sopotamia. In the last part of the eleventh century, the Seljukian Turks erected four kingdoms near the Enphrates, viz. of Bagdad in 1055, of Damascus and Aleppo in 1079, and of Iconium in 1080: but that of Bagdad, founded by Tangrolipix, or Tongrul Beg, and extending over Persia, was the most noted. The mutual broils of these kingdoms, and the marches and wars of the Europeans, for the recovery of Canaan from the Mahometans, disabled them from extending their power in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. About 1260, Jenghiz Kan and his sons, and their eastern Tartars, from small beginnings, overran and conquered the most of Asia, and the east of Europe, as far as the borders of Germany, and erected three powerful empires, those of China and Persia in Asia, and that of Kipjack in Europe, besides lesser sovereignties in India; but none of these continued above nine or ten successions in any degree of glory. About these times the Turks established a kingdom in Armenia, which for some ages was noted; and just before its ruin was very powerful. To avoid the incursive Tartars, Soliman Sha, one of the Gaz, or baser Turks, with his three sons, attempted to pass the Enphrates to the westward, but was drowned; and his two elder sons returned and submitted to the enemy. Ortogrul the younger, with his three sons, Condoz, Sarubani, and Othman, some time after passed the river, and having obtained a settlement on the west of Armenia from the Sultan of Iconium, numbers of the subjects of the four Turkish kingdoms joined him; by the assistance of which he gained several victories over the stragling Tartars, and over the Christians. Those Turks, now called Ottomans, began their ravages on the Christians, on the west of the Euphrates, about 1261, or according to others, in 1302. They gradually increased to prodigious numbers, especially of horsemen, sometimes to near a million at once: their livery and colours were of blue, scarlet, or yellow: they were terribly desperate, furlous, cruel, and bloody, and monstons were the fire-arms which they early used in besieging of cities. For three hundred and ninety-one, or three hundred and ninety-six years, in prophetic style, a year, a month, a day, and a hour, they, for the most part exceedingly prevailed, especially against the Christians; and made themselves masters of the western parts of Asia, the north parts of Africa, and the south-east parts of Europe, with a multitude of the isles in the Mediterranean sea; and, by their murder and oppression, have rendered these once fertile and populous countries, for the most part, a comparative desert. Instead of thousands of populous cities in their extensive empire, now only Constantinople in Europe, Smyrna, Bagdad, Aleppo, and Scanderoon in Asia, and Cairo in Egypt, deserve nuch notice. Since 1672 they have made no new conquests; and since the peace of Carlowitz, in 1698, they have not much attempted it. About the beginning of the millennium, tidings from the north and east, perhaps of Russian or Persian invasions shall give them great uneasiness. Scarcely shall the Jews be resettled in Canaan, when, as we expect, the Turks, assisted by the Persians, or other Tartar allies, and by the Persians, Arabs, and Africans, shall attempt to dislodge them; but, by mutual broils, and the signal vengeance of God, they shall perish in the attempt, and leave their carcases to be buried, and their spoils to be enjoyed by the Jews. About the end of the millennium, they, and their partisans, or men of like temper, shall make a terrible effort against the church, but miserably perish therein.

About A. D. 1400, Tamerlane, with a prodigious army of Tartars, overran western Asia, was a terrible scourge to the Ottoman Turks, and founded the two empires of Persia and Mogulistan; the last of which is governed by his descendants to this day. About A. D. 1640, the eastern Tartars, in the time of a civil war, made themselves masters of China, and continue so still; so that the descendants of Magog have almost all Asia, and a great part of Europe, in their hands at present. Multitudes of these Tartars have already been turned to the Lord; and in the millennium, we believe, their conversion will be much more general. Gen. ix. 27. Zech. vi. 7. Rev. ix. 12-21. GOLAN, or GAULAN, a famed city on the west of the sea of Tiberias, which pertained to Manasseh. It was given to the Levites, and was a city of refuge, and gave name to the territory of Golan or Gaulanitis, which extended from Perea on the south, to Lebanon on the north. Deut. iv. 43. Josh. xxi. 27. About three hundred years after Christ it was a considerable place.

GOLD; a precious metal, of a yellowish red colour, and very heavy, simple, pure, and shining. It is seldom found in a state of ore, mixed with sulphur, as other metals ordinarily are, but in a native state; nor is it ever found in an ore of its own, but in that of other metals, especially copper and silver; and even native gold has almost always some mixture of these metals. Native gold is sometimes found even in the German mines, in pure masses of about a pound weight; and it is said, in Peru much heavier, to about twenty-five pound's weight; and this was called their fine gold; but more frequently it is found in loose particles, mingled with the sand of rivers, especially in Guinea on the west of Africa. Gold is often found bedded in stones of various kinds, and even in earth, at the depth of one hundred and fifty fathoms. Gold is the most ductile of all metals, an ounce of it having been drawn into a wire, or thread, of 210,433 fathoms, or two hundred and forty miles long. It is incapable of rust, nor can the melting of it in common fire diminish its weight; but if exposed to the focus of a strong burning glass, it flies off in small particles; and, it is said, sometimes goes off in smoke, and the remainder loses the nature of gold, and becomes a kind of vitriol. It requires no great heat to melt gold; and before it runs, it appears white; and when melted appears of a pale bluish green colour on the surface. Anciently gold seems to have been very plentiful: the sacred ark, table of shew-bread, altar of incense, and pillars and cross-boards of the tabernacle were overlaid with pure gold; the mercy-seat and cherubim fixed on it, the sacred candlestick, &c. were entirely of pure gold. All Solomon's drinking vessels were of the same; ornamental chains, bracelets, crowns, statues, and medals, were of gold. Prodigious quantities of it belonged to David and Solomon, and were used in the building of the temple, &c. Alexander found immense quantities of it in the treasures of Darius, the Persian king. Some of the Roman generals had prodigious quantities of it, which they had taken, and carried before them in their triumphs; and some of their emperors expended excessive sums in luxury. The hiding or neglect of it, during the widely spread ravages of the Goths, Huns, Vandals, Saracens, Turks, and Tartars, probably occasioned the scarcity of it in latter times, till the mines of America were discovered by the Spaniards.

Gold is often an emblem of what is divine, pure, precious, solid, useful, incorruptible, or lasting, and glorious. The gold of the temple and tabernacle might represent the divine excellencies of Christ, and the precious and incorruptible ordinances of his church, and the graces of his people. His head is as most fine gold, his hands like gold rings set with the beryl; he is gold tried in the fire; his girdle, censer, his crown, are of fine gold. How divine, precious, solid, pure, and incorruptible, are his Godhead and government, power and work, person and fulness! and his preparation for and readiness to execute his office! how valuable and glorious his everlasting reward! Sol. Song v. 11, 14. Dan. x. 5. Rev. iii. 18. and viii. 3. and xiv. 14. God is likened to gold; how pure, precious, enriching, and everlasting portion is he to his people! Job xxii. 25. God's word, and his ordinances, especially if more spiritual, are likened to gold; how precious, lasting, enriching, and capable of enduring a trial! Psal. xix. 10. Rev. xxi. 15. 1 Cor. iii. 12. Zech. iv. 12. Isa. lx. 17. Saints, and their graces of faith, hope, love, &c. or even their trials, are likened to gold. Job xxiii. 10. Psal. xlv. 13. 1 Pet. i. 7. The trials of God's wrath are golden; divine, pure, and unmixed with partiality or passion. Rev. xv. 7. What is wealthy, pompous, and enticing, is called golden: so Babylon is called a golden city, head, or cup. Isa. xiv. 4. Dan. ii. 32, 38. Jer. li. 7. Antichristian Rome is said to have in her hand a golden cup. Rev. xvii. 4.

GOLGO-THA. See CALVARY.

GO-LI'ATH, a famous giant of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span, or eleven feet four inches. His brazen helmet weighed about fifteen pounds avoirdupois; his target, or collar, affixed between his shoulders to defend his neck, about thirty; his spear was about twenty six feet long, and its head about thirty eight pounds; his sword four; his greaves on his legs thirty; and his coat of mail one hundred and fifty six; and so the whole armour two hundred and seventy three pounds' weight. At Ephes-dammim, for forty days, he went out from the camp of the Philistines, and haughtily defied the Hebrews to produce a man that durst engage him in a single combat: he offered to decide the subjection of the one nation to the other on the victory, by this single combat. The Hebrews were terrified at the very sight of him; but David, coming to the camp, undertook to attack him with a staff, a sling, and a few small stones. With disdain Goliath cursed him by his idols, and bade him come on, and he would give his flesh to the fowls of the air; meanwhile David slung a stone, which penetrating by the hole left in the helmet for the giant's eye, or while he was tossing up his forehead, and leaving it bare, in contempt of his puny antagonist, sank into his head, and brought him to the ground, flat on his face. David then ran up to him, and with his own sword cut off his head. 1 Sam. xvii. Perhaps, on occasion of this victory, he composed the 9th and 144th Psalms. Four of his brethren were afterwards slain by David's warriors. 2 Sam. xxi. 2 Chron. xx.

GOMER, the eldest son of Japheth. He was no doubt the father of the Gomerians, Gomares, Cimmerians, or Cimbr, who anciently inhabited Galatia, Phrygia, &c. where, in the name Ascanius, the Ascanian bay, and the Akanian or Euxine sea, we find traces of his son Askenaz. After they had dwelt for some time about Phrygia and Georgia, they, either by the east end of the Euxine sea, or by crossing the Hellespont, penetrated into Europe, and peopled the countries now called Poland, Hungary, Germany, Switzerland, France, Spain, Portugal, and Britain, if not also part of Scandinavia. The Welsh in England still call themselves Camri, Cymro, or Coniari; nor do the ancient Scotch or Irish appear to be of a different original. These Gomerians were distinguished into the tribes of Celtæ or Gauls, Belgæ, Germans, Sacæ, Titians, &c.; and according to Pezron, did very early, about the time of Isaac, and afterwards, form a large and flourishing empire, whose kings were Man, or Mæneus, Acmon, Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter, and Theutat, or Mercury, who introduced traffic among them. After him, the empire was broken to pieces; but the Gauls who inhabited Switzerland and France, were long a terror to the Romans; and even sometimes made terrible irruptions into Greece and Asia. At last the conquests of the Romans; and descendants of Magog, swallowed up most of the Gomerians; but it seems a part of them will assist the Turks in opposing the Jews about the beginning of the millennium. GOOD. (1.) What is agreeable, and answers its proper end. Thus all things at first were good one by one; and very good in connexion. Gen. i. It was not good for man to be alone, without a wife. Gen. ii. 18. Wicked men seek any thing good, i. e. what is pleasant or agreeable to their carnal desires. Psal. iv. 6. (2.) Holy, virtuous; so wicked men can do no good. Psal. xiv. 1, 2. We ought to depart from evil, and do good. Psal. xxxiv. 14. Barnabas was a good man. Acts xi. 24. (3.) Bountiful, merciful, for such a good man one would dare to die. Rom. v. 7. The good hand of God is on men, when he deals kindly with them. Neh. ii. 8. (4.) Expedient and convenient for the time; so, in time of persecution, it is good not to marry. 1 Cor. vii. 1. It was not good for Moses to judge every cause of the Hebrews. Exod. xviii. 17. Mary's anointing of Christ with ointment was a good work. Matt. xxvi. 10. (5.) Lawful to be used; so every creature of God is good, when received with thanksgiving. 1 Tim. iv. 4. Christian liberty is good, when we do not, by abusing it, make it evil spoken of. Rom. xiv. 16. There is none good but God; none but God is infinitely, independently, and unchangeably good; he is kind to his creatures, and altogether holy and unspeakably pleasant to such as enjoy him. Matt. xix. 17. Psal. cxix. 68. Christ, and the fullness and salvation of God in him, are the good things we should seek, and that can never be taken from us. Amos v. 14. Mic. vi. 8. Luke x. 42.

GOODLY, is (1.) What is valuable, Num. xxxi. 10; and so Christ in derision calls the thirty shekels that he was sold for, a goodly price. Zech. xi. 13. (2.) Beautiful, lovely. Gen. xxxix. 6. (3.) Big and strong. 2 Sam. xxiii. 21. God's goodness, is the delightful excellency, and the grace, mercy, and bounty of his nature, and the favours to creatures, flowing therefrom. Psal. lii. 1. Men's goodness is their holy, useful, kind, and agreeable dispositions and conduct. Rom. xv. 14. Eph. v. 9. What men have, as their furniture, wealth, or their self-righteousness, and self-conceit, is their goods. Luke xix. 8. Rev. iii. 17. Good, i.e. refreshing, rain cometh. Jer. xvii. 6.

GOTHER-WOOD. Whether it be cedar, box-tree, pine, fir, turpentine-tree, Indian plane-tree, or rather cypress, is not agreed. It is certain that Noah built his ark of it; and that the cypress is a durable wood, very proper for shipping; and was so plentiful about Babylon, that Alexander built a whole navy of it. Gen. vi. 14.

GORGEOUS; gay, fine, bright, and shining. Luke xxiii. 11. and vii. 25.

GOSHEN. (1.) A very fertile province on the north-east part of Egypt, and mostly, if not wholly, eastward of the Nile. Here the Hebrews resided above two hundred years. Gen. xlvii. 6. (2.) A country that lay near Gibeon, which perhaps was fertile, like that in Egypt. Josh. x. 41. Here possibly stood the city of Goshen, that belonged to the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 51.

