Jeremiah is neither written in his style, nor in the style of the scriptures; and ridiculously turns seventy years into seven generations. The Song of the Three Children in the furnace, is partly a poor imitation of the 148th Psalm; and partly deprecatory, not suited to such a deliverance. The account of the flame's streaming above the furnace ' forty and nine cubits ; and of the angel's ' smiting the flame out of the oven, and making a most whistling wind' in it, seems entirely fabulous and romantic ; nor is it consistent with the fire's loosing their bands. The story of Susanna has not the least appearance of truth. That it was originally in Greek, is manifest from the allusion, in the punishment pronounced on the elders ; and to the mastic and holm trees, under which, they said, they found Susanna and the young man together. How absurd to affirm, that in the beginning of the captivity, Joachim, the husband of Susanna, was become considerably rich ; that there were Jewish judges of life and death in Babylon ; that Daniel, who was brought up in the court, had leisure, or, being so young, was admitted to be a judge ; that Susanna went into her garden to wash at noon day, and did it without searching if any body was there ; or that the elders attempted to force her, when they could not but every moment expect the return of her maids !

The story of Bel and the Dragon is still more romantic. How improbable, that Cyrus, a Persian, would worship a Babylonian idol ; an idol, too, that was broken to pieces at the taking of the city ! How absurd to imagine that a man of his sense could believe an image of brass and clay did really eat and drink ! How pitiful, to represent Daniel as discovering that the priests came and devoured the provisions, by making the king's servants strew ashes on the floor, when the priests might so easily perceive them, or the servants so readily give information of their being placed there ! How absurd the statements, that the newly conquered Babylonians should, by menaces, oblige Cyrus to deliver up his beloved Daniel to them, to be cast into the den of lions ! that Habakkuk should be then alive to bring him food, and that Cyrus should wait seven days before he went to the den, to see what was become of his favourite !

The prayer ascribed to Manasseh never appeared in the Hebrew language ; and seems to be the product of a proud Pharisee. The author speaks of just persons, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as being without sin, and not called to repent.

The books of the Maccabees are a history of events relative to the Jews under the government of the priest Mattathias, and his descendants ; and are, especially the first book, of considerable use. It seems to have been originally written in the Hebrew or Chaldee : in this language Origen saw it ; and from this language Jerome probably made his translation. It could not be written by inspiration : the writer often observes, that there was no prophet in his times, Chap. iv. 46 ; ix. 27 ; and xiv. 41 : and, indeed, he has fallen into several mistakes ; as, that Alexander the Great parted his kingdom among his honourable servants while he was yet alive : that Antiochus the Great was taken alive by the Romans ; that they gave India and Media, parts of his kingdom, to Eumenes king of Pergamus ; that the Roman senate consisted of three hundred and twenty persons ; that Alexander Balas was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, &c. Chap. i. 6. and viii. 6—8, 15, 16. and x. 1.

The second book of Maccabees is very inferior to the first. It contains a history of fifteen years ; and is an abridgment of the work of one Jason of Cyrene. The author concludes it, by imploring forgiveness if he had said any thing unbecoming the story : indeed, he had reason to do so, considering what a number of inconsistent and erroneous things he asserts : as, that Judas Maccabeus was alive in the 188th year of the Seleucidæ, when he died in the 152d ; that Antiochus Epiphanes was killed at the temple of Nanea in Persia ; whereas, he died on the frontiers of Babylon, of a violent disease ; that Nehemiah built the second temple and altar, whereas they were built sixty years before he came from Persia ; that Jeremiah hid the tabernacle, ark, and altar of incense in a cave ; that Persepolis was in being one hundred years after Alexander had burnt it to ashes : that Judas did well in offering prayers and sacrifices to make reconciliation for the dead ; that Razis acted right in murdering himself to escape the fury of the Syrians, &c. Chap. i. ii, ix. 2, 26—28 ; xii. 48—49. and xiv. 37.

The third book of the Maccabees is the history of a persecution raised against the Jews in Egypt, but miraculously prevented. Some term Josephus's account of the martyrs who suffered under Antiochus, the Fourth ; but that which Calmet calls so, appears to be nothing else than the Arabic history of the Jewish nation as given in the London Polyglot. It extends to about one hundred and sixty years ; begins at Seleucus's attempt to pillage the temple, and ends just before the birth of Jesus Christ.

A-POL-LO'NIA. There was a city of this name on the west of Canaan ; but that mentioned in scripture was a city of Macedonia, founded by the Corinthians, and scarce noted for any thing, but that Cæsar Augustus there learned the Greek language. It stood near Amphipolis, to the south. Acts xvii. 1.

A-POL'LOS, a Jew of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus at the time Paul set off on his third journey to Jerusalem. He was a very eloquent man ; and had a great acquaintance with the scriptures. With distinguished fervour and diligence, he taught the things of the Lord Jesus, knowing only the baptism of John. Aquila and Priscilla having heard him boldly preach in the synagogue, shewing that Jesus was the promised Messiah and Saviour, took him home with them, and instructed him more fully in the Christian faith. He departed thence, with letters of recommendation to Achaia ; where he was very useful in strengthening the new converts, and demonstrating to the Jews, from their own scriptures, that Jesus of Nazareth was indeed the Messiah promised to their fathers. Here, as at Ephesus, he watered the churches which Paul had planted. His fine address, and obliging behaviour, had nearly occasioned a schism at Corinth ; some pretending to be of Paul's party, others of Apollos's, others of Cephas's, and others, pretending yet higher, to be of Christ's. Vexed at this, Apollos left Achaia; and, with Zenas, the lawyer, sailed for Crete. Thence he went to Ephesus; and was there when Paul wrote his first epistle to Corinth; whither he could hardly be prevailed on to return. Acts xviii. 24—28. 1 Cor. i. 12; iii. 4—6. and xvi. 12. Tit. iii. 15.

APOSTLE, a messenger sent on a peculiar and important errand. Jesus Christ is called the Apostle of our profession; God sent him to declare his will, and found his church; and he is the author, substance, and end of those divine truths, which we are required to believe and profess. Heb. iii. 1.

Our Saviour, in the second or third year of his public ministry, first appointed, and then sent forth, twelve of his followers, whom he named APOSTLES. These he sent out by two and two. Simon Peter and Andrew his brother; James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother; Philip and Bartholomew; Thomas and Matthew; James the son of Alphaeus, and Jude his brother; Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot. Of these apostles Matthew had been a publican; other four, if not all the rest, fishermen of Galilee. The New Testament church not being founded till after our Saviour's resurrection, their first mission was merely temporary; confined to the cities of Israel; and in nothing superior to that of the seventy disciples, afterward sent on the same errand. Their work was to preach that the kingdom of heaven, or the gospel dispensation, was at hand; and to confirm their doctrine by the miraculous healing of diseases, and the casting out of devils. They were to provide no subsistence for their journey, but to expect it from their hearers; nor were they to use any fawning courtesy to gain favour; but were to shake off the dust of their feet, as a testimony against the city or family which rejected them. In the execution of their mission they had considerable success. When Jesus travelled, they were his ordinary attendants; and when he multiplied the loaves, they, as his servants, distributed the bread to the multitude. Matt. x. Mark iii. and vi. 7—13. Luke vi. Matt. xiv. and xv. At their request, he furnished them with a pattern by which to form their prayers: what he publicly preached to the multitude he privately explained to them; often discoursed to them of his sufferings; and committed to them the keys of the kingdom of heaven. When James and John proved their ambition by seeking some high post in his government, the rest were highly offended, as they knew not yet the nature of his kingdom. Just before his death, Jesus informed them of the approaching destruction of the Jewish church and state; and of his own coming to judgment: he assured them, that in a few days one of them should betray him into the hands of his enemies to be crucified. It seems the most of them at first concurred with Judas, in taking offence at Mary's expensive anointing of their Master. With the whole of them he celebrated his last passover; with all of them (except perhaps Judas) he instituted the sacred supper; and addressed them in suitable exhortations and consolatory promises, particularly of the Holy Ghost which was to be poured out upon them. They were so satisfied with these discourses, that, whatever impertinent questions they had formerly asked, they now owned that he spoke plainly. When Jesus was apprehended, he desired his persecutors to forbear touching them; they however, ungenerously forsook him, and fled: his crucifixion threw them into the greatest consternation, as they had all along dreamed of his erecting a temporal kingdom. Judas being dead, and Thomas absent, he, on the evening after his resurrection, appeared to ten of them, amidst their perplexity: he renewed their commission, and breathed on them as a token of his sending the Holy Ghost. Luke xi. Matt. xvi. xx. xxiv—xxvi. John xii—xviii. and xx.

After giving them repeated proofs of his resurrection, he, just before his ascension, gave them a formal commission, to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; assured them of his presence and protection; and that he would confirm their doctrine by miraculous proofs: he bid them tarry at Jerusalem for the effusion of the Holy Ghost, which should be sent upon them in a few days. After they had witnessed their Master's departure to the heavenly mansions, they chose Matthias in the place of Judas. On the day of Pentecost, a feast appointed to commemorate the giving of the law, the Holy Ghost, in the shape of cloven tongues of fire, descended on each of them; who rendered them bold and infallible in preaching the gospel; qualified them to speak in every language; to discern men's tempers; and to confer the miraculous influence of speaking with tongues on others by the laying on of their hands. They preached to multitudes; and thousands were converted. They daily repaired to the courts of the temple, where amidst vast numbers they proved Jesus to be the true Messiah, who had risen from the dead, and was ascended to glory; and confirmed their doctrine by unquestionable miracles. Stung with indignation at their extolling one whom they had put to death as a malefactor, and at their boldly charging upon them the guilt of his murder, the Jewish sanhedrim imprisoned them: an angel liberated them; and they returned to their work. They were again apprehended, and strictly charged to preach no more in the name of Jesus. With amazing joy, they endured the greatest sufferings; and went on with their work; both in public and private. When they were next apprehended, the sanhedrim had almost agreed to put them to death; but advised by Gamaliel, they dismissed them with a solemn charge, never more to preach in our Saviour's name. Soon after this, the Apostles ordained a number of deacons to manage the alms of the church. A furious storm of persecution soon after arose, which scattered the other preachers, but the Apostles abode at Jerusalem. When they had continued in Judea about eighteen years, the eleven, (for James the brother of John had been murdered by Herod) constituted part of a solemn synod, where it was enacted, 'That no observance of the Mosaic ceremonies ought to be imposed on the Christian converts;' but that, to avoid the offence of weak brethren, they should 'abstain from meats offered to idols, and from things strangled and blood.' John xxi. Matt. xxviii. Mark xvi. Acts i-viii. and xv.

Not long after, it seems, the Apostles dispersed themselves into other countries; determining their courses, as it is said, by lot; Peter went into Pontus, Galatia, and parts adjacent; Andrew into Scythia and Sogdiana; John into the Lesser Asia; Philip into Armenia, Media, and Colchis; Bartholomew into Arabia Felix; Matthew into Chaldaea, Persia, and Parthia; Thomas into Hyrcania, Bactria, and India; Jude into Syria and Mesopotamia; Simon the Canaanite into Egypt, Cyrene, Lybia, and Mauritania; Matthias into Cappadocia and Colchis; James the brother of Jude remained in Judea. Meanwhile, Paul, who was called to the Apostleship to fill the place of James the brother of John, flew like a seraph, almost every where, to gain souls to Christ. Without any shadow of proof our common creed is ascribed to the apostles, as the authors of it. Nobody can tell us, when or where they met to form it; or shew us how a creed formed by inspired men could have less than divine authority. None of the fathers in the first three centuries pretend it to have been the composition of the apostles; nor in the primitive ages was it the same in all the churches, or the same as it now exists. Far less ought the canons and constitutions, called by their name, to pass for apostolic. Besides, a variety of other errors, they speak of metropolitans, and other matters not known in the church, till long after the apostles' days. It is probable, that they were collected or forged about the fifth century, when impostors were become sufficiently impudent, and the people as credulous.

Numbers of false and pretended apostles very early deluged the churches; particularly those of Syria, Galatia, Corinth, and Colosse. Acts xv. Gal. i. 7-9. 2 Cor. x. and xi. Col. ii.

APOSTLESHIP, the office of an apostle. To constitute this, it was necessary to have seen the Lord; to have an express commission to go every where, and found and gather churches; to be possessed of an infallibility in doctrine; a power to speak with tongues; to work miracles; and confer the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands. 1 Cor. ix. 1. 2. 2 Cor. xii. 2.

APOTHECARY, one who compounds, or prepares drugs or perfumes. Eccl. x. 1. Exod. xxx. 25-35.

APPAREL: (1.) Clothing; GARMENTS. Isa. iii. 22. (2.) Appearance. Isa. lxiii. 1.

APPARENTLY, in familiar visions, as if face to face. Numb. xii. 8.

APPEAL; to decline the judgment of one, and refer the cause to another. Acts xxv. 11. and xxvi. 32.

APPEAR; (1.) To be seen; become visible. Gen. i. 9. (2.) To come before. Isa. i. 12. (3.) To seem. Matt. vi. 16. God's appearing, denotes his giving a visible token of his presence: thus, he often appeared to the fathers under the Old Testament. 2 Chron. i. 7. Gen. xlviii. 3. Numb. xii. 6; or his making some visible display of his perfections in his works of providence; or some clear intimation of his will. Psal. cii. 16. Acts xxvi. 16. Christ's appearing, denotes his coming in the flesh. Heb. ix. 26; his shewing himself alive to his followers after his resurrection. Mark xvi. 9, 11, 14; his interceding with the Father in heaven for us. Heb. ix. 24; but chiefly his coming in the clouds with power and great glory to judge the world; when every eye shall see him; and he shall clearly unveil the mysteries and excellencies of God. 1 Tim. vi. 14. Tit. ii. 13. Men's appearing before God, imports their coming into his courts of worship. Exod. xxiii. 15, 16. Psal. xlii. 2. Or, standing before Christ's tribunal at the last day, to receive their final sentence of damnation or happiness. 2 Cor. v. 10.

The appearance of a man, is the outward shape and form of one. Dan. viii. 15. The appearance of evil, is what has the least likeness to or tendency towards sin. 1 Thess. v. 22.

APPEASE; to remove anger. Gen. xxxii. 20.

APPERTAIN; to belong to. Lev. vi. 5. To relate to. Rom. iv. 1.

APPETITE; (1.) Desire after food. Job xxxviii. 39. (2.) Strong desire after worldly things. Isa. lvi. 11. To be given to appetite, is to be of a gluttonous and voracious disposition. Prov. xxiii. 2.

APPI-IFORUM, a place in the south-west of Italy, about fifty miles south of Rome, and eighteen from the Three-Taverns. Thus far the Christians of Rome came to meet Paul in his way thither from Puteoli. Acts xxviii. 15.

APPLE-TREE. It is a well known, large, comely, and fruitful vegetable: the kinds are manifold; and its fruit is round, refreshing, cooling, and medicinal. Perhaps the Hebrews extended this name to pear, cherry, and other fruit-trees. Nay, Brocard says, there were few of either in Canaan. A fine drink, called cider, is now commonly made from apples; and they are formed into a variety of very delicate dishes. Jesus Christ is compared to an apple-tree among the trees of the wood; perhaps, a citron apple-tree; to mark his glorious height, his comeliness, fruitfulness, and delightful shadow; with the refreshing, quieting, and nourishing virtue of his influence. Sol. Song ii. 3. The spiritual promises and blessings of the new covenant are called apples. How they delight, nourish, refresh, revive, and heal the soul! Sol. Song ii. 5. The saints' breath, or smell of their nose, is like apples; their fervent prayers, devout praise, and holy conversation, manifest the soundness of their inward dispositions; and are pleasing and acceptable to God; refreshing and edifying to men. Sol. Song vii. 8. The saints raise up Christ under the apple-tree, while they enjoy sweet protection and near fellowship with him: their prayers are prevalent with him, as means of exciting him to his saving work. Sol. Song ii. 3. and viii. 5. Good words fitly spoken are like oranges, or apples of gold in pictures of silver; have a most beautiful appearance, and a delightful and edifying influence. Prov. xxv. 11.

The APPLE of our eye, is the pupil, or small rolling ball. To keep a thing as the apple of the eye, is to preserve it with the utmost tenderness, care, and safety. Dent. xxxii. 10. Prov. vii. 2. The saints are compared to the apple of God's eye, because in themselves they are weak and easily hurt, but thus are inseparably connected with, and are infinitely dear to him: he observes, and tenderly sympathizes with them in all their afflictions; is offended with and will keenly resent every injury done to them. Zech. ii. 8. Psal. xvii. 8.

APPLY; to apply the heart to wisdom, or good works, is, to study by all means to obtain wisdom and knowledge; and to perform good works. Psal. xc. 12. Eccl. viii. 9.

APPOINT; (1.) To command; to order. 2 Sam. xiii. 15. (2.) To ordain; to set apart to an office. Gen. xli. 34. Acts vi. 3. (3.) To assign; to allot as a portion, or charge. Num. iv. 19. (4.) To decree; to purpose. Acts xx. 13. (5.) To settle; to fix. Prov. viii. 20. (6.) To agree on. Acts xxviii. 23. (7.) To set; to place. 2 Kings x. 24. To be appointed to wrath, is, in the sovereign and unchangeable purpose of God, to be left to endure the just and everlasting punishment of sin. To be appointed to salvation, is to be sovereignly and unchangeably chosen heirs of everlasting happiness. 1 Thess. v. 9. To be appointed to death, or trouble, is to be sentenced by men, or set apart in the providence of God, to endure it. Psal. cii. 20. 1 Cor. iv. 9. 1 Thess. liii. 8.

APPREHEND; to seize; to take fast and full hold of. 1 Kings xviii. 40. To take prisoner; 2 Cor. xi. 32. 'I count not myself to have apprehended; but I follow on that I may apprehend that for which I am apprehended of Christ Jesus.'—'I do not reckon myself to have attained to a perfect knowledge of, fellowship with, or likeness to God; but I proceed from one duty to another, and one degree of grace to another, that I may speedily receive the full prize of perfect glory, which Jesus Christ intended to give me, when he graciously seized me in the day of his power, made me the prisoner of his love, and fixed me in a new covenant state of union and communion with himself. Phil. liii. 12, 13.

APPROACH, sometimes imports to have carnal knowledge, Lev. xviii. 6. and xx. 16; but ordinarily to draw near in respect of place or time. 2 Sam. xi. 20.—Jesus Christ approached to God as an offended judge; he fully satisfied his law and justice with the infinite oblation of himself. Jer. xxx. 21. To approach unto God as a kind Sovereign and Father, is to wait upon him in his ordinances; but chiefly to enjoy his fulness. Isa. lviii. 2. Psal. lxxv. 4.

APPROVE; to sustain as right; to love; to commend. Psal. xlix. 13. 1 Cor. xi. 19. Jesus Christ was approved of God; dearly beloved of him: his person and work were accepted; and he fully demonstrated by God to be the true Messiah. Acts ii. 22. We approve ourselves, when, by good works we gain the approbation of men's consciences, and shew that we are favoured, and regarded as righteous by God. 2 Cor. vi. 4. 2 Tim. ii. 15. To be approved in Christ, is to be a lively, circumspect, and active follower of Christ.

APRON. With fig-leaves stitched together, or fig-branches woven, our first parents supplied the place of aprons. Gen. iii. 7. It was probably Ruth's apron, not her raib, into which Boaz put the six mea- syres of barley, to carry to her mother. Ruth iii. 15.

APT; fit; able for; inclined to, and skilful in. 1 Tim. iii. 2.

AQUI-LA, a Jew born in Pontus. He and his wife PRISCA, or PRISCILLA, wrought at the trade of making leathern tents for the Roman troops. They were early converted to the Christian faith; perhaps by Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost. After they had resided some time at Rome, the edict of Claudius, banishing all Jews from that city, obliged them to leave it, and return to Corinth: there Paul lodged with them, and wrought with them at their trade; till, probably to please the Gentiles, he went and lodged with Justus. They accompanied Paul to Ephesus, and there exposed their lives to protect him: here they instructed Apollos in the way of the Lord more perfectly. They returned back to Rome; and in their house was a meeting of the Christians held; and there they were saluted by Paul, in his epistle to that church. They returned to Asia, and dwelt in or near Ephesus; and were there when Paul wrote his second Epistle to Timothy. Acts xviii. Rom. xvi. 4, 5. 2 Tim. iv. 19.

AR, the capital city of MOAB, near the river Arnon. Sihon king of the Amorites burnt it with fire. Numb. xxi. 28. Shalmanezzer king of Assyria, or his successors, destroyed it in one night. Isa. xv. 1. It probably experienced a similar fate from the Chaldees. About three hundred years after our Saviour's death it was swallowed up by an earthquake. In Deut. ii. 9. the whole land of Moab seems to be called AR, from the name of the capital.

A-RABI-A, a large country of Asia, lying partly on the east, but chiefly southward of Canaan. It is situated between 13 and 35 degrees of north latitude, and between 33 and 60 degrees of east longitude from London. Its greatest length from east to west, is about 1620 miles; and its greatest breadth from north to south, about 1250. And in the northern parts, eastward of Canaan, it is considerably less than the least half of these numbers. It has the Indian Ocean on the south; the Red Sea, and the Isthmus of Suez, on the west; Canaan and Syria on the north-west and north; the mountains of Chaldaea, and the Persian gulf on the east. It is ordinarily divided into three parts. (1.) Arabia Petraea, or the Rocky, on the north-west, and which is now called Hejaz. In the south-west now stand the famed cities of Mecca and Medina, so much visited by the Mahometan pilgrims. This division contained the land of Edom, the wilderness of Paran, the land of Cushan, &c.; and seems to have been first called Arabia, from its westerly situation, or the mixed tribes which inhabited it. (2.) Arabia Deserta, which lay eastward of Canaan, and comprehended the land of Uz, of Ammon, Moab, Midian, with the country of the Itureans, Hagarenes, &c. (3.) Arabia Felix, or Happy, on the south of the two former. The two last seem to have been called Kedem, or the East, by the Hebrews. Scarcely any part of Arabia is well watered; but Arabia Felix is famed for the great variety and abundance of fine spices and fruits.

Arabia Felix appears to have been chiefly peopled by the numerous family of JOKTAN, a descendant of Shem: the other two parts seem to have been originally inhabited by the Rephaim, Emims, Zamzummims, Amalekites, Horites, and other descendants of CUSH, the eldest son of Ham. The Cushites were gradually expelled by the descendants of NAHOR, LOT, and ABRAHAM. Ishmael first settled in Hejaz, and formed twelve powerful tribes of Nabatheans, Kedarenes, Hagarenes, &c.; but they gradually spread themselves, at least, into the whole north parts of Arabia; and the remains of the Uzites or Ausitæ, Buzites, Ammonites, Moabites, Midianites, and other tribes, incorporated with them. The ancient Arabs, or Arabians, were gross idolaters: they worshipped the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and stars, and numbers of angels and men who had been famous in their opinion; they also worshipped a great number of large stones, which were probably, at first, no more than the places where their ancestors had worshipped the true God. See Gen. xxviii. 18. The Persians introduced their Magian religion among part of them. The Jews, who fled from the fury of the Romans, proselyted a part of them to their faith. Paul preached in some part of Arabia; and ten tribes are said to have received the Christian faith in that and the following ages. Since the rise of Mahomet, about A. D. 608, or rather his conquests, about A. D. 630, they have been generally followers of the Mahometan delusion.

To take particular notice of the Arabian tribes, or of the barren history of their ancient kingdoms of Hamyar, or Yaman, the same as Arabia Felix; of Chassan and Hira, in Arabia Deserta; or of Hejaz, the original residence of the Ishmaelites, is scarcely suited to the nature of this work. It is more consistent with its object to show the astonishing manner in which the ancient predictions of scripture have been fulfilled among them, for more than 3,000 years past.

It was prophesied that the Ishmaelites should be wild free men; should have their hand against every man; and every man's hand against them; and yet should dwell in the presence of all their brethren, and multiply into twelve tribes, and become a great nation: or, in other words, that however they should be harassed, they should never be utterly subdued; and that in the latter days they should push at the Roman empire; and, like so many locusts, plague the third part of men. Gen. xvi. 11, 12; xvii. 20; xxi. 10-13. Isa. xxi. 11-17. Numb. xxiv. 20. Jer. xxv. 23-25, and xlviii. 28-33. Dan. xi. 40. Rev. ix. 1-11. Let us trace the fulfilment:

Ishmael had twelve sons, each the father of a tribe: they dwelt next to their relations, the offspring of Lot, and of Abraham by Keturah, and of Esau the father of Edom. They gradually increased, till they swallowed up their neighbours on the north and east, if not also most of the children of Joktan in Arabia Felix. Numbers of them began early to trade with Egypt in spices. Gen. xxxvii. 27. and xxxix. 1. They, long after, traded with the Tyrians in ebony, ivory, precious cloths, spices, jewels, gold, and cattle. Ezek. xxvii. 15, 20-22. Vast numbers of them roved about with their cattle, dwelling in tents, without any settled abode. Isa. xlii. 20. They have been always famed for their lust, robbery, revenge, rapine, and murders; such, to use the words of a Roman historian, 'as one would neither wish his friends nor his foes.' It was therefore the interest of every conqueror to root them out; and it is observable, that almost every noted conqueror pushed his conquests to their very borders, and yet left them unsubdued. They oppressed the Hebrews, but were severely chastised for it by Gideon. Judg. viii. 24. They sent presents to Solomon, but there is no evidence that his father or himself had subdued them. 1 Kings x. 15. Sesostris, or Shishak, the Egyptian conqueror, had no Arabs in the vast and mingled army which he marched against Rehoboam; nay, he was obliged to draw a line along their frontiers, to protect his own country from their inroads and ravages. They sent a present of some flocks to Jehoshaphat; but soon after entered into the grand alliance against him. 2 Chron. xvii. 11. Psal. lxxxiii. 6. They invaded Judea under Jehoram, and murdered all his sons, except the youngest. 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17. They probably also attacked Uzziah, but were defeated with considerable loss. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7. SHALMANEZER, or Sennacherib, desolated part of their country, drove the Dedanites to their woods, where many of them perished by famine: the Kedarenes he murdered, and carried off their wealth for a spoil. Nebuchadnezzar invaded and wasted their country; and murdered vast numbers of the Dedanites, Buzites, Temanites, Scenites, Kedarenes, Zamarenes; reduced Hazor, and other principal cities, to lasting ruins; and carried off their tents and cattle for a prey.

Cyrus seized the whole empire of the Assyrians and Chaldeans; and even reduced a body of Arabs, inhabiting the north part of Arabia Deserta; but Herodotus assures us, that under Darius Hystaspes, who had extended the Persian dominion, the Arabians were free from tribute. This people highly provoked the haughty and ambitious Alexander, by some expressions of contempt. He declared that he would conquer or ruin them; but death prevented the execution of his project. To chastise their depredations on his territories adjacent, Antigonus, one of Alexander's successors, first by himself and then by his son Demetrius, thought to have subdued their country. But he was obliged to make peace with them, almost upon their own terms. Pompey, the famed Roman conqueror, ravaged part of their country; but his army being recalled, the Arabs closely followed them; and, for some time afterwards terribly harassed the Roman subjects in Syria, and the adjacent countries. About the 22d year before our Saviour's birth, Elias Gallus, another Roman general, sailed up the Red Sea, to subdue their country; but his attempt miscarried. About A. D. 130, Trajan, the Roman emperor, thought to have reduced Arabian Hejaz, and actually ravaged a part of it. He besieged Petra, their capital; but thence der, lightning, hail, whirlwinds, swarms of flies, and other calamities, terrified and repulsed his troops, as often as they repeated their attacks. About A. D. 200, that noted warrior, the emperor Severus, twice besieged it with a powerful host, and a fine train of artillery. An unaccountable difference between him and his troops obliged him to raise the siege. In the next four hundred years, we find a part of the Arabs sometimes allied with the Persians, and at others with the Romans; but never in subjection to either of those mighty empires.

In the seventh century, Mahomet, an Arab of Hejaz, commenced his noted imposture. Having contrived a new scheme of false religion, his countrymen, under the name of Saracens, in order to propagate it, subdued all Arabia: the most of western Asia; all Africa north of the Senegal river; together with Spain, Sicily, and many of the isles belonging to Europe; and constituted an empire, about 7000 miles in length. Divisions among themselves in Africa, Spain, and in Asia, together with the growing power of the Seljukian Turks; and at last the terrible ravages of the Tartars, between A. D. 900 and 1260, gradually reduced this extensive empire. In the next three centuries, the Ottoman Turks and Spaniards conquered the remaining fragments thereof in Africa and Spain. But Hejaz, the original country of the Ishmaelites, and its natives, were never subdued. The year 1780 was remarkable for the appearance of a new and most warlike tribe of Arabs; commanded by Abdul Wahab, a bold and enterprising character; who, to great personal courage, and considerable military skill, added the imposing pretensions of a public reformer. His followers so greatly increased, that in 1803 Mecca itself fell into their power; and in the following year the no less celebrated Medina, (where the remains of Mahomet were deposited,) surrendered to their victorious arms. By their conquests the whole of the peninsula has been wrested from the Turkish empire.

A'RAD. See HORMAH.

A'RAM. (1.) The fifth son of Shem (2.) The grandson of Nahor, father of the Aramites, or Syrians. Gen. x. 22. and xxii. 24. It is worthy of remark, that these ancient Greek authors, Hesiod and Homer, call the Syrians Aramæans. Aram is the Hebrew name of Syria: and hence we read of Aram-Naharaim, or Mesopotamia; Aram-Zobah, or Syria of Zobah; Aram-Damascus, or Syria of Damascus; and Aram-Bethrehab, or Syria of Bethrehab. (3.) Aram, or Ram, the great grandson of Judah, and father of Amminadab. Ruth iv. 19. Luke iii. 33. 1 Chron. ii. 10.

A'RA-RAT, or Armenia, a country in Asia, part of which is now called Turcomania, and the rest is included in Persia. It has Georgia on the north, Media on the east, Kurdistan, or Assyria, on the south, and Natolia, or Lesser Asia, on the west. Here the famed rivers Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and Phasis, have their source. Here stand the famed mountains, the Moschic on the north-west, the east end of the Taurus, and Antitaurus on the west, the mounts Niphates and Gordian, &c. Some imagine that the mountain of Ararat, upon which Noah's ark rested, was that on the east of Persia and north of India. But it is more probable that it was the Ar-dagh or Parmak-dagh, the finger mountain near the north-east of Armenia. It stands in a large plain, thirty six miles east from Erivan, is shaped like a sugar-loaf, and is visible at nearly two hundred miles' distance; its height is so great, and the snow which covers it so deep, that its top is inaccessible; the middle part is haunted by a multitude of tigers: some miserable flocks of sheep and goats, and two wretched monasteries, may be seen, about the foot. Besides northern distance, this mountain, called also Masius, is, by the most exact geographers, placed about one hundred miles eastward of Shinar; but if we take the mount Cardu, or Gordian, for that upon which the ark rested, the travels of Noah and his family to Shinar will be still more short and easy. Armenia is generally a high and cold country; it was anciently parted into two kingdoms, Greater Armenia on the east, and Lesser Armenia on the west. Probably it was peopled by Hul the son of Aram, the father of the Syrians; and the language of the two nations appears to have been much the same: and from him, or its own height, or from Har-minni, the mountain of the Minni, it seems to have its denomination. To this country the two sons of Sennacherib fled after they had murdered their father; which leads to the conclusion, that it was not then subject to Assyria. Isa. xxxvii. 38. 2 Kings xix. 37. The Armenian troops assisted Cyrus against the Chaldeans. Jer. li. 27. The Armenians had afterwards a long race of kings of their own, though often subject to Alexander's successors in Syria. About fifty years before Christ they began to fall under the Romans; and in about as many after, had their kingly government abolished. About A. D. 687, the Saracens, or ARABIANS, wrested Armenia from the Roman emperor of the east. They had not retained it more than one hundred and fifty years, when the ravaging Turcomanians seized on it, and some ages after erected there the sultanies, or kingdoms of the White and Black Sheep, the last of which was exceedingly powerful and large. In 1472, Armenia became a province of the Persian empire. In 1522, it was conquered by the Turks, who retain the western part of it to this day.

Christianity was early introduced into Armenia; and continues there still. There are now about a million or more of Armenian Christians. The Armenians being great merchants, about 40,000 of them reside in Persia to carry on trade, but they are mostly buried in ignorance and vain superstition.

A-RA'UNAH, or OR'NAN, the Jebusite: he had a threshing floor on MORIAH. When David perceived the angel of the Lord hovering over Jerusalem, preparing to destroy its inhabitants, as the punishment of his numbering the people, he, instructed by Nathan to build an altar, and offer sacrifice for stopping the plague, and instructed of God, that the temple should be built on that spot, hasted to Araunah. The good Jebusite and his sons had hid themselves in a hole for fear of the destroying angel: but when he observed David coming, he ran to meet him, fell at his feet, and asked his pleasure. Informed that he wanted to purchase his threshing-floor for the erection of an altar, and offering of sacrifice, that the destructive pestilence might be stopped, Araunah offered the king as a free gift, the floor, and wood, and oxen sufficient for sacrifice. Determined not to serve the Lord at the expence of another, David refused to accept them, till the price was fixed. For the floor itself and the oxen he gave him fifty shekels of silver, and for the whole field about six hundred shekels of gold. 2 Sam. xxvi. 16—25. 1 Chron. xxi. 15—23.

ARRAY; when this word respects clothing, it signifies garments, or the becoming manner of putting them on. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Esth. vi. 9. When it respects war, it denotes the proper arrangement of an army to defend themselves, or to attack the enemy. 2 Sam. x. 9. The terrors of God set themselves in array against one, when they appear in great numbers, and ready to surround and destroy him. Job vi. 4. Nebuchadnezzar arrayed himself as a shepherd with the land of Egypt, when he covered it with his troops, easily conquered it, and loaded himself and army with the rich spoils of it. Jer. xliii. 12.

AR'BA. See GIANT and HEBRON.

ARCHANGEL; a chief angel; but whether this word in scripture ever denotes a created angel, or always Christ, the Lord of angels, is hard to determine. Jude 9. 1 Thess. iv. 16.

ARCH, a building in form of a bow, such as is used in bridges, windows, vaults. Ezek. xl. 16—29.

ARCHERS, such as shoot with bows in hunting and battle. This method of shooting was almost universal in ancient times, before the invention of fire-arms. Gen. xxi. 20. Jer. li. 3. The archers that sorely grieved Joseph and shot at him, were his enemies, particularly his brethren and mistress, who with arrows of false accusation, bitter words, and murderous attempts, sought to destroy him. Gen. xlix. 23. The archers of God that compassed Job, were afflictions, pains, and terrors, sent by God; and which, like sharp poisoned arrows, wounded and vexed his soul. Job xvi. 13.

AR-CHE-LA'US, a son of Herod the Great by Malthace his fifth wife. He is described as the most cruel and bloody of his father's children. Herod having murdered his sons Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater, and stripped Herod Antipas of his claim to the kingdom, he, by his last will, constituted Archelaus his successor, on condition the Roman emperor agreed to it. The people and soldiery appeared very well pleased when this will was read, and promised allegiance and fidelity. Archelaus interred his father with great pomp; and, returning to Jerusalem, made a solemn mourning of seven days; gave the people a very splendid entertainment; and, having convened them in the court of the temple, he assured them of his mild government: and that he would not assume the royal title before the emperor had confirmed it.

About A. D. 1. the rabble assembled, and required him to execute the men who had advised his father to kill a noted zealot, for pulling down the golden eagle from the gate of the temple: they demanded that Joazas should be divested of the high priesthood; and they loaded the memory of Herod his father with the bitterest curses and reproaches. To revenge this insult, Archelaus ordered his troops to fall on the mob, who killed 3000 of them on the spot, close to the temple. He next repaired to Rome, for the confirmation of his father's will; but his brother Herod Antipas insisted on the ratification of his father's former will, constituting him his successor; alleging, that it was made when his judgment was more sound. After hearing both parties, Augustus delayed to give sentence. The Jewish nation petitioned the emperor to lay aside the whole family of Herod, and form them into a Roman province subject to the governor of Syria: Archelaus opposed the petition. The emperor heard both, but delayed to give judgment. A few days after, Augustus called Archelaus, assigned him a part of his father's kingdom, with the title of Ethnarch, and promised him the crown, if his conduct should deserve it.

Returning to Judea, he deposed Joazas the high-priest; pretending, that he had stirred up the seditious against him; and made Eleazar, his brother, priest in his room. When Archelaus had governed about seven years with the utmost rapacity and tyranny, the Jews and Samaritans jointly accused him to the emperor. His agent at Rome was ordered to bring him thither; his cause was heard; and he was banished to Vienne in France; and continued there, in exile, till his death. It was the cruel temper of this monster, that obliged Joseph and Mary to remove from Judea, with the infant Jesus. Matt. ii. 22, 23.

ARCHI, a city in the tribe of Ephraim, near Bethel: perhaps it ought to be joined with Ataroth, thus, ARCHI-ATAROTH; and is the same with ATAROTH-ADDAR. Josh. xvi. 2—5.

AR-CHIPPUS, a noted preacher of the gospel at Colosse. The church-members there were required to stir him up to diligence, care, and courage in the work of his ministry. Col. iv. 17. Paul salutes him by Philemon 2.

ARC-TU'RUS, the name of a northern star of the first magnitude, at some distance from the Great Bear, and between the thighs of the Bootes, or Charles-wain: but it is quite uncertain whether the Hebrew HASH, or round whirling star, be Arcturus, or not. The lesser stars around it may be called its sons. Job ix. 9. and xxxviii. 32.

ARE. See BE.

A-RE-O'PA-GUS, the high court at Athens, famed for the justice of its decisions; so called, because it sat on a hill of the same name, or in the suburbs of the city, dedicated to Mars, the god of war, as the city was to Minerva, his sister. When this court was instituted, whether by Solon in the time of Cyrus, or by Cæcrops, who lived many ages before, is quite uncertain. At first, it consisted of nine judges, who had been archons, or chief rulers in the city, and after a rigorous examination, had been found just in their management: but afterwards it sometimes consisted of thirty, or even five hundred. That they might be the more attentive, and biassed by no object of pity or regard, they sat by night, in the open air. Their jurisdiction was at first confined to criminal causes; but was gradually extended to other matters. The pleadings before them were to be expressed in a manner the most simple and plain. There may still be seen the vestiges of their seats cut out in a rock, in a semi-circular form; and around the tribunal, or seats of the judges, an esplanade, which served as a hall. For the preaching of Christ, and the resurrection at Athens, Paul was cited before this court as a setter forth of strange gods; but he reasoned so convincingly that he was dismissed; and Dionysius, one of his judges, became a convert to the Christian faith. Acts xvii. 19-32.

AR-ETAS; many kings of this name, or as the natives express it, Hareth, reigned in the Arabian kingdom of Ghassan, eastward of Canaan; but only the successor of Obodas, and father-in-law of Herod-Antipas, is mentioned in scripture. One Syllenus sought to ruin him with the emperor Augustus; pretending that he had usurped the Arabian throne. The treachery of Syllenus being discovered, Aretas was solemnly confirmed in his government. Offended with Herod, for divorcing his daughter, to make way for Herodias, Aretas declared war against him, under pretence of adjusting their limits in Galilee. Herod was often defeated, and begged the assistance of the emperor TIBERIUS, who ordered his lieutenant in Syria, to bring him Aretas either dead or alive. Vitellius immediately marched to attack the Arabian king; but hearing of Tiberius's death, he returned without giving him battle. Not long after, the deputy of Aretas at Damascus joined the Jews in their persecution of Paul; and kept the gates shut night and day to apprehend him. Acts ix. 23, 24. 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33.

ARGOB, a country of the half-tribe of Manasseh in Baahan. It is extremely fertile, and once contained sixty walled towns, which Jair the son of Machir repaired, and called HAYOTH-JAIR. It was probably called Argob, from its capital, or from some famed Amorite to whom it had belonged. Deut. iii. 4, 14. 1 Kings iv. 13.

ARI-EL, i.e. the lion of God. Jerusalem is so called from its warlike force; or Ariel may denote the temple and altar of burnt-offering. Woe was to Ariel, when the city and temple were destroyed by the Chaldeans and Romans. God distressed Ariel, and it was to him as Ariel, when the city and temple were made a scene of slaughter and blood, as the altar of burnt-offering was with respect to beasts. Isa. xxix. 1, 2.

ARIGHT; agreeable to the command and honour of God, and the edification of men. Psal. i. 23. Wine moves itself aright, when it appears very agreeable and enticing to the drinker. Prov. xxiii. 31.

AR-I-MA-THE'A, a city of Judea, where Joseph the honourable counsellor dwelt. Some writers will have it to be the same with Ramothaim Zophim, in the neighbourhood of Bethel: but then it would have been a city of the Samaritans, not of the Jews, contrary to Luke xxiii. 51. Jerome, and others who follow him, are certainly more in the right, who place it near Lydia, about thirty-six or thirty-seven miles west of Jerusalem, where the village Ramolah now stands.

ARI-UCH; (1.) A king of ELLASSAR, one of CHEDORLAOMER's allies. Gen. xiv. 1. (2.) A captain of NEBUCHADNEZZAR's guard, who was appointed to slay all the wisemen of Babylon. At Daniel's request, he delayed the execution of his orders, and introduced that prophet to the king, to tell and interpret his dream. Dan. ii. 14.

ARISE, or RISE, (1.) To proceed; spring forth. Acts xx. 30. (2.) To stand up. Hab. ii. 19. (3.) To rise from a seat, couch, or grave. John v. 8. Psal. lxxxviii. 10. (4.) To appear in a glorious manner. Mal. iv. 2. (5.) To bestir one's self. Josh. i. 2. 1 Chron. xxii. 16. (6.) To be advanced to honour and authority. Prov. xxviii. 12. (7.) To recover life, honour, power, and happiness. Mark xii. 26. Jer. xxv. 37. Amos vii. 2-5. (8.) To begin opposition or war. Matt. x. 21. God's arising, denotes his exerting himself in an eminent manner, and displaying his power, goodness, mercy, and justice, in the warning and relief of his people; and in the ruin of his enemies. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15. Psal. vii. 6. and xii. 5. Isa. xxxiii. 10. Amos vii. 9. Christ's arising, imports his returning to life after his death, and coming out of his grave, Luke xxiv. 46; and his beginning to manifest his glorious power and mercy, and other excellencies, in drawing the nations to himself, and enlightening, refreshing, and comforting his people. Rom. xv. 12. Mal. iv. 2. Men rise, when they receive quickening influences from Christ, and are recovered from their spiritual death and misery, Col. ii. 12. and iii. 1; or when they shake off sloth, and bestir themselves to an active receiving of Christ and walking in him, as the life and light of their souls, and in obedience to his commands. Eph. v. 14. Prov. vi. 9. Sol. Song iii. 2. and ii. 10-13. Nations rise, when they begin to be powerful: or are recovered from great distress and ruin, and become honourable and happy. Isa. xliii. 17; or when, with active fury and terrible preparations, they make war one with another. Matt. xxiv. 7. Or when they are in great tumult and confusion. Amos viii. 5. Jer. xli. 8. and xlvii. 2. Rising of the spirit, denotes anger or wrath. Eccl. x. 4.

AR-IS-TARCHUS, a native of Thesalonica; he became a zealous Christian, and attended Paul to Ephesus, where, in the tumult raised by Demetrius the silversmith, he with difficulty escaped with his life. He attended Paul in his return to Greece; and in his journey thence to Asia: and, having gone with him from Jerusalem to Rome, it is said he was beheaded along with him. Acts xix. 29. xx. 4. and xxvii. 2. Col. iv. 10.

A-RIS-TO-BULUS. He is supposed to have been the brother of Barnabas, and one of our Saviour's seventy disciples; and to have preached with great success in Britain: but it is wholly uncertain if he was so much as a Christian; since not he, but his family, are saluted by Paul. Rom. xvi. 10.

ARK. (1.) Noah's ark was a large floating vessel, in which he and his family, with pairs of all the terrestrial animals, for breeding, were preserved from the flood. It is pretty generally believed, though without direct evidence, that he spent about one hundred and twenty years in building it; and that he employed a number of hands in that work.

The form of the ark was an oblong square, with a flat bottom, and a sloped roof, raised a cubit high in the middle: it had neither sails nor rudder; nor was it sharp at the ends for cutting the water. This form was admirably calculated to make it lie steady in the water, without rolling, which would have endangered the lives of the animals within it; but made it very unfit for swimming to a great distance; or for riding upon a boisterous sea.

The length of this ark was three hundred cubits, which, according to Dr. Arbuthnot's calculation, amount to a little more than 547 feet: its breadth fifty cubits, or 91.2 feet; its height thirty cubits, or 54.72 feet; and its contents, 2,730,782 solid feet; sufficient for a carriage of 81,063 tons. It consisted of three stories, each of which, abating the thickness of the floors, might be about eighteen feet high; and, no doubt, was partitioned into several rooms, or apartments. This vessel was, doubtless, so contrived as to admit the air and light on all sides, though the particular construction of the windows is not mentioned. The word Tzohar, which our translation renders a window, is by some rendered a precious stone, or some other marvellous matter, which at once illuminated, and afforded fresh air to every part of the ark; but we know no foundation for this but the vain fancy of the authors. The ark seems to have had another covering besides the roof; perhaps one made of skin, which was thrown over, and hung before the windows, to prevent the entrance of the rain; and this, we suppose, Noah removed, and saw the earth dry. Gen. viii. 13. The ark was built of Gopher-wood, which in the opinion of many was either cedar, pine, or box, (or the cypress, a very strong and durable wood, not easily subject to rotteness.) And this naturally leads one to think that it was built in Chaldea, where vast quantities of cypress-wood were found as late as the time of Alexander the Great; and this conjecture is confirmed by a Chaldean tradition, which makes Xisuthrus, or Noah, sail from that country; and from hence a south-wind, or the northward motion of the decreasing waters would naturally bring the ark to rest on the mountain of ARARAT.

Some have imagined the ark, as we have described it, insufficient to contain so great a number of animals, and their provision for a year. But, upon an accurate calculation, the proportion of its size to its cargo, manifests it to be the device of him, 'to whom all the beasts of the field, and fowls of the air are well known.' The four-footed beasts which cannot live in the water are about seventy-two kinds; or, as Calmet divides them, one hundred and thirty; and the species of the winged fowls and creeping things, may amount to about two hundred. Now, of the two lower stories, the one might easily contain all the four-footed animals; and the other their provisions. The uppermost was sufficient for Noah and his family, and the fowls, with their provision. Possibly many of the serpents might live under the water, in an inactive, or torpid state; and, if so, there is no need to suppose such serpents as are peculiar to America to have been in the ark: or, if they were, the places about Chaldea might then produce them, though now it does not.

At the end of the one hundred and twenty years of God's forbearance with the old world, not only Noah and his wife, and their three sons and their wives, entered the ark, but two pair of every sort of unclean beasts, and seven pair of every clean sort, were, by the direction of Providence, conducted to their proper places in the ark, and then were shut up therein by God himself. The swelling waters, lifting it from the earth, carried it for several months in a northern direction; after which, the waters decreasing, it rested on the mountain of Ararat; and Noah, his family, and the various animals, went out of it, and replenished the earth. Gen. vi.—viii. Heb. xi. 7. 1 Pet. iii. 20.

May not this ark be regarded as a type of Jesus Christ; who was divinely appointed the Almighty Saviour of multitudes of Jews and Gentiles, from the deluge of divine wrath, by exposing himself thereto for a time? And as an emblem of the church, and of our baptism, which are the means of our separation from the world, and of our salvation through Jesus Christ? 1 Pet. iii. 21.

2. Jochebed made a small ARK, or vessel, in the form of a chest, of bulrushes; in which she put Moses, her infant child, and left him on the brink of the Nile. Exod. ii. 3, 5. The word rendered ark, in this and the former instance, signifies a dwelling or residence.

The sacred ARK, which stood in the most holy place of the tabernacle and temple, was a small chest made of Shittim-wood, overlaid with gold. It was about four feet and a half long, and two feet, nine inches, broad, and as much in height. Its lid, called the mercy-seat, because above it hovered the Shechinah, or symbol of the divine presence, was of pure gold; and out at the two ends of this lid were two cherubim, made of pure gold, which with their expanded wings covered the whole mercy-seat above, and with their faces seemed to pore on it. Within this ark were deposited the two tables of the moral law, and in some repository by its side were placed the golden pot of manna, Aaron's rod that budded, and a copy of the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses. This ark had two rings of gold for receiving the staves of Shittim-wood, by which it was borne by the Levites as occasion required: This vessel was so sacred, that it was death for any but the priest to look upon it; and hence it was carried under a canopy. Exod. xxv. 10—22, and xxxvii. 1—9. Numb. iv. 5, 6, 20, and xvii. 10. Deut. xxxi. 26. 1 Kings viii. 9. Heb. ix. 4. This ark being consecrated by the sprinkling of blood, and anointing of oil, was carried about with the Hebrews in their travels in the desert. On its being borne by the priests into the channel of Jordan, the swollen waters of that river divided and opened a clear passage for the whole congregation of Israel. It was thence transported to Gilgal. It was carried thirteen times in seven days round the city of Jericho, with the sound of rams' horns, and on the seventh day, the walls fell down before it. After the conquest of Canaan it was fixed in the tabernacle at Shiloh, and there continued above three hundred years. Just before the death of ELI, the Israelites, probably remembering its miraculous virtue at Jericho, carried it to the field of battle. The Philistines gained the victory, and seized on the ark : they placed it in the temple of Dagon their idol, as a signal trophy of his victory over the Hebrew God. Their idol was broken to pieces before it ; and wherever they placed it, a plague of emerods on the people, and perhaps another of mice on the land attended. The Philistines were glad to return it to the Hebrews with many presents. It halted at Bethshemesh ; where a multitude of Hebrews, 50,070, were struck dead for profanely looking into it. It was thence removed to the house of Abinadab, at Gibeah, or the hill of Kirjath-jearim, where, except when Saul brought it to the camp at Gibeah, 1 Sam. xiv. 18. it appears to have remained fifty, if not ninety years ; thence David attempted to bring it, not on the shoulders of the Levites, but on a new cart, to Jerusalem. The punishment of Uzzah for touching it, induced him to leave it by the way, at the house of Obededom. Hearing soon afterwards that Obededom's family was blessed on its account, David, with great solemnity, caused the Levites to carry it up to Jerusalem, to a tabernacle which he had prepared for it, in, or near to his own palace. Thence, about four years after, and about one hundred and thirty years after it had been separated from the Mosaic tabernacle, Solomon removed it into the inmost apartment of his temple, Numb. x. 33—36. Josh. iii. 6. and xviii. 1. 1 Sam. iv—vii. 2 Sam. vi. 1. 1 Chron. xiv—xvi. 1 Kings viii. 11. When Manasseh, or Ammon his son, set up their idols in the most holy place, probably some zealous priest carried out the ark, and kept it, till Josiah ordered it to be replaced in the temple. 2 Chron. xxxv. 3. When the first temple was destroyed by the Chaldeans, we know not what became of the ark ; but it is certain, that it, and its whole furniture, were wanting in the second temple. This being the principal symbol of the divine presence, the loss of it presaged the approaching abolition of the whole of the ceremonies, and was sufficient to make the old men weep at the laying of the foundation of their second temple. Ezra iii. 12. Hag. ii. 3. The Jews, after the captivity, it is said, made one somewhat like it, and put a standard copy of the Old Testament into it. The Jewish ark was called the ark of the covenant and testimony, because it contained the tables of God's law, and the book of the covenant made with Israel ; and was a pledge of the continuation of that covenant with them.

Deut. xxxi. 25, 26. Exod. xxxix. 35. It was also called the ark of God's strength. It was the residence of the symbol of his almighty and glorious presence, and the pledge of the manifestation of his power. Psal. cxxxii. 8. and lxxviii. 63. It was probably in imitation of the Hebrews, that the Egyptians, Trojans, Greeks, Romans, and other heathens had their sacred chest, in which they locked up the more holy things pertaining to their idols.

Did not the Jewish ark typify Jesus Christ, in the excellence and glory of his person ; and the marvellous union of the divine and human natures ! His Father's law was in his heart, and was magnified and made honourable by his divine and everlasting atonement ; he is the delightful rest of his Father, the great centre of all religious worship, and means of our familiar intercourse with God ; the subject of both testaments ; and the wonder of angels, ministers, and saints. He was solemnly consecrated to his work by the Spirit of grace : for a long time he had no settled abode on earth : having finished transgression and made an end of sin, he with great solemnity entered into the temple above : nor shall he ever be lost, or change his residence. The ark of God's testament is seen in his temple, when Jesus Christ and the mysteries of his grace are clearly discovered and known. Rev. xi. 19.

ARM ; that bodily member by which we chiefly exert our strength. 2 Sam. i. 10. Hence power and whatever qualifies a man for an active performance of actions, are called an arm. God's high, holy, strong, or outstretched arm, is his almighty power, displayed in a high, holy, vigorous and remarkable manner, in the making of all things ; in the bringing Israel out of Egypt ; in effecting our redemption ; in converting his people ; and in delivering his church. Jer. xxxii. 17. Exod. vi. 6. Isa. lii. 10. lxii. 8. and lxiii. 12. God is the arm of the people, in giving them strength, support, protection, provision. Isa. xxxiii. 2. Christ is called the arm of the Lord, because in and by him God displays the exceeding greatness of his power, in our creation, preservation, and especially our redemption. Isa. liii. 1. Christ's arm, with which he gathers his lambs, or people, is his saving power, mercy, and love, by the exertion of which he brings them to himself. Isa. xl. 11. Men's outward strength, riches, or other advantages, are called their arm. They depend on them, and are by them qualified for the accomplishment of their purposes. Psal. x. 15. and xxxvii. 17. Jer. xlviii. 25. Human power, force of armies, &c. are called an arm of flesh : it is but weak and fading. 2 Chron. xxxii. 8. It seems the ancient warriors made bare their right arm, or both, when closely engaged in battle : in allusion to which God is said to make bare his arm, when in a very noted and signal manner he exerts his power and mercy for the deliverance of his people, and the destruction of his enemies ; or when he openly reveals his Son to men, as the power and wisdom of God. Isa. lii. 10. Ezekiel's uncovered arm, at his visionary siege of Jerusalem, imported the furious and active manner in which the Chaldeans would assault it.

Ezek. iv. 7. ARMS sometimes denote strong armies or warriors. Dan. xi. 15, 22, 32.

TO ARM; (1.) To furnish with, or put on weapons or arms for war. Gen. xiv. 14. Num. xxxi. 5. (2.) To receive and exercise such spiritual graces as are bestowed by God for the defence of our souls. 1 Pet. iv. 1.

AR-MA-GED'DON; the Hebrew name given to the place where the Popish and Mahometan troops shall be destroyed under the sixth vial. Its name alludes to Megiddo, where Barak, with 10,000 dispirited, and almost unarmed men, entirely routed, and almost wholly destroyed, the mighty host of the Canaanites; and may be interpreted the destruction of troops. Whether this shall be in Italy or in Judea, or in both, about the same time, we cannot positively determine. Rev. xvi. 13, 14.

ARMOUR, weapons of war. The weapons which the Hebrews and other ancient nations had for attacking their enemies, were swords, darts, lances, spears, javelins, bows and arrows, and slings: their defensive armour for protecting themselves, were helmets, cuirasses, bucklers, coats of mail. In Deborah's time, it is probable Jabin had disarmed the Israelites; for neither sword nor spear was to be seen among 40,000 of them. Judg. v. 8. In Saul's time the Philistines had done the same, and entirely prohibited smiths to them: hence, only Saul and Jonathan had either sword or spear. 1 Sam. xiii. 22. It was common to hang up arms in strong or sacred places. Goliath's sword was hung up in the tabernacle, as a trophy sacred to the honour of God. 1 Sam. xxi. 9. A thousand shields of mighty men were deposited in David's tower. Sol. Song iv. 5. The Tyrians, Persians, Lybians, and Lydians hung up their helmets and bucklers on the walls of Tyre. Ezek. xxvii. 10. When the Maccabees retook the temple from Antiochus they hung the portal of it with golden crowns and bucklers.

ARMOUR, when ascribed to God, denotes his all-sufficient fitness for, and the methods and means by which he conquers and defends his people, and destroys his enemies. Psal. xxxv. 2. The spiritual armour of the saints consists of the shield of faith; that is, God in Christ, in whom they believe, and the grace of faith whereby they believe in him; the helmet of the hope of salvation; the breastplate of truth, applied to, and integrity, wrought in us, and of imputed and implanted righteousness; the girdle of truth revealed to us, and of uprightness in us; the shoes of the preparation of the gospel of peace; the sword of inspired scripture; and the artillery of earnest prayer. Eph. vi. 13—20. With these weapons we are to fight against sin, Satan, and the world; and to defend ourselves from their many and dangerous attacks. Eph. vi. 11—20. This armour is called the armour of God; God the Son purchased it for us; God the Holy Ghost applies it, or bestows it on us. Its nature is divine and spiritual. Its success is of God; and with it we fight his battles. Eph. vi. 11. It is called the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left: it was procured by the finished righteousness of Christ; and in every case and circumstance must be used with universal candour and holiness of life. 2 Cor. vi. 7. It is the armour of light; it proceeds from the Father of lights; it is possessed and used by the children of light; it is shining, glorious, and honourable: by the improvement of it we manifest our spiritual light and knowledge, and fight our way to everlasting light. Rom. xiii. 12. Our ignorance, hatred of God, unbelief, error, profaneness, proneness to following after righteousness by the works of the law, and the like, are called Satan's armour, wherein he trusteth: hereby he secures his interest in the soul, and opposes the designs of the Word, Spirit, and Providence of God. Luke xi. 22.

God's armour, or weapons of indignation, against the Chaldeans, were the Medes and Persians, by whom he executed his just vengeance upon that people. Jer. xiii. 5. and i. 25. The not carnal, but mighty weapons of warfare, used by gospel ministers, are earnest prayer, and the faithful preaching of the gospel, for the subjecting of souls to Jesus Christ, and the regulating of our lives according to his law. 2 Cor. x. 4. When the wicked flees from the iron weapon, the bow of steel strikes him through: when he shuns one calamity, he falls into another yet more dreadful. Job xx. 24.

ARMOURY; an arsenal, or repository of armour. Before David's time, every man of the Hebrew nation seems to have been trained for war, and to have kept his own arms. David laid up one collection of armour in a tower he built for that purpose. Sol. Song iv. 4. Another collection, probably the chief of those which he had taken in war, he laid up in the tabernacle, consecrated to the service of God; with these Jehoiada furnished the Levites, and others at the coronation of Joash. 2 Chron. xxiii. 9. Solomon stored up collections of armour in the house of the forest of Lebanon, and in his fortified cities, and even obliged some tributary princes to forge arms for his service. 2 Chron. ix. 16. and xi. 12. 1 Kings x. 25. King Uzziah furnished his armoury with spears, helmets, slings for casting large stones, &c. 2 Chron. xxvi. 14. Hezekiah, after his deliverance from Sennacherib, laid up a vast quantity of armour. id. xxxiii. 27. God's armoury is his treasury of awful judgments, ready to be brought forth for the execution of his wrath. Jer. i. 25. The word of God, and the grace of faith, which unite the church and her true members to Christ, are likened to a well furnished armoury: both richly supply us with proper weapons wherewith to oppose our spiritual enemies. Sol. Song iv. 4.

ARMY, or HOST; a multitude of armed men, or warriors, marshalled into proper order under different commanders. The greatest army of which we read in scripture, was Jeroboam's, of 800,000; Zerah's, of 1,000,000; but it is surprising, that in Jehoshaphat's kingdom, of so narrow an extent, there should be nearly 1,200,000 warriors. 2 Chron. xlii. 3. xiv. 9. and xvii. 14—18. The armies with which Xerxes, king of Persia, invaded Greece, and those which Bajazet the Turk, and Tamerlane the Tartar commanded, were still greater. Before David's reign the Israelites fought only on foot, and every man generally provided for himself. Nor had the most of his successors any soldiers, but militia and a life-guard. When the Hebrew army was about to engage an enemy, proclamation was made, that whoever had built a house, and not dedicated it; whoever had planted a vineyard, and not eaten of its fruit; whoever had betrothed a wife, and not married her; and whoever was cowardly and fearful, should return home. At the same time the priest blew with his trumpet, and encouraged the remaining troops to depend on the assistance of God. Deut. xx.

The Hebrews are represented as God's host. They were marshalled under him, as their prince and general: sometimes he nominated their captains, and gave express orders for their method of war; and his priests, with sound of the sacred trumpets, gave the alarm to battle Dan. viii. 10, 11. Josh. v. 14. Angels, ministers, the saints, heavenly luminaries, locusts, the Roman armies, and the creatures, in general, are represented as God's armies; because of their great number; their orderly subjection to him; and readiness to protect his interests and people; and to destroy his opposers: and he masters them, he directs their motions, and assigns them their work. Psal. ciii. 21. and lxviii. 12. Dan. iv. 85. Joel ii. 7, 25. Matt. xxii. 7. Angels, glorified saints, sun, moon, and stars, are, from their residence, called the armies, or hosts of heaven. Luke ii. 13. Psal. xxxiii. 6; and even the Christians, that contribute to the ruin of Antichrist, are called the armies which are in heaven, as they belong to the true church, and are directed and assisted of God. Rev. xix. 14. The church and her true members are like an army with banners; for, having Christ as their head, and their spiritual armour put on, and rightly used, they are terrible to devils and wicked men. Sol. Song vi. 4, 10. The two armies in the church are the perfection and attributes of Jehovah, with innumerable holy angels, protecting her true members; or armies of inward graces and lusts, warring with one another. Sol. Song vi. 13. The various creatures which have their residence in heaven and on earth, are called God's hosts, for their number, and the order in which he has placed them. Gen. ii. 1. Psal. xxxiii. 6.

AR'NON, a small river that rises in the mountains of Gilead, and runs along the north border of Moab, to the south-west, till it discharges itself into the Dead sea. Judg. xi. 18. Isa. xvi. 2. Num. xxi. 13.

AR'OE-ER, (1.) A city, partly on the north-bank, and partly in an island of the river Arnon. Sihon the Amorite conquered it from the Moabites; Moses took it from him, and gave it to the tribe of Gad, who rebuilt it. Num. xxxiii. 24. When the Gadites were carried captive to Assyria, the Syrians seem to have taken possession of it; but were soon obliged to abandon it to the Moabites; the Assyrians afterwards appear to have rendered it a desert. Isa. xvii. 2. It suffered the same fate from the Chaldeans, under Nebuchadnezzar. Jer. xlviii. 20. (2.) A city on the south of Judah, to whose inhabitants David sent part of the spoil which he took from the Amalekites. 1 Sam. xxx. 28. This, perhaps, was the same with the former, the inhabitants of which might have been kind to David's parents, while they sojourned in the country of Moab. (3.) A city near Rabbah of the Ammonites. Josh. xiii. 25.

AR'PHAD, a city near Hamath in Syria. Some think it was the same as Arvad in Phœnicia; but it is more likely it was a different place, situated on the north-east of Bashan, and is the same as Arphas, there placed by Josephus. Both it and its idols were destroyed by the Assyrians. 2 Kings xviii. 34. Isa. x. 9. and xxxvi. 19. and xxxvii. 18. It was also entirely ruined by the Chaldeans. Jer. xlix. 23. Afterwards it seems to have been rebuilt.

AR-PHAX'AD, the son of Shem, born about two years after the flood, and father of Shelah and others. After a life of 480 years, he died, A. M. 2066. Gen. xi. 10—13. and x. 22. 1 Chron. i. 17. Luke iii. 17.

ARROGANCY; proud contempt of others, attended with boasting, and insulting speech or behaviour. 1 Sam. ii. 3. Prov. viii. 13.

ARROW, a missile weapon, slender, sharp pointed, barbed, and shot from a bow in hunting and war. 1 Sam. xx. 36. Divination by arrows was very common with the Chaldeans, Arabians, Scythians, &c. Undetermined whether to attack the Jews or Ammonites first, both of whose kings had laid schemes to shake off his yoke, Nebuchadnezzar divined by arrows, consulted his Teraphim, and looked into the livers of slain beasts, to collect thence which should be his route. In this divination he probably wrote the names of the princes or places which he had a view to attack on different arrows; then shook the arrows together in a quiver. The prince or province whose name was on the arrow first drawn, was thought to be marked by Providence as the first to be attacked. Ezek. xxi. 21. On all important occasions of marriage, war, or journeys, the Arabs divined by three arrows shook together in a sack. If that inscribed, Command me, Lord, was first drawn, they proceeded in their purpose; if that inscribed, Forbid me, Lord, was drawn, they desisted at least for a whole year. If that on which nothing was written happened to be drawn, they drew a second time.

Whatever produces sharp pain, or quick destruction, is called an arrow. The arrows of God, are the terrible apprehensions or impressions of his wrath, which wound, pain, and torment the conscience; Job vi. 4. Psal. xxxviii. 2; and his various judgments, thunder, lightning, tempests, famine, and every other distress, 2 Sam. xxii. 15. Ezek. v. 16. Hab. iii. 11. Lam. iii. 12; and his word and Spirit, which are sharp and powerful in piercing and turning the hearts of sinners. Psal. xlv. 5. The arrows of wicked men, are their malicious purposes, Psal. xi. 2; and their false, abusive, and slanderous words, Prov. xxv. 18. Jer. ix. 8. Psal. lxxiv. 3; and their means of doing hurt to others, Psal. lvii. 4. Prov. xxvi. 18: all which are very piercing, and painful to endure; and may do sudden hurt. The falling of the Turks' arrows out of their hand, imports their being quite dispirited, and incapable of using their armour against the newly converted Jews. Ezek. xxxix. 3.

AR-TAX-ERX'ES, Smerdis, Mardus,

Sphendadates, Oropastes. AHASUERUS—Cambyses, while he ravaged Egypt, left Patizithes the Magus to govern the Persian state. Hearing that Cambyses had murdered his only brother Smerdis, Patizithes, considering how much his own brother Smerdis resembled the murdered prince, set him on the throne in Cambyses' absence; and gave out that he was the real brother of the king. Informed hereof, Cambyses marched homeward to dethrone him; but dying by the way, he begged his nobles to dethrone Smerdis, who he affirmed was not his brother, but a Magian impostor. To clear the matter with certainty, Ostanes a nobleman, who knew that the ears of the Magus had been cut off by Cyrus, or Cambyses, procured information by his own daughter, a concubine of Smerdis, that his ears were really wanting: he, Darius Hystaspis Gobrias, and four other princes, after binding themselves by an oath to slay the usurper, or perish in the attempt, rushed into the palace, and killed him and his brother.

During this impostor's short-reign of five months, Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel, Rehnum the chancellor, Shimshai, and their Samaritan tribes, wrote him a letter, stating, that Jerusalem was formerly a very powerful and rebellious city; and that if it was rebuilt, he might expect the Jews would quickly revolt, and deprive him of all his tribute, to the west of the Euphrates. His reply to this letter imported that upon inspection of the ancient histories, he found it to be as they had written; and ordered them to stop the Jews from rebuilding of either city or temple, till they had further orders from him. Ezra iv. 7—24.

ARTAXERXES Longimannus was the youngest son of Xerxes, and grand son of Darius Hystaspis. Artabanus, captain of the guards, intending to seize the Persian throne for himself, privately murdered Xerxes, his father, and persuaded Artaxerxes, that Darius his elder brother had done it, and intended to murder him likewise. On this information, Artaxerxes flew directly to the apartment of his brother Darius, and with the assistance of Artabanus and the guards killed him on the spot. His second brother Hystaspis, being in Scythia, Artabanus placed Artaxerxes on the throne, intending to remove him at pleasure, and seize the throne himself: but his murder and treason coming to light; he was quickly punished with the loss of his life. His friends raised an army to revenge his cause, but were totally crushed. After a war of two years, Hystaspis and his party were irrecoverably ruined: Artaxerxes then, to the joy of his subjects, applied himself to redress their disorders.

In the seventh year of his reign, in which perhaps he made Esther his queen, Esth. ii. 16; he authorized EZRA, with as many Jewish attendants as he pleased, to return to Judea. He allowed him to collect what money he could in Chaldea, for the use of the temple; he presented him with many of the sacred vessels; he ordered his collectors on the west of the Euphrates to pay to him from the public revenue one hundred talents of silver, one hundred measures of wheat, eight hundred gallons of wine, and as much oil, and whatever salt was necessary for the use of the temple; he exempted from tribute all the priests, Levites, and Nethinims; he authorized Ezra to promote the service of his God, and the welfare of his nation, to the utmost; and empowered him to fine, imprison, or kill, every one that dared to oppose the laws of God or the king. Ezra vii. In the twentieth year of his reign he, most probably at the suggestion of Esther, empowered Nehemiah to go and rebuild the city of Jerusalem, and ordered Asaph, the keeper of the royal forest, to furnish him with whatever timber he needed. Neh. ii.

The Egyptians, weary of the Persian yoke, had revolted about the fifth year of his reign; made Inarus, king of Lybia, their sovereign; and entered into a league with the Athenians. An army of 300,000, commanded by Achimenides, the brother, or son, of the king's mother, was sent to reduce them. Inarus and his allies defeated this powerful host, killed the general, and 100,000 of the troops. The rest fled to Memphis, and there defended themselves for three years, till Megabyzus and Artabanus with another Persian army relieved them; defeated the Egyptians, and reduced them to their former slavery; took Inarus, and many others of their chief men, prisoners. About the same time, the Athenians so terribly harassed the Persian empire, that Artaxerxes was obliged to make peace with them on these terms: That all the Greek cities of Asia should enjoy full liberty; that no Persian ships of war should enter the sea between the Euxine and Pamphylian coast; nor any of their land forces approach nearer the shore than within three days' journey; and that the Athenians should attack no place belonging to the Persians. After five years' importunity, Artaxerxes gave up Inarus, and the other Egyptian princes, to the will of his mother. To revenge the blood of Achimenides, she put them to a cruel death. Megabyzus, who had taken them prisoners, and promised them safety, enraged hereat, retired to Syria, and levied an army to take revenge on the king and his mother. Twice he routed the royal army, consisting of 200,000 troops; and obliged Artaxerxes to pardon, and recal him to court.

ARTE-MAS seems to have been a noted preacher. Paul intended to send him, or Tychicus, to Crete; probably to supply the place of Titus, while he came to visit the apostle at Nicopolis. Tit. iii. 12.

ART, skill in any particular business; as the compounding of spices, engraving, &c. Exod. xxx. 25.

ARTIFICERS, persons skilful in handy-work; as smiths, weavers, &c. 1 Chron. xxix. 5.

ARTILLERY, armour. 1 Sam. xx. 40.

ARVAD, (ARADUS), a city of Phœnicia, situated in a small island, southward of Tyre, and about a league from the continent. The Arvadites, descended from Canaan, built and peopled it in the earliest ages after the flood. It was once famous for navigation and riches, but shared in the fate of Tyre and Sidon. In Ezekiel's time the Arvadites served as mariners in the Tyrian fleets, and as guards on their walls. Gen. x. 18. Ezek. xxvii. 8—11. It is now called by the Turks Ruwaddé; and though, by reason of the height of the island, it appears beautiful from the shore, yet it is a very wretched spot, having scarcely any thing but a ruinous fort, and a few old cannon to defend it.

AS. (1.) Like. 1 Pet. iii. 8. (2.) While. Acts xx. 9. (3.) Because. John xv. 12. and xvii. 2. As, imports, (1.) Likeness only in appearance. Matt. xxvi. 25. (2.) Sameness. John i. 14. Heb. xii. 7. (3.) Likeness in reality or quality, but not degree: thus saints are united to one another as really as Christ is to God; are perfect as God; righteous as Christ; and loved of him, as he is loved of God. John xvii. 22. Matt. v. 48. 1 John iii. 7. John xv. 9. (4.) Likeness in both quality and degree. John v. 23.

ASA succeeded his father Abijah on the throne of Judah, A. M. 3049, and reigned forty-one years. He was educated by Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom, a noted idolater: yet he himself was pious. The first ten years of his reign he had no war, and applied himself to reform his kingdom. He did not destroy the high places, where his subjects, contrary to the law, worshipped the true God; but he abolished the idols, and altars, high places, and groves belonging to them; and commanded his subjects to worship only the true God. Those abominable sinners, the Sodomites, he entirely extirpated. Meanwhile, he fortified the principal cities on his frontiers, and took such care to train up his subjects in war, that he quickly had a militia of 800,000 Jews, armed with shields and spears, and 280,000 Benjamites, armed with shields and bows. He had scarcely reigned twelve or fourteen years, when ZERAH, king of ETHIOPIA, invaded Judea with a million of foot, and three hundred scythed chariots. After prayer to God, Asa attacked them at Maresah, with an army vastly inferior, routed them, pursued them as far as Gerar, on the southwest of Canaan, smote the cities thereabout in alliance with them, and returned home laden with booty.

In gratitude to God, and obedience to his prophet Azariah, Asa applied himself further to reform his kingdom. He and his subjects engaged themselves by covenant to serve the Lord; and agreed, that it should be held, according to the law, a capital crime to worship an idol. He deprived his grandmother Maachah of what authority she held, because she was a worshipper, if not a priestess, of some idol, perhaps a very obscene one. Her idol and its grove he trampled under foot, burnt it with fire in the valley of Hinnom, and cast the ashes into the brook Kidron, to mingle with the filth of the city. The dedicated things of his father, with a great part of his late spoils, he devoted to the service of God: and having repaired the altar of burnt-offering, he sacrificed thereon seven hundred oxen, and 5000 sheep, of his Ethiopian booty.

The fame of his reformation, and the blessings attending it, encouraged vast numbers of the pious Israelites to transport themselves into his kingdom. To prevent the loss of his subjects, Baasha, king of Israel, in the sixteenth year of Asa, and thirty-sixth from the division of the tribes, engaged in a war with Judah; took Ramah, and began to fortify it, to prevent all communication between the two kingdoms. On this occasion, Asa digged a remarkable pit; but for what purpose, whether to hide himself, or rather to hide his wealth, or to entrap Baasha, we are not told. Jer. xli. 9. To counteract Baasha's designs, Asa took all the silver and gold he could find in his own exchequer, or in the temple, and sent it to Benhadad king of Syria; begging that he would break his league with Baasha, and enter into one with him. Instigated by the valuable present, and the hopes of extending his power, Benhadad fell upon the north parts of Baasha's kingdom, and took several cities. Meanwhile, Asa, from the south, retook Ramah, and carried off the materials prepared for its fortifications, and therewith fortified Geba and western Mizpah.

Asa's distrust of the divine power and goodness, which had so lately rendered him victorious over a more formidable enemy, and his treacherous application for heathenish aid, highly displeased the Lord. By divine direction, Hanani the prophet sharply reproved him; and assured him, that henceforth he should have wars. Instead of thankfully receiving the admonitions of God, he outrageously imprisoned the prophet, and oppressed such of his subjects, as, it seems, had shewed themselves displeased with his conduct. He and Baasha continued thereafter in a state of war. In the last part of his life, he appears to have become extremely peevish; and in the thirty-ninth year of his reign he was seized with the gout, or some other disease, in his feet. He rather applied to his physicians than to God for relief. After two years' illness he died. Possibly the noisome effluvia of his corpse obliged them to fill his bed with odours and spices: nor can we say, whether his body was first burnt to ashes, and these only interred. 1 Kings xv. 2 Chron. xiv—xvi.

ASA-HEL, the son of Zeruiah, and brother of Joab. He was one of David's thirty heroes, and was extremely swift of foot. At the battle of Gibeon he so obstinately pursued Abner, that he obliged that general to kill him. Joab afterwards resented this slaughter, by the murder of Abner. 2 Sam. ii. 18, 19. and iii. 26, 27.

A'SAPH. His ancestors, reckoning upwards, were Berachiah, Shimeai, Michael, Baaseiah, Malchiah, Ethni, Zerah, Adaiab, Ethan, Zimnah, Shimei, Jahath, Gershom, Levi; his sons were Zaccur, Joseph, Nethaniah, and Asarelah. He was one of the three principal singers, and his children constituted the first, third, fifth, and seventh classes of the temple musicians. 1 Chron. vi. 20—42. and xxv. 2, 9—14. It seems their station was on the south side of the brazen altar. The fiftieth, seventy-third, and ten following psalms are ascribed to Asaph; but it is certain he did not compose them all, as several of them evidently relate to later times. Perhaps their titles mean no more, than that they were chiefly sung by his posterity.

ASCEND, to rise higher in place or dignity; to go or climb upwards. Josh. vi. 6.

God's essence being every where present, is incapable of motion; his ascend can therefore mean no more than the upward motion or departure of some visible token of his presence. Gen. xxxv. 12. Christ's ascending to Jerusalem, imports his going to a city high in honour and situation. Luke xix. 28. His ascending into heaven, while he continued in his debased state, denotes his perfect knowledge of every heavenly thing; of all the perfections, mysteries, and purposes of God. John iii. 18. Every where else his ascension to heaven, signifies the passage of his human nature thither, forty days after his resurrection. Eph. iv. 8. The ascending and descending of angels on Jacob's ladder, or on the Son of man, import their earnest prying into the mystery of our Saviour's incarnation and mediatorial work; and their active ministration to him and his people. Gen. xxviii. 12. John i. 51. The Angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God, is Jesus Christ gradually exalting his name, and shewing his glory from Judea in the east, to the western parts of the world; and by his word and Spirit sealing his people to the day of redemption. Rev. vii. 2. Some think it is spoken of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, ordering his governors every where to procure peace to the Christians. The ascent of the smoke of the ceremonial sacrifices, and incense, and the ascent of the smoke of the incense before God, out of the angel's hands, signify how savoury and acceptable the sacrifice, merit, and intercession of Christ are to his Father; and how effectual to procure his favour and blessings to us. Rev. viii. 4. To ascend the hill of God, is to turn our heart from the world, enter Christ's church, attend his ordinances, and enjoy his special fellowship with him therein. Psal. xxiv. 3. The ascent of the Chaldean king to heaven, imported his advancing himself to super-eminent power, honour, and greatness. Isa. xiv. 13. The ascent of the beast from the bottomless pit, imports Antichrist's obtaining of great power and authority by the contrivance and aid of Satan and his agents. Rev. xi. 7. Christ's revived WITNESSES ascend to heaven in a cloud; amid fearful confusions they shall in a marvellous manner, form themselves into a glorious state of church fellowship, and therein enjoy great knowledge, purity, honour, safety, and fellowship with God. Rev. xi. 12.

ASCRIBE, to avow that a thing was done by, or belongs to one. 1 Sam. xviii. 8.

AS'E-NATH, the daughter of Potipharah, and wife of JOSEPH. Some have supposed her to be the daughter of Potiphar; and that her discovering to her father her mother's wicked behaviour towards Joseph, endeared her to that young patriarch. Gen. xli. 45.

ASH, a well known tree, which grows quickly, and is of almost universal use where the wood can be kept dry. Its flower is of the apetalous kind; and its stamina have usually double heads; the pistil at last becomes a fruit of the figure of a tongue; which contains a seed of the same figure. Tournefort mentions four kinds of ash. Of part of this wood the idolaters formed their idols, and baked their bread, and warmed themselves with the rest. Isa. xlv. 14.

ASHAMED, filled or covered with SHAME. True hope maketh not ashamed, as it never will be disappointed of the good it expects; and has the love of God shed abroad in the heart as an earnest thereof. Rom. v. 5.

ASH'DOD, or A-ZOTUS, a strong city of the south-east coast of the Mediterranean sea, about twenty-five miles, or according to Diodorus, thirty-four north of Gaza, thirteen or fourteen south of Ekron, and thirty-four west of Jerusalem. It belonged to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 47; but the PHILISTINES either retained or retook it. Here stood the famous temple of DAGON. Here the ark of God, when captured by the Philistines, was first brought, and here it broke to pieces that idol, and plagued the inhabitants. 1 Sam. v. 1—6. Uzziah demolished the walls of this place, and built some adjacent forts to command it. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. Tartan, the Assyrian general, took it by force, and it seems put a strong garrison into it, which held out twenty-nine years against the siege of Psammiticus king of Egypt. Isa. xx. 1. Nebuchadnezzar's troops took and dreadfully ravaged it. Alexander and the Grecian forces did the same. Jonathan, the Jewish Maccabee, burnt it and the temple of Dagon to ashes; but it was rebuilt. Here Philip the evangelist early preached the gospel; and a Christian church continued till perhaps the ravage of the Saracens. Zeph. ii. 4. Zech. ix. 6. Acts viii. 4.

ASH'ER, the son of Jacob by Zilpah his maid, and father of one of the Hebrew tribes. His children were Jimnah, Ishua, Issui, and Beriah, of whom sprung the Jimnites, Jeuites, Berites, and Serah their sister. Forty and one thousand and five hundred of this tribe of war came out of Egypt, under the command of Pagiel the son of Ocran. Their spy, for searching the promised land was Sethur the son of Michael; and their prince, for the division of it, was Abihud the son of Shelomi. Gen. xli. 17. 1 Chron. vii. 30—40. Num. xxvi. 44. i. 13, 40, xiii. 13. and xxxiv. 27. They increased in the wilderness to 53,400. Num. xxvi. 47. Their inheritance fell by lot in the north-west of Canaan, where the soil was extremely fertile, and the mines plentiful; but, through faintness and cowardice, they suffered the Canaanites to retain the cities of Zidon. Ahiab, Achzib, Helbon, Aphek, and Rehob, Gen. xlix. 20. Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25. Josh. xix. 24—31. Judg. i. 31, 32. This tribe was one of the six who echoed AMEN to the curses from mount EBAL. They tamely submitted to the oppression of Jabin king of Canaan; and some time after assisted Gideon in his pursuit of the Midianites. Judg. v. 17. and vii. 16, 23. Forty thousand of them, all expert warriors, attended at David's coronation to be king over Israel. Baanah the son of Hushai, was their deputy governor under Solomon; many of them assisted in Hezekiah's reformation. 1 Chron. xii. 30. 1 Kings iv. 16. 2 Chron. xxx. 11.

ASHES, the remains of burned fuel. Lev. vi. 10. Man is compared to dust and ashes, to denote his meanness, insignificance, vileness, and readiness to be easily blown from the earth. Gen. xviii. 27. To be covered with ashes, to eat ashes, to become ashes, and to be ashes under the soles of the feet, is to be reduced to a poor, contemptible, distressed and ruinous condition. Lam. iii. 16. Psal. cii. 9. Job xxx. 19. Mal. iv. 3. To cast ashes on the head to spread ashes under one, or wallow in dust and ashes, imports great humiliation and grief. 2 Sam. xiii. 19. Isa. lviii. 5. and lxi. 3. Jer. vi. 26. Trusting in idols is called a feeding on ashes, to mark how vain, base, vile, shameful, and destructive it is. Isa. xlv. 20.

ASHI-MATH, an idol of the Hamathite Samaritans. Whether it was the same with the Ashemath of Samaria by which the Israelites swore, Amos viii. 14.; or the SHAMAIM, or heavens; or whether it was an idol shaped as a lion, and signifying the sun: or resembled a naked goat, or ape, we are absolutely uncertain. 2 Kings xvii. 30.

ASH'KE-NAZ, the eldest son of GOMER. Probably the Ascantes, who dwell about the Palus Mæotis; and the ancient Germans, if not also part of the Phrygians, were descended from him. Gen. x. 3. 1 Chron. i. 6.

ASH'PE-NAZ, the governor of Nebuchadnezzar's eunuchs: he changed the name of Daniel and his three companions into such as imported relation to the Chaldean idols. He was afraid to allow these Jews to live on pulse, lest their leanness should discover it, and offend the king at him: but Melzar his inferior steward allowed them. Dan. i. 2—17.

ASHTA-ROTH, ASHTORETH, or AS-TARTE, a famed goddess of the Zidonians. Her name, in the Syriac language, signifies eyes whose teats are full of milk: or it may come from ASHERA, a grove: a blessed one. It may be in the plural number, because the Phœnicians had sundry she-deities. The Phœnicians in the neighbourhood of Carthage reckoned Ashtaroth the same as Juno of the Romans: others represent her to have been the wife of Ham the father of the Canaanites. Lucian states and apparently very justly, that the moon, or queen of heaven, was worshipped under this name. Cicero calls her the fourth Venus of Syria. The Phœnician priests affirmed to Lucian, that she was Europa, the daughter of their king Agenor, whom Jupiter carried off by force; and who was deified by her father's subjects, to comfort him for his loss. Perhaps she is the Æstar or Eostre of the Saxons, from whom our Easter feast is derived; and not far different from the British goddess Andraste. She is variously represented; sometimes in a long, sometimes in a short habit; sometimes as holding a long stick with a cross at the top; sometimes she is crowned with rays; at other times with a bull's head, whose horns, according to Sanctioniatho, were emblems of the new moon.

Her temple at Aphex in Lebanon was a sink of the most degrading lewdness; because there it was pretended, that Venus had her first intercourse with her beloved Adonis, or TAMMUZ. She was probably worshipped by the Amorites in the days of Abraham; and gave name to Ashtaroth-karnaam, i. e. the Ashtaroth with two horns. Gen. xiv. 5. Soon after the death of Joshua, the Israelites began to adore her; and in all their relapses into idolatry, as under Jephthah, Eli, and Solomon, she was one of their favourite idols. Jezebel the wife of Ahab introduced her worship with all its shocking abominations among the ten tribes; and appointed four hundred priests for her service. Under Manasseh and Amon, she was worshipped with great pomp and ceremony in Judah; and the women wrought rich hangings for her temple. The remnant of the Jews left behind with Gedaliah, obstinately claved to her worship; pretending, that their forsaking of it under Josiah had been the cause of all their subsequent disasters. Judg. ii. 13. and x. 6. 1 Kings xi. 6. and xviii. 19. 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 13. Jer. xlv.

ASHTA-ROTH-KAR-NA'IM, a city belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh eastward of Jordan. It was about six miles from Edrei. Here Chedorlaomer smote the gigantic Rephaims: here was the residence of Og king of Bashan. Gen. xiv. 6. Deut. i. 4. But the place has long ago dwindled into a petty village called Karnion, or Karnia.

ASH'UR. (1.) The son of Shem, and father of the ASSYRIANS. (2.) Ashur sometimes denotes Assyria. Numb. xxiv. 23, 24. Hos. xiv. 3. When it is considered that Eupolemus says, that David conquered the Assyrians in Galadene or Gilead; that Ishbosheth was made king over the Ashurites in Gilead; that Ashur was in the alliance with the Ammonites and Moabites against Jehoshaphat; that the Ashurim made benches of ivory for the Tyrians. 2 Sam. ii. 9. Psal. lxxxiii. 8. Ezek. xxvii. 6; it must be concluded that a colony of Assyrians had settled in Arabia Deserta, perhaps about the time of Cushanrishathaim.

ASIA. (1.) One of the four great divisions of the EARTH. (2.) Lesser Asia, Natolia, or the Levant, lying between the Hellespont and Euxine sea on the north, and the east end of the Mediterranean sea on the south. It was about six hundred miles in length, and three hundred and twenty in breadth, and contained the provinces of Mysia, Lydia, Ionia, and Caria on the west: on the east of these, Bithynia, Phrygia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Lycia; eastward of these were Paphlagonia, Galatia, and Lycaonia; on the east of which were Pontus and Cappadocia. (3.) Proper Asia, which Attalus bequeathed to the Romans. It comprehended Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia. ASIA is perhaps always used in this sense in the New Testament. Here the seven famed churches stood. Acts xvi. 6. Rev. i. 11. Here Paul, in his first journey northward, was divinely forbidden to preach the gospel; and here a great part of the professed Christians, by means of false apostles, conceived a dislike at him while he lay prisoner at Rome. Acts xvi. 6. 2 Tim. i. 15.

Lesser Asia, Lydia perhaps excepted, was originally peopled by the offspring of Japheth; and was anciently divided into many small sovereignties; the kingdoms of Troas, Lydia, Pontus, Cappadocia, and the Grecian states, were the most noted. They do not appear to have been reduced by the Assyrian or Chaldean conquerors; but, no doubt, part of the others were subject to the Lydians in their flourishing state. The Persians extended their power over the greater part of it, which made it a scene of disputes between them and the Greeks. About three hundred and thirty years before our Saviour's birth, the Greeks, under Alexander, made themselves masters of the whole of it. It next fell under the Romans, and partly continued so, till the Saracens and Turks wrested it from the emperors of the east. For three hundred years past it has been wholly subject to the Ottoman Turks, by whose tyranny and exactions this once so glorious country is reduced to a comparative desert, noted for scarcely any thing else but ancient ruins.

No doubt, this country was one of those denominated in ancient predictions, The isles of the sea; and here Christianity was almost universally planted in the apostolic age; here, for a long time, were flourishing churches; and here the famed councils of Nice, Ephesus, Chalcedon, &c. were held. The ravages of the Arabians or Saracens began in the seventh, and continued during the three subsequent centuries, the conquests of the Seljukian Turks in the eleventh; and not long after the marches of the croisades, and at last the enslaving power of the Ottoman Turks, rendered their religious state exceedingly deplorable. At present, they have a number of bishops; but these are in a very poor and wretched condition. Isa. xlii. 4, 10. Zeph. ii. 11.

ASIDE. (1.) To another part at some distance. 2 Kings iv. 4. Matt. vii. 33. (2.) From off one. John xiii. 4. Heb. xii. 1. (3.) Out of the proper way, or from the right course of obedience to God, and of promoting our own true happiness. Jer. xv. 5. Psal. xiv. 3.

ASK. (1.) To inquire. Gen. xxxii. 29. (2.) To demand. Gen. xxxiv. 10. (3.) To seek counsel. Isa. xxx. 2. (4.) To pray for. John xv. 7. (5.) To accuse. Psal. xxxv. 10, 11. Christ's asking of the Father, imports his willingness and desire to receive eternal life and glory in his manhood; and to give the same to a multitude of happy subjects under him, as King in Zion: it also signifies his pleading in our nature for favours to these, as the due reward of his obedience unto death. Psal. xxi. 4. and ii. 8. We ask in Christ's name, and in faith, when, by the help of the Spirit, and in a believing dependence on his person, righteousness, and intercession, we, in obedience to his command, plead for, and firmly expect, whatever he has promised in his word, suited to our need, and capacity of enjoyment. John xiv. 13. James i. 6. We ask amiss, when we pray for what God has neither commanded nor promised; when we request any thing in an ignorant, careless, unbelieving manner; or seek it to answer some unworthy and sinful end. Jam. iv. 3. The nation that asked not for Christ, and were not called by his name, are the Gentiles, who under the Old Testament were destitute of the knowledge of Christ, void of desire after him, and made no profession of regard to him. Isa. lxxv. 1. We ask the beasts, fowls, fishes, and earth, that they may declare unto us, when we earnestly observe how the divine power, wisdom, and goodness are manifested in their creation, preservation, and government. Job xii. 7, 8.

ASKE-LON, a capital city of the Philis-times on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, about sixteen miles north of Gaza, and nine south of Ashdod, and about forty west of Jerusalem. It was anciently famed for its fine wines, and other fruits; and for its temple and fish-pond, sacred to the goddess Derceto. It was the strongest city belonging to the Philistines; but, with Gaza and Ekron, was wrested from them by the tribe of Judah: under some of the judges the Philistines recovered it. Judg. i. 18. and xiv. 9. It was taken and plundered by the Assyrians; destroyed by the Chaldeans; rebuilt and taken by Alexander and the Greeks; and afterwards by the Jewish Maccabees. Amos i. 8. Jer. xlvii. 5—7. Zech. ix. 5. Here a Christian church was planted soon after our Saviour's ascension, and continued for several ages. The place is now scarcely worthy of notice.

ASLEEP. (1.) Taking rest in natural sleep. John i. 5. (2.) Dead. Acts vii. 60. (3.) Careless; unconcerned; spiritually drowsy, or dead. Sol. Song vii. 9.

AS-NAPPAR, a famed prince, who, from different places, brought and settled the original Samaritans in the country of the ten tribes; but whether he was the same with Shalmaneser, or rather with Esarhad-don, or one of his noted generals, we are uncertain. Ezra iv. 10.

ASP, a small poisonous kind of serpent, whose bite gives a quick, but generally easy death, as if in a sleep. There are reckoned three kinds of asps; the Chersea, Chelidonia, and Ptyas; the last of whose bite is judged the most fatal. Asps are said to kill by causing sleep, thirst, or loss of blood. Immediately after the bite, the sight becomes dim, the part swells, and a slight pain is felt in the stomach. The bite is said to admit of no cure, but by the immediate cutting out of the wounded part. What is meant by the asp, (ADDER) stopping her ear at the voice of the charmer: whether some asps be deaf, or stop their ears from hearing of human voices; or whether diviners only persuaded the vulgar they did so, when unaffected by their charms, we know not. It is certain that wicked men are compared to asps for their subtlety; their carnal adherence to the earth; their gradual, but effectual murdering of themselves, and others, with the cruel venom, bitter gall, and destructive poison of sin that is in them, and always ready to appear in their speech and behaviour; and for their obstinate refusal to regard the engaging voice of Jesus Christ in the gospel. Deut. xxxii. 33. Job xx. 14, 16. Psal. lvi. 4.

ASS, an animal of the horse kind, with a long head, long ears, and round body, covered with short coarse hair. Asses are generally of a pale dun colour, with a black stroke along the back, and another across the shoulders, and a tail hairy only at the end. The eastern asses are larger and more beautiful than ours; on them even great men, as Abraham, Moses, Ahdon, and David's families rode: and on asses the princes of Israel under PEKAM generously sent back the Jewish captives that were unfit for travel. Nor had the captives in their return from Babylon almost any beasts of burden, besides 6720 asses. Gen. xlii. 3. Exod. iv

29. Judg. xii. 14. 2 Sam. xvi. 2. 2 Chron. xxviii. 17. Neh. xii. 69. Wild asses, were once common in Canaan and Arabia; and are still so in Africa; they are extremely beautiful, transversely striped with white, brown, and some black; they live in deserts and mountains, and are exceedingly swift, jealous of their liberty, libidinous, given to drinking, and usually seen in flocks. Job xi. 12. and xxxix. 5-8. Psal. civ. 11. Jer. xiv. 6. To them the Ishmaelites are compared, to represent their perpetual freedom, and their lustful, restless, wild, and savage temper. Gen. xvi. 12. Heb. On the banks of the Euphrates were asses altogether white; and on such the Hebrew princes rode in the days of Deborah. Judg. v. 10.

Under the law asses were unclean, and their firstlings were to be redeemed with a lamb, or to have their necks broken: they are emblems of wicked men, stupid, impudent, inconstant, untameable, disposed to feed on vain imaginations; and who must be redeemed by the death of Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God, or perish for ever. Exod. xxxiv. 20. Isa. i. 8. Job xi. 12. Jer. ii. 24. Hos. viii. 9. Of old the ass was remarkably honoured, in being miraculously used by God to rebuke the madness of Balaam, for striking her when stopped by the fear of an angel; nor ought men to ridicule this story, till they demonstrate the incapacity of infinite power to make this animal speak; or the impropriety of rebuking a proud diviner by such a stupid and contemptible creature. Numb. xxii. 2 Pet. ii. 16. But the chief honour of the ass is, that, when it had become most contemptible, our adored Saviour made his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, on one of its species. Zech. ix. 9. Matt. xxi. John xii.—Both Jews and Christians were unjustly accused by the heathen of worshipping an ass. But it is unworthy of our notice to observe the occasion of this reproach.

ASSAULT; to attack violently. Esth. viii. 11.

ASSEMBLE; to meet or gather together. Numb. x. 3. Zeph. iii. 8. An ASSEMBLY is a meeting of several persons to worship God jointly; or to transact civil, or even wicked business. Isa. i. 13. Acts xxix. 32-39. The solemn assembly of the Jews, was their meeting at their most noted festivals, sacrifices, or fasts. Isa. i. 13. and to be sorrowful for it, was to be grieved for the want of these public ordinances of God, observed in a regular manner. Zeph. iii. 18. The general assembly of the first born, is the harmonious and large meeting of both Jews and Gentiles in one Christian church; and of all the redeemed in the heavenly state. Heb. xii. 23. They shall come against Aholibah with an assembly, with a great army, to destroy the Jewish nation. Ezek. xxiii. 24.

To ASSENT; to declare agreement in judgment and inclination with others. Acts xxiv. 9.

ASSIGN; to set apart, or appoint for. Gen. xlvii. 23.

ASSOCIATE; to join together in fellowship or league. Isa. viii. 9. Dan. xi. 6.

ASSOS, a sea-port in the north-west of Lesser Asia, south of Troas, and over against the isle of Lesbos. It seems to have been built on a hill. Near it were famed quarries of the Sarcophagus stone, which consumes dead bodies, except the teeth, in forty days. Here Paul touched, in his fourth journey to Jerusalem; but we read of no Christian church in it till the eighth century. Acts xx. 13, 14.

ASSURE; (1.) To make certain; confirm. Lev. xxvii. 19. (2.) To embolden. 1 John iii. 19.

ASSURANCE; a certainty that renders one bold in adhering to what has been confirmed to him; as (1.) An assurance of life and property; when these are secured by the law of the land, or by the solemn deposition of the former proprietor. Deut. xxviii. 66. Isa. xxxii. 17. (2.) Assurance of evidence, is full evidence by miracles, and by the powerful operation of the Holy Ghost. Acts xvii. 31. (3.) Assurance of persuasion, which is opposed to doubting, as light is to darkness; and the more full the assurance the more fully are doubts excluded. The riches of the assurance of understanding, imports a solid, well-grounded knowledge of divine things, immediately founded on God's infallible word, confirmed by the correspondent influence of the Holy Ghost. Col. ii. 2. The full assurance of faith, is either a full persuasion of the truth of revealed religion; or, an assurance of a personal interest in the blessings procured by the death of Christ; or, rather, an unwavering confidence that what we ask in prayer according to the will of God, will be granted to us. 1 John iii. 21, 22. v. 14. The full assurance of hope, is a firm expectation, that, without doubt, God will grant us the complete enjoyment of the future blessedness he has promised. Heb. vi. 11.

ASSUAGE; to dry up; to abate. Gen. viii. 1. Job xvi. 5, 6.

AS-SYRI-A, an ancient kingdom of Asia. It had Armenia on the north; Media and Persia on the east; Susiana, a province of Persia, on the south; and the river Tigris, or Hiddekel, on the west, into which ran through Assyria, by a south-west course, the four small rivers Lycas, Capros, Gorgus, and Silla. Its most noted cities were Nineveh, Resen, Calah, Bessara, Ctesiphon, on the east bank of the Tigris; and Arbela and Artemias farther eastward. Part of it is now called Kurdistan; and having been so often the seat of war between powerful emperors and nations, it has been generally on the decay for 2000 years, and is now almost a wilderness and desert.

This country had its name, and the inhabitants their original, from ASHUR. Offended with the tyrannic usurpation of Nimrod at Babel, he removed to the north-east, where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen, on the banks of the Tigris. Gen. x. 11, 12. Bochart, indeed, and others, will have Nimrod to have gone to Assyria and built these cities. But the text is more naturally understood in the manner we have hinted. Besides, the prophet Micah represents the land of Nimrod as different from Assyria; (Mic. v. 6.) and Diodorus plainly suggests, that the Babylonians were a distinct kingdom when the Assyrians conquered them.

Ctesias, Diodorus, Trogus, Justin, &c. represent the Assyrian empire to have been prodigiously populous, just after the flood, and to have continued 1300 or 1400 years. Ctesias, from whom the rest copied, was known in his own times to be a fabulous writer, and his accounts are evidently romantic. Herodotus, a far more ancient and honest historian, assigns but five hundred and twenty years to the Assyrian empire; and Halicarnassæus maintains that it was at first of very small extent: we are convinced that it continued so till the age of Pul. In the time of Abraham, we find Chedorlao-mer, and his three allies, possessing distinct kingdoms on the frontiers of Assyria, without the least mark of dependence on that empire. Gen. xiv. 1. In the time of the JUDGES, we read of a powerful kingdom in Mesopotamia, on the west of Assyria, Judg. iii. 8—11. Without the least opposition from an Assyrian empire, David and Solomon reigned over all the country on this side the Euphrates. 2 Sam. viii. 10. 1 Kings iv. 24. In our accounts of the Asiatic conquests of Shishak and Memnon, we hear of no opposition which they met with from Assyrian emperors. In the time of Jonah the prophet, about A. M. 3142, we read of a king of Nineveh; but he is not called king of Assyria; and it seems his kingdom was so very small, that upon Jonah's alarm, they dreaded utter ruin within forty days from some of their neighbours. Homer, who lived about the same time, had heard of Bacchus, or Shishak, king of Egypt, and of Memnon king of Chusistan, or Ethiopia; but nothing of a potent king of Assyria, though the last country was much nearer to him. None of the prophets mention the king of Assyria, till after the days of Pul.

Under Pul the Assyrian kingdom began to be powerful: and extended itself further under his successors, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. It seems that Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, divided his kingdom at his death; and gave Babylonia to Nabonassar, a younger son; but as, perhaps, no great harmony subsisted between the two, Esarhaddon, by conquest, or for want of immediate heirs, reannexed Babylon to Assyria. At this time the Assyrian empire was in its greatest extent comprehending Media, Persia, Chaldaea, Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, and part of Arabia.

Under Saosduchinus and Chinaladin, the Assyrian empire gradually decayed: first the Medes on the east, and then the Babylonians on the south-west, revolted, and made war on the empire. Chinaladin was so alarmed by the alliance formed between Astyages the Mede, and Nabopolassar the Chaldean, against him, that he desperately burnt his palace on himself. After his death, the kingdom languished about twenty-five years more; and at last was utterly overturned, and Nineveh destroyed, by Cyaxares the Mede and Nebuchadnezzar, the Chaldean, A. M. 3403. 2 Kings xv—xix. 2 Chron. xxxi. xxxii. and xxxiii. 11. Isa. v. 26—30. viii. x. xxxiii. xxxvi. xxxvii. and xvii. 12—14. Nah. i—iii. Zeph. iii. 13—15. Ezek. xxxi.

The great Usher, Rollin, and others will have Nineveh to have been destroyed under Sardanapal, the son of Pul, by Arbaces the Mede, and Belshis the Chaldean. But how improbable is it, that the Assyrian empire should be then destroyed, and yet the very next Assyrian king be a more noted conqueror than ever Pul was? Besides, no ancient author mentions a double destruction of Nineveh; and the relations of its destruction, though by different authors referred to different times, and placed under kings of a different name, are so similar, that we cannot but suppose they relate to the same event.

Assyria fell under the power of the Chaldeans; and from them it passed to the Persians. Here, at Arbela, the Greeks gave the finishing stroke to the Persian empire. Num. xxiv. 24. It has since successively belonged to the Romans, Parthians, Persians, Saracens, and Turks. At present it is an almost useless part of the Persian empire; famed for very little but the robberies of the Kurds, who have, for many ages past, inhabited its mountainous parts. In the early ages of Christianity there was here a Christian church; but the successful introduction of the gospel to that dark and desolate region is an event rather to be hoped for than expected. Isa. xix. 23—25.

ASTONIED, or ASTONISHED, in the Old Testament, generally signifies, to be filled with wonder, mingled with perplexity, fear, and trouble. Ezra ix. 3. In the New, it generally means, to be filled with delightful wonder and amazement. Matt. ix. 28.

ASTRAY; away from one's proper place or path. When applied to moral conduct, it signifies to wander from the proper path of duty and happiness. Psal. cxix. 176. Prov. v. 23.

ASTROLOGERS, such as by observation of the stars and sky, and calculations drawn from their appearance and positions, pretend to foretell future events. They were famous among the heathen, especially at Babylon. Isa. xlvii. 13. Dan. i. 20.

ATAD, was probably a noted Canaanite, and had a threshing-floor at ABEL-MIZRAIM.

ATH-A-LI'AH, the grand-daughter of OMRI, daughter of AHAB, and wife of Jehoram king of Judah. She was extremely wicked herself, and seduced her husband and her son Ahaziah to follow the idolatrous courses of her father. 2 Kings viii. 18, 26. 2 Chron. xxi. 6, 18. and xxii. 34. Informed that Jehu had slain her son, and seventy others of the royal family of Judah, probably many of them her grand-children, she assumed the government; and, to secure it for herself, cut off all the remainder of the seed-royal, except Joash, her infant grandchild, who was conveyed away by his aunt, and hid six years in some apartment of the temple; during which time Athaliah governed the Jews, and sanctioned the vilest idolatries by her influence and example.

In the seventh year, Jehoiada the high-priest, having engaged the leading men of the kingdom in his interest, produced the young prince in a public assembly in the court of the temple; he caused the people to take an oath of fidelity to him, and engaged both them and their king to serve the Lord. Arming the Levites and other friends with weapons deposited in the temple, he appointed one part of them to guard the king, and the rest to secure the gates of the sacred courts; next, he brought forth the young prince, put the crown on his head, anointed him with oil, and by sound of trumpet, attended with the shouts of the populace, proclaimed him king. Alarmed with the noise, Athaliah ran to the temple to see what had happened: shocked with the sight of the king on his throne, she rent her clothes, and cried, Treason! Treason! By Jehoiada's orders, the guard directly carried her out of the temple, and slew her at the stable-gate of the palace. A. M. 3126. 2 Kings xi. 2 Chron. xxiii.

ATHENS, a celebrated city of Greece, about thirty-five miles eastward from Corinth situate in a very delightful plain. It is said to have been built 1500 years before our Saviour's birth, though that is, probably, to carry its antiquity too high by some hundreds of years. The inhabitants were anciently famed for their learning, wealth, and numerous conquests. They are said to have planted forty colonies in different parts of the world. They were governed by kings of the family of Cecrops, their Egyptian founder, for seventeen generations, or four hundred and eighty-seven years. They were governed about four hundred and seventy-two years more by archons, perpetual and annual, before they settled into a commonwealth about A. M. 3412. This city produced Solon, Socrates, Aristides, and other famed philosophers; Demosthenes, and a great number of other renowned orators; Miltiades, Cimon, Themistocles, Alcibiades, Phocian, and many other illustrious generals. The form of their government rendered it dangerous to excel, where the populace had so much power. The terrible struggles of this state with the Persians, the Lacedemonians, and others, often brought it to the brink of ruin. Twice the Persians burnt it to ashes; though in the end, they paid dear for their labour.

About A. M. 3668, the Athenians were subjected to the Macedonians by Alexander. About eighty-seven years before Christ, their city was taken by Sylla, most of the inhabitants put to the sword, and the place subjected to the Romans. In the fourth and fifth centuries of Christianity, it was pillaged by the Goths, and a great part of it reduced to ruins. Since 1455, it has been almost perpetually under the tyrannical dominion of the Turks, and at present has about eight or ten thousand inhabitants. It is now scarcely noted for any thing but the wit of the people, and the numerous remains of antiquity.

Amidst all their pretences to learning, the ancient Athenians were exceedingly given to vain curiosity, and the grossest idolatry. Besides their reverence for the Grecian gods, which Hesiod and Varro reckon at 30,000, it seems they erected altars in their fields to the unknown gods, that they might be sure to fail in their duty to none. Here Paul preached the gospel, and disputed with their philosophers. But his success was small: his powerful sermon before the court of Areopagus, at least in the place where it met, converted Dionysius, one of the judges. He, and a lady called Damaris, and some others, were the first-fruits of a Christian church, which has continued to this day; three parts of the inhabitants being Christians, and having a bishop at their head. Acts xvii. 16-34. 1 Thess. iii. 1.

ATHIRST. (1.) Earnestly desirous of refreshing liquor to drink: Judg. xv. 18. (2.) Desirous of spiritual blessings. Rev. xxi. 6. and xxii. 17.

ATONEMENT, or PROPIATION, a pacifying of God's justice, by the offering of a sacrifice sufficient to atone for the offence done to him by sin. The Hebrew word rendered atonement, signifies covering; and intimates, that our offences are by a proper atonement, covered from the avenging justice of God. The atonement made by the ceremonial offerings did not really appease the divine justice for offences, but only secured against the impending temporal punishment; and typified the satisfaction of Jesus Christ, which fully atones for our most heinous crimes. Exod. xxix. 36. On this account it is called the propitiation. Rom. iii. 25. and v. 11. 1 John ii. 2.

ATTAIN; (1.) To receive; get possession of; come to. Psal. cxxxix. 6. Ezek. xlvi. 7. Acts xxvii. 12. (2.) To be equal to. 2 Sam. xxiii. 19. To attain righteousness, is to have the obedience and death of Jesus imputed to our conscience, to have his grace implanted in our souls, and thus to be holy in all manner of conversation. Rom. ix. 30. To attain to good doctrine, is to understand, embrace, and feel the power of it. Rom. iv. 6. To attain to the resurrection from the dead, is to partake fully of the quickening, justifying, sanctifying, and comforting virtue of Christ's resurrection; and to share the happiness bestowed on the saints at the resurrection of the body. Phil. iii. 12.

AT-TA'LI-A, now Sattalia, a city of PAMPHYLIA, situated on a fair bay of the Mediterranean sea; or a city of Lycia; both of which were probably founded by Attalus, king of Pergamus. Here Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel, about sixteen or seventeen years after our Saviour's death. Acts xiv. 25. We read no more of its Christianity, except that the city had a bishop in the fifth and sixth centuries.

ATTEND; (1.) To hear with great care. Job xxxii. 12. (2.) To apply the mind earnestly to a thing. Acts xvi. 14. (3.) To wait upon one, as ready to hear or obey orders. Esth. iv. 5. God's attention to our prayers, imports his graciously regarding and accepting them for Christ's sake, and his speedy granting what we request. Psal. xvii. 1. and cxxx. 2.

ATTIRE; clothing; chiefly what is fine, splendid, and gay. Jer. ii. 32. The attire of an harlot, is that which, in its form, or manner of putting on, tempts beholders to suspect the wearer unchaste; or is calculated to awaken impure thoughts or desires. Prov. vii. 10.

AVAIL; to be for use, pleasure, profit, honour. Thus, neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, availeth any thing towards the present or future happiness of our soul. Gal. vi. 15.

AUDIENCE, hearing. Gen. xxiii. 13.

AVEN, ON, ВѢТШЕНАЯ, or Heliopolis, (city of the sun); a city of Egypt, almost directly westward from the north point of the Red sea, and eastward from the Nile, about a day's journey south-east of the Egyptian Babylon, and the capital of a country. Here sundry images of the sun were worshipped; and oxen were dedicated to him and the moon. Here, or at another city of the same name, a famed mirror was so placed as to enlighten a temple all the day long, with the solar rays which it collected and refracted. This city, standing at the entrance of Egypt from the east, was exposed to frequent disasters. Nebuchadnezzar's troops massacred most of the inhabitants able to bear arms, and broke the images to pieces. It is probable that Cambyases used it no better. Ezek. xxx. 17. Jer. xliii. 13.

2. A'VEN, a plain in Syria. It seems to be the same with that of Baal-beck, or valley of Baael, where was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun; and is called the valley of Lebanon. Amos i. 5. Josh. ix. 17. It lies between Lebanon and Antilibanus, and is a part or the whole of Cœlosyria, one of the most pleasant and fertile spots in the earth. About thirty miles north of Damascus stands Baal-beck, the ruins of whose temple are to this day the wonder of every beholder.

3. Bethel is called A'VEN, or BETH-A'VEN, because of the idolatry and other wickedness committed there. Hos. x. 8. and v. 8.

AVENGE; to punish an affront or injury. Lev. xix. 18. It is not the person punished, but he that received the injury, that is said to be avenged. Numb. xxxi. 2, 3. God has a sovereign, and magistrates have a subordinate, power and right to avenge injuries. Psal. xciv. 1. He who prosecuted the man-slayer under the law was called the avenger of blood, and had a right to slay him, if he found him without the city of refuge. In like manner Jesus Christ takes vengeance on all that injure his people, if they flee not to himself as their refuge. Josh. xx. 5, 9.

AUGMENT; to make greater. We augment the fierce anger of the Lord, by sinning more and more, and thus provoke him to increase our punishment. Numb. xxxii. 14.

AUGUSTUS CÆSAR, the second emperor of Rome. He succeeded his uncle Julius, A. M. 3065. After being partner with Mark Antony, he defeated him at the battle of Actium, A. M. 3075, and assumed the sole sovereignty. No sooner had he established universal peace and order in his vast empire, than he required all his subjects, and the value of their property, to be enrolled in the public records, that he might perfectly know what subjects he had fit for war, or otherwise; and what tax might be reasonably imposed. He made three such enrolments: the second was begun about seven years before our Saviour's birth, and was not then finished, but was the occasion of his mother and supposed father's journey to Bethlehem, at the time of his nativity. Luke ii. 1-6. although no tax was levied till several years after. To narrate this emperor's wars with Brutus, Cassius, and other enemies of his uncle; his wars with Antony, the Spaniards, Rhetians, Parthians, and Arabs; to mention his friendship with Herod the Great, and kindness to the Jews of Egypt and Cyrene; his careful investigation of the Sybilline books, and destroying whatever he thought forged and corrupted, is scarcely to our present purpose. His mild government made happy a great part of the known world, and almost removed the Roman prejudice against absolute monarchy. But the licentious conduct of his daughter Julia, and her children, and other family troubles, rendered his life a burden to himself. At last, after declaring TIBERIUS his successor, and giving him a number of excellent instructions, he caused himself to be dressed as a stage-player, and then asked his friends, if he had acted his part well. He no sooner heard their declaration, that he had, than he expired in the arms of Livia, his beloved wife, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, fifty-sixth of his reign, and fifteenth after our Saviour's birth.

AVIM. See HIVITES.

AVITES, a tribe of the Samaritans, which came from Avah, or Ivah, situated somewhere on the north-west of Chaldea, and was destroyed by Sennacherib. They worshipped the idols Nibhaz and Jartak. 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31. Isa. xxxvii. 13.

AVOUCH, solemnly to choose, and avow our interest in. Dent. xxvi. 17, 18.

AVOID; to shun; to keep far off; to withdraw from. Prov. iv. 15. 1 Sam. xviii. 11.

AUSTERE, of a stern and dismayingly countenance; churlish; greedy; cruel; hard; unreasonable. Luke xix. 21.

AUTHOR, the first inventor or maker of a thing. God is the author of peace: he requires it by his law; directs how to attain or maintain it: he promises it in his word; and bestows it by his Spirit. 1 Cor. xiv. 33. Christ is the author of faith, life, and salvation: he devised, he purchased, promises, offers, effects, maintains, and perfects our faith, life, and salvation. Heb. xii. 2. and v. 9. Acts iii. 15.

AUTHORITY. (1.) Power; RULE; dignity. Prov. xxix. 2. (2.) Majesty and efficacy, tending to awaken the conscience, and gain the heart. Matt. vii. 29. (3.) A warrant, order, or permission from a superior. Matt. xxi. 23. Acts ix. 14.

AWAKE; (1.) To rouse one's self or another, from natural sleep. Gen. xxviii. 10. 1 Kings xviii. 27. (2.) To bestir one's self. Judg. v. 12. (3.) To raise, or arise, from death natural or spiritual. John xi. 11. Job xiv. 12. God awakes to the judgment he hath commanded, when he openly and eminently displays his power and other perfections in punishing his enemies, and rescuing his people. Psal. vii. 6. His sword of justice awaked, when terribly displayed in full execution of the vengeance due to our sins, on Christ. Zech. xiii. 7. Christ is awaked before he please, when any thing is done to disturb or interrupt his fellowship with his people. Sol. Song ii. 7; iii. 5. and viii. 4. The north-wind awakes, and blows on our garden, when the Holy Ghost powerfully convinces our conscience, and that of others in the church. Sol. Song iv. 16; but some understand it of the ceasing of trouble. We awake out of the snares of the devil, awake because our salvation is near, awake that Christ may give us light, awake to righteousness, when, conscious of our danger, and an approaching eternity, we shake off our spiritual sloth and unconcern, and with great earnestness study to know and receive Jesus Christ and his righteousness; and in his strength to follow holiness in all manner of conversation. 2 Tim. ii. 25. Rom. xlii. 11. Eph. v. 14. 1 Cor. xv. 34.

AWARE, taking notice. Luke xi. 44.

AWAY, at a distance. 2 Chron. xxxv. 23. It signifies also detestation, and desire to have one cut off. John xix. 15. God could not away with the Jewish new moons, sabbaths, and calling of assemblies, when he disliked or detested them on account of the wickedness of the observers, and the carnal, hypocritical, and wicked manner of observance. Isa. i. 13.

AWE; reverential impression of fear. Psal. xxxiii. 8. An awe of God's greatness, power, justice, holiness, and mercy, and of eternal things, deters and dissuades from sin. Psal. iv. 4.

AWL; a small boring instrument used by shoemakers and others. Exod. xxi. 6.

AX; a sharp instrument for the cutting or hewing of wood. Deut. xix. 5. The Assyrians and Chaldeans are likened to an ax. By them God cut down, destroyed, and scattered the nations around. Isa. x. 15. Jer. i. 21. The ax was laid to the root of the tree with the Jews. In Christ's time the destructive judgments of God were ready to be executed on their church and state, if they did not speedily receive Christ, repent of their sins, and bring forth good works. Matt. iii. 10.

AZ-A-RI'AH. See AHAZIAH.

(2.) AZ-A-RI'AH, or UZ-ZI'AH, king of Judah. At sixteen years of age he succeeded his father Amaziah, A. M. 3194, and reigned fifty-two years; his mother's name was Jehoshiah. His behaviour was right before God; but he neglected to demolish the high places, or restrain the people from sacrificing therein. In the first part of his reign he was eminently successful: he defeated the Philistines, broke down the walls of Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod, and built forts for himself in their country: he routed the Arabs of Gurbaal, and the Mehunims, both which, inhabited the south west of Canaan; he spread his terror even to the entrance of Egypt. The Ammonites, though at a considerable distance eastward, were glad to court his favour with presents. His army amounted to 310,000 men; 2,600 of whom were valiant commanders; and Jeiel, Maaseiah, and Hananiah were chief generals. He built many forts, fortified his cities, and furnished his army with shields, spears, helmets, habergeons, bows, and slings. He caused his artificers to make curious engines, to throw immense stones to a great distance, and to shoot arrows with uncommon force. Meanwhile, by his example, he encouraged every kind of husbandry. While the pious ZECHARIAH continued his counsellor, Uziah's conduct was upright; but after his death, his prosperity rendering him proud, he rushed into the temple to burn incense. Azariah the high-priest boldly checked him, and told him, that his unhallowed attempt to burn incense should issue to his shame. While Uziah stood enraged at the opposition of the high-priest to his profane attempt, the leprosy began to appear in his forehead: the priests thrust him directly from the temple; nay, and even he himself hastened to get out. He continued a leper till he died, dwelling in a separate house, and his son Jotham managed the affairs of the kingdom. 2 Kings xv. 2 Chron. xxvi. Josephus will have the great earthquake to have happened at the time that Uziah was struck with the leprosy: but nothing can be more incorrect. The earthquake happened two years after Amos began to prophesy; and consequently during the reign of Jeroboam, and in, or before, the fifteenth year of Uziah, twelve years at least before Jotham was born, and about thirty before he was capable of governing the state. Compare Amos i. 1. 2 Kings xiv. 23. and xv. 23.

(3.) AZ-A-RI'AH, the son of Oded, a prophet; who, after the defeat of the Cushites, strongly represented to ASA the low state of religion, and that national prosperity was only to be attained in the way of serving God; and encouraged him to proceed further in reforming the kingdom. His admonition was obeyed. 2 Chron. xv. JEHOSHAPHAT had two sons of this name: they, and their brethren Jehiel, Zachariah, Michael, and Shephatiah, were portioned out before their father's death; but were soon after murdered by JEHORAM their elder brother. 2 Chron. xxi. 2-4, 13. We find four other princes of this name. Two under Solomon, the one the son of Nathan the prophet, 1 Kings iv. 2, 5, 15. Another, who along with Berechiah, Jehizkiah, and Amasa the son of Hadlai, at the instigation of Oded the prophet, opposed the bringing of the Jewish captives, taken from AHAZ, into Samaria: they represented the guilt of the ten tribes to be already too great; and that the retaining of these captives of their brethren would add to it. They got those who needed to be clothed and shod, and all of them sufficiently supplied with victuals; for such as were weak, they provided asses: and thus, in the most generous manner, carried them back to Jericho. 2 Chron. xxvii. 11-15. Another prince of this name, and son of Hoshaiah, along with Johanan, the son of Kareah, accused Jeremiah of dissembling; and, contrary to the warning of God, went down into Egypt, and carried Jeremiah along with them. Jer. xliii. 2. We find six priests of this name, a son and a grandson of Zadok; the last is by some thought to be the same with Amariah, the high-priest under Jehoshaphat; 1 Kings iv. 2. 1 Chron. vi. 9. 2 Chron. xix. 11; the third, a grandson of the last mentioned; the next withstood UZZIAH in the manner related; the fifth was high-priest under Hezekiah; and the sixth under Josiah. 1 Chron. vi. 1-14. 2 Chron. xxxi. 10. There were others of this name after the captivity; one of whom attended Ezra from Babylon: another repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah. Ezra vii. 3. Neh. iii. 23.

The frequency of this name, which signifies the help of the Lord, seems to sanction the opinion, that the pious Hebrews lived much under a sense of their dependence on God, and the favours which he shewed them.

AZ-AZEL. Our version rightly renders it, the scape-goat, led to the wilderness on the great day of FAST of EXPIATION. Some think it denotes a horrid precipice, over which the goat was thrown headlong. Witsius, Cocceius, and others will have it to signify Satan, to whom they say this goat was abandoned in the wilderness, as a type of Christ led by the Spirit into the desert, to be tempted of the devil; or led by Pilate and the Jews to have his heel bruised; his life taken without the gate. Lev. xvi. 10.

B.

BAAL, which signifies lord, or husband, did perhaps in the earliest ages signify the true God. It is certain that it was a very common name of the principal idol gods of the east, as Ashtaroth was a common one for their female deities. The Moabites, Phœnicians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, and often the Hebrews, had their BAAL; and which, from his temple or supposed office, had often distinguishing epithets annexed; as Baal-berith, Baal-peor, Baal-zebul, &c. Often this name BAAL was a part of the names of persons and cities; perhaps to signify, that the most of them were dedicated to his service. This the pious Hebrews sometimes turned into Bosheth, which signifies shame. Thus Jerubbaal is turned into Jerubbesheth; Eshbaal into Ishbosheth; Meribaal into Mephibosheth. Compare Judg. vi. 33. with 2 Sam. xi. 21. 1 Chron. viii. 33, 34. with 2 Sam. ii. 12. and ix. 6. This idol is sometimes represented as a female deity, Rom. xl. 4. Gr.; and, on the other hand, Ashtaroth is sometimes represented as a male. BAAL is often named BAALIM in the plural, perhaps because there were many Baals, at least many images of him.

Who the first Baal was, whether the Chaldean Nimrod, or Belus, or the Tyrian Hercules, &c. is not so evident as that the Phœnicians adored the sun under that name; though perhaps their idolatry, as described to us by profane writers, is not the most ancient, but a more recent form introduced by the Assyrians. Every sort of abominations was committed on the festivals of this idol, and of Ashtaroth his wife. In his chamanim, or temples, was kept a perpetual fire: altars were erected to him in groves, high places, and on the tops of houses. Jer. xxxii. 35. 2 Kings xvii. 16. and xxxiii. 4—12. Hos. iv. 14.

The Moabites began to worship Baal before the days of Moses. The Hebrews began to serve him in the time of that eminent leader. Num. xxii. 41. Psal. cvi. 28. They relapsed into that idolatry after the death of Joshua; and under the judges Ehud, Gideon, and Jephthah. Judg. ii. 13; iii. 7; vi. 25. and x. 6. Samuel seems to have quite abolished the worship of this idol from Israel, 1 Sam. vii. 4; but Ahab and Jezebel, about two hundred years afterwards, reimported it from Zidon, in all the abominations thereof. Four hundred and fifty priests were appointed to attend his service; and nearly as many that of Ashtaroth. These priests of Baal were openly disgraced at mount Carmel; their god appeared quite regardless of their cries, and their slashing of their flesh, to move his pity; and the impotence of their idol being exposed, they were, by Elijah's orders, apprehended and slain. Jehoram the son of Ahab did not worship Baal himself, but his subjects continued to do so. After his death, Jehu pretending an extraordinary regard to Baal, convened his prophets and priests into his temple, and there put them all to the sword. Not long after Jehoiada abolished the worship of Baal from Judah; but Ahab and Manasseh again introduced it. Josiah abolished it; but it was restored by his sons. 1 Kings xvi. 31. and xviii. 2 Kings iii. 1; x; xi; xvii. 16; xxi. 3. and xxii. 3, 5. Jer. xix. 5.

BA-AL'AH. (1.) Kirjath-Baal, or KIRJATH-JEARIM. Josh. xv. 9. (2.) BAAL'AH, or BA'LAH, a city transferred from the tribe of Judah to the Simeonites, Josh. xv. 29. and xix. 8. These cities appear denominated from Baal as well as the following.

BA-AL'ATH, a city of the tribe of Dan. Josh. xix. 44. Whether it was this, or Baalbeck, at the head of the ABANA, that Solomon built, we know not. 1 Kings ix. 18. See AVEN.

BAAL-ATH-BE'ER, BAAL, a city of the Simeonites, probably on the south-west border. If it be the same as South Ramah, or Ramoth, David sent to the inhabitants part of the spoil which he took from the Amalekites. Josh. xix. 8. 1 Chron. iv. 33. 1 Sam. xxx. 27.

BAAL-BE'ERITH, the idol worshipped in his temple at Shechem, and by the rest of the Israelites after the death of Gideon. Judg. viii. 33. Perhaps it was the same as the Phœnician Berith, or Beroe, the daughter of their Venus and Adonis; or rather it is Baal as the guardian of covenants; the same with the Horkios of the Greeks, and the Jupiter Sponsor, or Fidius ultor, of the Romans.

BAAL-GAD, a city at the north-west foot of Mount Hermon, in the valley of Lebanon, at the north-east point of the promised land; or, perhaps, a top of Hermon. Josh. xi. 7. and xii. 7.

BAAL-HAN'AN, the son of Achbor, and seventh king of the Edomites; his name, which signifies the grace and pity of Baal, leads one to suppose that the worship of Baal even then prevailed among the Edomites, as well as among the Canaanites. Gen. xxxvi. 38.

BAAL-HA'ZOR, a city near Ephraim, about eight miles north-east of Jerusalem, between Bethel and Jericho. It is commonly thought to be the same as Hazor-hodettah, in the lot of Judah, Josh. xv. 25; but if so, its situation ought to be placed more to the south. Here ABSALOM had his shearing-feast, and murdered his brother AMON. 2 Sam. xiii. 24.

BA AL-HER'MON, a part of Mount Hermon. Judg. iii. 3.

BA-ALIS, king of the Ammonites: he sent Ishmael the son of Netbaniah to murder GEDALIAH, Nebuchadnezzar's deputy over the Jews, who were left in the land: but he paid dear for his conduct, when the Chaldeans soon after invaded his country, and reduced it to a desert. Jer. xl. 17.

BA'AL-ME'ON, BETH-BA'AL-ME'ON, BE'ON. Perhaps SION took it from the Moabites; the Hebrews took it from him, and it was given to the Reubenites; but the Moabites recovered it; and, at last, it was destroyed by the Chaldeans. Num. xxxii. 38. Ezek. xxv. 9. It however seems to have been rebuilt, and to have been a city in the time of the Maccabees.

BA'AL-PE'OR, an idol or the Moabites and Midianites. Some think him the same with Misraim, or Osiris, of the Egyptians, or with Priapus of the Greeks. It is said, that the filthiest rites were used in his worship. He had the name Peor from the place of his temple, as Jupiter was called Olympius, from his being worshipped on mount Olympus. Some will have him the same with Chemosh, whom they suppose the sun, or the Comet, or Apollo Chonius, the god of drunkards: and for whom Solomon built a high place on mount Olivet, 1 Kings xi. 7; and who was carried off by the Chaldeans. Jer. xlviii. 7. But there does not seem to be sufficient reason for supposing these one and the same idol. In the worship of this dead deity, the Hebrews joined themselves, and ate his sacrifices; for this they were punished with the death of 24,000. Num. xxv. Psal. cvi. 28.

BA'AL-PER'A-ZIM, a place in the valley of Rephaim, about three miles south-west from Jerusalem. Here David routed the Philistines. 2 Sam. v. 20.

BA'AL-TA'MAR, a place near Gibeah. It seems the Canaanites had here worshipped Baal, in a grove of palm-trees. Here the other tribes almost utterly destroyed the Benjamites. Judg. xx. 33.

BA'AL-ZE'BUB, the idol-god of Ekron. This name, signifying lord of flies, does not seem to have been given him in contempt, since AHASIAH, his worshipper, called him by it; but either because he was painted as a fly, (though others say he was figured as a king on his throne,) or because he was supposed to chase off the hurtful swarms of flies; and might be the same as the god Achor at Cyrene, who was reckoned a preserver from flies. In the New Testament he is styled, the prince of devils; Matt. xii. 24. and x. 25; so that he is by some supposed to be the same with Pluto, or god of hell, of the Greeks.

BA'AL-ZE'PHON. Whether this was an idol erected at the north point of the Red sea, to watch the frontier of Egypt, or was a fortified place, we know not. Exod. xiv. 2.

BA-A'NAH and RECHAB, the sons of Rimmon of Beeroth, Benjamites. Being officers of the army under king Ishbosheth, they entered his house at noon; cut off his head as he slept, and carried it to David, expecting some valuable reward. After representing to them the horrid nature of the treacherous murder, he ordered their hands and feet to be cut off, and these, or their bodies, to be hanged over the pool at Hebron. 2 Sam. iv. David had a Netopathite hero of the name; and Solomon two noted governors; the one the son of Ahilud, David's secretary; and the other the son of Hushai. 2 Sam. xxiii. 29. 1 Kings iv. 12, 16.

BA-A'SHA, the son of Abijah, (not the Shilonite) was commander in chief of the forces belonging to Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. In A. M. 3051, he treacherously murdered his master and family, and usurped his crown. He continued in the idolatrous and other wicked courses of his predecessors on the throne. Jehu the son of Hanani, a prophet, was commanded by God to tell him, that by the concurring, though not approving, providence of God, he had got the crown: but since he continued in the wicked ways of the family, which God had been provoked to deliver into his hand, he and his house should, ere long, be extirpated in like manner, and their unburied carcases given to the beasts to eat. Regardless of this heavenly warning, Baasha made war on Asa, and his kingdom of Judah; took Ramah, a place situated in a noted passage between their kingdoms, and began to fortify it, that none of his pious subjects might transport themselves out of his dominions to enjoy the pure worship of God. An invasion of Benhadad and his Syrian troops from the north, diverted him from accomplishing his project: they smote Ijon, Dan, Abel-beth-maachah, Cinneroth, and all the land of Naphtali. After some years' war with Asa, Baasha died a natural death, was buried in Tirzah his capital, and succeeded by Elah his son. 1 Kings xv. and xvi.

BABE, a young infant. Luke i. 41. Weak and insignificant persons are called babes, because of their ignorance, folly, forwardness, rashness, and stupidity. Matt. xi. 25. Isa. iii. 4. Rom. ii. 20. In commendation, believers are called babes, because they live on the pure milk of gospel truth: and for their innocence, meekness, and humble sincerity in faith, love, profession, and obedience. 1 Pet. ii. 2. In dispraise, some saints are called babes; because of their weakness in spiritual knowledge, power, and experience; and for their stupidity, unteachableness, and readiness to be seduced by Satan. 1 Cor. ii. 1. Heb. v. 13.

BABEL. 1. A famous tower. About the time of Peleg's birth, in, A. M. 1758, and one hundred and two years after the flood, or perhaps later, the whole race of mankind, having gradually removed to the south west of Ararat, came to the plain of Shinar. Here, being all of one language and religion, they, perhaps at Nimrod's suggestion, agreed to erect a tower of prodigious extent and height. Their design was not to secure themselves against a second deluge; otherwise they had built their tower on a high mountain, not in a low valley; but to get themselves a famous character, and to prevent their dispersion to replenish the earth. As they knew of no quarries at hand, in that rich soil; they lured bricks for stone, and used slime for mortar. Three years, it is said they employed to prepare their materials, and twenty-two years they carried on their building. Their naughty and rebellious attempt displeased the Lord; by a miracle, he so confounded their language, that but few of them could understand each other. This effectually stopped the building, procured it the name of BABEL, or CONFUSION, and obliged the offspring of Noah to disperse themselves, and replenish the world. It is pretended, that the family of Shem did not concur in erecting this structure; but of this we have no certain evidence. What became of this tower we cannot determine; about 1700 years after its erection, Herodotus saw a structure at Babylon, consisting of eight towers, raised one above another, and each seventy-five feet high; above the highest of which was built the temple of Belus, the way to which winded about on the outside, and was so broad that carts could have passed each other: but whether this was that mentioned by Moses, or one built on its foundation, we know not. Modern travellers, who pretend to have seen the ruins of this structure, differ so widely among themselves, both with respect to situation and description that it is improbable that any of them have seen the genuine ruins of the famous tower.

2. BABEL, or BABYLON, the capital of Chaldaea, was one of the most splendid cities that ever existed. Its form was an exact square, built in a large plain; its circumference four hundred and eighty furlongs, or sixty miles; fifteen on each side. The walls were in thickness eighty-seven feet; in height three hundred and fifty; on which were built three hundred and sixteen towers, or, according to others, two hundred and fifty; three between each gate, and seven at each corner; at least where the adjacent morass reached not almost to the wall. These walls and towers were constructed of large bricks cemented with bitumen, a glutinous slime, which in that country issues out of the earth, and in a short time grows harder than the bricks or stones which it cements. Without the wall the city was surrounded by a ditch, filled with water, and lined with bricks on both sides. This must have been extremely deep and large, as the whole earth of which the bricks for building the walls were formed was dug out of it. The gates were a hundred in all, twenty-five on each side, and all of them solid brass. From these ran twenty-five streets, crossing one another at right angles, each one hundred and fifty feet wide, and fifteen miles in length. A row of houses, faced the wall on every side, with a street of two hundred feet between them and it. Thus the whole city was divided into six hundred and seventy-six squares, each four furlongs and a half on every side. Around these squares stood the houses fronting the streets, and the empty space within served for gardens, and other necessary purposes; but it does not appear that all these squares were ever wholly built and inhabited; though, from Curtius's account of it, when Alexander was there, we cannot safely infer what part might be inhabited, and in its meridian lustre before Cyrus took it.

A branch, if not the whole current of the Euphrates, running through the city, from north to south, divided it into two parts. On each side of the river were a quay and a high wall, of the same thickness with that of the city. In this, over against every street, were brazen gates, and from them a descent by steps to the river. A magnificent bridge, of a furlong or more in length, and thirty feet wide, joined the two parts of the city in the middle. To lay its foundation and raise banks, they turned off the river westward into a prodigious lake which they had dug, of about fifty-two miles square, and thirty-five, or, according to Megasthenes, seventy-five feet deep. To prevent the Euphrates from damaging the city, when the melting of the Armenian snows yearly caused it to overflow its banks, part of the current was then diverted into this lake, and afterwards, on proper occasions, drawn forth to moisten the fields that lay below the level of the city. At the east end of this stately bridge stood the old palace, which took up four squares, and was about four miles in circumference. Next to it stood the magnificent temple of the god BEL or Belus, on the top of the tower above mentioned, and which took up one square. The riches of this temple, we read of amounted to above twenty-one millions sterling. Its statues and vessels were all of massy gold. The statue of Jupiter Belus, probably that which Nebuchadnezzar erected in the plain of Dura, (Dan. iii.) was forty feet high, and weighed 1000 Babylonian talents, or about three millions and a half of our money; two other statues, of female deities, were not much inferior in magnitude or value. They had a golden table before them of forty feet long, and fifteen broad. Here Nebuchadnezzar deposited the sacred furniture of the Jewish temple, and a great part of his other precious spoils. At the west end of the bridge stood the new palace, which took up about nine squares, and was seven or eight miles in circumference. On the walls of these palaces an infinity of animals were represented to the life; and the several entrances were by magnificent gates of brass. A vault below the channel of the river afforded a secret communication betwixt the two palaces.

But nothing was more stupendous than the hanging gardens. To gratify his queen Amyte with a resemblance of her native mountains of Media, or to have a commanding prospect of the whole city, Nebuchadnezzar built them by his new palace. They contained a square of four hundred feet on each side, and consisted of terraces, one above another raised to the height of the walls of the city; the ascent from terrace to terrace being by steps ten feet wide. The whole pile consisted of substantial arches upon arches, and was strengthened with a surrounding wall of twenty-two feet thick. The floors on each terrace were laid in the following order: first, on the top of the arches was laid a bed or pavement of stones, each sixteen feet long, and four broad: over this, a layer of reed mixed with a great quantity of bitumen; over this, two courses of brick closely cemented with plaster: over all these were thick sheets of lead; and on these, the earth or mould of the garden, so deep, as to give sufficient root to the largest trees, and stocked with the choicest shrubs and flowers. Upon the uppermost terrace was a reservoir, supplied by a powerful engine with water from the river, and from whence the gardens on the other terraces were supplied with moisture.

Nimrod, the first king of Babylon, and perhaps in the world, is generally allowed to have founded this city. Belus, who by some is made cotemporary with SHAMGAR judge of Israel, and queen Semiramis, are said to have further enlarged and adorned it: but Nebuchadnezzar, or he and Nitocris his daughter-in-law, finished it, and made it one of the wonders of the world. The inhabitants of Babylon, and places adjacent, were excessively credulous, superstitious, lewd, and debauched; parents and husbands exposed to sale the chastity of their daughters and wives: their women scarce retained the least shadow of modesty; exposing themselves quite naked in companies. They were obliged by law once in their lives, to prostitute themselves to strangers, in honour of their goddess Saccoth-benoth. The other idols of the Babylonians were Bel, Nebo, Sheshach, Nergal, Merodach, and the element of fire. Here the idolatry, afterwards so prevalent in every place, appears to have had its origin. The Babylonians pretended to great skill in astrology, soothsaying, and magic. Dan. ii. 2. and iv. 7. and v. 7. Isa. xlvii. 12. From hence these pretended sciences spread into Canaan, (Isa. ii. 6.) if not into Egypt. After the death of Nimrod, Amraphel the ally, if not the tributary, of Chedorlaomer, was king of Shinar, where Babylon stood. Long afterwards reigned Belus, who is considered to be the same with Pul king of Assyria. He appears to have left Babylon to Baladan, Belesai, or Nabonassar, his younger son; and hence his son Merodach, and other successors, enjoyed their dominion, with the connivance of the elder branch of that family, who reigned in Assyria, and extended their conquests. Some, however, think that Baladan was not the brother, but a revoltor from Tiglath-pileser. About A. M. 3333, Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, either for its want of male-heirs, or by force, seized on the kingdom of Babylon. After he and his posterity had retained it about sixty years, Nabopolassar, perhaps a descendant of Baladan, revolted, and ascended the throne. He, with Cyaxares the Mede, began the overthrow of the Assyrian empire, and his son Nebuchadnezzar completed it, and raised the Babylonian empire to its summit of glory. His conquests extended from Media on the north-east, to Ethiopia beyond Egypt on the south-west, comprehending the kingdoms of Assyria, Persia, Syria, Phœnicia, Canaan, North Arabia, Idumæa, Egypt, &c. Jer. xxv. xxvii. xlv. xlvii. xlviii. and xlix. After his death the empire of Babylon began to dwindle into decay. Evil-merodach, his son, succeeded him. Neriglissor, a son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar, murdered him; and he and his infant son, Labroschard, reigned a few years: the last being murdered, Belshazzar, the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar by Evil-merodach, mounted the throne; under whom, after long war with the Medes and Persians, Babylon was taken by Cyrus: terrible ravages and slaughter ensued; and the whole royal family was ignominiously cut off, A. M. 3468.

About fifteen years after, the Babylonians, enraged that the royal residence was transferred to Shushan in Persia, and for other grievances, pretended or real, prepared to revolt: and after four years' preparation avowed their rebellion. Darius Hystaspes, king of Persia, with a mighty army, marched to reduce them. Trusting to their walls, they shut themselves up in their city, where they had collected great stores of provision; and that this might not be consumed by useless persons, they assembled their old people, their wives and children, and strangled all unfit for arms, except one beloved wife and a maid for every family. After Darius had without success invested the city, almost two years, Zopyrus, one of his generals, cut off his own nose, and mangled his face, he fled over to the besieged, and pretending that all this had been done to him by Darius' orders, for speaking in favour of the Babylonians; was readily admitted: he so bitterly inveighed against the cruelty of Darius, that they made him captain of some troops, and at last governor of their city. This, on the first opportunity, he treacherously surrendered to his master; who, to reward his successful stratagem, loaded him with honour and wealth. Three thousand of the principal revoltors were severely punished with impalement; the walls of the city reduced to one-third or one-fourth of the former height; and the brazen gates carried off. About forty years afterwards, Xerxes pillaged the temples, and destroyed the idols of Babylon.—When Alexander was here, about A. M. 3672, Babylon was still extensive and wealthy, and he intended to restore it to its former splendour, and make it the seat of his empire: but soon after, Seleucus Nicator, having drained about 500,000 persons from it, to people his new city of Seleucia, forty miles northward, it gradually dwindled into a desert. About A. M. 3670, one of the Parthian kings cruelly ravaged it, and demolished part of it. In Curtius' time it was reduced to a fourth part. The river Euphrates, changing its course, turned part of it into a fen, or standing pool of water. About the time of our Saviour's death, it was quite desolate; not 400 years after, it was an hunting park for the Persian kings. From the accounts of Rawolf, De la Valle, and Hanway, we are informed, that now, and for ages past, it is so completely desert, that it is hard to say where it is supposed to have stood; and that the place is so haunted with venomous and other doleful creatures, that no one dares go near it, except during the two winter months. Isa. xlii. xiv. xxi. xlv. and xlvii. Jer. i. and li.

3. BAB'Y-LON, or Babylonia, was also the name of the country about this famed city; and sometimes also of Chaldaea. Psal. cxxxvii. 1. Here Christianity was very early received by the Jews and others. Here the apostle Peter wrote one, if not both his epistles, to his dispersed brethren of Judah: here the Jews, since the destruction of their capital, have had famous synagogues, by one of the Rabbies of which their large Talmud was compiled. Psal. lxxxvii. 4. 1 Pet. v. 13. This province contained the cities of Babylon, Volagesocerta, Borsippa, Idiccara, Coche, Sura, and Pompeiditha.

4. Rome is called BABYLON, to mark the idolatry, superstition, lewdness, abused wealth, and bloody persecutions of the people of God, that have taken place in that Antichristian state. Rev. xiv. 8. xvi. xvii. and xviii.

BABBLE; to utter a vast deal of senseless and unprofitable talk. Prov. xxiii. 29. Acts xvii. 18. A babblers is no better than a serpent that bites, except it be enchanted. Unless restrained by fear or favour, he will do mischief to men's characters or interests, with the multitude of his thoughtless and slanderous words. Eccl. x. 11. The vain babbling, which ministers ought to shun, is all empty noise about words, sentiments, and customs, not allowed by Christ, nor calculated to the edification of men. 1 Tim. vi. 20.

BACA, a place on the way to Jerusalem; so called from the abundance of mulberry trees. The valley of Baca, may denote any valley abounding with these trees, through which the Hebrews, in their journey to their solemn feasts, had to travel; and where they digged wells to receive the rain for their refreshment: or it may denote the valley of Rephaim in particular. Psal. lxxxiv. 6.

BACK, the hinder and strongest part of our body. God's back-parts denote the less glorious manifestations of his presence. Exod. xxxiii. 23. He casts our sins behind his back, when he fully forgives them, so as to place them no more in the light of his countenance, to punish them. Compare Isa. xxxvii. 17. with Psal. xc. 8. Jer. xvi. 17. He shows men the back and not the face, when he disregards them, and refuses to smile on, or shew favour to them. Jer. xviii. 17. Christ's giving his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, imports his ready and cheerful exposure of himself to suffering for our sake. Isa. l. 6. Men turn the back, when they flee from a field of battle. Jer. xlviii. 39. Their turning their back on God, or his temple, their looking back, going back, drawing back, turning back, sliding back from him, imports their contempt of him; their gradual and often insensible revolt from the knowledge, love, profession, and practice of his truth. Jer. ii. 27. and xxxii. 33. Their casting him or his laws behind their back, imports their utmost contempt and abhorrence of both. Ezek. xxiii. 35. Neh. ix. 26. The church has her back ploughed on, when her members are cruelly oppressed and persecuted. Psal. cxxix. 3. The Jews, since their crucifixion of Christ, have their back bowed down alway: the strength of their nation, their government, and great men, are gone; and they are laden and grievously oppressed with slavery, oppression, and sorrow. Psal. lxxix. 23. Rom. xi. 10.

BACK, or BACKWARD. In metaphorical language, to go or turn back or backward, denotes wilful rebellion, and active apostasy from God. Isa. i. 4. Jer. vii. 24. and xv. 6. To be driven, turned, or fall backward, imports disappointment; and sudden, unexpected, and fearful destruction. Psal. xl. 14. and lxx. 2. Isa. xxviii. 13. and xlv. 25. To turn judgment backward, is violently to pervert good laws and their sanctions, in order to promote and maintain wickedness. Isa. lix. 14.

BACKBITE, to speak evil of one in his absence. The Hebrew word for this, signifies to go to and fro, to gather and spread calumny. Prov. xxv. 23. A backbiter is a hater of God; is excluded from fellowship with him; and ought to be excommunicated from the church. What a scandal, then, for professed Christians, that this sin is so common among them! Rom. i. 30. Psal. xv. 3.

BACKSLIDE; gradually, voluntarily, and insensibly, to turn from the knowledge, faith, love, profession, and practice of God's truth, which we once solemnly avowed or attained. Jer. iii. 6—14. Hos. iv. 16. Backslidings reprove one, and he is filled with them, when the punishment due to them is laid upon him till he is convinced of his guilt, or is terribly oppressed with the weight thereof. Jer. ii. 19. Prov. xiv. 14. Backslidings are healed, when they are freely forgiven, and one is recovered from them to a course of holiness. Hos. xiv. 4. A backslider in heart is one who, however secretly, allows himself in a deliberate course of revolting from God. Prov. xiv. 14. To be bent to backsliding, is to be strongly set upon revolting from God, and disposed to take all opportunities of it. Hos. xi. 7.

BAD; EVIL; useless; disagreeable; hurtful. Matt. xxii. 10.

BADGER, a four-footed beast that burrows in the earth: perhaps it includes the Civet cat.—Some authors, perhaps from their mere fancy, describe a dog-badger; but that which is best known is the hog-badger, or brock. Its body is short, its hair long, and stiff as bristles; that on the back is greyish, that on the side yellowish, that on the legs black. Its legs are short, and have sharp claws on the two fore feet. Its face resembles that of a fox, and is marked with white and black. Its eyes are small, and its teeth and snout like those of a dog. It feeds on small animals and roots of vegetables, and bites very hard. The hair is formed into pencils for painters and gilders; and the skins though coarse being an excellent preservative against rain, the uppermost covering of the sacred tabernacle was made thereof; and might signify the outwardly mean appearance of Christ and his church. Exod. xxvi. 14. and xxxvi. 19. Badger-skins were also used for shoes. Ezek. xvi. 10. But perhaps these skins, in both cases, pertained to an animal different from our badger; as some render the Hebrew TAMASH, by blue, purple, or scarlet.

BAG, a sack or pouch. Deut. xxv. 13. 1 Sam. xvii. 40. Treasures of heavenly blessings that cannot be scattered, lost, or fade away, are called bags that wax not old. Luke xii. 33. Riches blasted by the curse of God, are wages put into a bag with holes; they profit not the owner, but are secretly, inensibly, and unexpectedly consumed. Hag. i. 6. God seals and sews up men's iniquity in a bag, when he exactly remembers every act and circumstance thereof, in order to charge it on them, and punish them for it. Job xiv. 17.

BA-HURIM, a city of the Benjamites, about a mile, or perhaps considerably more, to the north-east of Jerusalem. It is said to be the same as ALMON; but it is certain that thus far Phaltiel attended his wife Michael in her return to David her first husband. 2 Sam. iii. 16. Here David passed in his flight, just as the rebellious Absalom entered Jerusalem, and was grievously cursed by Shimei, one of the inhabitants; and here Ahimaaz and Jonathan hid themselves in a well as they carried information to David. 2 Sam. xvi. 5. and xvii. 18.

BA'JITH, a temple, or a city where one was situated, in the country of MOAB, whither the king unsuccessfully went up to bewail the state of his nation, and supplicate his idol's assistance against the Assyrian invaders. Isa. xv. 2. It is possibly the same with BAAL-MEON.

BAKE. The baking of bread with human or cows' dung, signifies the firing of it with such dung burned above, below, or at the side of it. A similar custom still continues in Barbary and Arabia. Ezek. iv. Ten women baking the bread of a nation in one oven, imports great scarcity of provisions. Lev. xxvi. 26. The baker of the Israelites, who sleepeth all night, might signify their secure and indolent kings, who did not attend to the danger the state was then exposed to of being inflamed with contentions and destroyed by the Assyrian invasion. It may also represent Satan and men's lust, which, having inflamed the heart with temptation, wait with composure for its breaking forth into open wickedness, on every occasion. Hos. vii. 6.

BALA-AM, the son of Beor or Bosor, was a noted prophet or diviner of Pethor, a city on the Euphrates. Observing the vast numbers of the Hebrew nation, as they passed his territories in their way to Canaan, and fearing they might fall on his country and forcibly wrest it from him, as they had done that of the Amorites, Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab, in conjunction with the princes of Midian, sent messengers to this famed enchanter, promising him a valuable reward, if he would come and curse the Hebrews; which they hoped would render them easy to be conquered. Readily the noble messengers executed their commission. Greedy of the unhallowed reward, Balaam earnestly desired to comply: but, from some divine impression on his mind, durst not give them an answer, till in the night God (he possibly meant a devil) should direct him: but that night the true God forbade him to curse the Israelites. Vexed herewith, he informed the messengers that he was divinely forbidden to go with them. Upon their return, Balak, supposing his messengers' presents, or promised reward had not pleased the enchanter, sent other princes more honourable, with more costly presents, and promises of the highest advancement. To their message Balaam replied, that he could not, for a house full of gold and silver go a whit beyond the commandment of the Lord. But still anxious to earn the wages of unrighteousness, he desired the messengers to tarry till he should consult whether the Deity had changed his mind. In the night God appeared, and permitted him to go, if the messengers insisted: but commanded him to curse or bless the people just as he should direct him.

Without waiting any further solicitation, Balaam next morning rose early, and rode off with the messengers. To punish his raging avarice, the Angel JEHOVAH placed himself in his way, with a drawn sword in his hand. The enchanter perceived not the Angel, but his ass did, and turned aside: Balaam beat her back again into the road. The angel removing into a place betwixt two vineyards, the ass, for fear, ran against the wall, and crushed her master's foot. The Angel next posted himself in a still narrower passage: the ass fell down for fear, and durst not go forward. Greatly enraged, the enchanter unmercifully beat her. Meanwhile the Lord miraculously qualified the ass to reprove him for his madness and cruelty, when he might easily have guessed that she had some uncommon reason for her conduct. Accustomed to converse with devils in the form of beasts, or maddened with rage, Balaam, unafrighted, talked with the ass. JEHOVAH immediately discovered himself with his drawn sword; rebuked him for his abuse of his beast, and assured him that, had it not been for her turning aside, he should have now perished in his wicked course. Balaam confessed his guilt, and unwillingly offered to return. He was permitted to proceed in his journey, provided he took heed to say nothing, but as God directed him.

Informed of his approach, Balak met him on the frontiers of his kingdom; and kindly blamed him for not coming on the first invitation. The enchanter alleged in his excuse, the divine restraint he was under. Balak conducted him to Kirjath-huzoth, his capital, and entertained him with a splendid feast. Next day he conducted him to an adjacent hill, sacred to the idol Baal, that he might from thence view the Hebrew camp. To obtain the divine permission to curse them, Balaam desired seven altars to be reared; and a bullock and a ram to be offered on each. His orders were directly obeyed. While Balak stood by his sacrifice, Balaam retired to meet with enchantments, or perhaps with serpents, as instruments of divination. He was divinely inspired with this unwelcome message, that in vain had he been brought from the east to curse the Israelites, whom God had not cursed; and that they should be the numerous and peculiar favourites of Heaven. In delivering this, he wished that his death and posterity might resemble those of Jacob.

Balak was heartily vexed, but still hoped that a change of place, and alteration of prospect, might prove more propitious. He therefore carried Balaam to the top of Pisgah, where he saw but a part of the Hebrew camp. Seven altars being erected, and a bullock and a ram offered on each, he again retired to procure some enchantment against them. God met him, and ordered him back to tell Balak, that the unchangeable and Almighty JEHOVAH had blessed the Hebrews; had forgiven their iniquities; took delight in them; had by miracles brought them from Egypt; and would enable them, as lions, to devour the nations, and seize on their property. Offended herewith, Balak begged that he would at least refrain from blessing them. The enchanter assured him, that he was divinely constrained to act as he did.

Still intent to have Israel cursed, both agreed to make a third trial. On the top of Peor seven other altars were reared, and a bullock and a ram offered on each. Restrained by God, Balaam forebore to seek for enchantments; but turning his face to the Hebrew tents, he, after a most grand preface, extolled the comely order of their encampments; foretold that they should become a flourishing and mighty nation, far superior to every foe; that such as blessed and favoured them, should be blessed; and such as cursed and hated them, be cursed and ruined. Transported with rage, Balak charged him to get home to his country, since, by adherence to divine suggestions, he had abused him, and deprived himself of honour and wealth. Balaam replied, that from the very first he had told his messengers that he could do nothing but as God permitted. He added, that in aftertimes a Hebrew prince should subdue the country of Moab; a Hebrew Messiah marked in birth by a star, subdue the world to the obedience of faith; that Idumea and Seir should be ruined, while the Hebrews would do valiantly; that Amalek, however powerful at present, should, for their injuries to that people, perish for ever; that the Kenites, notwithstanding their advantageous habitation among rocks, should, after a variety of distresses, be carried captive to Assyria; that the Greeks from Macedonia, and the Romans from Italy, should seize on Assyria and its conquests; and at last perish themselves.

Some have thought Balak, in his earnestness to have Israel cursed, asked Balaam, whether by offering thousands of rams and ten thousand rivers of oil, or sacrificing his first-born, he might obtain his desire; and that he replied, the only way to find favour with God, was to do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly with God; but that question and its answer, seem plainly to refer to the Jews and the prophet Micah. Chap. vi. 7, 8. It is certain, Balaam advised Balak to cause the finest women of his country to frequent the Hebrew camp, to entice that people to whoredom and idolatry, and thereby to deprive them of the favour of God. This infernal suggestion, issued in the death of 1000 Hebrews by public execution, and 23,000 more by a plague. Not long after, God appointed Israel to resent these enticements on the Midianites: Balaam was killed in that war, and fell into the pit which he had digged for others. Numb. xxii. xxiii. xxiv. xxv. and xxxi. Deut. xxiii. 4, 5. Josh. xiii. 22. xxiv. 9. Neh. xiii. 2. Mic. vi. 5. Balaam is called a prophet, not merely because he pretended to foretell things by enchantments, but because God inspired him, (though against his will) to foresee and declare a variety of future events. 2 Pet. iii. 5. Some false teachers of the apostolic age are compared to Balaam, as they, like him, loved the wages of unrighteousness, and taught the doctrine of whoredom and idolatry. Jude 11. Rev. ii. 14.

BAL'A-DAN. His name is compounded of the names of the idols Baal and Adan, or Adonis. He is the same with Belesis, Bellessus, Nanybrus or Nabonassar, the first king of Babylon in Ptolemy's canon. According to Diodorus, he and Arbaces the Mede revolted from Sardanapalus king of Assyria, levied an army of 400,000, and therewith ruined Nineveh and the Assyrian empire. Sir Isaac Newton, with greater propriety considers him to have been the son of Pul king of Assyria, who had the kingdom of Babylon assigned him for his portion. He was succeeded by his son Berodach; and his kingdom seems to have enjoyed peace with Assyria till the reign of Esarhaddon. Isa. xxxix. 1. 2 Kings xx. 12.

BALANCE, an instrument for weighing. To weigh with an unjust one, is abomination to the Lord. Prov. xi. 1. Men are weighed in the balances, when they are tried by the law, word, or judgments of God, and their goodness or badness clearly discovered. Dan. v. 27. Job xxxi. 6. Psal. lxii. 9. The balances in the hand of him that sat on the black horse, appearing under the third seal, may denote the strict equity of Divine Providence; the famed equity of Severus, and other persecutors then living; and such scarcity of provision, temporal and spiritual, as obliged men to eat bread as by weight. Rev. vi. 5. The balancings of the clouds, is the manner in which they are poised and supported in the air, and formed for their proper purpose. Job xxxvii. 16.

BALD, wanting hair on the head. Lev. xlii. 40. Baldness, and polling or cutting off the hair, imported mourning or terrible distress. Isa. liii. 24. xv. 2. and xxii. 12. Jer. xlvii. 5. and xlviii. 25. Ezek. vii. 18. and xxvii. 31. Amos viii. 10. Mic. i. 16. The children of Bethel's mocking Elisha, crying, Go up, thou bald head! implied contempt of his prophetic character, ridicule of his master's translation to heaven, and of God's providence toward his body; and so justly merited being torn to pieces. 2 Kings ii. 23. The Chaldeans besieged Tyre till their heads were made bald with wearing helmets, and their shoulders peeled with bearing burdens.

BALM, a precious, sweet-smelling, and medicinal resin, or gum, extracted from the balm-tree, which is cultivated in the same manner as the vine, and grows in various places of Arabia the Rocky: but that of Canaan near Engedi, and in Gilead, was reckoned the best. The Arabs sold of it to the Egyptians, and the Jews to the Tyrians. Gen. xxxvii. 25. Ezek. xxii. 17. It is very light, when fresh, and swims above the water wherein it is dissolved. Its colour at first is whitish, and afterwards green; but when old, it becomes yellowish, and of a boney colour. Its taste is very bitter, and it is of a restraining quality. It is held useful in bringing forth dead births, preserving dead bodies, and healing venomous bites, and other dangerous wounds; but true and genuine balm is rarely found. The balm of Brazil and New Spain, and especially of Peru, is reckoned not much inferior to that of Gilead. Effectual deliverance from national distress is called balm, balm of Gilead. Jer. li. 8. viii. 22. and xvi. 11. Blessed Jesus: are not thy blood and grace the choicest balm? Proceeding from the pierced, the wounded tree of life; how precious, and medicinal! They heal the spiritual diseases of nations and of churches; cure the envenomed bites of the old serpent; bring forth the dead in sin, to be children to God; and preserve his chosen from the unpardonable and final course of wickedness.

BA'MAH, a high place, where the Jews shamelessly worshipped their idols. Ezek. xx. 29.

BA'MOTH, a place in the borders of Moab; but whether a city near the river Arnon, and the same with Bamoth-baal, which was conquered from Sihon, and given to the Reubenites, we know not. Numb. xxi. 19. Josh. xiii. 7. Here the Hebrews had their forty-second encampment. Perhaps the name Bamoth, imports no more, than some rising grounds in that chain of mountains north of the river Arnon.

BAND. (1.) A chain or cord. Luke viii. 29. Acts xvi. 26. (2.) A company of men, warriors, cattle, locusts; so called because chained together in society, or the resemblance thereof. 2 Kings xxiv. Acts x. 1. Gen. xxxii. 10. Prov. xxx. 27. A band of Roman soldiers consisted of about 1000. Acts xxi. 31. and xxvii. 1. The arguments, proofs, and influences of divine love, are called bands of a man; because in a way suited to our rational nature, they draw, and engage us to follow, and obey the Lord. Hos. xi. 4. Governments and laws are bands that restrain from sin, and draw to duty. Psal. ii. 3. Jer. v. 5. Zech. xi. 7—14. Faith and love are called bands: they unite and fasten the saints to Christ and his people. Col. ii. 19. Eph. iv. 46. Slavery distress, fear, perplexity, are called bands, they restrain men's liberty, and render them uneasy. Lev. xxvi. 12. Ezek. xxxiv. 27. Isa. xxviii. 22. and lii. 2. To have no bands in death, is to die without great pain, and without fear and terror of future misery. Psal. lxxiii. 4. Sinful lusts and customs, or the heart of a whore, are bands; they weaken our inward strength, obstruct our holy obedience, and powerfully draw and constrain us to work wickedness; nor is it easy to get rid of them. Isa. lviii. 6. Eccl. vii. 26. The band of iron and brass, securing the root of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary tree, was the fixed purpose and almighty providence of God, securing his kingdom to him after his madness. Dan. iv. 15, 23.

BANISHED, is to be driven and excluded from one's country. Ezra vii. 26. God's banished, are poor outcast sinners, who for their crimes are deprived of original happiness, and reduced to a most shameful, helpless, and destitute condition: or saints deprived of his sensible presence and comfort, and laid under temptation and affliction. 2 Sam. xiv. 14.

BANK. (1.) The side or brink of a river or sea. Gen. xli. 17. (2.) A mount or heap of earth thrown up in the siege of a city, to shoot from, or for defence to the besiegers. 2 Sam. xx. 15. (3.) A treasury for exchanging, receiving, or giving out, money on interest. Luke xix. 23.

BANNER, ENSIGN, STANDARD; colours borne in times of war, for assembling, directing, distinguishing, and encouraging the troops. In the wilderness every tribe of Israel had its particular standard; and they were again marshalled by three tribes a-piece, under the standards of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan. God's setting up an ensign to the Assyrians, or others, imports his providential leading them forth to chastise his people, and punish his enemies, by war and spoil. Isa. v. 26. and xviii. 3. The setting up standards in a country, imports approaching war and destruction. Jer. xvi. 21. and i. 2. Christ is a standard, or ensign; preached to Jews and Gentiles, he is the great means of assembling them to himself, and distinguishing them from others; he directs and animates them in their spiritual journey, and their warfare with sin, Satan, and the world; and enables them to oppose corruption and error: and for the same reason he is called a standard-bearer. Isa. lix. 19; xi. 10; xlix. 22. and lxii. 12. Sol. Song v. 10. Heb. Christ's love is called a banner; when displayed, it excites and draws men to him; and directs, encourages, and protects them in their spiritual warfare. Sol. Song ii. 4. God gives a banner to his people, to be displayed because of truth, when he accomplishes his promise, signally protects and delivers them; or affords them a valiant army to conquer their foes. Or it may refer to Christ, the promised Messiah, as the great security of the Jewish nation, Psal. lx. 4. The destruction of Sennacherib's army was like the fainting of a standard-bearer: it was very sudden, and so universal among the commanders, that scarce one remained to bear the colours. Isa. x. 18. The Jews in these times were as an ensign on a high hill; they were reduced to a small number, and obliged to flee to mountains and hills for safety. Isa. xxx. 17.

BANQUET, a splendid feast, at which is abundance of wine and choice provision. Eath. v. 5. Amos vi. 7. Christ's word, covenant, church, and intimate fellowship with him, are called the banqueting-house, or house of wine: thereby the saints are refreshed, satisfied, strengthened, exhilarated, encouraged, and comforted, against all their fears and griefs. Song ii. 4.

BAPTISM, denotes washing in general. Mark vii. 8. Gr.; but the washing of persons in token of dedication to God, is peculiarly so called. Possibly this rite commenced immediately after the flood. Jacob and his family washed themselves before they approached to God at Bethel. Gen. xxxv. 2. The Hebrews washed themselves before they entered into covenant with God at Sinai. Exod. xix. 14. Aaron and his sons washed themselves before their consecration to the priesthood. Exod. xxix. 4. After the Jews circumcised their proselytes, they washed them in water. In the ministry of John, baptism was administered as a seal of the new covenant. His baptism comprehended the whole substance of what afterward obtained, though it did not so clearly represent the Trinity of persons in the Godhead, and the actual incarnation of Christ. Nor is there any evidence that any baptized by John were rebaptized by the disciples of Christ. Our Saviour, and perhaps most of his apostles, had no other but the baptism of John. Christ baptized none himself, that he might baptize none in his own name; that he might maintain his dignity as the sole Lord of the church, and baptizer with the Holy Ghost; and that the validity of baptism might appear not to depend on the worth of the administrator, but the authority of God; and perhaps, for this last reason, Paul shunned baptizing as much as he could. John iv. 2. 1 Cor. i. 14. Before his death, Christ had empowered his apostles to baptize in Judea: after his resurrection he empowered them to teach and disciple all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. John iii. 26. and iv. 1, 2. Matt. xxviii. 19. Paul's being sent not to baptize, imports no more but that the preaching of the gospel, and not baptizing, was his principal work. 1 Cor. i. 17.

Israel's baptism unto Moses in the pillar of cloud and Red sea, signified, that their dwelling under the cloud, and passing through the Red sea, represented and confirmed their obligation to follow Moses as a leader, and to receive, profess, and obey his laws. 1 Cor. x. 2. Our washing with water in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, signifies and seals our spiritual union to Christ, and partaking of the benefits of the covenant of grace, through his blood and Spirit, viz. justification, adoption, regeneration, resurrection to eternal life, and our engagement to be the Lord's. It is baptism into Christ and his death, as it signifies and seals our ingrafting into him, and partaking of the benefits purchased by his death. Rom. vi. 3. Gal. iii. 27. It is baptism into one body, as it signifies and seals our being members of Christ's one mystical body, the church. 1 Cor. xii. 13. It is called baptism for forgiveness and washing away of sin, as it solemnly represents and seals the remission of all their sins to such as receive it in faith. Acts ii. 38. and xxii. 16. And it is perhaps called the washing or laver of regeneration, as it represents and seals the change of our nature. Tit. iii. 5. It is the baptism of repentance, as therein we profess and engage to hate and mourn over our sins, and to turn from them to God. Acts xiii. 24. and xix. 4. It is called baptism for the dead, because sometimes received in the view of an immediate death, natural or violent; and chiefly as it is a baptism into the faith and profession of Christ's being risen from the dead, and that we shall be in due time raised up in our order. 1 Cor. xv. 29. It is called baptisms, as it relates both to the outward and inward man; or as the outward signifies the inward baptism of the Holy Ghost, whereby our soul is really washed and regenerated; or baptism may there denote the ceremonial purifications, as emblematic of faith and repentance. Heb. vi. 1. Baptism saves: it is a means of salvation, when it is conscientiously received and improved, to lead men to apply the blood and resurrection of Jesus Christ. 1 Pet. iii. 21. But it does not remove all corruption out of the soul, Gal. v. 17. Rom. vii. 14; nor does it effectually implant any principle of grace in the heart, Acts viii. 13, 23; nor does the receiving of baptism, but believing on Christ, secure our salvation, John iii. 16; nor the want of baptism, but of faith, expose to damnation. Mark xvi. 16. John iii. 18. None but ministers of the gospel have any warrant from Christ to baptize. Matt. xxviii. 19. 1 Cor. iv. 1. Nor have they any warrant to add, to the simple washing prescribed by him, exorcisms, crossing, oil, spittle, &c. No adult person is to be baptized till he understand the Christian faith, and solemnly profess his belief of, and obedience thereto. Matt. xxviii. 19. Acts viii. 37. Matt. iii. 6. Luke iii. 8. But those infants who are descended from one or both parents members of Christ's mystical body, ought to be baptized. It is certain the children of believers are called holy, 1 Cor. vii. 14; and members of the kingdom of God, Mark x. 14: why then refuse them the seals? The promise of God, to be their God, is as much to them as to the offspring of Abraham, who received circumcision on the eighth day. Compare Acts ii. 39. with Gen. xvii. 7. The apostles baptized several whole families without any exception, of which infants must be supposed to have formed a part, till the contrary be proved. Acts xvi. 15, 33. 1 Cor. i. 16. Nor indeed can we, without incurring guilt, imagine that Jesus Christ came to straiten the privileges of the New Testament, and thus to place Christians in a worse state than the Jews were under the Old Testament. John x. 10. Nor, whatever Tertullian and some others equally giddy in their notions, pretend, can any, without the most palpable falsehood, allege, that infant baptism was not commonly allowed in the primitive ages of Christianity, as well as ever since to this day: nor without allowing infant baptism, know we how to distinguish the most, if not the whole of the Christian world, for ages past, from the state of heathens: they either had no baptism at all, or had it only from such as had none.

There is a twofold metaphorical baptism.

(1.) The baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire; which denotes not only the miraculous collation of the influences of the blessed Spirit, by which the New Testament church was solemnly consecrated to the service of God; but chiefly his gracious influences; which, like fire, purify, soften, and inflame our heart with love to Jesus, and wash away our sin, and enable us to join ourselves to him and his people. Matt. iii. 11. 1 Cor. xii. 13. Col. ii. 12. Rom. vi. 4. (2.) The sufferings of Christ and his people are called baptism; they are means of purging away iniquity, and thereby Christ and his people solemnly dedicate themselves to the service of God, and avouch him to be their only Lord. Matt. xx. 22. Luke xii. 50.

BAPTIST, one that baptizes. John, the son of Zacharias, is so called, because he first administered baptism as an ordinance of God. Matt. iii. 1. His whole doctrine is called his baptism. Acts xviii. 25.

BAR. (1.) That whereby a door is bolted and made fast. Neh. iii. 3, 6. (2.) A narrow cross-board, or rafter, to fasten other boards to. Exod. xxvi. 26. (3.) A rock in the sea that runs across its bottom. Jonah ii. 6. (4.) The bank or shore of the sea, which as a bar shuts up its waves in their own place. Job xxviii. 10. (5.) Strong fortifications and powerful impediments are called bars, or bars of iron. Amos i. 5. Isa. xlv. 2.

BAR-RAB-BAS, a notorious robber, guilty of sedition and murder. He happened to be imprisoned for his crimes when Christ's process was carried on. As it had, for some time, been usual to release some prisoner to the Jews at their passover-feast, Pilate proposed Jesus and Barabbas, that the Jews might choose one of them to be released. Contrary to his expectations and wish, they warmly urged the release of the notorious malefactor, and the crucifixion of the blessed Jesus. Matt. xxviii. 17, 21. John xviii. 40. Mark xiv. 7—15.

BARAK. See DEBORAH.

BARBARIAN, a rude unlearned person, or one whose speech we understand not. 1 Cor. xiv. 11. The Greeks called all besides themselves Barbarous, or Barbarians; because they reckoned their language coarse and their manner of life rude and savage. Rom. i. 14. Acts xxviii. 2, 4. Col. iii. 11.

BARBED, having points like hooks, or prickles of thorn. Job xli. 7.

BARE. (1.) Stripped; destitute of covering. Lev. xii. 45. Deprived of outward comforts. Jer. xlix. 10. (2.) Pure; mere; so bare grain, is grain of corn without any bud, straw, ear, or chaff. 1 Cor. xv. 37. To have the legs, thighs, heels, feet, head, or body, bare, or naked, imports want of outward comforts, and mourning and grief on account thereof. Isa. xlvii. 2. xx. 2. and xxxii. 11. Jer. xiii. 22. and Ezek. xvi. 7. But the arm being bare, revealed, or seen, denotes a great exertion of power. Isa. lii. 10. liii. 1. Psal. xxviii. 1. and lxxiv. 11.

BAR-JESUS. In the Arabic language, his name was Elymas, or the sorcerer. He was a noted Jewish magician in the isle of Cyprus. When Sergius Paulus, the prudent deputy, or proconsul, of that place, under the Roman emperor, sent for Paul and Barnabas to hear from them the doctrines of Christianity, this sorcerer endeavoured to hinder the deputy's conversion. With holy indignation Paul looked at him, pronounced him full of all subtlety and mischief; an enemy of all righteousness; an unceasing perverter of the right ways of the Lord. He foretold, that his opposition to the light of gospel truth should quickly be punished with the loss of his natural sight. The threatening immediately took effect, and the sorcerer was obliged to seek one to lead him by the way. The view of this miracle determined the deputy immediately to embrace the Christian faith; and it is probable he conferred his name PAUL on the honoured instrument of his conversion. Acts xiii. 8—12.

BAR-JONA, a Syriac designation of Peter, importing that he was the son of one Jona, or Jonas. Matt. xvi. 17. John i. 42. and xxi. 15—17.

BARK. (1.) To yelp; make a noise as a dog. But ministers that, as dumb dogs, cannot bark, are such as have neither conscience nor courage to reprove men's sin, and publish the alarming truths of Christ. Isa. lvi. 10. (2.) To peel the bark or rind of a tree. Joel i. 7.

BARLEY, a well known kind of the triandria digynia class of plants: its calyx is a partial wrapper, composed of six leaves, containing six flowers; the leaves are erect, linear, sharp-pointed, and two under each flower; it has no glume: the corolla consists of two valves; the outmost and largest of which terminates in a long awn or beard: the stamina are three hairy filaments, shorter than the flowers; the antheræ are oblong; the bud of the pistil is of a top-formed oval figure; the styles are two, reflex and hairy; the stigmata are similar; the corolla surrounds the seed, and keeps it from falling out; the seed is oblong, belled, sharp-pointed, and marked lengthwise with a furrow.

In Palestine the barley was sown in about October, and reaped in the end of March, just after the passover. In Egypt the barley-harvest was later; for when the hail fell there, a few days before the passover, the flax was ripe, and the barley in the ear, and the wheat only in the blade. Exod. ix. 30, 31, 32. Barley was anciently held a contemptible grain, proper only for servants, poor people, and beasts. In David's flight from Absalom, his friends brought him wheat, barley meal, peas, beans, and pulse. 2 Sam. xvii. 28. Solomon had barley for his horses; and sent barley, along with wine, oil, and wheat, to his Tyrian servants. 1 Kings iv. 28. 2 Chron. ii. 15. One that came from Baal-shalisha presented Elisha with twenty loaves of barley meal, and corn in the husk. 2 Kings iv. 42. Christ and his disciples seemed to have lived on barley bread, and with five loaves of it, and a few small fishes, he feasted above 5000 men. John vi. 9—14. The jealousy-offering was to be of barley meal, without oil or frankincense, to signify the base condition of one who had given occasion to suspect her unchastity, and that the offering merely called sin to remembrance. Numb. v. 15. Sometimes barley is put for a low contemptible reward or price. So the false prophets are charged with seducing God's people for handfuls of barley and morsels of bread. Ezek. xiii. 19. Hosea bought his emblematic bride for fifteen pieces of silver, and a homer and half of barley. Hos. iii. 2.

BARN, a repository for grain. Prov. iii. 10. The blessing or filling one's barns, or his enlarging them, imports great plenty and prosperity. Dent. xxviii. 8. Luke xii. 18. Breaking them down imports great scarcity and want. Joel i. 17.

BARNA-BAS; his ancestors were Levites, and had retired to Cyprus, perhaps to shun the ravages of the Syrians, Romans, or others in Judea. Here he was born, and was at first called Joses; but after his conversion to the Christian faith, was called BARNABAS, the son of prophecy, from his eminent gifts, and foresight of future things; or, the son of consolation; because his large estate, and affectionate preaching, much comforted the primitive believers. Acts iv. 36, 37. That he was one of the seventy disciples of our Saviour or was educated by Gamaliel along with Paul, we have no certain evidence; but it was he who introduced Paul to the Christians of Jerusalem, and assured them of his conversion. Acts ix. 26, 27. He was sent to regulate the affairs of the church newly planted at Antioch in Syria; and finding the work too heavy for him, he went to Tarsus, and engaged Paul to be his assistant: some time afterwards, he and Paul carried a large contribution from Antioch to their distressed brethren of Judea. Acts xi. 22—30. Not long afterwards he and Paul were divinely appointed to leave Antioch, and plant new churches among the gentiles. After three years, they returned to Antioch. In their second journey into Lesser Asia, Barnabas at Lystra was taken for JUPITER, probably because of the comeliness of his person, and his grave deportment. Some time after this, he and Paul were appointed delegates from the Syrian church to the synod at Jerusalem; and were therein appointed to carry the decrees to the gentile churches; at Antioch, Barnabas was led into dissimulation by Peter. In their return to Lesser Asia, he and Paul having had a sharp contest about taking Mark, the nephew of Barnabas, along with them, they separated; and Barnabas and Mark went to Cyprus. Acts xiii. xiv, and xv. Gal. ii. 13. What became of him afterward, whether he preached in Italy, and was stoned to death at Salamis near Athens, as some pretend, we know not. A spurious gospel and letter are ascribed to him.

BARREN, without proper issue or fruit. Gen. xi. 30. 2 Kings ii. 19, 21. Professors are barren, when they want those gracious qualities and exercises which God's law and providence call for at their hand. 2 Pet. i. 8. Luke xiii. 6—9. Sol. Song iv. 2. Jude 12. The gentile nations under the Old Testament, or rather the church during Christ's public ministry, are called barren; because so few converts, or good works, were brought forth among them, to the glory of God. Isa. liv. 1. Gal. iv. 27.

BARSA-BAS. (1.) Joseph Justus, who was perhaps one of Christ's seventy disciples; it is certain he was an eye-witness of Christ's public work of the ministry. He stood candidate along with MATTHIAS for the apostleship, instead of Judas, but was not chosen of God. Acts i. 21—26. (2.) BARBABAS Judas. He was a member of the synod at Jerusalem; and was sent along with Paul, Barnabas, and Silas, to publish the decrees thereof among the Gentile churches. After preaching awhile at Antioch, he returned to Jerusalem. Acts xv. 22—24.

BAR-THOLO-MEW, one of our Lord's twelve apostles. As John never mentions Bartholomew but Nathanael; and the other evangelists, never Nathanael, but Bartholomew; as John classes Philip and Nathanael, as the others do Philip and Bartholomew; as Nathanael is mentioned with the other apostles that met with their risen Saviour at the sea of Tiberias; as Bartholomew is not a proper name, but only signifies one to be the son of Tolmai, as Peter is called BAR-JONA; we suppose Bartholomew and Nathanael one and the same person. Informed by Philip concerning our Saviour as the true Messiah, Nathanael doubted how any good thing could come out of a place so notoriously wicked as Nazareth. Philip desired him to satisfy himself concerning Christ's excellence, by conversing with him; he complied. On sight of him, Jesus declared him an Israelite indeed, without allowed fraud and dissimulation. Nathanael asked how he knew him? Jesus replied, that he knew what had passed under a certain fig-tree, whither he retired to his most secret devotion. Struck with this discovery of his omniscience, Nathanael, all in raptures, acknowledged him the Son of God, and the promised Messiah, or king of Israel. Jesus assured him, that his ready faith should be quickly rewarded with further proof of his Messiahship; he should see the angels of God attend on, and serve him, as their high and sovereign Lord.—Some time afterwards, he was sent along with Philip to preach and work miracles in the land of Israel; and, with the other apostles, had repeated visits from his risen Redeemer. John i. 45—51; xx. and xxi. Matt. x. 3. Mark iii. 13. Luke vi. 14.

After teaching about eighteen years at Jerusalem, he is said to have preached to the East Indians, and committed to them the gospel according to Matthew. Thence, it is said, he travelled to Lycaonia; and at last, by the Albanians on the Caspian sea, to have been flayed alive, and crucified with his head downwards. A spurious gospel is ascribed to him.

BAR-TI-MEUS, son of Timeus, a blind man who sat begging by the way-side, as Jesus passed with a great multitude from Jericho to Jerusalem. Informed that Jesus was among this crowd, he cried out 'Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me!' Jesus stopped, and ordered him to be brought near. It was done. Jesus asked him, What he desired at his hand? He begged the recovery of his sight. Jesus bade him go his way; that his faith had saved him. Immediately he received his sight, and followed his divine Physician. Mark x. 46—52. Matthew mentions two blind men cured on this occasion. Chap. xx. 30—34. But as Bartimeus was most noted, or expressed the greatest earnestness and strongest faith, Mark mentions him, and omits the other.—Luke relates the cure of another blind man, performed by Christ in his going to Jericho. Luke xviii. 35—43.—How readily, how cheerfully, would our Redeemer heal our spiritual maladies if applied to!

BARUCH, a Jewish prince, son of Neriah, grandson of Maaseiah, and brother of Seraiah, one of Zedekiah's courtiers. He attached himself to the prophet Jeremiah, and was sometimes his secretary or scribe. When king Jehoiakim had imprisoned that prophet, Baruch, according to the direction of God, wrote his prophecies from his mouth, and read them to the people, as they were assembled at some extraordinary fast. The courtiers, informed hereof by Michaiah one of his hearers, sent for him, and he read them again in their hearing. Affected with what they had heard, the courtiers advised Baruch and Jeremiah to hide themselves; as they determined to lay the matter before the king. Having laid up the writing in the chamber of Elishama the scribe, they waited on the king and informed him of its contents. By his order, Jehudi fetched and read it before him and his princes. Scarcely were four or five pages read, when Jehoiakim, in a rage, and contrary to the intercession of several princes, took it, cut it to pieces, and cast it into the fire. He gave orders to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch; but they could not be found. Soon after, Baruch wrote another copy, more enlarged, from the mouth of the prophet. Baruch having lost all probable access to honour and wealth, and being in danger of his life, was extremely dejected. Inspired of God, Jeremiah chid him for his ambition after great things, when the ruin of Judah was at hand: and assured him of divine protection in every case. Jer. xxxvi. and xlv.

In the tenth year of Zedekiah, Baruch, by Jeremiah's direction, carried his charter of the field of Hanameel, and put it in an earthen vessel, that it might remain safe, till after the captivity. After Jerusalem was taken, Nebuzaradan allowed Jeremiah and Baruch to remain in Judea with Gedaliah.—Upon the murder of that good deputy, Johanan and other principal men, falsely blamed Baruch for having enviously excited Jeremiah to forbid their going to Egypt; and carried them both to that country. Whether Baruch, after the death of Jeremiah, removed from Egypt to Babylon, we know not. An APOCRYPHAL book is falsely ascribed to him. Jer. xxxii. 12, 13. and xliii. 3, 6.

BA'RUCH, the son of Zabbai, under the direction of Nehemiah, zealously repaired a part of the wall of Jerusalem. Perhaps, too, he sealed the covenant of reformation, and was the father of Maaseiah. Neh. iii. 20; x. 6. and xi. 5.

BAR-ZIL'LA-I. (1.) A Simeonite of Meholah, and father to Adriel the husband of Merab, the daughter of Saul. 2 Sam. xxi. 8. 1 Sam. xviii. 19. (2.) A Gileadite of Rogelim, who plentifully supplied David and his small host with provisions, as they lay at Mahanaim, during the usurpation of Absalom. On David's return to his capital, to take possession of his royal dignity, Barzillai attended him to the passage of Jordan. David insisted that he should go and dwell with him at Jerusalem. Barzillai pleaded his old age and unfitness for the court. His excuse was sustained, and king David dismissed him home with the kindest embraces; but, with his permission, retained Chimham his son at court. 2 Sam. xvii. 27—29. and xix. 31, 40. (3.) A priest descended from the daughter of the former Barzillai, and head of a number of priests who returned from the Babylonian captivity. Neh. vii. 63.

BASE, a foundation, or settle for pillars, or the like to stand on. The bases of the altar and lavers, might represent the perfections and purposes of God, whereby Christ is set up for our Surety and purification; or the dispensation of the gospel, that lifts up and bears his name before the gentiles. 1 Kings vii. 27. Ezra iii. 3. The visionary ephah, and woman in it, being established on her own base, in the land of Shinar, may signify, that the judgments of God should in a just and proper manner fall, and from age to age rest on Chaldea, where his people had been abused, and himself so dishonoured; or rather, that the wicked Jews in their present dispersion, should not be favourably supported by the promises and kindness of God, but for a multitude of ages be fixed in misery, and loaded with due punishment. Zech. v. 11.

BASE; mean; contemptible; of the vile and low sort. Job xxx. 8. Acts xvii. 5. Many of God's chosen are so in their outward condition, or before conversion. 1 Cor. i. 28. Paul was represented by the false teachers as such to those that saw him. 2 Cor. x. 1. Since the time of Ezekiel, Egypt has been a base kingdom, and the base of all kingdoms: being almost always subject to the most grievous oppression under the Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Saracens, Turks, and even Mamaluke slaves. Ezek. xxix. 14, 15. Zech. x. 11.

BASHAN, or BATA-NEA, one of the most fruitful countries in the world, lying eastward of Jordan and the sea of Tiberias, northward of the river Jabbok, westward of the mountains of Gilead, and south of Hermon and the kingdom of Geshuri. Besides villages, it contained sixty fenced cities. It was particularly famous for its rich pasture, excellent flocks and herds, and stately oaks. Moses took it from Og, and gave it to the half-tribe of Manasseh. Numb. xxxii. Josh. xvii. 1. 1 Chron. ii. 21—23. Deut. xxxii. 14. Amos iv. 1. Ezek. xvii. 6. Bashan and Carmel are used to represent fertile countries, or the flourishing condition of a nation or church. Nah. i. 4. Jer. i. 19. Mic. vii. 14. God's bringing his people from Bashan hill on the east, and the depths of the sea on the west, imports his recovering the Jews from their captivity and dispersion, into which they were driven by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and others on the east, and by the Romans, and others on the west; and his redeeming his chosen from distress on every hand. Psal. lxxviii. 23. The Jews' lifting up the voice in Bashan, imported their mourning, as the Chaldeans made their noisy march through that country to ruin their kingdom. Jer. xxii. 20.