GOSPEL, or good tidings. This word signifies, (1.) Most properly and strictly, an exhibition of the covenant of grace to men, and is an absolutely gracious declaration of the good-will of God to sinful men; setting before them, and freely offering them, Jesus Christ and all his righteousness and salvation in him, to be received by them even the worst, without money and without price. Mark xvi. 15. Luke ii. 10, 11. In this view the Gospel differs widely from the law, and is the very reverse of it. The law demands from us perfect holiness of nature and life, and an atonement for whatever offence we have been guilty of: the gospel demands nothing from us; and indeed it is impossible it could require any thing not required in the law, which is exceeding broad; but it represents to us what God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, have done for us; what blessings they have prepared for us, and are ready to bestow on us; and holds forth the same, in the most encouraging manner, to be received by us. This is the sum of all its doctrinal declarations, absolutely free promises, and kind offers and invitations. It, however, well agrees with the law of God, both as a broken covenant, and as an obligatory rule of life. By bringing near, and giving us Jesus Christ as our righteousness, it enables us to answer in him all the demands of the precept and penalty of the law, as a broken covenant. By bringing him near, and giving him to us, made of God to us sanctification, it excites and enables us to fulfil the demands of the law as a rule. 1 Cor. i. 30. Rom. iii. 31; viii. 4. and vii. 4. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15. John xv. 15. Tit. iii. 5, 6. and li. 11, 12, 14. (2.) As the Gospel, strictly taken, is the centre in which the lines of revelation meet, the whole of divine truth, whether law or gospel, strictly taken, is called the Gospel; as, in dispensing of it, the law, as a covenant, must be preached to alarm and drive men to hear the glad tidings of salvation to them in particular: and the law as a rule, must be preached to excite them to improve, and further apprehend, the privileges freely bestowed in the gospel. Mark i. 14. (3.) The preaching of these glad tidings of free and full salvation is called the Gospel; and so ministers are said to live by the gospel, and the gospel to be without charge, 1 Cor. ix. 14, 18; and the preaching of the gospel, in the New Testament manner, as it more clearly, fully, and extensively exhibits and offers a free salvation to lost men, is called the gospel, in contradistinction from the Old Testament dispensation, which was more dark and legal in appearance. 2 Tim. i. 10. (4.) The inspired histories of our Saviour's birth, life, death, and exaltation, are called the Gospel; as indeed that is glad tidings to lost men, and the foundation and centre of the whole Gospel. Mark i. 1. Besides the Four Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, about thirty eight or forty spurious gospels have been forged. Most of them are now lost, and such as remain are plainly fabulous and trifling.

The glad tidings of salvation to lost men is called the Gospel of God. He devised and framed it; it publishes his free grace, and makes over himself and his fulness to men, and tends to promote his pleasure and honour. Rom. i. 1. It is the Gospel of his grace; flows from his free favour, manifests his redeeming love, and is the instrument whereby he bestows his undeserved benefits on men. Acts xx. 24. It is the Gospel of Christ: he is the author, chief preacher, and the subject-matter thereof. Rom. i. 16. It is the Gospel of peace and salvation; it flows from a reconciled God and Saviour: it publishes and promotes our reconciliation with him, and our salvation by him. Eph. vi. 15. and i. 13. It is the Gospel of the kingdom, issued forth from Christ's royal authority; preached in the church, and by it men are brought to the kingdom of grace and glory. Matt. iv. 23. It is the Gospel of ministers, because they preach it. 2 Thes. ii.

14. 2 Tim. ii. 8. It is the Gospel of the circumcision, or uncircumcision, as preached to the Jews or gentiles. Gal. ii. 7. It is glorious, as it displays the glorious truths, perfections, and favour of God, and brings many sons and daughters to glory. 1 Tim. i. 11. See ANOTHER; ETERNAL.

From what has been said, it partly appears, that in order to render a sermon truly evangelical, the various truths of God must be exhibited in their proper connexion with God's redeeming and free grace, reigning through the person and righteousness of Jesus Christ, unto eternal life, of holiness and happiness here and hereafter. Suppose one should discourse on the person, natures, offices, and states of Jesus Christ, or on his merits, purchased blessings, and intercession, and on the important points of regeneration, faith, repentance, and good works, it is not the Gospel, unless the preacher truly state the nature of the Redeemer's undertaking for us, to fulfil the broken law in our stead; and shew his relation to the new-covenant, as mediator, surety, and administrator thereof; his relation to sinful men, as their appointed, and all-sufficient, and only Saviour, offered and given to them in the promise and invitations of God; his relation to his people, as their spiritual head and husband; their alone righteousness before God as a judge; the fountain and spring of their sanctification, by his blood sprinkled on their conscience to free them from the strength of sin, and purge it from dead works, to serve the living God; and by his Spirit dwelling in them, as a life-giving principle of holiness, enabling and causing to walk in newness of life. Unless he truly exhibit the freeness of redeeming grace in the offer of the gospel, and shew, that therein Jesus as a Saviour, Husband, Portion, and eternal life of holiness and happiness, purchased by, and lodged in him, are freely, without any dependence on our pious resolutions, sincerity, repentance, or good works, presented, and offered to, and urged on men, as sinners, even the chief. Unless he truly represent the state of a sinner's justification before God, as ONLY through the righteousness of Jesus Christ offered in the gospel, and received by faith, uniting our person to him as our husband, and law-magnifying surety. Unless he represent faith in its true manner, as a persuasion of God's record, that there is eternal life in his Son for us lost sinners, and as a receiving and resting on Christ alone for salvation as he is offered to us in the gospel. Unless he urge union with, and receiving of Christ, as the absolutely necessary means of the renovation of our heart; and our living in and on him, by the daily exercise of faith, according to our new-covenant state, as the only principal means of our perfecting holiness, in heart or life, in the fear of the Lord.

To be able to state the e matters in a proper manner, one must have a clear discernment of the various actings of the divine persons in promoting the redemption of men, and particularly, of the connexion of Christ's person, God-man, with the various parts of the new covenant, and all the privileges and duties of the saints. He ought clearly to perceive the differences and agreement relative to the two covenants of works and grace, the law and gospel, the making and administration of the covenant of grace, the gospel, and dispensation thereof; and relative to our Redeemer's offices; and relative to our privileges and duties; and particularly the difference, harmony, and connexion of our justification and sanctification. Nor can one rightly understand these things without personal experience of them. None can truly understand the power of inward corruption, till he has savingly felt his own. None can rightly understand how the law is the strength of sin, till it be closely applied to his conscience. Rom. vii. 9—13. None well understands why the offer of Christ as a Saviour must be absolutely free, and directed to sinners as such, till he himself has had to struggle with deep convictions. None rightly perceives how effectually a believing assurance of a free and full salvation in Christ, as given in the infallible promise of God, constrains to universal holiness, unless himself has had redeeming love shed abroad in his heart. Nor can one know, how sadly doubting and wavering, with respect to the free promises of eternal life, and a legal inclination to obtain divine favour by our own good works, hinder a cheerful progress in grace and true virtue, unless himself had experienced it. 1 Tim. i. 13—16. Gal. i. 16. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15. To obtain such knowledge and experience requires so much care and diligence, and is so contrary to the proud and corrupt lusts of many preachers, that it is no wonder they rather content themselves with a few pitiful scraps of heathen morality, or with Arminian or Socinian error, or a few disjointed and wrong placed fragments of divine truth.

As one small wheel or pin in a watch, if misplaced, will stop, or render irregular, the whole motion: so the misplacing of a single point of truth, may pervert a whole sermon, and remove it off an evangelical foundation. To render preaching truly of a gospel strain, the law, both as a broken covenant, and as a rule, must be faithfully declared, and urged home on men's consciences, but in a proper connexion with the reigning grace of the gospel strictly taken. In preaching the law as a covenant, the true gospel-preacher's aim is not to persuade sinners to attempt an observance of its precepts, that they may live thereby; but to convince them of their guilt and inability, and to drive them from it, as distinguished and self-irreformable transgressors to Jesus, as the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. To deter saints from attempting a return to their Egyptian bondage, or wishfully looking back to the flames of Sodom, which they have escaped, and to excite them, as safe under the atoning blood of Jesus, and covering righteousness, to admire what he undertook and fulfilled for them; and all influenced by these views, to yield a grateful obedience to his law as a rule. Regulating every sentence of discourse by this gospel-rule, he must exhibit the original making and breach of the law, as a covenant; and how once broken, it fixes on every man for himself. The holiness, equity, goodness, spiritual nature, and exceeding breadth of its precepts, must be clearly and earnestly displayed, that, by a view of our transgressions thereof, in their nature, number, and aggravations, every mouth may be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God, and filled with shame on that account. The dreadful nature, the justness, the certainty and everlasting duration of the punishment annexed by its penalty, to even the smallest transgression, must be feelingly represented, till our heart be pricked, and expect nothing but fiery indignation from the law to devour us.—Under a deep impression of his own inward corruption, the preacher must shew us how, by nature, we are dead in trespasses and sins; under the reigning power of sin; are in the flesh, and so cannot please God; have a carnal mind, enmity against God, and which is not subject to God's law, neither indeed can be; have a heart deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, which not only disqualifies us for every thing spiritually good, but renders us incapable to cease from sin, issuing forth evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies.—Affected with the terror of the Lord, he must represent, how the broken law is the strength of sin, not merely as by the view or impression of its difficult precepts, and heavy penalty, our corrupt heart is irritated and provoked more exceedingly to hate God the lawgiver, and to work wickedness with rage, despair, and greediness; but chiefly, as its curse, by what I might call an almighty influence, shuts up its sinful subjects under the dominion of indwelling sin, as a principal ingredient of that spiritual and eternal death which is threatened against the transgressors:—how it is absolutely impossible to shift the dominion of sin, or bring forth fruit to God, till we be freed from and dead to the law; and absurd, in the highest degree, to attempt self-reformation, by that which is the strength of sin;—nay, how even omnipotence of grace cannot change our nature, or render us possessed of any spiritual blessing, but in a way of first making us free from the law of sin and death, by the application of Christ's finished righteousness to our persons and consciences. 1 Cor. xv. 50. Rom. vi. 14. and vii. 4. and viii. 2. Gal. ii. 19.—He must shew how great a crime it is for gospel-hearers to seek righteousness by the works of the law; how it is an ignorant going about to establish our own righteousness, in opposition to the righteousness of God; a stumbling at Jesus Christ the chief corner stone; an attempt to frustrate the grace of God, and to render the death of his Son in vain. Rom. x. 3. and ix. 31, 32. Gal. ii. 21. and v. 4.—To prevent men deceiving themselves as to their state, he must, with the searching word, the candle of the Lord, urged home on their conscience, put them to the trial, and hunt them out of all their lying refuges of profession, experience, or practice, where they may think themselves safe, while without union to Christ, and actual interest in his righteousness.—Thus the flaming sword of the fiery law must be turned every way to alarm the sinner, and oblige him to escape to Jesus, the tree of life.

To discover Jesus, and to encourage the self-despairing sinner to flee to him, the gospel-preacher must next exhibit the covenant of grace in its spring, its formation, condition, promises, administration, end, and the manner of obtaining an interest in it. We must be taught, that in God there was and is help for us self-destroyers; that he thought on us in our low estate; caused his Son to approach and draw near to him as our Surety; so loved the world, that he spared not, but sent his only begotten Son into the world, in the likeness of sinful flesh, made under the law, to be a propitiation for us, that he might redeem us that were under the law, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have the righteousness of the law fulfilled in him, and attain to everlasting life, and with Christ freely receive all things.—How Jesus the Father's equal, cheerfully undertook for us; and having assumed our nature, and placed himself under the law, he was made sin for us; had our sins charged to his account, and punished on him.—How the just suffered for the unjust; died for the ungodly; that he might bring us unto God; bore our sins, our griefs, our sorrows, the punishment of our iniquities, that by his stripes we might be healed.—That having, by the holiness of his manhood, obedienced life, and satisfactory sufferings, made full expiation for sin, magnified the broken law; in answering all its demands, fulfilled the condition of the new covenant, ratifying all its promises in his blood, and brought in an everlasting righteousness, equally suited to every sinful man, in respect of its infinite value and fulfilment in their common nature, he was raised from the dead for our justification, and received from his Father glory, all power in heaven and earth, all fulness of gifts and graces for men, even the rebellious; power over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as he will, and that our faith and hope might be in God;—and is exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness of sins; sent to seek and save that which is lost; sent to bless us in turning us from our iniquities, and turning away ungodliness from us; and so, as a Saviour of his people, FROM their sins; comes not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; and, in the most earnest and engaging manner, freely presents, offers, and, in the promise, gives himself to us, as an all-sufficient Saviour; made of God to us, ignorant, guilty, corrupted, and enslaved men, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, and calls and invites us to receive him in his person and fulness, as the offered and absolutely free gift of God, bestowed without money and without price; that, by spiritual union to his person, we may become justified, adopted, sanctified, and possessed of eternal life.