BASKET, a light vessel for carrying victuals, or the like. Exod. xxix. 23. In a basket, Paul was let down over the wall of Damascus, that he might flee for his life. 2 Cor. xi. 33. In baskets, the noblemen of Samaria sent seventy heads of Ahab's children to Jehu at Jerzeel. 2 Kings x. 7. The three baskets seen by the Egyptian baker in his dream, represented three days of his life. Gen. x. 16, 18. Basket is put for the provision in it. Deut. xxvii. 5, 17. When our Saviour feasted 5000 with five loaves, there remained twelve baskets' full of fragments: when he fed four thousand with seven loaves, there remained seven baskets' full. On both occasions much more bread was left than was at the beginning, as a reward to the disciples for their liberality. Matt. xiv. 20. and xv. 37.

BASON, a small vessel for holding water, or other liquids, to wash or sprinkle with, John xiii. 5. The ceremonial basons, which received the blood of sacrifices, or holy water for washing, might represent the ordinances of the gospel, that bring near to us the blood and Spirit of Christ, in their cleansing and sanctifying virtue. Exod. xii. 22. and xxiv. 6. 1 Kings vii. 40.

BASTARD, a child begotten out of the state of marriage. Perhaps the bastards who were excluded from rule in the congregation of Israel, were such as had an accursed Canaanite for father or mother. Deut. xxiii. 2. Jephthah, a bastard of extraordinary character, was deliverer and judge of Israel. Judg. xi. The bastard that dwelt in Ashdod, might be Alexander the Great, whom his mother declared such; or rather, any foreigners who had no right to the place. Zech. ix. 6. Bastards, or mothers' children, in the family of God, are those who, in respect of external profession, have the church for their mother, but were never savingly adopted and begotten of God. Heb. xii. 8. Sol. Song i. 6.

BAT, a four-footed beast of the ravenous kind. In its upper-jaw it has six fore-teeth, acute, and distant from each other: in the lower, six acute, but contiguous. It has eight tusks, two above and two below, on each side. Every foot has five toes, and those of the fore-feet are connected with a membrane, and expand into a sort of wings. This animal has often been ranked with birds; but it has the mouth of a quadruped, not the beak of a bird; it is covered with hair, not feathers; it produces its young alive, not from eggs; and in general much resembles a mouse. The female has two paps, and brings forth two young ones at a birth: while these are incapable of providing for themselves, she flies about with them clinging to her paps, and sometimes hangs them on a wall. During the winter, bats cover themselves with their wings, and hang asleep in dry caves or old buildings. During the summer they hide themselves in the day, and flutter about in the evening, catching moths, and other insects. Some bats have tails, and others have none: they are scarcely ever tamed, but feed on insects, oil, cheese, tallow, &c. Some bats in China are said to be as large as pullets, and some in Golconda larger than hens; these are eaten by the inhabitants. The large bats in Brazil, Madagascar, and Maldives, fasten upon persons whom they find sleeping with any member uncovered, suck their blood, and leave them bleeding to death. Bats, being unclean under the law, might represent persons fearful, unbelieving, ignorant, and hypocritically wicked. But some render the word HATALAPH, a swallow. Lev. xi. 19. Deut. xiv. 19.

BATH, a measure for liquids, the same as the ephah for corn; it contained almost 1748 solid inches, was equal to above seventeen Scotch pints, or three pecks, three pints, and rather more than twelve inches of the Winchester measure; or seven gallons, four and above a half-pint English wine measure. Some think there was a common and sacred bath; the last containing a third more than the former; because in one place Solomon's brazen sea is said to contain 3000 baths, and in another 2000: but without supposing this, that vessel might ordinarily hold 2000, and when quite filled to the brim, hold 3000: or its foot might contain the third thousand. 1 Kings vii. 26. 2 Chron. iv. 5.

BATHE; to steep in water or other moisture. Lev. xv. 5. God's sword is bathed in heaven, when his judgments are prepared for a terrible infliction, as swords are hardened for slaughter, being steeped in liquor. Isa. xxxiv. 5.

BATHSHE-BA, or BATH'SHU-A the daughter of Eliam, or Ammiel, perhaps grand-daughter of Ahithophel, and wife of Uriah the Hittite. While her husband was employed in the siege of RABBAH, she happened to bathe herself, it seems, in her garden; king David espied her from the top of his adjacent palace: and being informed who she was, sent for her, and lay with her. Falling with child, she informed David thereof, that he might devise how to conceal their guilt. He sent directly for Uriah, as if he had intended to learn the affairs of the siege: but his real design was to give him an opportunity of being with his wife, and so be reputed the father of the child. Uriah came, and after a few trifling questions concerning the state and progress of the army, David ordered him home to his house, and sent a collation from his own table after him. Restrained by Providence, and his own continence and bravery, Uriah thought it below him to riot in pleasure, while his fellow-soldiers were encamped in the field; and so slept with the guards at the palace-gate. Informed of this, David next day called him to his table, and to inflame his appetite, made him drink heartily, and then ordered him home. Uriah again slept with the guards, and excused himself to the king, by alleging, that it was improper for him to enjoy the embraces of his wife, while Joab and the army, nay the ark of God, were encamped in the open field. Vexed with this disappointment, David sent him back to the army with a letter, directing Joab how to accomplish his murder. Bathsheba quickly hearing of her husband's death, and having mourned in the ordinary manner, David sent for, and married her. The child begotten in adultery was scarcely born when it sickened, and notwithstanding David's repentance and fasting, died, as had been threatened by Nathan in the name of the Lord. Bathsheba was, however, honoured to bear David other four sons, one Solomon, another Nathan, both ancestors of Jesus Christ. 2 Sam. xi. and xii. 1 Chron. iii. 5. Matt. i. 6. Luke iii. 31.

Bathsheba, it seems, was extremely careful in the education of her children, particularly of Solomon, concerning whom many promises had been made: the last chapter of proverbs, perhaps, contains part of her instructions. Prov. iv. 3. and xxxi. David having promised her, that Solomon her son should be his successor, a warm remonstrance from her and Nathan the prophet prevented Adonijah, and procured the coronation of Solomon. When, by Adonijah's instigation, she petitioned for his being allowed to marry Abishag his father's concubine, Solomon, however honourably he received her, with marks of high displeasure he rejected her petition. 1 Kings i. and ii. 13-25.

BATTLE, a warlike contest, or engagement. Dent. xx. 3. The Jewish wars are called the battles of the Lord because fought by his people against his enemies; and he often expressly directed, and gave signal victory therein. 1 Sam. xviii. 17. 2 Chron. xxxii. 8. To turn the battle to the gate, is to fight valiantly, and drive back the enemy who has got, as it were, into the heart of the city. Isa. xxviii. 6. The battle is not to the strong, is not always gained by the most powerful. Eccl. ix. 11. The Lord fought with Sennacherib's army in battles of shaking; by the shaking of his hand, an easy display of power, he cut them off with a terrible and alarming destruction. Isa. xxx. 32. and xxxvii. 36. Battle-ax, a heavy ax to cut down trees, houses, &c. in the way of an army; or to hew down whatever stood in the way of victory. The Chaldeans are called God's battle-ax and weapons of war; by them he destroyed the nations around. Jer. li. 20. Battle-bow, either a bow to shoot with in war, or an army of archers and excellent warriors. Zech. ix. 10. and x. 4.

BATTLEMENT, a wall around the top of flat-roofed houses, as those of the Jews, and some other eastern nations, generally were, to prevent falling from them, or to fight from with an enemy; or it may signify the towers, walls, and fortifications of cities. Jer. v. 10. Whatever Jew had not a battlement on his roof, was held guilty of the death of him who fell from it. Deut. xxi. 8.

BATTER; to beat down. 2 Sam. xx. 15.

BAY; (1.) A reddish colour inclining to chestnut: but some render AMUTZIM, strong, startling-coloured; speckled with black and white. Zech. vi. 3. (2.) BAY-TREE, is of that kind of plants which have nine stamina, and one style in the flower. It has no calyx, but the corolla consists of six hollow, erect, and oval pointed petals. Its fruit is a drupe of an oval-pointed figure; the seed is a single oval-pointed nut, and its kernel of the same shape. This tree propagates by seed, in most countries which are moderately warm. It spreads wide, and has a most beautiful flourish. Unless the winter be severe, it retains its verdure, but quickly grows old, and decays. Tournefort mentions five kinds of it. Wicked men are likened to it: their power and influence is often extensive; their victories, honour, and prosperity, make a glorious appearance; but how soon matters are changed, and they reduced to wretchedness and contempt! Psal. xxxviii. 25, 26.

BDEL LI-UM, a gum, or resin, somewhat resembling myrrh. It is found in single drops of a very irregular size, some of which are as big as a hazel-nut. It is of a dusky colour and its taste bitterish; it powerfully softens and cleanses when it is new and fresh. There was plenty of it near the river Pison. Gen. ii. 12. The manna resembled it in colour. Num. xi. 7. After all, the learned exceedingly disagree about the nature of bdellium, and the manner of its production; nor do we know if the modern be the same with the ancient. Some will have EBOLAH in scripture to signify a precious stone, fine crystal, or steel; and the great Bochart contends that it denotes pearls, plenty of which are fished not far from the mouth of the Pison in the Persian gulf.

BE; AM; IS; ARE; (1.) To exist; have a being. Rom. iv. 17. (2.) To exist in and of one's self, independently of all others. Hence God's name, I AM THAT I AM, or I WILL BE THAT I WILL BE, denotes his eternal, independent, self-existence; and his free, unchangeable, liberal, and everlasting communication of his goodness. Exod. iii. 14. (3.) To be made; become. Jer. xxxii. 38. (4.) To be openly manifested; appear to be. Rom. xiv. 9. Matt. v. 45. Luke vi. 35. John xii. 36. (5.) To be set apart to. Judg. xi. 31. To be the Lord's, or for him, is to be espoused to his Son, dedicated to his service, aim at his glory, and obey his commandments. Hos. iii. 3. Zech. ix. 7. The Lord's being with us, or for us, imports his favouring us with his love, assisting us by his power, and satisfying us with his goodness. Judg. vi. 14. Rom. viii. 31. 1 Chron. xxii. 16. (6.) To be reputed; judged; esteemed. 1 Cor. vii. 14. (7.) To be highly esteemed among men; and hence what is contemned is represented as not being. 1 Cor. i. 28. (8.) To be like unto. So Christ is called a rose and lily. Sol. Song ii. 1. John xv. 1. (9.) To represent; signify: Thus circumcision is called God's covenant, because a sign and seal of it. Gen. xvii. 10. The paschal lamb, the Passover; because a sign to commemorate the angel's passing over the houses of the Hebrews. Exod. xii. 11. and xiii. 9. The kine and ears of corn in Pharaoh's dream, were years of plenty and famine, i. e. they signified them. Gen. xli. 26, 27. Thus the Sabbath was the covenant of the Lord, Exod. xxxi. 13, 16; the rock which supplied the Hebrews with water was Christ, 1 Cor. x. 4; the candlesticks, churches, and stars, ministers. Rev. i. 20. Baptism is the washing away of sins, Acts xxii. 16; the bread and wine in the Lord's supper are Christ's body and blood, because they signified these things. Matt. xxvi. 27. 1 Cor. x. 16, 17. (10.) To comprehend and bring forth. Thus, to be carnally minded is death: it implies our lying under the power of spiritual death, and brings forth eternal death. Rom. viii. 6. To do to others as we wish they would do to us, is the law, and the prophets, it comprehends whatever duty to man is required by them. Matt. vii. 12. (11.) Ought to be. So marriage is honourable in all; that is, ought to be so. Heb. xiii. 4. Ministers ARE the salt of the earth; the light of the world; that is, ought to be so. Matt. v. 13, 14.

God is, WAS, and IS TO COME. He is absolutely eternal and unchangeable. Rev. i. 4, 8. God is all and is all in the eternal state; the full enjoyment of him shall render the man Christ and all his people fully happy in the highest degree: this enjoyment shall supersede the necessity and use of all outward enjoyments, and all instituted ordinances. 1 Cor. xv. 28. Christ is all and is all to his people. He is the all of their hope, confidence, esteem, and comforts: he is all in every privilege of acceptance, preservation, sanctification, and security for eternal life: he is the all in every operation of the Holy Ghost here, and in that fulness of joy at God's right hand for evermore. Col. iii. 11. Be ye as I am, for I am as ye are: have the same affection for me, as I have for you; embrace the same sentiments of justification as I now have, for I once had the same as you. Gal. iv. 12. The Romish beast was, and is NOT, and YET IS. It WAS, when the Romans had for many ages a large and flourishing empire; it WAS NOT, when the emperors ceased to be heathen, and became Christian; or when the Goths destroyed the empire: and YET IS, continues to exercise much the same power, idolatry, and cruelty, under the Pope and his agents. Rev. xvii. 11.

BEACON, a long piece of wood, erected on a rising ground or top of a hill, to give warning of the approach of an enemy; or on a place of danger, to warn passengers to avoid it. The Jews were like a beacon and ensign on a hill, when the judgments of God had rendered them few in number, and laid on them such alarming distress, as loudly warned others to avoid the like sins. Isa. xxx. 17.

BEAM, a large and strong plank of wood, such as those on which weavers roll their webs in the loom. 1 Sam. xvii. 7; or which are used to support the walls, roof, or galleries of a house. 2 Kings vi. 2. The foundations of the earth are called God's beams, because of the strength, stability, and duration he gives them. Psal. civ. 3. Christ's word, promises, and ordinances, are called the beams and rafters of his and his people's house; they support, establish, and adorn his church; and by means thereof, we have union and fellowship with him, and with one another. Sol. Song i. 17. Scandalous and heinous crimes are called beams in the eye: they greatly hurt, and, unless it be seared, terribly torment the conscience, and prevent men from seeing the light of life, or discerning good from evil. Matt. vii. 3.

BEAR; (1.) To carry. Jer. xvii. 21. 2 Chron. ii. 18. (2.) To bring forth. Gen. xviii. 13. Jam. iii. 12. Sol. Song iv. 2. (3.) To uphold. Isa. xlv. 4. Psal. lxxv. 8. (4.) To undergo the fatigue of ruling. Deut. i. 9. (5.) To endure; to suffer. 2 Cor. xi. 1. Rev. ii. 2. To bear witness, is to declare our testimony concerning a point. Deut. v. 20. To bear tribute, is quietly to pay it. 2 Kings xviii. 14. To bear the infirmities of the weak, or bear one another's burdens, is to assist them under distress, sympathize with their weakness, avoid offending them in points of indifference, refrain from condemning or despising them for their inadvertent slips. Rom. xv. 1. Gal. vi. 2. To bear sin, is to be charged with it in law, and suffer the punishment due to it. Numb. v. 31. and xiv. 34. 1 Pet. ii. 24. But children's bearing the iniquities or whoredoms of their fathers, imports their being punished on account of them. Numb. xiv. 38. Eze. xxiii. 35. The priest's, and the scape-goat's bearing the iniquities of the Israelites, imports the typical imputation of their sins to them, and their enduring labour and travail ceremonially to expiate them, as they were figures of Jesus Christ, on whom the Lord laid the iniquities of his chosen people, that he might make real and full satisfaction for them. Exod. xxviii. 38, 43. Rev. ii. 22. God's bearing and carrying his people, imports his care of them; his supporting, assisting, protecting, and comforting them, by his providence, power, and grace. Deut. vi. 11. Isa. xlv. 4.

BEAR, a four-footed beast of prey. It is a large unsightly animal; in some places about the size of a mastiff; in others as large as a small heifer. It is covered with a thick shaggy fur, so as to appear like a shapeless lump. Bears are mostly of a dark brown colour; but in cold countries some of them are found white. Their skull is thin, but firm, and contains a considerable quantity of brain; whence perhaps, they are so sagacious. Their eyes are small; their fore-teeth are six on every side, and longer than the rest. They have no tail, but a lengthened os coccygis. Their feet are so formed, that, in walking, they always tread on their heel; they have five toes on each foot; but the largest answer to the smallest in the human hands and feet. Their claws are very hooked and strong, proper for climbing. It is said, when first littered they are no bigger than mice, and are without eyes and hair. The dams go with young about thirty days, and generally bring forth five at a time. Bears feed on fruits, honey, bees, and flesh; and are very ravenous, resentful, subtle, and skilful in climbing trees; extremely kind to their young; and rage and roar dreadfully when they are taken from them. During the winter, they hide themselves, and sleep, the males about forty days, and the females about four months; at the end of which the males are exceeding fat. Bears are found in most countries where there are woods; they were common in Palestine. David attacked and slew one, as he attended his father's flock: two she-bears tore to pieces forty-two of the children of Bethel, who had mocked Elisha the prophet. 1 Sam. xvii. 34. 2 Kings ii. 23, 24.

God compares himself to a bear bereaved of her whelps, to mark his wrathful, unrelenting, and destructive judgments against his enemies. Hos. xiii. 8. Lam. iii. 10. Angry men are likened to bears robbed of their young: their reason is awakened and disturbed; they are disposed to tear the characters, property, and persons of such as they are disgusted with. 2 Sam. xvii. 8. Prov. xvii. 12. Wicked men, but chiefly tyrannic rulers, are likened to bears, because of their malice, revenge, fierceness, terrible, and murderous influence. Prov. xxviii. 15. Isa. xi. 7. Desperate grief and sorrow is likened to the roaring of bears. Isa. lix. 11. The Persian monarchy is figured as a bear raising up itself on one side, having three ribs between its teeth, and invited to devour much flesh: less active and glorious than the lion-like empire of the Chaldeans, but no less cruel and bloody, it raised up itself on the east of the Chaldeans. Invited by the providence of God, by the Hyrcanians, by Cyaxares the Mede, and Gobrias a noble Chaldean deserter, Cyrus, with no small craft, courage, labour, and bloodshed, destroyed the empire of Chaldea, and added to that conquest the wealthy and potent kingdoms of Lydia on the north, and of Egypt on the south. Dan. vii. 5. Antichrist is said to have the feet of a bear; he and his agents are qualified to climb to the highest places, by their ambition; his supporters and emissaries are active and unwearied in his service, and hold fast, and tear whatever they can seize. Rev. xiii. 2.

BEARD. In various countries the beard has been cultivated and preserved with scrupulous attention. The ancient Hebrews wore their beard on the chin, but not on the upper lip; and were divinely forbidden to cut off the angles and extremities of their beard in the manner of the heathens, Egyptians, or others who were only a tuft of hair on the chin. The modern Jews cherish a fillet of hair, all along from their ear, and the whole of it on their chin. Men's shaving their own hands and beards; or clipping or plucking the hair thereof; or neglecting to trim the hair of the beard; was expressive of great mourning and grief. Isa. xv. 3. Jer. xli. 5. and xlviii. 37. Ezra ix. 3. 2 Sam. xix. 24. To shave the whole or half of the beard of any one, was accounted the most horrid insult and contempt. 2 Sam. x. 4, 5. With the Lacedæmonians, the punishment of fugitives from the field of battle was to have their beards half shaved. With some Indians the shaving of the beard was the highest punishment. Aurengzeb the emperor of the Moguls, in the last century, terribly revenged the shaving of his ambassador's beard, on the Sophi of Persia. The Turks think themselves highly affronted, if one threatens to shave their beard.—God's shaving a people's head, beard, or the hair of their feet, imports his cutting off, in vast numbers, their principal and common men, and exposing them to the utmost ignominy, for the purging of them from their sinfulness. Isa. vii. 20.

BEAST, a living creature, devoid of rational consciousness, appointed for the service of man, and to ornament the universe. Beasts possess sagacity in very different degrees. Oysters, and some other shell-fish, have comparatively but little consciousness of pleasure or pain. Some animals have a far keener sensation than men. Horses, dogs, beavers, foxes, ants, bees, apes, especially the orangoutang, have a surprising sagacity, which approaches toward reason. It is not however, the want of speech that hinders them from reasoning, as some pretend. Parrots can be taught to speak, but not to reason, to perform operations of arithmetic, &c. In some climates, beasts, as well as men, are more dull and indocile than in others. The difference between us and these animals is, that we have immortal souls capable of religion, of knowing and enjoying God, and of being influenced by supernatural and eternal views; all their knowledge, designs, and cares, are confined to temporal happiness, the preservation of their bodies, and propagation of their species; and all die with their bodies. They have sense, imagination, passions, and memory: we have also understanding and reason. Yet, as to actual knowledge and exercise, how like to beasts have most men made themselves!

Beasts may be distinguished into cattle, fishes, fowls, creeping things, the latter including insects and animalculæ. On the fifth day of the creation, God formed out of the waters, or mingled mud, fishes and fowls. On the sixth, he formed of dust, cattle and creeping things. To begin the exercise of man's sovereignty over the creatures, God assembled the fowls and beasts of the earth, both wild and tame, to the number of perhaps about three hundred kinds, before Adam, that he might impose names on them. Gen. i. 20–24. and ii. 19, 20. Probably it was not till after the flood, that men were allowed to eat the flesh of beasts. We read of herbs and fruits assigned to Adam for his food, but no where of flesh. Gen. i. 29, 30. The grant of their flesh to Noah and his posterity, is conceived in such terms, as tempts one to think it was quite new; and even then, men were forbidden to eat them with the blood mixed with the flesh. Gen. ix. 3. Beasts which had killed a person, or had been used for unnatural purposes, were divinely appointed to death. Exod. xxi. 28. Lev. xx. 15. As beasts are the property of sinful man, they are subjected to much distress on account of his sin: the greater part of land animals perished by the flood; the cattle of Hebrew cities which apostatized to idolatry, as well as of the Amalekites, were to be entirely cut off: and in innumerable instances, God threatens and afflicts beasts, as well as men. Gen. vi. 17. and vii. 21. Deut. xiii. 15. 1 Sam. xv. 3. Ezek. xiv. 13–21. Zeph. i. 5. Hos. iv. 3. How far the sufferings of the innocent animals may be balanced, when at last the creature shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, we know not. Rom. viii. 20–22. God entered into a covenant with Noah, extending to the beasts of the field, that a general flood should no more destroy them. Gen. ix. 10. He enjoins, that they partake of the rest of his Sabbath. Exod. xx. 10. and xxiii. 12. He warns against every semblance of cruelty to them. Exod. xxiii. 5, 19. Deut. xxii. 6, 7. Prov. xii. 10. Partly from regard to the cattle, he spared Nineveh. Jonah iv. 11. As sometimes he made beasts his instruments to punish guilty nations, the Egyptians, Israelites, and others; so he makes a covenant of peace with them in behalf of his people. Exod. viii. and x. Ezek. xiv. and xxxiv. 25. Hos. ii. 18. No beasts speak naturally. It was Satan in the serpent that spoke to Eve. It was by a miracle that Balaam's ass rebuked his master. Gen. iii. 2–14. Numb. xxii. 28–30. The ancient Egyptians and others, it seems, imagined beasts superior to men, and therefore worshipped not a few; and many animals are still worshipped in Africa, &c. The doctrine of human souls departed, entering into beasts, was common through all the east; nor were the Jews in the days of our Saviour free of it. An article in the French Encyclopædia pretends to prove, that beasts are inhabited by devils, who render them mischievous.

Under the law, beasts were classed into three divisions. (1.) Some were most pure. These were such as were most profitable to men, easy to be obtained, fit to represent our Redeemer, and so allowed to be sacrificed: they were oxen, sheep, goats, turtles, pigeons: none were allowed to eat the fat of any of these, even though they were not sacrificed. And these perhaps were all that were reckoned clean at Noah's entrance into the ark. Lev. i; xxii. 18, 19. and xxvii. 8. Gen. vii. 8. and viii. 20. (2.) Some were simply clean, and might be eaten as common food, but not sacrificed. This kind included a variety of such four footed beasts, as both chewed the cud and divided the hoof; a variety of fowls, and all fishes that had fins and scales; together with four sorts of the locust kind of insects; but if any of these died of their own accord, or had been torn, and so perhaps touched by an unclean beast, they became unclean. Lev. xi. 3, 9, 22. Deut. xiv. 4-6, 9, 20. Exod. xxii. 31. (3.) The rest of the animals were unclean, particularly such as were ravenous, unsocial, nightly, &c.; as the eagle, ossifrage, osprey, vulture, kite, raven, owl, night-hawk, cuckow, cormorant, swan, pelican, stork, heron, lapwing, and bat. And among creeping things, the weasel, mouse, tortoise, ferret, chameleon, lizard, snail, and mole. Lev. xi. Deut. xiv. Were not the animals of the first class, chiefly figures of Jesus, our meek, ready, and all-profitable Redeemer and sacrifice? Were not those of the second, emblems of the saints, who live on wholesome food, meditate on God's word, strive to render every one his due, are children of the light, and have fellowship with Christ and his people; and covered with his righteousness, do by faith and love swim against the tides of corruption? Were not those of the third class, emblems of wicked men, heathens, superstitious, covetous, cruel, self-seekers, sensual, not having the Spirit? Thus by God's fixing the point of the uncleanness of animals, he at once dissuaded the Hebrews from the idolatry of Egypt; restrained them from hurtful food; marked them out his peculiar people; signified their duty to avoid wicked persons and courses, similar to the bad qualities of the prohibited animals. Acts x. 12, and xi. 6. We have but a very imperfect knowledge of the Hebrew names of many animals mentioned in Scripture, though, no doubt, the ancient Jews understood them: and from what we know, the wisdom of Adam, in naming them so agreeable to their nature, plainly appears. No commentator has handled this point with such sagacity and learning as the great Bochart, in his Hierozyicon; yet it would not be safe to receive implicitly all his explanations. Beasts of the earth sometimes denote ravenous beasts. Jer. xv. 3. Wild beasts of the desert and island, or Tzim or Iyim, are wild cats, and a kind of wolves that make a terrible howling. Isa. xlii. 21, 22. Jer. i. 39.

Ministers are called beasts, Rev. iv. v. and vi; but the word ought every where to be rendered living creatures, as in Ezek. i. Saints call themselves beasts, because of their sinful vileness, ignorance, stupidity, unruliness, and carnality. Prov. xxx. 3. Psal. lxxiii. 22. Men in general are called beasts, for their carnality, earthliness, ignorance, unteachableness, contention, hurtfulness to one another. Eccl. iii. 18. The mildest animals, as oxen, cows, calves, sheep, lambs, doves, are emblems of the saints; while lions, bears, wolves, and serpents, are made emblems of the outrageously wicked. Isa. xi. 6, 7, 8. The most powerful animals, as eagles, lions, bullocks, he-goats, rams, leviathan, &c. are made emblems of kings and others, powerful and wealthy. The subjects of the kings of Assyria, Chaldea, and Egypt, are represented as beasts lodged un- der the shadow of their protection, as animals under a tree. Ezek. xxxi. 6. Dan. iv. 14. Wicked men are called beasts, for their unreasonableness, earthly-mindedness, neglect of eternal things, and rage against God and his people. 1 Cor. xv. 32. 2 Pet. ii. 12. The gentiles, and others, are called beasts of the field, because of their distance from God; their want of fellowship with his people; and their bloody, malicious, and murderous principles. Isa. xliii. 20. The Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, Roman, and Antichristian empires, are likened to beasts; because by methods carnal, cruel, and unjust, they were erected and maintained. Dan. vii. 11. and viii. 4. Rev. xii. xiii. and xvii. The two beasts which represent Antichrist may represent, the one his civil, and the other his ecclesiastical power; or the one his papal, and the other his monastical powers. Rev. xiii. 1, 11. The scarlet-coloured beast, that carries the Romish Antichrist, is the bloody empire of Rome, parted among persecuting princes enslaved to Popery. Rev. xvii. 3. The beasts that devour Antichrist's slaughtered troops, are not only those literally so called, but the Protestants who seize on their spoil. Rev. xix. 17-23. The Hebrews' passage through the Red sea and wilderness, is likened to a beast going down into, or along a valley: it was easy and safe, under the protecting presence of God. Isa. lxiii. 14.

BEAT; (1.) To smite; strike. Deut. xxv. 3. (2.) To bruise; bray. Num. xi. 8. (3.) To thresh. Ruth ii. 17. Isa. xxviii. 27. (4.) To change; turn one thing into another. Isa. ii. 4. Joel iii. 10. (5.) To overcome in battle. 2 Kings xiii. 25. (6.) To batter; demolish. Judg. viii. 17.

BEAUTY; (1.) COMELINESS; fineness of appearance. 2 Sam. xiv. 25. In Dan. x. 8. it may signify vigour, strength. (2.) A chief person or city, which is comely, and confers an air of glory upon its fellows: so Saul and Jonathan were the beauty of Israel; Babylon the beauty of the Chaldeans; Jerusalem and the temple the beauty of Israel. 2 Sam. i. 19. Isa. xlii. 19. Lam. ii. 1. (3.) Splendour; dignity. Lam. i. 6. The beauty of the Lord, is the shining forth of his excellencies in Christ, and in his word and works. Psal. xxvii. 4. (4.) Comfort and joy. Isa. lxi. 3. God is called the beauty of holiness; his holiness and moral purity infinitely surpass those of angels and men, and are the bright ornaments of his nature. 2 Chron. xx. 21. The beauty of the Lord is on his people, when he displays his glory, grants them his presence honours them with favour, imputes Christ's righteousness to them, and renders them holy in heart and life. Psal. xc. 17. To worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness, is to worship him in Christ his holy One, and in whom his purity is fully displayed; in the beautiful and sacred temple or ordinances; and in the exercise of holiness in heart and life. 1 Chron. xvi. 29. Psal. xxix. 2. and xcvi. 9. and cx. 3. The perfect beauty of the Hebrew state, was their excellent order of government; their peace, prosperity, and wealth; with the truth, holiness, and benevolent tendency of their religion. Ezek. xvi. 14. Zech. xi. 7. The beauty of God's ornament set in majesty was the magnificent temple of Jerusalem. Ezek. vii. 20. Isa. lxi. 11. Jer. vi. 12. Psal. xlviii. 2. and 1. 2. Lam. ii. 1. The glorious beauty on the head of the fat valleys, was the fruitful crops, the wealth and prosperity of the ten tribes, chiefly of Samaria, which stood on a hill adjacent to fat valleys. Isa. xxviii. 4.

BEAUTIFUL, having much comeliness. Gen. xxix. 17. Christ, the Branch of the Lord, is beautiful and glorious. In his person, office, and work, gloriously shine forth, to his people's wonder and satisfaction, all the glorious excellencies of God. Isa. iv. 2. The saints are a beautiful flock: beautiful as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem: they are adorned with the Saviour's righteousness and grace, and with a holy conversation; and the church is adorned with divine ordinances, influences, and holy persons. Jer. xiii. 20. Sol. Song i. 5. and vi. 4. The beautiful garments of the church, and God's comeliness put on her, are the glory, wealth, comfort, and ordinances he bestowed on the Jews; the ordinances he gives his church in every age; and his saints' imputed righteousness, imparted grace, holy conversation, and spiritual comfort. Isa. lli. 1. Ezek. xvi. 14. The feet of the church are beautiful with shoes, when ministers, with great zeal and purity, faithfully preach the gospel, and spread abroad the knowledge of Christ; and when church members have their affections and conversation well ordered, and powerfully influenced by gospel principles and motives. Sol. Song vii. 1. The feet of ministers are beautiful: their labour and diligence in publishing salvation to men through Jesus Christ, are very agreeable and comely; their message ought to be much more acceptable than the news of the Assyrian ruin, and of the deliverance from Babylon, were to the ancient Jews. Neh. i. 15. Isa. lii. 7. Rom. x. 15.

BEAUTIFY; to render comely. God beautifies the meek with salvation, when he clothes them with the righteousness, grace, and glorious redemption, privileges, honours, and comforts of his Son; thus rendering them comely before God, angels, and men. Psal. cxlix. 4.

BECKON; to give a sign with the hand. Lake i. 22.

BECOME, (1.) To be made; to grow. Gen. iii. 22. (2.) To suit; agree with. Psal. xciii. 5. Phil. i. 27. 1 Tim. ii. 10.

BED, (1.) A place to sleep or rest on. 2 Sam. iv. 5. (2.) A small piece of ground raised for flowers or plants. Sol. Song vi. 2. The bed undefiled, is the lawful use of the marriage state. Heb. xiii. 4. The bed too short to stretch one's self on, and the covering too narrow to wrap one's self in, are the Jews' carnal schemes of alliance with the Egyptians, and the like which could procure them no solid rest, no complete safety; and the carnal and self-righteous methods which sinners use to obtain happiness, which yield no real comfort, ease, or safety to their souls. Isa. xxviii. 20. Sore distress is called a bed; therein men are confined amidst disquiet and uneasiness, and rendered inactive. Rev. ii. 22. The grave, chiefly of the righteous, is called a bed; there their bodies continue at ease, and insensibly pass the time. Isa. lvii. 2. The saints' affliction, or rather their frames of spiritual sloth and security, are their bed. How inactive and useless are they in this case! how void of vigorous concern! how oft their mind filled with unsubstantial fancies! Sol. Song iii. 1. Christ's bed, wherein he refreshes his people, and renders them vigorous and fruitful in good works, is his church, his word, his covenant, his ordinances, and special fellowship with him:—it is green, comely, refreshing, and ever productive of saints, saving influences, good works, and glorious rewards. The threescore valiant men about it, are divine perfections, ministering angels, and faithful church-rulers. Sol. Song i. 16. and iii. 7, 8. Christ's cheeks, his word wherein his beauty is seen, his displays of his presence, his humbled state, are as a bed of spices; there we see every delightful, un-wasting, and soul-refreshing, and perfuming grace beautifully connected. Sol. Song v. 13. Christ's church and people are as a bed of spices. In the church, what blessed variety of delightful ordinances and saints! In every saint, what variety of delightful graces and what pleasure Jesus takes in them all! Sol. Song ii. 6. As in the east persons sat or lay on beds at their feasts, the Jews lying on beds of ivory, and stretching themselves on couches, imported luxury and carnal ease. Amos vi. 4. Their enlarging of their bed, signifies their increase of their spiritual whoredom or idolatry, and their sinful leagues with the nations around. Isa. lvii. 8.

BED'AN, a deliverer or judge of the Hebrews; but who he was is not agreed. Some suppose him the same with Barak; others that he was Samson, who was Ben-dan, a son of Dan. Perhaps he was rather Jair, and called Bedan, after his ancestor, the great-grandson of MACHIR.

BEE, a small insect bred from a worm, and very remarkable for skill and industry in gathering honey and wax from flowers. Bees have four wings; their tail is pointed with a sting, through which they emit a poisonous juice; and which being hooked, is oft left in the wound. There are eight or nine kinds of wild bees that lodge in woods and fields; but the common bee has most attracted the attention of man. Their sagacity in collecting and conveying their honey and wax, in forming their combs, in distributing their labours, in punishing the idlers, and in following the directing bias of their leaders, are quite astonishing. They seldom inflict injury with their stings till they are provoked. Among these common bees are observable, (1.) The queen mother, who is somewhat longer and redder than the rest. She deposits eggs into the combs, and so brings forth a new swarm, perhaps to the number of ten or twenty thousand in a year. Rarely more than one queen bee is found in a hive. (2.) The drones, which lurk about the combs, doing little or nothing, and often suffer death as the reward of their laziness. (3.) The labouring bees, which collect the wax and honey, and rear the combs; and which are by far the most numerous. Assyria, Canaan, &c. were exceedingly noted for multitudes of bees. These animals were legally unclean, though their honey was not. Lev. xi. 23.

The armies of the Amorites, Assyrians, and David's enemies are likened to bees. How vast their numbers! how readily they followed the hiss, the call of Divine Providence! how hastily they marched and how grievously they distressed the objects of their hatred! Deut. i. 44. Isa. vii. 18. Psal. cxviii. 12. Might not the swarm of bees, which, contrary to nature, took up their residence in the carcase of Samson's slain lion, figure out the saints' resting in and feeding on their Redeemer's bloody victory over Satan, that roaring lion? Judg. xiv. 8.

BE'ER, a city twelve miles northward of Jerusalem, on the way to Shechem. Here Jotham the son of Gideon concealed himself from ABIMELECH. Judg. ix. 21.

BE'ER, or BE'ER-ELIM, a place in the country of Moab. As the name signifies the well of the princes, it was probably hereabouts that the Hebrew princes digged the well to supply their thirsty tribes; and here the howling of the distressed Moabites was heard during the Assyrian invasion. Numb. xxi. 18. Isa. xv. 8.

BE'ER-LA-HAI-ROI, the well of him that liveth and seeth me; a well between Kadesh and Shur, south of Canaan; so called by HAGAR, because there the living God appeared to, and provided for, her and her son. Gen. xvi. 13.

BE-EROTH. (1.) A city of the Gibeonites, given to the tribe of Benjamin, and where the two murderers of Ish-bosheth were born. Josh. ix. 17. 2 Sam. iv. 2. The inhabitants of this place, or of some place near Abel-beth-maacah, are called Beerites. 2 Sam. xx. 14. (2.) BE-EROTH of the children of Jaakan, or Be-nejaakan, or the wells of the children of Jaakan, the twenty-eighth encampment of the Hebrews in the Arabian desert, a little to the northward of Ezion-geber. It seems they marched from Mosera, or Moseroth, to this place, and then again southward to Mosera. Numb. xxxiii. 31, 32. Deut. x. 6.

BE-ER-SHE-BA, the well of the oath, or of seven; a place so called, because here Abraham swore a covenant with Abimelech king of Gerar, and gave seven ewe-lambs as a ratification thereof. In the adjacent wilderness of Arabia, Hagar wandered. Gen. xxi. 14. At Beersheba, Abraham planted a grove for his private devotions; here, he and the patriarchs Isaac and Jacob dwelt. From hence Jacob took his journey into Egypt. Gen. xxi. 14—33. xxii. 19. xxviii. 10. and xlv. 1. Here a city was afterwards built, which fell to the lot of the Simeonites. Josh. xix. 2. It stood about twenty miles south-west from Hebron, and forty-two miles from Jerusalem; and was on the southern border of the Israelites, as Dan was on the northern. Between the two were computed one hundred and fifty-six or one hundred and sixty Roman miles. 2 Sam. xvii. 11. and xxiv. 2. 1 Kings iv. 25. Judg. xx. 1.

BEETLE, a kind of insect extremely numerous and distinguishable into more than twenty different sorts: but as common beetles are not eatable, and have not legs to leap with, the Hebrew word CHARGOL, which denotes an eatable animal, must either denote a kind of locust, or cockchafer; which, as they are great devourers of provision, are not unwholesome food. Lev. xi. 22.

BEEVES; oxen, cows. Num. xxxi. 28.

BEFORE; (1.) In sight of. Gen. xliii. 14. (2.) Free to one's view and choice. Gen. xx. 15. (3.) Rather than. 2 Sam. vi. 21. (4.) At. Rev. iii. 9. (5.) Without commission from. John x. 8. (6.) Sooner than; first, in order of time, place, dignity. Isa. xliii. 13. Josh. viii. 10. John i. 15, 37. (7.) On the east side, as that was before him, who looked to the rising sun, and the west was behind. Isa. ix. 12. To be before God, is to enjoy his favour, and the smiles of his providence. Psal. xxxi. 22. To come before him, is to come to his temple and ordinances, to worship him, and have familiar fellowship with him. Psal. c. 2; lxxv. 4. and xlii. 2. To walk before him, is to behave as under his eye; depending on his strength; and aiming at his glory, as our chief end. Gen. xvii. 1. To sin before him, is to do it in his view, and with a bold and open contempt of him. Gen. xliii. 13. Isa. iii. 9. To have other gods before him, is to have them in his sight, and in opposition to him. Exod. xx. 3. To set the Lord before us, is to make him the object of our trust, the pattern of our conduct; to regard his glory, and consider him as our witness and judge in all we do. Psal. xvi. 8.

BEFOREHAND; before the time come. Mark xiii. 11. Some men's sins and good works are open and manifest beforehand, before they have opportunity of entrance into office in the church, and so it is easy to know whether to choose or refuse them; and some men's sins, or good works follow after, are not known till they be in office. 1 Tim. v. 24, 25. Before time, in former times. Josh. x. 5.

BEG; to ask alms, or free favours. David, in his time, never saw the children of any godly man begging for want; and, had the divine laws been observed, it is likely few or no Hebrews had ever been beggars. Psal. xxxvii. 25. Dent. xv. 4, 7. But their disobedience introduced poverty; and many, particularly in the time of Christ, were beggars. A little before his death, he cured three near Jericho. Matt. xx. 30—34. Luke xviii. 35—43. He had before cured one at the pool of Bethesda. John v. 1—13. Peter and John cured a lame one at the gate of the temple. Acts iii.

BEGET; (1.) To bring into existence, or form from animal seed; thus fathers beget their children. Gen. v. 3. Matt. i. (2.) To produce: so God begets the rain and dew. Job xxxviii. 28. God the Father beget his divine Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, by an eternal, necessary, and natural generation, which imports no production of essence or personality, no posteriority, inferiority, or dependence in the Son: but the manner hereof is conceivable only to infinite wisdom, and it is presumptuous in any to pretend to investigate or explain it. Psal. ii. 7. God begets us spiritually, when he effectually introduces the seed of his word to our heart, and thereby forms spiritual life, gracious qualities, principles, or habits, and dispositions, in our nature. 1 Pet. i. 3, 23. Ministers spiritually beget others, when, by earnest prayer, serious preaching, and other endeavours, they become means of their spiritual regeneration, and change of heart. 1 Cor. iv. 15. Gal. iv. 19.

BEGIN; (1.) To be at the first. Luke xxi. 28. (2.) To give first rise to. Neh. xi. 17.

BEGINNING, denotes, (1.) The first part of time in general. Gen. i. 1. (2.) The first part of a particular period; as of the year; of the duration of the state or kingdom of the Hebrews. Exod. xii. 2. Isa. i. 26. (3.) The first actor, or the cause of a thing. Num. x. 10. Micah i. 13. (4.) That which is most excellent. Prov. i. 7. and ix. 10. From the beginning, is, (1.) From eternity, before any creature was made. 2 Thess. ii. 13. Prov. viii. 23. (2.) From the very first part of time. 1 John iii. 8. (3.) From the beginning of a particular period; as of Christ's public ministry. John viii. 25. Christ is called the beginning, and the beginning of the creation of God, he is from eternity, and gave being to time and every creature. Rev. i. 8. and iii. 14. Col. i. 18.

BEHALF. To do or speak in one's behalf, is to do it for his honour or advantage. Exod. xxvii. 21. Or upon one's account; for his sake. Phil. i. 29.

BEHAVE; to carry or conduct one's-self, and order actions. Psal. ci. 2. Men's behaviour, is either holy, just, wise, blameless; or strange, proud, uncomely, unseemly; valiant, &c. 1 Thess. ii. 10. 1 Cor. vii. 36.

BEHEAD; to cut off the head. Matt. xiv. 10. It is put for the suffering of death in general. Rev. xx. 4.

BEHE-MOTH, one of the most noted four-footed beasts. To convince Job of his insignificance before him, God requires him to consider this animal. He represents it as made together with him, or near to his abode; as harmlessly feeding on the grass of mountains, lying among lotus trees, willows, reeds, and fens; as extremely fierce and courageous, indifferent though a river should burst forth upon him; as having a tail or trunk strong as a cedar tree, or able to rend one; as having his strength in his loins, and in the warped sinews of his belly; as having the sinews of his thighs or stones wrapped together; as having bones strong as bars of iron, and pipes of brass. Job xl. 15—24. It seems agreed, that this animal is either the elephant or the river-horse.

At full growth, an ELEPHANT is from seventeen to twenty feet high, with a belly reaching almost to the ground. Its head is large, and of an oval figure, growing smaller towards the mouth. It has no fore-teeth, but its two upper tusks are very long, and form our ivory: the two often weigh between three and four hundred pounds. In each jaw it has four grinders, of the same surprising size and structure, each composed as of several teeth joined together. Its eyes are small in proportion, but its ears are large, and full of membranes. Its nose, trunk, or proboscis, will extend from one to five feet, or more: with this, which consists of firm flesh, with three orders of fibres, it fetches its food to its mouth, and violently tosses whatever it regards as an enemy. It has two paps on its breast. Its legs are very thick, and each foot has five toes, but so joined, and covered with a common skin, that their distinction is scarce discernable, except towards the end, where they are pointed with claws or nails. Its tail is short and small. Its whole body is covered with a warted skin, exceedingly strong and thick, of a mouse colour, with a few long and stiff hairs growing at equal distances. The longevity, strength, sagacity, docility, fidelity, prudence, agility, and even modesty of this animal, are highly extolled. It is very gentle and harmless while unprovoked; but if provoked it tears with its teeth and tosses with its trunk, and even overturns trees, houses, and walls; and one blow of it will kill a horse. When elephants fight with each other, they push with their teeth, as bulls do with their horns. Anciently they were commonly used in war; and it is said, towers of wood, containing above thirty warriors, were built on their backs; but we doubt if above four or five could fight from them. This animal now breeds in Asia and Africa; but perhaps it was anciently a native of Russia in Europe. Wild elephants are caught by terrifying them with fire and noise; while running away, they fall into deep ditches, covered with hurdles and a little earth; or are allured by means of a female elephant, and barricaded in some narrow place.

The river-horse, or HIPPOTAMUS, is another singular four-footed beast, resembling partly the buffalo, or wild bull, and partly the bear. It is larger than the buffalo. Its length from head to tail is about thirteen feet; its circumference about the waist as much; its thickness four feet and a half. As it is usually very fat, its belly is flattish. Its head is very large in proportion; its mouth can open to the width of a foot; its eyes are small; its ears small and thin; its upper jaws are moveable; in the lower jaw it has two tusks about a foot long, and somewhat crooked; it has four grinders on each side of its mouth; its teeth are hard as flint, and will give fire with steel. Its legs resemble those of a bear, are about three feet round, and three feet and a half in length; each foot has a black hoof divided into four claws at the end. Its tail is very thick and short, tapering away to the end, and cannot be twisted. Its skin is black, hard, and tough, and without hair, except whiskers at the nose. This animal is found about the rivers Nile, Niger, and others, in Africa, &c. As it is not formed for swimming, it walks in the bottom of the river, and comes thence to feed on rice, herbs, and roots, of the adjacent shores and hills; and often lies among the reeds and bushes on the banks. The sea-horse of Russia and Greenland, which leaves the sea, and feeds on the adjacent mountains, seems to be a kind of river-horse.

BEHIND; (1.) After; at one's back. 2 Sam. iii. 16. (2.) Backward. Judg. xx. 40. (3.) Inferior to. 2 Cor. xi. 5. (4.) Done or attained already. Phil. iii. 13. (5.) Remaining to be undergone, or done. Col. i. 24. (6.) Out of one's notice or charge. Neh. ix. 26. Isa. xxxviii. 17. (7.) Near to; on the other side of. Isa. xxx. 21. Sol. Song ii. 9. (8.) On the west side. Isa. ix. 12.

BEHOLD, imports excitement; attention; wonder; joy; certainty; or suddenness. Isa. vii. 14. John i. 29. Matt. xxi. 5

Rev. xvi. 15. Luke xxiv. 39. To behold is, (1.) To look on; to see. Gen. xxxi. 51. (2.) To consider; know; care for. Lam. i. 12. John xix. 5, 26, 27. God beheld not iniquity in Jacob, nor perverseness in Israel: though his omniscient eye discerns sin in his people on earth, he observes it not as an angry judge, wrathfully to punish them for it. But the word may be rendered, he has not beheld injury against Jacob, nor vexation against Israel: that is, he will not suffer them to be hurt. Numb. xxiii. 21. To behold Christ, is, with wonder and attention, to know believe in, and receive him. Isa. lxx. 1.

BEHOVE; to be necessary, just, and becoming. As it became God, for the honour of his nature, counsels, word, and work, to expose Christ to suffering; so it behoved Christ to suffer and be in all things like unto his brethren of mankind, that he might display his Father's perfections, fulfil his purposes, promises, and types, destroy the works of the devil, and sympathize with, and save us. Heb. ii. 10, 17.

BEKAH, half a SHEKEL. Exod. xxxviii. 26.

BEL, the Chaldean idol Baal. Whether, under this name, they worshipped Nimrod, their first Baal or lord, or Pul king of Assyria, or some other monarch, the sun, or all in one, we know not. When Cyrus and Darius took Babylon, this idol and his monstrous image was cast down, and brought into absolute contempt. Isa. xli. 1. Jer. i. 2. and ii. 44.

BELIAL, a name given to Satan, representing him without yoke, profit, or ascent. To mark persons most worthless, wicked, and unruly; or things most horrid and abominable, they were called children, men, or things of Belial. 2 Cor. vi. 14. 2 Sam. xx. 1.; xxii. 6. and xxiii. 1 Sam. ii. 12.; xxv. 17.; xxx. 22. and i. 16. Deut. xiii. 13.

BELIEVE; (1.) To be persuaded of, and give credit to a report. Gen. xlv. 26. (2.) To give a bare assent to gospel-truth, at least such an assent as implies no reception of Christ into the heart. Acts viii. 13. (3.) To receive and rest upon Jesus Christ alone for salvation, as offered by God to us in the gospel. John iii. 15, 16. Acts xvi. 31. It is this that unites us with Christ, and actually interests us in his finished righteousness and full salvation; and for thus acting are the saints called BELIEVERS. 1 Tim. v. 12, 14. To depend on God for the fulfilment of some particular promise and grant of deliverance. Psal. xxviii. 13. 2 Chr. xx. 20. (5.) Sometimes it denotes a firm persuasion, whether grounded on report, or other certain evidence. Jam. ii. 19. — If he had answered my voice, yet would I not believe; while such trouble continues on me, I could never be persuaded that he regarded me or my prayers. Job ix. 16.

BELCH. They belch out with their mouth; they with great vehemence utter reviling, malicious, and wicked words, as a fountain bubbleth up its water. Psal. lix. 7.

BELL. The lower border of the high PRIEST'S blue robe was hung round alternately with bells and pomegranates. The sound of these informed the Jews of his passing by, and of his living in the sanctuary, and was a kind of typical intercession with God for his preservation; but he had not on this robe when he entered the holy of holies. Might not these bells signify the intercession and gospel administration of our Redeemer, which are connected with and dependent on his robe of righteousness, and by their powerful and pleasant sound manifest his continuance in life, and his state of high favour with God? Exod. xxviii. 33—35. Bells were anciently hung to the necks of horses. The horse bells, being inscribed, Holiness to the Lord, may import, that in the apostolic or millennial period, men in trading and warring with horses did, or shall, eye the glory of God, and study holiness in all manner of conversation, or devote their horses to his service. Zech. xiv. 20.

BELLOW; to cry and make a threatening noise as bulls; but the word rather signifies, to neigh as horses for wantonness. Jer. i. 11.

BELLOWS, a well known wind instrument for the blowing of fires in iron-works, smiths' forges, &c. The bellows are burnt; the lead is consumed of the fire; the founder melteth in vain: the lungs and labour of the prophets, and the judgments of God, are, as it were, wasted to no purpose, as wickedness and wicked persons are not purged away from church or state. Jer. vi. 29.

BELLY. (1.) That part of animal bodies which contains the entrails; or the entrails themselves. Matt. xv. 17. Rev. x. 9, 10. (2.) The womb. Jer. i. 5. (3.) The heart or soul, which is deep, hidden, and hard to be searched. Prov. xviii. 8. xx. 30. and xxii. 18. Mens' bellies prepare deceit, when their hearts devise how to speak or act it. Job xiii. 35. Christ's belly, or bowels, as bright ivory overlaid with sapphires, are his pure, constant, and durable compassion and sympathy. Sol. Song v. 14. The church's belly, as a heap of wheat set about with lilies, is her divine ordinances, whereby vast numbers are begotten to God, and nourished till their glorious birth at death or the last day. Sol. Song vii. 2. The brazen belly and thighs of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary image, signified the firmly erected and bulky empire of the brass-armed Greeks, under Alexander, quickly filled with disorder, and after several contentions formed into the two powerful kingdoms of Egypt on the south, and Syria on the north. Dan. ii. 32. and xi. The belly which multitudes serve and make their god, is carnal lusts, and sensual pleasures, which render them beastly, and daily crave new satisfaction. Rom. xvi. 18. Phil. iii. 19. The inhabitants of Crete are called slow bellies, for their gluttony, drunkenness, sloth, and idleness. Tit. i. 12. Jonah calls the belly of the whale, the belly of hell; because of his great darkness, perplexity and disquiet of mind therein. John ii. 2.

BELONG. A person or thing is said to belong to one, when he is the cause, author, proprietor, dispenser, or end thereof. Gen. xi. 8 Lev. xxvii. 24. Dan. ix. 9. Luke xix. 42.

BELoved; much valued, desired, and delighted in. Deut. xxi. 15. Christ is the beloved of God; God infinitely esteems, loves, and delights in him, as his Son, and media- torial servant. Matt. iii. 17. He is the beloved of saints; is highly esteemed, desired, praised, and delighted in, with their whole heart, mind, and strength. Sol. Song iv. 16. Saints are the beloved of God and Christ; and the church a beloved city. In infinite love to them, God devised their salvation; Jesus laid down his life, and intercedes for them; and all the divine Persons concur to save and delight in them. Sol. Song v. 1. Rev. xx. 9.

BELIE; to give one the lie. To belie the Lord, is falsely to ascribe our prosperity or distress to some other principal cause rather than God. Jer. v. 12. Prov. xxx. 9.

BEL-SHAZZAR, NABONEDUS, or LABYRINTUS, the son of Evil-merodach and Nitocris, and the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, and king of Babylon. He was a most worthless and inactive wretch; but his mother exerted herself exceedingly for the support of the kingdom. About the seventeenth year of his reign, A. M. 3466, and just when Cyrus the noted conqueror laid siege to his capital, Belshazzar, probably on a festival sacred to the idol Sheshach, made a splendid feast for a thousand of his lords. Heated with wine, he ordered the sacred vessels, taken from the temple of God at Jerusalem, to be brought; in these, he, his wives, concubines, and lords, drank in an intemperate and idolatrous manner; singing songs in honour of their idols. An angel's forming the appearance of a hand, and writing the king's condemnation on the wall, checked their mirth, and filled them with terror. Belshazzar was struck into such a panic, that the joints of his thighs were loosed, and he trembled exceedingly. None present could either read or explain the writing. The magicians, astrologers, and others famed for wisdom, were called; and a scarlet suit of apparel, a golden chain for his neck, and the office of third ruler in the kingdom, was the reward promised to him who should read and interpret it. Ignorant of the characters, or struck with a panic, none of them could pretend to read or interpret the writing. The sagacious Nitocris, hearing of the perplexity of her son and his courtiers, desired that Daniel, who, it seems, had been long a stranger to the court, should be sent for: who, she hoped, would read and interpret it. He was immediately brought, and the reward offered him, which he modestly refused. After a faithful reproof of the king for his idolatry; and ungrateful abuse of the sacred vessels of the Jewish temple, he read the writing, which was Mene, Tekel, Upharsin. MENE, said he to the king, imports that God has numbered the days of thy royalty, and is just finishing it: TEKEL, thou art weighed in the balances of God's purpose and law, and art found wanting in goodness, and suddenly to be cut off: PHARES, thy kingdom is divided, wrested from thee, and given to the Medes and Persians. Daniel immediately received the promised reward; and it seems the king and his courtiers returned to their cups. Cyrus, the general of the Persian troops, and his uncle, Darius the Mede, had already besieged Babylon two years without success. During this feast, he diverted the Euphrates from its channel; and that very night marched his troops along the channel; the brazen gates on the river being left open by the drunken Chaldeans, they entered, and filled the city with terrible bloodshed and confusion. Gobrias and Gadatas, two Babylonian deserters, with some choice Persian warriors, rushed into the palace, killed the guards, plunged their swords into the bowels of king Belshazzar and his nobles, whilst they were scarcely awaked from their sleep and drunkenness. It seems the king's corpse had not so much as a decent burial.

Christian historians sufficiently agree that by the Persians, Medes, and Armenians, Babylon was taken, and the empire translated to the Medes, and thence to the Persians. All agree, that after Belshazzar no Chaldean reigned at Babylon; but, as Herodotus relates the affair so differently from scripture, they are not agreed that Belshazzar was Nabonedus, or whether he was Nebuchadnezzar's grandson. Scaliger will have him to be the infant Laboroschard, the son of Nergiliassar by Nebuchadnezzar's daughter. Marsham asserts him to have been Evil-merodach. But it is certain, that God promised the service of the nations to Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and son's son. It is plain, therefore, Belshazzar could not be Evil-merodach, who was but the son of Nebuchadnezzar. Nor could he be Laboroschard, who was but Nebuchadnezzar's daughter's son, and besides, reigned but a few months, and died an infant; whereas Belshazzar reigned several years, and had wives and concubines. Jer. i. and li. Isa. xiii. and xiv. Dan. v. and viii. 1.

BEMOAN; to mourn over. Jer. xv. 5.

BEN-AIAH, the son of Jehoiada, was one of David's valiant men, and captain of his guards. He killed the two famed Ariels of Moab. He slew a lion that had fallen into a pit in the time of snow. Without staff he attacked an Egyptian champion armed with a spear, plucked his spear out of his hand, and slew him therewith. Having adhered to Solomon against Adonijah, and assisted at his coronation, he was made general instead of Joab; and by Solomon's orders put Joab and Adonijah to death. 2 Sam. xxiii. 20. 1 Kings i. and ii.

BENCHES, seats in ships for the rowers. The Tyrians had some of ivory. Ezek. xxvii. 6.

BEND; to bow; to yield, or stoop. To bend a bow, is to bow it by drawing the string, that the arrow may fly off with great force. Jer. i. 14. God's bending Judah for himself, and filling the bow with Ephraim, is his enabling them to defeat the Syroegrecian forces in the time of the Maccabees. Zeck. ix. 13. The vine, the royal family of Judah, bent her roots towards the king of Egypt, when king Zedekiah entered into a covenant with, and depended on him for assistance against the king of Babylon. Ezek. xvii. 7. The gentiles come bending to the church, when, in the apostolic or after ages, they join themselves as members, with great readiness, affection, and humility. Isa. ix. 14. To be bent to backsliding, is to be earnestly set upon it. Hos. xi. 7.

BENEATH, under, or lower than some other thing: so earth is below the heavens in respect of place; slaves and servants are beneath their masters in power and dignity. Isa. li. 6. Deut. xxviii. 13. Men, especially if wicked, are from beneath: they are sprung from the earth, their bodies live on it; their affections sadly cleave to it; and they are children of hell. John viii. 23.

BENEFACTORS, such as do much good to others. Rulers, as Ptolemy Evergetes king of Egypt, are often so called, when they scarcely deserve the name; but their office requires them to be such. Luke xxii. 25.

BENEFIT. (1.) The gifts and favours of God. 2 Chron. xxxii. 25. (2.) The favours and useful deeds of men one to another. 2 Cor. i. 15. Philem. 14. Salvation from sin and misery, to holiness and happiness, is called the benefit; it is the greatest display of God's favour to us, and comprehends all kindness. 1 Tim. vi. 2. To benefit, is to do good to one. Jer. xviii. 10.

BENEVOLENCE, kind affection; the sober use of the marriage-bed. 1 Cor. vii. 3.

BEN'HA-DAD, the son of Tabrimon, and king of Syria. Instigated by Asa's presents, he broke his league with BAASHA king of Israel, and ravaged the northern parts of his kingdom. In the reign of Omri, or Ahab, he made streets, market-places, or rather citadels, for himself in Samaria. 1 Kings xv. 18. and xx. 34.

2. BEN'HA-DAD, the son and successor of the former, was a still more terrible scourge to the kingdom of Israel. In the reign of AHAB he ravaged the country, laid siege to Samaria the capital, insolently claimed his wives, children, and wealth, and every thing valuable in the city. The Israelites rejected his absurd demands, and were miraculously enabled with a few troops to rout his powerful army. Remembering that God gave the law from a mountain, and had his temple on another, his servants persuaded him that the Hebrew God was only God of the hills; and that if they had fought them in a plain, they should certainly have gained the victory. This absurd notion he readily believed; and, displacing his thirty-two tributary kings from their place in his army, he filled it with captains, whom he hoped to be more skilful or faithful, and the next year returned to make a full conquest of the kingdom of Israel. To chastise his wickedness, God, by a handful of Israelites, gave him a terrible defeat. A hundred thousand of his forces were slain on the spot. An earthquake threw down the wall of Aphek upon 27,000 more, and crushed them to death. Reduced to the brink of despair, Benhadad, by his servants' advice, threw himself on Ahab's mercy. The insolent blasphemer had not only his life granted him, but liberty to return to his kingdom on the easiest terms. Contrary even to these, he detained Ramoth-gilead, a city of Israel, in his hands; and when Ahab attempted to wrest it from him, he most ungratefully ordered his troops to aim their strokes chiefly at him, who, by a sinful excess of pity, had so lately given him his life and kingdom. 1 Kings xx. and xxii.

Soon after, he made war on Jehoram, Ahab's successor, and carried off a number of Hebrew captives. Informed by one of these, that a Hebrew prophet could cure Naaman his general of his leprosy, he sent him to king Jehoram for that purpose. The general had scarce returned home cured of his loathsome disease, when Benhadad poured his ravaging troops into the kingdom of Israel, chiefly aiming to cut off Jehoram himself. Informed that Elisha revealed his designs to Jehoram, he sent a party to apprehend the prophet. At Elisha's request, God smote them with a partial blindness, and he led them to Samaria, where king Jehoram would have killed them; but, advised by Elisha, he gave them victuals, and dismissed them in safety. Terrified at Elisha's power, or moved with Jehoram's generosity, Benhadad for about four years withdrew his plundering bands. At last he invaded the country, and besieged Samaria, till the famine was excessive. The head of an ass was sold for almost £10 sterling: and about three gills of doves' dung, or coarse pulse, for almost twelve shillings. Women actually ate their own infants. Elisha foretold that on the next day a bushel of fine flour, and two bushels of barley, would be sold for about half a crown. That very night the Lord terrified the Syrian host; they imagined they heard a terrible noise, and concluded that Jehoram had hired a prodigious army of Egyptians, Hittites, and others to destroy them. In great consternation they fled from their camp, leaving it furnished as it was; they flung off their garments by the way, and cast from them what they had taken with them. Four lepers, who went from hunger to cast themselves on the Syrian mercy, finding the camp deserted, informed king Jehoram thereof. After some precautions, to try whether the Syrians had really fled, the Hebrews plundered the camp, and plenty answered the prophet's prediction. 2 Kings v. vi. and vii. Next year Benhadad sickened; and being informed that Elisha was somewhere near to Damascus, he sent Hazael his general to him, with a present of forty camels' load of the most precious things of Syria, to inquire if he should recover. Elisha replied, that there was nothing mortal in his distemper; but, notwithstanding, he should certainly die. Hazael informed his master that the prophet foretold his recovery; but to prevent it, took a thick cloth, dipped it in water, and spread it on his master's face; and so stifled him to death, and seized on his throne. 2 Kings viii.

3. BEN'HA-DAD, the son of Hazael, was also king of Syria. Under him that kingdom was reduced to the brink of ruin. Jehoash and Jeroboam, kings of Israel, defeated his troops in a variety of pitched battles, and forced him to restore to the Israelites whatever his predecessors had seized. 2 Kings xii. 3; xiii. 25. and xiv. 25.

BEN'JA-MIN, the youngest son of Jacob and Rachel, born A. M. 2272. His mother dying in childbed, called him BENONI, the son of my sorrow; but, unwilling to have his name a constant memorial of his beloved Rachael's death, Jacob called him BENJAMIN, the son of the right hand. He married young; and was scarce thirty-two years of age when he had ten sons, Belah, Becher, Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Eli, or Ahiram, Roeh, Muppim, or Shupham, Huppim, or Hupham, and Ard, five of whom died childless. Gen. xxxv. 16—18. and xlv. 21.—When a famine obliged Jacob to send his other ten sons to Egypt for corn, he kept Benjamin at home with himself, supposing him to be the only surviving child of his beloved wife. Joseph ordered them to bring him down with them at their return, or they should be considered as spies. With no small reluctance, Jacob was at last persuaded to let him go. To try his brethren's affection to him, Joseph, after giving him superior honours at his feast, soon brought him into great appearance of danger, by the silver cup being found in his sack, as if stolen by him. He soon after gave him five suits of apparel, and about £25 sterling in money. In his last benediction, Jacob foretold, that this tribe should, in the beginning and end of the Jewish state, be remarkable for valour and ravage; and Moses, that it should have residence near the temple of God. Gen. xliii. xlv. and xlix. 27. Deut. xxxiii. 12. When this tribe came out of Egypt, it consisted of five families, the Belaites, Ashbelites, Ahiramites, Shuphamites, and Huphamites; their chief prince was Abidan the son of Gideon: the number of their armed men under him, was 35,400. In the wilderness they increased to 45,600. They marched in the camp of Ephraim, and pitched their tents behind the tabernacle. Their spy to search the promised land, was Palti the son of Raphu; their prince to divide it, was Eliab the son of Chiston. Their inheritance lay to the north, and north-east of the lot of Judah. Num. xxvi. 38—41; i. 11, 30, 37; ii. 18—23; xiii. 9. and xxiv. 21. Josh. xviii. Not long after the death of Joshua, this tribe defended the lewd wretches of Gibeon, and drew a war upon themselves. They were then famed warriors, especially in using the bow. Twice they, with 25,000 men, defeated about 300,000 of the other tribes, and slew 40,000. In the third battle they were defeated; and except 600, who fled to the rock Rimmon, their whole tribe was cut off. The extirpation of this tribe exceedingly grieved their brethren, as soon as they had leisure to think; they, therefore, from the virgins of Jabesh-gilead and of Shiloh, procured wives to the 600 that remained. Judg. xx. and xxi. It was perhaps scarcely sixty years afterwards when EHUD, one of this tribe, judged Israel, and delivered them from the Moabites. Saul and Ishbosheth, the first kings of Israel, were of this tribe. About twenty of the most valiant of this tribe came over to David, before Saul's death, 1 Chron. xii. 2—7. and 3000 more soon after the death of Ishbosheth. 1 Chron. xii. 1—7, 29. When David numbered them a little before his death, there were of the Belaites 22,034 warriors; of the Becherites 20,200; of the Jedielites 17,200, besides others. 1 Chron. vii. 6—12. The captain of their 24,000 trained bands, was Abiezer the Anetothite; and their chief prince was Jassieli the son of ABNER. 1 Chron. xxvii. 12, 21. When the other ten tribes revolted to Jeroboam, the Benjamites clave to Judah, and the house of David; and all along shared in the religion and fate of that tribe. Under Jehoshaphat, their militia amounted to 380,000. After the captivity a vast number of them dwelt at Jerusalem. 2 Chron. xi; xvii; 2 Chron. viii. and ix. But the great honour of this tribe was the apostle Paul, who, in the morning of his life, destroyed as a persecutor; and in the latter part converted multitudes to Christ. Phil. iii. 5. Gen. xlix. 27.

BE'RA, king of Sodom, had his country terribly ravaged by CHEDORLAOMER and his allies. When Abram defeated the conquerors, and recovered the spoil, Bera offered him the whole booty, the persons excepted; but Abram refused any part of it, lest it should be said, that not JEHOVAH, but the king of Sodom had made him rich. Gen. xiv.

BE'RA-CHAH. See VALLEY, and JEHOHAPHAT.

BE'REA, a city of Macedonia: it was a little distant from Pella, where Alexander was born. Here Paul preached with great success; and his hearers were exceedingly careful to compare what they heard with the scriptures of the Old Testament. Sopater one of them, attended him to Asia. Acts xvii. 10—13. and xx. 4.

BEREAVE; to cause to want. Deut. xxxii. 25.

BER'ITH. See BA'AL-BE'RITH.

BER-NICE, the daughter of Agrippa the Great. She was first betrothed to Mark, the son of ALEXANDER, governor of the Jews at Alexandria. She next married her own uncle, Herod king of Chalcis. After his death she married Polemon, king of Pontus, on condition of his being circumcised. She quickly after abandoned him, and returned to Agrippa her brother, with whom, it is supposed, she lived in habitual incest. They both appeared with great pomp, to hear Paul's defence at Cesarea. Acts xxv. 13, 23. and xxvi.

BE-RO'DACH. See ME-RO'DACH.

BE-ROTH, BE-RO'THAI, or CHUN, a city of Syria, conquered by David; perhaps it was Berytus in Phœnicia. 2 Sam. viii. 8. 1 Chron. xviii. 8.

BERRY, a small fruit growing on trees, bushes, &c. The kinds and qualities of berries are almost innumerable. Some are poisonous; but most are nourishing and medicinal. The few Israelites left in their land by the Assyrians are likened to a few berries left in the uppermost or utmost branch of an olive tree. Isa. xvii. 6.

BERYL, a transparent jewel, of a bluish green colour. It loses its colour when exposed to fire, and is then reckoned of very little value. It never receives any admixture of foreign colour; but its native one is of very different degrees, from a deep dusky, to the palest colour of sea-water. It seems to have received its Hebrew name from the resemblance of its colour to the sea. Its size varies from that of a small tare, to that of a bean or walnut. Its hardness often approaches that of the garnet. It is chiefly found in the East Indies, and about the gold mines of Peru in America. There are beryls found in Silesia; but they are much inferior to the other, and perhaps are but a kind of crystal. The beryl is the eighth foundation of the new Jerusalem; and Christ's body is compared to it, to denote his heavenly beauty, mysterious person, and dignity. Rev. xxi. 20. Dan. x. 6. It was the tenth stone in the high-priest's breast-plate; and might denote the saints in their heavenly nature, and affection, and the mixture of their case and lot. Exod. xxviii. 10.

BESSECH; to entreat with great earnestness. Exod. xxxii. 18.

BESET; to assault, as an army making a general attack on a city or fort. Judg. xix. 20. God besets men behind and before; he exactly knows, upholds, and governs them, that they can go nowhere but as he permits, and where they are surrounded with his presence. Psal. cxxxix. 5. Men's sinful doings beset them, when they appear charged upon them, and with mighty force entangle them in their deserved punishment. Hos. vii. 2. The sin that easily besets them, is the sin of their nature, or their predominant lust, which being so deeply rooted in their heart and affections, and so connected with their outward circumstances of life, readily, and without much opposition, instigates, and, as it were, shuts them up to the commission of wicked acts. Heb. ii. 1.

BESIDE, BESIDES. (1.) More than these. Gen. xii. 12. (2.) Different from. Numb. v. 20. (3.) Near to. Judg. vi. 37. To be beside one's self, is to be deprived of the ordinary exercise of reason; to be mad. Compare Mark iii. 21. Acts xxvi. 24. with Luke xv. 17.

BESIEGE, is hostilely to surround a city or fort, in order to take possession of it by force. Deut. xxviii. 52. Jer. xxxix. 1. and lii. 5.

BESOM, an instrument to sweep with. God's judgments are called a besom of destruction; they make a great stir and confusion; they frequently cut off multitudes; and, with ease, sweep them into the dunghill of contempt and trouble, or pit of endless misery. Isa. xiv. 23.

BESOR, a brook in the south-west corner of Canaan. Here 200 of David's men staid behind, being faint, while the other 400 pursued the Amalekites who had burned Ziklag. 1 Sam. xxx. 9. It is said to fall into the Mediterranean sea between Gaza and Rhinocolura, and to be the same with the brook or river of the wilderness. Amos vi. 14. Dr. Shaw has given sufficient evidence, that the brook Besor can be but a small one; and that it scarcely deserves the name of a river. It was perhaps in this brook or rivulet that the Ethiopian eunuch was baptized. Acts viii. 26-39.

BEST; most excellent, valuable, commodious, comely, righteous. Exod. xxii. 5. Gen. xliii. 11. 1 Sam. xv. 9, &c. Heave-offerings and restitution, were to be of the best things answerable thereto. Numb. xviii. 29. Exod. xxii. 5. Man's best state, is his state of innocence; his chief period of health and strength; and his most fixed circumstances of honour, pleasure, or wealth. Psal. cxxxix. 5. The best robe, is Christ's imputed righteousness, which, in its origin, beauty, duration and use, far exceeds all others. Luke xv. 22. The best gifts, are such as are most useful for honouring of God, and doing good to men. 1 Cor. xii. 31.

BESTEAD. To be hardly bestead and hungry, is to be sorely distressed and almost famished. Isa. xvi. 21.

BESTIR; to stir up; to act vigorously. 2 Sam. v. 24.

BESTOW. (1.) To give out. Exod. xxxii. 29. John iv. 38. (2.) To lay up. Luke xii. 17, 18. 2 Kings v. 24.

BETHAI, or TIBHATH, a city which David took from Hadadezer king of Syria. 2 Sam. viii. 8. 1 Chron. xviii. 8. It is perhaps the same as BETEN, in the tribe of Asher. Josh. xix. 25.

BETH-AB'ARA, a place where John baptized multitudes; and near to which he pointed out Jesus Christ to two of his disciples. John i. 28. As the word BETH, in the beginning of names signifies house or temple, this signifies the house of passage. Calmet, Jerome, and others, place it on the east bank of Jordan, near the place where the Hebrews passed that river under Joshua. Others will have it, where Jacob passed the Jordan, a little south of the sea of Tiberias. Lightfoot says a good deal to prove it was situate to the north-east of that sea, in East Galilee. Perhaps most of the places beginning with BETH had temples of idols in them.

BETH'ANY, a considerable village at the foot of mount Olivet, almost two miles east from Jerusalem. It was the residence of Lazarus, and his sisters Martha and Mary. Here Mary poured the oil upon Christ's head. John xi. and xii. It is now quite inconsiderable; but they still pretend to shew the castle and grave of Lazarus, which the Turks use for a place of devotion. About a bow-shot distant, they shew the house of Mary Magdalene; and at the foot of the hill, you are shewn the well of which the apostles used to drink.

BETH-A-RAM, BETH-HA'ARAN, a city of the Reubenites, to the north-east of the Dead sea, and afterwards called Livias. Numb. xxxii. 26. Josh. xiii. 17.

BETH-A'VEN; either Bethel, so called, because of the idol there set up, or a place very near to it. Hos. iv. 15. Josh. vii. 2. See AVEN.

BETH-BA'RA, a place where Gideon instructed the Ephraimites to post themselves to stop the flying Midianites. If this be the same with BETHABARA, it seems plain that it was south of the Galilean sea; as there the Midianites crossed Jordan; and there the borders of Ephraim were. Judg. vii. 24.

BETHCAR, a city of the Danites. Thus far the Hebrews, under Samuel, pursued the Philistines; and near to it he set up his Ebenezer. 1 Sam. vii. 11.

BETHEL, a city about eight, some say twelve, miles northward of Jerusalem, and a mile westward of Ai. The place was originally called Luz, from the almond and hazel bushes that grew here. Here Jacob lodged under the open sky, as he went to Padan-aram. An eminent vision which he there enjoyed, made him call it BETH-EL, the house of God. About thirty years after, he pitched his tent here for some time. The Canaanites built a city on the spot, and called it Luz, or Bethel. Joshua took it along with Ai, and gave it to the Ephraimites, who, after Joshua's death, resolved to expel the Canaanites, who had reformed it. One of the inhabitants shewed them a secret passage into it, upon condition that he and his family should have their life spared. This man and his family retired to Arabia, where he built another city called Luz. The other inhabitants were put to the sword. In Bethel, Jeroboam set up one of his idolatrous calves, on which account it was called Aven, or Bethaven, the temple of idols, or wickedness, or vanity. Bethel was wrested from the Israelites by Abijah. 2 Chron. xiii. 19; but soon after retaken. The Assyrians made terrible slaughter and ravage in it. Hos. x. 8.

BETHER. Whether this was a distinct place, or the same with Betharam, Bethhoron, or Bithron, cannot be ascertained; but as some mountains near it are represented as abounding with deer; may we not rather render the words, the mountains of cliffs, or divisions? Sol. Song ii. 17. A city called Bither, or Bitter, sustained a terrible siege about one hundred years after Christ's death. It is said the blood which ran down the river stained the sea four miles from the shore. Eusebins thinks this place stood near Jerusalem, but more probably it stood near mount Carmel, and at no great distance from Cesarea.

BETH-ES'DA, a pool on the east of Jerusalem. The name signifies, either a draught-house, or house of mercy; so called, because a public bath was here erected; or because God graciously bestowed a healing virtue on the waters of it. As it lay but a little to the north-east of the temple, the sacrifices might be washed in it; but it did not thence derive its healing virtue. Some years before our Saviour and divine Healer came in the flesh, an angel on some occasions descended, and troubled the water of this pool. Whoever first, after the agitation, bathed himself in it, was healed of whatever disease he had. Multitudes of diseased persons, therefore, waited in its five porches till the water was moved. One man attended it thirty-eight years, and was at last cured by our Saviour; the healing virtue of whose blood, Spirit, and word, the pool no doubt typified. John v. 1—6. It is said to be now one hundred and twenty paces long, forty broad, and eight deep, but without water.

BETH-GA'MUL, a city of the Reubenites, but afterwards seized by the Moabites, and ravaged by the Chaldeans. Jer. xlviii. 28.

BETH-HACCE-REM, a city standing on a hill, and noted for vineyards, between Jerusalem and Tekoa. From hence the alarm of the Chaldeans' approach was given to the former. Jer. vi. 1. Here Malchia, a repairer of the wall of Jerusalem, was a prince. Neh. iii. 14.

BETH-HOG'LAH, a city about half-way between Jericho and Jordan: it pertained to the Benjamites. Josh. xviii. 21.

BETH-HO'RON, two cities of this name, the one in a lower situation than the other, pertained to the tribe of Ephraim. 1 Chron. vii. 24. Solomon repaired and fortified Bethoron the Nether. 1 Kings ix. 17.

BETHINK themselves; consider, and repent of their sins. 1 Kings viii. 49.

BETH-JESHI-MOTH, a city of the Reubenites, about ten miles east of Jordan. The Moabites seized on it: and at last it was destroyed by the Chaldeans. Josh. xiii. 20. Ezek. xxv. 9.

BETH-HLE-HEM. 1. A city of Judah, about six miles south of Jerusalem, and situated on the declivity of a hill. It is also called Ephratah, and Ephrath, and its inhabitants Ephrathites, from its founder. It was never considerable for wealth or extent, but is celebrated as the birth-place of Ibzan, Elimelech, Boaz, David, and chiefly of Jesus the promised Messiah. Gen. xxxv. 16, 19. and xlviii. 7. Ruth i. 2. Psal. cxxxii. 6. Mic. v. 2. Micah the prophet no way contradicts Matthew the evangelist with respect to its greatness. It might be little and yet not the least. Besides, Matthew but relates the Jews' rehearsal of the text in Micah. Matt. ii. 6. Moreover ТЗАHHHИR, rendered little, in Mic. v. 2, may there, and in Jer. xlviii. 4. xlix. 20. and Zech. xiii. 7. be rendered considerable; chief. Bethlehem is still much visited by pilgrims. Here is a convent of the Latin, another of the Greek, and a third of the Armenian churches. Here they pretend to shew you the stable where Christ was born; the manger which he had for his cradle; the grotto where he and his mother lay hid from the rage of Herod, before they departed to Egypt; and about half a mile to the eastward the fields where the angels appeared to the shepherds. Luke ii. 1—12. Matt. ii. 1.

2. BETH'LE-HEM, a city of the Zebulunites. Josh. xix. 15.

BETH-ME'ON. See BA'AL-ME'ON.

BETH-PHA-GE, a small village belonging to the priests. It was hard by Bethany, and near two miles east of Jerusalem. Here our Saviour obtained the ass for his lowly triumph. Matt. xxi. 1.

BETH-SA'I-DA, a city of Galilee; but whether it lay at the north-west, north-east, or rather south-east side of the sea of Tiberias, is not agreed. Its name imports, that it was a place of fishing or hunting; and on which ever side of Jordan it lay, it was commodious for both: the adjacent country abounded with deer, and the sea with fish. It is said Philip the tetrarch formed it into a magnificent city, called Julias, after the name of Augustus the emperor's daughter. Others will have Julias to be the same with Golan in Bashan. Peter and Andrew were natives of Bethsaida. John i. 44. Here Christ opened the eyes of a blind man, by anointing them with spittle. Mark viii. 22—26. Here many of Christ's miracles were performed and contemned; vengeance overtook the despisers; the place being one of the first attacked, and was most terribly distressed by the Romans. Matt. xi. 21, 22.

BETH-SHAN, or BEH-SHEAN, a city of the Manassites, on the west of Jordan, and about seventy-five, or rather sixty miles north-east of Jerusalem, and at the east end of the plain of Jezreel. Josh. xvii. 11. The Canaanites long retained it; and, perhaps, their alliance with the Philistines was the reason why Saul's corpse was hung up on its wall. Judg. i. 17. 1 Sam. xxxi. 10. According to Pliny, it was afterwards called Scythopolis, from the encampment of the Scythians, who, about the time of Josiah, made a terrible irruption into Western Asia; but others think it was so called from the Succoth, or booths, built thereabouts by Jacob, in his return from Padan-aram. Gen. xxxiii. 17, 18.

BETH-SHE-MESH. 1. A city of the tribe of Judah, given to the priests. Its name has led some to imagine that the Canaanites here had a temple to the sun. Josh. xxi. 16. It stood about thirty miles westward of Jerusalem. The kine with which the Philistines sent back the captive ark brought it to Beth-shemesh. The inhabitants profanely looked into it, and were destroyed by the Lord, to the number of seventy principal men, and 50,000 of the common people. Bochart and others think the words ought to be rendered seventy men, even fifty out of a thousand. They can hardly think that God would so severely punish a mistaken look: they cannot believe Beth-shemesh could contain 50,000 persons capable of offending. This reasoning has no great strength. God alone knows what severity is proper to be exercised on those who break his law. Numbers, beside the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh, might be gathered on that occasion. 1 Sam. vi. 12—19. Near this place, Jehoash king of Israel defeated and took Amaziah prisoner. 2 Chron. xxv. 21. The Philistines took this city from king Ahaz. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.

2. BETH-SHE-MESH, a city on the frontiers of Issachar's lot; but whether it be the same that pertained to the tribe of Naphtali, and out of which they expelled not the Canaanites is uncertain. Josh. xix. 22, 38. Judg. i. 33.

3. BETH-SHE-MESH in Egypt, the same as AVEN, or ON. Jer. xliii. 13.

BETH-SHITTAH, a place whither the Midianites fled when they were routed by Gideon. It probably lay to the south-west of the sea of Tiberias, and belonged to the Manassites, and abounded with Shittah-trees. Judg. vii. 22.

BETH-TAPPU-AH, a city or town on the south-west border of Canaan. It is said to have lain fourteen miles beyond Raphia; and if so, could be at no great distance from the Nile. Its name denotes that it was famous for apples, or for having a temple sacred to the god of that fruit. Josh. xv. 53.

BE-THUEL; (1.) The son of Nahor and Milcah, cousin of Abraham and father of Laban and Rebekah. Gen. xxii. 20. xxiv. 15, 29, and xxviii. 2. (2.) Bethnel, or Bethul, perhaps the same with Chesil, a city of the Simeonites. Could we credit the apocryphal history of Judith, here, or rather at another place of this name, a good way northward, Holofernes, the Assyrian general, was slain by her, and a great deliverance wrought for Israel. Josh. xix. 4. 1 Chron. iv. 29, 30.

BETH-ZUR, a noted city on the south of Judah, and confines of Edom, at no great distance from Hebron. Rehoboam fortified it. Josh. xv. 53. 2 Chron. xi. 17. In the Maccabean war it was extremely strong. Lysias, the Syro-grecian general, besieged it with an army of 65,000 men. Judas Maccabeus came to succour it, and Lysias was forced to retreat; but next year the Syrians took and retained it for some years, till Jonathan the Maccabee wrested it from them.

BETIMES; (1.) Early in the morning. Gen. xxvi. 31. (2.) Seasonably; on every proper occasion. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15. (3.) Continually; carefully. Job viii. 5.

BETRAY; dishonestly to give up one to his enemies. 1 Chron. xii. 17. Matt. xxvi. 2, 16, 21. 48.

BETROTH, or ESPOUSE; to promise, or contract marriage. Deut. xxviii. 30. God betroths or espouses people to himself, when he enters them into the relation of a church to himself. Jer. ii. 2. Chiefly when he unites them to Jesus Christ, that they may have a saving interest in his person, righteousness, grace, and glory, and he and they may rejoice in one another. He betroths them for ever, by an everlasting covenant, that neither time, sin, nor any thing else can disannul; and in righteousness, consistently with his essential righteousness, and clothed with his imputed righteousness; and in judgment, with great wisdom and prudence; and in faithfulness, in fulfilment of his covenant and promise, and sincerely determined to fulfil the marriage-trust toward them; and in loving-kindness and mercies to their persons, so base, wretched, guilty, vile, and rebellious. Sol. Song iii. 11. Hos. ii. 19, 20. Of this, ministers, by the preaching of the gospel, are means and instruments. 2 Cor. xi. 2.

BETTER; (1.) More valuable; preferable. Eccl. ix. 4, 16, 18. (2.) More acceptable. 1 Sam. xv. 22. (3.) More able and wise. Dan. i. 20. (4.) More convenient. 1 Cor. vii. 38. (5.) More easy. Matt. xviii. 6. (6.) More advantageous. Phil. i. 23. (7.) More holy. 1 Cor. viii. 8. (8.) More safe. Psal. cxviii. 8. (9.) More comfortable. Prov. xv. 16, 17.

God's love is better than life, is more sweet, pleasant, profitable, sure, and honourable. Psal. lxxiii. 3. Christ's love is better than wine; we cannot sinfully exceed in desire of, or delight in it; it is enjoyed without money and without price; it never loses its sweetness and virtue: our living on it by faith, renders us active, holy, and zealous for God, content with our lot, happy in ourselves, and a comfort to all around us. Sol. Song i. 2. His obedience and suffering are better sacrifices, than the Jewish, in respect of matter, manner of oblation, efficacy, and fruit. Heb. ix. 28. His blood speaks better things than that of Abel: it purchases and procures full remission, or eternal salvation, to his enemies and murderers; whereas Abel's imprecated vengeance on his murderer. Heb. xii. 24. He, his fruit, word, and saving instruction, are better than gold, or than rubies; are more valuable, delightful, useful, exalting, and durable. Prov. viii. 14, 19, and iii. 14. Psal. cxix. 73. His priesthood, and the promises of the gospel, are a better hope; a more clear, sure, honourable, and extensive ground of hope, for all the blessings of time and eternity, than the Jewish sacrifices and shadows could be. Heb. vii. 19. The better covenant, established on better promises, is the covenant of grace, which, in respect of the party contracted with, its freedom, firmness, benefits conferred, honour, and use, is far preferable to the covenant of works;—

and it is better than the national covenant made with the Hebrews at Sinai; it promises far more valuable blessings than the quiet possession of Canaan; and is more sure and permanent; and the New Testament dispensation of it is far more spiritual, easy, clear, and extensive than the Old. Heb. vii. 22. and viii. 6. Our condition under the gospel is a better thing than theirs under the law. Our revelation is more plain, full, and extensive; our ordinances are more clear, spiritual, and easy: we have the substance of their ceremonies, with infinite advantage, in Christ's birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension; have a more abundant and widely spread effusion of the Holy Ghost, and a more eminent freedom from the impression of the broken law on our conscience. Heb. xi. 40. A day in God's courts is better than a thousand elsewhere. Fellowship with him is infinitely more delightful, profitable, and honourable, than any earthly advantage. Psal. lxxxiv. 10. A little that a righteous man hath, his dinner of herbs, or dry morsel, is better than the wealth or delicate provision of the wicked. It springs from God's redeeming love, is blessed of him, a pledge of glory, and a means of drawing the affections and thoughts to God in Christ. Psal. xxxvii. 16. Prov. xv. 16, 17. xvi. 8. and xxvii. 1. The saints' resurrection is better, more glorious and happy than a recovery from a state of affliction; or a miraculous restoration to natural life; or the resurrection of the wicked to everlasting damnation. Heb. xi. 35. Heaven is a better country; its inhabitants, exercises, and enjoyments, are far more holy, honourable, and happy than those on earth: and to be with Christ is far better than to be with saints and ordinances on earth; as one is freed from every stain of sin, every temptation and trouble, and clearly sees, and fully enjoys and delights in God as his all in all. Heb. xi. 16. Phil. i. 23. It is better to marry than to burn under the power of unclean lust; the greatest trouble is to be chosen, rather than sinful desires, however secret. Sorrow and mourning are better than laughter and mirth; they tend more to awaken a concern about eternal things. Eccl. vii. 2, 3. Death, or the end of a man, is better than his birth or beginning; as in the former he goes out of worldly trouble; whereas, in the other he enters into it; and an untimely birth is better than either, as it never enters into trouble. Eccl. iv. 2, 3; vi. 4, 5, 6. and vii. 8. Better is the light of the eye than the wandering of the desire. It is better to enjoy the little that one has, than to indulge anxious desire after more. Eccl. vi. 9. Nothing is better than for a man to eat, drink, and be merry, and enjoy his labour. It is both advantageous and honourable for a man to free his mind from anxious care, and enjoy a moderate use of what God brings to his hand. Eccl. ii. 24; iii. 12, 13. and viii. 15.

BE-ULAH, a name given to the Jewish nation and church of God in the latter days, importing their marriage to Christ, as their husband and sovereign Lord. Isa. lxii. 4.

BEWAIL; to mourn over with deep sighs. Lev. x. 6. Dent. xxi. 13.

BEWARE; to take heed; be on our guard. Gen. xxiv. 6. To beware of Christ, is to have a due and holy awe of him on our spirit, and carefully to guard against every thing tending to offend him. Exod. xxxiii. 21. To beware of men, is to take heed lest they deceive us. Mark xii. 38. To beware of sin, is to avoid every appearance of it, and temptation to it; and, to the utmost of our power, watch against and oppose it. Matt. xvi. 6.

BEWITCH, wickedly to deceive and hurt, by juggling tricks and diabolical charms. Acts viii. 9. False teachers bewitch men, when, by Satanic methods of guileful reasoning, specious pretences to holiness or learning, apparent miracles, or proud boasting, they deceive their mind, and destroy their soul. Gal. iii. 1.

BEWRAY; to shew; discover. Prov. xxviii. 16.

BEYOND; (1.) On the other side of. Dent. xxx. 13. (2.) Further than. Num. xxii. 18. To know the signification of beyond, on the other side, or on this side, it is necessary to know where the sacred writer was at the time of writing. Thus, beyond, or on the other side of Jordan, with Moses, who gave his finished books to the Hebrews eastward of Jordan, signifies the west side of that river. While such as lived or wrote on the west of Jordan, called the east side beyond, or the other side. Deut. iii. 25. and xi. 30. Josh. ix. 10. and xiii. 8. The Hebrew word haeber ought sometimes to be rendered on this side, as Josh. xii. 7. Deut. i. 1; and perhaps Gen. i. 10. Beyond measure, is exceedingly. Mark vi. 51. To go beyond and defraud, is to exceed the conditions of a bargain, and the laws of honesty; or to transgress the rules of chastity and rights of marriage. 1 Thess. iv. 6.

BE-ZA'LE-EL, the son of Uri, of the tribe of Judah, and AHOLIAB, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan, were two noted artificers, called of God, and eminently qualified with wisdom and skill: they had the chief direction of framing the various appurtenances of the Mosaic tabernacle, and performed every thing with the greatest exactness. Were they heretofore figures of Jesus Christ, who being called of God, and qualified with the spirit of wisdom and understanding, rears up his church in exact agreement to his Father's purpose and will? Exod. xxxi. xxxvi—xxxix. chapters.

BE'ZEK. (1.) A city in the lot of Judah, on the east side of a hill, about two miles from Beth-zur, and a good way westward of Bethlehem. Here Adonibezek reigned, and was taken prisoner. Judg. i. 4—7. It was a small village about 150 years ago. (2.) A city southward from Bethshan, and on the west of Jordan. Here Saul reviewed his army before he crossed the Jordan, in his march to relieve Jabesh-gilead. 1 Sam. xi. 8.

BE'ZER. See BOZRAH.

BIBBER, a great drinker. Matt. xi. 19.

BIBLE, the name commonly given to the collection of the sacred writings, which are the sole standard and rule of our faith and practice. It is called by the Jews, The Mikra or Lesson; the Christians often designate it, the sacred books; the oracles of God; the volume of inspiration; the book of God, &c. It was always distinguished into books, but not into chapters and verses, as now. It appears from Clemens of Alexandria, Athanasius, and others, that, in the early ages of Christianity, it was divided into a kind of short paragraphs. The division of it into the present form of chapters is generally ascribed to Arlott, a Tuscan monk, or rather to Hugo Cardinalis, in the thirteenth century. But it is plain from the works of Theophylact, on the Gospel, that it must have taken place at least 200 years sooner. Such as believe the authenticity of the Hebrew punctuations, reckon the Old Testament to have been always divided into verses; but these were not numbered as now, till perhaps Mordecai Nathan published his Hebrew Concordance, about A. D. 1450. About 1551, Robert Stephen, a French printer, divided the New Testament into verses. It is, therefore, no wonder this division into chapters and verses is not altogether just; nor is it any crime to correct it. The division of the New Testament into sections by Doddridge is not injudicious.

At present our BIBLE consists of the Old and New Testaments: the former was written before, and the latter since, the incarnation of Christ: the former, excepting a part of Ezra and Daniel, and a verse of Jeremiah, written in the Chaldaic, are in the Hebrew language. The latter is written in Greek, but very different from that of Homer, and other celebrated authors. Both were written in the language which was then best known to the church of God: a sure token that every nation whither the gospel comes should have access to read the scriptures in their own language.

Whether the Old Testament was written in the Chaldaic character, in which it now appears, or in the Samaritan; and whether the vowel and disjunctive points be of divine authority, or not, has been warmly debated. In both cases, I incline to the former sentiment; but readily allow, that those who differ from me in opinion, have produced no inconsiderable arguments on their side; and that many who take the same side of the question with myself, have unwarily carried the affair of the points too far, and so rendered their cause less defensible. It must be allowed, that Boston has treated the affair of the accents with great care and judgment.

About the time of our Saviour, the Jews distinguished their Bible into twenty-two books, corresponding to the twenty-two letters of their alphabet, viz. the five books of Moses; thirteen of the prophets, Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel; the twelve minor prophets, Job, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther; and four Hagiographs, or holy writings, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Solomon. Thus, the law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms were comprehensive of the whole. Luke xxiv. 44. The modern Jews reckon twenty-four books, which they suppose to have three different degrees of authority. To the five books of Moses, they ascribe the highest authority. To the former prophets, writers of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, and the latter, viz. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the books of the minor ones, they ascribe a lower inspiration and authority. To the other eleven books of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, they scarcely ascribe any proper inspiration, but a mere superintendency of God's Spirit, leaving the writers in a great measure to the direction of their own reason. The Christian division of the Old Testament is far more sensible. The historical books which are most plain and necessary for the understanding of doctrines and predictions, are placed first, ending with Esther; the doctrinal books, ending with Solomon's Song, are placed in the middle; the prophetic books, to the knowledge of which an acquaintance with both histories and doctrines is necessary, are placed last in order. But in all the three parts, histories, doctrines, and predictions, are often mixed.

Several books mentioned in scripture, as of Jasher, of the wars of the Lord, and the annals of the kings of Israel and Judah, are now lost; but they never had more than human authority. It is a dishonour to Christians that ever the APOCRYPHA were supposed canonical, or bound up among the oracles of God. Just before Josiah's reign, the canonical books then extant seem to have been mostly destroyed; hence he and his courtiers were so much surprised at the contents of a book of the law, perhaps an original authenticated manuscript copy found in the house of the Lord. No doubt a variety of copies were transcribed from it. It is in vain pretended that the inspired writings were lost during the Chaldean captivity, and restored by Ezra. Daniel had the book of Jeremiah to peruse. Chap. ix. 2. Can we doubt but other godly persons also had copies? Or that even the SAMARITANS wanted copies of the law? It is nevertheless probable that Ezra, inspired of God, corrected a copy of the sacred books, and caused others to be transcribed therefrom. To elucidate the history, he added various sentences, and sometimes changed the ancient names of cities or persons, into such as were modern. Whether he minded the vowel points, and the kert, ketib, various readings, or marginal corrections, to the number of 900 or 1000, at least some of them, we dare not decide. As the book of Nehemiah carries down the genealogy of the high-priests, and that of first Chronicles the line of Zerubbabel, to near the time of Alexander the Great, it is probable the books of Malachi, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Chronicles, were admitted into the sacred canon, more than 100 years after Ezra's death.

The Jews divided the Pentateuch, or law of Moses, into fifty-four sections, answerable to the number of Sabbaths in their third or intercalated year. In other years they joined two short sections, or two different Sabbaths, that they might publicly read the whole law every year in their worshipping assemblies. They subdivided it into a number of lesser sections, where it seems their readers stopped to give the sense, or hand the book to another. About A. M. 3840, Antiochus prohibited the reading of the law; they therefore substituted fifty-four sections of the prophets in its stead. After Judas Maccabeus restored their worship, the two were conjoined, and a section of the law, and another of the prophets, were read every sabbath.

The manuscript Bibles of the Jews in Spain, are far more correct than those of Germany; but scarcely any of either are thought above 600 or 700 years old. In the sixteenth century of the Christian era, Bomberg printed a vast many Hebrew Bibles, in quarto and folio. The folio edition 1548, with the Masora, Chaldee paraphrases, and commentaries of Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and David Kimchi, is the most exact. From this, about seventy years after, Buxtorf and Leo Modena, printed their Rabbinic Bibles at Basil and Venice. An infinity of Hebrew Bibles, in almost every form, have been printed. Those of Leusden and Athias, in 1667, have a high character; but none for exactness, are equal to those of Menasseh-ben-Israel in 1685, and especially those of Vander Hooght in 1705. Nor are those of Proop, Jablonski, Opius, Michaelis, and Simon unexact, especially the former. Dr. Kennicott, having industriously, and with great care, compared between 600 and 700 different manuscript copies, published a most valuable Hebrew Bible, in two folio volumes. The text is that of Vander Hooght; differing only in the arrangement of the poetical books, which are printed in hemistichs, into which they naturally divide themselves, but retaining the original order.

When the Jews, in their captivity, learned the language of Chaldeas, and had forgotten part of their own, the reader of the law paused at the end of each sentence, and gave the sense. Neh. viii. 8. This produced a variety of paraphrases, or Targums; but no literal translation of the Bible was rendered into the Chaldean tongue. That of Onkelos on the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses, composed about the time of our Saviour, is by far the most literal and sensible. The Targum of Jerusalem on the same books, is written in a very obscure language, and we have no more than shreds of it. Another large paraphrase on the Pentateuch, containing abundance of fables, is ascribed to Jonathan the son of Uzziel, though, if we can judge by the style, it is none of his. Jonathan has indeed a paraphrase on the former and latter prophets, which is far from contemptible. The author of the paraphrase on the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, is not certainly known. It is pretty large, frequently useful, but not seldom whimsical. There is also a Targum on the two books of Chronicles, the character of which I know not. The Samaritans, whom the Assyrians placed in the land of Israel, have a double Pentateuch, one in the Hebrew language, but in Samaritan characters, little differing from the Hebrew, except in the years of the patriarchs before Abraham, and in what relates to mount Gerizzim, and in a number of inaccuracies; another in their own language, which is a corrupt Hebrew or Chaldaic, and which is not altogether despicable.

According to Aristobulus, the Penta-teuch and Joshua, if not other books, must have been translated into Greek before the time of Alexander the Great; and it is supposed the Grecian philosophers borrowed a part of their knowledge therefrom. The Greek version, ascribed to seventy interpreters, was not composed till a considerable time after. Could we credit Aristæus, Josephus, Philo, Justin Martyr, and Epiphanius, it was done by seventy-two Jewish interpreters at the demand of Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, for the use of his library; and with the exactness of miraculous inspiration; but the evident marks of fable interwoven with their account, the vast difference in various parts of that version, the obvious inaccuracy of the greater part of it, sufficiently refute this statement. It is more probable that the Pentateuch was translated for the use of those renegade Jews, who built a temple, and established the worship of their country, at Heliopolis in Egypt, about 150 years before our Saviour's birth; and that the rest, which is far less exact, was translated by various hands. This version, however, paved the way for the spread of the gospel, and was very much used in the primitive church, as well as among the Hellenist Jews, and is still of great use for settling the meaning of some Hebrew words. The principal printed editions of it are, (1.) The Complutensian, published by Cardinal Ximenes, A. D. 1515. It was altered in a variety of places to make it correspond with the Hebrew; and so is the best version in Greek, but not the true Septuagint. (2.) The Venetian, printed from a manuscript. This has been often reprinted at Strasburgh, Basil, &c. and altered in some places, to bring it nearer the Hebrew. (3.) The Vatican, printed at Rome 1587, from a fine manuscript in the pope's library. This and the various readings of the excellent Alexandrian manuscript, are inserted in Walton's Polyglot. (4.) Grabe's Alexandrian copy, printed at Oxford 1707, but sometimes altered as he thought fit.

When Christianity began to spread in the world, new translations of the Old Testament were published in Greek. About A. D. 128, Aquila, a Jewish proselyte of Pontus, published one very literal, perhaps out of hatred to the Christians, who had excommunicated him. About 200, Symmachus who by turns was a Jew, a Samaritan, a Christian, and Ebionite, published another, adhering to the sense rather than to the letter. About the same time, or perhaps twenty years sooner, Theodotian, first a Marcionite, and then a Jew, published another, in which he struck into a medium between the two former, his version being neither quite literal, nor too far distant from it; and so preferable to them both. There were two other Greek versions, whose authors are not known. In the fourth century, Lucian Martyr, Hesychius, and Sophronius, made each of them a translation.

The New Testament in its original Greek, has had an infinity of editions. Those of Alcalá, Erasmus, Stephens, and Beza, have been generally copied by others. Those of Mills, Knster, and Westein, and Bengelius, with the various readings, are the most valuable. Mills has shown a surprising fondness for collecting as many as he could, to the number of 30,000, for which he has been abused by some, severely chastised by Whitby, and candidly corrected by Bengelius; the two latter have omitted thousands of the most trifling. This vast number of various readings is so far from weakening the authority of scripture, that they mightily confirm it: they have been collated by the friends of Christianity, which shews their scrupulous exactness in trying their own cause. Not one of the vast multitude tends to overthrow one article of faith, but are chiefly about accents, letters, syllables, and things of smaller moment.

By comparing a multitude of copies, the genuine reading is easily established. Of the books of the New Testament, the first five are historical, the next twenty-one epistolary, and the last is prophetic. Some heretics have attempted to add spurious gospels, acts, and epistles; but these were always rejected by the Christian church.

The Syriac version of the whole scripture is both very ancient and useful. It is pretended that Solomon procured for the Syrians a version of the inspired books then extant; and that Abgarus, king of Edessa, soon after the death of our Saviour, procured a version of the rest of the Old Testament. It is far more probable that the Christians of Antioch procured the whole translation about A. D. 100. It is certain the version is ancient. In the Old Testament, it too often leaves the original Hebrew, to follow the Samaritan, or Septuagint; and leaves out the titles of the Psalms, to insert their contents. Nay, there is a Syriac version of the Old Testament done from the seventy.

In the first ages of Christianity the Romans, and others of the western church, had a variety of Latin translations. One called the Vulgate, and on the Old Testament, translated almost word for word from the Septuagint, was most generally received. Jerome, the only father of the Latin church, who seems to have had a correct acquaintance with the Hebrew language, formed a new version from the originals. This being better, was in some churches preferred to the Vulgate. Some contention about the two versions arising, the Vulgate was corrected by that of Jerome, and so one made from both. This sufficiently corrupted by the scribes, is used by the Romish church, and received the sanction of authenticity from the council of Trent. Pope Sextus, however, afterwards corrected some thousands of faults in it; and Clement VIII, his successor, added several thousands more of corrections, some of which are to the worse. Nor is Bellarmine mistaken in avowing that a number of places still need a further amendment. Jerome's own version was published at Paris in 1663, by Martianay and Pouget.

Chrysostom and Theodoret assure us, that the Old and New Testaments were, in their time, found in the Syriac, Indian, Persian, Armenian, Ethiopic, Scythian, and Samaritan languages. About A. D. 900, or later, Saadias Gaon, a Jew, translated the Old Testament into Arabic. Another of Manritania translated the Pentateuch; and Erpenius printed his work. A bishop of Seville formed an Arabic translation about 719. Kisius, a monk of Damascus, also translated the New Testament. Another Christian who lived in Egypt, formed another translation. Who were the authors of the Arabic version in the London Polyglot, we know not. It has been generally done from the Alexandrian Greek copy, and is not exact, but is nevertheless useful.

The Ethiopians of Abyssinia have a version of the whole Bible, which they ascribe to Frumentius, a bishop of the fourth century. In that part of the Old Testament which we possess, it closely corresponds with the Alexandrian copy of the Septuagint, and the New is far from exact; but whether this were owing to the copy, or to the ignorance of the printer and corrector, we cannot determine. It is certain the Ethiopian who inspected the printing of the Roman edition 1548, complained grievously that he understood not the art of printing, and that the workmen understood not the language, and scarcely the letters.

The Copts, or remnant of the ancient Egyptians, have an ancient translation of the Bible: the Old Testament done with considerable exactness from the Alexandrian Septuagint, but never printed. The New was printed at Oxford in 1716. But Joblonski and La Croze have a mean opinion of this work, especially the Latin translation.

The Persians have some manuscript versions of the Bible: the Pentateuch, by Rabbi Jacob a Jew; and the Gospels, by Simon, a Christian, are inserted in the London Polyglot: neither are ancient; and the last is far from being correct.

The Armenians have a translation of the Old Testament, done from the Septuagint, by Moses Grammaticus, and two others, about 1400 years ago. It was done from the Syriac and Greek. In 1666, an edition, corrected or corrupted from the Vulgate, was printed at Amsterdam, under the direction of an Armenian bishop. Theodorus Patrens procured an impression of an Armenian New Testament at Antwerp, 1668, and of the whole Bible in 1670.

The Georgians have the Bible in their ancient language; but that being now almost obsolete, and they themselves generally ignorant, few of them can either read or understand it.

The Russians have the Bible in their Slavonic tongue, done from the Greek by Cyril their apostle. It was published in 1581; but being too obscure, Ernest Glik, a Swedish captive began to form another. He died before he finished it. Peter the emperor ordered a number of his most learned clergy to complete the work. This translation, when completed, was printed, and the Bibles, distributed by royal authority about 1722, were of this translation.

The most ancient German translation, is that of Ulphilas, bishop of the Goths, about 300; but he omitted the books of Kings, lest they should have excited his savage countrymen to war. Towards the end of the sixteenth century, Junius professed to publish an edition of it, from a manuscript found in the abbey of Verden, written in letters of silver. An anonymous version was printed at Nuremberg in 1477. Between 1521 and 1532, Luther composed his translation, and published it in seven parts. Michaelis La Croze and Bayer think this was not the Gothic version of Ulphilas, but one about 200 years later; some persons of quality, proficients in the German language, revised it. Two Popish versions, the one of Eckius on the Old, and Emzer on the New Testament, and another of Ulemburgius, were published to destroy the credit of Luther's; but the Protestants of Germany and Switzerland still use it, a little corrected. About 1660, a project was set on foot to have it carefully corrected; but the death of the great Hottinger rendered that design abortive. About 1604, Piscator turned the Latin translation of Junius and Tremellius into a kind of German, but too much Latinized. About 1529, the Anabaptists published their German translation at Worms. In 1630, John Crellius, a Socinian, published his New Testament at Amsterdam, and Felbinger his in 1660. About 1660, Athias published a Hebrew German translation of the Old Testament, for the use of his Jewish brethren, and Jekuthiel another; but both, especially the latter, distorted several texts relative to the Messiah. Schmidt's German translation appears to have been not much more prized.

The first Polish version of scripture is ascribed to Hadewich, the wife of Jagellon duke of Lithuania, who embraced Christianity, A. D. 1390. In 1596, the Protestants published another, formed on Luther's translation. About three years after, James Wiek, a Jesuit, and some of his brethren published another more to the Popish taste. The Socinians published two versions in 1562 and 1572.

About 1506, the Bohemian Taborites published a Bible in their language, done from the Vulgate. In the end of the sixteenth century, eight Bohemian divines, after a careful study of the original languages, at Wirtemberg and Basil, published a version from the original text.

In 1534, Olaus and Laurence published a Swedish Bible, done from Luther's German translation. About 1617, Gustavus Adolphus ordered some learned men to revise it; since which time, it has been almost universally followed in that kingdom. The translation into the language of Finland was done from it. In 1550, Peter Palladius, and three others, published a Danish version, from the German of Luther. In 1605, Paul Resenius, bishop of Zealand, published another. In 1624, John Michel published his version of the New Testament. The Icelanders have a version of the Bible in their language; but the author is unknown.

The Flemish or Dutch Bibles, composed by Papists, are very numerous; but except that of Nicolas Vink, printed in 1548, they are all anonymous. The Calvinists of the Low Countries long used a version from Luther's; but the synod of Dort appointed some learned men to form a new one from the originals. It was published in 1637; nor do I know of another translation equally exact.

In 1471, an Italian Bible, translated from the Vulgate, by Nicolas Malerme, a Benedictine monk, was published at Venice. Antony Bruccioli published another in 1530. The council of Trent prohibited it. The Protestants have two Italian versions: the one by the celebrated Diodati, published in 1607, and with corrections in 1641. This is a half paraphrase, rather than a translation. The other by Maximus Theophilus, dedicated to the duke of Tuscany, about 1551. As about 1270, an order was issued by King James of Arragon, to burn all the Bibles that could be met with; it may be concluded that numerous copies in Spanish were then extant. These were, probably, some of the labours of the persecuted Waldenses. About 1500, a Spanish version was published, but the translator is unknown. In 1543, Briander published his version of the New Testament, and dedicated it to king Charles V. After long private use of it, the Jews published their Spanish version of the Old Testament in 1553. Cassiodore, a learned Calvinist, published his Bible in 1569. Cyprian de Valera corrected and republished it in 1602. About A. D. 1160, Peter de Vaux, chief of the Waldenses, published the first translation of the Bible in French. About 1290, Guinarddes Moulins formed a translation, and which, it is probable, Mernard published in 1484. About 1390, Raoul de Presle made another. By order of the emperor Charles V. the doctors of Lonvain published another, 1550; but F. Simon says, it scarce differed from that of L'Empereur, in 1534. Renatus Benoit published his French Bible 1567, and Corbin his in 1643. The first is said to be pirated, and the other to be harsh in its style, adhering too closely to the Vulgate. In 1672, Isaac le Maitre de Sacy published his version with short notes, to point out the literal and spiritual sense. It was received with great approbation. The New Testament of Mons, done from the Vulgate, and published 1665, with the king of Spain and archbishop of Cambray's license, is in a clear and agreeable style: but pope Clement IX. and Innocent XI. with a number of French bishops, strictly forbade its use. About 1670, Amelotte, pretending to have ransacked the various libraries of Europe, and with great care to have collated the ancient manuscripts, published his New Testament. To his shame, it was found he had scarcely noted any new various readings of consequence: he himself was obliged to own that he had so boasted, to procure a sale for his book. In 1697, Bohours and two other Jesuits, published their New Testament; but their strict adherence to the Vulgate has rendered their language harsh and obscure. In 1702, F. Simon published his New Testament, with some literal and critical notes: the bishops of Paris and Meaux immediately condemned it. Martianay published his New Testament in 1712.

There is a number of French Bibles translated by Protestants. Faber's version of the New Testament was printed for those of Piedmont, in 1534. Next year, Peter Olivetanus's Bible was published at Geneva, and being often reprinted with the corrections of Calvin, and others, is now a work of considerable exactness. After some struggling with the French Protestant clergy, Diodati published his in 1644; but, like his Italian and Latin versions, the translation is too free, and more of the nature of a paraphrase. Le Clerc published his New Testament at Amsterdam 1703, with notes mostly borrowed from Grotius and Hammond. The States General prohibited it, as inclining to the Sabellian and Socinian heresies. La Cene published another which shared much the same fate from the same cause.

About A. D. 709, Adelm translated the Psalms into English Saxon. About the same time, Eadfrid translated other parts of scripture; and the venerable Bede translated the Gospels, if not the whole Bible. About 890, king Alfred translated a great part of the scripture. An Anglo-Saxon version of some books by Elfrick, was published in 1699. A version of the Gospels was published by Parker, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1571; but the author is unknown. At the request of Lord Berkeley, John Trevisa translated the Bible into English, and finished his version A. D. 1357, or, according to others, in 1398. About 1360, John Wickliffe composed his version, copies of which are still extant in several libraries of England. In 1526, Tindal published his New Testament. Most of the copies were bought up and destroyed by bishop Tonsal and Sir Thomas More. The price enabled Tindal to proceed in the translation of the Old Testament. He was burned in Flanders, just as he had prepared his Bible for a second edition. John Rogers, who afterwards died a martyr, finished the correction, and printed it at Hamburgh, under the name of Thomas Matthews. Cranmer and Miles Coverdale further corrected it. Cranmer got it printed by public authority in England; and king Henry ordered a copy of it to be set up in every church, to be read by every one that pleased. By advice of the popish bishops, he soon after revoked this order, and prohibited the use of the Bible in the vulgar tongue. When Coverdale, Knox, Samson, Goodman, Gilby, Cole, and Whittingham, were exiles during the Marian persecution, they framed another translation, with short notes, and got it printed at Geneva. It was much valued by the Puritans and in about thirty years passed through as many editions. The bishops heartily hated it, and made a new one of their own, which was read in the churches, while the Geneva translation was generally read in families. About 1583, Laurence Thomson published a translation of Beza's New Testament, with annotations. In the end of the sixteenth, and beginning of the seventeenth centuries, the English Papists at Rheims published a version of the whole Bible. It was crowded with barbarous terms, and with notes, calculated to support the Papacy: nor durst the Popish people read even this bad translation without a licence from their superiors.

At the Hampton-court conference, the Puritans suggested unanswerable objections to the bishops' Bible; and king James heartily hated the Genevan translation. He, therefore, appointed fifty-four learned persons to translate the scriptures anew, or, at least, to compose a better translation out of many. Forty-seven of them, ranged into six divisions, actually engaged in it, A. D. 1607. After each had translated the portion assigned him, they met together: one read the new version; while all the rest, held in their hand either original copies, or some approved version. Whenever any material difference occurred, the reader stopped till they considered and agreed on it. In three years they finished their task; and their translation was published in 1610. It is still the authorized English version; and, next to the Dutch, is the best extant. Since that time, Ainsworth, Doddridge, and others, have published their own versions of part of the sacred books in English. The Dutch version and annotations have also been translated into our language. Who the author of the Welsh translation was, cannot now be ascertained. About 1630, Bedel, bishop of Kilmore employed one King to translate the English Bible into Irish. After it was finished, and Bedel had examined it, he intended to print it at his own charge. Archbishop Laud and Lord Stafford prevented him; pretending it would be a reproach for the nation, to use the version of so despicable a fellow as King. The manuscript, however, was not lost, but printed in 1685. The Erse Bibles used in the Highlands of Scotland, are supposed by some to have proceeded from the same origin.

The Turks have some manuscript translations of the Bible in their language. In 1666, a Turkish New Testament was printed at London, to be dispersed in the East. In 1721, it is said, the Grand Signior ordered an impression of Bibles at Constantinople, that they might be compared with the Alcoran, or Mahometan scriptures. About 1650, John Elliot published his translation of the Bible in the language of the American Massachusetts. About twenty years after, the Honourable Sir Robert Boyle procured a version of the New Testament into the Malayan language, and sent the whole impression to the East Indies. In 1711, Ziegenbalg and Grindler, Danish missionaries, published their version of the New Testament in the Malabrian language; and afterwards proceeded to translate the Old. The modern Greeks in Turkey have also a translation of the Bible in their language.

Since the Reformation, a vast number of Latin versions have been made by the Papists. Pagnin published his in 1527: it is very literal, and generally exact. The corrections by Montanus render it still more useful. By the assistance of two persons skilled in Hebrew, Cardinal Cajetan translated part of the Old Testament. Isidorus Clarius undertook to correct the Vulgate from the Hebrew, and pretends he rectified above eight hundred passages. Of Protestants, Sebastian Munster published a literal but judicious translation. That of Leo Juda is in more elegant Latin, but less conformable to the original. Castalio has attended more to the elegance of his style than to the mind of the Holy Ghost. Junius Tremellius and Beza's translations are generally correct, and have been frequently reprinted. Piscator's version, which he published a little before his death, along with his commentary, is still more so. Schmidt's version appears rather harsh, but is very literal: and, by its numerous supplements, also serves as a kind of commentary. It has been printed along with a coarse edition of Vander Hooght's Hebrew Bible.

For the more commodious comparison of different versions, many of them have been sometimes arranged together. In this octapla, or eightfold Bible, Origen placed, in different columns, a Hebrew copy, both in Hebrew and in Greek characters, with six different Greek versions. Elias Hutter, a German, about the sixteenth century, published the New Testament in twelve languages, viz. in Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Latin, Italian, Spanish, French, German, Bohemian, English, Danish, Polish; and the whole Bible in Hebrew, Chaldaic, Greek, Latin, German, and a varied version. But the most esteemed collections are those in which the originals and ancient translations, are conjoined. Such as the Complutensian Bible, by Cardinal Ximenes, a Spaniard; the King of Spain's Bible, directed by Montanus, &c.; the Paris Bible, by Michael Jay, a French gentleman, in ten large folio volumes; copies of which were published in Holland, under the name of pope Alexander the Seventh; and that of Brian Walton, afterward bishop of Chester. This last is the most regular and valuable. It contains the Hebrew and Greek originals, with Montanus's interlinear version; the Chaldee paraphrases; the Septuagint; the Samaritan Pentateuch; the Syriac and Arabic Bibles; the Persian Pentateuch and Gospels; the Ethiopic Psalms, Song of Solomon, and New Testament, with their respective Latin translations; together with the Latin Vulgate, and a large volume of various readings, to which is ordinarily joined, Castel's Heptaglot Lexicon, all included in eight volumes folio.

Whatever may be the case with pre-tenders to freedom of thought, under the enslaving power of their lusts, every one that really allows himself to think freely, must be persuaded, that man in his present state, has no natural light, sufficient to conquer his corruptions, and to guide him to real and everlasting happiness. The possibility of God's further manifesting his will, nay, the necessity of revelation, to effect the recovery of man to him, must be manifest. And, though the mysterious parts of the scripture may transcend the views of our reason, it will appear, on a serious trial, that no point is contrary to reason; that there is nothing in the matter or manner of revelation, but agrees exactly with the perfections of God; and, as Bolingbroke, an avowed infidel, observes, "It would pass for downright madness, if we were not accustomed to it, to hear creatures of the lowest form of intellectual beings, pretend to penetrate the designs, fathom the depths, and unveil the mysteries of infinite wisdom."

Every characteristic by which we can imagine a revelation from God to be distinguished, is discoverable in the Bible. The divine authority, majesty, wisdom, holiness, and goodness of God are therein discoverable; the depth, sublimity, purity, and benevolence of their matter; their scope to render all the glory to God, and correct the corrupt inclinations of man; the sublimity of their style, even when suited to the capacity of the weak; the obvious candour of the writers, in relating the weaknesses and faults of themselves and their nation; their amazing harmony, though written in very different places and ages, and declaring things contrary to the natural inclinations of men; the attestation of these writings by vast numbers of important, public, and incontestable miracles; the sufferings of millions, endured with joy, for their steadfast adherence to the truth; the marvellous preservation of these writings, and the signal proofs of divine vengeance on such as have attempted to destroy them; their amazing success, prevailing over the lusts of men, and the furious opposition of worldly power, to the civilizing of nations, and convincing, converting, and comforting, the hearts of millions, even the most obstinate opposers; the exact fulfilment of their numerous and most circumstantial predictions—are incontestable proofs that they ONLY are the word of God, able to make us wise unto salvation, and to convey to us eternal life. 2 Tim. iii. 15—17.

Nothing asserted in scripture is contrary to the true light of nature, however far it may transcend it. It is no way absurd to represent spiritual things, and even God himself, by proper emblems, as the sense is easily understood to be figurative; and those figures, drawn from common things, tend to make us conversant with such spiritual objects. As God is the supreme proprietor of men's lives and estates, he may justly deprive them of them, when and by whom he pleases; especially, if by sin they have signally forfeited them into the hand of his justice. In this view, there was nothing absurd in his commanding Abraham to sacrifice Isaac; in his ordering the Hebrews to borrow from the Egyptians what gold and silver he pleased, and which was but due for their hard service; or in his ordering these Hebrews, as a means of deterring them from like impieties, to kill the wicked and idolatrous Canaanites, and take possession of their land. No scripture, if rightly understood, ever represents God as the author of sin, but as permitting it; and as wisely rendering it a principal part of punishment to the transgressors. None of the symbolical actions enjoined on the prophets, if rightly understood, are unworthy of God; whom, without blasphemy, we cannot think obliged to form his estimate according to the local fancies and customs of men. Nor might these actions appear so peculiar in the eastern countries as in ours; or, if they did, they were so much the more alarming. Every standing law of revelation, tends to the perpetual happiness of mankind, and honour of God; and each positive and temporary institution was, or is, calculated for the instruction and welfare of men, in the circumstances they then were, or are now found.

When promises, threatenings, or warnings have a condition expressed, or understood, the failure of the condition evidently infers the non-accomplishment of the event, conditionally foretold. In other matters there are sometimes apparent contradictions; but, if rightly examined, they cease to appear so. To obviate such, it is proper to observe, (1.) The transcribers of scripture may have sometimes inadvertently put one letter for another; or even a word, as 'Cainan,' in Luke iii. 36, where it ought not to be; but such mistakes may be rectified by comparing several copies together. (2.) Sometimes the same thing is said to be done by different persons, and in different places, because it was commenced in one place by one, and finished in another by others; or, the person or place had two names. (3.) In the computation of time, the account is sometimes commenced at one period, and sometimes at another: kings sometimes began to reign jointly with their father; and again began to reign by themselves alone: sometimes too, round numbers of hundreds, thousands, &c. are put for those which differ but very little from them. (4.) Different subjects may be treated of, though the words be much the same. Thus justification before God, is not by works, but only by faith; and yet justification before men, or the evidence of justification, is by works, and not by faith merely. Gal. ii. 16. James ii. 14. (5.) Sometimes a thing is spoken of absolutely in one place and comparatively in another. Hatred of men, especially of relations, is sinful, Tit. iii. 3; and yet we must hate our nearest relations in comparison of Christ; that is, love them less. Luke xiv. 26. (6.) In different persons or times, the same thing may be lawful and unlawful. Private persons must be pitiful, and forgive injuries done them; but magistrates must according to justice avenge wrongs. Luke vi. 36. Deut. xix. 21. Rom. xii. 19, 20. and xiii. 4. Circumcision, and other Jewish ceremonies, were long positive duties; but the observance of them, after their abolishment by Christ, was sinful. Gen. xvii. 9, 10. Rom. iii. 1, 2. Gal. v. 2. and iv. 9—11. Isa. lxxvi. 3. (7.) The same thing is often considered in different respects. Christ is not always with his people on earth, by his bodily presence; but is always with them in his spiritual presence. Matt. xxvi. 11. and xxviii. 20. He is one with the Father in his divine nature, equal to him in his person; and yet inferior to him, and his servant, in his manhood and mediatorial office. John x. 30. and xiv. 28. Phil. ii. 6, 7. Swearing by God, necessarily, and with knowledge, righteousness, and truth, is lawful; and yet swearing by God unnecessarily, or profanely, or swearing by any creature, is forbidden. Jer. iv. 2. Matt. v. 33. James v. 12. (8.) Sometimes the father is put for the son, as Abraham for Jacob: one for many, or many for one. Acts vii. 16.

Let us try how easily some seeming contradictions of scripture relative to history may be reconciled. The sojourning of Abraham and his family, from his leaving his native country, to their deliverance from Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years;

but from the birth of Isaac, it was but four hundred years, or little more. Exod. xii. 40, 41. Gen. xv. 13. Jacob's family, at their descent to Egypt, including himself, and Joseph and his two sons, were but seventy persons; and yet, including eight of the patriarch's wives, that might be then living, they made seventy-five, exclusive of Joseph and his two sons. Gen. xli. 26, 27. Deut. x. 22. Acts vii. 14. Abishai, as commandant of David's army, slew 18,000 Edomites, who came to assist the Syrians; or slew 18,000 Syrians at one time, and 18,000 Edomites at another time. And his brother Joab slew 12,000; or assisted in slaying 12,000 after Abishai had begun the slaughter, and cut off 6000. 2 Sam. viii. 13. 1 Chron. xviii. 12. Psal. lx. title. The Ammonites hired 32,000 warriors, part of whom fought in chariots; besides the 1000 that were with king Maachah. 2 Sam. ix. 6. 1 Chron. xix. 6, 7. David slew of the Syrian army 7000, that fought in 700 chariots; and 40,000 men, that fought at first on horse, and afterwards on foot; or rather 40,000 horsemen, and as many footmen. 2 Sam. x. 18. 1 Chron. xix. 17. Adino, or Jashobeam, might slay in one battle eight hundred, and in another three hundred. 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. 1 Chron. xi. 11. The number of the ten tribes was 800,000, and the 280,000 militia, which made near 1,100,000. The men of Judah were 470,000, together with 30,000 under the thirty renowned chiefs; in all 500,000. 2 Sam. xxiv. 9. 1 Chron. xxi. 5. and xxvii. Only three years of famine were threatened for numbering the people; but had these been added to the three for the murder of the Gibeonites, and a year of release between them, there would have been seven years of famine. 2 Sam. xxiv. 13. 1 Chron. xxi. 12. David paid Arannah fifty shekels of silver for the threshing-floor and oxen for sacrifice; but afterwards bought the whole farm for six hundred shekels of gold. 2 Sam. xxiv. 24. 1 Chron. xxi. 25. Solomon had 4000 stables, and in these 40,000 stalls; or had 4000 stalls at Jerusalem, and 40,000 in all. 1 Kings iv. 26. 2 Chron. ix. 26. Solomon gave Hiram for his family-use, twenty measures of oil; and to his servants 20,000 baths of oil. 1 Kings v. 11. 2 Chron. ii. 10. Solomon's workmen had 3300 overseers, and three hundred over these; in all 3600. 1 Kings v. 16. 2 Chron. ii. 18. Solomon's temple was founded in the four hundred and eightieth year after the deliverance from Egypt. 1 Kings vi. 1; and therefore the about four hundred and fifty years mentioned by Paul, must reckon the one hundred and eleven years of servitude along with the years of the judges, though they were comprehended in them: or these four hundred and fifty years must be the interval between the birth of Isaac and the divisions of Canaan. Acts xiii. 20. Hiram's mother might be of the tribe of Naphtali, and married to a husband of the tribe of Dan, who for some time resided in Tyre. 1 Kings vii. 14. 2 Chron. ii. 11. Solomon's brazen pillars were each almost eighteen cubits high, and the height of both together amounted to thirty-five cubits. 1 Kings vii. 15. 2 Chron. iii. 15. His brazen sea generally contained 3000 baths; but, if filled to the brim, it contained 3600. 1 Kings

vii. 26. 2 Chron. iv. 5. His Ophir fleet brought him at one voyage four hundred and twenty talents of gold; at another four hundred and fifty: or there were four hundred and fifty in all, and four hundred and twenty of clear gain. 1 Kings ix. 28. 2 Chron. viii. 18. Nothing was in the ark but the tables of the law; but the pot of manna, Aaron's budding rod, and a copy of Moses' law were laid upon the side of it. 1 Kings viii. 9. Heb. ix. 4. Other seeming contradictions will be explained under their proper articles.

That the scriptures have their authority from God alone, and are the foundation of the church; that they are a perfect, plain, absolute supreme, infallible, and only standard of faith and practice, are the testament of our heavenly Father, which it is the duty and interest of every man to read and understand, is no less manifest. 1 Thess. ii. 13. 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16, 17. Psal. cxix. 105, 130. Isa. viii. 20. Dent. vi. 6, 7. John v. 30. Acts xvii. 11.

By frequent and attentive reading of the scriptures, meditation upon them, and comparing one place with another, in singleness of heart, attended with fervent prayer for, and in dependence on the Spirit of God, to explain and apply them to our souls, we may attain that knowledge of them which is necessary to our salvation and comfort; but skill in the original languages, knowledge of history and philosophy, perusal of the most noted concordances and commentaries, if used in due subordination to the former, are extremely useful to obtain a more correct knowledge of the mind of God therein contained.

The best concordance to the Hebrew Bible, is that of Calasio, or of Buxtorf; to both which Taylor's is preferable for Englishmen; for the Greek Testament, the Leipsic edition of Schmidius; for the English, the accurate one of CRUEN; a new and most correct edition of which was recently published in royal octavo, by T. TEGG, Cheapside, London. The best commentaries are those of Calvin, Pool, Patrick, Lowth, Clark, Henry, Calmet, Gill, Guise, Doddridge, Ainsworth, Caryl, Hutchison, Schultens, Durham, Owen, Vitringa, &c. For common readers, Henry's is the most useful. Great numbers of commentaries on the Bible are either very dry or inaccurate, or they convey Arminian and Socinian errors. Nevertheless some of them contain valuable explanations of particular texts. Scarcely is any other so thoroughly evangelical, and so attentive to the connection as Guise.

BID: (1.) To invite. Matt. xxii. 9. (2.) To command. 2 Kings x. 5. God's bidding Shimei to curse David, imports his permitting him to do so, and suffering Satan to excite him thereto, for the punishment of David's sin. 2 Sam. xvi. 11. God's bidding his guests, imports his providential opening of the way for the instruments of his vengeance, to fall on and devour guilty sinners. Zeph. i. 7. Bidding one God speed, imports, wishing him success. 2 John 10.

BIER, a kind of instrument on which they carried dead bodies to their interment. It was generally used only for the poorer sort. Luke vii. 14. The rich were carried on a kind of bed sometimes very splendid. 2 Sam. iii. 31. Heb.

BIL'DAD, a descendant of Shuah, the son of Abraham by Keturah. He was one of Job's four visitants in his distress. In his two first replies to Job, he attempts to prove that God only punishes noted transgressors with severe afflictions; and insinuates, that Job's sore calamities were a token of his being an hypocrite. In his last, he celebrates the greatness and infinite purity of God. Job ii. 11. and viii. xviii. and xxv.

BIL'HAI. (1.) The handmaid of Rachel, concubine of Jacob, and mother of Dan and Naphtali. She committed incest with Reuben. Gen. xxix. 20. xxx. 3-8. and xxxv. 23. (2.) A city belonging to the Simeonites. 1 Chron. iv. 20. See BAALAH.

BILL. (1.) A promise in writing. Luke xvi. 6, 7. (2.) A bill of DIVORCE. When God asks the Jews, Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement, and to which of his creditors he had sold them? he either denies, that they were yet abandoned by him; or rather hints, that not he, but their own sins were the cause of the rejection of their church and nation, and of their being delivered up into the hands of the oppressing Chaldeans and Romans. Isa. i. 1.

BILLOWS, raging waves of the sea. Powerful armies are likened to waves, for their furious approach, and their overwhelming and ruinous influence. Jer. li. 42. Wicked men are likened to raging waves, for their unsettledness and inconsistency, Jam. i. 6; or their noisy and unsubstantial doctrines, and their boasting to carry all before them, and ruin every opposer. Jude 13. Grievous afflictions succeeding one another, are called God's waves and billows. Sent and ordered by God, they terrify, perplex, and threaten to destroy men. Psal. xlii. 6. lxxxviii. 7. lxix. 1, 2. and cxxx. 1.

BIND: (1.) To tie firmly together. Gen. xxxvii. 7. (2.) To fix in chains or cords. Acts xii. 6. (3.) To engage by promise or oath. Numb. xxx. 2, 9, 13. (4.) To restrain. Job xxviii. 11. (5.) To distress; trouble. Luke xlii. 16. (6.) To impose with violence. Matt. xxiii. 4. (7.) To inflict or ratify church-censures, by which men are restrained from full communion with the visible part of the mystical body of Christ. Matt. xvi. 19. and xviii. 18. God binds up men, or binds up their breach, when he protects, heals, delivers, and comforts them. Job v. 18. Psal. cxlvii. 3. Isa. xxx. 26. Ezek. xxxiv. 16. He bound and strengthened the arms of the Israelites, when, by means of Jehoash and Jeroboam, he recovered them to their former power and glory. Hos. vii. 15. The binding of them in their two furrows, sins, or habitations, denotes, their exposing of themselves to certain punishment, by their obstinate forsaking of the Lord, and the family of David; and their turning aside to other gods and kings; or the Assyrians reducing them to brutal slavery. Hos. x. 10. The binding up the testimony, and sealing the law, among the disciples, may denote the preserving of the truths relative to the Messiah's birth and office with great care and esteem by the followers of Christ, even while they were hid from the body of the Jewish nation. Isa. viii. 16. Men's binding God's law on their hearts, neck, hands, or fingers, imports their constant regard to it, and their consideration and practice of it. Prov. vii. 21. iii. 3. and vii. 3. Deut. vi. 8. The binding of the wicked in bundles, or hand and foot, and casting them into hell, imports their deprivation of all liberty and ease. Matt. xiii. 30. and xxii. 13. Christ's binding of Satan, imports his conquest and restraint of him. Matt. xii. 29. Rev. xx. 2. A nation is said to be bound up, when their deliverance is begun. Isa. i. 6. Jer. xxx. 13. The wind bound up the Israelites in her wings; the whirlwind of God's wrath, and the Assyrian forces, fast seized them, and violently carried them into captivity. Hos. iv. 19. Their iniquity was bound up, and sin hid; remained unforgiven, exactly remembered by God, and ready to be produced against them in judgment, and its punishment executed on them. Hos. xiii. 12.

BIRDS, or FOWLS, are flying BEASTS. Their bodies are covered with feathers: they have two wings, and a beak of horny texture: their females bring forth young by hatching eggs: they have no teeth, lips, or external ear; no lacteal vessels, kidneys, or bladder for urine. Some are ravenous, feeding on flesh; others feed on grain; some are birds of passage, which in the winter-season remove to warmer climates. Some are singing birds, others not. Some species haunt the waters and fens; others the dry land, woods, &c. The ostrich is the largest fowl of the kind, and the American humming bird the smallest. From the form of their beak, Linnaeus distinguishes birds into six kinds; the hawk kind, with hooked beaks; the plover kind, with bending beaks; the goose kind, with serrated beaks; the woodcock kind, with roundish and obtuse beaks; the hen kind, with crooked conic beaks; the sparrow kind, with thin conic beaks. The statement, that there are two hundred different sorts of birds, is probably exaggerated. None of them, except turtles, or young pigeons, were permitted in the Levitical ceremonies, unless perhaps sparrows were used in the purification of lepers. God prohibited the Hebrews from capturing the dam with her young, but commanded them to let the mother escape, when they spoiled her nest. He also forbade them to eat the flesh of a great number of them. Dent. xxii. 6, 7. and xiv. Lev. xi. The two birds taken to purify the leper, of which the one was slain over a vessel full of running water, and the other, being first dipped into the mixture of blood and water, let fly into the open air, may signify Christ's two natures, the one whereof suffered, and the other triumphed over death: and his two states; in the one he offered up himself through the eternal Spirit; in the other, he rose again, and ascended to glory. Lev. xiv. 3-7. The Lord defends his people, as birds flying: he looks down upon them with pity; he comes speedily to their relief, and covers them with the protecting influence of his power, mercy, and goodness. Isa. xxxi. 5. Men in general, are likened to birds and fowls. they are weak, easily ensnared, much tossed, and often wander from their proper rest. Prov. v. 7. vii. 23. and xxvii. 8. Lam. iii. 52. And they lodge under the protection, and are upheld by the support, of Christ, or of earthly rulers, as the kings of Babylon, Egypt, &c. Ezek. xvii. 23. and xxxi. 6. Dan. ii. 38. The saints are like birds, weak, comely, active, exposed to trouble, often wondrously delivered from snares, and employed in sweet songs of praise; and they rest under the shadow, and on the supporting branches of Jesus, the tree of life. Sol. Song ii. 13. Ezek. xvii. 23. Psal. cxxiv. 7. Our translation likens the Jews to a speckled bird, and the Chaldeans to ravenous birds; but might not the sentence be better rendered, Mine heritage is unto me as a wild and fierce hyena?—has abused my kindness, and returned me hatred for my love; therefore every ravenous beast is upon her. Jer. xii. 9. The Israelites trembled like a bird out of Egypt: their connection with Egypt tempted the Assyrians to destroy them. Hos. xi. 11. Their glory fled away like a bird from the birth, and the conception. Their power and honour were scarcely recovered under king Jehoash, Jeroboam his son, and Pekah, when, by means of the Assyrians, they were utterly ruined. Hos. ix. 11. The distressed Moabites, and David in his exile, were like wandering birds driven from their home, not knowing whither to go. Isa. xvi. 2. Psal. xi. 1. The adherents of Antichrist are represented as unclean and hateful birds, for their oppression, murder, and filthiness of doctrine and practice. Rev. xviii. 2. Those who ruin Antichrist, Gog and Magog, are called fowls; like ravenous fowls, they shall tear their persons, and seize on their power and wealth. Rev. xix. 21. Ezek. xxxix. 17. Cyrus the Persian, is the ravenous bird which God called from the east. He with his army swiftly marched to ravage and subdue Babylon, and other countries to the westward of his own. Isa. xli. 11. A bird of the air shall tell the matter; it will be published by means we never thought of. Eccl. x. 20. As the bird by wandering, and the swallow by flying, secures itself against the fowler; so the curse causeless shall not come upon the innocent person; or, causeless curses and imprecations shall fly over men's heads, without touching them, as these birds do. Prov. xxvi. 2.

BIRTH; (1.) The coming of a child out of his mother's womb. Eccl. vii. 1. (2.) The child or embryo brought forth. Job iii. 16. Israel's original, and our sinful state by nature, are called a birth, or nativity of the land of Canaan: their original was no better than that of the worst of nations; and they had the same vicious habits and customs. We are born polluted with sin, under the divine curse, and exposed to just punishment. Ezek. xvi. 3. The reformation of a land, or the remarkable increase of the church, is called a birth. Great trouble and difficulty attend the bringing it about, and profitable and pleasant is the fruit of it. Isa. lxvi. 9. and xxvi. 18. The children are brought to the birth, and there is no strength to bring forth. The reformation under Hezekiah was stopped by the Assyrian invasion: or rather, the condition of the Jews was then brought to such a crisis, that except God had immediately interposed, they must have been ruined. Isa. xxxvii. 3. The saving change of men's nature is a birth, or being born again. By divine influence and painful conviction, they have a new nature formed in them; are brought from darkness to light; become heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; and begin to live on the sincere milk of God's word. John iii. 5. The church and her faithful ministers, travail as in birth: by earnest prayers, laborious instructions, and patient suffering of manifold distress, they exert themselves to promote the conversion of men to God and his ways. Rev. xii. 2. Gal. iv. 9. Born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God; adopted into God's family, not because descended from holy patriarchs, or by sharing in circumcision or sacrifices, or because of any natural endowments, or cultivation of natural powers, or as acting according to human exhortations. John i. 13. Our spiritual birth is of God, is of the Spirit, and from above; that change being only effected by the power of the Divine Spirit, and therein a heavenly and spiritual nature like unto God is given to us. 1 John iii. 9. John i. 13. and iii. 3-6. Ishmael was born after the flesh, by the power of nature; Isaac, after the Spirit, by the miraculous influence of God's Spirit, when Sarah his mother was naturally past child-bearing. Gal. iv. 23, 29.

BIRTH-RIGHT, the privilege of a first-born son. Among the Hebrews, the first-born male was peculiarly the Lord's; had a double share of his father's inheritance; had dominion over his brethren and sisters; and succeeded his father in the kingdom, or priest-hood. Exod. xxii. 29. Deut. xxi. 17. Gen. xlix. 9. Numb. viii. 14, 17. Esau sold his birth-right to Jacob; and so Jacob had a right openly to demand his father's blessing. Reuben forfeited his birth-right, by committing incest with his father's concubine; and so his tribe continued always in obscurity, while his younger brethren shared the privileges. Levi had the priesthood, Judah the royalty, and Joseph the double portion. Gen. xxv. 29. and xlix. See FIRSTBORN.

BISHOPS, or OVERSEERS. The managers or directors of any business, are, in the Old Testament, called the overseers of it. Thus Joseph was the overseer of Potiphar's family, who took care to provide things necessary, and saw the servants went rightly about their work. Gen. xxxix. 4. It is said the name was first given to clerks of the market, who inspected what was bought and sold. It is certain that in every important work, as in the building and repairs of the temple, there were overseers to observe and direct the workmen. 2 Chron. ii. 18. and xxxi. 13. Under the New Testament, bishop, or overseer, is restricted to spiritual rulers. Nor when applied to mere men, does it ever signify more than a pastor or presbyter. No where are any but deacons marked as subordinate to bishops. Phil. i. 1. 1 Tim. iii. The very same persons are called bishops and elders, or presbyters. Acts x. 17, 28. Tit. i. 5, 7. 1 Pet. v. 1, 2. The name imports, that their business was to watch over, care for, and instruct the people. No man was to be admitted to the office, except he was blameless; the husband of one wife, if married at all; vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach, not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, nor covetous. 1 Tim. iii. Tit. i. Christ is a Bishop of souls: sent by his Father, he spiritually and effectually instructs, watches over, and governs the souls of his people. 1 Pet. ii. 25.

It is agreed by Stillingfleet, Dodwell, and others of the most learned Episcopalians, that the office of bishop above other pastors in the church, has no foundation in the oracles of God. During the first three centuries of Christianity, the pastors of particular congregations were so called; but the name was given by way of eminence to him, who, on account of his age or superior judgment, presided in their courts. In the fourth and subsequent centuries, the mystery of Antichrist began to work; and such was the ambition of the clergy in the more noted cities, that they never ceased adding dignity to dignity, one above another, till his Holiness ascended the summit, as their universal head. None of the reformed churches, except England and Ireland, have lordly-bishops, properly so called; but the Popish and Greek churches have such in their establishment.

BISHOPRIC, or OVERSIGHT; the charge of instructing and governing souls. Acts i. 20. 1 Pet. v. 2.

BIT, the snaffle of a bridle, which is put into the horse's mouth; or the whole bridle. Psal. xxxii. 9. James iii. 3.

BITE; to hurt with the teeth. Numb. xxi. 6. Angriely to contend with, and injure others, is called a biting of them: it is learned from the old serpent; it manifests malice, and spreads destruction. Gal. v. 25. Fearful judgments are compared to the bite of a serpent; they come unexpectedly, and bring grievous and ruinous consequences. Eccl. x. 8. Jer. viii. 17. Hab. ii. 7. The tribe of Dan bit the horse-heels, that his rider fell backward: six hundred of them suddenly attacked and destroyed the people of Laish. Samson by singular and unexpected strokes, cut off multitudes of the Philistines, and pulled down their temple upon some thousands of them. Gen. xlix. 17. The Jewish false prophets bit with their teeth: to please their hearers, they avoided mention of the approaching judgments of God; they spread their poisonous doctrines; they devoured people's substance, and murdered their souls; they reproached and persecuted the faithful prophets of God. Mic. iii. 5. Wine bites like a serpent, and stings like an adder: the immoderate use of it, insensibly but terribly wastes and murders the souls and bodies of men. Prov. xxiii. 32.

BI-THYNTIA, a province on the south of the Euxine sea, west of Pontus and Galatia, north of Asia Proper, and east of the Propontis. It was famed in the time of the Argonautic expedition, which might be during the reign of Rehoboam, if not much earlier. It is now called Becksangil; and, if cultivated, would be a fruitful soil. The towns of note in it were, Prussa, Nice, Nicomedia, Chalcedon, Libyssa, Therma.

When Paul first travelled toward Europe, the Holy Ghost allowed him not to preach here. Acts xvi. 7. But afterward a church was planted, and numbers of Jews and others believed. 1 Pet. i. 1. The centurions of Magdeburg trace the history of Christianity here till the tenth century: nay there still remains some vestiges thereof.

BITTER; (1.) That which is opposite to sweet, and very disagreeable to the taste. Exod. xv. 23. (2.) Very sinful, disagreeable to God, and hurtful to men. Jer. ii. 13. (3.) Very tormenting and distressing. Amos viii. 10. (4.) Fretful, malicious, outrageous. James iii. 14. (5.) With great vehemence and grief. Zeph. i. 14. Job xxiii. 2. The water used in the trial of adultery, is called bitter; not so much from its taste, as from its terrible and tormenting consequences, if the accused person was guilty. Numb. v. Great trouble, sadness, wickedness, resentful passion, and malice, are called BITTERNESS, to intimate how disagreeable and hurtful they are. Isa. xxxviii. 17. Job x. 2. 2 Sam. ii. 26. Acts viii. 23. Heb. xii. 15. Eph. iv. 31.

BITTERN, a fowl about the size of a heron, and of that species, though the colour is very different. The crown of its head is black; and there is a black spot near each angle of the mouth. Its neck is covered with long feathers. Its back and upper parts are beautifully speckled with black, brown, and grey; and its belly is whitish. It is common in fen countries, skulks among the reeds and sedges, and ordinarily stands with its neck and beak straight upward. It suffers people to come very near it; and if unable to escape, will strike at them, chiefly at their eyes. It flies mostly in the dusk of the evening, and makes a very strange noise among the reeds, and a different one when it mounts into the sky, into which it ascends by a straight spiral ascent till it is quite out of sight. Nineveh and Babylon became a possession for the bittern, when the spot was partly turned into a fen, or pool of water. Isa. xiv. 23. and xxi. 1. Zeph. ii. 14. But the KIPPON is by some interpreters rendered an owl, an osprey, a tortoise, a beaver; and Bochart will have it a hedge-hog.

BLACK, BLACKNESS, applied to gates, skin, face, raiment, imports great distress, bitter grief and mourning. Jer. xiv. 2. and viii. 21. Joel ii. 6. Mal. iii. 4. When applied to the hair of one's head, it signifies beauty, freshness, and soundness. Lev. xiii. 37. Sol. Song v. 11. With respect to remaining corruptions and afflictions, the church and people of God are black: but in respect of Christ's ordinances, imputed righteousness, and implanted grace, they are comely. Sol. Song i. 5. 6. To mark dread, fear, and perplexity, the Jews and Assyrians are called black. Joel ii. 6. Nah. ii. 10. Hell is called the blackness of darkness. How terrible is every appearance there! What eternal torment, perplexity, despair, and sorrow! Jude 13.

BLADE; (1.) The cutting part of a dagger or sword. Judg. iii. 22. (2.) The first growth of corn. Matt. xiii. 30. (3.) The bone in which the human arm is fixed. Job xxxi. 2.

BLAINS, burning blisters, or boils. Exod. ix. 8, 10.

BLAME; (1.) A charge of guilt. Gen. xliii. 9. (2.) To charge with guilt; reprove. 2 Cor. vi. 3. Blameless, or unblameable, without open fault, or allowed guile. Luke i. 6.

BLASPHEME; to reproach and revile God, by denying or ridiculing his perfections, word, or ordinances; and by ascribing to him any thing base or sinful. 2 Sam. xii. 14. Tit. ii. 5. Rev. xiii. 6. In an improper sense, men are said to be blasphemed, when vilely reproached and mocked. 1 Kings xxi. 10. Rom. iii. 8. Gr. Blasphemy against God, ought to be punished with death by the civil magistrate, and with delivery unto Satan by the church. Lev. xxiv. 16. 1 Tim. i. 20. What the unpardonable blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is, has been much controverted. The occasion of Christ's mentioning it, in Matt. xii. 21—31, has tempted many to suppose it lay in ascribing his miracles to diabolical influence: but when we consider also, Heb. vi. 4, 5. and x. 26—30, it appears that an obstinate and malicious rejection of Christ, and the whole plan of salvation through him, notwithstanding strong convictions of the Holy Ghost, is indeed this dreadful crime, which to deter men from presumptuous sins, God has fixed as unpardonable.

To BLAST; to wither; to parch. Hag. ii. 17.

BLAST; (1.) A storm of wind, or frost, that withers the fruits of the earth. Gen. xii. 6. (2.) A sounding of horns or trumpets. Josh. vi. 5. The blast of God or of his nostrils, is his alarming, violent, and destructive judgments. Exod. xv. 8. 2 Kings xix. 7. The blast of the terrible ones against the wall, is the noisy, violent, furious, and short-lived attempts of the wicked against the saints; particularly Rabshekeh's reproachful demand of a surrender, and Sennacherib's march of his army to attack Jerusalem. Isa. xxv. 4.

BLASTUS. See HEROD.

BLAZE; to report a thing every where. Mark i. 45.

BLEMISH, whatever renders a person or thing defective, or uncomely. To shadow forth, that Jesus our great Priest and sacrifice is complete, holy, harmless, and undefiled, the Jewish priests and sacrifices were to be without blemish, such as wounds, blindness, lameness, &c. Lev. xxi. 17—23. and xxii. 20—24. Scandalous professors are spots and blemishes; they are a reproach, dishonour, and plague to the church and company that entertain them. 2 Pet. ii. 13. Jude 12.

BLESS, in general, signifies, to wish or do well to, or speak well of. When God is said to bless, it signifies, (1.) To bestow plenty of temporal good things upon one, and make his outward affairs prosperous and successful. Gen. xxx. 27. (2.) To bestow both temporal and spiritual good things. Gen. xii. 3. (3.) To justify one, and make him happy in the full enjoyment of himself. Psal. xxxii. 1, 2. Rev. xiv. 13. (4.) To set apart things to a holy use, and render them suitable to that end. Gen. ii. 3. (5.) To give creatures a power of propagating their species. Gen. i. 22. (6.) To endow one with heroic courage, miraculous strength, and other gifts and graces necessary to his calling. Judg. xiii. 24.

When Christ is said to bless, it signifies, (1.) To give thanks to God, and to pray for his blessing on nourishment. Matt. xiv. 19. (2.) To recommend persons by prayer to the favour of God. Mark x. 16. (3.) In a way of thanksgiving to God, to set apart the elements of his holy supper to a sacred use. Matt. xxvi. 26. (4.) To save men from the guilt and power of their sin, and to bring them to God as their portion and friend. Acts iii. 26.

When men are said to bless, it denotes, (1.) To extol and praise God for his infinite excellencies. Psal. civ. 1. (2.) To give him thanks for his mercies and benefits. Psal. xvi. 7. and ciii. 1, 2. (3.) Solemnly to desire and foretell happiness to one. Gen. xlix. Deut. xxxiii. (4.) Solemnly to pray for, and declare God's readiness to do good to others. Num. vi. 23, 24. 2 Sam. vi. 18. (5.) Thankfully to value our great happiness, in having God for our Saviour, portion, and Lord. Isa. lxxv. 16. Jer. iv. 2. (6.) To salute persons, wishing them peace and prosperity. Gen. xlviii. 7. Psal. cxxix. 8. (7.) To pray for, and speak well of others. Luke vi. 28. (8.) Fondly to imagine ourselves wise, happy, and in friendship with God, because of outward prosperity. Psal. xlix. 18; or flatter ourselves that God will not punish our sins. Deut. xxix. 19.

God is blessed; is infinitely happy in himself, and adored with the highest praises of his creatures. 1 Tim. i. 11. Rom. i. 25. Christ as Mediator, is blessed, is admitted to the highest honour and happiness as God-man, and highly valued and extolled by all the saints. Psal. xiv. 2. and lxxii. 17. Men are blessed, have the curse removed from them, are justified, sanctified, and made happy by God, through Christ Jesus. Eph. i. 3. Those are blessed who are chosen of, and brought into near fellowship with God. Psal. lxxv. 4. Rev. ix. 9. Who have their sins forgiven. Psal. xxxii. 1, 2. Who are spiritually quickened, and raised from a natural state. Rev. xx. 6. Who know God, trust in him, and have him for their God, and strength; wait on him, and watch for his coming. Matt. xvi. 17. Psal. li. 12; lxxxiv. 12. and clix. 15. Rev. xvi. 15; and with a pure heart, fear and serve him, Matt. v. 8. Psal. cxviii. 1; and who, in the view of their own vileness and weakness, are poor and unworthy in their own eyes; who mourn for their sins and spiritual wants; who kindly submit to God's afflicting providence; live quietly under injuries from men, and render good for evil; who earnestly desire Christ, and his righteousness and grace; who exert themselves to induce men to make their peace with God, and with one another; who wisely consider the case of the poor and afflicted; are deeply affected therewith, and ready to help and comfort them. Matt. v. 2, 9. Psal. xli. 1. Such as are enabled of God to bear affliction patiently and usefully. Psal. xciv. 12. Such as diligently study the word of God, and with candid uprightness walk according to it; and avoid intimacy with, or imitation of the wicked. Psal. i. 1, 2. and cxix. 1. Rev. i. 3. and xxii. 7. The memory of the just is blessed, is honourable, useful, and commended. Prov. x. 7. Their hope is blessed; on good ground they expect endless blessings, nor shall they be disappointed. Tit. ii. 13. It is more blessed to give than to receive: it marks more abundant happiness, and is more praise-worthy. Acts xx. 35.

BLESSING; (1.) That which tends to render one honoured or happy. Isa. lxxv. 8. Gen. xlix. 25. (2.) Commendation; good wishes. Prov. xi. 26. and xxiv. 25. (3.) A liberal present. 1 Sam. xxv. 27. 2 Kings v. 15. Josh. xv. 19. (4.) Alms; free contribution. 2 Cor. ix. + 5. (5.) The means of conveying good things. Thus the Jews were a blessing, as Christ was born of them, and the gospel ordinances were by them communicated to the gentiles; and Abraham was a blessing, as he profited his family, and others around him, by his instruction and example; as his posterity were blessed on his account; and as he was the progenitor of our adored Redeemer, and pattern of faith and holiness to all. Isa. xix. 24. Gen. xii. 2. God's blessing denotes his favour and love, with all the gifts, graces, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, that flow therefrom. Psal. iii. 8. Deut. xxviii. 2. Psal. xxiv. 5. Isa. xlix. 3. Eph. i. 3. Christ is set up blessings for evermore: he purchased all good things for us; he has them in himself, and is the ready bestower of them on men. Psal. xxi. + 6. The blessing of Abraham come upon the gentiles, is free justification, sanctification, and eternal happiness in heaven, through the blood of Christ. Gal. iii. 14. God's leaving a blessing behind him, imports his reserving part of the fruits of the earth for his own worship, and his people's support. Joel ii. 14.

BLIND; (1.) Without natural sight. John ix. 1. The blindness with which the Sodomites who beset Lot's house, and of the Syrians who came to apprehend Elisha, were smitten, perhaps respected only that matter they were about, and not a universal blindness: the former, it seems, knew the way home; nor is it probable that all the latter were led by the hand to Samaria. Gen. xix. 11. 2 Kings vi. 18. (2.) Ignorant; without any proper degree of rational knowledge, whether in beathen darkness or not. Matt. xv. 15. Rom. ii. 19. (3.) Without spiritual knowledge. Rev. iii. 17. The Jebusites blind and lame, hated of David's soul, were not lifeless idols, but persons blind and lame, who, in a way of defiance of him, were placed to defend the walls of Jerusalem. 2 Sam. v. 6. Judges are blind, when ignorance bribes, or partial favour hinders them to discern what is just and equal in a cause. Exod. xxiii. 8. Teachers are blind, when ignorance, honour, or interest, hinders their discernment of divine truth, imminent danger, and seasonable duty. Isa. lvi. 10. and xlii. 19. Matt. xxiii. 16. People are blind, when weakness, self-conceit, hatred of brethren, or the like, hinders them from discerning divine things. 1 John ii. 11.

God blinds persons spiritually, when he withdraws clear instruction from them, and withholds the enlightening influence of his Spirit; gives them up to their carnal affections and pleasures. and permits Satan and his agents to deceive them. John ix. 39. and xii. 40. Satan blinds men, by promoting sloth and ignorance; by seducing to the commission of horrid crimes, till their consciences be seared; by bribing the affections with enjoyment, or hope of carnal advantage; and by representing truth as absurd or disagreeable, and error as sensible and lovely. 2 Cor. iv. 4.

Under the law, no blind or lame persons were to officiate as priests; no blind or lame animals were to be sacrificed. Did not this denote, that Jesus, our great Priest and sacrifice, should have fullness of knowledge, wisdom, and ability for his work; and that our persons and services ought not to be blemished with ignorance, weakness, or stumbling? Lev. xxi. 18. To direct men to himself as the true spiritual instructor, Jesus gave a multitude of persons naturally blind their sight. Matt. xi. 5. and ix. xx. Mark vii. x. John ix.

To BLINDFOLD one, is to cover his face that he see not. Luke xxii. 64.

BLOOD. (1.) A red liquor that circulates through the veins of animal bodies, and serves for the life and nourishment of the parts. 1 Kings xxi. 19. (2.) Death or murder, with the guilt thereof. Gen. iv. 10. Matt. xxvii. 4. (3.) The guilt of murder, or other ruinous crimes, and the punishment due to them. Matt. xxvii. 25. Acts xviii. 6. (4.) That which is purchased by taking away the life of the innocent. Acts i. 19. Nah. iii. 10. Hab. ii. 12. (5.) Natural descent, which has its rise and progress from the blood. John i. 13. Acts xvii. 26. But in the former text, it may also include circumcision and sacrifices. (6.) The juice of grapes, which circulates through the grape as blood; and is often red in colour. Gen. xlix. 11. (7.) Christ's righteousness, or obedience and suffering, is called his blood: his shedding of blood, was the finishing, and the most visible act of it. Matt. xxvi. 28. It is called the blood of the covenant, or testament, because it fulfils the condition, ratifies the promises, and purchases the blessings of the new covenant. Zech. ix. 11. Heb. xiii. 20. It is called the blood of sprinkling. It was represented by the sprinkled blood of ancient sacrifices; it is applied towards God, to satisfy his justice; and to us, to put away our sin, and protect us from divine wrath. Heb. xii. 24. Because the life of animals lies in the heat and motion of the blood; but chiefly to intimate, that the blood of Jesus, the price of our redemption and life, is no common thing, God anciently prohibited the eating of blood alone, or with the flesh. Lev. xvii. 10—17. Gen. ix. 4, 5, 6. The blood of sacrifices, is called the blood of the covenant or testament, as it ratified the national covenant between God and the Israelites, and typified the righteousness of Christ, the only proper condition of the covenant of grace. Exod. xxiv. 8. Heb. ix. 20. To be in one's own blood, signifies an unclean and destitute natural state; or a base and perishing condition. Ezek. xvi. 6. To drink blood, is to be satisfied with slaughter. Ezek. xxxix. 18. Isa. xlix. 26. Numb. xxiii. 24. To have blood given one to drink, is to be terribly murdered. Rev. xvi. 6. Ezek. xvi. 38. To wash or dip the feet in the blood of others, or have the tongue of dogs dipped in it, denotes the terrible vengeance that shall fall on the enemies of Christ and his people. Psal. lxxviii. 23. and lviii. 10. A man of blood, or bloody man, denotes one cruel, and guilty of, or given to murder. 2 Sam. xvi. 7. Frequently the Hebrew has bloods in the plural, to signify repeated or very horrid murder. Gen. iv. 10. 2 Sam. iii. 28. and xvi. 7. 2 Kings ix. 26. Isa. i. 15; xxvi. 21. and xxxiii. 15. Ezek. xvi. 9. and xviii. 13. Hos. iv. 2. I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth. The Philistines shall henceforth want power and inclination to murder and ravage in their wonted manner; nor shall continue in their idolatries, but be fearfully punished on account of them. Zech. ix. 7.

BLOOM, BLOSSOM, BUD; (1.) To shoot forth flowers; approach near to fruit. Numb. xvii. 5, 8. Job xiv. 9. (2.) The bloom, or bud itself. Gen. xi. 10. Ezek. xvi. 7. (3.) Glory, prosperity. Isa. v. 24. The blossoming of Aaron's rod, imported the continuance of the priesthood in his family, and the more lasting bloom and fruitfulness of the gospel, which is the rod of Christ's strength. Num. xvii. 5, 8. The budding of David's horn, imported the increase and continuance of the royal power over Israel, under him and his family; and the abundant prosperity of the spiritual power and dominion of Christ. Psal. cxxxii. 17. The glory and prosperity of the Jewish church and state, and the spiritual prosperity of the New Testament church, in the apostolic and millennial periods, are compared to the blossoming of flowers and fields. How pleasant and increasing the happiness! How delightful a token of the approach of full glory in the eternal state! Isa. xxvii. 6. and xxxv. 1, 2. Righteousness and praise spring forth as buds of the earth. Through the virtue of Christ's blood, what numerous converts are turned to the Lord! What multiplied blessings are granted to them! What fruits of holiness brought forth by them! What thankful songs of praise! And yet these are but foretastes of the glory to be revealed. Isa. lxi. 11. The rod hath blossomed, pride hath budded. To punish the abundant pride of the Jews, the rod of God's judgments, by the haughty and prosperous Chaldeans, shall quickly ruin them. Ezek. vii. 10. The designs of the Ethiopians and Egyptians to conquer their neighbours, were like a perfect bud, just ripe for execution, when the Assyrians came upon them, and ruined them. Isa. xviii. 5.

BLOT; a sinful stain; a reproach. Job xxxi. 7. Prov. ix. 7. To blot out living things, or one's name or remembrance, is to destroy and abolish. Gen. vii. 4. Deut. ix. 14; xxv. 19. and xxix. 20. Col. ii. 14. To blot out sin, is fully and freely to forgive it. Isa. xliii. 22. God's blotting men out of his book, is to reject them from being his peculiar people; to deny them his providential favours; and to cut them off by an untimely death. Psal. xxxix. 28. Exod. xxxii. 32, 33. His not blotting their name out of the book of life, imports his clearly manifesting their eternal election. Rev. iii. 5.

BLOW; a stroke; a heavy judgment, influcted by the rod of God's anger. Psal. xxxix. 10. Jer. xiv. 7.

To BLOW as the wind does. The blowing of the Holy Ghost, is the mysterious exertion of his power, to convince, cleanse, refresh, and comfort his people. Sol. Song iv. 16. John iii. 8. But God's blowing on what men have, or the blowing of his Spirit on them, imports his easy, sudden, mysterious, and full destruction of them, and blasting what they have. Hag. i. 9. Isa. xl. 7—24. With respect to war, the blowing of trumpet and cornet, imported the approach of the enemy; or a call to muster an army to oppose him. Jer. vi. 1. Hos. v. 8. The blowing of the silver trumpets, or rams' horns, by the priests at Jericho, and at their festivals, and on their marches to war, prefigured the preaching of the gospel, to conquer all opposition, and invite sinners to feast on Christ, and war against their spiritual enemies along with him. Num. x. Josh. vi.

BLUE; A colour, which probably typified heavenlyness, purity, humility, &c. Exod. xxv. 4; xxvi. 1, 31, 36, and xxviii. 31. Prov. xx. 30.

BLUNT. A blunt iron, is an emblem of a weak judgment, imperfect strength, and little opportunity; in which case, more pains and labour must be used. Eccl. x. 10.

BLUSH; to evidence shame in the countenance. It is a token of humility, and of a sense of guilt or imperfection. Ezra ix. 6. Jer. vi. 15. and viii. 12.

BO-AN-ERGES. See JAMES the son of Zebedee.

BOAR, an uncastrated male swine. The wild kind are extremely fierce and revengeful. The wild boar out of the forest, which wasted God's vine, was the Philistines and Syrians; or the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Romans, who, with great fierceness and cruelty, destroyed the Jews. Psal. lxxx. 13.

BOAST; to esteem highly, and to extol greatly, a person, or thing. 2 Chron. xxv. 19. The saints boast of, or in God, or GLORY in Christ, when they rejoice in, highly value, and commend him; and loudly publish the great things he has done for them. Psal. xxxiv. 2. Isa. xiv. 25. Sinners boast of God and his law, when they vaunt that God is related to them, and of their having and obeying his word. Rom. ii. 17—23. To boast of glory of one's self, or in wickedness, is sinful. 1 Cor. i. 29. Psal. x. 3. Glory not, and lie not against the truth; do not proudly and deceitfully pretend to have true wisdom and zeal for God, when you have them not. Jam. iii. 14.

BO-AZ, or Boo'z, a noble and wealthy Jew, son of Salmon and RAHAB, who dwelt in Bethlehem: and after shewing much kindness to Ruth, a poor Moabitish widow, married her, and had by her a son called Obed. As about three hundred and sixty years elapsed between the marriage of Salmon and the birth of David, some have supposed two or three persons of the name of Boaz; but a fourfold genealogy concurs to overthrow such a supposition. Ruth iv. 20—22. 1 Chron. ii. 11—15. Matt. i. 5, 6. Luke iii. 31, 32. Such a conjecture is uncalled for. Boaz might be born about sixty years after the death of Moses. In the one hundredth year of his age, he married

Ruth, and had Obed. In the one hundredth year of his age, Obed had Jesse. About the same age, Jesse had David, the youngest of his sons. Was Boaz a figure of our blessed Redeemer, who, though great and wealthy, thought on us sinners of the gentiles; and, after manifold tokens of kindness, espoused us to himself, as his church and people? Ruth i—iv. Isa. liv. 1—6. Boaz was also the name of the pillar that stood on the north side of the porch of the temple. 1 Kings vii. 21.

BODY, the material part of a man or thing. In the present state our body is natural; and in the future state shall be spiritual; that is, so refined, as to need no meat or drink; so active, as to be no clog to the soul. 1 Cor. xv. 44. The body is dead, because of sin; but the spirit is life, because of righteousness. Because we have sinned, our bodies must die a natural death, but through Christ's righteousness, the quickening Spirit of God shall make our souls live in heaven for evermore. Rom. viii. 10. Our whole man, and Christ's whole manhood, are called a body, because the body is most obvious and visible. Rom. vi. 12. Heb. x. 5; The last is called the body of his flesh, to represent it in its state of humility, and to distinguish it from his mystical body, the church. Col. i. 22. Christ's body may sometimes denote himself, as fulfilling all righteousness for us. Rom. vii. 4. Heb. x. 10. The church is called Christ's body: it consists of many members, or persons, united to him, and to one another by faith, love, and the ministry of the word and sacraments; and by him every true member is quickened, strengthened, and supported. Eph. iv. 16. Col. ii. 19. 1 Cor. xii. 12, 13. Our inward corruption is called a body of sin and death. It consists of numerous lusts closely connected; is of a base nature; and disposes men to seek after, and delight in carnal things. It is altogether sinful, the cause of sinful actions; and a chief ingredient of spiritual and eternal death. Rom. vi. 6. and vii. 24. The body of types, is what is prefigured by them. Col. ii. 17. The body of Moses, concerning which the devil disputed, is either his natural body, the secret burial of which Satan opposed; or his ceremonies, the abolition and disuse of which, under the gospel, he warmly strove against. Jude 9. The body of heaven in its clearness, is its unclouded blue appearance, with the unnumbered stars sparkling brightly therein. Exod. xxiv. 10. Other sins are without a person's body; that is, the body is only the instrument, not the object thereof: but fornication is a sin against the body; the body is both instrumental in it, and is the object defiled by it. 1 Cor. vi. 13.

BOCH'IM, a place where the Hebrews assembled some time after Joshua's death. Probably it was near SHILOH, where they met at their solemn feasts. Here a prophet came to them from Gilgal, or rather the Angel JEHOVAH in fashion of a man, and upbraided them with their apostasy from him to the idols Baalim and Ashtaroth; and with their neglecting to extirpate the accursed Canaanites; and threatened, that these people should thenceforth continue among them, and be an ensnaring and vexatious plague to them. This occasioned a bitter weeping among the people, and thence the place had its name. Judg. ii. 1—10.

BOHAN, a Reubenite, who it seems did some noted exploits in the conquest of Canaan, and had a stone reared to his honour, on the frontier between Judah and Benjamin. Josh. xv. 6. and xviii. 17.

BOIL. The foaming of the sea, and grievous inward distress, are likened to the boiling of a pot, to denote great disquiet, and overwhelming confusion. Job xli. 31. and xxx. 27.

BOIL, a burning, and painful tumour. Job ii. 7. Exod. ix. 9—11.

BOLD; courageous; with strong assurance; without slavish fear. Prov. xxviii. 1. Heb. iv. 16. x. 19. and xiii. 6. Eph. vi. 20.

BOND; (1.) A band or chain. Acts xxv. 14. (2.) An obligation, or vow. Numb. xxx. 12. (3.) Oppression; captivity; affliction, outward or inward. Psal. cxvi. 16. Phil. i. 7. (4.) The just laws of God or men, which restrain our sinful liberty, and unite us into one body, in church or state. Jer. v. 5. The bond of the covenant, is a confirmed state in the covenant and dispensation of grace. This secures our eternal happiness; binds us up in the bundle of life with Christ; and lays under the most deep and lasting obligations to be his only. Ezek. xx. 37. Charity, or love is the bond of perfectness. It promotes a close union among church members, renders their gifts and graces subservient to their mutual progress towards perfect holiness and happiness. Col. iii. 14. Peace with God, with our own conscience, and with one another, is a bond, which sweetly unites the affections, designs, and exercises of church-members. Eph. iv. 3. The bond of kings, which God looseth, is that majesty, power, and authority, which keep their subjects in awe and obedience, and which he sometimes takes away. Job xii. 8. The bond of iniquity, is the state of sin, in which, by the curse of the law, and our own corruptions, our whole desires, thoughts, words, and actions, are shut up to the service of unrighteousness. Acts viii. 23.

BOND, such as are in slavery and bondage. 1 Cor. xii. 18. Rev. vi. 15.

BONDAGE; (1.) Outward slavery; hard service and oppression. Exod. vi. 5. Ezra ix. 8, 9. (2.) Restraint. 1 Cor. vii. 15. (3.) Spiritual slavery to the broken law, and subjection to the oppressive service of sin and Satan. 2 Pet. ii. 19. (4.) A condition of fear, heaviness, and compulsion of the law on the conscience, causing us to do good to procure heaven; and to abstain from evil, from fear of hell. Heb. ii. 15. (5.) Subjection to the heavy and burdensome yoke of the ceremonial law. Gal. ii. 4. iv. 9. and v. 1. Mount Sinai gendereth to bondage: those who are under the broken covenant there published, or who are now under the ceremonial law, are by virtue thereof under the tyrannical dominion of Satan and their lusts: they abstain from sin, merely from fear of punishment; and do good, merely from hopes of reward. Gal. iv. 24. The bondage of corruption, to which irrational creatures are subjected, is their being instruments of wickedness, and exposed to the effects of God's displeasure with the sinners who abuse them. Rom. vii. 21.

BONES; (1.) The hard parts of animal bodies, which support their frame. Job x. 11. (2.) A dead body, 1 Kings xiii. 31. 2 Kings xiii. 21. (3.) The whole man. Psal. xxxv. 10. A troubled soul is likened to broken, burned, pierced, shaken, or rotten bones: its distress is very painful, lasting, and difficult of cure. Psal. li. 8. Lam. i. 18. Psal. xlii. 10. Jer. xxiii. 9. Hab. iii. 16. To be bone of one's bone, and flesh of his flesh; or a member of his flesh and bones, is to have the same nature, and the nearest relation and affection. 2 Sam. v. 1. Gen. ii. 23. Eph. v. 30. To pluck the flesh off one's bones, or to break and chop them, is most cruelly to oppress and murder. Mic. iii. 2, 3. Iniquities are in and on men's bones, when their body is polluted by them, and lie under the guilt or fearful punishment of them. Job xx. 11. Ezek. xxxiii. 27.

BONNETS. According to the Jews, bonnets and mitres are the same, and were made of a piece of linen, sixteen yards long, which covered their priests' heads, in form of a helmet: that of the common priests being round, and that of the high priest pointed at the top. Josephus says, that the bonnet of the common priests was made of many rounds of linen, sewed into the form of a crown; and the whole covered with a fold of plain linen, to hide the seams; and the high priest to have had another above this, of a violet colour, which was encompassed with a triple crown of gold, with small buttons of henbane flowers, interrupted in the forepart with the golden plate, on which was inscribed, HOLINESS TO THE LORD. These bonnets and mitres of the priests represented the pure and excellent royalty of our blessed High Priest Christ Jesus. Exod. xxviii. 40. The linen bonnets of New-Testament ministers, import their gravity; their subjection to God; the purity of their power, and the clearness of their knowledge and doctrine. Ezek. xlv. 18.

BOOK, a written register of events, or declaration of doctrines and laws. Gen. v. 1. Esth. vi. 1. The books of Moses are the most ancient in the world: nor does it appear that any were written before them. Josephus says, the children of Seth, before the flood wrote their discoveries in arts, in astronomy, and other sciences, upon two pillars; the one of stone to withstand a deluge; and the other of brick, to endure a conflagration; but the obscurity of his narrative, and the want of concurring evidence, render his account very suspicious. The books of Moses are called, the book of the law; and a copy of Deuteronomy, if not of the whole of them, was laid up in some repository of the ark. Deut. xxxi. 25. Men used anciently to write upon tables of stone, lead, copper, wood, wax, bark, or leaves of trees. Hesiod's works were written on tables of lead; the Roman laws on twelve tables of brass; Solon's on wood: and those of God on stone, probably marble. In very ancient times the Persians and Ionians wrote on skins. When Attalus formed his library, about A. M. 5770, he either invented or improved parchment. This, when written on, was either sewed together in long rolls, and written only on one side, in the manner of the copy of the law now used in the Jewish synagogues; or it was formed in the manner of our books. Some Indian books are extant, written on leaves of the Malabar palm-tree. I am mistaken, if I did not once see a Persian manuscript written on such materials. Books now, and for about five hundred years back, have been generally written on linen paper.

The book of the Lord, is either the scriptures, Isa. xxxiv. 16; or his purpose, wherein every thing is regulated and fixed, Psal. cxxxix. 16. Rev. v. 1. and x. 2; or his providential care and support of men's natural life, Exod. xxxii. 32. Psal. lxi. 28; or his omniscient observation, and perfect remembrance of all events. Psal. lvi. 8. Mal. iii. 16. The purpose of election is called a book of life: therein God's chosen ones are marked out for the enjoyment of eternal life; and every means of their preparation for it is unalterably fixed. It is also called the Lamb's book, because they were chosen in, and given to Christ. Phil. iv. 3. Rev. xiii. 8. Men's conscience is like to a book; it records whatever they have done. Dan. vii. 10. The opening of the books at the last day, denotes the manifestation of the purposes and words of God, and the exact procedure in judgment, according to divine purposes, laws, and real facts. Rev. xx. 12. Christ's opening of the sealed book, imports his pre-declaration, and exact fulfilment of the purposes of God, relative to the New Testament church. Rev. v. 6. and viii. 1. John's eating the little book given him by the angel, and its being sweet in his mouth, but bitter in his belly, denotes his consideration and understanding of it with pleasure: and his being deeply affected with the events therein grievous to the church. Rev. x. 9, 10.

BOOTH; a kind of tent, formed of branches of trees, for persons or cattle to lodge in. Gen. xxxiii. 17.

BOOTY, PREY, SPOIL; (1.) What a wild beast catches for its food. Amos iii. 4. (2.) What is taken by conquerors and robbers, who ravage like wild beasts. Job xxiv. 5. Isa. x. 2. (3.) The unjust forcing of men's goods from them, is called a spoil. Jer. xx. 8. and vi. 7. Of the booty taken from the MIDIAKITES, the warriors had one half, and God a five hundredth part of it; the congregation of Israel had the other half, and the Lord a fiftieth part; but this appears to have been no standing law. Num. xxxi. David enacted a law, that the troops which guarded the baggage, should share equally of the booty, with those engaged in battle. 1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25. The Jews affirm, that their kings had the whole spoil of a conquered king, and the half of the rest. It is certain, that Abraham gave Melchizedec a tenth part of the spoil which his troops took from Chedorlaomer. Gen. xiv. 20. The prey of the mighty and terrible, which Christ delivers, and divides with the strong, is poor sinful men, the captives and prey of Satan, which he has begun to devour; and which our Redeemer rescues from the hands of law and justice, sin, Satan, and the world. Isa.

xliv. 21, 25. and liiii. 12. God riseth up to the prey, when he exerts his power to destroy his enemies and rescue his people. Zeph. iii. 8. Isa. xxxiii. 5-8. God's word, and the blessings of the new covenant, are likened to spoil; they are procured by Christ's bloody conquest of our spiritual enemies; are very precious; and the obtaining of them occasions much joy. Psal. cxix. 162. and lxxviii. 12. The spoil of the poor, is what is violently forced from them. Isa. iii. 14. The spoil of beasts covered Babylon, when their brutal ravages and murder of the Jewish nation were returned on their head; and their enemies, the Medes and Persians, hunted them as wild beasts, to make an end of them; and as wild beasts ravaged their country. Hab. ii. 17.

BORDER; (1.) The edge, or hem. Exod. xxv. 25. Mark vi. 56. (2.) A coast; boundary. Gen. xlix. 13. The borders of garments enlarged by the Pharisees, were the fringes worn by the Hebrews, as a memorial of their separation to God's service, and subjection to his law. Matt. xxiii. 5. The church's borders, or hems, of gold, with studs of silver, are her divine ordinances; and the righteousness, gifts, and graces, of ministers and saints; which, being precious, exceedingly beautify and adorn her. Sol. Song i. 11. Her borders of pleasant stones, are her true and substantial members, pleasant to God, angels, and good men. Isa. liv. 12. Idumea is called a border, or country of wickedness. For 2300 years, barrenness and desolation have marked it as a monument of God's vengeance against the unbrotherly cruelty, and other wickedness of the Edomites. Mal. i. 4. Hamath shall border thereby, i. e. shall share in the same terrible punishments, as Hadrach and Damascus. Zech. ix. 2.

BORN. See BIRTH.

BORROW. Where our translation states, that the Hebrews borrowed things of value from the Egyptians, the Hebrew word signifies merely to ASK; and does not imply any promise of returning them. Now seeing God is the supreme possessor of all things, might he not transfer the right of the Egyptians to his own people, and require them to demand what he gave them? When the Egyptians had denied them their just wages, might not God, the supreme judge, allot them their wages, and order them to demand it in this manner. Exod. iii. 22. and xii. 35. To borrow money or goods, without earnestly endeavouring to pay in due time, is a token of a covetous and wicked person. Psal. xxxvii. 21. It is sinful designedly to injure what we have borrowed. Exod. xxii. 14, 15.

BOSOM; (1.) The forefront of the body opposite to the heart. Exod. iv. 6. (2.) The arms. Psal. cxxix. 7. To have one in our bosom, implies lying with; kindness; secrecy. Gen. xvi. 5. 2 Sam. xii. 8. 1 Kings i. 2. Christ's being in the bosom of the Father, imports his oneness of nature, equality of person, infinite nearness to, and full knowledge of all the secrets of the Father. John i. 18. His carrying his people as lambs in his bosom, implies his fellowship with, and tender and complete protection of them. Isa. xl. 11. John's leaning on Christ's bosom, imports not merely his lying next to him at table, but his being singularly beloved. John xiii. 23. Abraham's bosom is heaven; where the saints not only have the closest and kindest intimacy with that great patriarch, but with God in Christ, as a child in his father's bosom. Luke xvi. 22. As the ancients used to carry money, and what was very precious, in their bosom, a gift in the bosom, denotes one secretly given, and heartily accepted. Prov. xxi. 14. Wicked men are rewarded into their bosom, when their sins are heavily and sensibly punished. Psal. lxxix. 12.

BOSSSES; the thickest and strongest parts of a buckler. Job xv. 20.

BOTTLE. The eastern bottles were a kind of leathern bags, generally made of goats' skin, with the hairy side inmost, and firmly sewed or pitched together: the longer they were used, they grew the worse, especially if hung near a fire. Gen. xxi. 14. Josh. ix. 4—13. God's bottle, in which he puts his people's tears, is his kind observation and remembrance of their griefs; and his readiness to answer their prayers, and avenge them of their enemies. Psal. lvi. 8. The bottles of heaven, are the clouds; which contain, and pour forth rain and dew at God's pleasure. Job xxxviii. 37. Christ's disciples and weak saints are like old bottles, that can endure no pressure; and strong saints are like new ones, they can endure distress, and perform difficult work. Or the scribes and Pharisees are the old bottles, into which Jesus did not pour the new wine of his grace. Saints renewed in the spirit of their mind, are the new ones, filled with Christ's spirit and grace. Matt. ix. 17. David was like a bottle in the smoke, when he was wasted with grief and trouble, and rendered almost useless. Psal. cxix. 83. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were like bottles, when God poured into them the wine of his wrath, and burst and ruined them. Jer. xiii. 12.

BOTTOM; the lower part. Jonah ii. 6. The bottom, where Zechariah in his vision saw the myrtle-trees, might denote the low and flat country of Babylon; or the distressed condition of the Jews there, during or after their captivity; and the afflicted lot of the saints in general. Zech. i. 8. Hell is bottomless. What multitudes it contains! How dreadful and unsearchable, and perhaps ever increasing, are its terrors and torments! Rev. ix. 1. See CHARIOT.

BOUGH, or BRANCH of a tree. Judg. ix. 48. Christ is called the BRANCH, and the Branch of righteousness. In his human nature, he sprang forth of the root of Jesse: his human nature has no personality of its own, but consists as an ingrafted branch in his divine person: he flourishes, and protects his people with his shadow: he brings forth the highest honour to God, and greatest happiness to men; he is infinitely righteous in himself and in his acts; and is made of God to us righteousness. Jer. xxiii. 5, and xxxiii. 15. Zech. iii. 8. and vi. 12. Isa. iv. 2; xi. 1, and liii. 2. When he is compared to a tree, his boughs indicate his ordinances, and his protecting and supporting power and grace. Ezek. xvii. 23. The saints are likened to branches; they are united to, and derive their nourishing influence from, Jesus, as their root: they refresh and protect the world with their shadow; and bring forth fruits of holiness. John xv. 5. When they are compared to trees, their boughs, like the top of the palm-tree, are their heavenly graces and exercises, which are many, are closely and beautifully connected, and stand out of the view of a carnal world. Sol. Song vii. 8. In respect of spreading and beautiful appearance and influence, the Jewish church and nation were like boughs extending to the sea: but they and their cities were cut down and destroyed by the Assyrians. Psal. lxxx. 10, 11. Isa. xxx. 17. and xxvii. 10, 11. Kings and great men are likened to branches: they make a flourishing appearance, and have their favourites and subjects dwelling under their boughs, or laws; and depending on their protection and support. Ezek. xvii. 8. and xxxi. 3. Dan. xi. 7. and iv. 12. Cities desolate of inhabitants and trade, are likened to forsaken boughs, uppermost branches, turned dead, or burned branches. Isa. xvii. 9. and xxvii. 10. Joseph was a fruitful bough, or flourishing son, for his numerous and honourable offspring. Gen. xlix. 22. Children, or offspring, are called branches; being sprung from their ancestors, they are an honour, help, and pleasure to them. Job viii. 16. Sennacherib's bough was lopped with error, when the Lord, by a terrible stroke, cut off his captains and numerous army, as the leaves of a tree. Isa. x. 33. Prosperity is likened to branches; it is glorious, useful, and protecting. Dan. iv. 14. To put the branch to the nose, is to smell branches carried in honour of idols; or to smell the censer of sacred incense; or by sin to furnish fuel for the devouring wrath of God. Ezek. viii. 17.

BOUND; (1.) The end. Gen. xlix. 26. (2.) The border; shore. Job xxxviii. 20. (3.) A land-mark. Hos. v. 10.

BOUNTY. (1.) A disposition to give freely. 1 Kings x. 15. (2.) A free gift. 2 Cor. ix. 5.

BOUNTIFUL, much disposed to give freely. Isa. xxxii. 5.

BOUNTIFULLY; liberally; generously conferring many and great blessings. Psal. cxvi. 7.

BOW, a weapon of war, made of horn, wood, or steel; which, after being strongly bent by means of a string fastened to its ends, in returning to its natural state, discharges an arrow with great force. It is one of the most ancient and universal weapons; is found in the most remote and barbarous countries; and is sometimes put for weapons of war in general. Psal. xlv. 6. Probably the Hebrews learned the use of the bow from the Philistines; but did not much practise it till the days of David, who taught them to kill their enemies from a distance. 2 Sam. i. 18. To break a bow, or bow of steel, is to destroy the warlike power and strength of nations or persons. Hos. i. 5. Psal. xviii. 34. God's bow, is his power, wisdom, and providence; by which he protects his people, and annoys his enemies with his arrows of famine, war, pestilence; or the human instruments whereby he executes his judgments; who also are arrows to fill his bow: or the rain-bow, which he forms, in order to assure the world against the fear of a second deluge. Psal. vii. 12.

Zech. ix. 18. Gen. ix. 13. Christ's gospel-bow, is the scriptures, attended with his saving power; and the arrows shot from it, are its doctrines and influences which fly speedily, strike suddenly, secretly, and deeply into the souls of men for their conviction and spiritual conquest. Rev. vi. 2. Psal. xlv. 5. Wicked men are like a deceitful bow that is ill strung, which shoots wide of the mark: they are never in a proper frame for duty; never perform it properly; are never steady to their purposes and vows. Psal. lxxviii. 57. Joseph's bow abode in strength, and his arms were made strong; his faith, hope, temperance, and patience, continued so firm, as to overcome all opposition. Gen. xlix. 24. Job's bow was renewed in his hand: his continued prosperity and flourishing circumstances enabled him to defend himself and annoy his enemies; and he even waxed stronger in power and authority. Job xxix. 20.