On these topics how delightfully ought a preacher to display the exceeding riches of the grace of God, and how every part of the work of our redemption tends to the praise of the glory thereof! How fit the blessed, the lovely, the precious, the rich and liberal, the once crucified and now ascended

Jesus is, to rescue us from the broken law, from sin, from hell! and what exceeding great and precious promises are given to us as the New Testament in his blood! Here a preacher ought carefully to attend to the following things: (1.) He ought plainly to set forth God's redoubled and absolutely free gift of his Son, as a ransom to die for us, the ungodly, and as an effectual Saviour, Husband, and Portion, to espouse, deliver, and satisfy our souls; as the foundation of every call to accept him. Without this, calls do but invite to presumption; to rob God of his Son and salvation; as if stolen waters were sweet. Nothing but the view of God's donation can warrant our intermeddling with Christ. (2.) The nature of faith as an assurance or real persuasion of the truth of God's giving promises, as directed to men, individually; and as a receiving and resting on Christ alone for salvation, as he is offered in the gospel, and as the finishing means of our spiritual union with Christ, and our actual interest in all that he has, and means of our receiving out of his fulness, must be clearly stated, that people be not daunted with the invitations to believe on Christ, or come to him, and yet never distinctly taught what believing, or coming to him is. (3.) To prevent or obviate the ordinary scruples of convinced consciences, great care must be taken to describe the persons Jesus Christ was given for as a ransom, and is offered to as an effectual Saviour, precisely in the terms of the scripture. Though it is true Christ died only for the elect; yet, as the secret things of the divine purpose belong only to the Lord, and are not to be known but by their inseparable fruits, a preacher, offering Christ to sinners, ought to represent the persons he died for, in their moral characters; as many; as unjust; ungodly; without strength; enemies; sinners; condemned in law; as lost; as dead in trespasses and sins. Matt. xx. 28. 2 Pet. iii. 18. Rom. v. 6—10. Isa. liii. 6. Gal. iv. 5. John x. 10. In inviting to receive Jesus as an effectual Saviour, he must call his hearers as men; sons of Adam; as simple; foolish; scorners; sinners; stout-hearted, and far from righteousness; backsliders; self-conceited; wicked; disobedient, and gainsaying; heavy laden with guilt or trouble; thirsting for happiness in vanity, or any thing else; as those who have spoken and done evil things as they could; and, in fine, as many as he finds out of hell. Prov. viii. 4. i. 22—24. and ix. 4, 5. Isa. lv. 1—7; xlvii. 12, 13; i. 18. and lxxv. 1, 2. Jer. iii. 4, 6, 14, 22. Rev. iii. 17, 18. and xiii. 17. Matt. xxii. 9. Nor is it amiss to shew, how every unconditional promise suits only those who are in a sinful and wretched state or condition. How wickedly the preacher contradicts all these oracles of God, who offers Christ and his salvation to men, providing they be sincere, be sensible sinners, hunger and thirst after righteousness! How it embarrasses the consciences of men, as those who are most sensible and sincere, are most affected with, and afraid of their own stupidity and hypocrisy! What thing spiritually good can proceed from a heart not created in Christ Jesus unto good works, a heart under the curse, which is the strength of sin; a carnal mind, enmity against God! Suppose it could, how could that goodness fail to exclude one from redemption by Christ, who came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, and to seek and to save that which is lost? Matt. ix. 13. and xviii. 11. It is true, Jesus invites the weary and heavy laden, but it is such as are wearied in, as well as of, wicked and self-righteous courses, and laden with the guilt and power of sin, as well as with the sense of it. He invites the thirsty, but it is such as spend money for that which is not bread, and labour for that which satisfieth not, which cannot be himself and his fulness. (4.) He must beware of directing sinners to prepare themselves for Jesus Christ, but press them to come to him as their Saviour, guilty, polluted, and wretched as they are, but by union with his person, their state and corrupt nature may be, not rectified or amended, but entirely changed; they being made the righteousness of God in him, and the sons of God, new creatures, created in Christ Jesus unto good works. How absurd to urge men to half save themselves, before they come to the Saviour; to half wash themselves, before they go to the water of purification! To endeavour to make them sensible of their natural state, and of their guilt in continuing to refuse Jesus Christ, and proceed in wickedness; and sensible of Christ's all-sufficiency, and fitness and readiness to save, is not a directing them to prepare themselves; but is a clearing of the way for their reception of him, and is using the means by which God introduces his Son into men's hearts. It is but proving their need, and their having the characters of the invited; and shewing the Redeemer's exact suitableness to their necessities; and so a driving and encouraging them to come to him just as they are. Nor ought he to excite men to read or hear God's word, or to prayer or meditation, as preparatives for Christ, but as means of Christ's meeting with their souls. Nor ought men to read, hear, meditate, or pray even for faith itself, without endeavouring to receive the offered Saviour; for without faith it is impossible to please God; and whatsoever is not of faith is sin. In exciting those who have received the Lord Jesus to walk in, and worthy of him, the gospel-preacher must, (1.) Instruct them how Jesus, as their righteousness and strength, is their supporting and securing way and means of their access to God, or fellowship with him; and how the holy law of God, in all the perfection of its commands, as a rule in his hand, but without penalty of any proper wrath, or promise of any servile reward, is our way of direction, and the sole unerring and authoritative standard of our whole conversation. John xiv. 6. Psal. cxix. 32. (2.) He must urge them to consider, detest, and flee from sin of every kind or degree, as the abominable thing which God hates; as their sole, and, in their case, a peculiarly horrid crime, and their chief misery; and to study the perfecting of holiness, in heart and life, as the will of God, and the glorious end of all his gracious purposes, precious promises, inestimable gifts, holy laws, and diversified providences; and of the whole office, undertaking, and work of our Redeemer; and that by receiving it out of Christ's fullness, as their great privilege, purchased by his blood, freely given in his promise, secured and effected by the imputation of his righteousness, and produced by his Spirit and presence, dwelling in their heart; and by growing in, and practising it, as their sole and honourable duty, commanded by his law, exemplified and directed by his pattern, constrained to by love shed abroad in the heart, and assisted in the performance, by his grace: and as their useful business, whereby God is honoured, their neighbour truly profited, and a great, a present, and everlasting, but gracious reward, brought to their soul. Tit. ii. 11, 12, 14. (3.) He must clearly teach, that as no attainments possible in men's natural state, can have the character of true holiness in them, or be an obedience to God's authority; because they proceed from a heart under the curse, which is the strength of sin, a heart desperately wicked, a carnal mind, enmity against God, that cannot be subject to his law, cannot please God, but must be unclean, their mind and conscience being defiled; so nothing done by a sinner, according to the temper or principle of his natural state, can fail to be an abomination to the Lord. Jer. xvii. 9. Rom. vi. 14. and viii. 7, 8. Tit. i. 15. (4.) He must shew, that as union to Christ, as made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, is the foundation of the change of our state and nature from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God: so the continuance of this union, and the fellowship with Christ dependent thereon, are the immediate sources of our growing holiness in heart or life. Hence it is called being rooted, and built up in Christ; walking in him; having him living in us; being strong in him, and in the power of his might; knowing him, and the fellowship of his sufferings, and the power of his resurrection; going on in his strength, making mention of his righteousness; walking up and down in his name, when strengthened in him; doing all in his name: and having a good conversation in him; a freedom from the law of sin and death, by the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus: being led by the Spirit; walking after the Spirit; having the fruits of the Spirit; and through the Spirit mortifying the deeds of the body.—In sum, Christ dwelling in our hearts by faith, as the Lord our righteousness and strength, and his Spirit as our comforter and sanctifier, bestow and support, strengthen and actuate, our gracious habits or new nature, for every good word or work. (5.) He must clearly teach, that as the curse of the law is the peculiar strength of sin; so justification through the Redeemer's righteousness imputed to our person, and applied to our conscience, is the distinguishing strength, source, and support of true holiness; not only that Christ's righteousness purchased the sanctifying influences of the Holy Ghost, and the holiness of our nature and practice proceeding therefrom; but how the removal of the curse, the deep engagement of all the divine perfections to promote our sanctification, are the great security of the eternal life, to which we are by God appointed in justification; and how the immediate cleansing influence of his blood on the conscience, and the constraining force of his dying love, believed on, mightily secure our perseverance and increase in holiness. Luke i. 74. 75. Rom. vi. 14. and vii. 4. Gal. ii. 19. (6.) He must carefully shew, that an actual and continued receiving of Jesus' person, righteousness, and fullness, by an assured faith in the gospel-promise, is the constant and immediate means of all gospel-holiness, repentance, love, and new obedience; and hence it is said to proceed from a pure conscience, and faith unfeigned; and is called the working of faith by love; living by faith on the Son of God; and walking by faith; a being strong in the faith, giving glory to God.—And according to the degree of faith's assured persuasion of the gospel-promises, and of its vigour in cleaving to, and receiving from the given Saviour, will the degree of every other grace and duty be. Phil. iv. 13. Eph. vi. 16. Nor must any one mark of a gracious state be given or used, that cannot be traced up to a believing of God's record of eternal life, given to us in his Son, and to our union and fellowship with Christ by faith, for whatsoever is not of faith is sin. (7.) In inculcating holiness on the saints, no motive must be used that is inconsistent with their state of indissoluble union to Christ, their complete and irrevocable justification through his blood, and unfailing conservation by his power. How absurd to thunder forth liability to damnation against those to whom there is no condemnation: who are passed from death to life; who have their life hid with Christ in God; and who, if Christ lives, must live also! Those with whom God has sworn he will not be wrath, nor suffer the covenant of his peace to be removed; and whom he keeps by his mighty power through faith unto salvation! How absurd to talk to the established heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, as if they had the title to, or the possession of their eternal life, to earn by their good works! (8.) He must carefully shew, that whatever reward, here or hereafter, is annexed to the holiness of saints, freely bestowed on them, not properly for their works' sake, but because their person is united to Jesus, and accepted in him! and that whatever affliction they meet with is a destructive punishment to their sin, but a precious blessing to their person and nature, purchased with Jesus' blood, and bestowed on them by God, as a wise and loving Father. Psal. xcix. 8. Heb. xii. 6.

GOURD. It is hard to say what was the kikayon, gourd, that covered Jonah's head at Nineveh. Jerome says, it was a small shrub, which, in the sandy places of Canaan, grows up in a few days to a considerable height, and with its large leaves, forms an agreeable shade. It is now generally thought to be the Palma Christi, which the Egyptians call kiki. It is somewhat like a lily, with large, smooth, and black spotted leaves. Dioscorides mentions a kind of it that grows to the height of a fig-tree, and whose branches and trunk are hollow as a reed. Jon. iv. 6. Wild gourds are plants which produce branches and leaves, which creep along the surface of the earth, as those of cucumbers. Its fruit is of the form and size of an orange, containing a light substance, but so excessively bitter, that it has been called the gall of the earth, and it is ready to kill one with violent purging. Sheuchzer thinks it might be the white briar, or white vine, the berries of which the young prophet gathered, and which are agreeable to the eye, but a very bitter and violent purgative. 2 Kings iv. 39.

GO'ZAN; the name of a river, and of the country adjacent, which the Assyrians conquered, and whither they transported a part of the ten tribes of Israel. Isa. xxxvii. 11. 2 Kings xvii. 6. Whether it was the Elon Gozine, near the source of the Tigris, and which Ptolemy calls Gauzanite in Mesopotamia; or a place in Media where Ptolemy places the provinces of Gauzan, and the city Gauzania, cannot be determined.

GRACE: FAVOUR; (1.) Free love and affection; and to find grace in the eyes of one, is to enjoy his regard, affection, and friendship. Esth. ii. 17. (2.) Good things freely given; a liberal collection. 2 Cor. viii. 6. (3.) Comeliness of person, ornaments, flowers, &c. Prov. xxxi. 30. and iv. 9. Jam. i. 11.

The grace of God or Christ denotes, (1.) His free favour and love to us. Rom. iii. 24. and v. 20, 21. 2 Cor. viii. 9. (2.) Those spiritual endowments, qualities, principles, or habits, that are in Christ, and are from him freely communicated to us. 2 Tim. i. 9. John i. 14, 16. (3.) The gospel, which is a free gift, and by which he declares, offers, and conveys his free gifts to us. Tit. ii. 11. 2 Cor. vi. 2. 1 Pet. v. 12. The saints' state of reconciliation and favour with God, in which they stand fixed, and under the influence of which they are; the working of the Spirit which they experience; the holy endowments, qualities, or habits of faith, hope, charity, fear of God, &c. which they possess, and the perfect happiness which they shall for ever enjoy, are each called grace. They proceed from the undeserved favour of God, are his free gifts to us, and render us honourable and comely. Rom. v. 1. and vi. 14. 2 Cor. xii. 9. Phil. i. 7. 2 Cor. viii. 7. 1 Pet. i. 13. The office of apostleship, and qualifications for discharging it, are called grace, because freely given. Rom. xv. 15. Eph. iii. 8. Spiritual edification of others is called grace; it displays the favour of God, and conveys his gracious influences to men. Eph. iv. 29. Speech is, with grace, seasoned with salt, when it is concerning the favour or truths of God, and tends to promote the edification and holiness of such as hear it. Col. iv. 6. To be called to the grace of Christ is to have his gospel published to us; and to be invited to the enjoyment of the fulness of God. Gal. i. 6.

GRACIOUS; full of free favour, and disposed to give free gifts. Exod. xxii. 27. and xxxiv. 6. Gen. xliii. 20. Christ's words were gracious: they shewed the grace that was in him; related to the precious and honourable truths of God; and tended to the edification of others. Luke iv. 22. How gracious shalt thou be, when pains come upon thee! How comely, how religiously disposed, when the Chaldeans come and murder, or carry you away captive! Jer. xxii. 23.

GRAFT; INGRAFT; to put a branch into a root or stump, that it may grow. God grafted in the gentiles, when he brought them into his church, and united them to Jesus Christ, as their spiritual and fructifying root. Rom. xi. 17-24. God's word is ingrafted, as it is put into and planted in our hearts, that it may bring forth the fruit of good works in our life. James i. 21.

GRAIN of corn or sand. 1 Cor. xv. 37. The least grain shall not fall to the earth; the weakest saints shall not be hurt or ruined amidst sifting and trying providences. Amos ix. 9.

GRAPES. See VINE.

GRASS. The well known vegetable on which flocks, herds, &c. feed, and which decks our fields and refreshes our sight with its green colour, and every blade of which is by the marvellous providence of God, diversified. Psal. civ. 14. Men are like grass; how often they flourish in multitude and prosperity! and yet how quickly withered by affliction and sorrow, or cut down by calamity and death! 2 Kings xix. 26. Isa. xl. 6, 7. Wicked men are like grass on house-tops; they make a pompous and flourishing appearance for a short time, and yet when the least blast of calamity comes, how wretched their condition! and of how little use are they! Psal. cxxix. 6. Under the first trumpet, the green grass was burnt up; flourishing multitudes of the common people in the Roman empire were impoverished and ruined by the Goths, &c. Multitudes of professed Christians were infected with the Arian heresy, and rendered useless to the honour of God, or edification of others. Rev. viii. 7. The grass, green things, and trees, not hurt by the locusts of the fifth trumpet, may be godly professors and ministers, marvellously preserved from the ravaging Saracens, and the seduction and persecution of the Antichristian clergy. Rev. ix. 4.

GRASSHOPPER; an insect of the locust kind, but small. Its antennæ are bristly, its outer wings skinny, narrow, and much like those of the common fly. They often abound in meadows and hedges, and the males sing during the clear heat. Multitudes of them destroy the fruits of the earth. Amos vii. 1. Some years ago, prodigious swarms of them, for several harvests, wasted the country of Languedoc in France, and some of them were an inch long; and sometimes they covered the earth where they went, four or five inches deep. Grasshoppers, under the law, were clean, and might represent weak saints, that can sing only amidst prosperity. Lev. xi. 22. Men are likened to grasshoppers, to signify their smallness, weakness, unworthiness; or their multitude, destructive influence, and being easily and quickly destroyed. Numb. xiii. 33. Isa. xl. 22. Judg. vi. 5. Nah. iii. 17. The grasshopper is a burden to the old dying man: the smallest annoyance is heavy and tormenting to him: he is quite peevish, and frets at every thing, and is unable to bear any thing. Eccl. xii. 5.