To Bow; to bend downwards in giving homage, or from weakness or pressure. Gen. xxiii. 12. Eccl. xii. 3. Hab. iii. 6. God's bowing his heaven, or his ear, towards men, imports his infinite condescension and regard to them; his ready acceptance of their prayers, and granting of their requests. Psal. cxliv. 5. and xxxi. 2. Men's bowing before God, or towards an idol, imports subjection and worship. Psal. xcv. 6. Lev. xxvi. 1. Their bowing towards men, imports civil homage; or slavery and ruin. Gen. xxvii. 29. Isa. lxx. 12. and x. 4.

BOWELS; the inward parts of a human body. 2 Sam. xx. 10. Bowels, when ascribed to God, denote his infinite compassion and tender mercy; and the sounding or troubling of his bowels, are the powerful and secret working of his mercy towards his people. Isa. lxiii. 15. Jer. xxxi. 20. Bowels figuratively ascribed to men, denote their souls, or affections, 2 Cor. vi. 12. Philem. 7; or a person dearly beloved of us, as our very soul, Philem. 12; or strong affection and pity. Col. iii. 12. The saints' bowels are troubled for Christ, when they are convinced of their need of him, and are very earnestly desirous of him. Sol. Song v. 4. Paul longed after the Philippians in the bowels of Christ, i. e. with the most ardent love and tender pity, wrought by Christ's Spirit; and similar, though not equal, to Christ's love to men. Phil. i. 8. Trouble, pain, and boiling of bowels, import terrible distress and grief. Lam. i. 20. Jer. iv. 19. Job xxx. 27. The curse coming into one's bowels like water, implies the execution of its fearful effects on the soul and whole man. Psal. cix. 18.

BOWL, a large vessel for holding liquor. To drink wine in bowls, is to drink it with greediness, and to excess. Amos vi. 6. The bowls in which were received the blood of sacrificed beasts, might represent God's acceptance of our Saviour's righteousness; and the ordinances in which it is exhibited for the sprinkling of men. The bowls with which they covered the incense and shewbread, might denote the purity and continuance of Christ as our Advocate, and spiritual nourishment. Exod. xxv. 29. and xxxvii. 16. Eminent saints, and their holy exercises, are likened to bowls before the altar; they delight in living near to Christ's blood, are filled with his Spirit and comfort; live as in his sight; and aim at his glory in what they do. Zech. ix. 15. and xiv. 20. Christ's fullness of grace, and what he bestows on his ministers and people, is likened to a bowl, to mark its abundant plenty. Zech. iv. 2. But the word might be rendered, a fountain, or collection of springs, as in Josh. xv. 19.

BOX-TREE. There are six kinds of it. Its flower is of the apetalous kind, composed of several stamina arising from the square bottom of a cup of leaves. This flower is barren, and the embryo fruit appears in other parts of the plant; which, when ripe, is like an inverted vessel, and bursts into three parts; in each whereof, a case containing seed is found. This shrub is ever green, and is much used for ornamenting the hedges and borders of gardens; the wood is yellow, and so very solid and heavy that it does not swim in water; and so hard, that it can scarce rot, or be worm-eaten: and easily takes a fine polish. Saints are likened to box-trees, for their comeliness, true solidity and steadfastness, and the incorruptibleness of their graces. Isa. xli. 19. and lx. 13.

BOZRAH. (1.) The same with Bezer in the wilderness. It belonged to the Benjaminites, and stood in a plain about the south-east border of their country, not far from the source of the river Arnon. It was given to the Levites, and was one of the cities of refuge. Josh. xx. 8. The Moabites seized on it during the decline of the kingdom of the ten tribes, and it was called Bozrah, or Bostra. The Chaldeans plundered and destroyed it. Jer. xlviii. 24, 25. It was, however, rebuilt, according to some authors. A Christian church was early planted in it, which continued for many ages; and, till the ravages of the Arabians under Mahomet's successors, seems to have been the seat of a bishop. The Romish emperor Trajan highly favoured it, and called it Philippopolis. But it is probable this Bostra was considerably northward of that in Moab. (2.) Bozrah, the capital of the land of Edom, which might lie about one hundred and fifty miles south-west of the former. It was very ancient: Jobab king of Edom was a native of it. Gen. xxxvi. 33. The inhabitants of it were great herdsmen and shepherds. Mic. ii. 10. It was ravaged by the Assyrians, and afterwards by the Chaldeans. Isa. xxxiv. 6. Jer. xlix. 18, 22, &c. Judas the Maccabee destroyed a great number of Edomites in it. We know not whether the least vestige of this place now remains.

BRACELET, an ornamental chain of silver, gold, &c. to wear about the wrist or leg. Gen. xlv. 30. Perhaps faith and love are called the bracelets of the hands; they promote and adorn our gospel-conversation. Ezek. xvi. 11. The African and American savages are so fond of bracelets of coloured glass, that they will sell their parents or children for them.

BRAMBLE, a weak, spreading, and prickly shrub. Base and wicked persons are compared to it. They are planted in a state of wrath; they are hurtful to others; their fruit is sour and worthless; they kindle mischief in church and state; and are ready fuel for the flames of divine wrath. Judg. ix. 14, 15. Luke vi. 44.

BRANCH. See BOUGH.

BRAND, a burning stick. Judg. xv. 5. Joshua the high-priest and all other saints, are brands plucked out of the burning; from the furnace of their natural lusts and enmity against himself; from their state of fiery wrath, and of condemnation to eternal fire; and from manifold fiery troubles God mercifully delivers them. Zech. iii. 2.

BRANDISH; to cause to glitter; to shake in a threatening manner. Ezek. xxxii. 10.

BRASS, a hard, strong, and shining metal. The brass used in the erection of the tabernacle and temple, might be an emblem of Christ in his strength, purity, and humiliation; and of the outwardly mean, but firm duration of his gospel-ordinances. Exod. xxv—xxvii. Christ is likened to a man of brass, and his feet to fine or polished brass burning in a furnace, to mark his debasement, strength, and durability; and the majestic and terrible appearance, and the stability and purity of his works. Ezek. xl. 3. Dan. x. 6. Rev. i. 15. and ii. 18. Brass, when ascribed to hoofs, bands, bonds, walls, gates, belly, nails, mountains, kingdoms, &c. imports strength, duration, firmness, and warlike disposition. Mic. iv. 18. Sinners are likened to brass, iron, tin, and lead; and are said to have a brow of brass, to denote their unworthiness, baseness, hardness of heart, and impudence in sin. Ezek. xxii. 19. Jer. vi. 28. Isa. xlviii. 4. For brass I will bring gold; and for iron silver; and for wood stone; and for stones iron. In the apostolic and millennial ages, the ordinances and members of the church, and the influences of God's Spirit thereon shall be more excellent, spiritual, and useful, than under the Old Testament, and under Antichrist's reign. Isa. lx. 17.

BRAVERY, finery of apparel. Isa. iii. 18.

BRAWL; to utter outrageous language. Prov. xxi. 19. Jam. iv. +1.

BRAY; (1.) To cry as an ass or thirsty hart. Job vi. 5. Psal. xlii. 1. (2.) To bruise small; to torment unto utter extinction. Prov. xxvii. 22.

BREACH. (1.) A breach made in a wall by a battering ram or other warlike implement. Ezek. xxvii. 10. (2.) A creek on the shore, or hole in a rock. Judg. v. 17. (3.) A hurt, or bruise, of the body. Lev. xxiv. 30. (4.) Decayed and ruinous places. Isa. lviii. 12. (5.) A punishment or affliction, taking away of life. 2 Sam. vi. 8. (6.) Confusions, losses, contentions. Psal. lx. 2. (7.) Too early coming out of the womb. Gen. xxxviii. 29. (8.) Not performing of promise. But God's breach of promise, is not his falsification of his word, but the just interruption of its fulfilment on account of Israel's sin; and, it may be remarked, that God never promised that those who came out of Egypt should enter Canaan. The words may be thus understood: When your children are brought into Canaan, then shall it appear I have made no breach of my promise, as you have falsely charged me with. Numb. xiv. 24. Moses stood in the breach; Israel's sins had opened the way for the destructive vengeance of God to destroy them utterly; but the powerful intercession of Moses prevented it. Psal. cvi. 23. The iniquity of the Jews was like a breach swelling out on an high wall: it brought the righteous judgments of God just to the very point of ruining them. Isa. xxx. 12.

BREAD, being the principal article of men's food, is put for the whole of it. Gen. iii. 19. The Hebrews baked their bread on the coals, or under the warm ashes. 1 Kings xix. 6. Gen. xviii. 6. To this day, the Arabs, and some other Eastern nations, bake their bread between two fires of cows' dung, which roast it very slowly. The crumb is very good if eaten the same day; but the crust is black, burned, and tastes of the fuel. To represent the coarse provision and abominable practices of the Jews in Babylon, Ezekiel was directed by God to make bread of wheat, barley, beans, millet, and fitches, and to roast it with a fire of human excrements; but, expressing his great reluctance, God permitted him to use cows' dung instead. Ezek. iv. 9—13. The Jews generally used leavened bread; but, to commemorate their hasty deliverance from Egypt, before the dough was leavened, and to represent the purity and incorruptibility of Jesus Christ, as our spiritual provision, they at the passover, and in most of their meat-offerings, used unleavened bread. Exod. xii. 8, 15. Lev. vi. 16. Some think, that a basket full of unleavened bread stood beside the brazen altar, ready to be offered, or to be eaten with the flesh of sacrifices.

SHEW-BREAD, (or, bread of faces,) that which stood before the Lord on the golden table, at the inner end of the sanctuary. Twelve loaves of fine flour salted were set on it, it seems in two rows, every sabbath, and the stale ones taken away, and eaten by the priests in the holy place. These signified the continual dedication of the twelve tribes of Israel to God as his portion. They were also emblems of the saints, who, after they have served their generation, their week, in the church below, are taken away to Jesus himself, and others placed in their stead; and were figures of him as the intercessor, the full and continually fresh provision, for all the redeemed tribes of God. Exod. xxv. 30. Lev. xxiv. 5—9. Frankincense seems to have been burned on the table, when these loaves were placed, and when they were taken away; none but the priests might eat of them, except in cases of urgent necessity, as David and his men were in. 1 Sam. xxi. 3, 4. Matt. xii. 4.

Jesus Christ is called BREAD, because by a believing application of his person and righteousness, our souls are spiritually nourished. He is the true bread, which was typified by the ancient manna, and on which our souls are truly supported and comforted. He is the bread of God: his person is divine; and he is prepared and given of God to us. He is the bread of life, which begets, maintains, and perfects our spiritual and eternal life. John vi. The ordinances and blessings of the gospel are bread and wine: they strengthen, nourish, and maintain the life of our souls. Prov.

ix. 5. The saints, though many, are one bread; they are united to, and live on Christ; and are joined together to constitute his mystical body, as a multitude of grains to constitute a loaf. 1 Cor. x. 17. The Canaanites were bread for Israel; they easily destroyed them, and lived on their substance. Numb. xiv. 9. The children's bread, not to be given to dogs, was Christ's miracles, which were chiefly confined to the support of the Jewish children of God, and not vouchsafed to the unclean gentiles. Matt. xv. 26. Bread of heaven is the manna showered down from heaven on the Hebrews, in the wilderness, for their food. Psal. cv. 40. Bread of adversity and tears, is such affliction and sorrow as overwhelm the spirit, and render men careless of food. Isa. xxx. 10. Psal. lxxx. 5. Bread of sorrow, is a sustenance procured and enjoyed with much labour and grief. Psal. cxxvii. 2. Bread of affliction and water of affliction, denote coarse and scanty provisions. Dent. xvi. 3. 1 Kings xxii. 27. Bread of the governor, the salary appointed for his sustenance. Neh. v. 14. Bread of men, bread given by friends on the occasion of funerals to make a feast. Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22. Bread of mourners, coarse food, such as people used in time of mourning. Hos. ix. 14. Bread of wickedness, of deceit, of violence, of idleness, is that which is acquired by sin, by fraud, robbery, oppression; or is obtained in a way of sloth: or it is wickedness, deceit, violence and sloth, delighted in by the soul. Prov. iv. 17; xx. 17, and xxxi. 27. Bread pleasant when eaten in secret, is whoredom, and other unlawful pleasures. Prov. ix. 18. Bread, or bread and water, often denote all necessary outward things; they are a staff and stay, are necessary for the support of mortals. Matt. vi. 11. Isa. xxxiii. 17, and iii. 1. To cast bread on the waters, is to do good, and give aims liberally, without any visible prospect of a return: so shall we find it after many days; God's blessing, supporting, and prospering us on that account. Eccl. xi. 1.

BREAK; (1.) to dash a thing to pieces, or sever one part from another. Exod. xxxiv. 13. (2.) To punish, afflict. Job xiii. 25. And to break with breach on breach, is to afflict with one sore trouble after another. Job xvi. 14. (3.) To destroy, render useless. Psal. x. 15. (4.) To make void a covenant, or disobey a law. 1 Kings xv. 19. (5.) To take away. Psal. cv. 16. The breaking of the heart, denotes great inward grief and trouble, or a deep and genuine conviction of and sorrow for sin. Acts xxi. 13. Luke iv. 18. Isa. lxi. 1. To break up our fallow ground, is to labour for a deep conviction of sin and misery, that we may be reformed by means of God's word. Jer. iv. 3. Hos. x. 12. The breaking of the day, signifies the first appearance of morning light, Gen. xxiii. 25; or the first beginning of the gospel dispensation; and of the state of perfect and everlasting glory. Sol. Song ii. 17. Breaking of bread, signifies the giving and receiving of the Lord's Supper. Acts ii. 42, and xx. 7. To break up, is to open a passage into: so open a place for; to dismiss. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1. Job xxxviii. 10. Acts. xiii. 48. To break out, or forth is to discover one's self, and rush out with violence. Exod. xix. 22, and xxii. 6. To break down, is to demolish, destroy. Exod. xxxiii. 24. To break off sins by righteousness, is to repent and turn from them to God. Dan. iv. 27. The Breaker that came up and passed through, is Christ; who, by his incarnation, righteousness, resurrection, ascension, and intercession, has opened a way for us to everlasting life. Some think it is the Assyrian king and his army, marching to waste the country of Israel and Judah. Mic. ii. 13.

BREAST; (1.) the fore-part of an animal. Exod. xxix. 26. (2.) Paps, or dugs. Gen. xlix. 25. (3.) Favour, assistance; which, like milk, strengthen and comfort. Isa. lx. 16. Breasts fashioned, and hair grown, import ripeness for entering into marriage-covenant with God, as his church or people. Ezek. xvi. 7. The Jews having their breasts or tests of virginity pressed and bruised, implies their being seduced to, and guilty of spiritual whoredom and idolatry, sinful alliances, and the like. Ezek. xxiii. 3, 8. Their having whoredoms between their breasts, denotes their great desire after, and delight in whoredom and idolatry. Hos. ii. 2. To smite or tabor on the breasts, imports great affliction and grief. Luke xxiii. 48. Nah. ii. 7. To pluck off one's own breast, imports desperate anguish and madness. Ezek. xxiii. 34. When Christ is said to be between the breasts, it imports, that he is greatly esteemed, desired, and delighted in. Sol. Song i. 13. The breast and right shoulder of peace-offerings given to the priests, might signify the saints' spiritually feeding by faith on the love, the purposes, and power of our blessed Redeemer. Numb. xviii. 18. The breasts of the church are the two inspired Testaments, her ordinances and ministers. The breasts of saints, are their faith and love, their capacity and readiness to instruct, comfort, and edify others. Sol. Song iv. 5, and viii. 8. The Persian empire is compared to a breast, and arms of silver, to denote the prudence, humanity, and valour, with which it was founded, and the wealth of it. Dan. ii. 32.

BREASTPLATE. 1. A part of the high-priest's glorious apparel. It was about ten inches square; and consisted of a folded piece of the same rich embroidered stuff, of which the robe of the ephod was formed. It was set with twelve different precious stones, fastened in ounces of gold, one for every Hebrew tribe. These were set in four rows: in the uppermost was a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle, for Reuben, Simeon, and Levi: in the second, an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond, for Judah, Dan, and Naphtali: in the third, a lignure, an agate, and an amethyst, for Gad, Asher, and Issachar: in the lowest, a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper, for Zebulun, Joseph, and Benjamin. This was fixed on the high-priest's breast. By the two upper corners it was fastened to his shoulders: by the two lower to the girdle of the ephod. By wearing it he carried the twelve tribes, as on his heart before God. It is called the breast-plate of judgment, as it contained the Urim and Thummim, by which God directed the Hebrews in difficult cases. Did it not represent Christ's church and true members, fixed in their new covenant state, set as a seal on Christ's heart, and continually presented before God in his intercession? Exod. xxviii. 15-30.

2. BREASTPLATE, a piece of defensive armour to protect the heart. 1 Kings xxii. † 84. God's breast-plate is righteousness, which renders his whole conduct impenetrable to any arrow of accusation. Isa. lix. 17. The saints' breast-plate is Christ's righteousness imputed, which protects our souls from the curse and terror of the law, from the slavish fears of God's wrath, and from the fiery darts of temptation; and righteousness imparted, inward grace, candour, holiness of life, which contribute to protect us from carnal fear, delusion, or the like: or it is faith, by whose improvement of Christ; and love, by whose delight in, and cleaving to, a God in Christ, our souls are supported and protected against temptations, fears, and troubles. Eph. vi. 14. 1 Thess. v. 8. The iron breast-plates of the Antichristian clergy, are their delusive influence; their having the civil power on their side; and their exemption from obedience thereto; and their threatenings, curses, and censures: these encourage their spirit, and protect them from their deserved punishment. The iron breastplates of the Saracens, were their courage, undaunted fury, and impenetrable armour. Rev. ix. 9. The Turkish soldiers' breastplates of fire, jacinth, and brimstone, may mark their shining breastplates of iron; their minding nothing but fury and ruin; and the terrible cannon that fronted their armies. Rev. ix. 17.

BREATH, the natural receiving and discharging of the air by our nostrils and mouth. Job ix. 18. Our natural life is called breath: by breathing of air, it is maintained; and as a puff of air it is easily extinguished. Psal. cxlvi. 4. Vigorous courage and spiritual life are called breath. They proceed from the gift of God's Spirit, and render men active and lively. Ezek. xxxvii. 5. God's breath, is the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from the Father and the Son, and by whom they convey their influence to creatures. Psal. xxxiii. 6. Also God's power, by which, in the execution of mercy and judgment, he makes known his being, and easily fulfils his word. Isa. xi. 4. and xxx. 26, 28. King Zedekiah was the breath of the Jews' nostrils: by the assistance of kings, our life is preserved, and rendered comfortable.—Lam. iv. 20.

To BREATHE; to draw natural breath: to live. Josh. x. 40. and xi. 11. God's breathing, imports his powerful and easy formation of man's soul in him. Gen. ii. 7. Christ's breathing on his disciples, represented his inspiring them with the gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost. John xx. 22. The Spirit's breathing on the dry bones, imported his giving zeal, courage, and hope to the captive Jews at Babylon; his giving spiritual life and activity to his elect; and his quickening the bodies of saints at the last day. Ezek. xxxvii. 9. The saints' breathing towards God is prayer, by which our spiritual life is maintained and mani-festated, and our weakness, and pressure discovered. Lam. iii. 56. Wicked men breathe out slaughter and cruelty: they heartily hate their neighbours, especially the saints, and take pleasure to threaten and destroy them. Acts ix. 1. Psal. xxvii. 12.

BREECHES; the linen ones of the priests, and of gospel ministers, were emblems of modesty, humility, chastity and holiness. Lev. vi. 10. Ezek. xlii. 18.

BRIBE, a present given to a judge, to procure his favour; or given to a witness, to induce him to swear falsely. Amos v. 12. To have the right hand full of bribes, is to have received, or to be in readiness to receive a number of them. Psal. xxvi. 10. To shake the hand from holding of bribes, is utterly to detest and reject them. Isa. xxxiii. 15.

BRICK; clay kneaded or formed, and by fire hardened, into a kind of stone. With bricks the tower of Babel was built, and some altars to idols. Gen. xi. 3. Isa. lxx. 2. They were much used for building in Egypt; in being required to make them, especially when denied straw, the Hebrews were afflicted. Exod. v. Bricks are still much used in building, chiefly where they have no proper quarries of stone. The BRICK-KILN is a place for burning bricks into a proper hardness. Jer. xliii. 9. If DAVID caused the Ammonites to pass through burning brick-kilns, it was a terrible punishment. 2 Sam. xii. 31. The Ninevites making strong the brick-kiln, signifies their astonishing labour and hurry to repair and fortify the fallen walls of their city with new bricks. Nah iii. 14.

BRIDE, a betrothed or newly married wife. The saints and church are a bride; they are betrothed and espoused to Jesus Christ; they are adorned with the wedding garment of his righteousness; and rejoice in him. Rev. xxii. 17. and xxi. 9.

BRIDEGROOM, a betrothed or newly married man. Christ is called a Bridegroom. In the councils of peace, and in the day of his power, he unites his people to himself, rejoices over them, and feasts them with his love; and he will quickly come to receive them home to his heavenly mansions. Matt. xxv. 1-10. The sun is likened to a bridegroom, because of his glorious and cheerful aspect, as he rises, and apparently walks along the sky. Psal. xix. 5.

BRIDLE. Instead of it, a cord drawn through the nose, was sometimes used for leading and commanding camels, mules, &c. The restraints of God's powerful providence are called his bridle and hook. The bridle in the jaws of the people, causing them to err, is God's suffering the Assyrians to be directed by their foolish counsels, that they might not accomplish their intended purpose against Jerusalem. Isa. xxxvii. 20. and xxx. 26. The restraints of law, humanity, and modesty, are called a bridle: and to let it loose, is to act without regard to any of these. Job xxx. 11. Blood coming to the horse-bridles, implies the terrible slaughter of the followers of Anti-christ at the battle of Armageddon, or about that time. Rev. xiv. 20.

BRIEFLY, in few words. Rom. xiii. 9.

BRIER. See THORN.

BRIGANDINE, a coat of mail, composed of iron rings, to protect from the sword of an enemy. Jer. xvi. 4. and li. 3.

BRIGHT, clear; shining.

BRIGHTNESS, denotes, (1.) Shining clearness, as of the sun at mid-day. Amos v. 20. (2.) Great excellency, which casts a lustre all around. Isa. lx. 3. (3.) Prosperity and grandeur, which render men noticed and esteemed. Ezek. xxviii. 7. Christ is called the bright Star, and the brightness of his Father's glory. He transcends all created excellency; and, being divinely begotten is equal to his Father in glory, and excellence. Heb. i. 3.

BRIMSTONE, a fat oily substance, that may be melted and inflamed by fire, but not dissolved in water. It is extracted from the pyrites, or fire-stone, and is a principal ingredient in gun-powder. It is also very useful in curing scorbutic wounds, and in cleansing the bowels. There are four principal kinds of it, the yellow, green, grey, and red. God destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim, with fire and brimstone from heaven. Gen. xix. 24. In allusion to which overthrow, the scattering of brimstone on a place; the making it brimstone, or a kindled stream of brimstone, import the most terrible and ruinous judgments. Job xviii. 15. Deut. xxix. 23. The torments of hell are likened to fire and brimstone, to represent the noisome, painful, and universal nature of them. Rev. xxi. 8. Psal. xi. 6. The brimstone issuing out of the mouth of the Turkish horse, may signify the Turks' terrible use of fire-arms, chiefly of prodigious cannon, in their battles and sieges, many ages ago; and the fearful havoc they made of the nations. Rev. ix. 17, 18.

BRINK, the edge of a pool, river, sea, &c. Gen. xli. 3.

BROAD. God is broad rivers to his people; his fulness can never be exhausted; in him they find the most delightful pleasure and prospect, and the surest defence; he is sufficiently capable to destroy and overwhelm all that seek their hurt. Isa. xxxii. 22. His law is exceeding broad; it extends to every person and circumstance; requires innumerable things to be done, and as many to be hated and avoided. Psal. cxix. 96. His instituted ordinances are broad ways: they are plainly marked out in his word; multitudes have access to them; and in them multitudes of saints and hypocrites truly or seemingly walk. Sol. Song iii. 2. He sets persons in a broad place, when he gives them great liberty, wealth, power, and prosperity. Job xxxvi. 16. Psal. xlviii. 19. The way to hell is broad; multitudes of men walk in it; and by unnumbered sinful courses they arrive there at last. Matt. vii. 13.

BROIDERED, wrought with various colours of needle-work. Exod. xxviii. 4. Broidered hair, is that which is plaited, and put up on crimping pins. 1 Pet. iii. 9.

EMBROIDER, to work broidered work.

BROOK, a small river, especially one that flows only in rainy seasons, and ceases in the time of drought. The brooks mentioned in Scripture, as being on the east of Jordan, are, Zered, Arnon, Chereth, and Jabbok;

but Arnon and Jabbok, are more properly rivers, though considerably less than Jordan. The brooks in Canaan, westward of Jordan, are, the brooks of Jernel, Escol, Besor, Kidron, Gaash, Kishon. As the word NACHAL signifies both a brook and a valley, it is possible there might be other brooks which are rendered valleys in our translation. Nay, in a country so abounding with hills as Canaan, it is probable that valleys and brooks were seldom separate. The brook of the willows, to which the Assyrians carried the spoil of Moab, is either a small brook of the Arabians, near the country of Moab; or it is the river Euphrates, whose banks were much covered with willows; or it is Chaldaea, the valley of the wilderness. Isa. xv. 7. The brooks of defence in Egypt, are the streams and canals of the river Nile, which protected the country from the invasion, or rapid progress of an enemy. Isa. xix. 6. The brook running in the way, of which Christ drank, that he might lift up his head, was his violent and disagreeable sufferings, produced by the great rain of his Father's wrath, which ran in the way of his obtaining our redemption, and his entrance to glory; or the influences of the Holy Ghost, given to assist and support him under his scorching and fatiguing afflictions. Psal. cx. 7. Wisdom, or true religion, is likened to a flowing brook, because of the plentiful and necessary comfort which issues from them. Prov. xviii. 4. Brooks of honey and butter, denote great plenty of them; or brooks, the fine grass and mellifluous flowers on whose banks, contributed to produce abundance of it; or great prosperity in general. Job xx. 17. To deal deceitfully as a brook, and to pass away as the streams thereof, is to disappoint our friend when he most needs and expects our help and comfort. Job vi. 15.

BROTH. Broth, or fragments of abominable things, is broth made with the flesh of swine, or other unclean animals; or slices of the flesh themselves; or, perhaps, the milk wherein a kid had been sodden; and which the Arabs used to sprinkle on their trees to render them fruitful. Isa. lxxv. 4.

BROTHER. According to the ceremonial law, if an elder brother had left a widow childless, his next younger brother, if unmarried, was to espouse her, and raise up seed to his deceased brother; if he refused, the widow was to spit on his face, and loose his shoe; and his family was to be called, the house of him that hath his shoe loosed. What shame and contempt await those ministers and professors who neglect to be active in raising up a spiritual seed to the blessed Jesus, who died and ascended to heaven, ere he saw his church bring forth any considerable offspring! Deut. xv.

The Scripture uses the word brother, or brethren, in a variety of senses: (1.) Some are proper brethren, by immediate descent from the same parent, or parents. Gen. xlii. 13. (2.) Some are brethren by affinity, kindred, or nation; so Abraham and Lot were brethren; thus all the Israelites, and even the Edomites, were brethren. Deut. xxiii. 7, 19. (3.) By common participation of the human nature; thus all men are brethren. 1 Thess. iv. 6. 1 John v. 16. (4.) In having the same religious profession; so all proessed Christians are brethren. Col. i. 2. (5.) In being members of the same spiritual family of God by regeneration and adoption; so all the saints are brethren. 1 John iii. 14, 16. (6.) In bearing the same office; so gospel-ministers are brethren. 2 Cor. viii. 3. (7.) By joint performance of the same work; so Simeon and Levi were brethren in iniquity. Gen. xlix. 5. (8.) In strong affection, or mutual covenant; so Jonathan and David were brethren. 2 Sam. i. 26. In this sense Ahab calls Benhadad his brother. 1 Kings xx. 32. One who dearly loves Wisdom, calls her his sister, or kinswoman. Prov. vii. 4. (9.) In resemblance of condition or conduct. The Hebrews called any thing like to or connected with another, a brother. Exod. xxv. 2, 20. Joel ii. 8. Ezek. xxvi. 3, 5, 17. Thus Job was a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls; he was in a very deplorable case, and indulged the most doleful mourning. He said to corruption, Thou art my father; and to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister; he reckoned himself extremely mean, sprung from dust, and fast hastening to the grave, where worms should be his companions and devourers. Job xxx. 29. and xvii. 14. The slothful is brother to him that is a great waster; his conduct has the same tendency to poverty and want. Prov. xviii. 9. Christ is our brother; he partakes of our nature, loves, delights in, and does us good. Sol. Song viii. 1. The saints are Christ's brethren; they are spiritually begotten by his Father; they love him, and are zealous for his interests. Matt. xii. 5. False brethren, are such as pretended to be preachers and apostles, but heartily hated such as were truly so. Gal. ii. 4. A brother is born for adversity; he should then peculiarly discover his love by sympathy, help, and comfort of his distressed relations. Prov. xvii. 17. To stick closer than a brother, is in adversity to befriend another, even at the hazard of our wealth, reputation, or life. Prov. xviii. 24. The Jews did not lament Jehoiakim, saying, Ah my brother! Ah lord! Ah his glory! i. e. Alas! brother, how are we distressed by the death of our beloved king! Alas! our lord, our governor, is cut off! Alas! his glory is quite abolished! Jer. xxiii. 18. The duty of brethren in every lawful connection, is mutual love, unity, and honouring of one another. Psal. cxxxiii. 1. 1 John iii. 14. SISTER, among females, has much the same extent of signification as BROTHER among males. It is taken not only for a sister, properly so called, but for a woman nearly related, or professing the same religion. Sarah is called Abraham's sister, though at most but his half-sister, or rather his niece, daughter of Haran his brother, Gen. xx. 12. Christ's cousins, the daughters of his mother's sister, are called his sisters. Mark vi. 3. Women, who were fellow-professors of Christianity, are called sisters. Rom. xvi. 1. 2 John 13. 1 Cor. vii. 15. and ix. 5. James ii. 15. In the latter passage it may be taken for any woman in general: and so when God forbids the Jews to take a wife to her sister, to grieve her in her life time, it implies a prohibition against marrying a second wife, during the life-time of the first. Lev. xviii. 18. Jerusalem, Samaria, and Sodom, are called sisters, because the inhabitants of those places were so similar in wickedness. Jer. lili. 8, 10. Ezek. xvi. 46. The gentiles are called the Jews' little sister; they possessed the same human nature, and, however unlikely it was for many ages, they were to be brought into the same state of church-fellowship with God in Christ. Sol. Song viii. 8. The saints are called Christ's sisters; they possess the same human nature; they are spiritually begotten by his Father, and are made like him in grace. How dearly he loves, protects, and carefully provides for them! Sol. Song iv. 9, 10—12. Matt. xii. 50.

BROTHERHOOD, the fellowship of brethren. Zech. xi. 14. 1 Pet. ii. 17.

BROTHERLY, that which pertains to, and becomes brethren. Brotherly kindness, or love, is what is most tender and affectionate; and chiefly denotes our esteeming, delighting in, sympathizing with, and helping and comforting the saints on account of their relation and likeness to Christ. Rom. xii. 10. 2 Pet. i. 7. The brotherly covenant with the Jews, which the Edomites despised, was their original relation by descent from Isaac; their covenant of subjection, when conquered by David; and perhaps some latter alliance. Amos i. 9.

BROW, the forehead of a person, and front of a hill. Luke iv. 29. To have a brow of brass, imports obstinacy, impudence, and boldness in sin. Isa. xlviii. 4.

BRUISE; (1.) To crush. Isa. xxviii. 23. (2.) To injure; oppress. Lam. iv. 18. (3.) To afflict; punish. Isa. liii. 5. (4.) To distress; destroy. Dan. ii. 40. The bruise of a body, is a hurt received by crushing. Luke ix. 39. The bruise of a soul, implies doubts, fears, anguish, and inward trouble, on account of the prevalence of sin. God's wrath, &c. Matt. xii. 40. The bruise of a city or nation, is their prevalent wickedness, or the decayed and disjointed frame of their civil constitution. Isa. i. 6. Jer. vi. 14. and xxx. 12.

Nothing bruised or broken was to be offered in sacrifice. Did this prefigure Jesus offering himself wholly to God, as a sacrifice of infinite completeness and value; and teach us to honour God with the most strong and perfect faith, love, and holy obedience? Lev. xxii. 24.

God bruised Christ, by inflicting on his soul and body the fearful punishment due to our sins. Isa. liii. 5, 10. Christ bruises Satan's head, when he crushes his designs, spoils him of his power, triumphs over him on the cross, or in the conquest of his chosen; and when he enables his people to oppose, conquer, and tread his temptations under foot. Satan bruises Christ's heel, in harassing his humble manhood, and afflicting his members on earth. Gen. iii. 15. Rom. xvi. 20. Weak saints and their feeble graces, are bruised, or bruised reeds, which Christ will not break; they are trodden down and afflicted by Satan, by false teachers, by the world, and their own lusts, and are in a painful and disjointed state, unable to oppose their spiritual enemies; but Jesus will protect, heal, comfort and deliver them. Isa. xlii. 3. Luke iv. 18. The king of Egypt is called a bruised reed, to mark the weak and broken state of his kingdom, and his utter inability to help such as depended on him. 2 Kings xviii. 21.

BRUIT, report. Jer. v. 22. Nah. iii. 19.

BRUTE, an irrational animal. Brutish persons are those, who, like beasts, are stupid, untractable, carnally minded, and cruel. Psal. xlix. 10. Brutish counsel, is that which is quite foolish and unreasonable. Isa. xix. 11.

BUCKET, a vessel to carry water in, or to draw it up from a well. Isa. xl. 15. God's bucket is the clouds, in which he collects, and from whence he pours rain, hail, and snow. Numb. xxiv. 7.

BUCKLER, SHIELD, TARGET. The Hebrews have two words, MAGEN and TZINNAH, for shield and buckler, or target; but what the difference between them was we do not certainly know, as the greatest masters of the Hebrew language plainly confound them. It is certain that the TZINNOTH, bucklers, or targets, made by Solomon, consisted of six hundred shekels of gold; whereas the MAGINOTH, or shields, consisted but of three hundred. 1 Kings x. 16, 17. 2 Chron. ix. 15, 16. Perhaps all the difference might be, that the one was larger than the other. The buckler, or shield, was a piece of defensive armour, wielded by the left hand, in the manner of the Highlanders' targets, to ward off the blows of arrows, swords, or spears, wherever they threatened to strike. The more common materials of the ancient shields was a round board, overlaid with folds of leather; but sometimes they were of gold, brass, &c. Conquerors sometimes hung up the bucklers they took from their principal enemies on towers, or in temples, as trophies of victory. David's tower had 1000 shields hung up in it. Sol. Song iv. 4. Solomon made two hundred larger, and three hundred lesser bucklers of solid gold, and hung them up in the house of the forest of Lebanon, to be used, probably by his life guard in solemn processions. These Shishak carried off, and Rehoboam made others of brass to serve in their stead. 1 Kings x. 16, 17. and xiv. 26, 27. God's taking hold of shield and buckler, imports the interposition of his providence, for the protection and deliverance of his people, and for the destruction of his enemies. Psal. xxxv. 2. God is the shield and buckler of his people; his truth and favour are their shield and buckler; and he bestows on them the shield of salvation. In accomplishing his promises to them, and his threatenings against their enemies, he kindly and affectionately encourages, protects, saves, and delivers them. Psal. xviii. 2, 35. xci. 4. and v. 12. Rulers in church or state are the Lord's shields; by them he protects and delivers nations and churches. Psal. xlvii. 9. The same word is rendered rulers, Hos. iv. 18. Faith is a shield; by an application of Christ's righteousness, power, and fulness, it encourages the heart, and prevents the darts and temptations of sin, Satan, and the world, from hurting the soul. Eph. vi. 16. The thousand bucklers connected with the neck of the church, are the perfections, promises, truths, and providences, of God exhibited in scripture, improved by ministers for the defence of truth, and applied by faith for the defence of the soul. Sol. Song iv. 4.

BUD. See BLoom.

BUFFET; to beat; harass. 1 Cor. iv. 11. Satan and his agents buffet the saints, by strong temptations, atheistical suggestions, and other afflictions of soul or body. 2 Cor. xii. 7.

BUILD; to erect a house, wall, or any thing else, in a similar manner. Dent. xxviii. 30. God's building of all things, is his wise and powerful creation of them, in proper connection and order. Heb. iii. 4. and xi. 10. His building up a person, imports his giving him children, wealth, or prosperity. Job xxii. 23. His building up families, cities, and nations, denotes his increasing their number, wealth, honour, power, and pleasure. 1 Chron. xvii. 10. Psal. lxi. 35. Jer. xlviii. 9. His building of David's throne, imports his upholding and prospering him and his seed, in the kingly office over the Israelites; but chiefly, his enlarging and perpetuating the glory of Christ and his church. Psal. lxxxix. 4. His building the walls of Jerusalem, or Zion, imports not only his giving prosperity to the Jewish nation and church, but his giving spiritual increase and prosperity to the church in every age. Psal. li. 18. Christ's building of his temple, or church, implies his giving himself up to death, that he might be her foundation; his establishing her system of doctrine, worship, discipline, and government; his abolishing notorious ignorance, idolatry, and impiety, and convincing, turning, and uniting men to himself, as their support; his connecting them by mutual love, profession and engagement to one another; and daily enabling them, by his grace, to increase in all holy dispositions and practices. Matt. xvi. 18. Zech. vi. 13. Eph. ii. 22. Acts xx. 32. The church is built in Christ: her true members are spiritually united to him, as their legal and mystical head, and cleave to him by faith and love; and are supported and strengthened by his Spirit and gracious influence. Col. ii. 7. Eph. ii. 21, 22. She is built on Christ; his person and righteousness, and truth, as declared by his prophets and apostles, are her true foundation; and in connection with him her whole fabric consists. Eph. ii. 20. 1 Cor. iii. 11. She is built to the Lord, to display his excellencies, and maintain his honour. Jer. xxxi. 38. The apostles, as master-builders, and ordinary pastors, as inferior ones, build up the church: by evangelical preaching, they lay the foundation of gospel doctrine, the sum of which is, Christ and him crucified; and they promote attendance to her divine rules of worship, discipline, and government. 1 Cor. iii. 10—14. 1 Pet. ii. 7. The saints build up themselves in their most holy faith; they more fully consider, more firmly believe, and more diligently practise divine truths; and, receiving out of Christ's fulness, increase in faith, love, and every other grace. Jude 20. Magistrates build up a state; they devise, establish, and execute good laws; and so promote the felicity and honour of the people. Ezek. xxvii. 4. Mothers build up families, by bringing forth children to enlarge and perpetuate them. Ruth iv. 11. In promoting the honour and the glory thereof. Prov. xiv. 1. The building of old wastes, in consequence of Christ's mission, is the conversion of the heathen world to him and his church. Isa. lxi. 4. and xlix. 8. The method of our redemption is called a building of mercy: with infinite wisdom, and according to the exceeding riches of God's grace it is devised, and gradually carried on, in the humiliation, exaltation, and work of Christ, and the gathering of sinners to him, until it shall issue in the perfect and eternal height of glory. Psal. lxxxix. 2. The ceremonial law, the state of glory, and the church, are a building: with great wisdom, power, and care, they are gradually set up and completed. Heb. ix. 11. 2 Cor. v. 1. 1 Cor. iii. 9. To build again what we once destroyed, is to return to those ceremonies and sinful practices we once relinquished. Gal. ii. 18.

BUL, the eighth month of the Jewish sacred year, and second of their civil. It answers partly to our October, and has twenty-nine days. On the sixth day of this month, the Jews fast for Zedekiah's loss of his eyes, and the murder of his children. 2 Kings xxv. 7. On the fifteenth day of it, Jeroboam fixed his idolatrous festival, opposed to the feast of tabernacles in the preceding month. 1 Kings xii. 32. On the seventeenth day of it, the flood began. On the twenty-seventh of it, next year, Noah, and the other living creatures, came out of the ark, after the flood was dried up. Gen. vii. 11. and viii. 14. In this month, the building of Solomon's temple was finished; but of the day we are not informed. 1 Kings vi. 38.

BULL, BULLOCK, OX. The Jews never castrated any of their animals, nor do the Mahometans to this day. Their oxen were therefore bulls, properly so called. Besides the tame kind, whose strength, fierceness, and pushing with their horns in fighting, are known, there is a wild kind of bulls, said to be very large, swift, and fierce; and to dwell in the large woods of Livonia and Ethiopia. Another kind of wild bulls, or buffaloes, are often tamed; and by an iron ring in their nose, are made to submit to the plough, though they never entirely lose their natural fierceness. Multitudes of these, or of a like kind, run wild in America; they are fiercer, their hair more shaggy, and their bodies larger than the common. But Hochart and others, will have the THAU or TRO to mean, not a wild ox or bull, but a wild goat. Deut. xiv. 5. Isa. li. 20.

With the Hebrews, bulls were clean animals. If one stole an ox, and killed or sold it, he was to return fivefold: if it was found in his hand, he restored double. A strayed ox or ass was to be brought back to the owner. If a man left his well or pit uncovered, and an ox or ass fell into it, and perished, the owner of the well got his flesh, and paid his price to the owner. If an ox gored another to death, the flesh of the dead, and the price of the living, was to be equally divided between the two owners; but if the ox had been wont to gore, his master had the price of the dead ox to pay to his owner. When an ox gored any person to death, he was stoned, and his flesh not eaten; but if he had been known to gore formerly, he, and his master who did not shut him up, were both stoned to death. If an ox or ass was lost by the keeper's negligence, or if, when borrowed, it died in the absence of the proprietor, the keeper, or borrower, was to make restitution. To inculcate tenderness to useful animals, and to teach the duty of affording proper subsistence to ministers, the ox that trod out the corn was never to be muzzled. To teach the impropriety of unequal marriages, and other connections, and of laborious ministers connecting themselves with such as are lazy and slothful, and of an unequal practice in life, an ox was never to be yoked with an ass. Exod. xxi. 22. Deut. xxv. 4. and xxii. 10.

Bullocks were often sacrificed for burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and sometimes for sin-offerings. These represented the pure, patient, strong, and laborious Redeemer, sacrificed for us. Heb. ix. 13, 14. The twelve brazen oxen which supported Solomon's brazen sea, might signify the twelve apostles, and their successors in the gospel-ministry, who, with much patience and labour, exhibit Jesus as the great means of purification from sin. 1 Kings vii. 25, 44. Jer. lii. 20. And are not such the labouring oxen and asses that eat clean provender, while they patiently labour in God's service, feed on his pure word, and eminent fellowship with him? Isa. xxxii. 20. and xxx. 24. Saints, but chiefly ministers, are compared to oxen: they are by nature equally perverse with others, but when converted, how tame, patient, and laborious! and how often appointed to slaughter by the wicked! Jer. xi. 19. Isa. xi. 7. and lxxv. 25. Rev. iv. 7. The glory of Joseph was like that of the firstling bullock: How numerous, powerful, prosperous, and joyful were his seed! How devoted to God, whose sanctuary was long fixed at Shiloh among them! Deut. xxxiii. 17. Persons impatient in trouble, are like wild bulls in a net: they roar and cry, but by their struggling, entangle themselves more and more. Isa. li. 20. Wicked men, chiefly rulers or warriors, are called bulls, and bulls of Bashan, and calves, to denote their prosperity, strength, untractableness, mischievous violence and fierceness. Jer. xxxi. 18. Psal. xxii. 12. and lxxviii. 30. A rash youth is like an ox led to the slaughter; he is thoughtlessly and easily decoyed, and tempted to that which ruins him. Prov. vii. 22. As a stalled and fatted ox is used to express the most sumptuous and delicate provision, Prov. xv. 7; so Christ in his person, obedience, and death for us, and in all his fulness of grace, is represented as oxen, as fattings, and a fatted calf slain for us. Matt. xxii. 4. Prov. ix. 2. Luke xv. 23.

The cow is the female of the ox kind, and very noted for her useful milk. Persons potent, proud, wealthy, perhaps chiefly females, are called kine of Bashan, to denote their stupidity, luxury, and wantonness. Amos iv. 1, 2. The seven fat kine which Pharaoh saw in his dream, represented seven years of great plenty; and the seven lean ones, seven years of famine. Gen. xli. 2-4, 18-21, 26, 27. Young cows are called heifers. Young wives were called heifers, to mark their gaiety, and expected fruitful.

ness. Judg. xiv. 18. Nations are likened to heifers: Egypt to a fair one; to mark their glory and prosperity. Isa. xlv. 20. The Chaldeans are compared to a fat one, to mark their wealth, wantonness, and unconcern. Jer. l. 11. The ten tribes of Israel are likened to a backsliding one, to signify their stupid and perverse revolting from God. Hos. iv. 16. Also to a taught one, loving to tread the corn, over whose fair neck God passed: they were instructed by God's oracles and prophets; they were expert and skilful in idolatry; they loved to riot in such plenty as they possessed under Jeroboam the Second; but were quickly after reduced to slavery and distress by the Assyrians. Hos. x. 11. If our version rightly renders HAGLA SHALISHIAH, a heifer of three years old, Zoar and Horonaim, cities of Moab, are thus likened to mark their untamable obstinacy; or, rather their terrible outcries, when the inhabitants fled from the Assyrians and Chaldeans. But perhaps these words may be the names of cities that should share in the ruin. Isa. xv. 5. Jer. xlviii. 34.

Among the Hebrews, when one was found slain in the field, and the murderer could not be found, the magistrates of the city next to the spot took an heifer, which had never been yoked; and, after striking off her head in a rough uncultivated valley, they washed their hands in water, protesting their innocence of the crime, and ignorance of the murderer; and, together with the Levites present, solemnly begged that God would not lay it to the charge of their nation. Dent. xxi. 1-9. Did this heifer represent Jesus, brought into a state of debasement and suffering, and slain by the elders of Israel, as well as by his eternal Father, for the removal of the guilt of millions of men?

To purify the Hebrews when polluted by the touch of a dead body, or any part thereof, an unblemished red heifer, that had never borne a yoke, was put into the hand of the sagan, or second high-priest. In his presence she was slain without the camp or city. With his finger he sprinkled her blood seven times towards the tabernacle or temple: the rest of her was burned along with cedar-wood, scarlet, and hyssop: a clean person gathered and laid up her ashes in a clean repository without the camp. These ashes mixed with water, were, on the third and seventh days of pollution, sprinkled on the unclean person. He never received the second sprinkling, till on the fourth after the first: and if he was not first sprinkled, till the seventh day of his defilement, he continued in it till he was sprinkled again on the eleventh. The priest who sprinkled the blood, he who burnt the carcase, and he who sprinkled the mixture, were rendered unclean, and were required to wash their clothes, and continue defiled till the evening. Num. xix. It is said, that no more than nine or ten heifers were burnt for this purpose, during the 1560 years of the Jewish dispensation; that, after the temple was built, the heifer was always burnt on the mount of Olives, directly over against it; and that not the sagan, but the high-priest, superintended the slaughter, the burning, and sprinkling of the blood. It is certain, that in no other case the colour of the victim was regarded. Did these heifers represent our unblemished and Almighty Redeemer, the SEED of the woman, voluntarily surrendering himself to adversity and death without the gate, that he, by the virtue of his blood and Spirit, might, to the surprise of angels and men, purify our conscience from dead works, to serve the living God? Heb. ix. 13, 14.

CALF, the young one of the ox kind. To eat calves out of the stall, is to riot in luxury, and live on the most delicate provisions. Amos vi. 4. As fatted calves are the most delightful and wholesome provision, Christ is compared to one, to express the wholesome, savoury, and nourishing food to immortal souls, his person, righteousness, and fullness are. Luke xv. 23-27. In this respect, as well as in his innocence, purity, and patience, the sacrificed calves represented him. Lev. ix. 2. The dividing a calf in twain, at the making of covenants, and wishing that God might so send the makers, if they broke it, exhibits our dreadful desert for covenant-breaking, and what our blessed Redeemer endured on our account. Jer. xxxiv. 18. Ministers and saints are like to calves in their meekness, patience, spiritual strength, readiness to labour, and cheerful running in the way of God's commandments. Rev. iv. 7. Ezek. i. 7. Isa. xi. 6. They grow up as calves in the stall; when feasted on Christ's fullness, they abound in grace and in good works. Mal. iv. 3. They render to him the calves of their lips, the pure offerings of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving. Hos. xiv. 2.

As the Hebrews had seen, and perhaps most of them worshipped, the Egyptian idol Apis, which was a living bull, and sometimes adored in the form of one, or in form of a man with a bull's head, they persuaded AARON to make them a golden calf in the wilderness, to which they, on the day after, kept a solemn festival. This calf Moses soon after reduced to powder, and caused the idolaters to drink it. This sin was punished in their after miseries for many generations. Exod. xxxii. When Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who had resided for a time in Egypt, got possession of the kingdom of Israel, he made two golden calves; the one he placed at Bethel on the south, and the other at Dan, on the north frontier of his kingdom. These calves the ten tribes, for about two hundred and sixty years, continued to worship, till their kingdom was broken up, the people carried captive, and probably the idols destroyed by the Assyrians. 1 Kings xii. 27, 28. Hos. x. 5. and xiii. 12. 2 Kings xvii. Some suppose that the calf at Dan was, for fear of the Syrians carrying it off, transported to Samaria, the capital of the Israelitish kingdom. Hos. viii. 5, 6.

BULRUSH, a shrub growing in fens, and easily bowed by the wind. What our translation calls so is perhaps no other than the papyrus, or paper reed, of which the Egyptians and Ethiopians made baskets, and even boats. Exod. ii. 13. To bow the head as a bulrush, is to make an outward appearance of grief for sin, hanging down the head, while there is no real sorrow in the heart. Isa. lviii. 5.

BULWARK, a strong fortification erected for the defence of a city, or to facilitate the taking of one. 2 Chron. xxvi. 15. Deut. xx. 20. The bulwarks of the church are her laws, worship, discipline, and government; together with the perfections, promises, and providences of God, which secure her salvation and deliverance. Psal. xlviii. 13. Isa. xxvi. 1. May not the former text also relate to the natural bulwarks of the city of David, not one of which was hurt by the Assyrians?

BUNCH: (1.) A handful; a small bundle. Exod. xii. 23. (2.) A hairy lump on the back of camels and dromedaries. Isa. xxx. 6.

BUNDLE; a variety of things knit together. To have one's soul bound up in the bundle of life with the Lord, is to enjoy his kindest protection, and infallible preservation. 1 Sam. xxv. 20. Christ is represented as a bundle of myrrh, to mark the abundant fulness and blessed connection of his influences and blessings. Sol. Song i. 13. Wicked men cast into hell, and who are often connected by their sins on earth, are likened to bundles of tares. Matt. xiii. 30. All creatures, chiefly the church and her chosen members, are called God's BUNDLES; they are many in number, and closely connected; but the whole weight and care of them are borne by him. Amos ix. 7. Multiplied oppressions, and superstitious impositions in worship, are called the bundle of the yoke, they are heavy to be borne. Isa. lviii. 7. 6.

BURDEN, or LOAD; as much as one can bear. 2 Kings v. 17. Acts xxi. 3. Christ's benefits, and the blessings of the glorified state, are a load or weight. God bestows them abundantly, as men are able to bear them. Psal. lxxviii. 19. 2 Cor. iv. 17. His laws are a burden, to which we must yield ourselves, at the expence of labour, and of pain to our lusts: and they are a light yoke, far easier than that of the broken law, which he endured for us: far easier now, under the gospel, than the ancient ceremonies; and may, with great ease and delight, be obeyed, under the influence of his Spirit. Matt. xi. 30. Rev. ii. 24. God's ceremonial law and men's superstitious ceremonies are a burden: they deprive men of pleasure and liberty, and are hard to be fulfilled. Acts xv. 28. Matt. xxiii. 4. The charge of government in church or state is a burden: the faithful execution of it is attended with much uneasy care and toil. Exod. xviii. 22. Isa. ix. 6. The dependents of Shebna and other magistrates, nay, of our Redeemer, are their burden, which they have to care for, protect, and support. Isa. xxii. 24, 25.

Predictions of heavy judgments are burdens: they render one uneasy to bear them; and how sinking, oppressive, and grievous is their fulfilment! Isa. xlii. 1; xiv. 28; xv. 1; xvii. 1; xix. 1; xxi. 1, 11, 13; xxii. 1. and xxiii. 1. Jer. xxiii. 33—38. Nah. i. 1. Zech. ix. 1. and xli. 1. Mal. i. 1. 2 Kings ix. 25. Hab. i. 1. Lam. ii. 14. The word may be translated the heavy judgment. Labour, servitude, tribute, affliction, fear and care, are a burden. How hard to be borne! How oppressive to the spirits, and restrictive of liberty. Psal. lxxx. 6. Hos. viii. 10. Mat. xx. 12.

Men's imperfections and infirmities are burdens, which hurt and grieve themselves or others; but which others ought to bear with patience and meekness. Gal. vi. 2. Sinful corruptions of nature or practice are a heavy burden, which greatly provokes God; stupifies, restrains, and vexes men; hinders them from walking in God's way; presses them towards hell; brings on heavy strokes of wrath; the guilt of which makes a fearful impression upon an awakened conscience. Psal. xxxviii. 4. Zech. v. 7, 8. Heb. xii. 1. In fine, whatever renders body or mind uneasy is called a burden. Zeph. iii. 18. But we are to cast it on the Lord, by imploring, and patiently waiting for support under, and deliverance from it. Psal. lv. 22. The word here rendered burden, signifies a gift, or supply; and imports the great resignation and holy confidence with which we should ask mercy and deliverance. Every man shall bear his own burden; shall give an account of his own deeds; and, if not interested in Christ, shall suffer the due punishment thereof. Gal. vi. 5.

BURDENSOME; grievous; troublesome. 2 Cor. xi. 9.

BURY. The Hebrews were careful to bury even their enemies. 1 Kings xi. 15. Ezek. xxxix. 14. The danger of pollution from dead bodies required it. To be deprived of burial, or to be buried with the burial of an ass, cast into an unclean place, they reckoned a terrible calamity. When one died, if his friends were able, he was embalmed, and, after a proper time, carried out to his grave on a bier, if poor; or on a stately bed, if rich; and laid in a proper manner, as in a bed, in the GRAVE. The dead bodies were arrayed in dead-clothes; but from the resurrection of Lazarus and Christ, and a variety of other evidence, it appears they were not buried in coffins, as is the manner with us. Relations and neighbours attended the occasion with a great deal of MOURNING and apparent grief. Kings scarcely ever attended a funeral; hence David's attendance on the funeral of Abner, and joining in the mourning, is observed as something remarkable. He no doubt did so, to remove suspicion of his having instigated murder, and to conciliate the affections of the people. John xv. xix. and xx. Acts viii. 2. 2 Sam. iii. 31—36. When the modern Jews arrive at the burying-place, which they call the house of the living, they address themselves to the persons buried, and bless God for making, preserving, and cutting them off by death, and that he will raise them again. At the grave, this blessing is repeated; and the corpse being set down on the ground, they make an oration, in praise of the dead person, and walking around the grave, repeat a long prayer. After a prayer for the man's soul, they let down the corpse into the grave, and desire him to go in peace. The relations begin to cover him with earth, and then all present assist. They walk backward till they are at some distance from the grave; and as they leave the burying-place, they pluck some bits of grass, and throw behind their backs, saying, They shall flourish like the grass of the earth.

To be buried with Christ in baptism, imports our regeneration and continued mortification of sin, by virtue of fellowship with him in his death; represented, sealed, and applied to us in our baptism. Rom. vi. 4. Col. ii. 13.

BURN; (1.) To be hot. Lev. xiii. 28. (2.) To consume with FIRE. (3.) To destroy; waste; purge; Lam. iii. 3. Isa. iv. 4. (4.) To have the heart eager in desire, love, sympathy. Luke xxiv. 32. 2 Cor. xi. 29. (5.) To have the mind filled with passion or grief. Psal. xxxix. 3. Jer. xx. 9. (6.) To be under the prevailing power of fleshly lust. 1 Cor. vii. 7. There shall be burning, i. e. burning ulcers, instead of beauty. Isa. iii. 24.

BURST; to rend violently. God bursts men's bands, when he restores them to liberty. Jer. ii. 20. and xxx. 8. Men burst God's bands, in furiously breaking his laws. Jer. v. 5. A man is ready to burst like a new bottle, when his desire to speak grows exceedingly on him. Job xxxii. 19. The bursting of the Jews' vain and wicked confidence, imports the dissolution of their church and state, by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Romans. Isa. xxx. 14.

BUSH, a low, spreading, shrub. The bush burning and not consumed, which Moses saw near Mount Horeb, represented our earthly nature united to the Son of God, inflamed with the fire of divine punishment, and yet not consumed, but supported and refreshed; and the Hebrew nation in the fire of Egyptian cruelty, and the church in the fire of persecution and distress, and yet not in the least injured, because of the good-will and favour of him that dwelt, i. e. appeared in the bush. Exod. iii. 2, 4. Acts vii. 30, 35. Deut. xxxiii. 16.

BUSHEL, a corn-measure. The Roman bushel, or modius, contained 552 solid inches; which is near eight cubical inches more than the English peck. Matt. v. 15.

BUSY; diligent in work. Busy bodies, are such as, neglecting their own concerns, give themselves up to intermeddle with the affairs of others. 2 Thess. iii. 11. Business is the work which men do; or which they ought to do, by virtue of their calling or trust. Dent. xxiv. 5. Rom. xii. 11.

BUT, ordinarily signifies, that the things between which it is placed are contrary or diverse. John vi. 27. and iii. 17. Matt. vi. 15. and xx. 16. Our English translation has frequently and, where but would have been more proper.

BUTLER, one charged with the care of the wine-cellars in the house of a great man. Pharaoh's butler was also his cup-bearer, who filled out the wine to him and his guests. Gen. xl. 1. and xli. 9. His office was called butlership.

BUTTER. Calmet asserts that among the eastern nations, it was the same with cream; but it is plain from Prov. xxx. 25. that it was brought forth by churning; whether in a skin, as is the custom at present among the Moors and Arabs, or otherwise, we know not. This was long before the Greeks knew any thing of butter. The Dutch introduced it into the East Indies. The ancient Romans, and modern Spaniards, use it as a medicine, not for food. It is far otherwise, in the Dutch and British dominions. Butter and honey were so plentiful in Canaan, as to be common provision. Isa. viii. 15, 22. To wash one's steps with butter, is to enjoy great and delightful prosperity. Job xxix. 6. Flattering speech is smoother than butter, is apparently very soft and agreeable. Psal. lv. 21.

BUTTOCK. To have these parts uncovered was the greatest shame and disgrace. 2 Sam. x. 4. Isa. xx. 4.

BUY; to buy from men, is to obtain right to, and possession of a thing, by giving a price for it. Gen. xlii. 2. To buy from Christ, is, under a sense of need, and a belief of their excellency and fitness for us, to receive himself and his blessings freely, as the eternal portion of our souls, and to forsake whatever stands in opposition thereto. Isa. lv. 1. Rev. iii. 18. Matt. xlii. 44. To buy the truth, and not sell it, imports the most diligent consideration and cordial reception of it, and cleaving to it, whatever expence, hazard, or trouble it costs. Prov. xxiii. 23. To buy the merchandize of Rome, is, at the eternal hazard of our soul, to embrace her abominations; or, by money, intercession, or the like, to procure Antichristian dignities, offices, relics, pardons. Rev. xviii. 11. God bought his chosen people, by giving his Son to the death, as an infinite ransom for them. 1 Cor. vi. 19. He bought the Hebrew nation, in exerting his power and goodness on their behalf, bringing them from Egypt, and loading them with mercies unnumbered, that they might be his peculiar people. Deut. xxxii. 6. He buys professed Christians, in giving them his word; and at much expence of power and goodness, delivering them from heathenism, popery, or profaneness, that they may serve him. 2. Pet. ii. 4.

BUZ, the son of Nahor, by Milcah, and ancestor of Elihu, the companion of Job. His posterity dwelt in Arabia the Desert, and were terribly distressed and enslaved by Nebuchadnezzar. Gen. xxii. 21. Job xxxiii. 1. Jer. xxv. 23.

BY, is expressive of the cause, means, or instrument of any thing. Rom. viii. 11. and v. 1. Or it signifies at, or near to. Exod. xxx. 4. Dan. viii. 8. Or it denotes the object sworn by in an oath. Gen. xlii. 15, 16. A by-way, is one not commonly used. Judg. v. 6. A by-word, a speech frequently used in derision of a person or place. By and by, in a short time. Matt. xlii. 20.

C.

CAB, a measure containing the sixth part of a seah, and eighteenth of an ephah; it contained about ninety-six solid inches, which is six inches less than the Scotch pint.

CABIN, a small cell in a prison. Jer. xxxvii. 16.

CABUL. (1.) A city on the frontier of the lot of Asher. Josh. xix. 27. (2.) The name that Hiram king of Tyre gave to the country with which Solomon presented him to mark his displeasure with it. 1 Kings ix. 13.

CAGE, for birds and wild beasts. Wicked men's houses are represented as filled with deceit, and what is obtained thereby, as a cage is with birds. Jer. v. 27. The Antichristian state, chiefly Rome, is a cage of every unclean and hateful bird; is full of abominable persons, offices, officers, doctrines, and customs. Rev. xviii. 2.

CAI-A-PHAS, the high-priest of the Jews, who succeeded Simon the son of Camith, about A. D. 16, or 25, as Calmet thinks, and married the daughter of Annas. It is certain he was high-priest the year in which our Saviour suffered. When the priests and Pharisees, enraged at the raising of Lazarus from the dead, consulted whether they should apprehend Jesus, or not, and put him to death, Caiaphas upbraided them with their stupidity, and told them, it was necessary Jesus should die for the people, that the whole nation might not perish. Doubtless he meant, that his death was necessary to prevent the Romans from destroying their nation; but the Spirit of God, who directed his lips in this sentence, intended to signify, that the death of Jesus was necessary for the salvation of the children of God, Jews or gentiles. John xi. 40, 50.

When Jesus was apprehended by the servants of Caiaphas, and others of the lower orders, he was first brought to and examined by Annas; next he was brought to the hall of Caiaphas, where the priests and elders were convened to judge him. After nothing could be proved to purpose, by their suborned witnesses, Caiaphas, in order to find a charge against him, adjured him, by the living God, to declare whether he was the Christ, the true Messiah, or not. Jesus acknowledged that he was, and that he would afterwards appear gloriously in the clouds. Caiaphas, as if shocked, rent his clothes; and taking the company to witness that they had heard his blasphemy, asked what they thought he deserved? They all agreed he deserved death. No doubt, Caiaphas attended the council next day, when they delivered up Jesus to Pilate, and begged he might be crucified. John xviii. 13—28. Matt. xxvi. 57—66. Luke xxii. 54—69. Mark xiv. 53—64. Soon after, he, at a meeting of the sanhedrim, expostulated with the apostles, why they durst, contrary to orders, preach Jesus as the Messiah:

they replied, they were obliged to obey God rather than men. Acts v. 27—32. In A. D. 35, Caiaphas and Pilate were both deposed by Vitellius, the Roman governor of Syria; and Jonathan, a son of Annas, was made high-priest in his stead.

CAIN, the eldest son of Adam. When his mother Eve bare him, she seems to have supposed him to be the promised seed, who should destroy the head and power of the devil. When grown up, he applied himself to the cultivation of the ground, as his brother Abel did to feeding of flocks. On the Sabbath, or last day of the week, or at the end of the year, Cain offered his first-fruits, and Abel the best firstling of his flock. Cain having offered his oblation with an unbelieving and wicked heart, God did not mark his acceptance of it by the descent of fire from heaven, or any similar token, as he did that of Abel. Cain was enraged to see his brother acknowledged the favourite of heaven, and expressed the same by his sullen countenance and surly temper. God expostulated with him, and told him, that his neglect of his offering was solely owing to his own wickedness; that, if he speedily believed and repented, he should be accepted; but if not, his sin, that already lay on his conscience, would speedily bring ruin on his head; and hinted, that he had no reason to be enraged at Abel, as he still continued in his wonted subjection to him, as a superior in age.

Contemning his Maker's admonition, Cain decoyed his brother into the field, and murdered him; and, it seems, buried him in the earth. The Lord quickly called him to account; and interrogated him, respecting what was become of Abel his brother. Cain angrily replied, that he knew not, and had no business to be his brother's keeper. God charged him with the murder; represented its horrid nature and consequence; that Abel's blood, however hidden, cried for vengeance against him; that the earth, which had covered it, should never more yield him a plentiful crop, or a settled abode. Cain complained of the divine severity, that his crime was not forgiven, but to be unsupportably punished; and that every body who found him would slay him. God assured him, that sevenfold vengeance should be taken on his murderer; and, either by some token, assured him of preservation, or by some visible badge of continual trembling, sullenness of countenance, or the like, marked him out to others for his safety. Driven from the east of Eden, where the symbols of the Divine Presence were often visible, and from the church of God, he retired to the country called Non, from his unsettled condition, and there built a city called Enoch, after the name of his son. There his family increased and spread through a great part of the world. They continued till the flood in seven generations, famous for the invention of arts, and for their impiety. By intermarriages with them, the posterity of Seth corrupted themselves, and provoked God to bring on the general deluge. See LAMECH. Gen. iv. and vi.

CA'INAN, or KE'NAN, the son of Enoch. He was born A. M. 325. Seventy years after, he begat Mahalaleel; and died, aged 910 years. Gen. v. 9—14. 1 Chron. i. 2. Luke iii. 37. Another CAINAN is represented as the son of Arphaxad. Luke iii. 36. A triple sacred genealogy testifies that no such person ever existed. Gen. x. 24. and xi. 12. 1 Chron. i. 18. It is likely some copyist threw him into Luke, in order to make his genealogy agree with the Septuagint.

CAKE. The cakes of the Jewish offerings were of fine flour kneaded or baked with oil. Exod. xii. 39. The ten tribes of Israel were a cake not turned; while on the one side they professed the true religion, on the other they were practical idolaters; while on the one side they were roasted with distressing judgments, on the other they remained stupid, and unteachable. Hos. vii. 8.

CA'LAH, an ancient city of Assyria, built soon after the flood by Asher; from it the country about, on the north-east of the Tigris, and south of the Gordian mountains of Armenia, was called Callachene, or Calacime. Gen. x. 11.

CALAMITY; grievous outward affliction. Jer. xviii. 17. A foolish son is the calamity of his father; grieves his spirit, disturbs and discredits his family, and wastes his substance. Prov. xix. 13.

CA'LA-MUS, or SWEET CANE, is an aromatic reed, found in pieces of ten or twelve inches long; it resembles a common reed, but is not so thick. It is filled with a spongy substance somewhat similar to cobwebs, but of a most agreeable smell when newly opened. It grows in the East Indies, is often used for sauce, and is said to refresh and heal the heart, and to cleanse the stomach; and when it is burned with turpentine, the fume is supposed to heal diseases of the stomach or lungs. It was a part of the Tyrian trade with the Grecians and Danites. Ezek. xxvii. 19; and an ingredient of the Jewish sacred perfume. Exod. xxx. 23. Isa. xliiii. 24. The saints' graces are compared to it; they are savoury, and acceptable to God, and his people; they purify the heart, excite love to God, and zeal for his glory, and an earnest appetite after his fulness. Sol. Song iv. 14.

CALDRON, a large vessel for boiling in. 1 Sam. ii. 14. The place where wicked men are tormented and ruined by God's judgments, is the caldron, and they are the flesh boiled in it. Ezek. xi. 3, 4. and xxiv. 1, 2. Jer. i. 13, 14.

CALEB; 1. the son of Jephunneh, brother of Kenaz, and descendant of Judah. When the spies returned from searching the promised land, Caleb and Joshua, ended by the Spirit of the Lord, opposed the rest, represented Canaan as a good land; and, rending their clothes for grief that the congregation believed the ill report of the rest, were on the point of returning to Egypt, earnestly endeavoured to persuade them that, with the assistance of God, they could easily conquer it. To reward their piety, they alone, of all the twelve spies, survived that day; they only, of all the armed men that came out of Egypt, entered into Canaan; and Moses promised Caleb the possession of the places about Hebron, where, without dismay, he had seen the monstrous giants. Forty-five years after, Caleb's strength and courage being no way abated, he begged that Joshua, who was going to divide the land, might give him the country of the giants, as Moses had predicted; that, depending on the assistance of God, he might have the honour to expel them. Joshua blessed him, and granted him his request. Assisted by a part of his brethren of Judah, he marched against Hebron, and slew there the children of ANAK. Thence he marched to Debir; and as the place was extremely strong, he offered his daughter Achsah to the hero that should take it. Othniel his nephew took it, and obtained Achsah, with a considerable portion of land. When or how Caleb died, we know not. By his three sons, Ira, Elah, and Naam, he had a numerous and honourable posterity. Num. xiii. and xiv. Josh. xiv. 6—15. and xv. 13—19. Judg. i. 9—15. 1 Chron. iv. 15—20.

2. CALEB, or CHE-LUBA-I, the son of Hezron, and brother of Jerahmeel; his wives, perhaps in succession, were Azubah, Jerioth, Ephrath; and Ephah and Maachah, concubines: his sons were, Jeshar, Shobab, Ardon, Hur, Mesha, Haran, Mozah, Gazek, Sheber, Tirhanah, Shaaph, Shevah, and a daughter called Achsah; and perhaps others. His posterity was very numerous. 1 Chron. ii. 9, 18—20, 42—45.

3. CALEB, the son of Hur, and the grandson of the former Caleb. His sons were Shobab, Salma, Hereph. His posterity peopled the whole country about Beth-lehem, Kirjath-jearim, Beth-gader, &c. 1 Chron. ii. 50—55.

4. CALEB, which is perhaps the same as Caleb-Ephrath, a city, where Caleb the son of Hezron and Ephrath had dwelt. To the elders of Caleb, David sent part of the spoil he took from the Amalekites. 1 Sam. xxx. 14.

CALF. See BULL.

CALKERS; carpenters who fill up the joints of ships; masons who repair the breaches of walls; magistrates who repair the breaches of order and safety in the state. Ezek. xxvii. 9, 27.

CALL; (1.) To name a person or thing. To be called or named by one, is to derive a name from them. Jacob's name was called upon the sons of Joseph, when they were named Israelites, and each became the parent of a tribe. Gen. xlviii. 16. Persons are called by the name of God or Christ, when called his people or followers, or called CHRISTIANS from CHRIST. James ii. 7. Acts xi. 26. (2.) To invite; require; request. Exod. ii. 7. (3.) To invite; to appoint and furnish for an office. Exod. xxxi. 2. (4.) To create; to produce things by a word; an act of the will. Rom. iv. 17. Ezek. xxxvi. 29. (5.) To invite and exhort to duty, by the ministry of the word, dispensation of providence, or motions of the Holy Ghost. Isa. xxii. 12. Prov. i. 24. Matt. xxii. 14. (6.) To invite and draw sinners into a state of union with Jesus Christ, by the preaching of the word, and working of the Holy Ghost. Therein the person is convinced of his sin and misery : has his mind enlightened in the knowledge of Christ, as able and willing to save ; has his will renewed : and is so persuaded and enabled to embrace Jesus Christ as offered to him in the gospel. This call is according to God's purpose, with respect to persons, time, and manner thereof. Rom. viii. 28. 2 Tim. i. 9. It is sovereign and free ; not many wise, mighty, or noble are called. 1 Cor. i. 26, 27. It is high, proceeds from the most High God, and interests us in the highest glory and happiness. Phil. iii. 14. It is holy in its author, means, and end. As we are called by the glorious power and almighty virtue of God's grace, so we are called to glory and virtue, to holiness and happiness. 2 Pet. i. 8. It is heavenly ; comes from above, interests us in, and prepares us for heaven. Heb. iii. 1. It is without repentance, as God will never cast off any that are once drawn to him. Rom. xi. 29. (7.) To acknowledge. Heb. ii. 11. (8.) To esteem ; account. Isa. lviii. 5, 13. Mal. iii. 15. (9.) To proclaim. Joel i. 4. and ii. 15. To call God for a record on one's soul, is solemnly to appeal to him. 2 Cor. i. 23. To call on God, is to worship him, particularly by prayer and praise. Psal. l. 15. and cv. 1. Perhaps calling on the name of the Lord, Gen. iv. 26. may denote worshipping him in public assemblies ; but some render it, to profane the name of the Lord. Lawful employments are termed a calling ; men are, by Providence, invited to, and furnished for them. 1 Cor. vii. 20. The heavenly glory is a calling ; we are invited and drawn to it ; and the enjoyment of its happiness is our everlasting business. 2 Thess. i. 11. The word there may signify effectual calling. Eph. iv. 1.

CAL'NEH, CAL'NO, a city built by Nimrod in the land of Shinar. Gen. x. 9. Isa. x. 9. If it be the same with Canneh, the inhabitants traded with the Tyrians. Ezek. xxvii. 23. It is probably the same with Ctesiphon, on the river Tigris, about three miles from Seleucia ; if so, it was for some time the capital of the Parthians, and was greatly enlarged and beautified by Pacorus, one of their kings.

CAL'VA-RY, or GOLGOTHA, which signifies the place of a skull ; (so called, either from its resemblance to the skull of a man's head, or because it was the place where malefactors were beheaded,) was a small hill to the west of Jerusalem. It is said Adam was buried here ; but it is certain Jesus was crucified here, and buried in an adjacent garden. Over his sepulchre Helena, the mother of Constantine, about A. D. 330, built a magnificent church, which, to this day, is visited by superstitious pilgrims of the Christian name, with great ceremony and pretence of devotion. Luke xxiii. 33.

CALVE, to bring forth young, chiefly a calf, or young deer. Psal. xxix. 9.

CAMEL, a four-footed beast without horns. It has no fore teeth in the upper jaw, and chews the cud. It has six or eight in the lower, broad and standing outward. It has three tusks in its upper jaw, and two in the lower, situate at some distance from each other. Camels are covered with a fine fur, which they cast in the spring, and which is gathered up, and a kind of stuff made of it. Their neck and legs are long and slender. When they lift up their head, it is very high. Their ears are short, and their feet broad and very sure ; their tail is about a foot long ; some of them, notwithstanding the excessive heat, can live without water four or five, nay, some say, nine or twelve days. They are not only used as beasts of burden in the hot and dry countries, but the Turks eat the flesh of young ones, and their milk is much used by the Arabs to prevent the dropsy ; perhaps as the animal is naturally revengeful, their milk may contribute to give the Arabs that revengeful turn which they generally have. The camel kneels down to receive its burden, or to have it taken off. There are four kinds of camels : (1.) The camel with two hairy bunches on its back, which is principally produced about the east of Persia, and will bear 1300 weight. This is by some improperly called the dromedary. (2.) The camel with one bunch, which is chiefly used in Arabia, and the north of Africa. The most handsome of this kind is the dromedary, which is of a rounder shape, and has a less bunch than the others. This kind is able to carry a far less burden, but is of prodigious swiftness ; and is said by the Arabs to run as far in one day as their best horses will do in nine, and is therefore chiefly used for riding. 1 Kings iv. 28. Esth. viii. 10. (3.) The Peruvian camel, whose back is even, and its breast bunched. (4.) The Pacos, which has no bunch at all.

Though camels chew the cud, yet, as the division of their feet is not complete, they were marked out by the Mosaic law as unclean ; and may thus represent wicked persons, haughty and revengeful. Lev. xi. 4. Deut. xiv. 7. The Jews were like swift dromedaries traversing their ways, for their levity and inconstancy in God's service. Jer. ii. 23. Multitudes of camels and dromedaries, of Midian, Ephah, Shebah, and flocks of Kedar, and Nebaioth covering the church, imports, that the Arabs in the apostolic age, and the Mahometans in the millennium, shall be converted to Christ, and use their power and wealth in his service. Isa. lx. 6-8.

CAMELEON, or CHAMELEON, a kind of lizard, with a long flat tail, and usually of a greenish yellow colour. On each of its four feet it has five toes, two or three of which adhere together. Its snout is long ; it has two small openings for nostrils ; its eyes move much, and often with a contrary motion ; it has no neck ; its back is sharp, and its skin grained like shagreen. It can hang to the branches of trees by its feet or tail. To catch flies, it darts its tongue to the length of its whole body, and contracts it with the utmost speed. Some cameleons in Egypt, the tail included, are a foot long ; but those of Arabia are not much above half that length. The cameleon neither feeds on air, nor changes its colour, in the manner some have asserted ; yet it appears bluer, and less beautiful, in the shade, than when exposed to the sun, where it appears of a darker grey, and beautifully spotted.

If it be wrapped in fine linen cloth, it will sometimes assume a lighter hue. Nay, it can make a number of variations in its appearance. It will appear plump and fat, and yet, in a few minutes, appear a mere bag of skin. It was unclean under the law, and might represent the seed of the old serpent, unsubstantial and unstedfast in every thing good. Lev. xi. 30.

CAMP, the lodgement of an army in the open air. 1 Sam. iv. 7. Nothing could be more exactly regulated than the camp of the Hebrews in the desert. The tabernacle was placed in the midst of it. Moses, Aaron, and their families, had their tents on the east of it. On the south pitched the Kohathites; on the west, the Gershonites; on the north, the Merarites. Thus it was encompassed by the LEVITES, who performed the service of it. Before the tabernacle, on the east side, was the camp of Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, containing 186,400 men fit for war; on the south, the camp of Reuben, Simeon, and Gad, containing 151,400; on the west, the camp of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, containing 108,100; on the north was the camp of Dan, Asher, and Naphtali, containing 157,600. The camps of the Greeks, but especially of the Romans, were formed similar to that of the Hebrews. When the Israelites marched, they had a triple warning by the silver trumpets; one to pack up their baggage; a second to assemble to their standard; and a third to begin their march. The camp of Judah marched first; the tabernacle was then taken down; and the Gershonites and Merarites, laying the boards on waggon, followed. Upon a second alarm, the camp of Reuben marched; the Kohathites followed, with the more sacred furniture of the tabernacle on their shoulders. Next followed the camp of Ephraim, Psal. lxxx. 1, 2; and that of Dan brought up the rear. Numb. i. ii. iv. and x. As Jesus, standing in the room of unclean and leprous sinners, suffered without the gate, and his ashes, the virtue of his death, chiefly extends to the once outcast gentiles, it becomes us to go without the camp of carnal societies, bearing his reproach, willingly exposing ourselves to shame and danger for his sake. Compare Deut. xxiii. 10. Numb. xix. 3. Exod. xxix. 14. Heb. xiii. 10. The camp of the saints, is the church regularly ranked, and prepared to fight with principalities and powers. Rev. ix. 9.

CAMP; ENCAMP, to set up tents to lodge in after the manner of an army, or to besiege a city. Num. i. 50. 1 Sam. xi. 1. God and his angels encamp about his people; they watch over, and afford them remarkable protection. Zech. ix. 8. Psal. xxxiv. 7. God camps against a place when he surrounds it with fearful judgments, or permits an enemy to lay siege to it. Isa. xxix. 8. God's troops encamped about Job's tabernacle, when numerous troubles beset him on every side. Job xix. 12. The grasshoppers camp in the hedges during the summer; they lodge there in vast numbers. Nah. iii. 17.

CAMPHIRE. The tree is a species of the bay, or laurel; some of them are three hundred feet high, and can scarcely be grasped by twenty men; every part of it abounds with the camphire drop, which is neither resin, volatile salt, oily juice, bitumen, nor gum; but a mixed substance; dry, white, transparent, and brittle; of a strong, penetrating, fragrant smell, and of a bitter taste; which either distils from the tree, or may be extracted by chemical process. It is of use in fire-works, varnish, &c. it will burn even under water. It promotes perspiration, and so is of considerable use in inflammatory, putrid, pestilential, maddening, and venereal disorders. The camphire of Japan is coarse; but that of Borneo, Sumatra, Ceylon, and China, is much finer. If the Hebrew COPHER be rightly translated CAMPHIRE, Jesus Christ is compared to a cluster of it; to denote the abundant, and well-connected plenty of fragrant, soul-healing, and exhilarating virtue that is in his person, righteousness, and fulness; but if it signify the Cyprus vine, it denotes his nourishing, strengthening, and comforting influence. If it signify the cyprus-tree, it exhibits him in the pleasant, pure, healing, and anointing virtue of his person, blood, and grace. If it signify cyprus, or sword grass, it represents him in his fruitfulness, fragrance, and strengthening influence, and his powerful virtue, to heal the wounds made by sin, the poison of the old serpent. If it signify dates, the fruit of the palm-tree, it represents him as infinitely precious, sweet, and nourishing. If it signify the BALM-TREE, it still figures him out in his pleasantness, and medicinal virtue, to the souls of men. The saints and their graces are compared to COPHER, to mark how acceptable their person, new nature, and holy conversation, are to Christ, and to good men; and what a healing, edifying, and exhilarating virtue they have in the churches and nations where they reside. Sol. Song iv. 13.

CAN; to be able, in respect of knowledge, authority, or strength, to perform a thing. Gen. xli. 38. Jesus could not do many mighty works at Nazareth; it was not consistent with his will, or commission, to do many miracles there, where unbelief and contempt of him so prevailed; and where the faith of receiving miracles was wanting. Matt. xiii. 58. Mark vi. 5. Worldly men neither will, nor, by reason of their disposition, can hate the wicked as such. John vii. 7. We speak and do evil things as we could, when we are as wicked as Providence permits. Jer. iii. 5.

CANA. See KANAH.

CANAAN, the youngest son of Ham. When Ham sported with his father's nakedness, Noah denounced a curse of the basest servitude, peculiarly against Canaan. Whether Canaan had joined in the crime, and informed his father of the shameful sight; or whether Noah could not pronounce a curse against Ham himself, who had been formerly blessed by God; or whether the word father of ought to be supplied before Canaan, as son is, Matt. iv. 21; and wife, John xix. 25; and father, Acts vii. 16; or whether the curse is chiefly pointed against Ham's posterity in Canaan, as they were to be extirpated in part by the Hebrews, is not agreed by interpreters. It is certain that the Lord is righteous in all his ways; it is certain that parents are punished in the misery of their posterity; and, from the subsequent history, it will appear that the Canaanites were terribly enslaved by the posterity of Shem, and of Japheth, according to the tenor of that curse. It is probable that Canaan lived and died in, as well as gave name to, the land of promise. His posterity was numerous: the Sidonians, Tyrians, Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Girgashites, Hivites, Arkites, Sinites, Arvadites, Zemarites, Hamathites, Perizzites, and another tribe that were called Canaanites, though why they had this name given them more than the rest, we know not, descended from him. Seven of these tribes, the Canaanites, Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Girgashites, Perizzites, and Hivites, peopled Canaan; their situation will be seen under their respective articles; the other tribes peopled Phenicia and part of Syria. According to the custom which then prevailed, they were divided into a vast number of kingdoms; scarcely a town or city of note but had its sovereign. As Moses subdued two, Joshua thirty-one, and Adonibezek, just before, seventy, it is plain that sometimes these Canaanites were formed into above a hundred kingdoms. They were generally very wicked, given to the vilest idolatry; but we hope Melchizedek's kingdom adhered to the true religion: it is certain he did so himself. Five of their kingdoms on the south-east, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, appear to have introduced the practice of the vilest and most unnatural lusts. Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, rendered them his tributaries, about A. M. 2078. After twelve years' servitude they rebelled. In A. M. 2092, he and his allies invaded Canaan, reduced the revolted kingdoms, and brought them and the places adjacent to the brink of destruction. By ABRAHAM's means they recovered this disaster. The people of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, had scarcely lived sixteen years more, in affluence and horrible guilt, when God by fire and brimstone from heaven, consumed their country, and turned it into a stagnant lake. For the sake of Lot, Zoar was preserved from a similar ruin. Gen. ix. 25. x. 6, 15—19. xiv. xviii. xix. Ezek. xvi. 49, 50. About A. M. 2270, Shechem the son of Hamor, by his defilement of Dinah, provoked the sons of Jacob to destroy his inconsiderable state. Gen. xxxiv. About A. M. 2514, the Canaanites on the south frontiers of Canaan, assisted by the Amalekites, gave the rebellious Hebrews a terrible defeat at Hormah. About thirty-eight years after, Arad harassed them, but paid dearly for his labour, the Hebrews utterly destroying his kingdom. The Canaanitish kingdoms of Sihon and Og, on the east of Jordan, were in a flourishing condition; but, on their refusal to give Israel a free passage, were utterly destroyed by Moses. On the west of Jordan, Joshua conquered thirty-one kingdoms of Jericho, Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, Egion, Gezer, Debir, Gedir, Hormah, Arad, Libnah, Adullam, Makkedah, Bethel, Tapuah, Hephher, Aphek, Lasharon, Madon, Hazar, Shimron-meron, Achshaph, Taanach, Megiddo, Kedesh, Jokneam, Dor, Gilgal, Tirzah; and the state of the Gibeonites submitted. The territories of these kingdoms, and of others, were divided to the tribes of Israel. After Joshua's death, the tribes of Judah and Simeon entirely expelled or reduced the Canaanites that were left in their portions. The tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, too, expelled part of them that were in their lot. In most of the portions of the other tribes, the Canaanites kept possession of several principal cities, where they sometimes tempted the Hebrews to idolatry, and often harassed them. After hard struggling, several of the tribes reduced them to a state of subjection. On the north parts of the promised land, the residue of the Canaanites formed themselves into the very powerful kingdom of Hazor; and about A. M. 2720, under king Jabin, reduced the Hebrews to a twenty years' servitude. Deborah and Barak gave such an overthrow to this state, that we hear no more of it. About 240 years after, David had almost finished the conquest of the Canaanites, and taken from them Jebus, or Jerusalem, one of their strongest places. Pharaoh, king of Egypt, reduced the Canaanites of Gezer, and gave it to Solomon his son-in-law. Above 153,300 Canaanites were employed in the servile work of building Solomon's temple; and on all that race he laid a heavy tribute; nor ever after do that people seem to have had any freedom among the Israelites, though we find remains of them after the captivity. Numb. xiv. and xx. and xxi. Judg. i. iii. and iv. 2 Sam. v. 6—9. 1 Kings v. 13, 16. and ix. 20, 21. Ezra ii. 55, 58. Neh. xi. 3.

The Canaanites, who escaped the servitude of Israel were reduced to it by others. What was the terrible fate of those that originally resided in SYRIA, or PHENICIA, or fled thither from the sword of Joshua, David, or others, will be related under those articles. The Girgashites, and perhaps other Canaanites, fled from the sword of Joshua, and retired to the north of Africa, near Carthage. Vast numbers followed them from Tyre, &c. in after times. There they, for some ages made a flourishing appearance; but, for 2000 years past, the country has been rendered a scene of the most horrid tyranny by the Romans, Vandals, Saracens, and Turks. Nor have the Canaanites of Tyre, Zidon, and other places in Phenicia, who planted themselves in the Mediterranean isles, escaped a similar fate. Such Canaanites, Hivites, or others, as escaped the sword of king David, and fled to Bæotia, on the south of Europe, were pursued by the curse of servitude. What a wretched figure did that state generally make! What shocking slaughter Alexander made among its inhabitants, selling the survivors for slaves! A part of the Bæotians fled to Heraclea on the south of the Euxine sea, where, after a grand appearance, they were reduced to slavery by the Romans about 1900 years ago; and have continued under these, and the Greeks, Saracens, and Turks, to this day. As we are strongly inclined to believe that the Pelasgi of Greece, and the Etruscans of Italy, were of Canaanitish origin, it is easy to observe to what sordid subjection the one were, after a short-lived prosperity, reduced by their neighbours in Greece, and the other by the conquering Romans. How dreadful, then, to be under the curse of the broken law! how impossible to escape it without an interest in Christ!

CANAAN was the name of the country where Canaan and his posterity dwelt. It is between one hundred and sixty and two hundred miles in length, from Dan on the north, to Beersheba on the south; and from east to west, about eighty miles; and so comprehended, in all, about 9,231,000 acres; of which each of the 691,730 Hebrew warriors who conquered it might have about twelve acres allotted him for his share. It lies in the 32d, 33d, and 34th degrees of north latitude, and in the 36th and 37th of the east longitude, from London. It has the Mediterranean sea on the west; Lebanon and Syria on the north; Arabia the Desert, and the land of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Midianites, on the east; the land of Edom, and wilderness of Paran, on the south; and Egypt on the south-west. No more than this was wont to be called Canaan; and this only was promised to the Hebrews in possession; but if we take in the whole extent of territory promised to them in dominion, from the river Euphrates on the north-east, to the river Nile on the south-west, (Gen. xv. 18—21. Exod. xxiii. 31.) it comprehended all these countries which David reduced: Syria, Ammon, Moab, Edom, &c. In this sense, it may be readily granted to the learned Dr. Shaw, that its south borders were the gulfs of the Red sea; and that it comprehended the land of Goshen in Egypt. Whatever the land of Canaan, properly so called, be now, when it lies under a curse, and lies almost wholly uncultivated, it was anciently a most beautiful and fertile country. The Jordan running southward through it, and forming the lakes of Merom and Tiberias; and a multitude of brooks and rivulets crossing the country on both sides of the Jordan, and a multitude of valleys and hills, pleasantly diversified the form thereof. The rich pastures produced prodigious quantities of milk and honey. The arable grounds, which, according to Hecateus, (but I suppose his account too low,) amounted to about 4,000,000 of acres, produced the richest crops. The mines of the mountains produced plenty of iron and brass. When God, by seasonable warmth and rains, concurred with the laborious improvers of this soil, it is abundantly credible, how fully it supported the numerous millions that dwelt therein. Deut. xi. 11; vi. 10. and viii. 7—9.

An account of the MOUNTAINS, RIVERS, BROOKS, and VALLEYS, of Canaan, will be given under those articles. We shall at present take a view of it, as divided into the twelve portions of the Hebrew tribes. On the east of Jordan dwelt the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites. The Reubenites had their lot on the south part, to the north-east of the Dead sea, and north of the river Arnon. It was partly very mountainous, including, Peor, Nebo, and Pisgah hills, which, at present, have a very disagreeable aspect. Their principal towns were Jaazah, Ramoth-baal, Beth-peor, Medeba, Mephath, Adam, Shittim, Beth-abara, Livias, Macheron, Bezer, Lasha, Kedemoth, Beth-jesimoth; but the Moabites seized on part of these cities. On the north of Reuben lay the inheritance of the Gadites: their chief towns were, Mahanaim, Peneul, Succoth, Mizpah, Rabbah, Ramoth-gilead, Rogelim, Tishbi, Sharon, Sophar, Armon, Magesh, Aroer, Beth-haran, Debir, Ashtaroth, Jazer, Heshbon, Dibon, Enon. Here the ground was more plain, and the soil very fertile. Northward of Gad was seated the half-tribe of Manasseh, whose territory was called Upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles; and was almost as large as both the two former portions. It contained the countries of Bashan, Golan, Hauran, Machonitis, Geshur, and Argob. The principal towns were, Shalisha, Bosra, Maacha, Gershon, Ashtaroth-karnaim, Hadrach-keder, Gamala, Edrei, Gilead, Pella, Abel-beth-maachah, Jabesh-gilead, Chorazin, Julias, Bethsaida, Girsasha, Gadara, Hippe, Ephron.

On the west of Jordan, nine tribes and a half had their inheritance. On the north border, the tribe of Naphtali had theirs on the east side; and the tribe of Asher theirs on the west. The chief cities of Naphtali were, Ir-shemesh, Ziddim, or Assoddin, Zer, Kartan, Hammath, Kakkath, Cinnereth, Admah, Raamah, Hazor, Kedesh, Edrei, En-hazor, Iron, Migdal-el, Horem, Beth-anath, Beth-shemesh. In the territory of Asher lay the country of Cabul, and the cities of Helkath, Kanah, Rehob, Hammon, Abdon, or Hebron, Hali, Beten, Achshaph, Alammelech, Amad, Misheal, Shihor-libnath, Beth-dagon, Achzib, Ummah, Aphek, Rehob, Zidon, Ahlah, Accho; but the Phenicians kept part of it from them. On the south of both these tribes, the lot of Zebulun extended from the Mediterranean sea to Jordan. Their principal cities were Sarid, Maralah, Dabbasheth, Jokneam, Chisloth-tabor, Daberath, Japhia, Gittah-hepther, Itta-kazin, Remmon-methoar, Neah, Kattath, Nahalal, Shimrom, Idalah, North Beth-lehem, Nazareth, Kanah, Zebulun, Jotapa, Kitron, Karta, Dimnah. Southward of Zebulun lay the inheritance of Issachar. In it were the mounts of North Carmel and Gilboah, and the valley of Jezreel. Its chief cities were Kishon, Dabereh, Jarmuth, Engannim, Chesulloth, Shunem, Hapharaim, Shihon, Anaharath, Rabbith, Abex, Remeth, Enhaddah, Beth-pazzez, Tabor, Shahazimah, Beth-shemesh, Nain, Jezreel, Aphek, Tarichea. Southward of Issachar dwelt the other half-tribe of Manasseh. Their chief cities were, Beth-shean, Ibleam, Dor, Endor, Taanach, Megiddo, Salim, Aner, Bezek, Abel-meholah, Tirzah, Thebez, Gath-rimmon, Makkoth, Gilgal-dor, Cesarea, and Antipatris. Southward of Manasseh was the inheritance of the Ephraimites. It abounded with a great many pleasant hills, Gerizim, Ebal, Ephraim, &c. Their chief cities were, Saron, Lydda, Elon, Ramath-shimon, two Beth-horons, Gazer, Timnath-serah, Pirathon, Shechem, Arumah, Samaria, Najoth, Michmash, Shiloh, Beth-el, Ataroth, Ataroth-addar, Michmetha, Taanath-shiloh, Janohah, Naarath, Tappuah, Kibzaim. The territories of these four last-mentioned tribes extended from the Mediterranean sea on the west, to Jordan on the east; but none other did. Southward of the east part of Ephraim's portion lay the inheritance of Benjamin. Their chief cities were Jericho, Beth-hoglah, Emik-kezi, Beth-arabah, Zemaraim, Bethel, Avim, Parah, Ophrah, Chephar-haammonai, Ophni, Gaba, Gibeon, Ramah, Beeroth, Mizpah, Chephirah, Mozah, Rekem, Irpeel, Taralah, Zelah, Eleph, Gilgal, Ai, Alemeth, Anathoth, Kirjath, Gibeah, Bahurim, and part of Jerusalem. Westward of Benjamin's lot lay the inheritance of Dan. Their chief cities were, Zorah, Eshtaol, Irshemesh, Shalabbin, Ajalon, Jethlah, Elon, Thimnathah, Ekron, Elfekeh, Gibbethon, Baalah, Jehud, Bene-berak, Gath-rimmon, Mejarcon, Rakon, and perhaps Joppa; part of these were taken out of the lot of Judah: they had also Dan on the north point of the promised land. Southward of the Danites, the Simeonites had their lot entirely out of the tribe of Judah. Their cities were Beer-sheba, Moladah, Hazar-shual, Balah, Azem, Eltolad, Bethul, Hormah, Ziklag, Beth-makaboth, Hazar-susah, Beth-lebaoth, Sharuhen, Ain, Remmon, Ether, Ashan, Baalath-beer, South Ramoth. The portion of Judah lay mostly to the eastward of Simeon, and south of Benjamin. It was exceedingly large, containing above ninety, if not one hundred fenced cities, after the deduction of about twenty-four for Simeon and Dan. The most noted were Libnah, Makkedah, Azekah, Bethzur, South Bethlehem, Tekoah, Engaddi, Adullam, Kellah, Hebron, Joktheel, Kirjath-jearim, &c. The land of the Philistines, containing the six noted cities of Gath, Ekron, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gaza, and Majuma, all on the west border of Canaan, and south-east coast of the Mediterranean sea, also pertained to Judah; but though once partly conquered, it was generally kept in possession by the Philistines. Num. xxxii. Josh. xiv—xxi. See the book of Judges. 1 Sam. xxx. 27—31. 1 Chron. ii. and vi.

From this brief sketch, it is plain that the face of ancient Canaan must have been covered with cities. In the numerous wars mentioned in scripture; in the war between the Greeks of Egypt and Syria, Dan. xi; with the Romans under Pompey, Vespasian, Trajan, and others; between the eastern emperors and Persians; and in fine, in those between the Franks and Turks; it has often been deluged with blood. For many ages past, it has had every where obvious marks of the curse. It is almost a desolate wilderness. Of most of its cities, we cannot trace the smallest remains. It wants not, however, vestiges of its ancient fertility. When the Jews return to it in the millennium, it will, no doubt, yield them its strength: but the description of it, and of the lots of the tribes, in Ezek. xlvii. and xlviii. perhaps relates not at all to it, but represents the harmony and order of the various tribes of the spiritual Israel, in their apostolic and chiefly millennial periods.

CAN-DACE, a queen of Ethiopia, probably that southward of Egypt. It is said, the name denotes royal authority, and was commonly given to the queens of Meroe. It is certain, Kanidak, in the Abyssinian language, signifies a governor of children. Pliny says, the government of Ethiopia subsisted for several generations in the hands of queens named Candace. It is said, that by the preaching of her EUNUCH, she was converted to the Christian faith. Acts viii. 27.

CANDLE. God's searching Jerusalem with candles imports his perfect knowledge of their conduct; his punishing their secret sins; and his searching their consciences by convictions, and awakening providences. Zeph. i. 12. God's favour and blessing are termed his candle; as they direct, honour, and comfort us. Job xxix. 3. The rational understanding and conscience are termed a candle; they search, observe, judge, inform, and direct us. Prov. xx. 27. Outward prosperity is called a candle; it is pleasant and agreeable; it manifests us to the world; renders us conspicuous; and enables us to act more abundantly for the honour of God, and welfare of men. Job xviii. 6. and xxi. 17. Psal. xviii. 28. Gifts and graces, and teaching offices, bestowed by God on persons, are termed a candle; they ought to be discovered and used for the direction and comfort of others. Matt. v. 15. Luke viii. 16. and xi. 23. Instituted ordinances, and earthly comforts, are called a candle; they are directive and comforting; but are short-lived, and quite unnecessary in the noon-tide of perfect glory. Rev. xxii. 5.

CANDLESTICK. That of the Mosaic sanctuary consisted of a talent of hammered gold, beaten out into seven branches, adorned with knops and flowers. It stood on the south side of the golden altar of incense; and being daily supplied with sacred oil, and its lamps lighted and trimmed by the priests, was the sole illuminator of the sanctuary. Solomon's temple being much larger, ten candlesticks were made for the illumination thereof. Did these candlesticks represent Jesus Christ, full of the Holy Ghost above measure, and the light of his church? Or, did they represent his church, by means of the gospel, giving light to all around? Did the increase of candlesticks portend the growing illumination of Jesus, and the extending glory of his church? Exod. xxv. 31. 1 Kings vii. 49. The seven golden candlesticks in John's vision denoted the seven churches of Asia. And did the two with seven branches in Zechariah's, represent the churches of Jews and Gentiles; or the eastern and western churches furnished with the Spirit of God in his various operations? Rev. i. 20. Zech. iv. 2. The placing of the candle of gifts, graces, and office, not under a bushel, but on a candlestick, imports the use of them, to the instruction, comfort, and edification of men. Mark iv. 21.

CANE. See CALAMUS.

CANKER, or GANGRENE, a terrible disease which inflames and mortifies the flesh upon which it seizes; spreads swiftly; endangers the whole body; and can scarcely be healed without cutting off the infected part. By the microscope, it appears, that swarms of small worms, preying on the flesh, constitute this disease; and that new swarms, produced by these, overrun the neighbouring parts. Errors and heresies are compared to a canker; they overspread, corrupt, and prey on the souls of men; they destroy the vitals of religion, and afterward the forms of godliness, they bring spiritual ruin and death on persons and churches; and ruin upon nations, wherever they are allowed. 2 Tim. ii. 17. Covetous men's silver and gold are cankered; the rust of them bears witness against them, and eats up their flesh as fire; the covetous hoarding of them up from use is attended with painful anxiety, and brings on a fearful curse, and endless torment. James v. 3.

CANKER-WORM; we generally understand by it a creeping insect, which terribly devours the fruits of the earth; but it is obvious from Nah. iii. 16. that the YELEK is a flying insect, and therefore must be a kind of locust; probably the same with the cock-chaffer. Prodigious swarms of these, not long ago, so wasted the county of Galway in Ireland, that, in summer, trees and fields appeared equally bare as in winter. The poor people ate multitudes of them. They, by licking, consume and waste the fruits of the earth. Joel i. 4. The Assyrians were numerous as swarms of canker-worms; but the Medes and Chaldeans, like canker-worms, or cock-chaffers, quickly ate up and destroyed them; and, after they had spoiled all their wealthy merchants, went off with their booty. Nah. iii. 15, 16.

CAN'NEH. See CALNEH.

CA-PERNA-UM, a principal city of Galilee. It was not probably built until after the Babylonish captivity; stood on the western shore of the sea of Tiberias, in the border of Zebulun and Naphtali. It received its name from a clear fountain near it. Here Christ much resided and taught. By the enjoyment of his miracles and ministrations it was exalted to heaven in privilege; and, for neglecting to improve them properly, was thrust down to hell, in the eternal damnation of many of its inhabitants; in its fearful sufferings from the Romans; and in its subsequent forlorn condition. Matt. iv. 15. and xi. 23.

CAPHTOR, an island or country. I am almost surprised to find Bochart follow a number of others, in taking this for Cappadocia, on the frontiers of Colchis, and south shore of the Euxine sea. What inducements could have determined the Caphtorim, or Philistines, the descendants of Mizraim in Egypt, to depart from so fertile a country to the coast of the Euxine sea; and upon little more than a sight of the place, to go back to the south-west corner of Canaan and settle there, before the birth of Abraham, at least not long after? With far more appearance of argument Calmet contends that Caphtor was the Isle of Crete. It is certain Caphtor is called an island. Jer. xlvii. † 4. The seventy interpreters, and apocryphal writers always represent the Philistines as come from another place. It is certain the Cherethites, or Crethim, were a tribe of the Philistines, if it was not once the proper name of the whole nation. Ezek. xxv. 16. Zeph. ii. 5. 1 Sam. xxx. 14. And who sees not that Crethim is the same with Cretis or Cretians, one of the most ancient nations in the islands of the Mediterranean sea? Crete was very anciently stocked, if not overstocked, with inhabitants, and had a hundred cities as early as the Trojan war, which could not be later than the days of Jehoshaphat, if it was not near three hundred years sooner. The language, manners, arms, and idols of the ancient Cretians were the same with those of the Philistines. Gaza, a chief city of the Philistines, was called Minoa, from Minos, a celebrated king of Crete. The whole of this reasoning, however, can only convince me that the Cretians and Philistines sprang from the same root, and maintained an intercourse with one another. And it appears more reasonable to believe that the Cretians were a colony of the Philistines, than to believe that the offspring of Mizraim, without any reason, left Egypt, and sailed into Crete, and so stocked that island, that before, or during the days of Abraham, they were obliged to send back their supernumeraries to Canaan.

The Jewish writers interpret Caphtor of Caphtukia, by which they understand a part of Lower Egypt, chiefly Damietta, or Damiatia, between the streams of the Nile. This opinion is every way probable. Here is Caphtor, properly enough called an island: here is a place where one might expect to find the Caphtorim, descended from Mizraim: here was the city Coptus, probably enough framed from Caphtor, the son of Casluhim, and father of the Caphtorim, which were either the same with the Philistines, or brethren of them. Gen. x. 14. Amos ix. 7. Jer. xlvii. 4.

CAP-PA-DO'CIA; a country having the Euxine sea on the north, Armenia the Greater on the south, Galatia and Pamphylia on the west, and Cilicia on the east. It is probable this country was peopled by the descendants of Torgamah. It was famed for horses and flocks; and traded with the Tyrians in horses and mules. Ezek. xxvii. 14. It is likely Cappadocia was a province of the kingdom of Lydia. According to Herodotus, it next passed to the Medes, and thence to the Persians, whose worship the inhabitants embraced, and afterwards added to it part of the idolatry of the Greeks. For what reason some ancient authors call them Assyrians, or White Syrians, I know not. The Cappadocians had kings of their own from the time of Cyrus until after the birth of our Saviour, when the country was reduced to a Roman province. From the Roman emperors of the east, it passed to the Turks. While heathenism prevailed, the Cappadocians were infamous for their wickedness, chiefly their lewdness; but Christianity was early planted among them, perhaps by means of some who were converted by Peter's sermon at Pentecost. Acts ii. 9. Peter wrote his first epistle partly to the Christian Jews of this place. 1 Pet. i. 1. Christianity flourished here considerably, and a number of celebrated bishops laboured in the work of the Lord. We can trace the history of Christianity in this country until the ninth century; nor is it yet altogether abolished.

CAPTAIN, an officer of a troop or army. Deut. i. 15. A king, prince, or head of a family, or tribe, is called a captain. In due order, his inferiors are marshalled under him, and may be led forth to war by him. 1 Sam. x. 1. Num. ii. 8. Christ is the Captain of our salvation. To purchase our salvation, with what wisdom and courage he attacked and conquered sin, Satan, and the world! How graciously he subdues our hearts to himself, leads us to glory through much opposition, and directs and enables us to vanquish our spiritual foes! Heb. ii. 10; and he was the Captain of the Lord's host of Israel, who directed, encouraged, and protected them in their war with the Canaanites, and others. Josh. v. 14. The Chaldean captains opened their mouths in the slaughter, when they gave orders for the murderous attacks: or the word may denote the destructive battering rams. Ezek. xxi. 22. The Antichristian captains are the chief rulers in church or state, who command, direct, or excite others to oppose the Redeemer. Rev. xix. 18.

CAPTIVE; one taken prisoner in war. There is a threefold captivity: (1.) Natural, when men are apprehended by the enemy, carried out of their own land, and held in slavery. Dent. xxviii. 25, 48. (2.) Evangelical, when one is apprehended and drawn by Christ's almighty love, and has his whole heart and affections subdued to the obedience of faith. 2 Cor. x. 5. (3.) Sinful, when one is carried away and oppressed, or enslaved under the power of Satan, and his own inward corruptions. Rom. vii. 23. 2 Tim. ii. 26. Captivity also signifies a multitude of captives, who had made others captive. Jesus leads captivity captive, when he makes devils and wicked men to serve as his slaves in promoting his work; and when he apprehends and subdues his people by the word of his grace; and places them in their new-covenant state. Psal. lxxviii. 18. Barak led captivity captive, when he took prisoners the Canaanites, who just before had terribly enslaved Israel. Judg. v. 12. The various turns of servitude and captivity that happened to the Hebrews may be seen under the articles ISRAEL and JUDAH.

CARBUNCLE; a very beautiful jewel, of a deep red, mingled with scarlet, second in value to the diamond, and of equal hardness with the sapphire. It is generally of an angular form; about a quarter of an inch in length, and a sixth part of one in breadth. But the king of Ceylon, in the East Indies, (where the finest carbuncles are found,) has one about four inches broad, and three thick, of the brightness of fire. Carbuncles bear the fire without the least alteration; but when they are held up against the sun, they lose their beautiful tinge, and become like a burning charcoal. They are very rare, found only in the East Indies, that I know of; but it seems the Tyrian king had his robes set thick with these sparkling stones of fire. Ezek. xxviii. 13. The carbuncle in the high-priest's breast-plate might prefigure the saints, as having their faith tried in the furnace of affliction; and having their hearts flaming with love and holy zeal for the honour of God. Exod. xxviii. 17. The carbuncle gates of the church may denote Jesus in his flaming love and fiery sufferings, as the means of our access to God: or holy, compassionate, and zealous ministers, who, after due trial, admit persons into the visible church; or the bright and burning love which flows from that faith by which we enter into our new-covenant state. Isa. liv. 12.

CARCASE; the dead body of a man or beast. Num. xiv. 25. Idols are called carcases, because lifeless and abominable. Jer. xvi. 18. The carcases of Jewish kings, that defiled God's house, are either the idolatrous images of their kings, or human bodies sacrificed to Moloch. Ezek. xliii. 7, 9. Christ's witnesses are like unburied carcases, when they are in a very weak and languishing condition, inhumanly used by the papists, and yet not permitted by Providence to be utterly undone. Rev. ix. 8, 9. The carcases of transgressors, whose worm dies not, and whose fire is not quenched, are the Jews and Anti-christians fearfully distressed by divine judgments, and the damned for ever tormented in hell. Isa. lxvi. 24. Whosoever the carcase is, thither shall the eagles be gathered together. Some have interpreted these words, wherever a crucified Redeemer is preached, thither shall hungry sinners and affectionate saints gather to him. But the context shews, that the real meaning is, that wherever the corrupt Jews, who had lost the true religion and zeal for God, and wallowed in the most abominable wickedness, should hide or secure themselves, whether in cities or fields, thither should the eagle-bannered and ravaging Roman armies come and find them out. Matt. xxiv. 28. Luke xvii. 37.

CARCHE-MISH; a city on the bank of the Euphrates, and probably the same with Circesium, on the east side of that river. About the downfall of the Assyrian empire, the Egyptians seized on it; but Nebuchadnezzar, after giving Pharaoh-necho a dreadful defeat near to it, took it, and broke the garrison to pieces. Isa. x. 9. 2 Chron. xxxv. 20. Jer. xli. 1—12.

CARE; thought and concern about a thing. God's providence towards his creatures, especially his people, is called his care for them. He considers their case, preserves their existence and powers, governs their acts, and promotes their welfare. Matt. vi. 26, 30. 1 Cor. ix. 9. 1 Pet. v. 7. Men's care is either, (1.) Lawful, consisting in a serious thought, and earnest endeavour to please God, embracing his Son, obeying his law, turning from sin; and to promote our neighbour's temporal or spiritual advantage; and in moderate exertions to gain a competent portion of the good things of this life. 2 Cor. vii. 11, 12. Phil. ii. 20. 1 Pet. v. 7. (2.) Sinful, in endeavouring to fulfil sinful lusts or pleasures; and in improper anxieties to obtain carnal advantages; such care is forbidden, Matt. vi. 24. and Phil. iv. 6. The cares of this world, that choke the word of God, and render it unfruitful, are immoderate and anxious concern for earthly enjoyments, which prevents the word from producing a proper effect on our hearts. Matt. xiii. 22. To eat bread with care or carefulness, is to do it under pinching straits, and apprehensions of terrible judgments. Ezek. iv. 16. and xii. 18, 19. We are not careful to answer thee in this matter; we need give no answer in words, being ready to manifest our fixed resolution by the endurance of suffering. Dan. iii. 16.

CARMEL. (1.) A city situated on a mountain of the same name, in the south part of the inheritance of Judah, about ten miles south-east of Hebron. Here Saul erected a triumphal monument as he returned from the slaughter of the Amalekites;—here Nabal the Carmelite dwelt;—and here, it is said, the Romans, many ages afterwards, had a garrison. 1 Sam. xv. 12. and xxv. 2. (2.) A pleasant hill on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, about sixteen miles north-west from Jezreel, in the border between Issachar and Manasseh. It abounded with vines and olives; and at the west foot of it was a fishing of the Carmel or purple fish. Here Elijah offered his famed sacrifice, and was answered by fire from heaven, and ordered the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal to be slain. 1 Kings xviii. 19—40. Here the heathens, in after ages, revered a noted deity, without image or temple, but merely an altar. To this deity the Roman emperor Vespasian sacrificed; and consulted it whether he should obtain the empire. About A. D. 1180, an order of Carmelite friars were appointed, who erected a monastery here, and pretended to be the successors of the children of the prophets left here by Elijah. Any fertile place is called Carmel, or Sharon. Isa. xxix. 17; xxxii. 15. and xxxiii. 9. The saints' head is like Carmel; Jesus, their head of government and influence, is infinitely high, glorious, and fruitful; hope, their crowning grace, enters within the veil, has a wide prospect, and is extremely delightful, and fruitful in good works. Sol. Song vii. 5. The word may be rendered crimson.

CARNAL; fleshly, sensual, sinful. Worldly enjoyments are carnal; they but please and support the body. Rom. xv. 27. 1 Cor. ix. 11. Ministers' weapons are not carnal, are not merely human and natural. 2 Cor. x. 4. The ceremonial ordinances were carnal; they related immediately to the bodies of men and beasts. Heb. vii. 16. and ix. 10. Wicked men are carnal, and carnally minded; are under the dominion of their sinful lusts, and habitually think of, desire after, and delight in sinful and fleshly pleasures and enjoyments. Rom. viii. 6, 7. Saints, especially if weak, are carnal; much sin continues in, and prevails over them; and their care for and delight in worldly things is great. Rom. vii. 14. 1 Cor. xiii. 1—4.

CARPENTER; an artificer in wood. 2 Kings xii. 11. Reforming magistrates and ministers like carpenters, rectify the frame of church and state, and duly join and polish the various members thereof. Zerubabel, Joshua, Ezra, Nehemiah, or Mattathias, with his sons Judas, Jonathan, and Simeon, were the four carpenters that frayed away the four horns, the harassing Samaritans, Arabians, Philistines, and Syrians. Zech. i. 20.

CARRIAGE; the load of a man or a beast; baggage. Acts xxi. 15. Isa. x. 28. or that on which a thing is carried. Isa. xli. 1.

CARRY; (1.) To bear; remove. 2 Sam. xv. 29. (2.) To support, protect, and keep safe. Isa. xli. 2, 4. (3.) To lead, or drive. Gen. xxxi. 18. (4.) To cause to ride, 1 Chron. xiii. 7. The Philistines, and other gentiles, carry the Jews, when they promote their conversion to Christ, and their return to their own land; and they carry the members of the church, when they join themselves to her, and promote her welfare. Isa. xi. 14. and xlix. 22. To be carried about of false doctrines, or tempests, is to be unsteadfast in our belief of divine truth, and easily seduced into error, the most stupid and self-inconsistent. Eph. iv. 14. Heb. xiii. 9. 2 Pet. ii. 17. To be carried away of Satan's flood, is to be utterly seduced into error, or utterly destroyed. Rev. xii. 15. To be carried away in the Spirit, is to be affected by an extraordinary impression of the Holy Ghost, and brought, as it were, to a particular place. Rev. xvii. 3.

CARVE; to cut figures or images in wood, stone, metal. 1 Kings vi. 18.

CASEMENT; a window, or the grate of it. Prov. vii. 6.

CA-SI-PHIA. To this place Ezra, when he came from Babylon to Judea, sent for some priests to attend him. The coast of the Caspian sea appears too distant to have been this place. It seems rather to have been near Babylon. Ezra viii. 17.

CASSIA, a kind of the decandria monogynia class of plants. Its flower is composed of five petals, arranged in a circular form. The pistil which arises from the midst of these is a pod, sometimes rothdiah, and sometimes flatted, and having a variety of cells, wherein are lodged a vast many seeds. Tournefort mentions ten kinds of cassia, five of them of a stinking smell. It grows in various places of the East, as well as in America. The fragrant cassia, which is said to have been the bark of the tree, was one of the sweet spices from which the anointing oil was extracted, and was sometimes used to perfume garments. It signified the savoury and medicinal graces of the Holy Ghost. Exod. xxx. 24. Psal. xlv. 8.

CAST. To cast young is to miscarry, or bring them forth before the time. Gen. xxxi. 38. Exod. xxiii. 26. To cast metal, is to melt and mould it into a particular shape. Exod. xxv. 12. To cast off, cast away, is to give up, disdainfully or wrathfully to reject. Judg. xv. 17. Ezek. xviii. 31. Rom. xi. 11. God casts on men, and spares not, when he terribly punishes them. Job xxvii. 22. God's casting sin behind his back, or into the depths of the sea, imports his complete forgiveness of it, and his determined purpose never to punish us for it. Isa. xxxviii. 17. Mic. vii. 19. To cast out, is to reject and cast into hell, Matt. viii. 12. John xv. 6; to excommunicate from the church. John ix. 35. The Jewish children of the kingdom were cast out, when excluded from a visible church-state, thrown out of the peculiar favour of God into terrible miseries, and multitudes cast into hell. Matt. viii. 12. Jesus Christ will not cast out any that come to him; however guilty, polluted, rebellious, and infamous, he will kindly receive and save them. John vi. 37. The casting of Satan to the earth, may import his loss of his worship in the heathen idols; his restraint from hurting the true church, and being only permitted to rage among heathens and reprobates. Rev. xii. 9. Men's casting God's words behind them, when they forget, reject, and condemn them. Psal. i. 17. They cast away their transgressions, when they repent of, turn from, and abhor them. Compare Ezek. xviii. 31. with Hos. ii. 2.

CASTAWAY. See REPROBATE.

CASTLE; a strong house or fort, fit to withstand the attacks of an enemy. Gen. xxv. 16. 2 Chron. xiii. 12.

CASTOR and POLLUX were reckoned the sons of Jupiter; they were heroes, who cleared the sea of pirates, and hence were worshipped by sailors and others, after their death. The fiery exhalations which sometimes appear at sea, they took for them; and if but one appeared at once, they thought the voyage would be unlucky. Their images were the sign of the ship in which Paul sailed to Rome. Acts xxviii. 11.

CATCH; to lay old on; to carry or draw quickly; to entangle and make a prey of. Exod. xxii. 6. Mark xii. 13. Ministers catch men, when they are instrumental in converting them to Christ by the gospel. Luke v. 10. with Acts ii. 14-41. The false apostles pretended Paul caught his hearers by guile, in using indirect methods of procuring their money. 2 Cor. xii. 16. Satan and his agents catch away the good seed, or word of God, when they make men quickly lose the remembrance and impression of what they have heard, and hinder their putting it in practice. Matt. xiii. 9. False teachers catch and scatter Christ's sheep, by entangling them in their error, or raising persecution against them. John x. 12.

CATECHISE; to instruct by question and answer. That it is the duty of ministers, masters, and parents, so to instruct those under their charge, is so plain as to need no proof. Gal. vi. 6. Deut. iv. 10.

CATERPILARS; soft or rough insects, that prey upon and consume the leaves and fruits of trees, herbs, flowers, and grass. Their kinds and eggs are very numerous; and it is said one destroys the eggs of another. Butterflies pass through the state of caterpillars, and therein spin a kind of silk out of their own bowels. By caterpillars the Lord plagued the Egyptians, and the wicked Jews. Psal. lxxviii. 46. Joel i. 4. and ii. 25.

CATTLE often comprehends all four-footed beasts; but sometimes only those of the more tame kinds, as horses, camels, asses, oxen, sheep, goats, and deer. Gen. i. 25. and xxx. 43. The substance of the ancients consisted chiefly in cattle; which is the case in many eastern countries in the present day; nor did the children of great men think it below them to attend their flocks. Job i. Gen. xxix. Exod. ii. By the impression of the air cattle know the approach of storms. Job xxxvi. 33. Men are likened to cattle: how naturally stupid are all of them! how mischievous some of them! how useful others! how necessary for all to be watched over, and to be provided for, by the providence of God! Ezek. xxxiv. 17.

CAVE; a hole of the earth, chiefly in rocks, for men to lodge in. Caves were pretty common in Canaan, and the neighbouring countries. Strabo says there were caves in Arabia sufficient to hold 4000 men. Vansleb mentions one in Egypt sufficient to contain 1000 horsemen. In a cave at Makkedah, the five Canaanitish kings thought to hide themselves from Joshua. Chap. x. 16. In caves the Israelites hid themselves from the Midianites and Philistines. Judg. vi. 2. 1 Sam. xiii. 6. In caves at Adullam, Engedi, &c. David often lodged in his exile. 1 Sam. xxii. 10. and xxiv. 10. In two caves Obadiah hid, and nourished a hundred prophets of the Lord. 1 Kings xviii. 2. In a cave Elijah lodged when he fled from Jezebel, and probably also when he was by the brook Cherith. 1 Kings xix. 9. and xvii. 3. In caves the Jews hid themselves from the persecution of Antiochus. Heb. xi. 38. In the cave of Machpelah were Abraham, Sarah, Jacob, and Leah, buried. In one near Bethany was Lazarus interred. A great many of the Jewish sepulchres were caves digged in the earth. Gen. i. 34. John xi. 38.

CAUL; (1.) The midriff or net-work that covers the heart of some animals. Exod. xxix. 13. (2.) A covering of net-work for women's heads. Isa. iii. 18. To rend the caul of one's heart, is violently to bereave him of life, and, as it were, tear him asunder quickly in the manner of wild beasts. Hos. xiii. 8.

CAUSE. (1.) A suit; a controversy. Psal. xliii. 1. (2.) A ground or reason. 1 Sam. xvii. 29. (3.) Sake; account. 2 Cor. vii. 12. Without cause, or causeless. (1.) Without any reason. 1 Sam. xxv. 31. (2.) Without a sufficient reason, or distinguished offence. Prov. xxvi. 2. Job ii. 3. and ix. 17.

CAUSEY; a way paved with stones or gravel. It probably means the raised way between the palace of the kings of Judah, and the south-west entrance of the temple. 1 Chron. xxvi. 16.

CEASE; (1.) To give over. 1 Sam. vii. 8. (2.) To be forgotten. Deut. xxxii. 16. (3.) To rest and become quiet. Judg. xv. 7. (4.) To be altogether wanting. Deut. xv. 11. (5.) To be removed by death, captivity, or the like. Lam. v. 14. (6.) To forbear trusting or depending on. Prov. xxiii. 4. Isa. ii. 24. To avoid, abstain from. Isa. i. 16. Psal. xxxvii. 8. To cease from our own works, is no longer to make our own will the rule of our duty; to forbear resting on our own works as our righteousness before God; and to depend on Christ's fulfilment of the law in our stead; and to obey the law in the strength of his grace. Heb. iv. 10. He that hath suffered in the flesh, hath ceased from sin; he that is regarded by God as suffering with Christ, is freed from the guilt of sin; he that has experienced the power of Christ's death on his conscience, is delivered from the love and voluntary service of sin; he that has cordially suffered a violent death for Christ's sake, has entirely got rid of sin, his worst burden; he that mortifies his corruptions, and endures fiery trials for Christ's sake, has ceased from the habitual practice of sin. 1 Pet. iv. 1. Without ceasing, frequently, earnestly. 2 Tim. i. 3. 1 Thess. v. 17.

CEDAR-TREE. Linnæus classes it among the junipers. Cedars spread their roots and branches exceedingly; they grow very high, and have a large and delightful shade; their leaves are like those of rosemary, and continue always green; their top is about 120 feet round; but in time of snow is contracted into the form of a cone, that it may receive no more load than it is able to bear. The stump or stock is sometimes about thirty-five or forty feet round. Its wood is of a beautiful brownish colour, has a fragrant smell, and fine grain; and being bitter and distasteful to worms, is so incorruptible, that part of it was found fresh in the temple of Utica in Barbary, about 2000 years old. It distils a useful gum; and its juice is said to preserve dead bodies from corruption. Lebanon once abounded with cedars; a great many of them were cut down to build the temple, and a variety of other structures, in Canaan, Phenicia, and Syria. The Chaldeans cut down a vast many more, to be employed in their sieges. 1 Kings vi. 36. Isa. xiv. 8. Cedar wood was also used in the cleansing of lepers, and in the water of purification. Lev. xiv. 4. Numb. xvi. 6.

Jesus Christ is supposed by some to be likened to a cedar, for his strength, excellency, glorious height, refreshing shadow, constant comeliness, delightfulness, duration, and for his quickening and preserving influence. Is he not the great material in the building of the church? and does he not purify us from our sinful leprosy, and loathsome death, in trespasses and sins? Sol. Song v. 15. Ezek. xvii. 23. The saints are also likened to cedars. Rooted and grounded in Christ, the Rock of ages; they grow up to the stature of perfect men in him; and are the delightful protection and strength of nations and churches; never utterly wither, nor are totally dispirited under any storm. Psal. xcii. 12. Judg. ix. 15. Sol. Song i. 17. Isa. xli. 19. Sol. Song viii. 9. The Assyrians, Amorites, and other nations are likened to cedars, to mark their great strength, pride, and prosperity. Ezek. xxxi. 3, 8. Amos ii. 9. Kings are likened to cedars, to figure out their high station, glorious excellency, and their protection of others. 2 Kings xiv. 9. Ezek. xvii. 3, 23. Proud and great men are likened to cedars; they seem, at least to themselves, firmly founded; they rise in a superiority above others, and for a while make a glorious and comely appearance. Isa. ii. 13. and x. 33, 34. Zech. xi. 2.

CEDRON. See Kidron.

CELEBRATE; (1.) To praise; to render famous. Isa. xxxviii. 18. (2.) To keep holy. Lev. xxiii. 32, 41.

CELESTIAL; heavenly. 1 Cor. xv. 40.

CELLAR; a storehouse for wine and other liquors. 1 Chron. xxvii. 28.

CEN'CHRE-A. See CORINTH.

CENSER; a golden vessel, perhaps somewhat of the form of a cup, with, or without a handle. With it the priest carried fire and incense to burn before the Lord in the sanctuary, or oracle. Did it represent Christ's person, in which his intercession proceeds from unmatched love, and is founded on infinite sufferings. Lev. xvi. 12. Heb. ix. 4. Rev. viii. 3, 5.

CENTURION; a Roman officer who commanded a hundred soldiers. One of them, with great faith and humility, applied to Jesus for the miraculous cure of his servant. Another was converted by means of the earthquake, and similar events which attended his death. Matt. viii. 5. and xxxvii. 54.

CERPHAS. See PETER.

CEREMONIES; rites used in the Jewish worship. See TYPES.

CERTAIN; (1.) Sure; fixed. Dent. xiii. 14. (2.) Some one. Num. xvi. 2.

CERTIFY; to give sure information. Ezra iv. 14.

CESAR; the Emperor of Rome, as Augustus, Tiberius, Claudius, Nero, &c. Luke ii. 1.

CES-A-RE'A, anciently called Strato's Tower, was built by Herod the Great, in honour of Augustus, and called by his name. This city stood on the shore of the Mediterranean sea, about seventy-five miles northwest of Jerusalem. It was peopled partly with heathens, and partly with Jews, which sometimes occasioned terrible contentions between them. Here Cornelius lived; here Herod was eaten up of worms; here Philip the deacon lived with his daughters; here Agabas foretold Paul's imprisonment at Jerusalem; here Paul was tried before Felix and Festus, and continued two years a prisoner. Acts x. 1; xii. 19; viii. 40; xi. 11; and xxiii. 28. A respectable church continued here till the seventh century. But in Acts ix. 30. it perhaps means Cesarea-Philippi.

CES-A-RE'A-PHI-LIP'PI. See DAN.

CHAFED; highly provoked. 2 Sam. xvii. 8.

CHAFF; the refuse of winnowed corn. Psal. i. 4. Wicked men, particularly hypocrites, are likened to chaff; whatever defence they afford to the saints, who are the good wheat, in themselves they are worthless, barren, and inconstant, easily driven about with false doctrines, and tossed into ruin by the blast of God's wrathful judgments. Matt. iii. 12. Hos. xiii. 3. Isa. xli. 16. False doctrines are called chaff; they are vile, useless, and unsubstantial, and cannot abide the trial of God's word or Spirit. Jer. xxiii. 28. Fruitless projects are like chaff and stubble; they are unsubstantial, and easily overturned by blasts of opposition. Isa. xxxiii. 11. The Assyrians were like the chaff of the mountains, when the angel destroyed most of their army, and the rest fled home with great precipitation. Isa. xvii. 13. and xxxvii. 7, 26, 27.

CHAIN. With chains idols were fixed in their shrines, Isa. xl. 19; and criminals in their prison, or servitude. Jer. lii. 11. Chains of gold were worn as ornaments of the neck. Gen. xli. 42. God's law is a chain; it restrains from sinful liberty; is uneasy to corrupt men; and is a great ornament to the saints who obey it. Prov. x. 9. The chains of gold that adorn the church's neck, may signify her well-connected and valuable truths and ordinances, and the gifts of her officers and members. The chains of gold, that adorn the necks of particular saints, may denote their gifts, graces, blessings, and good works, that are exceedingly ornamental to their faith. Sol. Song i. 10. and iv. 9. The great chain with which Satan is bound for a thousand years, is the powerful restraints of Divine Providence, and the just laws against scandalous crimes faithfully executed. Rev.

xx. 1. The chains of darkness, with which fallen angels are bound till the day of judgment, are, the reprobating purpose of God, the curse of his broken law, their own sinful lusts, and their condemning conscience. 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude 6. Bondage and trouble are chains; they restrain our liberty, render us uneasy, and are shameful badges of our guilt; and yet, if borne for Christ, are an honourable ornament. Lam. iii. 7. 2 Tim. i. 16. Make a chain, prepare for captivity and slavery. Ezek. vii. 23. Pride is a chain, which keeps men under its power; and by a discovery of it in their conduct, they use it, as if ornamental to them. Psal. lxxiii. 6.

CHAIN-WORK, is work wrought in resemblance of a chain. 1 Kings vii. 17.

CHAL'CE-DO-NY; a precious stone, of a grey colour, clouded with blue, yellow, or purple. It much resembles the common agate. The best sort is that which has a pale blue cast. It was the third foundation in the New Jerusalem, and might represent Jesus in the excellency and wonderful connection of his natures. Rev. xxi. 17.

CHAL-DEA; a country in Asia, between the 30th and 35th degree of north latitude, and mostly between the 45th and 49th degree of east longitude from London; and so can only be called north of Judea, because the Chaldean armies had to march by Syria to invade that country. When taken in its most extensive sense, it comprehended also Babylonia, and had the river Tigris on the east side, Mesopotamia on the north, and Arabia the Desert on the west, the Persian Gulf, and part of Arabia Felix, on the south. The soil was very fertile, but had little rain, sometimes scarcely any for eight months together; nor is there much need for it, as the Tigris and the Euphrates yearly water it; and the inhabitants, by painful toil, supply what is wanting. Its ancient name was SHINAR; because the Lord, by the confusion of tongues, did, as it were, shake the inhabitants out of it, to people the rest of the world. What cities in Chaldea were properly so called, which lay south of Babylonia, is not to our purpose: but when taken to include Mesopotamia, Ur, Carchemish, and others belonged to it.

The Chaldeans, or Chadim, seem to have been partly descended from Arphaxad the son of Shem, and partly from Chesed the son of Nahor. It appears both from Herodotus and from scripture, that the Chaldeans were, for some ages, given to robbery, in the manner of the Arabs. Three bands of them carried off Job's camels. Job i. 17. The Assyrians under Pul seem to have reduced them to order, and formed them into the kingdom of Babylon for Nabonassar his younger son. Isa. xxiii. 13. The Chaldeans, so called in a strict sense, were a society of pretenders to learning, priests, philosophers, astronomers, astrologers, soothsayers, who, it is said, dwelt in a region by themselves; and the rest of the people were called Babylonians. Dan. ii. 2, 4.

CHALK, or limestones. To make the stones of altars like these, is to pull them down, break them to pieces, and entirely abolish the idolatrous worship. Isa. xxvii. 9.

CHAMBER; an apartment of a house. Some were inner chambers, to which one had to go through part of the house, and were more secret. 1 Kings xx. 30. and xxii. 25. Some were upper chambers, or garrets, where it seems they laid their dead, and where the Jews sometimes had idolatrous altars; and where the Christians, in the apostolic age, had often their meetings for worship. Acts ix. 37; xx. 8. and i. 13. 2 Kings xxiii. 12. Some were for beds, others for entertaining guests, at the three solemn feasts, or on other occasions. Matt. ix. 15. 2 Kings vi. 12. Mark ix. 14.

God's chambers are the clouds, where he lays up his treasures of rain, snow, hail, wind; and where he mysteriously displays his wisdom and power. Psal. civ. 8, 13. Christ's chambers are his ordinances, and intimate fellowship with him therein, by which he familiarly instructs, comforts, and protects his people. Sol. Song i. 4. To apply ourselves to earnest prayer and supplication, and to depend on God's promises, perfections, and providence for special protection, is to enter into our chambers, that we may be safe, as the Hebrews were in their houses, from the destroying angel. Isa. xxvi. 20. The chambers built for lodging the serving priests at the temple, and which narrowed according to their height, might figure out the intimate fellowship with Christ, and deep concern for the church, which ministers ought to maintain; and that there are but few ministers of true eminence, and that even these are generally exposed to much persecution. 1 Kings vi. 5. Ezek. xlii. 5, 6. The little side chambers in Ezekiel's vision, that were built on the wall, and widened as they rose in height, might signify particular churches, religious assemblies, and ordinances, wherein the saints are spiritually born, feasted, instructed, and protected; and which are all supported by God, as their wall of salvation; and in which, the more men are dependent on God and heavenly-minded, the greater is their true liberty. Ezek. xl. 7, 13. and xlii. 5—7. The bride-chamber denotes the most intimate fellowship with Christ, while he continued the bridegroom of his church on earth. The chambers of the south are the constellations or clusters of stars belonging to the southern part of the firmament, which are often hid from us, and whose appearance is ordinarily attended with storms. Job ix. 9.

CHAMBERING; immodest or unclean behaviour. Rom. xiii. 13.

CHAMBERLAIN; (1.) A keeper of the king's bed-chamber, or a steward. Esth. i. 10. (2.) City-treasurer. Rom. xvi. 23.

CHAMOIS; a kind of goat; at least, its erected and hooked horns, of the length of six or seven inches, refer it to that class, though the rest of its figure comes nearer to the deer kind. Its whole body is covered with a deep fur, waved and somewhat curled about the ears. Of this animal's skin, the true chamoy leather is made. But whether this be the ZOMER, declared unclean by the Hebrew law, we cannot determine. Dr. Shaw thinks it is rather the Yerassa, or cameleopardalis, which, in figure, has a mixed resemblance of the goat, ox, and deer, chiefly the last; but its neck is as long as that of a camel, generally about seven feet; when erected, its head is about sixteen feet high; the whole length of its body is about eighteen feet. Its fore legs are very long, and the hinder ones much shorter. It is beautifully spotted as the leopard, and almost as tame as a sheep. Deut. xiv. 5.

CHAMPAIGN; a plain, open country. Dent. xi. 20.

CHAMPION; a strong and noted warrior. 1 Sam. xvii. 4.

CHANCE; (1.) Unforeseen event. 1 Sam. vi. 9. (2.) To happen; fall out. Deut. xxii. 6.

CHANCELLOR; the president of the council for the king's affairs. Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17.

CHANGE; (1.) To alter for the better or for the worse. Psal. cii. 26. Acts vi. 14. Eccl. viii. 1. (2.) To put or give one thing for another. Lev. xxvii. 10. (3.) To disannul. Dan. vi. 8. (4.) To give one's right to another. Ruth iv. 7. Antichrist changes times and laws, when he alters the constitutions and laws of Christ's church, and pretends to make things holy, or profane, as he pleases. Dan. vii. 25. The living at the last day are changed, when their bodies are rendered immortal. 1 Cor. xv. 51. Night is changed into day, when men can obtain no rest or sleep therein. Job xvii. 12. Changes and war against men, denote afflictive alterations of their circumstances. Job x. 17. Psal. lv. 19. Joshua the high priest's change of raiment, does not merely denote the putting on a suit of fine clothes instead of his filthy ones, but the removal of sin, through the imputation of our Saviour's finished obedience and suffering, and the qualifying of him to be a faithful High-priest. Zech. iii. 4.

CHANNEL; the bed in which a river runs. Isa. vii. 7. The hollow of the shoulder bone is called a channel, because somewhat, in form, like the bed of a river. Job xxx. + 22.

CHANT; to sing merrily. Amos vi. 5.

CHAPEL; a house for public worship. Bethel is called the king's chapel, because there the kings of Israel worshipped the golden calf. Amos vii. 13.

CHAPTERS; ornaments on the top of pillars, walls, &c. somewhat resembling a human head. The many chapters in the tabernacle and temple might signify Jesus, the ornamental head of his body, the church. Exod. xxxvi. 38. 1 Kings vii. 16.

CHAPT; rent with drought. Jer. xiv. 4.

CHARGE; (1.) To command solemnly. Exod. i. 22. Gen. xxviii. 1. (2.) To exhort earnestly. 1 Thess. ii. 11. (3.) To put an office or business on one; and so have the charge of any thing, is to have the care and management of it committed to him. Dent. xxiv. 5. 1 Tim. v. 16. Acts vii. 27. (4.) To bind or adjure by a solemn oath. 1 Sam. xiv. 27. (5.) To accuse or lay a thing as a crime to one's charge. Job i. 22. Psal. xxxv. 11.

CHARGER; a vessel for holding provisions at table. Num. vii. 17. Matt. xiv. 8.

CHARGEABLE; costly; expensive. 2 Sam. xiii. 25.

CHARIOTS. (1.) Light coaches to perform journeys in. Gen. xvi. 29. (2.) A sort of carriages for warriors to fight from, and to break the ranks of the enemy. 1 Kings xxi. 31. Chariots of iron, were such as had iron scythes fixed to their sides, that, when furiously driven, they might mow down whoever stood in the way. A vast number of the Egyptian war-chariots had their wheels divinely taken off, and were drowned in the Red sea. Exod. xv. 7. The Canaanites, defeated by Joshua near Merom, lost a multitude of chariots. Josh. xi. 4. Nine hundred chariots of iron were in the army of Jabin commanded by Sisera. Judg. iv. 4. In the beginning of Saul's reign, the Philistines brought to the field 30,000 chariots; but these comprehended the whole of their waggons, and other carriages; or perhaps rather meant such as fought in chariots, as the word seems to be taken, in 2 Sam. x. 18. 1 Kings xx. 21. 1 Chron. xix. 18. As the Hebrews were forbidden by God to trust in chariots and horses, or even to multiply them, it was long before they used them in their wars; nor indeed was their hilly country very fit for them. When David took 1000 chariots from Hadaderer, he burned 900 of them, and houghed the horses, reserving only 100 to himself. 2 Sam. viii. 4. Solomon had 1400 chariots. 1 Kings x. 26. Nor even afterwards do any but kings and chief captains seem to have used them in battle; their kings had often two, that if one broke, they might ride in the second. 2 Chron. xxxv. 24. The binding the chariot to the swift beast, imports fleeing off from the enemy with the utmost speed. Mic. i. 13. In imitation of the Persians and other heathen kings, Manasseh and Amon consecrated chariots to the sun; but Josiah destroyed them. 2 Kings xxiii. 11.

God's chariots are angels, providences, and clouds, in the agency and motion of which he displays his greatness and power, opposes and conquers his foes, and supports and protects his people. Psal. lxxviii. 17. Hab. iii. 8. Isa. lxvi. 15. Christ's chariot of the wood of Lebanon, whose bottom is of gold, its pillars of silver, its covering of purple, and its midst paved with love, is that by which he displays his glory, conquers his enemies, or carries his people to heaven; particularly his human nature, which is the fruit of the earth, and was educated in Nazareth, southward of Lebanon. Its golden bottom is his precious, eternal, and immutable Godhead; its silver pillars, his choice, pure, and incorruptible graces; its purple covering, his bloody sufferings and royal exaltation; its midst his amazing love to sinful men. Or, 2dly, This chariot is his new covenant, ever fresh, beautiful, and lasting. Its golden bottom, is the perfections and purposes of God; its silver pillars, the various promises contained therein; its purple covering, Christ's fulfilment of its conditions; and its midst, the redeeming love of God to men. Or, 3dly, His everlasting gospel, whose golden bottom is our divine Redeemer himself; its silver pillars, firm, pure, and eternal truths; its purple covering, the doctrines of justification through his blood; and its midst, the love, grace, and mercy, exhibited therein. Or, 4thly, His church deeply fixed, and indestructible. Her bottom is his invaluable Self; her silver pillars are precious ministers and saints; her purple covering, Christ's imputed righteousness, the royalty of her true members in him, and their suffering for his sake; and her midst, paved with love, is her ordinances, and the hearts of the saints. Sol. Song iii. 9, 10. Christ resembles the chariots of Amminadab, some noted driver. In notable glory and greatness, he comes speedily to help, bear, fight for, and protect his chosen people. But the words may be rendered, My soul, set me on the chariots of my willing people: their faith, hope, and desire, are the chariots on which he gloriously hastens to their relief. Sol. Song vi. 12. The four chariots, proceeding from between mountains of brass, may denote the four noted monarchies, which, according to the eternal purpose of God, have, from small beginnings, and amidst great opposition appeared in the world, and in their turn conquered the nations. The chariot with red horses, may denote the Assyrians and Chaldeans, cruel and bloody; that with black horses, the Medes and Persians sometimes arrayed in black, and terribly distressing: that with white horses, the Greeks, astonishingly victorious, and overrunning the very places which the Medes and Persians had conquered: that with grizzled and bay horses, the Romans and Goths, who pushed their conquests chiefly to the southward. Might these chariots signify angels, as employed in the dispensations of providence, in bloody wars and persecutions, in famines and pestilence, in joy and prosperity, and in events wonderfully mixed? Or, might they not signify gospel-ministers, in their diversified conditions? Or, in the periods, apostolic, antichristian, millennial &c.? Zech. vi. 1-8. Ministers and eminent saints are the chariots and horsemen of a country: such is the regard which God shews them, such the power of their prayers and holy conversation, that they are a principal means of their victories and preservation of their countries. 2 Kings ii. 12. and xlii. 14.

CHARITY. See LOVE.

CHARM. See DIVINATION. To be charmed, is to be affected with charms or spells. Jer viii. 17. Charmers charming never so wisely, may be rendered the eloquently putting things together with great wisdom. No human method of delivering gospel truth can, of itself, make any saving impression on the heart of an obstinate sinner. Psal. lviii. 4.

CHASE; to follow hard after one, with an intent to destroy. Deut. i. 44. To chase out; chase from; chase away, is angrily to drive. Job xviii. 18. Prov. xix. 20.

CHASTE; (1.) Pure from fleshly lust. Tit. ii. 5. (2.) Freed from the reigning power of worldly love and sinful corruptions. 2 Cor. xi. 2.

CHASTEN, CHASTISE, CORRECT; (1.) To strike or afflict one for his advantage and instruction. And to refuse, or despise chastisement, or correction, is to undervalue it, and be not reformed by it. Jer. ii. 30. and v. 3. and vii. 28. Heb. xii. 5. The overthrow of the Jewish nation by the Chaldeans, was the chastisement of a cruel one, it was very severe, and inflicted by cruel instruments. Jer. xxx. 14. (2.) To punish in just wrath. Lev. xxvi. 28. Thus the chastisement of our peace was laid on Christ; that punishment, by the bearing of which our reconciliation with God is effected, was laid on him as our surety. Im. liii. 5. To chasten one's self, is to be exercised before God, in self-abasement, fasting, and prayer. Dan. x. 12. The scriptures are for correction; by their powerful influence they prick a man to the heart, and make him amend his evil courses. 2 Tim. iii. 16.

CHAWS; jaws. Esek. xxix. 4. and xxxviii. 4.

CHE'BAR; a river in Chaldea, where Ezekiel saw several of his visions. Chap. i. 1; iii. 15; x. 20. It is thought to have been cut between the Euphrates and the Tigris; or rather it is that river which had its rise near the head of the Tigris, and ran through Mesopotamia to the south-west, and fell into the Euphrates, a little south from Carchemish.

CHECK; hinderance. I have heard the check of my reproach; I have heard enough of reproach to discourage me from saying any more. Job. xx. 3.

CHECKER-WORK; that in which the images of flowers, sprigs, leaves, and fruits, are curiously wrought together. 1 Kings viii. 17.

CHED-OR-LA'O-MER, king of Elam, about A. M. 2078, subdued the kingdoms of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar. After they had served him twelve years, they rebelled. In the fourteenth he resolved to reduce them. Assisted by Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioch, king of Ellasar, and Tidal king of Gogim, or nations, he marched against them. To deprive them of all possible aid, he first attacked the neighbouring powers; marching southward on the east of them, he smote the Rephaims, near the source of the river Arnon, and pillaged Ashtaroth Karnaim: he routed the Zuzims at Ham, the Emims in Shavey-kir-jathaim, and the Horites in Mount Seir. Having proceeded on the south side till he came to Elparan, he returned, and directed his course to the north-east. In his way he ravaged the country of the Amalekites, and smote the Amorites who dwelt about Hazontamar. At last he attacked the allied troops of the revolted kingdom. The field of battle was full of slime pits: the army of the revoltors was routed: such as escaped the slaughter fled to the mountains, possibly those on the north-east, which afterwards fell to the lot of the Reubenites. Chedorlaomer and his allies, after ravaging the country, and carrying off a number of captives, and a great booty, directed their march northward, intending to return home by the south-east of Syria. But, informed that Lot his nephew, and family, were among the captives, Abraham with a handful of servants, and a few Canaanitish allies, pursued the conquerors, overtook them at Dan, and routed them; then pursued them to Hobab, a little to the north of Damascus, and retook their captives and booty. Shuckford insists that Chedorlaomer to be the Assyrian Ninias; and Bedford, that he was a deputy of Zamels, king of Assyria; but their reasoning does not appear conclusive. Gen. xiv.

CHEEK; a part of the human face, and the special residence of comeliness and blushing. To smite on the cheek, or pull of its hair, implies both cruelty and contempt. 1 Kings xxii. 24. Mic. v. 1. Isa. i. 6. Christ's cheeks, like a bed of spices, denote the delightful and soul-refreshing comeliness of his person, his humiliation, and the manifestation of his spiritual presence. Sol. Song v. 13. Might not the saints, feeding by faith on his beauty and compassion, be signified by the priests' having the cheeks and the maw of the peace-offering? Dent. xviii. 3. Are not the church's cheeks comely with rows of jewels; her outward appearance and form decked with divine truths and ordinances? Are not the cheeks of particular saints, their holy and humble conversation, adorned with the gifts of the Holy Ghost? Sol. Song i. 10. Wicked men being likened to ravenous beasts, the smiting them on the cheek bone, and breaking their teeth, imports the depriving them, by fearful judgments, of their power to hurt others. Psal. iii. 7.

CHEER; to make joyful. Deut. xxiv. 5. Good cheer, signifies, (1.) Great joy. Matt. xiv. 27. (2.) Good meat, such as is used for sacrifices. Prov. xvii. 1.

CHEMA-RIMS; the black ones, are by some thought the images of Chamar, Isis, or the moon; perhaps rather the priests that were worshippers of the fire are meant, whose clothes, and often their faces, were black. Or, why might not the Chemarims be the agents that officiated as priests in the burning of the children to Moloch? Our version, Zeph. i. 4. distinguishes them from the priest; but the priests there mentioned might be apostate ones of the seed of Aaron, or the priests of some other idol. It is certain, that in 2 Kings xxiii. 5. and Hos. x. 5. the word plainly means idolatrous priests.

CHEMOSH. See BAAL-PEOR.

CHERETH-IMS; CHERETH-ITES; (1.) The Philistines, or a particular tribe of them. See CAPTOR. Zeph. ii. 5. Ezek. xxv. 16. (2.) David's life-guards were called Cherethites, and Peletites; either because they were partly composed of such Philistines as had joined him, or rather because they had, for a time, dwelt among that people, and might have their arms and order copied from such particular bands of their troops. 1 Chron. xviii. 17.

CHERISH; to administer cordials, warmth, ease, and comfort. 1 Thess. ii. 7. Christ cherisheth his church; he quiets the conscience by the application of his blood; he warms the heart with the shedding abroad of his love, and encourages the saints by his power and promise. Eph. v. 29.

CHERITH; the river of which Elijah drank, while he was nourished by ravens. 1 Kings xvii. 3, 4. It is thought to have run from the east into Jordan, a little to the southward of Bethshan. But Bochart will have it to be the same as the river Kanah; and Bunting will have it to run eastward to the Jordan, between Bethel and Ai.

CHERUB, CHEU-BIM. Angels are so called, because they often appeared as young men, mighty in power and knowledge. Psal. xviii. 10. Cherubim, or angels, with an appearance of a flaming sword, were placed at the east or entrance of the garden of Eden, after Adam's expulsion, to hinder his return: or God dwelt in the cherubim with a flaming sword. Gen. iii. 24.

The cherubim, or winged figures that covered the sacred ark in the holy of holies, and those painted on the walls, or hangings of the sanctuary, who seem each to have had the four faces of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle, might represent angels and ministers, who, with great activity, wisdom, boldness, patience, and knowledge, view and admire the work of our redemption, and are employed in ministering to the church and people of God. Exod. xxv. 18. and xxvi. 1. The cherubim that attended the wheels, or mingled with the palm-trees, in Ezekiel's visions, may denote either angels or ministers as subservient to the operations of Providence, and joined with and ministering to the saints. Ezek. i. 10. and xli. 18. God's riding on cherubim, imports his majestic use of angels in the dispensations of providence. Psal. xviii. 10. His dwelling between the cherubims imports his peculiar presence in the Jewish holy of holies; and chiefly his peculiar satisfaction and pleasure in our Mediator; and his law magnifying righteousness; and his readiness to be found of such as seek him, in him. Psal. lxxx. 1. The king of Tyre is called a covering cherub: he afforded his subjects an agreeable and glorious protection, while his fine apparel made him shine as an angel, or glitter as the golden cherubim over the ark. Ezek. xxviii. 14.

CHESA-LON is thought to be the same as Jearin. Josh. xv. 10.

CHESNUT-TREE is of the beech kind. There are four sorts of it. That which is most regarded is a beautiful and tall tree, with a thick shade. Its leaves are of the shape of a spear head, and their points like the teeth of a saw; they are good for medicine. Its fruit is a kind of nut useful for food. Jacob's peeled rods, for marking the embryos of the cattle, were partly of chesnut. Gen. xxx. 37, 39. The Assyrian king and his empire are likened to a chesnut-tree, for their glory, power, and influence. Ezek. xxxi. 8.

CHEZIB. See ACHZIB.

CHICKENS; the young brood of hens. Christ's people are compared to them, to mark how foolish and helpless they are in themselves, and how tenderly they are invited and gathered to him, and protected by him. Matt. xxiii. 37.

CHIDE: to find fault with, rebuke sharply. Exod. xvii. 2. Judg. viii. 1.

CHIDON and NACHON signify destruction; but whether they are the name of a threshing-floor, near Jerusalem, so called because Uzza was there struck dead for touching the ark, or whether they are the name of its owner, we know not. 2 Sam. vi. 6. 1 Chron. xiii. 9.

CHIEF. (1.) The principal person of a family, congregation, or tribe, &c. Numb. iii. 30. Deut. i. 15. 1 Sam. xiv. 36. 2 Sam. v. 8. 2 Cor. xi. 5. (2.) The best or most valuable. 1 Sam. xv. 21. (3.) The highest, most honourable. Matt. xxiii. 6. (4.) Most dear and familiar. Prov. xvi. 28. (5.) Greatest and most esteemed. Psal. cxxxvii. 6. Luke xiv. 1. 2 Cor. xii. 11. (6.) Most forward and active. Ezra ix. 2. (7.) Most noted and wonderful. Job xi. 10.

CHILD, SON, DAUGHTER. Child denotes, (1.) A son or daughter, young in age. 1 Sam. i. 28. (2.) One weak as a child in knowledge and prudence. Isa. x. 19. and iii. 4, 12. 1 Cor. xiii. 11. (3.) One young or weak in grace. 1 John ii. 13. (4.) Persons unsteady in their principles. Eph. iv. 14. (5.) It is sometimes used to express our affection to persons. Reuben calls Joseph a child, when about seventeen years of age. Gen. xxxvii. 30. Judah calls Benjamin a little child, when about thirty. Gen. xlv. 20. To become as a little child, or be as a weaned child, is to be humble, teachable, void of malice and envy, and weaned in affection from the carnal enjoyments of this world. Matt. xviii. 3, 4. Psal. cxxxi. 1, 2. The man-child brought forth by the church, and caught up to God and his throne, to rule the nations with a rod of iron may denote Jesus, exalted to be head over all things to his church; or his active members, some of them exalted to glory, and others delivered from persecution, and enabled to oppose and conquer their enemies; or Constantine the Great, the first Christian raised to the imperial throne, and made a conqueror of the heathens, and overturner of their idolatries. Rev. xii. 5. The child shall die a hundred years old. In the millennium, few shall die of untimely deaths; and children that die in youth shall have as much knowledge and experience of divine things as many who, at other times, lived till they were very old. Isa. lxxv. 20.

CHILDREN, or SONS; (1.) Not only signify a man's immediate seed, but his remotest descendants. Isa. xix. 11. So the Jews are called children of Israel; the Edomites, of Esau; the Ammonites and Moabites, of Lot; &c. 2 Kings xvii. 8. Psal. lxxxiii. 8. Mephibosheth is called the son of Saul, though but his grandson. 2 Sam. xix. 21. And often descendants are called by the name of their progenitors; so perhaps Jacob is called Abraham. Acts vii. 16. Rehoboam is called David, 1 Kings xii. 16; Abijah, Rehoboam. 1 Kings xv. 6. The descendants of Jacob, Edom, Moab, Ammon, &c. are called by their name. (2.) Inferiors are called children, to mark the affectionate kindness which superiors owe to them, and the dutiful regard they owe to these superiors. Eli called Samuel his son; Obed is called Naomi's; Timothy, Paul's; Benhadad, Elisha's; the apostles, Christ's; those to whom they wrote, the apostles'. 1 Sam. iii. 6. Ruth iv. 17. 1 Tim. i. 18. 2 Kings viii. 9. John. xxi. 5. Gal. iv. 19, &c. (3.) Such as are adopted, or married into a family, are denominated children of it: so Moses was the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Exod. ii. 10. Salathiel is called the son of Neri, because his son-in-law, Luke iii. 27; and Zerubbabel, the son of Pedaliah and of Salathiel, because descended from the one and adopted by the other. 2 Chron. iii. 19. Matt. i. 12. (4.) The inhabitants of a country or city are called the children, sons, or daughters of it. The Edomites are called children of Seir. 2 Chron. xxv. 11. The inhabitants of Gibbar, Bethlehem, and many other places, are called the children thereof. Ezra ii. 20—25. The children of the east are such as dwell on the east of Canaan. Judg.

vi. 3. Jesus Christ is the SON, the ONLY BEGOTTEN SON of God, his holy Child; begotten by eternal, necessary, and natural generation. In respect of his Sonship, he was equal with God. Psal. ii. 7. Acts iv. 27. John v. 17, 19. His Sonship was not founded in, but manifested by, his miraculous birth, in our nature, his resurrection, his high office, and glorious heirship of all things. Luke i. 35. Acts xiii. 33. John x. 35, 36. Heb. i. 4, 5. The sons, among whom Christ is as an apple-tree among the trees of the wood, are angels and men, even the most excellent. Sol. Song ii. 8. Holy angels are the sons of God: created, supported, and governed by him; and who cheerfully serve him, and sung his praise at the creation. Job xxxviii. 7. But whether they, or men professing the true religion, be the sons of God, into whose assembly Satan intruded himself in the days of Job, is not absolutely certain. Job i. 6. and ii. 1. Magistrates, chiefly the Jewish, who represented the Messiah, are called sons of God: from him they receive their office, power, and dignity. Psal. lxxxii. 6. But foolish and weak magistrates are likened to children, or babes. Isa. iii. 4. Eccl. x. 16. The posterity of Seth, the nation of the Jews, or other professors of the true religion, are the children of God; they were brought into his family of the visible church, called by his name, specially protected and favoured by him; they professed to worship and serve him; and many of them appeared to be spiritually begotten again to a lively hope. Gen. vi. 2, 4. Deut. xiv. 1. Exod. iv. 22. The Jews were like an exposed child, or infant, lying in its blood: their original was base; their condition in Egypt was extremely mean, and exposed to the most bloody cruelty; but God exalted them to a glorious kingdom. Ezek. xvi. 1—14. They are the ejected children of the kingdom; while the gentiles are admitted into the church, and a state of fellowship with God, they are cast out to ignorance, apostasy, and trouble. Matt. viii. 12. They, while cleaving to their burdensome ceremonies, and other wicked persons cleaving to the broken law, as the means of their happiness, and other legalists, are the children of the bond-woman; are the sordid slaves of the law of sin, Satan, and the world; and perform their apparently good works from the servile fears of hell, and hopes of heaven. Gal. iv. 31.

The saints are called the sons or children of God; they are graciously adopted into his spiritual family, begotten into his image, endued with his Spirit, and entitled to privileges innumerable, and an inheritance that fadeth not away: are heirs of righteousness, salvation, promises, nay, of God himself. John i. 12. Rom. viii. 14—17. They are the children, or seed, of Wisdom, or Christ: by his bloody travail and suffering, and by the influence of his regenerating Spirit, he begets them again; and with them he is mightily delighted; he bequeaths to them all the blessings of his purchase, and they love him, and are careful to promote his honour and interest. Matt. xi. 19. Isa. liii. 10. They are children of light: begotten of God, the purest light, by means of his pure and enlightening word: they have the knowledge of divine things, walk in the light of God's countenance and law; the light of their good works shines before men; and they are heirs and expectants of the inheritance of the saints in light. Luke xvi. 8. They are children of promise; by the promises of the gospel they are quickened, supported, comforted, and secured of eternal life. Gal. iv. 29. They are children of the resurrection; then they shall be raised from the dead, fully conformed to God, and enter on the complete possession of their glorious inheritance in heaven. Luke xx. 36. They are children of Zion; of Jerusalem; of the kingdom; and of the free woman; they are spiritually born, instructed, and nourished in the church; they are under the covenant of grace; have a spirit of liberty; are freed from the slavery of sin and Satan, and of the broken law; and now, under the gospel, are free from burdensome ceremonies, and serve God with cheerfulness of heart. Psal. cxix. 2. Matt. xiii. 38. Gal. iv. 31. Isa. ix. 4. Christ's disciples were children of the bride-chamber; they had early and peculiar intimacy with him, the glorious Bridegroom of souls. Matt. ix. 15. The title son of man is given to Ezekiel, Daniel, and Jesus Christ; but whether it was a title of dignity, importing their peculiar excellency, or whether it rather marked our Saviour's debasement, and his delight in our nature, and intimated the low original and frailty of the prophets, to be remembered by them amidst their visions, is not agreed. Ezek. ii. 1. Dan. viii. 17. and vii. 13. Son of man, and Son of David, among the Jews, were names of the Messiah; and Christ rarely called himself by any other. Matt. xvi. 13. xv. 22. xx. 30, 31.

The wicked are children of this world; are never born from above; have no portion of felicity but in this world; nor do they study to fulfil any thing but the lusts thereof. Luke xvi. 8. They are represented as sons of men, or Adam; in him they were corrupted; his transgression they imitate; they have no spiritual birth, but continue as the common herd of men. Psal. iv. 2; xii. 1; lvii. 4. They are children of the devil; they are wholly taken up with the wickedness he introduced into the world; they cheerfully imitate, obey, and serve him. John viii. 44. 1 John iii. 10. They are children of darkness; they are in a state of darkness and condemnation; their heart is full of ignorance, and their practice of things shameful and wicked. 1 Thess. v. 5. They are children of disobedience, iniquity, whoredoms; their carnal mind is enmity against God; their whole practice is a continued rebellion against his law, and a treacherous departure from him. Eph. ii. 2. Isa. lvii. 4. Hos. x. 9. and ii. 4. They are children of wrath; they are naturally full of enmity against God, and heirs of his just wrath and vengeance. Eph. ii. 3. They are curled children; they are a plague to others, and are themselves condemned to everlasting punishment. 1 Pet. ii. 14. Persons eminently wicked are called children of Belial; they are lawless, useless, abominable, and abandoned to the most horrid crimes. Deut. xlii. 13. The children of Abraham are such as descended from him by natural generation; as the Ishmaelites, Israelites, Edomites, &c.; or such as resemble him in faith and holiness. Luke xlii. 16. John viii. 39. Gal. iii. 7. Matt. iii. 9. The mother's children, that annoy the saints, are hypocrites and false teachers, educated in, and visible members of the church; but not spiritually begotten of God; who often oppress them with human inventions, angry persecutions, and inward corruptions, natural to us, and coeval with us, which enslave us to carnal and sinful practices, to the neglect of our proper duty. Sol. Song i. 6. The children of the desolate are more than of the married wife; the converts of the long desolate gentile world are more numerous than those of the Jewish nation, though long espoused to Christ: the converts of the church, after Christ's departure to heaven, are more numerous than when she enjoyed his presence on earth. Isa. liv. 1. Strange children are heathens, or wicked persons, or children begotten of heathenish women. Psal. cxliv. 7. Neh. ix. Hos. v. 7.

DAUGHTER; (1.) A female child, or descendant. Gen. xxxiv. 1. Luke i. 5. (2.) A sister. Gen. xxxiv. 17; called a daughter, because their father was present. (3.) A son's wife, or daughter-in-law. Ruth iii. 18. (4.) It is a name of kindness given to any woman, especially if young. Matt. ix. 23. Ruth iii. 10. (5.) The women of a country, and even the whole inhabitants of it. Gen. xxxiv. 1. Isa. xvi. 2. Psal. xlv. 9. The daughters of a city, chiefly a capital one, signify not only its inhabitants, but also lesser cities or villages. Num. xxi. † 25. The daughters of God's people, of Judah, of Zion, of Jerusalem, often signify the Jews; but in Solomon's Song, daughters of Jerusalem, and Zion, are nominal professors and saints, weak in grace. Sol. Song i. 5. and iii. 11. The saints are represented as daughters; they are dear to God, and to their elder brother, Christ; they receive their all from him; and are affectionate and beautiful. Psal. xlv. 10—14. The daughters of the horse-leech are her young ones, that are never satisfied with blood. Prov. xxx. 15. The daughters of music are brought low; in old age, the lungs, and other organs of singing, are weakened; and the ears that attended to it become dull. Eccl. xii. 4. The daughters of trees are their branches and sprouts. Gen. xlix. † 22.

CHIM'HAM; the son of Barzillai the Gileadite. To reward his father's kindness, David, on his return to Jerusalem after the death of Absalom, took Chimham along with him; and, it seems, gave him a portion of land near Bethlehem, where a town, called Chimham, was afterwards built. 2 Sam. xix. 37, 38. Jer. xli. 17.

CHIOS; an island in the Archipelago, or north-east part of the Mediterranean sea, next to Lesbos, and about twelve miles from the shore, over against Smyrna. Paul passed this way as he sailed southward from Mitylene to Samos. Acts xx. 15. It does not appear that any church was planted here for a long time after; even in the fourth century human sacrifices were offered here; but in the following ages we find Christians here, and a bishop of it attending the general councils. Nor is the Christian religion entirely rooted out to this day.

The place is now called Scio, and is chiefly inhabited by Genoese.

CHISLEU; the ninth month of the sacred year of the Jews, and third of their civil. It consists of thirty days, and answers to part of November and December. On the sixth day of this month the Jews fast for the burning of Jeremiah's roll by king Jehoiakim; on the seventh, they observe a feast of joy for the death of Herod the Great; on the 15th, they fast for Antiochus' profanation of the temple; on the 21st they have a festival, pretended to be for Alexander's delivering up the Samaritans into their power; on the 25th, they observe the feast of dedication, to commemorate the purging of the temple by Judas Maccabeus.

CHITTIM, KITTIM; the son of Javan, and grandson of Japheth. Gen. x. 4. Probably part of the Cilicians were his offspring. Homer mentions the Ketii, and Ptolemy the provinces Ketis and Kitis. It is likely some of these removed into the isle of Cyprus, where they founded the city Kitium. Possibly part of them founded the kingdom of the Latins in Italy. Here we find a city called Ketia, or Cetia; and it is observable, that both Latium, and Chittim have the same signification of hiding. But the chief residence of the posterity of Kittim appears to have been Macedonia, which was called Chittim, after his name. When Nebuchadnezzar intended to invade Phenicia, perhaps the Tyrians had information of his designs, by some Macedonian sailors; or some Tyrians, after the ruin of their city by him, fled off into Macedonia. It is more certain that Alexander and his Macedonian troops almost entirely ruined the Tyrian state, and carried off a number of slaves, wasted Assyria, and overturned the Persian empire. Isa. xxlii. 1, 12. Num. xxiv. 24. The ships wherein the Roman ambassadors sailed to Egypt were ships of Chittim; were of a Macedonian form, and sailed from a Macedonian harbour. Dan. xi. 30.

CHI'UN; either, (1.) An idol, the same with Remphan, if not also with Moloch; or Moloch represented the sun, and Chiun the moon. Or, (2.) A pedestal whereon images were placed, to render them more conspicuous. Amos v. 26.

CHLO'E; a noted Christian woman at Corinth, perhaps a widow, as she is represented as head of her family, from some of which Paul received his information of the divisions at Corinth. 1 Cor. i. 11.

CHOICE. (1.) Most excellent; best. Gen. xxiii. 6. (2.) Most strong, valiant, and skilful in war. 2 Sam. x. 9. The saints are choice ones; they are chosen of God, are clothed with the righteousness of his Son, and endued with the graces of his Spirit, and so more excellent than the rest of mankind. Sol. Song vi. 9. To make choice, is to choose, set apart to a particular work. Acts xv. 7.

CHOKER. To choke an animal, is to stop its breath, by pouring water down the throat or the like. Mark v. 13. To choke corn and plants, is to retard or stop their growth. Matt. xiii. 7. To choke the product of God's word, is, by carnal cares and corrupt affections and practices, to hinder its efficacy on our hearts and lives. Luke viii. 14. Matt. xiii. 22.

CHOLER; great anger. Dan. viii. 7. CHOOSE, ELECT; (1.) To set apart a person or thing from among others to some particular use, office, or privilege. Exod. xvii. 9. Psal. xxv. 12. (2.) To renew or manifest a choice. Isa. xiv. 1. and xlviii. 10. (2.) To follow, imitate, delight in, and practise. Prov. iii. 31. and i. 20. God chooses men's delusions, and brings their fears upon them, when he gives them up to their delusions as the just punishment of their sins. Thus God gave up the Jews to their vain fancies, and brought on them the destruction by the Romans, which they, by the murder of our Saviour, thought to evade. Isa. lxvi. 4. John xii. 50. ELECTION imports, (1.) God's act of choosing men to everlasting life. Rom. ix. 11. and xi. 5, 26. (2.) The persons chosen to eternal life. Rom. xi. 7.

CHOSEN, ELECT, ELECTED; picked out from among others to some honourable use. Christ is the elect or chosen of God: he was, from eternity, set apart as the only fit person to be our Mediator and Surety. Isa. xlii. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 4. Holy angels are elect; God set them apart in his purpose, to be established in holiness and happiness, when the rest were overlooked. 1 Tim. v. 21. Christ's people, saved by him, are elect or chosen: from eternity God, in his purpose, kindly separated them from the rest of mankind, and set them apart to receive salvation by Christ, to the praise of his glory; and, in time, by his grace, he renders them choice and excellent persons. 1 Pet. i. 2. 2 John i. Rev. xvii. 14. For the sake of these, that that none of them, in their persons or progenitors, may be cut off, are the days of vengeance on wicked nations shortened; no seducer can draw any of them fully and finally from the truth of the gospel; none can lay any valid charge against them before God; no injury done them shall pass unpunished; angels shall gather them all to Christ's right hand; and they shall infallibly obtain everlasting happiness. Matt. xxiv. 22, 24, 31. Rom. viii. 33. and xi. 7. The Hebrew nation was an elect or chosen people; God set them apart from the rest of the nations to be his peculiar church and people. Isa. xlv. 4. Psal. cv. 43. Jerusalem was chosen, was divinely fixed upon to enjoy the peculiar symbols of God's presence, the temple, sacrifices, &c. 1 Kings xi. 13. Apostles and ministers are chosen; by Jesus himself alone, or by him and his people in conjunction, they are fixed upon and separated from others, to bear and execute their sacred office. Acts x. 41. Chosen warriors are such as are picked out as the most valiant and skilful in an army. Exod. xv. 4. Judg. xx. 16.

CHRIST JESUS, the Lord and Saviour of mankind. He is called CHRIST, or MESSIAH, because he is anointed, sent, and furnished by God to execute his mediatorial office; and is called JESUS, because, by his righteousness, power, and Spirit, he is qualified to save, to the uttermost, them that come unto God through him; he is appointed of God for that end, and freely given in the offer of the gospel. Isa. lxi. 1, 2, 3. Matt. i. 21. He is the eternal Son of God, equal with his adored father in every unbounded perfection. No man that doubts of his being the only true and most high God, can, in consistency with common sense, allow himself to be a Christian. If Jesus be not the supreme God, he was a setter up of idolatry, encouraging men to worship himself; and Mahomet, who zealously opposed such worship, must be a valuable reformer! If Christ be not God, the Jews did well to crucify him as a noted blasphemer, that made himself equal with God; they did well to persecute his apostles, who represented him as the object of worship. If Christ be not God, the whole of the mystery of our redemption is erroneous or trifling. Where is the divine love in sending a merely nominal God to redeem us? or what can his death avail us, who are not nominal, but real transgressors against infinite Majesty? If Christ be not the supreme God, how obscure, false, absurd, and impious, must the language of the Holy Ghost be, particularly in the predictions relative to him! If Christ be not God, what is the whole Christian religion, but a mere comedy and farce, in which one appears in the character of God who is not really so? What are its miracles, predictions, and mysteries, but a system of magic, invented or effected by Satan, to promote the blasphemous adoration of a creature?

Nor is his eternal generation and divine Sonship less clearly marked in scripture. A great number of texts represent him as God's proper and only begotten Son, prior to all donation of him. Rom. viii. 3, 22. John i. 14. and iii. 16. Acts proper only to God are ascribed to him, when marked with the character of SON. Compare Luke i. 32, 36, with 16, 17, 46, 47. John iii. 31, 35, and i. 18; vi. 46. and ix. 35—38. Matt. xi. 27; xiv. 28. and xxvii. 54. His character of SON is also plainly distinguished from his official character of CHRIST. See John i. 49; vi. 66, 67. and vii. 29. Matt. xvi. 15, 16. By his silence he plainly conceded to his enemies, that his claim to be the Son of God imported his asserting himself equal with God. John v. 17, 18, 19; x. 31—39. and xix. 7. To pretend he is called the proper, the only begotten Son of God, because God sent him as our Mediator, or because of his miraculous conception by the virgin, is not only groundless and absurd, but even blasphemous; for, if the personal properties of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, be given up, there must either be three distinct Gods or but one person manifested in three different characters.

From eternity God foresaw men's destruction of themselves, and intended to recover part of them. It was impossible for any but a divine person to be a Mediator, Redeemer, Surety, Priest, Prophet, and King, to meet their revolted, lost, guilty, ignorant, and rebellious condition. Nor was it less necessary that his divine person should assume the nature of the transgressors, and therein execute the whole work of their redemption. Rom. viii. 3, 4. Gal. iv. 4, 5. Nothing can be more delightful than to observe in what respects the personal conjunction of the divine and human natures is necessary to the execution of every office, the sustaining of every relation, and the standing in every state, proper for our blessed Redeemer. God set him up in his purpose, as the Head of an elect world; chose them in him to everlasting life in the new covenant; and settled with him the whole conditions of their salvation, and every circumstance thereof. Psal. xl. 6, 7, 8. and lxxix. 3, 4, &c. Thus the remedy was prepared before we were ruined; and, for innumerable ages, our Redeemer had his delights with the sons of men before they were formed.

It was not proper the Son of God should assume our nature, and suffer, immediately after the fall. The absolute insufficiency of other means for reforming the world was not fully manifested; the stupendous power of sin was not yet sufficiently discovered; men were not sufficiently warned of his appearance; nor was there a sufficient number of persons to witness the facts, or to be agents therein; nor enough of opposition to be conquered by the doctrines of his cross. Preparation, however, was daily made for that astonishing event. By a multitude of typical and verbal predictions, every circumstance of his future life was marked out, that the world might be qualified to give his character a thorough examination whenever he should appear. To mark his readiness to invest himself with our nature, he often appeared in the form of a man; and almost every metaphorical representation of God was taken from things pertaining to men.

When the government was just departing from the tribe of Judah; when the 490 years mentioned by the angel to Daniel drew to an end; when the nations had been sufficiently shaken by the overthrow of the Persian and Grecian empires, and the erection of the Roman; while the second temple remained in its glory; when an alarming rumour of the sudden rise of a Jew to govern the world had spread through a great part of it, and just six months after the conception of the blessed Baptist, our Saviour's forerunner, the angel Gabriel intimated to the Virgin Mary, that by the influence of the Holy Ghost she should conceive and bear the promised Messiah. Gen. xlix. 10. Ezek. xxi. 27. Dan. ix. 24, 25. Hag. ii. 6—9. 21, 22, 23. Mal. iii. 1. Gen. iii. 15. Luke i. 32—35. This virgin was espoused to one Joseph, a carpenter: Both were sufficiently mean, but of the now debased royal family of David. According to the genealogy of Matthew, adding the three there omitted, Joseph was the thirty-second in descent from David, in the royal line of Solomon. According to Luke, Mary, by whose marriage Joseph was the son-in-law of Heli, was the forty-first from David by Nathan, and the seventy-fourth from Adam. The two lines of Solomon and Nathan, sons of David, appear to have met in the persons of Salathiel and Zorobabel; but Joseph sprung from Abiud, an elder son of Zorobabel; and Mary from Rhesa, a younger. Before Joseph had approached her bed, he, with great uneasiness, observed her with child. He might have insisted on putting her to death according to the law; but being a good man, and perhaps hoping she might have been forced, or having heard her relate the declaration of the angel Gabriel, he resolved to conceal the matter, and give her a private bill of divorce. But while he thought on these things, an angel warned him to take her home to him as his wife, as she was undefiled; and by the power of the Holy Ghost had conceived, and should bear the Messiah and Saviour of the world. Joseph then cheerfully accepted her, but knew her not till she had brought forth her illustrious Child. By this marriage the Virgin's honour was protected; she had one to assist and provide for her in her straits; and her divine Son had ready access to the congregation, and every ordinance of the Jewish church. Matt. i. Luke iii. 23—38.

Joseph and Mary dwelt at Nazareth; but this not being the place appointed for the birth of the Messiah, an enrolment of the Roman subjects, on which a taxation was afterwards founded, while Cyrenius was governor of Syria, obliged the Jews at this very time to repair to the places and families to which they originally belonged. Joseph, and Mary, now great with child, were obliged to travel about eighty-two miles southward to Bethlehem; and were there, and probably their Son, registered in the public records of the empire as descendants of David. Every inn at Bethlehem was so crowded with strangers, that Joseph and Mary were obliged to lodge in a stable. There she brought forth her divine Babe; and, for want of a cradle, laid him to rest in the manger. That very night an angel solemnly informed the shepherds, who watched their flocks in an adjacent field, of the Saviour's birth; and a multitude of other angels sang an anthem of praise for God's grace and mercy to men. The shepherds hastened to Bethlehem, and found the Babe in the debased condition the angel had described. To honour the ordinance of God; to avow himself a member of the Jewish church, and a debtor to fulfil the whole law; to receive his Father's seal of the new covenant made with him, and begin his shedding of blood for his people, the Messiah was circumcised on the eighth day of his life, and called Jesus, or the SAVIOUR, as the angel had directed before his birth. When about thirty-three days after, his mother presented herself and her Babe at the temple, Simeon, a saint, took the child in his arms, blessed God for his appearance, and wished to die immediately, as he had seen the incarnate Saviour. He warned Mary that her Son was sent for the fall and rise of many of the Jews, and would, by the treatment he should suffer, occasion much grief to herself. At that very instant, Anna, an aged prophetess, discerned him to be the Messiah, and told her pious friends of his greatness.

After going to Nazareth, and settling their affairs, it seems Joseph and Mary returned to Bethlehem to reside, intending, no doubt, a compliance with the ancient prediction of the place of the Messiah's appearance. But, warned by the ancient oracle of Balaam, and other predictions of scripture, and by the wide spread rumour of the Messiah's immediate appearance, and alarmed by the sight of an uncommon star, certain Magi, or wise men, came from Persia, Chaldea, or Eastern Arabia, to see and worship the new-born King of the Jews. At Jerusalem they inquired for him. Herod and his subjects were greatly troubled at the news of the Messiah's birth. A council was called, who agreed that Bethlehem was to be the place of his birth. After a private inquiry when the star had appeared, and giving them orders to return, and inform him who the babe was, Herod dismissed them to go to Bethlehem. They had scarcely left Jerusalem, when the star appeared to them in the lower region of the air, and conducted them to the very lodging of Joseph and Mary. With joy they proceeded on their journey, and having found the Babe, worshipped him, and gave him presents of gold, frankincense, and myrrh. As Herod intended to murder the child, an angel warned the wise men to return home without revisiting him, and warned Joseph, now furnished for his journey by the late presents, to conduct the child and his mother to Egypt, and continue there till further orders. Joseph immediately obeyed. Herod, enraged that the wise men had not returned to inform him of the child, sent forth his troops and murdered all the children in Bethlehem, and the places about, under two years old, that he might ensure the murder of Jesus among them. After Herod's death an angel warned Joseph and his family to return to Canaan. They did so; but the cruelty of Archelaus made them afraid of remaining in Judea. By the direction of God, they went northward, and settled at Nazareth; which, unknown to them, fulfilled the ancient predictions of Christ's being the NOTKZK, Preserver; or the NRTZER, Branch. Matt. ii. 23. Job vii. 20. Isa. xi. 1.

At twelve years of age, Jesus came along with his mother and supposed father, to celebrate the passover. After the festival, they returned; but he tarried behind, and conferred with the Jewish rabbies, to the surprise of all that heard him. His parents at last missing him, returned to seek him. On the third day they found him. His mother asked him, why he had caused her and her husband to seek him so long with sorrowful hearts. He replied, They might have known he would be the object of his divine Father's care, and be employed in his business. He, in the most submissive manner, returned with them to Nazareth, and, no doubt, wrought as a carpenter with Joseph; meanwhile, he increased in wisdom and grace, and behaved in such a manner as recommended him to the favour of God and men. Luke ii. 42—52.

John Baptist, his forerunner, had now begun his public ministrations. When Jesus was about thirty years of age, he repaired to him at Bethabara, and craved baptism, that he might, according to covenant engagement, fulfil all righteousness. His baptism sealed his and his father's mutual engagements, and excited and encouraged the graces of his human nature. On this occasion, the heavens were opened; the Holy Ghost descended on him in the form of a peaceful dove; and the Father proclaimed, that he was his beloved Son in whom he was well pleased. The Holy Ghost, by his powerful influence, conducted him to the wilderness; perhaps that horrible one in the mountains of Quarantana, northward of Jericho; or that of mount Pisgah, on the east of Jordan. There he spent forty days in fasting and prayer, to fit himself for his public ministry. Here, too, he was terribly tempted by Satan, especially at the end of these days. When he was hungry, Satan tempted him to doubt of his Sonship, and to work a miracle for his own preservation. He then carried him to Jerusalem, and placed him on a pinnacle of the temple, and tempted him to throw himself thence, in hopes of divine preservation. He next carried him to a high mountain, where he represented to him all the kingdoms of the world and their glory, and offered to give them all to him, if he would but fall down and worship him. With detestation, and with scripture arguments, Jesus baffled these horrid enticements. Satan left him for a time, and holy angels came and ministered to him, comforted him, and gave him provision. Matt. iii. and iv. Luke iv. Jesus left the wilderness, and went to the place where John was baptizing. John pointed him out to his hearers as the Lamb of God, that came to make atonement for the sins of the world, gentiles as well as Jews. Next day he pointed him out in the same manner to Andrew, and, perhaps, John, two of his disciples. They went after him, and inquired where he lodged. He took them along with him, and they abode with him all that day. Informed by Andrew that they had found the Messiah, Peter went along with his brother to see him. It was then Jesus gave him the name of Cephas, or Peter, to signify that he ought and would be constant and fixed as a rock in his religious profession and work. Next day Jesus, returning to Galilee, found Philip, and desired him to go along with him. Philip finding Nathanael, informed him that they had found the long-promised Messiah. Nathanael thought it impossible such a blessing could proceed from Nazareth; but on Jesus reminding him of some very secret devotions, he acknowledged him the Son of God and expected Redeemer. John i. 28—31.

Three days after Jesus, his mother, and disciples attended the marriage of some friend at Cana of Galilee. When the wine ran short, his mother hinted to him the necessity of his working a miracle for their supply. He respectfully replied, that it was improper for her to direct his miraculous operations; but ordered the servants to fill with water some pots that stood by for washing in; this water he turned into the most excellent wine; and thus began to display his divine power, that his disciples might believe in him. Quickly after he went up to Jerusalem to keep the passover; and finding the outer court polluted with markets of sheep, oxen, and doves, for sacrifice, and tables for exchange of money, he, with a scourge of small cords drove out the animals and overturned the tables of the money-changers; telling them, that the place ought to be used for prayer, not for robbery and deceit. Some of the Jewish rulers present asked his warrant for what he did. He replied that the resurrection of his body on the third day after their murder of him would exhibit it. He performed a great many miracles at this feast, and many believed he was the Messiah; but as he knew their deceit and inconsistency, he did not trust himself to them. Nicodemus was one of these believers, and came to him by night for instruction. Jesus finding him grossly ignorant of spiritual things, informed him of the necessity of regeneration, and of the cause, nature, and end of his coming into the world. John ii. and iii. 1—31. Jesus then departed from Jerusalem, perhaps to the country about Jericho. Here he began to baptize, not personally, but by his disciples. Multitudes resorted to him. Some Jews contended with John's disciples, that the baptism of Jesus was more effectual to purify the soul than that of their master. Whereupon they complained to John that every one was likely to desert him, and prefer Jesus and his baptism. John replied, that it was meet in itself, and a great pleasure to him, that the fame of Jesus should grow, and his own decrease. After John was imprisoned, and the Pharisees had taken the alarm at the multitudes that followed Jesus, he left Judea, and retired northward to Galilee. Ardent concern for the salvation of lost sinners determined him to take Samaria in his way. Fatigued with his journey, he rested himself at Jacob's well, near to Sychar, while his disciples went to the town to buy some provision. Here he conversed with a Samaritan; and, notwithstanding her manifold scruples, shewed himself the all-refreshing and life-giving gift of God; convinced her of her whoredom and wickedness, informed her of the spiritual nature of divine worship, and assured her that he was the Messiah. Induced by her commendations of him, her neighbours came and received his instructions; many of them believed on him. This he informed his disciples was a sure presage of the conversion of the gentiles. John iii. 22—36. and iv. 1—42.

When he was returned to Galilee, numbers, who had seen his miracles at Jerusalem with wonder, attended his instructions. When he was at Cana, a nobleman of Capernaum, hearing of his fame, came and begged he would come and cure his son who lay at the point of death. Jesus replied, it was unreasonable that they would not believe his heavenly doctrines without miraculous signs. He bade the nobleman go, and he would find his son recovered. By the way, the nobleman's servants met him, and informed him that the child's fever had left him just at the very time Jesus had intimated his recovery. The nobleman and his whole family believed in Jesus as the promised Messiah. In his course through Galilee, Jesus came to Nazareth, his native abode. Accordingly, as usual, he, on the Sabbath, stood up and read, and expounded the scripture in the synagogue. The passage he insisted on was Isaiah lxi. in which his mission and qualification for his work are described. His discourse astonished the audience; but his mean birth, and want of liberal education, prepossessed them against him. He told them it was usual for prophets to be contemned in their own country: and shewed them, from the case of Elijah and Elisha, that they had small reason to expect to be much blessed with his miracles. In a rage they dragged him to the top of the hill whereon their city was built, and intended to throw him down headlong. By his divine power he rescued himself, and left the place. John iv. 43—53. Luke iv. 14—30.

Next we find him at Capernaum, on the borders of the lot of Zebulun and Naphtali. There, as was anciently foretold, he instructed the inhabitants, called them to change their erroneous sentiments and evil courses, since the New Testament dispensation of the gospel was at hand. Here he called Peter and Andrew, James and John, to leave their employment of fishing, and go with him to preach the gospel, for the salvation of men; the first two he rewarded with a miraculous draught of fishes, for the use of their boat to preach from. As he one day taught in a synagogue, an evil spirit cried out of a possessed person, Why do you disturb us? are you come to torment us before the time? Jesus ordered him to leave the person, which, after hideous roaring, and terrible distortion of the man, he was obliged to do. Soon after, by a touch, and a word of command, he healed Peter's mother-in-law of her fever: she rose directly, and prepared him food. That evening he healed a number of possessed and diseased persons with the touch of his hand. Next morning he employed himself in solemn prayer; and notwithstanding the entreaties of his disciples and others, he departed thence to preach in the other synagogues of Galilee. The fame of his miracles spread through Canaan, and part of Syria; they brought multitudes of distressed persons, chiefly such as were incurable by physicians, and he healed them all. Matt. iv. 12—25. Mark i. 15—40. Luke v. 1—11. and iv. 34—44.