GRATE; a broad plate of brass, full of holes in the manner of a sieve, that was fixed below the fire of the altar, and through which the ashes fell down. This might hint at the perfect purity of Christ's sacrifice. Exod. xxvii. 4.

GRAVE: sober and modest; apparently impressed with the fear of God. Tit ii. 2. 1 Tim. iii. 8.

GRAVE, or sepulchre, for burying dead bodies in. The Hebrews were generally very careful about their graves, and the Jews are so to this day. Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Rebekah, and some others of the patriarchs, and of the kings of Israel and Judah, and other great men, were buried in hollow places, formed by nature, or dug into rocks. Moses, Aaron, Eleazar, and Joshua, were buried in mountains; Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, under a tree, and Samuel in his own house. It seems some of their kings were buried in the mount upon which the temple stood. Ezek. xliii. 9. Sometimes they buried in gardens, but generally their burying-places were without the city. It seems that the common place of interment at Jerusalem was in the valley of Kidron, eastward of the city. It does not appear that, in ordinary cases, they marked their graves with any inscriptions; but that of the man of God, who prophesied the destruction of the altar at Beth-el, seems to have had one. 2 Kings xxiii. 17. When they were dug into rocks, and even into the earth, a hewn stone was generally put over them; and something to warn passengers to avoid touching them, and so polluting themselves. On the 15th day of Adar, it is said, they used to whiten their sepulchres; and by building or whitening the sepulchres of the prophets, they professed their great respect to them. Matt. xxiii. 29.

The sepulchre of Moses was divinely concealed. About A. D. 1655, some Maronite shepherds pretended to have found it. For a while the discovery made a great noise in Turkey, the Ottoman court not excepted; but the whole was at last found to be an imposture. The sepulchre of David, and other kings of Judah, not only remained till our Saviour's ascension, Acts ii. 29; but continues still, though very much decayed. In it, first, you enter a court of about twenty-six feet square, cut out into a marble rock; on the left hand is a gallery, with its supporting pillars cut out in the same manner; at the end of this you creep through into a chamber of about twenty-four feet square. Around this are other smaller chambers, whose doors, posts, and hinges have all been cut out of the rock. In these little chambers are the niches cut out in the rock, wherein they placed the dead bodies of the kings. It is said that Solomon deposited vast treasures in these sepulchre of his father, and that Hircanus and Herod pillaged it; but whoever considers how oft Jerusalem had, ere that time, been taken by enemies, will be unable to believe any treasure could have continued there nine hundred or a thousand years. Our Saviour's sepulchre, now showed to travellers, is a small chamber about sixteen feet long, six broad, and eight high. Its entrance is four feet high, and two feet four inches wide. It has a stone-door, cut out of the same rock. This stone the Jews sealed, but the angel rolled it away, and sat on it. The place where his body is said to have lain is a stone raised two feet four inches from the floor.

The grave is said to swallow up men; nor is it ever filled or satisfied. Prov. i. 12. and xxx. 16. Christ is the destruction of it. By lying in it for his people, he delivered them from the imprisoning power of it, and made it a bed of rest to them. Hos. xiii. 14. It is sometimes put for death, Job iii. 22; or for the dead in the grave. Isa. xxxviii. 18. Zeal and ardent affection for Christ, jealousy of his love, is cruel as the grave: it swallows up a man's care and labour, nor is it ever satisfied till it obtain the immediate enjoyment of him. Sol. Song viii. 6. Hypocrites are likened to whited sepulchres, and also to graves which appear not; while they have an outward show of holiness, their heart and secret practice are full of filthiness and corruption. Matt. xxiii. 27. Luke xi. 44. Sinners' throats are an open sepulchre; they pour forth the most abominable stench of corrupt works, that defile and infect others. Rom. iii. 15. The Chaldeans' quiver was an open sepulchre; their arrows spread havoc and death all around them. Jer. v. 16.

GRAVEL; a mixture of sand and small stones. To have offspring as the gravel is to have them in great number. Isa. xlviii. 10. Grievous troubles are likened to gravel in the mouth; they are quite disagreeable and vexing. Prov. xx. 17. Lam. iii. 16.

GREASE; to have the heart fat as grease, is to have it puffed up with prosperity, and inattentive to any thing good. Psal. cxix. 70.

GREAT; wealthy; powerful; large; famous. God is great; is infinite in excellency, and the sovereign disposer of all things. Job xxxvi. 26. The Hebrews, or Abraham's seed in general, were a great nation; numerous, wealthy, powerful, and famous. Gen. xii. 2. The king of Assyria was a great king; had much wealth, many subjects, and extensive fame and influence. 2 Kings xviii. 19. Moses was very great in the land of Egypt; much famed as an extraordinary person. Exod. xi. 3. Naaman was a great man with his master; highly esteemed; and had much power and honour. 2 Kings v. 1. A great evil is wickedness or affliction more than common. Jer. xlv. 7. and xxxii. 42.

GRAVES; a kind of harness for the legs of warriors. 1 Sam. xvii. 16.

GREECE, GRECIA; in Hebrew, JAVAN; a country on the south-east of Europe. Going from the south-west to the north-east, it, when largely taken, contained the Peloponnesus, or Morea, Achaia, Thessaly, Macedonia, if not also Epirus on the west of Macedonia, &c; but more strictly taken, it contained the three former. It lay between the 36th and 43d degree of N. lat. and between the 19th and 27th degree of E. longitude; and is about four hundred miles from south to north, and three hundred and fifty-six from east to west. It was probably peopled soon after the flood. At the time of the Trojan war, which we reckon about nine hundred years before Christ, it was considerably populous, and divided into a prodigious number of small states, similar to those of the Canaanites in the time of Joshua. In after times, we find about forty-eight provinces in it, all which Philip king of Macedon, and Alexander his son, reduced into one. The kingdoms or states of Sicyon, Argos, Attica, or Athens, Boeotia, Arcadia, Theasaly, Phocis, Corinth, Lacedæmon, Elis, Ætolia, Locris, Doris, Achaia, and Macedonia, were the most noted.

The father of the GREEKS was JAVAN, the fourth son of Japheth; his sons were Elisha, Tarshish, Chittim, and Dodanim; his posterity were anciently called Joanes, or Jones; they first seem to have settled on the west of Lesser Asia, where part of them still continued, and to which others, in after times, returned from Greece, and formed Greek states in Lesser Asia of their various tribes, Ionians, Æolians, and Dorians. Numbers, in very early times, passed into Europe, perhaps by crossing the Hellespont, and settled in Greece. Some Phœnicians, Egyptians, and perhaps others, driven out of their own countries, came afterward and settled among them; they, notwithstanding a multitude of intestine wars, multiplied exceedingly, and spread themselves into almost every isle and coast of the Mediterranean sea: part of them took up their residence in the east of Italy; others at Marseilles in the south of France; part of them settled in Cyrene and Egypt, in Africa.

After they had long lived in barbarity, the study of philosophy began among them, about six or seven hundred years before the birth of our Saviour; they made considerable advances therein, chiefly in their own self-conceit: but though their manners were less savage, their morals were, on the whole, scarce a whit bettered. It is said they had about 30,000 idols. They traded with the Tyrians, and sometimes bought of them Jews to be slaves. Ezek. xxvii. 6, 7, 13. Joel iii. 6.

After long and repeated wars between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, their principal tribes, and the war of the Phocians, and Boeotians, &c. and their looseness of manners had exceedingly weakened those in the south parts of Greece, the Macedonians subdued them, A. M. 3666. But their foreign wars were still more remarkable. About A. M. 3100, they, after a war of ten years, ruined the powerful kingdom of Troy. About four hundred years after, the Ionians in Lesser Asia revolted from the Persians, and the Greeks in Europe, particularly the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, on different occasions, and sometimes conjunctly took part with them. Provoked therewith, Darius Hystaspes, and Xerxes his son, with a prodigious army thought to ruin them entirely: not a little of Greece was ravaged, and Athens was twice burnt. For almost two hundred years, partly by assisting the Egyptians, and partly by harassing the Persian territories in Asia, the Greeks attempted to resent this usage.

No sooner had Philip king of Macedonia, and his son Alexander, rendered themselves masters of Greece, than it was resolved to overturn the empire of Persia. About A. M. 3670, Alexander marched an army of 35,000 Greeks into Asia. With these, in the three great battles of Granicus, Issus, and Arbela, he, with almost no loss, overthrew the Persian armies, which it seems were, in the two first battles, about five or six hundred thousand; and in the last, ten or eleven hundred thousand. In six years he made himself master of the Persian empire, and part of India; and died, leaving an empire about 4000 miles in length. None of his relations, or posterity, had any peaceable possession of any part of it; and, in about fifteen years, they were all murdered. Roxana, one of his wives, murdered Statera, the daughter of Darius, another of them, and cast her body into a well. Olympias, his mother, murdered Aridæus his bastard-brother, and Eurydice his wife; and not long after was, in revenge hereof, murdered by Cassander's soldiery. Roxana, and Alexander Agus her son who had borne the title of king about fourteen years, and had been supported by Eumenes, that miracle of bravery and conduct, were privately murdered by Cassander, who, about a year after, murdered Hercules, another of Alexander's sons, and his mother Barsine. The royal family thus extinct, and Antigonus reduced, the empire was parcelled into four parts. Lysimachus had Bithynia, Thrace, and the northern; Cassander had Greece, and the western parts; Ptolemy had Egypt, and the southern countries; and Seleucus Nicator had Syria, and the eastern. That which belonged to Lysimachus was taken from him in a few years, and there remained but three divisions. The monarchy of Greece, after a variety of wars, was not long after split into the states of Macedonia, Achaia, Ætolia, &c. and the most of it was subdued by the Romans, about a hundred and forty-eight years before the birth of our Saviour.

The two thighs of this once belly-like empire had a long duration. Ptolemy Lagus, the first Grecian king of Egypt, on the south, was very powerful. He had under him Egypt, Canaan, Phœnicia, Caria, Hollow Syria, part of Arabia, all Cyprus, and sundry of the Ægean isles. Seleucus Nicator, the first Greek king of Syria, on the north, was still more powerful: he was sovereign of all the countries from the Hellespont to beyond the river Indus, and, after the death of Lysimachus, ruled over Thrace and Macedonia. Antiochus Soter, his son, succeeded him, whose war with the Gauls, Bithynians, and king of Pergamus, weakened his kingdom. After Ptolemy Philadelphus in Egypt, and Antiochus Theos in Syria, were wearied of their long war with one another, a method of peace was agreed on: Philadelphus carried his daughter Bernice along with him to Syria and persuaded Antiochus to divorce his wife Laodice, and marry her, and settle the Syrian crown on her children. No sooner was Philadelphus dead, than Antiochus divorced Bernice, and recalled Laodice, and settled the crown on her son Seleucus Callinicus. To prevent her husband from changing his mind, Laodice got him quickly poisoned. Seleucus succeeded him about A. M. 3758. Bernice and her child, and the Egyptians who attended her, were all murdered, before the troops of Lesser Asia could come up to assist her. To revenge her death, Ptolemy Euergetes king of Egypt, her brother, invaded the kingdom of Syria, reduced the most of it, killed Laodice, took much spoil, and recovered about 2500 of the Egyptian idols, which Cambyases, and other Persians had carried from Egypt, and he placed them in their temples. In his return through Canaan, he offered a solemn sacrifice of thanksgiving to the God of the Jews at Jerusalem. As a sedition at home had obliged Ptolemy to leave Syria, he made a truce with Seleucus; but that unhappy prince was harassed by his brother Hierax, and by Attalus and Eumenes of Pergamus; and at last was taken captive by the Parthians. Seleucus, Cerannus, and Antiochus the Great, his sons, formed a resolution to be revenged on Ptolemy, and to recover the provinces he had wrested from their father. Cerannus died before he did any thing worthy of notice: Antiochus succeeded him A. M. 3781. With difficulty he reduced the troops of Molon the rebel. Ptolemy Philopater of Egypt gave him a terrible defeat at Raphia, near the north east corner of Egypt, and obliged him to deliver up Canaan and Hollow Syria. When Ptolemy viewed the state of these provinces, he offered sacrifices at Jerusalem; but restrained by the Jews, or terrified by God, from entering the holy of holies, he conceived a terrible rage against the Jews, and caused about forty or sixty thousand of those in Egypt to be inhumanly murdered. He had so easily granted a peace to Antiochus, that he might have time to wallow in his lewdness with Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles. Offended with his baseness, a number of his subjects revolted; and he soon died of his debauchery. His son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of four or five years old, succeeded him. Antiochus the Great, having reduced Achæus the rebel, agreed with Philip king of Macedonia to conquer young Ptolemy's dominions, and part them betwixt them. Meanwhile, the Egyptians, highly offended that their young sovereign was under the guardianship of Agathocles, were ready to revolt; various seditions actually happened. The Alexandrians rose in arms, and put Agathocles, Agathoclea, and their mother and associates, to death. Many of the Jews revolted to Antiochus; but Scopas, the Egyptian general, quickly chastised them; and reduced Canaan and Hollow Syria to their wonted subjection. Antiochus with a great army, met him at the springs of Jordan, defeated the Egyptians; and, notwithstanding all that Scopas and three fresh armies sent to assist him, could do, reduced Phenicia, Canaan, and Hollow Syria. The Jews gladly submitted, and assisted him with provisions; and he honoured them and their religion with very distinguished favours. Taking a number of them along with him, he bent his march towards Egypt, with a design to conquer it; but fearing this might provoke the Romans, now guardians of young Ptolemy; or inclining to make war on some of the Roman allies in Asia, he resolved to gain Egypt by fraud. After bribing his beautiful daughter Cleopatra to betray her husband, he married her to Ptolemy, and assigned Phenicia, Canaan, and Hollow Syria, for her dowry; though, it seems, he never actually gave them up: but his designs on Egypt were disappointed. Ptolemy's generals, suspected him, and were on their guard; and Cleopatra faithfully supported the interest of her husband. Enraged with this disappointment, Antiochus fitted out three hundred ships and a formidable army, with which he rendered himself master of a number of places on the coasts of Lesser Asia, Thrace, and Greece; and took Samos, Eubœa, and many other islands in the Mediterranean sea. Hearing of the death of Ptolemy, he prepared to seize on the kingdom of Egypt: but a terrible storm, and the death of Scopas the traitor, prevented him. Instigated by Hannibal, he, and some Greeks in Europe, commenced a war on the Romans. To revenge this affront, and the injury he had done to their allies, they attacked him. Acilius routed his army in Greece, and drove him quite out of Europe; Livius and Æmilius, at different times, defeated him by sea. Lucius Scipio, with 30,000 forces, routed his army at Magnesia, killed 54,000 of them, stripped him of all his territory in Lesser Asia, on this side mount Taurus; and condemned him to pay 12,000 talents of silver to defray the expence of the Romans in making war on him. Covered with shame, he retired to the innermost parts of his kingdom, and attempting to rob the temple of Jupiter at Elymais, for money to pay the Romans, he was killed by the enraged mob.