Great multitudes attending him, he went up to a mountain, and instructed them concerning the blessedness of persons truly religious. He shewed the excellency and usefulness of good works; he shewed that the divine law is unalterable in its moral precepts; and that it prohibits malice, angry words, lascivious looks, toleration of beloved lusts, and profane swearing of every kind; he inculcated the most humble and peaceful behaviour towards others; the love of enemies, and the universal imitation of a gracious God in all that we do; he taught them the matter and manner of prayer, the manner of alms-giving and fasting; he showed them the duty of heavenly thoughts and affections, and of confident trusting in God with respect to outward concerns, and of chiefly seeking a saving interest in his kingdom and righteousness; he prohibited rash judging of others, or doing to them what we would not wish done to ourselves; he inculcated earnest prayer, and diligent endeavours to receive the Lord Jesus, and to walk in him; he warned them to avoid false teachers, and to beware of resting on outward forms of godliness. The important matter, and affectionate and solemn manner of his discourse astonished his audience. Matt. v. vii.

Leaving that mountain, he went toward Capernaum. In a village near to it he healed a suppliant leper, ordered him to conceal the miracle of his cure, and go and offer for his cleansing. The leper spread the matter abroad, and multitudes hearing of it, applied for cures. Jesus retired, and spent some time in solemn and secret prayer. He had scarcely entered Capernaum, when a centurion, very friendly to the Jewish nation, and who had built them a synagogue, sent some respectable Jews to beg he would come and heal his servant, who lay at the point of death. Upon their earnest invitation Jesus went with them. On their way, other messengers met him, and represented that the centurion thought himself unworthy of his presence, and begged he would command a cure at a distance, and it would be effected. Jesus signified his great pleasure in the strong faith of this gentile soldier, and observed, that it was a presage that many of the heathen nations should be quickly converted to his faith, and brought to the heavenly mansions, when the body of the Jewish nation should be excluded, and plunged into temporal or eternal misery. He ordered the disease to leave the servant, as his master had believed he could. Mark i. 40—46. Matt. viii. 1—18. Luke vii. 1—10.

To shun the crowds, Jesus intended to cross the sea of Tiberias to the eastward. As he travelled to the shore, a scribe, expecting temporal advancement, offered to become his disciple. Jesus, knowing his heart, told him he must expect no carnal profit or honour in following him, as he himself had not so much as any settled abode. About the same time one of his disciples begged leave to go and bury his father; Jesus admonished him to leave worldly cares to worldly men dead in sin, and attend to preaching of the gospel. Another begged permission to go and take farewell of his relations; Jesus told him, that, if he was weary of his work, he was unfit to be a minister of the New Testament church. While Jesus and his disciples crossed the sea, there happened a terrible storm. By reason of fatigue, and to try his disciples' faith, he fell asleep. They awoke him, and begged he would rescue them from ruin. After reproving the weakness of their faith, he commanded the storm to cease. A calm ensued. The mariners were astonished, and the ship quickly reached the eastern shore. They had scarcely landed in the territory of the Gadarenes, or Gergasenes, before two possessed persons, the one so uncommonly furious, that he could not be confined, nor kept from tearing his own flesh among tombs and rocks met him. From these Jesus ejected some thousands of devils; which, at his permission, entering a herd of swine, carried them furiously into the lake, and drowned them. Thus, at once, he discovered the reality of the possession, and the terrible tendency thereof; he also manifested his own power, and punished the Jews for breeding of swine, contrary to their law. The owners besought him to leave their country. The person who had been most furious begged that he and his companion might attend him; but being ordered to go home and tell their friends what deliverance had been granted them, they readily obeyed. Matt. viii. 18. Luke ix. 57—62. and viii. 22—40. Mark v. 1—20. Jesus returned to Capernaum; multitudes, with many Pharisees and doctors of the law, assembled about him, and were instructed. Here also miracles confirmed his doctrine. One, afflicted with the palsy, was let down by the roof before Jesus, as the crowd hindered his friends from bringing him by the door. He healed him; and, to the enagement of the Pharisees, declared his sins forgiven. Matthew, a publican, he called to be one of his apostles. At a feast in his house, he vindicated his eating with publicans and sinners; and signified, it was such persons, not righteous ones, who had no sin, that he came to call to repentance; he also vindicated his not yet imposing fasting, or other austere duties of religion on his disciples, since they were no more able to bear them than old bottles were to preserve new wine, or new cloth was proper to mend an old garment, or than an appetite used to old wine was desirous of new. In the mean time Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, came and begged he would come and cure his daughter who appeared in a dangerous state. As he went along, a woman who had been distressed for twelve years with a bloody issue, and who had spent all she had on physicians, without obtaining the least benefit from them, depending on his miraculous virtue, by touching the hem of his garment, was made perfectly whole. Finding she could not conceal the matter, she confessed the whole to his honour, and was dismissed with a blessing. Meanwhile the ruler's daughter died; but Jesus restored her to life. In his return from the ruler's house, he cured two blind men, and dislodged the devil from one that was dumb. Though the Pharisees ascribed these miracles to magic, and collusion with Satan, he went on preaching, and healing the distressed. Matt. ix. Mark ii. 1—21. Luke v. 18—39. and viii. 41—56.

Moved with compassion to the multitudes who crowded to hear his instructions, he required his disciples to pray that the Holy Ghost, the Lord of the spiritual harvest, would speedily provide a competent number of preachers. After spending a whole night in prayer, he set apart Peter and Andrew, James and John, Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas and Matthew, James and Jude, Simon the Zealot, and Judas Iscariot, to his work. He ordered them to go by twos into all the cities of Israel, preach the gospel and work miracles for the relief of the distressed; he directed them to rely on the care of Heaven for their subsistence; to lodge with persons of probity; to give a solemn testimony against the rejecters of their message; to behave themselves with meekness, innocence, and prudence; and to persevere in their work, notwithstanding the most fiery persecutions. After descending from the mountain, he gave the multitude present a summary rehearsal of his former sermon on the mount. As he travelled along from that place, he raised the only son of a widow of Nain to life, as he was carried out to his grave. Matt. ix. 36, 37, 38. and x. Mark iii. 13—19. Luke vi. 13—49. vii. 11—16. and ix. 1—6.

To confirm his own faith or that of his disciples, John Baptist, from his prison, sent two of them to ask Jesus himself, whether he was the true Messiah. Jesus ordered them to inform John of the miracles which they had seen performed, and the gospel then had heard preached to the poor, and they let him judge for himself. He commended John to the multitude present; and remarked, that neither the austere behaviour of John, nor his own more social deportment, had been capable of gaining that hardened generation to the faith and obedience of the truth. About this time the twelve returned, and informed him of their success. He rejoiced in spirit, and thankfully adored his Father's sovereignty in revealing his truth to persons poor and weak, while he concealed it from the carnally wise and prudent. He upbraided Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, for their inattention to his instructions and miracles, and threatened their ruin; but invited sinners, weary and heavy laden with sin and distress, to come to him for spiritual rest. Matt. xi. Luke vii. 16—35. Returning to Capernaum, he was entertained by Simon a wealthy Pharisee. A woman, who had been notoriously wicked, (probably Mary Magdalene,) washing his feet with her tears, and wiping them with her hair, occasioned an excellent discourse concerning the pardon of sin, as the cause of evangelical love. Soon afterwards he went up to Jerusalem to keep the passover with his disciples, and with Mary Magdalene, Joanna the wife of Chusa, Herod's steward, Susanna, and others who ministered to him for his subsistence. At Jerusalem he cured the impotent man, who had lain thirty-eight years, to no purpose, at the pool of Bethesda, and ordered him to mark the perfection of his cure, by carrying his bed. As it was the Sabbath-day the Jews, being informed that Jesus was his adviser, resolved to have him punished. In his own defence, he remarked, that as his father continued his work of providence every day, it was proper he should follow his example by doing good on the Sabbath. His asserting that God was his Father occasioned their charging him with blasphemy; in reply to which he largely vindicated his divine Sonship and mission. Luke. vii. 36—50. viii. 1, 2, 3. and John v. The next Sabbath being the second after the first day of unleavened bread, he and his disciples walked through some corn-fields. In their hunger, the disciples plucked and ate some ears of the corn, at which the Pharisees were offended. Jesus excused his disciples, from their hunger and necessity; remarking, that, in a similar case, David and his servants had eaten the hallowed shew-bread; and that, on the Sabbath, the priests, in offering their oblations, did things otherwise unlawful on the Sabbath-day; and that he himself was Lord of the Sabbath, and had made it for the real welfare of mankind. On the following Sabbath he healed a man who had a withered hand. In vindication of himself, he remarked, that it was usual to draw a sheep or an ox out of a ditch on that day, and therefore certainly must be lawful to cure a man. The Pharisees were greatly enraged at this observation, and, in conjunction with the Herodians, plotted a scheme for putting him to death. The omniscient Saviour, knowing their designs, retired to Capernaum, where great multitudes from Jerusalem, Idumea, Perea, or the country eastward of Jordan, and from Tyre, Sidon, and Galilee, attended him; he healed a number of diseases, and cast out many evil spirits. In his return from the sea-side to his lodging, such multitudes attended him for cures and instructions, that his friends almost forcibly carried him away to take some food, saying he was beside himself, or would certainly faint, though he seemed insensible of it. Not long afterwards he cured one whom a Satanic possession had rendered both blind and dumb. The multitude were amazed, but the Pharisees ascribed his cures to infernal influence. Jesus knowing their thoughts, remarked their absurdity in imagining that Satan would cast out Satan; and their self-contradiction, in attributing that in his case to Satan, which, in the case of their own children, they ascribed to the Spirit of God. He assured them that the ascription of his or his apostles' miracles to Satan, contrary to the clearest evidence, should never be forgiven them. Unaffected by this awakening discourse, they demanded that he would confirm his mission by a visible sign from heaven. Alluding to the typical fate of Jonah he told them that no new kind of sign should be allowed them, but his resurrection from the dead on the third day. He assured them that the Ninevites, who repented at the preaching of Jonah, and the queen of Sheba, who so greatly admired the wisdom of Solomon, would in the last judgment bear witness against the impenitence and unbelief of the Jewish nation; and, by the parable of an evil Spirit's going out and returning of his own accord, suggested, that the means used to reform them were likely to occasion their reduction to the most wretched condition. A woman present, and affected with his discourse, cried out, that she was blessed who had born such a son. Jesus replied, that it was not natural relationship to him or any other, but faith and obedience to God's word, that marked one truly blessed. Meanwhile his mother and other friends desired to speak with him; he suggested to the multitude, that he esteemed his disciples and others, who obeyed his heavenly Father, his most dear and beloved relatives among men. Matt. xii. Mark. li. 23—28. and iii. Luke vi. 6—12. and xi. 14—32.

A great multitude assembling to hear him, Jesus retired from the city to the shore, and taught the people from a ship. By the parable of the seed falling on the way-side, and on the stony, thorny, and good soil, he represented the different effects of the gospel upon careless, hard-hearted, carnal, and serious souls. By that of the tares among the wheat, he shewed that hypocrites and wicked men will continue among the saints until the end of the world, and then be fully separated from them, and wrathfully cast into hell-fire. By the gradual growth of corn, he represented the progressive, but imperceptible increase of his church, and of the graces of his people. By the parable of a grain of mustard-seed, he shewed that, from the smallest beginnings, and by the weakest means, his church should gradually become large, fill the whole earth, and afford spiritual rest and refuge to the heathen world. By that of the leaven, he signified that the gospel-dispensation, in its doctrines and influence, should gradually affect multitudes, and bring them to the obedience of faith. By that of the treasure hid in the field, he denoted, that himself and his truth, found in the field of his word, will, with every wise man, far overbalance every other consideration. By that of the pearl of great price, he suggested that men ought to avail themselves of himself, and the blessings of the gospel, whatever it may cost them. By that of the net cast into the sea, he represented, that by means of the gospel-dispensation, many of different kinds and nations should be brought into the church; and that, at the last day, the good should be separated from the bad; these go into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal. Returning to his lodging, he privately explained these parables to his disciples, and required them to ponder his instructions, that, as lights in the world, they might be qualified to teach others. Matt. xiii. Mark iv. Luke viii. 4—19. Leaving Capernaum, he repaired to Nazareth: the inhabitants still imagined that his mean pedigree and education sufficiently demonstrated that he was an impostor. Their unbelief rendering it improper to favour them with many instructions or miracles, he healed only a few diseased persons, and, retiring from them, taught in the neighbouring villages, and sent out the twelve apostles, with the same orders and powers as before; or, perhaps, it was now they were first sent forth, though they had been formerly called to that work. Herod, hearing of the fame of Jesus, strongly suspected he might be John Baptist, whom he had murdered, risen from the dead. To prevent every murderous attempt, Jesus retired from his territories. The twelve returned, and gave him an account of their success. He thanked God, and retired with them from the multitude. They crossed the lake of Tiberias to the eastward, and retired to the desert of Bethsaida. Multitudes quickly assembled there: he taught them, and healed their sick. With five loaves and two small fishes, he fed 5000 men, besides women and children; and twelve baskets full of fragments remained over and above. This miraculous increase of their victuals having convinced the multitude that he was the promised Messiah, they resolved to declare him their King. To prevent this carnal attempt, he sent off his disciples to Bethsaida, on the other side of a creek, and he himself retired to a hill for secret devotion. A violent storm almost drowned the disciples, though they sailed according to their Master's orders. When morning was come, they had advanced but about three or four miles; and Jesus came to them walking on the tempestuous sea. Fearing that it was an evil spirit coming to destroy them, they cried out for fear. Jesus comforted them, and told them who he was. On this occasion, Peter, through his rashness and unbelief, had been drowned, had not Jesus supported him. Upon our Saviour's entrance into the boat, the storm ceased, and they quickly reached the land, in the country of Genesaret, a little to the south of Capernaum. Here he instructed the people who assembled, and healed their sick. The people, whom he had left on the east side of the lake, came over in boats to Capernaum in search of him. Jesus earnestly called them to labour for spiritual and eternal blessings, rather than for outward provision: he represented himself as the true bread, which satisfies and for ever renders happy the receivers. Offended with the convictive hints and spiritual nature of his discourse, many of these followers entirely forsook him. He asked the twelve, if they intended to leave him also. Peter replied, they could not safely go any where else, as he alone had the words of eternal life, and power to confer it. Jesus replied, that even one of them (meaning Judas,) was a devil. Matt. xiii. 53—58. and xiv. Mark vi. Luke ix. 1—17. John vi.

Jesus had attended the passover at Jerusalem; but repeated attempts against his life determined him to leave Judea, and return to Galilee. A number of scribes and Pharisees followed him to Capernaum, to find matter of accusation against him. They and other Jews were greatly offended that he and his disciples did not observe their superstitious custom of washing hands, nay, of cups, pots, and even the couches on which they sat, before they took meat. He replied, that their superstitious traditions rendered their religious worship unprofitable, and contradicted the indispensable laws of Heaven; particularly in pretending to consecrate to the Lord what ought to be given for the relief of aged parents. He told them, it was not the meat which a man took that defiled him in God's sight, but the many evils of his wicked heart and life. To shun the consequences of their rage, he then retired to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. Here, after a severe trial of a Syrophenician woman, who importunately begged relief for her possessed daughter, he graciously healed the maid, and commended the faith of the mother. Returning from this heathen country, he crossed the Jordan to the eastward, and continued some time in Decapolis. Here, after curing a deaf man, and a number of other diseases, he spent a night in solemn prayer. He then proceeded to instruct the assembled crowds. After they had attended him three days, he fed four thousand men, besides women and children, with seven loaves, and a few small fishes, and seven baskets full of fragments remained. To prevent an insurrection in his favour, he crossed the sea of Galilee to the westward; and, landing near Dalmanutha, he passed through it and Magdala, in his way to Capernaum. Here the Pharisees tempted him with ensnaring questions, and insisted that he would confirm his pretences to the Messiahship by signs from heaven. He rebuked their hypocrisy, and told them, that no new sign should be given them but that of his resurrection, which had been so long ago typified by the deliverance of Jonah from the belly of the whale. Finding that the truths which he spoke made no impression on the Pharisees, he and his disciples again crossed the sea of Galilee to the eastward; and, in their passage, he exhorted them to beware of the leaven, the corrupting doctrines of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians.

Upon their landing at Bethsaida, he gradually cured a blind man, by anointing his eyes with spittle. After a short stay in Decapolis, he went northward to Cesarea-Philippi, and taught there, and in the places adjacent. His disciples told him, that some took him for John Baptist, others for Elias, others for Jeremiah, or some ancient prophet raised from the dead. He asked them their own sentiments. Peter replied, that they were fully persuaded he was the Christ or Messiah, the Son of the living God. Jesus, after signifying that he knew this, not by human instruction, but by the special teaching of God, assured him, that, upon his own immoveable person and office, and the truth just confessed concerning it, he would build his New-Testament church, and make him and his fellow-apostles the honoured preachers and governors of it. He had scarcely proceeded to inform them of his approaching death, when Peter begged him to spare himself, and wished such things might never happen to him. Jesus sharply rebuked him, as one that acted the part of Satan, in tempting him to lay aside his work; as in this he was influenced by carnal views, not from regard to the honour of God. He exhorted all present to study self-denial, and a cheerful compliance with trouble, as a necessary preparation for eternal life. He assured them, that no worldly gain can balance the eternal ruin of the soul; and that if they were ashamed to own him and his truths amidst wicked men, he would disdain to own them at his glorious appearance. He added, that it would not be long before he entered his glory; and that some of them present should live to see it displayed, in the erection of his gospel-church, and the terrible ruin of his Jewish opposers. Matt. xv. and xvi. Mark vii. and viii. Luke ix. 18—27. After six entire days, and on the eighth from the time of the above discourse, as he and his disciples were by themselves at the foot of a mountain, probably not Tabor, as has been commonly supposed, but one near Cesarea-Philippi, he took Peter, James, and John, along with him to the top of the mount. While he there prayed, his external appearance was changed, and shone with inconceivable brightness and lustre. To represent him as the scope and substance of the law and the prophets, Moses and Elias descended from heaven to converse with him on the grand topic of his sufferings and death. The disciples awakening from their sleep, beheld the vision. Peter rashly begged leave to build three tabernacles; one for his Master, and one for each of the prophets, imagining they were to tarry a considerable time. He had scarcely uttered this inconsiderate request, when a bright cloud received the prophets to heaven; and the voice of God proclaimed, This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased: hear him! instead of, above, and in, every prophet. The three disciples were affrighted; but Jesus encouraged them, and charged them to tell nobody what they had seen, till after his resurrection. He also informed them, that John Baptist was the New-Testament Elias, and had suffered already. When he came down from the mount next morning, he found the scribes upbraiding his disciples, because they could not cast out a stubborn devil from a tortured child. The child's father related the case to Jesus himself; and begged, if possible, he would relieve his son. After hinting the necessity of faith, and rebuking the father, and others present, for their want or weakness of it, he ordered the devil to go out of the child. After terribly distorting the youth, he came out, and the child was healed. Soon after, Jesus privately represented to his disciples, that strong faith, and much fervent prayer and fasting, were necessary to dislodge such stubborn fiends.

In his way to Capernaum, Jesus reminded his disciples of his future sufferings. In his entrance to the city, the Roman tax-gatherers, or, as others think, the collectors of the annual tax for the temple, asked Peter whether his master consented to pay the common tribute. To prevent all suspicion of his being of the Galilean party, who refused to acknowledge the Roman authority, or of his being a despiser of the temple, he ordered Peter to cast his hook into the sea and open the mouth of the fish he first caught, in which he would find a shekel of silver, to pay tribute for them both. By the way, his disciples had contended which of them should have the highest offices in the temporal kingdom, which they imagined he would shortly erect. To rebuke them, Jesus presented a little child before them, and told them, that it was absolutely necessary they should be as such an one in humility and self-denial. John replied, that they had been so zealous for his honour, that seeing one not of his society casting out devils, they forbade him. Jesus told him it was wrong; that it was extremely sinful and dangerous to discourage the very weakest of his sincere followers. He showed the danger of giving or taking offence, and the sin of despising the least saint; since not only his angels attended them, but he thought it worthy of himself to seek out the lost sheep of sinful men. He directed them how to deal with offending brethren, and how to secure the maintenance of their own grace. By the parable of a master forgiving 10,000 talents which is about £3,481,875, and that very debtor refusing to forgive his fellow-servant a hundred pence, which is about three pounds four shillings and seven-pence, he represented the absurdity and danger of neglecting or refusing to forgive injuries. Matt. xvii. and xviii. Mark ix. Luke ix. 28—50.

When the feast of tabernacles drew nigh, the kinsmen of Jesus, who, indeed, believed not in him, urged him to go up to Jerusalem, and there render his character illustrious. He reproved their carnal views, declined going up with them, or so much as informing them whether he intended to go at all. After a few days, he went up privately. About the middle of the festival, he taught publicly in the temple; cleared himself of selfish intentions; vindicated his performance of a miracle on the Sabbath-day; and foretold, that he would quickly be beyond the reach of his enemies. On the last day, while the people drew water to pour out in the sacred court, he solemnly invited the multitude to believe in him, that they might abundantly receive the influences and fruits of his Spirit. The Jewish rulers sent their officers to apprehend him; but these, affected with his discourse, returned and told their superiors, that never man spake like him. That evening, Jesus, as his manner was, returned to mount Olivet, and spent the night in meditation and prayer. Next morning, he returned to the court of the temple, and taught the multitude. The scribes and Pharisees presented to him a woman taken in the very act of adultery; and to ensnare him, asked, what should be done with her. After appearing for a time quite regardless, he advised the accuser, who was innocent of the like crime, to cast the first stone at her. Conscious of their guilt, and apprehensive that he might discover them, they all hastily slipped off, beginning at the eldest. None of them having condemned her, Jesus dismissed her with a solemn charge to avoid the like sin for the future. To his numerous audience he represented himself as the light of the world; he vindicated the truth and efficacy of his doctrine; he shewed that unless, by means of his word, they were freed from the bondage of sin, and brought from the family of their father the devil, their descent from Abraham could never avail them. He assured them, that he existed before Abraham; and that his anticipated appearance in human flesh was the joy of that patriarch's heart. Enraged herewith, the Jews, who had just before reproached him as wicked and devilish, took up stones to murder him, but he slipped out of their company. On his departure, or perhaps some time after, he cured a man born blind, by anointing his eyes with clay, and ordering him to wash them in the pool of Siloam. The Jewish rulers apprehended the poor man, severely examined him concerning his cure and physician; and because he avowed, that he, who could perform such a miracle, must necessarily be a good man, and a prophet, they excommunicated him from their synagogues. John vii. viii. and ix. 1—34.

Leaving Jerusalem, Jesus retired to Galilee, and there taught about six weeks, till the feast of dedication was at hand. Notwithstanding he knew the plots against his life, he resolved to take the opportunity of this great festival for the instruction of the people. In his way through the country of the Samaritans, he sent James and John before him, to obtain lodgings for him and his disciples. When that malicious people knew that he was going to the feast at Jerusalem, they refused him a lodging. The two disciples were eager to command fire from heaven, to consume them. Jesus rebuked their furious zeal; and told them that his errand to the earth was not to destroy, but to save men. In his way to Jerusalem, he sent forth seventy of his disciples, with much the same powers and instructions as he had twice before given to the twelve. After executing their orders, they returned to him, probably after he was at Jerusalem, with great joy, because of their success. He told them, that it was but a prelude to the fall of Satan's kingdom; and advised them not to make their success, but their saving interest in the redeeming kindness of God, the chief ground of their joy. When he was within a few miles of Jerusalem, a lawyer asked him what he must do in order to inherit eternal life. Jesus stated that the fulfilment of the whole law of love to God and our neighbour was necessary. The lawyer, willing to justify himself, asked, who was his neighbour, whom he ought to love as himself? whether it was any but Jews? By the parable of the tender hearted Samaritan, Jesus made him confess that no national prejudices should hinder our love to any man. At Bethany, he was entertained by two sisters, Martha and Mary; the one of whom he reproved for her anxious care in making ready their victuals; and the latter he commended for chiefly minding her eternal concerns. Luke x.

At Jerusalem, in the court of the temple, he found the man who had lately been cured of his blindness, and asked him, if he believed on the Son of God? and assured him that himself was he; on which the man immediately worshipped him. Jesus then remarked to the audience, that, by his coming, such as were sensible of blindness should see; and such as were insensible of their spiritual blindness should have it increased and made known. Some Pharisees present asked, if he took them to be blind and ignorant. He told them, that they improved what knowledge they had, chiefly to aggravate their sin. He entertained his audience with a comprehensive and delightful discourse concerning himself as the true Shepherd of his people, who would give his life for their redemption, and would preserve every one of them safe to eternal life. On his avowing himself equal to, and one with his Father, and averring that his miracles testified so much, the Jews thought to apprehend him; but he escaped their hands, and went to Bethabara, beyond Jordan. John ix. 35-42, and x.

While he continued in these quarters, he, at his disciples' request, prescribed them a pattern of prayer, much the same as he had formerly done in the mount. He recommended the utmost importunity in our addresses to God, as a proper way to succeed. He shewed that his casting out of devils was no effect of collusion with Satan. He foretold that the punishment of such as misimproved his instructions and miracles should be heavier than that of the heathen world. A Pharisee, who had invited him to dinner, taking offence at his sitting down without washing his hands, he sharply rebuked him and his sect for their superstitious care to avoid external impurity, while they were unconcerned for that of the heart; and that, while they scrupulously paid tithes of anise, mint, and rue, they neglected justice, mercy, and faith. He compared them to graves, whose putrefaction is concealed. He reprehended the lawyers for loading others with their imposed ceremonies, and for their pretended regard to the ancient prophets, while they hated the messengers of God who lived in their own times. He assured them, that that generation had, or would, by their conduct, approve all the murder of righteous men, from Abel to Zacharias, and be punished accordingly, Luke xi. From Perea, he went northward to Galilee. Great numbers attended his instructions. He directed his disciples to be always candid and open in their conduct; to stand in due awe of their God, trust themselves to his care, and depend on his immediate direction for what they should answer to their persecutors. After refusing to act the part of a civil judge, in the division of an inheritance between two brothers, he warned his hearers to beware of covetousness and earthly-mindedness. By the parable of a rich man cut off by death, just after his plentiful crop, and while he comforted his soul with the hopes of a luxurious life for many years, he enforced his injunctions. He warned them to make it their chief concern to secure the happiness above, and to be ever ready for an entrance into that eternal state. He told them, that himself was shortly to be baptised with painful sufferings and a bloody death; and that as they must expect their share of trouble in adhering to the gospel, it would be their wisdom speedily to make sure their saving interest in and peace with God. Luke xii.

About this time, he was informed of Pilate's murdering some Galileans, while they were offering their sacrifices at the temple. He told his audience, that they were not to think these men, or the eighteen Jews, on whom the tower of Siloam had lately fallen, were sinners above others; but that God, by their fate, warned the nation to repent, otherwise they should also perish in an awful manner. By the parable of a barren fig-tree, he represented, that unless the present dispensation of the gospel to the Jewish nation speedily brought them to repentance and holiness, they should soon be terribly punished, and their church and state altogether ruined. Upon a Sabbath-day, he cured a crooked woman, who, for eighteen years, had laboured under her disease; and vindicated his conduct by remarking, that even oxen and asses were led forth to be watered on the Sabbath; and much more might a Jewess and a good woman be healed on it. In his way southward, as he taught, one asked him, if few were saved. He earnestly admonished those present to secure their own entrance into a new-covenant state; as many who had a form of religion should be eternally ruined; and that the gentiles, though last invited, would come from every quarter, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; while the Jews, who had the first invitation, and were a kind of heirs of the kingdom of heaven, should be cast out. Some Pharisees informing him that it was necessary for him to leave Galilee, as Herod intended to kill him, he bade his informer go and tell that fox, that cruel and crafty tetrarch, that it was beyond his power to touch him, till his work should be perfected and that he would go up and die at Jerusalem. On mention whereof, he broke forth into a mournful lamentation over the wickedness and ruin of that city. Luke xiii.

While he dined in the house of a Pharisee on the Sabbath, a man applied to him for the cure of an inveterate dropsy. He asked those present, whether he might heal him on the Sabbath? None offering to reply, he by a touch restored the man to perfect health; and, to vindicate his conduct, observed, that an ox or ass was drawn out of a pit on the Sabbath-day. Observing how the guests chose out the best seats for themselves, he advised them to be humble, if they had a mind to be truly honoured; and to bestow their liberality rather on the poor, than in feasting their rich friends. By the parable of a great supper, he represented, that the Jews, and afterward the gentiles, should by the gospel dispensation be solemnly invited and urged to come and enjoy the fulness of God. In his after-travels, he advised the attending crowd to ponder seriously what trouble and expence it might cost them to follow him faithfully. From his familiarly eating with publicans and some noted transgressors, the Pharisees inferred that he was certainly a bad man himself. To vindicate himself, he, by the parable of the lost sheep, the lost piece of money, and the prodigal son, represented with what infinite pains, mercy, and pleasure, God recovers and saves self-destroyed, polluted, lost, and prodigal sinners, chiefly of the gentiles. To excite his audience to the wise improvement of their spiritual advantages, he pronounced the parable of the unjust steward. He reproved the Pharisees' pride, and their ill-grounded divorces. To warn them against trusting in riches, and indulging themselves in sensual pleasures, he, by the parable of Lazarus and the rich glutton, shewed them, that these often corrupt men's hearts, and ripen them for eternal misery. He warned them to avoid offences, readily forgive injuries, and to entertain a just awe of the divine authority, and sense of the unworthiness of their most perfect obedience. About this time, he healed ten lepers, one of whom, a Samaritan, returned to render him thanks. Luke xiv; xv; xvi. and xvii. 1-19. Probably after crossing the Jordan, south of Tiberias, Jesus went southward along the east side of the river, till he was over against Judea. He assured his Pharisaical audience, that his kingdom should not come in the carnal and pompous manner which they expected; and that many fearful plagues should quickly fall on the Jewish nation. By the parable of the importunate widow, he represented the advantage of earnestness and perseverance in prayer. To reprove the Pharisees' pride, and mark the hurt of a self-righteous temper, he uttered the parable of the Pharisee and publican praying at the temple. He pointed out the true causes of divorce.

He blessed the babes that were brought to him for that purpose. He directed the young ruler how to attain eternal happiness, and shewed the difficulty of rich men being truly religious; and the happiness of such as, at any age or period, forsake all to follow him and his truths. This last point he illustrated by the parable of labourers hired, at different hours, to work in a vineyard; and yet, through the liberality of the master, receiving an equal reward. He again foretold his sufferings; he checked James and John, who, by their mother's instigation, ambitiously desired the highest civil offices in the temporal kingdom which they expected him soon to erect; and solemnly prohibited all lordly dominion or rule in his church. Luke xvii. 20. and xviii. Matt. xix. and xx. Mark x.

Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, falling dangerously sick, they sent for Jesus to recover him. After continuing where he was two days longer, till he knew Lazarus was dead, Jesus and his disciples set off for Bethany. Before he reached that place, Lazarus had been four days dead, and was buried; nevertheless, after some converse with his sisters, Jesus restored him to life. This noted and public miracle convinced a number of Jews, who were there from Jerusalem, that he was the Messiah. Others, being hardened in their unbelief, went and informed the sanhedrim, who resolved to murder him; and issued orders, that whoever knew where he was should discover him. To lessen the evidence of the miracle, they also agreed to put Lazarus to death. Great inquiry and talk concerning him ensued; but he retired to a village called Ephraim, near the wilderness between Bethel and Jericho. To the last of these places he soon after went, and healed three blind beggars; one as he entered the city, and two as he left it. Here he converted Zaccheus the publican. At a feast in his house, Jesus, by the parable of the pounds distributed by a great man to his servants, to trade with till he should return from a far country, represented, that himself would quickly ascend into heaven, to receive his glorious kingdom, and would return to judge the world at the last day; and that it was only such as improved their gifts and endowments that might expect a happy reward; while the Jewish nation, for rejecting him, should be destroyed by the Roman troops. John xi. Matt. xx. 29-34. Mark x. 46-50. Luke xxiii. 35, 42. Luke xix. 1-29. On the sixth day before the pass-over, Jesus, amidst a great crowd of attendants, returned to Bethany, and was kindly entertained by Lazarus and his sisters. The day after, he caused his disciples to fetch him an ass, and he rode thereon to Jerusalem; while a prodigious multitude strewed branches, and even their clothes, by the way, and echoed loud acclamations of praise, importing that he was the ROYAL MESSIAH. Enraged at this, some Pharisees desired him to forbid the noise. He replied, that God had determined to honour him; and if these babes and others were now silent, the very stones would praise him. As he passed the mount of Olives, and had a full view of Jerusalem below, he with tears lamented and foretold its approaching siege and ruin by the Romans. The inhabitants were mightily moved at his entrance, and asked what this concourse, and these acclamations, meant? When he entered the court of the temple, he, for the second time, cleared it of the money-changers, and sellers of animals for sacrifice, and enjoined the people to make it a place of prayer, not of fraud and deceit. The whole of that day he taught in the temple; while the youth and others, imagining he was just going to erect his temporal kingdom, made the whole court resound with loud acclamations of his praise. At even he retired to Bethany; and returning next morning, he observed a fig-tree covered with leaves. Though the time of gathering figs was not come, he hoped this forward tree might have some ripe ones; but finding it had none, he cursed it into future barrenness, as an emblem of what should befall the Jewish nation, who, notwithstanding their crowding after John Baptist or himself, continued in their barrenness, and want of good works. Hearing that some Greeks desired to see him, and whom doubtless, he admitted, he discoursed of his death and resurrection, and of the blessed fruits thereof among the gentiles, while the Jews should continue hardened in their unbelief; and exhorted his audience to improve the gospel while they had it, as it would quickly be taken from them. John xii. Matt. xxi. 1-28. Mark xi. 1-27. Luke xix. 20-46. As he taught in the temple, some priests, elders, and scribes, asked his warrant for so doing. By offering to inform them, if they would first tell him, whether the baptism of John was of human or divine authority, he checked their impudence. By the parable of two sons, appointed to labour in their father's vineyard, he suggested, that, notwithstanding the Jews professed readiness in the service of God, the long rebellious gentiles would sooner yield obedience to the faith. By the parable of husbandmen forming a vineyard, and abusing the owner's servants and son, he hinted, that for the Jews' abuse of God's prophets, and murder of his Son, their church-state should be taken from them, and they be miserably destroyed by the Romans. By the parable of a marriage-feast, for a king's son, he represented God's earnestness in calling sinners, both Jews and gentiles; and the fearful vengeance that should overtake the despisers of the gospel, and the hypocritical embracers thereof. Matt. xxi. 28-43. and xxii. 1-14. Mark xi. and xii. Luke xx. 1-19. Having lodged all night in Bethany, in his return to Jerusalem next morning, Peter remarked, that the cursed fig-tree was already withered. Jesus took occasion to point out the efficacy of faith and prayer, and the necessity of forgiving injuries. In the night, the Pharisees had resolved to effect his murder, and, if possible, to interest the Roman governor therein. To render him obnoxious, they, under pretence of friendship and scruple of conscience, asked him if it was lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar? From their use of money bearing Cæsar's superscription and image, he inferred that they were Cæsar's subjects, and owed him his tax, but in such a way as God should not be wronged. Next, the Pharisees attempted to puzzle him with a question touching the resurrection of the dead. He shewed them, that their error sprang from their ignorance of the scripture, and of the power of God; and that the truth of the resurrection was plainly implied, in God's calling himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob after they were dead. Next, the Pharisees attempted to puzzle him, by asking, which was the greatest commandment? He replied, that our whole duty lay in first loving God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength, and in loving our neighbour as ourselves. As they acquiesced in the justness of his answer, he, in his turn, asked them, how the Messiah could at once be David's Son and Lord? To which they could make no reply. While the people stood astonished at his wisdom, he warned them to avoid imitating the scribes and Pharisees, in their professing much, and doing little; in hiding the vilest practices under a religious disguise; and in a proud affectation of honorary titles. Turning to the scribes and Pharisees, he denounced a number of woes against them for their wickedness and dissimulation; and assured them of the approaching ruin of their city and temple, for their contempt and murder of God's messengers and Son. Observing the people casting their offerings into the sacred treasury, he remarked, that a poor widow's two mites was the most noted donation, as they were all she had. Matt. xxii. 15-46. and xxiii. Mark xii. 14-44. Luke xx. 20-40. As he was retiring from the temple, one of his disciples remarked what a fine structure it was: he told him that in a little time not one stone of it should be left upon another. When he had passed the valley of Jehoshaphat, and had sat down on the mount of Olives, Peter, Andrew, James, and John, asked him, when the destruction of the Jewish temple and the end of the world, should happen, and what should be the presages thereof? In his reply he connected both together, and told them that false Christs and prophets should arise; terrible wars, famines, pestilences, and persecutions, happen; Jerusalem be besieged; the Jewish church and nation overturned; their capital and other cities rased; and themselves for many ages, be wretched exiles, in almost every nation of the world. He warned them to make ready for it, as they knew not how suddenly it might happen; seeing God on that occasion, would shew singular favour to the godly, and execute terrible vengeance on the wicked, particularly such as knew their duty, and did it not. This point he illustrated by the parables of an householder coming unawares to his servants; of a bridegroom coming at midnight, to virgins foolish and wise; and of a nobleman calling his servants to account for the talents he had delivered to them at his setting off on a journey; and concluded with a plain prediction of his own awful procedure in the last judgment of the world. Matt. xxiv. and xxv. Mark xiii. Luke xxi.

Next day, he continued at Bethany; and told his friends, that after two days more his sufferings and death should take place; and even then the Jewish rulers consulted how to put him to death, though they feared to do it on the feast day, for fear of the mob's espousing his cause. At even he supped in the house of one Simon, whom he had healed of a leprosy. Lazarus and his sisters were present, and Martha superintended the feast. Mary, to the no small grief of Judas Iscariot, and, it seems, of other disciples, poured a box of precious ointment, worth about nine pounds thirteen shillings and nine pence, on the head of Jesus as he sat at meat. He gently vindicated her conduct, alleging that they would have opportunities afterwards to shew benevolence to the poor, when they should not have his bodily presence among them. Fired with indignation hereat, Judas posted to the sanhedrim, and agreed to betray his divine Master into their hands for the price of a slave, about three pounds eight shillings and five pence. This treachery Jesus perceived, but seemed to take no notice of it. It was after this entertainment, or after the passover-supper next night, that Jesus washed his disciples' feet to teach them humility and brotherly affection. Matt. xxvi. 1-16. Mark xiv. 1-11. Luke xxii. 1-6. John xiii.

Next day, being the first of unleavened bread, Jesus appointed Peter and John to go into Jerusalem, where they would meet a man bearing a pitcher of water, who, upon demand, would give them a furnished upper-room, to prepare for eating the passover. At even, he and they, on the very day observed by other Jews, kept the passover. As they were eating the supper of bitter herbs, Jesus told them that one of them should betray him. Filled with perplexity, they asked him one by one, Lord, is it I? Jesus replied, it would be one of them, and his fate should be terrible. Investigated by Peter, John, who was reclining on the couch next to Jesus, secretly asked, who should be the person? By giving a sop dipped in the sauce to Judas, Jesus hinted that it should be he. Judas suspecting the design, said, Lord, am I the traitor. Jesus told him; that he had hit on the person; and added, What thou doest, do quickly. Confounded with this discovery, he immediately went out. Jesus hereon observed, that now God would glorify his Son, in making him an atoning sacrifice, and should be glorified in him. The mention of his future glory occasioned new contention among the eleven, which of them should be the greatest in his temporal kingdom. He sharply rebuked them, and exhorted them to humility and perseverance in his service, if they desired a glorious reward. While they continued their supper, Jesus, consecrating the bread and wine, instituted and dispensed the sacraments of his body and blood. This finished, he told them he would quickly leave them as to his bodily presence; and charged them to shew themselves to be his disciples, by loving one another. He warned them, that they would all desert him that very night, and Peter thrice deny him, though his faith should not utterly fall. He admonished them to prepare themselves with spiritual fortitude for their approaching trials. This they foolishly supposed to mean, their providing themselves with weapons of war. After he had entertained them with a long consolatory discourse concerning the heavenly mansions which he went to prepare for them, concerning the Father's love to them, and the coming of the Holy Ghost to instruct and comfort them, and concerning their union to and service of himself, he concluded with a solemn prayer, chiefly in behalf of his disciples and people; and, after singing a hymn, left the house when it was near midnight. Matt. xxvi. 17-35. Mark xiv. 32. Luke xxii. 7-38. John xiii. xvii.

Crossing the brook of Cedron, they came to the mount of Olives, to a garden of Gethsemane. Jesus, along with Peter, James, and John, retired to a corner thereof. Going a little from them, he prayed thrice with the utmost fervour, that if it were possible, and consistent with his Father's will, his sufferings might be prevented. At every turn, his disciples fell asleep. Meanwhile, the impressions and fears of his Father's wrath threw him into such an agony of soul-trouble, that he sweat great drops of blood, though the night was cold, and he lay on the ground. At length Judas, coming with a band of ruffians from the high-priest, did, by kissing Jesus, point out to them which was HE, that they might apprehend him. To shew his power to withstand them, he with a word made them fall backward; and, after they had recovered themselves, desired them to let his disciples go, if they wanted him. Peter drew his sword, and cut off the ear of Malchus, one of the high-priest's servants. Jesus rebuked him; told him it was proper for him to endure the sufferings his Father had appointed him; that, if it were not so, he could easily obtain multitudes of angels to protect him; and with a touch he healed Malchus's ear. Meanwhile the disciples fled; and Judas, with his band carried Jesus to Annas, the late high priest. Annas interrogated him concerning his disciples and doctrine. Jesus replied, that as he had taught nothing privately, the Jews could bear witness of his doctrine. Enraged with this mild and just reply, one of the high-priest's servants struck him on the face. Jesus meekly asked him, if it was proper to smite him without a cause?

Jesus being brought to the palace of Caiaphas the high-priest, was examined before a convention of priests and elders. Great pains were used to find false witnesses, but none sufficient could be had. Such as they suborned did not agree in their testimony. At last two presented themselves, who deposed that they had heard him say, he would destroy the temple, and build another in three days. This testimony was neither true of itself, nor was the matter deposed worthy of punishment; nor did they swear to the very same words. Jesus, meanwhile, continued altogether silent. Caiaphas therefore adjured him by God, to tell whether he was the true Messiah or not. Jesus acknowledged he was; and would hereafter, with great power and glory, judge the world. Caiaphas immediately rent his clothes, and cried, they had no need of further witnesses, they themselves had heard him blaspheme.

The whole court declared him worthy of death.

They separated, and Jesus was committed to a band of soldiers, who during the night offered him a thousand insults. Peter, having followed into the judgment-hall to see the end, upon very slight temptations, thrice wickedly, and at last with horrid oaths, denied in his presence that ever he had known him. At the second crowing of the cock, Jesus graciously looked on him; which being attended with powerful conviction of his conscience, he went out and wept bitterly. Matt. xxvi. 36-75. Mark xiv. 34-72. Luke xxii. 39-71. John xviii. 1-27. Next morning, the council early assembled in their ordinary place at the temple, and Jesus was placed at their bar. They interrogated him, if he was the Messiah and Son of God? He replied, that it was needless to tell them, as they were determined not to believe what he said; but they should afterward be obliged to acknowledge his power, when they should see him at the right hand of God, inflicting punishment on his enemies. They again demanded, if he were the Son of God? He replied, he was. The judges cried out, that he deserved death for his blasphemy. They then carried him bound to Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor, that he might ratify their sentence, and give orders for its execution. Judas the traitor, stung with his guilt, came and asserted his Master's innocence, and threw down the reward of his treachery. Unmoved herewith, they proceeded to Pilate's judgment-hall; but would not enter it, for fear of defiling themselves by going into a heathen's house, during their feast of unleavened bread. Pilate therefore came forth to a balcony, and asked their charge against Jesus. They told him, that he was certainly an evil-doer, who deserved death, which they had not power to inflict. Pilate insisted for a particular charge and proof. They averred he had perverted the nation, forbidden to pay tribute to Cæsar, and called himself the Messiah. After Pilate had examined Jesus concerning his royalty, he told the Jews that he could find no fault in him. The priests and elders the more vehemently accused him; alleging, he had begun at Galilee, and stirred up the people to rebellion against the emperor. To these accusations, Jesus, to the governor's surprise, never answered a word. Hearing that he had been in Galilee, Pilate sent him to Herod, the tetrarch of that country, who was then at Jerusalem, and glad to have such respect shewn to his authority, and to have an opportunity of seeing Jesus. To the interrogations of Herod, and the continued charges of the scribes and elders, Jesus answered nothing. To express his contempt of him, and of the charges laid against him, Herod, after mocking him a while, sent him back to Pilate, dressed as a mock-king. Once and again, Pilate remonstrated with the Jews, that in his view Jesus was innocent; and, warned by his wife's dream, he washed his hands in water, protesting, that he had no hand in his death. The Jewish multitude cried out for his crucifixion, and wished his blood might be on them and their children. Pilate, after permitting the soldiers to array him in purple robes, and crown him with thorns, as a mock sovereign, caused them to be scourged, in order to move their pity; and used some further means to obtain his rescue. Finding the mob were intent on the release of Barabbas, and the crucifixion of Jesus, and fearing they might raise an uproar in the city, and accuse him as unfaithful to Cæsar, he, contrary to his conscience, released Barabbas, a noted murderer, and condemned Jesus to be crucified.

The Jews and the Roman guard rudely hurried him to Golgotha, the place of execution. All the way they insulted and abused him, and forced him to bear his own cross. When he had almost fainted under its pressure, they compelled one Simon, a Cyrenian, to assist him in bearing it. Some pious women attended Jesus, weeping for his treatment. He bade them weep for themselves and children; for if he, though innocent, suffered in this manner, what terrible vengeance should overtake their guilty nation, so ripe for the judgments of Heaven! After offering him vinegar and myrrh, mingled with gall, and stripping off his clothes, the soldiers nailed him to the cross, with a thief on each side of him, and then parted his raiment. On the top of his cross, Pilate had caused to be inscribed in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, This is Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews; nor would he alter the inscription, to make it bear the least charge against him. The Jewish rulers and others ridiculed Jesus as he hung on the cross; but he begged that his Father would forgive his outrageous murderers. At first, it seems, both the thieves that were crucified along with him upbraided him. At last one of them rebuked his fellow, asserted the innocence of Jesus, and begged him to save him from ruin. Jesus told him, that that very day he should be with him in the heavenly paradise. Jesus next recommended his sorrowful mother to the care of John, the son of Zebedee. About noon, when he had perhaps hung three hours on the cross, the sun was supernaturally darkened, and continued so till three o'clock in the afternoon. Jesus cried out in the Hebrew, or Syriac, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Some derided him, and cried, that he was calling for Elias. Jesus quickly after, cried, I thirst. Some held to him a sponge full of vinegar, which when he had tasted, he cried out, that his suffering work was finished; and, recommending his soul to God, he bowed down his head, and gave up the ghost. Matt. xxvii. 1-50. Mark xv. 1-38. Luke xxiii. 1-46. John xviii. 28-40. and xix. 1-30.

When Jesus expired, the veil of the temple, between the sanctuary and most holy place, was rent asunder from the top to the bottom, to mark that the ceremonial distinction between Jews and gentiles was now abolished, and our access to the heavenly mansions obtained. The earth shook, the rocks rent, and the graves were opened; and now, or rather at his resurrection, a number of saints arose, and appeared to many in Jerusalem. The spectators were struck with awe. The centurion, who commanded the guard of soldiers, cried out, that certainly Jesus was a righteous man; nay, was the Son of God. The soldiers did beat their breasts for terror, and in grief for their hand in his death. The pious women, who had attended Jesus from Galilee, were extremely afflicted. That the body of Jesus, and his fellow-sufferers, might not remain on the cross, during the passover Sabbath, the Jewish rulers begged Pilate's permission to have their death hastened, by the breaking of their legs. The legs of the thieves were broken; but Jesus, being dead, not a bone of him was broken; only a soldier thrust his spear into his side, and there issued from his heart blood and water. Joseph of Arimathea having the disposal of the body allowed him by Pilate, he and Nicodemus, after perfuming and wrapping it in fine linen, laid it in Joseph's new grave, which he had cut out of a rock in his garden. Under pretence of fear that his disciples might steal away the corpse, and say he had risen, the Jews got the sepulchre sealed, and a guard of soldiers to watch it, till the third day in which he had said he would rise should be over. Matt. xxvii. 51—66. Mark xv. 38—47. Luke xliii. 47—54. John xix. 31—40.

Their precautions to detain him in his grave contributed to render his resurrection more illustrious and manifest. Early on the third day, and first day of the week, a terrible earthquake happened: an angel appearing in a glorious form caused the soldiers to flee in astonishment, and rolled away the stone from the door of the grave. Jesus, the prisoner of divine justice, thus solemnly released, immediately resumed his natural life, by the influence of the Holy Ghost, and came forth, leaving his grave-clothes behind him; a token he should visit the grave no more. Mary Magdalene, and other holy women, who, on the Friday had prepared spices for the further perfuming of his body, came early to his grave. They were astonished to find it open, and the body gone: especially as they saw two angels in the appearance of men, the one at the head of the niche, where the corpse had lain, and the other at the foot; one of whom kindly addressed them, and told them their Saviour was risen, as he had foretold. The women ran to inform his disciples. However ill-grounded they judged the report, Peter and John ran to the grave to make trial. They saw the grave-clothes, were persuaded he was risen, and hastened to inform their brethren. Mary Magdalene ran back a second time, and wept at the grave. One of the angels comforted her, and asked the cause of her tears. She had scarcely turned about to go home, when Jesus himself appeared to her. As soon as she knew it was HE, she was going to embrace him; but he desired her to forbear for the present, and to go and tell his disciples, particularly Peter, who had so lately denied him, that he was risen from the dead, and would shortly ascend into heaven. By the way she met with the other women, and Jesus gave them a visit. Meanwhile, the guard of soldiers had informed the Jewish rulers of what they had witnessed, but were bribed to say, that his disciples had come and stolen him away while they slept.

What a farce was this! how deeply marked with the most glaring falsehood! That very night Jesus appeared to two of his disciples, as they went to Emmaus, and conversed with them on his sufferings and glory, and made himself known to them in breaking of bread. By this time also he had graciously appeared to Peter, who had so shamefully denied him. At night he visited ten of his disciples while they were met in a chamber, desired them to handle him for their conviction, that it was he himself, and no spirit; and, eating a part of their meal with them, he breathed on them, as a presage of their receiving the Holy Ghost, and authorized them officers in his church. Thomas being absent, averred he would not believe his Master's resurrection, except he felt the wounds that had been made in his body. Eight days afterward Jesus appeared to the eleven, and offered Thomas the proof which he had mentioned. Soon after, when Peter, James, John, Thomas, and Nathaniel, were fishing on the sea of Tiberias, Jesus appeared to them; and by his direction they caught a multitude of fishes, as a token of the multitudes which should speedily be converted to Christ. Here he shared an entertainment with them, interrogated Peter concerning his love to him, and predicted his future afflictions. Soon after, on a mountain of Galilee, he appeared to James, to the eleven, and, in fine, to above five hundred of his followers. Forty days after his resurrection, he appeared to his apostles at Jernsalem, ordered them to wait there till they should be endued with the miraculous powers of the Holy Ghost, and then to go and preach the gospel to every person and nation, baptizing men in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. He assured them of his extensive power, and of his gracious presence with them and their successors, to protect them, and to succeed their labours. Thus talking to them, he led them out to the mount of Olives, near Bethany, perhaps to the very spot in which he had his bitter agony; and while he blessed them, he, amidst multitudes of angels, was conveyed up into heaven, and sat down on the right hand of God, where he employs himself in ruling his church, interceding and preparing heavenly mansions for his people; and, by his word and Spirit, and providence on earth, prepares them for these. About thirty-seven or forty years after his death, his terrible vengeance fell upon and ruined the Jewish church and nation. At the last day he will, in a glorious manner, judge the world of devils and men, put an end to every earthly form of government, and present all his chosen people before his Father. Through eternity, he will continue, in our nature, the everlasting medium of fellowship between God and ransomed men. Matt. xxviii. Mark xvi. Luke xxiv. John xi. and xxi. Acts i. 12. and iii. 20, 21. Matt. xxv. 31—46. 1 Cor. xv. 24—28. Isa. ix. 19. Rev. xxi. 23. Psal. cx. 4. Isa. ix. 7. As the order in which some of the events mentioned in our Saviour's life is not altogether certain, a view of them somewhat different from the preceding, and perhaps more accurately arranged, shall be given in the chronological index at the end.

Whatever astonishing mysteries are comprehended in the incarnation, obedience, and death of the Son of God, it is still more inconceivable how any deceiver, unlearned, or learned, could with such an air of candour, forge a character so grand and amiable. When the birth, life, death, resurrection, and glory of Jesus of Nazareth, and the various circumstances thereof, are compared with the ancient types and predictions, the agreement is so plain and full, that it is surprising how any can doubt of his Messiahship. His doctrines, miracles, and resurrection, attested by friends and foes; the success of his gospel; nay, the unbelief of the Jews, the terrible ruin of their church and nation; their miraculous preservation in a distinct body, amidst their dispersion and distress, all the false Christs, or Messiahs, that have appeared among them, at once fulfil his predictions, and demonstrate his Messiahship. Nothing, therefore, but ignorance of the ancient prophecies and ceremonies, pride, and a mad desire of a temporal deliverer and sovereign or Messiah, could or can influence the Jews to reject him. The stupid methods by which they confirm themselves in their unbelief, are low and pitiful! For a while, they, ignorant of chronology, shortened the time between their return from Babylon and Christ's birth, and pretended the season of the Messiah's appearance, prescribed by the prophets, was not come. Next, they became perplexed and divided in sentiment. Some pretended his coming was delayed because of their sins; but how could sin be a reason for delaying a deliverer from sin? Others pretended he was born about the time their sceptre departed, and their city and temple were ruined by Titus, but lay concealed among the lepers at Rome, or in the earthly paradise, till Elias should come and manifest him to men. For many ages past, they have been wont to curse the man who pretends to calculate the time of the Messiah's appearance. Instead of justly applying the diversified prophecies to the twofold state of the Messiah, they have stupidly divided him into two; one a descendant of Ephraim, who, amidst terrible distress, shall, with the troops of Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, and Gad, attempt to deliver the Jews, and shall perish in his work. The other of the family of David, who shall raise the former from the dead, raise the deceased Jews, rebuild their temple at Jerusalem, and conquer and rule the whole earth.

When we consider the relation of Christ's person as God-man to his work, in executing his offices, and to his states of humiliation and glory; when we consider how God is in, and with him; how all his perfections are displayed, and his truths exemplified in him; when we consider his various relations to the purposes, covenants, words, and ordinances of God, and to the church; and to the privileges, duties, and worship of the saints, whether in time or eternity, we have a delightful view of him as ALL and IN ALL. Col. iii. 11.

False Christs, are such as pretend to be the Messiah. Numbers of these have appeared among the Jews, to punish them for their rejection of Jesus, as will be seen under the article Jews. Matt. xxiv. 54. To have Christ formed in us, is to have our persons united to him by spiritual union, that he, his Spirit, and grace may dwell in our hearts by faith. Gal. iv. 19. Eph. iii. 17. Jesus and his people, considered as united in one mystical body, whereof he is head, and they members, are called Christ. 1 Cor. xii. 19.

CHRISTIANS. The saints are called CHRISTIANS, because they belong to, obey, and imitate Jesus Christ; and are anointed with the same Spirit of God. To constitute one a true Christian, he must be united to Christ as his head and husband, have Christ and his Spirit dwelling in his heart, have Christ's graces implanted in all the faculties of his soul, and must believe, profess, and practise Christ's truths, in conformity to Christ's command and example. They, by divine direction, first received this designation at Antioch, in the apostolic age, and still retain it. Acts xi. 26.

CHRONICLES; a history that records what happened in former times. Two books of the Old Testament are so called. They contain the history of about 3500 years, from the creation till after the return of the Jews from Babylon, and relate a variety of facts not mentioned in the histories before written, and add other circumstances; and hence sometimes seem to contradict the former, though they do not really. It is probable Ezra wrote the most part thereof. But another book of Chronicles is often mentioned in the history of the kings, and which was but a human work, wherein the history of the Hebrew nation was more largely delineated. 2 Kings xxiv. 5.

CHRYSOLEITE. That which the ancients so called was probably the TOPAZ. The jewel now called chrysolite is of a golden colour, but of no great value. The Asiatic chrysolite is very beautiful in its pure state, and is seldom found bigger than the head of a large pin. The American is larger, and the European of Silesia and Bohemia still larger, but of least value. The chrysolite of the ancients was the seventh foundation of the new Jerusalem, and perhaps the tenth jewel in the high-priest's breastplate. Rev. xxi. 20.

CHRYSOPRASUS; a precious jewel, of a beautiful green colour, mingled with yellow. It was the tenth foundation of the new Jerusalem. Rev. xxi. 20.

CHUB; probably the country of the Cubians, on the north-west of Egypt; but the Arabic version, and others, will have them to be the Nubians, who settled on the south-west of Egypt. Ezek. xxx. 5.

CHURCH. The word so rendered was anciently used to signify any public meeting of persons to consult about the common welfare of a city or state, and sometimes it was given to an unlawful assembly. Acts xix. + 32, 39, 41. It has been contended that the place of sacred meeting is so called in 1 Cor. xi. 18, 22. and xiv. 24; but in both texts the word may very well be understood of the congregation assembled. With respect to sacred assemblies, the word is used to signify a society of men called of God by the gospel, out of the world that lieth in wickedness, into the faith, fellowship, obedience, and worship of the Lord Christ, and of God in him. With respect to which sense it is taken more or less largely. It signifies, (1.) The whole body of the elect, as united under Christ their Head. Col. i. 18. (2.) The followers and worshippers of Christ in a particular province, or city, as Ephesus, Smyrna, Jerusalem, Rome, &c. Rev. ii. and iii. (3.) A particular body of men that are wont to meet together in one place, to profess, worship, and serve the Lord Christ. Thus we read of churches in particular houses. Rom. xvi. 5. Col. iv. 15. In both these last senses, the people with, or without their rulers, are called a church. Acts viii. 3. and xiv. 23. (4.) An assembly of sacred rulers met in Christ's name and authority, to execute his laws, and govern his people, in a congregation, city, or province. Matt. xviii. 19.

From the beginning to the end of the world, the church is continued, and is a spiritual, holy, regular, and more or less visible society. As relation to Christ, and to one another in him, is the constituent form of a church, the Old and New Testament church agree in essentials, though, in their external rites of worship, and many other circumstances, they exceedingly differ. In every age, Jesus Christ is the church's foundation and head; his oracles her binding rules of direction: his glory, and the glory of God in him, and the spiritual and eternal salvation of men through him, are the ends of her establishment. Men who are by faith united to his person, and sanctified by his indwelling Spirit, and who, as they have opportunity, believe and profess his revealed truths, and are subject to his ordinances, are, in every age, her only true members. Eph. i. 23. and iv. 4, 5, 6. Col. ii. 17. Eph. ii. 20. Isa. viii. 20. John v. 39. Eph. iii. 21. and v. 25—27. Heb. iii. 1, 6.

For 2500 years, the church seems to have had no ordinary governors or officers; but the patriarchal heads of families were teachers and priests. Gen. xviii. 19. Job i. 5. During much of that period, she had no multitude of ordinances or members. For the next 1530 years, she was chiefly confined to the Jewish nation, her ceremonial ordinances were exceedingly numerous, and the oracles bestowed on her very extensive. Her teachers and governors were prophets, priests, and Levites. During a great part of both these periods, the visions of God, chiefly to church-guides, were very frequent.

For some ages, the providence of God prepared matters for the erection of the New-Testament church, chiefly among the gentiles. The Jews were dispersed into a multitude of places besides their own country. For their use, the Old Testament was translated into Greek, a language which then greatly prevailed in the world. At the Saviour's birth, wise men were miraculously led to adore him, and no doubt carried home the news of his incarnation. During his life, the Samaritans, the centurion, the Syrophenecian woman, and other gentiles, believed on him. A number of Greeks were anxious to see him. And it is observable, that he chiefly preached in Galilee, and places where multitudes of heathens were mingled with the Jews. After his resurrection, the church was erected in her gospel-form. The ceremonial rites were abolished, and ordinances more simple and easy, as preaching, baptism, the Lord's supper, &c. established in their stead. To plant churches, the extraordinary officers appointed were apostles, evangelists, prophets. To manage these when planted, the ordinary ones were pastors or teachers, ruling elders, and deacons. By means of miraculous operations, chiefly by the saving influences of the Holy Ghost, multitudes in Judea, and in all the countries around, were quickly converted to Christ. Churches were planted in Arabia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and Barbary, to the south and west; in Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Assyria, and Persia, to the east; in Phœnicia, Syria, Lesser Asia, Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, Illyricum, Italy, and Spain, to the north.

During the apostolic age, the form of the Christian church was truly glorious. The apostles and others, with amazing diligence, boldness, and prudence published the truths of the gospel, and were examples of the believers, in faith, in holiness, and charity. The converts to Christianity believed the gospel and cordially surrendered themselves, and all that they had, to the honour, service, influence, government, and disposal of the Lord Jesus, as their Head, Saviour, and King; denying ungodliness, and worldly lusts, and living soberly, righteously, and godly; they were lovers of one another, and ready to lay down their lives for the brethren. Truth, peace, holiness, and order, were every where pleasantly united: soundness in the faith, simplicity of gospel-worship, impartial exercise of discipline, and purity of conversation remarkably prevailed: honesty, regularity, meekness, prudence, impartial equity, zeal for the honour of Christ, and the edification of men's souls, ran through the whole management of government and discipline. Christians having carefully formed their principles, not on the dictates of men, but on the unerring oracles of God, received the truth in the love and power of it; contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; they kept the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; they bore one another's burdens; they carefully avoided the laying of offensive stumbling-blocks before others; they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine, and in fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers; they carefully attended to relative duties; and in whatever stations they were placed, they abode with God. Acts ii. 41—47. and iv. 32—35. Psal. lxxii. and xlv. and xcvi. Isa. xi. and xxxv. and xlix. and liv. iv. and ix. &c. Rev. vi. 2.

About A. D. 68, when the second seal was opened, persecution of the Christians, by imperial authority began. Nero, a monster of men, having maliciously burned a part of the city of Rome, charged it on the Christians, and enacted laws to destroy them. They were greatly persecuted for about a year; and multitudes of them were burned in his gardens for nightly illuminations. In this persecution it is probable Paul and other apostles were murdered. The dreadful overthrow of the Jewish church and state, a few years afterwards, tended to confirm the Christian religion; and to wean its professors from their attachment to the ancient ceremonies. About A. D. 92, Domitian, another monster of cruelty, raised a new persecution. John the apostle, it is said, was cast into a caldron of boiling oil, but escaped unhurt, and was afterwards banished to Patmos. The murder of Domitian, by his wife and friends, put an end to this persecution, about three years after it began. About A. D. 105, the emperor Trajan raised a third persecution. After two years, it was almost stopped by means of Pliny the younger, who had wearied himself with murdering the Christians in Pontus and Bithinia. About A. D. 120, a fourth persecution was raised by Adrian, which lasted nine years. And besides great numbers of Christians were murdered by the Jewish rebels, in this and the former reign. Rev. vi. 3, 4.

Under the third seal, extending from A. D. 123, to 235, the Christian clergy were less bold and active in spreading the gospel than formerly; nevertheless many of them were excellent men. Justin Martyr, Melito, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Clemens, Alexandrinus, Tertullian, and others, wrote well in opposition to Peregrinus, Crescens, Celsus, and Lucian, who attempted to confute the Christian faith: but most of them were deeply tainted with smaller errors in doctrine, or with superstitions in practice. The heresies of the Gnostics and Ebionites, which had formerly sprung up, and of Basilides, Valentinus, Hermogenes, Cerdon, Marcion, Apelles, Montanus, Praxeus and others, mightily prevailed. The emperors Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, and Septimius Severus, though famed for equity and goodness, persecuted the Christians with no small fury. These things produced a soul-ruining famine of the pure preaching of the gospel, while multitudes of the Roman subjects perished from want of common food. Rev. vi. 5, 6.

Under the fourth seal, extending from A. D. 235 to almost 300, matters still grew worse; the bold zeal, patience, and prudence of ministers, and even the purity of gospel truth, gradually decreased. The Christians felt their share of the terrible ravages, famines, and pestilence, which wasted the empire. The rise of the Sabellian, Samosatenian, Manichean, and other heresies; the wild fancies of Origen, and the schism between the partisans for and against him; the schism of the Donatists, raised by Novatus and Novatian, under pretence that some compliers with idolatry, in time of persecution, were too easily re-admitted to the church; the schism between the Roman, and the African, and Asiatic churches, about the re-baptizing of such as had their baptism from heretics; and the persecutions raised by the emperors Maximin, Decius, and Valerian, exceedingly distressed the church. Rev. vi. 7, 8. From A. D. 260 to 302, the Christians, suffering no general persecution, had access to hold a variety of smaller councils against heretics and schismatics. In the mean time streams of Roman blood were shed by the Goths, Alemans, Sarmatae, Quadi, and Persians, and in their own mutual broils; but the murder of the Christians demanded a further revenge on these heathens. It was, however, delayed of God till another persecution, and by far the most terrible, had happened. The emperor Dioclesian began it about 302, and it lasted ten years, and extended to the whole Christian church under the power of the empire. The Christians, chiefly the ministers, were scourged to death, had their flesh torn off with pincers, and mangled with broken pots. They were cast to wild beasts; were beheaded, crucified, burned, drowned, torn to pieces between trees, and roasted by gentle fires; and some by holes made in their body, had melted lead poured into their bowels. In Egypt alone, it is said, 140,000 were cut off by violent deaths, and 700,000 by banishment and hard labour. In every part of the empire, churches were rased to the ground, and the copies of the scriptures were burned. It appears from some medals struck on the occasion, that the persecutors thought they had effectually and finally ruined the religion of Jesus. Herod, Nero, Domitian, and almost every noted persecutor, had already been marked with the signal vengeance of God. Dioclesian, and Maximian Herculus, his partner, had scarcely begun the above persecution, when Galerius, a subordinate Cæsar, obliged them to resign their power, and retire to a private condition. It is said, Dioclesian afterwards ended an anxious life by a draught of poison. Herculus often attempted to resume his power, and at last for the intended murder of Constantine his son-in-law, had his neck broken. Maxentius, his son, had his army of 200,000 routed by Constantine; and himself being obliged to fly by the Milvian bridge, was, with a large part of his army, drowned in the Tiber, just where he had laid snares for Constantine's life. Galerius died of a loathsome and terrible distemper, begging the prayers of Christians for his relief. Constantius Chlorus, his colleague, was not a persecutor; and his son Constantine succeeded him. Though he had not yet thought of embracing the Christian faith, yet, detesting the cruelties of his partners in the empire, he warred on, and vanquished Maxentius. In A. D. 312, he published an edict of toleration to the Christians: Maximin his colleague, speedily revoked it in the east; and, instigated by the heathen priests, made war on Licinius, the brother-in-law of Constantine. Enraged that his army was routed, he murdered a number of the priests, who had promised him the victory. He was just going to venture a second battle, when he was smitten with blindness and terrible pain: he poisoned himself; and, amidst rage and despair, acknowledged his trouble to be the just punishment of his persecution of the innocent Christians. For a time, Licinius, now Cæsar, or emperor depute in the east, pretended to favour the Christians; but afterwards commenced a persecutor. Constantine, his brother-in-law, and now a Christian, marched against him; defeated him in three great battles, in the last of which 100,000 were slain. Licinius was taken, and afterwards put to death. Rev. vi. 9—17. Psal. xxi. 8—12. and cx. 5, 6. Under the opening of the seventh seal, chiefly from A. D. 323 to 338, when Constantine died, the Christians enjoyed a great calm of prosperity: Constantine enacted various laws in their favour; and scarcely admitted any but Christians to offices of state. He called the council of Nice, which condemned the Arian heresy. He vigorously promoted the strict sanctification of the Lord's day; erected churches and schools, and established revenues for the Christian clergy. After he had tried softer methods for extirpating the heathen idolatry, he, for the six or eight last years of his life, used others more severe. He destroyed the idols, pulled down their temples, and sometimes banished the obstinate priests, or put them to death. By these means, heathenism was chiefly dislodged from the cities, but continued in the pagi, or villages; and so came to be called Paganism. His excessive favour to the Christian clergy, and to new converts, occasioned pride, and ambition; and many assumed the Christian name who had no cordial regard to religion. It is certain, however, that great numbers both of Jews and gentiles, were sincere converts; and the gospel was propagated among the Persians, Indians, and the nations on the east of the Euxine sea. Rev. vii. and viii. 1. and xii. 1—11.

To punish the Christians' abuse of their prosperity, a long series of dreadful judgments, signified by the apocalyptic trumpets, came upon them. Before Constantine's death, the Arian heresy, which represents our Redeemer as no more than an excellent creature, or secondary god, was introduced; and, amid the terrible contentions, that emperor was decoyed to favour the leading Arians not a little. Constantius his son, who, after the death of his two brothers, became sole emperor, was a cordial Arian, and persecuted the orthodox. Julian the Apostate, his cousin and successor, did all that lay in his power to abolish Christianity, and re-establish the heathen idolatry. At first he studied to have the heathens decked with an appearance of learning, benevolence, and other excellencies. He ordered the youth to be educated by heathen teachers. He encouraged the heathens in office under him to oppress and murder the Christians. After his return from the Persian war, he intended a furious persecution; but he was killed in it, when he had scarcely reigned two years. About A. D. 366, Valens, the emperor of the east, an Arian, raised a violent persecution of the orthodox, and continued it until his death in 375. Valentinian, his son, was more favourable to them; but the terrible contentions occasioned by the Arians and half Arians, and by the Macedonians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost; and the continued schism of the Donatists, who considered their fellow Christians almost heathens in comparison of themselves, raging in Africa; together with the heresies of the Photinians, who thought Christ a mere man, and the Holy Ghost no divine person; and of the Apollinarists, who believed Christ's flesh consubstantial to the Deity, and not formed of the substance of the Virgin, and that his divine nature supplied the place of a soul; and of the Arians, or Anthropomorphites, who imagined God to have a material body like their own, exceedingly troubled the church. From A. D. 379 to 385, the church had some outward calm. Theodosius the emperor favoured the orthodox; made a great many laws for the abolition of heathen idolatry, which had been regaining its ground ever since the death of Constantine. This prosperity was quite abused: now, as well as formerly, councils were held, one would think, rather to gain victories than really to establish the truth. The Romish bishops violently struggled to have all appeals made to them; and every where the clergy contended for their own or their friends' promotion into the stations of bishops, metropolitans, &c. In this fourth century, the superstition, formerly began, exceedingly increased. Besides lordly bishops, we find arch and subdeacons, exorcists, and canon singers: they lighted candles by day in their churches; they burned incense in the time of prayers and sacraments; they abstained from particular meats during their stated fasts; they admired celibacy; they prayed to departed saints; marked a great veneration for relics, the cross, &c.; they set up images in churches, and sometimes adored them; the clergy officiated in robes held sacred; they prayed for the dead, and sometimes for the damned, that their torments might be mitigated. They baptized the dead, and allowed baptism by the laity. People went in pilgrimage to our Saviour's sepulchre; and men and women began to live by themselves in a monkish manner, under pretence of being wholly the Lord's.

About the beginning of the fifth century, Arcadius and Honorius, the sons of Theodosius, renewed the Arian persecution of the orthodox. The terrible ravages of the Goths, Huns, Vandals, and Heruli, repeated until, in 476, the empire was abolished, soon gave the emperors other work than to persecute the saints. But the heathen Goths turning Arian, carried on the persecution of the orthodox, almost wherever they had power. While the Donatists and Circumcellions tore to pieces the African church, the Arian Vandals seized on the country, and greatly persecuted the orthodox. The heathens in Persia, raised an equally cruel persecution against the Christians there; and the Saxon ravagers almost ruined the churches in Britain. Meanwhile, the Pelagian, Nestorian, and Eutychian heresies troubled the church. The different parties scarcely stuck at any thing which they imagined could render them superior, in councils or otherwise. The two last of these heresies still remain in the eastern churches. Few I believe, of those called Nestorians, or Eutychians, distinctly know what they would have been at; but it is much to the honour of the former Nestorians, that they were so diligent in spreading the Christian religion in a great part of Eastern Asia, though not a little obscured by their whims and superstitions. The first invented by Pelagius, who was once extremely famous for a show of piety, still subsists, with some refinements among the Popish and Armenian parties in Europe. In this century, we find patriarchs, primates, archbishops, vicars; and it was an established rule with the clergy to model the church after the form of the empire as much as they could; the celibacy of the clergy, the doctrine of purgatory, and of the middle state of souls, till the last day, and of the absolute necessity of baptism took place.

About the commencement of the sixth century, the external state of the church seemed more agreeable. Theodoric, the Gothic king of Italy, except a little before his death, acted with great moderation. Hilderic, the Vandal king of Africa, favoured the orthodox. Justin, the emperor of the east, was at great pains to reform and reunite the Christian churches, and procured a union between the eastern and Romish, after a long schism. Justinian, his successor, recovered Africa from the Vandals, and a great part of Italy from the Goths, and enacted a number of civil laws in favour of the church. The Arian Goths and Vandals however considerably distressed the orthodox. After the overthrow of the Vandal kingdom in Africa, the Donatists recovered their power. The Trinitheists, Severetus, Agnoetæ, and Apathartodæ, also with their heresies and deliriums, troubled the church. In this century we find arch-presbyters, village-bishops, and patriarchal thrones; with temples, feasts, and litanies to angels, to the Virgin Mary, to the apostles, and martyrs; and every thing pretended to have been connected with saints was held in veneration. Multitudes of feigned miracles were said to be wrought; new rites of consecration, and a new office of the mass, the shaving of monks, and perhaps the reservation of the eucharist, or consecrated elements of the Lord's supper on the altar, and other ceremonies were introduced. Rev. viii. 2—12. and xii. 12, 13—16.

Ignorance, error, profaneness, and superstition, had now almost obscured the light of Christ and his word; neither the ordinances nor officers of the church shone as of old. The discipline was corrupt and remiss, especially in favour of the great. The government was almost one perpetual struggle between the bishops, chiefly of Constantinople and Rome, which should be the greatest. The worship was sufficiently ceremonious, but Gregory the Great, bishop of Rome, about A. D. 600, by his canons of the mass, his canticles, antiphones, and other superstitious institutes, relative to stations, litanies, processions, lent, oblations for the dead, pontifical robes, consecrations of temples and altars, monasteries and relics almost unnumbered, made it much more so. In this state of things, it was easy for Mahomet the Arab to introduce his stupid and sensual delusion in the east; nor more difficult for the proper Antichrist to erect his throne in the west. Rev. ix. 1—11. and xiii. Dan. vii. 7. 2 Thess. ii. 1 Tim. iv. 1, 4. 2 Tim. iii. 1—9.

Thus, about A. D. 606, the Christian church entered into her wilderness state, and began to have her outer court of civil authority, visible appearance, and nominal professors, trodden down of the gentiles, for forty and two months, or 1260 years. The state of matters under Antichrist, in the west, has been already exhibited. Nor has the state of the eastern church been much better. The Nestorian or Eutychian whims or heresies greatly prevailed in the south part of it. Nor could a sagacious observer say what the most of her members, from the north coast of Russia to the southern borders of Abyssinia, had for their religion, except regard to saints, pictures, relics, and the like. By their own contentions, and by the Turkish oppression, a great part of them were outwardly miserable. But though the din of arms, and the ravage of war have hindered our having any just history of the eastern churches for almost 1200 years past, yet we have reason to hope there has been a succession of witnesses for God. A Christian church has been preserved in Ethiopia, notwithstanding vigorous attempts to introduce Mahometanism and Popery. What friends to truth some emperors and patriarchs of Constantinople have been, is not a secret. In the last century, Cyril, the patriarch, zealously contended for almost all the Protestants do, and on that account was terribly persecuted by means of the Jesuits and others.

It is easy to trace a succession of witnesses for Jesus Christ against his rival at Rome. In the seventh century, the Greek church vigorously opposed the papal supremacy. Multitudes in Italy, France, Spain, and Britain, refused the yoke of the Roman pontiff, and a deal of the new superstition, as the celibacy of the clergy, monastic rules, &c. In the eighth, the Greek emperors, Leo Isenricus, and Constantine Copronymus, strenuously opposed the worship of images. In A. D. 754, the latter convened a council of three hundred and thirty eight bishops, who condemned it, and declared there was no lawful image of Jesus Christ but the bread and wine in the sacrament, which represent his body and blood. In 794, Charles the Great, emperor of Germany and France, held a council at Frankfort, of three hundred bishops, which condemned the worship of images. In his name were published books which affirmed that the scriptures are a sufficient rule of faith and practice, and are to be read by all Christians; that God alone ought to be worshipped; that the bread and wine in shipped; that prayer is to be made in a known the Lord's supper are signs of Christ's body and blood; that justification is through the righteousness of Christ, not by our own works; that pretended visions and miracles ought to be guarded against and detested. Meanwhile the British churches execrated the worship of images, and the second council of Nice which approved it. They opposed the celibacy of the clergy, the rules of monkish orders, superstitious feasts, &c. A number of German and Italian bishops appear to have been of the same sentiments.

In the ninth century, the Greek emperors, Nicephorus, Logetheta, Leo Armenius, Michael Balbus, and Theophilus his son, with a number of the eastern bishops, vigorously opposed the worship of images, and the supremacy of the Pope; and had it not been for the mad zeal of the empresses Irene and Theodora, the worship of images, saints, and angels stood fast to have been banished from the east. Louis the Pious emperor of Germany, vigorously opposed the worship of images, and the papal supremacy. He enjoined the reading of the canonical books of scripture, as the only rule of faith, and prohibited private masses, pilgrimages, and similar superstitions. His successors, Lotharius, Louis the Second and Charles the Bald, enacted a variety of laws to correct the profligate courses of the Romish clergy. A vast number of provincial councils did the same. Agobard, bishop of Lyons, wrote a book, to prove that God alone ought to be worshipped; and that there is no mediator besides our Lord Jesus Christ. Angilbert, archbishop of Milan, utterly rejected the Pope's supremacy; nor until about two hundred years afterwards did the church of that place submit to Rome. Claude, bishop of Turin, in his numerous writings, maintained that all the apostles were equal to Peter; that Jesus Christ is the only head of the church; that all pretences to human merit and supererogation are groundless and wicked; that, as the church is fallible, no traditions ought to be regarded in religion; that no prayers ought to be made for the dead; no images of saints or angels to be worshipped; that all superstitions pilgrimages, penances, &c. ought to be laid aside; that the elements in the Lord's supper are but means of representing his body and blood to believers. These doctrines he propagated with great zeal and success, in the valleys of Piedmont, and the adjacent country. Meanwhile Betram, Rabanus, and John Scot, zealously opposed the then rising doctrine of transubstantiation. Gottschalk, notwithstanding twenty years of furious persecution from Hincmar, bishop of Rheims, vigorously opposed the Pelagian doctrines of conditional election, and of men's free will to do good. Rhemigius, bishop of Lyons, and his church, together with the Valentine and Lingonensian synod, did the same.

Amidst the shocking ignorance and wickedness of the tenth century, numbers in Germany, France, and Britain, still opposed the worship of images, and the celibacy of the unchaste clergy. In A. D. 909, the council of Soissons in France published a confession, mostly the same in substance with those of the Protestant churches. The council of Rheims declared Popes censurable if they did amiss. Many churches refused to part with the use of the scriptures in their own language. Athelstan, king of England, caused them to be translated into the language of his Anglo-Saxon subjects. Heriger, abbot of Lobes, with Afric and Wulfen of England, opposed transubstantiation. Florus, Prudentius, Tricassin, Lupus, Servatus, and other noted clergymen, opposed conditional election, and the opinion of men's natural abilities or will to do good. In the eleventh century, the papal supremacy was advanced, and the council of cardinals instituted. Emperors of Germany and kings of England opposed the Pope's dominion over them in temporal affairs. Vast numbers about Orleans in France, and in Flanders, testified against transubstantiation, against prayer to angels or saints, and against purgatory, penance, relics, traditions, &c. Berengarius, archdeacon of Angiers in France, though often forced to recant, always relapsed, and died in his opposition to transubstantiation: and some good historians assert, that almost all the French, Italians, and English were infected with his opinions. Still the furious imposition of celibacy, or an unmarried life, on the clergy, met with great opposition in Germany, Italy, France, and Britain.

In the twelfth century, the Pope's supremacy over church and state was opposed by several kings of England, France, and Sicily, and by Henry the Fourth and Fifth, emperors of Germany, and a number of other princes. This and other abominations of the Romish church were boldly opposed by Fluenius, bishop of Florence, Joachim of Calabria, Peter Bruis and Henry, both of France, Arnold of Brescia, and even Bernard himself. But the Waldenses in Piedmont, Savoy, and the south of France, were the most noted witnesses for the truth. From the rise of Antichrist, the purity of the Christian faith and worship had been remarkably retained in those quarters. Claude of Turin, above mentioned, had been very instrumental in reviving religion there, and after him Berengarius. At this time, that people appeared against Popery in the most open manner. They maintained, that the scripture is the only rule of men's faith and practice, and ought to be read by all; that baptism and the Lord's supper are the only sacraments of the Christian church; that the bread and wine in the last ought to be received by all communicants as representations of Christ's body and blood; that masses, especially for the dead, are impious and absurd; purgatory, an invention of men; the worshipping of departed saints and angels idolatry; that the superstitious dedication of churches, commemoration of the dead, benediction of mitres, crosses, palms, &c. pilgrimages, forced fasting, superfluous festivals, and the perpetual chanting of hymns, were contrivances of Satan; that laws or vows of celibacy were human inventions, and occasions of sodomy; that monkery is to be detested, and the various orders of monks and clergy were marks of the Antichristian beast; and, in fine, that the Romish church is the apocalyptic whore of Babylon; that the Pope has no primacy in the church, nor power in the state; but he and his agents are devouring wolves, not to be obeyed. With great zeal, they dispersed their preachers, and propagated these sentiments in the surrounding places.

In the thirteenth century, it is needless to mention the resistance of the Pope's civil supremacy by the emperors of Germany, and the kings of England and France, as these contended for their own power, rather than the honour of Christ. But the Waldenses still increased. The inquisition, and a variety of warlike crusades, were employed to destroy them; and it is reckoned, that in France alone, about a million of them were slain. Numbers fled into Provence, and the adjacent mountains; some to Calabria in Italy; others to Bohemia, Poland, and Livonia, and others to Britain; and thus spread the light of the gospel. Meanwhile Almeric, and William of St. Amour in France, Robert Grossthead, bishop of Lincoln in England, and others, who went not the length of the Waldenses, loudly decried the abominations of Rome.

In the fourteenth century, Dante, Petrarch Cassiodor, Casenas, Occam, and Marsilins, terribly exposed the errors and abominable practices of the Pope and his clergy; but continued in communion with them. The Waldenses continued their testimony; and, in spite of the rage of the Romanists, exceedingly multiplied. In Bohemia and Austria, and places adjacent, they were computed at 80,000. In the west of Germany and in Britain, they were called Lollards, or sweet singers, perhaps from one of their chief preachers burned at Cologne, A. D. 1323. About 1360, John Wickliff, an English rector, was famous for his opposition to the tyranny, superstition, error, idolatry, and wickedness of the church of Rome. The university of Oxford, many of the nobles and clergy, and a multitude of the populace, supported him, and embraced his opinions. In 1387 he died; but his doctrines subsisted and spread. His books were read in the colleges of Oxford for thirty years afterwards. In 1395, his followers presented a remonstrance to parliament, which maintained, that the conformity of the English church to the Romish, in the management of her temporal concerns, banished faith, hope, and charity; that the priesthood, derived from Rome, and pretending power over angels, is not that appointed by Christ; that the imposition of celibacy upon the clergy, and vows of single life, even by women, occasioned horrible disorders; that transubstantiation renders the Christian church idolatrous; that benediction of mitres, crosses, &c. have more of necromancy than of religion; that prayer for the dead is a wrong ground for religious donations; that pilgrimages, prayers, and offerings to images and crosses, are nearly allied to idolatry: that auricular confession and indulgences render priests proud, admit them to secrets, and give occasion for their scandalous intrigues with women.

In the fifteenth century, the books of Wickliff were condemned and burnt. His bones were dug up and burnt about forty years after his death. William Sawtre, Thomas Badby, and Sir John Oldcastle, three of his followers, were burnt: but numbers among the people, and even in the parliament, still adhered to his doctrines. In Bohemia, John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, instructed by his books, propagated the same faith with great zeal and success. About A. D. 1416, they were most villainously burnt, by order of the council of Constance. The Bohemians claved to their doctrines, viz. That the Pope of Rome is no greater than other bishops; that good moral conduct alone makes a difference between priests; that there is no purgatory, or middle state, for souls departed; that prayer for the dead was invented by covetous priests; that images of God and of saints ought to be destroyed; that auricular confession, canonical singing, ecclesiastical fasts, festivals, and prayers to saints, sacerdotal garments, ornaments of altars, palls, corporals, chalices, palms, &c. are altogether useless, and the benediction of holy water and palm-branches ridiculous; that no notorious sin ought to be tolerated, nor any scandalous person to enjoy offices in either church or state; that the religion of the begging monks was invented by the devil; that confirmation and extreme unction are not true sacraments, nor ought baptism to be administered with a mixture of oil, &c. The Popish party raised armies to destroy these Reformers; but, under Zisca, their valiant commander, they often routed their foes; till the less zealous being detached from them, by the craft of their persecutors, and by some concessions in the receiving of the Lord's supper, the rest were overpowered, and obliged to retire to mountains and dens, where they continued till the reformation, and had their form of doctrine, worship, and government, not much unlike those of the Scotch Presbyterians. The unsuccessful and ruinous war of the Papists with the Mahometans, for the recovery of Canaan, had been the occasion of introducing some knowledge, as well as much superstition, from Asia. But when Constantinople was taken by the Turks, A. D. 1453, a number of learned Greeks fled to the west, and were the happy instruments of reviving knowledge, where it was almost extinct. John Trithemius, John Gesler, John Baptista, John Picus Mirandulæ, and others in the Romish church, testified against her abominations. Savonarola, a Dominican friar, after he had been for some time famous for piety, meekness, and faithfully preaching of the truth, was imprisoned, tortured, and burnt at Florence, A. D. 1498. He endured his sufferings with the utmost calmness and constancy, and in death proved his genuine love to the truth.

In the beginning of the sixteenth century, the external state of the church was extremely low. The poor remains of the Waldenses, Lollards, and Bohemians, scarcely made any appearance. The councils of Constance and Basil, in the preceding age, and the council of Pisa, A. D. 1511, had made some ineffectual attempts to reform the head and members of the Romish church. We learn, from the hundred grievances of the Germans presented to the imperial diet at Norimberg, and the thirty-five of the Swiss of Zurich and Bern, and other documents of these times, that the scriptures were almost unknown, and men's doctrines not tried by them, but by false miracles and lying wonders; religion was quite oppressed by foolish and wicked traditions; piety buried in Jewish and heathen superstition. The worship chiefly consisted in adoring the bread in the sacrament, the Virgin Mary, departed saints, and pretended relics. Pardon of sin, or indulgence in it, right of calling ministers, and every thing sacred, were set to sale. The priests were sunk in pride, oppression, covetousness, blasphemy, and lewdness. Provoked with these enormities, Luther, in Germany, Zuinglius, in Switzerland, and Calvin in France, began an unbiassed and careful search of the scriptures, opposed the abominations of the Papacy, and separated from it. Their success in preaching the gospel, and reforming the nations, was astonishing. The diligence of these, and of such as joined them in the study of divinity, and in preaching of truth; their various translations of the scripture, and the other books they published; their pious lives; their confounding of the Popish doctors in disputes; the fraternal leagues of the Protestant party, and the constancy and joy of their martyrs; the favour of a great many princes; the cruelty of the Papists; the horrid wickedness of their clergy, even in the use of holy things; and their differences among themselves with respect to religion; together with the fearful judgments of God on sundry, who, after siding with the reformers, relapsed to Popery, contributed mightily to promote the reformation.

With a zeal absolutely infernal, the Popish party opposed the Protestants, and the reformation which they had set on foot. Edicts, inquisitions, persecutions, and bloody wars, were applied to destroy them. Chiefly in Germany, France, Britain, the Low Countries, and Switzerland, the earth was soaked with blood. No attempts of false miracles, apparitions, witchcraft, perjury, or deceit, were left untried to ruin them. Their books were burnt, or prohibited to be read. The reformation was represented as the source of heresy, sedition, contention, and every other evil; and such Protestants as seemed inclined to apostatize were bribed, cajoled, and flattered to return to Rome. A number of the more stupid abominations were dropped, and the rest were, in the most crafty and splendid manner, established by the infamous council of Trent. The order of the Jesuits, who afterwards rendered themselves so famous for learning, villany, and firm support of the Pope, was established. None of these things, however, so much hindered the success of the reformation as the lukewarmness, unholiness, division, and error, which sprung up among Protestants themselves; and in promoting which, it is believed, the Papists had a very active hand. By reason of the Lutherans' obstinacy, their difference with other Protestants about the corporal presence of Christ, in and with the sacramental bread, could never be composed. Servetus, Socinus, and others, shocked with the idolatry and absurdities of the Romish church, drank in a system of blasphemy not much different from that of Mahomet. They made human reason the standard for trying revelation, and so rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, of the divinity of Christ, and of the Holy Spirit; and of Christ's satisfaction for our sins, and our justification through him. They denied the covenants of works and grace; denied original sin; maintained that perfection in holiness is attainable in this life; and that it is of no moment what opinions in religion men were of, if they but trust the promises, and obey the commands of God. They admitted every body that applied, be of what party he might, to their church-fellowship; and contended, that such as opposed this universal coalescence were unchristian bigots. In Poland, Hungary, and Transylvania, they made a considerable figure under the name of Antitrinitarians, or Socinians. In the next century, the Dutch Remonstrant Arminians embraced a great part of their errors, and thought the rest of very small consequence. These Socinians, assuming the Protestant name, rendered the Reformers odious. The madness, error, and bloodshed of the Anabaptists in Germany, immediately after the reformation commenced, had the same effect. The Christian religion, however, as taught by Luther, was by civil authority settled in Denmark, Sweden, and a great part of Germany; as taught by Calvin in Holland, half of Switzerland, and in Scotland; and secured by edict in France. In England and Ireland, the doctrines of Calvin were embraced and taught by some of the reformers; but they retained a form of government much nearer to the Popish than any of their Protestant brethren. Twice the Prelatists' persecution of their Protestant brethren in Britain, and once a Popish massacre of about 200,000, or, as some say, 300,000 Protestants in Ireland, threatened the extirpation of the reformation in these places; but Providence remarkably interposed. About A. D. 1620, and afterward, the Papists almost extirpated the Protestants from Bohemia and the palatinate of the Rhine; and seemed likely to succeed in expelling their religion from Germany. But by the seasonable interposal of Gustavus, king of Sweden, and after a war of about thirty years, the Protestants, both Lutherans and Calvinists, had their liberties restored, and settled by the treaty of Westphalia in 1648. Louis XIII. of France also terribly distressed the Protestants in those countries. His ungrateful son, whom they had fixed on the throne, after long oppression of them, in 1685, abolished the edict of Nantz, by which their liberties were established, and ordered his troops to convert them to Popery. Multitudes were induced to comply; vast numbers were barbarously murdered; and several hundred thousands with great difficulty fled off to Holland, Brandenburg, Britain, &c. Thus a famous Protestant church, in which there were once about 2000 congregations, several of them comprehending some thousands of communicants, was entirely ruined.

In the two last centuries, the Protestants that were once numerous in Hungary, Austria, and Savoy, were almost utterly extirpated. Nor in Poland, except in the country of Prussia, are many of them left. If we may judge of other Protestant countries from the case of Britain, we must conclude that a considerable increase of Papists has taken place. At present, such is the condition of the Protestant churches, by reason of the prevalence of ignorance, contention, and licentiousness among all ranks, and of infidelity, Deism, and other errors; and of negligence, and even profaneness of clergymen; that one can hardly say whether they seem faster returning to Popery or to heathenism.

[The pious Author of this excellent work would have rejoiced to witness a scene in the moral and spiritual world so different from that which he anticipated from the overflowings of ungodliness, which in his time threatened to overwhelm both this country, and the whole of Europe. The last eighty years has beheld a gradual, but powerful counteraction of the working of Satan, and though within that period infidelity stalked abroad among the nations, threatening to destroy the religion of the Bible; and succeeded in seducing millions, especially on the continent of Europe, yet her triumphing was short. The friends of truth thus challenged to the contest, armed themselves with the armour of righteousness, and fought the good fight of faith with success. The weapons of their warfare were not carnal, but spiritual; and were mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds. The result has been most glorious. Superstition, not only has been weakened; but Christianity has stood the shock, unimpaired. Societies for the dispersion of the Holy Scriptures in every tongue, and for the preaching of the Gospel in every clime, have been formed, and are supported with benevolent zeal by Christians of all denominations; who, instead of unrighteously contending about the mere circumstantialities of their common faith, thus agree to make common cause against error, idolatry, and superstition. And the success has been great. God has poured out his Spirit upon the church, and, in some degree, upon the world; and the "signs of the times" justify the expectation that the Lord is taking to himself his great power, and is by means of his faithful servants of all denominations of the Christian church, bringing near the day when the universal acclamation shall be heard, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ!"—Editor.

During the glorious millennium, or thousand years' reign of the saints, Satan and his agents shall be remarkably restrained; the world of Jews and gentiles shall unite in one Christian faith and fellowship; the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the church shall exactly correspond with the word of God; her spiritual light, peace, and the activity of her members in holiness, internal and external, shall be quite amazing. While our Redeemer, and God in him, shall appear all in all, her officers shall be holy, and eminently qualified for, and successful in, winning souls to Christ. Such shall be the multitudes and quality of her members, as if all the ancient martyrs had risen from the dead; and indeed they shall rise, not in their persons, but in their spiritual successors; and shall, in glorious fellowship with Christ, have the ruling power for a thousand years; while the wicked shall be brought under to such a degree, as if almost buried in their graves. It seems, that near the end of this happy period, Christians shall become luke-warm; Satan shall be freed from his former restrictions; and, by his instigation, the Russians, Turks, and Tartars, the Scythians, or persons of a similar savage temper, shall unite to make a ruinous attack on the church. By some signal stroke of divine vengeance, perhaps at the very instant of Christ's appearance to judgment, shall their wicked armies be cut off. Then shall the world be judged; the hypocritical members of the church, together with heathens and others, shall be condemned, and hurried to everlasting torments in hell; while the saints, after being first raised from the dead, caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and adjudged to happiness, shall, by Jesus, be led into the heavenly mansions of bliss, to possess the everlasting enjoyment of God. Rev. xi. 15—19. xx. and xxi. Isa. xxxv. lx. and lxx. Ezek. xl—xlvii.

CHURL; a naughty person, who hoards up his wealth as in a prison, and is utterly averse to live up to his station, or to bestow alms according to his ability. Isa. xxxiii. 5.

CHURN; to toss milk in a vessel of skin, or wood, &c. till the butter be extracted. Prov. xxx. 33.

CHUSHAN-RISH-A-THA'IM, a king of Mesopotamia, who oppressed the Israelites eight years, from A. M. 2591 to 2599; and from whose yoke they were delivered by OTHNIEL, Judg. iii. 8—10.

CIEL; to overlay the inside of a roof with deals or plaster. Jer. xxii. 14.

CI-LICI-A; a country of Lesser Asia, on the north of Syria, between the 36th and 40th degree of north latitude. It had Pamphylia on the west; the Issic Bay of the Mediterranean sea on the south; the mountain Amanus on the east; and part of Cappadocia and Armenia the Less on the north. The soil was mostly stony, and the country was so surrounded with the hills Taurus, Amanus and others, that there were but three narrow passages into it. Its chief cities were Tarsus, Soli, Anchiale, Anazarbuni, and Issus. It seems to have been originally peopled by Tarsish, the grandson of Japheth, but these were driven out by Cilix and his Phenicians about the time of David. Numbers from Syria, and, it seems, from Persia, afterwards settled here. The Cilicians were a rough, cruel, and deceitful people, much given to piracy. They appear to have had kings of their own for many ages, but these in subjection to the Trojans, Lydians, Persians, or Romans, the last of whom made the country a province. The gospel was preached here by Paul, and a Christian church early settled. Acts xi. 30. The Christians here were concerned in the contests about the imposition of the Jewish ceremonies on the gentile converts. Acts xv. 23, 41. Christianity remained here in some lustre till about the beginning of the eighth century, when the Saracens seized on the country. After some ages the Turks took it from them, and it is now a part of Caramania.

CINNAMON. The cinnamon-tree grows in woods in the East Indies, in Java, Ceylon, &c. It is somewhat of the form of the bay-tree, or of our willow. Its flowers are ordinarily as red as scarlet, and, it is said, sometimes blue. Its fruit is of the form of an olive, and from it is extracted a kind of tallow, for making candles. The bark is the most valuable: when newly stripped off, it has little taste or colour, but, when dried, it, at least the middlemost bark, becomes brown and is a most agreeable spice, much used in diarrheas, and weaknesses of the stomach. There is a wild cinnamon-tree in the West Indies, but its bark is inferior to that of the former. It seems the cinnamon-tree anciently grew in Arabia, or else the cinnamon of the ancients was different from ours. The cinnamon bark was used in the sacred oil. Exod. xxx. 23. and in perfuming beds. Prov. vii. 17. Saints and their graces are likened to cinnamon: they are precious and pleasant; saints are the means of rendering nations and churches delightful, and sound in their constitution; and spiritual grace has the same effect on men's hearts. Sol. Song iv. 14.

CIN'NE-RETH, CIN'NE-ROTH; a city of the tribe of Naphtali, on the west of the sea of Tiberias, and from which, all along the west of Jordan to the Dead sea, there was a plain. Josh. xix. 35; xi. 2. and xii. 3. Dent. iv. 49. Some have thought it the same as Tiberias; but Reland is of a different opinion. It is more probable it stood where Capernaum was afterwards built.

CIRCLE; a line surrounding a round body. The circle on the face of the deep is the boundary which God has fixed for the sea; or that crust of earth which surrounds the mass of water, supposed to be stored up in the bowels of our globe. Prov. viii. 27. The circle of the earth may denote its whole surface. Isa. xl. 22.

CIRCUIT; a round course of motion. 1 Sam. vii. 16.

CIRCUMCISION; the cutting off of the foreskin of males. To distinguish Abraham's family from others, to seal the new covenant to them, and their obligation to keep the laws thereof, and to represent the removal of their natural corruption by the blood and Spirit of Jesus Christ, in virtue of his resurrection on the eighth day, God appointed that all the males in Abraham's family should be circumcised, and that his posterity should thereafter be circumcised on the eighth day of their life. The uncircumcised child was to be cut off from his people, but that threatening seems not to have affected the child till he was grown up, and wilfully neglected that ordinance of God for himself. Gen. xvii. For the last thirty-eight years of their abode in the desert, the Hebrew children were not circumcised. It was not so necessary there to distinguish them from others, and their frequent and sudden removals from one place to another rendered it less convenient; but possibly the chief design of the interruption of this ordinance was to mark the interruption of the fulfilment of God's covenant promise of giving them Canaan. Just after the Hebrews passed the Jordan, their males were all circumcised; this is called a circumcision of them the second time, as, on this occasion, the institution was again revived, after it had long fallen into disuse, and it was a rolling away of the reproach of Egypt: God hereby declared they were his free people, and heirs of the promised land, and removed from them what they reckoned the shame of the Egyptians. Josh. v. 1—10.

After circumcision had continued about 1950 years, it was abolished by means of our Saviour's death and resurrection, and the use of it, as necessary to salvation, became wicked and damnable, because it imported that the true Messiah had not made satisfaction for sin, and was a practical rejection of him and his atonement; and he that was circumcised was a debtor to the whole law, obliged to fulfil it for himself, and Christ could profit him nothing; and the returning to it from the faith of the gospel was a falling from the doctrines of grace, and from a dependence on the free favour of God, as the ground of our salvation. 1 Cor. vii. 18. Gal. v. 2, 3. By preaching up circumcision, the false apostles shunned persecution from the Jews. Gal. v. 11. and vi. 12, 13. When Paul circumcised Timothy, whose mother was a Jewess, he did it merely to recommend him to the Jews as a preacher; but he did not circumcise Titus, that he might shew his belief, that circumcision was no more a binding ordinance of God. Acts xvi. 3. Gal. ii. 3.

As circumcision was a leading ordinance of the ceremonial law, it is sometimes put for the observance of the whole of it. Acts xv. 1. As the Jews were, by this rite, distinguished from others, they are called the circumcision, and the gentiles the uncircumcision. Rom. iv. 9, 11. Circumcision profiteth: is useful as a seal of the covenant, if one keep the law as a rule, and so manifest his union with Christ; but if he be a breaker of the law, his circumcision is made uncircumcision; is of no avail to his present or eternal happiness; and if uncircumcised gentiles keep the law, their uncircumcision is counted for circumcision; they are as readily accepted of God and rendered happy, as if they were circumcised Jews. Rom. ii. 25, 26. Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth any thing; no man is a whit more readily accepted of God, or saved by him, that he is either a Jew or a gentile. Gal. v. 6. and vi. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 19.

Besides the outward circumcision of the flesh, we find an inward one mentioned, which is what was signified by the other. It consists in God's changing of our state and nature, through the application of the blood and Spirit of his Son. By this we are made God's peculiar people, have our corruptions mortified, and our souls disposed to his service, and, for this reason, the saints are called the circumcision, while the Jews with their outward circumcision, are, in contempt called the circumcision. Phil. iii. 2, 3.

UNCIRCUMCISED; (1.) Such as had not their foreskin cut off; the gentiles, Gal. ii. 7. Eph. ii. 11. Such were detested of the Jews, and divinely prohibited to eat the passover. Judg. xiv. 3. 1 Sam. xvii. 26. Exod. xii. 48. (2.) Such as had not their nature changed, nor their inward corruptions subdued and mortified, nor their souls disposed to a ready hearing and belief of the gospel, are called uncircumcised in heart and ears. Jer. ix. 26. and vi. 10. Acts vii. 51. Such who are inwardly unregenerate, and outwardly scandalous, are uncircumcised in heart and flesh. Ezek. xlv. 7. The corruption of nature is called the uncircumcision, or foreskin, of the flesh. Col. ii. 13. Moses was of uncircumcised lips; spoke with a stammering tongue, or in inelegant language. Exod. vi. 12, 13. The fruit of the Hebrew trees was uncircumcised, or polluted, three years after they began to bear,—to commemorate Adam's fall, and to point out to us how defiled those enjoyments are at which we come too hastily. Lev. xix. 23. All the nations, descended from Abraham, except, perhaps, the Edomites, long retained the use of circumcision. The Arabs and the Turks, who derived it from them, still retain the use of it; but it is no where commanded by their Koran, or Bible, nor have they a fixed time for it; and it is rarely performed till the child be at least five or six years of age. The Jews, with great zeal, and a multitude of ceremonies unworthy of rehearsal, still practise it. It is said that the natives, in some parts of the West Indies, lately practised it. It is more certain that it was used by the Egyptian priests, and that it has been long practised in Abyssinia, perhaps from the days of Solomon.

CIRCUMSPECT; cautious, seriously attentive to every precept of God's law, and every circumstance of things to be done or forborne. Exod. xxiii. 12. Eph. v. 15.

CISTERN; a large vessel or reservoir to retain water. Cisterns were very necessary in Canaan, where fountains were scarce; and some of them were one hundred and fifty paces long, and sixty broad. 2 Kings xviii. 31. The left ventricle of the heart, which retains the blood till it be redispersed through the body, is called a cistern. Eccl. xii. 6. Wives are called cisterns; they, when dutiful, are a great pleasure, assistance, and comfort to their husbands. Prov. v. 15. Idols, armies, and outward enjoyments, are broken cisterns that can hold no water; they can afford no solid or lasting happiness and comfort. Jer. ii. 13.

CITY; a walled town. A place of much trade, wealth, and honour; subject to proper rulers, and possessed of distinguished privileges. The most noted cities, now destroyed, were Thebes, Memphis, and Alexandria in Egypt; Jerusalem and Samaria, in Canaan; Babylon, in Chaldea; Nineveh, in Assyria; Shashan, Persepolis, and Rey, in Persia; Antioch, in Syria; Ephesus, Philadelphia, Pergamos, and Troy, in Lesser Asia. The chief cities, now in existence, are, Cairo, in Egypt; Ispahan, in Persia; Delhi, in India; Peking and Nankin, in China; Constantinople, in Turkey; Rome, Paris, London, &c. in Europe. Jerusalem was called the holy city, city of God, city of solemnities; because there the temple of God was built, and his holy and solemn ordinances observed. Matt. v. 35. and xxvii. 53. Isa. xxxiii. 20. She is called faithful, a city of righteousness, or an oppressing city, from the temper of her inhabitants. Isa. i. 26. Zeph. iii. 1. Rome is called a great city, because her inhabitants were once very numerous, and their power and glory extremely extensive. Rev. xvii. 18. Damascus is called a city of praise and joy, because of the great mirth that abounded in it, and the pleasantness of its situation. Jer. xlix. 25. Heaven is represented as a city, a city with twelve foundations, a holy city. What glory, order, safety, and happiness, are there enjoyed by the multitudes of saints; how perfect and durable their state of felicity! and all this is founded on the person and work of Christ! None but holy persons ever enter it, nor is aught but holiness ever practised in it. Heb. xi. 10, 16. The church on earth is called a city. How beautiful her orders, laws, and privileges! God her King dwells in her; angels and ministers are her watchmen and guards; believers are her free CITIZENS, entitled to all the fulness of God; divine ordinances are her streets and towers; God himself, his salvation, providential preservation, and system of sacred government, are her walls; Jesus himself is her gates; his ordinances of dispensing word and sacrament, and of exercising government and discipline, her keys. Isa. lx. 14. She is called a great city, because of her extent, and the vast number of her members. Rev. xxi. 10; a holy city, because of the holiness of her founder, laws, ordinances, members, and end of erection, Rev. xi. 2; and the city of God, because he planned, built, peopled, rules, protects, and dwells in her. Heb. xii. 22. The Antichristian state is called a great city, because of her great extent and power, and the close connexion of her members, chiefly her clergy and devotees. Rev. xvi. 19. and xi. 8. The cities of the nations fell; the power and wealth of the Antichristian, Mahometan, and heathen party were ruined, and a number of their cities destroyed by earthquakes, sieges, &c. Rev. xvi. 19. The names of cities, whether general or particular, are often put for the inhabitants. Gen. xxxv. 5. Isa. xiv. 31. Jer. xxvi. 2. A man's wealth and power are his strong city; in them he delights and trusts for accommodation and protection. Prov. x. 15. He that hath no rule over his own spirit, is like a city broken down, and without walls; he is inwardly full of confusion, and most wretchedly exposed to every danger. Prov. xxv. 28. Some great men have explained the little city, saved by the wisdom of a poor wise man of the church, delivered by Christ; but perhaps it is better to consider it as a real fact, that happened in or before the age of Solomon. Eccl. ix. 14, 15. Jeremiah was like a defenced city, iron pillar, and brazen wall, against the Jewish nation; God preserved his life and faithful boldness, notwithstanding all their threats and persecution. Jer. i. 18.

CITIZEN. (1.) One that is born or dwells in a city. Acts xxi. 39. (2.) One that has the freedom of trade, and other privileges belonging to a city; so Paul was a citizen of Rome. Acts xxii. 28. (3.) Subjects. Luke xix. 14. The saints are called citizens, because they are entitled to all the privileges of the church, militant and triumphant. Eph. ii. 19. Satan is a citizen of this world; he has liberty to act in it, and is much esteemed by the men of it. Luke xv. 15.

CLAMOUR; quarrelsome and loud talk. Eph. iv. 31. CLAMOROUS; full of loud talk. Prov. ix. 13.

CLAUDA; a small island hard by Crete, and now called Gozo. Paul and his companions sailed by it in their voyage to Rome. Acts xxvii. 16.

CLAUDI-A; a Roman lady, who, it is said, was converted to Christianity by Paul. 2 Tim. iv. 21.

CLAUDI-US CÆSAR, the fifth emperor of the Romans. He succeeded the mad Caligula, A. D. 41, and reigned thirteen years. The senate had designed to assert their ancient liberty; but, by the army and populace, and the craft of Herod Agrippa, Claudius obtained the imperial throne. To mark his gratitude to Agrippa, he gave him the sovereignty of Judea, and gave the kingdom of Chalcis to his brother Herod; he also confirmed the Alexandrian Jews in their privileges, but prohibited those at Rome from holding any public meetings. Some time after, he again reduced Judea to a Roman province, and ordered all the Jews to depart from Rome. His reign is noted for nothing but a terrible famine; his own timorousness, and for the abominable disorders of Messalina and Agrippina, his wives. Acts xi. 28. and xviii. 2.

CLAU'DI-US LY'SI-as; a tribune of the Roman guard at Jerusalem. With a great price he obtained his freedom as a Roman citizen. Acts xxii. 28. When the Jewish mob sought to murder Paul, Lysias rescued him out of their hands, bound him with chains, and carried him to the fort of Antonia; he then ordered Paul to be scourged, till they should extort a confession from him; but upon information that he was a Roman, he forebore; and next day brought him out to the council. Finding Paul's life in danger among them, he again by force carried him back to the fort. Soon after, he was informed that above forty Jews had sworn neither to eat nor drink till they had murdered Paul. Lysias therefore sent him to Felix at Cesarea, under the protection of a strong guard. Acts xxi—xxiii.

CLAWS; the hoofs of four-footed beasts. Deut. xiv. 6. Claws of birds are their talons, with which they, with their feet, scratch, seize, and hold fast their prey. To tear claws in pieces, is to devour outrageously, and cut off every means of protection, resistance, or conquest. Zech. xi. 16.

CLAY; an earthy substance, of which mortar, brick, and potters' vessels are formed. Nah. iii. 14. Jer. xviii. 4. Men are likened to clay; their bodies are formed of it; they are vile, frail, unworthy, and easily broken. Isa. lxiv. 8. xxix. 16. and xli. 25. The Roman state is compared to a mixture of iron and miry clay, to denote that, notwithstanding its being once very powerful, yet it should become weak, and be easily destroyed by the barbarous Goths, Huns, Vandals, Heruli, &c. Dan. ii. 33—35, 42. Trouble is like miry clay; it is very uncomfortable; men gradually sink into it, and with difficulty escape from it. Psal. xl. 2. Wealth, and other worldly enjoyments, are likened to a load of thick clay; they are of small value for an immortal soul, and are often polluting, enslaving, and burdensome. Hab. ii. 6. The clay with which Jesus anointed the eyes of the blind man may denote ordinances, which are contemptible in the view of worldly men; or convictions, which render men blind in their own view. John ix. 6, 15. The earth is turned up as clay to the seal; when it is fresh ploughed, it is ready to receive any impression; and, when the warmth of summer returns, it assumes a comely appearance. Job xxxviii. 14.

CLEAN; PURE; (1.) Free from natural filth, chaff, or dross. Prov. xiv. 4. Isa.

xxx. 24. (2.) Free from ceremonial defilement. Lev. x. 14. Rom. xiv. 20. (3.) Free from moral filth, corruption, and vanity. Job xiv. 4. and xxv. 5. (4.) Innocent; righteous; free from guilt. Acts xviii. 6. and xx. 26. Wine is pure, when not mixed with water. Deut. xxiii. 14. Metal is pure, when without dross. Oil, myrrh, and frankincense, are pure, when without refuse or mixture. Exod. xxv. 17, 31. Provender or grain is clean, when it is without chaff or sand. Isa. xxx. 24. Meats are pure, when lawful to be used. The ancient sacrifices, priests, and other persons were pure, when without ceremonial pollution. Ezra vi. 20. The purity of the saints lies in their having a clean heart and pure hands; in having their conscience purged from guilt, by the application of the Saviour's righteousness; their mind, will, and affections, sanctified by his spirit, endowed with implanted grace, and freed from the love and power of sinful corruption; their outward conversation being holy and blameless. Prov. xx. 9. Job xvii. 9. 1 Tim. i. 5. Matt. v. 8. To the pure all things are pure; to those whose consciences and hearts are purified by the blood and Spirit of Jesus, all meats are lawful. Tit. i. 15. Give alms, and all things are clean to you; turn your fraud into honesty and charity, and then you need not fear eating with unwashed hands. Luke xi. 41. The purity of prayer lies in its proceeding from a pure heart, and requesting lawful things for lawfulends. Job xvi. 17. The purity of God's word, law, religion, and service, lies in freedom from error and sinful defilement. Psal. xli. 6. and xix. 8. James i. 27. The cleanness of Christ's blood and Spirit lies in their infinite native purity, and their unbounded virtue to purge away our guilt and corruption. Ezek. xxxvi. 25. Cleanness of teeth is want of provision to eat. Amos iv. 6. Clean, purity, also denote full, fully. Lev. xiii. 23. Joseph. iii. 17. Isa. i. 25.

CLEANSE, PURGE, PURIFY; to make pure or clean. (1.) To make free from natural filth or dross. Mark vii. 19. Mal. iii. 3. (2.) To consecrate to a holy use, and render free from ceremonial pollution. Ezek. xliii. 20, 26. Lev. viii. 15. Numb. viii. 12. (3.) To remove the guilt of sin, by the application of Christ's blood. Heb. ix. 14. 1 John i. 9; and the power and sanctification of it, by the regeneration and sanctification of our nature and life. John xv. 2. Tit. iii. 5. Christ purges our sin, by making atonement for it by his blood. Heb. i. 3. He and his Father also cleanse men by the powerful application of his blood and Spirit, by means of his word. Ezek. xxxvi. 25. Rev. i. 5; and we cleanse ourselves, by receiving and improving his word, blood, and Spirit, to promote the purity of our conscience, and the sanctification of our heart and life. 2 Cor. vii. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 22. Stripes cleanse the inward parts of the belly; afflictions are useful to make us uneasy in and watchful against sin, and to cause us to improve Jesus Christ as our righteousness and sanctification. Prov. xx. 30. Isa. xxvii. 9. By mercy and truth iniquity is purged; by God's display of mercy and truth in making Christ a propitiation for us, it is atoned for:

by the faith of this mercy and truth is the propitiation received, and our souls purged from the guilt, love, and power of sin; by the exercise of mercy and truth in our practice, iniquity is excluded from our heart and life, and the efficacy and fulness of the atonement manifested. 1st Prov. xvi. 6.

(4.) A land is purged, when wicked men, who defile it, are cut off by death or captivity. Ezek. xx. 38; or the idols, and other occasions of wickedness, are destroyed. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3. Ministers are purified, when they are eminently reformed by Christ and furnished with gifts and graces for their work. Mal. iii. 2. Hypocrites are purged from their old sins, when they receive baptism, which represents the washing away of sin; when they solemnly engage and profess to be holy; and when they have their lives outwardly reformed. 2 Pet. i. 9.

The method of purification from ceremonial defilement was very different in form; but all represented the gradual purifying of our conscience, heart, and life, by the word, the blood, and Spirit of Jesus Christ. He that offered the expiation-goat, or sprinkled his blood; he that led the scape-goat into the wilderness; he that burnt the flesh of a sin-offering for the high-priest or congregation; and the person or garment, merely suspected of leprosy, was purified by a simple washing in water. The brazen pot, in which the flesh of a sin-offering had been boiled, was to be washed and raised in water. Lev. xvi; vi. 28; xiii; and xiv. He that burnt the red heifer, or cast the cedar-wood, scarlet, or hyssop into the fire; he that carried her ashes; he that sprinkled, or unnecessarily touched the water of separation; he that ate or touched any part of the carcase of an unclean beast; he that used the marriage-bed, or had any involuntary pollution happening him by night; he that had any way approached to a running issue, or was defiled by means of one that had it, washed himself in water, and continued unclean until the even. Num. xix. Lev. xi. and xv. Deut. xiv. and xxiii.

To purify a woman who had lain in of child-birth, she was to offer a lamb, turtle, or pigeon, for a burnt-offering, and a turtle or pigeon for a sin-offering. To purge away the defilement contracted by dead bodies, a house and furniture, after being unclean seven days, were to be sprinkled with the water of separation; and a person was to be sprinkled therewith on the third and the seventh days. Lev. xii. Num. xix. When one was cleansed from leprosy, he was to be sprinkled seven times with a mixture of water, blood of a slain bird, cedar-wood, scarlet, and hyssop. On the first day, he washed his whole body and clothes in water, and shaved off all his hair; on the seventh, he repeated this washing and shaving; on the eighth, he offered three lambs for a burnt-offering, a trespass-offering, and sin-offering; or, if poor, a turtle dove, a pigeon, for a burnt-offering, and another for a sin-offering. The extremities of his right ear, thumb, and toe, were anointed with the blood of his trespass-offering, and then with part of the log of oil that attended it. The sprinkling of a leprous house with the above-mentioned mixture of water, birds' blood, cedar, scarlet, and hyssop, rendered it clean. Lev. xiv.

The Jewish elders added a great many superstitious purifications; as the washing of hands up to the elbow before meals; washing of pots, cups, and tables. Mark vii. 2-8.

CLEAR; (1.) Innocent; free from guilt and blame. Gen. xxiv. 8. (2.) Bright and shining. Sol. Song vi. 10. To CLEAR; to free from guilt or blame, God will by no means clear the guilty; will not pardon, without full satisfaction for their offences. But the text might be read, In destroying, he will not destroy the guilty. Exod. xxxiv. 7.

CLEAVE. To cleave a thing, is to divide it into parts. Gen. xxii. 3. To cleave to a person or thing, is to stick fast to, abide with, or love ardently. 1 Kings xi. 2. To cleave to the Lord, is firmly to believe his word, hold intimate fellowship with him in his fulness, receive and retain his Spirit, and faithfully adhere to his truth, follow his example, and obey his commands. Cloven-footed beasts, under the law, might represent such as render to God and to men their proper dues. Lev. xi. 3. Cloven tongues of fire falling on the apostles denoted their being qualified to preach the gospel, with great zeal and success, in the various languages of mankind. Acts ii. 3.

CLEFT; CLIFF; (1.) A rent in a rock or wall. Isa. ii. 21. Amos vi. 11. (2.) A den or narrow passage between two hills or rising grounds. Job xxx. 6. 2 Chron. xx. 16. (3.) The divided part of a beast's foot. Deut. xiv. 6. The clefts of the rock, and secret places of the stairs, where believers hide themselves, are their desponding frames; or rather, the secret and unchangeable purposes of God, and the wounds and sufferings of Jesus Christ, by which the life of their souls is secured and protected. Sol. Song ii. 14.

CLEMENCY; softness of disposition. Acts xxiv. 4.

CLEMENT; a noted Christian, who preached the gospel in company with Paul at Philippi. He wrote an excellent letter to the Corinthians; and is supposed by some to have been the fourth bishop of Rome. Phil. iv. 3.

CLEO-PHAS, probably the same with ALPHEUS, is said to have been the brother of Joseph, our Lord's supposed father, and the husband of Mary, the sister of the blessed virgin, and father of Simon and James the Less, and of Jude and Joseph, or Joses, the cousin-german of Christ. Though Cleophas and his family were followers of our Saviour, he remained very ignorant of the mystery of his death; and, when it happened, greatly doubted of his Messiahship. On the evening after his resurrection, while Cleophas and another disciple travelled to Emmaus, and conversed concerning Jesus, he himself joined them in the form of a traveller; and, from the scriptures shewed them the necessity of the Messiah's sufferings, in order to his entrance into his glory. Cleophas detained him to sup with them; and, while they ate, they discerned that it was the Lord; but he suddenly disappeared. Cleophas and his companion hastened back to Jerusalem, and informed the disciples, who in their turn observed, that he had also appeared to Peter. As they spake, Jesus presented himself among them. Luke xxiv. 13—35. It is probable Cleophas was an inhabitant of Galilee rather than of Emmanus.

CLERK. The town-clerk of Ephesus is supposed to be of superior authority to those who bear the same name of office with us. Gregory of Oxford will have the GRAMMATEUS to have been the chief ruler chosen by the people, and to have had the office of registering the names of the victors at their public games. Acts xix. 35.

CLODS; (1.) Hard pieces of earth. Isa. xxviii. 24. Job xxi. 33. (2.) Vile scabs, or boils. Job vii. 5.

CLOKE. (1.) An upper garment that covers the rest of the clothes. 2 Tim. iv. 13. (2.) A fair pretence or excuse, concealing covetousness, malice, unbelief. 1 Thess. ii. 5. 1 Pet. ii. 16. John xv. 22. God's zeal is called his cloke: it plainly appears in punishing his enemies, and in delivering his people. Isa. lix. 17.

CLOSE; (1.) To shut up. Gen. xx. 18. (2.) To cover. Jer. xxii. 15.

CLOTH; a kind of stuff woven of threads of silk, flax, cotton, wool, hemp, &c. The blue scarlet cloth that was spread over the sacred utensils of the tabernacle, as they were carried from one place to another, might shadow forth the royal, pure, heavenly, but suffering appearance of Jesus Christ, and his church. Num. iv. 6—8. The new cloth, that cannot be rightly joined with an old garment, may signify Christ's righteousness, which we cannot attempt to mix with our own, in the matter of justification, without making our case worse: or the difficult exercises of religion, which weak Christians cannot perform. Matt. ix. 16. To cast away idols as a menstruous cloth, is to reject them, as most base and abominable. Isa. xxx. 22.

CLOTHES; CLOTHING; GARMENTS; VESTMENTS; RAIMENT; ROBES; APPAREL. It is said, the Hebrews wore no other clothes than their linen coats, with large sleeves, which were often, as they still are in the eastern countries, woven so as to need no seam: and their woollen clokes. These two made a change of raiment. Their coats, which supplied the place of our shirts, hung down to the very ground, unless when they tucked them up for walking or work. The scribes wore theirs longer than ordinary, to mark their uncommon gravity and holiness. Luke xx. 46. Princes, especially great kings and priests, generally wore white garments: such were also worn on the occasions of great joy and gladness. Eccl. ix. 8. In mourning, men generally wore sackcloth, or hair-cloth. Prophets being professed mourners, often wore a mourning-dress of coarse stuff or skin. 2 Kings i. 7, 8. Matt. iii. 4. False prophets, in order to deceive the people, clothed themselves after the same manner. Zech. xiii. 4. Among the Hebrews, neither sex was permitted to wear such form of apparel as was used by the other; as that tended to introduce confusion and unnatural lusts. Deut. xxii. 5. To mark the impropriety of mingling our works with the righteousness of the Saviour, they were prohibited from having their garments of linen and woollen threads mixed together. Lev. xix. 19. Deut. xxii. 11. To distinguish them from other people, and cause them constantly to remember their state of covenant-subjection to God, they wore tufts or fringes of blue on the four corners of their garments; and a border or hem of galloon upon the edges. Num. xv. 38. Deut. xxii. 12. Matt. ix. 20. These the Pharisees wore broader than ordinary, to mark their uncommon attention to the injunction of the law. Matt. xxiii. 5. Great men's children had oft their garments striped with divers colours. Gen. xxxvii. 3. 2 Sam. xiii. 18. Isaiah particularly describes the apparel of the Jewish women in his time. It is plain, these ornaments and parts of apparel were gaudy and fine; but we are now quite ignorant of their particular form. Isa. iii. 16—24.

The PRIESTS had their sacred garments, all which had reference to the humanity, office, and righteousness of our Redeemer.

In metaphorical language, whatever cleaves close to one, or appears in his condition and work, is represented as a robe or garment. Thus the light, glory, majesty, strength, and zeal, that God manifests in his providential dispensations, are called his garments. Psal. civ. 2. and xciii. 1. Isa. lix. 17. His garments white as snow, denote the holiness, equity, and glory of his nature and works. Dan. vii. 9. Christ's clothing of a cloud imports his majesty, and the obscurity of his providential fulfilment of his work. Rev. x. 1. His red garments and vesture dipped in blood, mark his victory over, and his bloody ruin of his incorrigible foes. Isa. lxiii. 1, 2. Rev. xix. 13. His linen garment down to the foot is his dignity and majesty as King of his church; or rather his righteousness, which covers himself and his people. Rev. i. 13. His garments smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they make him glad. To his people his mediatorial office, his humanity, his righteousness, and salvation, have the most refreshing and purifying influence, far superior to the fragrant smell of garments that have lain perfumed in wardrobes lined with ivory; and that both in heaven above, and in his church and ordinances below, where his heart is gladdened with the possession of his office, salvation, and righteousness, and with the holy exercises of his people. Psal. xlv. 8. His imputed righteousness is a robe: when imputed to us, it beautifies, warms, and protects our soul. Isa. lxi. 10. It is a wedding-garment, given us at our spiritual marriage with him; and in which we stand before God, while we receive the sacramental seals of the marriage, and while it is publicly solemnized at the last day. Matt. xxii. 11. Rev. xix. 9. It is the best robe; it consists of the obedience and suffering of an infinite person; eternally protects from all evil; renders accepted before God; and entitles to an unbounded and everlasting felicity. Luke xv. 22. Jesus himself is a robe to be put on; by his imputed righteousness and imparted grace he protects, adorns, and refreshes our souls; nor ought we to be ashamed of him, but to glory and rejoice in him. Rom. xiii. 14. Rev. xii. 1. The raiments new nature, gracious endowments, and holy conversation, are their garments, which they keep, keep pure, and wash in the blood of the Lamb. Psal. xiv. 13, 14. 1 Pet. iii. 4. Rev. xvi. 15. iii. 4. and vii. 14. White robes were given to the martyrs; their innocence was manifested; and they were possessed of the utmost joy, peace, purity, happiness, and nearness to God. Rev. vi. 11. The heavenly glory is called clothing, as we shall have the glorious adorning, and protecting enjoyment thereof. 3 Cor. v. 2. Job's righteousness in judging causes was to him as a robe and a diadem; it procured him comfort and honour. Job xxix. 14.

To be clothed with worms, is to be infected all over with a loathsome disease, or to have one's skin crawling with vermin. Job vii. 5. To be clothed with shame and cursing, is to be exceedingly exposed to reproach, contempt, confusion, and ruin. Psal. cxxxii. 18. and cix. 18, 19. To be clothed with salvation and praise, is abundantly to possess deliverance, happiness, and comfort. Isa. lxi. 3, 10. To cover one's self with violence, as with a garment, is to practise injustice and oppression without shame, or even with boasting, as if it were honourable. Psal. lxxiii. 6. False teachers put on sheep's clothing, when they pretend to great innocence, holiness, and usefulness. Matt. vii. 15. The rending or tearing of garments imports great grief or horror. Acts xiv. 14. Mark xiv. 63.

CLOUD. (1.) A collection of vapour exhaled from the seas and earth, and suspended in the air. 2 Sam. xxi. 12. (2.) Fog or mist. Hos. vi. 4. (3.) Smoke. Lev. xvi. 13. (4.) Heaven. Psal. xxxvi. 5. and lxxviii. 24. (5.) A great number. Isa. lx. 8. Heb. xii. 1. Ezek. xxxviii. 9. God binds up the water in clouds, and thence pours it in rain on the earth. Job xxxviii. 9. A cloud in the form of a pillar hovered over the camp of the Hebrews in the wilderness. In the daytime it appeared as mist, protecting them from the scorching sun. In the night it seemed a pillar of fire, and gave them light. When they encamped, it hovered above them on the tabernacle; when they marched, it went before them; when they went through the Red sea, it went behind them, giving them light, and before the Egyptians, darkening the air to them, and filling them with terror and dread. Forty years it attended the Hebrews, till it had led them to the promised land, and, it seems, disappeared when Moses died. Did it not represent Jesus Christ, and God in him, as the majestic and awful director, comforter, and protector of his people, in their journey to the heavenly Canaan, and as the terror and destroyer of his enemies? Exod. xiii. 21. and xiv. 20, 24. In allusion to this, God is said to create a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night, upon the dwellings and assemblies of Zion, when he remarkably protects, guides, and comforts his people. Isa. iv. 5. The cloud of glory that hovered over the mercy-seat, signified the majestic and marvellous presence of God as revealed in Christ, with his church. 1 Kings viii. 10. God is likened to a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest; his fulness is unsearchable, his approaches quick, and his presence very comfortable. Isa. xviii. 4. God often appeared in a cloud, to mark his majesty; and to intimate that his glory, purposes, and works are unsearchable. Exod. xvi. 10. Psal. civ. 3. Matt. xvii. 5. He rides on swift clouds, or has them for the dust of his feet, when he comes in a speedy and awful manner to deliver his people, and destroy his enemies. 2 Sam. xxii. 12. Isa. xix. 1. Neh. i. 3. Clouds and darkness are round about him, when his providences are very mysterious and awful. Psal. cxvii. 2. Christ was received up into heaven by a cloud, when he ascended; and, at the last day, will come in the clouds, making them his throne while he judges the world. Acts i. 9. Dan. vii. 13. Rev. i. 7. He is clothed with a cloud, when his work is obscure and terrible. Rev. x. 1. His sitting on a white cloud denotes the glorious display of his equity, holiness, power, and authority, in the execution of his judgments. Rev. xiv. 14. and xx. 11.

Ministers and ordinances are likened to clouds; by the authority of heaven they are appointed, and by them God comforts and directs his people, and communicates his grace to them. Isa. v. 6. Saints are called a cloud; their number is great; they are guides and patterns to others; their conversation and affections are heavenly, and are moved by the wind of the Holy Ghost; they refresh their country with their useful influence, and protect it from scorching judgments. Isa. lx. 8. Heb. xii. 1. Hypocrites and false teachers are clouds without water: they promise usefulness, but, being without true solidity, value, and knowledge, are easily carried about by their own pride and ambition, and by the winds of false doctrine and infernal temptations. 1 Pet. ii. 17. Men, in general, are as a vanishing cloud; while they live, they have but little of true happiness and comfort, and their days hasten to an end. Job vii. 9. Sins are compared to a cloud; how vast their numbers! how they darken our souls, separate between God and us, and forebode the storms of his wrath! By his free forgiveness, by the shining of his countenance, and the breathing of his Spirit, only can they be dispelled. Isa. xlii. 22. Afflictions are a cloud; their ingredients are many, their nature awful and mysterious; they bereave men of their glory and joy, and are often preludes of eternal ruin. Lam. ii. 1. The favour of a king is like a cloud of the latter rain, very useful and pleasant. Prov. xvi. 15. The goodness of the ten tribes of Israel was like a morning cloud, and early dew; whatever appearances of reformation were among them under Jehu, and whatever prosperity they had under Joash, and Jeroboam his son, or Pekah, they all quickly came to an end. Hos. vi. 4. Armies are likened to a cloud, because of their number, and their threatening to overwhelm and ruin all around. Ezek. xxxviii. 9.

CLUSTER; a bunch of raisins, grapes, or the like. 1 Sam. xxv. 18. Christ is as a cluster of camphire; his fulness is unbounded, his security infallible, and sweet is the connexion of his person, natures, offices, relations, promises, and benefits. Sol. Song i. 14. The saints are as clusters of the vine;

they are precious and fruitful; their graces are well connected and abundant. Isa. lxxv. 8. Mic. vii. 1. Ministers, divine ordinances, and the edifying influences of believers, are clusters of grapes; how delightful, abundant, and rich, their refreshing and nourishing virtue to the souls of men! Sol. Song vii. 7. Wicked men, particularly Antichristians, are clusters of the vine of the earth. How numerous and earthly-minded! What corruption and wickedness they produce! Rev. xiv. 18. Corrupt doctrines and practices are bitter clusters; are hateful to God and his people; and bitter fruits of divine wrath attend them. Deut. xxxii. 32.

COAL. God's judgments are compared to coals, or coals of juniper: they are terrible to endure, and sometimes of long continuance. Psal. cxi. 10. and cxx. 4. The objects or instruments of his judgments are likened to coals; the former are affected with his wrath, and consumed by it, and the latter are employed to torment and consume others. Psal. xviii. 8. Christ's promise of forgiveness and grace is a live-coal taken from the altar; conveyed to us through his person and righteousness; it melts our hearts into godly sorrow, warms them with love, and purges away our dross of sinful corruption. Isa. vi. 6. The saints' love to Christ is as coals of fire, that have a most vehement flame; it makes their hearts to burn with desire after him; makes them clear, shining, heavenly-minded, and full of godly sorrow for sin; nor can it be easily or at all extinguished. Sol. Song viii. 6, 7. A man's posterity is a burning coal; in them progenitors act, shine, and are comforted. 2 Sam. xiv. 7. Good deeds done to our enemies among men are as coals of fire heaped on their heads, they tend to melt and pain their heart with grief for injuring us, and make them to love us; as they occasion the speedy infliction of terrible judgments upon them. Rom. xii. 20. Prov. xxv. 22. Harlots, and temptations to unchastity, are as burning coals; they can scarcely be approached without inflaming our lusts, and mortally wounding our souls. Prov. vi. 28. Strife and contention are as burning coals; they spread terribly, and hurt, and ruin every thing near them. Prov. xxvi. 21.

COAST; (1.) Border, boundary. Num. xiv. 24. (2.) Country. Exod. x. 4.

COAT. Joseph's coat of many colours may represent Christ's human nature in its various graces and beauties; and as it marked God's love to him, and his bloody sufferings for us. Gen. xxxvii. 3, 32. The linen coats of the priests represented his pure humanity and spotless righteousness. Exod. xxviii. 40. The coats of skin wherewith God clothed our first parents represented the righteousness of our glorious sacrifice, Christ, imputed to us for the covering of our sinful nakedness. Gen. iii. 21. Rev. iii. 18. I have put off my coat, how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet, how shall I defile them? I am now quite out of proper frame to entertain Jesus Christ; I cannot actively put on and apply his righteousness, cannot exercise grace, or bring forth good works, but lie under the power of sloth and unconcern. Sol. Song v. 3.

COCK; a male fowl. The dunghill-cock has his head ornamented with a long fleshy crest or comb, and has two wattles lengthways on his throat. He is a robust and beautiful animal, whose feathers are often variegated with a number of elegant colours. He usually crows at two different times of the night; the first time a little after midnight, and a second time about break of day. This last season is usually called cock-crowing; and at this time the cock crew for the second time after Peter had thrice denied his Master. Mark xiv. 66, 72.

COCKATRICE. It does not appear that any such creature exists. The word so translated in our Bibles ought to be translated serpent. It appears to have been one of the most poisonous kind, which lurked in holes of the earth, and whose eggs were rank poison. Out of the serpent's root came forth a cockatrice, and a fiery flying serpent, when Hezekiah proved a more ruinous adversary to the Philistines than Uzziah had been. Isa. xiv. 29. The weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice-dex; the most poor and weak saints shall be in no danger from malicious and ruinous heretics and persecutors. Isa. xi. 8. They hatch cockatrice-eggs, and he that eateth of their eggs shall die, and that which is crushed breaks out into a viper, or serpent; they contrive and execute wicked practices, and publish false doctrines; by which sure and sudden destruction is brought upon themselves and others. Isa. lix. 5.

COCKLE; a weed that grows among corn. The Hebrew word BOSHAN signifies any stinking weed. Job xxxi. 40.

COFFER; a chest. 1 Sam. vi. 8.

COGITATION; thought. Dan. vii. 28.

COLD is, (1.) Natural, as of water, the season, &c. Jer. xviii. 14. Nah. iii. 17. (2.) Spiritual, which consists in an utter or very great unconcern about Jesus Christ and divine things. Matt. xxiv. 12. Professors are neither cold nor hot, when they retain the profession of truth in some degree, but have no active liveliness, zeal, or concern for the power of it. Christ's wishing men were either cold or hot imports, that none are more detested of him, or dishonouring to him, than hypocritical and careless professors of the Christian faith. Rev. iii. 15, 16. A faithful messenger, chiefly of Jesus Christ, is as the cold of snow in harvest, very refreshing, and useful to distressed and labouring souls. Prov. xxv. 13. And good news, chiefly of the glorious gospel, are as cold waters to a thirsty soul; are very suitable, refreshing, and reviving. Prov. xxv. 25.

COLLAR; (1.) A chain of gold, silver, &c. worn about the neck. Judg. viii. 20. (2.) The part of one's coat that is fastened about the neck. Job's trouble bound him closely, firmly, and fast, as the collar of his coat. Job xxx. 15.

COLLECTION; a gathering of money from a variety of hands for some public use, as for the repairs of the temple, or for the poor Jews who had embraced the gospel. 2 Chron. xxiv. 6, 9. 1 Cor. xvi. 1.

COLLEGE; a school for training up young prophets or teachers. 2 Kings xxii. 14.

COLLOPS. To have collops of flesh on one's flanks, is expressive of great prosperity and luxury. Job xv. 27.

COLONY, a place peopled from some more ancient city or country. The Greeks and Romans settled their countrymen in a variety of places. Acts xvi. 12.

CO-LOS'SE, an ancient city of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, just where it began to run under ground before it fell into the river Meander. It was near Laodicea and Hierapolis. These three cities are said to have been buried in ruins by an earthquake, A. D. 68. Though it does not appear that Paul was ever at Colosse, yet, when a prisoner at Rome, he wrote the Christians there an excellent epistle, warning them against vain philosophy and legal ceremonies; demonstrating the excellency of Christ, and the saints' completeness in him; and exhorting them to the duties of their respective stations. This he sent to them by Tychicus and Onesimus.

COLOUR; (1.) A dye, as black, red, &c. Numb. xi. 7. (2.) A show; pretence. Acts xxviii. 30.

COLT; a young ass. Gen. xxxii. 15. Matt. xxi. 2, 5.

COME; (1.) To draw near; approach to. Exod. xxxiv. 3. (2.) To proceed from. 1 Chron. xxix. 14. (3.) To befall. Ezra ix. 13. Job iv. 5. (4.) To attain to. Acts xxvi. 7. (5.) To join with. Prov. i. 11. (6.) To touch. Ezek. xlv. 25. (7.) To be married to. Dan. xi. 6. (8.) To lie carnally with. Gen. xxxviii. 16. (9.) To invade, attack. Gen. xxvii. 25. (10.) To arise. Numb. xxiv. 17. God's coming signifies the manifestation of his presence in glory, favour, or wrath in a particular place. Psal. l. 3. and ci. 2. Christ's coming is fivefold: his assuming our nature; his giving the offers of his grace in the gospel; his bestowing the influences of his Spirit; his executing judgments in time, particularly on the Jews and Antichrist; and his last appearance to judge the world. 1 John v. 20. Matt. xvi. 28. and xxiv. 30. Rev. xvi. 15. and xxii. 30. Men come to Christ, when, leaving their natural state, and renouncing their own righteousness, wisdom, strength, and inclinations, they believe, receive, and feed on his person and fulness by faith. John v. 40. and vi. 37. 1 Pet. ii. 4. Men come to God, when they receive out of his fulness, enjoy his presence, and worship and serve him. Heb. vii. 25. and xi. 6. John xiv. 6.

COMELY. See BEAUTY.

COMFORT; CONSOLATION; inward pleasure, joy, and cheerfulness, natural or spiritual. Job vi. 10. Psal. cxix. 50, 76. Spiritual comfort is that refreshing pleasure of the soul, which arises from the consideration of what God in Christ is to us with respect to relation, and of what he has done for and infallibly promised to us. 2 Cor. i. 5. The Holy Spirit is the author of it; the scriptures are the established ground and means of it; and ministers and godly companions are the instruments, and helpers of it. John xvi. 7. Psal. cxix. 49, 50. 2 Cor. i. 5, 6, 7. and vii. 6, 7. Christ is the consolation of Israel; with predictions of his coming and kingdom the ancient prophets comforted the Jews; and in every age, his person, righteousness, fulness, and love, are the source and substance of his people's comfort against every trouble. Luke ii. 25. Are the consolations of God small with thee? Do you condemn our divine advices, which we have given you for your direction and comfort? Job xv. 11. To comfort, is to free one from grief and render him glad and joyful. Gen. v. 29. God comforts the cast down, by supporting them under their trouble, and delivering them from it. 2 Cor. vii. 6. The Holy Ghost is called the Comforter; because, by the application of the Saviour's word, blood, and fulness to our souls, he fills us with joy unspeakable and full of glory. John xiv. 26. This word is by some rendered Advocate.

COMMAND; (1.) To charge by authority. Deut. xi. 22. (2.) To cause a thing to be done. Isa. v. 6. and xiii. 3. God commands the blessing of life, or the strength of his people, when, by his will, he furnishes it. Psal. cxxxiii. 3. and lxviii. 28. Jesus Christ is the Commander given to the people: he enlists men for his spiritual soldiers; he convenes, orders, encourages, and goes before them in their gracious warfare. Isa. lv. 4. The saints command God concerning his sons and daughters, and the works of his hands, when, in Christ's name, they earnestly plead his promise, and argue from his faithfulness, power, equity, and love, pledged therein. Isa. xlv. 11.

COMMANDMENT. See LAW.

COMMEND; (1.) To speak to one's praise. 2 Cor. iii. 1. (2.) To render praiseworthy; make acceptable. 1 Cor. viii. 8. (3.) To trust a thing to the care and management of another. Acts xx. 32. God commends his love; he makes it appear glorious and unbounded, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Rom. v. 8. Our unrighteousness commends the righteousness of God; it gives occasion for him clearly to manifest his justice in punishing us, or in forgiving us through Christ's blood: and the Jews' rejection of Christ demonstrated the faithfulness of God in the ancient predictions. Rom. iii. 5.

COMMISSION; a charge to one to manage a business. Acts xxvi. 12.

COMMIT; (1.) To act, perform. Exod. xx. 14. (2.) To trust, give charge of. 2 Tim. ii. 2. To commit one's spirit, self, way, or salvation to God, is upon the faith of his promise, to entrust the same to his care, that he may receive, uphold, direct, preserve, and save us. Psal. xxxi. 5; x. 14; and xxxvii. 5. Prov. xvi. 3. 2 Tim. i. 12. The good thing committed to Timothy's trust, was the truths of God, and his ministerial office, and the gifts and graces qualifying him for the discharge of it. 1 Tim. vi. 20. 2 Tim. i. 14.

COMMODIOUS; safe and convenient. Acts xxvii. 12.

COMMON; (1.) Ordinary, usual. Numb. xvi. 29. (2.) Ceremonially unclean. Acts x. 14. and xi. 9. (3.) Unwashed. Mark vii. + 2. (4.) Not hallowed or set apart to the service of God. 1 Sam. xxi. 4. (5.) What many have an equal access to, or interest in. Ezek. xxxiii. 42. (6.) What belongs to every one of the society. Acts iv. 32. The church is called a commonwealth: her members stand in mutual and strong connexions one to another; they possess common privileges, and are subject to common laws. Eph. ii. 12. Salvation is common; it is suited to and offered to men as sinful; it is published to and received by all sorts of men; and all the saints have an equal interest in it. Jude 3.

COMMOTION; tossing to and fro; great unsettledness, perplexity, and trouble. Jer. x. 22. Luke xx. 9.

COMMUNE; to talk friendly with. Gen. xxxiv. 6. To commune with our heart is seriously to propose to it important questions; entertain it with the view of excellent subjects, and address it with weighty charges and directions. Psal. iv. 4.

COMMUNICATE; (1.) To give others a share of what good things we have. 1 Tim. vi. 18. (2.) To have a share with one. Thus the Philippians communicated with the apostle in his affliction, bearing a share of it in their supplying him in his distress. Phil. iv. 14, 15.

COMMUNICATION; fellowship in converse and practice. 1 Cor. xv. 33. Eph. iv. 29. The communication of faith is an account of it, and of its inward fruits to others, or a manifestation of it by good works, for the advantage of others; rather acts of beneficence flowing from faith. Philemon 6.

COMMUNION. See FELLOWSHIP.

COMPACT; regularly framed and joined. Psal. cxlii. 3. The church is compact together; every member has his own proper station and work, and yet all are so joined as to add to her general glory and welfare. Eph. iv. 16. Col. ii. 19.

COMPANION; (1.) Familiar friend. Judg. xv. 22. (2.) A copartner in office, grace, labour, suffering, or consultation. Ezra iv. 7. Sol. Song viii. 13. Acts xix. 29. Phil. ii. 25. Heb. x. 33. False teachers, and corrupt insts, are Christ's companions, or rivals; they often pretend to be friendly to and familiar with him, and attempt to share our love and affection due to him. Sol. Song i. 7.

COMPANY; a number of persons. Psal. lxxviii. 11. To company, accompany, or go in company with, is to go along with one, and often to be familiar with him. 1 Cor. v. 9, 11. Job xxxiv. 8. Psal. lv. 14.

COMPARE, LIKEN; (1.) To reckon alike or equal. Psal. lxxxix. 6. (2.) To make like. Sol. Song i. 9. Jer. vi. 2. (3.) To set things together, in order that the likeness or difference may clearly appear. 1 Cor. ii. 13. Judg. viii. 2. It is not wise to compare ourselves with our opposers or friends; as not they, but the law of God, is the proper standard by which we ought to judge ourselves. 2 Cor. x. 12.

COMPASS; (1.) To go round about a place; to guard or beset it on every side. Psal. v. 12. (2.) To furnish plentifully, till one be, as it were, surrounded therewith. Heb. xii. 1. Psal. xxxii. 7. The Virgin Mary compassed a man, when she conceived, retained in her womb, and brought forth the Son of God in our nature. Jer. xxxi. 22. Men compass God, when they, in multitudes assenible to praise and worship him. Psal. vii. 7. They compass him with lies, when, in their worship, they deal hypocritically and deceitfully; confess what they do not really believe sinful; ask what they do not really desire; vow what they never intend to perform; profess what they do not believe with their heart; and when they multiply idols in his land. Hos. xi. 12.

COMPASS. (1.) An instrument for drawing a circle. Isa. xlv. 13. (2.) A boundary. Prov. vii. 27. (3.) A circuitous course. 2 Sam. v. 23.

COMPASSION, PITY; sympathy and kindness to such as are in trouble. 1 Kings viii. 50. God's being full of compassion imports the infinite greatness of his tender mercy and love, and his readiness to comfort and relieve such as are afflicted. Psal. lxxviii. 38; lxxxvi. 15; cxi. 4. and cxlv. 8.

COMPEL; (1.) To force violently. Lev. xxv. 39. Matt. v. 41. (2.) To urge earnestly, and with success. 1 Sam. xxviii. 23. Ministers compel sinners to come in to Christ's house, when, with the utmost earnestness and concern, they show them their sinfulness and danger: the excellency, love, and loveliness, of Christ; the happiness of those who receive him; their warrant, and the command of God to believe in him, and beseech them, as in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God. Luke xiv. 23.

COMPLAIN; to find fault with an action or condition. Num. xi. 11. Acts xxv. 7. I will leave my complaint on myself; I will secretly bemoan my own guilt and trouble. Job x. 1.

COMPLETE; fully finished. Lev. xxiii. 15. Saints are complete in Christ; they are perfectly justified, and have in him complete fulness of grace to render them perfectly holy and happy. Col. ii. 10. They stand complete in all the will of God, when they regard all his commandments, and obey them in an eminent degree. Col. iv. 12.

COMPOSITION; a mingling of several spices, or other ingredients. Exod. xxx. 32.

COMPOUND; to mix together. Exod. xxx. 25—33.

COMPREHEND; (1.) To enclose. Isa. xl. 12. (2.) To sum up. Rom. xiii. 9. (3.) To perceive clearly; understand fully. John i. 5. To comprehend, with all saints, the unbounded love of Christ, is to have a clear, extensive, and heart-ravishing knowledge of its nature and effects. Eph. iii. 18.

CONCEAL; to hide; keep secret. Gen. xxxvii. 26. Job concealed not the words of God; he openly professed his adherence to divine truth, and in every proper method improved it for the instruction of others. Job vi. 10. A faithful spirit conceals the matter; he hides his neighbour's infirmities. Prov. xi. 13. A prudent man concealeth knowledge; he has more knowledge in his heart than he pretends to. Prov. xii. 23. It is the glory of God to conceal a thing; by sovereignly and wisely hiding from men the knowledge of some things, and the reasons of his conduct, he displays his own glory and greatness. Prov. xxv. 2.

CONCEIT; fancy; proud thoughts. Prov. xviii. 11.

CONCEIVE; (1.) To begin to be with young. Gen. xxx. 38. (2.) To devise; pur-pose; form designs and counsels in the mind. Acts v. 4. Isa. xxxiii. 11. Job xv. 25. The church conceives the saints, when, by means of ordinances, ministers, or others, the first beginnings of grace are formed in them. Sol. Song iii. 4. Lust conceives, when it produces the first motions or resolutions toward sinful acts. James i. 15. To conceive mischief, a mischievous purpose, or words of falsehood, is to devise and fix on a method for executing mischief, or for uttering words of falsehood. Job xv. 35. Isa. lix. 13. Jer. xlix. 30.

CONCERN; to touch; belong to. Ezek. xii. 10.

CONCISION; cutting off. Joel iii. + 14. The Jews are called the concision, because, under pretence of zealous adherence to circumcision, they, after it was abolished by our Saviour's death, cut their bodies, rent the church, and cut off themselves from the blessings of the gospel. Phil. iii. 2.

CONCLUDE; (1.) To end a dispute by a plain inference from what had been said. Rom. iii. 28. (2.) To make a final resolution or determination. Acts xxi. 25. (3.) Irrevocably to declare. Gal. iii. 22. God concluded the Jews in unbelief; he gave them up to their own unbelieving hearts, and withheld the light and influence of the gospel from them. Rom. xi. 32.

CONCLUSION; the end, the summary inference, final determination, and whole substance. Eccl. xii. 13.

CONCORD; agreement. 2 Cor. vi. 15.

CONCOURSE; running together. Acts xix. 40.

CONCUBINE; a wife of the second rank. She differed from a proper wife, in that she was not married by solemn stipulation; she brought no dowry with her; she had no share in the government of the family; nor did her children share of the father's inheritance. Gen. xxv. 6. Through a sinful mistake of the nature of marriage, it was common for the ancients to have concubines. Abraham had Hagar and Keturah, Jacob had Zilpah and Bilhah. Gen. xxv. 6. and xxx. A Levite's concubine occasioned terrible disorder and ruin in Israel. Judg. xix—xxi. One of Saul's occasioned the loss of the kingdom of the eleven tribes to his family. 2 Sam. iii. David's ten concubines were publicly defiled by Absalom his son. 2 Sam. xvi. 22. Solomon had three hundred concubines; and Rehoboam his son sixty. 1 Kings xi. 3. 2 Chron. xi. 21. The four score concubines, Sol. Song vi. 8. may denote great beauties among women; or weak saints of a very legal temper, who have small familiarity with Christ, and little boldness towards him.

CONCUPISCENCE. (1.) The corruption of our nature, from whence all actual sin proceeds. Rom. vii. + 7. James i. + 14. (2.) Actual motions and inclinations of our heart toward sinful deeds. Rom. vii. 8. (3.) Unchastity, especially of desire. Col. iii. 5. 1 Thess. iv. 5.

CONDEMNATION. (1.) The judicial declaring of a person to be guilty, and sentencing him to punishment. In this sense, Christ did not condemn the woman taken in adultery, but spoke to her as a gospel-minister and Saviour, calling her to repentance. John viii. 10, 11. (2.) The cause and reason of such a sentence. John iii. 19. (3.) The punishment to which one is condemned. 1 Cor. xi. 22. Lake xxiii. 40. (4.) Rash, uncharitable, and unjust censures of men's persons, purposes, words, or actions. Luke vi. 37. (5.) A witnessing against sin, by a contrary practice: so the Ninevites, by their ready hearkening to the warning of Jonah, condemned the Jews who refused to embrace Christianity, though often called to it by Jesus and his apostles, and though it was attested by miracles unnumbered. Matt. xii. 41. The condemnation of the devil, is a sin and punishment like to his. 1 Tim. iii. 6. The condemnation which all wicked men are under, and all believers free from, is a legal charge of iniquities; and the sentence of the divine law, as a broken covenant, adjudging them to bear the wrath of an angry God till their sins be fully satisfied for, and all the infinite wrath contained in that sentence be fully executed. Rom. v. 16, 18. and viii. 1. God condemned sin in the flesh of his Son; by executing the punishment due to it upon him in our nature, he clearly demonstrated how abominable and criminal it is, expiated its guilt, and adjudged to utter ruin its power, pollution, and existence. Rom. viii. 3.

CONDESCEND; humbly to stoop. Rom. xii. 16.

CONDITION. (1.) A term of a bargain to be performed. Luke xiv. 32. 1 Sam. xi. 2. Strictly taken, a condition of a covenant is that which, when performed, gives the performer a right to claim the promised reward, as due to his work. (2.) A case or circumstance. Dan. xi. + 17.

CONDUCT; to guide in a proper way. 2 Sam. xix. 15, 31.

CONDUIT; a water-course, whether by pipes, stone-work, ditch, &c. 2 Kings xviii. 17.

CONFECTION; a medicinal composition of gums, powders, &c. Exod. xxx. 35.

CONFECTIONARIES; makers of sweetmeats. 1 Sam. viii. 13.

CONFEDERACY; a covenant-agreement between princes or nations. Isaiah was forbidden to say, A confederacy; he was neither to approve nor trust in the alliance between Ahas and the Assyrians, nor to be afraid of that between the Israelites and Syrians. Isa. viii. 12.

CONFEDERATE; in league or covenant. Gen. xiv. 13.

CONFER; to talk together; advise with. 1 Kings i. 7.

CONFESS; plainly to acknowledge; so an accused party confesses his crime before a judge. Josh. vii. 19. Jesus Christ will confess his people at the last day; will publicly own them his children, bride, and faithful servants. Luke xii. 8. They confess him before men, when notwithstanding danger and opposition, they openly profess and adhere to his truth, observe his ordinances, and walk in his way. Matt. x. 32. To confess God, is to praise and thank him. Heb. xiii. + 15. To confess sin, is candidly to acknowledge our guilt before God who can pardon or punish us; or to our neighbour whom we have offended, or who can give us proper instruction and comfort. Psal. xxxii. 5. James v. 16. Matt. iii. 6.

On the tenth day of the seventh month, the Jewish high-priest confessed the sins of the whole nation over the head of the scape-goat, which typically bore them into the wilderness. Lev. xvi. 21. During the ten preceding days, it is said, the Jews made particular confession each of his own sins: if they were breaches of the first table, they confessed them only to God; if they were breaches of the second, they confessed them also to the party wronged. When a criminal was come within ten cubits of the place of execution, he was obliged to confess his crimes, and beg that his death might expiate them. At the beginning of the year, the modern Jews confess their sins, standing in a tub of water: some of them, when sick, confess them to a Rabbin, who marks them down in an alphabetic order. On their death-beds, they confess them with a great deal of vain ceremony, much in the manner of the Papists.

CONFIDENCE; (1.) Assurance; certainty. 2 Cor. viii. 22. (2.) Boldness; courage. Acts xxviii. 31. (3.) Trust, hope. Job iv. 6. (4.) The thing in which one trusts. Jer. xlviii. 13. (5.) Succour; help. 2 Kings xviii. 19. (6.) Safety; security. Ezek. xxviii. 26. (7.) Due resolution. 2 Cor. x. 2. (8.) A bold and open profession of Christ and his truth. Heb. x. 85. (9.) A well-grounded persuasion of God's accepting our persons, and hearing our prayers. Eph. iii. 11.

CONFIDENT; bold; assured. Ps. xxvii. 3.

CONFIRM; (1.) To strengthen; establish. 1 Chron. xiv. 2. Acts xiv. 22. (2.) To make sure, ratify. Ruth iv. 7. (3.) To give further evidence of the certainty of. 2 Cor. ii. 8. 1 Kings i. 14. Phil. i. 7. (4.) To refresh; encourage. Psal. lxxviii. 9. (5.) To fulfil; continue to perform. Dan. ix. 12. Deut. xxvii. 26. God confirmed the covenant to Abraham, when he repeated the intimation of it; added his oath to it; and by fire and darkness marked the truth of it. Gal. iii. 17. Gen. xv. and xvii. God confirms the promises, in fulfilling the principal ones of the incarnation, death, and resurrection of his Son; and in showing to our faith the absolute certainty of them all. Rom. xv. 8. He confirms the saints, when he refreshes, strengthens, and encourages them under fainting and weakness. 1 Cor. i. 8. He confirmed Israel to himself, when he renewed his covenant with them, and heaped distinguished favours on them. 2 Sam. vii. 24. The testimony of Christ is confirmed in his people, when the power and certainty of his truth are spiritually felt in their heart, and manifested in their practice. 1 Cor. i. 6. He shall confirm the covenant with many for one week; either Jesus by the ministry of John Baptist, and his own and apostles, shall, for about seven years before his death, bring many into the bond of the new covenant; or, in about the same space, before the destruction of Jerusalem, shall Titus make or confirm leagues with a variety of eastern princes. Dan. ix. 27.

CONFISCATION; a punishment whereby a man's goods are taken from him, and appropriated to the king's use. Ezra vii. 26.

CONFLICT; (1.) Warlike struggle or stroke. Psal. xxxix. + 10. (2.) Persecution; distress. Phil. i. 33. (3.) Deep concern, care, and anxiety to promote one's good. Col. ii. 1.

CONFORMED; made like. Rom. xii. 2. The saints are conformed to Christ; they are made like him in their new-covenant relations to God; and in their privileges, graces, and holy conversation. Rom. viii. 29. They are conformable or like to him in his death; they gradually die to their corrupt lusts; have their old man crucified with him; its lusts and deeds mortified through the influence of his death; and they are exposed to sufferings for his sake. Phil. iii. 10. They ought not to be conformed to this world; ought not to imitate or join in the vain and wicked customs and practices thereof. Rom. xii. 2.

CONFOUND; (1.) To disorder; jumble together. Gen. xi. 7. (2.) Mightily to baffle and confute. Acts ix. 22. (3.) To be ashamed and vexed for sin or disappointment. Ezek. xvi. 63. Job vi. 20. (4.) To be perplexed, astonished, and troubled in mind. Acts ii. 6. (5.) To be fearfully destroyed. Jer. i. 17. Zech. x. 5. He that believeth shall not be confounded; he shall not be disappointed of his expected salvation; shall not, with perplexity or surprise, be exposed to any fearful destruction; nor shall he make haste; shall not basely catch at unlawful means of deliverance, but patiently wait, till God deliver him. 1 Pet. ii. 6. Isa. xxviii. 16. Rom. ix. 33.

CONFUSION; huddling of things together; perplexity; disorder; shame; ruin. Isa. xxiv. 10. Psal. xxxv. 4. Unnatural intimacy with beasts, or of a man with his daughter-in-law, is confusion; is an horrid and shameful blending of natures, or persons, which ought to be kept distinct. But the word TEHEL might be translated, A shocking crime. Lev. xviii. 25. and xx. 12. Idols, and the Egyptians, were the confusion of the Jews; were the means or occasion of bringing them to shame, disorder, perplexity, and ruin. Isa. xli. 29. and xxx. 3. Confusion of face denotes perplexity and shame, which make one doubtful, or to blush to look any where. Ezra ix. 7.

CONGEAL; to freeze together. The waters of the Red sea stood up as firmly on every hand of the Israelites, as if they had been frozen into walls of ice. Exod. xv. 8.

CONGRATULATE; to express joy to or with one for some happiness that has befallen him. 1 Chron. xviii. 10.

CONGREGATION; an assembly; church. The Israelites having encamped together forty years in the wilderness, and met thrice every year at their solemn feasts, are called the congregation. Lev. iv. 15. And the congregation of the Lord; as they were peculiarly related to, dependent on, and subject to the Lord Christ, and to God in him. Num. xxxi. 16. To be cut off from the congregation, was to be removed from among the Hebrews by death, or to be excommunicated from their sacred privileges. Num. xix. 20. The congregation, from which the Egyptians and Edomites were excluded till the third generation, and the Ammonites, Moabites, and bastards for ever, probably was no more than the assemblies of Jewish rulers; for it is hard to suppose that bastards, however pious, and Ammonites and Moabites, though real proselytes were perpetually excluded from sacred privileges.

The great congregation, in which Jesus Christ declared his Father's faithfulness, and praised him, is the multitudes to which he preached on earth, or his church in general. Psal. xl. 9, 10, and xxii. 22. In the congregation of the dead, is among unregenerate or damned sinners. Prov. xxi. 16. Sometimes this word denotes an assembly of rulers, convened for judgment, Num. xxxv. 12; and sometimes an assembly, as distinguished from their chief rulers. Josh. ix. 18.

CONQUER; TO OVERCOME; SUBDUER.

(1.) To prevail against; take away the strength, and bring down the power of enemies. Dan. vii. 24. Mal. iv. 3. (2.) To bring into obedience and subjection. Phil. iii. 21. 1 Cor. xv. 26. (3.) To cultivate; rule over. Gen. i. 28. Jesus Christ overcame the world, by his death, and the exercise of his power; he prevailed against Satan, the god of it, and took him captive; in himself he prevailed over every temptation, arising from its smiles of prosperity, or frowns of adversity; by his powerful word and Spirit, he reforms men from their lusts and wicked customs thereof; by his providence he cuts off the incorrigibly wicked; curbs their outrages, and makes their wrath conduce to his praise. John xvi. 33. Rev. xvii. 14. He goes forth conquering and to conquer. In the apostolic and after ages, he did, or shall, by his word and Spirit, bring down the power of men's sinful lusts, and render themselves obedient and subject to his law. Rev. vi. 2. He subdues iniquity, when, by removing its guilt, applying his word, and conveying his grace, he gradually takes away the power of it in his people. Mic. vii. 19. The saints overcome Christ with their eyes; their exercise of faith, hope, love, and desire on him makes him delight to do them good. Sol. Song vi. 5. They overcome through his blood, and the word of their testimony; by a vigorous application of his righteousness to their conscience, by the working of his Spirit through the word of his truth, professed by them, they prevail over their own lusts, over the temptations of Satan, and the allurements and frowns of an evil world. Rev. xii. 11. and iii. 5, 12, 21. 1 John ii. 13, 14. and v. 4, 5. They overcome evil with good, when, by rendering good for evil, they make those who have injured them to be ashamed and grieved for so doing. Rom. xii. 21. In all their tribulations, the saints are more than conquerors through Christ: by his grace and presence, they overcome them most certainly easily, and quickly; they patiently bear them, rejoice in them, and gain much advantage by them. Rom. viii. 37. Sinful lusts and corruptions overcome the wicked; notwithstanding of conviction, resolution, and danger, they instigate them to take pleasure in and work wickedness. 2 Pet. ii. 19, 20.

CONSCIENCE; that reflecting power of our mind which compares our qualities and actions with the law of God known to us, and approves what appears good, and condemns and upbraids for what appears evil. Rom. ii. 15. Conscience is good, when, being sprinkled with Christ's blood, it clearly discerns the will of God, and urges obedience to his law, from gospel-motives, and approves for the same. 1 Tim. i. 5. It is pure, purged from dead works, when, by the application of Christ's blood, it is freed from the sentence of death due to sin, delivered from the slavery of indwelling corruption; and, by the instruction of the Holy Ghost, is rendered clear in its views, holy in its aims, and a vigorous opposer of every thing sinful. 1 Tim. iii. 9. Heb. ix. 14. and x. 2, 22. It is faithful, when it approves and condemns things, as they agree with or are contrary to the divine law; and powerfully restrains from every known sin. Rom. ii. 15. It is quiet and void of offence, when it does not accuse for any wilful breach of the divine law; and to live in all good conscience, is to behave agreeably to the dictates of a well-informed conscience. Acts xxiv. 16. and xxiii. 1. Heb. xiii. 19. It bears witness by the Holy Ghost, when, by his direction, it attests the state of the soul, or the integrity and truth of our concern and ends. Rom. viii. 16. and ix. 1.—Conscience is evil, when it is influenced by sinful habits, or base motives. Heb. x. 22. It is defiled, when it is blinded and perverted, ready to call good evil, and evil good. Tit. i. 15. It is seared with a hot iron, when it is not affected with the promises, precepts, threatenings, or providences of God, nor burdened with the sin that lies on the person. 1 Tim. iv. 2. To do a thing for conscience' sake, is to do it that conscience may not be defiled or offended. Rom. xiii. 5. To eat things offered to idols with conscience of the idol, is to eat them with a reverential regard to the idol, as if we were persuaded it had some divinity or value in it. 1 Cor. viii. 7. But conscience being only God's deputy-governor in men, its dictates are binding, only so far as agreeable to the law of God. Neither when sound, nor when erring, does it become a God, who can stamp his will into indispensable laws.

CONSECRATE; DEDICATE; DEVOTE; solemnly to set apart a person or thing to the service of God. In the circumcision of, and covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; in their passing through the Red sea; in their appearance before and covenant-transaction with God at Mount Sinai; in the solemn dedication at Ebal and Gerizim, the whole Hebrew nation were consecrated to be the peculiar people and servants of God. Gen. xvii. Exod. xiv. and xix—xxiv. Dent. v. xxvi. xxvii. and xxix. To commemorate the destruction of the first-born of the Egyptians, the first-born of Israel, man and beast, were consecrated to be the Lord's. Exod. xiii. By washing, offering of sacrifices, and sprinkling of oil or blood, were the Levites, in room of the first-born, and the priests, and the tabernacle, temple, and sacred furniture, consecrated to the ceremonial service of God. Numb. i. 49; iii. 10. and viii. Exod. xxviii. and xxix. Numb. vii. 2 Chron. ii. 4. and vii. 9. Ezra vi. 16, 17. The tithes and first-fruits were really, but less solemnly, dedicated to the service of God. The Jews dedicated their houses, and even the walls of their city; probably this was done with prayer and thanksgiving. Dent. xx. 5. Neh. xii. 27. Joshua dedicated the Gibeonites, and the silver and gold of Jericho. Josh. vi. 19. and ix. 27. Not a few consecrated themselves to serve God in the form of Na-zarites, or Nethinims. Numb. vi. Manoh devoted Samson his son, and Hannah, Samuel her son. Judg. xiii. 1 Sam. i. 11, 22. Many dedicated their money, fields, and cattle to the Lord. Lev. xxvii. Moses, Samuel, Saul, David, and his successors, and other warriors, dedicated part of the spoil they took in battle. Numb. xxxi. 28-54. 1 Chron. xxvi. 26-28. 1 Kings xv. 15. When Judas Maccabeus, about A. M. 3840, purged the temple, he solemnly dedicated it to its holy use, and appointed the feast of dedication to be yearly observed. John x. 22.

Did these consecrations denote the solemn separation of Jesus and his people to the service of God: and the solemn setting apart all blessings and honours, to be enjoyed by them? Jesus is consecrated for evermore; is irreversibly appointed and qualified by the Holy Ghost, to be the everlasting Prophet, Priest, and King of his church; and by shedding of his blood did he surrender himself and people to his Father's service. Heb. vii. 28. He hath consecrated for us a new and living way to God; solemnly opening it in his obedience and death for our advantage. Heb. x. 20. Ministers, saints, and all they have, are consecrated: by God's receiving them into their office or membership, and his imputing the righteousness of his Son, and endowing them with his Spirit, and by their own solemn vows, they are set aside to his service, honour, disposal, and government. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Ezek. xliii. 26. Mic. iv. 13. Isa. xxlii. 18. Types being now abolished, the solemn consecration of churches, church-yards, vessels for the administration of sacraments, &c. under the New Testament, has no warrant in the word of God, but is derived from the man of sin.

CONSENT; agreement. Hos. vi. 9.

CONSENT; to agree to a proposal. Gen. xxiv. 15.

CONSIDER; (1.) to think of. 2 Tim. ii. 7. (2.) To view, observe. Lev. xiii. 13. (3.) To resolve what to do, after deliberate thought on the affair. Judg. xviii. 14. and xix. 30. (4.) To remember and call to mind. 1 Sam. xii. 14. (5.) To think on a thing with wonder. Job xxxvii. 14. (6.) To think upon one with pity, and resolution to grant him relief. Psal. xli. 1. God considers men, in general, by a perfect knowledge and exact observation of their works. Psal. xxxiii. 15. He considers his people, in graciously observing and regarding their persons, prayers, and troubles, in order to deliver and bless them. Psal. v. 1; xiii. 3; ix. 13. and xxv. 19. We consider Jesus Christ by thinking on, observing, and admiring his person, offices, relations, undertaking, incarnation, life, death, resurrection, and glory, and applying him to ourselves in all these respects. Heb. iii. 1. We consider ourselves, when, with serious concern, and earnest care, we mark and ponder our own frailty, sinfulness, and danger of being led astray. Gal. vi. 1. We consider one another, when we charitably observe our brethren's tempers, circumstances, infirmities, and temptations, that we may accordingly excite and encourage them to their duty. Heb. x. 24.

CONSIST; (1.) To lie. Luke xii. 15. (2.) To be supported and held together. Col. i. 27.

CONSOLATION. See COMFORT.

CONSORT; to keep frequent and familiar company with. Acts xvii. 4.

CONSPIRACY. (1.) A conjunct plot of subjects against their sovereign. Absalom and his party conspired against David; the servants of Joash and Amaziah against them; Shallum against Zechariah; Pekah against Pekahiah; Hoshea against Pekah and Shalmaneser. 2 Sam. xv. 12, 31. 2 Kings xii. 20. xiv. 19. xv. 10, 25, 30. and xvii. 4. (2.) A deliberate rejection of God's authority by the Jews, and their false prophets. Ezek xii. 25. Jer. xi. 9. (3.) A conjunct plot of many to take away one's life. Acts xiii. 13.

CONSPIRE; to plot against the life of one, chiefly that of a rightful sovereign. 1 Sam. xxii. 8. Gen. xxxvii. 18. 2 Sam. xv. 31.

CONSTANT; steady; abiding firmly. 1 Chron. xxviii. 7. To do a thing constantly, is to do it with firmness, frequency, and perseverance. Tit. iii. 8. The man that heareth speaketh constantly; he who deliberately thinks before he speaks, speaks constantly, and firmly adheres to what he says, and will ever be admitted for a witness. Prov. xxi. 28.

CONSTELLATION; a cluster of stars. About 3000 visible stars, are classed into fifty-nine constellations, twelve of which are in the zodiac, or middle region of the firmament, twenty-three in the north part, and twenty-four in the south. Isa. xlii. 10.

CONSTRAIN; to urge powerfully; to oblige by force. 2 Kings iv. 8. Job xxxii. 18. The love of Christ constraineth us, or bears away; when applied to and believed with the heart, it most powerfully draws out our affections to him, and strongly and irresistibly influences us to a holy and active obedience of his law. 2 Cor. v. 14.

CONSULT; (1.) To plot or advise together. Psal. lxii. 4. (2.) Deliberately to consider. Luke xiv. 31. A consultant with spirits is one who converses with Satan, or uses means devised by him to obtain the knowledge of things secret or future. Deut. xviii. 11. One consults shame to his house, when he devises, and executes projects that issue in his and his friends' shame and confusion. Hab. ii. 10.

CONSUME; (1.) To waste; destroy utterly. Exod. xxxii. 10. (2.) To spend or squander away. James iv. 3. (3.) To vanish away. Job vii. 9. (4.) To make to pass away unhappily. Psal. lxxviii. 33. (5.) To burn up till the thing be utterly destroyed. Luke ix. 54. He, as a rotten thing consumeth, and as a garment that is moth eaten; God, by his providence, gradually wastes the man and his substance, and he is gradually brought to ruin. Job xlii. 28.

CONSUMPTION; (1.) A wasting ruinous stroke. Isa. x. 22. (2.) A consuming fire. Judg. x. xx. +40.

CONSUMMATION; the last period of time; the complete fulfilment of the threatening. Dan. ix. 27.

CONTAIN; (1.) To take in; hold. 1 Kings viii. 27. (2.) To peruse fully. John xxi. 25.

CONTEMN, DESPISE; slight; undervalue. Psal. x. 13. Job xxxvi. 5. We despise the chastening of the Lord, and the riches of his goodness, when we are unaffected with it, as coming from the hand of God, and are not thereby excited to consider our ways, turn from sin to Jesus Christ, as our Saviour, portion, and Lord. Heb. xii. 5. Rom. ii. 4. A vile person is rightly contemned, when we shew intimacy with him, and prefer the meanness of the saints to him. Psal. xv. 4. The glory of Moab was contemned, when their wealth, power, and honour, were rendered despicable. Isa. xvi. 14. He that despiset Christ's ministers, in contemning their person, slighting and mocking their instructions, or neglecting to follow their holy example, despiset Christ and his Father who sent them. Luke x. 16.

CONTEMPT; shame; disdain; slight. Job xii. 21.

CONTEMPTIBLE; pitifully mean; unworthy of regard. Mal. i. 7.

CONTEND; (1.) To strive. Jer. xviii. 19. (2.) To dispute earnestly. Acts xi. 2. Job ix. 3. (3.) To reprove a person sharply, in order to convince and reclaim him. Neh. xiii. 11. Prov. xxix. 9. Mic. vi. 1. (4.) To punish severely. Amos vii. 4. (5.) To fight. Deut. ii. 9. We contend earnestly for the faith, when, notwithstanding manifold suffering and danger, we are strong in the faith of God's truth contained in his word; zealously profess and practise it, and excite others to do so; and exert ourselves to promote the censure of scandalous and heretical persons. Jude 3.

CONTENTION is either sinful, when, with carnal affections, we strive with one another, Prov. xiii. 10; or lawful, when we eagerly promote that which is good, notwithstanding great opposition. 1 Thess. ii. 2.

CONTENT; satisfied in mind and desire. Gen. xxxvii. 27. Contentment, with godliness, is great gain; it renders a man's life easy, gives him pleasure in what he enjoys, renders him thankful to God, and meet to be a partaker of the heavenly glory. 1 Tim. vi. 6.

CONTINUE; (1.) To persevere; abide constantly. James i. 25. (2.) To manifest and bestow as formerly, or more abundantly. Psal. xxxvi. 10. (3.) Constantly to fulfil more and more. 1 Kings ii. 4. Men continue in Christ's word or doctrine by a constant perusal, believing, and practising of it, and in their station declaring it. John viii. 31. 2 Tit. iii. 14. They continue in his love and goodness, when they constantly exercise faith on it, and experimentally taste it, and return love to him on account of it. John xv. 9. Rom. xi. 22. They continue in his grace, in ever retaining the enjoyment of it; in exercising it, and displaying the power of it in their outward life. Acts xiii. 43. They continue in his law, by perseverance in their regard, love, and obedience to it. James i. 25. They continue in the faith by a constant holding of the doctrines of faith, and a perpetual exercise of the grace of faith. Col. i. 23. Acts xiv. 22.

CONTRADICT; to speak against. Acts xiii. 45. Without contradiction; most plainly and certainly. Heb. vii. 9. The contradiction of sinners, which Christ endured, was the vilest reproaches, taunts, blasphemies, and opposition to his doctrines and miracles. Heb. xii. 3.

CONTRARY. Grace and corruption in the saints are contrary; their nature, quality, and exercise, are destructive of one another. Gal. v. 17. We walk contrary to God, doing what is abominable to his nature, and opposite to his law; and he walks contrary to us, in fearfully punishing us for our sin. Lev. xxvi. 27, 28. The ceremonial law was contrary to men; it laid heavy burdens on them, presented their guilt to them, and of itself could do them no good, and was a means of excluding the gentiles from the church of God. Col. ii. 14.

CONTRIBUTION; a joint giving of money for the relief of the poor. Rom. xv. 26.

CONTRITE; broken; bruised; deeply affected with grief. Psal. xxxiv. 18. and li. 17. Isa. lviii. 15. and lxvi. 2.

CONTROVERSY; a plea; dispute. Deut. xvii. 8. The Lord has a controversy with men, when, for their wickedness, he might or does proceed to punish them. Mic. vi. 2. Hos. iv. 1.

CONVENIENT. The things not convenient, which the heathens were given up to, were vices contrary to the light and frame of nature, as sodomy, &c. Rom. i. 27, 28.

CONVERSANT; walking among, and dealing with. Josh. viii. 35.

CONVERSATION; the habitual manner of one's practice and behaviour. Gal. i. 13. The conversation of saints ought to be in Christ, and to be upright, orderly, sincere, becoming the gospel, heavenly, honest, without covetousness, chaste, good, holy, and tending to win men to Jesus Christ and his way. 1 Pet. iii. 16. Psal. xxxvii. 14. and l. 23, &c. The conversation of the wicked is vain; full of pride, and altogether unprofitable and filthy, flowing from filthy lusts, and consisting in filthy practices. Eph. iv. 22. 1 Pet. i. 18. 2 Pet. ii. 7.

CONVERT; (1.) To turn men to the church. Isa. lx. 5. (2.) To renew their heart, and turn them from the power of sin and Satan to God. John xii. 40. (3.) To recover one from a sinful fall and error. Luke xxii. 32. James v. 19, 20. In the renewing of men's hearts, God is the author; his Spirit implants spiritual knowledge, faith, love, and every other grace in the heart, as abiding principles of virtuous actions. Jer. xxxi. 18. His word is the means, with respect to adult persons, whereby he convinces of sin and misery, discovers the glory, excellency, and suitability of Jesus Christ, and conveys him and his grace into the soul. Psal. xix. 7. Ministers, fellow Christians, and even afflictions, are instrumental in producing this saving change. 1 Cor. iv. 15. Ezek. xx. 37. Converts, are believers, who have received Jesus Christ, as freely and fully offered to them in the gospel, as their Divine Teacher, Righteousness, Portion, and Lord. They are new creatures, who have Christ formed in them the hope of glory, and are changed in all their powers and qualities into the image of God; grow from one degree of grace to another; obey from the heart the doctrine of the gospel, and serve the living and true God. John i. 12. 2 Cor. v. 17, 18. Gal. iv. 19. 2 Pet. iii. 18. 2 Cor. iii. 18. Rom. vi. 17. 1 Thess. i. 9.

CONVEY; carry over, transport. 1 Kings v. 9.

CONVICT, CONVINCE; (1.) To persuade one of the truth of a thing. Acts xviii. 28. 1 Cor. xiv. 24. (2.) To prove one guilty and thoroughly persuade him of the truth and nature of his faults. James ii. 9. Job xxxii. 19. The Spirit convinceth men of sin, when, by applying the precepts and threatenings of the law to their conscience, he gives them an affecting view of the facts, nature, aggravations, and unhappy fruits of their sins. It is a sign that convictions are thorough and saving, when they chiefly tend to unbelief, and the corruption of nature, and are completed by a discovery of a crucified Redeemer. John xvi. 7, 8, 9. Rom. vii. 9—14. Zech. xii. 10.

CONVOCATION; a sacred meeting of multitudes for the solemn worship of God. On the Sabbath, on the day of the passover, on the first and seventh days of unleavened bread, on the days of Pentecost and expiation, on the first and eighth days of the feast of tabernacles, the Jews had their solemn convocations. Lev. xxiii. Num. xxviii. Exod. xii. 16.

CONY, or RABBIT; a furred animal, with a short tail. In our countries, conies are generally of a pale, brownish, grey colour on the back, and white on the belly, and have a very soft and useful fur; but our conies do not properly chew the cud, nor dwell in rocks, and so are not probably the SHAPHAN of scripture. Lev. xi. 5. Perhaps the SHAPHAN is the aljarbue, or mountain rat of the Arabs, which indeed chew the cud, dwell in rocks, and go forth by bands. Psal. civ. 18. Prov. xxx. 26. Dr. Shaw thinks the SHAPHAN to be the same with the Israel's lambs, which abound in Mount Lebanon, and are pretty like our rabbits.

COOK, one who dresses food for eating. 1 Sam. viii. 13.

COOL; to remove warmth. To cool the tip of one's tongue is to give the very smallest degree of ease from torment. Luke xvi. 24. A cool spirit is one submissive, patient, and not soon angry. Prov. xvii. 27. The cool, or wind of the day, is the time of the evening-sacrifice, a little before sunset: then Jesus first appeared to fallen men in Paradise, and then he expired for them on Calvary. Gen. iii. 8.

CO'OS; an island in the Mediterranean sea, at a small distance from the south-west point of Lesser Asia. The chief city of it was Coos, which was overthrown by an earthquake about four hundred years before Christ. Æsculapius, the god of physic, was their chief idol. The famed painter Apelles, and the no less famous physician Hippocrates, were natives of this island. A kind of silk trade began here very early, and served the immodest Roman ladies with a kind of gauze, through which their bodies sufficiently appeared. The Coans had kings of their own as early as the reign of Jehoshaphat, if not much earlier. They afterwards fell under the Persians, Pontians, and Romans. Paul sailed by this place in his voyage to Jerusalem; but it does not appear that there was a church here for some ages afterwards. In the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, we find a church settled in it: but since it fell into the hands of the Saracens and Turks, Christianity, and every thing else have made but a poor appearance. It is now called Stancora or Lango. Acts xxi. 1.

COPPER; a hard and heavy metal, and next to gold and silver, the most ductile into threads or wire. It consists of ill-digested sulphur, yellowish mercury, and red salt. It is found in stones of various forms and colours. Virgin copper is found pure, in grains, flakes, or lumps. Copper mingled with the Calamin stone becomes brass; and with fine tin it constitutes bell-metal. If copper be anointed with the spirit of wine and orpiment it becomes white. Ezra viii. 27.

COPY; a double of an original writing. Dent. xvii. 18. To copy out is to write a double from an original manuscript. Prov. xxv. 1.

COR, or CHOMER; a measure equal to ten ephahs, or 17,468 solid inches, which is forty-four solid inches more than the English quarter. Ezek. xiv. 14.

CORAL; a stony plant which grows in the sea, and which is no less hard when in the sea than when out of it. It cleaves to rocks by a root scarcely visible. It is of three general kinds: the black is the most rare and esteemed: the schite is of very small use; but the red is used in medicine, and for chaplets, beads, and other ornaments. Coral is fished in the Persian gulf, in the Red sea, on the African coast, near the Bastion of France, and near Marseilles, in the Mediterranean. The Syrians anciently brought coral from the south, and traded in it with the Tyrians. Ezek. xxvii. 16. However valuable it be, it is not to be compared to wisdom, to Jesus Christ, and his true religion. Job xxviii. 18.

CORBAN; a gift offered to the service of the Jewish temple. The Jews frequently devoted the whole or part of their goods, or even their persons, as a corban or offering to God. In their degenerate ages, if a man made a corban, or sacred oblation, of what should have maintained his wife, his father, or mother, they pretended that they owed them no subsistence; and sometimes, to ease themselves, they pretended to make a corban of their property, when they did not. Mark vii. 11. They sometimes swore by their corban, or gift. Matt. xxiii. 18; and called the treasury of the temple corban, because the presents were laid up in it. Matt. xxvii. 6. Gr.

CORD; a small ROPE, for binding or drawing, &c. Josh. ii. 15. The silver cord, that is broken at death, is the pith or marrow of the back-bone, which descending from the brain, goes down to the lowest part of the back-bone, and produces the various tendons, nerves, and sinews of the body. This is round as a cord, and white as silver; and by it the motion of the body is effected. Or may not this silver cord be the union between soul and body? Eccl. xii. 6. The cords of God, which wicked men cast from them, are his government and laws, which are uneasy to them as they restrain their liberty, and bind them to duties which they hate. Psal. ii. 3. He draws with cords of a man, and bands of love, when, with rational and gentle arguments, and with the discovery and application of his redeeming love, he, by his word, excites and inclines their souls to receive Jesus Christ, and obey his laws. Hos. xi. 4. The cords of a church or state, are her constitutions, laws, rulers, power, and wealth, which connect and establish the various parts of it; and by the ruin of the former of which, the church and the state are disordered or dissolved. Isa. liv. 3. Jer. x. 20. The harmonious society of friends is a three-fold cord, not easily broken; each contributes to strengthen and support the whole body. Eccl. iv. 12. The cords with which the Jewish sacrifices were bound to the altar, might represent God's command, Christ's love to sinners, and his surety-engagement for them, by which he was bound to continue in his debased and suffering state until, by his death, he had finished the atonement of our sins. Psal. cxviii. 27. The cords of sinners, are the snares by which they catch and ruin weak and innocent persons. Psal. cxxix. 4. and cxi. 5. The cords of sins are their corrupt lusts, and habits, the curse of God's law, and the punishment denounced by it, which hold transgressors that they cannot escape. Prov. v. 22. Men draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as with a cart rope, when, with unsubstantial pretences of pleasure, profit, and the like, they engage themselves and others to act wickedly; and, with all their might and diligence, endeavour to commit it. Isa. v. 18. Afflictions are cords; they restrain our liberty, and ought to draw us to God; nor can we free ourselves from them at pleasure. Job xxxvi. 8.

CORIANDER, according to Linnæus, is a kind of the pentandria digynia plants, the general corolla of which is perfum and radiated; the proper flowers of the disk are hermaphrodites, and composed of five unequal petals; the stamina are five simple filaments; the fruit is a roundish berry, containing two half round seeds, of an aromatic smell and pleasant taste. They are reckoned useful medicines in windy disorders, and the headaches occasioned by them. They are also useful to stop emorods and fluxes, and to discuss strumæ. The manna might be like coriander seed, in respect of its form; the two seeds together being about the bigness of a pea, with a smooth surface: but if Moses means that the manna was like the seed of GAD in whiteness of colour, it must be some other plant that is meant by GAD; for the seed of coriander is greyish. Exod. xvi. 31.

CORINTH; a famed city, the capital of Achaia, seated on the isthmus or neck of land which separates the Peloponnesus, or Morea, from Attica on the north, Lecheum on the west, and CENCHREA on the east, were sea-ports and distant suburbs, belonging to it. It is said to have been built by Sisyphus, the grandfather of Ulysses, about A. M. 2420: but, if he was the founder, it was probably built five hundred years later, in the days of Solomon. The citadel of Corinth, built upon an almost impregnable rock, made the place considerably strong; its situation between the two seas of Greece rendered it extremely wealthy. Riches introduced pride, luxury, and lewdness, to an astonishing degree. The most public and abominable prostitution of women was a part of the worship of Venus, their goddess; a thousand whores were consecrated to one temple. Until about A. M. 3300 or later, the Corinthians were governed by kings, and, for many ages afterwards, chiefly by an aristocracy. About A. M. 3724, this city acceded to the Achæan confederacy. Highly provoked with the Corinthians' insulting of the Roman ambassadors, who, after the conquest of Greece, had ordered the dissolution of that league, Mummius the consul, in A. M. 3858, took their city, and burnt it to ashes: the multitude of statues of different metals, melted and run together in the conflagration, composed the Corinthian brass, which was reckoned more precious than gold. About forty-six years before Christ, this city was rebuilt by Julius Cæsar, and peopled with a Roman colony. It quickly became the finest city of Greece.

About A. D. 52, Paul preached here eighteen months with great success, and amidst considerable persecution from the Jews; planted a Christian church here, which has continued, rising or declining till the present time. Soon after his departure from them, in A. D. 54, it seems that he wrote them a friendly letter, which was not inspired, and is now lost. 1 Cor. v. 9. 2 Cor. x. 10, 11. Various disorders and schisms quickly took place among them: some pretended to be followers of Paul, others of Peter, others of Apollos, and others of Christ. Their false teachers exceedingly decried the apostle Paul. He therefore, inspired by God, wrote them a large epistle; in which he rebukes their divisions; vindicates his own office and conduct; directs them to excommunicate an incestuous person; warns them to avoid law-suits before heathen magistrates, mutual offences, uncleanness, irregularities in marriage, or giving offence, in eating things offered to idols. He directs them to afford due support to their faithful pastors; and how to attend public worship, particularly the Lord's supper, with due reverence and order; and how to seek and use spiritual gifts; he then largely explains and vindicates the doctrine of the resurrection, which some among them doubted or denied; and directs them to make a collection for the poor Christians in Judea. This epistle had a very good effect on them. The apostle, therefore, wrote them another, in which he explains to them the substance, glory, and tendency of the gospel: gives them directions to receive the incestuous person, when sufficiently penitent; insists upon their having in readiness their collection for the saints of Judea; and, with boldness declaims against his wicked opposers, and vindicates the marks of his apostleship. Acts xviii. 1—17. 1st and 2d Epistles to the Corinthians.

About A. D. 268, the Heruli burned Corinth to ashes. In 525 it was again almost ruined by an earthquake. About 1180, Roger, king of Sicily, took and plundered it. Since 1458 it has been generally under the power of the Turks. The greater number of its present inhabitants are Christians of the Greek church.

CORMORANT, the water raven. It is a kind of pelican, and of the size of a goose. Its back is of a deep dusky brown, with some admixture of a greenish gloss; and its belly and breast are white; the long feathers of its wings are greyish; its tail is about the length of a hand-breadth and a half, and, when expanded, appears roundish at the end; its legs are black, thick, flattish, and covered with a kind of scales; its toes are joined together by a membrane, in the manner of those of a duck; its lower chap has its base covered with a naked yellow membrane. It builds on trees or in rocks, and lives on fish, and, with great violence, alights on them in the water; the SHELECH was unclean by the law. Lev. xi. 17. Deut. xiv. 17; but the KATH, Isa. xxxiv. 11. and Zeph. ii. 14. is the pelican. Psal. cii. 6.

CORN; wheat, barley, oats, rye, &c. After growing up in stalks, it forms into ears at the top, of different figures. Being cut down with the sickle or scythe in the harvest, it is bound into sheaves, and set up in shocks, that it may be sufficiently dried; then it is carried home to the barn-yard, or garner; and being thrashed out, and ground into meal, is a most strengthening food. The ancients, and some of the eastern people, still have their thrashing-floors under the open sky; here they sometimes thrashed out their corn, by running carts with low, thick, and iron-shod wheels over it. Isa. xxviii. 28. Sometimes they caused their cattle to tread it out, as its ears were bigger than ours. Deut. xxv. 4. They also thrashed it out by a kind of sledge with two rollers, which had rows of iron teeth, which cut the straw as a saw. Isa. xli. 15. Sometimes they beat it out with flails. After it was thrashed, it was winnowed, and ground in hand-mills, driven by asses or slaves. Matt. xxiv. 41.

A handful of corn sown on the top of the mountains, may denote Christ himself, the corn of wheat, as preached, or his gospel-truths and ordinances, dispensed by a few apostles and other preachers, in places spiritually barren to an eminent degree, and yet remarkably fruitful in the conversion of multitudes, and the production of much grace and many good works. Psal. lxxii. 16. The people of God rejoice as the corn; when watered with the rain of his word and Spirit, and warmed by the rays of the Sun of righteousness, they recover from spiritual decays, pleasantly flourish, and forebode a rich harvest of eternal blessedness. Hos. xiv. 7. Good men dying in old age are as a shock of corn coming in in its season; being fully prepared for death, they are carried by angels into the heavenly mansions. Job v. 26. Blessings, whether temporal or spiritual, are likened to corn, to denote their necessity and eminent usefulness for men's souls or bodies. Isa. lxii. 8. Ezek. xxxvi. 29. Hos. ii. 9. Zech. ix. 17. Manna is called corn of heaven; it fell from heaven, and sustained men's lives as corn does. Psal. lxxviii. 24.

CORNELIUS; a centurion belonging to the Italian band. He was a gentile by birth, probably of the Cornelii at Rome, but a devout man, perhaps a proselyte of the gate to the Jewish religion, and lived at Caesarea. While he was employed in solemn prayer and fasting, an angel appeared to him, assured him that God had accepted his prayers and alms, and directed him to send to Joppa for Simon Peter, that he might receive further direction in his religious concerns from him. He immediately sent off two of his servants to bring Peter. Peter was prepared for their invitation by a vision of mingled beasts, by which was signified to him that God had chosen to himself a people from among the gentiles, and therefore he ought to make no scruple in preaching the gospel to them, or of admitting them members of the Christian church; he, therefore, directed by the Holy Ghost, went with the servants, and in the afternoon of the following day came to Cornelius's house, who, with a number of his friends, waited his arrival. It seems Cornelius had supposed Peter might be the Messiah, and so fell at his feet to worship him; but was quickly checked by Peter's raising him up, and informing him that he was but a mere man. After Cornelius had told Peter his reason for sending for him, and that he and his friends were assembled to hear the word of God, Peter entertained them with a discourse concerning Jesus the Messiah, in his miracles, sufferings, and glorious resurrection, and of his sufficiency to save from sin. In the mean time, to the surprise of Peter's Jewish attendants, the Holy Ghost, in his miraculous influences, fell upon Cornelius and his gentile friends, and they spake with tongues. Upon Peter's suggestion they were immediately baptised. Cornelius detained Peter some days with him. At first the believers at Jerusalem were offended with Peter for baptizing the gentiles, but, on hearing the whole circumstances, they glorified God for granting them faith and repentance. This was the first noted gathering of the gentiles to Christ; and perhaps, at this very time, the sceptre departed from Judah. Acts x. and xi. Gen. xlix. 10.

CORNER. (1.) The utmost part of any thing, as of a country, robe, beard, building, altar, table. The corners, or four corners, of a land signify the whole of it. Num. xxiv. 17. Ezek. vii. 2. The Hebrews were forbidden to round the corners of their heads by shaving, or marring the corners of their beard, as the superstitious heathens did. Lev. xix. 27. (2.) An obscure part of a house or country. Prov. xxi. 9. Isa. xxx. 20. Acts xxvi. 26. The corner that came forth from Judah was either their chief rulers, who adorned and established their nation in the time of Nehemiah, the Maccabees, &c. compare 1 Sam. xiv. 23. Heb.; or rather Jesus Christ, who, as the chief corner-stone, connects, adorns, and establishes his church. Zech. x. 4. with Psal. cxviii. 22. Isa. xxviii. 16. The horns, and sprinkling of blood on the four corners of the altar, imported the equal access which all the ends of the earth have to salvation in Christ. Exod. xxvii. 2. Ezek. xiv. 19. The people of Samaria were taken out in the corner of a bed, and those of Damascus in a couch; they were reduced to great poverty, and, notwithstanding all endeavours to the contrary, were carried into a wretched captivity by the Assyrians. Amos iii. 12.

CORNET; a wind-instrument of horn, or like one for sounding in war, or at religious solemnities; but as SHOFAR is commonly rendered trumpet, I know not why it is ever rendered cornet. Hos. v. 8. but KEREN, or KARNAH, is very properly rendered cornet. Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10.

CORRECT. See CHASTEN.

CORRUPT. (1.) To waste; consume. Matt. vi. 19. (2.) To mar; make bad. 1 Cor. xv. 33. (3.) To disobey; pervert; improve wickedly. Mal. ii. 8. (4.) To defile; pollute. Exod. xxxii. 7. (5.) To entice from good, and allure to evil. 2 Cor. xi. 3. (6.) To bribe; make to dissemble. Dan. xi. 17, 22.

CORRUPT, what is bad, or tends to render any thing bad. Corrupt communication, is filthy and unsavoury converse proceeding from a wicked heart, and tending to defile others with sin. Eph. iv. 29. Corrupt words, are such as are flattering, and deceitful. Dan. ii. 9. Corrupt persons, are such as are biased by carnal interest, or sinful inclinations. 1 Tim. vi. 5. 2 Tim. iii. 8.

CORRUPTION. (1.) The abominable putrefaction or rottenness of dead bodies. Psal. xvi. 10. (2.) The blemishes which rendered an animal unfit for sacrifice. Lev. xxii. 25. (3.) Sinful inclinations, habits, and practices, which are hateful in themselves, and defile and ruin men. Rom. viii. 21. 2 Pet. ii. 12, 19. (4.) Everlasting ruin. Gal. vi. 8. (5.) Uncomeliness, as of a dead body. Dan. x. 8. (6.) Men in their mortal and imperfect state. 1 Cor. xv. 50. The mount of Olives is called the mount of corruption, because there Solomon built high places or temples for abominable idols, to gratify his heathenish wives. 2 Kings xiii. 18.

COTES; huts or houses to shelter sheep amid storms. 2 Chron. xxxii. 28.

COTTAGE; a mean hut or house for shepherds or poor people. Zeph. ii. 6. The daughter of Zion was like a cottage, and lodge in a garden, when the cities around were destroyed, and Jerusalem and the temple were on the point of being invested and ruined by the Assyrians. Isa. i. 8. The earth shall be removed as a cottage; easily did Nebuchadnezzar and Titus entirely overthrow and bring to ruin the Jewish state; and easily shall the Antichristian state be utterly destroyed. Isa. xxiv. 20.

COUCH; a bed, chiefly a mean one, that lies, or may lie, on the floor. Amos vi. 4. Acts v. 15.

COUCH, is, (1.) To lie down as on a small bed. Job xxxviii. 40. (2.) To lie low. Dent. xxxiii. 18. (3.) To yield to labour and oppression. Gen. xlix. 14.

COVENANT; an agreement between two or more parties, on certain terms. The obligation of all covenants arises from the self-binding act of the parties covenanting, even as the obligation of a law arises from the authority of the law-giver. Anciently covenants were made with great solemnity; beasts were slain with awful imprecations, that God might deal so with the breaker. The scripture alludes to the solemnity of killing a calf, and rending it asunder, and passing between the parts, in token of a solemn wish, that so God might rend in twain the breaker of the covenant. Jer. xxiv.

18. In covenants, there are the parties between whom the agreement is made; the condition which, when performed, gives right to claim the reward; the promise, which secures the reward to him who fulfils the condition; and if a party be fallible, a threatening is generally annexed, to deter him from breaking his terms. The Hebrew BERITH denotes choosing, or friendly parting; as, in covenants, each party, in a friendly manner, consented, and so bound himself to the chosen terms; and because of the cutting asunder of beasts on that occasion, the making of covenants is often called a cutting of them. In the New Testament, God's covenant is called DIATHESE, or testaments, as all its blessings are freely dispensed to us. Both words may, in general, be rendered an ESTABLISHMENT; and this signification will answer in every place where the words are found. In scripture, we read of a variety of covenants between men; between Abraham, Esau, Aner, and Mamre; between Abraham and Abimelech; between Isaac and Abimelech; between Jacob and Laban; between Jacob's family and the Shechemites; between Israel and the Gibeonites; between David and Jonathan; between Solomon and Hiram; between Asa and Benhadad; between Ahab and Benhadad; between Jehonida and the Jewish rulers; between Joash and his subjects; between Hoshai and the Assyrians and the Egyptians in their turn; between Zedekiah and Nebuchadnezzar, and others. Gen. xiv. 13. and xxi. 2. and xxvi. 28. and xxxi. 44. and xxxiv. &c. The Jews' covenant with death and agreement with hell, were their sinful leagues with the Assyrians or Egyptians, or their carnal dependence on the Romans, that made them as secure against hell and destruction as if they had been in alliance with them. Isa. xxviii. 15, 18.

When covenants are between men, each party has the power to accept or refuse the terms. But, when God is a party, it is inconsistent with his grandeur to have the terms proposed by a creature: nor is it possible, that what he proposes, can, without sin or self-injury be rejected. Immediately after the flood, God made a covenant of safety with Noah and his family, and the beasts of the earth, importing that the earth should never more be drowned with water, and that day and night, summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, should from age to age, return in their order. Of this the rainbow was the seal. Gen. viii. 21, 22. and ix. 9—17. Jer. xxxiii. 20, 25. He made a covenant of property with Abraham, importing that his seed should be very numerous, and have Canaan for their inheritance. This he confirmed to Isaac and Jacob; and of this, circumcision was the seal; for which reason it is called the covenant. Gen. xiii. 15—17. and xv. 18. and xvii. 4—9, 13. Psal. cv. 8—11. Neh. ix. 8. At Sinai, besides publishing the covenants of works and grace, to excite the Hebrews to flee from the one, and to seek salvation by the other, God made with the Hebrews a national covenant, importing, that he assumed them for his peculiar people, and gave them the peaceful and happy enjoyment of Canaan, on condition of their obedience to his laws. Exod. xix—xxiv. Deut. vi. 17—19. The commandments which required the condition, are called God's covenant. Dent. iv. 13. Psal. xxv. 10. The Jewish nation, or their religion, are called the holy covenant: the former were God's peculiar people, and the latter exhibited the whole substance of his covenants with men. Dan. xi. 28. The whole ceremonial service was a kind of seal of this national covenant. Exod. xxiv. Dent. xxvi. and xxvii. Just before the death of Moses and of Joshua, and in the days of Asa, Joash, Hezekiah, Josiah, Zedekiah, Ezra, and Nehemiah, this was solemnly renewed, and the Hebrews devoted themselves to the service of God: and in this the churches of Christ under the gospel ought to imitate them, as God gives opportunity. Dent. xxix. Josh. xxiv. 2 Chron. xv. and xxiii. and xxix. and xxxiv. Jer. xxxiv. Ezra x. Neh. ix. and x. Isa. xix. 18, 21. 2 Cor. viii. 5. God made a covenant of high priesthood with Phineas, denoting that, for his zeal in cutting off two impudent fornicators, he and his family should chiefly enjoy that office, till it should be abolished by the death and resurrection of Christ. Numb. xxv. 12, 13. God also made a covenant of royalty with David, importing, that he and his family should be kings and governors of the Hebrews till the Messiah should spring from his loins, and be the everlasting King of his church. 2 Sam. xvii. Psal. lxxxix. That these covenants did not immediately relate to eternal felicity; that they were typical of good things to come; and that most of them were not proper covenants, but mere promises, is evident to every careful inquirer. The covenants to which the gentiles were long strangers, and which long pertained to the Jews, were not only several of the above, but also the covenant of grace, which, in respect of its various intimations, and different dispensations to us in free promises, may be called the covenants of promise. Rom. ix. 4. Eph. ii. 12. Marriage is called the covenant of God, as therein, according to his will, persons bind themselves to one another, as in his presence. Compare Prov. ii. 17. with Mal. ii. 14.

The TWO COVENANTS, which relate to the everlasting happiness of mankind, are those of works and of grace. Gal. iv. 24. The covenant of works, as it was not between equals, but its whole terms were proposed by the sovereign Lawgiver, is often called the law, or law of works. Gal. iii. 10. Rom. iii. 27; vi. 14; vii. 4. and viii. 2. Gal. ii. 19. and iv. 4. In this transaction, the parties were God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as our Creator and Supreme Ruler, infinitely holy, kind, and condescending; and Adam, a holy and righteous man, perfectly able to keep the whole law, and as the common father and representative of mankind. It was made by the self-obligation of these parties. The condition was Adam's perseverance during his whole time of probation, in the most perfect and unspotted obedience to the whole law of God written on his heart, and to the positive law of forbearance from the forbidden fruit. The reward annexed to this obedience was the continuance of him and his posterity in such perfect holiness and happiness as he then had, while they remained upon earth; and the translation of them, in due time, to the celestial regions, where they should be forever blessed with the full enjoyment of a Three One God. The penalty threatened for the least breach of any command was an immediate sentence of condemnation, issuing in the spiritual death of the souls of him and his posterity, the temporal death of their bodies, and the eternal death of both soul and body in hell for ever. The seals of this covenant were the tree of knowledge, and the tree of life; if we may not also add, the Sabbath and paradise. That such a covenant was really made is evident. Here we find every requisite of a covenant; parties, condition, penalty, which includes the promise and seals. Gen. ii. 16, 17. and iii. Gal. iii. 10, 12. It is expressly called a covenant. Gal. ii. 24. Hos. vi. 7. marg. Adam is expressly compared with Jesus Christ, as our new-covenant head. Rom. v. 12—19. 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, 45, 49. Without the recognition of this covenant, it is impossible to account for the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity, in a way consistent with the justice of God; it is impossible to account for the imputation of his first sin, his one offence, more than of all his after transgressions; or for the imputation of his sin, more than of those of our intermediate ancestors. Rom. v. 12—19. 1 Cor. xv. 22. By Adam's eating of the forbidden fruit, which contained in it a most aggravated violation of every part of the divine law, this covenant was broken, and Adam and all his posterity thereby ruined. Gen. iii. Rom. v. 12—19. It were most absurd to imagine that this act of disobedience could annul the obligation of the divine law, or of the covenant-engagement to keep that law, or render men independent of God, and under no obligation to obey him. Man, therefore, now became at once obliged to perfect obedience, and to endure the whole penalty of the violated agreement. Adam was displaced from his honorary station of covenant-head, and he and all his posterity stood under the broken law, each bound for himself. Gal. iii. 10, 12. Thus dreadful was the case of mankind. Those represented in Adam behaved to be brought into existence in their respective order, according to the tenor of the covenant: nor could they be so without the immediate imputation of his first sin, and the divine curse in consequence thereof, subjecting them to spiritual, temporal, and eternal death. The demands of the law, in order to life, were become infinitely hard, and impossible for any creature. The corruption of every man's nature rendered him an outrageous enemy to God and his law: and the curse lying on his conscience, as with almighty weight secured him under the power of this corruption, as part of his punishment. Gal. iii. 10. Rom. v. 12—19. and viii. 7, 8. Eph. ii. 1—3, 12. 1 Cor. xv. 56. To add to his misery, the corruption of his nature, his pride and enmity against God, together with the impression of the curse on his conscience, powerfully impelled him to seek happiness by the works of the law, in opposition to any other scheme which God might reveal. Rom. ix. 31, 32. and x. 3. Gal. iii. 10. and iv. 21. Matt. xix. 16.

From eternity God foresaw our ruin, and before we fell, had settled the whole method of our redemption in a covenant of grace. Here indeed every Divine Person engaged to bear his share of the work; but the agreement was formally between the Father, as sustaining the sovereign majesty of the divine essence; a God, high, holy, just, infinitely offended with sin, and gracious to sinners; and his eternal Son, as our incarnate Redeemer, Surety, and atoning Priest, representing the whole number of men that were chosen to everlasting life. As it was inconsistent with the perfections of God to recover a sinner to the dishonour of his holy law, the Son of God was required, in our nature, to submit himself to the broken law, and fulfil every demand of its precept or penalty, as the condition of our eternal life. The infallibility of the Redeemer's person entirely excluded a penalty, as there could be no breach. But the promises of this covenant are exceeding great and numerous, all of them primarily made to him, and some of them immediately fulfilled on his person, and others on his chosen seed. The promise of preparation for and assistance in his work depended entirely on the free and sovereign love of God, the promised acceptance of and reward of his work in his glorious exaltation, and our eternal redemption, immediately depend on his fulfilment of the broken law in our stead. Psal. lxxxix. 3, 4. and xl. 6—8. Isa. lii. 13—15. and liii. Matt. iii. 15. Luke xxiv. 26. Phil. ii. 7—10.

To honour our Redeemer, to secure and reward our redemption, by him, the whole administration of the covenant is divinely committed into his hand, that he may dispense it to sinful men. In him, as Trustee thereof, hath God lodged the whole blessings of righteousness; the Spirit, justification, adoption, sanctification, comfort, and endless glory. John iii. 85. Col. i. 19. Matt. xi. 27. John xvii. 2. All these blessings he, as the great Testator, freely bequeaths to us sinful men, in the promises and offers of the glorious gospel. Heb. ix. 16, 17. Luke xxii. 29, 30. As our Advocate with the Father, he, by intercession, procures the execution of his latter-will; as Prophet and King, he reveals and applies the various blessings therein contained. John xvii. Heb. vii. 25. 1 John ii. 1. Acts iii. 22, 26. and v. 31. Rom. xi. 26.

Under the Old Testament, this covenant of grace was externally administered by promises, prophecies, sacrifices, circumcision, the passover, and other types and ordinances. Under the New, it is administered in the preaching of the gospel, baptism, and the Lord's supper; in which grace and salvation are held forth in greater fullness, evidence, and efficacy, to all nations. 2 Cor. iii. 6—18. Heb. viii. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. 1 Cor. xi. 23—28. But in both periods, the Mediator, the whole substance, blessings, and manner of obtaining an interest therein by faith, are the very same, without any difference. Heb. xiii. 6. Gal. iii. 7—14.

COVER; (1.) To hide. Prov. xii. 16. (2.) To clothe. 1 Sam. xxviii. 14. (3.) To protect. Psal. xci. 4. (4.) To veil. 1 Cor. xi. 6. (5.) To enclose. Exod. xxix. 18. God covers himself with a cloud, when he withholds the favourable smiles of his presence and providence, and manifests his just wrath and indignation. Lam. iii. 44. God covered the Jewish prophets, rulers, and seers, when he rendered them stupid, wretched, and contemptible. Isa. xxix. 10. God covers with a robe of righteousness, and covers sin, when, through the imputation of the Saviour's obedience and suffering, he fully and irrevocably forgives it. Isa. lxi. 10. Psal. xxxii. 1. Rom. iv. 7. Men cover their own sin, when they deny, excuse, extenuate, or defend it. Prov. xxviii. 13. Job xxxi. 83. Men cover the sins of others, when they forgive injuries done them, and hinder others' faults from being publicly known. Prov. x. 12; xii. 16. and xvii. 9. One's covering his own head, face, or lips, imports shame, grief, and perplexity. Jer. xiv. 3. 2 Sam. xix. 4. and xv. 30. Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22. and xii. 6. To have one's face covered by another, imports condemnation to death. Esth. vii. 8. Seraphim covering their face and feet with their wings, are angels and ministers unable to behold the brightness of the divine glory, that shines in the person and office of Christ; and blushing at their best works before him. Isa. vi. 2. To be covered with a cloud, anger, shame, confusion, horror, ashes, violence, is, through the anger of the Lord, to be reduced to a most wretched and shameful condition, and to be punished for oppression of others. Lam. ii. 1. Ezek. vii. 18. Hab. ii. 17. Obad. 10. Psal. lxxxix. 45. A man's mouth is covered with violence, when the obvious punishment of his oppression convinces and confounds him, that he has nothing to say for himself. Prov. x. 6. The waters cover the sea; they cover the bed or channel of the sea; or the fresh waters being lighter, cover the surface of the sea. Hab. ii. 14.

COVERING; veil; clothes; roof. Job xxvi. 6. and xxxi. 9. Gen. viii. 13. The Jews covered with a covering not of God's Spirit: they depended on the assistance of the Egyptians, contrary to the will of God. Isa. xxx. 1. The face-covering and veil spread over all nations, is the gross ignorance, and sentence of condemnation which lay on the gentile world. Isa. xxv. 7. He discovered the covering of Judah: God exposed their hypocrisy and wickedness; and the king of Assyria destroyed their armies, and demolished their walls. Isa. xlii. 8. He is a covering of the eyes to thee, and to all that are with thee; thy husband shall protect and govern thee and thy family; or, might not the words be translated, It, the thousand pieces of silver, shall purchase veils to thee, and all these with thee. Gen. xx. 16.

COVERT; (1.) A shady place. 1 Sam. xxv. 10. (2.) A thicker of trees or shrubs. Job xxxviii. 40. (3.) Shelter; protection. Psal. lxi. 4. The covert of the Sabbath, which Ahaz demolished, was a place in the court of the temple, where the royal family sat to hear the law on the Sabbath; or a shelter here erected, to defend the people in a storm. 2 Kings xvi. 18. He has forsoaken his covert as a lion; God has wrathfully forsaken his city and temple of Jerusalem; or rather Nebuchadnezzar has furiously marched from Babylon, his capital, or from his lodging at Riblah. Jer. xxv. 88. Jesus Christ is a covert to his people; by his blood, his love, his power, and providence, he covers their crimes and infirmities; protects them from the wrath of God, the dominion of sin, and the rage of devils and men. Isa. iv. 6. and xxxii. 2.

COVET; (1.) Sinfully and immoderately to desire earthly enjoyments, as honour, wealth, pleasure. Josh. vii. 21. (2.) To desire earnestly in a lawful manner. 1 Cor. xii. 31.

COVETOUSNESS, an inordinate desire of earthly things, or of what belongs to our neighbour. Covetousness is a vice that becomes stronger in old age, when other vices are weakened: it can never be satisfied; it renders men the abhorrence of God, cruel, oppressive, and unjust towards neighbours; and it betrays the man into sins and miseries unnumbered. Psal. x. 3. Mic. ii. 2. Dent. xvi. 19. Job xx. 15—17. Prov. i. 19. 1 Tim. vi. 10.

COULTER; that part of the plough which cuts the ground. It is generally of iron. 1 Sam. xiii. 30.

COUNCIL; a meeting of rulers, to decide pleas, and other affairs. John xi. 47. See SANHEDRIM.

COUNSEL; (1.) Advice. Dan. iv. 27. (2.) A secret purpose or thought. 1 Cor. iv. 5. God's counsel is, (1.) His purpose or decree. Acts iv. 28. Isa. xlv. 10. Psal. xxxiii. 11. (2.) His will and doctrine, concerning the way of salvation to sinful men. Luke vii. 30. (3.) The direction of his word, the teaching of his Spirit, and the guidance of his providence. Psal. lxxiii. 24. Rev. iii. 18. To stand in God's counsel, is to be familiar with him, and know his will and purpose. Jer. xxiii. 18, 22.

COUNSELLOR, is one who deliberates about affairs; especially such an one as kings used to advise with. Prov. xi. 14. Ezra iv. 5. Christ is called a Counsellor; with him his Father deliberately fixed the whole plan of our salvation; and he, possessed of infinite wisdom and knowledge, directs and admonishes his people in every case. Isa. ix. 6. God's statutes are the saints' counsellors, which they consult, and from which they receive direction in every hard and difficult case. Psal. cxix. 24.

COUNT; reckon; (1.) To number. Lev. xxiii. 15. Ezek. xlv. 26. (2.) To esteem; judge. Job xix. 15. (3.) To impute; place to one's account. Gen. xv. 6. Psal. cvi. 31. Rom. iv. 3. (4.) To reason with one's self, and conclude from arguments. Isa. xxxviii. 13. Rom. vi. 11. and viii. 18. (5.) To state an account with one. Matt. xviii. 24. See ACCOUNT.

COUNTENANCE; (1.) The face or visage. 1 Sam. xvi. 7. (2.) Love; favour. Gen. xxxi. 5. Belshazzar's countenance was changed, when, instead of cheerful, he looked sad and affrighted. Dan. v. 6. Cain's countenance fell, when he looked angry and surly. Gen. iv. 8. As by the countenance we manifest our love, hatred, grief, joy, pleasure, and anger; the lifting up, or shining of God's countenance, denotes the manifestation of his favour and love: and the hiding, frown, or rebuke of his countenance, denotes the manifestation of his anger in just judgments. Psal. xlv. 3. and lxxx. 16. Christ's countenance as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars, is his whole appearance in person, office, relations, and work, which is ever delightful and glorious. Sol. Song v. 15. The saints cause Christ to see their countenance, when, in the confident exercise of faith and hope, they come with boldness to his throne of grace. Sol. Song ii. 14. Thou shalt not countenance a poor man in his cause; thou shalt not unjustly pity and favour him on account of his poverty. Exod. xxiii. 2.

COUNTERVAIL; to make up the loss. Esth. vii. 4.

COUNTRY; REGION; (1.) A kingdom or province. Gen. xiv. 7. (2.) That part of a kingdom or province which lies without the limits of cities. Isa. i. 7. (3.) The people that dwell in a country. Matt. iii. 5. Heaven is called a country, in allusion to Canaan: how extensive its limits! how wholesome its air of divine influence! how wide its prospect! how numerous the privileges and inhabitants! And it is a better country, as its inhabitants, privileges, and employments are far more excellent than any on earth. Heb. xi. 14, 16. It is a far country, very distant from and unknown in our world. Matt. xxi. 23. and xxv. 14. Luke xix. 12. A state of apostasy from God, whether of men in general, or of the gentile world, is called a far country; it is distant from that in which we ought to be: in it we are ignorant of God, exposed to danger, and have none to pity or help us. Luke xv. 13. A state or place of gross ignorance and wickedness is called the region and shadow of death. Mat. iv. 16.

COUPLE; to join together. Exod. xxvi. 6. A COUPLE; two, a few. 2 Sam. xiii. 6.

COURAGEOUS; free from fear; full of boldness and hope. Josh. i. 7.

COURSE. (1.) The running of a stream; or the channel where it runs. Isa. xlv. 4. (2.) Motion; voyage; journey. Acts xxi. 7. (3.) Success; progress. 2 Thess. iii. 1. (4.) Order; proper station. Psal. lxxii. 5. (5.) Turn of service. 2 Chron. v. 1. (6.) Class of priests appointed to serve in a particular order or turn. Luke i. 5. (7.) Common manner or practice. Eph. ii. 2. (8.) The business appointed for one, whether ministers or others. 2 Tim. iv. 7. Acts xiii. 25.

COURT; (1.) An enclosed part of the entrance into a palace, house, or tent. Esth. v. 1. Jer. xxxviii. 6. The tabernacle had one court, the temple two, where the priests or Israelites assembled to worship God; which might represent the humble and exposed state of Christ and his people; and in allusion to which, the places of public worship, the ordinances of God, and fellowship with him therein, are called God's courts: and to dwell in his courts, is frequently to attend ordinances, and enjoy God in them. Psal. lxx. 4. lxxxiv. and xxxiv. 2. The court without the temple, left unmeasured, and to be trodden of the gentiles, is the outward state, civil establishment, and nominal professors of the Christian church.

given up to be abused by the Papists for 1200 years. Rev. xi. 3. (3.) COURT signifies a king's palace or household. Phil. i. 13. COURTEOUS; kind; affable. 1 Pet. iii. 8.

COW. See BULLOCK.

COZBI; a daughter of Evil, prince of Midian. She, with a number of her country-women, came into the camp of the Israelites to seduce them to uncleanness and idolatry; and being taken in the very act of adultery with Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince of the Simeonites, Phinchas thrust them both through the belly, at the moment of their infamous embraces. Numb. xxv. 6-15.

CRACKLING. The laughter of a fool, is like to the crackling noise of thorns burning; is senseless, base, and of short duration. Eccl. vii. 6.

CRACKNELS; a sort of hard cakes, or buns. 1 Kings xiv. 3.

CRAFT; (1.) DECEIT; guile. Dan. vii. 25. (2.) Trade; occupation. Acts xviii. 3. and xix. 25, 27.

CRAFTSMAN; one skilled in some mechanical trade. Deut. xxvii. 15. Acts xix. 24.

CRAFTY; cunning; deceitful. Job v. 12. 2 Cor. xii. 16.

CRAQ; the top or sharp point of a rock. Job xxxix. 28.

CRANE; a tall and long-necked fowl. Its beak is pretty long, but shorter than that of the heron. Its head is cristated, and almost bare. The claw of the middle toe is not serrated. Cranes are of three kinds. (1.) The common ones, whose weight is about ten or twelve pounds, and their length, from the toe to the beak, about five feet; their beak of a greenish black, and long and pointed; their wings large; their legs and feet black, with long toes; their wind-pipe runs far down their breast, and then returns at the same passage, and descends to the lungs. They live on grain, and their flesh is very delicate. (2.) The Indian cranes, which are smaller, but their beak longer, their tail short, and a rough red skin on the top of their head. (3.) Majorca cranes, having a crest like hog's bristles on the crown of their head. Cranes have a loud voice, and before winter remove with the storks, and return in the spring; but where they spend the cold season we know not. Ezekiel, in his sickness, chattered as a crane or swallow, sometimes complained aloud of his grievous pain, as a crane, and sometimes twittered, or peeped, as a swallow. Isa. xxxviii. 14. The Jews were more stupid than cranes, storks, and turtles; they knew not the proper season of duty. Jer. viii. 7.

CRASHING; a noise occasioned by treading down, breaking, or justling. The great crashing from the hills was the noise of the breaking down of the temple, or palaces, erected on hills, in Jerusalem. Zeph. i. 10.

CRAVE; earnestly to desire or request. A man's mouth craveth his labour: he is obliged to labour, that he may have wherewith to satisfy his craving appetite. Prov. xvi. 26.

CREATE; (1.) To make things from nothing. Gen. i. 1. (3.) To form things from unfit matter. Gen. i. 21. and ii. 19. (3.) To implant saving graces and endowments where they were not. Eph. ii. 10. (4.) To recover the heart from apostasy, and cleanse it from great pollution. Psal. li. 10. (5.) To bring things about in the course of providence. Isa. xlv. 7. (6.) To restore to vigour and flourish. Psal. civ. 30. The creation of all things from nothing happened about 4006 years before our common account. This being 1828, and added to the former, gives 5836 years in all. To give as an example of working six days, and resting on the seventh, and to render the order of his operation obvious to us, God employed six days in bringing his work of creation to perfection. On the first, He formed the general system of heaven and earth, and probably the angels. The earth was at first a rude mass, without form and beauty, and without inhabitants or product; the Divine Spirit, in his actuating influence, hovered over the dark surface of this deep chaos. By the word, the will, or eternal Son of God, light was formed and separated from the darkness, to make a succession of day and night. On the second day, God made a firmament, expansion, or atmosphere, to support the water in the clouds, and separate it from that which was below. On the third, He drained the water from the earthly parts of our system, and gathered it into seas, either in the bowels of the earth, or in such beds on the surface as he formed for it. On the fourth, He further collected the light, and formed the sun, moon, and stars, and appointed them their motions and use. On the fifth, He formed the fishes from water, and the fowls from a mixture of water and earth. On the sixth, He formed cattle, creeping things, and the body of Adam, out of the dust of the ground; and the body of Eve out of a rib taken from Adam's side: both Adam and Eve were in their formation endued with rational and immortal souls. Gen. i. Exod. xx. 11. Capellus and others would have the creation effected in the spring, the first day of it about the 11th of April. But as the most ancient heathens reckoned the beginning of their year from harvest, we do not know of any other reckoning till the Jews' departure from Egypt; and as the trees and herbs bore seed on the day of their creation, we are inclined with the great Usher and others, to think the world was created in harvest, but whether on the 22d day of October, as Usher, or about the first of September, as Scaliger and Spanheim, we shall leave undetermined, though the latter opinion appears the most probable. As Moses' account of the creation is very short, Descartes, Thomas Burnet, Whiston, Buffon, and others, have attempted a philosophical explication, if we might not rather say, a confutation of it, but as Moses' informer knew better how it was effected than any of these learned gentlemen, we shall not insert any of their fancies.

CREATION not only signifies the act of making things out of nothing, but also the creatures or things formed from nothing. 2 Pet. iii. 4. Rev. iii. 14.

CREATURE sometimes denotes all created things. Rev. v. 13; and sometimes only men, whom the Jews called the creature, by way of eminence. Mark xvi. 15. By the creature or creation, that waits for a glorious deliverance into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, some will have the Heathen gentiles meant; but how these were unwillingly made subject to the bondage of corruption, or how they waited and longed for a gospel deliverance, it is difficult to understand. Is it not more easy to represent the creature, or creation, to be the irrational part of our world, which, by the providence of God, is subjected to vanity for man's sin, and is often used instrumentally in wickedness, and which, at the last day, shall be perfectly delivered from this vile abuse. Rom. viii. 19–23. The implanted habit or principle of grace, and the man who possesses it, are called a new creature; it is formed from nothing by the almighty influence of the word and Spirit of God; it is quite new, and entirely opposite to the old principle of natural corruption. Gal. vi. 15. 2 Cor. v. 17.

CREDITOR; one to whom we owe a debt. 2 Kings iv. 1, 7. God is our creditor; to him, we as creatures, owe our existence, and all we have; to him, as sinners, we owe infinite satisfaction for our offences; and the more he forgives us, the more we ought to love him. Luke vii. 41–43.

CREEK; a small bay of the sea, where it juts into the land; or a corner of a harbour. Acts xxvii. 39. Judg. v. 17.

CREEP; (1.) To crawl on the ground. Gen. i. 20. (2.) To enter with subtlety and privacy. 2 Tim. iii. 6. Jude. 4.

CRESCENS; one of Paul's fellow preachers, who departed from him while he was at Rome, to go for Galatia, and perhaps carried the inspired epistle to that church. 2 Tim. iv. 10.

CRETE, or CANDIA; an island in the Mediterranean sea, a good way north of Egypt, and west of Syria, about 280 miles long, and fifty-five broad. It was very early peopled, probably by a number of the Philistines, who fled from Canaan in the days of Joshua; nay, perhaps the Caphtorim of Egypt had partly settled here in times still more ancient. Vast numbers of Greeks also took up their residence in this island, especially after the Trojan war. Crete contained one hundred cities, Gnosus, Cydon, Cortyna, Dictynna, &c.; but nothing rendered it more famous than the pretended education of Jupiter, a chief deity, there; and the laws of Minos, one of their kings. The inhabitants at first were famed for probity; but afterwards became more so for lying, deceit, sloth, gluttony, and lewdness. Anciently they were most expert slingers and archers, though now they appear to know nothing of that art. After the Cretians had been governed by a succession of eighteen kings, they were formed into a commonwealth. After they had continued in this form for several ages, and had never made any great figure, Metellus the Roman consul, about A. M. 3938, reduced them by a bloody war of two or three years. Crete continued subject to the emperors of Rome and Constantinople till about A. D. 823, when the Saracens seized on it. Not long after, the Greeks retook it. About A. D. 1203, Baldwin the Frank, emperor of Constantinople, gave it to Boniface earl of Montferrat, who sold it to the Venetians. They had not been masters of it much above 400 years, when the Ottoman Turks, after a twenty-four years' siege of the city Candia, became masters of the whole island, A. D. 1669. The gospel was very early preached, and a church planted here; Titus was appointed to ordain officers in it: and here Paul touched in his way to Rome. Ever since, there has been less or more Christianity in this place, though at present it is scarcely noted for anything at all. Tit. i. 5. Acts xxvii. 9, 21.

CRIB; a stall for cattle. Prov. xiv. 4.

CRIME; a fault that incurs punishment. Acts xxv. 16. Adultery is a heinous crime, in the view of the mildest judges, and punished by them. Job xxxi. 11. Bloody crimes are cruelty, oppression, murder. Ezek. vii. 23.

CRIMSON; one of the seven red colours. The KERMES, from whence crimson is derived, is a small round shell, thin, smooth, and shining, of a reddish brown colour, mixed with a white ash-colour, and about a quarter of an inch in diameter, and generally divided into two unequal cavities, the largest of which is filled with eggs exceeding red, and the lesser with red liquor. These shells grow on the branches of a shrubby green oak, found in Palestine, south of France, &c. When these shells are loosed from the leaves to which they hang, the worms formed therein come out at the hole made thereby, and by sifting are separated from the shells; and afterwards lightly pressed into balls of the bigness of a small hen-egg, and so kept till they are used for dying. 2 Chron. ii. 7, 14, and iii. 14. Isa. i. 18, and Jer. iv. 30. See SCARLET.

CRISPING-PINS; for curling the hair: but CHARITIM, may signify bags for the hair, or clasps. Isa. lii. 22.

CRISPUS; chief of the synagogue at Corinth; who was converted and baptized by Paul. Acts xviii. 8. 1 Cor. i. 14. about A. D. 52.

CROCODILE; a large animal of the lizard kind, supposed by some to be the leviathan of Job. Moses, in Lev. xi. 29, refers to an animal of this nature, which in Hebrew is called CHOLED, and translated by the Seventy, land crocodile; as it is by most other translators: but what led the translators of the English authorised version to render it tortoise, cannot be surmised. The crocodile so well known in Egypt is found in great numbers upon the banks of the Nile: their eggs resemble those of a goose; they deposit them in considerable numbers in the sand, and leave them to be hatched by the heat of the sun. The crocodile is covered with very hard scales, which cannot be pierced without great strength; but under the belly the skin is tender. It has a very wide throat; its teeth are sharp, and placed at equal distances from each other; those of the under jaw closing between those of the upper. Though its feet are disproportionately short, it runs with great swiftness, but turns itself with great difficulty, it being from twenty to thirty feet in length.

The crocodile is sometimes caught with hooks baited with hogs' flesh; it is also taken in pitfalls. The Egyptians worshipped this animal.

CROOKED; bowed; turning in and out. A crooked nation or generation are such as rebel against God, have their qualities, inclinations, and practices quite disagreeable to the even rule of his law, and unanswerable to their own profession. Phil. ii. 15. Deut. xxxii. 5. Crooked ways are practices and customs, unconstant, uncandid, uncomely, and disagreeable to the law of God. Prov. ii. 15. God makes men's lot or path crooked, when he inflicts on them changes from prosperity to adversity, or from one trouble to another, and renders their condition unsightly and disagreeable. Lam. iii. 9. Eccl. i. 15. and vii. 12. He makes crooked places straight when he removes every impediment, and renders a work easy to his agents. Isa. xiv. 2.

CROP; the craw of a fowl. Lev. i. 16. To CROP, is to cut off the top of a plant. Ezek. xvii. 4, 22.

CROSS: a sort of gibbet, consisting of two pieces of wood placed cross-wise, in the form of a T or X. That on which our Saviour suffered death, is said to have been of the former kind. The death of the cross was called crucifying. With the Greeks, and other nations, it was a common punishment. With the Jews it was not used at all, hanging on a tree being an execution of a different kind. With the Romans, it was reckoned a horrid crime to execute any of their citizens in this manner. It is therefore no inconsiderable proof of an overruling Providence to order matters so, that Jesus should suffer the death of the cross. It was a shameful, painful, and lingering death. First, the criminal was generally scourged with cords, often with bones at the ends. Next, he bore his cross, or part of it, to the place of execution. When he came thither, his clothes were stripped off, and, either before or after the cross was erected, his hands were sometimes bound, but usually nailed to the cross-beam, and his feet to the lower part. The nails driven through the most sensible parts of the body, and sustaining part if not the whole weight of the criminal, rendered the pain very exquisite. It is, however, said, a piece of wood between their legs often supported them. It was sometimes two or three days before the person expired: hence the legs of the thieves crucified along with Christ were broken, that their death might be hastened; and it was owing to the voluntariness of his death, and the impression of his Father's wrath on him, that Jesus so quickly expired. Sometimes persons were crucified with their head downwards. In this manner, it is said, Peter, to honour his Master's death, desired to be crucified. An inscription, representing the cause of the punishment, was written on a tablet, and placed on the top of the cross. It is observable, that the inscription of Christ, instead of charging him with a crime plainly hinted his innocence and Messiahship; nor could the heathen governor be prevailed on to alter it. Christ was crucified through the weakness of his humanity, but lives by the power of God; was raised from the dead, and lives for ever, by his own divine power. 2 Cor. xiii. 4. compared with 1 Pet. iii. 18. He is crucified a/resh, when his person or office is despised, hated, and blasphemed, or his righteousness and gospel utterly rejected. Heb. vi. 6. He is crucified at Rome, or in the Antichristian state, when his person and office are despised, his truth perverted, his righteousness blasphemed, and his people murdered. Rev. xi. 8. The saints are crucified with Christ; in his death he represented them, and, applied to their conscience, this renders them dead to the law, to sin, and to the world, and gradually effects the death of their indwelling corruptions. Gal. ii. 20. Their old man, or corrupt lusts, are crucified with him; the law, which is the strength of sin, being slain by his fulfilment of it; and by their union with his person, and sharing of the views and virtue of his dying love, their indwelling sin is gradually weakened, and they are enabled through the Spirit to mortify the deeds of it. Rom. vi. 6. Gal. v. 24. By him and his cross they are crucified to the world, and the world to them; by their professed cleaving to him, and the doctrine of his cross, they become contemptible to wicked and worldly men, and are separated from them: by cleaving to his person, and applying his righteousness to their consciences, their affections and love to the world are disengaged from it, and it is to them as a dead malefactor, that has murdered their soul, and caused them to dishonour their God. Gal. vi. 14.

The whole sufferings of Christ are called his cross; as on it he suffered in the most tremendous manner, in both soul and body at once. Eph. ii. 16. Heb. xii. 2. The doctrine of his sufferings is called his cross. 1 Cor. i. 18. Gal. v. 11. and vi. 12. Enemies to his cross are such as undermine the necessity or virtue of his righteousness, by their legal doctrine, worldly care, or licentious life. Phil. iii. 18. Troubles and afflictions, chiefly those endured for Christ, are called a cross; they are painful, lingering, and attended with shame in the view of carnal men: and to take up this cross, is cheerfully to submit to it, from love to Christ. Matt. xvi. 24.

CROSSWAY; the place where one way passes through another, and where, consequently, fugitives and travellers are most readily met with. Obad. 14.

CROUCH; to crouch towards the earth. The crouching of the wicked, in order to take the poor, signifies the low and base methods he takes to oppress him, and the hiding of his designs till he accomplish them. Psal. x. 10.

CROWN. (1.) The top of the head. Isa. i. 6. (2.) A cap of state, worn on the heads of sovereign princes, to mark their power and authority. 1 Chron. xx. 2. In allusion to this, our Saviour was crowned with thorns. John xix. 5. (3.) A cap given in reward to one who had been most active in taking a city, gaining a battle, or winning a game or dispute. Such crowns were often no more than of twigs of palm-tree, olive, laurel, ivy, &c. 1 Cor. ix. 25. (4.) A cap worn by persons on their marriage-day, and which, it seems, was put on by their mother. Sol. Song iii. 11. (5.) That blue ribband whereby the high-priest fastened his mitre on his head, and on whose golden plate, fixed to the forehead, was inscribed, Holiness to the Lord. Exod. xxviii. 36. and xxix. 6. (6.) Any thing that adds honour and glory to one. Thus the Lord was a crown of glory and a diadem of beauty to Judah; he protected, exalted, and reformed them, when the ten tribes were carried into captivity. Isa. xxviii. 5. with 2 Chron. xxix—xxxiii. The church is a crown of glory, and royal diadem to God; in her, his glory, power, and authority, are clearly displayed. Isa. lxiii. 3. Zech. ix. 16. Christ's crown of gold, his many crowns, are the mediatorial power, authority, and glory assigned him by his Father; his manifold victories, and high sovereignty, and the ascription of all praise and honour to him by the church. Psal. cxxxii. 18. Rev. xix. 12. Sol. Song iii. 11. The church's crown of twelve stars is her heavenly, illuminating, and directing doctrines of the prophets and apostles, which are her honour, and mark her royal state and marriage with Christ. Rev. xii. 1. Saints are a crown to ministers; are the ornament and honour of their labours. Phil. iv. 1. 1 Thess. ii. 19.—The saints' crown of glory, life, and righteousness, is that royal and truly honourable state of glory, life, and holiness, given them through the righteousness of Jesus Christ. Rev. iii. 11. and ii. 10. 1 Pet. v. 4. 2 Tim. iv. 8. The saints cast their crowns before God's throne; they undervalue themselves, and all they have, in comparison of him; and ascribe their whole existence, holiness, and happiness to Christ, and to God in him. Rev. iv. 4, 10. A good wife is a crown, an honour, and cause of wealth and power to her husband. Prov. xii. 4. So are children a crown to their parents. Prov. xvii. 6. A hoary head, or grey hairs, are a crown; an honourable badge of wisdom and authority. Prov. xx. 29. and xvi. 31. Riches are a crown to the wise, as they gain, and expend them honourably. Prov. xiv. 24. Honour, wealth, and authority, are called a crown. Prov. xvii. 6; xxvii. 24. and iv. 9.

The beautiful crown given to the Jews at their marriage-covenant with God, and which fell from their head, at their captivity, was their honourable renown, glorious wealth, and beautiful order and government of church and state. Ezek. xvi. 12. Lam. v. 16. The crowns of the locusts, under the fifth trumpet, denote the outward glory, power, and authority of the Saracens in the east, and of the Romish clergy in the west; and may also mean the caps of the Saracens formed like crowns, and the mitres and hoods of the Romanists. Rev. ix. 7. The seven crowns of the red dragon, are the sevenfold forms of authority, by kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, tribunes, emperors, heathen and Christian, and Gothic kings, or exarchs, that successively ruled in Rome; and the great glory of that state. Rev. xii. 3. The ten crowns of the Antichristian beast are the Pope's authority over, and command of all the glory of the ten different kingdoms formed out of the Roman empire in the west. Rev. xiii. 1.

CROWN. (1.) To put on a crown. 2 Tim.

ii. 5. (2.) To protect; enrich; honour. Psal. ciii. 4. The crowned of Assyria were as the locusts; their princes and great men were exceedingly numerous. Nah. iii. 17. Tyre is called a crowning city, because of her royal government, her great glory, power, and wealth, above others. Isa. xxiii. 8.

CRUDLE; to thicken the seminal substance in the womb, till it be formed into flesh and bones, as milk is thickened in order to make cheese. Job x. 10.

CRUEL; hard-hearted; fierce; painful. Gen. xlix. 7. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel; even their kindness enmeshes and murders men's souls. Prov. xii. 10. To breathe out cruelty is to utter threatenings; and to delight in want of tender sympathy, and in doing mischief. Psal. xxvii. 12.

CRUMBS. Miraculous benefits done to poor gentiles are compared to crumbs let fall to dogs under the table. Matt. xv. 27.

CRUSE; a small vessel of glass, &c. for holding water, oil, &c. 1 Sam. xxvi. 11.

CRUSH; (1.) To bruise. Num. xxii. 26. (2.) To tread to pieces. Job xxxix. 15. (3.) To oppress grievously. Job xx. 15. (4.) To ruin almost utterly. Jer. li. 34.

CRY; (1.) To make a loud noise with the voice. Eccl. ix. 17. Matt. xxi. 15. (2.) Bitter lamentation and mourning. Exod. xi. 6. and xii. 30. (3.) Horrible complaints of oppression and injustice. Isa. v. 7. (4.) Earnest prayer, as in great strait and danger, and with strong desire. Exod. xiv. 15. Psal. xvii. 1. (5.) The earnest desire of beasts for their food, and eager expression of it. Psal. cxiv. 9. God's crying imports his earnest warning of his people. Isa. xxx. 7; and his exertion of his power, in awful providences, for their deliverance. Isa. xlii. 14.

Jesus' crying to men, imports his earnest warning them of their infinitely dangerous condition; rousing them from their spiritual sleep and slumber; and his hearty invitation of them to receive his blessings. Prov. i. 21. and viii. 1. Zech. vii. 13. His not crying nor lifting up his voice in the streets, imports his lowliness, meekness, and patience, amid his humiliation. Isa. xlii. 2. The cry of Abel's blood; of Sodom's sin; of the wall built by oppressive and unjust means; and of the hire of the labourer, kept back by fraud; imports the sure connexion there is between murder, uncleanness, or fraud, and a sudden and fearful punishment; and that even irrational creatures are ready to bear witness against such guilt. Gen. xiv. 18. and xviii. 21. Hab. ii. 11. James v. 4. Israel shall cry, My God, we know thee: in their distress they shall make solemn professions of their relation to God, and earnestly seek his help. Hos. viii. 2. To cry in Lebanon and Bashan, is to wail aloud as on hill-tops, in a most destitute case; to cry for help from every quarter; and to utter bitter lamentations, as they went out of their land into the Babylonish captivity. Jer. xxii. 20.

CRYSTAL; a hard, transparent, and naturally colourless fossil, of a regular angular form. It is composed of simple, not twisted, thready plates; it is not flexible nor elastic; nor gives it any fire with steel. There are three kinds of pure crystal, besides various sorts mixed with other different substances. Crystal was anciently found in an island of the Red sea, and the cups and other vessels made of it were reckoned exceeding valuable. Pliny mentions one worth £1250 sterling. To punish the men of his generation, Nero furiously broke two crystal cups. But this stone is now of far less esteem. Job xxxviii. 17. The firmament above the cherubim, the sea of glass before the throne of God, the river of life, and the light of the new Jerusalem, are likened to crystal, to mark their purity, clearness, and illuminating influence. Ezek. i. 22. Rev. iv. 6; xxii. 1. and xxi. 11.

CUBIT; the measure between the point of a man's elbow and the point of his middle finger. The cubit is commonly reckoned half a yard, or eighteen inches; but the Jewish sacred cubit was a handbreadth more, amounting to 21,988 inches. Ezek. xliiii. 13. Some imagine the sacred cubit to have been the double of the common; and that the pillars in the porch of Solomon's temple were thirty-five common cubits, and but eighteen sacred ones in height. 1 Kings vii. 15. 2 Chron. iii. 15. But these texts may be otherwise reconciled, by taking the height of one pillar to be almost eighteen cubits, and the height of both taken together thirty-five. It is probable the Chaldean cubit was but eighteen inches. Dan. iii. 1.

CUCKOW; a solitary bird, whose beak is smooth; its nostrils hang a little forward; its tongue is shaped somewhat like an arrow; it has four toes, two before and two behind; its bulk is almost equal to that of a sparrowhawk. It is pretty beautiful, the head, neck, and back, of a hoary colour, with some dark grey feathers; the wings of a brownish black, and the belly whitish. It departs from our country in the end of harvest, and returns in spring. But Bochart and others will have the SHACHAPH to be not the cuckow, but the sea-gull, a fowl about the size of a hen but very light. Lev. xi. 16. Dent. xiv. 15.

CUCUMBER; a plant. The flower consists of one leaf fashioned like a bell, divided into several parts; the fruit is fleshy as an apple, and contains three cells, where the numerous seeds are placed in two rows. Tournefort mentions six kinds, of which the white, and especially the green, are reckoned the best. They require a good deal of heat to produce them. Plenty of cucumbers grew in Palestine and in Egypt, where they were the common food of slaves and poor people. Isa. i. 8. Num. xi. 5. Cucumbers in warm climates are an excellent cooler to the stomach; and are of use in fevers and nephritic distempers.

CUD; the inner part of the throat in cattle, by means of which they chew their food, when it returns upwards after being swallowed. Rev. xi. 8—7. Dent. xiv. 6—8.

CUMBER; to trouble; vex. Barren sinners in the church cumber God's ground; they offend God; they grieve ministers and saints; fill up room to no purpose; and hinder the spiritual growth of others. Luke xiii. 7.

CUMMIN; a plant somewhat like fennel, and which produces its blossoms and branches in the form of a nosegay. The Jews sowed it in their fields, and thrashed it out with a rod. Isa. xxviii. 25, 27. The Maltese sow it in the same manner. Doves feed on it with great pleasure. The oil of it is said to be a remedy for rheumatisms.

CUNNING; (1.) Skillful; artful. Gen. xxv. 27. Exod. xxxi. 4. and xxxv. 35. (2.) Crafty; deceitful. Eph. iv. 14.

CUP. (1.) A drinking vessel made of gold, silver, glass, wood, or the like. Gen. xl. 13. (2.) The liquor contained in it. 1 Cor. xi. 27. As by cups men's shares of liquor were given them, and affected them differently, the share of any thing is called a cup. So the soul-satisfying inheritance of the saints is called the portion of their cup. Psal. xvi. 5; and the state of wicked men in endless misery is called their cup. Psal. xi. 6. An abundant share of blessings, prosperity, joy, and salvation, is called a cup. Psal. xliii. 5. and cxvi. 13; and a share of terrible afflictions is called a cup. Psal. lxxv. 8. Isa. li. 17. Matt. xx. 23. and xxvi. 39. John xviii. 11. The cup of devils is liquor drunk at idolatrous feasts, and in mad revels. 1 Cor. x. 21. Men are likened to cups and platters; first their inside, or heart, should be cleansed, and then their outside, or practice. Matt. xxiii. 25, 26. Babylon is called a golden cup; great were her riches and wealth; and by her the Lord inflicted his judgments on the nations. Jer. li. 7. and xxv. Antichrist is said to have a golden cup, to denote her abundant luxury, power, and wealth, and the specious means by which she seduces the nations to idolatry, superstition, and error. Rev. xvii. 4. The cup of wine, in the Lord's supper, is called a cup of blessing; it is solemnly set apart and dedicated to a holy use; and all the blessings of the new covenant are represented and sealed by it. 1 Cor. x. 16. To take the cup of salvation, is, with cheerful joy, gratitude, and praise, to take hold of and improve God's deliverances and eternal redemption. Psal. cxvi. 13. There seems to be here an allusion to the drinking of the wine at the feast of the peace-offering.—To drink the cup of trembling, or of the fury of the Lord, is to be afflicted with sore and terrible judgments. Isa. li. 17. Psal. lxxv. 8. Jer. xxv. 15—29. Matt. xx. 23.

CURE; deliverance from disease. To cure a person, is to heal his body or mind of their diseases and troubles. Luke vii. 21. To cure a church or state, is to reform it, and restore it to order, freedom, power, and wealth. Jer. xxxiii. 6. and xlv. 11.

CURIOUS; (1.) Made with great art. Exod. xxviii. 8. (2.) Mysterious; magical. Acts xix. 19.

CURRENT MONEY, is what passes well; is readily received. Gen. xxiii. 16.

CURSE. (1.) The just and awful sentence of God's law, condemning one to suffer the full punishment of his sin. By this curse a man is separated from God's favour and fellowship, is subjected to his avenging justice, separated to evil, and set up as a mark of his indignation. It is alarming to think how this curse stands in the way of every mercy; promotes the ruin of soul and body, in time and eternity; and renders every thing terrible and hurtful to him that is under it. Nor can it be removed but by the application of Christ's blood and righteousness to the conscience, for justification of life. Gal. iii. 10. (3.) An instance of misery, the like to which men shall readily wish to those whom they exceedingly abhor. Jer. xxiv. 9. Jesus Christ was made a curse; had the condemnatory sentence of the broken law passed and executed on him, in room of millions of transgressors, by means of which he was made an unparalleled instance of misery and woe. Gal. iii. 13.

CURSE; to denounce evil against one. Judg. xvii. 2. God curseth persons when he condemns them to, and executes on them, his just wrath for sin. Gen. xii. 3. Inspired persons curse, when they solemnly predict miseries upon men. Gen. ix. 25. Josh. vi. 26. Men sinfully curse persons, when they rail at them, solemnly wish them evil, or rashly condemn them to ruin. Judg. ix. 27. 1 Sam. xiv. 24. Let them curse it that curse the day, and are ready to raise up their mourning; (or, the leviathan.) Let those who are skillful to curse the seasons of misery, days of battle, or death, in the horrid manner, curse the day of my birth, as a season and source of monstrous mischiefs. Job iii. 8. Cursed persons, are those who are eminently wicked, or devoted to wrath and ruin. 1 Pet. ii. 14. Job xxiv. 18. Men's enjoyments are curst to them, when they are wrathfully blasted, that they cannot thrive; or are made instrumental of vexing and hurting the owners. Dent. xxviii. 16, 17.

CURTAIN. (1.) A hanging for a bed, court, tent, or house, &c. 1 Sam. vii. 2. (2.) Dwellings; TENTS. Hab. iii. 7. (3.) Outward wealth, order, or other accommodations. Jer. iv. 20. and x. 20. The saints are like the curtains of Solomon's temple or palace: great is their glory and comeliness, as clothed with Jesus' righteousness, adorned with the graces of his Spirit, and a holy gospel-conversation. Sol. Song i. 6. The visible heaven resembles a curtain; great is its glory and extent, and it is spread betwixt us and the veiled brightness of the glorified state. Isa. xl. 22.

CUSH. (1.) The eldest son of Ham, and father of Nimrod, Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha, and the grandfather of Sheba and Dedan. His posterity took up their primitive abodes on the east and west of the lower part of the Euphrates; and in that part of Arabia, called the Happy. Gen. x. 6—8. (2.) The name of some countries, where Cush or his posterity dwelt, called ETHIOPIA, by the Greeks, and other translators. The scriptures appear to mention a threefold Cush or Ethiopia; (1.) CUSH; CUTH; CUTHA; Susiana, now Chuzestan, or the country of Cush in Persia, on the east of the lower part of the Hiddekel or Tigris. Gen. ii. 13. Memnon the son of Anrora, or the day-break, who assisted Priam in the defence of Troy, and is by Homer and Pindar called an Ethiopian, was probably the king of this country in these early times. Shalmaneser, or Esarhaddon, having conquered this country, transplanted the Cushites, or according to the Chaldean pronunciation, the Cuthites, from their own country, to inhabit that of the ten tribes of Israel, where they continued in the idolatrous worship of their idol Nergal. (See SAMARITANS and PERSIA.) 2 Kings xvii. 24.

(2.) CUSH or CUSHAN, on the north-east of the Red sea, near the point of the Eilatitic gulf. This is joined with Midian, and was shaken with the earthquake which attended God's appearance on mount Sinai. Hab. iii. 7. On the coast of this country they had excellent topazes. Job xxviii. 19. Zipporah, Moses' wife, is called a Cushite or Ethiopian, because she was born here. Num. xii. 1. Whether CUSHI the courier, who brought David certain word of the death of his son Absalom; CUSHI the father of Shelamiah; and CUSHI the father of the prophet Zephaniah, were Ethiopians of this place, as their name may import, we know not. It was perhaps the Ethiopians of this country who, under Zerah their king, marched, to the number of 1,000,000, against Asa king of Judah. Some say that Tirshakah was king of this country; and that the Ethiopians and Sabeans, given for the Jews, were the inhabitants of this country, and their allies, abandoned to the fury of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, or Persians, in order to promote the welfare of the Jews. 2 Chron. xiv. 2 Kings xix. Isa. xliii. 3. and xlv. 14. (3.) CUSH, ETHIOPIA, or ABYSSINIA, a country on the south-west of the Red sea, and south of Egypt. The great Bochart, indeed, together with Wells and others, confidently deny that ever this country is mentioned in scripture by the name of Cush, or Ethiopia. But what other Ethiopia could possibly be the boundary of the Persian empire, since both the other two were included in the bosom of it? Eath. i. 1; viii. 9; and ix. 1. What other Ethiopians could be joined with the Lybians on the west of Egypt? Dan. xi. 43. What other Ethiopians, beside the black ones of Abyssinia, could be so distinguished for their unchanging colour? Jer. xlii. 27. In what does the march of an Abyssinian army from Egypt, and return thereto, so well suit the story of Zerah and Tirshakah, as the march of an army from Arabia? When the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Persians, in their turn subdued Egypt, what hindered them from distressing the Ethiopians of Abyssinia, as well as of Cushan? Isa. xviii. and xx. Ezek. xxx. 4, 5. Who knows not that the gospel promises relative to Ethiopia have been far more eminently accomplished in Abyssinia than in either Cushan or Chuzestan? Psal. lxxviii. 31. and lxxxvii. 4. Dionysius, the ancient geographer, and Eustathius, the commentator of Homer, plainly distinguish the Ethiopians, into the eastern and western, the Red sea being between them; and Herodotus affirms, that Xerxes the son of Darius Hystaspes, king of Persia, had both Asiatic and African Ethiopians in his formidable army. Perhaps the Cushites crossed the Red sea westward, about A. M. 2470. Ethiopia, southward of Egypt, was once a very large kingdom or empire, consisting of forty-five kingdoms, according to Pliny. It is exceedingly mountainous, and never had any noted cities, except Axuma and Meroe, which last, it is said, could have furnished 250,000 soldiers, and 400,000 artificers. Some of the mountains are of salt, and others abound with mines of iron, copper, and gold. The chief river of Ethiopia is the Nile, into which almost all the inferior ones run, and which, according to some good authors, is divided into two branches; the Niger, which crosses the vast regions of Africa to the westward; and the Nile which runs through Egypt into the Mediterranean sea, and is prodigiously swelled by the immoderate showers that fall in Ethiopia in the months of June and July.

It appears, that in the earliest ages, about the time of the Hebrew bondage in Egypt, the Cushites of Arabia, with part of the descendants of Joktan, passed the Red sea, at the straits of Babel-mandel. Perhaps the Ludim, in ages still more ancient, settled in that country. The language of the modern Abyssinians is plainly a dialect of the true and ancient Arabic. Many of their laws were much the same with those of the Egyptians, and others resembled the customs of the more civilized Arabs. Ham the father of Cush, or Jupiter Ammon, was their chief deity. They seem to have been anciently divided into a great number of tribes, with kings at their head. Probably the queen of Sheba was an Abyssinian. It is pretended she had a son, called Menelech, by king Solomon, who was instructed in the Jewish religion, and, by the help of some Hebrew doctors, introduced it into Ethiopia. It is certain, that circumcision, the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath, and a number of other Jewish rites, are practised by the Ethiopians to this very day. But is far less evident that their sovereigns are descended in a direct line from Solomon. It is probable that the Ethiopians of Abyssinia were conquered by Shishak. During the civil war which happened in Egypt after the death of Shishak, Zerah the Ethiopian appears to have made himself master of Egypt and Lybia; and, intending to add Judea to his dominions, was routed by king Asa. After which the Egyptians, assisted by 200,000 Hebrews, or Canaanites, recovered their country from the Ethiopians. About A. M. 2557, So, or Sabacon, king of Ethiopia, reduced Egypt, which then consisted of three or more different kingdoms, and entered into an alliance with Hoshea and the Israelites against the king of Assyria. TIRHAKAH, perhaps the same with Sethon, marched an army against Sennacherib. Some time after, Esarhaddon king of Assyria, having ravaged Egypt, subdued a great part of Ethiopia, and held the people in bondage for three years. They recovered their liberty; but Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, and Cambyses, in their turns, harassed part of the country. Isa. xviii. 3, and xiv. 14. Ezek. xxx. 4, 5. They have since been harassed by the Romans, Saracens, and Turks, and sometimes the country terribly ravaged by the inhuman Gallies, or Giagas; but have maintained themselves in an independent state, though it must not be denied that the Saracens and Turks mightily abridged the extent of their empire. Dan. xi. 43.

Christianity was perhaps introduced into Ethiopia by the eunuch as early as the times of the apostles. It is certain, that in the fourth century since our Saviour's birth, and ever since, there has been here a Christian church of considerable note. They indeed mix with their Christianity a number of Jewish rites; but they pretend to retain these as usages either wholly civil, or as far subordinate to the duties of the Christian law. In the seventh and subsequent centuries, the Mahometans thought to have introduced their delusion into Ethiopia; but all their attempts, though bloody, were in vain, as to the greatest part of the country. In the seventeenth century, the Popish Missionaries, having decoyed the Ethiopians to their faith, thought to introduce their idolatry and superstition; but, after a terrible civil war on that account, the Papists were entirely prohibited from entering the kingdom. Psal. lxxviii. 31. and lxxxvii. 4. It seems the Ethiopians in Arabia, or part of those in Abyssinia, will assist the Mahometan powers in their attempt to dislodge the Jews from their own land, in the beginning of the glorious millennium. Ezek. xxxviii. 5.

The Jews are compared to Ethiopians, for their ignorance, unconcern, strong habits of sinning, and their profane heathenish courses. Amos ix. 7. Jer. xiii. 23. CUSH the Benjamite was either some wicked informer against David, or Saul is compared to an Ethiopian, for the black and horrid nature of his conduct. Psal. vii. title.

CUSTODY; charge; keeping. Num. iii. 36.

CUSTOM. (1.) Ordinary practice. Luke iv. 16. (2.) A practice long used, or derived from ancestors. Judg. xi. 39. John xviii. 30. (3.) Frequent disease. Gen. xxxi. 35. (4.) A tax upon persons or goods demanded by civil magistrates. Rom. xiii. 7.

CUT; (1.) To divide into pieces with a knife, or sharp instrument. Exod. xxxix. 3. Lev. i. 6. (2.) To prick; pain; vex. Acts v. 33. (3.) To destroy. Hab. iii. 16. 2 Chron. xv. 16. Job xxiv. 24. Men cutting themselves, imported excess of grief and madness. Jer. xlviii. 37. Mark v. 5. If a Hebrew neglected circumcision after he was come to age, or neglected to observe the passover, or ate leaven during the days of unleavened bread. Gen. xvii. 14. Num. ix. 13; if he did secular work on the sabbath; if he attempted to counterfeite the sacred oil or incense. Exod. xxxi. 14. and xxx. 33; if he ate any part of a sacrifice in his uncleanness, or ate any blood, or of the fat of beasts fit for sacrifice; or ate of the peace-offering after the third day; or killed his sacrifice in any other place than at the door of the tabernacle, without special warrant from God, Lev. vii. 20—27; xix. 8. and xvii. 4, 9; if he neglected to observe the fast of expiation, or to use the water of purification; Lev. xlviii. 29. Numb. xix. 13, 20; if he was guilty of sodomy, bestiality, voluntarily lying with a woman during her menstrual disorder, or of incest, idolatry, giving of seed to Moloch, consulting familiar spirits, or of blasphemy, presumptuous sinning, murder, rape, adultery. Lev. xviii. and xx. Num. xv. 30, 31; he was to be CUT OFF from the congregation; not only separated from communion with the church, but, in many cases, put to death by the magistrate, or destroyed by the immediate vengeance of heaven.

The cutting off from the church, or casting out from the synagogue, was what we call excommunication, by which church members evidently guilty of obstinate rebellion against the law of God, are separated from the fellowship of the church, and deprived of the spiritual privileges proper to church fellowship. John ix. 34. It is generally supposed the Jews had three kinds or degrees of excommunication: the first was NIDDUI, or separation of the person from things holy, for the space of thirty days; the second CHEREM, or ANATHEMA, which ratified the former, and excluded the offender from the synagogue, and from civil commerce: the third SHAMMATHA, which was published by 300 or 400 trumpets, and implied a final exclusion from the synagogue. But Selden, that prodigy of Jewish learning, has pretty fully evinced that niddui and shammatha are promiscuously used, and often signify the same censure; and, consequently, that the Jews have but a lesser and greater excommunication. The form of the lesser is simple and short; "Let such an one be excommunicated." If an offender continue three months under this without manifesting his repentance, the greater is inflicted. In it the offender is charged with a multitude of terrible curses, by God, by angels, by heaven and earth, &c. The lesser excommunication debarred the offender from approaching nearer any person, his wife and children not excepted, than four cubits. The greater shuts him out from all converse; his goods are confiscated, and sometimes himself imprisoned. Miserable was the case of the excommunicated among the rigid sect of the Essenes. Their sentence debarred them from all commerce with those of their own party; their vow obliged them to receive no food from any other; they were therefore forced to live like heasts on roots and herbs till their body decayed or rotted away. The other Jews were wont to be more moderate. They allowed the excommunicated person to be present at their public worship, and absolved him, upon an apparently serious profession of grief for his sin, and a promise of amendment; though, if the offence was immediately against God, absolution was never pronounced till a month after excommunication was past. But the modern Jews are terribly cruel to their excommunicated brethren. They are refused all manner of assistance; they meet with nothing but rudeness; they are pelted with stones, if they appear in the streets; they are shunned by their nearest relations. In order to obtain absolution they must be tied to a post and whipped; after which they must lie prostrate at the door of the synagogue, that the rest may step over them. If they die under the sentence, their death is celebrated with feasting and diversion.

The Jews pretend that excommunication was early introduced into the church; that Adam excommunicated Cain and his seed. Some find the origin of it in Deborah's curse against the inhabitants of Meroz, for refusing to assist Barak against the armies of Jabin. Judges v. 23. Others place its commencement in the proclamation of Ezra, that all the Jews should gather themselves to Jerusalem, to divorce their strange wives; and that whoever came not should have his substance forfeited, and he himself put from the congregation. Ezra x. 7, 8. Since that time, we find in their history various instances of it, at least of the lesser. Luke vi. 22. John ix. 22. It seems that private persons presumed to excommunicate and absolve offenders, as well as public judges. And we are assured that some modern Jews imitate the Papists in excommunicating beasts for what they reckon highly offensive. In the Christian church, there is a divine warrant for a prudential suspension of offenders from fellowship in sealing ordinances; but excommunication, properly so called, secludes from the seals of the new covenant, and other Christian privileges, and from all unnecessary civil converse of fellow Christians; renders one as a heathen man and publican, and delivers him up to Satan, the god of this world, as, for the present, a visible member of his kingdom, that lieth in wickedness. Never, but for sins plainly prohibited by the divine law, and obstinately continued in, ought this censure to be inflicted, nor ought it to be inflicted but in a prudent, impartial, orderly, meek, and solemn manner. When thus inflicted, it is abundantly terrible, though no civil punishment attend it: it is ratified in heaven by the God, Saviour, and Judge of the world. Matt. xviii. 15-18. and xvi. 19. John xx. 23. 1 Cor. v. 4-13. Gal. v. 12. 2 Thess. iii. 14, 15. Tit. iii. 13. 1 Tim. i. 20.

CYMBAL: a hollow vessel of brass, which being struck against another of the same kind, made a sharp shrill sound. 2 Sam. xvi. 5. Such as have knowledge and eloquence without true love to God and men, are but as a sinking cymbal; are noisy, and no more. 1 Cor. xiii. 1.

CYPRESS; a tree noted for its height, strength, and comeliness. It is always green, its wood heavy, fragrant, and almost incorruptible. Idols were formed of it. Isa. xlv. 14. The Romans reckoned it a fatal tree, and used it in funeral ceremonies. Tournefort mentions three kinds of it: but it is not valued as it deserves. The fruit of it, called cones, is used in medicine; for its astringent qualities, and therefore useful to cure ruptures and fluxes of blood. See GOPHER and CAMPFIRE.

CYPRUS; a famed island in the Mediterranean sea, about 100 miles north of Syria, and sixty south-west of Cilicia. Its length from east to west is about 175 miles; and its breadth sixty; and according to some only forty-six. It abounded with cypress-trees; but it was most infamous for lewdness, every woman being obliged by law to prostitute herself to strangers. According to Josephus, it was peopled by the descendants of CHITTIM. It had fifteen cities of note, viz. Paphos, Citium, Salamis, &c.; and was parcelled out into nine petty kingdoms. Cyrus reduced the Cyprists. About seventy years afterward, Cimon, the Athenian general, obliged the Persians to withdraw their garrisons from Cyprus, and restore the islanders their liberty. By the shameful peace of Antalcidas the Lacedæmonian, they were deprived of their freedom, and reduced to their former bondage. They submitted to Alexander and to his successors in Syria and Egypt, by turns. About A. M. 3950, the wicked Clodius, and Cato the famed moralist, in the most villainous manner, stripped Ptolemy the king of Cyprus of his wealth to the value of $\pounds 21,350,350$ sterling, and of his kingdom, and reduced it to a Roman province. It was exceedingly crowded with Jews; but for murdering about 240,000 of its inhabitants, they were banished out of it about A. D. 118. In 648, it was taken by the Saracens, but recovered by the Emperor of Constantinople about 937. About 1191, Richard king of England wrested it from the Seljucian Turks, and gave it to Lusignan, titular king of Jerusalem. He and his posterity held it almost 300 years; though, for the last fifty, they were tributary to the Mameluke sultans of Egypt. His male line failing, the Venetians seized it about A. D. 1473. After a most desperate war, the Turks forced it from them in 1570. Christianity was planted in this island by some that fled from the Jewish persecution, and confirmed by Paul, and Barnabas, and Mark; and has continued ever since; though at present, religion, as well as the country, is in a most wretched condition. Acts xi. 19, 20. xiii. 4-13; and xv. 39.

CY-RENE; a country at some distance westward of Egypt, and south of the Mediterranean sea. Its principal cities were, Cyrene, Bernice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, and Apollonia. This state had for some ages its own kings, of a Grecian lineage, and contended in power with the Carthaginians. Here were born, Eratosthenes the historian, Callimachus the poet, and Simon, who assisted Jesus in bearing his cross. Many of the Jews who lived here were converted at Pentecost, and others afterward, to the Christian faith; but others of them were no less inveterate persecutors of it. Acts ii. 10; xi. 20.; xiii. 1. and vi. 9. After this country had been above 1000 years subject to the Persians, Egypto-Grecians, and Romans, the Saracens seized it, A. D. 640; since which, Christianity has made a poor appearance there. Some of the Mahometan princes erected a kingdom here, which continued about 350 years, from A. D. 900 to 1250, though the seat of government was mostly in Egypt. At present the country is almost a desert, and belongs to the Turks.

CY-RENI-US, or Quirinus, the Roman deputy in Syria, some years after our Saviour's birth, he obliged the Jews to pay the tax for which they had been enrolled at the time of it. Luke ii. 1, 2.

CYRUS, the son of Cambyses, king of Persia, by Mandane the daughter of Ahasuerus, king of the Medes. The stories of his grandfather's appointing him to death when an infant, and of his exposure and education by a shepherd, and of his violent death by the order of the Scythian queen, are unworthy of credit. His parents were extremely careful of his education; and he discovered early an uncommon sprightliness, sagacity, and courage. When about twelve years of age, his mother carried him to her father's court. His generous, obliging, and heroic behaviour quickly gained him the affections of the Medes. After five years, he returned to Persia. About the fortieth year of his life, he assisted Darius the Mede, his uncle, with 30,000 Persian troops. He reduced the revolted Armenians. Neriglissar, the king of Babylon, then intended to reduce the kingdom of Media: his vast army of Babylonians, Lydians, Cappadocians, Carians, Phrygians, Cilicians, and Paphlagonians, bade fair to swallow up Cyrus and his uncle; but this host was routed, and Neriglissar himself was slain. Soon after, Cyrus and his uncle, encouraged by Gobrias and Gadates, two revolted Babylonian lords, carried the war almost up to the very gates of Babylon, filling the country with terror, ravage, and blood. To oppose him, Belshazzar entered into a league with the Egyptians, Thracians, and all the nations of Lesser Asia; and raised an army of 420,000, of which Croesus king of Lydia had the command. Cyrus, with less than half the number, gave them a total defeat: he pursued Croesus to Sardis his capital, and having taken it, ordered the inhabitants to bring him their gold and silver, and thus to save the place from being plundered. Croesus was the first to obey. Either this ready compliance, or his repeating a saying of Solon the Athenian sage, importing that no man was happy till his death, so touched the generous heart of Cyrus, that he ever after honoured Croesus; restored him almost the whole power of his kingdom; and carried him about with him, in all his future expeditions, as a counsellor and friend. He then reduced the various nations of Lesser Asia, Syria, and part of Arabia the Desert; took Babylon, and put an end to the Chaldean empire. After settling their new form of government, and dividing their territories into one hundred and twenty provinces, the command whereof was given to such as had distinguished themselves in the war, Cyrus left Darius, his uncle and father-in-law, to govern the empire, and marched to the conquest of Egypt.

Two years after the reduction of Babylon, Darius died; and Cyrus having married his only daughter, became heir to the crown. Having perhaps read the Jewish prophecies concerning himself, or induced by the providence of God, he of his own accord, in the first year of his reign, issued a warrant for the Hebrew captives to return to their country, and rebuild the temple of their God. About seven years after, in the thirtieth year of his reign over Persia, and the seventh of his life, he died, A. M. 3475. Dan. vii. 5; viii. 3, 20. and ii. 39. Isa. xlviii. 11; xli. 2, 3, 25; xlv. 26-28. and xlv. 1-4, 13. Ezra i-iii.

D.

DAB'E-RATH; a city near the foot of Mount Tabor, in the great plain of Jezreel. Whether it be the same which the tribe of Issachar gave to the Levites, is uncertain. Josh. xix. 11, 12, and xxi. 28. Not long ago a village called Debarah was in these parts.

DAGGER; a long knife with a sharp point. Judg. iii. 16.

DAG'ON; the principal idol of the Philistines. He is commonly figured as a man in his upper parts, with the tail of a fish, and is thought to represent Noah, who long floated in his ark; and to have his name derived from DAG a fish; but others will have his name derived from DAGAN, corn; and state that he is a copy of the Egyptian Isis, who taught men to cultivate fields, and grind meal. At Gaza Samson pulled down his temple on the head of his worshippers. Judg. xvi. 21—30. At Ashdod, when the ark of God was placed in his temple, as if it had been his booty, his image fell before it; his head and hands were broken off on the threshold. On account of which, his priests never after trod on the threshold, but jumped over it as they entered the temple. 1 Sam. v. About A. M. 3840, Jonathan the Maccabee burned it, and the remains of the Syrian army which had fled into it. Since which we hear no more of the existence of Dagon. Perhaps Odon, the Chaldean deity, was the same with him.

DAINTY; (1.) Nice; costly; delicate. Rev. xviii. 17. (2.) Delicate food. Gen. xlix. 20.

DALE; a valley. Gen. xiv. 7.

DAL-MA-NUTHA; a city on the east side of the sea of Tiberias. It is either the same with Magdala, or near it; and hence one Evangelist says, Christ and his disciples landed in the parts of Dalmanutha; and another, that he landed in the coasts of Magdala. Mark viii. 10. Matt. xv. 39.

DAL-MATI-A; a province of old Illyricum, situated east of the gulf of Venice. With no small difficulty, the Romans subdued it. It was long after terribly ravaged by the Quadi, Goths, and Huns. From A. D. 1076 to 1310, the Dalmatians had a kingdom of their own. Except the small republic of Ragusa, Dalmatia is now subject partly to the Venetians, and partly to the Turks. Since Titus preached the gospel here, Christianity has never been wholly extirpated. 2 Tim. iv. 10.

DAM; a mother among animals. Deut. xxii. 6, 7. Lev. xxii. 27.

DAMAGE; loss; hurt. Ezra iv. 23. To drink damage, is to ruin one's self. Prov. xxvi. 6. To endamage; to do hurt. Ezra iv. 13.

DA-MASCUS; a noted city, long the capital of Syria, about one hundred and sixty miles north-east of Jerusalem, in the pleasant plain between mount Lebanon on the west, and Hermon on the south. As its name, according to some, signifies the blood of a righteous person, they imagine Abel was here murdered. It was in being in the days of Abraham. Gen. xiv. 15. It is said, he reigned some time in it; but it is far more certain that Eliezer, his principal servant, was a native of it. Gen. xv. 2. In the latter end of Solomon's reign, Rezin made it the capital of his Syrian kingdom. 1 Kings xi. 24. It was taken by Jeroboam, the son of Joash, king of Israel. 2 Kings xiv. 28.

About one hundred years after, TIGLATH-PILESER, A. M. 3264, demolished it, and carried the inhabitants captive to Kir. Isa. vii. 4. viii. 4. and ix. 9. Amos i. 3, 4. Some think Sennacherib had to retake it in his march against Hezekiah: it is more certain, that soon after it became a flourishing city, and was taken and pillaged by Nebuchadnezzar. Ezek. xxvii. 18. Jer. xxv. 9, 10, and xlix. 23, 24. It recovered its lustre, but was betrayed to Alexander's troops, A. M. 3671, with Darius's treasure, and part of his family, in it. About A. M. 3939, the Romans seized on it. Soon after which, we find it the residence of an Arabian prince, subject to the Romans. 2 Cor. xi. 32. About A. D. 630, Cosroes king of Persia took it from the Romans; but it was quickly retaken; and in a few years after taken by the Saracens. During the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, it was often rendered a scene of ravage and blood by the Seljucian Turks, the European Crusades, &c. Zech. ix. 1. Here the gospel was early preached by Ananias, Paul, and others; and a Christian church long maintained a considerable figure in it. But, for many ages past, there has been very little of real Christianity to be found here. At present, the place has some outward splendour, and magnificent ruins; but the houses are generally little better than cottages; and the furniture is still more wretched. The river Abana waters their gardens. In rainy weather their streets are perfect quagmires. About 20,000 of the inhabitants are cutlers. Our damask silks, damask roses, and plums, were brought to Europe from Damascus.

DAMN; to condemn to, or punish in hell. Mark. xvi. 16. DAMNATION, the punishment of hell; or the sentence dooming to it. Matt. xxiii. 33. 1 Tim. v. 12. Such as believe not the truth shall be damned; adjudged to, and tormented in hell. 2 Thess. ii. 11. He that does what he doubts the lawfulness of, is damned, is self-condemned, and deserves to be cast into hell. Rom. xiv. 23. Unworthy receivers of the Lord's supper eat and drink damnation to themselves; the unregenerate hereby deserve and ratify their sentence of condemnation to eternal torments; the regenerate hereby deserve the torments of hell, and expose themselves to fearful chastisements. 1 Cor. xi. 29. Christian widows waxing wanton against Christ, and marrying with heathens, and so apostatizing from the gospel, have damnation, because they have cast off their first faith; are sentenced to hell for their apostasy. 1 Tim. v. 12.

DAN, the fifth son of Jacob, and eldest of Bilhah. He had but one son, viz. Hushim, or Shuham, Gen. xli. 23; yet, when his tribe came out of Egypt, about 310 years afterward they amounted to 62,700, under the command of Abieser the son of Amishaddai; and in the wilderness they increased to 64,400. Their spy to search the promised land was Ammiel the son of Gemalli; and their prince to divide it was Bukki the son of Jogli. They, with the tribes of Asher and Naphtali, formed the fourth division of the Hebrew camp, and marched last. Numb. i. 12, 39. xvi. 43. xiii. 12. xxiv. 22. and viii. 25. They had their inheritance on the north-west of Judah: but the Amorites retained a great part of the low country, particularly Ajalon and Shaalabin, till the neighbouring tribe of Ephraim obliged them to be tributaries. Josh. xix. 40—48. Judg. i. 34, 35. Part of the Danites, being informed that a city on the north of Bashan, might be easily taken from the Canaanites, 600 of them went and seized on it, and called it DAN. On their way, they robbed Micah the Ephraimite of his idol: and at Dan they set it up, and continued to worship it, till they were carried captive by Tiglath-pileser. Judg. xviii. Deut. xxxiii. 22. During the oppression of King Jaban, the Danites, unconcerned for the misery of their brethren, applied themselves to their sea-trade, or shipped off their effects for some other country. Judg. v. 17. Samson, one of this tribe, when judge of Israel, privately, and without open war, terribly harassed the Philistines. Gen. xlix. 16, 17. 28,600 Danites attended at David's coronation. 1 Chron. xii. 35. As this tribe lay so contiguous to the Philistines, it was no doubt peculiarly distressed by them.

DAN: a city on the east of the springs of Jordan, and south of mount Lebanon. It was built by the Canaanites, and called LAISH or LESHUM. After the end of Joshua's wars, the inhabitants became extremely secure, and connected themselves with no people. This tempted the Danites, who lived about one hundred and forty miles distant to the south-west, to come and seize on it. Near to this place, Abraham routed Chedorlaomer and his allies. Gen. xiv. 14. Here the idolatry of the Hebrews had its first public establishment. Judg. xviii. 19, 30, 31. Here Jeroboam fixed one of his golden calves. 1 Kings xii. 29. Benhadad king of Assyria took it and pillaged it. 1 Kings xv. 20. After the captivity of the ten tribes, it seems to have made some figure; and it, or perhaps the Tribe of Dan in general, carried on a trade with the Tyrians. Ezek. xxvii. 12. Nebuchadnezzar marched his troops this way to invade Judea. Jer. iv. 15. and viii. 16. In our Saviour's time, Philip the tetrarch rebuilt this place, or one very near it, and called it CESAREA-PHILIPPI, which lay about a day's journey eastward from Sidon, and something more westward from Damascus. Mark viii. 27.

DANCE. The original words, so rendered in our Bibles, do not always bear such a sense, but merely to leap for joy, or great joy. Psal. xxx. 11. Luke xv. 25; or to praise God by playing on an organ. 2 Sam. vi. 14. The word rendered the dance, signifies no more than a company of singers. Psal. cxlix. 2, &c.

DANDLE; to nurse on the knees. Church-members are dandled on her knees, when her ordinances profit, refresh, and comfort their soul. Isa. lxvi. 12.

DANGER. The different degrees of danger of the judgment, council, or hell-fire, denote different degrees of punishment, prepared by God for sinners, according to the greater or lesser heinousness of their crimes; and there is an allusion to the Jewish courts, the lesser of which judged lesser crimes, and inflicted lesser punishments. Matt. v. 21, 23. Sailing was dangerous, after the FAST of expiation, on the tenth day of the seventh month; as winter began, and the weather became stormy. Acts xxvii. 9.

DAN'EL. (1.) A son of David by Abigail, and perhaps the same with Chileab. 2 Sam. iii. 3. 1 Chron. iii. 1. (2.) A priest of Ithamar's family, who attended Ezra to Judea, A. M. 3550; and, about twenty years after probably sealed Nehemiah's covenant of reformation. Ezra viii. 2. Neh. x. 6. (3.) DANIEL, the prophet, was of the royal family of Judah: and, along with others, was carried captive to Babylon, A. M. 3368. By Nebuchadnezzar's order, he, and three other young men were educated in the learning of Chaldea. They all four had new names given them, importing relation to the idols of Babylon. Daniel was called Belteshazzar; Hananiah, Shadrach; Mishaël, Meshaç; and Azariah, Abednego. These, and some other young men, educated in like manner, were appointed a daily allowance of provision from the king's own table: but as such provision was partly forbidden by the Jewish law, or would too much pamper the flesh, and perhaps entice them to idolatry, and at least was not suitable to a captive state, Daniel and his three companions, requested the prince of the eunuchs to give them pulse instead. He refused, lest their feeding on pulse should render them lean, and so his life be endangered; but Melzar his deputy, after proving them ten days with pulse, and finding that they looked better than such as had eaten of the king's provision, allowed them pulse for their ordinary diet. All the four quickly excelled their fellows in comeliness and learning, and were admitted to attend the king. Their wisdom was found far superior to that of all the wise men of Babylon. Dan. i.

Daniel's renown for piety and wisdom was very great, while he was but a youth. Ezek. xiv. 14, 20. and xxviii. 3. Repeated occasions furnished him with opportunity to manifest his wisdom. About A. M. 3400, Nebuchadnezzar dreamed of a large image, whose head was of gold, its breast and arms of silver, its belly and thighs of brass, and its legs iron, and its feet part of iron and part of miry clay. It was broken to pieces by a small stone cut out of a mountain without hands, and which gradually increased into a mountain that filled the whole earth. This dream mightily affected him; but he quickly forgot it. He convened a vast number of his wise men; and because they could not tell him his dream, nor the interpretation thereof, he gave orders to slay them, whether present or absent. Daniel and his three companions, though not called to make trial of their skill, were appointed to death. Hearing of this bloody mandate, Daniel begged Arioch, the captain appointed to oversee the execution, would delay it till he and his fellows should try to fulfil the desire of the king. After Daniel and his companions had spent some hours in fasting and prayer, he was conducted by Arioch to the king's presence: he related his dream of the image; explained the golden head of the Chaldean monarchy; the silver breast and arms of the Medo-Persian; the brazen belly and thighs of the Grecian; which was soon after its erection divided into the Syro-Grecian and Egypto-Grecian kingdoms: the iron legs and feet of the Roman, divided in process of time into the eastern and western empires, and at last into ten sovereignties: which fourfold empire should be overturned, one after another, to make way for the glory of Christ and his church to fill the whole earth. Nebuchadnezzar was so entirely satisfied with his rehearsal and interpretation of his dream, that he immediately constituted Daniel the chief of all his wise men; and at his request, promoted his three companions to places of authority in the province of Babylon. Dan. ii. About sixteen or perhaps thirty-two years after, when Nebuchadnezzar returned from his conquest of Judea, or of Egypt, he set up a monstrous idol in the plain of Dura, and ordered every body, as soon as they heard the sound of the concert of music on that occasion, to fall down and worship it. Daniel was then either absent from Babylon, or his high honour, and his large share of the king's favour, made his enemies afraid to accuse him: but Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, were accused before the king. Being interrogated, they declared their resolution not to worship the idol, and their firm assurance of God's ability to deliver them from the burning fiery furnace. Enraged by their resolute reply, Nebuchadnezzar ordered them to be cast bound into the furnace of fire, heated to a sevenfold degree. The flame caught hold of those who cast them into the fire, and burnt them to ashes. But by the interposition of the Son of God, who appeared walking with them in the furnace, the fire was only permitted to burn their bands, but not so much as to singe their garments, or the hair of their head. Nebuchadnezzar observing this, called them to come forth; which they did, and were advanced to more honourable stations. The king then made a decree, That if any body should speak reproachfully of the God of the Jews, whose power and majesty were so great, he should be put to death, and his house turned into a dunghill. Dan. iii. About the thirty-fifth year of his reign, Nebuchadnezzar dreamed of a large and flourishing tree cut down, and no more of it left but the stump fixed in the earth, to be wet with the dew of heaven, till seven times passed over it. When none of the magicians, or other pretenders to wisdom, could interpret it, Daniel, after a handsome introduction, and friendly advice, told the king, that this dream portended, that he should be deprived of his reason and royal dignity, and for seven years live as a beast in the field; after which, his reason and royal dominion should be returned unto him. Dan. iv.

About A. M. 3451, Daniel himself had a vision of four beasts rising out of the sea, a lion, a bear, a leopard, and a monstrous animal. An angel informed him, that they signified the Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires; the last of which he assured him, would, in its fall, be divided into ten sovereignties, and give rise to Antichrist, whose duration should be 1260 years. Dan. vii. Two years after, he had another vision of a pushing ram, with two horns, and of a he-goat, which destroyed him. An angel informed him that the ram signified the empire of the Medes and Persians; and the he-goat the empire of the Greeks, which, under Alexander, should destroy the Persian, and afterward be divided into several kingdoms; one of which should, a little before its downfall, be governed by Antiochus Epiphanes, noted for his baseness, conquests, and his persecution of the Jews, and abolition of their daily sacrifice, for 1150 days, or 2300 evenings and mornings. Dan. viii. In A. M. 3466, Daniel, by the advice of Nitocris, was sent for, and explained to Belshazzar and his courtiers the hand-writing on the wall, and was made the third ruler in the kingdom.

Darius the Mede, having on that very night paved his way to the establishment of his new empire, he constituted Daniel the third ruler in it, and intended to make him deputy-governor, next to himself. The heathen governors hated him for his religion, and were enraged at his promotion. Despairing to find any thing blameable in his conduct, except touching his religion, they persuaded king Darius to enact an unalterable law, That whoever should, for the space of thirty days, ask any favour from either God or man, besides the king himself, should be cast into the den of lions, to be torn asunder. Informed that this wicked act was ratified, Daniel thought it his duty to avow his worship of God more publicly than before. When he thrice a-day prayed to his God, he opened his window toward Jerusalem. His enemies, who watched him, quickly apprehended him, and brought him before the king to be punished. Darius did what he could to deliver him; but all was in vain, as the royal laws of the Medes and Persians were unalterable. Daniel was cast into the den of lions, but they were divinely restrained from hurting him. Darius, who could sleep none the ensuing night, by reason of his grief, came early next morning, and, in a most mournful tone, called to Daniel, and asked, If his God had been able to deliver him from the lions? Finding him perfectly safe, he ordered him to be drawn up from the den, and his accusers and their friends to be thrown into it. These the lions quickly devoured, and tore in pieces, ere they came to the bottom. Dan. vi.

About this very time, Daniel, finding from Jeremiah's predictions, that the captivity of the Jews would be just seventy years, and therefore their deliverance at hand, applied himself to solemn fasting and prayer. While he was thus employed the angel Gabriel came and informed him that his prayer was accepted; and that about the end of re-venty weeks, or 400 years, from Artaxerxes' edict to rebuild Jerusalem, the Messiah would appear; and by his death make atonement for sin, and fulfil a multitude of ancient prophecies; and that soon after the Jewish nation should be punished with lasting desolation and misery. Dan. ix.

In A. M. 3471, he had next a vision of Jesus Christ, as a man like brass, marked with glory, which almost killed him with terror, but an angel comforted him. This angel informed him that the kings of Persia had been divinely supported, and should be restrained from hurting the Jews; that their empire should, after the reign of a few kings, be seized by Alexander the Greek; that his kingdom should be divided after his death, but not to his friends; that his successors in Egypt on the south, and Syria on the north, should have mutual wars; and of Antiochus's persecution of the Jews, and miserable end; of the rise and fall of the Antichristian and Mahometan states; of the deliverance of the Jews from their present dispersion, and of the last judgment. Dan. x. xi. and xii.

The style of Daniel is extremely plain; but his language, from the 4th verse of the second chapter, to the end of the seventh, is Chaldaic, and merely relates to the affairs of that empire. Enraged at his fixing the time of the Messiah, the Jews deny him the name of a prophet; but our infallible Saviour calls him one. Matt. xxiv. 15. The order of his predictions is very distinct; and they may serve as a key to those of the Revelation, and to many of Isaiah, Ezekiel, &c. The fabulous story of his affair with Susannah, and with Bell and the Dragon, are unworthy of regard.

DA-RI'US, or CYAXARES, the Mede, was the son of Ahasuerus, or Astyages, and the brother of Mandane mother of Cyrus, and of Amyt the mother of Evil-merodach king of Babylon. After a long war with the Babylonians, he got possession of their empire on the death of Belshazzar his grand-nephew. He appointed 120 governors over his kingdom, and three principal ones to direct them, of whom Daniel was one. Upon the occasion of Daniel's marvellous deliverance from the lions, he published an edict, that all his subjects should shew a reverential regard for the God of the Jews. Dan. v. 31; vi. 1. and xi. 1. He had scarcely reigned two years at Babylon when he died, aged sixty-four, and was succeeded by Cyrus his nephew and son-in-law.

DA-RI'US-HY-STAS-PES. See AHASUERUS the husband of Esther.

DA-RI'US CO-DE-MAN'NUS, the last of the Persian kings of that age, Neh. xii. 22. was of royal descent, but very remote from the throne, and of a very debased condition. He had been courier to Darius Ochus; but, for defeating a bold champion of the enemies' host, was made governor of Armenia. After murdering Ochus and Arses kings of Persia, one after another, Bogos the eunuch set him on the Persian throne. He had not long possessed it, when Alexander king of Macedonia, with a small but brave army of Greeks, invaded his empire, and in three battles overthrew his troops, seized on his family and empire. After collecting about 40,000 warriors in Media, he resolved to hazard a fourth engagement with Alexander, who pursued him; but Bessus and Nabarzemes, two of his deputy-governors, put him in chains, shut him up in a close chariot, and retreated with the army into Bactria, on the south-east of Media. If Alexander overtook them, they resolved to procure his favour by surrendering their master; if Alexander pursued them not, they resolved to kill Darius, and set up for themselves. Informed of their treachery, Alexander pursued them with rage and speed. Observing him just at their heels, they stabbed Darius, because he refused to flee off with them on horseback, and left him bleeding to death in his chariot. Alexander found him, and wept to see him thus abused by his servants. He sent his corpse to Sisigambis his queen, that she might inter it in the royal sepulchres of Persia. Dan. viii. 5, 6, 20, 23.

DARK. (1.) Without natural light. Gen. xv. 17. (2.) Blackish; hindering light. Job xxii. 13. (3.) Mysterious; obscure. Psal. lxxviii. 2. (4.) Unhappy; perplexing; without the light of prosperity. Psal. xxxv. 6. Mic. iii. 6. Job xii. 25. and xviii. 6. Isa. v. 30. Eccl. ii. 14. Prov. xxii. 29. (5.) Full of ignorance and wickedness, without the light of revelation and religion. Psal. lxxiv. 20. Prov. ii. 13. Job xxxvii. 19. Isa. xxix. 18. Psal. lxxviii. 5. (6.) Without the saving knowledge of divine things. Eph. iv. 18. (7.) Secret; not exposed to open view. Ezek. viii. 12. 1 Cor. iv. 5.

DARKLY; obscurely; imperfectly. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

DARKNESS signifies, (1.) The absence or want of natural light. Matt. xxvii. 45. Such darkness surrounded the deep or chaos on the first day of the creation. Gen. i. 2. Job xxxviii. 9; and in part returns every night. Thick clouds of black and moist vapour so overspread the land of Egypt for three days, that no man could see his fellow, nor could their fires or candles burn. Exod. x. 21, 22. While our Saviour, the blessed Sun of righteousness, hung on the cross, a similar darkness covered Judea and the places around. Matt. xxvii. 45. (2.) Ignorance, unbelief, error, which bewilder men, bereave them of true comfort, and unfit them for proper exercise. John iii. 19. Nay, sin, especially a state of it, is called darkness, to denote how uncomely, dreadful, and bewildering it is, 1 Pet. ii. 9. Col. i. 13; and the persons under the reign of ignorance, unbelief, error, or any other sin, are represented as darkness. John i. 5. Eph. v. 8. (3.) Great distress and perplexity, and hell, where the utmost confusion, misery, and horror for ever reign, are called outer darkness. Isa. viii. 22. Matt. xxii. 13. To eat in darkness, is to live in perpetual anxiety and distress, amidst the outward comforts of life. Eccl. v. 17. All darkness is hid in his secret place; terrible confusion and horror wait on him, and shall surprise him. Job xx. 26. To meet with darkness in the day-time, and to grope at noon, is to be exceedingly infatuated; or surprised with great trouble at the height of prosperity. Job v. 14. (4.) Privacy; obscurity. Matt. x. 27. Hence the grave is represented as darkness, and a place where the light is as useless as darkness. Psal. lxxxviii. 12. Job x. 22. (5.) Forgetfulness and contempt. Eccl. vi. 4.—The darkness is past, and the true light shineth. The ceremonial dispensation is over, and Jesus is clearly exhibited in the gospel. The state of ignorance, error, unbelief, and wickedness is over; and ye have received the knowledge, felt the power, and believed the promises of God. 1 John iii. 8.

DARLING; a beloved one. The soul is so called, as we ought chiefly to care for it. Psal. xxii. 20. and xxxv. 17.

DART; a missile weapon to be thrown by the hand. The javelin is a kind of it. 2 Sam. xviii. 14. 1 Sam. xx. 23. Num. xxv. 6. A dart strikes through the adulterer's liver, when his constitution is wasted, or some sudden judgment comes upon him. Prov. vii. 23. Satan's temptations are fiery darts, which suddenly terrify, and mightily hurt and torment the souls of the godly. Eph. vi. 16.

DASH; furiously to break or beat to pieces. 2 Kings viii. 12. God dashes his enemies, when he grievously punishes and destroys them. Exod. xv. 6. He dashes them one against another, when he gives them up to ruinous wars, contentions, and disorders. Jer. xiii. 14.

DATES; the fruit of the palm-trees; they are extremely sweet and nourishing. 2 Chron. xxxi. 5.

DAUB; to besmear; plaster. Exod. ii. 3.

DAUGHTER. See CHILDREN.

DAVID, the son of Jesse, and descendant of Judah, was born at Bethlehem, A. M. 2919. No sooner had the Lord rejected Saul than, to comfort Samuel, he sent him to anoint one of Jesse's sons to be the future king. David's seven elder brethren were presented to that prophet, but he was instructed of God, that none of them was the intended sovereign. David was brought home from the sheep, and by the direction of God anointed to be king over Israel. After this, David returned to his flock; but the Spirit of God began to qualify him for his future office. Meanwhile the spirit of government departed from Saul; and an evil spirit, which produced a deep melancholy, troubled him. David, who was an excellent musician, was brought to divert him with his music. His comeliness, sober behaviour, and fine music, quickly gained him an interest in Saul's favour, and he became his armour-bearer. Saul's melancholy at length abated, and David returned to his flock.

The Philistines invaded the country. While they and the Hebrews encamped over against one another, with the valley of Elah between them; for the space of forty days Goliath presented himself, and offered to decide the fate of the war, by a single combat with any they pleased; and defied them to produce the man that durst engage him. The very sight of him terrified the Hebrews. At last David came with provision to his three elder brethren who served in the army. Observing the proud Philistine defy the armies of the true God, and hearing that Saul's eldest daughter was offered to the man who should kill him, he, directed of God, signified his readiness to accept the challenge. Eliab his elder brother haughti-ly rebuked him; to which he returned a mild reply. Hearing of his offer, Saul sent for him, and dissuaded him from so unequal a combat. David replied, that he trusted the Lord who had enabled him to slay a lion and a bear, without any weapons, would give him the victory over this proud blasphemer. Pleased with this answer, Saul equipped him in armour similar to that of Goliath; but David, finding it heavy and burdensome, put it off, and met the giant with no arms, but his staff, sling, and five small stones. Goliath disdained his appearance, and bade him come on, and he would give his flesh to the fowls of the air and the beasts of the earth. David replied that he came against him armed with the protection and power of that God of Israel whom he had blasphemed, and whose armies he had defied; and slung a stone, which, divinely directed, penetrated by the hole of the giant's helmet, and sinking into his forehead, brought him flat to the ground. David ran up to him, and, with his own sword, cut off his head. The Philistine army fled, and the Hebrews pursued them with great slaughter to the very gates of Ekron. 1 Sam. xvii.

David's beard being now grown, and having his shepherd's dress on him, he was quite unknown to Saul and Abner his general, till he informed them who he was. Jonathan conceived a very uncommon regard for him; but the Hebrew women, in their triumphal songs, having ascribed the slaughter of ten thousands to him, and of but thousands to Saul, that jealous monarch conceived an inveterate resentment against him: he indeed retained him in some post in the army; but treacherously disposed of Merab his daughter to Adriel the Meholathite. When Saul returned to his house, and had no public affairs to engross his attention, his melancholy returned upon him, and David was called to divert it with his music. Twice Saul attempted to murder him with the cast of a javelin; but he escaped and withdrew from his presence. Informed that his daughter Michal loved David, Saul thought to make this an occasion of murdering him. He therefore made to David an offer of marriage with her, providing he would give a hundred foreskins of the Philistines as her dowry; hoping that he would perish in the attempt. David slew two hundred of those murderous enemies of his nation, and presented their foreskins to Saul, who, on that account, was obliged to give him Michal to wife. Soon after, he directed Jonathan and other courtiers to kill David. Jonathan diverted this for the present. The Philistines commenced a new war against Israel; David routed them with prodigious slaughter, and was scarcely returned, when, while he diverted Saul with his harp, that malicious and unnatural wretch threw a javelin at him; and, because he escaped, ordered his guards to beset his house that night, and murder him. Informed of her father's designs, Michal let David down by a window; and laying an image in the bed, and pretending he was sick, gained the time till he was got a good way off. 1 Sam. xvii. 55; xviii. and xix.

David fled to Naoth, where Samuel superintended a college of young men, who studied the divine law, and prepared themselves to receive the gift of prophecy. Informed where he was, Saul sent two different parties to apprehend and bring him back. Whenever they came to the place, they were inspired, and fell a prophesying, or otherwise joined in the religious exercise of the college. Vexed that they did not return, Saul went thither himself, and was so affected, that he lay upon the ground almost naked before David and Samuel all that day and the ensuing night. This might have taught him that God was David's protector. David, on invitation, returned and entered into a solemn covenant of friendship with Jonathan, who undertook to discover whether his father was resolutely determined to murder him or not. From his rage at David's absence on the feast of the new-moon, he saw it evident that his murder was resolved on; and, under pretence of shooting in the field, went and informed David of his danger, and renewed their covenant of friendship. 1 Sam. xix. 18—24, and xx.

Ever after, David was in a state of exile from the court of his father-in-law. He and a few of his servants went to Nob. Here Ahimelech the high-priest, knowing nothing of the rupture between him and Saul, gave them shew-bread to relieve them in their absolute necessity, and gave David the sword of Goliath. This occasioned the murder of AHIMELECH, and all the priests and inhabitants of Nob, Abiathar excepted. David fled to Achish king of Gath, but finding that the Philistines knew and hated him for his killing of Goliath, he sinfully feigned himself destitute of reason. Retiring from Gath, he went to Adullam, where his brethren and a number of malcontents, and people of desperate fortunes, to the number of 400, came to him, and engaged to adhere to him. His aged parents he carried away, and put them under the protection of the king of Moab, who was, perhaps, an enemy of Saul. At this time he went northward about Mount Hermon, and married Maachah the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur; and in his return married Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. Psal. xlii. 6. 2 Sam. iii. 2, 8. It is certain, the prophet Gad warned him to return to the land of Judah. He obeyed, and abode in the forest of Hareth. Here Abiathar came to him, and informed him of the ruin of Nob. Hearing that the Philistines were ravaging Keilah, a city of Judah not far distant, he marched to attack them, and took from them a valuable booty. Saul learning that he was in Keilah, hastened with some chosen troops to apprehend him. Upon consulting the Lord, whether the people of Keilah would ungratefully betray him to Saul, if he remained in their city, he was informed they would, and therefore retreated to the wilderness of Ziph, whither Jonathan came, and renewed their covenant of friendship. The malicious Ziphites informed Saul where he was, and he came in quest of him. David retired to the wilderness of Maon, where he was on the point of being taken, had not an invasion of the Philistines diverted Saul from his murderous pursuits. 1 Sam. xxi—xxiii. Psal. xxxiv. li. liii. lvi. lix.

David retired eastward to the desert of Engedi, and he and his men lodged there in a cave. Saul searched the country for him, and entered into this very cave to ease nature, or to sleep during the heat of the day. Some of David's friends advised him to kill Saul, when Providence had delivered him into his hand; but he refused, and only cut off the skirt of his robe, without being perceived. When Saul was gone off to some distance, David cried after him, and remonstrated how evident it was that he had no design on his life, since he had but cut off his skirt, when he might so easily have taken his life. Saul owned the justness of what he said, confessed his own guilt, and begged that David would not destroy his family when he should be king. After David had given him his oath, he retired to his cave. David and his men had till now chiefly continued about the wilderness of Maon, in the south-east-part of the inheritance of Judah, and had protected Nabal's flocks from robbers and wild beasts. While Nabal kept his shearing feast, David sent some of his servants to ask a small present of what he could best spare. Nabal abused the servants with ill language, and represented David himself as a base fellow, that had outrun the king's service. Provoked with this message David furiously resolved to destroy him and his whole family, had not Abigail diverted him from it. 1 Sam. xxiv. and xxv.

The Ziphites, desirous of recommending themselves to the favour of Saul, informed him that David and his men concealed themselves in the hill of Hachilah, over against Jeshimon. Saul, with 3000 chosen men, marched in quest of him. One night David reconnoitred Saul's army, and finding them all asleep, carried off Saul's spear and cruse of water. From a proper distance he cried, and upbraided Abner for guarding his master so ill; and represented how unjust it was to charge himself with murderous designs against Saul, when he had now a second time left him safe, when he had it evidently in his power to slay him without being discovered. Saul readily acknowledged David's integrity; and, after receiving back his spear and cruse, went home to his house. 1 Sam. xxvi.

Fearing that Saul might some time or other get him murdered, David rashly resolved to shelter himself in the country of the Philistines. Achish king of Gath, having sufficient proof of the variance between David and Saul, gave him the kindest reception, and allotted him and his men the city of Ziklag, which the Philistines had taken from the tribe of Judah, to dwell in. While they abode here, they made several attacks upon the Amalekites, Geshurites, and Gerezites, that dwelt in the west of the Arabian Desert, and killed all they met with, that no information might be given against them. David made a present of the cattle to Achish, and pretended they had ravaged the country of the Kenites, and south of Judah. Achish believed this report, and placed an entire confidence in David. He even carried him to the war against Saul, and promised that he and his men should be his life-guard; and David pretended to be in friendship to Achish; but the opposition of the other lords of the Philistines obliged Achish to dismiss him and his men from the army, as persons not to be trusted. Had not Providence thus interposed, David had either sinfully fought against Israel, or proved treacherous to Achish. In his return to Ziklag, a number of valiant Manasites fell to him, as some Gadites and Benjamites had done before: and it was well it so happened; for the Amalekites, provoked by his late ravages, had burnt Ziklag, made prisoners of his two wives, Ahinoam and Abigail, and the rest of the people, and carried off what was valuable. His men were so enraged, that they spoke of stoning him, as the cause of this disaster. But he encouraged himself in the Lord, and consulted him, whether he should pursue the plunderers, and if he could overtake them? Directed of God, he pursued them. An Egyptian slave of the enemy, who had been ill used, and fallen sick by the way, being his guide, he found the Amalekites spread abroad at a riotous feast in the field; he came on them unexpectedly, cut the most of them to pieces, recovered the prisoners and booty, and took a rich spoil. Two hundred of his men had, by reason of fatigue, been obliged to halt at the brook Besor. The rest, who were engaged in the action, refused to give these any thing but their wives and children; but David made them equal sharers of the booty with their brethren. His own share of the spoil he divided among his friends in Bethel, South Ramoth, Jattir, Aroer, Siphmoth, Eshtemoa, Rachal, Hormah, Corashan, Athach, Hebron, and other cities in the south of Judah. By this means he at once expressed his gratitude for the kindness which he had received, and at this critical juncture recommended himself to their favour. 1 Sam. xxvii.—xxx.

Meanwhile the Philistines had defeated the Hebrews at Gilboa: Saul and his three sons, with a multitude of his army, were slain. On the third day after the battle, an Amalekite, expecting a reward brought him Saul's crown, and pretended he had helped to despatch him out of life. David ordered him to be killed, as he was, confessedly, a murderer of the king. He and his warriors expressed great sorrow at the news of the defeat; and he composed a mournful elegy in honour of Saul and Jonathan. Finding the slaughter was greatly owing to the Philistines' arrows, he ordered the men of Judah to be taught the use of bows, that they might oppose the enemy on equal terms. 1 Sam. xxxi. 2 Sam. i. 1 Chron. x.

Directed of God, David removed his family and warriors to Hebron. Thither the princes of Judah came, and made him their king; but Abner made Ishbosheth, Saul's son, king over the rest of the tribes. For some years, almost perpetual skirmishes happened between the troops of Ishbosheth and David, in which the latter had always the advantage. At last Abner, conceiving an offence at Ishbosheth, began to treat with David, in order to render him king of all Israel, but was murdered by Joab ere he effected his purpose. David sufficiently marked his detestation of the murder; but Joab's credit with the army saved him from condign punishment. Baanah and Rechab, two Benjamites, murdered Ishbosheth, and brought his head to David, expecting a reward; but he justly ordered them to be slain, and made them standing monuments of his detestation of their treachery and murder. 2 Sam. ii.—iv.

David had already governed the tribe of Judah seven years and six months, when 330,822 armed men from the different tribes assembled to make him king over all Israel. He therefore removed northward to Jerusalem; and with no small difficulty reduced the proud Jebusites, that had kept possession of it till now. Resolved to overturn his government before it was fully established, the Philistines twice marched their troops almost to the walls of Jerusalem, and encamped in the valley of Rephaim. It was probably about this time they had their garrison at Bethlehem, and Adino, Eleazar, and Shammah, David's three principal heroes, broke through their host, and brought him water from the well of Bethlehem, as that about Jerusalem was brackish; but he would not drink it, as they had endangered their lives to bring it, but poured it out as a drink-offering of thankfulness for their preservation. Attending to the direction of his God, David twice defeated these enemies. He next removed the ark of God from Kirjath-Jearim, to bring it to a tent he had prepared for it at Jerusalem. Contrary to the law, they brought in on a cart; but Uzzah being struck dead for touching it when the oxen shook the cart, it was left in the house of Obed-edom. Three months after, it was with great solemnity, according to order, carried up to Jerusalem on the shoulders of the Levites. David, dressed like a common priest, played on an organ before it: Michal rallied him for this behaviour, as too mean and base for a king. He replied, that he thought no expression of gratitude to God, who had given him her father's throne, any baseness, but real honour. 2 Sam. v. and vi. and xxiii. 13—17. 1 Chron. xii.—xvi. David now enjoyed profound peace, and resolved to build a house for the ark of God, as he thought it improper that it should be lodged worse than himself. Nathan the prophet encouraged him in this project. But the Lord by Nathan quickly informed him, that though he approved his good design, yet he had shed, and would shed, too much blood to be concerned in so sacred an undertaking; but that his son and successor should build it; that his family should be established on his throne, and the everlasting King, the Messiah, spring from his loins. With the utmost thankfulness and wonder, David acquiesced in the will of God, and contented himself with preparing a fund and materials for the erection of a temple. 2 Sam. vii. 1 Chron. xvii.

About A. M. 2060, he commenced a war with the Philistines, and rendered that troublesome nation his tributaries. Provoked with the Moabites for the murder of his parents, or for some other cause, he subdued their country, dismantled their fortifications, and slew the most of them, except such as were necessary to cultivate the fields. He next attacked the Syrians of Zobah routed, Hadadeser's army, and just after routed the allied army of Syrians from Zobah and Damascus, put garrisons in their cities, and rendered them tributary. About the same time he attacked the Edomites; and on the field of battle, in the Valley of Salt, cut off 12,000 of them, and 6000 more in the pursuit; or Abishai cut off 18,000 and Joab 12,000 more. Psalm lx. title, 2 Sam. viii. 1 Chron. xviii. It was about this time he found out Mephibosheth, and invited him to live at his table. 2 Sam. ix.

About A. M. 2967, his ambassadors, sent with compliments of condolence to Hæmun king of the Ammonites, were ill used, as if spies, and sent home with their clothes cut over in the middle, and their beards shaved. Fired with indignation, David commenced a war against the Ammonites. Twice he defeated their armies, though mightily enforced with vast numbers of Syrians. Several petty kings of Syria submitted to him. 2 Sam. x. 1 Chron. xix.

In the third year of this war, while Joab, after ravaging the country, invested Rabbah the capital, David at Jerusalem happened, after his sleep, to take an evening walk on the flat roof of his house. He observed Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah, bathing herself in her garden. His lust was inflamed; he sent for and defiled her. She became with child, and informed him of it. To prevent the discovery of their guilt, David called home Uriah from the army; did what he could to make him go home, sleep with his wife, and so be reputed the father of the child. Neither the royal advice nor the luxurious entertainment could prevail on Uriah to approach his own house. David therefore sent back this worthy hero with a letter to Joab, ordering him to have him killed by the sword of the children of Ammon, while his bravery refused to yield to a shameful flight. Uriah, according to direction, was deserted at the siege, and so slain by the Ammonites. Informed of his death, David represented that there was no more but the chance of war in the whole matter, and quickly after took Bathsheba to wife. This scene of wickedness highly provoked the Lord, offended the pious Hebrews, and tempted the very heathens to blaspheme the way of God. By Joab's advice, David, with a strong reinforcement, marched to Rabbah, about sixty-four miles distant from Jerusalem, that he might have the honour of taking a place so noted for strength; he took it by storm; gave it up to the ravage of his soldiers, reserving only what belonged to the king for himself. The principal men, and most violent that held out against him, he put to exquisite tortures, tearing their flesh with arrows, saws, and axes of iron, and burning them quick in their brick-kilns. Or, as some read the words, he obliged them to work at the saw, at cutting of stones, digging of iron-mines, hewing of wood, and making of brick. Thus he used all the Ammonites who did not readily submit to him. 2 Sam. xii. 1.

Scarcely had David returned to Jerusalem, A. M. 2970, when Nathan the prophet, by a parable, brought him to condemn himself in the matter of Uriah, and to supplicate the pardon of his sin. Nathan was soon after ordered of God to inform him, that his crimes should not expose him to wrathful and eternal punishment, but to fearful chastise-ment in this life; that his adulterous child should die in its infancy; several of his family come to an untimely end; one of his sons rebel against him; and his wives be publicly prostituted. No less than four of his sons perished in this quarrel. The child begotten in adultery fell sick in its infancy, and notwithstanding his most earnest prayer, and fasting for its life, was cut off. Next year Bathsheba bore David a second son, whom he called Solomon; but God, by means of Nathan the prophet called him Jedidiah, the beloved of the Lord. 1 Chron. xx. 2 Sam. xi. and xii. Psalm li.

About A. M. 2974, his son Ammon defiled Tamar his sister, and, after two years, was murdered by Absalom on that account. About 2981, Absalom drove his father from his throne, and publicly defiled ten of his concubines. David's liegeward and principal friends fled along with him: but he persuaded Hushai, Abiathar, and Zadok, to serve his interest by staying at Jerusalem. He and his friends crossed the brook Kidron, weeping as they went. As they passed the mount of Olives, Ziba met him with two asses loaded with provision; and by falsely accusing Mephibosheth, his master, of intending to claim the crown, prompted David to make him a grant of Mephibosheth's estate. David was just advanced over against Bahurim, when SHIMEI rudely insulted him, and bitterly cursed him, as a most wicked and bloody monster. He endured all with the utmost resignation and patience, taking it as from the hand of God; nor would he allow his attendants to revenge it on Shimei. Informed by Hushai of Absalom's designs, he fled beyond Jordan to Mahanaim, where Barzillai, Shobi, and Machir supplied him with plenty of provisions. During this rebellion, he composed a number of excellent Psalms; the iid, perhaps to the viith; the xlist, xliind, xliiird, xliivth, and xliyth, &c. Absalom pursued him as quickly as possible with a formidable army; but his troops were routed, and himself, contrary to the charge David had given to his warriors, was slain. David most bitterly lamented his death. Joab sharply rebuked him for so discouraging his friends and soldiers, who had saved his life at the hazard of their own. David upon this forbore his mourning, and spoke kindly to his friends. He next set forward for Jerusalem, and sent word to the chief men of Judah to show their distinguished zeal on this occasion; and promised Amasa, his nephew, the office of chief general in room of Joab, who had highly offended him in the killing of Absalom. The men of Judah, instigated by Amasa, immediately invited David back to his throne, and multitudes went to conduct him home. Shimei, at the head of a thousand Benjamites, came with the first, and, by his frank confession of his late behaviour, obtained his pardon, contrary to the remonstrance of Abishai. Mephibosheth too met David, and cleared himself of the charge which had been laid against him by Ziba. He was continued in favour, but had no more than half of his estate restored to him, while his treacherous servant was allowed to enjoy the other half. To reward Barzillai the Gileadite for his late generosity, David begged him to go and live with him in his palace; but the old man declining this offer, David took Chimham his son with him. When the other tribes found that the men of Judah had come before them to bring back their king, they were highly offended, and hot speeches were thrown out on both sides, especially by the men of Judah, as they reckoned themselves more deeply connected with David. Sheba the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, instigated the ten tribes to a new revolt; but Joab, after murdering Amasa, who had been, perhaps not very justly, invested with his office, pursued Sheba, and soon put an end to his life and rebellious attempt. 2 Sam. xliii—xx. About A. M. 2963, God punished the Israelites with a famine of three years' continuance. Informed by God that it was the punishment of Saul and the people's sin in murdering the Gibeonites, whom, by a solemn oath made about four hundred and thirty years before, they were bound to preserve, David sent for the remains of that people, and asked what satisfaction they required for the injury done them? Upon their demand, Armoni and Mephibosheth, the sons of Saul by Rizpah, and the five sons of Adriel the son of Barzillai the Maholathite, born by Merab, and brought up by Michal the daughter of Saul, were delivered to the Gibeonites, and they hanged them up before the Lord in Gibeah, and his anger was appeased. Much about this time, or perhaps a little before it, the Philistines, encouraged by a family of giants, made four different attacks on the Israelites; in one of which David had like to have been slain, had not Abishai run up to his assistance, and slain the giant: after which the Hebrews would no more allow David to go to battle, lest his death should quench their light, glory, and comfort. 2 Sam. xxi. 1 Chron. xx.

The above famine had scarcely ceased, when David, permitted of God, and tempted by Satan, proudly resolved to have all his subjects, capable of arms, numbered; and Joab was appointed to take the account. Joab remonstrated against this project, as not agreeable to the promise of God to render the Hebrews innumerable: but was obliged to yield to the king's will. After nine months, he brought in the account. The men of Judah amounted to 470,000, which, together with their 24,000 of standing militia, made nearly 500,000. The men of Israel were 800,000, which, with several odd thousands, and the 264,000 of the eleven trained bands, made near 1,100,000. But the Levites and Benjamites were not numbered, as Joab heartily detested the whole business. Offended with David's pride, God offered him his choice of three different punishments, calculated to diminish the number of his subjects; three years of famine added to the former three; three months' flight before their enemies; or three days' pestilence. David chose the last, as it came immediately from the hand of a gracious God. It had lasted about nine hours, and had cut off 70,000 persons, when David observed an angel brandishing his sword over Jerusalem, and ready to destroy the inhabitants. With great earnestness he implored mercy and forgiveness; and having erected an altar on the threshing-floor of ARAUNAH, and offered sacrifices thereon, the plague was stayed. 1 Chron. xxi. 2 Sam. xxiv.

About A. M. 2968, David's aged body was now so exhausted of natural warmth, or smitten with a kind of palsy, that he could get no heat in his bed. They got him Abishag, a beautiful young woman, to sleep with him, and keep his body in temper; but he had no carnal intimacy with her. Meanwhile, as David was too indulgent to his children, Adonijah attempted to render himself his successor, but was prevented; and Solomon was made king, as David had long before promised to Bathsheba his mother. In the latter part of his reign, David made great preparations for building the temple of God; and he settled the priests, Levites, singers, and porters, in their respective orders and stations of service. His kingdom was put into the most excellent order. Of 288,000 standing militia, 24,000 served each month by turns: rulers were assigned to the various tribes of Israel, and to the king's stores, vineyards, flocks, and herds. The history of his MIGHTIES will be given hereafter. Perceiving his death near, David confirmed Solomon's enthronement; delivered into his hand a model of the temple, which had been prescribed him by God, with about 46,000 tons' weight of gold and silver, besides an immense quantity of brass and other materials for the use of it. And having given him various solemn charges with respect to his religious and civil conduct, and enjoined him to punish Joab for his murders, and Shimei for his opprobrious insult, and poured forth a prophetic prayer on his behalf, he died, expressing his firm assurance and full comfort in the everlasting covenant made with him and his seed. He reigned seven years and a half in Hebron, and thirty three in Jerusalem. He penned a vast number of PSALMS, especially during his troubles. He was a noted type of our Saviour. God gave him the exalted character of his servant, and a man after his heart; but the Jewish Rabbins, and other wicked men, have rudely abused him. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1 Kings i. and ii. 1 Chron. xxii—xxix. Psal. lxxii. Acts xiii. 22, 26.

Jesus Christ is frequently called DAVID, because he was the antitype of the former. He is the chosen one of God, who sprung from Bethlehem; the man according to his heart, who fulfils all his counsels. How noted his fidelity, meekness, and humility; his love to God, zeal for his honour, and devout intimacy with him! Thrice, in his conception, at his baptism, and at his ascension, he was plentifully anointed with the Holy Ghost above measure to be the head of God's chosen people. He is the covenant-head of his spiritual seed, who are kings unto God. He is our sweet Psalmist, who sings for himself, and indites our songs, and tunes our hearts to praise God. He is our great Prophet and King, who instructs, forms, and governs his church, the Israel of God. Through what debasement, labour, reproach, temptation from the world, from heaven, from hell, from relations, from friends, from foes, did he obtain his kingdom and glory! With what resignation, courage, and steady eye to his Father's glory, and sure hope of deliverance, he endured the whole! How he defeated and destroyed the lions, the bears, the giants of hell; fulfilled the law, destroyed death and the grave; and, by the gospel, conquers the nations to the obedience of faith; and puts his chosen people in possession of the whole inheritance and dominion assigned them by God! How skilful, compassionate, and righteous, is he in the government of his subjects! and how active in forming the gospel-church; and in preparing the temple above for his people, and in preparing them for it! His mighties, who, by the word of the gospel, do wondrous exploits, are prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, and teachers: and his faithful warriors are such as, discontented with their natural state, poverty, and debt, have been obliged to enlist in his service. Psal. lxxxix. Ezek. xxxiv. and xxxvii. Hos. iii. 5.

DAY. An artificial day is that space of time which intervenes between the rising and setting of the sun, and by the light thereof is fit for labour. A natural day is the period between one midnight, or noon-tide, and another, consisting of twenty-four hours. The civil day is much the same; but it begins and ends according to the custom of different nations. The Hebrews began their sacred, if not their civil day, from the evening. Lev. xxii. 32. The ancient Athenians, Austrians, Bohemians, Marcomans, Silesians, modern Italians, and Chinese, do the same. The Chaldeans, Persians, Syrians, and modern Greeks, begin it at the rising of the sun; the ancient Umbri and Arabians at noon. The Egyptians and almost all the moderns in Europe, begin their day at midnight. As in the polar circles, the sun continues sometimes twenty-four hours, or more, above the horizon, there must be fewer artificial days in these places; nay, under the poles, the whole year is but one artificial day, the sun being six months above, and other six below the horizon. In prophetic language a day is put for a year; and so a week is seven years, a month thirty, and a year or time, 360, Ezek. iv. 5, 6. Dan. ix. 24. and vii. 25. Rev. iv. 15. and x. 8. One day is with the Lord as a thousand years; and a thousand years as one day. God's duration is without succession of moments; so that a longer period is no more in his account, and in comparison with his eternity, than a shorter one. 2 Pet. iii. 8. As the day is a period proper for work, so any noted occasion of mercy or judgment is called a day. Psal. xxxvii. 13. Mal. iv. 1. Jer. i. 4, 20. The day of the Lord often signifies the period when he will execute his fearful judgments. Isa. ii. 12. and xiii. 6. Psal. xxxvii. 13. Job xxiv. 1. Zeph. i. 14, 18. The day of Christ, is either the period of his humiliation, and the time of the powerful spread of the gospel. John viii. 56; or the period of the Jewish destruction, and of the last judgment. The season is fixed; and great is, or will be, the work and discoveries made therein. 2 Pet. iii. 12. 1 Cor. iii. 13. and v. 6. Phil. i. 6. Or the Christian Sabbath, which he set apart to commemorate the memory of his resurrection. Rev. i. 10. The day of persons, is either their birth-day, Job iii. 1; or the season of merciful opportunities and prosperity, Luke xix. 42. Amos v. 8; or their day or season of ruin and trouble, Psal. xxxvii. 13. and cxxxvii. 7. Job iii. 8; or the eternal period of their complete happiness. Rom. xiii. 12. A day of power, is that period in which Jesus, by his word and Spirit, powerfully converts sinners to himself. Psal. cx. 3. A day of espousals, is the period in which one, or rather many souls are spiritually united to Christ. Sol. Song iii. 11. A day of slaughter, signifies a time of excessive feasting; as when multitudes of peace offerings were slain, or when some sumptuous feast is held. Jam. v. 5. The day of vengeance in Christ's heart, and year of his redeemed, is the appointed time for punishing his enemies, and for saving, delivering, and comforting his people. Isa. lxiii. 4. The season of gospel-light, opportunities, and success, is called a day, and a day of salvation: it is a period of light, labour, and comfort. Isa. xlix. 8. 2 Chron. vi. 2. Psal. cxviii. 23. Saving knowledge of Christ, and a state of gracious union with him, are called a day. 1 Thess. v. 5, 8. 2 Pet. i. 19. The state of heavenly glory is called a day of redemption: there the ransomed constantly enjoy the light of God's countenance, are delivered from bondage and trouble, and are active in the service of God. Eph. iv. 30. The day-break or breaking, which the saints did or do long for, is the period of Jesus' birth, and of the New Testament dispensation, when the wind of the Holy Spirit's influences should affect men's souls, the new light of truth shine into the world, and the shadows of legal ceremonies be abolished: or the season of death and the resurrection, when, by the influence of the Spirit of God, we shall be introduced into the light of endless glory, and all shadows of infirmities, troubles, darkness, and sin, be abolished. Sol. Song ii. 17.

The day of the king, is the day of his birth, or of his coronation; which is commonly commemorated annually with feasting, joy, and gladness. Hos. vii. 5. A great day, is a season of something very great and wonderful; and that either of great mercy, as when the Jews shall be converted to the Lord, Hos. i. 11; or of great trouble and vengeance; as on the Jews, when led captive by the Chaldeans, and when almost destroyed by the Romans. Jer. xxx. 7. Joel ii. 31. Mal. iv. 5; and on heathenism and Antichrist at their downfall. Rev. vi. 17. and xvi. 14. That day, in predictions, does not always signify the time of the events mentioned just before, but a noted period; as Isa. xi. 1. and xxvii. 1; or of the last judgment. Jude 6. This day, denotes a time near at hand, as well as one present. Deut. ix. 1. and xi. 8. This day sometimes denotes eternity, wherein Christ was divinely begotten, and which admits of no yesterday, or to-morrow, Psal. ii. 7. Isa. xliiii. 13; or the period of his resurrection, when his eternal generation and divine Sonship were manifested. Acts xiii. 33. The latter or last days, denote future time in general, Gen. xlix. 1; the period of the New Testament dispensation, Isa. ii. 2; the last part of the gospel-period, 1 Tim. iv. 1. 2 Tim. iii. 1; or the day of death and judgment. Jam. v.

3. A good day, is one of prosperity, feasting, and gladness. Esth. viii. 17. and ix. 22. An evil or bitter day, is a time of trouble and distress. Amos vi. 3. and viii. 10. To-day denotes a present season of grace and opportunity of salvation. Psal. xcv. Heb. iii. and iv. In one day, sometimes denotes suddenly, and all at once. Rev. xviii. 8. In the day-time, signifies publicly, or at a set time. 2 Pet. ii. 13. Psal. xlii. 8; or in a time of scorching trouble and persecution. Isa. iv. 6. All the day, is constantly, habitually. Dent. xxviii. 52. Psal. xxv. 5.

DAYS; signify, (1.) A period of duration; thus, the days of men are their whole life. Psal. xc. 9. The days of a tree, denote a long happy period. Isa. lxxv. 22. The days of Christ, denote the period of his powerfully gathering the nations to himself, and governing his people. Jer. xxiii. 6. The days of heaven, mark eternal duration. Psal. lxxxix. 29. (2.) The events that happen in a period. Psal. xxxvii. 18; xxxi. 15. and cxix. 84. Isa. vii. 17. (3.) Persons of great age. Job xxxii. 7. The ten days of the church's tribulation denote a short time, or the ten years of persecution, from A. D. 302 to 312. Rev. ii. 10. The 1260 days of Antichrist's reign, which is the same with forty-two months, or time, times, and half a time, are 1260 years. Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 6. Dan. vii. 25. and xlii. 11, 12. The 2300 days of the pollution of the sanctuary, may either denote so many days from the first pollution of it by Antiochus Epiphanes to the perfect purification of it by Judas the Maccabee; or rather so many mornings and evenings, and no more than 1150 days. Dan. viii. 14. A days-man, is an arbitrator that judges a cause; or a mediator. Job ix. 33. The day-spring is the first beginning of light in the morning; or day-break. Job xxxvii. 12. Jesus Christ is called the day-spring, that visits us from on high. Luke i. 78. By his appearance in our nature, by his righteousness, resurrection, saving discoveries of himself, and appearance to judgment, he introduces light and comfort; and brings in a day of gospel-dispensation, spiritual knowledge, gracious state, and endless glory.

DEACON. The word so rendered is applied to such as perform important services in the church or state; as to Christ. Rom. xv. 8; to gospel-ministers, ordinary or extraordinary, 1 Cor. iii. 5. Col. i. 23, 25; to every follower of Christ, John xii. 26; and to magistrates, Rom. xiii. 4: but it is chiefly used to signify an officer in the church, whose business it is to serve in distributing the elements at the Lord's table, and to provide for and duly distribute support to ministers, and to the poor. Phil. i. 1. When the converts to the Christian faith were exceedingly multiplied at Jerusalem, and the Hellenists, or Jews who used the Greek language, complained that their widows were overlooked in the administration of the sacred alms, the apostles, not reckoning it proper for themselves to leave the constant preaching of the gospel, desired the multitude of converts to choose from among themselves seven men of good report, and filled with the Holy Ghost, who might be ordained to manage this business. Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Parmenas, Timon, and Nicolas, were chosen. These the apostles ordained by prayer and laying on of hands. Acts vi. It is required that deacons be chaste, sincere, blameless, sober, and honest, rule well their families, and be well approved, before ordination. It is plain some of the first seven deacons were afterwards preachers; but no where do the sacred oracles hint that preaching belongs to the office of a deacon. 1 Tim. iii. 8—12. For many ages after Christ, deacons were considered as inferior to presbyters; but by Antichristian power they were exalted above them, and continue so in the Popish and Episcopalian churches.

It is both sinful and shameful that these officers, the divine institution of which is so plainly marked in scripture, should be so often wanting in Christian congregations, under pretence that ruling elders have their whole power resident in them.

DEAD; (1.) Deprived of natural life. 1 Pet. iv. 6. Ruth i. 8. (2.) Without spiritual life; under the dominion of sin; void of grace; incapable to perform any spiritual exercise, Eph. ii. 1. 1 Tim. v. 6; or even desperately obstinate in wickedness. Luke xv. 24. (3.) What never had life, as idols, &c. Job xxvi. 5. Isa. viii. 19. (4.) What has no continued existence, no living soul to be reunited to its body. Matt. xxii. 32. (5.) In a state of mortality; condemned or signally exposed to death. Rom. viii. 10. Gen. xx. 3. (6.) In a state of oppression, slavery, and desperate-like wretchedness. Isa. xxvi. 19. Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14. (7.) Unfit for generation, according to the power of nature. Rom. ix. 19. Heb. xi. 12. (8.) Formal hypocrites; or much decayed in grace. Rev. iii. 1. (9.) The resurrection of the dead. 1 Cor. xv. 20. Let the dead bury their dead; let men dead in sin bury those naturally dead: or let the dead lie unburied, rather than the preaching of the gospel be hindered. Dead, or rather monstrous gigantic things, are formed from under the waters; whales and other huge animals, and strange creatures, are produced in the deep seas. Job xxvi. 5. Dead faith is that persuasion of divine truth which flows not from spiritual life, and is not productive of good works. James ii. 17, 20. Dead works are those that flow not from a principle of spiritual life, but from corrupt nature, which is in a state of spiritual death. Heb. ix. 14. To be dead to the law, as a covenant, is to be delivered from the obligations of it, and from a reigning inclination to be under it, Rom. vii. 4; and it is dead to us, when it can exercise no commanding or condemning power over our conscience. Gal. ii. 19. Sin is dead relatively, when it lies undiscovered and unregarded in the soul, Rom. vii. 8; it is dead really, when it is mortified and slain by the word, Spirit, and blood of Christ. Rom. vi. 6. To die to sin, or be dead to it, is to be freed from the dominion of it, and the curse due to it, by the blood of Christ, and by his grace drawn from the love and service of it. Rom. vi. 7. The saints are dead both to the law and to sin. Col. iii. 2. The wicked are dead; are in a powerless and mean condition, during the thousand years' reign of the saints. Rev. xx. 5.

DIE, to be laid under the sentence or execution of death. Gen. ii. 17. Christ died unto sin, when by death, he made atonement for it; and believers reckon themselves dead unto sin, when they receive a full remission of their sins through his death, and become thus firmly entitled to, and reinstated in eternal life. Rom. vi. 10, 11.

DEAF. (1.) Without natural hearing. The Hebrew word signifies also DUMB, or silent; because such as are born deaf cannot easily learn to speak; though there have been various instances of their learning to know what was said, by the motion of the speaker's lips. According to the ancient predictions, Christ healed many who were deaf and dumb. Isa. xxxv. 5; xxix. 18. and xlii. 18. Matt. xi. 5. Cursing of the deaf, or putting a stumbling-block before the blind, exposed him who did so to distinguished punishment and wrath, as it was an outrageous insulting of God, who had made them such. Lev. xix. 14. (2.) Without spiritual ability or concern to regard or understand divine things. Isa. xlii. 18, 19. and xxix. 18. (3.) Saints are as deaf and dumb, when they exercise the utmost patience and resignation under trouble; neither murmuring against God, nor angrily vindicating themselves before men. Psal. xxviii. 13. and xxxix. 9.

DEAL; (1.) To act; to behave. Jesus deals prudently in the work of our redemption, always employing the most proper means to gain the most noble ends. Isa. lii. 13. Men deal with one another wisely, falsely, deceitfully, subtilly, foolishly, corruptly, perversely, treacherously, proudly, truly, with knowledge, or with a slack, prodigal, and careless hand. Exod. i. 10. Lev. xix. 11, &c. (2.) To distribute by parts. Isa. lviii. 7. Rom. xii. 3; and a DEAL signifies a part. Exod. xxxix. 40. Num. xv. 4-9. God deals bountifully and in mercy, when he graciously bestows his favours on men worthless and miserable. Psal. cxvi. 7; cxix. 17, 124, and cxlii. 7. He deals bitterly and in fury, when he sorely afflicts and punishes men. Ruth i. 20. Ezek. viii. 18; xvi. 59. and xxii. 14.

DEAR; precious; eminently beloved. Jer. xxxi. 20. Col. i. 13. Dearly beloved; loved in the most tender manner and highest degree. Rom. xii. 19. The Jewish nation were the dearly beloved of God's soul. He had taken great delight to do them good, and brought them into covenant with him, as his peculiar people. Jer. xii. 7.

DEATH is sometimes taken for great danger, distress, and affliction. 2 Cor. i. 10. and xi. 23. In this sense, Paul died daily, was constantly exposed to, or suffering great distress. 1 Cor. xv. 31. The saints bear about in their body the dying of the Lord Jesus; they endure manifold sufferings, after his example, and for his sake. 2 Cor. iv. 10. (2.) For the separation of the soul from the body, in consequence of which the body becomes destitute of natural life, and corrupts into dust. Gen. xxi. 11. In allusion to this, seed cast into the ground is said to die, when it corrupts in such a manner as is necessary to its springing up in new stalks. John xii. 24. (3.) For spiritual death, which consists in being under the curse of God's law, separated from his favour, destitute of his moral image, and under the dominion and total pollution of sin. 1 John iii. 14. Luke i. 79. Eph. ii. 1. And with respect to this, persons are said to be twice dead when, to that naturally inflicted on all men there are added additional degrees of alienation and apostasy from God, contracted by a sinful practice, and impressed by the just vengeance of God. Jude 13. (4.) Everlasting punishment of both soul and body in hell; this is the second death, which comes after the first. Rev. xx. 6, 14. (5.) The certain cause of death, as some poisonous thing. 2 Kings iv. 40. The pestilence, or like infectious disease. Jer. xv. 2.

The saints' love is strong as death; it can neither be bribed nor resisted; it effectually weans and separates the heart from sinful habits and courses. Sol. Song viii. 6. Death unto death, is the ruin of soul and body, in time and in eternity. 2 Cor. ii. 16. To have death working in us, and have the sentence of death in us, is to be daily exposed to and lay our account with the suffering of trouble and death, for the sake of Christ and his truths. 2 Cor. iv. 12. and i. 9. The law of God is unto death, and a ministration of it. No life can be had by the works of it; but every man under it is cursed and condemned to death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal. Rom. vii. 10. 2 Cor. iii. 7. It is made death to a convinced sinner; it irritates his sinful lusts, occasions the increase of his sin, and kills his vain hopes of eternal happiness. Rom. vii. 13. To be carnally minded is death; it confirms and constitutes spiritual death; it forebodes, prepares for, and condemns to eternal death. Rom. viii. 6. Wicked works are fruit unto death, they flow from spiritual death, expose to, and prepare for eternal death. Rom. vi. 16, 21. and vii. 5. The feet of a harlot go down to death, and her steps take hold on hell; she hastens herself, and those who deal with her in whoredom, to a natural death, and to everlasting ruin. Prov. v. 5, 6. Christ abolished death, and swallowed it up in victory; by his own death he removed the curse and sting from his people's natural death; and redeemed them from spiritual and eternal death; and hereafter he will raise them from the dead, and give them the full possession of eternal happiness. 2 Tim. i. 10. 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55. Isa. xxv. 8. Death and hell are cast into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone; when the bodies of the wicked, once mortal or dead, and their souls mostly once in hell, are united together, and shut up in Tophet, where all the former torments of both are summed up with inconceivable increase; after which no effect of the divine curse shall remain any where, but in that pit of endless misery. Rev. xx. 14.

DEBASE; to render base and contemptible. Men debase themselves to hell, when they commit the vilest crimes, and thereby expose themselves to contempt, and the most disgraceful punishments, in order to fulfil their lusts. Isa. lvii. 9.

DEBATE; to dispute. A man ought to debate his cause with his neighbour: he ought privately and meekly to reason the point of difference between them. Prov. xxv. 9. God debates in measure with his people, when he reproves and corrects them as they are able to bear it. Isa. xxvii. 8.

DEBATE signifies contention, especially in words. Rom. i. 29.

DE'BIR. (1.) A city of the tribe of Judah, near Hebron. It was also called Kirjath-sepher, and Kirjath-sannah, because there the Canaanites had a seat of learning. Joshua took it, but it seems the Canaanites repossessed themselves of it; and Caleb, to whose lot it fell, observing the strength of its walls and inhabitants, gave Achsah his daughter to Othniel for making the first effectual assault on it. It was afterward given to the priests. Josh. xi. 39; xv. 15, 16, and xxi. 15. (2.) A city on the frontiers of the tribe of Gad. The seventy will have it to be the same as Dibon; but it is rather the same as Lodebar, where Mephiboseth lived in his childhood with Machar his friend. Josh. xiii. 26. 2 Sam. ix. 4, 5. (3.) A king of Eglon. Josh. x. 3. (4.) A city of Benjamin, which formerly belonged to Judah. Josh. xv. 7.

DEB'O-RAH. (1.) Rebekah's nurse who came along with her from Padan-aram. After the death of her mistress, she continued with her country-women in Jacob's family. She died near Bethel in a very advanced age, and was buried under an oak-tree, called, from that event, ALONBACHUTH, the oak of weeping. Gen. xxiv. 59. xxxv. 8.

(2.) DEB'O-RAH; a prophetess and judge of Israel, and wife of Lapidoth. She dwelt under a palm-tree between Ramah and Bethel. When JABIN king of Canaan had for twenty years grievously oppressed the Israelites, she sent for BARAK the son of Abinoam, a man of Issachar, who lived in Kadesh-Naphtali, and, from God, directed him to levy an army of 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulun, the tribes which had been principally enslaved, and march them to mount Tabor, where the Lord would deliver Sisera, and the mighty host of Jabin, into his hand. He refused to attempt this, unless she would go along with him; she consented; but told him that his cowardice should be punished by the Lord's giving the chief honour of the victory, the death of the general, into the hand of a woman. They had scarcely levied their troops, and marched from Kadesh to Tabor, when Sisera was at their heels with a prodigious army. It seems, scarcely one of Barak's 10,000 had either sword or spear; but the Canaanites were struck with a panic, when they saw the Hebrews come down from the hill to attack them: the slaughter was so universal that few escaped. Barak and Deborah composed a song to commemorate their victory, and to praise God on account of it; and to celebrate the Hebrew princes, and Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, for their instrumentality therein; and to condemn the tribes of Asher, Dan, and Reuben, for their inactivity. Judg. iv. and v.

DEBT; what one owes to another. 1 Sam. xxii. 2. Sin is called a debt; it consists in withholding from God his due honour and love; and by suffering must his justice be satisfied for its offence. Matt. vi. 12. A DEBTOR is one who, by promise or equity, owes somewhat to another. The saints are not debtors to the flesh; they owe no service to their sinful lusts but to God, who has saved them with a full and everlasting salvation. Rom. viii. 12. Circumcised persons were debtors to fulfil the whole law: by circumcision they solemnly declared their obligation and willingness to do so; such as came to circumcision, after the erection of the gospel-church, renounced, in effect, Christ's fulfilment of the law, and obliged themselves to a personal fulfilment of the whole broken covenant. Gal. v. 3. Sinners are debtors to God, owe much obedience to the precept, and satisfaction to the penalty of his holy law. Luke vii. 41. Mal. xviii. 24. Paul was a debtor to both Jews and gentiles, wise and unwise; he was bound by office to preach the gospel to them. Rom. i. 14. Love to one another is a debt we ought never to think discharged. Rom. xiii. 8.

DE-CAPO-LIS; a country, according to Lightfoot, on the north and east of the sea of Tiberias; but if Bethshan was one of the cities of it, part of it lay on the south-west of that sea. It was called Decapolis, because there were ten cities in it, viz. Bethshan, Gadara, Hippos, Pella, Cephar-zemach, Beth-gubron, Caphar-carnaim, Cesarea-Philippi, Orbo, and another whose name I find not. Some say it was Damascus, but that was certainly too far distant. Here Jesus preached, and healed the diseased inhabitants. Matt. iv. 25.

DECAY; to lessen, to weaken. Job xiv. 11. Neh. iv. 10. Cities and houses are decayed, when broken down, and in a ruinous condition. Eccl. x. 18. Isa. xlv. 20.

DECEASE; to die a natural death. Matt. xxii. 25. Death. Luke ix. 31.

DECEIT; FRAUD; GUILT; (1.) Villanous and unjust conduct practised under a fair show. Psal. x. 7. and xxxvi. 3. (2.) Fair pretences and devices, calculated to impose on and deceive men. Psal. xxxviii. 12. (3.) Deluding messages, dreams, and lies of false teachers calculated to please men's humours, and gratify their lusts. Isa. xxx. 10. Jer. viii. 5. and ix. 6. (4.) False accusation; dishonest conduct; and goods gotten by means of it. Jer. v. 27. Zeph. i. 9. One is without guile, when he allows himself in no hypocrisy, deceit, or dishonesty. Psal. xxxii. 2. Being crafty, I caught you with guile: mine enemies will perhaps say, Though I myself did not appear covetous of your money, yet by a crafty, guileful, and underhand dealing, I procured it by Titus, or some other of my friends. 2 Cor. xii. 16.

DECEITFUL; (1.) Much given to deceit and villany. Psal. v. 6. (2.) Full of deceit; calculated to impose on, and craftily ruin men. Psal. xxxv. 20. Our hearts and their lusts are deceitful above all things; they, in unnumbered ways, beguile multitudes out of their present and eternal happiness for mere trifles; and render them persuaded of the innocence or goodness of things the most abominable and wicked; fill them with views of God, of Christ, of time and eternity, of themselves, the most contrary to truth. Jer. xvii. 9. Heb. iii. 13. Eph. iv. 22. Favour is deceitful; it has a fair show, and no more. Prov. xxxi. 30. A bow is deceitful, which shoots wide of the mark. Psal. lxxviii. 37. Men handle the word of God deceitfully, when they wrest it to please the corrupt humours of themselves or others; when they mingle it with their own inventions, and use it to promote or protect passion, pride, covetousness, &c. 2 Cor. iv. 2. and ii. 17. To swear deceitfully, is to swear false and unlawful oaths, or to swear lawful ones, without a candid resolution and earnest care to fulfil them. Psal. xxiv. 4.

DECEIVE; (1.) To cheat; beguile. Ger. xxxi. 7. Lev. vi. 2. (2.) To mislead; seduce. Deut. xi. 16. Isa. xlv. 20. (3.) To allure; entice. Job xxxi. 9. The Lord deceives false prophets, when he gives them up to the delusions of their own hearts, and frustrates their expectations and predictions. Ezek. xiv. 7. Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived: thou hast, contrary to my inclination, persuaded me to undertake this office of prophesying, and hast disappointed me of the success and comfort I expected in it. Jer. xx. 7. Heretics deceive and are deceived; they are persuaded of the goodness or innocence of error and wickedness, and endeavour to persuade others of it. 2 Tim. iii. 13. Adam was not deceived; i. e. was not first deceived. 1 Tim. ii. 14.

DECENTLY; with becoming soberness and gravity. 1 Cor. xiii. 5. and xiv. 40.

DECIDE; to give sentence as to what should be done in a case. 1 Kings xx. 40.

DECISION denotes, the Lord's passing and executing just sentence on his people, and his enemies. Joel iii. 14.

DECLARE; (1.) To tell; publish. Psal. ix. 11. (2.) To explain; make clear and manifest. Gen. xli. 24. Isa. liii. 8. The heavens declare the glory of God: Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. Their form and order shew forth the glorious wisdom, power, and goodness of their Almighty Former. Compare Psal. xix. 1, 2. with Job xli. 8, 9. Rom. i. 19, 20.

DECLINE; to turn aside. To decline from God's testimonies, word, law, or way, is to disregard them, and walk in sinful courses opposite thereto. Psal. cxix. 51, 157. Job xxiii. 11. Psal. xlv. 18.

DECREASE; (1.) To become less honoured. John iii. 30. (2.) To become fewer, and weaker. Psal. cvii. 38. The waters of the flood decreased, when, being dissipated into the air, or returned into the bowels of the earth, they ceased to cover the ground. Gen. viii. 5.

DECREE, firmly to purpose, and authoritatively to appoint. Job xxii. 28. Isa. x. 1. A DECREE is (1.) An authoritative determination, or law. 2 Chron. xxx. 5. The acts of the Christian council at Jerusalem are called decrees ordained, to mark their binding force upon the churches. Acts xvi. 4. (2.) God's settled purpose, whereby he foreordains whatsoever comes to pass. Dan. iv. 24. The decree made for the rain, the sea, &c. denotes not only the purposes of God fixing the plan of these things, but also the fixed laws of nature, established to them. Job xxviii. 26. and xxxviii. 10. Prov. viii. 29. Jer. v. 22. The decree which Christ declares, is the covenant of grace made with him, as the only begotten Son of God, and our Surety. Psal. ii. 7—10.

The DECREES of God are his purpose, whereby, from all eternity, he has, for his own glory, and according to the counsel of his will, unchangeably foreordained all things which come to pass. They imply his foreknowledge and fixed settlement of all persons, events, and circumstances, that take place. Acts xv. 18. That God has thus decreed all things, is evident from his infinite knowledge; his having all creatures dependent on him; and his having so often foretold the birth and death of persons in the most circumstantial manner. The most noted branch of the divine decree is his predestination, or fixed appointment of the eternal state of every particular angel and man, together with every means and circumstance thereof. To understand this aright, it is necessary to keep our eye fixed upon the infinite wisdom and equity of God's nature, and his absolute sovereignty over all his creatures. God's predestination of angels is his holy, wise, and unchangeable purpose, whereby, from all eternity, he determined to form in time so many millions of them in a state of holiness and happiness, but subject to change; to establish such individuals of them in this state, and for ever employ them to enjoy his favour, and show forth the praises of his bounty and goodness; and to permit others to fall into sin through their own fault, and lie therein, and be, on account of it, eternally punished to the praise of the glory of his justice. 1 Tim. v. 21. Jude 6. 2 Pet. ii. 4.

God's predestination of men is his eternal purpose, whereby he determined to form so many of them; to create them, in their origin and representative, holy and happy; to permit their covenant-head to fall, and bring on their whole race sinfulness and misery. Out of this multitude, involved in common corruption and ruin, he from no regard to foreseen good works, but for his mere good pleasure, elected in Christ the smaller number to everlasting life, and fixed the whole means for securing it, viz. by the incarnation, obedience unto death, and intercession of his Son; the dispensation of ordinances, and their attendance thereto; and the conviction, renovation, and sanctification of the Holy Ghost. Eph. i. 4—6. 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14. The rest he, in a sovereign and righteous manner, purposed to leave in their sin, permit them to increase their wickedness, and, in fine, to punish them on account of it, to the praise of the glory of his justice. Rom. ix. 11—23. Matt. xi. 25, 26.

More largely: ELECTION, according to the scripture, is an act of God, in which he, as an eternal, unchangeable, infinitely wise, good, gracious, sovereign, and faithful Jehovah, intending to manifest the glory of his own perfections, particularly of his power, wisdom, sovereignty, grace, and mercy, (Eph. iii. 10. and i. 5, 6, 11. Matt. xi. 26. and xx. 15, 16. Rom. ix. 15, 16, 18—23; and xl. 32, 35, 36. 1 Pet. ii. 9.) from all eternity, foreknew, and forechose to everlasting salvation, and all the benefits thereof, (Rom. viii. 29, 30; and v. 8; and ix. 13. John iii. 16. 1 Pet. i. 2. 2 Tim. ii. 19. 1 John iv. 9, 10, 19.) some particular persons of mankind, whom he pleased, and but the smaller number, and as permitted, or to be permitted, to fall into sin and misery, from which they could not recover themselves, (Matt. xx. 16. and xxii. 14. Luke xii. 32. 2 Tim. ii. 19. John x. 26—28. and xiii. 18.

and xvii. 6, 12. and xv. 19. Rom. viii. 29. and ix. 16, 18. and v. 8, 10;) and preappointed them to salvation, into conformity with Christ, and to an adoption into his family, as heirs of God, and joint heirs with him, (2 Thess. ii. 13. 1 Thess. v. 9. Rom. viii. 17, 29. Eph. i. 5;) and without regarding any foreseen qualities in them, whether natural or moral, as his motive, has, of his own mere will, and sovereign grace and good pleasure, (Matt. xi. 25, 26. 1 Cor. i. 26-28. Rom. ix. 11, 16, 18. Eph. i. 4, 5. 2 Tim. i. 9.) from eternity, (Matt. xxv. 34. Eph. i. 4. 2 Tim. i. 9. Rev. xiii. 8. Tit. i. 2;) chose them in Christ as their head; and unalterably ordained and appointed them to obtain everlasting life in and through him; (Rom. ix. 11, 18, 23. 2 Tim. i. 9. Acts xiii. 48. 1 Thess. v. 9. with iv. 17. Rom. xi. 29. John x. 28, 29.) and inscribed their names in his book of life, (Luke x. 20. Psal. iv. 3. Rev. iii. 5. and xiii. 8. and xvii. 8.) and thus distinguished them from the rest of mankind, who were left in their corruption, and the misery thereby deserved, (1 Cor. iv. 7. and i. 26-28. Rom. ix. 13. Eph. i. 4, 5, 6.) and in the same wise and unchangeable counsel, fixed the mediation of Christ, effectual calling to him, spiritual union with him, and an interest in, and partaking of him, and his righteousness and fulness; together with faith and holiness, as means of their eternal salvation. John iii. 16, 17. and x. 20-29. and xvii. 4, 6. Eph. i. 4. Col. i. 19. 2 Tim. i. 9. 1 Thess. v. 9. 1 Pet. ii. 19, 20. Rom. viii. 1-4, 28-30. Isa. xlv. 24, 25. Acts xiii. 48. 2 Thess. ii. 13. 1 Pet. i. 2. Heb. xi. 6. and xii. 14. John iii. 3, 5.

REPROBATION is an act of God, in which he, the absolutely independent, and infinitely sovereign, wise, powerful, righteous, and holy Jehovah, whose thoughts, judgments, and ways are unsearchable, (Isa. lv. 9. and xl. 18. Rom. xi. 33, 34. Job xi. 6, 7. and xxxiii. 3.) intending to manifest the glory of his high sovereignty, almighty power, unsearchable wisdom, unbounded patience, and revenging justice, (Matt. xx. 15. Rom. xi. 11, 23, 33, 34, 36; ix. 15-22. and ii. 4. Isa. v. 4. Prov. xvi. 4.) did, from all eternity, in his immutable purpose, (Matt. xxv. 34, 41. Rom. ix. 11. James i. 17. Job xxiii. 18. Eph. i. 11. Isa. xli. 10. and xiv. 24, 27.) according to his own mere good pleasure, pass by, and determine to leave certain persons of mankind, greater in number, but in themselves no worse than others, in the state of sin and misery, into which they would fall, (Rom. ix. 13, 15, 17, 18; xi. 20, 21, 22; v. 12. and iii. 10-19, 28. Matt. xx. 15, 16. and xii. 14. and xxiv. 40, 41. Luke xii. 32. Eph. ii. 8.) not to know them with any distinguished regard,—not to love them with any particular good-will,—not to pity them in order to their eternal salvation,—did not choose, predestinate, set apart, or ordain them to eternal life; (Matt. vii. 23. Rom. viii. 29, 30. and ix. 13, 15, 17, 18. John xiii. 18. 1 Cor. iv. 7. Acts xiii. 48. 1 Thess. v. 9.) did not write their names in his book of life, or mark them out for his sheep, people, and subjects, and objects and vessels of mercy; John x. 26. Rom. ix. 6, 7, 25. Hos. i. 6, 9.) and, in consequence hereof, determined to withhold from them the undeserved favours of redemption and reconciliation through Christ, and of effectual calling, justification, and adoption, faith, and holiness, (John x. 15, 26. and xvii. 9. and xii. 37-40. Matt. xi. 25, 26. and xiii. 11, 13. Rom. viii. 28-33. 2 Thess. iii. 2. Eph. ii. 8.) but not all external favours of common providence, or of gospel revelations and common influences, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, (Acts xiv. 17. Rom. ii. 4. and ix. 23. Exod. vii. 16, 17. Lev. xxvi. 3-13. Deut. xxviii. 1-14. Isa. v. 4. Matt. xiii. 9. and xxiii. 37. Heb. vi. 4, 5. and x. 26, 29. 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21. 1 Cor. xii. 10. Gen. vi. 3. Acts vii. 51.) and determined, that they, being of their own accord, rendered miserable by their sin, original and actual, against law or gospel,—and become despisers of his benefits, (Eph. ii. 1-3. Rom. v. 12-14. and ii. 12, 14, 15. Mark xvi. 16. John iii. 18. and xii. 40. Rom. ii. 4, 5. and xi. 7. Matt. x. 15. Job vii. 4. Psal. lxxxi. 11, 12, 13. Acts xiv. 16.) should, in a wise, holy, and sovereign manner, answerably to their freedom of will, and their rebellious dispositions, (Psal. xlv. 6, 7. Jer. xli. 1. Psal. cxlv. 17. and civ. 24. Rom. xi. 33, 34. James i. 13. Matt. xxiii. 37. John v. 40. Acts vii. 51.) for their former sins be further blinded in their mind, and hardened in their heart,—given up to strong delusions, vile affections, and a reprobate sense, (Exod. xiv. 4. John xii. 40. Rom. ix. 15. and xi. 7, 8. and i. 24, 28. 2 Thess. ii. 11. Isa. lxvi. 4;) that, persevering in their obstinate wickedness, and convicted by their own conscience of final impenitence, and neither capable to blame the severity of God, or to excuse themselves as ignorant of his will, or unable to resist his providence, or accept his offered salvation, (Matt. xxvii. 4. Luke xvi. 24, 27. Matt. xxv. 25-28, 44, 45. Rom. ii. 4, 15; i. 20. and ix. 19, 20. Luke xxii. 23. John v. 40.) should, as hated of God, appointed, separated, and fore-ordained to evil, wrath, and condemnation; as children of wrath, and vessels of wrath fitted to destruction, Mal. i. 3. Rom. ix. 13. Prov. xvi. 4. 1 Thess. v. 9. 1 Pet. ii. 8. Jude 4. 2 Thess. ii. 3. John xvii. 12. Rom. ix. 23.) be for their sins, eternally damned. Hos. xiii. 9. Matt. xxv. 41-46. Esak. xviii. 4. Rom. ii. 8, 9. Isa. iii. 11.

The decrees of God are executed in his work of creation and providence, and are the rule according to which he invariably acts. Eph. i. 11. Isa. xli. 10. Without allowing this, we represent the Almighty as inferior to our artists on earth. To imagine that either his purpose or providence interferes with the freedom of the will of rational creatures, is to suppose God so wiser than ourselves, and utterly incapable to form or execute a plan worthy of himself. The means of accomplishing the divine decrees are so connected, that one thing is oft a condition of, or at least indispensably necessary to, the existence of another; but to imagine his purpose itself suspended on the free will and behaviour of men, is to suppose him dependent on his creatures, and their free-will a necessary restraint on his liberty.

DEDAN. (1.) The son of Ramah, and grandson of CUSH. It is probable his posterity had their residence on the west of the Persian Gulf, in Arabia-Felix, where the city Dedan is yet to be found. Gen. x. 7. (2.) The son of Jokshan, and grandson of Abraham. He was the father of the Dedanim, Letushim, Ashurim, and Leummim, tribes in Arabia the Desert. Gen. xxv. 3. Whether the offspring of this man peopled the city of Dedan on the frontiers of Idumea, we know not. It is certain the Dedanites, chiefly the posterity of the latter, traded with the Tyrians in ivory, ebony, and fine cloths, for chariots, and were miserably harassed by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Ezek. xxvii. 15, 20. and xxv. 13. Isa. xxi. 13. Jer. xxv. 23. and xlix. 8.

DEED. See WORK.

DEEM; to think; to guess. Acts xxvii. 27.

DEEP. (1.) A great way from the surface to the bottom. Psal. cxi. 10. (2.) Strange, unknown, incomprehensible. Isa. xxxiii. 19. Job. xii. 22. Dan. ii. 23. Psal. xcii. 5. Thus the deep things of God are the mysteries of his purpose, word, and providence. 1 Cor. ii. 10. (3.) Complete and full. Poverty is deep, when it is very great. 2 Cor. viii. 2. Sleep is deep, when one can hardly be awakened out of it. Acts xx. 9. Dan. ix. 10. To revel deeply; to corrupt themselves deeply; is to proceed in apostasy and wickedness to a fearful degree. Isa. xxxi. 6. Hos. ix. 9.

DEEP or DEPTH; (1.) The ocean, sea, and deep places thereof. Job xli. 31, 32. (2.) The mingled chaos of earth and water. Gen. i. 2. (3.) The huge collection of waters hid in the bowels of the earth. Gen. vii. 11. and viii. 2. (4.) Fearful and overwhelming trouble of soul or body. Psal. cxxx. 1. and lxxxviii. 6. Rom. viii. 39. (5.) The grave. Rom. x. 7. (6.) A deep dungeon, where one sinks in darkness, water, or mire. 2 Cor. xi. 25. (7.) Hell, which is hidden, unsearchable, and bottomless. Luke viii. 31. Rev. xx. 3. Prov. ix. 18. The depths of the sea, into which God casts his people's sins, are the infinity of his pardoning grace, and the unbounded merit of Jesus' blood, whereby our iniquities are so perfectly pardoned, that they can never more be charged on us. Mic. vii. 19. The depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, is the infinity and unsearchableness thereof. Rom. xi. 33. The depth of Jesus' love, is its condescension to save the vilest and meanest sinners from the lowest hell. Eph. iii. 18. The depths of Satan, are mysterious fancies, and secret or shameful practices invented by seducers. Rev. ii. 24. The Chaldean army is likened to a deep, for their multitude, their noise, and their overwhelming conquests. Ezek. xxvi. 19. The countries wasted by the Assyrians are likened to a great deep, for their number of inhabitants, their confusion, and roaring noise. Amos vii. 4. These, as well as the trade of his rivers, Hiddekel, Euphrates, &c. exalted the Assyrian empire and king; and were covered with mourning when it was overturned. Ezek. xxxi. 4, 15. God's judgments are a great deep; are very mysterious, and hard to be understood. Psal. xxxvi. 6.

DEER; a four-footed beast of the flock kind. Their horns are branchy, and fall off yearly: they are at first hairy, but afterwards become smooth. The females seldom have any horns. The various creatures of the deer kind are the hart, the roe-buck, rein-deer, elk, goat-deer, horse-deer, &c. These creatures live long, and, especially when young, are very comely and loving. They have a great antipathy to serpents, and eat multitudes of them. It is said too, that serpents are much disposed to fasten on and sting their bodies, when they find them asleep. Their thirst is excessively strong and painful. They are very timorous, swift, and can leap far. They were allowed to be eaten by the ceremonial law. Lev. xi. 3. Deut. xiv. 5. 1 Kings iv. 23. The hinds, or female deer, have great pain in bringing forth their young, and, it is said, are sometimes assisted by the noise made by claps of thunder. Job xxxix. 1-4. Jesus Christ likened to a roe, hart, and hind, to mark his loveliness and love; his eternal duration; the enmity between him and the old serpent and his seed; his sad suffering and persecution on earth; his thirst for his Father's support, and glorious reward; and his being the allowed provision of our souls, and his speed in coming to deliver us. Sol. Song ii. 9, 17. and viii. 14. Psal. xxii. title. The saints are likened to harts panting for water-brooks, to mark the earnestness of their desire after God, and the ordinances of his grace, when hunted by Satan, and persecuted by the world. Psal. xlii. 1. The saints' breasts of faith, love, and edifying conversation, and the ministers and ordinances of the church, are like twin roes feeding among lilies; are very harmonious, pleasant and comely. Sol. Song iv. 5. and vii. 3. The Chaldeans were like chased roes, when with terror and dread they fled from the fury of the Medes and Persians, not knowing what to do. Isa. xlii. 14. Wives are likened to hinds and roes, to mark their comeliness and affection, and the delight their husbands should take in them. Prov. v. 19. To charge by the roes and hinds is to beseech and obtest, by every thing comely and desirable, and for the sake of Christ and his people. Sol. Song ii. 7. and iii. 5.

Dr. Shaw thinks the Yachmur, which we render fallow-deer, to be the wild-bear; but perhaps it is rather the elk, a kind of red deer. He takes the Tzebi, which we render roe, to be the antelope, a kind of goat, about the bigness of a deer. There are three kinds of the antelope, two in Africa, and another in India, whose horns, springing out of their forehead, are sometimes about three feet long.

DEFAME; to REPROACH.

DEFEAT; to overturn; render successful; overcome. 2 Sam. xv. 34.

DEFEND, is to protect from enemies and wrongs. Psal. lxxxii. 3.

DEFENCE; (1.) Protection; refuge. 2 Chron. xi. 5. (2.) What one has to say in vindication of himself against his accusers. Acts xix. 33. God and Christ are a defence; they protect the saints from enemies, wrath, danger, and hurt. Psal. xxxi. 2. Isa. iv. 5. and xxxiii. 16. Ministers are set for the defence of the gospel; to maintain it in its purity and honour against heretics, and every other opposer. Phil. i. 17. Wisdom and money are a defence; are useful to protect their owners from outward trouble and ruin. Eccl. vii. 12.

DEFER; DELAY; to put off till afterwards. Eccl. v. 4. Isa. xlviii. 9. Acts xxv. 17. Hope deferred sickens the heart; when what we expect and wait for is long in coming, our hearts faint for fear it should never come. Prov. xiii. 12.

DEFY; to speak boastfully; to challenge. 1 Sam. xvii. 10, 36, 45.

DEFILE; to render unclean. (1.) By disgraceful usage. 2 Kings xxiii. 8, 10. Ezek. xxviii. 7. (2.) With ceremonial pollution, as the leprosy, the touching of a dead body, &c. Lev. xiv. 46. Num. v. 2. (3.) With sinful filthiness, by following heathenish customs, by seeking to wizards, by idolatry, apostasy, error, unnatural lust, whoredom, evil speech. 1 Cor. viii. 7. Tit. i. 15. Lev. xviii. 24. and xix. 31. Ezek. xx. 7. Heb. xii. 15. 1 Tim. vi. 5. and i. 10. Gen. xxxiv. 1. Ezek. xviii. 11. Jam. iii. 6. God's name is defiled, when those who profess to be his people bring a reproach on him with their untender carriage. Ezek. xliii. 7, 8. His priesthood was defiled, when men invested with it walked unworthy of it, or, by marriage with heathens, brought in a strange offspring to officiate. Neh. xiii. 2, 9. His sanctuary was defiled, when men contemned the service of it, wallowed in wickedness, while they professed to cleave to his worship; or when they filled it with dead carcasses. Lev. xx. 3. Ezek. v. 11; xxiii. 38, and ix. 7. The earth is defiled under its inhabitants, when men commit their wickedness on it, and use it as an instrument therein. Isa. xxiv. 5. Jer. iii. 9. and xvi. 18. The saints not defiling their garments, and not being defiled with women, imports their walking in purity and holiness of conversation, as persons clothed with Jesus' righteousness, and their keeping themselves from the abomination of Antichrist. Rev. iii. 4. and xiv. 4.

DEFRAUD; deceitfully to withhold or take one's just due from him, 1 Cor. vii. 5, 7. and vi. 7; but in 1 Thess. iv. 6. it perhaps signifies to injure one by defiling his wife.

DEGENERATE; grown worse than it was originally. The Jews were turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine, when, leaving the example of their pious ancestors, they gradually became almost as wicked as heathens. Jer. ii. 21.

DEGREE. (1.) A part or division of a dial, or a step of a stair. 2 Kings xx. 9. (2.) Condition; order, rank. 1 Chron. xv. 18. Psal. lxii. 9. In allusion to the custom of giving the higher seats in a school to the best scholar, deacons are said to purchase to themselves a good degree, when, by the proper exercise of their office, they gain themselves much honour and reputation. 1 Tim. iii. 13.

DEHA-VITES; a tribe of the SAMARITANS; perhaps the same with the Avites; or they might come from about the river Diaba in Assyria. Ezra iv. 9.

DELECTABLE; precious, comely; delightful; idols are so called. Isa. xlv. 9.

DELICATE; fine; nice. Deut. xxviii. 54.

DELICACIES; DELICATES; most precious things, wealth, &c. that are to the desire as dainty meats to the belly. Rev. xviii. 2. Jer. li. 34. He that delicately bringeth up his servant from a child, shall have him become his son at length. Prov. xxix. 21. He that too nicely and indulgently brings up his servant may expect him by and by to grow as bold and familiar, and as full of pretensions, as if he were an heir of the family.

DELICIOUSLY; in wealth, pleasure, and luxury. Rev. xviii. 7.

DELIGHT; to take pleasure. Esth. vi. 6. God's not delighting in the ceremonial services of the wicked Jews imports his abhorrence of them, because of the wicked manner and end for which they were performed. Isa. i. 11. Jer. vi. 20. His people are a delightful land, when their piety, glory, and happiness, are very great. Mal. iii. 12. What one takes great pleasure in is called his delight: so Jesus is the delight of his Father. Prov. viii. 30. Genuine saints, and their prayers, and just weights, are the delight of God. Prov. xii. 22; xv. 8. and xi. 1, 20.

DELI-LAH. See SAMSON.

DELIVER; (1.) To give into one's hand; give up. Gen. xl. 13. Exod. v. 18. (2.) To free from diseases, danger, enemies, &c. Exod. v. 18. Heb. ii. 15. DELIVERANCE denotes, (1.) A rescue from outward danger and distress. Gen. xxxii. 11. (2.) A salvation from sin and misery, by the blood and Spirit of Christ. Luke iv. 18. (3.) The bringing forth of a child, whereby a woman is freed from her burden, eased of her pains, and gives to the world a new inhabitant. Isa. xxvi. 17. The erection or reformation of a church is likened to the delivery of a man child: with much pain and labour are a number of lively and active church-members brought forth. Isa. lxvi. 7. Rev. xii. 2-4.

DELUSIONS; errors and influences of Satan, calculated to deceive men. God chooses men's delusions, and sends them strong delusions, when in his righteous judgment, and infinite wisdom, he permits Satan, their own lusts, and false teachers, effectually to seduce them; and gives them up to the very errors and abominations which they relish. Isa. lxvi. 4. 2 Thess. ii. 11.

DEMAND; to ask humbly. Luke iii. 14. Job xlii. 4; or authoritatively. Job xxxviii. 5. and xl. 7.

DEMAS; an early professor of Christianity, perhaps a preacher, that was for a while very serviceable to Paul in his confinement; but about A. D. 65, he forsook him to follow some more gainful worldly business. It is said he fell into the heresy of Ebion and Corinthus, who held Christ to be a mere man. Col. iv. 14. 2 Tim. iv. 10.

DE-METRI-US; a silver-smith of Ephesus, who made little models of Diana's temple there, with her image inclosed therein. Vexed at the success of the gospel, and the danger of his loss of business, by the inhabitants turning their backs on idolatry, he convened a mob of his fellow-trademen, and represented to them the danger of their craft and idolatrous worship. They were immediately inflamed with rage, and assisted by the rascally part of the inhabitants, they raised, for some hours, a terrible outcry, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. They seized Aristarchus and Gaius, and hurried them into the theatre, no doubt with a view to have them condemned. Perceiving Alexander, perhaps the coppersmith, they dragged him into the crowd; he begged they would hear what he had to say for himself; but, understanding that he was a Jew, and so an enemy to their religion, they would not hear him; but continued to bawl out, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. Meanwhile a notary of considerable influence in the city got an audience of the mob. He warmly represented to them, that the men whom they had seized could not be proved blasphemers of Diana, nor robbers of her temple; that the honour of Diana was sufficiently established all the world over, and the Ephesians' zeal for her worship abundantly known; that they were in the utmost hazard of being called to account and punished by their Roman superiors, for the uproar which they had made; that if Demetrius, or any body else, had a plea, they ought to bring it regularly before a lawful meeting of the magistracy, and not fill the city with confusion. With this soft and sensible remonstrance, he quieted and dispersed the mob. Whether this be the same Demetrius who afterwards became a Christian convert, and had a good report of all men, we know not. Acts xix. 24—40. & John 12.

DEN; a hole or hollow place in the earth, where lions and other wild beasts lodge. Judges vi. 2. Job xxvii. 8. Rev. vi. 15. God's temple became a den of thieves, when multitudes of wicked men officiated in it, and, to the robbing God of his honour prostituted it to be a place of dishonest merchandise. Jer. vii. 11. Matt. xxi. 13. Jerusalem, and other cities of Judah became a den of dragons, when, being left desolate, the creatures lodged amidst the rubbish. Jer. ix. 11. and x. 22. Nineveh is called a lion's den filled with ravens; the conquering monarchs who ruled there, issuing forth like lions, destroyed the nations, and enriched the city with their spoil. Nah. ii. 12. This present world is a den of lions, and a mountain of leopards; it is a very dangerous dwelling, as outrageous and wicked men abound and rest in it. Sol. Song iv. 8.

DENY; (1.) To contradict a charge or affirmation. Gen. xviii. 15. (2.) To refuse granting a request. 1 Kings ii. 16. Prov. xxx. 7. God cannot deny himself; he cannot possibly act or speak unlike his own nature, or unlike the gracious characters which he has assumed, or the promises he has made, 2 Tim. ii. 13. Men deny God, or Christ, or his name, when, in their profession or practice, they disown his being the true God, Saviour, portion, ruler, and last end of their souls. Job xxxi. 28. Acts iii. 13, 14. They deny the faith, when they embrace error, indulge themselves in a slothful and wicked practice, and so manifest their unbelief of, and opposition to the truths of scripture. Rev. ii. 13. 1 Tim. v. 8. Men deny themselves, when they refuse to depend on their own righteousness as the ground of their happiness; or to be led by their own wisdom, or ruled by their own will and affections; or to attempt performance of good works in their own strength; but receive Jesus Christ as the free gift of God for their all and in all, and undervalue their own ease, profit, or pleasure, for the sake of Christ. Matt. xvi. 24.

DENOUNCE; solemnly to declare a threatening. Deut. xxx. 18.

DEPART; (1.) To go from a place or person. John vii. 3. (2.) To die, go out of this world and life, into an eternal state. Luko ii. 29. (3.) To cease. Nah. iii. 1. God departs from men, when he ceases to bestow his favours, hides the smiles of his countenance, and pours out his wrath on them. Hos. ix. 12. or when he ceases to afflict. Job vii. 19. Men depart from God, when they follow sinful lusts instead of holiness, and seek created enjoyments for their portion, instead of his fulness. Jor. xxxii. 40; and especially when they break their vows to him, and cease from serving him, as once they did. Hos. i. 2. Men depart from evil, or from hell, when they cease from the love and practice of sin, and so from walking in the way to hell. Prov. xv. 24. and xvi. 6.

DEPARTURE. (1.) The ruin of Tyre by the Chaldeans, which made the inhabitants to leave the city. Ezek. xxxi. 18. (2.) A removal into the other world by death. 2 Tim. iv. 6.

DEPOSE; to put out of office. Dan. v. 20.

DEPRIVE; (1.) To take from one what he has, or expects to have. Gen. xxvii. 45. Isa. xxxviii. 10. (2.) To make destitute of. Job xxxix. 17.

DEPTH. See DEEP.

DEPUTED; constituted an inferior judge. 2 Sam. xv. 3. A DEPUTY is a ruler appointed by a superior one. Acts xiii. 7. and xviii. 12. 1 Kings xxii. 49.

DERBE. See LYCAONIA.

DERIDE; to mock. Luke xvi. 14. To deride strong holds, is to make a jest of taking them; to demolish them, as if in sport. Hab. i. 10.

DERISION; mockery; reproach. Job xxxi. 1.

DESCEND; to go down from a higher place to a lower, whether from heaven, or the clouds, to the earth, or from a place higher in situation, to one lower in the same country, or a different one. Matt. xxviii. 2. Psal. cxxxiii. 3. Acts xxiv. 1. God descends; or comes down, when some visible token of his presence moves towards the earth. Exod. xix. 18. Luke iii. 22. Christ's descending into the lower parts of the earth, denotes his infinite condescension, and his personal union with his manhood on the earth, and with his body in the grave. Eph. iv. 10. Wisdom descends; it proceeds from God, who is high, and resides in heaven, to men on earth. James iii. 15.

DESCENT is, (1.) A place bending downward. Luke xix. 37. (2.) A coming from parents and ancestors by natural generation. Heb. vii. 3, 6.

DESCRIBE; to describe a country, is to draw a plan of it. Josh. xviii. 4. To describe persons, is to declare their names, marks, and places of abode. Judges viii. 14. To describe things, is to explain their nature and properties. Rom. iv. 6.

DESCRY; to view; spy out. Judg. i. 23.

DESERT; WILDERNESS. The Hebrews

called the places a wilderness, where the cities or towns were more distant one from another, as well as where there were no towns at all. The most noted deserts we read of in scripture are that of Egypt, on the north-east of that country, Ezek. xx. 36; the wilderness of Etham, on the west of the Red sea; the wilderness of Shur, Sin, and Sinai, on the east side of the western gulf of the Red sea; the wilderness of Paran, northward of the former, and of Zin, at the east end of it. The wilderness of Edom, is perhaps the same with that of Paran or Zin, or rather one at the south end of the Dead sea. The wilderness of Kadesh might be the north part of the wilderness of Paran. The wilderness of Moab, Arnon, and Kedemoth, might be the same near the head of the river Arnon. The wilderness of Tadmor lay to the north-east of Canaan. The wilderness of Judah, of Zeph, Jeshamon, and Maon, lay on the west of the Dead sea. The wilderness where Jesus was tempted, was probably the mountains of Quarantana, to the east of Jerusalem, which now have an appearance most rugged and unsightly; or that near Pisgal, on the east of Jordan. A great many wildernesses were named from the cities next adjacent; as the wilderness of Diblah, En-gedi, Jeruel, Tekoah, Gibeon, Bethaven, &c. The wilderness of Arabia comprehends the deserts of Shur, Sin, Paran, Zin, and Kedemoth, and was a very terrible and waste howling wilderness. Deut. i. 19. and xxxii. 10. The whole north parts of Arabia are called a desert: because so little of it was cultivated or had cities built in it. Jer. xxv. 24. Chaldea is called the desert of the sea: it was exceedingly well watered: much of it a fen country; there was a desert between it and the Medes and Persians; and by them it began to be turned into a desert: but the words might be rendered, the plain of the sea. Isa. xxi. 1. The wilderness of the people, is either Chaldea, which, though replenished with inhabitants, was destitute of things spiritually good; or the barbarous countries of Media and Scythia. Ezek. xx. 25. Whatever affords no support and comfort, but distresses and perplexes, is called a wilderness; hence God asks the Hebrews, If he had been to them a wilderness, and land of darkness? Jer. ii. 31. The gentle world, before the spread of the gospel, is called a wilderness; the poor heathens lived like wild beasts, devouring one another, without order of divine laws and ordinances, without the comfortable presence of God, and without any fruit of good works to his honour. Isa. xxxv. 1, 6. xli. 19. and xliii. 19. The wilderness into which God brought the Jews that he might speak to their heart, was their afflicted state of captivity in Babylon, and their present unhappy state of dispersion. Hos. ii. 14. The wilderness, in which the church subsists under Antichrist, is her private and distressed condition; and may point to the rugged country about *Savo*y and Piedmont, in which the Waldenses, for many ages, boldly professed the truth. Rev. vii. 6. The wilderness, from which the saints go up, is their barren, comfortless, and dangerous state of ignorance and unbelief; the present evil world, in its errors and corruptions; and a state of persecution and trouble. Sol. Song iii. 6. and viii. 5; where the words ought to be translated, goeth up from the wilderness.