The short reign of Seleucus Philopater his son was notable for nothing but raising of taxes, and an attempt by Heliodorus his minister to pillage the temple of Jerusalem for money to pay the Roman debt. He was cut off, not in the sedition of subjects, or in open war with his foes, but poisoned by Heliodorus his infamous agent. Nor did Demetrius his son succeed him; but Antiochus his brother, who had long been hostage at Rome, for securing the payment of the debt due to the senate; and one of the most base, frantic, and wicked persons that ever breathed. By flattering the Romans to favour him, by flattering Eumenes king of Pergamus to assist him, and by flattering the Syrian subjects, he peaceably obtained the crown. He quickly defeated the forces of Heliodorus the usurper; of Demetrius the true heir; and of Ptolemy the young king of Egypt, whose guardians claimed the kingdom of Syria in right of his mother; and, by his excessive distribution of presents, he gained the hearts of his people. Eulæus and Lenæus, administrators for young Ptolemy Philometer, justly demanded for him the provinces which had been assigned for his mother's dowry. Piqued herewith, Antiochus, after viewing and repairing the fortifications of these places, marched a moderate army towards Egypt; and on the north-east border of that country defeated the Egyptian generals; but as the victory was not complete, he returned back to his own kingdom. Next year he invaded, and, except Alexandria, ravaged the most part of Egypt, and had Cyprus treacherously betrayed to him by Macron. Ptolemy, whose education had been so effeminate, could do almost nothing in this time of distress. Perhaps he was taken prisoner by the Syrians. It was certain that he and Antiochus, who was his uncle, had an interview, and feasted together. While neither intended performance, they entered into a mutual league; and were both disappointed of their designs. In his return home, Antiochus committed the most terrible murder and sacrilege at Jerusalem, and 40,000 were slain, and 40,000 made slaves. Meanwhile the Alexandrians, seeing Philometor their king entirely at the beck of Antiochus, made his brother Ptolemy Physcon king in his stead. Under pretence of restoring Philometor, Antiochus again invaded Egypt; but not being able to reduce the Alexandrians, he left the country, expecting that the two brothers would exhaust its strength by their civil wars, and so render the whole an easy prey for him. They, suspecting his designs, agreed to reign jointly. Provoked herewith, he again invaded Egypt, and ravaged a great part of it: but Popilius, and other ambassadors from Rome, arriving in Macedonian ships, charged him to desist, as he tendered the favour of their state. Stung with rage at this disappointment, and provoked with the peculiarity of the Jewish religion, and some affronts which they had done him, he made terrible work in Judea. He had before turned out their high-priests at pleasure, and sold the office to the highest bidder; he now stopped the daily sacrifice, rendered the temple a scene of idolatry and lewdness, compelled the Jews to eat swine's flesh, and seemed intent to cut off every copy of the scriptures, and every worshipper of God. Meanwhile the Armenians, Persians, and others of his subjects, revolted. The first were easily reduced, but the Persian mob gave him a repulse, as he attempted to plunder their temple. Hearing, in his return towards Babylon, that the Jews had defeated Lysias, his general, and troops, he vowed to root them wholly out from the earth. He was almost immediately struck with a terrible distemper; his flesh crawled with worms, rotted, and fell off in pieces. Convinced that his persecution of the Jews was the cause, he made solemn vows to grant them redress and favour, and to restore their religion; but all was in vain; the torment and stench put an end to his life.

For about a hundred years more, the kingdom of the Greeks subsisted in Syria, amidst contention and wretchedness, to the highest degree, and was seized by the Romans about A. M. 3939. The Egyptian kingdom lingered out about thirty-five years longer, and then fell into the same hands. When the Roman empire came to be divided into the eastern and western, about A. D. 338, the most part of what the Greeks had ever possessed, except Parthia, and some other countries on the south-east, fell to the share of the emperor of the east, who generally resided at Constantinople. The Saracens seized a great part of what once belonged to the Greeks. The Ottoman Turks are at present masters of almost the whole of it: but vast numbers of the Greeks still live among them, in a condition sufficiently wretched. Gen. ix. 27. Zech. iii. 3, 6. Dan. ii. 32, 39. Dan. vii. 6. and viii. 5—25. and x. 20. and xi. 2—35. Zech. ix. 13. Dan. vii. 7, 12.

Long before our Saviour's incarnation, a part, if not the whole, of the then received oracles of God, was translated into the Greek tongue, and, not long after his death, so much counted foolishness by their philosophic pretenders to wisdom. Christian churches were planted almost every where in the Grecian territories. Multitudes of them still retain the Christian name. See CHURCH. Isa. lx. 19. 1 Cor. i. 24. All the gentiles are sometimes called Greeks. Rom. x. 12. Gal. iii. 28: and the Jews, who used the Septuagint, or Greek translation of the Old Testament, are called Grecians, or Hellenists. Acts vi. 1.

GREEDY; to work uncleanness with greediness, is to commit it with an increasing desire and delight in it; or a striving who shall exceed in it. Eph. iv. 19.

GREEN. As green is the colour of flourishing grass, it is used as an emblem of pleasantness, prosperity, fulness of wealth, grace, or comfort. Jesus Christ is called a green tree, to mark his unbounded and never-failing fulness of grace and fruitifying virtue. Luke xxiii. 31. Hos. xiv. 8. Saints are green trees, or green things; they still retain the Spirit of grace, and grow in grace and good works; and are delightful to behold. Psal. liii. 8. Rev. ix. 4. Men abounding in prosperity, honour, and wealth, are called green trees. Ezek. xvii. 24. and xx. 47. See BED.

GREET. See SALUTE.

GREY; perhaps what we render GREYHOUND, an animal comely in going, ought to be rendered a riding or war-horse. Prov. xxx. 31.

GRIEF; SORROW. 1. Inward pain and vexation of mind, on account of something sinful or distressing; it contracts the heart, sinks the spirits, and often mars the health of the body. It is either, (1.) Natural, occasioned by the death or departure of friends, or any other sore trouble. Acts xx. 38. Job ii. 13. We are to beware of an immoderate degree of it; and are not to mourn hopelessly, since there is a future resurrection of the dead to eternal life. 1 Thess. iv. 13; nor must we express it in a heathenish and superstitious manner, by cutting our flesh, or the like. Deut. xiv. 1. (2.) Godly, when one affected with the love of God shed abroad in his heart, is sensibly pained in soul for sin, as offensive to God, or with God's withdrawal of his influence and presence. This appears in carefulness to search out, and amend what is wrong; in clearing one's self, shewing detestation of sin in others, as well as in ourselves; in fear of God's just vengeance, and of continuance in sin; vehement desire to remove offence, and get rid of sin; zeal for the honour of God and his law; and in revenge, loathing one's self on account of sin. 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11. (3.) A legal sorrow, such as is found on account of sin in the heart of unregenerate men. Accurately speaking, this is an inward pain of mind, that God will not let sin escape unpunished. It works death, stupifies the soul, hurts the bodily constitution, and often drives people to murder themselves. 2 Cor. vii. 10. 2. Sorrow or grief also signifies the cause of grief, and trouble of mind; so Job's trouble is called his grief; and Esau's Canaanitish wives a grief to Isaac and Rebekah. Job vi. 2. and ix. 28. Gen. xxvi. 35. A woman's pains in child-birth are her sorrows; and to them are likened the terrible and vexatious calamities of famine, sword, and pestilence, that so perplexed the Israelites, that they knew not what to do, or whither to go. Hos. xii. 13. The young ones of hinds are called their sorrows, because they give them much pain in bringing them forth. Job xxxix. 3. 3. Often it signifies both the passion of grief, and the cause of it. Matt. xxiv. 8. 1 Tim. vi. 10. Sorrows of hell, or death, are great troubles, causing the most painful grief. Psal. xviii. 4, 5. and cxvi. 3.

To grieve, is to fill with vexation and grief. 1 Sam. ii. 33. God is grieved, when he is highly offended with men's sinning, and provoked to execute his judgments on them. Gen. vi. 6. Heb. iii. 10. Men grieve the Holy Ghost, when they resist his influence, abuse his gifts or grace; and so displease and offend him, and provoke him to withdraw his influences, and give them up to their corrupt lusts. Eph. iv. 30. To sorrow, is to be grieved and mourn. Jer. xxxi. 12. A hand is said to sorrow, when its inhabitants are filled with grief, and mourn exceedingly; and the face of the country is ruined and desolate. Jer. li. 29. They shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes. After being a little distressed and grieved with the heavy tax of the Assyrian king, they shall be more grievously afflicted with murder, captivity, &c. Hos. viii. 10.

GRIEVOUS; that which furnishes great cause of grief; (1.) What is very offensive; so sin is grievous, when it is very great and aggravated. Lam. i. 8, 20. Ezek. xiv. 13; and men are grievous revolters, when they sin exceedingly. Jer. vi. 28. (2.) What is very ill-natured, outrageous, and provoking; so grievous words stir up anger. Prov. xv. 1. (3.) What is very afflicting, and hard to be borne; and so war, visions, &c. are said to be grievous. Isa. xxi. 15. Matt. xxiii. 4. (4.) What is very hurtful and destructive: so wolves, or false teachers, are called grievous. Acts xx. 29. Men write grievousness, which they have prescribed, when they establish and ratify wicked and oppressive laws. Isa. x. 1.

GRIND; to bruise small, as meal is bruised in a mill. Anciently they had only hand-mills for grinding their meal; women and slaves, such as Samson was at Gaza, and the Hebrews at Babylon, and the Chaldeans under the Persians, were usually the grinders; and it seems they sat behind the mill. Matt. xxiv. 41. Judg. xvi. 21. Lam. v. 13. Isa. xlvii. 2. Millstones were never to be taken in pledge, as this would have hindered from grinding the daily provision of the family. Deut. xxiv. 6. The Romans had their mills driven with asses or slaves. Nor is it much above six hundred years since wind-mills were first brought from Asia into Europe. The millstones were hard, the nethermost especially, which was fixed; and so the heart of Leviathan is likened to a piece of it, to represent his undaunted courage and obstinacy. Job xii. 24. The ceasing of the sound of the millstones, imported the place's being turned into a desolation. Jer. xxv. 10. Rev. xviii. 22. Christ's falling on men, and grinding them to powder, denotes his rendering them utterly miserable for their contempt of him; thus he did grind the Jewish nation, when their city and temple were utterly ruined, and multitudes slain and enslaved in the most wretched manner. Matt. xxiv. 44. To grind the face of the poor, is cruelly to oppress and afflict them. Isa. iii. 15. Let my wife grind to another: let her become a slave to work at the mill; or let her be defiled by another. Job xxxi. 10. Our jaw-teeth, which chew our food, are called our grinders; and their sound is brought low, when they are lost by old age, and we have hardly any stumps left to chew our victuals. Eccl. xii. 3, 4.

GRIN. See SNARL.

GRIZZLED; having many white spots like hailstones. Zech. vi. 3.

GROANING, is expressive of great trouble; and of a vehement desire of relief. Exod. ii. 24. The saints groan earnestly, and with groanings that cannot be uttered: they have a deep and heart-burdening sense of their sins and afflictions; and, with ardent desire, long and cry for deliverance. 2 Cor. v. 2, 4. Rom. viii. 26. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain: the irrational part of it, in our earth and air, suffer much abuse and distress, on account of man's sin; and will never be happy, till at the last day they be delivered from man's sinful abuse, and from the distressful judgments of God; but others understand it, that the gentle world, though anxiously seeking after happiness, never attained it, till the gospel revealed to them true rest and satisfaction in Christ. Rom. viii. 22.

GROPE, signifies to be deprived of seeing; or reduced to great perplexity and uncertainty what to think or do. Deut. xxviii. 29. Isa. lix. 10.

GROSS darkness, is what is very thick. Exod. x. 21—23. Isa. lx. 2. Men's heart is gross, when it is sensual, stupid, and obdurate. Matt. xiii. 15.

GROVE; a plot of growing trees. Abraham planted a grove in Beersheba around his altar, that he might worship God with more privacy. In after times, the heathens generally erected altars, and worshipped their idols in groves. God therefore prohibited the Hebrews to plant any trees near his altar; and commanded them to cut down all the groves of the Canaanites. Deut. xii. 3. and xvi. 21. In their repeated relapses into idolatry, the Israelites worshipped their idols in groves. Judg. iii. 7. and vi. 25. 1 Kings xiv. xv. &c. Sometimes groves may denote the idols there worshipped. 1 Kings xviii. 19.

GROUND. Men and things are said to be brought to, or cast on the ground, when they are destroyed, or rendered contemptible. Judg. xx. 21. Psal. lxxiv. 7. and lxxxix. 39. Dan. vii. 7, 10, 13. Fallow ground, a field that has rested from bearing crops of corn; to break up our fallow ground, and not sow among thorns, is seriously to consider our ways, break off our wickedness and turn our spiritual barrenness into an active bringing forth of good works. Jer. iv. 3. Hos. x. 10. Way-side ground denotes careless hearers of the gospel, who never are much impressed with it, and soon lose what impression they have had. Stony ground denotes such as, with considerable affection, receive the gospel, and are, for a while, reformed in their life by means of it, but never have it deep-rooted in their heart, and so quickly fall away before temptation. Thorny ground denotes hearers, who are, for a considerable time, impressed with the power of gospel-truth, but at last worldly cares prevail, and render it evident that their heart was never changed. The good ground, bringing forth thirty, forty, sixty, or one hundred fold, is heart-renewed hearers of the gospel, who, in an upright manner, and in different degrees, bring forth fruit unto God. Matt. xiii. 4-8, 19-23. Mark iv. Luke viii. To be grounded and settled in faith, is to have a real habit or principle of faith, implanted in the heart, to be well established in the knowledge and belief of God's truths. Col. i. 23. See ROOTED.