DESERVE; to be worthy of. Ezra ix. 13. Job xi. 6. Men are judged according to their deserts, and have their deserts rendered to them, when they receive the just punishment of their deeds. Psal. xxviii. 4.

DESIRE. (1.) A longing; wishing. 1 Sam. xxiii. 20. (2.) The request, or prayer, of a soul for the supply of its wants, spiritual, temporal, or eternal. Psal. cxlv. 19. (3.) Love; affection. Sol. Song vii. 10. Dan. xi. 37. (4.) Inclination to, or delight in the pleasures of this life. Eccl. xii. 5. (5.) Hope; expectation. 1 Sam. ix. 20. (6.) The thing desired. Prov. x. 24. Desire is either natural, Deut. xxi. 11; or religious, after things spiritually good, Psal. lxxiii. 25; or mischievous, for hurt to others, Mic. vi. 8; or covetous and lustful. Deut. vii. 25. and v. 21. Wives are the desire of their husbands' eyes; they are comely and desirable to them: the temple was the desire of the Jews' eyes; they much valued and prized themselves on it. Ezek. xxiv. 16, 21. Christ is the desire of all nations; he is altogether lovely, excellent, useful, and necessary: all that spiritually know him, desire and long for him: at last, multitudes out of all nations shall believe on him. Hag. ii. 7. The Jews were a nation not desirous, or desired; they had no proper desire after, and love to God and his ways; nor were they a pleasure and delight to him, but the reverse. Zeph. ii. 1. The desires of the flesh are our sinful lusts and inclinations. Eph. ii. 3. Gen. vi. 5. Through desire a man separateth himself, and intermeddleth with all wisdom: Prov. xviii. 1. through good desire a man separates himself from the common customs of the world, and earnestly pursues after knowledge: or, through a vain-glorious desire, a man separates himself from others, and meddles with every branch of business; or he objects to, and pours contempt on all true wisdom.

DESOLATE; SOLITARY; lonely. A person is desolate or solitary, when without husband or companions. 2 Sam. xiii. 20. Psal. xxv. 16. A desolate heart is one deserted of God, deprived of comfort, and filled with perplexity. Psal. cxliii. 4. A house, city, or country, is desolate or solitary, when without inhabitants. Jer. xlix. 20; vi. 8. and ix. 11. Lam. i. 1. Psal. cvii. 4. The Hebrew word CALMUD rendered solitary, signifies barren as a flinty rock, quite destitute of good. Job iii. 7; xv. 24. and xxx. 3. Isa. xlix. 21. Altars are desolate, when ruinous, and no offerings presented on them. Ezek. vi. 6. Vines, fig-trees, and idols are desolate, when destroyed, or quite neglected. Hos. ii. 12. Mic. i. 7. The Jewish temple was made desolate, when God's special presence no more resided in it, when it was turned into ruins, and the Jews were cast off from being God's peculiar people. Matt. xxiii. 28. Job's company was made desolate, when his children and servants were slain, and his friends scattered from him. Job xvi. 7. Antichrist will be made desolate, when Rome shall be turned into a ruinous heap, and multitudes shall forsake Popery, and turn to the Lord. Rev. xvii. 16. and xviii. 19.

The gentle world, long destitute of the gracious presence of God, or the church deprived of Christ's bodily presence, is likened to a desolate widow. Isa. xlix. 8. and liv. 1. The desolate places, which great men build for themselves, are desolate cities, which they rebuild for their honour; or tombs, in which their dead bodies dwell in silence. Job iii. 14.

DESPAIR; to grow hopeless. 1 Sam. xxvii. 1. 2 Cor. iv. 8.

DESPERATE; without hope. Job vi. 26. Man's heart is desperately wicked; so set on evil, that it will forego every hope, and rush on eternal ruin, to have it committed. Jer. xvii. 9.

DESPISE. See CONTEMN.

DESPITE, OF SPITE: (1.) Envy; malice. Ezek. xxv. 6. Psal. x. 14. (2.) The object of envy or malice. Neh. iv. 4. DESPITEFUL; full of envy and malice. Ezek. xxv. 15. To entreat one apitefully, is maliciously to expose him to the most cruel and shameful abuse. Luke xviii. 32. Matt. v. 44.

DESTITUTE; wanting; without help, happiness, or comfort. 1 Tim. vi. 6. Gen. xxiv. 27.

DESTROY; (1.) To pull down; cut off; kill. Gen. xix. 24. Exod. xxxiv. 13. Rom. i. 16. (2.) To cast one into hell. Mark i. 14. (3.) To hurt a weak Christian, by drawing him to act against his conscience, in the use of things indifferent; or by alienating his mind from his Christian profession. Rom. xiv. 15. 1 Cor. xviii. 11, 12. God destroys meats, and the belly, when by death he breaks the connexion between the two. 1 Cor. vi. 13. The mouth of hypocrites destroyleth their neighbours, by seducing them into error and ruin. Prov. xi. 1. Sin and Satan are destroyed, when their dominion, power, and influence are taken away. Rom. vi. 6. Heb. ii. 14. Satan, the Chaldeans, robbers, the pestilence, &c. are called destroyers. Rev. ix. 11. Jer. iv. 7. Job xv. 21. 1 Cor. x. 10.

DESTRUCTION is (1.) The taking away of the power and life of any person or thing. 1 Sam. v. 11. 1 Cor. v. 5. (2.) Death, which cuts off men from their place and station. Psal. xc. 3. and lxxxviii. 11. (3.) The pestilence, or some other terrible calamity. Psal. xci. 10. Job xxi. 17. (4.) The punishment of hell. 1 Tim. vi. 9. 2 Thess. i. 9. The poverty of poor men is their destruction, or constriction; it distresses and affrights them. Prov. x. 15.

DETERMINE; (1.) To decide or judge a cause. Exod. xxi. 22. (2.) Firmly to resolve. 1 Sam. xx. 7. 1 Cor. ii. 2. (3.) Unchangeably to appoint. Job xiv. 5. Dan. ix. 25. The determinate counsel of God, is his fixed and immutable decree. Acts ii. 23.

DETEST; to hate and abhor a person or thing, as abominable. Deut. vii. 26. Idols are represented as detestable things. Jer. xvi. 18. Ezek. v. 11. and vii. 20.

DEVIL; a fallen ANGEL, especially the chief of them; so called, because he is a malicious accuser of God and his people. Rev. xii. 9, 10. Devils were and are worshipped in the idols of the heathens and Papists. Deut. xxxii. 17. Psal. cvi. 37. Lev. xvii. 7. Rev. ix. 20. and xviii. 2; but they themselves tremble before the true God.

Jam. ii. 19. Wicked men are called devils; they resemble these evil spirits in malice and enmity against God, and his people, and in reproach and slander of them; and they are agents for Satan on earth. John vi. 70. Rev. ii. 10. 1 Tim. iii. 11.

DEVICE; (1.) Curious work of an artificer. 2 Chron. ii. 14. (2.) Contrivance; purpose. Eccl. ix. 10. (3.) Crafty projects. Psal. x. 2. The devices of Satan, are his crafty temptations, whereby he ensnares and ruins men's souls. 2 Cor. ii. 11. Men are filled with their own devices, when the execution and fruit of them tend to their ruin. Prov. i. 31.

DEVISE; (1.) To contrive. Exod. xxxi. 4. (2.) To plot something hurtful. 2 Sam. xxi. 5.

DEVOTE. (1.) Solemnly to set apart to the service and honour of God. Lev. xxvii. 21. (2.) To set apart for destruction. Josh. vi. 17. Deut. xiii. 13. See ACCUSED.—DEVOTIONS; religious observances. Acts xvii. 28.

DEVOUT; much given to religious exercise, whether lawful or not. Luke ii. 25. Acts x. 2; xiii. 50. and xvii. 4, 17.

DEVOUR; (1.) To eat up greedily. Gen. xxxvii. 20. (2.) To spend riotously. Luke xv. 30. (3.) Cunningly to defraud God or men of their due, and seize on it for our own use. Matt. xxiii. 14. Prov. xx. 25. (4.) Cruelly to harrass men, and spoil them of their spiritual and eternal happiness. 1 Pet. v. 8. (5.) To kill or destroy. 2 Sam. ii. 26. Satan, the enemies of a people, or destructive judgments, are the devourers, whom God will rebuke, or stop. Mal. iii. 11.

DEUTER-O-NOMY; the last of the five books of Moses. Its name signifies, the repetition of the law. As the generation, who came out of Egypt, were generally dead, Moses, a few days before his death, in this book repeated the substance of their history in the wilderness, and the substance of the laws that had been given them, and added some new ones; as of cutting off false prophets, and idolatrous cities; of making battlements around the roofs of their houses; of expiating uncertain murder; of taking down the bodies of hanged malefactors in the evening; of punishing rebellious children; of distinguishing the sexes by their apparel; of the marriage of captives, and the wives of deceased brethren; of divorce; and trial of virginity; of men-stealing; of run-away servants, &c. Chap. i—xxv. He then directed them to surrender themselves to God at Ebal and Gerizim; solemnly lays before them the blessings that would follow on their obedience to the divine laws; and the miseries that would attend their apostasy and rebellion; and which have, or do take place, on that unhappy nation, in their ancient calamities, and present dispersion. Chap. xxvi—xxxii. It next contains the song of Moses; his blessing of the twelve tribes; and the account of his death, the last of which was written by another hand. Chap. xxxii—xxxiv. The style of this book of Moses is more sublime, and its matter, chiefly the commands, more plain and practical than any of the rest.

DEW; a thick moist vapour that falls on the earth, chiefly when the sun is below the horizon. In warm countries, where it seldom rains, copious dews exceedingly refresh and moisten the ground; hence the fall of dew was reckoned a great blessing, and the withholding of it a grievous curse. Deut. xxxiii. 13. 2 Sam. i. 21. The dew is first raised from the earth, heated by the sun, and hence the lower bodies are first moistened: and bodies most hard share least of the dew; when so much is extracted, as the air cannot sufficiently poise, it falls back on the earth: when the air is corrupted with hurtful vapour, the dew is infected by it, and hence is formed the mildew, so injurious to vegetation. Christ, and God in him, are likened to dew: how pleasant, reviving, and fructifying, the influences of his word and Spirit. Hos. xiv. 5. Isa. xxvi. 19. The saints are as dew, for multitude, pleasantness, and refreshing influence on others around. Psal. cx. 3. Mic. v. 7. An army is like falling dew, for their numbers, and their seizing on every thing near them. 2 Sam. xvii. 12. Afflictions and sufferings are like dew, and drops of the night; are many and disagreeable, and yet have a happy and fructifying tendency. Sol. Song v. 2. Dan. iv. 25. Amos vi. 11. The truths of God are as dew; falling gradually, and often insensibly, on the souls of men, they refresh, render them soft, pliable, and fruitful in good works. Deut. xxxii. 2. Any thing very delightful and refreshing, is compared to dew; the king's favour is as dew; it mightily delights and actuates men. Prov. xix. 12. Harmony of brethren, is as the dew of Hermon, very delightful, reviving, and encouraging to good works. Psal. cxxxiii. 3. The dew lies on a man's branches, when his soul prospers under the influences of God's word and Spirit, and his outward lot under the smiles of his providence. Job xxix. 19.

DIADEM; a crown. Isa. lxxii. 3.

DIAL; an instrument for measuring of time by the shadow of the sun. Whether the people on the east of the Euphrates, or the Jews or Phœnicians, first invented this instrument, we know not. The Greeks knew nothing of dials, till the time of Anaximander, the contemporary of Cyrus. Nor in history do we find a dial more ancient than that of Ahaz. Nor is there any mention of hours till the time of Daniel's captivity in Babylon. Chap. iv. 9. Some learned men suppose, that the MAHALOTH, which our version renders a dial, was no more than a flight of stairs, and the degrees were the steps of the stair. Others contend that it was a real dial; but of what form, horizontal, or vertical, or of what other form, they are not agreed. It is certain, that a real miracle on this dial or stair, marked the certainty of Hezekiah's future restoration to health; but whether the sun, or only his shadow, went backward the ten degrees, is still controverted. Those who maintain that only the shadow went back, observe, that in 2 Kings xx. mention is only made of the going back of the shadow; and that in Isaiah's account of this matter, chap. xxxviii. the sun may be put for his shadow; that the shadow might go back by an inflection of the rays of the sun; that if the sun had gone back gradually, the day would have been ten or twenty hours longer than ordinary, and thus one part of the world would have been scorched, and the other half frozen; or, if it had gone back instantaneously, the frame of nature must have experienced a most tremendous shock, which the astronomers of those times could not have failed to observe; and that it was needless for God to put himself to the expense of so great a miracle, when the inflection of the solar rays might as well serve the turn. To me, the whole of this reasoning appears rather showy than solid. In favour of the sun's going back, it is easy to observe, that one miracle is not more difficult to God than another; that we are expressly told that the sun went back; that it is hard to conceive how the shadow could go back without the sun; that if all had been done, by a mere inflection of the rays of the sun, it would have been a private affair, and not alarmed the Chaldeans, as it seems it did; that the Chinese annals inform us that the planet Mars went back several degrees, for the sake of one of their kings about this same time. Isa. xxxviii. 8. 2 Kings xx. 9—11.

DIAMOND. See ADAMANT.

DI'ANA; a celebrated goddess of the heathens. She was especially renowned at Ephesus. She was one of the twelve superior deities, and was called by the several names of Hebe, Trivia, Hecate, Diana, and Lucinia. In heaven, she was the moon, or queen of heaven; and perhaps the same with Meni, the numberer, or goddess of months. Jer. vii. 18. Ezek. xvi. 25. Isa. lxx. 11. On earth, she was Diana and Trivia, the goddess of hunting and highways; in hell, she was Hecate; in assisting women in childbirth, she was Lucinia. She was said to be the daughter of Jupiter; and sister of Apollo; and was figured as a young huntress, with a crescent or half-moon on her head; or as wholly covered with breasts, and her pedestal ornamented with heads of stags, oxen, and dogs, to mark her bounty, and power over hunting. She was worshipped with great solemnity at Ephesus. Acts xix. 27—34.

DI'BON, or DI'BON-GAD'; perhaps the same with DI'MON. Sihon took it from the Moabites. Moses, when the Hebrews encamped near it, took it, and gave it to the Reubenites; but it seems the Gadites obtained it in exchange for some other place. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Moabites, and was ruined by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Num. xxxii. 24. and xxxiii. 45. Josh. xiii. 9, 17. Isa. xv. 2, 9. Jer. xlviii. 18.

DIE; not only to be distressed, to lose natural life; but to lose all kind of happiness, and incur every kind of misery. 1 Cor. xv. 31. Gen. vii. 21. Ezek. xxxiii. 11. See DEAD.

DIFFER; (1.) To be unlike. 1 Cor. xv. 41. (2.) To be more excellent. 1 Cor. iv. 7.

DIG; to make a trench, pit, &c. God digs and digs about barren professors, when he deals with them by awakening and alluring providences, ordinances, and influences. Luke xiii. 8. Wicked men dig up evil; they reproach neighbours with former faults, and with great pains they do mischief. Prov. xvi. 27. The unjust steward, could not dig, could not perform servile work. Luke xv. 3. See PIT.

DIGNITY; (1.) Honour; reputation; honourable employ. Eccl. x. 6. (2.) A ruler. 2 Pet. ii. 10.

DILIGENT; very careful and active. Deut. xix. 18. Saints, especially if active in following the Lord, are often called diligent. Prov. xiii. 4; xii. 27. and x. 4. Jer. xxix. 13.

DIMINISH; to make less in power, wealth, measure, or number. Ezek. v. 11. and xxix. 11.

DIM; (1.) Weak in sight. Gen. xxvii. 1. (2.) Obscure; darkish. Lam. iv. 1. Perplexing and heavy calamities on a nation are called a dimness; they obscure their glory, and make them scarcely know what to do. Lam. iv. 10. The dimness shall not be such as when he lightly afflicted the land of Zebulun and Naphtali, and afterward did more grievously afflict her, &c.: the judgments of God upon the Jewish nation, by the hand of the Romans, shall be more distressing, than the ruin of the ten tribes by the Assyrians. The harassing of Judah by Sennacherib, or even their captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, shall be more hopeful than the captivity of the ten tribes. But the words might be read, He made base the land of Zebulun, but afterwards glorified it. Isa. i. 1.

DINAH. See JACOB.

DINA-ITES. See SAMARITANS.

DINNER; the chief meal. Prov. xv. 17. The gospel dispensation, in the apostolic age, is called a DINNER. It took place in the afternoon of time, and was a blessed means of refreshing and strengthening many souls for the service of God. When the Jews refused it, the gentiles were called, and the Jews severely punished for their contempt of it. Fearful will be the punishment of Antichristians, and others, who put not on the Lord Jesus, as their righteousness and sanctification. Matt. xxii. 1—4.

DI-O-NYSTUS the Areopagite, or judge in the court of Areopagus. In his youth, it is said, he was bred in all the famed learning of Athens; and went afterward to Egypt, to perfect himself in astronomy; being at On, when our Saviour died, and observing the miraculous darkness, he cried out, Either the God of nature suffers himself, or sympathizes with one that suffers. He was converted at Athens by Paul; and it is said, became an evangelist, and was burnt as a martyr in his own city, A. D. 95. Perhaps Damaris, the lady who was converted about the same time, was his wife. Acts xvii. 34.

DI-OTRE-PHES; a pretended Christian, who was ambitious of being preferred to every body else. He did all he could to oppose the reception of the messengers sent by the apostle John, and said what he could to disparage that great man. 3 John 9.

DIRECT; (1.) To show the way to one. Gen. xli. 28. (2.) To point towards one. Job xxiii. 14. God directs men's steps and ways, and their heart into the love of himself. Prov. xvi. 9. 2 Thess. iii. 5. Wisdom is profitable to direct how to act; righteousness directs: it tends to keep men in a proper course of life. Eccl. x. 10. Prov. xi.

5. Men direct prayer to God, when they, with knowledge, confidence, and awe, address their prayers to him, and expect the fulfilment thereof from him. Psal. v. 3. and cxli. 2.

DISALLOW; to testify dislike of a person or thing. Num. xxx. 5. Christ is disallowed of men; by their unbelief, blasphemy, and hatred of him: and by their persecution of him or his people, the Jews and others marked their dislike of him. 1 Pet. ii. 4.

DISANNUL; to alter; abolish. Job xl. 8. Gal. iii. 17.

DISAPPOINT; to prevent one's obtaining what he hoped for; and executing what he intended. Prov. xv. 22. Psal. xvii. 13.

DISCERN; (1.) To observe carefully. Gen. xxxi. 32. (2.) To distinguish one thing from another. 2 Sam. xiv. 17. To discern time and judgment, is to know the season proper for such works and the works proper for such occasions. Eccl. viii. 5.

To discern the Lord's body, is by spiritual knowledge, to take up the bread and wine in the Lord's supper, as representing the person and righteousness of God in our nature. 1 Cor. xi. 29. Christ is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart: he fully knows, and can judge of their motives, manner, and ends; the scripture is a discerner of them: when powerfully applied, it makes men truly to understand them. Heb. iv. 12. Discerning of spirits was either a miraculous power of discerning men's state or secret conduct; or a spiritual ability to discern true apostles and ministers from false ones. 1 Cor. xii. 10.

DISCHARGE; to unload; give up. 1 Kings v. 9. There is no discharge in the warfare of death; no way of escaping from it. Eccl. viii. 8.

DISCIPLES; those who learn from a master; scholars. John ix. 28. In the Gospels, it generally signifies the twelve Apostles, who learned under Jesus Christ as their Master; but in the Acts and Epistles, it signifies the followers of Christ, who are careful to learn his truth.

DISCIPLINE; instruction; correction. Job xxvi. 10.

DISCLOSE; to shew openly; to uncover. The earth discloses her blood and slain, when those who did wickedness, and shed innocent blood, are publicly punished. Isa. xxvi. 21.

DISCOMFIT; to conquer; rout. Exod. xvii. 13.

DISCONTINUE; to cease. Jer. xvii. 4.

DISCOVER; (1.) To perceive; observe. Acts xxi. 3. (2.) To render manifest, expose to open view. Exod. xx. 26. The Jews discovered themselves to another in God's stead, when they loved and worshipped idols, and trusted to alliances in his room; Isa. lvii. 8. To discover, or UNCOVER near kin or nakedness, is to have carnal dealings with one. Lev. xx. 18, 19. and xviii. 6—19. To uncover the locks, thighs, forehead, nakedness, or skirts of a people, is to expose them to terrible shame and disgrace, and shew their weakness and wickedness. Isa. xlvii. 2. and iii. 17. Hab. ii. 16. Ezek. xvi. 37. Jer. xiii. 26. God discovers the lewdness and sin of a people, when he openly punishes them on account of their idolatry, whoredom, and other wickedness. Lam. iv. 22. Hos. ii. 10. To discover the foundation of a city is to demolish it utterly. Mic. i. 6. To discover the foundations of a kingdom, even to the neck, is to cut off its great men, and so overturn it. Hab. i. 13. He discovered the covering of Judah; Sennacherib dismantled their fortified cities. Isa. xxii. 8.

DISCRETION; prudence; sobriety. Psal. cxii. 5. Prov. i. 4.

DISDAIN; to despise as insignificant and vile. Job xxx. 1.

DISEASE; an imperfect state of health of body or soul. 1 Kings xv. 23. Ezek. xxxiv. 4. All diseases are the fruit of sin, and are comprehended in the death that is the wages of it. Their various forms are innumerable; and as men change their method of sinning against him, God changes the form of their diseases. The diseases mentioned in scripture, are fevers, agues, inflammation, itch, botches, boils, leprosy, palsy, dropsy, running issues, blindness, deafness, dumbness, lameness, &c. Deut. xxviii. 22, 27. Matt. iv. 25. and xi. 5. The Hebrews, being very unskilful in the system of nature, generally ascribed their diseases to evil spirits, and the more terrible ones to the immediate hand of God. Nor can we say, how far these causes may immediately act in the production of bodily distempers. It is plain, God has often punished peculiar sins with peculiar judgments, as in the case of Abimelech, Er, Onan, Miriam, Gehazi, Jehoram, Uzziah, Herod, the Philistines who detained the captive ark, Sennacherib's army, the Corinthians, &c. Jesus Christ healed a vast number of diseases, otherwise desperate; and also often healed the maladies of the soul, along with those of the body. The diseases of Egypt, were blindness, ulcers in the legs, consumptions, the elephantiac leprosy, &c. Exod. xv. 26. Covetousness is an evil disease, that terribly corrupts and pains the soul. Eccl. vi. 2. An evil disease, or disease of Belial; some terrible and desperate disease inflicted by the devil, as the fruit of his distinguished crimes, cleaveth to him. Psal. xli. 8.

DISFIGURE; to deform; make ugly. Mark vi. 16.

DISGRACE; to dishonour; shame; render contemptible. Jer. xiv. 21.

DISGUISE; to conceal one's self by a false appearance. 1 Sam. xxviii. 8.

DISHONESTY; deceit; thievishness; shameful behaviour. 2 Cor. iv. 2.

DISINHERIT; to deprive of the inheritance. Num. xiv. 12.

DISJOINT; painfully to separate. Jer. vi. 8. Ezek. xxlii. 17.

DISMAY; terribly to affright and perplex. Obad. 9.

DISMISS; to send off; cause to separate. 2 Chron. xxlii. 8.

DISOBEDIENT; rebellious; averse to obey the laws of God or men. Luke i. 17. Acts xxvi. 19.

DISORDERLY; not according to the laws of Christ. 2 Thess. iii. 6.

DISPATCH; (1.) To kill. Ezek. xxiii. 47. (2.) To put an end to an affair. Ezra x. 14.

DISPENSATION. (1.) A stewardship or commission to administer the ordinances of the gospel. 1 Cor. ix. 17. It is called a dispensation of grace, because it is freely given, and given in order to confer the grace of God to men. Eph. iii. 2; and a dispensation of God, as it is given by him, and for his glory. Col. i. 25. The two different methods of revealing the truths of the gospel, before and after Christ's death, are the Old and New Testament dispensations thereof. Eph. i. 10.

DISPERSE; (1.) To spread; scatter. Prov. xv. 7. Ezek. xii. 15. (2.) To give to the poor. Psal. cxli. 9. 2 Cor. ix. 9. (3.) To place here one, and there one. 2 Chron. xi. 23. God's dispersed, and the dispersed among the gentiles, may signify those Jews that lived in Egypt, Assyria, Lesser Asia, and other countries than Judea. Zeph. iii. 10. John vii. 35.

DISPLAY; to shew openly; clearly to spread out. Psal. lx. 4.

DISPLEASE. God's hot or sore displeasure, denotes his being highly provoked; his avenging wrath and most fearful judgments. Zech. i. 2, 15. Deut. ix. 19. Psal. vi. 1.

DISPOSE; (1.) To incline. 1 Cor. x. 27. (2.) To place in right order. Job xxxiv. 13. The Hebrews received the law by the disposition of angels; they attended God at Sinai, when he gave it; and by them the audible voice that published it, was, perhaps, formed. Acts vii. 53. But the word may be rendered, among the ranks of angels.

DISPOSSESS; to drive one out of his property. Num. xxiii. 39.

DISPUTE; to contend with arguments. Acts vi. 9. and xvii. 17. Disputing is sinful, when it is carried on by wrong arguments, for a wrong end, or in an angry and contentious manner, wherein victory, rather than the discovery or honour of truth, is sought for. Phil. ii. 14. 1 Tim. vi. 5. Such as are weak in the faith, are to be admitted into the church but not to doubtful disputations: they are not to be tried whether they understand intricate controversies; nor to have any thing but what is clearly asserted in scripture, imposed on them as terms of admission. Rom. xiv. 1.

DISQUIET; to distress; render uneasy. Jer. l. 84.

DISSEMBLE; to lie; pretend one thing and do another. Josh. vii. 11. Jer. xlii. 20. Rom. xii. 9.

DISSENSION; disputing; strife. Acts xv. 2. and xxiii. 7.

DISSIMULATION. Love is without dissimulation, when it is altogether sincere, and when men's kind carriage truly proceeds from their hearts. Rom. xii. 9. The dissimulation that Barnabas was carried away with, was Peter's keeping at a distance from eating with gentile converts, though he knew God gave no warrant for so doing. Gal. ii. 13.

DISSOLVE; (1.) To soften; moisten. Psal. lxx. 10. (2.) To melt down; put quite out of order; destroy. Psal. lxxv. 3. (3.) To answer and explain a dark and doubtful matter. Dan. v. 13, 16.

DISTAFF; an instrument to spin flax with; probably the same which is now used, and called a rock. Prov. xxxi. 19.

DISTIL ; to drop softly. Deut. xxxii. 2.

DISTINCTION ; what shows the difference of one thing from another. 1 Cor. xiv. 7.

DISTINCTLY ; plainly, so as one point may be distinguished from another ; and so every part, and the whole point, clearly understood. Neh. viii. 8, 9.

DISTRACTED ; tossed in mind ; out of one's wits. Psal. lxxxviii. 15. To attend on God without distraction, is to wait on his ordinances without vexation and disturbance of mind, or temptations tending thereto. 1 Cor. vii. 33.

DISTRESS ; TROUBLE ; whatever vexes, pains, or hurts the soul, body, or outward enjoyments ; as temptation, desertion, disquiet of mind, Psal. cxliii. 11 ; or war, persecution, bodily affliction, &c. 1 Chron. xxii. 14. 2 Tim. ii. 9. Job xiv. 1. Isa. xxv. 4. Lam. i. 30. The sinful manner of the Jews' observance of their ceremonies was a trouble to God ; quite offensive and unacceptable to him. Isa. i. 14. Egypt was a land of trouble and anguish ; there the Hebrews had been once sore oppressed, and painfully enslaved ; and the Jews' expectation of help from them, in the time of Hezekiah, and afterward, did but increase their misery. Isa. xxx. 6. To TROUBLE the water, or sea, is to toss it hither and thither. John v. 4. To trouble men, is to bring anxious care, fear, danger and pain on them. Luke x. 41. Gen. xlv. 3. Lam. i. 20. The apostles were troubled, but not distressed ; they were loaded with outward affliction, but were inwardly full of spiritual consolation ; perplexed, oft brought to their wits' end what to do, but not in despair of God's delivering them ; persecuted of men, but not forsaken of God ; cast down, sorely distressed in body and mind, but not destroyed. 2 Cor. iv. 8, 9. From their return from Babylon, the Jews had troublesome times ; they were terribly harassed with tributes, wars, persecutions. Dan. ix. 25.

DISTRIBUTE ; (1.) To give by parcels or parts. Josh. xiii. 32. (2.) To give freely. 1 Tim. vi. 18. Rom. xii. 13.

DITCH ; a place digged around a city, garden, or field to defend it, or drain off the water. Isa. xxii. 11. Ditches are generally miry at the bottom ; nor is it easy to get out of them. God plunges men into the ditch, when he manifests to them their abominable wickedness, and afflicts them for it. Job ix. 31. Whorish women are a deep ditch ; such as intermeddle with them can scarce be recovered, but wallow in their uncleanness, and die in misery. Prov. xxiii. 27. The ditches and pits, which wicked men dig for their neighbours, are snares which they lay to ruin their soul, body, reputation, &c. Psal. vii. 15. and cxl. 10. Error, wickedness, and hell, out of which there is no recovery, and where sinners for ever wallow in wickedness and torment, are the ditch into which blind teachers lead their followers. Matt. xv. 14.

DIVERS ; (1.) Several persons. 2 Chron. xxx. 11. (2.) Different. Judg. v. 30. Dan. vii. 19. The Hebrews were forbid to engender their cattle with dirers kinds, as by coupling horses and asses ; and to sow their fields or gardens with mingled seed ; and to wear cloth made of linen and woollen wrought together ; by these admonitions, they were excited to beware of mingling themselves with the heathen ; of mingling the truths and ordinances of God with their own inventions ; and to avoid thinking to mix nature and grace, the Messiah's righteousness and their own, in the work of their salvation. Lev. xix. 19. Deut. xxii. 9, 11. Divers weights and measures, are a larger to receive goods with, and a lesser to give them out. This importing as it does, the most vile and deliberate dishonesty, is an abomination to the Lord. Prov. xx. 10, 23. Diversity of gifts and operations are different forms, kinds, and degrees of them. 1 Cor. xii. 4, 6.

DIVIDE ; (1.) To separate or part one thing from another. Gen. i. 6. (2.) To part one thing into two, making a distance between them. Exod. xv. 9. (3.) To break to pieces ; raise contending parties ; set one against another. Lam. iv. 16. Luke xii. 53. Matt. xii. 25. (4.) To deal ; give or take his due share. Isa. liii. 12. The dividing asunder of the joints and marrow by the word of God, imports deep conviction of conscience, reaching even to the most secret and beloved lusts. Heb. iv. 12. To divide rightly the word of truth, is to preach it distinctly, and apply to saints and sinners what is proper for them. 2 Tim. ii. 15. Matt. xxiv. 45.

DIVINE ; belonging to God ; excellent and God-like. Heb. ix. 1. Prov. xvi. 10. 2 Pet. i. 4.

DIVINE. The word NAHASH, properly signifies to search carefully, or to try ; and, when mentioned in the history of Joseph, may import no more than that he would carefully search for his cup, or had sufficiently tried his brethren's honesty by it. Gen. xlv. 5, 15 ; but ordinarily the word signifies to find out and foretell secret or future things, by some sinful and diabolical means. The art of DIVINATION was very much practised among the Chaldeans, and other eastern nations ; nay, among all the heathens in every age, and among multitudes of nominal Christians heathenishly disposed, trying to make up their want of true knowledge with what is shadowy and wicked, and ever ready to mark their subjection to Satan, as the god of this world, in their observance of his ordinances. The systems and methods of divination were almost infinite in number, as Cardan shows us. Scarcely any thing but was abused, as a means to obtain this unlawful and unsubstantial knowledge ; against which Cicero has written two books, to refute the whole of it, as senseless and trifling. (1.) The CHARTUMIN, or magicians, were perhaps their natural philosophers, who added to their knowledge of nature the effecting of things wonderful by diabolical means. Nay, it is certain, that electricity, and a thousand other things in the experimental part of philosophy, are apt to be thought, by weak minds, an effect of Satanic power. The HOBBE SHAMAIM ASHAPHIM, and MEHONENIM, astrologers, observers of times, soothsayers, were such, as, by observing the heavens, stars, clouds, and by casting of nativities, pretended to know future events. The MENAHASHIM, or enchanters, were such as pretended intercourse with serpents, and to interpret omens, and to work things wonderful, by supernatural influence. The MECASHEPHIM, witches, or sorcerers, it seems, were such as had unlawful arts of hurting their neighbours, by poison or diabolical influence. The HOBBERIM, charmners, might be such as pretended to prevent hurt, or to heal diseases by charms, that is, by means having no natural tendency to accomplish the end. The YIDENHONIM, wizards, or cunning men, might be such as were consulted concerning things lost, or in case of incurable diseases; or to find out future events. The KOSEMIN, diviners, might be such as set up for prophets; but how they acquired their pretended knowledge, whether by observing the flight of birds, or by looking into the entrails of beasts, or by diabolical impressions on their minds, &c. we cannot so much as guess. There were besides, the consulters with familiar spirits, who held familiar intercourse with Satan, and consulted him as they had need. Others were aecromancers, and pretended to raise and consult with such persons as were dead. How the HONENIM and GOZERIM, soothsayers, pretended to derive their art of foretelling future events, whether by clouds, or by divination with twigs, &c. we know not. It is probable, that sometimes one person pretended to all or most of the arts, supposed to be marked by these various characters; hence it becomes hard to know their precise meaning. All these arts, and all pretensions to them, are prohibited by the word of God. Lev. xx. 27. Dent. xviii. 9—13. Isa. viii. 19. It is probable divination began in the earliest ages; whether Joseph pretended to it or not is uncertain. But it is certain, about 200 years after, there were magicians in Egypt, who pretended to perform wonderful things. It is plain they, by their enchantments made their rods appear as serpents, the water as blood, and that they brought up frogs on the land of Egypt, in imitation of Moses. But whether, by illusive witchcraft they merely cheated the eyes of spectators, or whether, by Satanic impression on the rod, water, &c. there was any real change effected, or whether, while they used their enchantments, God sovereignly effected a real miracle, in order to harden the heart of Pharaoh, is not agreed by interpreters. It is certain that, in all their appearance of miracles, Moses had by far the superiority; that whatever they did, but added to the plagues of their country; and that they taught no doctrine proper to accompany, and be the distinguishing mark of true miracles. Exod. vii. and viii. Diviners abounded among the people of Canaan; nor do the Hebrews seem to have taken due care to extirpate them, till the days of Saul: and he afterwards consulted a witch at Endor, who pretended to bring up Samuel from the dead, to show him his fate. In the days of Ahaz, it seems to have been common to use divination by rods, Hos. iv. 12; and to consult diviners and soothsayers; and numbers probably, came to them from Chaldaea or Arabia in the East for the sake of gain. Isa. ii. 6. and viii. 19. Manasseh not only encouraged this infernal trade, but became one of their number. 2 Kings xxi. 6. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6. To this day, the Egyptians make high pretensions to divination; nor were the Philistines much behind them. Isa. ii. 6. No people were more mad upon it than the Chaldeans. Isa. xlvii. 9, 12, 13. and xlv. 25. When Nebuchadnezzar came to the south-east of Syria, he consulted by the drawing of arrows out of a quiver, and by images, and by inspecting the entrails of beasts, whether he should first besiege Rabbah or Jerusalem. Ezek. xxi. 21. Multitudes of diviners were maintained at Babylon at the public expense, that they might be ready to consult on every difficult occasion. Their inability to tell Nebuchadnezzar one of his dreams, and to interpret another, or to read the hand writing of the angel on the wall of Belshazzar's palace, no doubt, much diminished their credit. Dan. ii. iv. and v; but it is probable Zoroaster restored it about the time of Darius Hystaspes, king of Persia. At Philippi, a young sorceress vexed Paul and Silas, till they dislodged the devil who possessed her. Acts xvi. 16—18. At Ephesus a vast number of diviners were converted to the Christian faith, and burnt their magical books, to the value of 50,000 pieces of silver. Acts xix. 19. When Christianity overspread the world, divination every where fell into contempt. Under the prevalence of Antichrist, it regained its character, and was reckoned of great use to effect the lying wonders necessary to the establishment of its delusions. 2 Thess. ii. 11. Rev. xiii. 14. Even among Protestants, the regard to omens of good or bad luck; the using of charms for healing or preventing of distempers; the readiness to consult fortune-tellers, or pretenders to skill in discovering of goods stolen or lost; or to encourage dice-players, and exhibitors of puppet-shows, &c. show how fond multitudes are of marking their subjection to, and dependence on Satan.

DIVISION; (1.) Separation, difference. Exod. viii. 23. (2.) Contention; breach. 1 Cor. xii. 25. and i. 10. And it is observable, from these and other similar texts, that in scripture, schism chiefly, if not solely, means alienation of affection and disagreement among those who continue the same joint attendance on the ordinances of the gospel. (3.) Class; order. Ezra vi. 18.

DIVORCE; the separation of married persons one from another. According to the original institution of marriage, a man and woman thereby become one flesh; and nothing but death, adultery, or wilful desertion of one party, can dissolve the union. Matt. v. 32. and xix. 9. 1 Cor. vii. 15. But the Jews being a malicious and revengeful people, God, to prevent the murder of their wives, permitted them to divorce them, if they found some hateful uncleanness in them. This permission their Rabbies extended to such a degree, that in our Saviour's time it was thought lawful to divorce a wife for the smallest trifle. Women too divorced their husbands. Salome, the sister of Herod the Great, was the first we find mentioned that did so: but it soon after became a common practice. All the three sisters of Agrippa divorced their husbands: Bernice, Polemon king of Pontus; Mariamne, Archelaus; and Drusilla, Azizus king of Emesa. The Old Testament affords no instance of divorce: for the marriage of the strange wives was unlawful and null from the beginning. The Pharisees thought, perhaps oftener than once, to entrap our Saviour on the subject of divorce; but, by referring them to the original institution of marriage, he left it to themselves to infer, whether Moses could give a contrary command; after observing, that no more than a mere permission of divorce was mentioned by Moses, he declared the mind of God on this head. Matt. xix. 3-9.

Since their last dispersion, the Jews are more cautious on the head of divorce. Scarcely any thing but adultery, or strong suspicions thereof, are reckoned sufficient grounds for it; so many formalities are used about it, and the examination of the husband with respect to his determination so close, that few seek or obtain it, who can be reconciled to their wives. The bill of divorce is to this effect: "On such a day, month, year, and at such a place, I N. voluntarily divorce, put away, and restore to your liberty, you N. who was formerly my wife, and permit you to marry whom you please." This bill of divorce must be written by a woman, a deaf man, or a Rabbi, on parchment, in twelve lines of square letters: two witnesses must sign their attestation of the man's subscription, and other two must attest the date of it. Ordinarily there are other ten persons present at the giving of it. They generally advise the woman not to marry till after three months. But the divine law absolutely prohibited her return to her former husband. Deut. xxiv. 4. Jer. iii. 1. Such girls as had been married under ten years of age were allowed before twelve to leave their husbands without any divorce. God's divorcement of the Hebrew nation, and of which he denies himself the cause, is his casting them off from being his peculiar covenant-people and church. Jer. iii. 8. Isa. i. 1.

DOCTOR; teacher; somewhat like our teachers in colleges. Luke ii. 46.

DOCTRINE. (1.) Knowledge; learning. Isa. xxviii. 9. (2.) A tenet or opinion. Matt. xvi. 12. (3.) The truths of the gospel in general. Tit. ii. 10. (4.) Instruction in gospel-truth. 2 Tim. iii. 16. (5.) Act, manner, and matter of teaching. Mark iv. 2. Matt. vii. 28. (6.) Divine ordinances. Matt. xv. 9. The truths of the gospel, are the doctrine of God, and according to godliness and sound doctrine. God in Christ is their author, matter, and end; and they are pure, solid, substantial, and uncorrupted with error. 1 Tim. vi. 1, 3. Heb. vi. 1. 2 Tim. iv. 3. And they are Christ's doctrine, as he is the chief preacher, and great substance of them, Tit. ii. 10; and they are not his, i. e. not his only, nor his as a mere man, which the Jews supposed him to be, but the Father's also. John vii. 16. They are the doctrine of preachers, as they are published by them. 2 Tim. iii. 10. The Popish tenets concerning the unlawfulness of marriage to the clergy, or others, or the restrained use of meats, are doctrines of devils, invented by, and calculated to honour these evil spirits. 1 Tim. iv. 1. Error is strange doctrine; it is absurd in itself, and foreign to God's word, the only standard of truth. Heb. xiii. 9. The doctrine of Balaam, was an allowance of whoredom, and eating of things offered to idols; nor was that of the Nicolaitans very different, allowing, it is said, of the common use of women, and of compliance with heathen superstitions. Rev. ii. 14, 15.

DO-D'ANIM, RO-DA'NIM; the youngest son of Javan; perhaps the same with Dorus the son of Neptune, and father of the Dorian tribe of Greeks, who possessed part of Greece in Europe, and part of the west of Lesser Asia. Some would have his posterity to have peopled Rhodes; and Bochart drags them as far as the banks of the Rhone, on the south-east of France. Gen. x. 4. 1 Chron. i. 7.

DO'EG; the accuser of AHIMELECH the high-priest, and the murderer of him and eighty-four other priests. Probably he came to some unhappy end. 1 Sam. xxi, xxiii. Psal. lii; cxx. and cxi.

DOG. In the Linnæan system of animals, this comprehends household dogs of all kinds, as mastiffs, hounds, terriers, lapdogs, curs, &c.; and the fox and wolf. Animals of the dog-kind have ten paws, four on the breast, and six on the belly; five toes on the fore feet, and four on the hinder ones. All of this kind were unclean, and reckoned by the Jews most vile and despicable; nor was their price to be devoted to the Lord. Deut. xxiii. 18. A dog, dead dog, or dog's head, was expressive of the most insignificant person. 2 Kings viii. 13. 1 Sam. xxiv. 14. and 2 Sam. ix. 8. and iii. 8. Persons immodest and unclean, or who return to filthy doctrines and practices, or who bark and rail at such as they hate, are called dogs. Rev. xxii. 15. Deut. xxiii. 18. 2 Pet. ii. 22. Prov. xxvi. 11. Psal. lix. 6. and xxii. 16. False teachers are dogs; they are inclined to abominable courses; are dumb dogs, do not faithfully warn and instruct men; are laxy dogs; do not travail as in birth, till Christ be formed in their hearers' souls; are greedy dogs that never get enough of worldly things; and are given to bark at and reproach the people of God. Phil. iii. 2. Isa. lvi. 10, 11. The gentiles were reckoned as dogs by the Jews, but they ate of the crumbs, that fell from Jesus' table; partook of some of his miracles; and licked his sores, applied his sufferings for the healing and food of their souls. Matt. xv. 27. Luke xvi. 21. Satan is called a dog, to mark his villainess and hurtfulness, in reproaching and harassing the saints, though God made both him and his agents useful in driving them to himself. Psal. xxii. 20.

DOLEFUL; hideously mournful. Mic. ii. 4. Doleful creatures are such as utter hideous cries of the mournful kind; as dragons, owls, &c. Isa. xiii. 21. and xxxiv. 13, 14.

DOMINION; authority; power to rule and dispose of. Gen. i. 26. Ministers have not dominion over the faith of their hearers, to require them to believe any thing not founded in the word of God. 2 Cor. i. 24. 1 Pet. v. 3. (2.) Kingdom; nation. Psal. ciii. 22. 2 Kings xx. 13. (3.) Governors and their subjects. Dan. vii. 27. (4.) Angels who have great power and authority to execute God's commission. Col. i. 16.

DOOR; an entrance by which people go out and in to houses, gardens, &c. The word is used for any kind of means of entrance to or going out. Christ is called the door, and was figured out by the doors or gates of the tabernacle and temple. He, in his person and offices of mediation, is the only means of our access to God. Only such as believe on him can be true members of his church on earth, or be admitted to that in heaven. John x. 9. The gospel-church is a door enclosed with boards of cedar; her constitution is glorious and lasting; and by her multitudes come to the presence and fellowship of God in Christ. Sol. Song viii. 9. Slothful persons are as a door turning upon its hinges; they appear to be doing something, and yet make no progress in any thing good. Prov. xxvi. 14. The door at which Christ knocks, and demands entrance, is the understanding, conscience, and affections, and by these he enters into our hearts. Rev. iii. 20. Sol. Song v. 4. Psal. xxiv. 7, 9. The door is shut, after Christ's chosen have entered his marriage-feast; all merciful access to God, the dispensation of the gospel, and the striving of his Spirit cease. Nor can heaven be opened to such as are left behind. Matt. xxv. 10. Luke xiii. 25. The door of faith is opened to the gentiles, when they have a clear warrant and invitation to believe set before them in the gospel, and they are powerfully determined to receive Jesus and all his fulness, as the gift of God, and the means of access to his favour. Acts xiv. 27. An effectual door was opened to the apostles, and other ministers, when they had opportunity, with appearance of success, to preach Christ to multitudes. 1 Cor. xvi. 9. 2 Cor. ii. 12. Rev. iii. 8. Ministers have a door of utterance given them, when they are helped by God to preach the gospel with great plainness, readiness, and boldness. Col. iv. 3. Ministers enter in by the door, when they have a regular call from God to their office. John x. 1, 2. At the door, or before it, imports nearness, readiness to testify against, come up on, or judge us. Gen. iv. 7. Matt. xxiv. 33. James v. 9. God's making the valley of Achor a door of hope, may import that, amid guilt and trouble, the beginnings of mercy shall encourage to hope for still greater favours; or that the conversion of the Samaritans near that place was an earnest of the conversion of the gentiles. Hos. ii. 15. John iv.

DOR; a city on the shore of the Mediterranean sea, with a very bad harbour. It stood about nine miles northward of Cesarea of Palestine, and a little to the south of mount Carmel. It was taken by Joshua, and given to the half-tribe of Manasseh; but they suffered the Canaanites to keep possession of it. Judges i. 27. Long after, it was a strong city; and here Antiochus Sidetes, about A. M. 3866, besieged Tryphon the usurper, of the Græco-Syrian throne. Josh. xii. 23. and xvii. 11.

NOTE; (1.) To grow delirious, senseless, and stupid. Jer. i. 36. 1 Tim. vi. 4. (2.) To be fond of persons or things, even to madness and stupidity. Ezek. xxiii. 6, 13, 16.

DOTHAN; a city and country about twelve miles north from Samaria, and according to Bunting, forty-four north of Jerusalem, and six westward of Tiberias. Here Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites; and here Elisha smote the Syrians, who came to apprehend him, with blindness. Gen. xxxvii. 17. 2 Kings vi. 13.

DOUBLE. God's people receive of his hand double for all their sins. The Jews in their Chaldean captivity received large punishment, sufficient to answer God's designs with them. In Christ, the saints have full satisfaction given for their sins; and, in their own persons, they receive proper correction. Isa. xl. 2. The Jews had double for their shame, when their troubles and disgrace were removed, and great happiness and glory succeeded. Isa. lxi. 7. Anti-christ's cup shall be filled double; the judgments of God upon the Papists shall, at last, be more dreadful than the persecution they inflicted on the witnesses of Christ. Rev. xviii. 6. A double portion is either twice as much as any other, Deut. xxi. 17; or a very large share. 2 Kings ii. 9. A double garment is a lined one. Exod. xxxix. 9. A double heart, or mind, is that which pretends an inclination to good, and yet habitually works wickedness with pleasure; and is opposite to a single, honest, faithful, and sincere one. Psal. xii. 2. James i. 8.

DOUBT; to be uncertain what to think or believe. John x. 24. Matt. xxviii. 17.

DOVES; birds which have their beaks of an attenuated and conic figure; their nostrils are oblong, skinny, and partly covered; their tongue has no division; their eyes are very clear and beautiful. Doves have no gall, feed on pure food, are mild, harmless, beautiful, fruitful, defenceless, hated by ravenous birds, chaste to their mates, and much given to mourning, if they lose them. Doves are of different kinds; the common pigeon; the ring-dove, or turtle; the wood-pigeon; the American grey and black dove, with a white breast; and the green dove, with yellow legs. All doves were of old legally clean, and pigeons and turtles were the appointed oblations of the poor. By these was figured out Jesus Christ, in his meekness, purity, and constancy of love. Lev. i; vi. and xii. The Holy Ghost appeared in the likeness of a dove, and is called a turtle, to mark his purity, loveliness, and love; and that his voice in the gospel brings certain evidence that the deluging waters of divine wrath are abated, and that heathenish darkness and ungeneracy are past; and that he brings forth a race of holy and harmless saints. Matt. iii. 16. Sol. Song ii. 12. The church and her true members are likened to a dove, to mark their natural weakness and exposure to enemies; their spiritual sagacity and comeliness; their pure feeding on Jesus Christ and his truth; their chaste affection to him, and mourning for his absence; their meekness, innocence, spiritual fruitfulness in good works, and heavenly-mindedness. Psal. lxxiv. 19. and lxxviii. 13. Sol. Song ii. 14. Matt. x. 16. The ten tribes of Israel were like a silly dove without heart; when, by means of the Assyrian oppression, and their own civil broils, they were weakened, perplexed, dispirited, and took no care to avoid their ruinous afflictions. Hos. vi. 11. To mourn like doves, is to lament in the most bitter and desperate manner. Isa. xxxviii. 14. and lx. 11. Nah. ii. 7.

DOWRY. (1.) A portion brought by a husband to his wife, or given to her parent, to obtain her in marriage. Gen. xxxiv. 12.

1 Sam. xviii. 25. (2.) A portion brought by a wife to her husband. Exod. xxii. 17.

DRAG. See NRT. To DRAG, is to draw along with difficulty. John xxi. 8.

DRAGON. This word generally answers to the Hebrew word THANNIM, or THANNIN, which signifies either a large fish, as the whale, crocodile, dolphin, &c. Gen. i. 21. Job xxxiv. 13; or, secondly, a SERPENT of a large size; some of which have feet, claws, and crests. Some writers speak of dragons in Greece that are not venomous, and may be tamed; but those of which the prophets speak are represented as wild, hurtful, and dangerous. Because dragons, and other venomous creatures, delight to lodge among old rubbish, cities reduced to desolation are figured out as dens and dwellings of dragons. Isa. xiii. 22, and xxxiv. 13. Jer. ix. 11. Satan is called a dragon, because of his power, malice, and hurtfulness. Rev. xx. 2. Cruel tyrants and conquerors, such as the kings of Assyria, and Egypt, are likened to dragons, chiefly those of the water kind, as crocodiles, &c. for their terrible appearance and destructive influence. Isa. xxvii. 1. and ii. 9. Psal. lxxiv. 13. Ezek. xix. 3. The heathen empire of Rome is likened to a great red dragon: actuated by the devil, it, in a most bloody manner, wasted the nations, and persecuted the church of God. Rev. xii. 3. The dragon and his angels were cast out unto the earth, when the power of the bloody persecutors was brought low; heathen idolatry and superstition banished out of the cities to villages, and the power of Satan and his agents trampled under foot. Rev. xii. 9. Antichrist speaks as a dragon: by diabolical and heathen authority he teaches, and under the most terrible penalties imposed devilish and Pagan errors, superstition, idolatry. Rev. xiii. 2. Wicked men are like dragons; they are the seed of the old serpent, and are full of sinful poison; and destruction and misery are in all their ways. Isa. xxxv. 7. and xliii. 20. To wail like dragons, is to mourn very bitterly, and in a hideous and hissing manner: but some think the dolphin fish is here meant, who mourns in the most pitiful strains. Micah i. 8. Job xxx. 29.

DRAM, or DRACHM; a weight of sixty grains, or the eighth part of an ounce, and the fourth part of a shekel; but Prideaux thinks it heavier, and that a dram of silver is equal to ninepence, and a dram of gold about twelve times as much; and so a thousand drams of gold will amount to about £450 sterling. This coin is mentioned in 1 Chron. xxix. 7. and Ezra ii. 69.

DRAUGHT. (1.) The quantity of fishes taken at one drawing of the net. Luke v. 4. 9. (2.) That part of the belly which contains the excrements. Matt. xv. 17. A draught-house is a place for filth and excrements. 2 Kings x. 27.

DRAW; (1.) To pull towards one. Judg. iii. 22. (2.) To go. Job xxi. 33. (3.) To come. Exod. iii. 5. Christ drew near and approached to God, in the council of peace, by undertaking our cause: he drew near to him in his humiliation, by obeying and suffering in our stead: he now draws near to him, in sitting at his right hand, and boldly interceding for us. Jer. xxx. 21. Psal. lxxv.

4. God and Christ draw men, by kindly and powerfully persuading and enabling them to come to, and enjoy union and fellowship with them. John vi. 37. and xii. 32. Hos. xi. 4. God draws nigh to us, when he bestows on us his quickening, liberating, strengthening, and comforting influence; and we draw near to him, when we earnestly seek and embrace him, as our Saviour, Portion, and Master; and solemnly apply to the ordinances of his worship, and study to have fellowship with him therein. James iv. 8. Psal. lxxiii. 28. We draw back, when our knowledge of seeming love to God, and outward service and worship of him, lessen: or, we utterly cast off all the regard to him and his ways that we once seemed to have. Heb. x. 38. To be drawn away of lust, is to be powerfully enticed by it into sinful acts. Jam. i. 14.

DREAD; terror. Gen. ix. 2. Job xiii. 11, 21. God is the dread of his people, when they, in a holy and affectionate manner, reverence and stand in awe of him. DREADFUL, TERRIBLE. Mal. i. 14.

DREAM. Natural dreams proceed much from the business men are intent upon, or from the constitution and habit of their bodies; and hence diseases, latent or beginning, are often discernible from them. It is likely they often begin from some outward sensation of the body, in which spirits, good or bad, have no inconsiderable influence. By supernatural dreams, God of old informed men of his mind. In this manner he informed Abimelech that Sarah was Abraham's wife; informed Eliphaz of his incomparable greatness; shewed Jacob, Joseph, Pharaoh, and his butler and baker, the Midianitish soldier, Nubuchadnezzar, Daniel, and Joseph the husband of Mary, what was to happen; and sometimes added proper instructions. Gen. xx. 6. Job iv. 12-21. Gen. xxviii. 12-16. xl. and xli. Judg. vii. 13-15. Dan. ii. 4. and vii. The heathens and even the Jews, were superstitiously inclined to collect a knowledge of futurity from dreams, and to apply to their diviners for the interpretation of them. False prophets often pretended they had received the oracles of God in their dreams. Jer. xxiii. 25. and xxix. 8. Deut. xiii. 1. Wicked men, and the Assyrian host, are likened to a dream; they, and their posterity, were, or are, in the end, easily and utterly cut off. Job xx. 8. Psal. lxxiii. 20. Isa. xxix. 7. and xxxvii. 36. The Jews were like men that dreamed, when God turned back their captivity; they were without expectation of it, and unconcerned about it. Psal. cxxvi. 1. Filthy dreamers that defile the flesh, are either false teachers that vent their abominable tenets, or lascivious persons who, by means of unclean dreams pollute their bodies. Jude 8.

DRESS. To dress ground, is to dig, sow, and otherwise cultivate it. Gen. ii. 15. Heb. vi. 7. To dress meat, is to make it ready for eating. 2 Sam. xii. 4. and xlii. 5. To dress the lamps of the sanctuary, was to light, snuff, and trim them. Exod. xxx. 7. To dress one's nails, is to pare them. To dress one's feet, or self, is to clothe and adorn in a proper manner. Deut. xxi. 12. 2 Sam. xix. 24. The dresser of the vineyard, who pleaded for another year's patience to the barren fig-tree, is Jesus Christ who interceded for the sparing of the Jewish nation, till they had about forty years' enjoyment of the gospel-dispensation. Luke xii. 7.

DREGS; the refuse of wine at the bottom of the vessel. Sore and terrible afflictions are likened thereto. Psal. lxxv. 8. Isa. li. 17.

DRINK, not only denotes the drinking of liquor to the satisfying of thirst, or to create a sober cheerfulness, Gen. xliii. 34. John ii. 10; but the receiving or enduring of things good or bad. To drink waters out of one's cistern and well, is to enjoy the lawful pleasures of marriage. Prov. v. 15. To drink a cup of gall, fury, astonishment, and trembling, is to undergo fearful miseries, that make one tremble and be astonished. Jer. xxiii. 15. and xxv. 15. Psal. lx. 3. Isa. li. 22. To drink abundantly Christ's water, wine, and milk, is to receive his Spirit, and new-covenant blessings, in a plentiful degree. John vii. 37. Sol. Song v. 1. Zech. ix. 15—17. To drink up iniquity as water, is with great pleasure to abound in the practice of wickedness. Job xv. 16. To drink blood, is to be satisfied with slaughter. Ezek. xxxix. 18. Sennacherib drank strange waters, and dried up the rivers of besieged places, when his army exhausted the wells of the countries which he invaded, and dried up the cisterns and wells of besieged cities; or when he conquered the nations, and seized their wealth at pleasure. Isa. xxxvii. 25. The Jews' drinking the water of the Nile and Euphrates, signifies their entering into alliances with the Egyptians and Assyrians. Jer. li. 18. To drink one's piss, to buy water to drink, or to drink water in measure, imports being reduced to the utmost distress of famine and want. 2 Kings xviii. 27. Lam. v. 4. Ezek. iv. 11.

DRUNK, is, (1.) To be intoxicated with liquor. 1 Kings xx. 16. (2.) To be madly carried away with delusion, idolatry, error, and superstition. Isa. xxviii. 7. Rev. xvii. 2. (3.) To be stupefied and overwhelmed with sore afflictions and miseries. Jer. xiii. 13. Isa. lxiii. 6. (4.) To be given to luxury, wantonness, and infamous lust. 1 Thess. v. 7. Hab. ii. 15. Antichrist is drunk with the blood of the saints: with great pleasure he persecutes and murders multitudes of them. Rev. xvii. 6. To add drunkenness to thirst, is to become worse and worse in idolatry and other wickedness. Deut. xxix. 19. See CUP.

DRIVE; to force to go. Exod. vi. 1. The wicked are driven away in their wickedness; by death they are violently hurled, under the guilt and power of their sins, into eternal misery. Prov. xiv. 32. God's driving out the nations of Canaan by little and little, figured his gradually but powerfully expelling sinful corruptions from the heart of his people, and of hypocrites from his church. Exod. xxiii. 30.

DROMEDARY. See CAMEL.

DROP; to fall gently, as rain. To drop, in metaphorical language, imports a gradual, continued, and delightful course of words, influences, or blessings. Prov. v. 3. Sol. Song iv. 11. and v. 5, 13. Joel iii. 18. The contentions of a wife are a continual dropping; an unceasing and grievous plague. Prov. xix. 13. Through idleness the house droppeth; the family and estate go to ruin. Eccl. x. 18. Before God all nations are small, insignificant, and contemptible, as the drop of a bucket; as the small dust of the balance, that casts not the scale; and as nothing, and less than nothing, vanity. Isa. xl. 15, 17.

DROSS; the refuse of metal, &c. Prov. xxv. 4. and xxvi. 23. The corruptions of a people, and their profane and wicked persons, are likened to dross; they are useless, and tend to defile others, till God, by his grace and providence, separate them; and wicked persons are to be cast out into the dunghill of everlasting wrath. Isa. i. 25. Psal. cxix. 119. Ezek. xxii. 18, 19. Silver is become dross, and wine is mixed with water, when God's word is mixed with traditions and errors; and rulers and professors become naughty and profane. Isa. i. 22.

DROPSY; a very dangerous disease, produced by a preternatural abounding of a kind of water in the body, or mingled with the blood. It is of very different kinds, as of the head, breast, lungs, scrotum, or whole body; but the most usual is that of the lower belly. Sometimes this humour has so pestilential a steam, that the health of the physician who extracts it is endangered. In dropsies, the feet and legs ordinarily swell; there is a difficulty of breathing, intense thirst, small quantity of urine, costiveness, &c. In the beginning, much exercise, change of air, strong purgatives, &c. are proper for it; but when it is well advanced, scarcely any thing but tapping is of service. Nor is that often any more than a means of present ease. There is also windy dropsy, called a tympany. Luke xiv. 2.

DROWN; to kill by stopping the breath in water. Exod. xv. 4. Pechlin, Derham, and others, relate instances of persons being recovered to life, after they had long appeared to be drowned. At present, the Dutch are very attentive to find out a method to recover such as are newly drowned, and have already had considerable success.

DROWSINESS; a disposition to sleep: a thoughtless unconcern, attended with empty imagination, and vain desires. Such a disposition reduces one to poverty and rage, in his outward condition; and to a ragged and blemished conversation. Prov. xxiii. 21.

DRUSILLA; the youngest sister of AGRIPPA, Bernice, and Mariamne. Epiphanes, prince of Comagena in Syria, had the promise of her in marriage, if he would become circumcised; but he declining that operation she was given to Azizus king of Emesa in Syria, who underwent it to obtain her. It was not long before she divorced him, and married FELIX governor of Judea, by whom she had a son called Agrippa. She was considered one of the most beautiful women of the age, but was very unchaste. Acts xiv. 24.

DRY; without sap. Christ grew as a root out of a dry ground: he sprang out of the Jewish nation, when very sinful, and reduced to bondage and slavery; and of a poor virgin of the family of David, when very low and contemptible. Isa. liii. 2. The eunuchs, though childless, and excluded from rule in the congregation of Israel, shall not say, I am a dry tree, altogether useless, and excluded from fellowship with God. Isa. lvi. 3. The wicked, the Jews and heathen world, are like dry trees, or dry ground; void of grace, destitute of gospel-ordinances, and ripe for the vengeance of God. Luke xxiii. 31. Isa. xli. 18. and xlv. 3. A country deprived of inhabitants is called dry ground. Zeph. ii. 13. Jer. i. 12. To dry a thing is to deprive it of moisture, power, excellency, courage, and comfort. 1 Kings xvii. 7. Hos. xiii. 15. Zech. xi. 17. Ezek. xlvii. 24. Numb. xi. 6. and Prov. xvii. 22.

DRYSHOD; in the most safe and easy manner, without any thing to stop them. Isa. xi. 15.

DUE. (1.) What is owing. Rom. xiii. 7. (2.) What is proper and fit. Lev. xxvi. 4. Deut. xxxii. 35.

DUKES; a kind of princes who governed among the Horites, Edomites, and Midianites; and these last are called dukes of Sihon, because he had rendered them tributary. Gen. xxxvi. 15, 21. Exod. xv. 15. Josh. xiii. 21.

DULCIMER; a musical instrument; but whether a crooked pipe, or a kind of drum, we know not. Dan. iii. 5.

DUMAH; a son of Ishmael, who it seems, gave name to a country of Arabia the Rocky, which belonged to the Edomites, or rather the Ishmaelites, and was terribly harassed by the Assyrian and Chaldean conquerors. Gen. xxv. 11. Isa. xxi. 11.

DULL; one that cannot readily hear or understand. Matt. xiii. 15. Acts xxviii. 27. Heb. v. 11.

DUMB. (1.) Such as cannot speak for want of natural abilities. Exod. iv. 11. 1 Cor. xii. 2. (2.) Such as cannot teach others for want of grace, knowledge, and courage. Isa. lvi. 10. (3.) Submissive and silent under the dispensations of Providence. Psal. xxxix. 9. (4.) Such as do not speak. Psal. xxxix. 2. Ezek. iii. 26. (5.) Such as cannot speak in their own cause, by reason of ignorance, fear, &c. Prov. xxxi. 8. (6.) Rendered speechless by a divine ecstasy of wonder and amazement. Dan. x. 16. Zachariah's dumbness during his wife's pregnancy, might figure out the silencing and abolition of the ceremonial laws, by Christ's appearance in our nature; or that by means of his birth, and what followed, their true language, and signification should be made known. Luke i. 20. A dumb and deaf spirit is one who, by his possession of persons, renders them dumb and deaf. Mark ix. 17, 25.

DUNG; DIRT; excrements of animals, or other loathsome matter. Wicked men are likened to dung; their corrupt nature is vile and abominable; God rejects them with abhorrence and contempt; their carcases like dung fatten the ground; and at last they are cast into hell as abominable. Jer. xvi. 4. Job xx. 7. To fall like dung, and handfuls of corn, is to be slain in multitudes. Psal. lxxxiii. 13. Jer. ix. 22. Idols are called, about forty-nine times, dung-gods, or geidim, to denote how useless and abominable they are. Deut. xxix. † 17, &c.

God spreads the dung of men's sacrifices and solemn feasts on their faces, when he rejects their religious services with the utmost contempt, because of their hypocrisy and wickedness. Mal. ii. 3. The saints count all things but dung, or dogs' meat, to win Christ; altogether worthless and abominable in comparison of him, and utterly insufficient to recommend them to the favour of God as a judge. Phil. iii. 8.

DUNGHILL. (1.) A place for dung. Luke xiv. 35. (2.) A very low and wretched condition of life. 1 Sam. ii. 8. Doves'-dung, was perhaps not the excrements of doves, but a kind of chick-peas. 2 Kings vi. 25.

DUNGEON. (1.) A dark and incommensurable apartment in a prison. Gen. xi. 15. (2.) A most shameful, debased, and unhappy condition. Isa. xxiv. † 22. Lam. iii. 55.

DURE; to last.

DURABLE; lasting. Prov. xiii. 21. and viii. 18.

DUST. The putting of dust and ashes on the head; rolling one's self in dust; sitting in the dust; putting the mouth in the dust; imports great mourning and distress. Josh. vii. 6. Mic. i. 10. Job xlii. 6. Isa. xlvii. 1. Lam. iii. 29. The Jews throwing dust in the air against Paul, imported an outrageous desire to have reduced him to powder. Acts xxii. 29. The apostles shaking off the dust of their feet, against those who refused to receive them, imported a detestation of them, and all they had, and a giving of them up to their stupidity, misery, and wickedness. Matt. x. 14. Luke x. 5. The shaking one's self from the dust, imports recovery from distress, contempt, and grief. Isa. lii. 2. To lick the dust of one's feet, is to pay him the utmost reverence and subjection; as the subjects in some eastern courts fell on the earth, and kissed the dust at the feet of their sovereign. Psal. lxxii. 9. Isa. xlix. 23. To pant for the dust, on the head of the poor, is to wish for their utter ruin, or to be earnestly covetous of their meanest enjoyments. Amos ii. 7. Dust shall be the serpent's meat. Satan shall only harass wicked men; and wicked men shall have a poor pittance of outward enjoyments. Gen. iii. 14. Isa. lxxv. 26. Dust is put for the grave, where men's bodies are encompassed with, and turned into dust. Gen. iii. 19. Job vii. 21. Eccl. xii. 7; and for a low and wretched condition. 1 Sam. ii. 8. Nah. iii. 18. Psal. xxii. 29. Men are called dust and ashes; they are mean and contemptible before God; their bodies are formed from, nourished with, and shall return to dust. Gen. xviii. 27. Dead men are called dust. Psal. xxx. 9. The Jews are likened to dust for their multitude. Gen. xiii. 16. Num. xxiii. 10; and for their great distress, 2 Kings xiii. 7; and the quails for their vast number. Psal. lxxviii. 27. Affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground; it comes not by mere chance or course of nature, but from a sinful cause, and by means of the providence of God. Or the words might be rendered, Men not able in iniquity, shall not grow prosperously out of the dust; nor shall those remarkable in wickedness flourish out of the ground; and the following verse thus, But if man, as one born to it, be obstinate in gross impiety, the flaming thunderbolts of divine vengeance, fly aloft to destroy him.

DUTY; what one owes, is obliged to by equity, law, or engagement. Ezek. xviii. 11. The duty of marriage is the same with what Paul calls due benevolence, together with a proper authority in the family. Exod. xxi. 10. 1 Cor. vii. 3. The duty of a husband's brother, if unmarried, was to marry the widow of his deceased brother, and raise up children to him. Deut. xxv. 5—7.

DWARFS, or persons far below the ordinary size of men, were not allowed to minister in the ceremonial service of the tabernacle or temple. Lev. xxi. 20.

DWELL; to have a fixed residence in a place. God dwells in light, in respect of his delight in, and independent possession of, his own glorious excellencies, and in respect of his glorious residence amidst rays of inexpressible glory in heaven. 1 Tim. vi. 16. 1 John i. 7. He dwells in heaven, in respect of the continued and delightful residence of his presence there. Psal. cxxiii. 1. He dwells in the tabernacle, temple, and city of Jerusalem; there the symbols of his presence were continued. Psal. cxxiii. 14. and lxxviii. 16. He dwells in his church, and in and with his people, in the continued bestowal of his ordinances, and of his gracious, supporting, and comforting influences. Psal. ix. 11. 1 John iv. 12. Isa. lviii. 15. The fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily in Christ; the divine nature personally, perpetually, and truly, resides in his human nature, by the closest union with it. Col. ii. 9. Christ dwells among men in his state of humiliation on earth. John i. 14. He dwells in our heart by faith; he is united to us as our head and husband; his righteousness is imputed to us, and applied to our conscience; his Spirit and grace are fixed in our heart; he loves and delights in us, and furnishes our whole soul with his fullness. Eph. iii. 17. The Holy Spirit dwells in us by personal residence, and gracious influence. Rom. viii. and ix. 2 Tim. i. 14. 1 Cor. iii. 16. The word of God dwells in us richly when it is carefully studied, firmly believed, closely applied, and diligently practised. Col. iii. 16. Psal. cxix. 11. Satan dwells in men, when he reigns over them, and fills them with ignorance, error, malice, blasphemy, &c. Matt. xii. 45. The saints dwell in God, and in Christ; they are united to, and nourished, supported, and comforted by him, and have sweet intimacy and fellowship with him. 1 John iii. 24. and iv. 16. They dwell in love, when they live in the faith of God's redeeming love to them, and in the exercise of love to him and his people. 1 John iv. 15. Their dwelling in the house of God, or in his courts, imports their frequent fellowship with him in his ordinances. Psal. xxvii. 4. and lxxxiv. 4. Wickedness, vengeance, or judgment, dwells in or on a person and land, when it long continues there. Job xi. 14. and xviii. 15. Isa. xxxii. 16.

E

EAGLE; one of the principal birds of prey. It has a beak, strong and hooked. Its feet have three toes before, and one behind. It is a very ravenous fowl. It sees or smells dead carcasses at a great distance. It breaks the bones of its prey to come at the marrow. Every year it moults, and becomes almost bold, and then renews its youth, by producing a set of new feathers. Eagles are extremely solicitous for their young; take them on their wings when weak and fearful. They fly high and quick, have their nests in rocks, and are generally long-lived. There are a great many kinds of eagles; as brown eagles, chesnut-coloured eagles, white-tailed eagles, &c. The common eagle is about the size of a turkey, and of an iron colour; the tongue like a man's; the mouth large; the eyes sunk into the head, but large, bright, and piercing; the wings are large; the legs are feathered; the feet yellowish; and the claws bluish black, long, and fit to take a fast gripe of any thing. Job xxxix. 27—30. Psal. ciii. 5. Deut. xxxii. 11.

The GIER-EAGLE, or vulture-eagle, is perhaps the same with the mountain stork. The storks that feed upon the carrion about Grand Cairo in Egypt, are called by the Arabs RACHAMA, which is the very name of this fowl with the Hebrews; and imports it to be full of pity and compassion to its young, as both eagles and vultures are; and, it is said, will sometimes feed them with their own blood, rather than suffer them to perish for want. Were we sure that the Targum of Jonathan, the Syriac version, and the Talmudists, rightly call this fowl serakrak, we should be tempted, with Dr. Shaw, to take it for the shagarak of the Arabs, which is a kind of jay, whose back is brownish; its head, neck, and belly, of a light green; its wings and tail spotted with a deep blue; and its nose squalling. Some take the RACHAM for the woodpecker, the tenderness of which to its aged parents is very remarkable.

The HHOZNIYAH is generally reckoned the OSPRAY, or sea-eagle. It has a large and thick neck, crooked wings, and a broad tail, and haunts sea-shores and islands. When it perceives a fish in the water, it rushes downward, and fetches it out. Before its young are fledged with feathers, it is said to make them gaze on the sun, and to kill, or cast out of the nest, such as wink, or have their eyes watery. Bochart will have it to be the black eagle, which, though of a small size, is the strongest of the eagle kind.

The PHERES, or OSSIFRAGE, is also considered to be of the same species with the eagle. It has been remarked by some writers that it will dig up dead bodies, and break their bones, for the purpose of obtaining the marrow which it voraciously devours, and to take up the young eagles that have been cast off by their own parents. Some will have this fowl to be the bald buzzard, one of the hawk kind. All birds of the eagle kind were unclean, and might represent wicked men, full of carnal wisdom, pride, greediness, and destructive malice. Lev. xi. 13, 18. Deut. xiv. 12, 13, 17.

God flattered over, and bore the Hebrews as on eagles' wings; he encouraged, supported, protected, and directed them in their march through the wilderness. Exod. xix. 14. Deut. xxxii. 11. Jesus Christ is represented as a great eagle: how great his height, power, and knowledge! and with the wings of his perfections and providence are his people carried and protected from ruin. Rev. xii. 14. Ministers are likened to eagles; for their deep insight into the mysteries of truth, and for their heavenlyness, activity, and tender care of the saints. Rev. iv. 7. Ezek. i. 10. Saints are like eagles; notwithstanding of spiritual decays, they recover their vigour and comeliness; and, being divinely directed and drawn, they mount high in the exercise of faith, love, heavenly affections, and meditations. Psal. ciii. 5. Isa. xl. 31. The conquering kings of Assyria, Egypt, and Babylon, are likened to eagles for their power and dominion, and for their ravenous oppression, ravage, and murder of the nations. Hos. viii. 1. Ezek. xvii. 3, 7. The Chaldean armies are said to have had eagles' wings, and to be swift as eagles; with speed they overran and destroyed the nations. Dan. vii. 4. Hab. i. 8. Jer. iv. 13, and xlviii. 40. Lam. iv. 19. Roman armies are likened to eagles; they had their standards marked with the image of an eagle; they ravaged and murdered the nations; and, coming from afar, terribly ruined the corrupt nation of the Jews. Deut. xxviii. 49. Matt. xxiv. 28. Luke xvii. 37. The Edomites exalted themselves, and made their nest high as the eagles; they thought to secure themselves by the almost inaccessible rocks of their country. Jer. xlix. 16. Obad. 4. To enlarge baldness as the eagles, is to be bereaved of all comfort, protection, and happiness, and oppressed with sorrow and grief on that account. Mic. i. 16. Life and wealth pass away as flying eagles; they go off quickly, cannot be stopped in their course: riches fly towards heaven, to accuse their late abusers before God, and to receive fresh orders to whom they should go. Job ix. 26. Prov. xxiii. 5.

EAR; the organ of hearing, and of knowledge received by that means. The servant who declined to receive his freedom in the seventh year had his ear bored with an awl to the post of his master's door, as a token that he was to continue his servant for ever. This might denote the boring of Christ's ear, his solemn engagement to voluntary obedience in our room. Exod. xxi. 6. Dent. xv. 16, 17. But the phrase, Ozayim carti-ka li, might be rendered, Thou hast prepared me two ears; that is, an obedient humanity; and hence the phrase is rendered, A body hast thou prepared me. Heb. x. 5. God's ears denote his knowledge of his people's condition, his readiness to regard their requests, and deliver them from their afflictions and enemies. Psal. xxxiv. 15, and cxvi. 2. James v. 4. To hear in the ear, is to have a thing privately told us. Matt. x. 27. To bow down the ear, incline the ear, give ear, is carefully to attend to what is commanded or requested, and readily to do it. Psal. xxxi. 2. cxvi. 2. cxxx. 2, and xlix. 1. To uncover the ear, is to whisper or tell a secret to one. 1 Sam. xx. + 2. To stop the ears, imports the highest disregard and abhorrence. Isa. xxxiii. 15. Open and obedient ears import readiness to hear, to receive, and obey instructions. Isa. i. 6, and xlviii. 8. Prov. xxv. 12. Heavy and dull ears import an incapacity to perceive, or an unwillingness to embrace and obey divine truths. Isa. lix. 1, and vi. 10. Uncircumcised ears, and ears turned away from hearing the law, or ears stopped to good, import stupidity, obstinacy, and impenitency, which render men incapable of receiving good counsel or instruction. Jer. vi. 10. Acts vii. 51. Prov. xxi. 18, and xxviii. 9. Itching ears, denote an excessive fondness to hear novelties, quaint speeches, &c. 2 Tim. iv. 3. Such as have ears, and hear not, are those that have opportunities of learning God's truth, and have natural faculties to consider it, and yet never apply them for that purpose. Isa. xlii. 20, and xliii. 8. Mark viii. 18.

EAR, a head of corn. Exod. ix. 31. By seven fruitful ears, seven years of plenty, and by seven blasted ears, seven years of famine were represented to Pharaoh. Gen. xii. 5, 22. To ear the ground, is to plough it. Isa. xxx. 24, and Exod. xxxiv. 21.

EARLY; (1.) Soon in the morning. Gen. xix. 2. (2.) Speedily; seasonably; earnestly. Psal. xc. 14. Prov. viii. 17. Hos. v. 15, and Jer. xlv. 4.

EAR-RINGS; ornaments of gold, silver, &c. hung in the ears. It was common for both men and women, in the eastern countries, to wear them. Gen. xxxv. 4. Twice they were given to make idols of. Exod. xxxii. 2. Judg. viii. 24; and twice they were made an offering to the Lord. Exod. xxxv. 22. Num. xxxi. 50.

EARNEST; diligent; eager; vehement. 2 Cor. vii. 7, and viii. 16.

EARNEST; somewhat given in hand to give assurance, that what more is promised shall be given in due time. It differs from a pledge, as it is not taken back when full payment is made. The Holy Ghost and his influences are the earnest of our inheritance; are of the same nature, though not degree of application, with our eternal happiness; and they give us assurance, that in due time it shall be bestowed upon us. 2 Cor. i. 22, and v. 5. Eph. i. 14.

EARN; to gain by labour. Hag. i. 6.

EARTH. (1.) That huge and gross body of dust, stones, &c. which supports our feet, and affords us nourishment. Gen. i. 10. (2.) The whole globe of earth and sea joined together. Gen. i. 1. (3.) The inhabitants of the earth. Gen. vi. 13, and xi. 1. Psal. xcvi. 1; or the wicked part of them. Isa. xi. 4. Rev. xiv. 3. (4.) A part of the earth, such as the land of Judea, the empire of Assyria, Babylon, or Persia; and in some of these cases, it had been more distinct, if the word ERETZ had been translated land.

Rom. ix. 28. Psal. xlviii. 2. Isa. x. 14. Jer. li. 7, 26, 49. Zech. i. 14. Ezra i. 11. (5.) A low and debased condition. Rev. vi. 13. and xii. 13. (6.) Carnal schemes, projects, tempers, and enjoyments. Rev. xii. 4. and xiii. 11. John iii. 31.

EARTHEN; made of earth or dust. 2 Cor. iv. 7.

EARTHY, or EARTHLY; belonging to the earth; carnal. John iii. 12. James iii. 15. Adam and his seed, and the saints' bodies, are called earthy or earthly, because formed from the dust, and mortal and corruptible. 1 Cor. xv. 47, 48. 2 Cor. v. 1.

The globe of our EARTH is almost round, the equatorial line of longitude, or circumference from east to west, being but about one hundred and seven miles longer than the meridian line of latitude from north to south; nor do the mountains mar its roundish form any more than pin-heads would that of a lemon. Its circumference, allowing almost sixty-nine and half miles to each of the three hundred and sixty degrees, is above 25,000 English miles; its diameter 7957 miles in length; its surface about one hundred and ninety-nine and a half millions of square miles: its contents about 264 thousand millions of solid miles. About three-fourth parts of our globe, if not much more, are for what is yet known, covered with water, and, besides, there is a great depth of water in the bowels of it, to which our earthly surface is instead of a shell; which seems to have been broken to pieces at the flood, that the waters of the great deep might gush forth and overflow the earth. Though probably there is a large continent in the south seas, and of which New Holland is the north part, yet hitherto we have only discovered the OLD continent, which comprehends Asia, Africa, and Europe; and the NEW, containing South and North America. Both continents together, according to some, contain about fifty or fifty-four millions of square miles. It is said, if the whole be divided into three hundred parts, Asia will have one hundred and one, America ninety, Africa eighty-two, and Europe twenty-seven. But on a more accurate inspection, the habitable part of our globe amounts to thirty-nine millions of square miles, and the seas and unknown countries to 1604 millions of square miles. It is observable, that for the better balancing of the earth, if, on the old continent, a line be drawn from the north-east point of Tartary to the Cape of Good Hope, there will be an almost equal quantity of land on each side. And the same thing will happen in America, if, in a contrary direction, a line be drawn from the south-east point at Rio de la Plata to far beyond the lakes north-west of Canada. It may also be observed, that if the diurnal rotation of the earth were increased, the sea would rise at the equator, and overflow the dry land there; or, if it were lessened, the sea would fall at the equator, and overflow the dry land near the poles. Nay, if the whirling motion of the earth were exceedingly increased, the sea might altogether fly off from the earth, as water does from a grindstone, when it is fast whirled; but God, by a proper balance of gravity and centrifuge, has shut it up with doors, even with doors and bars. Job xxviii. 8, 10.

Asia lies on the east side of the old continent, between the 3d and 72d degree of north latitude, and between the 26th and 180th degree of east longitude, and is about 6000 miles from east to west, and almost 5000 from north to south, and contains about 10,769,000 of square miles, and five hundred millions of inhabitants. Tartary stretches itself along the north side. On the east, southward of Tartary, are the rich and populous empires of Japan and China; and south of the latter, Cochinchina, Tonquin, Pegu, Malacca, and other kingdoms of India beyond the Ganges. On the west of this is the large empire of the Moguls, the public revenue of which amounts yearly to about forty millions sterling. Northward of it is another large empire of Iran or Persia. To the west of Persia is Arabia. The rest of the western parts, including Canaan, Syria, Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, Assyria, Armenia, and Lesser Asia, belongs mostly to the Turks. Asia is not only the largest part of the world, but has been the most honoured. Here man was created; Paradise planted; the Jewish church for thousands of years subsisted; our Saviour tabernacled with men; and his apostles chiefly preached: here Noah and his sons were saved by the ark; and from hence the rest of the world was twice originally peopled. The north part of Asia was peopled by the posterity of Japheth, and the south by those of Shem. Besides the terrible ravage and murder committed here, in the erection of the Assyrian, Chaldean, Persian, Arabian, Tartarian, Turkish, and Chinese empires, the western parts of Asia were reduced and long held in subjection by the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, in their turns. At present heathenism reigns in the eastern part of it, and Mahometanism in the west, and no where has Christianity any establishment; and, except in China and Mogulistan, nay, even there, the inhabitants are generally in a most wretched condition as to the outward enjoyments of life.

Africa lies to the south-west of Asia, and south of Europe; is almost wholly separated from the former on the east, by the Indian Ocean and Red Sea, and wholly from the latter, on the north, by the Mediterranean sea. It lies between the 35th degree of north, and 35th of south latitude, and from the 51st of east, and 18th of west longitude from London: so that it forms a kind of triangle, and is about 4920 miles in length from north to south, and 4200 in breadth from east to west, and contains 9,655,000 square miles, and 150,000,000 of inhabitants. It was principally peopled by the descendants of Ham. It has generally been a scene of slavery, ignorance, and wretchedness. Nor, except Egypt and Ethiopia on the east, and Carthage on the north, has any state formed in it, made any remarkable figure in history. To relate the ravage and murder committed in the north parts of it, now distinguished into Egypt, Barbary, and Morocco, by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Romans, Vandals, Arabs, or Moors; or that committed in the midst of the country by the Imbii, Galles, or Giages; or the horrid manner of carrying on the slave-trade with the Europeans on the west coasts; or the inhuman brutality of the inhabitants in the south part, nay, through almost the whole of it, would be shocking to our readers. In Ethiopia or Abyssinia, the Christian religion is established, and in Egypt it is tolerated. In northern Africa, Mahometanism prevails; among the rest of the inhabitants, heathenism of the most unmeaning kind takes place; nay, indeed, most of the inhabitants of Africa have little more religion than the beasts that perish. Europe lies on the north of Africa, and the north-west of Asia. It is separated from the former, and from part of the latter, by the Mediterranean sea; then by the Hellespont and Euxine sea. On the east, it is separated from Asia by the rivers Don and Obey; or rather by a line drawn between the mouths of the two. It lies between the 35th and 72d degree of north latitude, and between the 61st degree of east, and 15th of west longitude from London. Its greatest breadth, from north to south, is about 2600, and its greatest length, from east to west, about 2800 miles; and contains about four and a half millions of square miles, and a hundred and fifty-three millions of inhabitants. It was originally peopled by the offspring of Japheth; and though by far the least part of the world, has been the most noted for learning, liberty, and religion. Here the Greeks, Romans, Germans, Ottoman Turks, and Russians, had or have the seat of their empires. In Turkey, on the south-east, Mahometanism is established. The Russians, on the north-east, profess to be Christians of the Greek church. In Italy, France, Spain, and Portugal, on the south; and a great part of Switzerland, Germany, Hungary, and Poland, in the midland, Popery is the established religion. In Sweden, Denmark, Prussia, Holland, and Britain, and part of Germany and Switzerland, the Protestant religion is settled by law.

America lies westward of Europe and Africa, with the Atlantic ocean between them, and eastward of Asia with the Pacific ocean between most of them; but the north-west parts of America, and the north-east of Asia, are nearly, if not wholly, joined by an isthmus of land. America has a prodigious length, reaching from about the 55th degree of south to almost the 80th degree of north latitude, and so cannot be much less than 9000 miles. Its breadth is not proportionable; being in the south part, about 2600 miles, and in the north about 3500; and in the middle it dwindles to almost nothing at all. It contains about 14,111,000 square miles, and 150,000,000 of inhabitants. It is probable, this large continent was peopled chiefly by the descendants of Japheth from Tartary, and partly by those of Ham from Africa. It is not three hundred years since it was discovered by the Europeans, at which time it had the two large empires of Peru on the south, and of Mexico in the north part. It is said, the Spaniards murdered about fifty millions of the natives in seizing their part of it; how far the Portuguese, English, and French, have imitated them in murder and ravage, we know not. To this moment, the natives are mostly heathens; nor are many of the Europeans, who have settled there, except those of New-England, Pennsylvania, and some places adjacent, a whit better.

Nearly 2000 years ago, it began to be suspected that the sun stood still, and the earth had a twofold motion, one round its own axis every day, and another around the sun once every year. Superstition of heathenism and Popery long restrained the philosophers from prosecuting this opinion. Since the reformation it has gradually gained ground, till it is become the general apprehension of every sensible philosopher.

EARTHQUAKE, a terrible shaking of the earth, occasioned by the motion of air or water, or by the kindling of sulphur, in its bowels. Earthquakes are a kind of thunder under ground. If an equal quantity of filings of iron and of sulphur be mixed together, and moistened with a little water, and hid in the earth, it will occasion a small shock similar to that of an earthquake. Countries where the bowels of the earth abound with sulphur, nitre, or pyrites, and where there are plenty of hollow cavities of the rocky kind, are the most subject to earthquakes. Sometimes the motion of earthquakes is perpendicular, throwing things directly upward; sometimes it is horizontal, pushing them from side to side. Earthquakes are the most terrible phenomena of nature. Oft they have swallowed up whole cities and ruined the country about. Perhaps Sodom and the neighbouring cities were swallowed up by one, and turned into a standing lake. In the days of Uzziah, a terrible earthquake at Jerusalem is said to have divided a mountain westward of the city, and removed the one part of it about half a mile out of its place. Amos. i. 1. Zech. xiv. 5. About A.D. 19, a terrible earthquake overturned twelve or thirteen cities of Lesser Asia. When our Saviour expired on the cross, a terrible earthquake happened, which is said to have been felt over all the world; and to have rent the rocks in a preternatural manner. Matt. xxvii. 54. Just before the destruction of Jerusalem, there happened many earthquakes in Crete, Miletus, Chios, Samos, at Smyrna and Rome, and in Campania and Judea. Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colosse in Lesser Asia, were quite overturned. Matt. xxiv. 7. The most terrible earthquakes of later times, is that of Sicily in 1693, in which about 60,000 perished, and in Cataniae not 1000 out of 12,000 were preserved; those of Jamaica in 1687 and 1692; that of Lima in 1687, by which about 5000 perished; that of Portugal in 1755, wherein many thousands were killed; and that of Syria in 1759, wherein about 30,000 perished.

Fearful appearances of providence, and terrible infliction of judgments, are represented as earthquakes, as, by them states, nations, rulers, and laws, though secure as mountains, are quite overturned. Psal. xviii. 7. xli. 2. and civ. 32. Isa. xxix. 6. Rev. viii. 5. xi. 12, 19. vi. 12. and xvi. 18.

EASE; rest, pleasure, comfort. Deut. xxviii. 65. To be at ease, is to be without trouble or concern. Isa. xxxii. 9. To be cased, is to be freed from pain, or from heavy burden and expense. Job xvi. 6. 2 Cor. viii. 13.

EAST. The Hebrews express the east by before, the west by behind, the south by the right hand, the north by the left hand, according to the position of a man whose face is toward the sun-rising. By the east, they not only meant Arabia the Desert, where the Midianites, Moabites, and Ammonites, &c. dwelt, (Judg. vi. 3. Job i. 3.) but also Mesopotamia, Chaldea, Persia, Assyria, Media, Armenia, and other countries that lay eastward of Canaan. Balaam, Cyrus, and the wise men, are said to come from the East, Numb. xxiii. 7. Isa. xlv. 11. Matt. ii. 1; and the Assyrians and Chaldeans are called an east wind. Hos. xii. 1. Jer. xviii. 17. Interpreters have questioned how Noah and his sons journeyed from the east, and came into the land of Shinar. But it was natural for them to journey in this direction, when mount Masius, on which it is supposed the ark rested, is about 100 miles, or two degrees, eastward of Shinar. Suppose the mount where the ark rested had been to the westward, how easy was it for Noah's family to have taken a round-about course, and at last moved westward!

EAT; (1.) To chew food, and receive it into the stomach. Gen. xxvii. 4. (2.) Happily to enjoy, Isa. i. 19; and hence to eat and drink, is liberally and cheerfully to enjoy the good things of this world, Eccl. v. 18. and li. 24; or of this world, and that which is to come. Isa. lxx. 13. (3.) Attentively to consider and believe. Jer. xv. 16. (4.) To consume; waste. Eccl. v. 11. To eat people, or eat their flesh, is cruelly to oppress and destroy them; and to bereave them of all that they enjoy. Psal. xiv. 4. Mic. iii. 3. Rev. xvii. 16. and xix. 18. To eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ, is with pleasure, appropriation, and desire, to know, believe on, and receive him in his person, incarnation, righteousness, and benefits, for the spiritual nourishment and life of our souls. John vi. 53. To eat and worship, is to receive the fulness of God, and to be influenced thereby to activity in his worship and service. Psal. xxii. 29. To eat a roll, book, or word, is thoroughly to consider, understand, and be affected by it. Ezek. lii. 1. Rev. x. 9. Jer. xv. 16. To be eaten up, or consumed with zeal, is to have our thoughts and cares wholly taken up, and our natural spirits exhausted, by a fervent but prudently conducted passion for the welfare of the church, and for promoting the honour and service of God. Psal. lxxix. 9. and cxix. 139. To eat on the left hand, and eat the flesh of one's own arm, is to be reduced to terrible straits of famine, and to destroy what might be useful for their own protection and relief. Isa. ix. 20. The Jewish priests did eat up the sin of God's people: For the sake of their share of the sin-offerings, they gladly received information of scandals, and with pleasure feasted on, and pampered themselves with the sacrifices offered for them. Hos. iv. 8. To eat on the mountains, is to partake of the idolatrous sacrifices offered in high places. Ezek. xviii. 16. To eat dung, and drink urine, is to suffer the utmost extremities of famine and misery in the siege of a city, &c. Isa. xxxvi. 12. To eat before the Lord, was to attend the solemn feasts in his courts. Deut. xii. 7. To eat with one, is to be familiar with him. 1 Cor. v. 11. The lion is called the eater, because he kills and feeds on a multitude of animals, and is himself preyed on by none. Judg. xiv. 14. See MEAT.

EBAL and GERIZIM, are two hills near Shechem, with a valley of about two hundred paces between them. Ebal is on the north, and has a top extremely bare and barren; Gerizim is on the south, and was extremely verdant and fertile. On these mountains the Hebrews were arranged, six tribes on each, who echoed Amen to the blessings and curses pronounced by the priests in the valley between the two. Dent. xxvii. and xxviii. Josh. viii. 30—35. On Gerizim the Samaritans afterwards built a temple, where they sometimes professed to worship the true God, and sometimes the Jupiter-Olympius of the Greeks. It seems our Saviour talked with the Samaritan woman on this mountain. John iv. 20.

EBED-MELECH; an Ethiopian slave of king Zedekiah. Hearing of Jeremiah's imprisonment in a dungeon full of infectious filthiness, he so effectually represented the matter to the king, and that the prophet was in danger of being starved, that he was ordered to take thirty men with him, and draw Jeremiah out of the dungeon. Ebed-melech immediately did so, and, lest the ropes might hurt the prophet's arms while they drew him up, he let down so many old rags to be put under his arm holes. This act of kindness to the prophet was quickly rewarded by God. He ordered Jeremiah to tell him, he should be safely preserved when the Chaldeans should take the city; and it happened accordingly. Jer. xxxviii. 6, 7, &c. and xxxix. 15—18.

EB-EN-EZER; (the stone of help,) the name of a field where the Philistines defeated the Hebrews, and seized on the sacred ark; and where afterward, at Samuel's request, the Lord discomfited the Philistines with thunder and hail, and gave the Hebrews a signal deliverance. On this occasion Samuel set up a stone, and gave it this designation, to mark that the Lord had helped them; and from it the whole field adjacent received its name. It is said to have been about forty miles south-west of Shiloh. 1 Sam. iv. 1. and vii. 12.

EBER. See HEBER.

EC-CLE-SI-ASTES; an inspired book written by Solomon in his old age, when he repented of his idolatry, luxury, and lust. In the first six chapters he shows the vanity of knowledge, pleasure, power, honour, and wealth; and how insufficient they are to render men truly happy. In the last six he recommends the fear of God, which is manifested by wisdom, prudence, equity, universal uprightness, liberality, and early consideration of divine things, death, judgment, and eternity. In vain Grotius and others have ascribed this book to any but Solomon. The high state, the wisdom, the splendour, the search amongst a thousand women, the setting forth of many proverbs, and study to the weariness of the flesh, which the author attributes to himself, chap. i. li. v. vii. and xii. can agree to none but him. It is true, the style of it inclines a little toward the Chaldaic or Arabic; but that might be occasioned by his converse with foreigners, his wives or others; and is no more than may be observed in some places of his proverbs.

EDEN; pleasure; (1.) A country on the banks of the Euphrates, a little northward of where it runs into the Persian gulph, and near Haran and Gozan. 2 Kings xix. 12, 13. Here is still the fattest soil in the Turkish empire, and one of the most pleasant places in the world, were it properly cultivated. Here probably the earthly paradise stood, on the spot where the Euphrates and Hiddekel, or Tigris, are joined into one river, and which a little below is parted into two streams; the Pison, which compasseth, or rather runs along the east of Havilah, a country on the north-east of Arabia-Felix; and Gihon, which runs along the west of Cush, Ethiopia, or Chuzestan in Persia. Here the Assyrians extended their conquests. The children of Eden, which were in Thelassar, may signify the inhabitants of Edon, which were in the province of Ellasar; or who had posted themselves in a strong tower, to defend themselves from the Assyrian ravages. The people of Eden traded with Tyre. Gen. ii. 8—15. Isa. xxxvii. 12. Ezek. xxvii. 13. (2.) That fruitful spot in Syria, between Libanus and Antilibanus; and was called Celo-Syria, or Hollow Syria. The houses of Eden might be pleasure palaces of the Syrian kings. Amos i. 5. Because Edon was so pleasant and fertile, any country pleasant and fruitful is likened to it, or called by its name. Isa. li. 3. Ezek. xxviii. 13. and xxxi. 9, 10, 13. Joel ii. 3.

EDGE; (1.) Outside; border. Exod. xiii. 20. and xxvi. 10. (2.) The sharp side or point of a sword, or other cutting instrument. Gen. xxxiv. 26.

EDIFY; to build up one in the saving knowledge and love of Christ, and cause him to make progress in the practice of holiness. 1 Cor. viii. 1. Such edification is the end of the gospel ministry and ordinances, and ought to be the aim of every Christian. 2 Cor. x. 8. and xiii. 10. Eph. iv. 14. 1 Thess. v. 11.

EDOM, ESAU, the elder son of Isaac. He was called ESAU, because he was as hairy as a grown man at his birth: and EDOM, perhaps, because his hair and complexion were red; and chiefly because he sold his birthright for a meal of red pottage. He was born A. M. 2173. When he was grown up, he applied himself chiefly to hunting. His supplying of his father so often with venison made him conceive a peculiar affection for him; while Jacob, being of a more gentle disposition, and staying much at home in the tent, was the darling of Rebekah their mother. One day, when Jacob had prepared for himself a mess of pottage, made of red lentles, Esau returned from his hunting at the point of death with hunger. He begged that Jacob would give him a little of his pottage. Jacob refused, unless Esau would immediately renounce his birthright in favour of him. Esau contemning the privileges annexed to the birthright, renounced it, ate his pottage, and went his way unconcerned. Gen. xxv. 24—34.

When Esau was forty years old, he, to the great grief of his parents, married two wicked women of Canaan: the one was Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite; and the other Adah, or Bashemath, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. About thirty years after, Isaac apprehending himself near death, intended to give Esau his last benediction. To render it the more tender, he ordered Esau to procure him some venison dressed to his taste. Esau took his weapons, and went to procure some by hunting. Rebekah, knowing from God that the blessing was divinely designed for Jacob, took methods by no means justifiable to obtain it for him. When Esau returned, he found that Jacob had artfully counterfeited his appearance, and obtained his father's principal blessing. With tears and bitter outcries, he begged that his father would bless him also. Moved by his entreaties, Isaac told him, that though he had irrevocably bestowed his choicest blessings on Jacob, yet he should inherit a country refreshed with the dew, and in some places, fat in its soil; that he should live by his sword, he and his posterity be much employed in war, and serve his brother and his posterity; but should sometimes throw off the yoke of subjection. Esau was highly enraged with the fraudulent manner in which Jacob had bereaved him of his birthright and blessing, and resolved to be revenged, by murdering him, while the friends were mourning for his father, whose death he daily expected. Meanwhile, finding his former marriages were so disagreeable to his parents, he, to please them, and to secure his title to what had been promised to Abraham, took to wife Mahalath, or Bashemath, the daughter of Ishmael; and, removing from his parents to Mount Seir, where the remnant of the Horites then lived, he married Aholibamah, daughter of ANAH, a chief prince of that tribe. Gen. xxvi. 34, 35; xxvii; xxviii. 6—9. and xxxvi.

Jacob had fled to Padan-aram to avoid the fury of Esau. When he returned home, twenty years afterward, he sent messengers with a present to appease him. Esau, with four hundred armed men, set out from Seir to meet Jacob, probably with an intent to destroy him, and all that he had. When they met on the south-east of the Galilean sea, God had so cooled the temper of Esau, that he was all kindness; with difficulty he accepted the presents which Jacob had prepared for him, as he thought he had enough cattle already. He invited Jacob to Mount Seir, and offered him his service to conduct him thither; but Jacob, in the most obliging manner, declined to accept it. About A. M. 2299, Jacob and Esau assisted together at their father's burial; and it seems they then both dwelt in the south of Canaan; but as the country could not support the vast herds of cattle belonging to both, Esau again retired to Mount Seir. Gen. xxxii. xxxiii. xxxv. 29. and xxxvi. 6, 7, 8.

Shackford and others, will have Esau to be a good man. They extol his ready forgiveness of the injuries done him by his brother, and his generous affection towards him, as marks of his goodness. They will have God's hatred of him to amount to no more than a postponing him to Jacob, with respect to the inheritance of Canaan; and the Holy Ghost's calling him a profane person to mean nothing more, but that he was too unmindful of the promise made to his father's family, and so unfit to be heir of the mercies peculiar to it. But, at this rate of explication, they might turn the Scripture upside down at their pleasure.

Esau's posterity were called EDOMITES, and were a people given to ravage and war. Esau had five sons; Eliphaz, the son of Adah; Renel, the son of Mahalath; and Jeshu, Jaulam, and Korah, the sons of Aholibamah. Eliphaz had seven sons; Teman, Omar, Zepho, Kenaz, Korah, Gatam, Amalek. Renel had four sons; Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah. These eleven, with the three sons of Aholibamah, were dukes in the land of Edom. The Edomites intermarried with the Horites, and at length swallowed up that people. Though the Edomites were divinely cursed to be the bond-slaves of Satan, yet in that early age, while the Hebrews endured the cruellest bondage, they were a potent nation, and were governed by a race of eight kings; Bela, the son of Beor; Jobab, the son of Zerah of Bozrah; Husham, of the land of Timani; Hadad, who defeated the Midianites in the country of Moab; Samlah of Masrekah; Saul of Rehoboth; Baal-hanan, the son of Achber; Hadar, of the city of Pau; but some think these were rather kings of the ancient Horites. About the time of the Hebrews' travels in the wilderness, the Edomites had eleven dukes, Timnah, Aliah, Jetheth, Aholibamah, Elah, Pinnon, Kenaz, Teman, Mibzar, Magdiel, Iran. But, perhaps, the fear of that wandering multitude made them again unite under one king. It was probably to this sovereign that Moses sent messengers to beg a passage through his country. The passage was denied. When Moses sent a second, importing that they would pay for every thing they asked, the king of Edom levied an army to stop them; but it seems the Edomites relented, and furnished them with provisions for money. Gen. xxxvi. 1 Chron. i. 35-54. Numb. xxii. 14-21. Deut. ii. 26, 29. For about four hundred years after, we hear nothing of the Edomites; but it is probable they applied themselves to commerce, both by sea and land. Elath and Ezion-geber were their ports on the Red sea. In the height of their prosperity, they gave some umbrage to David. He turned his victorious arms against them; 18,000 were slain in the Valley of Salt, and Joab ravaged the country, till he had scarcely left alive any of the males, and reduced the whole kingdom under the Hebrew yoke. Numbers of them fled into other countries, particularly to Phœnicia and Egypt, and, no doubt, carried their arts with them. Hadad their prince fled to Egypt; and, returning in the days of Solomon, founded a kingdom near the south-east of the land of Edom; but it seems his dominion was quickly reduced by the Jews, and Hadad himself perhaps obliged to flee into Syria. The Edomites were governed by deputies under the kings of Judah. Their troops assisted Jehoshaphat and Jehoram against the Moabites. It seems the Moabites soon after invaded their country, and burnt the bones of their king into ashes. They joined in the grand alliance against Jehoshaphat, but were murdered by their allies, the Moabites and Ammonites. 2 Sam. viii. 14. 1 Kings xi. 14-25. and xxii. 47. 2 Kings iii. Amos ii. 1. 2 Chron. xx. Psal. cxxxiii.

After they had been 150 years subject to the Hebrews, they threw off the yoke, and set up a king of their own, A. M. 5115. Jehoram king of Judah, attempted to reduce them, but could not effect it, though he routed their troops with great slaughter. About A. M. 5280, Amaziah, to revenge their buying the Hebrews from the Philistines and Tyrians for slaves, or some such affront, invaded their country, took Selah their capital, killed 10,000 of them, and cast other 10,000 from the rock whereon their city was built, and carried off their idols. Uzziah his son again attacked them, and took Elath, their chief city for the sea trade; but Rezin, king of Syria retook it in the days of Ahaz, and either kept it to himself, or restored it to the Edomites. 2 Chron. xxi. 8. Amos i. 6-9. 2 Kings xiv. 7. 2 Chron. xxvi. 2. and xxvii. 17. 2 Kings xvi. 6.

The Assyrians under Sennacherib, or his son Esarhaddon, terribly wasted the country of Edom, and ruined Bozrah the capital. When the Chaldeans besieged Jerusalem, the Edomites joined them, and excited them utterly to raze the city and temple; but scarcely had five years elapsed, when the Chaldeans ravaged their country; and this, or some other disaster about this time, rendered it a desolate wilderness. Those on the south parts coalesced with the Nebaioth, and those on the north parts seized on the south parts of the lot of Simeon and Judah; since which their own country has been cursed into perpetual barrenness and drought. Darius Hystaspes ordered them to deliver up to the Jews that part of their country which they had seized; but what effect this edict had we know not. About 3640, Judas Maccabæus terribly harassed them, put about 40,000 of them to the sword, and sacked Hebron their capital. About A. M. 1874, John Hyrcanus entirely conquered them, and obliged them to incorporate with the Jewish nation. Just before the taking of Jerusalem by Titus, a body of Edomites deserted the Jews, and went off laden with booty; since which, their name is perished from among men. Isa. xxi. 11. and xxxiv. Psal. cxxxvii. 7. Jer. ix. 26, 29. xxv. 9, 21. xxvii. 3. and xlix. 7-23. Lam. iv. 21, 22. Ezek. xxv. 12-14. xxxii. 29. xxxv. and xxxvi. 2, 35. Joel iii. 19. Amos i. 11, 12. and ix. 12. Obad. i. Mal. i. 3, 4. Isa. xi. 14. Edom, Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon, shall escape out of his hands: the Arabs, descended of Ishmael, and who dwell in these countries, shall not be subdued by the Turks. Dan. xi. 43. As the Edomites were cruel enemies to the Jews, the enemies of the church, of whatever kind, subdued by Christ, are called Edom and Bozrah. Isa. lxiii. 1.

EDOM, or IDUMEA; the country of the Edomites. It lay on the south and south-east of the inheritance of Judah, and extended sometimes to the Euxine gulf of the Red sea. It was very mountainous, including mounts Seir and Hor. Its principal cities were Selah, Bozrah, Elath, and Ezion-geber; and included the provinces of Uz, Dedan, Teman, &c. When the Edomites seized on the south parts of Canaan, that was called Idumea. Mark iii. 8. Anciently Idumea was well moistened with the dew of heaven, and was a land of corn and wine. Now, and for many ages past, it has been a frightful desert, so parched with drought that scarcely either flocks can feed, or the hardest vegetables grow; and so infested with dragons and vipers, that a passenger is every moment in danger of being bitten by them. Gen xxvii. 30. Mal. i. 3, 4.

ED-REI; (1.) The capital of the kingdom of Bashan, near to which Og was defeated. It was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh, — and for some ages after Christ was the seat of a bishop. Nu. xxi. 33—35. Josh. xiii. 31. (2.) A city in the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 37.

EFFECT, to finish; accomplish. An EFFECT, is, (1.) The accomplishment; product. Mark viii. 13. (2.) Purpose; end. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22. Quietness and assurance are the effect of righteousness, are purchased by the righteousness of Christ, and to be enjoyed in the way of exercising holiness of life. Isa. xxxii. 17. Christ and his cross, and promise, are of none effect, of no good use to men, when they do not believe his promise, embrace his person, religion, righteousness, they receive no saving benefits. Gal. v. 4. 1 Cor. i. 17. Rom. iv. 14.

EFFECTUAL; powerful enough to answer the end. A door for preaching the gospel is effectual, when the opportunity of doing it issues in the conviction and conversion of many. 1 Cor. xvi. 9. God works effectually in ministers, when he enables them, zealously to preach the gospel, and crowns their labours with success. Gal. ii. 8. He works effectually in his chosen people, when he converts them to himself, and causes them to bring forth fruits of holiness to his glory. Eph. iii. 7. and iv. 16. 1 Thess. ii. 13.

EG'LOH. See EHUB.

EGYPT; a country on the north-east of Africa, and south-west of Canaan. It is situated between the 24th and 33d degrees of north latitude, and between the 29th and 34th of east longitude from London. Its greatest length, from north to south, is six hundred miles, and its greatest breadth, from east to west, three hundred miles. It is bounded by the Mediterranean sea on the north; by the deserts of Lybia on the west; by Abyssinia on the south; and by the Red sea on the east. It was anciently called Chemia, or the land of Ham; and the present Copts call it Chemi, perhaps because Ham resided here. The Hebrews called it Mizraim; and the Arabs to this day call it Mesr, from Mizraim the son of Ham, who peopled it. Its present name, Egypt, was given it by the Greeks; and signifies either the land of the Copts, a name which the ancient inhabitants gave to themselves; or the land of blackness, because the soil and water are of a blackish colour. The river Nile runs through it northward, and yearly waters it, so that rain is scarce requisite; and indeed as seldom happens in Upper Egypt. Egypt was anciently extremely fertile; but as the Nile has sunk his channel lower, or rather, by yearly additions, raised the surface of the earth a great deal higher, and now overflows to a less height, and brings worse mud along with it; and as the enslaved inhabitants are disheartened from their ancient care and industry, it is now but moderately fertile and in time may become barren enough. Egypt was once very populous, and contained about 20,000 cities, viz. Syene, No, Memphis, Zoan, Sin, On, Phibesbeth, Pithom, Rameses, Migdol, Taphanes, Pathros, &c. The country was divided into three large provinces; Upper Egypt, or Thebais, which, according to most authors, is Pathros, whose capital was No; Middle Egypt, whose capital was Noph, Moph, or Memphis; and Lower Egypt, whose ancient capital seems to have been Zoan; this included all between the branches of the Nile, now called Delta, as well as the land of Goshen on the east, and the territory of Mareotis on the west; and, by means of the mud of the Nile, has gained considerable additions from the sea. Moreover, Egypt was divided into about thirty-six nomes, or counties, which were generally named after the chief city in each. The Egyptians were a people exceedingly given to divination and idolatry. Their chief idols were Osiris and Isis, or the sun and moon, Jupiter Ammon, Serapis, Anubis, Harpocrates, Orus and Canopus, &c. The pyed bull, in the worship of which so much of their religion consisted, was the representative of Osiris. They also worshipped sheep, goats, cats, and even leeks and onions. A great number of their civil regulations, however, were exceedingly reasonable; and they were reckoned by the more ancient Greeks, as the most noted for philosophy. They were no less famous for building; the three pyramids, of about 3000 years' standing, are to the south-west of Grand Cairo. The largest is four hundred and ninety-nine feet high, and six hundred and ninety-three at the bottom on each side, which makes the whole area of its foundation to be 480,249 square feet, or some more than eleven acres of English measure: this building is gradually carried up to a point. What use these pyramids served for, whether as repositories for their dead monarchs, we know not. It is said 36,000 or more persons were employed in building the largest. The labyrinth was a kind of a structure with one door, and which contained twelve palaces, and 3000 chambers, half of them under ground. Here, it seems, was an assemblage of all their idols; and here the magistrates of the whole nation held their grand conventions. At Alexandria there still stands Pompey's pillar, erected by Julius Cæsar, to commemorate his victory over Pompey. It is of granite marble, and is seventy feet high, and twenty-five in circumference. A variety of other magnificent ruins we shall pass over without mention. According to Manetho, the gods reigned in Egypt 30,000 years, and thirty dynasties of men, 5300 years before the time of Alexander the great; but some other ancient historians make the whole to amount to 36,325 years. This computation is most absurd, invented by pride of antiquity, or affectation of the marvellous. The reign of the gods and demi-gods I take to be the 1656 years before the flood. The thirty dynasties ought not to be taken as successive, but as reigning jointly, two or three at a time, in the different provinces of Egypt, which may bring down the whole reckoning to about 2000 years.

Mizraim, or Menes, the son of Ham, with his posterity, the Pathrusim, Casluhim, and Caphtorim, peopled Egypt after the flood; and he was the first king of it, and was succeeded by a vast number of Pharaohs, some say to the number of sixty. One of them, A. M. 2064, took Abraham's wife into his palace, intending to make her his bride; but plagues that marked the cause obliged him to restore her. Two hundred years after, there happened seven crops on end surprisingly plentiful, which were succeeded by seven years of famine, in which the Egyptians had mostly perished, had they not been saved by the wise management of JOSEPH. About this time the Hebrews came down into Egypt. After they had been there above a hundred years, the Egyptian king took every method to oppress them, and cut off their males. In A. M. 2513, God required the Egyptian king to allow the Hebrews to depart from his land. He refusing, tenfold plagues, of turning the waters into blood, of frogs, of flies, of lice, of murrain of cattle, of fiery boils, on man and beast, of thunder and hail, of locusts, of darkness, and of the death of the first-born, obliged him to it at last. They had scarce retired, when he pursued them, and with his whole army was drowned in the Red sea. About this time the Egyptian historians place an invasion of their country by swarms of Phœnician shepherds; but who these shepherds were, whether Amalekites who fled from Chedorlaomer, or Canaanites who fled from Joshua, or Arabs, we cannot positively determine. Gen. xli-xlvii. Exod. i-xiv. About A. M. 2989, Solomon espoused an Egyptian princess; and Pharaoh, her father, having taken Gezer from the Canaanites, gave it for her dowry. Shishak, who might be her brother or nephew, was a mighty conqueror. After he had united Egypt into one kingdom, and extended his empire almost to the straits of Gibraltar, he marched a huge army into Asia, and conquered the western part of it. In his absence, his brother Danus rebelled, and after his death the empire fell to pieces; and even Egypt itself fell under the yoke of the Ethiopians. After some ages, they recovered their liberty; but it seems the kingdom was divided into three. Sabaco, or So, the Ethiopian, reduced them all, and seized on the whole country. After him reigned Sethon, the priest of Vulcan, perhaps no more than the viceroy of Tirkahali. After his death, Egypt being terribly ravaged by the Assyrians, had twelve lords set over the whole; but whether by the Assyrian conqueror we cannot say. After about fifteen years of civil war, Psammetichus subdued the other eleven, and seized on the whole kingdom. In his time the Greeks first settled in Egypt; and 200,000 of his soldiers, affronted in a point of honour, retired to Ethiopia. Under him, and his son, Pharaoh-necho, the Egyptians thought to have erected their grandeur on the ruins of Assyria. The taking of Ashdod cost the father twenty-nine years' siege; and the son, after reducing the kingdom of Judah, received a terrible defeat near the Euphrates.

About thirty years after, A. M. 2430, Egypt was in a miserable condition, by means of the civil wars between Pharaoh-hephra and Amasis the rebel, who gained the throne, and by the ravages of the Chaldeans. About forty years the country was almost a wilderness, and Amasis was tributary to the Chaldeans. Towards the fall of the Chaldean empire, the Egyptians recovered their liberty, but were quickly subdued by Cyrus, and their country terribly ravaged by Cambyses, his son, and some thousands of their idols transported to Persia. This so enraged them, that they again revolted from the Persian yoke, but were still reduced to more grievous servitude; and their own civil broils tended much to accelerate their ruin. About A. M. 3672, they submitted to Alexander the Great: from thence they were governed by a race of GREEK kings, mostly of the name of Ptolemy, for about three hundred and twenty years. About A. M. 3908, the Romans reduced Egypt into the form of a province; and it continued under their yoke till A. D. 640. Under the Greeks, a prodigious number of Jews settled in Egypt, and the Old Testament was commonly read. Under the Romans, the Egyptians had the gospel very early planted among them, and the church considerably flourished. Since the Arabs seized the country, in A. D. 640, and destroyed every monument of learning, the Mahometan delusion has been established, and Christianity tolerated; but it has been in a very low and wretched condition. About A. D. 970, the Fatemite Calif of Cyrene wrested Egypt from the Calif of Bagdad, and he and his posterity governed it about 200 years. About A. D. 1171, Saladin the Kurd craftily seized it; and his posterity, called Jobites, reigned till 1250. Between that and 1527 it was governed by kings, which the Mameluke slaves chose out of their body, twenty-four of whom were Turks, and twenty-three Circassians; since which it has been subject to the servitude of the Ottoman Turks. Thus the sceptre of Egypt hath departed; it hath for thousands of years been without a prince of its own, and hath been the base of kingdoms, long governed even by slaves, and the people most stupid. 1 Kings iii. 1; ix. 18; xi. and xiv. 21-26. 2 Kings xvii. 4; xxiii. and xxiv. Isa. xix. xx. xxx. and xxxi. Jer. xxv. 18, 19; xxxvii. 9. and xliii. 8, 13. Ezek. xxix-xxxii. Dan. xi. Joel iii. 19. Zech. x. 11. Isa. xix. 18-25. Psal. lxxviii. 31.

Antichrist is called EGYPT, for his idolatry, cruelty, and oppression of the people of God, and because he shall be destroyed by the fearful judgments of God. Rev. xi. 8.

EHUD, the son of Gera, a Benjamite; he was left-handed, or rather lame of his right-hand. Eglon, the king of Moab, together with the Ammonites and Amalekites, had mightily oppressed the Israelites, from

A. M. 2661 to 2679. and made Jericho his common residence. It being customary for the Hebrews to send their tribute or presents to Eglon: Ehud was appointed to deliver it. Directed of God, he had projected the deliverance of his nation, and for that purpose had concealed a two edged dagger under his cloke. He had no sooner delivered his present, and sent off those that bore it, than he returned to king Eglon, and told him that he had a message from God to him. All the Moabites present were ordered to withdraw; and Eglon, however unwieldy, stood upon his feet. Ehud plunged his dagger into his belly; and leaving him bleeding to death, he locked the door of the parlour, and carried off the keys. Eglon's servants imagined their master was easing nature, or taking his afternoon sleep, and so waited long before they presumed to open the door with another key. Meanwhile, Ehud had escaped to mount Ephraim, and collected a body of such Hebrews as lay nearest: with these he took the fords of Jordan, to prevent the Moabites' return, and killed of them to the number of 10,000 valiant men, and restored Israel to their liberty. Judges iii. 15—30.

EIGHTH. The deferring of circumcision, and of the sacrificing of animals, till the eighth day of life, may import, that our regeneration, and the acceptableness of our spiritual service, depend on the virtue of Christ's resurrection from the dead, on the day after the seventh. Gen. xvii. 12. Lev. xxii. 27. The great solemnity on the eighth day of the feast of tabernacles may represent our eternal joy in the general assembly of the first born, after the week of our life, and the seven-fold period of the New Testament church, are ended. Num. xxix. 35. The New-Testament burnt-offerings are represented as made on the eighth day, to signify that the Sabbath should be then fixed to the first day of the week. Ezek. xliii. 27. Antichrist is the eighth, and is of the seven. The Popish form of government is the eighth in succession, yet it is much the same in substance with the idolatrous forms used before Christian emperors came to the imperial throne. Rev. xvii. 11.

EITHER; (1.) Or. Luke vi. 42. (2.) Each of the two. Rev. xxii. 2.

EK'RON; one of the capital cities of the Philistines. It stood about thirty-four miles west from Jerusalem, about ten miles south-west, or, according to some, north-west from Gath, and fourteen north of Ashdod. It was at first given to the tribe of Judah, and afterwards to the tribe of Dan. Josh. xv. 45. and xix. 43. The tribes of Judah and Simeon wrested it from the Philistines after Joshua's death, Judg. i. 18; but the Philistines quickly recovered possession of it. Here the idol Baal-zebub was worshipped. 2 Kings i. 2. The Ekronites were the first who urged that the ark of God should be sent back to the Israelites. 1 Sam. v. 10. Ekron was pillaged by the Assyrians, and afterwards by the Chaldeans: the inhabitants were exceedingly distressed at the news of Alexander's sacking of Tyre. At last the Maccabee Jews reduced it. The gospel was early preached here. Amos i. 8. Zeph. ii. 4. Zech. ix. 5, 7.

ELAH. (1.) The son of Baasha, and king of Israel. After he had reigned about two months, he and his family were murdered by Zimri his servant. 1 Kings xvi. 8—14. (3.) A valley in the south-west of Canaan, where Goliath was slain. 1 Sam. xvii. 2.

ELAM, the eldest son of Shem, who gave name to, and whose posterity peopled Elam or Elymais in PERSIA, and the Elamites are the same as the PERSIANS. Whether that Elam, of which Chedorlaomer was king, was Elymais in Persia, is not agreed. Raleigh, Gill, and others, think it improbable that a Persian king would have marched so far to subdue or regain the five cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c.; and that this Elam, of which he was king, was somewhere in Arabia or Syria, where there might be a colony of the Elamites: but when we observe that the king of Shinar, which lay on the west of Persia, was one of Chedorlaomer's allies, we see no reason to depart from the common opinion. Gen. x. 22. and xiv. 1. ELAM is also the name of two persons or places in Judea, to which 2508 of the Jewish captives, who returned from Babylon pertained. Ezra ii. 7, 31.

ELATH, or ELOTH; a city on the north point of the eastern gulf of the Red sea. David took it from the Edomites; and he and his son established a considerable sea-trade in it. About a hundred and fifty years after, the Edomites recovered their kingdom, and Elath along with it. It seems Hazael the Syrian conqueror marched thus far southward, and siezed on Elath, in order to engross to his nation the trade of the Red sea; but Uzziah king of Judah took it, and rebuilt it. In the days of Ahaz, Rezin king of Syria recovered it, and expelled the Jews from it. After various changes under the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, and Ptolemies of Egypt, it fell into the hands of the Romans. 2 Kings xiv. 22. and xvi. 6.

ELDAD and ME'DAD, being divinely destined for two of the seventy assistants of Moses, modestly declined the office, and remained in the camp: the spirit of prophecy which marked the choice of God, seized them there. Joshua observing it, and fearing it might detract from Moses' honour, begged him to forbid them; but Moses replied, that he should be glad if the whole assembly of Israel were made prophets. Num. xi. 24—30.

ELDER primarily signifies one advanced in age. Job xv. 10. As such were commonly chosen to bear rule, the word ordinarily signifies a subordinate ruler in church or state. Even in Egypt, the Hebrews had elders, whom they owned as chief men, that bare rule over them. To these Moses intimated his commission from God, to bring the nation out of Egypt. Exod. iii. 16. and iv. 49. These were either the heads of the chief families, or the persons most noted for prudence and experience; and it seems they were seventy-two in number, six of each tribe. They attended Moses part of his way up to mount Sinai, and held a feast near the symbols of the divine presence, without receiving any hurt. Exod. xxiv. 1, 9, 10. Though, by Jethro's advice, there had been constituted heads of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, yet to ease Moses further of his burden in the government of Israel, God appointed the tribes to choose seventy, or seventy-two elders; and by the spirit of prophecy, on the day of their election, poured on the candidates, he marked his approbation of the choice. These were perhaps the elders that after Joshua's death restrained the Hebrews from their grosser impieties. Num. xi. Josh. xxiv. 31. By the consultation of the supreme elders, a method was devised to supply the remains of the almost extirpated Benjamites with wives. Judg. xxi. Besides such, there were elders that ruled in every city, and who generally held their courts in the gate, or some other public place. Ruth iv. 2. Ezra x. 14.

In allusion to these Jewish elders, the ordinary governors of the Christian church are called elders, or presbyters, and who are the same as bishops or overseers. Acts xx. 17, 28. Tit. i. 5, 7. Such elders judged along with the apostles in the Christian council of Jerusalem. Acts xv. 4, 6. Nay, the apostles Peter and John, call themselves elders. 1 Pet. v. 1. 2 John 1. 3 John 1. Some elders, whose office is only to rule well in the church, are expressly distinguished from such as also labour in word and doctrine. 1 Tim. v. 17. These are designated governments, and are required to rule with diligence. 1 Cor. xii. 28. Rom. xii. 28.

The four and twenty elders that surround God's throne, are the principal saints of the Old and New Testaments, followers of the prophets and twelve apostles, or ministers, similar to the twenty-four orders of priests and Levites; they sit on thrones, are advanced to high dignity, together with Christ; they attend the peculiar presence of God, and humbly worship before him. Rev. iv; v. and vii. 11, 13, and xiv. 3.

EL-E-A'LEH; a city which Moses gave to the Reubenites. It lay about a mile from Heshbon, and along with it, was seized on by the Moabites, and, while in their possession, was terribly ravaged by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Num. xxxii. 27. Isa. xv. 4. Jer. xlviii. 34.

EL-E-A'ZAR. (1.) The third son of Aaron. Long after the death of his two elder brothers, he succeeded Aaron his father in the high priesthood. After assisting Joshua to divide the land of Canaan, and executing the office of high-priest about twenty-three years at Shiloh, he died, and was buried in a hill that belonged to Phinehas, his son and successor. Except the short while of about a hundred and twenty years or upwards of the dignity of Eli's family, the high priesthood continued in the family of Eleazar, till after the death of Christ; and in David's time, sixteen courses of priests were formed out of it, when but eight were formed of the family of Ithamar. Num. xx. 26—28. and xxxiv. 17. Josh. xxiv. 33. 1 Chron. xxiv.

(2.) EL-E-A'ZAR, the son of Dodo the Ahoite, and the second of David's mighty men. When at Ephesdammin he was deserted by his fellows, he stood his ground, and continued slaying the Philistines, till his hand clave to his sword; and he made such havoc of the enemy, that the Hebrews returned towards them, but had nothing to do but to spoil. Along with Shamah, the son of Agee the Hararite, he defended a field full of lentils so well, that the Philistines fled before them. 2 Sam. xxiii. 9—12. 1 Chron. xi. 12—14.

EL-BETHEL, and EL-EL-O-HE-IS-RA-EL, the name of two altars, built by Jacob after his return to Canaan. The first signified that God was still the God of Bethel to him, in performing the promises there made; and the second, that the mighty God was the object of worship to him and his offspring. Gen. xxxv. 2. and xxxiii. 20.

ELECTION. See CHOOSE, DECREE.

ELEMENTS, the principal kinds of matter whereof compound bodies are formed, as air, fire, earth, and water. The earth, in its various kinds of original matter, shall be melted with fervent heat at Christ's second coming. 2 Pet. iii. 10. Elements also signify the alphabet of letters, and syllables formed of them, and thence it is transferred to signify the rudiments, first rules, or first principles of a science. Col. ii. 8, 20. Heb. v. 12. The rudiments of this world, which are not to be used in the gospel-church, are ceremonial laws and human customs, which are not proper for such as enjoy the clear instructions of the gospel. Col. ii. 8, 20. The ceremonial laws were weak and beggarly elements; they could never purge our conscience from guilt, nor were they in themselves at all acceptable to God, nor could in the least procure our peace with him. They could enrich none with solid and eternal comforts; they were so impoverished by Christ's fulfilment of them, that nothing was left in them. Gal. iv. 3, 9.

ELEPHANT. See BENEOTH and IVORY.

EL-HA'NAN. (1.) The son of Dodo a Bethlehemite, one of David's mighty men. 1 Chron. xi. 26. (2.) The son of Jair, or Jaare-oregim, who, at Gob, slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath. 1 Chron. xx. 5. 2 Sam. xxi. 19.

ELI, a Jewish high-priest, descended from Ithamar, who judged Israel after the death of Abdon. Why the high priesthood was translated to him from the family of Eleazar, whether it was because of the high-priest's offence in the sacrificing of Jephthah's daughter, or for some other reason, we know not; but it is certain the translation was by the appointment of God. 1 Sam. ii. 30. He was a good man himself; but his sons, HOPHNI and PHINEHAS were extremely wicked: they defiled the women that assembled for devotion in the courts of the tabernacle; they demanded their portion of the peace or sin-offerings, ere the fat was burnt: they exacted more than their due, and raw flesh instead of sodden: if any body refused, their servants took it by force. Their profane conduct provoked a multitude of the Hebrews to withhold their offerings. Eli their father reproved them, but so faintly, that they took no care to amend. By a prophet, the Lord charged Eli and his sons with the most horrid abuse of his worship; and the father with honouring his sons above God. He signified, that though he had conditionally promised the continuance of the high priesthood to his family, yet since they had behaved so wickedly, their prosperity and power should quickly be at an end, and none of them live to old age; that Eli himself should see his country invaded by foreign enemies; the ark taken; his two sons die in one day; that the high priesthood should be given to another family that would be more faithful; to whom Eli's seed should abjectly crouch for a piece of bread, or the meanest pittance of provision. Some years after, the Lord, by young Sammel, further assured Eli of the approaching ruin of his family, and that it was in vain to attempt atonement for their sin by sacrifice. Eli received these denunciations with great submission to the divine will. 1 Sam. ii. and iii.

These just and terrible threatenings had a speedy accomplishment. The Philistines invaded the country, defeated the Hebrews, and killed 4000 of them. The Hebrews imagined the ark of God would act as a charm for their protection; and sent for it to the camp; but soon after received a most bloody defeat: 30,000, along with Hophni and Phinehas, were slain; and the ark was taken and carried off. Informed of these things, Eli, with grief and astonishment, fell from his seat and broke his neck, in the ninety-eighth year of his age, and fortieth year of his government. The wife of Phinehas, hearing of this and the former disasters, took her pains, and amid pressures of grief, brought forth a son, whom she called Ichabod, to signify that the glory was departed from Israel, since the ark of God was taken. She immediately died. Ahitub, the brother of Ichabod, succeeded his grandfather, and he was succeeded by Ahiah his son, and he by Abimelech his brother; all whose family except Abiathar were cruelly murdered by Saul; and Zadok, of the line of Eleazar, was made high-priest in his room. About forty-three years after, Solomon deposed Abiathar. Thereafter the remnant of the family lived in the most wretched condition. Let indulgent parents, and connivers at sin, take heed. 1 Sam. iv; xiv. 3. and xxii. 1 Kings ii.

ELI, Eli, (or Eloi, Eloi) lama sabachthani, a Hebrew-Syriac exclamation of Christ on the cross. It is taken from the beginning of Psal. xxii. and signifies, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? Perhaps our Saviour repeated much more of the psalm, though it is not recorded by the evangelists. Matt. xxvii. 46. Mark xv. 34.

E-LI'A-KIM, the son of Hilkiah. He succeeded Shebna as chief treasurer and master of the household to king Hezekiah. He, together with Shebna the scribe, and Joah the son of Asaph, recorder, were sent ambassadors to solicit terms of peace from Sennacherib. They could obtain nothing but abusive language from Rabshakeh his general; and so without giving him a reply, returned weeping, and with their clothes rent. Soon after, the two first, and some of the elders of Judah, were sent to Isaiah, to beg his earnest prayers for the city. 2 Kings xviii. 26-37. and xix. 2. Isaiah xxxiii. 7; xxxvi. 18. and xxxvii. 22. Was he not a type of Jesus our great Minister of state, and who is over the whole household of God? Doth not he succeed a treacherous Adam? Is he not the great Messenger of peace, who, when he beheld Jerusalem, wept over it? Is he not the faithful manager, support, and glory of all things in the church? Isa. xxii. 20-25.

E-LI-A'SHIB, the grandson of Joshua the high-priest. He rebuilt part of the wall of Jerusalem. He was allied to Tobiah the Ammonite, perhaps by the marriage of his daughter; and, being high-priest, wickedly prepared for that heathen a chamber in the temple. Neh. iii. 1. and xiii. 4, 7.

E-LI-EZER. His father was probably a Syrian of Damascus, but he himself was born in Abraham's family; and, it seems, was once designed for his heir. Gen. xv. 2. When Abraham intended to have a wife to his son Isaac, he took Eliezer, and bound him by a solemn oath, that he should not bring him one of the Canaanites, but one of his relations in Mesopotamia; warned him against doing any thing tending to make Isaac return to Mesopotamia; and sent him off to Nahor, a city there, which was about 460 miles north-east of Hebron. When he came nigh to the city, he lighted on a well to which the young women of the place used to come morning and evening; there he waited to refresh himself and his ten camels. Solicitous of divine direction, he lifted up his heart to God in prayer, and begged the Lord would discover the virgin proper for Isaac, by her offering to draw water for his camels, when he but desired her to do it for himself. Rebekah came to the well. Eliezer had scarce desired her to draw a little water for him, when she offered to draw for the watering of his camels also. Pleased with her features, and finding that she was his master's grand-niece, he presented her with a pair of golden ear-rings, to the weight of about an ounce, and a pair of bracelets for her hands, which were five times as valuable; and inquired if he and his camels could be lodged at her father's house. She replied, they might. While she hastened to inform her father's family, Eliezer returned his thankful acknowledgments to God for giving him his desired token. Laban, the brother of Rebekah, came with haste, and kindly conducted him to the house. He had scarce sat down when he informed them who he was; what wealth his master had, and intended to bestow on Isaac; and how he had charged him to procure a proper wife for Isaac; and what token he had received from God that Rebekah was the person; with respect to whom, he requested a positive answer, before he should eat or drink. Bethuel her father, and Laban her brother, replied, that they saw the matter determined of God, and durst not oppose it. After anew lifting up his heart to God in thanksgiving, Eliezer presented Rebekah with the fine jewels and rich apparel that he had brought with him; and gave to her mother and brother a variety of valuable presents. Next morning, he insisted that Rebekah should be sent along with him. Her friends were averse to her going off so soon; but herself was for an immediate departure. They therefore got all things in readiness, and set off; and, in a few days after, safely arrived near Beersheba, where Isaac then dwelt. Gen. xxiv.

E-LI-E'ZER, the son of Dodavah, was the prophet who foretold Jehoshaphat, that the trading ships which he had built, in conjunction with the impious Abaziah, should be broken with a tempest, and disabled from sailing to Tarshish. 2 Chron. xx. 37.

ELI-HU. (1.) The son of Barachel the Buzite, or descendant of Nahor the brother of Abraham, by Buz his second son. When Job was in his distress, Elihu paid him a visit. He attended to the conference betwixt him and his three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, and was highly offended at both. With the friends he was offended for their strong insinuations that Job was a wicked hypocrite, when they had so little to say for supporting their charge. With Job he was displeased for throwing out in his defence a variety of indecent expressions, savouring of self-justification, and of arraignment of the providence of God, as if rigorous and unjust. As he was younger than they, he patiently waited till the friends had no more to say. He then hinted, that his fulness of matter urged him to speak on God's behalf. He left Job's state undetermined; but sharply reprov'd him for his faulty behaviour and rash speeches under his trouble; and in the most grand and affecting manner represented the sovereign greatness, absolute purity, infinite justice, and wisdom of God; and how oft he rendered affliction the means of men's reformation; and earnestly called on Job to wait on him for deliverance. Job xxxii—xxxvii.

(2.) The great grandfather of Samuel, and the elder brother of David, whom Samuel took for the divinely intended king of Israel, and who reprov'd David for talking of encountering Goliath, and was afterward ruler of Judah, are called ELIHU, and ELI-AB, and the first also ELIEL. 1 Sam. i. 1. and xvi. 6. and xvii. 28. 1 Chron. vi. 27, 34. and xxvii. 18.

E-LIJAH, ELI'AS, the Tishbite; a native of Gilead, and noted prophet. About A. M. 3002, he foretold to king Ahab, that for several years there should be neither dew nor rain, but as he pleased to pray for it. The drought began. Directed of God, Elijah concealed himself by the brook Cherith, near the east or west bank of Jordan. There he drank of the brook, and was miraculously fed with bread and flesh, which ravens brought him every morning and evening; and which no doubt, they fetched from some person's table. When this brook dried up, he went, at the direction of God, and dwelt with a heathen widow of Zarephath. As he entered the city, he met this poor widow gathering a few sticks, to dress a handful of meal, and a little oil for her and her son, as their last entertainment; she neither having, or knowing where to get, any more food. Elijah desired her to bring him a drink of water. As she went to bring it, he called after and bade her bring him a little bread also. She told him the wretched case of herself and her son. Elijah bade her first make a small cake for him, and then dress for herself and child; for her handful of meal, and small quantity of oil, should never waste, till plenty should be returned to the country. The Zidonian widow believed the prophet, obeyed his orders, and received him into her house. After he had staid with her about two years, her only son died. Oppressed with grief, she complained, that Elijah had come to call her sin to remembrance, and to slay her son. He took the child, laid him upon his own bed, stretched himself upon him, and earnestly begged the Lord would restore him to life. His request was readily granted. 1 Kings xviii.

When the drought and famine had continued three years and a half, Elijah was divinely directed to present himself to Ahab, and inform him of the return of the rain. While Ahab's servants were dispersed through the country in quest of grass for the cattle that remained, Elijah met with Obadiah, one of the chief ones, and bade him go and inform his master that he wanted to see him. Obadiah replied, that Ahab had with murderous designs searched the whole kingdom, and kingdoms adjacent, for him, and that while he went to inform Ahab, the Spirit of the Lord would carry him off; and Ahab, enraged, would murder him in his stead; which he begged might not be the case, as he had been a useful protector of the Lord's prophets, having fed a hundred of them, in two caves, with bread and water. Elijah peremptorily assured him, that he needed be under no apprehensions, as he firmly intended to shew himself to Ahab. Obadiah believed him, and informed Ahab, who hastened to the place where Elijah was, and asked him, if he was the troubler of Israel? Elijah replied that not he, but the king himself, and his family, by their idolatry and wickedness, had brought these plagues on the nation. He further required, that the people of Israel, with the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, and four hundred of the groves, should immediately be convened on mount Carmel, that they might have a fair trial, whether JEHOVAH or Baal, was the true God. When they were assembled, Elijah rebuked the Israelites for halting between the two, and begged they would follow whichever of the two was truly possessed of Godhead. The people being silent, he represented, that though he was the only prophet of JEHOVAH present, he was willing to make a public trial of the power of his God, in opposition to all the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal. He proposed that each of the two parties should offer a bullock in sacrifice; and that whichever of the Gods, JEHOVAH or Baal, should with fire from heaven, burn up their sacrifice; should be worshipped as the true God. The people acquiesced in this reasonable proposal.

The prophets of Baal erected their altar, sacrificed their bullock, and laid it on the altar, crying to their god for celestial fire to consume it. Baal continued deaf to their prayers, they leaped on the altar, slashed and stabbed their bodies, to procure his pity; and, in the most earnest manner, begged that he would grant their request. Elijah too insulted them, and bade them cry aloud, for their god was certainly either at a great distance, or was on some journey, or had fallen into some deep sleep. When the prophets of Baal had spent above half a day in this mad manner, Elijah bade the people attend to him. With twelve stones, one for each tribe of Israel, he repaired a ruinous altar of JERIMAH. Having slain his bullock, he laid the flesh thereon, but put no fire under. He then ordered the people to bring water, and pour on his sacrifice. They did so, till the flesh, the wood under it, and the altar, were drenched with moisture, and even the trench around filled to the brim. He next applied himself to request the Lord for a display of his power, in consuming his sacrifice. He had scarcely begun, when fire from heaven consumed the flesh, the wood, the stones, the water, and earth around. Surprised with the miracle, the people cried out, The Lord is God. Elijah then ordered them to apprehend and slay the prophets of Baal. While Ahab looked on, they laid hold of them, and, dragging them to the foot of the hill, they slew them by the river Kishon. These principal causes of the famishing drought being removed, Elijah informed Ahab, that now he might look for a plentiful rain. He then returned, and on the mount prostrated himself in prayer for it; and directed his servant, perhaps Gehazi, to observe what he saw rise out of the adjacent sea. At the seventh time, the servant told him that he saw a little cloud, like a man's hand, rising out of it. Elijah bade him desire Ahab to prepare his chariot, and ride post to Jezreel, lest the rain should stop him. Elijah girded up his own loins, and ran before the king to the entrance of the city. Meanwhile, there was a plentiful rain, attended, if we may believe Menander's annals of Tyre, with a terrible thunder. 1 Kings xviii.

Jezebel, the queen, had no sooner heard of the slaughter of her idolatrous priests, than she sent Elijah a threatening message, importing that to-morrow he should pay for his conduct with the loss of his life. In a cowardly manner he fled off, without halting, to Beersheba, a place eighty-four miles, if not rather one hundred and ten, south of Jezreel. Here he dismissed his servant, and pursued his course into the Arabian desert. On the first night after he, being extremely fatigued, lay down under a juniper tree, and begged, that since he was the only opposer of idolatry in Israel that had not been already murdered, God would take away his life, that now was in danger. An angel touched him, and bade him eat the bread, and drink the water, which he had brought him. He did so; and after he had slept some hours, the angel next morning bade him eat a similar meal, as he had a long journey before him. He obeyed, and without any more refreshment, travelled hither and thither forty days, till at last he came to mount Horeb. Here he lodged in a cave. The Lord called to him, and asked him, what was his business there? Elijah replied, that he had been very zealous for the honour of the true God, whose covenant the Israelites had forsaken, whose altars they had thrown down, and whose prophets they had murdered, all except himself, and now sought to murder him. At the direction of God, he went forth, and stood in the mouth of his cave. A strong wind, an earthquake, and a flaming fire, having succeeded one another, the Lord again in a still small voice asked him, what business he had there? He repeated his former answer. The Lord assured him, that there were yet 7000 in Israel who had not bowed the knee to Baal: he directed him to return home, by the very round-about and solitary way of the wilderness of Damascus, and anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, Jehu to be king over Israel, and Elisha, prophet in his own room; by which three, God assured him, terrible havoc should be made of the Israelitish idolaters. He then called Elisha to be his attendant, to whom he referred the unction of the two kings. 1 Kings xix.

About A. M. 3108, Elijah, directed of God, went to king Ahab, and denounced terrible judgments against him and his family for the murder of Naboth, and the unjust seizure of his vineyard. 1 Kings xxi. In A. M. 3108, both to AMARIAN'S messengers, and to himself, he denounced his approaching death, and consumed, with fire from heaven, two troops of fifty men each, who came to apprehend him; but upon the humble request of the third, spared him and his troop, and went along with them. Knowing that his translation to heaven was at hand, Elijah took various methods to get out of Elisha's company, that it might be entirely a secret. But the matter being divinely suggested to Elisha, and other prophets about Bethel and Jericho, he would never leave him; and fifty young prophets followed them at a distance. When they came to the west bank of the Jordan, Elijah, with a stroke of his mantle, divided that deep river, and they went through on dry ground. Elijah then bade Elisha ask, what should be done for him? He begged for a double or large portion of his spirit. Elijah assured him, that however great this request was, it should be granted him, if he witnessed his translation. They had walked together but a little way, when a company of angels, in the form of a chariot and horses of fire, appeared; and Elijah entering the chariot, was carried up by a whirlwind into heaven. Elisha cried after him, My father! my father! the chariot and horsemen of Israel! that is, the strength and protection thereof. He took up his mantle, that fell from him as he entered the chariot, and therewith smiting the waters of Jordan, divided them, and returned to Jericho. Fifty strong men of the young prophets, contrary to Elisha's inclination, were by him permitted to go in quest of Elijah, as they imagined he might only be carried into some desert place. After they had spent three days in this vain labour, they returned. 2 Kings i. and ii.

About eight years after, letters from Elijah the prophet were brought to Jehoram king of Judah, bearing, that on account of his forsaking the good example of his fathers, and since he had walked in the way of the house of Ahab, and made his people do the same, and had murdered his brethren that were better than himself, therefore the Lord would smite his family and subjects with sore judgments; that his own bowels should burst and fall out, by means of his terrible distemper. Probably this was written before Elijah's translation, and lodged with Elisha, or some other prophet, to be given Jehoram at a proper season, or even given him before that translation, is not clearly determined. 2 Chron. xxi. 12—15. About nine hundred and thirty years after his translation, Elias descended from heaven, and conversed with our Saviour on the mount. Matt. xvii. 1—5.

John Baptist is called ELIJAH, or ELIAS. In his temper, in his coarse and hairy apparel, and his austere method of living, and holy deportment; in his candid and bold reproving of vices; in his flaming zeal, and useful gift of prophecy, for the revival of religion, he resembled that ancient prophet. Mal. iv. 5, 6. Matt. xvii. 10—13. And is not our Saviour the antitype of the ancient Elijah? He is the famed Prophet that denounced the wrath, and restored the knowledge and worship of God upon earth. So solemn was his call, and remarkably confirmed by miracles of mercy and judgment. His condition in life was low, afflicted, and persecuted. Forty days he fasted in the desert. Ardent was his zeal, and pungent his rebukes. With unquenchable love from within, and fierceness of wrath from above, was his great sacrifice inflamed. Powerfully his intercession regulates the motions of providence, procures mercy to friends, and consuming vengeance to foes. By him kings are appointed to death or dominion, and prophets, apostles, and ministers, to their office. How sovereign the bestowal of his presence! He removed his ordinances from the Jews, that he might dwell with raven-like publicans and sinners, with widowed gentiles, and restore to life the dead in trespasses and sins. Baptized in the river of Jordan, and travelling through the Jordan of trouble and death, he ascended to heaven without seeing corruption. How vain, ever since, has been the laborious search of the Jews for a promised Messiah! how dreadful the vengeance that overtook these persecutors! and how lasting the misery of such as hate and oppose him!

ELIM; a place on the east side of the western gulf of the Red sea, a little eastward of Tor, and north-west of Sinai; but Pocock will have it thirty miles further to the north-west, at Corondel. At Elim the Hebrews encamped, and found twelve wells, and seventy palm-trees; which might be typical emblems of the twelve apostles, and seventy disciples, sent forth by our Saviour. Dr. Shaw says, the wells are now decreased to nine, but the palm-trees are increased to about 2000.

ELI-PHAZ, the son of Esau by Adah. Not this, but rather his grandson by Teman, appears to have been the visitant of Job. As he spoke first in the conference, it is like he was the person much older than Job's father. Job xv. 10. After acknowledging Job's former bright appearances in religion, he insinuates his suspicion of his hypocrisy. From a vision that he had, and from experimental observation, he attempts to demonstrate, that it is only grievous sinners that are punished in an extraordinary manner; and he urges Job to repent of his hypocrisy and wickedness, and God would deliver him. Job ii. 11. and iv. v. and xv. xxi. and xiii.

E-LIS'A-BETH; a descendant of Aaron, wife of Zacharias, and mother of John Baptist. She was long barren; but by supernatural influence, at last she conceived. Hereon she concealed herself five months. When she met with the blessed Virgin, just after the conception of the Messiah, Elisabeth's babe leaped in her womb, and she herself broke out into a rapturous commendation of the Virgin, her cousin. Luke i.

EL-I'SHA, E-LI-SH US; a native of Abimeholah, son of Shaphat, and disciple and successor of Elijah; who, directed of God, when he found him ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen, cast his mantle over him, thereby intimating his call to follow and succeed him. After going home, and taking farewell of his parents, Elisha returned; and having slain a yoke of oxen, and feasted the servants, he went after Elijah. 1 Kings xix. 16—21. Having witnessed the translation of that great man, he received a far larger share of like spiritual influence than the other prophets of that time. When he returned back to Jericho, after the translation of his master, he smote the waters of Jordan with the mantle that had dropped from him; but to convince him that the mantle of the greatest prophet had no miraculous powers attending it, the river divided not. He smote the water a second time with the mantle, crying, Where is the God of Elijah? The current was divided, and he passed over on dry ground. On sight of this miracle, the young prophets at Jericho were assured of Elijah's spirit resting on him, and they came and bowed to him as their superior. It was these same men who, by their importunity, had his permission to search for Elijah: though he assured them it would be to no purpose. When he came to Jericho, the inhabitants complained, that however agreeable the situation of their city was, their water was naught, and the ground barren; both which, I suppose, flowed from Joshua's curse. Elisha called for a new cruse, and filling it with salt, cast it into the springs, and told them, that henceforth they should never have barren land, or bad water. And it is said, that this very well is, to this day, not only excellent water, but fertilizes the ground about. When he went up to Bethel, the profane children of the place ridiculed him, and bade him go up to heaven, as he pretended his master had done: Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head. To punish these children, and the parents who had so badly educated them, he turned, and cursed them in the name of the Lord: whereupon two she-bears coming out of the adjacent forest, tore to pieces forty-two of them. 2 Kings ii.

He attended the allied army of Israel, Judah, and Edom, that marched to reduce the revolted Moabites. When these troops were almost killed with thirst, king Jehoram and Jehoshaphat applied to him for relief. He angrily bade Jehoram apply to the prophets of his idolatrous father and mother; and assured him, that were it not for the sake of Jehoshaphat, he would shew him no regard. After his passion was allayed by the music of a minstrel, and the Holy Ghost fell on his calmed spirit, he assured them, that without either wind or rain, the ditches which he had ordered them to dig should be filled with water for their refreshment. That very night the ditches were filled, and the people drank their fill. Soon after, a prophet's widow complained to him, that her husband's creditor intended to sell her two sons to pay himself. Elisha, informed of a small pot of oil in her house, so miraculously multiplied the oil, that it filled all the vessels she could borrow. This the prophet directed her to sell, and pay her debt, and live on the overplus. Being often at Shunem, a lady there kindly entertained him, and prepared a chamber for him. By prayer he obtained a child for his barren hostess, and afterwards restored him to life. When, during the famine, a young prophet at Gilgal had made pottage of wild gourds, a herb bitter in the highest degree, his fellow prophets no sooner tasted it, than they cried it was poison; but, by a little meal cast into the pot, Elisha removed the bitter taste, and noxious quality of the pottage. Much about the same time, he miraculously increased the virtue of twenty small barley loaves, that above a hundred persons ate to satisfaction, and left thereof. 2 Kings iii. and iv.

About A. M. 3110, Naaman, the Syrian general, came to him, to be healed of his leprosy. To humble the proud captain, Elisha would not so much as speak to him, or see him; but sent him out orders to wash himself seven times in Jordan. Finding this prescription, however ill taken at first, to be effectual, Naaman returned, and offered him large presents; but Elisha would have nothing. When Gehazi, his covetous servant, ran after the Syrian, and took from him two talents of silver, or about £684. 7s. 6d. sterling, and two changes of raiment, God discovered the fraud to Elisha: he sharply rebuked Gehazi for it; and assured him that the leprosy should cleave to him and his family. Soon after the young prophets went to cut wood on the banks of Jordan. One of them let his axe head, which was borrowed, fall off into the deep current. Elisha, by putting a stick into the water near where it was, caused the axe head to swim, and so it was recovered. As our prophet informed Jehoram of the snares which the Syrians, who then ravaged the country, laid for him, that he might escape them, Benhadad, informed hereof, sent a party to apprehend him; but a company of angels surrounded and protected him and his terrified servant. At his request, the Lord smote the Syrian troops with a partial blindness. Elisha then went up to them, and told them this was not the place where they could see the man they wanted, and offered to conduct them. He led them into the midst of Samaria, where, at his request, God opened their eyes. When they saw where they were, they expected nothing but death; but Elisha represented to king Jehoram, that it would be more inhuman to kill them than if they had surrendered themselves prisoners; and at the prophet's direction he gave them a refreshment; and sent them back to their master. This event deterred the Syrians from ravaging the land of Israel in small parties. 1 Kings v. and vi.

About A. M. 3114, when Benhadad had besieged Samaria, till the unclean head of an ass was sold for about ten pounds, and a very small measure of chick-peas, if not doves' dung, for about twelve shillings, Jehoram, offended with Elisha, as if he had brought on this calamity, or, at least that he did not relieve from it, sent a messenger to murder him; but the prophet, warned of God, ordered the door to be shut, till the king himself should come up. When he came, and desperately complained of the distress of the city, Elisha assured him, that, before twenty four hours were ended, the plenty in Samaria should be such, that a SEAH, which is more than an English peck, of fine flour, and two of barley, should be sold for less than half a crown. A certain lord present ridiculed the prophet, and averred it was impossible, unless God were to rain down corn from heaven. The prophet told him he should see that plenty, but never taste of it. It so happened; for that lord was trod to death in the gate by the people who brought the spoil of the Syrian camp into the city. 2 Kings vi. and vii.

About A. M. 3119, Elisha went to Damascus to declare Hazael king over Syria, as it seems Elijah had directed him. Hazael, then captain of the army, was sent to him with rich presents, to ask if Benhadad, who was sick, should recover. According to our reading, Elisha told Hazael, that Benhadad might recover in respect of his disease, as it was not mortal, but nevertheless should die by another means: but the textual reading of the Hebrew is, Thou shalt not certainly recover, for the Lord hath shewed me that he shall surely die. He then broke out into tears, as he looked on Hazael, and told him, it was at the foresight of the miseries he would bring on the Israelites, when he should become king of Syria. About the same time, he sent a young prophet to anoint JEHU to be king over Israel, that he might cut off the idolatrous family of Ahab. About A. M. 3165, Elisha fell sick. Jehoshaphat the king of Israel came to visit him, and wept to see the prophetic protector and support of the kingdom in a dying condition. He directed the king to take bow and arrows, and shoot eastward, adding, that this was a presage of deliverance from the Syrian yoke, and of a glorious victory over them at Aphek. He then desired the king to smite against the ground with the other arrows. He did so three times and stopped. The prophet chid the king with some fervour of passion, that he did not smite the ground five or six times, that he might as oft have defeated the Syrian troops, whereas now he should defeat them but thrice. Some time after Elisha died, and was buried, a dead body, being hastily thrown into his sepulchre, revived as soon as it touched his bones. 2 Kings viii; ix. and xiii.

Is Jesus the great antitype of this ancient prophet? How solemn was his call to his work! how large his furniture! and by what numerous miracles was his mission confirmed! Coming after the New Testament Elias, he was solemnly initiated on Jordan's bank. By death he divided the floods of wrath, and the Jordans of trouble. By his covenant of salt, he rectifies the bitter water, and barren soil of law-precepts and curses, and of multiplied afflictions. He makes streams of gospel-grace to break forth in the wilderness to perishing sinners. This barren world he makes a joyful mother of Christians, and those fruitful in good works. He multiplies their oil of grace, till there be no more room to receive it. By his word he often revived the naturally dead, and to many such his death gave their discharge from their graves. By his prayers and death, what numbers he quickens of such as were dead in trespasses and sins! what multitudes of gentiles he cures of the leprosy of sin by a sevenfold washing in his blood! How he sweetens their bitter lot of temptations, raises their sinking spirits, and plentifully supplies them when famished! Is not he the strength, the chariots and horsemen of his church, who gives them their victories, and overturns the nations around, as tends to their good? How burning his zeal for God, and tender his compassion towards destitute, sorrowful, fainting, captive, and endangered men! How severe the resentment of heaven against his injurers! His mockers are torn in pieces, while there is no deliverer: ministers who, imitating Gehazi, preach for filthy lucre, infamously perish in their sins: such as attend his ordinances with malignant designs are smitten with spiritual blindness: such as condemn his promised fullness shall see it with their eyes, but never eat thereof. What vengeance to the uttermost came on Judas, who betrayed; on the Jews, who reviled, discredited, and persecuted him.

E-LI'SHAH, the son of JAVAN. Probably his posterity peopled Eolia in Lesser Asia, and afterward the region of Elis, and Alisium in Peloponnesus, now Morea, in Greece. They traded with the Tyrians in purple, a great many of the purple fish being caught at the mouth of the river Eorotas. Gen. x. 4. 1 Chron. i. 7. Ezek. xxvii. 7.

E-LI'Z-A-PHAN, E-LI'Z-A-HAN, the son of Uzziel, and cousin of Moses. He was the chief director of the Kohathites in the wilderness. Num. iii. 30. He and his brother Mishael, at the direction of Moses, carried the dead bodies of Nadab and Abihu to their graves. Lev. x. 4. About two hundred of his posterity attended, when David brought the ark of God to Jerusalem. 1 Chron. xv. 8.

EL-KA'NAH. Some descendants of Korah, as well as others, were of this name; but the most noted is the son of Jehoram, the husband of HANNAH and Peninah, and the father of Samuel. 1 Chron. vi. 26, 27, 34—36. 1 Sam. i.

EL-LA'SAR; the name of the city or kingdom of Arioch, the confederate of CHORDLOMER; but whether it be the same with Thelassar in Mesopotamia, or, which is perhaps all one, with the canton of Ellasar, which Ptolemy places in Arabia, or with Ellas in Hollow-Syria, we know not; but we believe few will suppose it to be Pontus on the Euxine sea. Gen. xiv. 1.

ELM-TREE. The flower is of the form of a bell, consisting of one single leaf, with a great number of stamina; the pistil rises from the bottom of it, and becomes a heart-shaped fruit, in whose centre is the seed. This tree is very useful. Its timber is good; its bark, leaves, and juice, are medicinal, and cure burnings, &c. It may be propagated either by layers or by seed. It has a surprisingly productive influence. One elm, in a hundred years, will, at a moderate reckoning, produce 33,000,000 grains of seed: and an elm-stock of twenty feet will be found to contain 15,840 millions of seed. Tournefort mentions four kinds of elm. The shadow of elms is good, and therefore the Israelites burnt incense to their idols under them. Hos. iv. 13.

EL-NA'THAN, the son of Achbor, and father of Nehushta, the wife of Jehoiakim. He was sent to bring back the prophet Urijah from Egypt, that he might be murdered; and he, without succeeding, supplanted Jehoiakim not to burn Jeremiah's roll. 2 Kings xxiv. 8. Jer. xxvi. 22. and xxxvi. 12.

ELON. (1.) A son of Zebulun, father of the Elonites. Num. xxvi. 26. (2.) A judge of Israel descended of Zebulun; he governed his nation ten years, from about A. M. 2830 to 2840, and was buried at Ajalon. Judg. xii. 11, 12. (3.) ELON, or Elon-beth-hanan, a city of the Danites. Josh. xix. 43. 1 Kings iv. 9.

ELOQUENT; that can speak well. Exod. iv. 10.

ELUL; the sixth month of the Jewish sacred, and the twelfth of their civil year; it answers to part of our August, and September, and has twenty-nine days. On the 17th day, the Jews fast for the disasters which happened at the return of the spies. Num. xiv. On the 21st or 22d, they feast in commemoration of their carriage of wood to the temple, to burn the sacrifices; on the 25th, they commemorate Nehemiah's dedication of the walls of Jerusalem. Neh. xii. 28.

To EMBALM dead bodies is to take out their bowels, and fill the space with odiferous and drying spices and drugs. The embalming of dead bodies appears to have had its origin, as well as its highest perfection, among the Egyptians; but whether their want of access to bury their dead during the overflow of the Nile, or a regard to civil honour, or a fancy that the freshness of the body tended to detain the soul in it, chiefly prompted them hereto, we know not. The manner of embalming was this: When a person died, a fit coffin was prepared, the covering, or lid of which represented the body inclosed; great men had their coffins painted or embellished, according to their quality. The corpse was then carried to the embalmer, and the price of embalming settled with him; the highest was about £300. the second about £109. and the lowest but a mere trifle. The corpse being extended on a table, or the ground, the designer marked the place to be cut, the dissector opened it with a sharp Ethiopian stone; through this incision they drew out all the inwards, save the kidneys and heart, and washed them with palm-wine, and other binding drugs: they then filled the belly with myrrh, cassia, and other spices, frankincense excepted. The brain was drawn out by the nose with an iron hook, and the skull filled with astringent drugs. The whole body was then anointed with oil of cedar, and with myrrh, and cinnamon, &c. for the space of thirty days. It was next put into salt about forty days. Gen. i. 3. Afterwards it was wrapt in linen dipt in oil of myrrh, and rubbed with a certain gum, and delivered to the relations, who put it into the coffin, and either kept it in their own house or in a tomb. By this embalming, they could preserve dead bodies for some thousands of years, as the mummies, or embalmed bodies of their ancients to this day attest.

The poor had oil of cedar infused by the fundament, and the body wrapt in salt of nitre: the oil preyed on the intestines, and when the oil was extracted, they came along with it dried, but not putrified. Some of the poorest did but cleanse the inside by injecting a certain liquor, and then laid the body seventy days in nitre to dry it.—Jacob and Joseph were no doubt embalmed in the manner of the Egyptians, as they died in that country. Gen. i. 2, 3, 26. The Jews embalmed their dead bodies, but perhaps their manner was very different from that of the Egyptians. When our Saviour was crucified, the necessity of his hasty burial obliged them only to wrap his body in linen, with a hundred pounds of myrrh, aloes, and like spices bestowed by Nicodemus; but Mary, and other holy women, had prepared ointment and spices for further embalming it. Matt. xxvii. 59. Luke xxiii. 56. John xix. 39, 40.

EMBOLDEN; to make bold and daring. 1 Cor. viii. 10. What emboldeneth thee? What substantial and solid reasons hast thou to render thee bold? Job xvi. 3.

EMBRACE; kindly to take into one's bosom. Gen. xxix. 13. To embrace a son, is to have one of one's own to lie in her bosom. 2 Kings iv. 16. To embrace rocks, is gladly to betake one's self to them for shelter and residence. Job xxiv. 8. To embrace dung-hills, is to be reduced to the deepest poverty, and basest servitude, or to have one's dead body thrown to the dogs. Lam. iv. 5. Christ's embracing of his people with his right hand imports his kind and gracious support and comforting of them. Sol. Song ii. 6. To embrace promises, is to trust in them with delight and pleasure. Heb. xi. 13. To embrace wisdom, is to receive Jesus and his truth into our heart, and to take pleasure to follow him. Prov. iv. 8.

EMBROIDER; to work cloth with various colours of needle-work. Exod. xxviii. 39. and xxxv. 35.

EMERALD; a precious stone of a deep green, and next in hardness to the RUBY. Emeralds are of different sizes, from the sixteenth part of an inch in diameter, to the bigness of a walnut. Emeralds, roundish as pebble stones, are the hardest and brightest, but seldom exceed the bigness of a pea; those of the pillar-like form are most frequent and large. The emeralds of the East Indies are the finest and only genuine ones, second in lustre to the diamond, and are the most beautiful of all the gems. The American emeralds are of the hardness of the garnet, and the European are still softer. Emeralds lose their colour in the fire, and become undistinguishable from the white sapphire. That their green colour refreshes and strengthens the eye is credible; but that the hanging of them about people's necks prevents the falling-sickness, or restores the memory, seems but an idle fancy. The emerald was the fourth foundation in the new Jerusalem, and perhaps the fourth in the high-priest's breast-plate. Rev. xxi. 12. Exod. xxviii. 18. The king of Tyre had his robes hung thick with them; and his subjects traded in them with the Syrians, who probably had them from India, or the south of Persia. Ezek. xxviii. 13. and xxvii. 16. But perhaps the NOFHECH signifies rather the ruby or carbuncle. The rainbow of the new covenant is like unto an emerald; is ever precious, beautiful, and refreshing to the saints. Rev. iv. 3.

EMERODS; a flux of blood from the vessels about the fundament. When these vessels swell, but discharge no blood, it is called the blind piles. According to our version, the inhabitants of Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron, were afflicted with emerods, because they detained the ark of God among them; and when they sent it back, they sent five golden emerods as part of their atonement. 1 Sam. v. and vi. But though it is certain God smote these Philistines in their hinder parts. Psal. lxxviii. 66; yet some think this distemper was not the emerods, but a bloody flux; others, a procedentia anus; others, a cancer.

EMIMS; the ancient inhabitants of the land of Canaan towards the east end, north-east of the Dead sea. They were probably descended of Ham, and were very numerous, gigantic, and warlike. Chedorlaomer gave them a terrible defeat at Shave Kirjathaim. Gen. xiv. 5. Josh. xiii. 19–21. It seems ANAH the Horite also attacked a body of them, and cut them off. Gen. xxxv. 24. The Moabites cut off the most of them; and incorporated with the rest; but seized on their whole country. Deut. ii. 10, 11.

EMINENT; noted, standing out above others. Job xxii. 8. The Jews' eminent place, or brothel-house, signifies the high-places where they worshipped their idols. Ezek. xvi. 39.

EM-MAN'U-EL, or IM-MAN'U-EL, a name given to our Saviour, signifying that he is God with us, in our nature, and on our side. Isa. vii. 14. and viii. 8. Matt. i. 23.

EM-MAUS; a village about eight miles westward of Jerusalem. To this Cleophas and another disciple were going when Christ met them; here he supped with them, and made himself known to them. Luke xxiv. 13–32. Here were hot baths, the medicinal virtue of which was pretended to have been given them by Christ's having washed his feet in them: but Julian the apostate, from hatred to our Saviour, caused them to be stopped. There was a city called Emmans, near Lydda, and about twenty-two miles north-west from Jerusalem. It was afterwards called Nicapolis. Another near Tiberias. All the three seem to have received their name from their hot baths.

EM'MOR. See SHECHEM.

EMPIRE; a large dominion, including various kingdoms and principalities. Such were the Assyrian, Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, Roman, Parthian, Arabian, Mexican and Peruvian states; and such are the German, Russian, Turkish, Persian, Mogul, Chinese, and Japanese, and Moorish, and Ethiopian, at present; and we may add, the French, Spanish, and British. Esth. i. 20.

EMPTY. A vessel, brook, or pit, is empty, when there is nothing in it. Judg. vii. 16. A city, land, or earth is empty, when without inhabitants. Nah. ii. 10. Isa. xxiv. 3. Persons are empty, when they are poor, without wealth, Ruth i. 21; without reward, Gen. xxxi. 42; without an offering, Exod. xxiii. 15. 1 Sam. vi. 3; and, in fine, without anything good. Luke i. 53. Ruth iii. 17. To empty, is to pour out. Zech. iv. 12; or to take forth. Gen. xliii. 35. Moab had not been emptied from vessel to vessel; they had not been tossed from place to place, nor their condition changed, as that of the Jews had been. Jer. xlviii. 11. The Medes and Chaldeans are called emptiers, because they drained Nineveh of its inhabitants, power, wealth, and glory. Nah. ii. 2.

EMULATION. (1.) A striving to do more than others in what is holy, just, and good. Rom. xi. 14. (2.) A striving to exceed others in carnal favour, honour, or power. Gal. v. 20.

ENCAMP; to fix or lodge in a camp. Exod. xiv. 2. Psal. xxxiv. 7. and liii. 5.

ENCOUNTER; to provoke another to a dispute; or sustain it with him. Acts xvii. 18.

ENCOURAGE; to render one hearty, hopeful, cheerful, and ready, for acting. Moses encouraged Joshua by laying before him the goodness of his work, his supernatural assistance, and undoubted success. Deut. i. 28. David encouraged himself in the Lord, when his warriors threatened to stone him; he considered God's former kind and wonderful interpositions for him, his continued power, wisdom, and mercy, and his faithful promise, and gracious relations to him. 1 Sam. xxx. 6.

END. (1.) The utmost bound, or part of a thing. Jer. xii. 12. (2.) The last part of a period of time. Matt. xxviii. 1. (3.) The last part of what is designed in an action; or the last tendency and use of it. Luke xxii. 37. 2 Cor. ii. 9. Rom. vi. 21. The end thereof shall be with a flood; the final destruction of the Jewish nation shall be brought about with terrible and overwhelming judgments. Dan. ix. 26. He setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out all perfection, the stones of darkness, and the shadow of death. Job xxxviii. 3. The miner, by penetrating into the bowels of the earth, brings his candle, or the light of day, where nothing but darkness was before; and he diligently searcheth for metal among stones long hid in thick darkness. The end of all flesh is come before me; that is, their final period hasteneth over: I will utterly destroy them. An end is come upon the four corners of the land; final ruin and desolation just come on the whole country. Jesus Christ is the ending; he continues for ever, and is the perfecter and scope of all things. Rev. xxi. 6. He is the end of the law for righteousness: the law was given to cause men to seek righteousness in him; he perfected the ceremonial law as he was the scope and substance of all its types, and therefore abolished it; through his obedience and death, he fulfilled the moral law, in its precepts and penalty; and in him, as their righteousness, believers enjoy whatever the law, as a covenant, can demand from them. Rom. x. 4. He is the end of ministers' conversation; he is the scope and substance of all their ministrations, and, in all they do, they ought to aim at the advancement of his glory. Heb. xiii. 7. The end of the faith of the saints, is what is exhibited in the promise, and they trust to obtain even the eternal salvation of their souls. 1 Pet. i. 9. An oath is the end of strife, as no further inquiry is to be made in a cause, but all parties concerned are to rest satisfied with the determination made by an oath. Heb. vi. 16.

ENDOR; a city of the western half-tribe of Manasseh, about four miles south-east of mount Tabor. Near to it, Jabin's host were routed by Barak. Psal. lxxxi. 11. And here dwelt the witch whom Saul consulted just before his fatal defeat at Gilboa. 1 Sam. xxviii. 7. It was a considerable place about 800 years after Christ.

ENDOW; to give a dowry. Exod. xxli. 16. To be endued with the Holy Ghost, is to have the possession of him in his person and influences, particularly such as are miraculous. Luke xxiv. 49.

ENDURE; to continue; to bear with. To endure, referred to God, denotes his constancy, perpetual continuance in being, life, and greatness, Psal. ix. 7; or his bearing with persons, in his long-suffering patience. Rom. ix. 22. Referred to men; it signifies, (1.) To bear up under the exercise of the duties of an office, Exod. xviii. 23; or under any thing that fatigues and presses. Gen. xxxiii. 14. Job xxxi. 23. (2.) To bear affliction, especially for Christ, with a sensible, calm, and affectionate complacency in the will of God. Heb. xii. 7. 2 Tim. iii. 11. The saints endure to the end; they persevere in their holy profession and practice, notwithstanding manifold opposition and trouble. Matt. xxiv. 13. Antichristians, and other wicked persons, will not endure sound doctrine; they dislike it, they reproach it, persecute it and endeavour to banish it from them. 2 Tim. iv. 3.

EN-EG-LA'IM. The word HEN, or EN, so often prefixed to the names of places, signifies a well; and, it seems, these places were so called because of some noted well there. Perhaps En-eg-laim is the same as Eg-laim, or Agal-lim; which was on the east side of the Dead sea, about eight miles north from Ar, and opposite to Engedi. Fishers on the Dead sea from Egedi, even to En-eg-laim; may signify ministers labouring in the work of the gospel from one end of the world to another. Ezek. xlvii. 10.

ENEMY, or FOE; one who hates another, and seeks his hurt. Exod. xxiii. 4. God becomes men's enemy, when he pursues them with his wrathful judgments. 1 Sam. xxviii. 16. Job supposed him an enemy, when he grievously afflicted him. Job xxxiii. 10. Wicked men count faithful teachers their enemies, imagining they act from hatred, in reproving and opposing their wicked ways. 1 Kings xxi. 20. Col. iv. 16. Satan is an enemy to God and his creatures; he hates them, and seeks their dishonour and ruin. Matt. xiii. 26, 30. Wicked men are enemies to God; they hate him with their whole heart, do what in them lies to dishonour his name, and ruin his interest. Rom. v. 10. The Philistines, Syrians, Moabites, &c. were the enemies of Israel, as they rose in arms to oppose, hurt, and destroy them. 1 Sam. ii. 32. 2 Sam. xxii. 38. Death is called an enemy; it really ruins the wicked, it terrifies the saints, and for a while detains their body from the heavenly glory. 1 Cor. xv. 26.

ENGAGE; to bind by promise. How delightful a wonder, that God's Son engaged his heart, or pledged his soul, that he would approach to an offended God, in room of us sinful men, in order to obey the broken law, and satisfy justice for us! Jer. xxx. 21.

EN-GAD'DI, or EN-GAD'DI; otherwise called Hazazon-tamar, because of the multitude of palm-trees around. It lay about thirty-seven miles south-east of Jerusalem; south of Jericho, between which and it was a delightful valley; and near the north-west shore of the Dead sea; though others place it near the south-west. It abounded with excellent vineyards, where grew gopher and palm-trees. Sol. Song i. 14. This was perhaps the city of palm-trees, taken by the Moabites and Amalekites. Judg. iii. 13. It was very early built, and possessed by the Amorites, and pillaged by Chedorlaomer. Gen. xiv. 7. It was given to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 62. Here David, in his exile under Saul, dwelt for a time in strong holds. 1 Sam. xxiv. 1. Here the allied army of Ammonites, Moabites, &c. who came against Jehoshaphat, encamped. 2 Chron. xx. 2.

ENGINES; warlike instruments for throwing stones, battering down walls, &c. 2 Chron. xxvi. 15. Ezek. xxvi. 9.

ENGRAVE; GRAVE: (1.) To cut letters or figures in stone. 2 Cor. iii. 7. The engraving of the names of the twelve tribes, in the stones of the high-priest's shoulder and breastplate, imported Christ's perpetual remembrance, esteem, and support of his people, and the impossibility of their separation from him. Exod. xxviii. 11. and xxxix. 14. God's engraving the graving of the choice stone may denote his conferring on Christ every saving office, his preparing for him a human nature adorned with all gracious excellencies and his inflicting on him the deep penetrating strokes of his wrath. Zech. iii. 9. So the saints are graven on the palms of God's hands; he perpetually thinks of, cares for, and does them good. Isa. xlix. 16. (2.) To grave. Exod. xx. 4.

EN-HAKKO-RE, the well of him that cried; the name of the well which was miraculously opened to allay the excessive thirst which Samson had contracted in slaying a thousand of the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass. Our English version insinuates, that this well was opened in the jaw-bone; but how it could then have continued in after ages, we know not. As the word LEHI signifies the place where he was, as well as a jaw-bone, is it not more natural to suppose that the well was opened in a hollow spot in it, rather than in a hollow place of the jaw-bone? Judg. xv. 9—19.

ENJOY; (1.) To possess with pleasure.

Josh. i. 15. (2.) To have in abundance. Heb. xi. 25. The land of Canaan enjoyed her sabbaths, when it lay untill for want of inhabitants. Lev. xxvi. 34. God's elect long enjoy the work of their hands, when they receive a long continued happiness on earth, and everlasting blessedness in heaven, as the gracious reward of their good works. Isa. lxx. 22.

ENLARGE; to render more wide and extensive. Enlarging of borders, or coasts, imports conquest of more territory to dwell in. Deut. xii. 20. and xix. 8. To enlarge nations, is to grant them deliverance, liberty, happiness and increase of numbers, territory, or wealth. Esth. iv. 14. Job xii. 23. Deut. xxxiii. 20. Enlargement of heart imports loosening of spiritual bands, fullness of inward joy, Psal. cxix. 32; or extensive love, care, and joy. 2 Cor. vi. 11. Enlargement of mouth, imports readiness to answer reproaches, and to pour forth praise to God for his kindness. 1 Sam. ii. 1. God enlargeth men in trouble, or enlargeth their steps, when he grants them remarkable deliverances, and liberty to go where they please. Psal. iv. 1. and xviii. 36. He enlargeth Japheth, in giving him a numerous posterity, and a very extensive territory, viz. the north half of Asia, all Europe, and almost all America, to dwell in; or the word may be rendered, God shall persuade Japheth: by the preaching of the gospel a multitude of his posterity have been or shall be turned to Christ. Gen. ix. 26. Hell's enlarging itself imports that the grave, the state of the dead, and even the regions of the damned, should quickly receive multitudes of the sinful Jews. Isa. v. 14.

ENLIGHTEN; to give light to. God enlightens his people's darkness, when he frees them from trouble, grants them prosperity, and gives them knowledge and joy. Psal. xviii. 28. He enlightens their eyes, when, by his word and Spirit, he savingly teaches them his truth, and shows them his glory. Psal. xlii. and xix. 8. Eph. i. 18. Hypocrites are enlightened with the speculative knowledge of divine truth, and the miraculous, though not saving influences of the Holy Ghost. Heb. vi. 4.

ENMITY; very bitter, deep-rooted, irreconcilable hatred and variance. Such a constant enmity there is between the followers of Christ and Satan; nay, there is some such enmity between mankind and some serpents. Gen. iii. 15. Friendship with this world, in its wicked members and lusts, is enmity with God; is opposed to the love of him, and amounts to an actual exerting of ourselves to dishonour and abuse him. Jam. iv. 4. 1 John ii. 15, 16. The carnal mind, or minding of fleshly and sinful things, is enmity against God; is opposed to his nature and will in the highest degree; and, though it may be removed, cannot be reconciled to him, nor he to it. Rom. viii. 7, 8. The ceremonial law is called enmity; it marked God's enmity against sin, by demanding atonement for it; it occasioned men's enmity against God by its burdensome services; and was an accidental source of standing variance between Jews and gentiles; or perhaps the enmity here meant is the state of variance between God and men, whereby he justly loathed and hated them as sinful, and condemned them to punishment; and they wickedly hated him for his excellency and goodness: both are slain and abolished by the death of Christ. Eph. ii. 15, 16.

ENOCH. (1.) A son of Cain, after whose name his father called the city which he built, in the land of Nod, eastward of Eden, where we find the city Anuchta, and where Pliny and Ptolemy place the Henochii: but perhaps these names sprung from the following. (2.) Enoch, the son of Jared, and the father of Methuselah. While he reared his family, begetting and educating a vast number of children, he maintained a most holy life, living by faith, walking with God in sweet fellowship with him, and eminent conformity to him. To honour and reward such a conversation, God not only testified his delight in him while he lived, but, after he was 365 years of age, translated him to heaven, soul and body, without tasting of death. That he wrote any thing does not appear; but he prophesied of the last judgment, that the Lord would come with ten thousands of his saints or angels to convince the wicked of their hard speeches and ungodly deeds, and punish them on account thereof. This prophecy Jude might have conveyed to him by tradition, and the Holy Ghost assured him it was genuine. Gen. v. 18—24. Heb. xi. 5. Jude 14, 15. The eastern writers, Arabic and Persian, record many remarkable things about the prophet Enoch, or Edris, as they call him. They told us he received thirty volumes from heaven filled with mysterious science. There is a book ascribed to him, but it is certain it was none of his; but was written either by a fanciful Jew before the coming of Christ, or by a foolish Christian soon after. For about 1000 years it was buried in oblivion, till Joseph Scaliger, about 200 years ago, recovered part of it. It fancifully maintains, that before the flood, the angels seeing the beautiful daughters of men, took them in marriage, begat on them the ancient giants, and introduced idolatry, astrology, and other unlawful arts into the world.

Was our Saviour prefigured by Enoch the son of Jared? He is dedicated, in a peculiar manner, to the service of God. He did always the things that pleased his Father, and twice was attested of God as his beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased. First, in order of dignity and influence, he entered the heavenly mansions, without tasting of corruption. As our great prophet, he foretold the last judgment, and the ruin of the wicked generation of Judah. Scarce were his Jewish seed according to the Spirit, removed by death, or fled from their country, when wrath came upon that nation to the uttermost: nor shall his whole chosen seed be sooner ripe for the mansions of eternal bliss, than the floods of unmix'd and endless misery shall overwhelm the world of the ungodly.

ENON; a place where John baptized, because there were many springs or rivulets of water there. It was between Salim and Jordan, about eight miles south from Bethshan, and fifty-three north-east of Jerusalem. John iii. 23.

ENOS, the son of Seth, and father of Cainan, was born A. M. 235. His name imports the sense his father had of the misery of mankind by reason of sin. In his days men began to call on the name of the Lord, i. e. such as detested the wicked progeny of Cain, formed themselves into public worshipping societies. Perhaps too, before his death, A. M. 1140, the descendants of Seth began to profane the name of the Lord, intermarrying with the offspring of Cain. Gen. iv. 26; v. 9—11, and vi. 1, 2.

ENQUIRE; to SEARCH, ask. Psal. xxvii. 4. Acts ix. 11. Gen. xxiv. 57. God's enquiry after men's iniquity, imports his bringing it to light, and punishing for it. Job x. 6. Men's enquiring of God imports their asking his mind by his priests or prophets, or immediately from himself, what they should do, or that he would grant what they need. 1 Kings xxii. 5. Gen. xxv. 22. Ezek. xxxvi. 37. To enquire after God, is to pray to him. Psal. lxxviii. 34. To make enquiry after vows, is to consider how the vow may be eluded and broken. Prov. xx. 25.

EN-ROGEL; the fuller's fountain. It seems to have been either the Dragon-well, or the King's-well; or rather the fountain of Shiloah, a little to the south-west of the city of David, and without the fountain-gate. Possibly it was in or beside the fuller's field, which was the conduit of the upper pool. Josh. xv. 7. Isa. vii. 3. Here Ahimaaz and Jonathan hid themselves, to get information of Absalom's counsels against his father, 2 Sam. xvii. 15; and near to it Adonijah feasted Abiathar, Joab, and the rest of his assistants in the usurpation. 1 Kings i. 9. Some place Enrogel on the east of Jerusalem, near the foot of mount Zion, and then it is probably the same with the pool of Siloam.

EN-SHE'MISH, was situated on the borders of Judah and Benjamin; whether it were a town, or only a well, is not determined. Josh. xv. 7.

ENSAMPLE; example, pattern. Phil. iii. 17. 2 Thess. iii. 9.

ENSIGN. See BANNER.

ENSNARE; to bring into a snare, into sin, imprisonment, bondage, distress. Job xxxiv. 20.

ENSUE; to follow after with great earnestness. 1 Pet. iii. 11.

ENTER; to go within. Matt. vi. 6. God enters into judgment with men, when in wrath he calls them to account, and sentences them to bear the due punishment of their sins. Psal. cxliii. 2. Our cries enter into his ears, when he graciously accepts our suits, and grants what we request, or regards what we cry about. 2 Sam. xxii. 7. Jam. v. 4. To enter into covenant, is to come under the solemn obligations thereof; to make it by binding ourselves. Deut. xxix. 12. To enter at the strait gate, and into the kingdom of God, is, by receiving Jesus Christ as our Saviour, door and way to happiness, to become members of God's spiritual family and kingdom in heaven and earth. Matt. vii. 13. John iii. 5. To enter into joy, peace, or rest, is to receive the earnest or the full possession thereof. Matt. xxv. 21. Isa. lvii. 2. Heb. iv. 2. To enter into other men's labours, is to enjoy the fruit of them. John iv. 38. A fool's lips enter into contention; his words stir up strife; in his talk he meddles with strife not pertaining to him. Prov. xviii. 6. Reproof enters into a wise man; it penetrates to his heart, and hath a mighty effect upon him. Prov. xvii. 10. No man was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues were fulfilled. During Antichrist's ruin, none shall be able to hurt the church, none shall dare to pray for Antichrist, nor even fully understand the manner of his destruction till it be finished. Rev. xv. 18.

ENTRANCE; ENTERING, is, (1.) The act of coming in or to. 1 Thess. ii. 1. (2.) The passage into a city, &c. Judg. i. 24, 25. The entrance of God's word gives light; the first effectual application of it to the heart makes wise unto salvation. Psal. cxix. 130.

ENTICE; cunningly to persuade and move one to what is sinful or hazardous. Satan enticed Ahab to go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead, by making the false prophets promise him victory. 2 Chron. xviii. 20. Whoremongers entice virgins, with promises of reward, and hopes of secrecy, in uncleanness. Exod. xxii. 16. Our lusts entice to sin, from hopes of profit, pleasure, or honour, by means of it. Jam. i. 14. Outward objects entice to sin, as they are occasions of tempting our evil hearts to it. Job xxxi. 26, 27. False teachers, pretended friends, and wicked companions, entice; by their fair speeches, and guileful example, they persuade us to embrace error, commit sin, or rush on snares. Col. ii. 4. Enticing words of man's wisdom, are such as please the ear and fancy of hearers, but lead away the heart from the regard of the true matter and scope of divine truth. 1 Cor. ii. 4. Col. ii. 4.

ENTIRE. (1.) Whole, complete. Amos i. 6. (2.) Faultless; upright and exact in every point and quality. Jam. i. 4.

ENVY is an affection of the heart, whereby we fret and grudge at the grace, honour, or prosperity of our neighbour. So Rachel envied her sister Leah because of her fruitfulness. Gen. xxxi. 1. Joseph's brethren envied him, because his father loved him. Gen. xxxvii. 11. The Jews envied Paul and Barnabas, because they preached the gospel of Christ. Acts xiii. 4, 5. Some preached Christ out of envy and strife, from discontent at the high honours of the apostle Paul, and in order to vex his spirit, and diminish his reputation. Phil. i. 15. Envy is more dangerous than open outrageous anger and fury, as it is more abiding, and will make a man turn himself into every shape to undo his neighbour. Prov. xxvii. 4. It is often pointed against the most excellent and useful works. Eccl. iv. 4. It is its own punishment, is rotteness to the bones, and slays the silly one; it stops the blessings of heaven, and torments the soul where it dwells, even unto death. Prov. xiv. 30. Job v. 2. The spirit that is in us hatheth to or against envy; our natural corruption powerfully inclines us to envy; and the indwelling Spirit of God carries out the saints to oppose and strive against it. Jam. iv. 5.

E-PAPH RAS; a native of Colosse, and a faithful and laborious preacher among the inhabitants thereof, and by whose means many of them were converted to Christ. When Paul was at Rome, Epaphras went from Phrygia to see him, and was some time his fellow-prisoner. Understanding that, in his absence, false teachers had much corrupted and troubled his Colossian hearers, he represented the case to Paul, who, directed of God, wrote a letter to rectify these disorders. It is said, he suffered martyrdom at Colosse. Col. i. 7. and iv. 12.

E-PAPH-RO-DITUS; a noted preacher of the Christian faith at Philippi. He was sent by the believers there with a supply of money to Paul, when a prisoner at Rome, and otherwise to assist him to the utmost of his power. He executed his commission with such care and zeal, that he brought on himself an indisposition which threatened his life; but being mercifully recovered, he went quickly home, as he had heard the Philippians were extremely concerned for him, and he carried along with him Paul's epistle to that church. Phil. ii. 25. and vi. 18.

EPHAH. (1.) The eldest son of Midian: he gave his name to a city or country on the south-east of the Dead sea, where Ptolemy mentions a city called Ippos; this place abounded with camels and dromedaries. Gen. xxv. 4. Isa. lx. 6. (2.) A measure of capacity among the Jews. It seems to have been the same as the BATH.

EPHER; the second son of Midian. 1 Chron. i. 33. Whether any of his posterity peopled the isle of Urphe in the Red sea, or Orpha in Diarbek, is uncertain. Polyhistor and Cleodemus say, that he conquered Lybia, and called it Africa; and it is said, Hercules accompanied him in that expedition.