GROW; INCREASE. (1.) To spring up; wax bigger. Gen. ii. 5. (2.) To increase or flourish in honour, grace, fruit, multitude. Isa. liii. 2. Mal. iv. 2. Acts xii. 24. and vii. 17. Christ increased, when he became more famous and esteemed. John iii. 30. Faith is increased, when it is made more strong, lively, and fruitful in good works. Luke xvii. 5. And the growth of grace is called the increase of God. Col. ii. 19. The word of God increaseth, when it is more fully, clearly, and extensively preached. Acts vi. 7. The young brood of animals, or the fruit of seed sown in the earth, and the good effects of the gospel, are called increase. Deut. vii. 13. and xiv. 22. 1 Cor. iii. 6, 7. The latter growth of hay, after the kings' mowings, may represent the Israelites recovered from their Syrian calamities, by means of Jehoash and Jeroboam the second, but quickly ruined by the Assyrians. Amos vii. 1.

GUEST; one bidden to eat at our table, or lodge in our house. 1 Kings i. 41, 49. Gospel hearers are likened to guests; at Christ's invitation, by his ministers or others, they come to his ordinances, professing to feed with him on his fulness. Matt. xxii. 10, 11. The Chaldeans were guests bidden to the Lord's sacrifice; he raised them up and enabled them to execute his vengeance; and they satiated their own pride and covetousness in murdering and spoiling the Jews and nations around. Zeph. i. 7.

GUIDE; a leader; director; adviser. Acts i. 16. God is a guide: he directs the motions of all his creatures. Job xxxviii. 22; and by his word, Spirit, and providence, he directs his people in their proper course, and comforts them under their troubles. Isa. xlix. 10. A first husband is called a guide of youth, Prov. ii. 17; so God was to the Hebrews. Jer. iii. 4.

GUILE. See DECEIT.

GUILTY; chargeable with crimes that expose to punishment. Gen. xlii. 21. He that offends in one point is guilty of all; of breaking all the commandments of God; he tramples on the authority which establishes, and fails of that love which fulfils the whole law. James ii. 10. An unworthy partaker of the Lord's supper is guilty of the body and blood of the Lord: he is chargeable with the horrid crime of crucifying Christ afresh, and offering the highest indignity to his person and righteousness, represented by the symbols of that ordinance. 1 Cor. xi. 27. To be guilty of death is to be chargeable with a crime which deserves death by the hand of the civil magistrate. Matt. xxvi. 66. The Jews reckoned him who swore by the gift on the altar guilty: that is, bound to perform his oath or vow. Matt. xxiii. 18.

GULF; a large breaking in of the sea into the dry land, as in the frith of Forth; or a great rent in the earth. The great gulf fixed between Abraham and the rich man may denote the great distance between heaven and hell, and the irremovable hindrances of coming from the one to the other. Luke xvi. 26.

GUR-BAAL; a place in Arabia, the Stony, south of Canaan, and perhaps the same with Petra, the Arabian capital. The inhabitants of it were defeated by the troops of Uzziah. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7.

GUTTER; dams or troughs for watering flocks or herds. Gen. xxx. 38, 41. But the gutter, through which one might enter the city of Jerusalem, was perhaps some privy entrance, by which the filth of the city ran out. 2 Sam. v. 8.

H.

HA, HA, is expressive of courage and joyful contempt. Job xxxviii. 25.

HABAK-KUK, the prophet, is said to have been of the tribe of Simeon. He prophesied during the reign of Manassch, or rather was cotemporary with Jeremiah. In his first chapter, he foretels the destruction of Judea, and the countries about, by the Chaldeans; in the second, he foretels the overthrow of the Chaldeans, for their oppression and murder of others; and encourrages the Jews patiently to wait for it; in the third, he, in a most lofty manner, celebrates God's former appearances for Israel, in bringing them through the Red sea; in giving his law to them, and in casting out the Canaanites before them: he professes his terrible apprehensions of the Chaldean invasion; begs the Lord would at least mitigate the stroke; and concludes rejoicing in God his Saviour.

HABERGEON. (1.) A corselet or coat of mail. Exod. xxviii. 32. (2.) A javelin or hand-dart. Job xli. 26.

HABITATION; dwelling; house. God is the habitation of his people; in him they find the most delightful rest, safety, and comfort. Psal. xci. 9. Justice and judgment are the habitation, or establishment, of God's throne; all his royal acts are founded on judgment and justice; he takes pleasure to execute them; and being executed on our Redeemer, they became the foundation of his exercise of mercy, and performance of his promises to us; by his righteous distribution of rewards and punishments, he supports the honour of his character. Psal. lxxxix. 14. The land of Canaan, the city of Jerusalem, the tabernacle and temple, heaven, and the heart of the saints, are represented as the habitation of God; there he did or does signally shew himself present, work by his power, or bestow his favour and influence. Jer. xxv. 30. Ezra vii. 15. Exod. xv. 2. Psal. cxxxii. 5, 13. Eph. ii. 22. Eternity is represented as his habitation; he is eternal in a manner no other is, nor does his duration increase as that of angels and men. Isa. lvii. 15. He inhabited the praises of Israel; he dwelt in the temple where they praised; he owns, deserves, is the object of, and kindly accepts the praises of his people. Psal. xxii. 3. Their first habitation, which sinning angels left, was their original state of holiness and happiness, and their mansions in heaven. Jude 6. A body, soul, or family, exercised in holiness, is called a habitation of righteousness. Job viii. 6. The state of heavenly glory is everlasting habitations. Luke xvi. 9. The firmament is the habitation of the sun and moon. Hab. iii. 11. The antichristian state becomes a habitation of devils, when the infernal nature of her laws and customs is discovered; or when Rome is reduced to a desolate haunt of evil spirits. Rev. xviii. 2.

HACHT-LAH; a hill in the south-east part of Judea, southward of Jeshimon, which was about ten miles south of Jericho. Here David for a while hid himself from Saul. 1 Sam. xxiii. 19. Here Jonathan the Maccabee built the almost impregnable castle of Massada, and whose garrison killed themselves, soon after the taking of Jerusalem by Titus.

HADAD; three kings of Edom had this name; the last was the son of that king whom David conquered; his friends carried him off from the destructive rage of Joab, and committed him to the protection of Pharaoh, king of Egypt. When he grew up, Pharaoh gave him Tahpenes his sister to wife, who bare him a son called Genubath. Informed of king David's death, he took a strong fancy to return to his native country, and recover his kingdom. With reluctance, Pharaoh consented to part with him. He set up for king in some remote corner of Idumea, or perhaps Pharaoh procured him Solomon's allowance to govern Edom as his deputy. It is certain that, towards the end of Solomon's reign, he did what mischief he could to the Hebrews. 1 Kings xi. 14—25. 1 Chron. i. 46—51.

HA-DAD-EZER, HAD-A-RE'ZER, son of Rehob, was a powerful king of Zobah in Syria, and appears to have been very troublesome to his neighbours, particularly to Toi, or Tou, king of Hamath. David intending to extend the boundaries of the Hebrew dominion to the Euphrates, as God had promised to give them, he defeated Hadadezer's host, and took 20,000 of them prisoners, and 700 horse, and 1000 chariots. The Syrians of Damascus came to Hadadezer's assistance, but were defeated with the loss of 23,000. David ordered the arms of the Syrians, with a prodigious spoil, particularly an immense store of brass, which he found in the cities of Beten, or Tibbath, and Berothai, or Chun, to be carried to Jerusalem. Glad of the ruin of his rival, Toi sent Hadoram, or Joram his son with his grateful compliments and large presents to king David. About seven years after, Hadadezer, and three other Syrian princes, assisted the Ammonites. Joab and Abishai gave them a terrible defeat. Hadadezer, intent on resistance, or ruin to the Hebrews, drew together a large body of Syrians from the east of the Euphrates. These the Hebrews routed at Helam, a place about the south-east of Syria, (if the name might not perhaps be as well rendered to them,) and killed 40,000 of them, with Shobach, or Shopach, their general. Hereon all the kingdoms tributary to Hadadezer became David's servants, and forebore to assist the Ammonites. 2 Sam. viii. and x. 1 Chron. xviii. and xix.

HADAD-RIMMON; a city in the valley of Megiddo, near to which Josiah was slain, and his army routed by Pharaoh Necho, which occasioned a terrible mourning and consternation in these parts. Zech. xii. 11. 2 Chron. xxxv. 23, 24.

HA-DO'RAM. See HADADEZER and REHOBAM.

HAD'RACH; a city or country near Damascus; perhaps Hollow Syria, or Adra, a city of it, about twenty-five miles north of Bostra; but whether the burden of the Lord on it imports, that it would early, and for many ages, be the rest or residence of a Christian church; or rather; that it would be terribly distressed by the Greeks, Romans, Saracens, Turks, and Popish Crusades, in their turns, is not agreed. Zech. ix. 1.

HAGAR; an Egyptian hand-maid of Abraham. Perhaps she was presented to him by Pharaoh. Sarah finding herself still more and more unlikely to conceive the promised offspring, advised Abraham to take Hagar to his bed as his concubine. Hagar had no sooner conceived than she contemned her barren mistress. On Sarah's insinuation that Abraham encouraged her in it, he allowed her to do with Hagar what she pleased. Hagar was ill used, and fled off, intending to return home to Egypt. The Lord appeared to her in the wilderness of Shur, directed her to return to her mistress, and humble herself under her hand; and told her she should have a son, called Ishmael, whose numerous posterity should dwell in the presence of, or on the south of Abraham's other posterity; and be remarkable for constant wildness and freedom. Deeply affected with this vision, she called the name of the adjacent well Beer-lahai-roi; the well of him that lieth and seeth me; and, all obedient, she returned and submitted herself to Sarah. About sixteen or seventeen years after, her son Ishmael having marked some hatred or contempt of young Isaac, Sarah begged that he and his mother might be expelled from the family. After God had directed Abraham, and assured him that he would multiply Ishmael's posterity exceedingly into twelve different tribes, Abraham sent off Hagar and her son with a small portion of bread, and a bottle of water. Thus he was chastised for taking her to his bed, and she for her haughtiness. He perhaps intended to send more provision after her, and she missed it. In going towards Egypt, she lost her way in the wilderness of Beersheba. Her water failed, and her son became faint. Unwilling to see him breathe out his last, she left him under a tree whose shadow might be refreshing, withdrew to the distance of a bow-shot, and sat down and wept. The Lord called to her from heaven, comforted her, and shewed her a well of water for their refreshment.—After they had drunk to satisfaction, she filled her bottle, and they went on, till they took up their residence in the desert of Paran, where she procured one of her country-women for a wife to her son. Gen. xvi. and xxi. She and mount Sinai, which perhaps pertained to her seed, were an emblem of the covenant of works and ceremonial law, to which all that now cleave, in opposition to Christ, are slaves of Satan, and outcasts from the family of God, as we see verified in the present state of the Jews. Gal. iv. 24. At least part of her descendants were called HAGARITES or HAGARENES. In the days of Saul, the Reubenites and Gadites attacked the Hagarites that dwelt on their borders, and cutting off their army, seized on their territory, eastward of Gilead. The Hagarenes assisted the Ammonites and Moabites against Jehoshaphat, and were miserably cut off. About the time of Jeroboam the Second, or soon after, the Reubenites and Gadites with 44,000 defeated the Hagarites, then governed by Jetur. Nephis, and Nodab, took 100,000 of them prisoners, with an immense booty of flocks and herds. 1 Chron. v. Psal. lxxxiii. See ARABIA.

HAG'GA-I; the first of the three Jewish prophets that flourished after the captivity. He was probably born in Chaldea; and in the sixth month of the second year of Darius Hystaspes, he began his public work of prophesying, about seventeen years after the return from Babylon. He, together with Zechariah, mightily excited and encouraged their brethren to finish the building of the temple. He remonstrated how improper it was for the temple to lie in ruins, while their own houses were so fine: and that their neglect of God's house and honour had provoked him to blast their outward enjoyments. He assured them, that after terrible convulsions of the nations, the Messiah should appear in the flesh, teach in the courts of the second temple, and render it more glorious than the first. Ezra v. 1, 2. Hag. i. and ii.

HAIL. (1.) It appears to be formed of rain-drops, frozen in their descent through the middle region of the air. It often attends thunder and lightning; and sometimes hailstones have sulphurous matter enclosed in them. In April 20, 1697, there was a terrible storm of hail in Cheshire and Lancashire; several of the stones were about five or six inches round, and about half a pound weight. On May 4th, there was a storm in Hertfordshire, whose stones were from ten to fourteen inches about. Casper Weser tells us of a hail-storm in Zurich, in Switzerland, whose stones when carried to a considerable distance, weighed a pound. In 1510, after a terrible darkness, there was a storm of hail in Italy, whose stones were bluish, and of so terrible a weight, that most of the animals without doors were destroyed. Terrible hail was part of one of the Egyptian plagues, Exod. ix. 24; and by terrible hailstones did God discomfit the allied army of the Canaanitish kings. Josh. x. 11. God's judgments on nations are likened to a hail-storm: how oft, sudden, and dreadful! and, by the direction of Heaven, they easily destroy men's persons and property. Isa. xxviii. 2. Rev. viii. 7. and xi. 17. and xvi. 21. (2.) HAIL! as a word of salutation, imports a wish of prosperity and comfort to any one. Mark xv. 18. Luke i. 28.

HAIR: the Hebrews were not allowed to cut their hair, nor make themselves bald in the manner of the heathen, Deut. xvi. 1; but, it is said, the priests, while they served at the temple, cut off the hair of their beard with scissors once every fortnight. Nazarites were never to cut off their hair during the time of their vow. Samson having broken his vow, by suffering his hair to be cut, God deprived him of his extraordinary strength, Num. vi. 5—9. Judg. xvi. 1; but, at the expiration of the vow, Nazarites shaved it off. Numb. vi. 18, 19. Acts xviii. 18. The Levites, at their consecration, shaved off all their hair. Did this signify Christ's freedom from sin, and our duty to mortify it? Numb. viii. 7. Did the leper's shaving off all his hair, at his purification, denote our mortifying the deeds of the body, when we are cleansed by the blood and Spirit of Christ? Lev. xiv. 8, 9. Black HAIR was an emblem of beauty and vigour. Sol. Song v. 11. White hair, or hair like pure wool, an emblem of gravity, antiquity, and wisdom. Rev. i. 14. Dan. vii. 9. Grey hairs here and there on Ephraim, imported the decaying condition of the kingdom of the ten tribes; that, by consuming corruptions, intestine commotions, and the Assyrian ravages, it was fast hastening to ruin. Hos. vii. 9. The hair on the church's head like purple, is saints weak in themselves, but rooted and grounded in Christ; washed in his blood, and in honour to him;—and the good works of saints flowing from a solid hope of eternal life, and a conscience washed in Jesus' blood. Sol. Song iv. 1. and vii. 5. The locusts of the fifth trumpet had hair like women: the Arabs put up their hair in the manner of women; and the Antichristian clergy were effeminate to an uncommon degree. Rev. ix. 8. By the cutting off hair, is sometimes denoted God's destroying a people small or great. Isa. vii. 20. Ezek. v.

HALE; to draw by force.

HALF a man's days is a short time. Psal. lv. 23. Perhaps half the valley should be read, from the middle of the river, viz. Arnon. Dent. iii. 16.

HALLOW. (1.) To set apart to a holy use. Exod. xxviii. 30. (2.) To use and improve holily, in holy exercises. Jer. xvii. 22. God's name is hallowed, when his glory is advanced by himself; and when men exert themselves to glorify and honour him. Matt. vi. 19.

HALT; cripple. Halting denotes falling into snares and trouble. Psal. xxxviii. 17. Jer. xx. 10; or continuing in doubt which to choose. 1 Kings xviii. 21. Her that halteth: i. e. Jews weak and unresolved to return to their own land. Mic. iv. 6. Zeph. iii. 9.

HAM; the youngest son of Noah, who mocked at his father's shame, and whose posterity was cursed on that account. He had four sons, viz. Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan. His posterity peopled Africa, and part of the west of Asia. They have been generally most wicked and miserable, and few of them have hitherto enjoyed the light of the gospel. From him the land of Egypt was called Chemia, or land of Ham. There was another place on the east of Jordan, called Ham; but whether it was Rabbah, which Stephanus calls Ammana, or Hamath, the city of Tou, which the Targum calls Hemta, cannot be ascertained. Gen. xiv. 5. Part of Ham's race dwelt anciently on the south borders of the tribe of Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 40.

HAMAN, the son of Hammedatha, a descendant from Agag the Amalekite. When he was promoted by Ahasuerus, and made prime minister of the Persian empire, and all the servants of the court were ordered to bow to him, all but Mordecai the Jew obeyed. Haman thought it below him to revenge this affront on Mordecai alone: he resolved to cut off the whole nation of the Jews that were in the Persian empire. He cast lots for the luckiest day to accomplish his design. The lot directed of God, fell on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month: and so the execution was put back almost a whole year, that Providence might gradually counteract it. Meanwhile, Haman represented the Jews to king Ahasuerus as a nuisance and burden to the kingdom on account of their different laws and customs, and begged they might utterly be extirpated, and he would pay 10,000 talents of silver to the exchequer, as a full balance for the loss of their tribute. Ahasuerus replied, that he freely allowed him to extirpate that people. Haman immediately despatched letters in the king's name to all the provinces of the empire to massacre the Jews among them on the day appointed, and to take their wealth for a prey. He mightily rejoiced in his success and wealth; and the more, that queen Esther had invited him only along with the king to her banquet; but signified that it galled his spirit to see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate. Zeresh his wife, and other friends, advised him to erect a gallows immediately, and get the king's allowance to hang Mordecai thereon. A gallows was erected, about seventy-five or ninety feet high: and he went in next morning to ask the king's leave to hang Mordecai on it: but the king prevented his request, by ordering him to array Mordecai in the royal apparel, and as his page, lead his horse through the city of Shushan, and proclaim that he was one of the king's chief favourites. Stung with grief, he hastened home as soon as his task was finished, and told his wife and friends what had happened. They told him, that his begun fall before Mordecai was a sad omen of the fatal consequences of his project against the Jews. That very day Esther accused him as the intended murderer of her and her nation; and begged the king would interpose for their lives. Ahasuerus having got out in a rage, Haman fell at the queen's feet, to implore her intercession for his life; the king returning, reproached him as attempting to stain the honour of his bed. Glad of Haman's downfall, the servants covered his face; and Harbonah, the chamberlain, told the king, that Haman had prepared a gallows to hang Mordecai, the preserver of the king's life: Ahasuerus ordered him to be hanged up on it directly. Not long after, his ten sons shared the same fate. Esth. iii. v—vii, and ix. See FEAST of Purim.

HA-MATH; Canaan had a son of this name, who was the father of the Hamathites. 1 Chron. i. 16. Gen. x. 18; and from whom, it is possible, the places called Hamath, or Hammath, derived their name. There appears to have been several Hamaths: (1.) Hamath, a country where Solomon built store-cities, which perhaps was about Hammon, or Hammath-dor, in Galilee, where the crops were exceeding plentiful; if it was not the same with Hamath-Zobah on the south-east of Syria near Tadmor, and which was the only city that Solomon appears to have warred against. 2 Chron. viii. 3, 4. (2.) Hamath, a city of Naphtali, near the entrance into Hollow Syria. Josh. xiii. 5. and xix. 35. Which of these two Hamaths Jeroboam restored to Israel, we know not certainly, though most probably, it was Hamath-Zobah. (3.) Hamath the Great, which seems to be the same as Epiphania, or Emesa, cities pretty far northward in Syria. Amos vi. 2: whether it was this, or Hamath-Zobah, of which Toi was king, cannot now be ascertained.

HAMMER. God's word is like a hammer: with it he breaks our hearts, and fastens the nails of his convictions therein. Jer. xxiii. 29. Babylon was the hammer of the whole earth; the Chaldean armies broke in pieces, and subdued a multitude of nations. Jer. i. 23. Nah. i. 1.

HAM-ONAH; the name which Ezekiel gives to a city, and Hammon-gog, the name he assigns to a valley, imports, that multitudes of Gog, or the Turks, shall be killed in some place of Canaan. Ezek. xxxix. 11, 16.

HAND, especially the right, being the member so much used in business, is much used in metaphorical language. Pouring water on one's hands, imported serving of him. 2 Kings iii. 11. Washing of hands, imported profession of innocence. Deut. xxi. 6. Matt. xxvii. 24; or a solemn purgation of one's self in Jesus' blood, and a resolution to maintain a holy practice. Psal. xxvi. 6. Kissing of the hand to a thing, imported adoration of it. Job xxxi. 27. The consecration of the priests was called a filling of their hands, because part of the consecrated offerings was put into their hands. 1 Kings xiii. 33. Leaning on one's hand, imported the familiarity of a superior with his inferior. 2 Kings v. 18. and vii. 17. Striking of hands, imports undertaking, as surety for one's debt or good behaviour. Prov. xvii. 18. and xxii. 26. Putting the hand under the thigh, was an ancient form of swearing: but that it signified subjection to the person under whose thigh the hand was put, or a belief of the Messiah's proceeding from his loins, we dare not peremptorily affirm. Gen. xiv. 2. and xlvii. 29. Giving of the hand, imports making a covenant with one, or serving him. 2 Kings x. 15. Lam. v. 6. 1 Chron. xxix. 20. Stretching out the hand to God, imports earnest prayer for his favours, and solemn dedication of ourselves to him. Psal. lxxviii. 81. and cxliii. 6. Lifting up the hand, in affirmation, was a form of solemn swearing much used anciently. Gen. xiv. 22. Lifting up the hands in prayer, or by the priests in blessing, imported solemn wishing of blessings to come from God, Lev. ix. 22; but to lift up the hand against a superior, is to rebel against him. 2 Sam. xx. 21. To put forth the hand against one, is to kill him. 1 Sam. xxiv. 10. To put our hand to our neighbour's goods, is to steal them. Exod. xxii. 8, 11. To lay the hand on the mouth imports silence and an acknowledgment of guilt. Job xl. 4. Mic. vii. 16. To lay hands angrily on persons, is to apprehend and smite them, Exod. xxiv. 11; or seize on their country. Isa. xi. 14. Witnesses laid their hands on the head of the person accused; importing their solemn charging him with guilt, or their readiness to be the first in stoning him. Deut. xiii. 9. and xvii. 7. The Hebrews laying their hands on their sacrifices before they were slain, imported solemn confession of their sin, and of their deserving to die; their ceremonial translation of their guilt on the victim, and profession to trust in Jesus, the great sacrifice for their atonement. Lev. i. 4. and xvi. 21. Laying on of hands was used in setting apart men to an office: thus Moses publicly set apart Joshua to the office of governor. Numb. xxvii. 18. So the Levites under the Old Testament, and ministers under the New, were set apart to their offices by laying on of hands. Numb. viii. 10. Acts xiii. 3. 1 Tim. iv. 14. This form was also used in blessing of persons: so Jacob blessed Joseph's children, Gen. xlviii. 14; and so Jesus blessed the little children brought to him. Mark x. 16. The miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost were conferred by laying on of the apostles' hands. Acts viii. 17. and xix. 6. Hiding the hand in the bosom, denotes great inactivity, or sluggish aversion to do or receive any thing. Prov. xix. 24.

Clapping of hands, denotes great joy and rejoicing, Psal. xlvii. 1; and the clapping of hands, by trees and floods, denotes universal joy and gladness, Isa. lv. 12. Psal. cxviii. 8; but sometimes it denotes contempt and noisy derision. Ezek. xxv. 6. Job xxxiv. 37. With respect to station, the seat on the right hand was honourable, that on the left not so much so. Matt. xx. 21. With respect to the points of the heavens, the left hand signifies the north, and the right hand the south; and yet sometimes it may only signify different quarters. Gen. xiii. 9; and so our not turning from God's law to the left hand or to the right, imports our following it most exactly in every point, neither indulging ourselves in neglect of what it requires, nor pretending to go beyond it. Josh. i. 7. and xxiii. 6. Prov. iv. 27. God's standing at men's right hand, imports his regard to them, and readiness to plead their cause, and assist and comfort them. Psal. xvi. 8. and cix. 81. Satan's standing at men's right hand, imports his accusing of them, hindering them from their proper work; and his readiness to torment them. Zech. iii. 1. Psal. cix. 6. In giving alms we are not to let our left hand know what our right hand doth; i.e. we are to bestow them with all proper secrecy, and with no proud ostentation. Matt. vi. 3. Though hand join in hand, i.e. though all men should use their most vigorous and united efforts to protect a wicked man, he shall not go unpunished. Prov. xi. 21. To be in the hand of persons, is to be in their possession, or under their management; or under their power and dominion. Job xii. 6. Gen. xxxix. 6. 2 Kings xxi. 14. Psal. xxxi. 15. A darling and apparently pleasant and profitable lust to be mortified, is likened to a right hand, or foot, or eye, to be cut off, or plucked out. Matt. v. 29, 30. and xviii. 8, 9. To have one's life or soul in his hand, is to be in extreme hazard of death. 1 Sam. xix. 5. Job xiii. 14. Psal. cxix. 109. As hands are the instruments of acting, doing, or receiving, they are often the emblems of power and work. God's hand, or right hand, signifies his power and the exertion thereof, either in a way of mercy or wrath. Psal. lxxiii. 8. Deut. xxxii. 4. So his powerful influence to instruct or support a prophet, is called his hand being on or with him. 1 Kings xviii. 46. Ezek. i. 3. and iii. 14. His judgments executed are called his heavy hand. 1 Sam. v. 11. His stretching out his hand, imports the exertion of his power to protect and deliver his friends, or terribly to punish his foes, Exod. iii. 20; or his continuing to threaten men with further strokes. Isa. ix. 12. and xiv. 26, 27. He will not stretch out his hand to the grave, though they cry in his destruction. Let friends mourn ever so bitterly, God will not, by his power, bring me, or any other dead man, to life again; nor will he pursue me farther than the grave with his judgments. Job xxx. 24. God plucks his hand out of his bosom, when he exerts his power for the deliverance of his people, and withdraws it, when he forbears to help, comfort, or deliver them. Psal. lxxiv. 11. Christ sits at God's right hand; he is enthroned in his highest favour, and in the highest honour and authority. Rom. viii.

31. Christ's hands as gold-rings set with the beryl, and which embrace his people, are his divine, well-ordered, and glorious power and offices, whereby he saves, supports, and comforts us. Sol. Song. v. 14; i. 6, and viii. 3. His stretching out his hands to men, in the offer of the gospel, denotes his earnest calling of them, his readiness to receive them, and supply them out of his fulness. Isa. lxx. 2. Prov. i. 24. Length of days is in his, or Wisdom's right hand, and in his left riches and honour. In receiving and walking in him, in a wise and well-ordered conversation, there is to be had life and happiness, both here and hereafter. Prov. iii. 16. He has the stars, or ministers, in his right hand; he supports, protects, and governs them. Rev. i. 16. Angels and ministers have the hands of a man; they act with knowledge and affection. Ezek. i. 8. Hands weak, or hanging down; denote persons dispirited and unfit for action. Job iv. 8. Heb. xii. 12. To lift up the hands to God's commandments, is to be devoted to and earnest in obeying God's law in our practice. Psal. cxix. 48. Clean and holy hands, denote a blameless and holy practice. Psal. xxiv. 3. 1 Tim. ii. 8. Hands defiled and bloody denote a practice corrupt and murderous. Ezek. xxiii. 37. Isa. i. 15. Slack hands import a careless, inactive practice. Prov. x. 4. Faith, whereby we receive Christ, and every good thing, and work by love, is hands dropping with myrrh on the handles of the lock, sweetly influenced by the Saviour's power and love, in desiring to admit him into the heart. Sol. Song v. 5. To do a thing by the hand of others, is to do it by their assistance, Exod. iv. 13. Lev. viii. 36, and x. 11, and xxvi. 46, &c.: and so wicked men are called the hand of God; as by them he executes much of his providential work on earth, particularly in correcting his people. Psal. xvii. 14.