EPH'E-SUS; anciently one of the most famous cities of Lesser Asia. It is said to have been built by Ephesus an Amazon lady, or by Androclus the son of Codrus king of Athens, as early as the days of David, or, according to others, much earlier. It was situated on the river Cayster, about twenty three miles north of Miletus, and sixty-three west of Laodicea; and among the heathens was chiefly famed for a magnificent temple of Diana. It is said to have been four hundred and twenty-five feet long, two hundred and twenty broad; its roof supported by one hundred and twenty-seven pillars, seventy feet high, of which twenty-seven were curiously carved, and the rest polished. The plan of this temple was contrived by one Ctesiphon; and though it was built at the common expence of proconsular Asia, it was two hundred and twenty years, if not more, in finishing. It was seven times set on fire. About three hundred and sixty years before the birth of our Saviour, one Erostratus, despairing of rendering himself famous by any thing good, burnt it, that he might render himself famous for evil. It was however rebuilt. Soon after, Lysimachus rebuilt the whole city in a more convenient place, and nearer to the temple. Before the time of Alexander, Ephesus had kings of her own. It was taken by Antiochus the Great of Syria. After it fell into the hands of the Romans, the inhabitants revolted to Mithridates king of Pontus; and, on that account, were pillaged and terribly taxed by Sylla the Roman general. It was destroyed by an earthquake, A. D. 19, but quickly rebuilt. It suffered exceedingly in its various sieges and captures by the Saracens, Tartars, and Turks, and is now dwindled into a ruinous village of about forty or fifty houses, and an old castle.

The Ephesians were anciently noted for sorcery, magic, astrology, and the rest of the black arts, as well as for luxury and its attendant evils; they were mad on idolatry, especially the worship of Diana. When Paul came here at the first, he staid only a few days, but Apollos preached here about the same time. Some months after, Paul returned, and preached three years with remarkable success. Some Jewish vagabonds, the sons of Sceva, took upon them to exorcise evil spirits from the possessed in the name of Jesus; but the possessed person, instigated by the demon, attacked them, and drove them out of the house naked. Both Jews and Greeks were affrighted by this accident; and vast numbers of Ephesians, who had dealt in sorcery, brought their magical books, and others of that kind, together, and publicly burnt them, to the value of 50,000 pieces of silver; which, if understood of Attic drachmas, amounted to 1562 10s. but, if understood of Jewish shekels, amounted near to £2650. sterling. Not long after this, DEMETRIUS raised the mob against Paul and his fellow-preachers. Paul then departed, and left Timothy to settle the affairs of this church. Some years after, in his last journey to Jerusalem, Paul called the elders of this church to Miletus, and after giving them several weighty charges and directions, he took a solemn farewell of them. About five or six years after, Paul, then a prisoner at Rome, wrote the Christian church at this place a most sublime and useful epistle. After congratulating their stedfastness in the faith, wishing them a variety of spiritual blessings, and exhibiting to them the astonishing grace of God, that shone forth in their election, justification, adoption, illumination, regeneration, bold access to God, inhabitation of his Spirit, freedom from heathenish idolatry and Jewish ceremonies, knowledge of Christ's love, and assured title to be filled with all the fulness of God, he exhorts them to the study of Christian unity, mortification of sin, universal holiness, honesty, meekness, love, relative duties, and spiritual warfare with Satan and his agents. Acts xviii. and xix. Eph. i-vi.

About thirty years after, Christ directed a missive to them by John the apostle, commending the diligence, patience, and fidelity of their pastors, but reproving their decay of Christian love, and threatening to take the gospel from them, except they repented. A Christian church, however, continued here six hundred years more; since which, the wickedness and ravage of the Mahometans have so exceedingly defaced it, that it often scarce deserved the name of a church. A few of its present inhabitants still pretend to be Christians of the Greek church.

EPHES-DAMMIM, or PAS-DAMMIM; a place between Shochoh and Azekah, it seems, on the west of the valley of Elah. Here the Philistines encamped when Goliath assaulted the Hebrew host. 1 Sam. xvii. 1, 2, 19: here they again assembled after David's coronation, when Eleazar and Shammah made such terrible slaughter of their troops. 1 Chron. xi. 13, 14.

EPHOD; a short upper garment worn by the Hebrew priests, somewhat in the form of our women's short gowns, if without sleeves. That for the common priests was of plain linen. 1 Sam. xxii. 18. That for the high-priest was a rich robe of fine twined linen or cotton embroidered with gold, blue, purple, and scarlet. On its two shoulder-pieces, whereby it was fixed above, were two precious stones, in each of which were engraven six names of the tribes of Israel. On that part of it which crossed his breast was fastened the breast-plate of judgment by means of the Urim and Thummim, in which the Lord revealed his mind to his people; below which, the Ephod was fastened on the priest's body with a curious girdle. Exod. xxviii. Did this ephod signify the humanity, mediatorial office, and righteousness of our Redeemer? Sometimes persons not in the office of priests, when ministering about holy things, wore ephods; Samuel, when a child, and David, when attending the ark to Jerusalem, had on a linen ephod. 1 Sam. ii. 18. 2 Sam. vi. 14. What Gideon intended by his costly ephod, whether he inadvertently framed it, as a memorial of his victories, or whether, having been once appointed to offer sacrifice, he imagined himself a kind of priest, and made it for consulting the mind of God, we know not; but it is certain the Hebrews idolatrously adored it. Judg. viii. 27. A little before the destruction of Jerusalem, king Agrippa permitted the Levites to wear a linen ephod; but, for about 1700 years past, this nation has been without ephod, and every other badge of the peculiar people of God. Hos. iii. 5.

EPHRAIM, the younger son of Joseph, born about A.M. 2293. Joseph presented him and his brother Manasseh to Jacob his father when dying, that he might give them his blessing. To intimate that Ephraim's tribe should be most numerous and powerful, Jacob crossed his hands, laying the right hand on the head of Ephraim, and the left on the head of Manasseh: nor would the patriarch change his hands; and gave, for his reason, his certain knowledge, that though Manasseh's tribe should be great and numerous, yet that of Ephraim should be much more so. Gen. xlviii. 8-22. His sons Shuthelah, Becher and Tahan, or Tahath, were heads of numerous families. Num. xxvi. 35, 36. He had other sons, viz. Zebad, Ezer, and Eleah, Bered, and Eladah; the first three of whom, together with Shuthelah, were murdered by the Philistines of Gath, as they attempted to defend their herds of cattle from these robbers. He was extremely grieved for the loss of his children; and happening to have a son born to him about that time, he called the child Beriah, to mark that it went evil with his house. He had also a daughter, whose posterity built the two Beththorons and Uzzensherah. 1 Chron. vii. 20-27.

When the Ephraimites came out of Egypt, they amounted to 40,500, but they decreased 8000 in the wilderness. Eliahah the son of Ammihud was their chief prince and captain, Joshua the son of Nun their spy, Kemuel the son of Shipthan their agent for the division of the land. Num. ii. 18, 19; xxvi. 37; xlii. 8. and xxxiv. 24. They, together with the Manassites and Benjaminites, encamped behind the tabernacle, marched behind the ark; and so God is said to lead Joseph like a flock, and to shew himself in the view of these tribes. Numb. ii. 18—24. and x. 21—24. Psal. lxxx. 1, 2. When Joshua became head of the Israelites, and conquered Canaan, he, according to the direction of God, by the lot, assigned his own tribe their inheritance in the very heart of the promised land, where that portion of ground lay which Jacob first bought from Hamor, and afterwards forcibly wrested from the Amorites. Gen. xlviii. 21. They and their brethren of Manasseh remonstrated that their territory was too narrow; but he refused to add any thing to it, and he encouraged them to expel the Canaanites from their hill-country. They took his advice; and obliging a citizen to be their conductor, took Bethel, slew its inhabitants, and possessed it themselves; but they expelled not the inhabitants of Gezer, and the villages around. Judg. i. 22—29. When Deborah, a prophetess of this tribe, judged Israel, and levied war against Jabin, a body of the Ephraimites were detached to attack the Amalekites, who, it seems, were marching to ravage the south country of Israel, or to join Sisera. When Gideon defeated the armies of Midian, the Ephraimites proudly upbraided him, because he had not more early called them to his assistance; but he pacified them with soft words; representing that their apprehending of Oreb and Zeeb, chief princes, and killing so vast a number of fugitives, was more important and honourable than his whole victory. When Jephthah levied an army against the Ammonites, he invited the Ephraimites to join him, but they declined it. When, without their aid, he had routed the enemy, vast numbers of them crossed the Jordan, and rudely abused his troops as a parcel of vagabonds, and threatened to burn his house on him. Provoked with such ungenerous abuse, he and his troops fell upon them, and put them to flight; and taking the passages of Jordan before them, they killed all they could discern to be Ephraimites, by their pronouncing Sibboleth instead of Shibboleth. There fell of them at this time 42,000. Soon after this, Abdon, an Ephraimite judged Israel eight years. Judg. v. 12; vii. 24, 25; viii. 1—3. and xii.

For about three hundred and twenty years, the tabernacle of God was lodged at Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim. In the war in which it was carried off by the Philistines, it seems the Ephraimites, though well armed, behaved with the utmost cowardice. Josh. xviii. 1. 1 Sam. iv. Psal. lxxviii. 6. 20,800 valiant men of this tribe attended David's coronation; in his reign, Hoshai, the son of Azariah, was their deputy-governor, and Helez, the Pelonite their chief captain. 1 Chron. xii. 30. and xxviii. 10, 20. Nothing remarkable happened in the tribe of Ephraim after this, till Jeroboam, one of their number, decoyed it, and nine other tribes, to erect a separate kingdom for him, which continued two hundred and fifty-four years, from A. M. 3029 to 3223. Most if not all the kings were of this tribe, and the royal cities of Shechem and Samaria pertained to it. One of the golden calves was placed in Bethel, another city of it. As this tribe of Ephraim made so noted an appearance among the ten, they all frequently received its name, especially in the time of Hosea. 2 Chron. xxv. 7 Isa. xxviii. Hos. iv. v. vi. &c.

EPHRA-IM, is also the name of, (1.) A city near Bethel, and about eight miles from Jerusalem. Abijah took it from Jeroboam. 2 Chron. xiii. 19. Hither, it is probable, our Saviour withdrew, when the Jews sought his life. John xi. 54; and near to this was Baalhazor, where Absalom had his flocks. 2 Sam. xiii. 23. (2.) A hill in the territory of this tribe, near the south border. Here Micah the idol-maker dwelt, and the Levite who cut his wife in pieces, and Elkanah the father of Samuel. 1 Sam. i. 1. Judg. xvii. 1. and xix. 1. It was not long after the Chaldean army marched by Dan, at the springs of Jordan, when they had got south to mount Ephraim, and were within a few miles of Jerusalem. Jer. iv. 15. (3.) A wood beyond Jordan, near Mahanaim, where Absalom's army was defeated; and which seems to have been so called from the slaughter of the Ephraimites by Jephthah in or near to that place. 2 Sam. xviii. 6. (4.) It seems to be put for the whole country of the ten tribes. Jer. xxxi. 6. and i. 19.

E-PHRATAH, or EPH'RATH. Bethlehem so called. Gen. xxv. 16, 19; but whether Ephratah, where David heard of the ark, be Mount Ephraim, where he heard it had been once placed in Shiloh; or Bethlehem, where he had often heard of it, we know not. It is certain the Ephraimites are called Ephrathites. Judg. xii. 5. Elkanah, the father of Samuel, and Jeroboam, were Ephrathites, as they dwelt in Mount Ephraim. 1 Sam. i. 1. 1 Kings xi. 26. And Jesse is so called, because he dwelt in Bethlehem-Ephratah. 1 Sam. xvii. 12.

EPH'RATH, the second wife of Caleb, by whom he had Hur. 1 Chron. ii. 19. The city of Bethlehem is supposed to have received the addition of Ephrata, in honour of her.

EPH'RON. (1.) A Hittite, who generously offered Abraham the compliment of the field of Machpelah for a burying-place, and could scarce be prevailed on to take money for it. Gen. xxiii. (2.) A mount on which several cities stood; but whether it be mount Ephraim or not, we cannot tell. Josh. xv. 9.

E-PI-CU-RE-ANS; a sect of heathen philosophers, followers of the doctrine of Epicurus the Athenian, who flourished about A. M. 3700. They maintained that the world was formed, not by God, nor with any design, but by the fortuitous concurrence of atoms. They denied that God governs the world, or in the least condescends to interfere with creatures below. They denied the immortality of the soul, and the existence of angels. They maintained that happiness consisted in pleasure; but some of them placed this pleasure in the tranquillity and joy of the mind, arising from the practice of moral virtue, and which is thought by some to have been the true principle of Epicurus: others understood him in the gross sense, and placed all their happiness in sensual pleasures.

EPISTLE, or LETTER, by which one communicates his mind to his friend at a distance. The whole word of God is his inspired epistle to us. Jesus Christ dictated to John, in the isle of Patmos, seven epistles, to be sent to the seven Asiatic churches, framed exactly according as their cases required. Rev. ii. and iii. Twenty-one of the books of the New Testament are called epistles; the first fourteen were written by Paul; the other seven were written, one by James, other two by Peter, three by John, and one by Jude. Why these last seven are called general is not easily determined; whether because the first four of them and the last were written to no particular church, or because they easily met with a general reception among Christians; but as the character does not seem to be of inspired authority, we need give ourselves the less trouble to know the reason of it. The Corinthians were Paul's epistle, written in his heart, known and read of all men, manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ, written with the Spirit, in fleshy tables of the heart: their conversion was a divine recommendation of his ministry, very delightful to himself, and obvious enough to every observer; and in which appeared evident the powerful influence of Jesus Christ and his Spirit, writing his law in their hearts. 2 Cor. ii. 2, 3.

EQUAL. (1.) Just; righteous. Psal. xvii. 2. Ezek. xviii. 2. (2.) Of the same excellency and dignity. John v. 18. Phil. ii. 7. (3.) An intimate companion; one of the same age, station, and opportunities. Psal. lv. 18. Gal. i. 14.

EQUITY; RIGHTOUSNESS. Isa. xi. 4.

ERASTUS; the chamberlain or city-treasurer of Corinth. Having resigned his office, he attended Paul to Ephesus, and was sent along with Timothy to Macedonia, probably to prepare the contribution for the poor Christians of Judea. When Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, and some years after, Erastus was at Corinth. Acts xix. 22. Rom. xvi. 23. 2 Tim. iv. 10. Some make him a bishop of Macedonia, and a martyr at Philippi; and others, on equally slender grounds, make him bishop of Paneas, at the springs of Jordan.

ERECH; a city of Chaldee, built by Nimrod, and probably the same with Ptolemy's Araka in Susiana, on the east bank of the Tigris. Gen. x. 10.

ERECT; to rear; to build. Gen. xxxiii. 20.

ERR; to wander; to mistake. ERROR is, (1.) A mistake or oversight. Eccl. v. 6. (2.) False doctrine, whereby one wanders from the rule of God's word. 1 John iv. 6. (3.) Sin of any kind, which is a wandering from the path of duty, and missing the end of God's glory and our own good. Psal. xix. 12. (4.) Unnatural lust. Rom. i. 27. The error of Balaam was his love of gain; and, in order to obtain it, tempting the Israelites to whoredom and idolatry. Jude 11. Be it indeed that I have erred, mine error remaineth with myself; i. e. If I have mistaken views, I am likely to retain them for ought you have said; or, if I have offended, I now suffer for it, and do not need that you should add to my affliction with your reproachful speeches. Job xix. 4.

ESAR-HADDON, the son or successor of Sennacherib. Finding the kingdom upon the point of ruin at his accession, A. M. 3296, he continued at home, establishing his power the best way he could. About the twenty-ninth year of his reign, he, either by force or by heirship, obtained the kingdom of Babylon, and took up his residence there. Grown powerful by this extension of dominion, he marched his army to the westward, took Jerusalem, and carried Manasseh prisoner to Babylon. He too reduced the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and ravaged the country of Edom; and perhaps Tartan, his general, took Ashdod. The remains of the ten tribes and Syrians he transplanted to the eastern parts of his dominions; and brought men from Cuth, Avah, Sepharvaim, and other eastern provinces, which he had subdued, to people the country in their room. See SAMARITANS. After a glorious reign of forty-two years he died; and his son Saosaduchin succeeded him. Probably Esarhaddon is the Sardanapalus of Clearchus, who died of old age. Isa. xxxvii. 38. xix. 23. xviii. xix. and xx. 1. Nah. iii. 8, 10. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. 2 Kings xvii. 24—25. Ezra iv. 2, 10.

ESCAPE; to get off from danger or punishment. Gen. xix. 17. Heb. ii. 3. Those who do escape are called an escaping. 2 Kings xix. 30. Ezek. vi. 8, 9.

ESCHEW; to shun; keep free from. Job i. 1.

ESPY. See SPY.

ESPECIALLY, SPECIALLY. This word always distinguishes persons or things, and introduces the mention of what is more eminent. 1 Tim. v. 17. Deut. iv. 10. Acts xxvi. 8.

ESH-BA'AL. See ISBOSHETH.

ESHCOL; one of Abraham's allies, who assisted him against Chedorlaomer. Perhaps the valley of Eshcol, in the south territories of Judah, was denominated from him; though it is more probable it was so called from the large cluster of grapes which Caleb and Joshua carried thence, when they spied the land. Gen. xiv. 24. Numb. xiii. 24.

ESH-TA'OL; a city on the west border of the tribe of Judah. It was first given to that tribe, and afterwards to the Danites; nevertheless its inhabitants are represented of the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 23, and xix. 41. 1 Chron. ii. 53. Samson was born and buried near to this place. Judg. xiii. 2, 25. and xvi. 31.

ESH-TE-MO'A; a city given by the tribe of Judah to the priests and to elders, of which David sent part of the spoil he took from the Amalekites. Josh. xxi. 14. 1 Sam. xxx. 28. Whether it be the ESHTMOA in the hill country of Judea, we know not. Josh. xv. 50.

ESPOUSE. See BETROTH; MARRIAGE.

ES'ROM. See HEZERON.

ESTABLISH; (1.) To fix; settle.

Kings ix. 5. (2.) To confirm. Numb. xxx. 18. Rom. i. 11. (3.) To appoint. Hab. i. 13. (4.) To perform; fulfil. Psal. cxix. 38. God establisheth his faithfulness in the very heavens, when, by fulfilling his word in the most visible and noted manner, he manifests its being as sure, firm, and unchangeable, as the third heaven. Psal. lxxxix. 3. He establisheth his words, when he fulfils what he had promised or threatened. 1 Sam. i. 23. 2 Sam. vii. 25. He establishes the Hebrews to be his people, by taking them into solemn covenant with him, and openly owning them; and by his doing wonders in their behalf, settling them in his promised land, and requiring them to behave as his chosen subjects. Deut. xxviii. 9. He establisheth the work of his people's hands, when he gives them direction, assistance, and success in their undertakings. Psal. xc. 17. We establish our own righteousness, when we perform it, in order to found our acceptance with God, and persuade ourselves, that it is a proper foundation for our hopes of eternal happiness. Rom. x. 3. We by faith establish the law, presenting to it, as a covenant, the law-magnifying righteousness of Jesus Christ, as fulfilled in our stead; and by faith, deriving virtue from Christ, we are enabled to fulfil it as a rule of duty. Rom. iii. 31.

ESTATE. (1.) Order; condition. Gen. xliii. 7. (2.) Stead, or place. Dan. xi. 7, 20. The chief estates of Galilee are the great men who possessed the highest stations of power and wealth. Mark vi. 22.

ESTEEM; (1.) To value; prize. Job xxxvi. 19. (2.) To judge; think. Rom. xiv. 14. We did esteem him stricken, smitten of God; we thought him divinely punished for his own crimes. Isa. liii. 4.

ESTHER, or HADASSAH, of the tribe of Benjamin, the daughter of Abihail, the uncle of Mordecai. As her parents died when she was but a child, Mordecai her cousin brought her up. When Ahasuerus convened the beautiful young women of his empire that he might select a queen from among them instead of Vashti, Esther was brought among the rest. A eunuch had the charge of her, and provided for her every thing necessary. Seven maids also attended and assisted her. After she had undergone a year's purification with sweet oils and perfumes, she was in her turn conducted to the king's bed. Superlatively delighted with her comeliness, and agreeable deportment, he put the royal crown on her head, and declared her his queen. A splendid feast was made to honour the nuptials; and the king bestowed a multitude of valuable presents on the queen and the guests. He likewise released a vast number of prisoners, and forgave his subjects a considerable part of his revenue. Esther, according to Mordecai's advice, entirely concealed her Jewish original; but informed by him of a plot against the king by two of his chamberlains, notified it to him. Esth. ii.

Upon Haman's obtaining the royal edict for the general destruction of the Jews, Mordecai, by Hatach, one of her attendants, informed Esther, and begged that she would interpose with her husband the king. She returned him answer, that she had not been called into the king's presence for thirty days past; and that to approach it uncalled was to run the hazard of her life. Mordecai returned her answer, begging that she would interpose, be the hazard what it would; he suggested that probably God had raised her to her high station for such an end; and that, if she continued inactive, deliverance would come to the Jews from some other part and she and her friends be destroyed. This message determined her to interpose, cost what it would. After she and her maidens, and the rest of the Jews in Shushan, had spent three days in solemn fasting and prayer, for a blessing on her attempt, she, on the third, in a most splendid dress, approached the king's presence without any call. He had no sooner observed her enter the inner court, than, all in raptures of affection, he stretched out the golden sceptre as a sign of his favour, and asked her request, for it should be granted to the half of his kingdom. That she might the more effectually insinuate herself into his favour, before she mentioned her business, she only begged the king and Haman would honour her with their presence at a banquet which she had prepared. She had her desire, and, while the entertainment lasted, Ahasuerus again asked her request. She only begged that he and Haman would vouchsafe her their presence at a second treat. Her desire was readily granted. While they sat at this second banquet, the king, merry with wine, asked her once more what was her request, and it should be granted to the half of his kingdom. She begged that he would protect her life, and the lives of her people, which, to the hurt of the public revenues were devoted to ruin. He immediately asked the author of this scheme; and was informed that it was Haman, there present. This discovery issued in the sudden ruin of Haman and his whole family, and his estate was given to Esther, who made Mordecai steward thereof. The edict against the Jews could not, according to the maxims of the Medes and Persians, who held royal edicts immutable, be revoked; but Esther, and Mordecai, now prime minister instead of Haman, wrote to the Jews in all the provinces of the empire to defend themselves on the day appointed for their ruin. These letters discouraged the heathens from rising; and of such as attempted to put the massacre into execution, the Jews killed about 75,800, but seized no part of their spoil. To commemorate this wonderful deliverance, Esther and Mordecai appointed the Jews to keep every year the FEAST of Purim, on the day that had been marked out for their destruction.

These events are recorded in the book denominated from Esther, a principal subject thereof. Who was the author, whether Ezra, Mordecai, or some other, is absolutely uncertain. No Jew ever doubted of its divine authority, notwithstanding the name of God is not mentioned therein; nor perhaps ever a Christian; for though the canons of Melito and Athanasius mention it not, it is probable they include it under EZRA. See APOCRYPHA.

ESTIMATE; to put a value or price on a thing. Lev. xxviii. 14.

ESTIMATION. (1.) The valuing of a thing. Lev. v. 15. (2.) The price set upon a thing. Num. xviii. 16.

ESTRANGED; filled with dislike; rendered like strangers. The wicked are estranged from God; destitute of the knowledge of him, or intimacy with him, and filled with dislike of him, Psal. lviii. 3; but not estranged from their lusts; not filled with dislike of it, or turned from the practice of it. Psal. lxxviii. 30. The Jews estranged Jerusalem, by turning out the worship of the true God, and bringing in the worship of idols, and the practice of the basest wickedness. Jer. xix. 4.

ETAM; a city of Judah, between Bethlehem and Tekoa, and which Rehoboam fortified. 2 Chron. xi. 6. Near to it was a rock, to the top of which Samson retired after he had burnt the standing corn of the Philistines. Judg. xv. 8. From a noted fountain near this place, perhaps the fountain of gardens, Pilate, and perhaps Solomon long before him, brought water by an aqueduct into the city of Jerusalem.

ETERNAL, EVERLASTING, FOR EVER, EVERMORE, sometimes denote that which continues a long time; so the ceremonial laws are said to be for ever. Exod. xxvii. 21. and xxviii. 43. Canaan is called an everlasting possession, Gen. xvii. 8. and the rather, as they typified things strictly eternal. The hills are called everlasting, to signify their antiquity, stability, and long duration. Gen. xlix. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 15. In this limited sense, the government promised to David and his seed is called everlasting; unless we consider it as for ever continued in the spiritual dominion of the Messiah. 1 Chron. xvii. 14. 2 Sam. vii. 16. Sometimes they denote that which is without beginning and end, or at least without end. When eternal or everlasting is ascribed to God, it denotes his being without beginning, succession, or end of duration. This unlimited continuance is implied in his self-existence; for that which is self-existent can admit of no supposable period in which it is not the same: but the manner of the divine duration, and of its co-existence with time, is to us no more comprehensible than the co-existence of his infinity with particular places. This eternity of God is expressed in his being from everlasting to everlasting. Deut. xxxiii. 27. Isa. ix. 6. Heb. ix. 14. Psal. xc. 2. In this sense, God's love is everlasting. Jer. xxxi. 3. The covenant of grace, in the execution of it, Heb. xiii. 20; and angels, human souls, and the execution of Christ's mediatory office, and so redemption, salvation, and glory, are everlasting, without end. Psal. cx. 4. Heb. vii. 25. Isa. ix. 7. Heb. ix. 12. and v. 9. 2 Cor. iv. 17. Nor is the punishment of the damned of less duration; the same word is used to express both. Matt. xix. 16. and xxv. 41. The gospel is everlasting; it is preached from the fall till the end of time, and its blessings shall never have an end. Rev. xiv. 6. The last judgment is eternal; it irrevocably determines and fixes the endless state of angels and men. Heb. vi. 2.

ETHAM; the third station of the Hebrews in their departure from Egypt. It was situated near the north-west point of the Red sea; and the wilderness, both on the east and west of the Red sea, was called by its name. Perhaps it is the same as BUTHUM, or BUTHUS. Exod. xiii. 20.

ETHAN. (1.) A son of Zerah, the son of Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 6. (2.) The son of Kishi, and descendant of MERARI. He was one of the wisest men of his age, except Solomon, and a chief musician of the temple; and living to a good age, he penned the 89th Psalm on the occasion of the revolt of the ten tribes. 1 Kings iv. 31. 1 Chron. vi. 44. and xv. 17. If he be the same with Jeduthun, he had six sons, Gedaliah, Zeri, Jeshaiah, Hashabiah, Mattathiah, and Shimei, who were heads of so many classes of the temple singers. 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 17. Sundry of the Psalms were given into his and his descendants' hands, to be sung by them. 1 Chron. xvi. 41, 42. Psal. xxxix. and lxii. &c.

ETH-A'NIM; the seventh month of the Jews' sacred year, and the first of their civil. After the captivity it was called Tizri. On the first day of it was observed the feast of trumpets: on the third, a fast for the death of Gedaliah, Zech. viii. 19; on the 5th, a fast for the death of some doctors, and the sentence against the makers of the golden calf; on the 10th, the feast of atonement; on the 15th, and seven days following, the feast of tabernacles; and on the 23d, a festival of joy for the re-delivery of the law to Moses, on which they read Moses' blessings of the tribes, and the history of his death. This month had thirty days, and answered partly to September, and partly to October. In this month was Solomon's temple dedicated. 1 Kings viii. 2.

ETH-I-O'PI-A. See CUSH.

EVANGELIST; a preacher of the gospel. Those denominated evangelists were next in order to the apostles, and were sent by them, not to settle any where, but to travel through the infant-churches of the Christian name, and ordain ordinary officers, and finish what the apostles had begun. Of this kind were Philip the deacon, Timothy, Titus, Mark, Silas, &c. Acts xxi. 8. It seems there were some of this extraordinary office as late as the times of Trajan, about A. D. 116. The title is given to the four inspired writers of our Saviour's life and death, which are indeed the most delightful things to sinful and ruined men.

EVE; the first woman, and common mother of mankind. God having created the man, and presented before him the various animals of earth and air, none of them were a help meet for him. He therefore cast him into a deep sleep, and out of his side formed a most beautiful woman, and gave her to Adam as his wife. To mark their origin from dust, and the unity of affection between them, God called them both Adam; but Adam called her ISCHAH, or woman, because taken out of man, and so lively a resemblance of him. They had lived together in happiness but a few days, if so much as one, when Satan, envying their felicity, assumed the form of a serpent, or rather took possession of one, and in this form addressed the woman in the absence of her husband, and in an equivocating manner insinuated, that God had dealt unkindly with them, in not allowing them to eat of every tree of the garden. She replied, that they were only forbidden to eat or touch the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and that under pain of death. Satan replied, that there was no absolute certainty of their death, though they should eat of it: for God knew that, on their eating it, their eyes should be opened, and they should become as gods, knowing good and evil. Perceiving the delightful appearance of the fruit, and ardently desirous of higher degrees of wisdom, she took of the fruit and did eat; and being much taken therewith, gave unto her husband, and he did eat. Their consciences quickly discovered their guilt; and irregular passions awakening in their soul, they were ashamed of their nakedness. When God called them to account, Adam threw the blame entirely on his wife. To mark his detestation of sin, God condemned her, and her female descendants, to a multitude of sorrows, and painful trouble in the bringing forth of children, and to further degrees of subjection to their husbands. After the revelation of man's recovery through Christ, Adam called her name HAVAH, or EVE, because she was to be the mother of all living. She, quickly after their expulsion from Paradise, conceived and bare a son. Imagining that she had got the promised seed, the Man, the Lord Redeemer, she called his name Cain, which signifies possession. Soon after, she bare a second son, and called his name ABEL, or vanity. And long after, just when Abel was newly murdered, she bare SETH, whom she accounted a seed given her instead of Abel. See ADAM. Gen. ii. iii. and iv. 2 Cor. xi. 3. 1 Tim. ii. 13-15.

EVEN, when it denotes a quality, signifies the same as equal. Job xxxi. 6; or straight and plain. Psal. xxvi. 12. When it is a particle, it either introduces an explanation, and is the same as, that is, 2 Cor. i. 3; or it lessens the signification, importing the same as merely, simply, 1 Cor. xi. 14; or it increases the signification, and signifies altogether; wholly; 2 Cor. x. 13; or it connects things, and signifies, ALSO, YEA. Rom. viii. 23. 1 Kings i. 48.

EVEN; EVENING; EVEN-TIDE; the close of the day, when it begins to grow dark; or, at least, when the sun is considerably declined. Neh. xiii. 19. The passover-lamb was killed between the two evenings, that is, about three o'clock after noon, when the sun was half-way declined; and about this time the evening sacrifice was offered: by both which was prefigured, Christ's being crucified for us in the last part of the age of the world, and his dying at that time of the day. Exod. xii. 6. Ezra ix. 4. A time of trouble and distress is likened to an evening: it comes after a pleasant day of opportunity and prosperity; it has a dismal and gloomy appearance; mercies decrease and fearful judgments abound. Jer. vi. 4. Zech. xiv. 7.

EVER. (1.) Always. Lev. vi. 13. (2.) At any time. Eph. v. 29. (3.) To eternity. 1 Thess. iv. 1. Or ever, before. Sol. Song iv. 12. EVERMORE. (1.) Daily; always. Psal. cv. 4. (2.) To eternity. Rev. i. 18. See ETERNAL.

EVIDENT; plain; clear; fully proved. Gal. iii. 11.

EVIDENCE; (1.) a deed or writing, to ascertain one's claim to his property. Jer. xxxii. 10, 11. (2.) A demonstrative and convincing proof. Faith is the evidence of things not seen; thereby in the most certain manner, we perceive, realize, and are persuaded of the truth of things invisible and eternal. Heb. xi. 1.

EVIL. (1.) Sinful, wicked. Eccl. ix. 3. The face of the Lord is set against them that do evil, and evil shall not dwell with him. Psal. xxxiv. 16. and v. 4. (2.) Troublesome and hurtful. Job ii. 10. Psal. xxxiv. 21. In this sense, evil comes from God. Amos iii. 6. Eccl. xii. 1. And days are evil, distressful, and full of trouble. Prov. xv. 15. Eccl. xii. 1. Amos vi. 3. In this sense, injuries from men are called evil. Prov. xvii. 13. Matt. v. 29. Satan is called the evil one, or evil spirit; he is the author of all sin; he perpetually works wickedness, and causes trouble. John xvii. 15. Acts xix. 12. An evil time is a season of much sin, danger, and trouble. Amos v. 13. Mic. ii. 3. Psal. xxxvii. 19. Sin is the worst of evils; it is direct enmity against God, and obscures the glory of all his perfections: and it is the source and cause of all the miseries that come on the creatures. Jer. ii. 13. The evil we pray against, is both what is sinful, and what is hurtful. Matt. vi. 13. 1 Chron. iv. 10. See DISEASE; AGE.

E'VIL-MER'O-DOCH, or Merodach the fool, the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. It is said, he governed the empire during his father's madness, and was afterwards imprisoned for his mismanagement, when he contracted a familiarity with JEHOIACHIN; and on that account, liberated and dignified him as soon as he came to the throne. Jer. lii. 31. He married Nitocris, the daughter of Astyages king of Media, one of the most active and prudent of her sex; and who advised Belshazzar her son to call Daniel to read the handwriting on the wall. By a wanton ravage of part of the Median territories, he occasioned the war between the two kingdoms that ended in the ruin of the Chaldeans. After he had for about two years reigned, or rather wallowed in sloth and wickedness, he was murdered by Neriglissar, his sister's husband, who succeeded him on the throne.

EUNUCH; one that is by nature, or by manual operation, deprived of his generative power. Such have, for many ages, been employed in the eastern parts of the world, especially to guard the beds of princes and princesses: hence the name came to be given to such officers as served in the inner courts and chambers of kings, even suppose they had not been castrated; as to Potiphar, who had a wife. Gen. xxxvii. 36. As the custom of rendering men eunuchs is contrary to the original law of nature, God prohibited it to his ancient people, and excluded all such from civil offices among them. Dent. xxiii. 1; and they were reckoned as useless dry trees, as they could have no children. Isa. lvi. 3. We find, however, that their kings had often eunuchs in their service. 1 Sam. viii. 13. 1 Chron. xxviii. 1. 1 Kings xxii. 9; 2 Kings ix. 32. and xxiv. 12, 15. Some of the royal family of Judah served as eunuchs in the court of Babylon. Isa. xxxix. 7. Ebedmelech, an Ethiopian eunuch, drew Jeremiah from his prison. Jer. xxxviii. 7—13. Another Ethiopian eunuch, a servant of queen Candace, having come to worship at Jerusalem, as a proselyte to the Jewish religion, was, on his return, converted to the Christian faith by Philip; and, it is probable, introduced it into his own country. Acts viii. 27—39. Some are born eunuchs; have never any inclination after the marriage bed. Some make themselves eunuchs; for the kingdom of heaven's sake, they abstain from marriage, and the pleasures and cares thereof, that they may more eminently attend to the exercises of religion. Matt. xv. 12.

EU-O'DI-AS and SYN-TY-CHÉ, two noted women of the Philipian church, who had mightily, in their station, helped the apostle Paul to propagate the Christian faith. Some variance having happened between them, he warmly conjures them to be reconciled and live in perfect harmony. Phil. iv. 2.

EU-PHRATES; the most famous river in western Asia. It has its source in the north-east mountains of Armenia. For a long way it directs its course to the westward; after which, at the foot of mount Taurus, it bends its course southward, and having received the Melas, which flows into it from almost the north-west corner of Lesser Asia, it runs along the east side of Syria and Arabia the Desert. It seems, that anciently a branch of the Euphrates, turning eastward, fell into the Hiddekel, or Tigris, at Seulucia. Between these branches Nebuchadnezzar digged a large canal, called Nahar-malch, or the royal river. At present after having watered the provinces of Irak or ancient Chaldaea, and the province of Auxa, it runs with a gentle flow towards the city of Ario, where the violent reflux of the Persian gulf obstructs its waters. About thirty miles further south it joins the Tigris, just above where the ancient paradise is supposed to have stood: about sixty miles further south, they discharge themselves into the Persian gulf; but whether now by one or more streams, is not certainly known. This river is generally slow in its course, and yet it is not so navigable, even for small craft, as one might expect; but this is owing to the sloth of the people who live near it, in not clearing the canal of stones, and suffering it in the flat country to part into so many streams, that sailors are oft at a loss which to take. Its course is for the most part very pleasant, running through delightful plains, where its banks are decked with the constant verdure of willows, palm-trees, and rich pastures. The water is generally foul and muddy, but, when settled, or strained, is very wholesome, and by the Arabs reckoned a universal medicine. In passing through some deserts, it contracts a yellowish colour and disagreeable taste; the first of which distinguishes it, after it has run some miles into the Persian gulf. This river is neither deep nor wide, except when swelled by the annual melting of the Armenian snows.

The Arabs divide this river into the greater and lesser: the greater, they say, falls into the Tigris, near the cities of Amber and Felujah; and the lesser, which is often the largest stream, after forming the Nabathean fens, on the east of Arabia Deserta, discharges itself into the Tigris, at Karnah. To prevent the yearly overflow of the adjacent country by the Tigris, and Euphrates, it has been often attempted to divide their streams into a variety of lesser ones; but these attempts have not hitherto much answered the end. The Euphrates was the north-east border of the extensive dominion promised to the Israelites, and to which it scarcely ever reached, but in the days of David, Solomon, and Jeroboam the Second. Gen. xv. 18. Exod. xxiii. 81. The Mahometan powers are likened to the river Euphrates, that river has been a kind of centre to their dominion; they are a noted bar to prevent the spread of the gospel in the east; but at the beginning of the millennium they shall be brought down. Rev. xvi. 12. The Assyrian army that invaded Judea under Sennacherib and Esarhaddon, is likened to the Euphrates, when overflowing its banks; they overspread and wasted the countries around. Isa. viii. 6, 7.

EU-ROCLY-DON; a kind of whirlwind from the north-east, very dangerous to ships, as it suddenly falls upon them, causes them to tack about, and sometimes to founder. Acts xxvii. 14.

EUTY-CHUS; a young man of Tross, who, sitting in a window, as Paul preached till midnight, fell asleep, tumbled from the third story, and was taken up for dead; but Paul taking him up in his arms, he revived, and returned to the company. Acts xx. 9—12.

EXACT; (1.) To demand, especially without pity. Neh. v. 7, 11. (2.) To prevail over. Psal. lxxxix. 22.

EXACTORS; rulers; overseers. Isa. ix. 17; especially such as without pity demand tribute. Isa. iii. 12. ix. 4. and xiv. 2.

EXALT; to lift up to greater height, glory, and dignity. Numb. xxiv. 7. God exalts Christ, in raising him from the dead, receiving him up into heaven, and giving all power and judgment in heaven and earth into his hand. Acts ii. 33. God exalts every valley, and exalts his high-way, when every impediment to his shewing mercy is removed, and the method of his coming to do us good is made visible and manifest. Isa. xl. 4. and xlix. 11. The horn of men is exalted, when their honour, power, or confidence, is advanced to greater eminence. 1 Sam. ii. 1, 10. Psal. xcii. 10. Men exalt God, when with care and diligence they advance his declarative glory, and praise his excellencies and works. Exod. xv. 2. Psal. xxxiv. 3. and xcix. 5, 9. Men exalt themselves, when they advance their own power or wealth, or value themselves above others. Ezek. xxix. 15. Matt. xxiii. 12. Antichrist exalts himself above every thing called God.

he exalts himself above magistrates, pretending to enthroned and depose them at pleasure; above angels, presumptuously requiring them to carry such souls to heaven as he pleaseth, and in ordering devils to leave the persons of the possessed; and above the true God, in pretending to dispense with his laws, give authority to his word, and govern his church by rules of his own, &c. 2 Thess. ii. 4.

EXAMINE. See TRY.

EXAMPLE, or ENSAMPLE. (1.) An instance, or precedent for our admonition, to beware of the sins which others have committed, and so avoid the judgments they brought on themselves: so the punishments of the Hebrews happened to them for examples or warning to others. 1 Cor. x. 11.

(2.) A pattern for our imitation: thus we have the pattern of Christ, and of his ancient saints, to copy after in the manner of our life. 1 Cor. xi. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 21. As examples more powerfully incline others to a holy practice, more clearly point out our duty, rendering it visible in its various circumstances; not only shewing the duty, but the possibility of performance; and by a secret force urge to imitation, reproaching our defects, and animating us to like zeal and diligence, ministers and others ought to be exemplary in their lives. 1 Tim. iv. 12. 1 Thess. i. 7.

EXCEED. (1.) To go beyond. Deut. xxv. 2. (2.) To take liberties not allowed by the law of God; to be more wicked than ordinary. Job xxxvi. 9.

EXCEL; to be more great, valuable, honourable, powerful, or skilful, than others. Gen. xlix. 4. Psal. ciii. 20. 1 Kings iv. 30. Saints are more excellent than others; they are united to Christ, have his righteousness on them, his grace in them, and their good works flowing from his indwelling Spirit, regulated by his law, and directed to his glory as their end; and they are more useful, being a blessing in the midst of the land. Prov. xii. 26.

EXCELLENCY; preciousness; surpassing value or glory. Psal. lxii. 4. Job xl. 10. The excellency of God is the bright shining and valuable perfections of his nature, and the glorious displays thereof. Deut. xxxiii. 26. Isa. xxxv. 2. The excellency of Christ is the glorious properties of his nature, his offices, righteousness, and fulness. Phil. iii. 8. The excellency of saints is their relation to Christ, and fellowship with him in his righteousness, grace, and glory. Psal. xvi. 3. Isa. lx. 15. The excellency of men in general, is their power, wealth, wisdom, &c. Job iv. 21. Isa. xlii. 19. The excellency of Jacob is either God himself, who is the source, sum, and substance of all his people's blessings, in time and eternity, Amos viii. 7. Psal. xlvii. 4; in which last text it perhaps signifies their fat land, their civil and ecclesiastic glory and honour; and hence the temple is called the excellency of their strength, a magnificent building, and distinguished means of their protection. Ezek. xiv. 21. Their excellency, which he abhorred, was their public form of worship hypocritically used, their fortified cities, their wealth, and whatever else they were proud of. Amos vi. 8. God's turning away, or avenging the excellency of Jacob and Israel, signifies his avenging on the Assyrians what injury they had done to the kings of Israel and Judah. Nah. ii. 2.

EXCEPT; to leave out. 1 Cor. xv. 27.

EXCESS; what is beyond due bounds. Matt. xxiii. 25. It is especially used to signify eating or drinking too much. Eph. v. 18. 1 Pet. iv. 3, 4.

EXCHANGE; either the act of giving one thing for another, Gen. xlvii. 17; or the thing given for another. Lev. xxvii. 10.

EXCHANGERS were such as took people's money to make profit by it, and give them a share thereof; the same as our bankers. Matt. xxv. 27.

EXCLUDE; to shut out. The gospel, or law of faith, shuts out boasting, as it deals with men, and gives blessings to them, as altogether sinful, and unworthy of themselves. Rom. iii. 22. The false apostles laboured to shut out the Galatians from all connexion with Paul, and from the true gospel and church, and from the liberty which Christ had given his people from the ceremonial law, and the law as a covenant. Gal. iv. 17.

EXCOMMUNICATE. See CUT.

EXCUSE; to give a reason why we forbear doing a thing, or do another. 2 Cor. xii. 19. To have one excused, is to sustain his reason for not doing, or for doing a thing, as good and sufficient. Luke xiv. 8, 19.

EXECRATION. See CURSE.

EXECUTE; to perform. Num. v. 30. To execute judgment, is to pass righteous sentences and to inflict just punishments for the destruction of the guilty, and the deliverance of the righteous. Deut. x. 18. Mic. vii. 9. An EXECUTIONER is one that puts criminals to death; one that executes the sentence of the judge. Mark vi. 27.

EXEMPTED; freed by privilege. 1 Kings xv. 22.

EXERCISE, habitually and earnestly to make use of; employ; exert. Rev. xiii. 12. To exercise one's self to have a conscience void of offence, is to be at all thought, care, and pains, to act up to the rule of God's law. Acts xxiv. 16. To exercise one's self unto godliness, is, with the utmost earnestness and activity, to live by faith on Christ as our righteousness and strength; and, in so doing, habitually to exert all our powers, and improve our time, opportunities, and advantages, to seek after, and promote our fellowship with God, and conformity to him in thoughts, words, and actions. 1 Tim. iv. 7. To be exercised by trouble, is to be much afflicted therewith, and led out to a proper improvement of it. Heb. xii. 11. Having the senses exercised to discern good and evil, is to have the powers of the soul carefully and frequently employed, till they become skilful in distinguishing the difference between good and evil. Heb. v. 14. A heart exercised to covetous practices, is one exceedingly bent on, much employed, and skilful in promoting covetous courses. 2 Pet. ii. 14. Bodily exercise, which profiteth little, is outward austerity in watchings, fastings; or a mere outward attendance on religious worship. 1 Tim. iv. 8.

EXHORT; kindly and earnestly to call men to their duty and happiness. Heb. iii. 13.

EXHORTATION is a great branch of the preaching of the gospel, as we are thereby called and stirred up to receive the blessings necessary for our happiness, and to attend to our proper work of holiness. Luke iii. 18. Acts xiii. 15. 1 Thess. ii. 3.

EXILE; one carried, banished, or driven from his country. 2 Sam. xv. 19. Perhaps it means one in prison. Isa. li. 14.

EXODUS; the second book of Moses: so called, because it relates the history of the Israelites' departure from Egypt. It is a narrative of the transactions of about a hundred and forty-five years, from the death of Joseph, A.M. 2369, to the erection of the tabernacle in 2514; particularly of the tyranny of Pharaoh; the bondage and marvellous increase of the Israelites in Egypt; the Lord's sending Moses and Aaron to deliver them; the ten plagues inflicted on the Egyptians for refusing to let them go; and the destruction of their king and army in the Red sea; the Israelites' departure from Egypt; safe passage through the Red sea; their wonderful sustenance by sweetened water, or water from a dry rock, and with bread from heaven; God's publishing and giving them his law at Sinai, and their idolatrous making and worship of the golden calf; the directions concerning the tabernacle, and consecration of priests; the oblations for, and actual erection of, the tabernacle.

Boivin, and other learned men, have stated that the Hebrews sojourned four hundred and thirty years in Egypt; that from the death of Joseph, and beginning of the history of Exodus, there is an interval of about two hundred and fifty years, in which the Israelites made themselves masters of Lower Egypt, and formed Manetho's dynasty of Hyosos, or shepherd kings, Ephraim and his descendants being their sovereigns; at last, falling into idolatry, God gave them up into the hands of the native Egyptians, who, having reduced them, terribly oppressed them. The history of these transactions, they say, was contained in the book of the Wars of the Lord, the book of Jasher, and other books now lost. But we suppose, no one who believes that Moses was the grandchild of Levi, who entered Egypt, when between forty and fifty years of age, and was but eighty when he brought Israel out of Egypt, Exod. vi. 20. will credit the statement of these critics.

EXORCIST; one, who in the name of God, adjures evil spirits, to dislodge them from persons possessed. As Christ gave his twelve apostles and seventy disciples a power of dislodging evil spirits, and which, it is said, in some degree continued in the church about two hundred years, the sons of Sceva, and others, chiefly of the Papists, have wickedly attempted to counterfeit the same; but if at any time real effects followed the endeavours of such, it must have been owing to their magical collusion with Satan, or his with them. Acts ix. 13.

EXPECT. See HOPE.

EXPEDIENT; fit; profitable. John xi. 50.

EXPULSION; to drive out of a place. Josh. xiii. 5.

EXPERIENCE; long proof and trial, by seeing, feeling, or the like. Gen. xxx. 27. Patience works experience, and experience hope: by bearing tribulation in a patient and resigned manner, we observe and feel much of the goodness of God to us, and of the working of his grace in us; and are thereby encouraged to hope for further support, deliverance, grace, and glory, and every good thing. Rom. v. 4. An experiment is a practical trial. 2 Cor. ix. 13.

EXPERT; well skilled; much experienced. Skilful warriors are expert men, that is, in their own business. 1 Chron. xii. 33. Jer. i. 9. Gospel ministers are expert in war; they are well skilled, and able to resist sin, Satan, and the world, particularly erroneous and deceitful men, and qualified to teach others to do so. Sol. Song iii. 8.

EXPIRE; to come to an end. 1 Sam. xviii. 26.

EXPLOITS. Those done by Antiochus Epiphanes in his return from Egypt were fearful outrages against the Jews, murder of many thousands of them, overturning their temple worship, and appointing the idolatry of the Greeks in its room: and those done by the pious Jews, on that occasion, were their bold resistance of temptations, their patient and cheerful enduring of tortures and death, and, at last, their gallant defeating of his armies. Dan. xi. 23, 32.

EXPOUND. (1.) To explain. Acts xviii. 26. (2.) To rehearse. Acts vi. 4.

EXPRESS; exact; lively. Heb. i. 3. EXPRESSED; particularly marked, numbered, mentioned. Num. i. 17.

EXPRESSLY; most plainly and particularly. Ezek. i. 3.

EXTEND; to reach out; to bestow. God extends mercy, kindness, and peace to men, when, in a condescending, sovereign, and powerful manner, he bestows it abundantly on them. Ezra vii. 28. Isa. lxvi. 12. The goodness of Christ, and his people extends not unto God; does not render him more gracious or happy than before; but it extends to the saints, to promote the increase of their holiness and happiness. Psal. xvi. 2, 3.

EXTINCT; quenched as the light and flame of a candle put out. My days are extinct, the graves are ready for me; my season of prosperity is past, my life ends, and I can hope for nothing in this world, but death and the grave. Job xvii. 1.

EXTOL; to praise to the highest, Psal. xxx. 1; to exalt highly. Isa. lii. 13. Psal. xxxiv. 3.

EXTORTION, is an unjust wresting from any one, by fraudulent bargains, lawsuits, or violence of hand, what belongs to him. Ezek. xxii. 12. An extortioner is one who, by violence or deceit, wrests from men their substance. Psal. cix. 11.

EXTREME; very painful and grievous. Dent. xxviii. 22.

EXTREMITY, denotes the most heavy, painful, and extensive afflictions. Job xxxv. 15.

EYE; the organ of sight. It is of most marvellous construction; and consists of six different coats, between which are placed a watery crystalline, and glassy humour. It vessels are nerves, glands, arteries, and veins. The whole is disposed, that the rays of light, and objects represented thereby, may be collected at the bottom of the eye. The eyes of animals are placed in such a manner as is most proper. The eyes of bares, and other creatures much exposed to danger, are placed standing out, that they may take in almost the whole horizon, both before and behind. The eyes of moles are very small, and placed deep and covered over with hair, that they may not be hurt by their digging in the earth. In old age, men's eyes grow stiff, and shrink in their sockets. 1 Kings xiv. 4. As the eye is very useful, not only to receive rays of light, and present objects, but also to express love, pity, or wrath, &c. they are much used in metaphoric language. Eyes and eyelids, when ascribed to God, signify his wisdom and knowledge, which are displayed in every place; and by which he observes and tries all his creatures. Prov. xv. 3. Psal. xi. 4. His being of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, imports, that he cannot think evil good, or good evil, or give the least mark of indifference or regard towards sin. Hab. i. 13. His setting of his eyes on the temple, denotes his delight therein, care for it, as typical of Christ, and his respect to the worship there performed. 1 Kings viii. 29. The setting of his eyes on his people, imports his delight in, love to, and bestowing blessings on them. Jer. xxiv. 6. Psal. xxxiv. 15. He guides with his eye set upon them; with the utmost care and exactness, he directs them in the paths of duty and happiness. Psal. xxxii. 8. He has not eyes of flesh, that see outward things only, and may be full of envy and malice. Job x. 4. His hiding his eyes from men, denotes hatred and abhorrence of them, and their works. Isa. i. 15. His eyes are set against men, and do not spare them, when, observant of all their sins, he manifests his wrath and indignation, in his just judgments against them. Amos ix. 8. Ezek. v. 11. He sharpeneth his eyes upon one, when he strictly marks and severely punishes his sins. Job xvi. 9. The words may relate to Eliphaz, and then they mean, that he looked on Job with an evil and malicious eye, ready to spy his faults, and expressive of a wish for his destruction. Christ's eyes, as a flame of fire, denote how pure, penetrating, and terrible to his enemies, his knowledge and wrath are. Rev. i. 14. His eyes as doves' eyes, by the rivers of water, denote the pleasantness and constancy of his knowledge, and of his love to his people. Sol. Song v. 12; and his having seven eyes, denotes the perfection of his knowledge and wisdom. Rev. v. 6. Seven eyes upon him, either denote this, or rather that he is the object of observation and delight to his Father and blessed Spirit, and to holy angels and saints; and is, or shall be, the object of terror to devils and wicked men. Zech. iii. 9.

EYES, metaphorically ascribed to men, signify their mind, understanding or judgment, which are opened when they are made to observe what they did not before. Gen. xxi. 9; when their conscience clearly discerns their sin and misery, Gen. iii. 7; or when their mind is savingly instructed in the knowledge of Christ and spiritual things. Acts xxvi. 18. The eyes are blinded, closed, or darkened, when the mind is destitute of spiritual knowledge; and so ignorant, obstinate, or biassed, that it cannot discern between good and evil. Acts xxviii. 27. Rom. xi. 10. Deut. xvi. 19. The church's eyes are her discerning and directing ministers; and the eyes of the saints are their spiritual knowledge, faith, hope, desire, and affection: which, like doves' eyes, are very comely, clear, quick, discerning, beautiful, humble, mild, and affectionately fixed on Jesus, their husband, and are a great pleasure and delight to him; and are as fish-pools, pure, self-discovering, and given to godly sorrow. Sol. Song i. 15; iv. 1, 9. and vii. 4; and they are toward the Lord, as the eyes of servants to their masters, to observe what he is, and does, or requires; and to look for and expect necessary blessings from him. Psal. xxv. 15. and cxxiii. 2; and they fail for God's word, salvation, and presence, when by long exercise, they are nearly wearied out. Psal. cxix. 82, 123. and lxxxix. 3. Isa. xxxviii. 14. Angels are full of eyes within, before, and behind, or on the back; they have an extensive knowledge of their own heart and way, and of the truths of Christ, and providence of God, and watchfully inspect and care for the souls of men. Rev. iv. 6, 8. Ezek. i. 10. The eyes of wise men are in their head; their knowledge is useful, and properly applied, Eccl. ii. 14: but the eyes of fools are in the ends of the earth; their thoughts and cares unsettlely go out after what they have no concern with. Prov. xvii. 24. Kings scatter away evil with their eyes; restrain it, and reform from it, by a careful inspection of affairs, and by frowning on evil doers. Prov. xx. 8. Job was eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame; he was a helpful director, assistant, and comfortor of the distressed; a teacher of the ignorant, and reliever of the weak. Job xxix. 15. To have a single eye, is to have the mind divinely and clearly instructed, and unremittently set upon knowing the mind and will of God, in order to glorify him. Where this is, the whole body is full of light, the person is rightly directed. Matt. vi. 22. To have an evil eye, is to be of a churlish and envious disposition, and behaviour. Prov. xxiii. 6. Matt. xx. 15. To have a beautiful eye, is to shew kindness, and seek opportunities of doing or bestowing favours. Prov. xxii. 9. Lofly eyes, import pride, and self-conceit. Prov. xxx. 13. To be wise or pure in one's own eyes, is to be so in his own opinion, without being really so. Prov. iii. 7. and xxx. 12. Wanton and adulterous eyes, are such as express wanton and lascivious looks. Isa. iii. 16. 2 Pet. ii. 14. Open eyes, import full capacity and readiness to observe and regard, Num. xxiv. 3. 1 Kings viii. 29; or readiness to punish. Job xiv. 8. Sometimes the opening of the eyes denotes, giving to persons who were blind their sight, or making them to observe what they did not before. John ix. 32. Gen. xxi. 9. To fix the eyes on one, imports delight in, and care of him. Psal. ci. 6; to look favourably towards him, Gen. xlv. 21; or expectation of some direction from him. 1 Kings i. 20.

To have eyes that see not, and ears that hear not, is to have natural faculties to discern, and even a natural knowledge of divine things, without any spiritual understanding thereof. Isa. vi. 10. Rom. xi. 8. As the eye is very useful and tender, and right hands and feet very useful, any earthly enjoyment, or lust, or whatever is very useful and dearly beloved by one, is compared to right eyes, hands, and feet. Matt. v. 29, 30, and xviii. 8, 9. To pluck out the eyes, and give them to one, is to love him so dearly as to be ready to part with the dearest things for his sake. Gal. iv. 19. Hence God's people are compared to the apple of his eye, to denote how dear they are to him, and how tenderly he sympathizes with them, and keeps them. Psal. xvii. 8. Zech. ii. 8. Sins, more or less scandalous, as they obstruct our clear views of God, and ought to be painful to our conscience, are likened to motes and beams in the eye. Matt. vii. 3. Sore troubles, or troubleshooters, are likened to pricks and thorns in the eyes. Num. xxxiii. 55. Josh. xxiii. 13. In one's eyes, is in his sight, or in his view and opinion. Jer. vii. 11. 2 Sam. xix. 27. Before one's eyes, is publicly, Gen. xlii. 24; or impudently. Isa. lxxv. 12. The eye is not satisfied with riches; the covetous mind is not satisfied with them. Eccl. iv. 8, and i. 8. Men have the sword on their right eye, and is utterly darkened when their natural knowledge and sagacity is taken from them, as it was from the Jews before the taking of Jerusalem by Titus; or they were bereaved of their temples, and whatever else is dear to them. Zech. xi. 17.

EYE-SALVE; Christ's word and Spirit are likened to it, as thereby our judgment is rectified, and we are enabled to discern the things of God. Rev. iii. 18.

EYE-SERVICE; what is done only when masters are present, while no care is taken to act for his advantage when absent. Eph. vi. 6.

EYE-WITNESS; one that attests what he saw with his eyes. Luke i. 2. To eye one, is carefully, and with evil intent, to observe whatever he doth. 1 Sam. xviii. 9.

E-ZEKIEL, the son of Buzi, a prophet and a priest, who was carried captive to Babylon with Jehoiachin king of Judah. In A. M. 3409, in the fifth year of his captivity, and thirtieth of his age, or from the eighteenth of Josiah, when the great passover was kept, as he was among the captives, by the river Chebar in Chaldea, the Lord appeared to him, on a throne, supported by cherubim and wheels, signifying angels and changing providences, or ministers and churches, and directed him to go and declare his mind to the captive Jews. There appeared to him about the same time, a roll or book, filled with mournful threatenings of heavy judgments, which he was commanded to eat, that is, solidly to consider, and thoroughly understand. After he had continued other seven days with his fellow-captives, the Lord constituted him a watchman or prophet to the house of Israel; assuring him, that they would not regard what he said; and that he should be seized and bound as a madman. Ezek. i. ii. and iii.

When he, by the direction of God, shut himself up in his house, God commanded him to describe or figure the city of Jerusalem upon a brick or tile, and to put a pan, as a wall of iron, between him and this figure of the city; then lie before it, on his left side, three hundred and ninety days, for the three hundred and ninety years' sin of the ten tribes, and forty days on his right, for the forty years' provocation of Judah. This imported, that by the Chaldeans' furious and determined siege of Jerusalem, and taking of it, the sins of Israel, from the setting up of the calves at Bethel and Dan, to that day, and the sins of Judah, during the wicked part of Manasseh's reign, with that of the years elapsed since Josiah's death, should be avenged. Or might it not also signify, that after the Chaldeans had besieged it three hundred and ninety days, they should again lay siege to it, and after forty days render themselves masters of it? While he thus lay on his side, he was ordered to make himself bread of wheat, barley, beans, lentiles, millet and fitches; and either fire it, or rub it over with human excrements; but on his expressing the greatest reluctance at the last point, he was allowed to use cows' dung for that purpose. By this bread, and his manner of eating it, was prefigured, the Jews being reduced to live on base and unclean victuals, in small quantities, and amid terrible apprehensions of danger. Chap. iv.

He was next directed to cut off his hair, and divide it into three parts; to burn one, cut another to pieces with a sword or knife, and scatter the rest in the wind, except a few hairs which he was to keep and burn with fire. This imported, that the Jews should partly be destroyed with the famine and pestilence, partly by the sword of the Chaldeans, and another part be carried into captivity, and scattered among the heathen; only a few of the survivors should be left in the land, and by their folly become a fire-brand, a means of kindling the Chaldean resentment against the whole nation of the Jews. Soon after, he was employed to predict a variety of particular judgments against them. Next year, he was carried in spirit to Jerusalem, and had a vision of the abominable idolatries that there prevailed; and of five men, under the direction of Jesus Christ, appointed to slay the inhabitants, except such as were given to mourning and grief for the prevailing sins of the land. He also, in his vision, saw the Lord Jesus cast the fire of his vengeance, from between the cherubim, on the wicked city. He at the same time, was inspired to utter a variety of fearful threatenings of their destruction, and some promises of their merciful restoration. Chap. v—xi.

After the Spirit had transported him back to Chaldea, he was ordered of God to dig through the wall of his house, and by the hole, carry forth his furniture at even-tide, when it was dark; and to eat his meat with trembling. This prefigured Zedekiah's shameful flight from Jerusalem, and the calamities that were coming on the Jewish nation. After this, he declaimed against the false prophets, and the hypocritical elders, that were his fellow captives; and assured them, that God's purpose of overturning the Jewish state was irrevocable, and the time of it at hand. Chap. xii—xiv. By the metaphor of a barren vine, and a wife, lawfully espoused, turning where, he shadowed forth the wickedness of the Jews, and the equity of their approaching ruin; to which he subjoins some promises of mercy. Chap. xv. and xvi. By the parable of two eagles, and their interference with the twigs of a cedar tree, he exhibits how justly the Chaldeans should punish Zedekiah and his subjects for their treacherous revolt to the king of Egypt; and, after a prediction of the Messiah's incarnation and power, he vindicates the justness of all the calamities that were to come upon them. Chap. xvii. and xviii. By the taking of young lions, he figures out the unhappy end of the four kings who succeeded Josiah. Chap. xix. He rehearses the crimes of the nation in former ages, and their abuse of the favours which God had heaped on them; he foretells the siege of Jerusalem as near at hand; rehearses the horrid crimes of its inhabitants; and represents, that their sins, which had provoked God against them, were more heinous than those of Sodom and Israel. Chap. xx—xxiii.

In A. M. 3414, though about six hundred miles distant, he declared to his fellow captives that that very day Nebuchadnezzar had laid siege to Jerusalem, and that the wicked inhabitants should be consumed in it, as flesh is boiled in a caldron, and the city itself be melted as copper that is destroyed. That night his wife died, and he was forbidden to weep for her. This imported, that the Jews should quickly be deprived of their temple, their civil and ecclesiastic constitution, and every thing dear to them, without being so much as allowed to bewail the same. Chap. xxiv.

After he had predicted the overthrow of the kingdoms of Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistines, Tyrians, and Egyptians, by the hand of the Chaldeans, he was again solemnly admonished of his duty, as a spiritual watchman to the Jews; and hearing of the destruction of Jerusalem, his mouth was opened. He, in a most delightful manner, foretold the coming of the Messiah, as their spiritual king and shepherd; their deliverance from Babylon, and from their present dispersion; the harmonious junction of their tribes; the purity of their worship; the destruction of their enemies, particularly Gog and Magog, or the Turks; and their happy and holy establishment in their country in the latter days: and through the symbolic account of them, their land, temple, and tribes, he decyphers the state of the gospel church in the apostolic, but chiefly in the millennial age. Chap. xxv—xlviii. Ezekiel began to prophesy six years before the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and continued at least sixteen years after it. Compare chap. i. 1. with xl. 1. and xxxiv. 17. In reproving sin he is often abundantly plain; but abounds more in enigmatical visions than the rest of the prophets. Those in the first, and in the nine last chapters, are reckoned so obscure by the Jews that they forbear reading them till they be thirty years of age. The history of his death and burial, with a multitude of things reported of him by Jews, Christian fathers, and Mahometan writers, are too uncertain and fabulous to have a place in this work. Perhaps Zoroaster, or Zerdusht, the great reformer of the Magian religion among the Persians, might be one of his disciples, who apostatized to heathenism.

EZEL; the place where David met with Jonathan to receive information of the designs of Saul. It is said to have been nineteen miles eastward of Jerusalem, and seven and a half west of Jordan; but I can hardly believe it was so far distant from Gibeah, where Saul dwelt. 1 Sam. xx. 19.

E'ZI-ON-GA'BER, or E'ZI-ON-GE'BER; a city of the land of Edom, on the eastern gulph of the Red sea. According to Dr. Shaw, it stood on the west side of the gulph, about sixty miles north of Sinai, and thirty or more south of Elath, which seems more than the scripture will allow of, when it says, it was beside it. Thus far back the rebellious Hebrews retreated, after they had touched the south borders of the promised land. Numb. xxxiii. 35. Here Solomon equipped his navy that traded to Ophir for gold; on which account the Arabs still call it the Golden Harbour. 1 Kings ix. 26. On the ridge of rocks, which resembles a man's backbone, before its harbour the combined fleets of Jehoshaphat and Ahasiah were dashed to pieces by a storm. 1 Kings xxii. 48.

EZ'RA, the son of Seraiah, who was probably the high-priest slain at the burning of the temple, a priest and ready scribe in the law of his God. Whether he came to Judea with Zerubbabel, and afterward returned to Babylon, we are not certain, though we scarce believe it. It is evident, Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, sent him to Judea, in the seventh year of his reign, with a royal warrant to rectify the church and state of the Jews, according to the law of God. A great number attended him. At the river Ahava he made a stop, and sent back for priests and Levites. After two hundred and fifty-eight had come up, they there observed a solemn fast, to implore the guidance and protection of God, as Ezra did not choose to ask the king an escort of troops. Here he delivered into the hands of his principal attendants an account of the gold and silver which the king had granted for the service of the temple, to the value of about 2800,000 sterling. In about the space of four months, they, to the number of 1775, arrived at Jerusalem. Ezra vii. and viii.

There he found that vast numbers of the Jews had married heathen women of the devoted nations, or others. After a solemn confession of sin, and a deprecation of wrath, he issued a proclamation, charging all the Jews in the country, under pain of excommunication, and confiscation of goods, to assemble and rectify this matter. After they had assembled, he made them sensible of their sin, and engaged them by covenant to forsake it; but on account of the great rain, commissioners were appointed to see the matter finished. In three months, they made thorough inquiry, and about one hundred and thirteen priests, Levites, and other Jews dismissed their strange wives, though by some of them they had children. It does not appear that they put away the children, but carefully educated them in the Jewish religion. Ezra ix. and x. For thirteen years Ezra continued director of the Jewish church and state. After Nehemiah had come and got the walls of Jerusalem rebuilt, Ezra, assisted by twenty-six Levites, read and expounded the law to the people, as they assembled during the eight days of the feast of tabernacles, from morning to night; which was succeeded with solemn confession of sin, and renovation of their covenant with God. Neh. viii.—x. It is probable that Ezra wrote the book called by his name; which together with most of the facts related in this article, gives an account of the Jews' return from Babylon; their founding and finishing the second temple, notwithstanding the obstructions which the Samaritans and others gave to the work. Chap. i.—vi. As from chap. iv. 8. to 27. it mostly relates to the affairs of the empire, the language is Chaldee; the rest is in Hebrew. It is generally supposed that he wrote also the two books of Chronicles, and those of Nehemiah and Esther. He received into the canon of Scripture what books he found deserved the honour, and sometimes changed the ancient names, and added expressions, to render some places more intelligible. But whether he exchanged the Samaritan character for the Chaldaic, now used in our Hebrew Bibles; whether he added the vowel-points, is not so easily determined.

F.

FABLE, an idle and groundless story. The heathens had fables innumerable concerning the rise and exploits of their gods, &c. Nor were the Jews in the apostolic age much behind them in contemptible stories concerning their oral law, the traditions of the elders, &c. These and things of a similar nature ought to be rejected by every minister and Christian. 1 Tim. iv. 1, 7. and i. 11. 2 Pet. i. 16.

FACE; VISAGE. The face especially distinguishes one person from another. It is truly surprising, that when so few parts compose it, when it has so small a compass and is always in the same place, that there should be such an infinite variation and diversity of faces in the world; and indeed without this there could be no order, no certainty. One might impose himself for another; nor could a testimony from sight be given concerning persons. In the face, love, hatred, desire, dislike, joy, grief, confidence, despair, courage, cowardice, wonder, contempt, pride, modesty, cruelty, compassion, and other passions and affections of the mind, are not a little discovered. Whatever of a thing is most exposed to view is called its FACE: hence we read of the face of the country, field, gate, house, ground, porch, wilderness, waters, sky, &c. Sometimes face is put for the person himself; as when Jacob said to Joseph, I had not thought to see thy face; and to have respect of persons is, in the original, to regard faces. Gen. xlviii. 11. To accept one's face, is to show him a favour, and grant his request. Gen. xix. 21. To spit in the face, implied the highest contempt. Deut. xxv. 9. To fall upon one's face, imports great grief, and deep abasement, Matt. xxvi. 39. Josh. vii. 7; or humble adoration. Rev. vii. 11. To testify to men's face, is to bear witness sufficient to convince them, however shameless and impudent. Hos. v. 5. To withstand one to the face, is to reprove him boldly. Gal. ii. 11. Before one's face, is in his sight and presence; and sometimes it is expressive of boldness. Numb. xix. 8. Coering of the face often implied shame, blushing, Ezek. xii. 6. Isa. vi. 2. Psal. lxx. 7; or condemnation and insult, Mark xiv. 65; or grief.

2 Sam. xix. 4. Face to face implies familiarity, plainness, clearness. 2 John. xii. 3. John xiv. God talked with and was seen face to face by the Israelites in the wilderness, in a clear, evident, and familiar manner. Num. xiv. 14. Deut. v. 4. and xxxiv. 10. God pleads with men face to face, when, by his judgments or otherwise, he plainly testifies to them of their wickedness. Ezek. xx. 35. The saints shall see him face to face in heaven; they shall have the most clear and immediate discovery of God in Christ. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

FACE, when applied to God, denotes, (1.) His omniscience. 1 Sam. xxvi. 20; and to provoke him to the face, is to do it very openly and impudently. Isa. lxx. 3. (2.) The brighter displays of his glory which cannot be enjoyed in this world. Exod. xxxiii. 20. Gen. vi. 13. (3.) His favour and love, and the gracious displays thereof; this is always meant when his face is said to shine: or when it is represented as a mercy to behold and enjoy it, or a misery for it to be hidden. Psal. xxxi. 16. and lxxx. 7. Dan. ix. 7. 2 Chron. xxx. 9. (4.) His wrath, and the providential displays thereof. Psal. xxxiv. 16. Christ's face denotes, (1.) His person and office, as the image of the invisible God. 2 Cor. iv. 6. (2.) His gracious, glorious, or terrible appearances. Rev. i. 11; vi. 16. and xx. 11. But his visage more marred than the sons of men, denotes his humble appearance, all marred with blood, spitting, and grief. Isa. lii. 14.

The four faces of a man, lion, ox, and eagle, pertaining to the cherubim and living creatures, denote the affection and wisdom, the boldness, courage and strength, the patience and labour, the piercing knowledge and activity of angels and gospel-ministers. Ezek. i. 10; x. 14; and xli. 19. Rev. iv. 7. The Antichristian priests, and the Arabian troops, under Mahomet and his followers, have faces like men; they are courageous and bold, and pretend much kindness and humanity. Rev. ix. 7. Men's faces being like flame, denotes their excessive grief, perplexity, and terror. Isa. xiii. 8. Their having faces or a visage black as a coal, imports great hunger, mourning and sadness. Lam. iv. 8. Nah. ii. 10. Those who saw the king's face were his intimate companions, his privy counsellors. 2 Kings xxv. 19. The lifting up of the face imports joy and boldness. Job xxii. 26; and the falling of it, sadness and malice. Gen. iv. 6. To turn away the face of one, is to withstand him; put him to flight. 2 Kings xviii. 24; or to detest, abhor, and disregard. Psal. cxxxii. 10. Hiding of the face denotes hatred, contempt. Isa. liii. 3.

FADE; to wither; decay, as leaves and flowers. Isa. i. 30. Rich men fade away in their ways; they often grow poor and despicable, amidst all their pains to procure wealth and honour; and are cut off by death amidst all their bustling and gay appearances. Jam. i. 11.

FAIL; to grow insufficient and weak; to fall short; to cease; to perish. Gen. xvii. 16. Psal. cxlii. 4. God doth not fail, nor forsake his people; he always directs, supports, and protects them. Josh. i. 6. Promises would fail, if they were not accomplished to the full extent. Josh. xxi. 45. Men's hearts or spirits fail, when they are exceedingly grieved, discouraged, and filled with fear. Psal. xl. 12. and lxxiii. 26. My soul failed when he spake; my soul was languidly affected when he spake to me, and is now like to die of grief for slighting him. Sol. Song v. 6. Men's eyes fail, when their desires or expectations are long delayed, and like to be disappointed. Job xi. 20. Psal. cxix. 82, 123.

FAINT; (1.) To lose vigour, courage, activity, and hope, by reason of hunger, thirst, fear, toil, distress. Psal. xxvii. 13. Gal. vi. 9. (2.) To long with such earnestness, that one is upon the point of dying of his desire. Psal. lxxxiv. 2. My soul fainteth for thy salvation; I earnestly desire it, and am sad and heavy with the delay of it. Psal. cxix. 81.

FAIR; comely, BEAUTIFUL. Christ is fairer than the children of men; in his divine nature he is infinitely comely; in his human he is transcendently so, it being that holy thing, and in his whole office, relations, appearances, and works, he is unspeakably glorious, and in him the perfections of God shine with unmatched lustre and brightness; the Hebrew word is of a double form, to mark the astonishing degree of his comeliness. Psal. xlv. 2. The church and her true members are fair, fairest among women, and fair without spot; by the pure ordinances and offices God has established in her, and by the order and holiness of her customs and members, the church far out-views any other society. In the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, the saints are rendered absolutely perfect and unspotted before God as a judge. In respect of their implanted grace, they are a holy people, and cannot commit sin; and, in their practice, their aim and endeavour is after perfection, as their Father which is in heaven, is perfect. Sol. Song i. 8, 15; ii. 14. and iv. 1, 7. 1 John iii. 9. Prov. iv. 18.

FAIRS; stated assemblies of people for merchandise. Ezek. xxvii.

FAITH, 1. Properly signifies a persuasion and assent to truth upon the authority of another, and is opposed to doubting.

Matt. xiv. 31. That faith which respects divine things is either, (1.) Historical, by which we assent to the truths of revelation, as a certain and infallible record: this, when without works is dead. Jam. ii. 17; of this kind is the faith of devils. Jam. ii. 19. (2.) A temporary faith, whereby, with some degree of affection, we receive divine truths, as both certain and good; but soon after lose the whole impression, as they were never rooted in the heart; such is the faith of the gospel hearers, who are compared to stony ground. Matt. xiii. 4. (3.) The faith of miracles, whereby, by means of a divine impression, a man is persuaded that God will work such a particular miracle, by his means, or upon his person; a faith to remove mountains is of the first kind; and faith to be healed is of the last. 1 Cor. xiii. 2. Acts xiv. 9. (4.) Saving faith is that gracious quality, principle, or habit, wrought in the heart, by the Spirit of God taking the things of Christ, and shewing them to us, whereby we receive and rest on Christ alone for salvation, as he is offered to us in the gospel. By this we, on the testimony of God's law, believe ourselves utterly sinful, lost, and undone, without Jesus Christ; on the testimony of his gospel, believe that Christ is every way sufficient and suited to save us; that he is candidly offered to us, as lost and sinful men; and that, by the appointment of his Father, and his own offer of himself, we have a divine right to take and use him for all the purposes of our salvation; and so trust and depend on him and his righteousness, as the ground of salvation to us in particular. By this faith we are united to his person, as our spiritual head and husband, and he dwells in our heart; are interested in his righteousness and fullness; and, by improvement thereof, become bold before God, and active in his service. Eph. iii. 17. Gal. ii. 20. By this faith we are justified and saved, as it receives, in the gospel-promise, Christ and his righteousness for justification and salvation. Rom. v. 1. Eph. ii. 8. It purifies the heart, by receiving and applying Jesus' blood, Spirit, and grace, presented in the promise. Acts xv. 9; it worketh by love; exciting to, and drawing virtue from Jesus Christ, for the performance of every good word and work. Gal. v. 6. This is the faith of God's elect, as none but they are made sharers of it. Tit. i. 1; and they alone are in the faith, 2 Cor. xiii. 5. and of the faith, that is, possessed of, and act according to, the principles of it. Gal. iii. 7. Faith, as a habit or principle, is implanted in every regenerated infant, even though the word of God can neither be the means of their regeneration, nor can they act faith on it, as it is unknown to them; and as a habit or principle, it is said to be obtained by us and kept. 2 Pet. i. 1. 2 Tim. iv. 7; to abide and dwell in us. 1 Cor. xiii. 13. 1 Tim. i. 5. 2 Tim. i. 5. Eph. iii. 17; to increase, Luke xvii. 5. 2 Cor. x. 15; and to work. Gal. v. 6. James ii. 23.

2. FAITH is taken for the object which faith believes; whether the doctrines of the gospel in general; this faith Paul once destroyed, or persecuted, and afterwards preached, Gal. i. 23. Acts xxiv. 24: or the promises of God concerning the Messiah and his grace, and in which his faithfulness was pledged for performance: this the unbelief of men cannot make void, or of none effect, Rom. iii. 3; or Christ the subject-matter of the gospel and promises. It was his coming and fulfilling all righteousness, that introduced freedom from the ceremonial law; and his coming into the heart frees from bondage to the law as a covenant, Gal. iii. 23, 25; and it is his righteousness believed on that is imputed to us, to constitute our persons righteous before God as a Judge; for it is a righteousness without works, and hence not our habit, or act of believing. Rom. iv. 3, 5, 6.

3. FAITH signifies an open profession of gospel-truths, springing from a firm persuasion and belief of them. In this sense, the faith of the Roman Christians was spoken of through the whole world. Rom. i. 8. (4.) A particular persuasion of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of something in itself indifferent. This a man is to keep to himself, not troubling the church with it; and without such persuasion of the lawfulness of indifferent things, the man sins in using them. Rom. xiv. 22, 23. (5.) It signifies fidelity in performing promises, or executing a trust. The Hebrews were a people in whom was no faith; they neither believed God's word to them, nor were careful to fulfil their vows and engagements to him. Deut. xxxii. 20. The righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith; from the faithful promise of God, to the grace of faith in our heart, to be received thereby: from the faith of Old-Testament saints, to that of those under the New; from one degree and act of faith to another: or the words might be rendered, The righteousness of God by faith is revealed to faith. Rom. i. 17.

FAITHFUL. A faithful person may sometimes denote one filled with the saving grace of faith; but ordinarily denotes one who may be depended on to speak truth, perform promises, answer his good character, or execute his trust. 1 Tim. vi. 2. 2 Tim. ii. 2. A faithful saying is that which may be certainly believed, and cannot prove false. 2 Tim. ii. 11. 1 Tim. i. 15.

FAITHFULNESS is a sincere and firm attachment to truth, and to performance of promises and engagements. Psal. cxliii. 1. and v. 9. God's faithfulness reacheth unto, and is established in the heavens; his inviolable regard to his covenant-promise and relation is displayed in the most marvellous and exalted manner in his providences here, though they are sometimes dark and cloudy; and in the heavenly state, how much more abundantly shall it be displayed! Psal. xxxvi. 5. and lxxxix. 2. He afflicts his people in faithfulness; in conformity with his relation of Father, Shepherd, Saviour, and in performance of his promise to their souls, and his threatenings against their sins. Psal. cxix. 75.

FALL, metaphorically taken, imports to become guilty of sin, or be subjected to misery: in this way, persons, nations, or cities, lose their height of glory and happiness. 1 Cor. x. 12. Psal. xxxvii. 24. The first man's disobedience to his Maker, and so losing his favour and image, and becoming sinful and miserable, is called his fall, or the fall, by way of eminence. To fall most frequently signifies to be destroyed by death and ruin. 2 Kings xiv. 10. Dan. xi. 10. Hos. iv. 5, 14. The righteous fall before the wicked, when they are seduced into sin by their means, and when they are oppressed and persecuted by them. Prov. xxv. 26. To fall on persons often signifies to attack them. 1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18. The tongue of the wicked falls on themselves, when they are hurt by and punished for their wicked, reproachful, and malicious talk. Psal. lxxiv. 8. The people fall under Christ, when by his grace they are made subject to his government; or when they are weakened and destroyed, that they cannot oppose his designs. Psal. xiv. 6. Apostasy from the profession or practice of gospel-truth to open profaneness, or Antichristian abomination, is called a falling away. Heb. vi. 6. 2 Thess. ii. 3. Such as practised circumcision, and the observance of the ceremonial law, in opposition to the doctrine of free justification through a Redeemer's righteousness alone, had fallen from grace; had abandoned the whole truth of the gospel, and were in a fair way never to share of the free favour of God, which they once had hopes of. Gal. v. 4.

FALLOW. See DEER; GROUND.

FALSE; untrue; deceiving. 2 Kings ix. 12. False Christs were such Jews, or others, as falsely pretended to be the true Messiah. Matt. xxiv. 24. False prophets were such as, under pretence of a commission from God, published error, foretold untruth, or excited to wickedness. Matt. vii. 15. 2 Cor. xi. 13. False witnesses are such as, for gain, revenge, or other carnal motives, insinuate or assert falsehood. Matt. xxvi. 59. False ways are sinful courses, which agree not with the standard of God's truth, and deceive the transgressor into everlasting ruin. Psal. cxix. 28.

FALSEHOOD; untruth; deceit. Idols are called falsehood; they are not what is pretended; have no divinity in them; and are the means of seducing men to a vain and wicked worship, tending to their ruin. Jer. x. 14. The Jews thought to hide themselves under falsehood, when they trusted for their protection to idol gods, sinful alliances with heathen neighbours, treacherous compliance with the enemy, crafty devices, and to the power and wealth which they had procured by fraudulent methods. Isa. xxviii. 15.

FAME, sometimes signifies common talk; public report. Gen. xlv. 10; but ordinarily it means a widely spread report of one's excellency and glorious deeds. Zeph. iii. 19. To be famous, is to have a widely spread renown. Ruth iv. 11.

FAMILY, not only denominates, (1.) Such as dwell together in one household. Gen. xlvii. 12. Esth. ix. 28; but also, (2.) A whole kindred. Lev. xxv. 49. (3.) A large division of one of the Hebrew tribes; all the descendants of a particular son of the twelve patriarchs. Numb. xxvi. 5. Jer. iii. 14. (4.) A whole nation. Jer. viii. 3. Amos iii. 1. Zech. xiv. 18. (5.) All the creatures of God in general, which proceed from and are governed by him. Eph. iii. 15. (6.) A particular sort of beasts. Gen. viii. 10.

FAMILIAR; an intimate companion, that, as it were, lives in the same family with us, and to whom we readily impart our secrets, and consult him in time of need. Job xix. 14.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS. Those who practised magic, or divination, were supposed to be instructed by familiar spirits; and to perform their wonderful exploits by the aid of Satan. Acts xvi. 16. Lev. xix. 31. Saul, when abandoned by God, had recourse to a woman of Endor who dealt with familiar spirits, and requested her to call up Samuel. 1 Sam. xxviii. 7—15; for this, and other heinous sins, God delivered him to death by the hands of the Philistines. 1 Chron. x. 13. Those who consulted diviners were threatened with death. Lev. xx. 6.

FAMINE; DEARTH; such scarcity of provisions as renders the price of them extremely dear. To punish men for their contempt and neglect of spiritual provision, and for their abuse of temporal favours, God has often afflicted men with famine, partly occasioned by drought, excessive rains, or the ravages of vermin; by which the fruits of the ground were destroyed; partly by the march and spoil of armies, and their besieging of cities. 1 Kings xvii. Joel i. and ii. Jer. xiv. 2 Kings vi. Deut. xxviii. Multitudes have perished by famines. In their extremity they have sometimes lived on human flesh, and even killed their own children for food. A famine happened in Canaan in the days of Abraham; another in the days of Isaac, Gen. xii. 10. and xxvi. 1; another in the days of Boaz, Ruth i. 1; one of three years' continuance in the days of David, 2 Sam. xxi; another of three or four years was occasioned by the drought in the reign of Ahab, 1 Kings xvii. and xviii; another of seven years in the reign of Jehoram his son, 2 Kings viii. 1; another, by means of vermin, &c. in the days of Joel, chap. i. and ii; and another in the time of Jeremiah, chap. xiv. There were also famines in the time of Haggai and Nehemiah, Hag. i. 7—11. Neh. v. 3. Even in Egypt, where the crops were ordinarily most large and certain, they had seven years of famine in the days of Jacob. Gen. xli. 27. When Ben-hadad, and Shalmaneser besieged Samaria, and, when the Chaldeans and Romans besieged Jerusalem, the famines were so terrible, that even mothers murdered their sucking children and ate them. Deut. xxviii. 57. 2 Kings vi. 24—29. and xxv. 3.

According to our Saviour's prediction, grievous famines happened before the siege of Jerusalem; particularly one predicted by Agabus, that extended over the whole Roman empire, and during which the gentile Christians generously raised a contribution for the relief of the distressed Christians in Judea. Matt. xiv. 7. Acts xi. 27—30. Under the third and fourth seals, there were terrible famines, between A. D. 190 and 250, which distressed the Roman empire, Rev. vi. 6—8. Scarcity of gospel-ordinances is called a famine; it tends to starve and ruin the souls of men through want of spiritual provision. Amos viii. 11. The mighty famine, that urged the prodigal son to return to God, is the perplexity of soul occasioned by distress and conviction, which entirely deprives men of pleasure and comfort, notwithstanding all they can do to obtain it in sinful and worldly things. Luke xv. 14.

FAMISH. Egypt was famished, when the people were likely to be starved to death for want of food. Gen. xli. 55. God will not suffer the righteous to famish; i. e. to continue destitute of subsistence, help, or comfort. Prov. x. 3. The honourable Hebrews were famished, when they were reduced to poverty and contempt, and made few in number. Isa. v. 13. God famishes the gods of the earth, when he renders every thing beside himself evidently worthless, contemptible, and incapable to help, save, or comfort men. Zeph. ii. 11.

FAN; an instrument for winnowing corn. In the east they had two kinds of them: one with teeth, with which they turned up the corn to the wind, that the chaff might be blown away; another that produced wind, if the air was calm. Isa. xxx. 24. God's judgments are compared to a fan; by these he turns up persons and nations to the blasts of his vengeance, and scatters and disperses them for their naughtiness; and his thus scattering and overturning them is called his fanning of them. Jer. xv. 7. The Medes, Persians, and others, by whose means he executed his scattering and overturning judgments, are called fanners. Jer. li. 2. Christ's fan is in his hand, with which he will thoroughly purge his floor: by the gospel dispensation, and spiritual influence, which he introduced, men were or shall be put to the trial, and the elect separated from the reprobate. His fearful judgments were at hand, whereby he tried the Jewish church and nation, and destroyed and scattered, as chaff, the wicked among them. In every age by temptations and trouble, he tries professed members of his church: and especially, by death and judgment, will separate the righteous from the wicked; and, by the blast of his wrath, hurl them into unquenchable fire. Matt. iii. 12.

FAR. (1.) Very much. Heb. vii. 15. Rom. xiii. 12. (2.) At a great distance. Isa. x. 3. God is far from the wicked; he has no friendship with them: is perpetually angry with, and is averse to deliver them. Prov. xv. 29. He is far from their reins: he is not seriously and affectionately thought of, esteemed, loved, or desired by them. Jer. xii. 2. He seems far from his own people, when he appears angry with them, hides the comforting views of his countenance, and continues to deny them assistance or relief. Psal. xxii. 1. and x. 1. He removes our transgressions far from us, when he fully and finally forgives them, that they can never come into judgment against us. Psal. ciii. 12. He set the Jewish temple far from them, when he permitted the Chaldeans to carry them captive into Babylon, a place about six hundred miles eastward of Jerusalem. Ezek. vii. 26.

FARE; the price of one's passage in a ship. Jon. i. 3. Look how thy brethren fare; how they live; how they prosper; what they meet with. 1 Sam. xvii. 18. The rich man fares sumptuously every day; he enjoyed in an abundant degree whatever food, raiment, honour, pleasure, &c. was delightful to him, however costly. Luke xvi. 19.

FAREWELL; a word used by friends at parting, and imports a wish of all joy and happiness to soul or body. Acts xv. 29. Luke ix. 61.

FARM; a piece of ground, in the country, let out to one at a certain rate. Men's going to their farm and merchandise, when called to the gospel-feast, imports, that they preferred their earthly business to the care of their salvation; and their carnal gain to Jesus Christ, and all his inestimable blessings. Matt. xxii. 5.

FARTHING; a piece of brass money used by the Romans. Our translators give this English to both ASSARION and QUADRANS; but these were different; the assarion was the tenth part of a Roman penny, or about three farthings sterling. Matt. x. 29. The quadrans was equal to two mites, and so is about a fifth part of our farthing. Mark xii. 42.

FASHION; (1.) A pattern or form. Exod. xxvi. 30. (2.) Outward appearance. 1 Kings vi. 38. Phil. ii. 8. 1 Cor. vii. 31. To fashion a thing is to give it being or form. Job. x. 8. Exod. xxxii. 4. To fashion one's self according to former lusts, is to live under their power, and to act according to their sinful inclinations and motions. 1 Pet. i. 14.

FAST, relating to motion, signifies speedily. Ezra v. 8. Jer. xlviii. 16. In other cases it signifies firmly; closely. Gen. xx. 18. Acts xxvii. 41.

FAST; (1.) To eat little or no food. Acts xxvii. 33. Matt. xv. 32. (2.) To abstain voluntarily from food, in order to be employed in penitential mourning for sin, and supplication for mercies. Judg. xx. 26. The Jews had every year a stated and solemn FAST on the 10th day of the month Tisri, which answered to about the end of our September. Whether the time of this fast had any relation to the fall of Adam, the Hebrews worshipping of the golden calf, or the death of Aaron's two sons, we are uncertain; but the great design of the solemnity was to make a ceremonial atonement for the sins of the whole Hebrew nation during the past year; and to prefigure the Messiah's perfect atonement for the sins of all his people, in the day of his humiliation and death; at the end of which he entered into the holy place not made with hands, having obtained eternal redemption for us. This solemnity was a day of strict rest and fasting to the Israelites. Many of them spent the day before in prayer, and penitential exercises. On the day itself, at least in latter times, they made a tenfold confession of their sins, and were careful to terminate all their mutual differences.

The high-priest had the chief work of this solemnity on his hands. For seven days before, he separated himself from his wife, and on the preceding night he supped sparingly. On the day of the fast, after the daily morning-sacrifice, and the festival-offering of one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, for a burnt-offering, and a kid of the goats for a sin-offering, were slain and presented on the altar, he laid aside his golden robes, washed his flesh in holy water, and put on his linen garments, similar to those of the ordinary priests. He then offered a bullock for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, as an atonement for himself and the other priests. He then received from the people a ram for a burnt-offering, and two goats for a sin-offering, to be offered for them. By casting of lots, it was determined which of the goats should be slain, and which should be sent into the wilderness. This done, he took fire in a censor from off the brazen altar, put incense on, and placed it thus burning, in the holy of holies, just before the ark, in order to perfume it. He then brought in part of the blood of the bullock of his own sin-offering, and sprinkled it once towards the top, and seven times between the veil and the foreside of the ark. He next came forth to the court, and having killed the people's goat of sin-offering destined for slaughter, he returned for the third time to the holy of holies, and sprinkled part of the blood once towards the top, and seven times towards the front of the mercy-seat, to make atonement for the holy of holies, and the tabernacle defiled by all the iniquities of the children of Israel who assembled around it. He then returned to the sanctuary, and having mingled the rest of the blood of the goat which he had along with him, with that part of the blood of the bullock which he had formerly left in a bason in the sanctuary, he sprinkled part of it towards both sides of the sanctuary; he touched the four horns of the golden altar with it, and sprinkled it seven times on it; and, it seems, did the same to the horns of the brazen altar in the court.

The high-priest next laid his hands on the head of the scape-goat, and confessed over it all the known crimes of the Hebrew nation, particularly those of the past year, and then sent off the goat ceremonially loaded with these crimes, into the wilderness by a proper hand; but whether it was left to wander, or was thrown over a precipice, we know not. The high-priest then returned to the sanctuary, put off his linen robes, washed himself in water, and put on his golden vestments; returned to the court; offered his own and the people's ram for a burnt-offering; and the fat of the bullock and goat for a sin offering, the carcasses of which were burnt without the camp. After blessing the people, and probably attending the evening-sacrifice, he went home rejoicing. Numb. xxix. 7—12. Lev. xvi. and xxiii. 23—32.

The modern Jews having no opportunity of sacrificing, the men take a cock, which in their language has the same name as a man, and dashing its head three times against the wall, or any thing else, wish it may be an atonement for them. They then lay the entrails on the top of the house, that the ravenous fowls may carry them away, and their sins along with them, into the land of forgetfulness.

We read of many occasional FASTS in scripture; some of them were private, others public. Moses appears to have thrice fasted, for the space of forty days; before he received the first tables of the law; forty for the sin of Israel's making the golden calf; and forty when he received the last tables of the law. Deut. ix. 9, 18. and x. 10. Exod. xxxiv. 28. Elijah fasted forty days in the wilderness of Arabia. 1 Kings xix. 6.

In another wilderness our Saviour fasted forty days. Matt. iv. 2. Of this last the Popish observation of Lent is a fanciful and unauthorised imitation. The light of nature and word of God direct us, that whenever we have fallen into grievous sins; when we feel or fear the infliction of God's judgments; or when we have distinguished need of some special mercy and assistance, we ought, by fasting and prayer, solemnly to bewail our sins, supplicate forgiveness thereof, implore the averting or removal of judgments, and request the bestowal of necessary favours and help. Thus David fasted during the sickness of his child of adultery. 2 Sam. xii. 21. Ahab fasted when he and his family were threatened with ruin. 1 Kings xxi. 27; Daniel, when he understood that the Jewish captivity drew to an end, Dan. ix. and x; Nehemiah, when he heard of the ruinous condition of Jerusalem, Neh. i. 4; Joshua and the elders of Israel fasted, when part of their army was defeated before Ai, Josh. vii. 6. About forty-five years after, the army of the eleven tribes fasted near Gibeah, on account of the repulses which they had sustained from the Benjamites. Judg. xx. 23, 26. Samuel and the Hebrews observed a solemn fast at Mizpeh, to supplicate deliverance from the oppression of the Philistines. 1 Sam. vii. 6. Informed that a prodigious army of Moabites, Edomites, and others, had invaded his kingdom, and were within thirty-eight miles of his capital, Jehoshaphat and his subjects observed a solemn fast. 2 Chron. xx. 3. The Ninevites, alarmed by the warnings of Jonah, fasted three days, and cried to God for his prevention of the threatened ruin; and denied even the beasts their ordinary provision. John iii. When locusts and other vermin had occasioned a terrible famine, Joel called the Hebrews to solemn fasting, and even infants to be deprived of the breasts. Joel i. 14. and ii. 15, 16. When Jehoikim and his subjects were alarmed by an invasion of the Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, they observed a fast in the ninth month. Jer. xxxvi. 6. When Haman obtained a ruinous decree against the Jewish nation, Esther, Mordecai, and the other Jews at Shushan, and in other places, observed a solemn fast of three days. Esth. iv. 3, 16. At the river Abaya, Ezra, and near 2000 other Jews, observed a solemn fast to obtain the direction and protection of God. Ezra viii. 21. Some time after, he and the Jews in Canaan observed another fast, to afflict their souls for the people's marriage with strange wives. Ezra ix. and x. Nehemiah and the Jews observed another solemn fast, and renewed their covenant with God. Neh. ix. and x.

Jezebel's fast, to promote the murder of Naboth, was abominably wicked. Perhaps it was rather a civil meeting of the rulers in Jezreel. 1 Kings xxi. 9-12. During their captivity in Chaldea, the Jews superstitiously agreed on and observed two annual fasts; the first in the fifth month, for the burning of the temple; the other in the seventh month, on account of the murder of Gedaliah. Zech. vii. 3-5. and viii. 19. In our Saviour's time, the Pharisees and disciples of John fasted very often. Matt. ix. 14. Some Pharisees fasted twice every week, with a great deal of solemn grimace in their external behaviour. Luke xviii. 12. Matt. vi. 16. The modern Jews observe about twenty-three annual fasts: and, besides, some of them fast twice a week; on Monday, because on that day Moses came down from mount Sinai; and on Thursday, because on that day he went up to it; nay, some fast four days every week. Affectionate children observe the day of their father's death, as an annual fast. Whenever they are afflicted, or only dream an unpropitious dream, they observe occasional fasts. They observe their fasts with great austerity; abstaining from all manner of food except sometimes a little butter and herbs; they wear sackcloth, and other coarse apparel; they lie on hard beds; they rend their clothes; go bare-footed, and with a dejected countenance; they read the book of Lamentations, sitting on the ground. From seven years old and upward, children according to their ability, join in their fasts. At eleven the females, and at thirteen the males, begin to observe their fasts, in all the rigour thereof.

According to the Christian law, fasting is altogether occasional; and is to be used at the ordination of ministers. Acts xiii. 2. and xiv. 23. and on other public or private occasions, as the dispensations of Providence call for it. Matt. ix. 15. Luke v. 33-35. 1 Cor. vii. 5. In private fasts, persons should beware of making any public show. Matt. vi. 16. It is impossible to reconcile the liberties which most in modern times indulge themselves in, as to their eating and drinking on fast-days, with the word of God.

FAT. God prohibited the Hebrews to eat of the fat of beasts. Lev. iii. 17. Some think that this prohibition comprehended all kind of fat; others think, only the fat of such animals as might be sacrificed, as of oxen, sheep, and goats, was prohibited. Lev. vii. 24. Others, that only the fat of beasts actually sacrificed was forbidden, and no more of it than was easily separated from the flesh, and which we call tallow. This notion seems to be favoured by Lev. vii. 25. The burning of the fat to the Lord typified the inexpressible trouble of Christ's soul amidst the flames of his Father's wrath; and that we ought to devote ourselves to God's service with a heart all inflamed with holy love; and ought to have our most inward and beloved lusts destroyed by the Spirit of judgment and burning. Lev. iii. 9, 11. The Hebrews used the word which we render fat, to signify the best of any thing: hence we read of the fat of wheat; the fat of the land; the fat of the flock. Psal. lxxxi. 16. and cxlvii. 14. Gen. xlvii. 6. Gen. iv. 4. Wicked men are represented as fat; as fatlings; as enclosed in their own fat; when they abound in honour, power, and wealth. Deut. xxxii. 14, 15. Ezek. xxxix. 18. Psal. xvii. 10. Their heart is fat, or gross, when men are self-conceited, stupid, careless, and unteachable. Psal. cxix. 70. Isa. vi. 10. They perish as the fat of lambs; when they are easily and quickly wasted and destroyed. Psal. xxxvii. 20. Great men are represented as fat ones, because of their large possessions, joy, and pleasure. Isa. v. 17. and x. 26. Ezek. xxxiv. 16, 20. Psal. xxii. 29. Saints are fat, when they abound much in spiritual graces and comfort. Psal. xcii. 14. Prov. xi. 25; xlii. 4; xv. 30. and xxviii. 25. The sword of the Lord is fat with fatness, when his judgments cut off multitudes of men great and wealthy. Isa. xxxiv. 6.

FATLING, an ox or calf, fattened for slaughter. Christ is likened to a fatling, or fatted calf; and his blessings to fat things full of marrow; he and they are most plentiful, sweet, and nourishing provision to our souls. Luke xv. 23. Matt. xxii. 4. Isa. xxv. 6. Prov. ix. 2. The saints are called fatlings, because of their innocence, spiritual beauty, cheerfulness, fullness of grace. Isa. xi. 6. See BULL.

FATNESS denotes plenty; greatness. The fatness of the earth, is a rich soil, or the fruits of a rich soil. Gen. xxvii. 28, 29. The fatness of the olive tree, of which the gentiles partake, is the soul-nourishing and comforting word, ordinances, and influences of Christ communicated to his church. Rom. xi. 17. The fatness of God's house, wherewith he satisfies the souls of his ministers and people, is the rich and abundant blessings of his goodness, grace, and comfort. Psal. xxxvi. 8. and lxiii. 5. and lxxv. 4. Jer. xxxiii. 14. That which was set on Job's table was full of fatness; when his trouble was removed, his riches abounded, and his soul was filled with the grace and consolations of the Holy Ghost. Job. xxxvi. 16.

FATHER. (1.) The male parent of a child. Gen. ix. 18. It is sometimes put for both parents, as Prov. x. 1. (2.) The grandfather, or any other progenitor, however remote, especially if any covenant was made with them, or grant of blessings given them for their posterity: so Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and others, were the fathers of the Jews in the time of Christ. John iv. 20. and viii. 53. Heb. i. 1. Gen. xvii. 4. (3.) An inventor of an art, and method of living; an instructor of others in any science. Judg. xvii. 10. 1 Sam. x. 12. Thus Jabel was the father of such as dwell in tents, and Jubal the father of musicians. Gen. iv. 20, 21. Hiram the founder was a father, or chief director of the artificers belonging to Hiram king of Tyre, and Solomon. 2 Chron. ii. 13. Elijah was a father to Elisha, and the young prophets of Jericho. 2 Kings ii. 12. Founders of cities, and progenitors of the inhabitants, are called fathers of these cities: So Salma was the father of Bethlehem; Hareph, of Bethgader; Joab, of the valley of Charashim; Jehiel the father of Gibeon. 1 Chron. ii. 51. v. 14. and ix. 35. (4.) Father is a title of respect: Naaman's servants called him their father. 2 Kings v. 13. Jehoram and Joash called Elisha their father. 2 Kings vi. 21. and xiii. 14. (5.) One who affectionately counsels, cares, and provides for one; so God is the Father of the fatherless. Psal. lxxviii. 5. Joseph was a father to Pharaoh. Gen. xlv. 8. Job a father to the poor. Job xix. 16.

God is called the Father of Christ. In the first person of the Godhead he from eternity begat him. Eph. i. 3. John i. 14. He is the Father of spirits, of lights, of glory, of mercies, of all things; he created angels and the souls of men, and preserves them in their nature and work; he is the origin and bestower of all light, glory, and merciful favours; he is the former and preserver of all things. Heb. xii. 9. Jam. i. 17. Eph. i. 17. and iv. 6. 2 Cor. i. 3. He is the father of the rain, dew, ice, and hoar-frost, as he forms and produces the same, and sends it on the earth. Job xxxviii. 28, 29. He was the father of the Jews, and is of all professors of the true religion, as he marvellously raises them up, establishes them in their national and church condition; and is their peculiar governor. Deut. xxxii. 6. Gen. vi. 2. He is the father of the saints; he begets them again into his image by his word and Spirit, adopts them into his family; renders them familiar with him, kindly cares, provides for, and protects them, and renders them joint heirs with Christ of his heavenly inheritance. Rom. viii. 15, 16. He is the father of all men by creation, and providential preservation and government. Mal. ii. 10. Christ is the everlasting Father; from eternity the elect were chosen in him; by his obedience and suffering, by his word and Spirit, he confers their new state and nature, and gives them his kingdom, and every thing necessary. Isa. ix. 6. and liii. 10. The Old Testament saints are called the fathers; the apostles and other New-Testament believers, are called children. Psal. lxxv. 16. Satan is called a father; he introduced sin into the world; he makes men like himself, and directs and counsels them in their evil ways. John viii. 44. Abraham was the father of them who believe; he was an eminent pattern of their faith and obedience; and into his bosom they are gathered in the eternal state. Rom. iv. 11. Natural parents are called the fathers of our flesh. Heb. xii. 9. We are to call no man father; are to acknowledge none but Christ, and God in him, head of the church, author of our religion, or Lord of our conscience. Matt. xxiii. 9. To call corruption our father, and the worm our mother and sister, is humbly to acknowledge that we sprang from dust; and shall by putrefaction return to it; and so may, for our meanness, claim kindred with vermin. Job xvii. 14. John Baptist turned the hearts of the fathers to the children, when he excited the Jews in his time to believe the principles, receive the same endowments, and follow the practice of their godly ancestors. Mal. iv. 6. To sleep with our fathers, go to them, or be gathered to them, is to die like our ancestors, and go with them to the grave, or separate state of souls. 1 Kings ii. 10. Judg. ii. 10. Sometimes the father-in-law, or father of one's wife, is represented as his father; so Heli, who was the father-in-law of Joseph the carpenter, is represented as his father. Luke iii. 23.

MOTHER; (1.) A woman who has brought forth a child. Exod. ii. 8. (2.) The dam of a beast. Exod. xxiii. 19. The character of mother is applied, (1.) To the true church; she is Christ's mother; as he assumed our nature therein, and was a member thereof. Sol. Song iii. 11. and viii. 5. She is the mother of believers; in her, and by her ordinances, they are spiritually born, nourished, protected, and directed. Sol. Song iv. 4. and i. 6. She is free, now delivered from the bondage of ceremonies; and her true members are freed from the broken law, and the slavery of sin and Satan. She is from above; is of a heavenly original, frame, and tendency; and her true members have their conversation in heaven. Gal. iv. 26. Phil. iii. 20. (2.) To the kingdom of Judah, or family of David, which produced those wicked oppressors, Jehoa-haz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. Ezek. xix. (3.) To a metropolis, or capital city, of a country, or tribe; and then the inhabitants, villages, or lesser cities, are called daughters. Jer. i. 12. 2 Sam. xx. 19. (4.) To any female, superior in age, station, gifts, or grace, or who deals tenderly with one. Deborah was a mother in Israel; with tenderness and valour she judged, instructed, and governed that people. Jndg. v. 7. The mother of Rufus was a mother to Paul; she kindly cared and provided for him. Rom. xvi. 13. (5.) The saints are Christ's mother, sisters, and brethren; he is formed in their hearts, by their spiritual union to him, and their receiving out of his fulness; and there is a dearer intimacy and relation between him and them, than between the nearest relatives on earth. Matt. xii. 49, 50. (6.) Rome is the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth; the Antichristian Papacy there established produces multitudes of idolaters, whoredoms, and every other impurity. Rev. xvii. 5.

All superiors are called fathers, and mothers, or parents; intimating, that we are to behave with a tender affection toward inferiors; and to teach inferiors, whether children, wives, servants, people, subjects, pupils, &c. to behave with a respectful and affectionate regard to them and their commands. Exod. xx. 12. Deut. v. 16. Kings are nursing-fathers, and queens nursing-mothers, to the church, when civil rulers exert themselves to promote the true religion, and attend to the establishment and right government and prosperity of the church. Isa. xlix. 23. and lx. 16. To rebuke offenders, as fathers, mothers, brethren, or sisters, is to do it in a respectful, tender, and affectionate manner. 1 Tim. v. 1-3.

FATHOM; a measure of six feet length. Our sailors have three kinds of fathoms: that of war-ships is six feet; that of merchant-ships is five and a half; and that of fly-boats and fishing vessels, it is said, is five feet. Acts xxvii. 28.

FAULT. (1.) Crime; offence. Gen. xli. 9. (2.) Defect. 1 Cor. vi. 7. The first covenant was faulty; the covenant of works could not secure man against falling from his holiness and happiness, nor recover him if he did fall. The ceremonial dispensation of the covenant of grace was carnal and burdensome, incapable to purify or quiet the consciences of sinful men. Heb. viii. 7. The zealous opposers of Antichrist are without fault, are clear from Popery, and free of legal guilt. Rev. xiv. 5. The saints are at last presented faultless before God, free from guilt, pollution, or infirmity. Jude 24.

FAVOUR. See GRACE.

FEAR is, (1.) A passion naturally inherent in animal and rational creatures, disposing them to avoid evil, real or imaginary. Men's fear of God is either filial or slavish. Filial fear is that holy affection wrought in men's souls by the Holy Ghost, as a Spirit of adoption, whereby it is inclined, and disposed kindly to regard God's authority, obey his commandments, and hate and avoid whatever is sinful. Jer. xxxii. 40. Gen. xxii. 12. Eccl. xii. 13. Neh. v. 16. Prov. viii. 13. and xv. 6. Heb. v. 7. And because this holy awe influences the whole of practical religion, it in general is called the fear of God. Deut. vi. 13. Psal. xxxiv. 9, 11; cxii. 1; and cxxviii. 1. Slavish fear is a dread of danger and punishment, arising from an inward sense of guilt. So Felix feared when he heard Paul preach. Acts xxiv. 26. This slavish dread of God's wrath, though not good of itself, is often by the Holy Ghost made useful towards the ushering in of conversion and deliverance of men's souls. Acts ii. 37. and xvi. 30, 31.—Fear of men is either a reverential awe and regard of them, as of masters and magistrates, 1 Pet. ii. 18. Rom. xiii. 7; or a slavish dread of them, and what they can do, Isa. viii. 12. Prov. xxix. 26; or a holy jealousy and care, lest they should be ruined by sin. 1 Cor. ii. 3. Col. ii. 1. 2 Cor. xi. 3. True love to God, so far as it prevails, casteth out the slavish fear of God and men, but not the filial fear of proper awe and care; for, so far as we discern an object amiable, we shall not slavishly dread, but with due reverence desire it. 1 John iv. 18.—Men are said to fear the Lord, not only when they sincerely believe on and obey him, but also when they have a resemblance of true religion, and regard to God. 2 Kings iv. 1. and xvii. 41. Isa. xxix. 13. (2.) Fear is put for the object or ground of fear; so God is called the fear of Isaac, Gen. xxxi. 43, 53; and their fear, that is, the thing that terrifies them, comes upon the wicked. Prov. i. 26, 27; x. 24; and iii. 25. God sent his fear before the Hebrews, when they entered into Canaan; by terrible providences, or by impressing the minds of the Canaanites with the dread of the Hebrews, he rendered them spiritless, and void of courage to withstand them. Exod. xxxiii. 27. Is not this thy fear and thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways? where is now thy so much pretended fear of God, thy trust and hope in him, and the uprightness of thy ways! hast thou not plainly been a mercenary hypocrite, religious only for the sake of carnal gain? Job iv. 6.

FEARFUL. (1.) Terrible; awful; a proper object of reverence or dread: so God and his judgments are fearful. Deut. xxviii. 58. Luke xxi. 11. Heb. x. 31. (2.) Timorous; filled with dread of approaching evil. Deut. xx. 8. Matt. viii. 26. Isa. xxxv. 4. Fearfulness, imports great dread seizing upon any one. Isa. xxi. 4. and xxxiii. 14. The fearful, who shall have their portion in hell, are such as, being destitute of a holy awe of God, have such a slavish fear of him, as they will not dare to come boldly to his throne of grace, and receive his Son and the blessings of the new covenant in him. Rev. xxi. 8.

FEAST. To perpetuate the memory of God's mighty works, to attach the Hebrews to the true religion by the frequent use of divinely instituted ceremonies; to allow them frequent seasons of instruction in his laws, of rest, pleasure, and cultivation of acquaintance with their brethren; but chiefly to prefigure good things to come, with respect to Jesus Christ and his fulness, God appointed a variety of sacred seasons or festivals. Besides the morning and evening hours of prayer, and daily sacrifice, and the weekly SABBATH, they had the monthly feasts of the new-moon; and the annual feasts of PASSOVER and UNLEAVENED BREAD; of PENTECOST; of TRUMPETS; the fast of EXPIATION, and feast of TABERNACLES; the Sabbatical year of RELEASE; the year of JUBILEE. They had also, in latter times, the feast of PURIM, and of the DEDICATION, but neither of these was of divine appointment.

1. The daily festival of the Hebrew nation was the hours of their morning and evening sacrifice; the first about nine o'clock in the morning, and the last about three o'clock in the afternoon. At each of these hours, a lamb, bought at the public expence, and which had the guilt of the whole nation ceremonially transferred on it by the stationary men, or representatives of the people, laying their hands on its head, was offered as a burnt-offering for them; a homer of fine flour, mingled with frankincense and beaten oil, for a meat-offering, and the fourth part of a hin of strong wine, for a drink-offering, attended it. Meanwhile the people worshipped in the court, and the priests burnt incense in the sanctuary. Did this prefigure Jesus, the unspotted Lamb of God, having all the iniquities of an elect world laid on him, set up from everlasting, early promised and typified; and in the end of the world, in his early and latter sufferings, finished at the time of the evening sacrifice, offered for us, as the foundation of our constant happiness, consolation, and worship? And is not his intercession founded on his atonement for us? Does not this daily festival teach us solemnly to worship God in secret, and in our families, at least twice every day? and that all our life long, particularly in youth and old age, we ought to live devoutly and joyfully, by faith on the Son of God crucified for us? Exod. xxix. 38—45. Lev. vi. 9—12. Num. xxviii. 1—8.

2. The weekly sabbath had a ceremonial signification added to the original and moral one: it is called a sign between the Lord and the Hebrew nation. It was a memorial of their deliverance from Egypt, and of their feeding on manna in the desert. It was a symbol of our spiritual rest in Christ, a figure of our evangelic rest in the New-Testament church, and of our Sabbath eternal in the heavens. On it was appointed a total, a holy cessation from all labour, whether servile or not. No fire was to be kindled for preparing utensils for the tabernacle, or for dressing the manna; the daily sacrifices were doubled, and the whole day spent in the spiritual worship of God; and if any profaned it, he was put to death.—Under the gospel, how glorious our liberty and rest from ancient ceremonies, from sin, and Satan, and our works of self-righteousness! how improper fiery contentions! how frequent and clear our views of Christ and his atonement! how spiritual our worship! and how great the danger of Papists, and others, who corrupt it! How much more glorious the rest of heaven, where, with endless and redoubled devotion, we, ceasing from every sinful, contentions, and legal work, shall behold, rejoice, and glory in the Lamb once slain, and now in the midst of the throne! In the view hereof, let us with pleasure remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy; let Jesus, the atonement and the soul-nourishing provision and joy that attend him, be our all, and in all. Exod. xxxi. 12—17. and xxxv. 2, 8. Num. xxix. 9, 10. and xv. 32—35.

3. The design of the FEAST of new-moons was to acknowledge God as the giver of the moon to rule by night, and as the gracious Governor of the world, who has the times and seasons in his own power; and to expiate the sins, and acknowledge the mercies of the finished month, and lay an evangelic foundation for the duties of the commencing one. It was observed on the first day of the appearance of the new-moon; and, to prevent mistakes, the Jews often observed two days. They rested from their servile labour; met for instruction in the law of their God, in their synagogues, &c.; and offered two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering, with their respective meat-offering and drink-offering, and a kid for a sin-offering; over which, as they lay burning on the altar, the priests blew the silver trumpets; the people too had generally feasts in their own houses. Did not this typify the renovation of all things by Jesus Christ? our nature being united to his, again shone forth fair as the moon: and the moon-ruled ceremonies of the Jewish church were abolished, that the gospel-church might shine forth fair as the moon. Quickly shall this moon-like world vanish away, and be succeeded by endless brightness, never to withdraw its shining. Under the gospel, what large views have we of Jesus' full atonement! what a joyful sound of salvation preached through him! what rest from legal ceremonies and spiritual slavery! what instruction in the knowledge, and feasting on the fulness of our God!—When the last trumpet shall be blown at the coming of our once crucified Redeemer, what full deliverance from sin, from servitude! what views of and rest in God shall we for ever enjoy! Num. x. 10. and xxviii. 11—15. Amos viii. 5. 2 Kings vi. 24. Psal. lxxxvi. 1, 2. 1 Sam. x. 5, 18.

4. The PASSOVER was observed at the time we call Easter. The design of it was to commemorate the Israelites' deliverance from Egypt; to seal the new-covenant with the believers among them; to prefigure our redemption by Christ, and represent our spiritual fellowship with him and his people. It was first observed on that night on which the Hebrews went forth out of Egypt. On the tenth day of the month Abib, each man, for his family, or, if his family was small, he for his and his neighbour's family, took a male lamb, or kid, of a year old, and quite unblemished. It was kept in the house alive till the fourteenth day of the month; on the evening of which, after a careful search for, and destruction of all leavened bread in their houses, it was slain; and with the blood thereof received into basons, they, with a bunch of hyssop, sprinkled the upper lintel and posts of their doors, that the destroying angel might not enter their houses. The flesh of the lamb was then roasted whole on a spit, and eaten by the circumcised Hebrews, and such circumcised servants, as they had bought with their money, or such gentiles as, being proselytes, had been circumcised, along with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, and amidst pious conference with their children: but no bone of it was to be broken in the killing, roasting, or eating of it. What of the flesh remained over night was burnt with fire. At first they did eat it with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staff in their hand, and in great haste, to signify their immediate departure from Egypt. In after ages, they used to drink a cup of wine, and sing a sacred hymn, probably. Psal. cxlii—cxviii. While they ate the passover, the first-born of Egypt was slain: Pharaoh was forced to allow their departure, and judgments were executed on the gods of Egypt. Before the passover they used to busy themselves in finishing their ceremonial purifications, if possible. Such as were on a journey, or under sickness, or ceremonial uncleanness, at the proper time, were obliged to observe the feast on the fourteenth day of the second month: and some of their Rabbins say, that if the greater part of the congregation was at any time unclean, the whole observation was delayed till the second month. He that wilfully neglected the passover was condemned to death. Did these rites prefigure that Jesus, the precious, mighty, and unspotted Son of God, who was set up from everlasting, and promised and typified since the fall, should, in the fulness of time, assume our nature, and in the fourth year of his public ministry, and on the fourth day from his solemn entrance into Jerusalem, should endure bitter sufferings, and be roasted in the fire of his Father's wrath, but not a bone of him broken, that he might be our complete protection from the wrath of God, and the means of destroying sin, Satan, and death; and he, with unfeigned faith, sincere candour, and bitter grief for sin, fed upon, as the heart-supporting and cheering food of our soul, enabling us to go up from the world towards our everlasting inheritance in the Canaan above. Blessed be the Lord, that we gentiles are taken in among his people to eat thereof; and that though of old we were far off, and in our uncleanness, yet now under the gospel, we have a second opportunity to feed on Christ, our passover sacrificed for us; Satan has been forced to yield to our escape; idolatry has been overturned; and a people consecrated to the Lord. Exod. xii. Num. ix. and xxviii. 16. Deut. xvi.

The Hebrews twice observed the passover in the wilderness. Joshua caused them to observe it a third time, when he had just passed the Jordan, in his entrance into Canaan. It was solemnly observed in the times of David and Solomon, and in the time of Hezekiah and Josiah, 2 Chron. xxx. xxxv; but there is too much reason to believe, that, before the captivity, the Jews were oft negligent as to a punctual observance thereof. After the captivity, particularly in the time of Christ, they seem to have attended more exactly to the rites thereof. At it, and the two other more general feasts, it is said, such as came from a distance had free lodging at Jerusalem.

5. The feast of UNLEAVENED BREAD was an appendage to the passover, and immediately succeeded it. It continued seven days, on none of which any leavened bread was to be eaten, but unleavened, to commemorate the Hebrews' hasty departure from Egypt before their dough was leavened. To commemorate the beginning of their march on the first, and perhaps their passage through the Red sea on the seventh, the first and last days of this feast were to be holy convocations, no servile work was to be done thereon. On every day of it, two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, were offered for a burnt-offering, and a kid for a sin-offering, with their respective meat-offerings and drink-offerings; and the silver trumpets were blown over the burnt-offering, as it lay on the altar. On the second day a sheaf of barley publicly reaped was given to the priest: and it being thrashed, winnowed, and dried by the fire, and ground in the mill, a homer of the meal was taken, heaved, and waved with oil and frankincense; part of it was burnt on the altar, together with a lamb of the first year for a burnt-offering, with two tenth deals of fine flour for a meat-offering, and a fourth part of a hin of wine for a drink-offering; and after this they might begin their harvest. Before this feast began, not only was leaven put from all their dwellings, but their houses were often whitened. Did this feast represent Jesus' state of debasement? his week of life, fulfilled in sanctity, sorrow, and suffering? and our constant living on him as the uncorrupted nourishment of our souls; carefully avoiding the leaven of malice, hypocrisy, error, and corrupt practices? Was not the first period of the gospel-church a time of solemn convocation to Christ? and shall not the millennial period be more so? Did not Jesus, the corn of wheat, once die for our offences, and, on the second day of unleavened bread, rise for our justification, as the first-fruits, that he might sanctify his people, and introduce the harvest period, of the gathering of multitudes to himself, by means of the gospel? Exod. xii. and xiii. Lev. xxiii. 6—14. Num. ix. 9—14. and xxviii. 17—25. Deut. xvi. 1—7. Josh. v. 2 Chron. xxx. and xxxv.

6. To render thanks to God for the quiet possession of Canaan, and for the mercies of the finished harvest; to commemorate the giving of the law from Sinai; and to prefigure the descent of the Holy Ghost on the apostles, the Jews observed the FEAST of PENTECOST, on the 50th day after the second of the feast of unleavened bread, which being a week of weeks, or forty-nine days, occasioned its being called the FEAST of WEEKS. No servile work was done thereon, but they offered one he-lamb for a burnt-offering, with a double meat-offering; next, two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs, for a burnt-offering, with their respective meat-offering and drink-offering, and a kid of the goats for a sin-offering; next, one bullock, two rams, and seven lambs, for a burnt-offering, and a kid of the goats for a sin-offering; finally, two lambs for a peace-offering, the flesh of which was wholly sacred to the priests; along with which, two loaves of leavened bread of fine flour were presented at the altar. At this time, also, they presented their first-fruits in a solemn manner, and the silver trumpets were blown over the burnt and peace-offerings. By the threefold burnt-offering, they acknowledged God their sovereign, and the proprietor of their country, in whose sight their sins needed much atonement. By the two sin-offerings, they confessed their guilt, and implored his pardon; by their peace-offering, loaves, and first-fruits, they confessed their goodness, and begged his blessing on their increase. Did this prefigure the plentiful effusion of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost, and the marvellous spread of the gospel, and the discovery of the nature and virtue of Christ's death, that should follow thereon? Did it portend how plentifully the first-fruits of the gentiles should then, with great humility and thankfulness, give themselves, and all they had, to the service of Christ? Is it not observable, that as, on the day of Pentecost, God gave the law from Sinai; so, on that very day, the gospel-law began remarkably to come out of Zion? Lev. xxiii. 9-21. Num. xxviii. 26-31. Dent. xxvi. 1-11. Acts ii.

7. When the Hebrews had ended their vintage, they observed the feast of TRUMPETS, on the same day with that of the new-moon of the seventh sacred month, and which was the first day of their civil year. It seems to have happened in our September. The design of it was to commemorate the creation of all things: to give thanks for the mercies of the finished year; to sanctify the commencing civil year; to prepare the people for the great day of expiation. On it there was a holy convocation of the people to hear the law of God, and an entire cessation from labour; besides the daily and new-moon offering, one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, were offered for a burnt-offering, with their respective meat-offering and drink-offering, and a kid of the goats for a sin-offering; and from morning to night were the silver trumpets, if not also other trumpets of horn, blown over the burnt-offerings. Did this prefigure the beginning or whole of the gospel-period, wherein Jesus as the great atonement, is preached and constantly exhibited; men rest from Jewish ceremonies, and heathenish and other wicked courses, and are blessed with the distinguished knowledge of God? Num. xxix. 1-6. and x. 10.

8. Passing the FEST of expiation on the tenth day of this seventh month, as it has been already noticed, the feast of tabernacles began on the 15th day, and continued eight days; and on the first and eighth there was a solemn convocation, on which no servile work was allowed. On the first they cut down branches of palm-trees, willows, and such others as had plenty of leaves, and with these erected booths for themselves to dwell in during the feast. They also carried small bundles of beautiful branches to the temple or synagogue waving them towards the four winds, and crying, HOSANNA. On this day they offered thirteen bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs, for a burnt-offering, with their respective meat-offering and drink-offering, and one kid for a sin-offering. This oblation was repeated during the first seven days, except that the number of the bullocks was daily diminished by one. On the eighth day, which they reckoned the principal, they offered one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, for a burnt-offering, with their respective meat-offering and drink-offering, and one kid for a sin-offering. With singing, Ye shall with joy draw water out of the wells of salvation, the people drew water out of the pool of Siloam, and the priests poured it forth, mingled with wine, at the bottom of the brazen altar. It was the design of this solemnity to commemorate the Hebrews dwelling in tents in the wilderness; to represent the fertility of Canaan, and to praise the Lord for it. And did it prefigure Jesus tabernacling in our nature, and gradually putting away sin by the sacrifice of himself, and then rising again on the eighth or third day, and ascending to everlasting rest and gladness? Did it prefigure the happy though unfixed state of the gospel-church, in consequence of his expiation of our sins? How the nations were gathered to Shiloh, received the Holy Ghost, rested from ancient ceremonies, and sinful and legal labours, and with joy received instruction in the knowledge of God; and after the opening of seven seals, of the manifold purposes of God, shall, by virtue of Christ's resurrection on the eighth day, at last enter into the complete joy of the heavenly state? The gospel-solennities of hearing the word, and of administration of sacraments, are called the feast of tabernacles, as they suit the unfixed state of the church, and are proper seasons of much spiritual gladness. Lev. xxiii. 32-43. Num. xxix. 12-28. Dent. xvi. 13-15. Zech. xiv. 16-19.

9. The seventh year, or year of RELEASE, was a continued festival; a season of spiritual instruction; a relief to poor debtors; a monitor to teach the Hebrews that their land was the Lord's property, and his providence, not its fruitful soil, their security for provision. It began with the seventh sacred month. The land lay untilled; the spontaneous growth was the property of the poor, the fatherless, and widow: the people spent their time in reading and hearing the law of the Lord; every debt owing by a Hebrew was forborne, if not forgiven. On any seventh year, a Hebrew bond-servant who had served six years, was dismissed free, if he pleased, with a variety of compliments from his master. Did this typify our acceptable year of gospel-release? Jesus having finished his course of bond-service, is dismissed from under the law, and has received gifts for men. What spiritual rest and instruction! what forgiveness of sin! what blessings spontaneously flowing from the love of God, are exhibited and given to us poor sinners of the gentiles! And when we have finished our course of hard service on earth, with what solemnity shall we be dismissed into the everlasting joy of our Lord! Lev. xxv. 2-7. Deut. xv. 1-13. Isa. lxi. 1-3. and xlii. 4.

10. The JUBILEE was every forty-ninth or fiftieth year. It commenced on the very day of the FAST of expiation. It was proclaimed with the sound of rams' horns. No servile work was done on it; the land lay untilled; what grew of itself belonged to the poor and needy: whatever debt the Hebrews owed to one another was wholly remitted: hired as well as bond-servants of the Hebrew race, obtained their liberty: inheritances referred to their original proprietors; and so as the Jubilee approached, the Hebrew lands bore the less price. By this means, their possessions were kept fixed to particular families, and their genealogies kept clear; and sinful hasting to be rich was discouraged. And did it not prefigure the happy period of the gospel-dispensation, founded on the death and resurrection of Christ; when, on the preaching of the gospel by weak instruments, the sinners of mankind, especially of the gentiles, had their sins forgiven, shared of freedom and rest from legal ceremonies, and the slavery of sin; and the heathen returned to the church, from which they had been long almost excluded? Was it not an emblem of our spiritual rest, freedom, forgiveness, and wealth in our new-covenant state? Was it not a figure of our eternal felicity, when the times of rest and refreshment shall come from the presence of the Lord, and we shall obtain the heavenly bliss long forfeited by sin? Lev. xxv. 8-55.

At three of these feasts, viz. the passover, Pentecost, and the feast of tabernacles, all the Hebrew males capable of travel were to attend with gifts to their God; nor did ever the enemy then invade their land, till the wickedness of the Jews was great, or the feasts no longer binding; as when Titus laid siege to Jerusalem. Many of these feasts were in the beginning of the month, or in the beginning of their sacred or civil year: does this not teach us, that all our holiness and happiness must be founded on our feasting by faith on Jesus' atonement and fullness? About A. M. 3840, Judas Maccabeus instituted the FEAST of dedication, to commemorate the recovery of the temple from the Syro-Grecians, the purging it of idols, and other abominations, and the careful reparation and dedication of it to the service of God. It was in winter, beginning on the 25th day of Chisleu, which answers to part of our December, and lasted eight days. These were spent in civil joy and gladness. To commemorate their restored property, lamps were lighted in every family; sometimes one for every man, sometimes one for every person, man, or woman: and some added a lamp every day for every person in their house. Thus, if the family consisted of ten persons, ten lamps were lighted the first day, twenty the second, and so on to eighty on the eighth day. This feast was observed in other places, as well as at Jerusalem. John x. 22. Esther and Mordecai appointed the FEAST of PUR, PURIM, or lots, to commemorate the Jews' deliverance from the universal massacre which Haman had by lot determined against them. On the 13th day of the month Adar, which partly answers to our February, the Jews observe a strict fast, eating none for twenty-four hours; and every one above eighteen years of age is obliged to observe it, in remembrance of Esther's fast: but if it fall on a day improper for fasting, viz. on Friday or Saturday, they fast on the preceding Thursday. The fast being ended, on the evening of the 13th day, they assemble at their synagogues; and, after thanking God for the rise of the joyful occasion, they, from a written roll of parchment read the whole book of Esther. At five different places, the reader roars loud, with a terrible howling. He mentions the ten sons of Haman with one breath, to intimate that they were all cut off in a moment. Whenever the name of Haman is mentioned, the children, with horrible outcries, strike the pavement with mallets and stones. Anciently it seems, they broke to pieces a great stone which they carried in and called Haman. After the reading is concluded, with terrible curses against Haman and Zerish his wife, and his ten sons, they return home, and sup on milk-meat rather than flesh, and send liberal presents to their poor brethren, that they may have somewhat to feast on. Early next morning they return to their synagogue; and, after reading the passage in Exod. xvii. relative to the Amalekites, of whom Haman was one, they again read the whole book of Esther, in the manner above mentioned. Returning home, they spend the rest of the day in feasting, sports, and dissolute mirth; each sex dressing themselves in the clothes of the other. The rich send a part of their provision to feast their poor brethren. Pretending that Esther, by intoxicating Ahasuerus, obtained the deliverance, their Rabbins allow them to drink till they are intoxicated. On this day, they give a multitude of presents, scholars to masters; heads of families to their domestics; and the rich to the poor; but only to such as are of the same sex with themselves. Anciently they were wont to erect a gibbet, and hang a man of straw, called Haman; but as this was suspected for an intended insult of our crucified Redeemer, and it was alleged they sometimes hung up Christians, Justinian the emperor prohibited it under the penalty of their losing all their privileges. This was followed with no small insurrection and bloodshed. This feast is continued also on the 15th day, but it is remarkable for nothing but feasting on what they had left the day before, and some mad frolics. When their year has thirteen months, i. e. every third year, they observe the festival in both months. But such is the disagreement of authors, that we can hardly say on which of the two months they observe it with lesser or greater solemnity. Esth. iii. 7-13. and ix. Under the gospel, we have no divine warrant for any religious festival, except the observance of the Lord's day and supper dispensed thereon be so called; and indeed this last, if not rather the whole Christian life, is called a FEAST; it is to be spent in a careful desire after, and joyful receiving of Christ and his fullness, in fellowship with him and his people. 1 Cor. v.

8. Some primitive Christians, to testify their unity and mutual affection, and to assist the poor, observed feasts of charity, just before or after the celebration of the Lord's supper; but drunkenness and other enormities, being committed thereat by some naughty persons, they were laid aside. 1 Cor. xi. 21, 22, 34. Jude 12.

Civil feasts are well known entertainments, at which assembled friends, for promoting mutual affection, do with gladness feed plentifully on delicate provision. Such feasts were kept at weaning of children. Gen. xxi. 8; at making of covenants, Gen. xxvi. 30; at marriages, Gen. xxix. 23; at shearing of sheep. 1 Sam. xxv. 26, and 2 Sam. xiii. 23, 24; and on other amicable occasions. Job i. 4. Luke xv. 23. Kings frequently made feasts. Pharaoh feasted his servants on his birth-day. Gen. xl. 20; Solomon his, 1 Kings iii. 15; Belshazzar and Herod their lords, Dan. v. 1. Mark vi. 21; Vashti, the women of Shushan; but that of Ahasuerus exceeded any other recorded in history, sacred or profane: it being made for all his subjects that pleased to attend, and lasted half a year. Esth. i. In allusion to such an entertainment, the dispensation of the gospel is called a feast of fat things, of wines on the lees, made for all people, in a mountain; and as a dinner or supper, to which every one is welcome; therein God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to show their infinite riches, liberality, and love, exhibit and offer the whole unbounded fulness of the new covenant, that multitudes of sinners, Jews or gentiles, may, with desire, affection, and joy, assemble, and feed their souls thereon. Isa. xxv. 6. Matt. xxi. 1—14. Luke xiv. 15—24. He that hath a merry heart, or good conscience, hath a continual feast; hath constant peace and comfort. Prov. xv. 15. But carnal feasting, in times of public danger or calamity, is very criminal before God. Isa. xxii. 12. Amos iv. 4—6.

FEATHER. See WING.

FEEDLE. See WEAK.

FEED, is a metaphor taken from flocks, and is expressive both of the eating of the flock, and of the care of the shepherd to provide them food. To feed one's self, is to take meat for the body. Jude 12. Isa. xxvii. 10; or with desire and delight, to take, use, and depend on, persons or things. Idolaters feed on ashes, when with desire and delight they worship and depend on idols that can do them no good, but hurt. Isa. xlv. 20. Ephraim fed on the east wind, when, with desire and delight, they trusted to the Assyrians or Egyptians for help and relief. Hos. xii. 1. The Chaldeans fed, every one in his place, when their armies, like flocks, took up their quarters, and spoiled the places assigned them. Jer. vi. 3. Israel fed on Carmel and Sharon, when, after the Chaldean captivity, and their present dispersion, they returned to a safe and prosperous condition in their own land. Jer. i. 19. Gospel-bearers, once more or less outrageous in wickedness, feed together; feed in the ways, in high-places, in mountains, and in a good pasture; when, in kind fellowship, they have a safe and public attendance on divine ordinances, and have their souls nourished with the abundant fulness of God in Christ, communicated to and received by faith. Isa. xi. 7. lxx. 26. and xlix. 9. Ezek. xxxiv. 13—15. Jer. xxxi. 10—14. Zech. ix. 16, 17. Death, as a hungry wolf, feeds on the wicked; their bodies are wrathfully corrupted, and their souls terribly tormented. Psal. xlix. 14.

God feeds his people, by ruling, defending, supporting, strengthening, and comforting them, inwardly with gracious favours and influences; or outwardly, by exerting his power and providence in their behalf. Psal. xxviii. 9. Gen. xlviii. 15. He feeds them with bread of tears, and wine of astonishment, when he lays heavy and confounding troubles on them. Psal. lxxx. 5. He graciously feeds them with his rod, when he uses their afflictions to purge away their sin, and work for them an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Mic. vii. 14. He feeds all creatures, giving them what is necessary for their support. Psal. cxlv. 15. Matt. vi. 26. He feeds his enemies with judgment; with their own blood: with wormwood; when he inflicts fearful, distressing, and ruinous judgments upon them. Ezek. xxiv. 16. Isa. xlix. 26. Jer. ix. 15. He fed the ten tribes, as a lamb in a large place, when he scattered them in Assyria, Media, &c. Hos. iv. 16.—Christ feeds his people; he wisely and kindly applies to their souls his supporting, strengthening, and comforting word, blood, and Spirit: he rules and protects them, and will for ever render them happy in the enjoyment of himself, and his fulness. Isa. xl. 1. Rev. vii. 17. He feeds in the name and strength of the Lord; as authorized and assisted by his Father and the Holy Spirit. Mic. v. 4.—Ministers feed their people, when they preach to them the nourishing truths and fulness of Christ; rule them according to his word; and shew themselves patterns of holiness. Acts xx. 28. Jer. iii. 15. The lips of the righteous feed many; their edifying instructions, advices, and encouragements, do good to the souls of many. Prov. xvi. 21. Magistrates feed their subjects, by wisely governing them, and providing for them what is calculated for their real welfare, as gospel-ordinances, &c. 2 Sam. v. 2. Wicked ministers or magistrates feed themselves, not their flock; they seek their own ease, honour, or wealth, not the real advantage of their hearers or subjects. Ezek. xxxiv. 2, 3. Sinners hire themselves to Satan to feed arise, when they abandon themselves to the basest lusts, and most abominable practices. Luke xv. 15.

FEEL; to discern by handling. Gen. xxvii. 12. Christ has a feeling of our infirmities; having endured the like, he tenderly sympathizes with us in our troubles. Heb. iv. 15. Such as keep God's commandments feel no evil; meet with nothing that really tends to their hurt. Eccl. viii. 3. The heathen feel after God, when, amidst great ignorance and mistake, they search out and perceive his existence, and some of his perfections. Acts xvii. 27. Wicked men feel no quietness in their bellies, when that which they have sinfully gotten occasions tormenting challenges of conscience. Job xx. 29. Before pots can feel the heat of kindlethorns, (i. e. very suddenly) shall they be destroyed with the blast of God's judgments. Psal. lviii. 9. They are past feeling, when their conscience is so seared, that they can commit the most horrid crimes without the least conviction or remorse. Eph. iv. 19.

FEIGN; deceitfully to forge, Neh. vi. 8; to put on an appearance of what is not real. Feigned lips, are such as utter what the heart thinks not. Psal. xvii. 1. Feigned obedience, is what proceeds not from a sincere and good will. Psal. lxxx. 14. Feigned words, are such as represent persons or things otherwise than they really are. 2 Pet. ii. 2. Unfeigned, is that which is sincere, true, and candid; so faith unfeigned, is that whereby the heart, with sincerity and candour, receives Christ and all his fulness, as offered in the gospel. 1 Tim. i. 5.

To FELL trees or beams, is to cut them down. 2 Kings iii. 19. and v. 6. The king of Babylon is represented as a feller, because he destroyed the nations, and caused to cut down a vast many trees in Lebanon for his sieges. Isa. xiv. 8.

FELIX, (CLAUDIUS) succeeded Cumanus, as deputy for the Romans, in the government of Judea: he enticed Drusilla to divorce Azizus king of Emesa, and marry himself: he sent prisoner to Rome, Eleazer, a noted robber, who had committed great ravages in the country; he procured the death of Jonathan the high-priest for his taking the liberty to admonish him of his duty; he defeated about 4000 assassins, headed by an Egyptian impostor, who had posted themselves in the mount of Olives. Acts xxi. 38. Paul was brought before Felix at Cesarea, where he resided; and, notwithstanding all that Tertullus and his assistants could say, was treated by him with no small humanity. He refused to regard their accusations, till Lysias the chief captain, who sent him under a guard, came down: he permitted his friends to see him in the prison, and do him what service they could. Hoping that they would have purchased his release, he often sent for Paul, and communed with him. Upon one of these occasions, Paul entertained Felix, and Drusilla his wife, a hardened Jewish professor, with a discourse concerning temperance, righteousness, and the last judgment, till Felix's awakened conscience made him to tremble; but, to avoid further conviction, he desired Paul to desist, and he would call for him at a more convenient season. A. D. 60, he was recalled to Rome, and Festus was sent in his room. To do the Jews a pleasure, he left Paul bound; this, however, did him no service; numbers of them followed him to Rome, and complained of his extortion and violence. He had been punished with death, had not his brother Pallas, by his credit at court, preserved his life. Acts xxiii. and xxiv.

FELLOES. See WHEEL.

FELLOW, when used by itself, is a term of reproach or contempt; and signifies an insignificant or wicked person. Gen. xix. 9. Lake xxii. 2. Acts xxii. 22. In other cases, it signifies an equal; a companion; a partner; so we read of fellow-servants; fellow-soldiers; fellow-labourers; fellow-citizens; fellow-helpers. Matt. xviii. 28. Col. iv. 11. Phil. iv. 3. Rom. xvi. 7. Eph. ii. 19. 3 John 8.

Christ is called God's fellow; he is equal to the Father in power and glory. Zech. xiii. 7. Ministers and saints are called Christ's fellows: they imitate him in his work, carry on the same design, and share with him in his honours; but his fulness of the Spirit, and dignity of office, is far superior to theirs. Psal. xiv. 7. The gentiles are made fellow-heirs of the same body, when they are admitted into the gospel-church, and share the spiritual privileges of it, equally with the Jews. Eph. iii. 6.

FELLOWSHIP, or COMMUNION; (1.) Joint interest; partnership. Phil. iii. 10. and ii. 1. (2.) Familiar intercourse. Psal. xciv. 20. The saints have fellowship with God; they are interested in whatever he is and has, and are allowed intimate familiarity with him. 1 John i. 7. Eph. ii. 18. They have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings; he suffered in their room; these sufferings are imputed to them, and the virtue thereof experienced by their hearts. Phil. iii. 10. The fellowship of the gospel is the mutual interest and intercourse of saints and ministers, in the profession of the truths, experience of the blessings, and observance of the rules and ordinances of the gospel. Phil. i. 5. There is no communion or fellowship between Christ and Belial, sin and holiness; i. e. neither mutual interest nor friendly intercourse. 2 Cor. vi. 14, 15. The bread and wine in the Lord's supper are the communion of the body and blood of Christ; they signify, seal, and apply the same; and are means of our partaking of Christ's person, righteousness, and fulness, for the nourishment of our souls. 1 Cor. x. 16.

FENCE; what tends to protect a thing, as walls do cities. The wicked are as a tottering fence, and bowing wall; their ruin comes on them very suddenly. Psal. lxxi. 3. FENCED; walled round about; and so made strong and difficult to be taken or hurt. 2 Chron. xi. 10. Job x. 11.

FENS; miry places. Job xl. 21.

FERRET; a four-footed animal, of a middle size, between a polecat and a weasel. It was originally a native of Africa; but is now common with us. Its upper teeth are straight, distinct, and sharp; the lower are obtuse and clustered; two of them stand inward. Its feet are formed for climbing. Our people use this animal for taking rabbits. They plant nets at the mouth of the burrows, and then turn in the ferret to chase them out from their retreats. Bochart will have the ANAKAH to be a lizard or newt. The Septuagint and Vulgate versions make it the weasel-mouse. It is plain, that it has its name from its whining noise; and that it was unclean under the law. This animal might represent wicked men, murderers, mischievous, and earthly. Lev. xi. 30.

FERRY; a place where passengers are carried over a river, or arm of the sea in boats; and a ferry-boat is that which is used for that purpose. 2 Sam. xix. 18.

FERVENT; warm; burning. Fervent in spirit, very zealous and active. Rom. xii. 11. A fervent mind denotes great concern, love, and affection. 2 Cor. vii. 7. Fervent charity, or love, is that passion which fills one with the utmost regard for one, and the strongest inclination to do him good. 1 Pet. iv. 8. and i. 22. Effectual fervent prayer, is that which is very earnest, proceeding from the strongest inward desire of heart. Col. iv. 12. Jam. v. 16.

FESTUS (PORTIUS) succeeded FELIX in the government of Judea. When he came first to Jerusalem, some of the principal Jews solicited him to condemn PAUL, whom Felix had left in prison; or, at least, to give orders for conveying him to Jerusalem. Festus, perhaps ignorant of their intention to murder him by the way, rejected their request, and told them, that the Romans condemned nobody before they heard his defence. He bid them come down to Cæsarea, and he should consider their charge. They went down in a few days; and after they had laid the charge against Paul, he was allowed to make his defence. Festus, perhaps influenced by a bribe, inclined to remit Paul to Jerusalem; but this was prevented by Paul's appeal to Cæsar. Some time after, at the desire of Agrippa, Festus allowed Paul to make a further defence, that he might write the more distinctly to the emperor concerning his case. When Paul gave an account of his conversion, and call to the apostleship, Festus, ignorant of these affairs, pronounced, that his much learning had made him mad; and soon after sent him to Rome. Acts xxv. and xxvi. Festus was extremely active in suppressing the numerous bands of robbers and assassins that then infested Judea. He also suppressed a magician, that drew multitudes after him into the desert. After he had enjoyed that office about two years, he died, and was succeeded by Nero Albinus.

FETCH; brought; to bring. 2 Sam. ix. 5. Gen. xxvii. 14.

FETTERS; shackles, or chains, for binding prisoners and madmen. With such were Joseph's feet hurt in the prison. Psal. cv. 18. With such was Samson bound by the Philistines. Judg. xvi. 21. With such were Manasseh, Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah bound, when they were led captive to Babylon. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. 2 Kings xxiv. and xxv. 7. The saints bind nobles with fetters of iron, when by prayer, and the exercise of the power that God gives them, they restrain them from accomplishing their wicked designs. Psal. cxlix. 8.

FEVER; a disease consisting in a fermentation of the blood, accompanied with a quick pulse, and excessive heat. It is often found in the most healthy bodies, where there was no morbid apparatus. In the beginning of this distemper, vomits are very useful. The more acute the fever is, the thinner should the diet be, and no matter if the patient fast several days successively, as meat tends to increase the disease. Whenever the urine forms a considerable sediment, the principal danger is over. A frequent blowing of the nose, without the discharge of matter, and a quick, but weak and faltering pulse, are almost infallible presages of an approaching death. The kinds of fevers are exceeding numerous; as essential, symptomatic, continual, intermitting, &c. Deut. xxviii. 22.

FEW. The saved persons are few, in comparison of the damned multitudes; the believers of the gospel are few, in comparison of unbelievers. Matt. vii. 14. xx. 16. and xxii. 14.

FIDELITY; strict adherence to one's promise or trust. Tit. ii. 10.

FIELD; a piece of ground in the country. Gen. iv. 8. The world is called a field: its boundaries are extensive; into it God sends his labourers to work; and in it he sows the good seed of his word. Matt. xiii. 28. Let us go forth into the FIELD, and lodge in the villages: Let the gentile world be brought to the faith, fellowship, and obedience of Christ; or let us retire from the noise and hurry of the world, and hold intimate fellowship with one another. Sol. Song vii. 11. The scripture is a field, in which treasures of gospel-truth, and of Jesus and his fulness, lie concealed from multitudes. As a field, it is open to all, is of great extent, and is diversified with numerous histories, predictions, promises, threatenings, doctrines, and laws. Matt. xiii. 44.

PIERCE; bold and threatening; cruel; appearing furious, and disposed to destroy. Gen. xlvii. 7. and Deut. xxviii. 50.

FIG-TREE. It belongs to that class of plants of which the figure is more perfect, but its parts of fructification indistinct and concealed. It produces flowers, both male and female, separated, and in different parts of the fruit; the outer part of which is the common calyx; the fruit is of a figure somewhat oval, and is hollow and close; the stamina are three bristly filaments, of the length of the cup; there is no pericarpium, but the cup contains the seed, which is single and roundish. The fig-tree contains a milky or oily substance, the deficiency or redundancy of which renders it barren. When this juice is deficient, the overseer cures it with dung and sweet water; when it is redundant he takes care to make part of it evaporate. Fig-trees have large leaves, and are large themselves; some in the East Indies are capable of sheltering fifty or, as others, four hundred horsemen; with the leaves of such fig-trees, possibly, our first parents covered their nakedness. Gen. iii. 7.

The saints are likened to fig-trees; they have an agreeable profession and a useful practice, that keep pace with each other; they are the protection of nations; and their good fruits are delightful to God and to good men. Sol. Song ii. 13. The Jewish nation is likened to a barren fig-tree, spared another year at the request of the dresser. When our Saviour came into the world, and for more than three years exercised his public ministry among them, how barren were they, and how ripe for destruction! but by his intercession, and the prayers of his apostles, they were spared, till it was seen that the preaching of the gospel had no good effect on the greater part of them; and were afterwards cut off with terrible destruction. Luke xiii. 6-9. They were also shadowed forth by the fig-tree with fair leaves, but no fruit, which Jesus cursed into barrenness and withering; they had many showy pretences to holiness and zeal, but were destitute of good works, and refused to believe in, and receive the promised Messiah. Matt.

xxi. 19. The evangelist Mark says, with respect to this tree, that the time of figs was not yet; why then did our Saviour curse it for its barrenness? To solve this difficulty, some render the phrase, for it was not a year of figs; but this rather increases the difficulty; for why then should our Saviour curse the tree for its want of figs? Others, therefore, render the words, for it was the season of figs where he was; but, to establish this reading, both points and accents must be changed, which is, perhaps, to take too much liberty with the sacred original. But why may we not understand it, that it was not yet the season of gathering figs? and so there might be some expected on this tree. Or, though it was not the common season of figs, being in the month of March, yet, as the fruit of fig-trees is rather more forward than their leaves, it might have been expected that this tree, which had so many and large leaves, should have had ripe fruit; that it was one of those which bear the first ripe figs; or one of those trees which, according to Pliny, are always green, and have part of their fruit ripe, when the rest is budding. Mark xi. 13.

FIGS; a well known and very agreeable fruit, and are of considerable use in medicine. When full of moisture, they are excellent for ripening imposthumes, and healing ulcers, quinsies, &c. But, that the healing virtue might appear supernatural, Hezekiah was ordered to lay a lump, not of moist, but dried figs, to his boil, that he might recover from it. 2 Kings xx. 7. The glory of Samaria is likened to early figs, that a man eats whenever he sees them, to denote how quickly it would be destroyed. Isa. xxviii. 4. The godly Jews are likened to first ripe and good figs, to mark their usefulness, and the delight of God in them. Hos. ix. 16. Jer. xxiv. 2. Mic. vii. 1. Others are likened to bad figs, to denote their wickedness, unprofitableness, and disagreeableness. Jer. xxiv. 1. To signify how easily the Chaldeans and Medes would take and destroy the Assyrian cities and forts, they are likened to figs falling, for ripeness, into the mouth of the eater. Nah. iii. 12. Green figs denote the beginnings and first motions of grace in men's souls. Sol. Song ii. 12.

FIGHT; to contend and strive as in battle. God *fight*s with men when he exerts his power and wisdom to protect and deliver his people, and to destroy their enemies. Exod. xiv. 14. Psal. xxxv. 1, 2. Christ *fight*s in righteousness, and with the sword of his mouth, when he justly and powerfully executes the threatenings of his word upon his enemies. Rev. ii. 19. and xix. 11. He *fight*s in love, when he effectually conquers the hearts of his chosen people by his word and Spirit. Psal. xiv. 2—5. Rev. vi. 2. The saints fight spiritually, when they resist and endeavour to overcome sin, Satan, and the world. 1 Tim. vi. 12. Satan and his agents fight, they eagerly strive against Christ and his church, and oppose the work of God on earth, and resist the influence of his word and Spirit. Rev. xi. 7. xii. 7. xvii. 14. and Acts v. 29.

FIGHT; FIGHTING; WAR; WARFARE; contention and striving, even unto danger and death, between nations, tribes, or parties. 1 Kings xiv. 20. Luke xiv. 21. Sin has not only occasioned a variance between God and men, but it instigates persons and nations to ravage and murder one another. It is shocking to think what multitudes have been cut off in war. On one side, war must always be unlawful and groundless, and frequently is so on both. When war is begun on slight grounds, without the use of every proper method to obtain just satisfaction in a peaceable manner, or when the ravage and bloodshed of it are committed in any manner or degree not tending to the establishment of peace and the proper security of the nation highly injured, it must be sinful and murderous. Nor can right to a territory, merely acquired by conquest, be any better in itself than that which a robber has to the money or goods which he violently seizes on the highway, by means of his superior strength or boldness.

The wars that make the greatest figure in history are those of the Jews, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Goths, Saracens, Tartars, and Turks. No nation can boast of greater heroes in war than the Jewish. God singularly qualified them for their work. Some of their wars, as those with the Canaanites and Amalekites, were divinely enjoined; others were voluntary, to assist an ally, or revenge an insult. In their voluntary wars with the nations around, they were, before they besieged a city, to offer the inhabitants terms of peace, on condition of an easy servitude; if these were obstinately refused, all the males were to be killed when the city was taken; but the women and children were to be saved alive. Deut. xx. 1—14. Their success was often astonishing. Without the loss of a man, they terribly smote the Midianites. With the loss of but few men before Ai, Joshua subdued thirty-one kingdoms. With a very limited number of men, and with scarcely any loss their judges routed prodigious armies. With small loss, David reduced the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Syrians. When they had grievously provoked the Lord, as in their wars with the Romans, their troops, however desperate, were cut off in vast numbers. Even in profane history, we find great bloodshed on one side, and scarcely any on the other. Without the loss of a man, the Spartans killed 10,000 of the Arcadians, and Stilicho the Roman killed above 100,000 of the Goths under Rhadagaisus. At Issus, the Greeks killed 110,000 Persians, with the loss of about two hundred. With the loss of fifty, Julius Cæsar killed 10,000 in the camps of Juba, Scipio, and Labienus. See ARMY.

The war in heaven, between Michael and his angels, and the dragon and his angels, is the struggle in the Christian church, by the opposition made to Jesus Christ and his agents, whether Constantine or faithful ministers, by Satan and heathen persecutors. Ministers carry on this warfare, not by carnal weapons, as swords, &c. but by the faithful and diligent preaching of the gospel, and earnest prayer for the success of it. Rev. xii. 7. 2 Cor. x. 4. 1 Tim. i. 18. The violent and irreconcilable struggle between the saints' inward grace and corruption, and their striving against the temptations of Satan, are called a war, or warfare. Rom. vii. 23. 1 Pet. ii. 11. Eph. vi. 11, 12. Both are the good fight of faith, carried on by the exercise of the grace of faith on Christ's word and power; and in maintenance of the doctrines of faith; and it is good in respect of their cause, Captain, and the manner and end of their conflict. 1 Tim. vi. 12. 2 Tim. iv. 7. Outward opposition, trouble, and distress, are likened to a fight or warfare. 2 Cor. vii. 5. Isa. xl. 2. Carnal contention and strife are represented as *war*s and fighting; men therein act from natural hatred, and seek to destroy one another. Jam. iv. 1.

FIGURE; shape, resemblance. Idols are called figures, because they are made after the likeness of some original form, or in order to represent it. Acts vii. 43. Adam, Isaac, and others, and the ancient ceremonies, were figures or types, as they shadowed forth Jesus Christ, and his office and work. Rom. v. 14. Heb. xi. 19. and ix. 9. Baptism is called a figure; its washing of water shadows forth the washing of our souls in the blood of Christ; and in its nature, use and ends, it resembles circumcision. 1 Pet. iii. 21.

FILL; to put into a thing a great deal, or as much as it can hold. Job xx. 23. Ezra ix. 11. To fill up is to accomplish: make full and complete. To fill up what is behind of the sufferings of Christ, is to bear the troubles assigned by him to his followers, and which are borne for his sake. Col. i. 24. To fill up the measure of sin, is to add one iniquity to another, till the patience of God can no longer suffer them to escape unpunished. Matt. xxiii. 32. 1 Thess. ii. 16. Satan fills the heart, when he strongly inclines and emboldens it to sin. Acts v. 8. Sinners are filled with their own devices, with their own ways, with drunkenness, and have their faces filled with shame, when God, to punish their wicked acts and designs, brings dreadful and confounding calamities upon them. Prov. i. 31. xiv. 14. xii. 21. Ezek. xxiii. 33. Psal. lxxxiii. 16. Christ fillets all in all: he is every where present; is in all the churches, and their true members; he is the great substance of all the blessings of the new-covenant, and of all the graces and duties of his people. Eph. i. 23.

FILLET. (1.) A ribbon to tie about one's head. (2.) A kind of small ring fastened about any thing. Perhaps the fillets of the pillars of the tabernacle were not merely for ornament, but for fastening the hangings to the pillars. Exod. xxvii. 10.

FILTH; excrements. Lev. i. 16. The apostles were made as the filth of the world; were by wicked men accounted and used as if most base and contemptible. 1 Cor. iv. 13. Sinful pollutions of the heart or practice are often called filth and filthiness; they render men corrupt and abominable to God and to good men. Isa. iv. 4. Ezek. vi. 21. Men are represented as filthy, and filthiness, on account of their being infected and defiled with sin. Rev. xxii. 11. Ezek. xxii. 15. Filthy lucre is gain basely and sinfully gotten; as when ministers make their benefice their great aim in their work. Tit. i. 7, 11. 1 Pet. v. 2.

FINALLY. (1.) Lastly. 2 Cor. xiii. 11. (2.) Moreover. Phil. iii. 1. (3.) Briefly; in a word. 1 Pet. iii. 8.

FIND; (1.) To obtain what one had not. Matt. vii. 7. (2.) To discover what was unknown. 2 Chron. ii. 14. (3.) To recover what was lost. Luke xv. 5, 9. (4.) To experience; enjoy. Isa. lviii. 3, 13. (5.) To come to; meet with; light on. Job iii. 23. Luke iv. 17. Gen. xxxvii. 15. (6.) To discover and observe with certainty, as upon trial. Rev. ii. 2. Matt. viii. 10. (7.) To choose; appoint; set apart. Acts xiii. 22. Psal. lxxxix. 19. (8.) To attack; seize upon. Judg. i. 5. 1 Sam. xxxi. 8. See AMAH.

FINE; precious; pure. Ezra viii. 27. To fine metal, is to purify it from dross by melting it, &c. Job xxviii. 1. Prov. xxv. 4.

FINGER. As the fingers are very pliant, active, and dexterous, at work, fingers, ascribed to God, signify his power, and the operation thereof: by this the world was created, Psal. viii. 3; the miracles of Egypt were performed, Exod. vii. 19; and the ten commandments written on tables of stone, Exod. xxxi. 18; by this were Christ's casting out of devils, and other miracles, performed. Luke xi. 20. Men's powers for working, and their practices issuing therefrom, are called their fingers. Isa. lix. 3. The saints' fingers dropping with sweet-smelling myrrh, on the handles of the lock of their heart, are their faith and love refreshed by the spiritual influence of Jesus in their essaying to open their heart for his return. Sol. Song v. 3. To put out the finger to one implied insult and banter. Isa. lviii. 9. To teach with the fingers, imported a concealed and indirect method of exciting others to iniquity. Prov. vi. 23. To bind God's law on the fingers, is to have it constantly in our eye, as the rule and reason of our whole practice. Prov. vi. 3. Rehoboam's little finger being thicker than his father's loins, implied that the smallest exertion of his power and authority should be more rigid and grievous than any servitude or hardship they had suffered under his father. 1 Kings xii. 10. 2 Chron. x. 10.

FINISH; to bring to an end, or to complete a saying or work. Matt. xiii. 53. Zechariah. 9. Christ finished transgression and made an end of sin; he completely atoned for all the sins of his people, and laid a sufficient foundation for the utter destruction of it, and all its effects, in their persons. Dan. ix. 24. In his entrance on his last sufferings, he had finished his Father's work; he had finished the work of his public ministry; and was just about to finish his work of humiliation by suffering unto death. John xvii. 4. Just before he expired on the cross, he cried with a loud voice, It is finished; that is, my soul's sufferings are ended; my death is at hand; and so the righteousness necessary to fulfil the condition of the new-covenant, and redemption of lost sinners of mankind, is completely performed; the demands of the broken law are completely answered; the ceremonial rites have had their signification fulfilled; and now their obligation ceases, and the Jewish covenant of peculiarity is for ever at an end. John xix. 30.

FINS; those thin membranes whereby many kinds of fishes, as with wings, poise themselves, and move in the water. The fin and scales that marked out clean fishes under the law might denote the faith of the saints, that actuates and directs their motions, and the righteousness of Christ imputed to them, and his grace implanted in them, and their holy conversation flowing from both, by which they are covered, protected, and beautified. Lev. xi. 9—12. Dent. xiv. 9, 10.

The FIR-TREE grows to a great height; it is very straight and plain below, and abounds with a gum called rosin; and is green both in summer and winter. Its fruit resembles the pine-apple, but is useless for food. The wood of the fir-tree was anciently used for musical instruments, building, furniture of houses, and for materials for ships. Psal. civ. 17. Jesus Christ resembles a green fir-tree: how comely and glorious his person, God-man! how astonishing his height and dominion! how unfading his beautiful appearance and office! and what a root of fructifying influence to his people. Hos. xiv. 8. His saints are likened to fir-trees for their high-towering profession, and heavenly affections and practice; and for their spiritual moisture and constant perseverance in grace. Isa. xli. 19; lv. 13. and lx. 13. His ordinances are likened to beams, galleries, or watering troughs of fir: how straight, supporting, pleasant, and refreshing to the saints. Sol. Song i. 17. Mean persons or houses are called fir-trees, while the great are called cedars and oaks. Zech. xi. 2. The fir-trees, terribly shaken are the spears or beams of houses. Nah. ii. 3.

FIRE; that well-known element which affords heat and light, consumes fuel, and refines and tries metal. 2 Kings xvi. 3. By fire and brimstone from heaven were Sodom and three other cities consumed. Gen. xix. 24, 25. By the fire of God, i. e. thunder and lightning, Job's flocks were destroyed. Job i. 16. With fire from heaven were NADAB, ABIHU, and KORAH, and his company of two hundred and fifty men, and the two troops of king AHAZIAH, cut off. Lev. x. Num. xvi. 2 Kings i. . With fire from heaven were the animals presented before God by Abraham, the sacrifice of Elijah, the sacrifice at the dedication of the tabernacle and temple, and probably also that of Abel, consumed. Gen. xv. 17. 1 Kings xviii. 38. Lev. ix. 24. 2 Chron. vii. 1. With fire issuing out of the rock was Gideon's sacrifice, if not also Manoah's, consumed. Judg. vi. 21. and xiii. 19, 20. This sacred fire might typify Christ's burning zeal, and ardent love to us; but chiefly his Father's wrath, which preyed upon his soul and body. The sacred fire, which descended at the dedication of the tabernacle, was preserved by the priests, being fed with daily fuel on the brazen altar; and from it was taken all the fire necessary to burn sacrifices, light the lamps, and burn incense. Possibly the sacred fire might be lost, when the tabernacle was removed from Shiloh. It is certain, it was renewed from heaven at the dedication of Solomon's temple, and preserved until about the beginning of the captivity in Babylon. After their return, they never seem to have had it renewed, but were obliged to use common fire in its stead.

There is also a vast quantity of fire in the bowels of the earth, arising, no doubt, from the number of pyrites, or fire-stone, in it; hence there are so many volcanoes, or places of the earth, particularly in hills, which at times, with great noise, send forth fire and smoke, stones, and sometimes burning rivers of melted ore. In Europe there are five noted ones: one in Ætna in Sicily; another in Vesuvius in Naples; a third in Strongylis; a fourth in Hecla in Iceland; a fifth in Chimera in Greece. In Asia, particularly in the mountains of Persia, and of the islands Ormuz, Ternate, Java, Sumatra, and of the Molucca and Philippine Isles, but especially of Japan, there are a great many of them; nay, even in North Tartary and Greenland, there are not a few. In the Andes, those long mountains of South America, there are above twenty eight volcanoes. In New Spain there are three, very remarkable for the fierceness of their burning; and in Terra del Fuego there are several. What volcanoes are in Africa, we do not yet know. According as coals partake much of the nature of these pyrites, and less of brimstone, they burn the longer in the fire: accordingly those of Newcastle, Sunderland, and especially some in Ireland, burn much longer than ours in Scotland.

To display his sovereign majesty and awful dread, God anciently manifested his presence in flames of fire: as to Moses and the Hebrews at Sinai; to Ezekiel, to Daniel, &c. Exod. iii. 2. and xix. 18. Ezek. i. 4. Dan. vii. 10; and at the last day Christ will appear in flaming fire. 2 Thess. i. 8. Whether any such appearance of God in flaming fire, or merely the sun, was the occasion of the Chaldeans and Persians adoring fire, we know not.

God is compared to fire, because of his purity, majesty, terribleness, and readiness to destroy such as oppose him. Deut. iv. 24. Heb. xii. 29. Isa. x. 17. Christ is compared to fire; he tries the children of men, purifies and comforts his people, and destroys his enemies. Mal. iii. 2. Ezek. viii. 2. and i. 27. The Holy Ghost is likened to fire, to denote his enlightening, purifying, sin-destroying, and holy love-enkindling influences. Matt. iii. 11. Acts ii. 3. Isa. iv. 4. Angels are compared to fire; they are pure in their nature, and their execution of God's command is irresistible, awful, and speedy. Psal. civ. 4. The church of God is likened to fire: she is often full of troubles; but, eventually, she shall prevail over and consume her opposers. Obad. 18. The wicked, particularly lustful and proud hypocrites, are like fire; they are very dangerous and destructive to others, and hateful to God. Prov. vi. 27. Isa. lxxv. 5; and God makes them like a fiery oven, when he inflicts his tormenting judgments on them, and they cannot escape. Psal. xxi. 9. Holy zeal and love to God, and desire after him, are compared to fire; they exhilarate the heart, surmount the most determined opposition, consume internal corruptions, and are sometimes sweetly painful. Sol. Song viii. 6, 7. Psal. cxix. 130. God's word is like fire; it tries the states and conditions of men; and it warms, melts, and purifies the hearts of the elect! and in the destruction of the wicked are its threatenings fulfilled. Jer. v. 14. and xxiii. 29. It was like a fire in the prophet's bowels; his faithful conscience smote him; his love to God, and zeal for the Jews' welfare, distressed him, while he concealed his inspirations in his own breast. Jer. xx. 9. and vi. 11. While I was musing, the fire burned; while I meditated upon God's word, my heart burned with love to and desire after him; or rather, while I meditated on my afflicted condition, my impatience and fretful passions prevailed. Psal. xxxix. 3. The wrath of God, and the torments of hell, are likened to fire; how terrible, irresistible, tormenting, and destructive! Lam. ii. 3, 4. Isa. xxxiii. 14. and lxvi. 24. Matt. xxv. 41; and it is a fire not blown by men, but by almighty power and justice. Job xx. 6. The fire, cast by Christ from the altar on the earth, and attended with voices, thunderings, lightnings, and earthquakes, is numerous and terrible judgments, inflicted on men for despising the gospel; particularly the ravages of the Goths, Huns, Vandals, &c.; and the violent contentions and persecutions in the Christian church, from A. D. 338 to 1890, or 2040. This, together with the ruin of the Jewish nation, and the persecution and contention in the primitive church, was the terrible and consuming fire which Christ came to send. Luke xii. 49. All trouble is called fire; it tries and refines the saints; and torments and destroys the wicked. Isa. xlii. 2. 1 Pet. i. 7. Wickedness, in particular, lies, slander, and passionate speeches, are like fire, very hurtful, spreading, and destructive. Isa. ix. 18. and i. 11. Prov. xvi. 27.

FIERY; full of fire. Whatever is terrible, or destructive, or burning, is called fiery; so God's indignation, Satan's temptations, and the trials of the saints, are called fiery. Heb. x. 27. Eph. vi. 16. 1 Pet. iv. 12. The divine law is called fiery; it was published from amid flames of fire; it is alarming and trying to awakened consciences; and it condemns transgressors to fiery punishments in hell. Deut. xxxiii. 2. Serpents are called fiery, either because of their fiery colour, or the burning nature of their bites and stings. Num. xxi. 6.

FIREBRANDS; burning sticks. Such Gideon put into his earthen pitchers. Judg. vii. 16. The Jews were firebrands plucked out of the burning; God repeatedly delivered them when they were on the brink of ruin. Amos iv. 11. Pekah and Rezin were like tails of smoking firebrands; their utter ruin and extinction were near at hand. Isa. vii. 4. See BRAND.

FIRKIN; a measure of capacity, containing, perhaps, a BATH, or about a fourth part of one. John ii. 6.

FIRM. (1.) Strong; well fixed. Job xii. 23. (2.) Certain; stable; unshaken; constant. Dan. vi. 7. Heb. iii. 6. (3.) Strong and hard. Job xii. 24.

FIRMAMENT. In Hebrew RAKIAH. It signifies what is spread out; as silver is spread into plates, or as a curtain. FIRMAMENT denotes that which is solid and fixed; including not only the atmosphere, or region of AIR, in which we breathe, fowls fly, and clouds move, but also that ether, or sky, in which the sun, moon, and stars are placed.

The lower region of the firmament serves to separate the water of the clouds above it, from the water in the sea below it. Gen. i. 6, 7, 14, 20. The firmament is spread out like a molten looking-glass; its colour is bluish to our sight; through it are the rays of light transmitted; and by it are the perfections of God discovered. Job xxxviii. 18. The firmament over the head of the cherubim, and under the throne of God, was an appearance resembling the sky, and might signify the church as subject to Christ, and as the great care and end of the work of ministers. Ezek. i. 22—26. and x. 2. It may be called the firmament of his power; as therein his power is signally displayed, and in it his ministers and people, like sun, moon, and stars, shine, and illuminate others. Psal. cl. 1.

FIRST. (1.) What is before others, in time or order: so Peter was first called to be an apostle, and is first named. Matt. x. 2. Adam is called the first man, because first in time and order of all mankind; and his representation of men is supposed as prior to Christ's, who is the second Adam. 1 Cor. xv. 45. (2.) That which exceeds others in degree of badness or excellence; so Paul was the first or chief sinner. 1 Tim. i. 15, 16; and Christ's righteousness is the first or best robe. Luke xv. 22. Among all nations, the first-born males in families, as they keep up the honour of the family, had special privileges allowed them. The first-born Hebrews had a double portion of the inheritance, and a pre-eminence and rule over their brethren. Deut. xxi. 17. 3 Chron. xxi. 8. It is said, they had the office of priesthood in the family, till the family of Aaron and the Levites were chosen to officiate in their stead. Lev. viii. ix. and Num. viii. But perhaps they only officiated for their fathers on some occasions. When God, by his angel, cut off the first-born of the Egyptians in one night, he to commemorate that event, required that all the first-born males of the Hebrews should be his: that all the firstlings of their cattle, and all the first-fruits of their ground, should be his. This donation to God tended to sanctify and bring his blessing on the rest. The first-born, amounting to 22,273, were divinely exchanged for 22,000 Levites; and the 273 odd ones were redeemed at five shekels a head. Num. iii. If the firstlings of their beasts were proper for sacrifice, they were sacrificed, but never until they were seven days old: if they were improper for sacrifice, they were redeemed with money, or exchanged for a lamb; or if not redeemed or exchanged, they were to be killed to the honour of God, but not offered up, nor their blood sprinkled on the altar. Exod. xiii. 12, 13. Num. xviii. 17, 18, 19. It seems that they were not allowed to work the second firstlings of their cattle, nor sheer those of their sheep, nor to eat their flesh at home, but to bring them up, and feast on them before the Lord at the solemn feasts. Deut. xii. 17. and xv. 19. Did not these first-born and firstlings typify Christ, the first-born of every creature, and the first-begotten from the dead, who, as he was begotten from eternity, is dignified above all creatures, has a double portion of power, authority, and fulness; is the great High Priest consecrated for evermore; and is the first, the only person, who ever did or will rise from the dead by his own power. He is the head of all his chosen, the preserver of his Father's name, and the sanctifier of his people. Col. i. 15, 18. Rev. i. 5. Did they represent the saints, who are divinely set apart to the service of God, and, though filthy in themselves, are redeemed by the obedience and death of Christ, the Lamb of God; and being made kings and priests unto God, even the Father, have great influence and happiness above others, and are a means of their preservation on earth? Heb. xii. 22. Isa. vi. 13. The first-born of the poor are those who are exceedingly wretched, having a double share of poverty. Isa. xiv. 30. The first-born of death, is an accursed, and most wretched and tormenting death. Job xviii. 13.

To acknowledge God's authority over them, and his being the peculiar proprietor of their land, and to sanctify the rest of their increase, the Jews offered *FIRST-FRUIT*s unto the Lord. On the second day of the feast of unleavened bread, before they began their harvest, they reaped a sheaf of barley, and thrashed it out in the court of the tabernacle or temple. When it was winnowed, they roasted a homer full of it, and pounded it in a mortar; then, after adding oil and frankincense to it, the priest waved it before the Lord towards the four winds, and burnt a handful of it on the brazen altar; the rest was his own. With this was offered a lamb for a burnt-offering, with a double meat-offering and drink-offering. After this general oblation of first-fruits of barley for the whole nation, every man was at liberty to begin his harvest. At the end of wheat-harvest, on the day of Pentecost, they offered two leavened loaves of fine flour for an oblation of first-fruits, attended with seven lambs, one bullock, two rams for a burnt-offering, one kid for a sin-offering, with two lambs for a peace-offering, with their meat-offerings and drink-offerings. Besides these oblations of first-fruits for the whole congregation, private persons brought their first-fruits to the house of God, but the law determines not the proportion. These were, with great solemnity, brought up at the feast of Pentecost. Such as were in one place, or near it, went up in a body; their guide or watchman, awakened them in the morning with crying, Let us go up to Zion, the mountain of the Lord our God. Jer. xxxi. 6. A bullock, with his horns gilt, and his head crowned with olive-branches, was driven before them for sacrifice. When they came near Jerusalem, they sent one before them to notify their approach, and they adorned their baskets with flowers, and their finest fruits. Some of the principal priests met them as they entered the city. As they went through it, they sang, Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem! The inhabitants of Jerusalem, by way of response, sang Psahn cxxii. When they came to the court of the Lord, every man, great or small, took his basket in his own arms, and carried it, singing the 115th and 30th Psalms, till they came near the foot of the altar, where they acknowledged that a Syrian, ready to perish, was their father; and that God, in sovereign mercy, had given them the land of Canaan. Moreover, the first of their dough, and of their wool was given to the Levites that dwell near them; and, it is said, if none lived near them, the dough was burnt in the fire. Lev. xxiii. 10-21. Exod. xxii. 29. and xxiii. 19. Num. xv. 19, 20. Did not these four kinds of first-fruits typify Jesus, the principal first-fruits, who was before all things, has in all things the pre-eminence, and by his consecration, oblation, and resurrection on the second day of unleavened bread, are his people sanctified to God, and their resurrection and eternal happiness secured. 1 Cor. xv. 20; and whose Spirit, descending at Pentecost, began to gather the nations to Christ? Acts ii. Did they represent the saints, who as first-fruits to God, were, from eternity, chosen to his service; in the day of power devote themselves to him; are by grace rendered more excellent than their neighbours; and are a means of preserving and converting the nations to Christ? Those who are first converted to Christ in a country are represented as the first-fruits of it. Rev. xiv. 4. Jam. i. 18. 1 Cor. xvi. 5. The ancient patriarchs were the first-fruits of the Jewish nation, by whose means their posterity were blessed, and set apart to God. Rom. xi. 16. The Hebrews were the first-fruits of God's increase; were long his peculiar people, before the gentiles were gathered to Shiloh. Jer. ii. 3. The first-fruits of the Spirit are such communications of his grace on earth, as fully ensure the full enjoyment of God hereafter. Rom. viii. 23.

FISH; a kind of animal living in the water, though some of them can occasionally quit it and exist on land; and some of them, by their large fins on their breast, can fly a short way. Fishes have generally a surprising increase; sometimes millions of seed are found in one; hence, notwithstanding the mutual havoc they make of one another, multitudes remain. The numerous kinds of fishes are almost infinite; but Wiloughby has classed them into eleven sorts, and Artedi into five, according to some obvious and invariable characteristics. It is not probable that the fishes came before Adam to receive their names. It is obvious, that as ravenous beasts generally incline to dwell in deserts, so fishes, less useful, and more mischievous, reside in distant and deep seas, while such as are useful for the sustenance of men generally haunt the shores. The Mediterranean and Galilean seas supplied the Hebrews with great quantities of fish; but, under the law, none were clean but such as had both FINS and scales.

With respect to the fish that swallowed the prophet Jonah, the learned are not agreed; nor does this affect the credit of revelation: as the word rendered whale signifies any large fish. Jon. i. and ii. Matt. xii. 40. We know of no fish larger than the whale, except Bishop Pontopidan's kraken, which he represents as similar to a small island, do really exist. Pliny mentions whales six hundred feet long, and three hundred and sixty broad; and mentions the bones of one, brought from Joppa to Rome, which were forty feet long. Some whales are said to lodge their young in the belly in time of danger. Whales feed on sea-weeds, small fish, and other light provision; and so Jonah might remain undigested in the belly of one. Many whales have no teeth, and so might swallow him without hurting him. But some assert that the throat of a whale, being but about a foot and a half wide, could not swallow the prophet; and that it must rather have been a dog-fish; in the belly of which whole carcasses have often been found; and of one of which, caught on the coast of Spain, Nicrembergius relates, that a man on horseback might have entered its mouth, and seven men have lain in the cavity of its brain; that its jaws were seventeen feet long; and it had two carcasses in its belly. Or it must have been a shark, in whose belly human carcasses, and sometimes clad in armour, have been found.

Men are compared to fishes, and fishes of the great sea; they are very numerous; their tempers and courses are very different; they often live in a very confused and disorderly manner; they prey on one another; they are frequently taken in the net of temptation and trouble; and sometimes in the net of the gospel. At last, by the providence of God, they are drawn to the shore of the eternal state; and the good fishes with fins and scales, or saints, with faith, righteousness, and grace, are carried into the heavenly mansions, and the bad are thrown away into everlasting fire. Hab. i. 14—17. Ezek. xlvii. 9, 10. Eccl. ix. 12. Matt. xiii. 47—50. Ministers are fishers of men; by casting the net of the gospel among them, with great labour and care, they draw them to Christ, and his church. Matt. iv. 16. Ezek. xlvii. 10. The Chaldeans are called fishers; they ensnared, apprehended, and carried out of their country multitudes of men. Jer. xvi. 16. Hab. i. 15. See HOOK; POOL.

FIST; the hand closed, either to smite one, or to hold something. Exod. xxi. 18. The fist of wickedness, is the sinful means by which men oppress and injure others. Isa. lviii. 4. God gathers the wind in his fist; he, at pleasure, easily restrains and excites it. Prov. xxxi. 4.

FIT; becoming; proper; useful. Col. iii. 18. 1 Chron. vii. 11. Luke xiv. 35.

FIX. The heart is fixed, when it is powerfully captivated by the love of Christ; firmly depends on God's promises, perfections, and new-covenant relations, and has its thoughts and desires firmly settled on him. Psal. lvii. 5. and cxli. 7.

FLAG; a kind of sedge or rush that grows by the Red sea, and the river Nile; of these Jochebed made an ark, to hold Moses her infant. Exod. ii. 3, 5. The word is translated a meadow. Gen. xli. 2, 18. See REED; RUSH.

FLAGON; a vessel for carrying wine at feasts, to pour it into cups. A flagon of wine imported as much as one could safely drink. 2 Sam. vi. 19. To love flagons of wine, denotes a lust towards excessive drinking. Hos. iii. 1. The most abundant, supporting, and comforting influences of the Holy Ghost, through his word and ordinances, are likened to flagons of wine. Sol. Song ii. 5. See VESSEL.

FLAKES of flesh; the loose hanging parts, or the veins of it. Job xli. 23.

FLAME of FIRE. God is likened to it. How resplendent his glory! how terrible and destructive to his enemies his power and wrath. Isa. x. 17. Angels are as flames; their motions are quick; their appearance awful; and they consume God's enemies. Psal. civ. 4. The saints' strong and purifying love to Jesus; drought, which blasts and consumes grass, corn, and other vegetables; the judgments of God, which terribly trouble and consume persons, families, and nations; his terrible and majestic throne; and the torments of hell, which for ever terribly affright and distress the ungodly, are called flames. Sol. Song viii. 6. Joel i. 19. Dan. vii. 9, 11. Luke xvi. 24. See EYES; FACES; FIRE.

FLATTER; to speak to any one such soft words as encourage his pride, or decoy him into sin. Psal. xlii. 2, 3.

FLAX; a well-known vegetable of which linen is made. Feeble saints, and their weak graces, are likened to smoking flax; perhaps the almost-extinguished wick of a candle; to mark their near approaches to the loss of their grace and comfort, and the unsavouriness of their conversation. Isa. xlii. 3.

FLAY; to cut, or draw off the skin. 2 Chron. xxxv. 11.

FLEA; a well-known insect, troublesome to a variety of animals; and of which one kind haunts beds that are occupied in the summer-season. David likens himself to one; importing, that it would cost Saul much pains to apprehend him; and he would obtain small profit by it. 1 Sam. xxiv. 14.

FLEE; (1.) To hasten away, as from a pursuing enemy. Matt. viii. 33. (2.) To run quickly from danger to a refuge, or hiding-place. Gen. xxvii. 43. Men flee from fornication, from youthful lusts, worldly-mindedness, and other things sinful, when, under a sense of danger, they avoid every temptation to it, appearance of, or approach toward it. 1 Cor. vi. 11. 2 Tim. ii. 22. 1 Tim. vi. 11. We flee to God, or Christ when, sensible of guilt, defilement, danger, or distress, we, with shame, fear, haste, and hope of relief, apply to him as our refuge and deliverer. Psal. cxliii. 9. Heb. vi. 18. Shadows and sorrows flee away; remove quickly, easily, and for ever. Sol. Song ii. 17. Isa. li. 11. Men flee from a lion, and a bear meets them; or go into the house, and a serpent bites them; flee from the iron weapon, and the bow of steel strikes them through; and flee from the noise of the fear, and are taken in the pit; and he that cometh up out of the pit is taken in the snare; when striving to escape one danger and calamity, they fall into another still worse. Amos v. 19. Job xx. 24. Isa. xxiv. 18. Murderers flee to the pit; run fast to their own ruin; and often by the terrors of their own consciences are hurried into punishment, here and hereafter. Prov. xxviii. 17.

FLEECE; the wool one sheep bears at a time. With clothes made of the fleece, or wool, of his sheep, Job clothed the poor. Job xxxi. 20. Gideon's fleece, on which the dew fell plentifully one night, while the ground about was dry, and next night was quite dry, while the adjacent floor was moistened with dew, might represent the Jewish nation, who enjoyed the soul-fructifying dew of God's word, ordinances, and influences, while the gentile world continued destitute thereof; and are now given up to spiritual withering and hardness, while the gentiles obtain mercy. Judg. vi. 37—39.

FLESH. (1.) That part of the animal body which is soft, and which easily putrefies or corrupts. Lev. xiii. 10. Num. xi. 33. (2.) Every animal creature on earth; so the end of all flesh came before God, when he had purposed and was just going to destroy men and beasts off the earth with a flood. Gen. vi. 13. (3.) Men in general are called flesh; they are partly of a fleshy substance, and they are ready to be corrupted; or are remarkably obstinate in wickedness. John xvii. 2. Gen. vi. 3. To make flesh our arm, is to depend on men for help and deliverance. Jer. xvii. 5. (4.) Human nature: so Christ is said to have been made flesh, when he assumed our nature. John i. 14. Acts ii. 30. (5.) The body of man or woman, and the parts which nature teaches us to cover. Exod. iv. 7. Gen. xvii. 11, 14. Lev. xv. Ezek. xvi. 26. and xxiii. 20. (6.) What is weak and incapable to help. Isa. xxxi. 3. Flesh often denotes human nature, in an infirm and calamitous state. Gen. vi. 12. Num. xvi. 22. Dent. v. 26. Psal. cxlv. 21. Isa. xlix. 26. Acts ii. 17. 1 Cor. i. 22. (7.) Persons a-kin to us, or even of the same nature with us, are represented as our own flesh. Gen. xxxvii. 27. 2 Sam. ix. 13. Isa. lviii. 7. Persons married together are one flesh, they stand nearly connected, and have mutual power of one another's body. Gen. ii. 24. Eph. v. 30, 31. Nay, whoredom renders the two parties one body, or one flesh. 1 Cor. vi. 15, 16. (8.) This state of mortal life, and the things pertaining to it: thus women have trouble in the flesh. 1 Cor. vii. 18. Paul had temptations, and afflictions in his flesh. Gal. iv. 14. Col. i. 24. The days of Christ's flesh are the time of his debasement and mortal life; and the body of his flesh is his human nature in its infirm and debased state. Heb. v. 7. Col. i. 22. (9.) Indwelling grace is called a heart of flesh, because soft, pliable, and sensible of divine impressions. Ezek. xxxvi. 26. And a renewed heart is represented as fleshy tables. 2 Cor. iii. 2. (10.) Legal righteousness, and ceremonial services. By this, the apostle says, Abraham did not find justification, Rom. iv. 1; and asks the Galatians if they were become perfect by it? Gal. iii. 3. (11.) The corruption of our nature is very often, in the New Testament, called flesh, to hint its conveyance by natural generation, its weakness and vileness, and its being much excited and exerted by our bodily members. Rom. vii. 24. Men are called flesh, because it reigns and rages in them. Gen. vi. 3. Christ's flesh is his human nature; in this he was put to death, but quickened in the Spirit by his divine nature. 1 Pet. iii. 18. and iv. 1. This was, in his debased state, subject to mortality, and was and is the veil that conceals the glory of his Godhead, and is the means of our access to God. Heb. x. 20. Or his person, as dwelling in our nature; so his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed; his person, as God-man, and his finished righteousness, afford true, solid, and everlasting life, comfort, and nourishment, and strength to our souls. John vi. 53, 56. His saints are his flesh and bones, as they are united to him, and members of his mystical body. Eph. v. 30. The flesh of kings and captains slain at the downfall of Antichrist, is not only the flesh of their bodies, but their kingdoms, honour, power, and wealth. Rev. xix. 21. To represent men as madly inclined to uncleanness and idolatry, they are said to have the flesh of horses, or asses. Exod. xvi. 26. and xxiii. 20. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God: human nature, in its frail and corrupt condition is not capable of the immediate enjoyment of God. 1 Cor. xv. 50. We are not born again by the will of flesh, or blood; i. e. by natural descent from godly parents, or by any, however vigorous and careful, cultivation of our natural powers. John i. 13. Flesh and blood, that is, means, merely human, did not reveal the Saviour's true character, as the Christ, the Son of the living God, to Peter. Matt. xvi. 17. Paul, when converted, conferred not with flesh and blood; consulted not carnal friends, inclinations, or views, respecting his true interest and duty. Gal. i. 16. In the flesh, is either in the human nature, Rom. vii. 8; or in the present mortal and embodied state, Phil. i. 23, 24; or in the human body, Eph. ii. 11, 15. Gal. vi. 12; or, in self-righteousness, power, and wisdom, Phil. iii. 3, 4; or in a sinful and corrupt state. Rom. viii. 8. After the flesh is either according to outward appearances, so the Jews judged concerning Christ, according to his outwardly mean appearance, John viii. 15; or according to the common powers of nature; so Ishmael was born after the flesh, Gal. iv. 23; but most commonly it signifies according to the inclinations and lusts of indwelling sin; so the saints neither walk nor war after the flesh, nor do they sow to the flesh. Rom. viii. 1, 4. 2 Cor. x. 5. Gal. vi. 8. All flesh denotes either all men, all animals, or all on earth, Gen. ix. 11. Isa. xl. 6; or most men, Gen. vi. 12; or great multitudes, many nations, Jer. xxv. 31. Isa. lxvi. 16; multitudes, both of Jews and gentiles. Joel ii. 28. Luke iii. 6. Holy flesh is the flesh of the sacrifices. Hag. ii. 12. The holy flesh is passed from thee: holy men are cut off by death; ye are become profane, as if uncircumcised heathens, and therefore God will quickly stop your offering of sacrifices, by carrying you to Babylon. Jer. xi. 15. To desire a man's flesh, or to eat of it, is to be ready to use him in a malicious and barbarous manner. Job xxxi. 31. Psal. xxvii. 2.

FLESHLY; pertaining to the flesh, whether natural, corrupt, or gracious. 2 Cor. i. 12. Col. ii. 18. 1 Pet. ii. 11. 2 Cor. iii. 3. See WISDOM; MIND; LUSTS; TABLES.

FLINT; a very hard stone, that easily gives fire when struck with steel. Deut. viii. 15. A face or forehead like flint, imports undaunted boldness and courage. Isa. i. 7. Ezek. iii. 9.

FLOCK; a drove of sheep, goats, or such like animals, that feed together. A flock is composed of lesser cattle; also a herd of bullocks, horses, asses, camels, and swine. Gen. xlvii. 4. and xxvii. 9. and xviii. 7. Dent. xii. 21. Armies, nations, and companies of men, are likened to flocks: they are numerous, and are inspected, governed, and, as it were, fed and folded by their respective rulers. Jer. xlix. 20. and li. 23. The principal of the flock are men distinguished in honour, power, and wealth. Jer. xxv. 34, 35. The Jews are represented as the Lord's flock; they were peculiarly chosen, redeemed, and governed by him; and a beautiful flock that made a glorious appearance at their solemn feast. Jer. xlii. 17, 20; a holy flock, as they were separated to the service of God, and not a few of them sanctified by his Holy Spirit. Ezek. xxxvi. 38; and a flock of slaughter, as in Christ's time, they were condemned to, and ripened for, the destructive vengeance of God. Zech. xi. 4. The Lord himself, and, under him their magistrates, prophets, priests, and teachers, were their shepherds. Psal. lxxxi. Ezek. xxxiv. The church is likened to a flock, because of the number, the order, and agreeable society of her members; and for their delightful pasture on Jesus and his fulness in the mount of ordinances, and for their usefulness in the world; and they are inspected, governed, protected, and fed by Jesus and his ministers. Isa. xl. 11. Acts xx. 28. The spouse's hair, that is, saints' good works, and the young converts in the church, are as a flock of goats browsing on mount Gilead; how numerous, fresh, and beautiful! and all supported and nourished by Jesus, the Rock of ages, and the ordinances of his grace. Sol. Song iv. 1. and vi. 5. The church's ministers, and the saints' faith and zeal, resemble a flock of sheep, even shorn, newly washed, and fruitful: how harmonious and social! how effectually washed in Jesus' blood, and fruitful in good works! Sol. Song iv. 2. and vi. 6. To go with flocks and herds to seek the Lord, is to offer multitudes of sacrifices. Hos. v. 6.

FLOOD. After the posterity of Seth had intermarried with the descendants of Cain, and the most criminal oppression, luxury, and almost every other vice abounded, God passed a sentence of destruction, by a flood, against men, and the other animals on earth. After warning mankind hereof, for about one hundred and twenty years, by the preaching of Noah, this flood happened within a few days after the death of Methuselah, and on the 17th day of the second month, which is about the end of October, it began. The fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened; that is, the water rushed out from the hidden abyss in the bowels of the earth, and the clouds poured down their rain incessantly, as in spouts, for the space of forty days; nay, for one hundred and fifty days, or five months, the flood still increased till it was risen above twenty-seven feet higher than the top of the highest mountain. Prodigious numbers of land animals, and of men, perhaps about 80,000 millions, or about eighty times the number of its present inhabitants, perished in the waters. Only Noah and his family and a sample of land animals, were preserved in the ARK which he had built. About the beginning of April, the waters began to abate, partly returning to the bowels of the earth, whose shell was then much broken and deformed, and partly exhaled into the regions of the air, and, about the end of it, the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat. About the end of June the tops of the mountains were seen. Forty days after, about the beginning of August, Noah sent forth a raven and dove, to try if the waters were dried off the face of the earth. In about fourteen days after, the dove sent out for the third time, returned no more. About the middle of September the dry land appeared in the valleys; and, about the beginning of November, in the 27th day of the second month, Noah, and his family, and the animals, went out from the ark, after they had been in it a year and ten days. Gen. vi—viii.

There is no reason to doubt of this flood, nor of its universality. Besides the testimony of God in his word, we have the testimony of Berosus, Hieronymus, Manassas, Nicolaus, Melo, and Abydenus Plato, and of the fabulists, Ovid and Lucian, and of other ancient writers among the heathens, concerning it. The Americans of Mexico and Peru had a tradition concerning it. The East-Indian Brahmins have a tradition, that, at it, only eight persons, and two of every sort of land animals, were preserved by flying to some high hill.

Upon calculation, it will appear probable that the earth was then much more fully peopled than at present; and so a universal flood was necessary to destroy them. God's oracle asserts that the whole earth, and even the highest mountains, were covered, and that every land animal, without the ark, perished. If the whole earth had not been overflowed, to what purpose did Noah build his ark for the preservation of a breed of man and beast? How easily might he and his family, and the beasts destined for preservation, have gone to some spot unoverflowed! Who knows not, that in Italy, France, Switzerland, Germany, England, and other countries, far from Eden, and even in the tops of high mountains, far from the sea, there are found whole trees sunk under ground, together with teeth and bones of animals, sea-shells, petrified fishes, and ears of corn? How these could possibly come thither, but by a universal deluge? Nor is there the least difficulty to find a sufficiency of water to cover the earth to the above-mentioned height. Who knows but the waters in the bowels of the earth, and the rains produced by our atmosphere, might be more than sufficient? or, if it was not, what hindered the Almighty to create what water was necessary; and to annihilate it, whenever it had served his purpose? That this flood was produced by a comet's passing just before the earth, and with its heat swelling the seas, till their beds could not contain them; and swelling the great abyss, till it burst the shell of the earth into a thousand pieces, that the waters might gush out, does not to me appear probable. Such heat would certainly have roasted the antediluvians alive. It is enough to us that earth, winds, and seas obey the Almighty, and do as he pleaseth. But when we consider that the teeth, bones, shells, and other relics of fishes are found so deep in the earth, and in the hardest strata, or even enclosed in flint and marble, we cannot but think that the whole shell of the earth was then terribly rent in pieces by earthquakes, or otherwise; and that the fishes entered these rents, especially when the waters of the great deep turned to their native abodes; and that the ancient earth in many places, sunk into the abyss, and became the channel of our visible seas, and new earth rose out of the bottom of the antediluvian seas. Such as would see a variety of curious fancies concerning this flood, may find them in the writings of Burnett, Whiston, Woodward, Buffon, &c.

Any large collection, or strong stream of water is called a flood; as the Red sea, and the rivers Euphrates and Nile, which, in the summer season, being swollen high by the melting of snows, or falling of rains, overflow the adjacent country. Psal. lxi. 6. Amos ix. 5. Josh. xxiv. 2. Mighty, and especially victorious armies, are likened to floods. How vast their number and loud their noise; how they threaten, and often irresistibly spread, ruin and destruction all around them! Isa. viii. 7, 8. Nah. i. 8. Jer. xli. 7, 8. and xlvii. 2. Ezek. xxvi. 3. Ungodly men are like floods. How great their power! how spreading, prevalent, terrible, and destructive, their influence! Psal. xviii. 4. and xciii. 34. Persecutions, temptations, heresies, profaneness, trouble, and death, are like floods; how prevalent, speedy, affrighting, and ruinous, their tendency and influence! Rev. xii. 15. Isa. lix. 19. Matt. vii. 25. Psal. xc. 5. and lxi. 1, 2. Great plenty of temporal or spiritual blessings are called floods; how abundant! how satiating to our desires! and how they carry our heart along with them! Job xx. 17. God's judgments and providences are like floods; they are very unsearchable. Psal. xxxvi. 6. and lxxvii. 19. See WATER.

FLOOR. (1.) The bottom of a house. 1 Kings vi. 15. The place where corn was thrashed out. Hos. ix. 1. Judg. vi. 37. As thrashing-floors were anciently under the open sky, it is said they were formed of clay and lees of oil, beaten together; which, when once dried, no water could enter it, no weed grows on it, nor any mice, rats, or ants, penetrate into it. The church is likened to a thrashing-floor; in it are persons good and bad; and here God, by manifold troubles, thrashes them; and thereby, and by the influence of his Spirit, he separates his chosen from others, and purges them from their chaff of sinful corruption, Matt. iii. 11; the place where God's judgments are executed. Isa. xxi. 10. Mic. iii. 12.

FLOATS; flat-bottomed vessels for sailing; or a collection of trees, fastened together by ropes, to be drawn along by sea. 1 Kings v. 9.

FLOUR. See SIN and MEAT-OFFERING.

FLOURISH; to bud; spring forth; appear beautiful as a flower. Sol. Song vii. 12. Christ's crown flourisheth, when his authority and glory are signally displayed, and many become his faithful, loving, and obedient subjects. Psal. cxxxii. 18. The church flourisheth, when her ordinances are pure and powerful, her ministers faithful, wise, and diligent, and her members mightily increase, and walk as becomes the gospel. Sol. Song vi. 11. Men in general flourish when they appear gay in youth, and prosper and increase in wisdom, honour, wealth, or pleasure. Psal. xc. 6. and xcii. 7. Saints flourish, when their grace, comforts, and good works, more and more abound. Isa. lxvi. 14.

FLOW; (1.) To run as a stream. Psal. cxlvii. 18. (2.) To gather peacefully in multitudes. Isa. ii. 2. Jer. xxxi. 12. (3.) To abound, as water in a stream. Joel iii. 18. (4.) Speedily to melt away, and be removed or consumed. Isa. lxiv. 1, 3. Job xx. 28. (5.) To bud; increase, and beautifully discover themselves. Sol. Song iv. 16.

FLOWERS. (1.) A running of blood. Lev. xv. 24. (2.) The fragrant and comely buds of some vegetables. ROSES, LILIES, pinks, &c. are flowers well known. The sun-flower is one of the largest, and the passion-flower one of the most curious in form. Flowers are very delightful, but easily and quickly fade. James i. 10. The figures of flowers on the golden candlesticks, and on the inside of the cedar beams of the temple wall, or on the brim of the brazen sea, were not merely for ornament, but shadowed forth the refreshing and fructifying nature and virtue of Christ, as our light, our means of fellowship with God, and our atonement and purification from sin; and the flourishing prosperity of the church, as a means of light to the world, and of their fellowship with God. Exod. xxix. 31. and xxxvii. 20. 1 Kings vi. 18, 29. vii. 26, 49. 2 Chron. iv. 5. Christ's cheeks, or display of himself, in his debasement, or glory, are, like sweet flowers, very comely, refreshing, and reviving to his people. Sol. Song v. 18. The saints and their graces are like flowers; how lovely, refreshful, and adorning in the church! Sol. Song ii. 12. Men in general are like flowers; in youth and prosperity, how blooming, delightful, and glorious! but how quickly does trouble or death mar their beauty, and bereave them of wealth, honour, or life! Job xiv. 2. Isa. xl. 6. and xxviii. 1. Jam. i. 10, 11.

FLUTE; a musical instrument, the most simple of the wind kind: it is played with the breath, and the notes formed by stopping, or opening, the holes. It was used as early as the reign of David, 1 Kings i. 40; and long after, in Nebuchadnezzar's idolatrous concert. Dan. iii. 5, 10, 15.

FLUTTER; to sit brooding eggs, or cherishing young birds: so eagles flutter over their eggs or young. So God kindly multiplied, protected, and comforted the Hebrews. Deut. xxxii. 11; so his Spirit, in creation, influenced the waters, or mingled chaos, with his productive influence. Gen. i. 2.

FLUX, (Bloody) or dysentery; an inward disease, occasioning frequent stools, mixed with blood, and attended with gripes of the bowels. Sometimes there is an evacuation of laudable blood, arising from the too great plenty thereof, without any inward disorder, as in the hæmorrhoids. Sometimes a watery blood is evacuated, that arises from the hæmorrhoidal vessels. But, in the bloody flux, properly so called, blood, attended with purulent matter, is evacuated. This is either benign, when it is attended with no fever, or malignant, when it is attended with a pestilential and infectious fever. In this, the intestines are often excoriated, ulcerated, or even gangrened. In such a case, the place where the sick person lies, ought to be kept as clean, and void of the infectious smell as possible. In the beginning of the distemper, bleeding, and vomiting are useful; in the sequel, it is proper to moderate the purging with opiates, glutinous food, and glysters of anodyne. Repeated doses of ipecacuanha, and of rhubarb, with calomel, with opiates in the evening, are also useful. Sometimes a decoction of sloe-thorn, with milk, or of millet seed, is found an efficacious cure. Acts xxviii.

FLY; to march with great speed; to move quickly as a bird in the air. Hab. i. 8. To fly upon, is to seize a thing greedily, as hungry hawks or eagles do their prey. 1 Sam. xv. 19: or outrageously to fall on and abuse one. 1 Sam. xxv. 14. God's flying, imports the quick progress of his providence to deliver and comfort his people, or to destroy their enemies. Psal. xviii. 10. Isa. xxxi. 5. Angels' flying, denotes the alert and speedy manner in which they execute the will of God. Isa. v. 2. Ministers' flying in the midst of heaven, imports their vigour, boldness, diligence, and openness in their work, under the supernatural influence of the divine Spirit. Rev. iv. 7; viii. 13. and xiv. 6. Saints fly as a cloud, as doves, or eagles; when, aided by the Holy Ghost, they, with vigour, care, and speed, by faith and love, apply to Jesus, as their refuge and resting-place, and set their affections on things above. Isa. lx. 8. and xl. 31. In their return from Babylon, and from their present dispersion, the Jews did or shall fly on the shoulders of their enemies. Such as once hated them shall assist them, or shall be subdued by them. Isa. xi. 14. Men fly away by death; are suddenly and easily cut off before they have well begun to live. Psal. xc. 10.

FLY; a small insect, of various kinds, and exceedingly numerous; some have two, and some four wings; some have teeth, and others not. Flies chiefly abound in moist and warm countries; as in Egypt, Chaldaea, Palestine, and in the middle regions of Africa, during the moistness of the summer, &c. The flies that plagued Egypt seem to have been the dog-flies, which fix their teeth so fast in the flesh of cattle, that they sometimes run mad. Exod. viii. 21, 35. In allusion to the flies of their country, and because they were very numerous and troublesome to the Jews, the Egyptians are called flies. Isa. vii. 18.

FOAL; a young horse, ass, mule, or camel. Gen. xlix. 11.

FODDER; hay, straw, or like provision for feeding cattle. Job vi. 5.

FOLD. God folds together the visible heavens, when, at the last day, he uningles their present form. Heb. i. 12. The Assyrians were folded together as thorns, when gathered into Nineveh to be tormented and consumed by the fiery judgments of God, executed on them by the Medes and Chaldeans. Nah. i. 10. Seven-fold, thirty-fold, sixty-fold, a hundred fold, denote great abundance; plentifully. Psal. lxxix. 12. Matt. xiii. 8.

FOLD; a house, or small enclosure for flocks to rest together in, by night or at noon. Isa. xlii. 20. The country which a nation possesseth, and dwelleth together in, is called their fold. Jer. xxiii. 3. The church and ordinances of Christ are as a fold; there his sheep or people are gathered together; they enter by him as the door, and have strict union, and delightful society, and pleasant refreshment and rest together, and are surrounded with his protection and laws; and the present form of church and ordinances will be soon taken down. John x. 1. The Jews and gentiles were once distinct folds; but the ceremonial wall of partition is taken away, and both are become one. John x. 16. Ezek. xxxiv. 14.

FOLLOW; to come after. 1 Sam. xxv. 27. To follow the Lord is to choose him as our portion, observe his laws, imitate his perfections, and cleave to his worship. Jer. xvii. 16. To follow Christ, the Lamb of God, is, under the direction and influence of his word and Spirit, to depend on his righteousness and strength, imitate his example, and cleave close to his truths and ordinances. Rev. xiv. 4; or to die with him. John xiii. 36. To follow false gods is idolatrously to honour and worship them. Judg. ii. 12. God's goodness and mercy follow the saints: in the exercise thereof he constantly attends, supports, and relieves them; forgives their sins, protects them from danger; and bestows on them grace and glory. Psal. xxiii. 6. We follow the churches, the saints, ministers, or others, when we imitate them in their profession and practice. 1 Thess. ii. 14. Heb. vi. 12. and xiii. 7. 1 Cor. iv. 16. Deut. xxiii. 2. 2 Pet. ii. 2. To follow persons is also to side with them and assist them. 2 Sam. ii. 10. 2 Kings xi. 15. We follow our own spirit, when, in our principles or practices, we are led and drawn by our own vain and wicked imaginations. Ezek. xiii. 3. We follow things when we earnestly endeavour to obtain or practise them. Phil. iii. 12. Rom. xiv. 19. Our good works follow us into heaven: though they do not go before, to purchase our entrance, yet we there obtain the pleasant and gracious reward of them. Rev. xiii. 14.

FOAM, to cast forth froth as a raging sea. Foaming at the mouth is expressive of rage, or tormenting inward pain. Mark ix. 16. Seducers foam out their own shame when, from a corrupt heart, and with rage against Christ and his ways, they publish their vain and erroneous doctrines, and indulge themselves in shameful practices. Jude 13. The king of Samaria was cut off as the foam of the water. Some of their last kings were basely murdered; and Hoshea, the last, was easily, and quickly destroyed, or reduced to abject slavery. Hos. x. 7.

FOOD. See MEAT.

A FOOL, or foolish person, is one that is the reverse of wise and learned, and acts contrary to, or as if without sense and reason. 1 Sam. xxxvi. 21. 2 Sam. iii. 3. It is very hard to cure foolish people of their folly, even though they should be sore chastised and afflicted on account of it, as if they were brayed in a mortar. Prov. xxvii. 22. Wicked persons are oft called fools, or foolish; they act contrary to all sound reason; they wish there were not a God; they trust to Satan, to the world and their own heart, these noted deceivers; they prefer things vile, trifling, and temporal, to such as are important, divine, and eternal; in opposition to the warnings and strivings of Heaven, they laboriously promote their own ruin. Psal. xiv. 1. and xlix. 10. And almost every where in the book of Proverbs. The saints are called fools or foolish, because of their remaining sinfulness: and they oft act ignorantly, and contrary to their duty and interest, Luke xxiv. 25. Psal. lxxviii. 23; and they, as well as apostles, are accounted fools by wicked and wordly men. 1 Cor. i. 27. and iv. 10. Such as upbraid their neighbours as silly impertinent fools, or reprobate miscreants, are in danger of hell. Matt. v. 22. Whatever is without good reason, and answers not the important ends of God's glory, and men's true and eternal advantage, is foolish; and hence we read of foolish talking, foolish lusts, foolish questions, &c. Eph. v. 4. 1 Tim. vi. 9. Tit. iii. 9. Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou be like unto him: answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit: We ought never to answer a fool in a foolish manner, and sometimes not at all; but it is proper sometimes to answer him in a wise manner, to expose the folly of what he says, that his waxing proud, and the hurt of others, may be prevented. Prov. xxvi. 4, 5.

FOOLY; FOOLISHNESS; a behaving, or readiness to behave, in a foolish or sinful manner. A very little of this may render the reputation of a man famed for wisdom very base and odious. Eccl. x. 1. There are fools who are self-conceited, outrageous, and wrathful; talk much, and are ready to enter into contention, and reckon it sport to slander their neighbour, or to do mischief; or who hate reproof and instruction, and are disposed to answer a matter before they have fully heard and considered it; or are much given to laughter and mirth. Prov. i. 7, 23. Eccl. vii. 4, 6, &c. Sin, and particularly scandalous crimes, are called folly. By such conduct, contrary to our own reason and interest, we dishonour God, and render ourselves infamous and miserable. Mark vii. 22. Gen. xxxiv. 7. Josh. vii. 15. Judg. xxi. 6. Through their ignorance and folly, wicked men account Christ crucified, spiritual things, and the preaching of the gospel, to be foolishness; mean, impertinent, or unreasonable. 1 Cor. i. 18, 21, 23. and ii. 14. What in God they esteem foolishness has more wisdom in it than all their sagacious schemes; and the wisdom, the sagacity, and carnal schemes of men, is reckoned foolishness by God. 1 Cor. i. 25; and iii. 19. God charges his angels with folly, i. e. with possible folly, or readiness to slip, if left to themselves. Job iv. 18.

FOOT, FEET. Among the ancients, as well as moderns, a foot was a measure of about twelve inches; but the Hebrews had no such measure, their Zerith being but the half of a cubit, or almost eleven inches. When Moses and Joshua drew near to the symbols of the burning bush, or divine presence, they were directed to approach with their feet bare, as a token of reverence. Exod. iii. 5. John v. 15. The priests performed their service bare-footed, and the people approached the altars with their shoes off. To this day the Jews enter their synagogues bare-footed on the FAST of expiation. Pythagoras directed men to sacrifice and worship with naked feet; and in this manner the priests of Diana and Hercules sacrificed. The Indian Brahmins take off their shoes whenever they enter their temples; nor do the Ethiopian Christians enter their places of public worship with their shoes on. As the ancients often walked bare-foot, or with sandals, it was common to wash their feet, for their refreshment, at their entrance into houses. Gen. xviii. 4. xix. 2. and xxiv. 32. Before his death, Jesus washed his disciples' feet, to teach them humility, and a readiness to perform good offices one toward another; nor was any widow to be entered on the church's charity-roll, unless she had showed her readiness to wash the feet of the saints, and perform other humble services to them. John xiii. 5. 1 Tim. v. 10. Jesus setting his right foot on the sea, and his left on the earth, in the vision, imported his being Lord of all, and able to rule raging seas of persecution and trouble as he pleased. Rev. x. 2. His feet like fine brass burning in a furnace may denote his providence, terrible and pure, but destructive to his enemies. Rev. i. 15.

With the inspired writers, feet often signify the whole man or beast. Psal. cxxi. 3. Isa. xxxii. 20; or the affections and conversation; hence we read of keeping the feet, of turning the feet unto God's testimonies; of the feet being shod with the preparation, or knowledge and influence of the gospel of peace, Eccl. v. 1. Psal. exix. 59. Eph. vi. 15. Sol. Song vii. 1; and straight feet, like those of a calf, may denote the integrity and constancy of angels and ministers in executing their work. Ezek. i. 7. To stand, or be at another's feet, is to be his attendants, servants, or subjects. 1 Sam. xxv. 27. Jud. iv. 10. To fall at one's feet, or lick the dust at the soles of one's feet, is deeply to reverence, worship, or submit to him, as in some eastern countries the people kiss the ground at the feet of their kings. John xi. 32. Isa. xlix. 25. To sit at, or be brought up at one's feet, is to receive instruction from him; for the Jewish scholars sat at the feet of their teachers. Deut. xxxiii. 3. Luke x. 39. Acts xxii. 3; or to follow him, and be at his disposal. Deut. xii. 6. 2 Kings iii. 9. Hab. iii. 5. To be under one's feet is to be subject to him, at his absolute disposal, Psal. viii. 6 and xviii. 38; or be distressed or conquered, Psal. xci. 13; or to be contemned and undervalued. Rev. xii. 1. To wash, or dip the feet in oil or butter, is to enjoy great plenty of oil, butter, and other good things. Job xxix. 6. Deut. xxxiii. 24. To wash the feet in the blood of the wicked, is to kill numbers of them, or with pleasure to behold them dreadfully cut off in multitudes. Psal. lviii. 10. and lxviii. 26. Bare feet is also expressive of mourning. Isa. xx. 2. and xlvii. 2. Ezek. xxiv. 17. The Ammonites stamping with the feet at the destruction of Jerusalem, expressed their joy and gladness. Ezek. xxv. 6; but Ezekiel's stamping with his feet expressed great grief and terror. Ezek. vi. 11. To turn away the foot from the Sabbath, is to forbear carnal affections, walk, and work on it. Isa. lviii. 13. To speak with the feet is, by example, or concealed signs, to excite to wickedness. Prov. vi. 13. To cover the feet is to ease nature, or compose one's self to sleep. 1 Sam. xxiv. 3. Judg. iii. 24; but the seraphim covering their feet with their wings, imports their holy awe and deep humility before God. Isa. vi. To gather up the feet, is to die. Gen. xlix. 33. To open the feet imports proneness to spiritual whoredoms, and a ready compliance with and running after the idols of the heathen nations. Ezek. xvi. 26. To withhold the foot from being washed, and the throat from thirst, is to cease from idolatrous compliance with the nations around. Jer. ii. 25. Feet taken in a snare, imports entanglement in temptation or trouble. Psal. ix. 15. Job's feet being in the stocks imports his being in great trouble, from which he knew of no way of escape. Job xlii. 7. Laban was blessed at Jacob's feet; while he was with him, and by his means. Gen. xxx. 30. Egypt was watered with the foot; by human means, or by ditches digged, and wheels driven, by the labour of the foot. Deut. xi. 10.

FOOTSTEPS; marks made by the foot. God's footsteps in the sea are his marvellous providences, often unobserved, and always unsearchable. Psal. lxxvii. 19. The footsteps of his anointed, are Christ's whole mediatorial work, in undertaking for us, assuming our nature, fulfilling all righteousness, rising from the dead, ascending to glory, interceding for us, applying his redemption to us, and at last judging the world, &c. Psal. lxxxix. 51. The footsteps of Christ's flock are either the exemplary practice of former saints, or the ordinances of the gospel attended by them. Sol. Song i. 8.

FOOTSTOOL; the earth; the tabernacle, and temple, are called God's footstool; there the less glorious displays of his presence were or are made. Isa. lxvi. 1. Psal. xcix. 5. 1 Chron. xxviii. 2. Lam. ii. 1. Christ's enemies are made his footstool, when they are completely subdued, and by him crushed down, contemned, and destroyed. Psal. cx. 1. Luke xx. 43. 1 Cor. xv. 25.

FOR. (1.) Sometimes nearly connects sentences. Gen. xxiv. 10. Josh. ii. 14. (2.) It denotes the cause of what went before: Woe unto the wicked, it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands, or works, shall be given him. Isa. iii. 9, 10, 11. When it signifies on account of; as, For bread that man will transgress. Prov. xxviii. 21. (3.) It denotes the proof and evidence of what went before: Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom; for I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: i. e. your kindness to me and my saints manifests that you were blessed of my Father, and had the kingdom of heaven prepared for you. Matt. xxv. 34, 35. Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much: i. e. her great love is an evidence that her many and great sins are forgiven her. Luke vii. 47. With many of them God was not well pleased, for they were overthrown in the wilderness: i. e. Their overthrow was a token that God was displeased with them. 1 Cor. x. 5. (4.) It denotes the end for which a thing is done; so the Lord made all things for himself; i. e. to glorify his own perfections. Prov. xvi. 4. We lay down our lives for the brethren, when we do it for their profit and advantage. 1 John iii. 16. (5.) Instead of; as Christ suffered, was sacrificed, gave himself for us, not merely for our good, but in our stead. 1 Pet. iii. 18. 1 Cor. v. 7. Matt. xx. 28.

FORBEAR. (1.) To let alone. 2 Chron. xxv. 16. (2.) To neglect. Num. ix. 13. God's forbearance is the continued exercise of his patience, whereby he lets men alone, at least for a time, without punishing them. Rom. ii. 4. and iii. 25. Christian forbearance, required of us, is a patient letting of others alone, not resenting the injuries which they have done us, nor oppressing their conscience with a rigid imposition of our notions, or pattern, as their rule. Eph. iv. 2. Col. iii. 13. By long forbearing a prince is persuaded: by mild representations, repeated and submissive remonstrances, and patient waiting, he is persuaded to do that which he would not, had it been haughtily and rashly suggested to him. Prov. xxv. 15.

FORBID; to hinder by word or deed. Acts xvi. 6. Luke ix. 49. Matt. xv. 30. Luke vi. 29. The phrase, God forbid, or let it never be, expresses detestation of a thing. Rom. vi. 3. 15.

FORCE. (1.) Vigour; strength. Deut. xxiv. 7. (2.) Violence; oppression. Ezek. xxiv. 4. (3.) Validity; so a testament is of force; is unalterable, and valid, when the testator is dead. Heb. ix. 17. Violent men take the kingdom of heaven by force; by vigorous endeavours to receive Christ, and walk with him, notwithstanding manifold oppositions and temptations. Matt. xi. 12.

FORCES. (1.) Armies. 2 Chron. xvii. 2. (2.) Multitudes enlisting themselves under Christ's banner. Isa. lx. 5, 11. To FORCE; to make one do a thing contrary to his will. Judg. i. 24. So the men of Gibeon forced the Levite's concubine; Amnon his sister; and the harlot by her flattery forced the young man to whoredom. Judg. xxi. 5. 2 Sam. xiii. 14. Prov. vii. 21. (3.) To apply vigorously. Dent. xx. 19. The forcing of wrath is the violent stirring up of hatred, anger, rage. Prov. xxx. 33. How forcible are right words! how effectually convincing are solid arguments! Job vi. 26.

FORD; a shallow place of a river. Josh. ii. 7. The daughters of Moab, being at the fords of Arnon, imports their flying or going captives out of their own land. Isa. xvi. 2.

FORECAST; to contrive things beforehand. Dan. xi. 24.

FOREHEAD. The golden plate, inscribed, HOLINESS TO THE LORD, fixed on the high-priest's forehead may signify, that in Jesus, our High Priest, the holiness, and glory of God shine in the most bright and open manner. Exod. xxviii. 28. God's making Ezekiel's forehead strong and hard, against the forehead of the Jews, imports his enabling him boldly to withstand and testify against their opposition, and shameless and obstinate wickedness. Ezek. iii. 8. The saints having a mark or seal in their foreheads imports their having full direction and protection amid terrible calamities. Ezek. ix. 4. Rev. vii. 3. The saints having God's name in their foreheads, imports their open and bold profession of his truth, obedience to his law, and conformity to his image. Rev. xiv. 1. and xxii. 4. Antichrist's name, written on his forehead, imports the Papists' open avowal of the vilest abominations. Rev. xvii. 5. Men's having the mark of the beast in their forehead imports their open profession of the heresies, and their bold attachment to the superstition and idolatry of the church of Rome. Rev. xiii. 16. and xx. 4. The Jews having a whore's forehead, and a stiff forehead, imports their shameless obstinacy in idolatry and other wickedness. Jer. iii. 3. Ezek. iii. 17. God's setting a jewel on their forehead, imports his giving them public and great honour and wealth, and openly placing his tabernacle, temple, and ordinances among them. Ezek. xvi. 12.

FOREIGNER. See STRANGER.

FOREKNOWLEDGE. (1.) God's foreseeing and foreordaining of things; before the world was made. Acts ii. 23. (2.) His fore-acknowledging and choosing of the elect. Rom. viii. 29. and xi. 9. 1 Pet. i. 2. See DECREE.

FOREORDAIN: in purpose to appoint or set up. Rom. iii. 25. 1 Pet. i. 20.

FORERUNNER. Christ is so called, because, by his obedience and death, he paved the way for us, and left us an example and encouragement to follow him; and in his ascension, he hath entered into heaven, to prepare mansions for us. Heb. vi. 20.

FORESEE. (1.) To discern things before they happen. Prov. xxii. 3. (2.) To keep one's eye fixed upon. Acts ii. 25. (3.) To provide. Heb. xi. 40. The scripture is said to foresee what God its Author did, and therein foretels. Gal. iii. 8.

FORESHIP; the prow or forepart of a ship. Acts xxvii. 30.

FORESKIN. This was cut off by the Jews in circumcision; but if the child was born without one, he was circumcised by cutting the inner skin, till the blood dropped out. As the Hebrews had none, two hundred foreskins sufficiently marked the slaughter of so many Philistines by David. 1 Sam. xviii. 25. It is said, that some Jews after circumcision, to conceal it, have drawn on a kind of foreskin. And it is probable, that many of them, in Spain, retained the natural one, till their last moments, that they might not be known to be Jews. The foreskin of the heart, is its natural and reigning corruption. Jer. iv. 4.

FOREST. See WOOD.

FORFEIT. All his substance shall be forfeited, taken from him, and given to the use of the temple, the poor, or the civil magistrates. Exra x. 8.

FORGET; to lose the remembrance of a person or thing, or give up all care about them. Deut. iv. 9. God seemingly forgets the saints, when he ceases to give visible displays of his power and love in their favour; and for a while denies them the sensible tokens of his kindness, Psal. xlii. 1. and lxxvii. 9; but he will not readily forget them; will not cease to support, and provide what is really necessary for their real good. Isa. xlix. 15. He will not forget the works of the wicked; he will certainly punish them, Amos viii. 7; nor the good works of the saints, but will graciously reward them. Heb. vi. 10. God's elect forget their father's house, and their own people; in embracing Christianity, the Jews quitted their ancient ceremonies and temple; in receiving Christ, every saint quits his natural dispositions, false persuasions, self-righteousness, and sinful customs; and parts with natural relations, so as to prefer Christ to them all. Psal. xlv. 10. Saints forget the things behind, when they disesteem their works and attainments, and think of, and press after further knowledge of, intimacy with, and conformity to Christ. Phil. iii. 15. Men forget God, when they neglect to think of, and worship him; when they break his laws, and pour contempt on any thing pertaining to him. Judg. iii. 7. Men forget Jerusalem, when they are thoughtless of, and unconcerned how things go in the church. Psal. cxxxvii. 5. They forget misery, poverty, and toil; when succeeding comforts, honour, and wealth, more than balance the same. Prov. xxxi. 7. Gen. xli. 51.

FORGIVE; PARDON; REMIT; to remove the guilt of sin, that the punishment due to it may not be inflicted. God pardons iniquity in justification, when, through the imputed righteousness of his Son, he removes the legal charge of sin against men, and frees them from the condemning sentence or curse of the broken law, Psal. ciii. 3; or when, as a Father, he intimates to them, more and more, their forgiveness, and removes their guilt, and frees them from fatherly chastisements. Matt. vi. 12. 2 Sam. xii. 13. Or when he judicially publishes their pardon at the last day, when all the fruits of sin are forever removed from them. Acts iii. 19. Or when, as governor of Israel, he removed their outward calamities. 2 Chron. vii. God forgives all sins, even the greatest, except the sin against the Holy Ghost, as to the guilt or charge of it by the law, in order to eternal punishment. Isa. lv. 7. Matt. xii. 31, 32. Sometimes he refuses to pardon other gross sins, as to the temporal correction or punishment thereof. Thus he would not forgive the sin of Moses and Aaron, and the other Hebrews, so as to admit them into the promised land. Nor would he forgive the sin of Manasseh, so as to forbear inflicting his judgments on Judah. Exod. xxxii. 21. 2 Kings xxiv. 4. Sometimes he remits it, as to part of the temporal judgment, but not as to the whole. Thus David had his adultery and murder so far remitted as to have his own life preserved, but not as to have the judgments of God to pass from his family. 2 Sam. xli. 9—14. The absolution of penitent offenders from church censures, is called a remission, or forgiveness, of them, as it is a ministerial declaration of divine forgiveness, and frees from the discipline incurred by the sins. John xx. 23. 2 Cor. ii. 10. Our for giving of injuries, signifies our laying aside every inward grudge toward the injurer, and endeavouring to render him good for evil. Matt. vi. 14. and xviii. 21, 35. Eph. iv. 32. Col. iii. 13. God alone forgives sins as such, Isa. xliii. 25. Ministers publish his remission in the gospel; and churches absolve from sins, considered as scandals. John xx. 23. We forgive the faults of our neighbour, only as injuries done to us. Eph. v. 32. Repentance hath an inseparable connexion with forgiveness of sin, Prov. xxviii. 13; but is not a proper condition of it. Rom. iii. 24. A legal repentance may, and often does, precede the judicial pardon of sin in justification, Acts ii. 37, 38; but no true gospel-repentance can, because, till the curse be removed by pardon, we continue under the dominion of sin, 1 Cor. xv. 56. Rom. vi. 14; and it is the view of God's pardoning mercy that can influence our heart to godly sorrow for sin. Ezek. xvi. 62, 63. and xxxvi. 25—31. Gospel-repentance may and doth precede God's fatherly forgiveness, and his publishing of forgiveness at the last day, Acts iii. 19; and the Jews' returning from their gross wickedness, was necessary to God's removal of these outward calamities. 1 Kings viii. 31—50. Lev. xxvi. 40—46. It may be often prudent to forbear intimating forgiveness to an injurious neighbour, till he appear to repent of the injury; but we are in our heart to forgive him, even though he continue to injure us. Luke xvii. 4. and xxiii. 34. Our forgiving of injuries done us is not the condition of God's forgiving us; but it is an inseparable attendant and token thereof. Matt. vi. 14. Eph. v. 32. Nor can we, in faith, ask forgiveness of God, while we indulge in resentment against our neighbour. Luke xi. 4.

FORM; shape; likeness. Job iv. 16. Christ was in the form of God, and took on him the form of a servant: he was truly God, in nature the same, and in person like unto the Father; and he really became a bond-servant to the broken law in our stead. Phil. ii. 6, 7. He had no form, or comeliness; no outward splendour or earthly dignity, as the Jews expected in the Messiah. Isa. liii. 2. In different forms, or outward appearances, he appeared to his disciples after his resurrection. Mark xvi. 12. A form of sound words, is a draught or system of divine truth. 2 Tim. i. 13. A form of godliness, without the power of it, is an outward show of true religion, and worship of God, without experience of the saving power and grace of God in our heart. 2 Tim. iii. 5. To FORM, is to give a thing being or shape. Gen. ii. 7.

FORNICATION. See WHOREDOM.

FORSAKE; to depart from. God seemingly forakes his people, when he withdraws his sensible presence, and withholds his assistance and comfort. Psal. lxxi. 11. and xxii. 1. Isa. xlix. 14; but he never forsakes them as to real love, and such influence as is absolutely necessary for the subsistence of their grace. Heb. xiii. 5. Psal. xxxvii. 28. Men forake God and his law, when they disregard and condemn him, and disobey his law, deny his truth, neglect his worship, and depend not on his fulness. Jer. xvii. 3. and ix. 13. Men forake others, when they deny them their company, help, or comfort, and leave them to shift for themselves. 2 Tim. iv. 10. To forake persons or things for Christ, is to be ready to quit them; or actually to part with them, in order to enjoy and serve him. Matt. xix. 27, 29. There was a great forsaking in the land of Israel, when most of the inhabitants fled from their dwellings, or were killed or carried captive by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Isa. vi. 12.

FORSWEAR; to break an oath or vow. Matt. v. 33.

FORT; FORTRESS. (1.) A strong HOLD; a place of defence and safety. The Lord is the fortress or strong hold of his people. To him they flee in times of danger; in him they trust, and find preservation from hurt. Psal. xlviii. 2. Nab. i. 7. (2.) A kind of mount, or TOWER, erected by the besiegers of a city, in order to annoy the defenders, or their wall. Ezek. xxi. 32.

FORTIFY; to make strong, by erecting towers and walls for defence. Judg. ix. 31.

FORTY days the deluging rain fell. Gen. vii. 17. Thrice Moses fasted forty days. Dent. ix. 9—25. Exod. xxiv. 18. and xxxiv. 28. In forty days the Hebrew spies searched Canaan. Num. xiii. 25. During forty days Goliath defied the Hebrew troops. 1 Sam. xvii. 16. Forty days Elijah fasted. 1 Kings xvii. 8. Forty days was the time allowed for the ruin of Nineveh. Jonah iii. 4. Forty days Ezekiel bore the iniquities of the house of Judah, a day for a year. Ezek. iv. 6. Forty days Christ was tempted of the devil. Matt. iv. 2. Mark i. 13. Forty days he continued on earth after his resurrection. Acts i. 3. Forty years the Hebrews tempted God in the wilderness, Psal. xcv. 10; and forty years after Christ's death were their city and temple preserved.

FORWARD. (1.) Further on in a journey; in the progress of a work; or in time. Gen. xxvi. 13. 1 Chron. xxiii. 4. 1 Sam. xvi. 13. (2.) Strongly bent and inclined. Gal. ii. 10. (3.) Far on in readiness. 2 Cor. viii. 10.

FORWARDNESS; an earnest bent of the mind towards any thing, particularly to make collection for the poor. 2 Cor. viii. 8. and ix. 2.

FOUND; (1.) To fix the lower part of a building. Ezra iii. 6. (2.) To settle the beginning of a city or nation. Isa. xxiii. 13. (3.) To ordain or appoint firmly. 1 Chron. ix. 22. Psal. viii. 7. (4.) To cast metal. Jer. x. 9.

FOUNDATION. (1.) The lower part of any structure, as of a house, wall, mountain, &c. which supports the rest. Ezra iv. 12. 2 Sam. xxii. 16. Dent. xxxii. 22. (2.) The beginning of a thing; thus the foundation of the world denotes the beginning of it. Matt. xiii. 35. Christ is a foundation: on his person, office, and work, is his church, and the whole of our salvation, erected and supported. Isa. xxviii. 16. 1 Cor. iii. 11. Matt. xvi. 18. He is likened to twelve foundations of precious stones; he is infinitely precious, adapted to every case, and exhibited in the doctrine of his twelve apostles. Rev. xxi. 14, 19, 20. God's truths, published by the prophets and apostles, are a foundation: on them the saints found their faith and hope;

and depending on them, they are built up to perfect holiness and happiness; and on them the church, in all her ordinances, faith, profession, offices, and blessings, depends. Eph. ii. 20. The first principles of divine truth are a foundation, as they ought to be first known, in order to understand the rest, which depend on them. Heb. vi. 1, 2. Teaching these divine truths is called a foundation. Paul studied so to preach Christ as not to build on another man's foundation; i. e. to preach Christ where nobody had before taught the first principles of Christianity. Rom. xv. 20. Magistrates, and the principal constitutions of their government, are the foundations of a state that support and establish the rest. Psal. lxxxii. 5. and xi. 13. Mic. vi. 2. The righteous are an everlasting foundation; being fixed in Christ, their persons, and holy and happy state and condition, are stable and fixed; and they are great means of supporting and establishing nations and churches. Rev. x. 25. They lay up a good foundation for the time to come; receive Jesus and his righteousness; whereby they are infallibly determined to such good works as shall be rewarded in the future state; or the good foundation they lay up is the heavenly glory itself, which is fixed and stable; and on that account is called a city having foundations. 1 Tim. vi. 19. Heb. xi. 10. The foundation of God that standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his, is either his unchangeable and fixed purpose of election, on which the salvation of his people is reared up; or the fundamental truths of the gospel, that cannot be overthrown; or the saints themselves, divinely fixed in their new-covenant state. 2 Tim. ii. 19. The foundations or pillars of heaven are the mountains on which the skies seem to rest. 2 Sam. xxii. 8.

FOUNDER; one that casts metal into vessels and other utensils. Judg. xvii. 4. Jer. x. 9. God, and his prophets, are likened to a founder, because, by the judgments declared by prophets, and executed by God, nations are melted with trouble, to purge off their dross, and form them into a conformity to his will. Jer. vi. 20.

FOUNTAIN; WELL; SPRING. In the south part of Canaan, as well as in most of Arabia, and in many places of Africa, &c. it was hard to come at any spring-water; hence so much contention happened about wells. Gen. xxi. and xxvi. Exod. ii. In the valley of Baca, it seems there were no springs, but pits that retained the rain-water. Psal. lxxxiv. The most noted wells we read of in scripture were Abraham's at Beersheba; Hagar's at Beer-lahai-roi; Isaac's wells at Sitnah, Ezek. and Rehoboth; Laban's at Haran; Jacob's near Shechem. Gen. xvi. and xxi. and xxvi. John iv. 6; those of Elim. Exod. xv. 27; the well of Beer, eastward of the Dead sea. Num. xxi. 16—18; of Bethlehem; 1 Chron. xi. 17, 18; the fountain of gardens, probably at the foot of mount Lebanon, about six miles north from Tripoli; and the well of living waters, about a mile southward of Tyre, Sol. Song iv. 15; together with the fountain of Gihon and Enrogel at Jerusalem; and Samson's well, Enbakkore. Judg. xv. 19.

1 Kings i. 9—38. Uzziah also digged a great many wells. 2 Chron. xxvi. 10. The upper and lower springs, which Caleb gave to his daughters, were two fields full of springs. Judg. i. 15. That called Joseph's well, in Egypt, is about two hundred and seventy-six feet, or forty-nine fathoms deep; and the water is drawn by a most curious engine, wrought with oxen, some far below, and some above ground.

God is called a fountain of living waters, and with him is the fountain of living waters; he is the unsearchable and unfailing source of all our happiness and comfort. Jer. ii. 13. Psal. xxxvi. 9. Jesus Christ is an open fountain, a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon; by his blood, righteousness, and spiritual influence, exhibited and offered in the gospel, are our guilt and pollution washed away, and all the churches and worshipping assemblies of his people refreshed, quickened, and rendered fruitful in the works of righteousness. Zech. xiii. 1. Sol. Song iv. 15. The Holy Ghost, attending the preaching of the gospel, is a fountain coming out of the house of the Lord, and watering the valley of Shittim; he, proceeding from and sent by Jesus, the residence of God, does, by his gifts and graces, cool, refresh, cleanse, and fructify the barren souls of men, Jews and gentiles, Joel iii. 18; and is a well of waters springing up to eternal life, in growth of grace, and abounding practice of good works. John iv. 14. and vii. 38, 39. The church is a spring shut up, and fountain sealed; in her is lodged the fresh and ever-flowing fulness of Christ's word, blood, and Spirit, for the purification and refreshment of her members: none but Christ ought to rule or govern in her as her head; and, by his providence and grace, her true members are safely and secretly secured to him alone. Isa. lviii. 11. Sol. Song iv. 12. All the saints' springs are in her; in her dwells God, the fountain of living waters; Jesus the smitten, the water-yielding Rock of ages; the Holy Ghost, that river of life, issuing from under the throne of God, and the scriptures and ordinances, those subordinate wells of salvation, whence the saints draw their happiness and comfort; and which make them send forth rivers of edifying words and works in their conversation. Psal. lxxxvii. 7. John vii. 38. The saints are fountains; from their souls, replenished with the Spirit and grace of Christ, flow forth much edifying converse, and so their tongue, or mouth, is called a well of life, and much refreshing benevolence, and many useful good works: but when they fall before the wicked, by temptations and persecution, they are a troubled fountain and corrupt spring: far less comely and useful. Prov. xxv. 26. and x. 11. Spiritual knowledge and wisdom, and the fear of the Lord, are a fountain, or well-spring of life; a delightful means of promoting the temporal and spiritual happiness of ourselves and others. Prov. xvi. 22; xviii. 4; xiii. 14. and xiv. 27. Wives are called fountains and wells; they bring forth children, that, as streams, are dispersed in the streets; and are a great means of happiness and comfort to their husbands. Prov. v. 15, 18. Children are fountains; and the offspring of Jacob, his fountain; they are means of help and comfort to their parents; and, in due time, produce children of their own. Prov. v. 16. Deut. xxxiii. 28. But the fountain of Israel may either signify Jacob's posterity, or Jesus, who sprung from him; or God himself, the source of all true comfort to Jacob and his seed. Psal. lxxviii. 26. False teachers are wells without water: they promise men much instruction, edification, and comfort, and yet afford nothing but error, corrupt examples, and enticements. 2 Pet. ii. 17. Whatever a thing proceeds from, is called its fountain, or spring. Thus the cause or first rise of the bloody issue is called its fountain. Lev. xx. 18. Mark v. 29. The right ventricle of the heart, whence the blood, and with it the life and vital spirits, take their rise, is called a fountain. Eccl. xii. 6. Fountains and springs also denote prosperity, and the means thereof. Hos. xiii. 15. Thus, to turn dry land into springs of water, is to afford great prosperity to a distressed nation: or to grant plenty of ordinances and powerful influences to a church or people that had been barren and withered. Psal. cvii. 85. Isa. xxxv. 7; xli. 11. and xlix. 10. To turn springs and rivers into a wilderness, is not only to alter the soil of fields to the worse, as God has done in Idumea, Canaan, Egypt, &c. but to change great prosperity into sad adversity. Psal. cvii. 33.

FOUR-SQUARE; that whose length and breadth are equal. The foursquare form of the altar, and new Jerusalem, figures out the stability and self-consistence of Christ and his church. Exod. xxvii. 1. Rev. xxi. 16.

FOWLER; one that by fire-arms, arrows, or nets, studies to catch fowls. Satan is a fowler; with great subtlety and deceit, he and his agents lay snares and temptations for the ruin of mankind. Psal. xci. 3. Prov. vi. 5. Such as oppress and seek the ruin of their neighbours, or endeavour to ensnare them into sin or danger, are called fowlers. Psal. cxxiv. 7. Jer. v. 26.

FOX; an animal of the dog kind. In form it resembles the common dog, and in size the spaniel; it is chiefly distinguished by its long and straight tail, with a white tip. It is a native of the most northern countries, and is remarkable for its craft, its winding motions, its rank smell, and its hurtfulness to vines and flocks, its eating of dead bodies, its desperate biting, &c. It cannot be tamed, so as to become harmless; it feeds on tame animals, rather than wild; it has often, if not always, a variety of outlets to its den, that, if one be stopped, it may escape by another. Foxes, fattened with grapes, are, by some, used as food in the harvest. Foxes were very numerous in Canaan, lodging in hedges, old ruins, and the like; and hence some cities or countries were called Shaul, which signifies a fox; as the land of Shaul, Hasar-Shaul, Shualabbin, &c. so that it was easy enough for Samson to procure three hundred of them, or of another kind of animals of a middle size between a wolf and a fox, which assembled there sometimes in hundreds. Judg. xv. 4. False prophets and teachers are likened to foxes: how crafty! how obstinate in their evil way! how uneven and inconsistent their doctrine and practice! how abominable their instructions! how often, under a mask of innocence and usefulness, they undermine nations and churches, and render them unfruitful to God! how maliciously they hate such as oppose them! Ezek. xiii. 4. Sol. Song ii. 15. Tyrants, and other wicked men, are likened to foxes for their craft, obstinacy in sin, and ruinous designs against others. Luke xiii. 32. Inward sinful lusts resemble foxes; how crafty, stubborn, abominable, and ruinous to the souls of men! and how hurtful to the graces of the saints! Sol. Song ii. 15. To be the portion of foxes, is for men to have their land or habitation, rendered desolate and ruinous, and themselves left unbarred. Psal. lxxiii. 10.

FRAGMENTS; broken pieces of meat. Matt. xiv. 20. and John vi. 12.

FRAIL; easy to be broken, or cut off by death; short lived. Psal. xxxix. 4.

FRAME; artfully to put into a form.

FRAME. (1.) An instrument for fashioning a thing upon. Jer. xvii. 3. (2.) The figure or picture of a thing. Ezek. xl. 2. (3.) The constitution of a person or thing. Psal. ciii. 14.

FRANKINCENSE; a sweet-smelling gum, anciently much burned in temples, and now used in medicine. It distills from incisions made in the tree during the heat of summer. The largest and best trees are called male incense; the whitish, drawn at the end of summer, are better than those drawn at the beginning. Some frankincense is brought from the East Indies, but it is not equal in value to that of Arabia or Syria. What is the form of the frankincense tree, we do not certainly know. Pliny at one time says it is like a pear-tree; at another, that it is like a mastick-tree; then, that it resembles the laurel; and in fine, that it is a kind of turpentine-tree. Frankincense is still used in many of the Popish ceremonies, as well as by heathens; and, at funerals, it is bestowed as an honorary present on prelates, &c. Rev. xviii. 13. The saints, and their graces and religious services, are compared to frankincense; how delightful and medicinal to themselves, and other church-members! and how savoury and acceptable to God. Sol. Song iv. 14. and iii. 6.

FRAUD. See DECEIT.

FRAY; to chase one away with fear. Deut. xxviii. 26.

FRECKLED; clear-whitish. A freckled spot was not the leprosy, but an approach to it. Lev. xiii. 39.

FREE. (1.) Without price; out of mere favour. Rom. v. 15. and iii. 24. (2.) Without constraint or obligation. Psal. liv. 6. Rom. viii. 2. (3.) Without restraint or hindrance. 2 Thess. iii. 1. God's Spirit is free, voluntary, or princely; he is freely bestowed on sinners; and, in a princely and liberal manner, he influences, convinces, instructs, draws, and comforts men's souls. Psal. li. 12. God's blessings of the new covenant are free; though purchased by Christ, yet they are given to sinful men, without money or price on our part, and are to be received as gifts of mere grace and favour. Rom. v. 18. Rev. xxii. 17. A free heart is one disposed to bestow freely and willingly. 2 Chron. xxix. 31. Free or free-will offerings were those given without any obligation of God's law. Exod. xxxvi. 3. Lev. xxii. 31. Persons are free when in no slavish bondage, or exempted from paying tribute, Deut. xv. 13. Matt. xvii. 26 : or not obliged to maintain parents. Matt. xv. 6. The saints are free, or freed from the law, or from sin : they are, by the grace of God in Christ, delivered from the yoke of the broken law, the dominion of sin, and the slavery of Satan ; and now under the gospel, from the Jewish ceremonies, are entitled to all the privileges of the children of God. Rom. viii. 2 ; vi. 23. John viii. 34, 36, and Gal. v. 1. Sinners are free from righteousness, quite destitute of, and no way influenced by a holy principle. Rom. vi. 20. To be free among the dead, is to be in a miserable case on earth, as if a citizen of the grave. Psal. lxxxviii. 5.

FREEDOM signifies, (1.) The giving of liberty to a slave. Lev. xix. 20. (2.) The privilege of citizens in the Roman state. Acts xxii. 28.

FRESH. (1.) New and uncorrupted. Num. xi. 8. (2.) What is beautiful, and has no appearance of fading. Job xxix. 20, and xxxiii. 25.

FRET. (1.) Angrily to murmur. 1 Sam. i. 6. Prov. xix. 3. (2.) To vex exceedingly ; make one very angry. Psal. xxxvii. 1-7. Ezek. xvi. 43. A fretting leprosy is one which, by pricking and rankling, wastes the flesh. Lev. xiii. 51.

FRIEND ; one who sincerely and in a fixed manner, loves us, and is ready to exert himself for our good ; one that sympathizes with us in trouble, and whom we may safely trust with our secrets. Prov. xvii. 17. Christ is called a friend ; how affectionately and constantly he loves his people ! What great and good things he has done, does, and will do for them ! how kindly and faithfully he reproves their faults ; sympathizes with them in distress : and is ready to give them counsel and help ! and how safely he may be intrusted with our most important secrets. Sol. Song iv. 16. Christ's friends and neighbours, whom he invites to rejoice with him at the conversion of his elect, are angels, ministers, and saints, who ardently love him and his Father, promote his honour and cause, and have much intimacy with him. Luke xv. 6, 9. Jam. ii. 22. John xv. 15, and Sol. Song v. 1. In allusion to the friend at marriages, who performed the honours of the wedding, and led the bride to the nuptial bed, John Baptist, and other ministers, are friends of the Bridegroom : they, by their preaching and example, direct and conduct sinners to Christ. Judg. xv. 20. John iii. 29. Judas, and the man without the wedding-garment, were but pretended friends ; or the word is used as a term of discreet address. Matt. xxvi. 50, and xxii. 12. The friendship of this world, which is enmity with God, is a superlative love and desire of earthly and sinful things, and a study to obtain the favour of worldly men, by conformity to them in their evil courses. Jam. iv. 4. Matt. vi. 24. Luke xvi. 13.

FRINGE. See CLOTHES.

FROG ; an amphibious animal that lives partly in the water, and partly on the earth.

It has a short body, without any tail, and four legs for leaping with. Frogs are strong breathed, delight in pools, and fens, and are much given to croaking. Sometimes during a summer shower, after a long drought, such multitudes creep abroad, that some have foolishly imagined they had been rained from heaven. When God used them to plague the Egyptians, they swarmed in such numbers as to cover the whole land. They entered their houses and ovens ; nor could their beds, and repositories for victuals, be kept rid of them. When God cut them off by death, the Egyptians gathered them into heaps, and the country stank with their disagreeable smell. Exod. viii. The unclean spirits, like frogs, proceeding out of the mouth of the heathen dragon, Antichristian beast, and Mahometan false prophet, may be the Jesuits and other Romish or Mahometan clergy, who by a kind of authority, exert themselves to support their various abominations, wallow in villainous, croak out their errors and flatteries, creep into bed-chambers, to defile matrons and maidens, and strangely gain the ear and confidence of great men ; and who about the beginning of the millennium, shall exert themselves to the utmost to support Paganism, Popery, and Mahometanism, against Christ and the gospel. Rev. xvi. 13, 14.

FRONT. (1.) The fore part of a house. 2 Chron. iii. 4. (2.) The fore rank or part of an army. 2 Sam. x. 9.

FRONTIERS, the outermost borders of a country. Ezek. xxv. 9.

FRONTLET, called also PHYLACTERIES, or preservatives ; a kind of busk, or mark on the forehead. God charged the Hebrews to have his law as a sign on their forehead, and as frontlets between their eyes ; that is to have a thorough knowledge of it, constant regard to it, and to obey it in all they did. Exod. xii. 16. It seems that, after the death of the prophets, the Jews began foolishly to understand these words according to the literal signification, and made four pieces of parchment ! On the first they wrote the texts, Exod. xiii. 2-10 ; on the second, they wrote Exod. xiii. 11-21 ; on the third, they wrote Deut. vi. 4-9 ; and on the fourth, Dent. xi. 13-21. These they put together ; and covering them with a piece of hard calf-skin, bound it on their forehead, and wore it, the more devout of them at both morning and evening prayer, and the less devout of them only at morning prayer. In our Saviour's time, the Jews of Persia and Chaldaea wore them, as well as those in Judea, but he plainly condemned the proud affecting of them, especially such as were larger than ordinary. Matt. xxiii. 5. The Caraites Jews, who are but few, and detest the Pharisaic traditions, call the wearers of frontlets, bridled asses.

FROST. By the breath of God frost is given ; by his will, and by the chillness of the air, the earth is hardened, and water frozen into ice. Job xxxvii. 10. By frost, or excessive cold, Jacob was distressed, as he watched Laban's flocks by night. Gen. 31, 40. JEHOIAKIN's corpse lay unburied until it was hardened by the frost. Jer. xxxvi. 30. By frost the sycamores of Egypt were withered. Psal. lxxviii. 47. Hoarfrost is dew frozen in the air, and falling on the ground. Psal. cxlvii. 16. In some warm regions near the equator, they have scarcely ever any frost or ice; and could hardly believe that water will harden, so as men may walk upon it. In the regions near the pole, whether in the north or south, as in Norway, Sweden, Lapland, Siberia, and especially Greenland, frost prevails during the greater part of the year, and seas freeze to a prodigious depth of ice; nay, in some high mountains the frost is scarcely ever absent, though they are situated at no great distance from the equator. In the Alps, which are a great way to southward of us, there are lakes that have perhaps been frozen ever since the flood. In Muscovy, the ice is often from six to ten feet thick. In A. D. 401, the Euxine or Black sea, was frozen over for the space of twenty days; and in 763, the seas at Constantinople were frozen one hundred miles from the shore, so thick as to be able to bear the heaviest carriages.

FRUIT; whatever is produced by any cause. The fruits of the earth are, grass, corn, trees, herbs: the fruit of vegetables is their berries, apples, grapes, &c.: the fruit of animals is their young ones. Children are called the fruit of the body or womb. Deut. xxviii. 4. Psal. cxxvii. 3. To prevent the injury of fruit-trees, by too early plucking their fruit; to secure the best for the Lord on the fourth year; to commemorate the entrance of sin by forbidden fruit; and to teach us to bridle our appetites; the Jews were to hold their fruit of trees unclean for three years, and on the fourth it was to be the Lord's. Lev. xix. 23. Christ is the fruit of the earth; his human body sprung of it. Isa. iv. 2. The twelve manner of fruits which he bears, and which are better than gold, are his various blessings of righteousness, peace, pardon, acceptance, adoption, sanctification, comfort, and eternal glory, sufficient for all the tribes of the chosen Israel. Rev. xxii. 2. Sol. Song ii. 3. Prov. viii. 19. The fruits of the Spirit are the gracious qualities, tempers, comforts, and good works, which his inhabitation and influence produce in the saints. Gal. v. 22-24. Eph. v. 9. The fruits of the gospel, are turning from idols, and other wickedness, to God, believing on Christ, and the bringing forth of good works. Col. i. 6. Rom. i. 13. Saints are represented as fruit gathered by ministers, Isa. xxvii. 6. John iv. 36. Sol. Song viii. 12; their good fruit is the exercise of their graces and their good works; they are fruits of righteousness produced by the application of Jesus' righteousness to their souls, and are in obedience to God's righteous law: they are sown in peace; founded on and performed in a state of peace with God, and in the study of following a holy peace with men. Matt. vii. 18. and xii. 33. Gal. v. 22-24. Prov. xi. 30. Phil. i. 11. Jam. iii. 18. They are fruits meet for repentance; i. e. such as mark the truth and sincerity of, and answer to a profession of it, Matt. iii. 8; and fruit unto holiness and life; they mark the truth of our inward sanctification, and promote our holiness in themselves; and they are a means of promoting life temporal, spiritual, and eternal, in ourselves and others, Rom. vi. 22; they are fruits of the valley, produced in Jesus' church, and by his influence, and spring from a humble heart, Sol. Song vi. 11; they are Christ's pleasant fruits, produced by his Spirit, and to his honour; and are a delight and pleasure to him and his people, Sol. Song iv. 16; and fruits new and old, laid up, holy fruits produced at different times, and all aimed at the glory of Christ, Sol. Song vii. 13; and fruit unto God, to show forth his grace, power, wisdom, and holiness. Rom. vii. 4. The fruit of the lips is either the comfortable doctrines of the gospel published by ministers; or the saints' praises and thanksgiving to God; or their pious conferences and counsels. Isa. lvii. 19. Heb. xiii. 15. Prov. xii. 14. The fruit of the wicked is their evil works, in thought, word, or deed, Matt. vii. 16; it is fruit unto death, as it tends to promote the spiritual and eternal death of themselves and others. Rom. vii. 5, 13. Jam. i. 15. Even their good-like fruit is fruit to themselves; springs from selfish principles, is performed in their own strength, and directed to selfish ends, Hos. x. 1. Zech. viii. 5, 6; and it is withering fruit, which is not continued in, but they fall away, and grow worse and worse. Jude 12. The fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria was his insolent blasphemies against God. Isa. x. 12. Liberal donations to such as are in need are called a fruit; they proceed from a benevolent disposition, and are refreshing to such as receive them. Rom. xv. 28. Phil. iv. 17. The fruit of men's ways or deeds, is the reward or punishment that follows on good or evil works. Prov. i. 31. Isa. liii. 10.

FRUSTRATE; to make void. God frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh the diviners mad; he, especially after the coming of Christ, struck dumb the heathen oracles, disappointed their lying priest, and made void the tokens which their soothsayers gave out, of such or such thing happening; and so they became distracted with shame and grief. Isa. xlii. 25.

FUEL; wood, coals, or the like materials for burning in the fire. Men are as fuel, when they are cast into, and painfully destroyed by the fire of God's judgment. Isa. ix. 19. Ezek. xxi. 32. The victory of Christ and his people over their enemies, shall be with burning, and fuel of fire; quickly and easily effected by them, but very terrible and destructive to their enemies. Isa. ix. 5.

FUGITIVE and VAGABOND; one that quits his country, and wanders up and down in a restless manner. Gen. iv. 12, 14.

FULL. (1.) Complete; perfect; without want. 2 John 8. John xv. 11. (2.) Having as much as a person or thing can hold. Numb. vii. 12, 14. (3.) Having as much, and more than one wishes. Isa. i. 11. (4.) Having as much as one is persuaded he needs. Luke vi. 25. 'Now ye are full, rich, and reign, and would to God that ye did reign, that we might reign together with you.' In your own view, ye abound in knowledge and wisdom; and I wish you were as wise and holy as ye think yourselves, that we might rejoice in your happiness. 1 Cor. iv. 8. (5.) Having a great deal of: hence men are said to be full of faith; full of the influences of the Holy Ghost; full of abominations; full of children, of days, or years, &c. Acts vi. 5. Rev. xvii. 4. Psal. xvii. 14. Gen. xxv. 8. God is full of compassion, and his right hand is full of righteousness; he is infinitely ready to pity and do good to poor sinful men: he is ready to bestow the righteousness of his Son; and all his works are perfectly just and righteous. Psal. cxii. 4. and cxviii. 10. The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord, or glory of Christ, when it is every where signally displayed. Psal. xxxiii. 5. Isa. vi. 8. Men's cup or their measure of iniquity is full, when God will no longer defer to execute proper vengeance on them. Gen. xv. 16. See FILL.

FULNESS. (1.) The furniture contained in any thing, or what fills it. Psal. xxiv. 1. (2.) Great abundance. Numb. xviii. 27. The fulness of the Godhead, dwelling in Christ, is the whole perfections of the divine nature. Col. ii. 9. Christ, as Mediator, has all the fulness of the new-covenant blessings of righteousness, grace, comfort, and glory, lodged in him by the Father, and out of that the saints receive, and grace for grace. Col. i. 19. John iii. 34. Eph. iv. 16. John i. 16. The saints are filled with all the fulness of God, when they enjoy the Father in his love, the Son in his righteousness and blessings, and the Holy Ghost in his influences, in a most abundant degree. Eph. iii. 19. The saints are the fulness of Christ; among and in them he displays the fulness of his righteousness, grace, and glory; and by their union and subjection to him, and their dependence on him, he is rendered a complete mediatorial Head. Eph. i. 23. They grow up to the stature of the fulness of Christ, when they are all brought to perfection, and so constitute his complete and perfect mystical body. Eph. iv. 13. Christ came in the fulness of time, i. e. in the time fixed in God's purpose, and marked out in his predictions; and when the world was sufficiently wicked to be conquered; when men had been repeatedly warned of his coming; and when the godly had waited long enough for him. Gal. iv. 4. Eph. i. 10. The future gathering of multitudes of Jews and gentiles to Jesus, to receive happiness in him in the millennium, is called their fulness. Rom. xi. 12, 25. The fulness that Christ's eyes sit upon, may be the time of his incarnation, the fulness of blessings lodged in him, and the fulness of his mystical body. Sol. Song v. † 12. Sodom's sin was fulness of bread, i. e. excessive gluttony and drunkenness. Ezek. xvi. 46.

FULFIL; to render full; to complete. Exod. v. 18. To fulfil a work is to finish or complete it. Matt. iii. 15. To fulfil a promise, threatening, or prophecy, is to do what is promised, threatened, or foretold. Matt. xxiv. 34. To fulfil a law, or command, or will, is to obey it. Rom. xiii. 8. To fulfil requests and desires, is to grant the things desired. Psal. xx. 4, 5. To fulfil lusts, is to do what wicked works they incline us to. Eph. ii. 3. Time is fulfilled, when it is over or fully come. Luke i. 57. ii. 6, 22. and xxi. 24.

FURLONG; a measure of length, containing one hundred and twenty-five paces, which made the eighth part of an Italian mile; but Maimonides says, the Jewish furlong contained 260 cubits, and so seven cubits and a half went to one mile. Luke xxiv. 13.

FURY. See ANGER.

FURNACE. (1.) A great fire for melting and refining metals; or for burning offenders. Gen. xix. 28. Dan. iii. 6—23. (2.) A place of cruel and tormenting bondage; so Egypt is called a furnace, and iron furnace to the Hebrews. Deut. iv. 50. Jer. xi. 4. Isa. xlviii. 10. (3.) Most grievous and tormenting judgments and calamities, by which the righteous are tried and purged from sin, and the wicked consumed as dross. Isa. xxxi. 9. and xlviii. 10. (4.) The terrible and tormenting punishments of hell. Matt. xiii. 42.

FURNISH; to give what is needed. 1 Kings ix. 11.

FURNITURE whatever is necessary to accommodate a person or thing, for the end or work it is designed; as a house for dwelling in, a camel for riding, &c. Exod. xxxi. 7.

FURROW. (1.) An opening of the ground with a plough. Psal. lxxv. 10. (2.) Grievous injuries done to the church and saints of God are compared to long furrows, made upon the back; how barbarous and painful! Psal. cxxix. 3. The two furrows of the Israelites may either denote their principal transgressions, revolting from the family of David by rebellion, and from God by idolatry, or their two countries, or their hard service under the Assyrians. Hos. x. 10.

G.

GAAL, the son of Ebed, probably a Canaanite, and perhaps descended from Hamor, the ancient king of Shechem. When the people of that city began to conceive a dislike to Abimelech, Gaal came and dwelt among them, and increased the dissension. Under his direction they ravaged the adjacent fields and vineyards, and amidst their carousals, cursed Abimelech. Gaal, to excite their rage, cried, What a silly fellow is this Abimelech, a Hebrew bastard, that we should serve him? Let us make some descendant of Hamor, the father and ruler of the city. He insolently wished they would make him their captain, and he would quickly dethrone Abimelech. Zebul, Abimelech's deputy in the city, informed him of all these things. Next morning he appeared with an army on the adjacent hills. For a time Zebul imposed on Gaal, as if he took the tops of the mountains for men; but when he could no longer dissemble, he upbraided him, and bade him, who lately boasted of his superiority, go and fight Abimelech. Gaal and his friends being defeated, Zebul expelled them from Shechem. Judg. ix. 26—41.

GĀ'ASH; a hill in the lot of Ephraim, southward of Timnath-Serah. At the foot of this mountain was probably the brook or valley of Gaash, where Hiddai, or Hurai, one of David's worthies was born. Josh. xxiv. 30. 2 Sam. xxiii. 30. 1 Chron. xi. 32.

GAB'BA-THA; a place in Pilate's judgment-hall, whence he pronounced sentence of death on our Saviour. It was probably a pretty high seat, terrass, or balcony, paved with stone; and hence called the pavement. John xix. 13.

GABRI-EL; a noted angel of God. For three weeks, he conflicted with the prince of Persia; either some evil angel occupied at the Persian court, or rather the Persian king, whose counsels against the Jews he opposed and frustrated, and meanwhile, forwarded the ruin of Persia. Dan. x. 13, 20. He explained to Daniel his visions of the four beasts, of the ram and goat; he declared the time of our Saviour's appearance on earth, and his death, and the fearful consequences thereof to the Jewish nation. He informed him of the ruin of the Persian empire, and of the wars between the Grecian kings of Egypt and Syria, and of the distress of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, and of the rise and fall of Antichrist, and of present adversity and future restoration of the Jews. Dan. vii—xii. He informed Zacharias of the birth of his son John Baptist, and of his punishment of dumbness till he was born. He afterwards informed the Virgin Mary of her conception and birth of the Messiah; and told her, her cousin Elizabeth was in the sixth month of her pregnancy. He admonished Joseph to retain his wife, to flee into Egypt, and to return thence after the death of Herod. Luke i. Matt. i. and ii.

GAD, the son of Zilpah, the handmaid of Leah; so called to signify that a troop, or good fortune, was coming. Gen. xxx. 9—11. He had seven sons, Ziphion, Haggai, Shuni, Ebzon, Eri, Arodi, Areli, all of whom were fathers of numerous families. Gen. xvi. 16. Num. xxvi. 15—18. When this tribe came out of Egypt under their prince Eliasaph, the son of Ducl, it amounted to 45,650, but it decreased 5150 in the wilderness. Their spy to search the promised land was Geuel, the son of Machi. Num. xiii. 15. They, with the Reubenites, petitioned for, and obtained their inheritance from Moses on the east of Jordan, between the Reubenites on the south, and the Manassites on the north. Deut. xxii. and xxxiii. 20, 21. Their warriors assisted in conquering Canaan westward of Jordan; and from mount Ebal they gave their assent to the curses of the law. Josh. i. 12. and iv. 12. Deut. xxvii. 13. After seven years they returned to their homes. Josh. xii. Eleven captains of this tribe, swimming through Jordan when high swollen came to David in the hold, and routed some Arabs, or Philistines, they found in the valley of Jordan; and great numbers of them attended at David's coronation. 1 Chron. xii. 8—15, 37, 38. The situation of the Gadites exposed them to terrible attacks from the Syrians and Arabians, but in the issue they were often victorious. About the time of Jeroboam the Second, they cut off a prodigious number of the Arabian Hagarites and seized on their cattle and country. Gen. xlix. 19. Deut. xxxiii. 20. When Tiglath-pileser transported the Gadites and Reubenites to Assyria, the Ammonites and Moabites seized on their country. 1 Chron. vi. 18—26. Jer. xlix. 1. and xlviii. 18—24.

2. GAD, a prophet that attended David in his persecution by Saul, and afterwards. In the first year of David's exile, Gad divinely admonished him to depart from the country of Moab into the land of Judah. 1 Sam. xxii. 5. When David numbered the people, Gad, in the name of the Lord offered him his choice of three plagues, famine, pestilence, or war, and when David had chosen the pestilence, and by humble prayer, obtained the shortening thereof, Gad, by the Lord's direction, ordered him to build an altar in the thrashing-floor of Araunah. Gad wrote a history of David's life. 2 Sam. xxiv. 1 Chron. xxi. and xlix. 29.—GAD was also a name given to the country of the Gadites, and to the river Arnon, that ran through part of it. 1 Sam. xiii. 7. 2 Sam. xxiv. 5.

GAD, to go hither and thither. The Jews gadded about to change their way; they changed their gods, leaving the true God to worship idols: now they applied to the Assyrians, and anon to the Egyptians, for help. Jer. ii. 26.

GAD'ARA; a celebrated city, Josephus says it was the capital of Perea, and about eight miles eastward of the sea of Tiberias; and in it Pompey, about A. M. 3948, erected one of the five principal Jewish courts. The Gadarenes who inhabited it, being a mixture of Jews and heathens, fed great numbers of swine; or living on the borders of the heathens, they fed them to sell them to the heathens. When Christ, in healing two possessed persons, suffered the devils to enter their herd of swine, and drown them, instead of accepting the punishment of their iniquity, they besought our Saviour to leave their country; and, about forty years after, had their city burnt to ashes by the Romans. Mark v. Luke viii. 26, &c. Matthew, chap. viii. 28. calls this the country of the Gergesenes, because Gergesa was the name of the country where Gadara stood, or was a city near to Gadara; and Christ healed the possessed men on the border betwixt the two, or in a place common to both.

GAIN; profit; advantage. Luke xix. 15. Men gain when they make profit seeming or real. Job xxvii. 8. To gain men is to be instrumental in converting them from sin and danger to Jesus Christ and his way. Matt. xviii. 15. 1 Cor. ix. 19—22.—To GAIRNAY, is to refuse, contradict. Rom. x. 21.

GAI'US; a noted Christian, baptized by Paul at Corinth, and in whose house Paul lodged when he wrote to the Romans. He sent his salutation to them. He and Aristarchus, both originally Macedonians, accompanied Paul to Ephesus, where, in the mob raised by Demetrius, they were dragged from their lodging to the theatre; but it seems received no remarkable injury. 1 Cor. i. 14. Rom. xvi. 23. Acts xix. 29. Whether he was the same with Gaius of Derbe, Acts. xx. 4. or with that hospitable person to whom John directed his third epistle, we know not.

GALATI-A; a province of Lesser Asia; bounded on the west by Phrygia; on the north by Paphlagonia; on the east by the river Halys; on the south by Lycaonia. It anciently contained twenty-two celebrated cities, viz. Gordium, Ancyra, Pessinus, &c. It received its name from the Gauls, or Galatæ, who, when their country of France, and places adjacent, were overstocked with inhabitants, after ravaging Italy and Greece, entered Asia, and pillaged the country, as far southward as Babylon; but 120,000 of them being defeated there by a handful of Jews, and Attalus king of Pergamus having forced them from his territories, they settled here. Some ages before the birth of our Saviour, and even four hundred years after, they spoke much the same language as that then used at Trier in France. About A. M. 3824, the Romans ravaged Galatia; and about A. D. twenty-five reduced it, and some places adjacent, into a Roman province. About A. D. 266, it was terribly ravaged by the Goths. After the Romans, the Saracens, and the Turks became lords of the country. The gospel was preached here, and Christianity planted by the apostle Paul. Acts xvi. 6. and xviii. 23. Gal. i. 2. He had scarce left the country, when some Judaizing teachers stirred up the people to despise him, and to seek justification by the works of the law, and the observation of the Jewish ceremonies. To vindicate his own character, refute these heresies, and direct the Galatians to the peaceful and proper duties of Christianity, he wrote them an excellent epistle. For about nine hundred years, the churches of Galatia were not inconsiderable. We find a great number of bishops, and some councils or synods, among them; but, for these 800 years past, the tyranny of the Mahometan Saracens and Turks has almost buried Christianity in oblivion.

GALBANUM; a fat gum, or sweet spice, and one of the ingredients of the Jews' sacred perfume: Exod. xxx. 34. It was extracted from a plant much like the large fennel; which grows in mount Amanus in Syria. It was probably different from our ill-smelling galbanum.

GALILEE; a large and fertile territory of the north parts of Canaan. The Lower Galilee lay on the west of Jordan, and sea of Tiberias, and contained the portions of Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Asher. Upper Galilee lay eastward of the Jordan, and took in a great part of the lot of the eastern half-tribe of Manasseh, if not more. It was called Galilee of the Gentiles; because it bordered on the heathen countries of Syria and Arabia; and, it seems great numbers of gentiles dwelt along with the Jews in it. Solomon gave twenty cities of Lower Galilee, called the land of Cabul, to Hiram king of Tyre; and here Jonah and Nahum the prophets were born. Benhadad, and, after him, Tiglath-pileser, terribly ravaged the land of Galilee. 1 Kings ix. 11. and xv. 20. 2 Kings xiv. 25. and xv. 20. Nah. i. 1. After the Jews returned from Babylon, the Samaritans kept possession of Samaria, or the portions of Ephraim, and the western Manassites; but the Jews spread themselves into Galilee, and into the country called Perea, beyond Jordan. In Galilee our Saviour, and most of his disciples were educated, and here he chiefly preached and wrought his miracles. Here he was transfigured, and afterwards seen of five hundred followers, after he had risen from the dead; and from this country he and they were sometimes called Galileans. Luke xxiii. 6. Acts ii. 7. Isa. ix. 2, 3.

The GALILEANS, in general, bore no good character for religion, John vii. 52; but they were very intrepid and daring. They were the first to rebel against the Romans, and thereby brought terrible calamities of sieges, ravage, and bloodshed, on themselves. About A. D. 10, or sooner, one Judas, a native of Golan, in Upper Galilee, instigated a number of his people to resist the raising of the Roman tax, for which they had been inrolled about ten years before. They formed into a kind of sect, called Galileans. They held much the same sentiments as the Pharisees, but were more active to put them into execution. They considered it quite unworthy a Hebrew to pay a tax to heathens. These began the war with the Romans, which was never quite extinguished till the overthrow of the Jewish nation. Even the more quiet people of the country often suffered, as if they had been of this sect. When some Galileans attended the worship of God at Jerusalem, at one of the festivals, Pilate barbarously murdered them in the court of the temple, and mingled their blood with the sacrifices. To render our Saviour obnoxious, his accusers represented him to Pilate as a Galilean, that went about stirring up the nation to a revolt, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar. Luke xiii. 1. and xxiii. 2.

GALL; a herb or root much like our hemlock. It is exceedingly bitter; and was given, mingled with vinegar, to our Saviour on the cross. Psal. lxxix. 21. Any thing very bitter or disagreeable is likened to it, as a part or juice of the animal body. Job xvi. 13. and xx. 25. Injustice, oppression, and such wicked works, are likened to gall: how offensive and detestable to God! how hurtful and ruinous to men! Amos vi. 12. Deut. xxxii. 32. A state of sin is called the gall of bitterness, and bond of iniquity. Acts viii. 23. Most grievous troubles are called gall. Jer. viii. 14. and ix. 15. Lam. iii. 5, 19. The wicked man's meat, and other outward enjoyments, are turned into the gall of asps within him; they tend to ruin and destroy him, and oft his conscience is terribly tormented, for the unlawful manner of procuring them. Job xx. 14.

GALLERIES; upper rooms. Christ's ordinances are likened to them: they are lightsome, pleasant, and refreshful, and in them the saints hold him by their faith and love. Sol. Song vii. 5. The same word is rendered rafters, and watering-troughs. Sol. Song i. 17. Gen. xxx. 38, 41.

GALLEY; a ship rowed with oars. The enemies of the Jews, and the Assyrian army in particular, are likened to *galley*s, or gal-lant, i. e. large and magnificent ships. Isa. xxxiii. 21.

GALLIM; a city of the Benjamites, about three or four miles north of Jerusalem, and near Anathoth. Here lived Phalti, the husband of Michal, David's wife; and here the inhabitants were terribly affrighted and harassed by Sennacherib's troops. 1 Sam. xxv. 44. Isa. x. 30.

GALLIO, the brother of Seneca, the famous moralist, and the adopted son of Lucius Junius Gallio, from whom he received his name. Under the emperors Claudius and Nero, he was proconsul, or deputy governor of Achaia. About A. D. 54, when the Jews, enraged at PAUL's converting many of the Corinthians to Christianity, dragged him to Gallio's tribunal, as guilty of teaching men to worship God contrary to the Roman law, as Paul was going to answer for himself, Gallio, being of a temper extremely mild, calmly told the Jews, that had their charges against Paul been of a criminal nature, he would have thought himself obliged to give them a hearing: but since they only related to idle disputes about their law, he ordered them directly out of his presence. The heathen Greeks, glad of an opportunity of affronting the Jews, laid hold on Sosthenes, the chief ruler of their synagogue, and beat him before the tribunal, without Gallio's concerning himself in the affair. Acts xviii. 12—17. Not many years after, Gallio and his brother were murdered by the order of Nero.

GA-M'LI-EL; a noted Pharisee, and doctor of the Jewish law, at whose feet Paul was brought up. When, not long after our Saviour's ascension, the Jewish council was on the point of murdering the apostles, Gamaliel advised to let them alone; for if they were impostors, their folly would quickly appear, and their project come to nought, as had happened in the case of Judas and Theudas: but if their cause was of God, all opposition to it amounted to a fighting against God. With this speech he persuaded the council to spare their lives. Acts xxii. 3. and v. 34—40. It is said that Gamaliel was the son of the famous Hillel, and the uncle of Nicodemus, and for thirty-two years president of the Jewish sanhedrim. What is further said of his conversion to Christianity and of the share he had in the honourable burial of Stephen, we pass as unworthy of regard.

GAMMA-DIMB were not dwarfs of a cubit long, as some have pretended, but the inhabitants of some place in Phœnicia; either of Ancon, in Hebrew Gamad, a cubit; or of Gammade, which Pliny corruptly calls Gamale. They served as soldiers in his towers of Tyre; and Hiller, in the Onomasticon, thinks their name imports them to have been left-handed. Ezek. xxvii. 11.

GAP; a breach made in a dam or hedge. The Jewish false prophets did not stand in the gap, or make up the hedge: they did nothing tending to stop the course of wickedness, which opened a door for the vengeance of God to break in upon their nation; nor did they, with effectual fervent prayer, intercede with God to turn away his wrath. Ezek. xlii. 5. and xxii. 30.

To GAPE upon one, imports a strong desire cruelly to undo one's property, reputation, or life, in the manner of a wild beast. Job xvi. 10. Psal. xxii. 12, 13.

GARDEN; a place enclosed, and much cultivated, for the bringing up of herbs, flowers, and fruitful trees. That of Eden was the most famous, and is called the garden of the Lord, because he planted it. Gen. ii. 7. and xiii. 10. Joel ii. 3. In Isaiah's time, the Jews sacrificed in gardens upon altars of brick, and performed a variety of impious lustrations. Isa. i. 29. lxx. 3. and lxxvi. 17. The church is likened to a garden, she is taken from the waste soil of sinful mankind. Not naturally, but by the gracious implantation of God, is every thing useful in her; in her are a variety of precious saints, these lilies, herbs, and trees of righteousness; and in each of them is a garden of God, planted with graces and good works. She is regulated by divine ordinances and laws; fenced about with divine protection and government; is watered with the rain, dew, and river of God's love, word, and spiritual influence; and is purged from corruptions by ministers and providences. As Jesus plants and owns her, so he takes great pleasure in her; and her whole tendency is to honour him. And she is called gardens, because of her various worshipping assemblies. Sol. Song iv. 16. and v. 1. and viii. 13.

GARLANDS; a kind of crowns made of flowers, ribands, &c. Those brought by the priest of Jupiter were probably designed to crown the ox destined for sacrifice, in like manner as the Jews crowned their victim of first-fruits with olive-branches. Acts xiv. 18.

GARLIC; a plant whose flower is of the lily kind, and consists of six leaves, with a pistil in the centre, which at last becomes a roundish fruit, divided into three roundish cells, each containing seeds of the same figure. The flowers are collected into round heads, and the roots are covered with a kind of skin. Tournefort mentions thirty-eight sorts of garlic. It is an extremely active and penetrating medicine; and ought to be used when fresh and full of juice. It is useful to kill worms in the belly, to cure colics and suppressions of urine, and to promote expectoration in asthmas, and catarrhs of the breast; but, if it is used in too large quantities, it is apt to inflame the bowels. Whether that, so much eaten, and even worshipped in Egypt, had the same virtues as ours, we know not. Numb. xi. 5.

GARMENT. See CLOTHES.

GARNER. See STORE-HOUSE.

GARNISH; to cover over; deck beautifully. 2 Chron. iii. 6. Job xxvi. 13.

GARRISON. (1.) A place where soldiers are posted to defend it, or to protect, or keep in subjection the country round about. 1 Sam. xliii. 23. (2.) The bands of soldiers posted in such a place, or for such an end. 2 Cor. xi. 32. 2 Sam. viii. 6.

GASHMU, or GESHEN. See SANBAL-LAT; NEHEMIAH.

GATE; the entrance into a city, court, house, &c. Judg. xvi. 3. As the gates of cities were the most public places of intercourse, judges anciently held their courts at them. Deut. xvii. 5, 8. and xxv. 6, 7. Ruth iv. 1.; and sometimes gate is put for the power or work of judging. Prov. xxii. 22. To open the mouth in the gate, is to judge, or speak sensibly in public companies. Prov. xxiv. 7. Gates mourn, when there are no people to frequent them, and the judges and governors are destroyed. Isa. xiv. 31. Jer. xiv. 2. Men exalt their own gate, when they talk boastfully, build magnificent houses, and live beyond their ability. Prov. xvii. 9. To reprove in the gate, is to judge causes, or give faithful, public, and authoritative reproofs. Prov. i. 21. Isa. xxix. 21. To possess the gates of enemies, is to have dominion over them. Gen. xxiii. 17. The gates of God's courts are called gates of righteousness; by them the righteous nation of Israel went in before God, to praise him for his goodness. Psal. cxviii. 19. The gates and lasting doors of the temple, opening to receive the sacred ark, typified Jesus' abundant and solemn entrance into heaven at his ascension; and prefigured our receiving him with the full consent of our soul. Psal. xxiv. 7, 9. The gates and doors of the temple and tabernacle, represented him as in his person, righteousness, and intercession, the means of our access to the favour and fellowship of God, and of our communion with his church; and he is the twelve pearly gates of the new Jerusalem; by him there is a most precious, constant, and abundant access to God, for all the tribes of his people; and full access for sinful men, from every part of the earth. 2 Chron. viii. 14. Ezek. xi. xli. xliii. and xlvi. 31, 32. Rev. xxi. 12, 13, 21, 25. Christ and the work of regeneration, and faith by union with him, are a strait gate by which we must strive to enter in: by this alone we enter into a new-covenant state of grace and glory; nor can we enter it with one reigning lust. Matt. vii. 13. Luke xiii. 23. Isa. liv. 12. Christ's ordinances of preaching, baptism, &c. are gates and doors; now open and accessible to every nation and kind of men, and by them we have access to fellowship with God and his church: they are praise, when thereby wonderful mercies are bestowed, and church-members strongly disposed to praise God for his kindness, even in the most open manner. Their not being shut by day, but open continually, may not only denote men's ready access to the church, but her perfect safety, and abundant peace. Prov. i. 22. and viii. 34. Isa. lx. 11, 18. Rev. xxi. 25. And in, or at these gates of ordinances, are the saints' pleasant fruits of grace and good works laid up for Christ. Sol. Song vii. 13. Gates of brass, and bars of iron, import strong help and full protection; or impediments apparently insurmountable. Psal. cxlvii. 13. and cvii. 16. The gates of hell, that cannot prevail against Christ's church are the whole power and policy of hell; the whole legions of evil angels, and their unnumbered agents of erroneous and wicked men. Matt. xvi. 18. The gates of death, or the grave, are sore troubles, near approaches to death and the grave. Psal. ix. 13. Isa. xxxviii. 10. The gates of the river may be the bridges on it. Nah. ii. 6.

GATH, or GRTH, the inhabitants of which were called Gittites, was a celebrated city of the Philistines, about fourteen miles south of Joppa, five from Ekron, and thirty-two west of Jerusalem. It was very ancient; for, while the patriarch Ephraim was alive, about A. M. 2360, the men of Gath made a descent on the land of Goshen, carried off part of the Hebrews' cattle, and murdered several of Ephraim's sons, but were repulsed by the Benjamites. 1 Chron. vii. 21. and viii. 13. Here Goliath, and his gigantic brethren were born. Achish, to whom David twice fled for protection, was king of it. 1 Sam. xvii. and xxi. and xxvii. About eight or ten years after, David reduced it. 2 Sam. viii. 1, 2. Rehoboam fortified it for Judah. 2 Chron. xi. 8. About the time of Jehoram, it seems to have been recovered by the Philistines; but Hazael, king of Syria, took and demolished it. 2 Kings xii. 17. Uzziah took it from the Philistines, and broke down the wall of it. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6; they retook it under Ahaz, and Hezekiah recovered it to Judah. 2 Kings xviii. 8. Since which time it appears to have been of small note. About seven hundred and fifty years ago, Fulk, king of Jerusalem, built a castle on its ruins.

GATH, or GIT-TAH-HEPHER; a city of Galilee, noted as the birth-place of the prophet Jonah. Josh. xix. 13. 2 Kings xiv. 25. Jerome says, it was two miles from Sephoris or Decapolis. There were two Gathrimmons; one in the lot of Dan, and westward from Jerusalem, and another in the lot of the western half-tribe of Manasseh; both were given to the Levites of Kohath's family. Josh. xxi. 24, 25. In a country so full of vineyards as Canaan was, we need not wonder to find a variety of cities named Gath, or wine-press.

GATHER. (1.) To bring or come together. Zeph. ii. 1. (2.) To collect for the poor. 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Christ gathers lilies, when he brings his chosen into a state of grace; when he operates, and delights in their graces and good works; or when he transports them by death to his celestial garden above. Sol. Song vi. 2. He gathers his myrrh with his spices, and eats his honey-comb with his honey, and drinks his wine and milk, when he brings near to his people his promises and blessings, and takes delight in their exercise of faith thereon. Sol. Song v. 1. He gathers sinners to himself, when, by his preached gospel, and holy Spirit, he powerfully draws and unites them to his person, and instates and preserves them in favour and fellowship with him. Matt. xxiii. 37. Those gather with Christ, that promote the true interests of religion, and welfare of men's souls. Matt. xii. 30. Luke xi. 23. The gathering of the people was to Judah, as, at the three solemn feasts, the Hebrew tribes went up to Jerusalem; and their gathering was and is to Shiloh, when multitudes attended his instructions; multitudes, chiefly of gentiles, believe on and walk in him. Gen. xlix. 10. The daily gathering of the manna on the mornings of the labouring-days, prefigured our early and constant attendance on Christ's ordinances, and our receiving his person, righteousness, and benefits, for the portion of our soul; and all such as do so, have an equal interest in Christ, and his fulness. Exod. xvi. 26. 2 Cor. viii. 13—15. To have one's soul gathered with sinners, and his life with bloody men, is to be shut up in their company, to share in their plagues, and be carried into hell with them. Psalm. xxvi. 9. The Jews gathered wares out of the land, when they carried up their goods to Jerusalem for fear of the Chaldeans, and when they prepared for going into flight or captivity. Jer. x. 17.

GAZA. (1.) A city of the Ephraimites, whose true name perhaps was Adazzah. 1 Chron. vii. 28. (2.) GAZA; a city near the south-west point of Canaan; and about two miles and a half from the Mediterranean sea, sixty south-west of Jerusalem, and a hundred and fifty-seven north-west from Elath. It was anciently a city of the Philistines, but was given to the tribe of Judah, who conquered it, and Askelon, and Ekron, after the death of Joshua. Judg. i. 18. But the Philistines retook it, and kept possession of it till the reign of David. SAMSON carried the gates of it almost to Hebron, and afterwards was imprisoned, and died in it, along with many of the inhabitants, called Gazites, or Gazathites. Judg. xvi. David reduced it. About a hundred and fifty years afterwards, the Gazites revolted; and, during the disasters of Judah, they sold or betrayed many of the Jews to the Edomites. Whether Uziah or Hezekiah retook it is not certain; but it seems that Shalmaneser or Sennacherib, kings of Assyria, took it, and burnt part of it with fire. Amos i. 6, 7. Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, seized it. Jer. xlvii. 1. Not long after, it fell into the hand of the Chaldeans, and after them the Persians. About A. M. 3670, Alexander took it, after a siege of two months; and, in the most barbarous manner, dragged the brave commander of the Persian troops around it alive, and destroyed the place. Zeph. ii. 4. Zech. ix. 5. Probably it was never after rebuilt. Acts viii. 26. The Gaza, which belonged to the Greek sovereigns of Egypt, and was sacked by Antiochus the Great, and which the Macedonian generals several times wrested from the Syrian Greeks, and which, by Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, was raised to the ground, but rebuilt by the emperor Gabinius, the Roman, and given by the emperor Augustus to Herod the Great, was probably little Gaza, or Majuma, that stood about three miles from the other on the sea-shore, and had been the sea-port to it. Here the people were obstinate heathens, and had a noted deity called Marnas, which was worshipped in a magnificent temple. Reland, and some others, think this new Gaza was about the spot of the old city, and quite different from Majuma. During the first six centuries of Christianity, there appears to have been a church in this place; and mention is made of its bishops as present at some of the ancient councils. Here Constantine built a stately church, and called the city Constantia, from the name of his son, and made it a free city; but Julian deprived it of all its privileges, about thirty or forty years after. Some report that it is at present in a pretty flourishing condition; but if so, it must be since 1707, when Sir Paul Lucas saw it little better than a heap of ruins, with about four hundred poor people nestling among them.

GAZE; to look upon a thing with curiosity. Exod. xix. 21. Persons are made a gazing stock, when set up by men, or by the providence of God, as if to be looked upon with curiosity and contempt. Nah. iii. 6. Heb. x. 33.

GEBAL; the inhabitants of which were in the grand alliance against Jehoshaphat king of Judah. There appears to have been a twofold Gebal, one to the south of Canaan, the same with the country of Amalek. The Chaldee and Samaritan versions call mount Seir, Gebal. Josephus mentions the Gobelitis, or Gobolitis, and Stephanus Gabalene in these quarters. The other was a hill and city, perhaps the same as Byblus, in Phœnicia. Pliny calls it Gabale; and it is now called Gibyle. This was the land of the Gibelites. Josh. xiii. 5. From hence Solomon had his Tyrian stone-squarers, or Giblites. 1 Kings v. 18. The ancients of Gebal were occupied in repairing and making the Tyrian ships. Ezek. xxvii. 9. Byblus was anciently a magnificent city, famous for a temple to Adonis or Tamuz; but now, though it has a wall and ditch around it, with some square towers, it is a very poor place, remarkable for nothing but the stately ruins of fine pillars, scattered up and down in the gardens.

GED-A-LIAH, the son of Ahikam, a Jewish prince, who went over to the Chaldeans a little before the destruction of Jerusalem. Nebuzaradan, the Chaldean general, made him governor of the poor people that were left in the land of Judah. Jeremiah and Baruch retired to him at western Mizpah; numbers of the Jews, who had fled into the land of Moab and Ammon, came and put themselves under his protection: he assured them of safety, provided they would live peaceably. Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, instigated by Baalis king of the Ammonites, came to murder him, and set up for himself, Gedaliah was timely informed of his horrid intention, but would not believe it; and generously entertained Ishmael and his attendants. Scarcely was the feast ended, when Ishmael and his party murdered Gedaliah, and all that were present at that time, whether Jews or Chaldeans. The remnant of the Jews who were under his protection, fearing that Nebuchadnezzar would impute to them the murder of his deputy, retired into Egypt, notwithstanding all the prophet Jeremiah could say to hinder them. 2 Kings xxv. 22. Jer. xl—xliii.

GEDER; probably the same with Gederah and Gedor. It seems that near to it the Simeonites smote the Amalekites; and so it must have been a city about the south-west point of Canaan. Josh. xii. 13. and xv. 58. 1 Chron. iv. 39.

GE-D'ROTH, and GE-DE'RAH, or GE-DE-ROTHA'IM; two cities of the tribe of Judah; the former of which, lying in the plain south-west of Jerusalem, was taken by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz. Josh. xv. 21, 26. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.

GE-HA ZI, had probably been the servant of Elijah. It is certain he attended Elisha for some time. He tried to recover the Shannamite's son, by laying his master's staff on him; some time after, his love of money tempted him to run after Naaman the healed leper, whom his master had freely dismissed, and to demand some money and clothes of him in his master's name; he readily obtained more than he asked; but Elisha, highly displeased with his conduct, rebuked him; and by a solemn curse, laid him and his posterity under the leprosy. He was immediately infected, and left his service. But it seems, that about five or six years after, he conferred with Jehoram king of Israel, concerning Elisha's miracles. 2 Kings iv. and v. and vii.

GENDER. (1.) To get with young. Lev. xix. 19. Job xxi. 10. (2.) To breed; bring forth. 2 Tim. ii. 23. Gal. iv. 24.

GENEALOGY; a list of ancestors. That the Messiah's descent from Abraham, Judah, and David, according to the promise, might be clearly manifested, God instigated the Hebrews to a careful preservation of their genealogies. Josephus avers that his nation had an uninterrupted succession of priests for about 2000 years; and that the priests in Judea, and even in Chaldaea and Egypt, were, amidst all the ravages of war or persecution, careful to preserve their genealogy. Such priests, after the captivity, as could not produce their genealogies, were excluded from officiating. In the first part of the Chronicles, we have genealogies carried on for more than 2500 years. 1 Chron. i. iii. and vi. Matthew gives us one of about 2000 from Abraham to Christ; and Luke one of 4000 from Adam to Christ. These two are different, as Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph. Luke gives the genealogy of Mary. The variation found in genealogies is owing to several causes. Some persons had several names; different persons had the same name; fathers and sons-in-law, grandfathers, and grandsons, and fathers and sons by adoption, are represented as if proper fathers and sons. When one raised up seed to his brother, the first-born child was the legal son of the one, and the natural son of the other. The ancient Gauls, the Arabs, ancient Scots, and many other nations have been, or are not a little careful to preserve their genealogies. But since Jesus is come in the flesh, there is no reason to give heed to useless or endless registers of descent. Tit. iii. 9. Nor, since the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and the more complete ruin of the Jews by Adrian, can that people produce any genealogy that can be depended on.

GENERAL; that which consists of, or respects many, or all of the kind. Heb. xii. 23.

GENERATION, properly signifies the natural production of animals, &c. In scripture it signifies (1.) Posterity; offspring. Gen. x. 1. (2.) Historical account of the formation, descent, posterity, or life of one. The generations of the heavens and the earth, are the history of their formation. Gen. ii. 4. The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, is a history of his descent, birth, life, and death. Matt. i. 1. The book of the generations of Adam, is the history of his creation and offspring. Gen. v. 1. (3.) A particular order of descent; and hence a race or class of persons alive at the same time; so there were forty-two generations from Abraham to Christ. Matt. i. 2—17. Joseph saw three generations; his own, his children, and his grandchildren. Abraham's seed came out of Egypt in the fourth generation, as Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, or others of the fourth descent might be still alive. Gen. i. 23. and xv. 16. This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled; the people living at the time of Christ's death, were not all dead when Jerusalem and the Jewish nation were ruined by the Romans. Matt. xxiv. 34. In Christ's time, the Jews were a faithless, perverse, and untoward generation. Mark ix. 19. Acts ii. 40. The saints are a chosen generation, a generation dedicated to the Lord, and who seek his face. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Psal. xxii. 30. and xxiv. 6. (4.) When the original for generation is nor, it most properly signifies an age, as Exod. iii. 15; xvii. 16. Psal. xc. 1. and xxxiii. 11. Who can declare his generation? Who can explain the manner of his divine generation by his Father, or even of the Virgin's conception of him, and the union of his natures, or of his resurrection? Or rather, who can reckon the number converted to him, in consequence of his death and resurrection? Who can comprehend his duration as God, or his everlasting continuance as God-man? Who can express the dreadful wickedness of his age, and of the generation he lived among. Isa. liii. 8.

GEN'-NESAR, or GEN-NES'A-RETH; a country or city on the west of the sea of Tiberias. Matt. xiv. 34.

GENESIS. The Hebrews call it, and the other books of Moses, from the first word or words; but the Greeks called it Genesis, or generation, because it relates the history of the creation, and about twenty-four generations descended from Adam. It extends to 2360 years; informs us of God's making the world; of man's happy state, and fall; of the propagation of mankind in the lines of Cain, the murderer of Abel, and of Seth; of the rise of religion, and the general apostasy from it; of the flood, the salvation of Noah's family by an ark, and their reappearing the world; of the origin of nations, and the building of Babel; of the life, and death, and posterity of Nahor, Lot, Abraham, Isaac, Esau, Jacob, and Joseph. Moses might have had a human certainty of the most of what he records in this book. By reason of their long lives, Adam might inform Methuselah, he Shem, Shem Isaac, Isaac Levi, whose grandchild Moses was. But not this, but the unerring inspiration of the Holy Ghost, was the proper ground on which he proceeded, and for which we are to credit his account. No history but this affords any probable account of ancient things, and this has the concurrent testimony of almost every authentic historian we have; as of Abydenus, Berossus, Magasthenes, Polyhistor, Nicolaus, &c. Whether Moses wrote this book while in Midian, or rather when he led the Hebrews through the desert, is not agreed.

GENTILES; HEATHEN; all nations besides the Jews. For many ages before Christ, these nations were destitute of the true religion, and gave themselves up to the grossest ignorance, or the most absurd idolatry, superstition, and horrid crimes. Their most learned men that pretended to wisdom, were absurd in the main, as well as others, and complied with, or promoted the absurd customs they found among their countrymen. They were strangers to the covenants of promise, without God, and without hope in the world, living in subjection to Satan, and in the most horrid, and unnatural lusts. Rom. i. 21—32. 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10. Eph. ii. 2, 3, 12, and v. 8. It was, however, divinely foretold, that in Abraham's seed all nations should be blessed; that to the Saviour they should gather, and become his inheritance, and rejoice with his people, be enlightened and saved by him, and seek to him. Gen. xxii. 18. xlix. 10. Psal. ii. 8. Deut. xxxii. 43. Isa. xlii. 6, 7, and xlix. 5—8. lx. and xl. 10. It was particularly predicted that the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Arabians, Philistines, Egyptians, Ethiopians, Tyrians, inhabitants of the isles, and ends of the earth should believe on him. Psal. lxxxvii. 4. and lxxii. 8—11. lxxviii. 31. xlv. 12. Isa. xix. 18—25, xxxii. 18. lx. 5—7, and lxvi. 19. To prepare matters for the accomplishment of these and other promises, vast numbers, of Jews, after the Chaldean captivity, were left scattered among the heathen. The Old Testament was translated into Greek, the most common language of the heathen. A rumour of the Saviour's appearance in flesh was spread far and wide among them. When Christ came, he preached chiefly in Galilee, where there were multitudes of gentiles; he never extolled the faith of any but gentiles, nor did he ever prohibit them from publishing his fame. On the Greeks desiring to see him, he hinted that, after his death and resurrection, great numbers of gentiles should be brought into the church. Matt. iv. John xii. 20—24. For 1700 years past, the Jews have been generally rejected, and the church of God has been composed of gentiles. Rom. xi. Paul was the apostle, or noted missionary of Christ, for promoting the conversion of the gentiles, as Peter was of the Jews. 1 Tim. ii. 7. Gal. ii. 7. As the nations were of old destitute of the knowledge and worship of the true God, the word heathen or gentile, sometimes denoted such as are without the church, are ignorant, atheistical, and idolatrous; so excommunicated persons are to be held by us as heathen men, and publicans; they must be secluded from the seals of the covenant, and we must keep at all possible distance from them as to civil converse, that they may be ashamed of their wickedness. Matt. xviii. 17. The gentiles who tread the outer court of the church for 1260 years are the Papists, who resemble the ancient heathens in ignorance, idolatry, and superstition. Rev. xi. 2.

GENTLE; quiet; meek, and easy to be entreated. 1 Thess. ii. 7. God's gentleness is his grace, goodness, and mercy, and favours proceeding therefrom. Psal. xviii. 35.

GERAH: the twentieth part of a shekel. It was the least of the Jewish coins. Exod. xxx. 13.

GERAR; an ancient city of the Philistines, near the south-west of Canaan, between Kadesh and Shur, and not far from Beersheba, and Gaza. Its territories extended to Arabia. It was governed by kings called ABIMELECH, whose herdsmen were very troublesome to Abraham and Isaac's servants. Gen. x. 19. xx. and xxvi.

GERSHOM, or GER'SHON, the eldest son of Levi. At the departure from Egypt, his family consisted of 7500 males, of whom 2630 were fit for service. They were stationed at the west end of the tabernacle in the wilderness, and governed by Eliasaph, the son of Lael. Their work was to carry the vails and curtains of the tabernacle, as Ithamar ordered them. Num. iii. 21—25. and iv. 24—28. When they came to Canaan, they had thirteen cities assigned them, viz. Golan and Beeshterah, from the eastern half-tribe of Manasseh, from Issachar, Kishon, Dabareh, Jarmuth, and Engannim; from Asher, Mishal, Abdon, Helkath, and Rehob; from Naphtali, Kedesh, Hammoth-dor, and Kartan, with their suburbs, some of whose names were changed, or perhaps the cities exchanged for others. Josh. xxi. 27—33. 1 Chron. vi. 71—76. As the family of Gershon consisted of two branches, those of Laadan had for their heads, in the days of David, Jehiel, Zethan, Joel, Shelomith, Haziell, and Haran; and those of Shimei, had Jahath, Zinab, Jeshu, and Berial. 1 Chron. xxiii. 7—11. Jehiel's sons, Zetham and Joel, were overseers of the treasures in the house of the Lord. 1 Chron. xxvi. 21, 25.

GESHUR. (1.) A city or country on the south of Damascus, and east of Jordan. Whether the Geshurites were Canaanites or Syrians, has never been satisfactorily explained. Neither Moses nor Joshua expelled them; but Jair, a valiant Manassite, reduced them. Josh. xiii. 11—13. 1 Chron. ii. 23. Nevertheless, they and their neighbours the Maachabites had kings of their own, in the days of David. Talmi then reigned in Geshur, whose daughter Maachah David married, and had by her Absalom. The Geshurites were subject to Ishbosheth: and to Geshur Absalom fled, after he had murdered his brother. 2 Sam. xiii. 37. (2.) Geshur, or Geshuri: a place on the south-east of the land of the Philistines: the inhabitants of this place, David and his warriors slew, while he dwelt at Ziklag. Josh. xiii. 2. and 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, 9.

GETH-SEM'ANE; a small village in the mount of Olives, and where it seems there was an oil-press. Hither our Saviour sometimes retired from Jerusalem; and in a garden belonging to it, he had his bitter agony, and was apprehended by Judas and his band. Matt. xxvi. 36—50.

GEZER; GE'ZER; a city not far from Joppa, on the south-west corner of the lot of Ephraim: but the Canaanites kept possession of it for many ages. Judg. i. 29. There was another Gezer on the south-west of Canaan, the inhabitants of which David and his warriors smote. 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, 9. Possibly these Gezrites might be a colony from north Gezer, and might have changed the name of Gerar into Gezer. These Gezrites, or Gerarites, are probably the Gereans, and Gerenians in the time of the Maccabees. Whether it was south or rather north Gezar, that Pharaoh king of Egypt took from the Canaanites, and burnt with fire, and gave as a dowry with his daughter to Solomon, who repaired it, is not altogether certain. 1 Kings ix. 15, 16.

GHOST, A SPIRIT. See GOD.

GIANTS; persons far exceeding the common stature. The Hebrews called them Nephilim, because of their violent falling on and oppressing of others, and Rephaim, because their terror and strokes rendered men incurable, or dead. Several of the mixed posterity of Seth and Cain were giants before the flood; and it is possibly in allusion to these, that companions of whores and wanderers from God's way, are represented as going to, or remaining among the Rephaim or dead, viz. in hell. Prov. ii. 18 and ix. 18. and xxi. 26. Ham's posterity was distinguished for several families of giants. Eastward of Jordan were the Rephaim of Bashan, whom Chedorlaomer smote at Ashtaroth-Kirnaïm. Og the king of Bashan, who gave battle to, and was entirely routed, and his kingdom seized by Moses, appears to have been the last remains of these; his iron bedstead was fifteen feet four inches and a half in length, and was long after preserved in Rabbah of the Ammonites. Deut. iii. 11. The Emims and Zamzumims were a gigantic people, that were cut off by the Moabites and Ammonites, and their land was seized by them. Deut. ii. 10—21. About the same time there lived a number of giants about Hebron, Debir, and Anab, and in other hill-countries of Canaan. The most noted family seems to have been the Anakims, or children of Anak, of whom Arba the father, Anak the son, and his three sons, Abiman Sheshai, and Tahmai, were the most noted. These giants were a terror to the Hebrew spies; but Joshua, Caleb, and Othniel, cut them off. Numb. xiii. 21, 33. Josh. xi. 21. and xiv. 15. and xv. 13—17. Bochart thinks that part of these Beneanack, fled north to about Tyre, and gave the country the name of Phœnicia. It is more probable that there still remained giants in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod; but whether these were of a Canaanitish or Philistine origin we know not. Josh. xi. 22. In David's time, we find a family of giants at Gath, viz. Goliath, Suph, or Sippai, Ishbi-benob, Lahmi, and another who had six fingers on each hand, and as many toes on each foot; all these were cut off by the hand of David and his servants in several battles. 2 Sam. xxi. 1 Chron. xx. After this, we hear no more of giants in Canaan. Not only the scripture, but almost every ancient writer, as Homer, Herodotus, Diodorus, Pliny, Plutarch, Virgil, Ovid, &c. inform us of giants in the early ages; though proceeding on tradition, they ordinarily overstretch their magnitude.

GIBBE-THON; a city of the tribe of Dan, given to the Levites. Josh. xxi. 23. It lay on the borders of the Philistines. It seems the Levites forsook it, or were driven out of it by Jeroboam the son of Nebat. Soon after which the Philistines seized on it. Both Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, and Elah, the son of Baasha, attempted to wrest it from them; but it is probable that it remained in their hands until the reign of Jeroboam the Second. Josh. xxi. 23. 1 Kings xv. 27. and xvi. 15.

GIB'E-AH, or GIB'EATH; a city at first given to the tribe of Judah, but afterwards to the Benjamites; or there were two or more cities of this name. It is certain there was a place called Gibeah, or the Hill, near Kirjath-jearim. Josh. xv. 57. and xviii. 23. 1 Sam. vii. 1. 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4. Gibeah, in the tribe of Benjamin, was about four or six miles north of Jerusalem, upon a hill. Not long after the death of Joshua, its inhabitants became remarkably wicked. A Levite of mount Ephraim had gone to Bethlehem Judah, to bring back his concubine; her parents detained him some days; but having got off at last with his concubine, they did not choose to lodge with the Canaanites of Jebus, but went forward to Gibeah. So inhospitable were its inhabitants, that nobody offered them a lodging. An old man from mount Ephraim, a sojourner, at last invited them to his house. They had scarcely supped, when the lewd inhabitants demanded the stranger, that they might abuse his body in a manner absolutely unnatural. When no entreaty could prevail, the old man offered them his own daughter, a virgin, and the Levite's wife; the latter was actually put out, and they abused her, till she was at the point of death. On the next morning her husband found her dead on the threshold, carried her corpse home with him; and dividing it into twelve pieces, sent a piece by a messenger to each tribe that they might be inspired with a sense of his wrong, and prepare themselves for revenging the same. When they assembled at Mizpah, a city of Ephraim, about eight miles north of Gibeah, this Levite declared the affair of his treatment at Gibeah. As the Benjamites took the part of the wretches of Gibeah, that tribe was almost wholly destroyed. Judg. xix. and xx. The days of Gibeah denote a time when the most horrid wickedness is committed, and even sanctioned. Hos. ix. 9. and x. 9. Gibeah was then burnt, but rebuilt, and was the royal residence of king Saul; and here the Gibeonites hanged seven of his offspring. 1 Sam. x. 29. and xv. 34. 2 Sam. xxi. 6. The inhabitants of it fled for fear of Sennacherib's army. Isa. x. 29. Hos. v. 8.

GIB'E-ON; a city situated on a hill, about five miles north of Jerusalem. Near to it the Lord rained hailstones, and cast thunderbolts on the Canaanites, while the sun stood over it; and, to commemorate this, there seems to have been a great stone erected. Josh. x. 10. Isa. xxvii. 21. and 2 Sam. xx. 8. Near to it the troops of David and Ishbosheth skirmished, and Asahel was slain. 2 Sam. ii. 13. and iii. 30. Here the tabernacle and altar of burnt offering about that time and afterwards stood. 1 Chron. xxi. 29, 30. and 1 Kings iii. 3, 4; and, long after, Ishmael the son of Nethaniah was taken, and his captives were recovered. Jer. xli. 12. Hannaniah, the false prophet, was a native of it. Jer. xxviii. 1. In the time of Joshua, the Hivites who inhabited Gibeon, Chephira, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim, alarmed with the miraculous passage of the Hebrews through Jordan, and their capture of Jericho and Ai, came to meet them arrayed in old clothes, and with mondy provision, as if they had come from a far country, alarmed with the overthrow of the Amorites beyond Jordan, and begged they would enter into a league with them. After making some objections, the Hebrew princes, without consulting the Lord, made a covenant with them, and partook of their victuals, as a testimony of their friendship. On the third day after, the Hebrews discovered their mistake, by coming to their cities. Being reproached with their fraud, the Gibeonites pleaded in excuse, their impending danger of utter destruction. In terms of the covenant their lives were spared; but Joshua condemned them to the servile but sacred work of hewing wood, and drawing water for the house of God. Five of their neighbouring nations immediately took arms against them for submitting to the Israelites; but Joshua protected them, and cut off their enemies. Josh. ix. and x. Saul, and his subjects, by his orders, had, under pretence of zeal for the Hebrew nation, murdered great multitudes of them. Long after Saul's death, God punished the Hebrews with three years of famine; nor was it removed until the Gibeonites, by David's permission, had hanged up seven of Saul's descendants before the Lord in Gibeah. 2 Sam. xxi. Before or after this, the Gibeonites, and such others as devoted themselves, or were devoted by David, Solomon, or others, to the servile labour of the tabernacle or temple, were called Nethinims. They were carried captive along with the Jews; and it seems most of them, to enjoy an easier life, remained in Casiphia, and places adjacent; but three hundred and ninety-two returned with Zerubbabel, and two hundred and twenty with Ezra, who had their dwelling in Ophel at Jerusalem, and other places; and Zihah and Gispah were their directors. Lev. xxvii. 1-8. Ezra ii. 58. viii. 20. Neh. iii. 26. xi. 21. and x. 28. As they were now too few for their work, the Jews appointed a kind of feast at which they brought wood to the temple.

Did these Nethinims represent Jesus as, for our fraud, condemned to the humblest service of the church, and as the provider of what is necessary to cleanse and inflame our spiritual offerings? Or did they prefigure ministers and saints in their humble but laborious work, content to do any thing for the service of Christ, in which they live near unto God.

GIDEON, the son of Joash, of the western half-tribe of Manasseh, and city of Ophrah. After the Midianites and their allies had, from about A. M. 2752 to 2759, greatly oppressed the Hebrews, eating up their crop, and seizing their cattle, the Hebrews cried to the Lord. By his prophet he reproached them for their ungrateful abuse of their former deliverances; but appeared to Gideon as he was thrashing wheat in a secret place; and assured him that, however mean himself and family were, he should deliver Israel from their present servitude. To confirm his faith of it, he with a touch of his rod, caused fire to come out of the rock and consume the slain kid, and unleavened cakes, all moistened with broth, which Gideon, at his command, had put on it. When the Lord disappeared, he was apprehensive of immediate death, as he had seen an angel; but was assured of God that he was in no danger. He immediately built an altar to the Lord, and called it JEHOVAH SHALOM, i. e. the Lord shall perfect, or send peace. That very night, God directed him to cut down the grove, and demolish the altar which his neighbours had erected for Baal, and to build an altar to God on the rock where the miraculous fire had devoured his provision, and offer one of his father's bullocks on it. With the assistance of ten of his father's servants, he punctually executed these orders. Enraged at this, his fellow-citizens demanded his life: but Joash his father remarked that it ill became the covenant people of God to plead for Baal; and that it was more reasonable that every one who did it should be slain; and that if Baal was truly a God, he ought to exert his power in punishing him who had broken down his altar; and he called his son Jerubbaal, i. e. let Baal contend with him. Understanding that the Midianites to the number of almost 200,000 had crossed the Jordan westward, and were encamped in the valley of Jezreel, at no great distance, Gideon, filled with the Spirit of God, sounded a trumpet, and assembled his friends the Abiezrites; by messengers he required the tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali, to attend him for attacking the Midianites. He had quickly an army of 32,000 men. By a double sign, of bedewing a fleece of wool, while the adjacent ground was dry; and again bedewing the ground, while the fleece was dry, the Lord condescended to confirm his doubtful mind.

Thus assured of victory, Gideon marched his forces directly towards the Midianites. At the well of Harod, his faith was put to a double trial. God ordered him to warn his army, that every body who was in the least timorous should return home; 22,000 departed, and 10,000 remained. That it might be more clearly evident that the victory was wholly of God, he was further ordered to cause all his people to drink out of the river, without using any vessel. (In this trial, only three hundred lapped the water, putting their hand to their mouth. Only these were retained, and all the rest sent home. These three hundred he ordered to provide victuals for some days, and each a trumpet, and a lamp concealed in an empty pitcher. In the night, Gideon, directed of God, went into the Midianitish camp, along with Phurah his servant; there he heard one tell his fellow of his dream, that a barley-cake, rolling from the hill, had overturned their tent; which dream the other explained of Gideon's overthrowing the Midianites. Encouraged by this, Gideon hastened back to his men; and ordering them to imitate himself, they, in three companies, attacked the camp of Midian on different sides. Gideon suddenly cried, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon;" and breaking his pitcher, threw it and the lamp on the ground, and blew his trumpet; all his three hundred men immediately did the same. Filled with terror, the Midianites fled; and taking their friends for foes in the dark, they killed one another. The Manassites, Asherites, and Naphtalites, pursued the fugitives. Excited by Gideon's messengers, the Ephraimites took the fords of Jordan, and slew Oreb and Zeeb, two of the Midianitish kings. Twelve thousand Midianites were slain; and 15,000 still remained in a body, and got over Jordan with Zeba and Zalmunna their kings. Gideon closely pursued them. His men being faint, he desired the elders of Penuel and Succoth, as he passed, to give them some victuals; but they, considering him an enthusiast, for pursuing the Midianites with a small band of men, denied him his request. He overtook the Midianites at Karkor, near the country of Ammon; took the kings prisoners, and smote their army. In his return westward, he chastised the two cities for their barbarity and insult. With thorns and briers he tore the flesh of the princes of Succoth; he killed the chief men of Penuel, and demolished their tower. After finding, that Zebah and Zalmunna had murdered some of his friends or relations at Mount Tabor, he ordered his son Jether to kill them; but the young man fearing, he did it himself. With mild words he pacified the proud Ephraimites, who complained he had not earlier invited their assistance. The Hebrews offered him and his posterity the government of their nation; but he piously declined it, and told them that the Lord was their only rightful Sovereign. At his desire, they gave him the ear-rings of their prey, which amounted to 1700 shekels of gold, or £2380 sterling, with other ornaments. Of these Gideon made an ephod, and placed it in Ophrah. Whether he imagined his being ordered to offer sacrifice constituted him a priest; or intended to consult God by this ephod; or merely designed it as a memorial of his victory, we know not; but it proved an occasion of idolatry to Israel, and of ruin to his family. After judging Israel forty years, he died, A. M. 2798, leaving behind him seventy sons, all of whom were basely murdered by his bastard ABIMELECH. Judg. vi. vii. and viii.

Was our Redeemer prefigured by Gideon? How mean his debased condition! but express, solemn, and seasonable his call to his work, and miraculous the confirmation of it! How important and necessary his work of our salvation! With what ardent zeal he offered his sacrifice, overthrew idolatry, and restored the true love and worship of God! by a few weak and unarmed preachers sounding the gospel-trumpet, and displaying its light and fire from their earthen vessels, he vanquished sin, Satan, the world, and their numerous agents. How kindly he invites us to share with him in his victories! How mildly he pacifies his unreasonable friends! and what terrible vengeance he inflicts on his despisers, of Judah and Rome; and will on all such as deny his poor people supplies in their time of need!

GIFT. (1.) That which is given without any price or obligation. Thus Christ is the unspeakable gift of God: his excellence, usefulness, and fulness of office, righteousness, and salvation, cannot be expressed or conceived by any creature; and God freely gave him for us as our ransom, and gives him to us as our husband and portion. 2 Cor. ix. 15. His righteousness, and the benefits purchased by it, are the free gift, and gift of righteousness. Rom. v. 15—17. The Holy Ghost, and his miraculous influences, are the gift of God. Acts viii. 20. Eternal life, offices in the church, and qualifications for the discharge of them, and every saving blessing are represented as gifts. Such of them as are necessarily connected with union to Christ, are gifts given to his children, never to be recalled; and such as are separable from real grace, are gifts given to servants to be recalled. Rom. vi. 23. Jam. i. 17. Psal. lxxviii. 18. Eph. ii. 8. iv. 8. Ezek. xli. 16, 17. Rom. xi. 29. 1 Cor. xii. 1, 4, 9, 31. and xiv. 1, 12. Heb. vi. 4. (2.) A present between friends, whether given in mere friendship, or to atone for an injury, obtain something desired, or to reward a service. Thus the wise men gave Christ gifts; Matt. ii. 11; Shechem offered Jacob and his sons any gift to obtain Dinah, Gen. xxxiv. 12; Daniel had a gift offered him for his service in reading and interpreting the hand-writing. Dan. v. 17. A gift in the bosom, is one secretly given, which strongly tends to appease anger. Prov. xxi. 14. (3.) Free-will offerings, or other noted services to God, or to idols. Psal. xx. 8. Matt. v. 23, 24. Ezek. xx. 26, 39. (4.) A bribe given to judges, to hire them to pervert judgment; or to others, to instigate them to wickedness. Eccl. vii. 7. Prov. xv. 27. xxix. 4. Ezek. xvi. 33. and xxii. 12. And to take a gift out of the bosom, is to take it secretly. Prov. xvii. 23.

GI'HON. (1.) One of the four heads or branches of the river that watered the garden of Eden, and compassed or ran along the whole land of CUSH. The Arabs call that river that runs north-westward into the Caspian sea, and is the north-east boundary of modern Persia, Gihon; but it cannot be the Gihon of scripture. Calmet and Reland will have the Gihon to be the river Araxes, which, taking its rise in Armenia, near the head of the Euphrates, runs eastward into the Caspian sea. Calvin, Scaliger, and others, suppose it to be the western branch of the mingled Euphrates and Tigris. I am persuaded that Bochart, Wells, &c. are more accurate, who make it the eastern branch that runs along the west side of Cush, Susiana, or Chusistan. Gen. ii. 13. (2.) A celebrated fountain or stream, on the west side of Jerusalem, near to which Solomon was anointed, 1 Kings i. 33; and whose upper or most southern branch or stream Hezekiah enclosed within the walls, or privately conveyed into the city, when he feared the Assyrian siege. 2 Chron. xxxii. 4, 30.

GIL'BO-A; a mountain remarkable for the defeat of the Hebrews, and the slaughter of Saul and his three sons. It lay about sixty miles north from Jerusalem, and six westward from Bethshan, on the south of the valley of Jezreel. Though David, in his elegy, wished its spontaneous fertility turned into barrenness and drought, yet travellers assure us, that rain and dew fall on it, as copiously as on other places. 1 Sam. xxviii. 4. and xxxi. 1. 2 Sam. i. 6, 21.

GILEAD. (1.) The son of Machir, and grandson of Manasseh. His sons were Jezer, Helek, Asriel, Shechem, Shemida, and Hephher, by whom he had a numerous posterity, settled beyond Jordan. Num. xxvi. 29-31. and xxxii. 40. (2.) The father of Jephthah, who also had a numerous family, and might be a descendant of the former. Judg. xi. 1, 2. (3.) A noted range of mountains, stretching almost from Lebanon to the country of Moab, at some distance eastward from Jordan. Whether it originally had its name from Jacob's Gilead, or heap of witness; or from Gilead the son of Machir; it is certain that the whole country pertaining to the Hebrews, eastward of Jordan, and which contained Perea, Golan, Bashan, and Trachonites, was sometimes called Gilead, and the people Gileadites, Num. xxxii. 26; but the northern part of the hill-country was more properly called Gilead. Num. xxxii. 1. Gilead was noted for the best of balm, Jer. viii. 22; xlii. 11. and li. 8; and for the most excellent pasture; and hence a prosperous condition is likened to the pastures of Gilead. Sol. Song iv. 1. Mic. vii. 14. Zech. x. 10. and Jer. i. 19. In the time of JEPHTHAH, it was dreadfully overrun by the Ammonites, who laid claim to a great part of it; and it seems they thought to renew their pretended claim in the days of SAUL. It was not until after the death of Ishbosheth that DAVID was king here. It was often terribly ravaged by the Syrians under Benhadad and Hazael. When the Assyrians carried captive the Hebrews, it was generally seized by the Ammonites and Moabites. After the Chaldean captivity, the Jews, with a mixture of gentiles, dwelt in it. Judg. xi. 2 Sam. ii. 9. Psal. lx. 7. Amos i. 3, 13. We remember no distinguished person of this country, besides Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, and Elijah. (4.) A city called Ramoth-Gilead, and Ramoth-Mizpeh; a strong city near to the place where Jacob and Laban made their covenant, and which was an east frontier to the tribe of Gad. It was a city of the Levites, and of refuge. Josh. xx. 8. and xxi. 38. It seems to have been noted for idolatry. Hos. vi. 8. and xii. 11; as it was for the judgments of God, being a chief cause of contention between the Syrians and the Hebrews in the days of AHAB and JEHU, &c. 1 Kings xxii. 2 Kings viii. 28. and ix. 1.—Thou royal family of Judah art to me as Gilead, and the head of Lebanon; i. e. though you were in as flourishing and stately a condition as the pastures of Gilead, or cedars of Lebanon, I will make you a wilderness, and ruin you. Jer. xxii. 6. Benjamin shall possess Gilead; that tribe, once so weak, shall greatly prosper; part of them, after the Chaldean captivity, or their present dispersion, shall inhabit the country eastward of Jordan. Obad. 19.

GIL'GAL. (1.) A celebrated place, about three miles westward of Jordan, and perhaps about as much from Jericho. Here Joshua had his camp, for some time, after he passed the Jordan; and by circumcising the people, and rolling away their reproach, gave name to the spot. A city was here built. Here Saul had his kingdom confirmed to him, and his ejection from it intimated, and Agag king of Amalek hewed in pieces before his face. 1 Sam. xi. 14, 15. and xv. 33. In the time of Sammel, there was an altar erected here, and sacrifices were offered thereon. 1 Sam. xi. 15. Whether there was an idolatrous regard paid to the place, or any idol erected here in the time of Eglon, from whom, perhaps, Eglon thought he brought his message, is not certain; but towards the decline of the kingdom of the ten tribes, there were idols worshipped here. Judg. iii. 19. Hos. iv. 15. Amos iv. 4. and v. 5. (2.) A city or country about six miles north from Antipatris, and whose ancient kingdom consisted of various nations or tribes. Josh. xiii. 23. There was a village called Gaugulis about this spot, four hundred years after Christ.

GIN. See SNARE.

GIRD; to fasten any thing firm and close about one. 1 Kings xx. 11. As the Jews and other eastern nations wore a loose kind of garments, they made much use of girdles, to tuck up their clothes, and fit them for working or walking. John xiii. 4. 1 Kings xviii. 46. and some of them were very costly and fine, Prov. xxxi. 24. They were often large and hollow, somewhat like the skin of a serpent or eel, and were used as their purses to bear their money. Matt. x. 9. In times of mourning, the Jews laid aside their costly girdles, and used belts of sackcloth, ropes, or the like. Isa. iii. 24. and xxii. 13. Some prophets, as Elijah and John Baptist, that professed continual mourning, wore girdles of coarse leather. 2 Kings i. 8. Matt. iii. 4. Servants' girdles, wherewith they tucked up their long robes, were probably coarse. Luke xii. 37. and xvii. 8. The Hebrew soldiers' belts, wherewith they girded on their arms, went not about their shoulders in the manner of the Greeks', but about their loins, and were supposed to strengthen them. Neh. iv. 18. and Ezek. xxiii. 15. They were generally valuable, especially those of commanders; and hence Jonathan made a present of his to David, 1 Sam. xviii. 4; and Joab represents a girdle as a valuable reward. 2 Sam. xviii. 11. The priests' girdle, at least that of the high-priest, was of fine twined linen, embroidered with gold, blue, purple, and scarlet. Exod. xxviii. 4, 8. Josephus says it went twice about their body, and was fastened before, and the ends hung down to their feet.—God's girding himself imports his giving noted displays of his almighty power, and his readiness to act. Psal. xciii. 1. and lxxv. 8. His girding others with strength or gladness, is his exciting and enabling them to do great exploits, and his filling their heart with joy and pleasure. Psal. xviii. 32, 39. and xxx. 11. He girded Cyrus; encouraged and enabled him to conquer the nations, Isa. xlv. 5; but he looses the bond of kings, and girds their loins with a girdle, when he strips them of their power and authority, and reduces them to the condition of servants. Job xii. 18. Christ's love, power, equity, and faithfulness, are the girdle of his breast or loins, whereby he is qualified for the discharge of his priestly and kingly office; and whereby we hold him by faith. Isa. xi. 5. Dan. x. 5. Rev. i. 13. The Jews are likened to a linen girdle, hid in the bank of the river Euphrates, and marred: after God had caused them to cleave to him by covenant, by profession, and receipt of special favours, he, for their sins, marred them; and by the Chaldean troops, and in the Chaldean captivity, reduced them to a very low condition. Jer. xiii. 1—14. The saints have their loins girded, when they are in constant readiness to receive God's gracious favours, and obey his laws. Luke xii. 35. 1 Pet. i. 13. Their loins are girt about with truth, when they are thoroughly established in the faith and experience of divine truth; are filled with inward candour and sincerity; and pay an exact regard to their promises and vows: how excellently this qualifies them to fight the Lord's battles. Eph. vi. 14. The seven angels that pour out destructive vials on Antichrist, are girded with golden girdles: they are fully furnished with strength and courage, and are ready for and zealous in their work. Rev. xv. 6.

GIRGA-SHITES; a tribe of the ancient Canaanites. Joshua destroyed part of them. Josh. xxiv. 11. It is said, part of them fled off into North Africa; and Procopius tells us of an ancient pillar in that country, whose inscription shewed that the inhabitants had fled from the face of Joshua the ravager. Perhaps the Gergesenes on the east of the sea of Tiberias were the remains of them. See GADARA.

GITTITES; the inhabitants of Gath. Josh. xiii. 3. Perhaps Obed-edom and Ittai, David's friends, were called Gittites, because they resorted to him at Gath; or because they were natives of Gittaim, a city of Benjamin, to which the Beerothites fled after the death of Saul, and which was rebuilt after the captivity. 2 Sam. vi. 10. xv. 19. and iv. 3. Neh. xi. 33.

GITTITH, in the titles of Psal. viii. lxxxi. and lxxxiv. is by some thought to be the name of a musical instrument invented at Gath; by others, to signify a wine-press, and these Psalms to have been sung after the vintage; others think they were sung by virgins born in Gath; others, that they were composed on the defeat of Goliath the Gittite; but this is very unlikely.

GIVE, properly signifies to bestow a thing freely, as in alms. John iii. 16. But it is used to signify the imparting or permitting of any thing good or bad. Psal. xvi. 7. John xviii. 11. Psal. xxviii. 4. To give ourselves to Christ, and his ministers and people, is solemnly to devote ourselves to the faith, profession, worship, and obedience of Jesus Christ, as our husband, teacher, Saviour, portion, and sovereign Lord; and to a submissive subjection to the instruction, government, and discipline of his ministers; and to a walking with his people in all the ordinances of his grace. 2 Cor. viii. 5. To be given to a thing is to be much set upon, earnest for, and delighted in it. 1 Tim. iii. 3.

GLADNESS. See JOY.

GLASS. Anciently looking-glasses were made of polished brass, tin, silver, brass and silver mixed, &c. The brazen laver of the tabernacle was formed of looking-glasses, which devout women had offered. According to Pliny and Tacitus, the Phœnicians were the inventors of glass. According to Diodorus, the Ethiopians very anciently preserved their dead bodies in large glasses. The invention of fire-glasses is commonly ascribed to Archimedes of Sicily, who lived about two hundred years before Christ; but Abulpharaj, an Arabic author, says, the Egyptians knew it not long after the flood. The word and ordinances of God are a glass; in them we see our own sins, wants, or graces; have imperfect views of Jesus and his Father, and of eternal things, and have our heart warmed by them. James i. 23, 25. 2 Cor. iii. 18. When the ceremonial and gospel-ordinances are compared, the former are called a shadow, which gives a very imperfect view of the thing represented: but the latter are called a glass, in which we see spiritual things much more clearly. Col. ii. 17. Heb. x. 1. 2 Cor. iii. 18. The new Jerusalem is likened to transparent glass, for its comeliness and glory, and the delightful views of divine things enjoyed in it. Rev. xxi. 18, 21. The sea of glass, mingled with fire, before the throne of God, on which the saints stand, may denote the righteousness of Jesus mingled with flaming love and fiery sufferings, and which indeed is the support and encouragement of the saints before God: or the glorious gospel, attended with the influences of the Holy Ghost, to uphold and embolden them: or a pure and holy church actuated with burning zeal for the glory of God. Rev. iv. 6. and xv. 2.

GLEAN, to gather ears of corn, or grapes left by reapers and grape-gatherers. Nor were the Hebrews allowed to glean their fields or vineyards, or to goover their trees a second time, but to leave the gleanings to the poor, fatherless, and widow. Lev. xxiii. 22. xix. 10. Deut. xxiv. 21. To glean and turn the hand into the basket, figuratively signifies to kill and take captive such as had escaped the more general overthrow. Jer. vi. 9. Judg. xx. 45. and viii. 2; and hence a small remnant left in a country are called gleanings. Isa. xvii. 6. Jer. xlix. 9. Obad. 5.

GLEDE; a well-known fowl of the ravenous kind. It is called daak, from its swift flight; and raah, from its quick sight. It is impatient of cold, and so is seldom seen in the winter, through fear and cowardice, it seldom attacks any but tame fowls, hens, &c. Deut. xvi. 13. It is called a culture, Lev. xi. 14. Was this unclean bird an emblem of persecutors destitute of courage except to harass and destroy the saints?

GLOOMINESS; a darkening of the air with clouds, or with multitudes of locusts. Joel ii. 2. God's judgments are likened to gloominess, how terrible in their nature! and how ready to fall on transgressors! Zeph. i. 15.

GLORIFY; to render glorious. God is glorified by Christ, or by creatures, when his perfections are acknowledged or manifested by their praising, trusting in him, or serving him; or are displayed in his favours and judgments executed on them. John xvii. 4. Psal. i. 23. Rom. iv. 20. Lev. x. 3. Isa. xlv. 23. Christ is glorified in God's receiving him into heaven, bestowing on him the highest honour, power, and authority, as our mediator, John xvii. 1, 5; and in the Holy Ghost's declaring and revealing his excellencies, and communicating his fulness to men, John xvi. 14; and in his people's believing on him, walking in him, praising, obeying, and imitating him; and his exerting and manifesting his power and wisdom, by doing good to them. 2 Thess. i. 10, 12. and John xi. 4. Men are glorified, when endowed with great and shining holiness, happiness, and honour, in the heavenly and eternal state. Rom. viii. 17, 30. To glorify one's self, is to claim or boast of honour not due to one. Heb. v. 5. and Rev. xviii. 7.

GLORY; the shining forth of excellency. 2 Cor. iii. 7, 9. The glory of God, is either, (1.) The cloud, or visible brightness, whence God spake to Moses or others, and which entered into the temple of Solomon, Exod. xvi. 7, 10. 1 Kings viii. 11; or, (2.) The bright display of his perfections, his holiness, power, wisdom, goodness, &c. Lev. x. 2. Num. xiv. 21. Thus the heavens declare his glory. Psal. xix. 1. Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of his father, by his mighty power, and to the honour of all his perfections of wisdom, equity, goodness, and truth. Rom. vi. 4. (3.) His grace and mercy. Eph. iii. 16. Psal. cii. 16. (4.) The glory ascribed or given to God, is the acknowledgment of his excellencies, by esteeming, loving, trusting in him, commending and praising him, and studying, in all we do, to aim at honouring him, and manifest his perfections to men. Psal. xxix. 1. 1 Sam. vi. 5. Josh. vii. 19. 1 Cor. x. 81. (5.) The glorious state of happiness in heaven which he prepares and bestows. Rom. v. 2. Psal. lxxiii. 24. (6.) An honourable representation of him: thus the man is called the glory of God, as he represents him in his superiority and dominion:—as the woman is also an honourable representation of the man. 1 Cor. xi. 8. The glory of God, that of which mankind by sin have come short, is likeness to him in spiritual knowledge, righteousness, and holiness; actual honouring of him in what they do; and the glorious privileges that had been conferred on them, if they had not sinned. Rom. iii. 23. God is the glory of his people; their relation to him is their great honour; their enjoyment of him is their true and everlasting happiness; and their fellowship with him renders them honourable in the view of others: and in him they glory and exult. Jer. ii. 11. Isa. lx. 19. Zech. i. 5. It is the glory of God to conceal a thing; God sees that it will often tend to his glory, to conceal for a while the reasons of his providential conduct; and to hide pride from men, does not qualify them to understand a matter so quickly or clearly as might be expected. Prov. xxv. 2. Christ's glory is either the manifestation of his divine excellencies, and exalted offices, John i. 14. and ii. 11. and xvii. 5; or the glorious state of his exaltation, Matt. xix. 28. Heb. ii. 9. 1 Tim. iii. 16; or his ministers, who represent him, and publish his excellencies and usefulness to men. 2 Cor. viii. 23. Christ, the gospel, and gospel ordinances, are the glory, the honourable and exalting things, that dwell in a land. Psal. lxxv. 9. Col. i. 27. Christ gave that glory to his apostles which the Father had given to him; he not only rendered them holy in nature, and heirs of eternal happiness, but constituted them preachers and workers of miracles. John xvii. 23. Christ was glorified with his Father himself, and had that glory given him which he had before the world began; when, by his Father's acceptance, and exaltation of him as man, and Mediator, into his immediate presence and throne, the brightness of his divine nature shone clearly through his manhood, and the high grandeur of that office, to which he was set apart from eternity, clearly appeared. John xvii. 5. The glory of the Lord fills the whole earth, when the excellencies of the person and office of Jesus Christ, and of God in him, are clearly preached, and by the Holy Ghost, in his influences and fruits, discovered in Judea, and a multitude of nations. Isa. xl. 5. and vi. 3. The church is called the glory; as she is rendered honourable by her relation to Christ, by his ordinances, Spirit, and saints, and their graces and holy conversation. Isa. iv. 4, 5.

Whatever tends to render a person or people honoured, is their glory. Prov. iii. 35. The ceremonial ark is called glory; it represented the glorious Redeemer; and it was the honourable token of the Jews' peculiar relation to God. 1 Sam. iv. 21. Rom. ix. 4. Saints are the glory of ministers: their conversion and holy walk put great honour on them, as the instruments by which they are produced; and their labour shall be rewarded in the eternal state. 1 Thess. ii. 20. Grace is called glory; it renders saints like to God, and renders their nature and practice comely and honourable. From glory to glory, is from one degree of grace to another. 2 Cor. iii. 18. The Ephesians' perseverance in the Christian faith and practice amidst trials, and Paul's enduring persecution for the gospel which they believed, was their glory, or honour. Eph. iii. 3. The state of eternal happiness is called glory, how surpassing conception are its happiness, brightness, and excellency! what clear views of the blessed God! what adorning privileges it comprehends! Psal. lxxiii. 24. Men's tongue is their glory; when rightly used, it procures them honour, and with it they do, or ought to publish the praises of God. Psal. xvi. 9; xxx. 12; lvii. 8. and cviii. 1. Strength is the glory, or honour, of young men. Prov. xx. 29. Fathers of a good character are the glory, or honour, of their children. Prov. xvii. 6. Rich clothing and shining ornaments were the glory of Solomon. Matt. vi. 29. Wealth, authority, sumptuous buildings, shining apparel, and the like, are the glory of great men. Psal. xlix. 16. Riches, dominion, powerful armies, and fine cities are the glory of a nation, and their kings. Dan. xi. 39. Isa. viii. 7. So Adullam, or Jerusalem, was the glory of Israel. Mic. i. 15. Whatever is most excellent, or is a people's pride, is called their glory. So the captains and best warriors of the Assyrian army are called the glory of Sennacherib's forest, Isa. x. 18; and his high looks, on which he prided himself, is called his glory, ver. 12; and the Egyptians, on whom the Jews depended, and in whom they boasted, are called their glory. Isa. xx. 5. The praise and commendation of men was the glory, or honour the Pharisees sought for. Matt. vi. 2. Shew me thy glory; i. e. more bright and full discoveries of thine excellency, power, wisdom, mercy, and goodness. Exod. xxxiii. 18. God set glory in the land of the living, when he restored the Jews to their own country from Bablyon, and established his temple and ordinances among them; and when Christ appeared in the flesh, and the gospel-church was erected. Ezek. xxvi. 20. After the glory hath he sent me to the nations that spoiled you:—After the Jews' honourable return from Chaldea, and from their present dispersion, my prophecies of divine judgments on your enemies are uttered, or shall be fulfilled; or, after the glorious incarnation of me, the Messiah, shall I be manifested to the gentiles, and cause them to unite into one gospel-church with the Jews. Zech. ii. 8. He hath called us to (or by) glory and virtue:—By the glorious exercise of his power and grace, he hath called us to a glorious state of fellowship with Christ, now and hereafter; and to an active abounding in holiness and in all good works. 2 Pet. i. 3. Thou shalt see the glory of God:—See his power and kindness mightily displayed in raising thy brother. John xi. 40. The gentiles and kings bring their glory and honour into the new Jerusalem: they improve their power, wealth, and reputation, and every thing they have, to promote the welfare of the church on earth; and the saints shall enter heaven full of grace, and to receive the free reward of their good works. Rev. xxi. 24. The ceremonial dispensation, though established in a glorious manner at Sinai, and had much outward pomp, yet it had no glory; i. e. very little comeliness, in comparison of the exalting glory of the gospel-dispensation, wherein Jesus and his fulness are revealed in a way more clear, powerful, and extensive, and more agreeable to the spiritual nature of the things, and of our souls. 2 Cor. iii. 7—11. See BOAST.

GNAI; a small troublesome insect, which often flutters about lighted candles till it burns itself. Sometimes great swarms of them have obliged people to leave their country. Such as are very zealous about trifles, or smaller matters, while they indulge themselves in things evidently heinously sinful, are said to strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel. Matt. xxiii. 24.

GO. When one moves from a lower place to a higher, he is said to go up, as from Egypt to Canaan; from the country about to Jerusalem; from earth to heaven. Gen. xiii. 1. Matt. xx. 18. Psal. xlvii. 6. When his motion is from a higher to a lower, he is said to go or come down: as from Canaan to Egypt; from earth to the sea; or to hell, or the grave; or from heaven to earth. 2 Chron. vii. 1. Gen. xli. 3. Psal. cvii. 23; lv. 11. and xxii. 29. When God is said to go down, or up, it does not mean that he changes his place in respect of his essence, but that his knowledge, or powerful operation, or the symbol of his presence, bears such relation to a particular place. Gen. xi. 5, 7. and xxxv. 13. His goings are the display of his perfections, and the acts of his providence towards the world, towards Jesus, or his church; and in respect of this, he may be said to come to, or go from one. Psal. lxxviii. 24. Christ's goings forth from everlasting, may include his being begotten of the Father, and his appearing as our Surety in the council of peace from all eternity. Mic. v. 2. The prince in the midst of them, when they go in, shall go in; and when they go forth, shall go forth. Jesus, who is among his people, in their heart, always present to assist them, shall go with them, when they go in to the throne of grace, that he may present their petitions, and render them accepted; when they go in to the house of God, he shall go in to feed them on good pasture: when they go in to their heart, to search it, he shall go in to discover it to them, and comfort against all grief on every side. When they go out from public ordinances, he shall go with them, to impress what they have been about on their mind; he shall go out with them to the world, to keep them from the evil; he shall go out of the world with them at death, to introduce them to eternal glory. Ezek. xli. 10. The saints going out and in, denotes their whole conversation, which is by Christ as the door; they have great liberty in him, and live by faith on him. Psal. xvii. 5. and cxxi. 8. John x. 9. Their going out at an opposite gate, not at that by which they entered, imports their making progress in their religious course, by an upright and a uniform conversation. Ezek. xli. 9. Rulers going out and in before their subjects, denotes their whole government of them, and shewing them a proper example. Num. xlvii. 17. 2 Chron. i. 10. To go with one, often signifies to be a companion of his, entered into close fellowship with him. Prov. xxii. 24. Zech. viii. 21, 23. Men's goings are their whole behaviour and condition. Prov. v. 21. Psal. xl. 2: and they are of the Lord, as nothing can be done without the determination and concurrence of his upholding and governing Providence. Prov. xx. 24.

GOAD, a long staff, or wand, for driving cattle with. Judg. iii. 26. It had a piece of sharply-pointed iron in the small end, and perhaps a paddle on the other, to cut up weeds. The words of the wise are as goads; they penetrate into men's minds, and stir them up to the practice of duty. Eccl. xii. 11.

GOAT: a four-footed animal of the sheep kind, much of the same size with the sheep, but with hollow and erect horns, bending a little backward. It is covered with a pale dun hair, which in some eastern countries is spun, and made into cloth, and of it the tabernacle had one of its coverings. Goats are also noted for a long beard. They are much given to wantonness; and sometimes have a very rank smell; they eat serpents and poisonous herbs, but their milk is very medicinal for such as are weak and consumptive; they are mischievous to corn and plants; and their bite hurts the growth of trees; their blood is said to scour rusted iron, and to soften the adamant-stone. Wild goats have often larger horns, and are so swift, that they can run on sides of rocks, and leap from one to another. Under the law, goats were ceremonially clean, and often used instead of a lamb: but they were especially used in the sin-offerings. Num. vii. xxix. Did these sacrificed goats represent Jesus, as, in the likeness of sinful flesh, surety for, and reckoned with transgressors, sacrificed for us? Did the two expiatory goats on the FAST of atonement, the one sacrificed, and the other conducted to the wilderness, represent Jesus in his two natures: the manhood, in which he died, and his Godhead, in which he lived and conquered death? Or the one, his dying for our offences, and the other, his rising again for our justification, and being preached to the gentiles in the wilderness of the people? Lev. xvi.

Princes and great men are likened to he-goats, whose goings are very comely; their station requires them to go before and direct others in an orderly manner; but alas, how often are they wanton, polluted, disagreeable, and mischievous! Zech. x. 8. Jer. l. 8. The GREEKS, (who were also called Egeans, i. e. goatish-people;) are likened to a he-goat with one horn; that, without touching the earth, ran against and trod down the pushing-ram. Under Alexander, their sovereign, they with incredible speed, marched into Asia, and overthrew the Persian empire. Dan. viii. 5. Devils and wicked men are likened to goats; how vile, hurtful, and disposed to climb in pride and self-conceit! Lev. xvii. 7. 2 Chron. xi. 15. Matt. xxv. 33.

GOB; a place on the border of the Philistines, where the Hebrews gave the Philistines two remarkable defeats, and killed two of their giants. Instead of Gob, we have Gezer in another text; which shows that Gob and north GEZER were not far distant, if they were not the same. 2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19. 1 Chron. xx. 4.

GOBLET; a small vessel for holding liquor. The church's navel, her ministers, ordinances, and the inward constitution of her saints, are as a round goblet not wanting liquor; are abundantly supplied with gifts, gospel-truths, and gracious influences, from the fulness of Christ. Sol. Song vii. 2.

GOD, properly denotes a being of infinite perfection. Of the two Hebrew names so rendered, EL, signifies the Strong One; and ELOAH, the Worshipful One; perhaps it is so often used in the plural ELOHIM, to hint at the Trinity of persons; and Hutchison renders the word, the persons in covenant. He is also called LORD, JEROVAH, JAH, &c. We cannot seriously consider the nature of our own soul and body, or the things around us, or events that happen; we cannot attend to the dictates of our consciences concerning good or evil, and how it accuses or excuses us with respect to our conduct; we cannot consider the universal harmony of all nations, however different in interest, or form of devotion, on this head, without being persuaded of some self-existent, and absolutely eternal, almighty, benevolent, but wise and just Being, who has created, and does support and govern all things. But, in our present corrupted condition, we must have recourse to the Bible for a clear and efficacious knowledge of him. There we find, that there is one God, the Creator of all things, Deut. vi. 4. 1 Cor. viii. 6. Psal. lxxxvi. 10. Jer. x. 10, 11. John xvii. 3. 1 Tim. vi. 15. and ii. 5; that he is an eternal spirit, John iv. 24. Heb. xi. 27. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Deut. xxxiii. 27. Psal. xc. 2; that he is infinite, every where present, and incomprehensible in excellencies, Job xi. 7. 1 Kings viii. 27. Jer. xxiii. 24. Psal. viii. 1. and cxxxix. 6—10. Eccl. iii. 11. and viii. 17. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Rom. xi. 33; unchangeable, Exod. iii. 14. Mal. iii. 6. James i. 17; that he knows all things past, present, or to come; and is infinitely wise, to purpose and order things to their proper ends, 1 Sam. ii. 3. Job xxxvi. 4. and xlii. 2. Psal. cxlvii. 5. and cxxxix. 2. Jer. xxxii. 19. Acts xv. 18. Isa. xlii. 9; xli. 22—26; xlv. 10; xlviii. 3. and xl. 13, 14. Job ix. 4. 1 Tim. i. 17; that he is almighty, able to do every thing not base or sinful, Jer. xxxii. 17, 27. Rev. xix. 6. Psal. cxlv. 5. Job ix. 4. &c. 1 Chron. xxix. 11, 12. Gen. xvii. 1. and xviii. 14; that he is perfectly holy, Isa. vi. 3. and xliii. 15. and lvii. 15. Psal. cxlv. 17. Rev. xv. 4. Exod. xv. 11. 1 Sam. ii. 2; perfectly good, kind, merciful, and gracious, Matt. v. 48. Psal. lii. 1. and cxlv. 9. Matt. xix. 17. James i. 17. Exod. xxiv. 6, 7. 1 John iv. 8; perfectly just, true, sincere, and faithful, Psal. xxxvi. 6; cxix. 4; cxix. 137; xcvi. 2. and xcix. 4. Rom. ii. 6. Acts x. 34, 35. Rev. xv. 3. Deut. xxxii. 4. Num. xxiii. 19. Deut. vii. 9. 2 Sam. vii. 28. Tit. i. 2. 1 Sam. xv. 29; that according to his fixed and eternal purpose, he hath created, and by his Providence upholds and governs, all his creatures and all their actions, good or bad. Acts xv. 18. Isa. xlv. 10. Eph. i. 11. Gen. i. 1. Psal. xxxiii. 6. Acts xiv. 17. Heb. xii. 8. Psal. xxxvi. 6; cxxxvi. 25; civ; cvii; cxlv—cxlvii. Job xxii. 10; and xxxvii—xxxix. Acts xvii. 28. Matt. x. 29, 30. Prov. xvi. 33. Amos iii. 6. and iv. 7. Gen. i. 20. Acts ii. 23. and iv. 27, 28. Rom. ix. 17—23.

They also show us, that this one God, necessarily in and of his own infinite, but simple and undivided essence, subsists in three distinct persons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the same in substance, and equal in all divine power and glory. Gen. i. 26; iii. 22. and xl. 7. Isa. vi. 3; lxi. 1, 2. and lxlii. 7—9. Psal. xxxiii. 6. and xlv. 7. Matt. iii. 16, 17. and xxviii. 19. John. xiv. 16. 1 Cor. xii. 4—6. 2 Cor. xiii. 14. Gal. iv. 6. 2 Thess. iii. 5. 1 Pet. i. 3. 1 John. v. 7. Rom. i. 4. Heb. ix. 14. Rev. 4. 4, 5. Concerning the FATHER, we are informed that he is the true God, John. xvii. 3. Eph. i. 3; that from eternity he begat his only Son, Psal. ii. 7; consulted with him, fore-ordained, and set him up as our Surety and Mediator, and entered into covenant with him before the foundation of the world, Prov. viii. 22—31. 1 Pet. i. 20. Acts ii. 23. Isa. xlix. 6—9. and i. 7—9;—he promised, sent, and afterward brought him into the world, Jer. xxxi. 22. Zech. ii. 8—10. Luke i. 35;—he gave him commission and qualified him for his work, John x. 18. and xx. 21. Isa. xi. 2, 3. and lxi. 1, 2. Matt. iii. 16, 17. John i. 33, 35. and iv. 34. Col. i. 19;—he stood by him in care, love, power, and providence, during the whole course of his humiliation. Isa. xlix. 2, 8. and xlii. 1—7;—he spake in, and wrought by him, and bare witness to him, Heb. i. 1. John v. 19—22;—he gave him up to death, and raised him from the dead, Rom. viii. 32. Acts ii. 23, 24. 1 Pet. i. 21;—he crowned him with glory and honour, exalted him to his right hand, gave to him, as Mediator, all power, authority, and judgment, in heaven and on earth, and made him Head over all things to his church, John xvii. 5. Heb. ii. 9. Acts 32, 33. Phil. ii. 9, 10. Matt. xxviii. 18. John v. 22. Eph. i. 20, 21, 23; he promiseth and sends the Holy Ghost, who proceedeth from him, to anoint Jesus Christ, and his prophets, apostles, and people, Psal. xlv. 7. Joel ii. 28. Luke xxiv. 49. John iii. 34. and xiv. 26. and xv. 26:—that he predestinated the elect to holiness and happiness, Rom. viii. 28—30. Eph. i. 4, 5;—he proposed the covenant and terms of their salvation, Zech. vi. 13. Prov. viii. 20—30. Isa. liiii. 10—12. Heb. ii. 10;—having sent his Son, and accepted his reconciling righteousness in their stead, he shows him to them, draws them to him, and reconciles them to himself, Jer. xxxi. 32—34. Matt. xi. 25. Gal. i. 16. John vi. 44. 2 Cor. v. 18—21;—he adopts, quickens, and sanctifies them, Gal. iv. 6. Rom. viii. 11. Tit. iii. 5, 6;—he, by the Holy Ghost, confirms and comforts them, and, in short, brings them to glory, 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. Eph. iii. 20, 21. John x. 28. and xvii. 11. John xiv. 16, 17. 2 Thess. ii. 17. Heb. ii. 10. Rev. vii. 17.

Concerning the Son, we are informed that he is, from eternity, begotten by the Father in a manner no creature is, Psal. ii. 7. John i. 14. Rom. viii. 3, 32;—that he is equal to him as a person, Zech. xiii. 7. Phil. ii. 6, 7;—and one with him in essence, John x. 30. 1 John v. 7. We find names and titles proper only to God ascribed to him, as JEHOVAH, Jer. xxiii. 6. and xxxiii. 16. Isa. xlv. 23—25. with Rom. xiv. 10—12. Isa. xl. 8. with Luke i. 76. Isa. vi. 1, 9, 10. with John xii. 40, 41; and in hundreds of other places, where mention is made of the Lord speaking to prophets, or others, under the Old Testament. He is called God, Matt. i. 23. John i. 1, 2. and xx. 28. 1 Tim. iii. 16. 2 Pet. i. 1: the true God, 1 John v. 20, 21; the great, and mighty God, Tit. ii. 13. Isa. ix. 6; the only wise God, Jude 24, 25. Rom. xvi. 27. 1 Tim. i. 16, 17; the God of glory, Acts vii. 2; the only God, Isa. xlv. 15—25. with Rom. xiv. 11; God blessed for ever, Rom. ix. 5; the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Exod. iii. 6. with Acts vii. 30—32. Hos. xii. 8—5; the Lord of hosts, Isa. lviii. 13, 14. with 1 Pet. ii. 6—8. Psal. cxlviii. 22. with Matt. xxi. 42. and 2 Sam. vi. 2. and Isa. liv. 5. with 2 Cor. xi. 2; King of kings, and Lord of lords, Rev. xvii. 14. and xix. 13—16. with 1 Tim. vi. 14, 15; the first and the last. Rev. i. 17, 18. and ii. 8. with Isa. xli. 4. and xlv. 6. Divine attributes are ascribed to him; as, omniscience, Col. ii. 8. Rev. ii. 23. John xxi. 17. and ii. 24, 25. Matt. xiii. 25; omnipresence, Matt. xviii. 20. and xxviii. 20. Col. i. 17. Heb. i. 3. John i. 18. and iii. 13; almighty power, Phil. iii. 21. Rev. i. 8. with chap. i. 11, 17, 18. and xii. 12, 13, 20; eternity, Rev. i. 11, 17, 18. Heb. vii. 3. Prov. viii. 23. Mic. v. 2. John i. 1. and viii. 56; unchangeableness. Heb. i. 12. and xiii.

8. Divine works of creation, providence, and redemption, are ascribed unto him. John i. 1, 2. Col. i. 16, 17. 1 Cor. viii. 6. Eph. iii. 9. Heb. i. 3. Acts xx. 28. He is represented as the object of religious worship, without any limitation; as in baptism, by faith, prayer, praise, vows. Matt. xxviii. 19. John v. 23; xiv. 1. and xx. 28. Acts vii. 5, 9. Heb. i. 6. Phil. ii. 9—11.

Though as Son, this second person be equal to the Father, yet, in his human nature, and as appointed to be the Mediator, Surety, Prophet, Priest, and King of his people, he is his Father's inferior and servant. John xiv. 28. and xx. 17. 2 Cor. xi. 31. Mark xiii. 32. John v. 18, 19. Isa. xlii. 1. and xlix. 3. and lii. 13. Phil. ii. 6. As Mediator, he is chosen of God, and consents to the covenant of our redemption, and undertakes to pay our debt to the law of God, Isa. xliiii. 1. Psal. xl. 6—8. Jer. xxx. 21; he fulfils the condition of the covenant in his debased state, Matt. iii. 15. Luke xxiv. 26. Isa. xlii. 21; he administers the fulness of blessings purchased by his death; and is the Husband, Friend, Shepherd, Physician, and all in all, to his people. Psal. lxviii. 18. Col. iii. 11. See CHRIST and COVENANT.

To execute the offices with which the Father had invested him, the Son assumed our nature into a personal, and indissoluble union with his divine person; and is God and man, in two distinct natures and one person, for ever. Isa. ix. 6. John i. 14. 1 Tim. iii. 16. This union of his divine and human natures was necessary to his being Mediator, that he might be a middle person, at once nearly related to both God, and men, equally careful for the true interests of both, and qualified to do what tended to bring both to agreement;—necessary to his being a Redeemer, that he might have the right of redemption, and be qualified to give a proper price of sufficient value for, and have sufficient power to effect our redemption;—necessary to his being a Surety and Priest, that, as God, he might lawfully undertake, being absolute master of himself; might fully secure the payment of our debt; might do the world no injury by his voluntary death; might willingly bear all that law and justice could lay upon or require at his hands, and add infinite value to his obedience and sufferings; might exactly know every particular person, and his circumstances, for whom he died; and might, by his own power, conquer death, and come from prison and from judgment: and that, as man, the law might take hold on him, that he might obey and suffer; that he might pay our debt in the same kind we did owe; and that in his payment of it, he might have a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, and set us a pattern of holy obedience, and patient suffering; and that, as our intercessor, he, by his divine power, might remove from his sacrificing state to that of his honorary intercession; might with confidence appear before God, and sit with him on his throne, that he might know all the necessities and believing requests of his people, and might have that in his intercession, which is sufficient to balance all our weakness and unworthiness; and, as man, might present our nature, and intercede for us, as one having a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, Heb. iv. 14—16: necessary to his Prophetic office, that, as God, he might, in every age, be equally present with all his disciples; might at once have a comprehensive view of the whole of divine truth, that there might be full certainty of the authority, fullness, and infallibility of his revelations; that he might employ the Holy Ghost, and render his instructions duly efficacious on our heart; and, as man, might teach us in a way adapted to our weakness, exemplifying the truths he taught, and the teaching thereof, in his own person and life:—necessary to his Kingly office, that he, being God, his subjects might be reduced under no lower head, in their recovered and in their creation-state; that he might equally defend and rule every one of them; that he might withstand all the opposing power and policy of hell and earth, and be head over all things to his church, and be capable to supply all her wants in a proper season and manner; that his power might be proper for conquering, changing, ruling, and comforting the hearts of his people, and he might be capable to call the world to an account for their conduct to him and his chosen;—and that, as man, his heart might be toward his brethren in condescending and tender regard; and he might, by his example, enforce obedience to that law, by which he, as a visible judge, will quickly fix the endless conditions of both angels and men. His manhood renders every relation of his near and delightful; his Godhead secures the everlasting comfort and infinite efficacy thereof. His manhood rendered his humiliation and exaltation possible, real, and exemplary; his Godhead rendered his humiliation infinitely deep, meritorious, and dignified with rays of divine brightness; and renders his exaltation high, and qualifies him to bear and manage it aright.

As God is one with our Redeemer, in his divine nature, in perfections, will, affection, and dignified dominion; he is with him in mutual operation, in support, in favour, and intimate fellowship, as our Mediator. He is in him in respect of delight, residence and accessibleness to men. In him every apparently opposite perfection, name, declaration, or work of God, delightfully harmonize, and in his person and work as God-man, are the infinity, eternity, unchangeableness, independence, subsistence in three distinct persons, life, power, wisdom, holiness, justice, goodness, majesty and ineffable glory of God, brightly discovered, in a way saving and satisfying to sinful men. John x. 30. v. 10. and xiv. 2 Cor. iv. 6. Christ in his person, as God-man, and office, is the foundation of the counsels and works of God, the centre in which they harmoniously meet, the great means of their fulfilment, the great scope and end of them, the chief glory of them, and attractive of the heart of God to them. Col. i. 17, 18. He is the foundation, the centre, the repository, the glory, the exemplification, and the source of the saving efficacy of revealed truths; nor can we perceive or be profited by them, but in beholding and maintaining fellowship with him in his person and office. All the blessings of grace and glory are lodged in his person as our Mediator, and are received by union therewith; as election; gift of the Holy Ghost; righteousness; justification; a new covenant-interest in God, as friends, children, and possessors; regeneration; sanctification; comfort; preservation in grace; happy death; and eternal glory. Eph. i. 3, 4, &c. All our fellowship with the Father in his love, and with the Holy Ghost in his influences, comes through our fellowship with Jesus in his person, righteousness, and grace: no saving grace, but stands nearly connected with his person and office as God-man. Saving knowledge perceives the truths relative to God, to his law, his covenants, gospel, and to sin, righteousness, and judgment, holiness, happiness, or misery, as these are manifested in Jesus Christ, his person, suffering, or work. 1 Cor. ii. and i. 30. Faith is persuaded of divine truths, as yea and amen in him; receives and cleaves to his person; possesses righteousness in, and derives holiness and comfort from, his person; and presents the soul, and all its wants and services to God, through him. Gal. ii. 20. Hope has Christ in his death, and the promises of the New Testament in his blood, for its ground; Christ in the heart, as its acting principle, and the pledge of the thing hoped for; and Christ in his glory, and all the fullness of God in him, as its expected object. 1 Tim. i. 1. Col. i. 27. Holy love is kindled by his redeeming love shed abroad in the heart, and by the views of the loveliness of his person; and it primarily fixes on his person, and God is loved as in him: righteousness, grace, and comfort, holiness of life, scriptures, ordinances, providences, and saints, are loved, as connected with his person. 2 Cor. v. 14. Repentance has the view of his person suffering for us, as the grand demonstration of the love of God, and of the evil of sin, as its chief motives; his righteousness imputed frees from the strength of sin; and in him God is apprehended merciful and gracious, fit to be turned to, as an intimate Friend, Sovereign, Lord, and everlasting Portion. Zech. xii. 10. Christ's person and office as Mediator, are the motive and chief means of all gospel-worship, and the sole cause of its acceptance with God; and in his divine nature he is the object of it equally with the Father and Holy Ghost. Eph. ii. 18. With respect to our walking with God in all holy obedience, he is the way in which God and we must walk together; all reconciliation with God, all knowledge of him, all harmony of design with him, all skill, strength, and confidence, necessary for this walk, and all acceptance of it, are in and from his person. John xiv. 6. Heb. x. 19—22. Col. iii. 17. Our perseverance in a state of grace, is from his person; his righteousness, being of infinite value, secures an everlasting reward to us; his intercession, as infinitely prevalent, secures our grace and glory; the love and power by which he embraces and holds us firm, is infinite; and the immutable and eternal life of his person is the immediate spring of our endless life. John xiv. 10. In his person he laid down the price; in his person he, by intercession, prepares glory for us; in his person he is the establishment of our title to it; and the beholding of and enjoying his person, are the foretaste of it here; and the being with and beholding his person, and God in him, are the whole sum of our everlasting happiness. John xvii. 24.

Concerning the Holy Ghost, we are informed that he proceeds from the Father and Son. John xv. 26. Gal. iv. 5, 6. He is called JEHOVAH, Isa. vi. 9. with Acts xviii. 25. Exod. xvii. 7. with Heb. iii. 7—9. Jer. xxxi. 31—34. with Heb. x. 15, 16. He is called God, Acts v. 5. 1 Cor. iii. 16. and vi. 19; and Lord, 2 Cor. iii. 17. 2 Thess. iii. 5. Divine perfections of omniscience, 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. Isa. xl. 13, 14. 1 John ii. 20; omnipresence, Psal. cxxxix. 7. Eph. ii. 17, 18. Rom. viii. 26, 27; almighty power, Luke i. 35. 1 Cor. xii. 11; eternity, Heb. ix. 14. are ascribed to him; as are also the divine works of creation and providence, Gen. i. 2. Job xxvi. 13. Psal. xxxiii. 6. and civ. 30; of miracles; of anointing Christ; and of converting, sanctifying, and comforting his people. Heb. ii. 4. Isa. lxi. 1. Tit. iii. 5. John xvi. 13, 14. Divine worship of him is exemplified and commanded; as baptism in his name; Matt. xxviii. 19; prayer, praise, or solemn appeals to him, 2 Cor. xiii. 14. Rev. i. 4. Isa. vi. 3, 9. Rom. ix. 1. Matt. ix. 38. with Acts xiii. 2. and xx. 28. That he is a person, not a mere powerful energy, is plain from his being described in plain scriptures, as understanding, 1 Cor. ii. 10; willing, 1 Cor. xii. 11; speaking, and sending messengers, Isa. vi. 8. Acts viii. 29. and x. 19, 20. and xiii. 1—4. 1 Tim. iv. 1; as pleading, Rom. viii. 26; as being grieved, Isa. lxiii. 10. Eph. iv. 30; as teaching and renewing persons, John xiv. 26; as testifying, John xv. 26; as reproving and executing a commission from God. John xvi. 8—14.

The Holy Ghost, in order of operation, finished the work of creation; he qualified men with uncommon strength of body, and with distinguished endowments of wisdom and understanding; he inspired men with a certain knowledge of the mind and will of God; and sometimes rendered persons prophets, to whom he never communicated saving grace: he effected miracles unnumbered. But his work on our Saviour, and the souls of his people, is, in a particular manner, worthy of consideration. He framed the body of our Redeemer, and created his soul, in a state of union with his divine person. Luke i. 34, 35. He sanctified his manhood in its formation, with all the grace it was then capable of. Isa. xi. 2, 8. John iii. 34. He increased his grace in proportion to the growth of his human faculties. Luke ii. 40, 47, 52. At his baptism he conferred on him such extraordinary gifts as qualified him for his public ministry. Isa. lxi. 1—3. Matt. iii. 16, 17. John iii. 34. and vi. 27; he directed him to the wilderness to endure temptation, and enabled him to resist it. Luke iv. 1—14. He made Christ's human nature the instrument of multitudes of miracles. Acts ii. 22. Matt. xii. 28—32. He excited him to, and supported in him, proper dispositions under his sufferings. Heb. ix. 14. He preserved his dead body from corruption; and in his resurrection he reunited his soul and body. 1 Pet. iii. 18. Rom. viii. 11. Eph. i. 17—19. 1 Tim. iii. 16. He filled his human nature with such glory and joy as suit his now exalted state. Psal. xiv. 7; and in fine, after his ascension, bore witness to his Messiahship, by multitudes of miraculous gifts and operations on his followers; and by the powerful spread of his doctrine. John xv. 26. Acts v. 23. Heb. ii. 4. John xvi. 7—14. 2 Cor. x. 4, 5.

In his operations on the elect, he often prepares their souls by various affecting convictions for sin, and illuminations in the knowledge of Christ. Rom. viii. 15. John xvi. 9, 10. Matt. xiii. 20—22. Heb. vi. 4. In conviction, he impresses the law of God on their consciences, fixes their thoughts on it, and on their want of conformity thereto, and impresses a sense of sin on their affections, that they may become filled with fear and shame. Rom. vii. 9. Acts ii. 37. In regeneration, he attending the word of the gospel with almighty influence, opens the understanding to discern the truth, and, by means of the enlightening truth, conveys Jesus and his righteousness, and himself, into their souls, and conveys heart-renewing grace from Jesus into their nature, which, as an abiding habit, or vital principle, produceth good works. 1 John v. 20. Eph. i. 17, 18. and iv. 23. Col. iii. 10. 2 Cor. iv. 6. Heb. x. 20. 1 Cor. vi. 11. John xvi. 13. Psal. cx. 3. 2 Cor. v. 17. Ezek. xxxvi. 26. Rom. viii. 2. Deut. xxx. 6. Col. ii. 11. Having thus formed the habit of faith in them, he excites and enables them actively to embrace Christ, who has already taken possession of their hearts. Phil. i. 29. In justification, he causes their consciences to condemn them as in themselves sinners; applies Jesus as their righteousness, to their consciences, and intimates the sentence founded thereon. 1 Cor. vi. 11. With respect to adoption, he translates them into the family of God; and, by his personal inhabitation and influence, enables them to discern and believe the paternal love of God to them, and to behave towards him as children; and he witnesses with their spirits that they are heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ. Gal. iv. 6. Rom. viii. 16. In the work of sanctification, he shines on the truths of the gospel, and gives them an understanding more and more to perceive them. 1 Cor. ii. 4. Psal. cxix. 18. Luke xxiv. 25. 1 John ii. 20—27. Thus he produces spiritual knowledge and wisdom, and removes pride, error, prejudice, sloth, and the like. Hereby he not only discover to them their polluted condition, and the beauty and reasonableness of holiness, but by the views of Christ's glory, the impression of his righteousness on their conscience, and the shedding abroad his love in their heart, new supplies of grace are conveyed, and what is conveyed is excited to action; hence they watch and struggle against sin, and grow in faith, humility, repentance, and other graces. Tit. iii. 5, 6. 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. and vi. 11. 2 Cor. iii. 18. Phil. iv. 19. and ii. 13. Gal. v. 22—26. He particularly promotes every grace; he shews the grounds of faith and hope, and enables them to fix thereon. Psal. cxix. 49. By shewing a crucified Saviour, and a merciful Father, through the word of the gospel, he disposes to repentance. Zech. xii. 10. Isa.

lv. 7. By discovering the loveliness and love of Jesus, and of God in him, and impressing the affections therewith, he makes men to love him. Rom. v. 5. 1 John iv. 19. In prayer, he impresses us with a sense of our need; he shews our encouragement to pray, drawn from the relations, promises, and former goodness of God; he directs what to ask; enables to request it with faith and fervency; and to wait for an answer. Rom. viii. 26, 27. In self-examination, he shines on the evidences of grace laid down in scripture, renders our grace or sinfulness discoverable, and enables our consciences to draw a just conclusion. Rom. viii. 16. He comforts the saints, by shewing on those truths that relate to the relations and promises of God to them, or his works towards them, by impressing these on their conscience, and enabling to apply them earnestly; and by restraining Satan, the world, and our lusts, from marring our comfort. With respect to eternal happiness, he is the seal that sets apart the saints to it, and he prepares them for it. Eph. iv. 30; he, in his presence and influences, is the earnest of it, Eph. i. 13, 14. 2 Cor. i. 21, 22; and he is the immediate bestower of all that fulness of holiness and glory which they possess in the heavenly state. John iv. 14. and xiv. 16. Rev. xxii. 1.

Adam, in his state of innocence, had, no doubt, this property of the divine nature, its necessary subsistence in three persons, revealed to him, that he might worship the true God agreeably to his nature. Some knowledge of it is absolutely necessary to our salvation: nor can we have any proper conception of the method of our redemption, without supposing it. John xvii. 3. and xvi. 7—14. No doubt, all the three divine Persons have their distinct agency in the creation of all things, in the preservation of the world, and every creature therein; and in the effecting, permitting, and ruling every thing, miraculous or common, that takes place in the world, from the beginning to the end of time, and throughout the eternity to come; but in many cases our weakness disqualifies us to conceive of their respective influence. God is the God of glory, grace, mercy, patience, peace, comfort, and salvation, &c. as he is infinitely glorious in his perfections, counsels, and works; he is full of and marvellously exercises mercy and patience towards creatures sinful and miserable; and provides and bestows peace, comfort, and salvation on his people. Acts vii. 2. 1 Pet. v. 10. Psal. lix. 10. 2 Cor. i. 3. Rom. xv. 33. Psal. lxxviii. 19. He is the God of hope, as he is the object thereof, from whom, and in whom, we expect every good thing. Rom. xv. 13. He is the living and true God; he possesses an infinite fulness of life in himself, and gives to his creatures whatever life they enjoy; and he alone is really possessed of infinite perfection or Godhead. 1 Thess. i. 9. He is the God of gods, superior to angels, magistrates, and whatever can be esteemed or adored as a god. Ezra v. 11. He is the God of Christ: he formed his manhood, appointed him to his mediatorial office, and assisted in and rewards his work. John xx. 17. Eph. i. 13. He is the God of all men: in creation, he formed, by providence he preserves and actuates, and therefore has a right to govern them. He is the God of church-members: by his word separating them from the world, giving them his ordinances, and by their professed dedication of themselves to his service. He is the God of saints: by instating them in the new covenant, and giving himself to them as their all in all, and by their solemn and hearty dedication of themselves to him. Num. xxvii. 16. Jer. xxxi. 31. He was the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Israel, as he entered into a covenant of special friendship with, and gave himself to be their portion, ruler, civil and sacred, and their last end. God very often, particularly in giving laws, makes a grant of himself to men as their God, to mark how much he delights to bestow himself freely upon men as their portion, and to shew that all our obedience must be founded upon our taking him freely as our God in Christ. Exod. iii. 6. Sometimes, to express the dignity or excellence of things, they are represented as of God: hence Moses is said to be fair as God. Acts vii. 20. Stately cedars are called trees of the Lord. Psal. civ. 16. A great trembling is called a trembling of God. 1 Sam. xiv. 15. To assist our weak minds in conceiving of God, and to keep them always impressed with his presence and nature, affections innumerable belonging to creatures, especially men, are ascribed to God; to understand which, we must always remember that he is a most pure Spirit, and that these affections must represent what, in his spiritual nature, or his work, corresponds thereto. Thus, as eyes in men are instrumental in discerning objects, and in expressing love, pity, pleasure, or anger, we must consider them, when ascribed to God, as denoting his knowledge, wisdom, favour, or anger.

As hands are the instruments of action, of kind support, affectionate reception, or inflicting chastisement, these, ascribed to God, must denote his power, and the kind or wrathful exercise thereof.

Angels are called gods, for their excellent nature, and their declaring God's mind, and executing his work as his deputies; and they were required to worship Christ, when the heathen idols were destroyed. Psal. xcvi. 7. Heb. i. 6. Magistrates are called gods; they ought signally to resemble God in wisdom and equity, and, as his deputies, they rule over others. Exod. xxii. 28. Psal. lxxxii. 1, 6. John x. 34. Moses is called a god, because God's deputy in delivering the Israelites. Exod. iv. 16. and vii. 1. Satan is called the god of this world; he is believed, obeyed, and adored, under various forms, by most of the inhabitants of it. 2 Cor. iv. 4. Idols are called gods, because adored, worshipped, and trusted by their votaries. 1 Kings xi. 33. They are strange, or other gods; the Hebrews were not originally in covenant with them. Deut. xxxii. 16. Judg. ii. 12; and the most pious among them, out of detestation, declined pronouncing their names, and hence substitute Besheth, or Besheth, i. e. shame, instead of Baal, in naming some persons; thus, for Esau, Meribaal, and Jerubbaal, they said Ishobesheth, Mephobesheth, and Jerubbesheth; and sometimes called the idols Elikim, nothings, or not-gods, and often Gihlim, rolling excrements. Ezek. xxx. 12, &c. Men's belly is their god, when they are chiefly careful to provide for and please it. Phil. iii. 19.

GODDESS; a female deity. The heathens had many of them, as Ashtoreth, the moon, Diana, Juno, Venus, &c. 1 Kings xi. 5. Acts xix. 27.

GODHEAD; the nature or essence of God. Col. ii. 9. Rom. i. 20. Acts xvii. 29.

GODLY; that which proceeds from and is pleasing to God. A godly man is one who, having obtained grace from God, makes it his business to glorify him, by receiving, worshipping, and imitating him. Psal. xii. 1. Tit. ii. 12. Godly fear is a holy and filial reverence of God, as an infinitely great and merciful Father, and a deep regard to the law as his will. Heb. xii. 28. Godly sincerity, is candour flowing from fellowship with God, and conformable to his nature and law. 2 Cor. i. 12. A godly seed, are children who have real grace, and love, worship, and serve God. Mal. ii. 15. Godly sorrow is grief proceeding from the discoveries of God's love; and for sin as hateful and offensive to him, and defiling to our soul. 2 Cor. vii. 10.

GODLINESS is worshipping and serving of God, from faith of his love and relation to us, and in love toward him. 1 Tim. ii. 2. As parents are a kind of deputy-gods to their households, return of kindness to them from children is called godliness, or piety. 1 Tim. v. 4.

GOG and MA'GOG. Gog may signify the governor, and Ma'gog, when joined with it may denote the people. Magog was the second son of Japheth, and gave name to his seed; his posterity seem to have peopled Tartary, a large country on the north of Asia, and part of Europe, reaching in length, from west to east, about 5000 miles; and in breadth, from north to south, about 2700; most of which at present belongs to the Russian empire. The ancient Tartars called themselves Mogli, or Magogli, or Mungli, or Mungngli, the children of Magog. A Tartar empire in the East Indies is called the Mogul empire, and the country Mogulistan, or the country of the Moguls. A tribe of eastern Tartars are still called Munguls, or Munggals. Many names of places in ancient Tartary retain vestiges of Gog and Magog. An Arabian geographer calls North Tartary, now Siberia, the land of Giug, or Maguig; and says it is separated by dreadful mountains from the rest of the world: probably he means the Verchaturian hills, which, for most of the year, are often covered with snow several fathoms deep. Perhaps Mount Caucasus was originally Gog-hasen, the fortress of God; and the Palus Meotis, on the north of the Euxine sea, Magotis. These descendants of Magog, under the various names of Scythians, Goths, Huns, Tartars, Moguls, and Turks, have committed horrible devastation in the earth.

About A.M. 3400, the Scythians made a terrible irruption into Western Asia, and nearly over-ran it, till the king of Egypt, by presents and flattery, diverted them from entering his kingdom. Vast numbers of them continued in Media for about twenty-eight years, till most of them, at least their chiefs, were massacred. About the same time they seem to have conquered part of China. In A. M. 3500, they commenced a war with Darius Hystaspes. About 3070, they treated even Alexander the Great with contempt. Some time before our Saviour's birth, the Dacians began to ravage the north-east part of the Roman empire; but were reduced by Trajan about A. D. 110. The Samaritans began their ravages in Germany, &c. about A. D. 69; and were reduced partly by the Huns about A. D. 450, and the rest by the Goths about A. D. 500. The Alans began their ravage of Media about A. D. 70, and of Europe 120, and at last settled in Spain 409. After the Vandals, who began in A. D. 166, had ravaged from Germany to the west of Spain, they crossed the Mediterranean sea, and established a powerful kingdom on the north of Africa; and issuing from thence, they ravaged Sicily; and in 455, took and pillaged Rome; but about 536 were reduced by the Emperor Justinian, if not before. About A. D. 260, the Gepidæ began their ravages; and about 572 were reduced by the Lombards, a branch of themselves, who began their ravages about 500; and about sixty-eight years after established a kingdom in Italy, which was reduced by Charles the Great, 774. About A. D. 85, the Suevi began their ravages, settled in Spain 409, and were reduced by the Goths, 585. About 215, or, rather more early, the Getæ, or Goths, began their ravages. In A. D. 410, they took Rome; and about the same time settled themselves in Italy, Spain, &c. About 250, the Franks began their ravages; and about 420 settled in Gaul, now called France. About 275, the Burgundi began their ravages, and were reduced by the Franks about 534. The Heruli began their ravages about 256, and ruined the Roman empire 476; but within a hundred years after were reduced by Justinian and the Goths. Whether the Saxons that made such terrible wars in Germany, and partly entered Britain, and murdering the inhabitants, settled in their stead, were altogether of a Tartar origin we know not. From A. D. 376 to 560, the Huns committed terrible devastations, and at last settled in Hungary. About the same time, another tribe of them fearfully harassed the kingdom of Persia. From about 485 to 1300, the Bulgars often repeated their ravages on the eastern part of the Roman empire, till at last they were reduced by the Ottoman Turks. While the savage multitudes left their native countries almost desolate, they, by a series of murders, rendered the whole west of Europe mere shambles of bloodshed, and comparatively desert; introduced their own language, feudal system, inhuman diversions, trials, &c. About A. D. 1000, Mahmud, with a number of Tartars, established the empire of the Gaznevites in East India, which for some ages continued powerful and flourishing. Toward the decline of the empire of the Arabs or Saracens, prodigious numbers of Turks poured themselves into Armenia, Persia, and Me-