HANDBREADTH, a measure of about four inches. Our days are as a handbreadth; they are very short, and their shortness ought to be ever before us. Psal. xxxix. 5.

HANDMAID, a woman-servant. Women in general are so called, in the language of humility. Ruth iii. 9. Psal. cxvi. 16.

HAND-WRITING. The ceremonial law is called a hand-writing against us; its rites witnessed guilt and desert of death; and it was a means of shutting out the gentiles from the church of God. Col. ii. 14.

HAND-STAVES; darts cast by the hand. Ezek. xxxix. 9.

HAN'ES. See TAHFAN'NES.

HANG. God hangeth the earth upon nothing; by mere power he preserves it in its proper place, a ball surrounded, at immense distance, by the visible heavens. Job xxvi. 27. On the two commandments, of loving God, and our neighbour, hang all the law and the prophets; every duty pointed out in the law and prophets is comprehended in these two things; and every history, doctrine, promise, and threatening, tends to promote this love. Matt. xxii. 40.

HANGING; an ancient PUNISHMENT. Gen. xl. 22. Josh. viii. 29. The hanged malefactors of Israel were not to remain on the tree all night. They were emblems of Christ's being cursed and crucified for us, and of his satisfying the penalty of the broken law by his death, and thereby removing the iniquity of a land in one day. Deut. xxi. 23. Gal. iii. 13. Crucifixion is called hanging. Luke xxiii. 39. Acts v. 30. Hanging, curtains. Exod. xxvii. 9.

HANNAH. Her husband Elkanah, was a Levite of mount Ephraim, the seven-teenth in descent from Kohath, the son of Levi, and had two wives, Hannah and Peninnah. The former was exceeding pious, and the darling of her husband; but the latter had children, and mightily upbraided Hannah with her want of them. As Elkanah and his whole family attended one of the solemn feasts at Shiloh, of his share of his sacrifices, he, at their feasts, gave Peninnah and her children their several portions; but to Hannah he gave the best part of the peace-offering that fell to his share, or best part of the passover-lamb. At these entertainments, it was Peninnah's common practice to reproach Hannah with her barrenness. Hannah at last took it so ill, that she could eat none. To comfort her, Elkanah told her, that his distinguished regard to her was better than ten children. After eating a little, Hannah retired to the court of the tabernacle, prayed with great fervour for a child, and vowed to surrender him, as a Nazarite, for life, to the service of God. Eli, the high-priest, observing her lips move, but not hearing her words, upbraided her, as if she had been drunk. She told him her case, and he wished the Lord might grant her request. Divinely impressed that he would grant it, she went home cheerful. She had scarcely returned to Ramah, the place of their abode, when she conceived; and, in due time bare him, and called him Samuel, because she had asked him of, and lent him to, the Lord. After she had weaned him, and he was about three years old, she carried him to Shiloh; and with an oblation of three bullocks, an ephah of flour, and bottle of wine, presented him before the Lord, and put him under Eli's tuition; representing, that as she had obtained him by prayer, so she had given him up for life to the service of God. On this occasion she composed an elegant hymn, celebrating the holiness, greatness, wisdom, power, and mercy of God. At an after feast, as she gave Eli a coat for her son, he blessed her, and wished her more children. She bare other three sons and two daughters, while, it seems Peninnah's children died. 1 Sam. i. and ii.

HAN'UN; the son and successor of Nahash king of the Ammonites. Persuaded by evil counsellors, he used David's ambassadors, sent to him with compliments of condolence after his father's death, as if they had come to spy the country, where it might be most easily attacked; he ordered to shave their beards, and cut off their clothes by their middle. He immediately thought how ill this would be taken, and prepared for a war with the Hebrews. Once and again he procured an assistant army from the Syrians; but all his forces being defeated in sundry battles, and the Syrians giving up with him, his whole kingdom was taken, and Rabbath his capital, after a siege of some months, destroyed: his crown, weighing or worth a talent of gold, and all he had, being seized by David, it is probable himself was slain, and his brother Shobi, who brought victuals to David at Mahanaim made deputy-governor of the kingdom under David. 2 Sam. x. xi. xii. and xvii. 27—30.

HAPPY. Some are happy only in the opinion of themselves, or others; as is indeed the case of all wicked men; there being no solid happiness but in reconciliation to, and enjoyment of God, who is happy in himself, and the author of all happiness to his creatures. Gen. xxx. 18. Jer. xii. 1. Mal. iii. 15. The saints are truly happy, because God is their portion; their life of fearing and serving him is the best; they are corrected by him for their profit; and their suffering for righteousness, is their honour, and shall be rewarded by him. Psal. cxliv. 15. and cxxviii. Job v. 17. 1 Pet. iii. 14. Matt. v. 8—10. Luke vi. 20—23.

HARAN, the eldest son of Terah and brother of Abraham, and father of Lot, and of two daughters, viz. Milcah and Iscah. As he died young, it seems his two brothers married his two daughters, Abraham, Iscah, or Sarah, and NAHOR Milcah. Out of respect to his memory, it is probable that his father called the place of their future abode, HARAN, HARA, or CHARRAN. Gen. xi. 27 32. Acts vii. 2. Here Terah died; and Jacob dwelt with his uncle Laban. Gen. xxvii. 45. and xxix. It seems to have been situated between the rivers Chebar and Euphrates, considerably northward of the place where these rivers met. The natives carried on a trade with the Tyrians. Ezek. xxvii. 23. Near this place, Crassus the Roman general, and almost all his army, were cut off by the Parthians.

HARD. Beside its natural signification of the hardness of matter, it signifies, (1.) Powerful; having much influence; thus the sons of Zeruiah were too hard for David to get any of them punished. 2 Sam. iii. 39. (2.) Difficult; what can scarcely be got done, or understood; hence we read of hard causes, questions, and language. Exod. xviii. 26. 1 Kings x. 1. Ezek. iii. 5. (3.) What is cruel, insupportable, troublesome, and unmerciful; hence we read of hard bondage, a hard saying, a hard man. Exod. i. 14. John vi. 60. Matt. xxv. 24. Hardness of spirit, expresses great inward sorrow and trouble. 1 Sam. i. 15. Hardness of heart, imports stupidity and obstinacy in sinning. Ezek. iii. 7. The way of transgressors is hard; they are obstinate in their sin, and their course is disagreeable and dangerous. Prov. xiii. 15. Manifold troubles are called hardness, because difficult to be borne. 2 Tim. ii. 3. God's hardening men, imports his justly withholding his gracious influences from them; his casting them into such circumstances, as their corruption will improve to bad purposes; and his permitting Satan, sinful companions, and their own lusts, to draw them into one sin after another, and thus render them bold and obstinate in wickedness. Exod. iv. 21; vii. 3; xiv. 4, 17; xix. 12. and x. 10, 27. Men harden their heart, face, or neck, when they grow more and more obstinate and impudent in wickedness, and refuse to be reclaimed. 1 Sam. vi.

6. Jer. v. 8. Prov. xxix. 1. To harden one's self in sorrow, is with bravery to endure violent pains from an eager desire of death. Job vi. 10.

HARE; a well-known animal, with a short tail, black eyes, double fore-teeth, single under teeth, and no tusks. It has long ears, by which it hears quickly; its feet are excellently formed for running, especially up-hill, the fore-legs being shortest. It is very timorous and lustful. Moses is not the only writer who affirms that hares chew the cud. Aristotle says, it has a runnet similar to other beasts that chew the cud. It was unclean under the law, as it did not divide the hoof, and might be an emblem of sinners, fearful, unbelieving, and given to fleshly lusts. Lev. xi. 6. Dent. xiv. 7.

HARLOT. See WHORE.

HARNESS; the furniture of a horse, to render him fit for work, or war. Jer. xlv. 4; but it is more frequently taken for a set of defensive armour, as a coat of mail, brigantine, and habergeon. 1 Kings xxii. 24. The children of Israel went up out of Egypt harnessed, girded as for war; but the word may be rendered, by five in a rank. Exod. xiii. 18. He that puts on his harness ought not to boast as he that puts it off: he that only prepares for battle ought not to boast as if he had gotten the victory. 1 Kings xx. 11.

HAROD; a place in the valley of Jezreel, near the foot of mount Gilboa, and seems to have had its name from the trembling of the Hebrews or Midianites, near to it. Here Gideon mustered his army. Judg. vii. 1; and here Elikah and Shammah, two of David's mighty men, seem to have been born. 2 Sam. xxiii. 25. 1 Chron. ii. 27.

HAR'O-SHETH of the gentiles; a city of Galilee, near the lake of Merom, near which many heathens dwelt; where Sisera resided; and to the very gates of which his routed army was pursued. Judg. iv. 2, 16.

HARP. The kind invented by Jubal, the descendant of Cain, and used by the ancients, is now disused. It was composed of a base or hollow sounding belly, with two branches raised on the sides to which were fastened three, six, or nine strings, which, when played on with the fingers, or with a bow-string, gave a very agreeable sound. From Isaiah's saying that his bowels sound in mourning as a harp, and from other evidences, it appears that its sound was of a grave and querulous kind; its very name KINNOH, signifies what is sad and lamentable. Solomon's harps were of wood. 1 Kings x. 12. Harps were used both in sacred and civil music. 1 Sam. xvi. 16, 23. During the captivity in Babylon, the Levitical singers hung their harps, as useless, on the willow-trees on the bank of the Euphrates, and other rivers of Chaldea. Psal. cxxvii. 2. The Greeks and Romans learned the use of the harp from the eastern nations. The modern harp is of a triangular form, having three rows of strings, and being held upright between the knees, is played on with both hands, and has a sound somewhat similar to that of the spinet. Playing on the harp often denotes grave and cheerful praise of, and thanksgiving to God.

Psal. xxxiii. 2; xliii. 4. and cxlix. 3. The saints are likened to harpers, because with gravity, cheerfulness, and holy skill, they praise the Lord for his goodness. Rev. v. 8. and xiv. 2.

HART. See DEER.

HARVEST. The harvest or time of cutting down and gathering in the fruits of the earth, is different according to the soil and warmth of countries. In Canaan it began in March, and was finished about the middle of May. As the harvest is a time of great importance for laying up provision, any time of gainful labour is called harvest. Hence a sleep in harvest causeth shame to himself and his friends. Prov. x. 5. A time of God's destructive judgments, whereby he puts down many, and carries them into the eternal state, is likened to a harvest; hence we read of a harvest on Babylon and Judah. Jer. li. 33. Hos. vi. 11. A people ripened by sin for destruction, are likened to a harvest, or crop ready for the sickle of God's vengeance. Isa. xviii. 5. Joel iii. 13. Rev. xiv. 15. A favourable opportunity afforded to ministers labouring with much success in the work of the gospel, cutting men off from their natural state, and gathering them to Christ, is called a harvest; and men disposed by Providence for receiving the gospel are likened to a ripe crop. Matt. ix. 36, 37. John iv. 35, 36. A season of mercy, in which a nation, or people, is favoured with opportunities to escape impending judgments, or to secure important benefits, is called a harvest. Jer. viii. 20. The day of judgment is likened to a harvest; then all things shall be ripe for a dissolution; the frame of nature shall be broken up; men's condition shall be quite altered; the saints shall be gathered into Christ's garner, his heavenly mansions, and the wicked cast into hell-fire. Matt. xiii. 30, 39—42. The Assyrians were like harvest-men; they destroyed the nations, cut them down, and even gleaned, cutting off the remnant that were left. Isa. xvii. 6.

HASTE; HASTEN. To hasten righteousness, is to execute judgment and justice with all proper speed. Isa. xvi. 5. To hasten to the coming of the day of God; is earnestly to long after and prepare for the last judgment. 2 Pet. iii. 12. HASTY persons are such as are rash and inconsiderate. Prov. xiv. 29; or who are very active, furious, and speedy in their march. Hab. i. 6. The hasty fruit is what is ready before the ordinary time. The suddenly-approaching judgments of God are likened to it. Isa. xxxiii. 4.

HATE. (1.) To bear an in-will to one. God and his people hate sin; enemies hate one another; and unregenerate men hate God. Jer. xlv. 4. Rom. vii. 15. Psal. xxxiv. 21. Rom. i. 30. God hated the Jewish new-moons, and feasts, and sacrifices, and solemn assemblies, on account of the sinful manner in which they were observed. Isa. i. 13, 14. (2.) To want love to persons. Thus God hated Esau; he did not elect him to everlasting life; he did not choose his seed to be his peculiar people, nor shew saving kindness to him, or to many of them. Mal. i. 3. Rom. ix. 13. A parent hates his child, i. e. wants proper love to him when he forbears to inflict on him due correction for his real good. (3.) To love far less ardently: so sometimes the Jews had a hated and a beloved wife. Deut. xxi. 15. We must hate father and mother in comparison with Christ; that is, we must love them far less than him. Luke xiv. 26.

HATRED; a deeply rooted ill-will towards any one, disposing us to vex, injure, and destroy him. 2 Sam. xiii. 15. Hatred of our neighbour is accounted murder before God. 1 John iii. 15; and he reckons us guilty of this hatred, if we suffer our neighbour to lie in sin, or go on in it, without reproving him in a serious and faithful manner. Lev. xix. 17. Wicked priests are hated; are very hateful and often malicious and fearful means of variance between God and men, and between man and man. Hos. ix. 8.

HATEFUL; odious; deserving to be hated. Sinners being full of hatred against God, deserve to be hated, Tit. iii. 3; and birds, such as ravens, owls, kites, vultures, are hateful. Rev. xviii. 2.

HAVEN; a sea-port, where ships lie at rest. Zebulun was a haven for ships; that tribe had convenient harbours in their part of the coast of the Mediterranean sea. Gen. xlix. 13. A place on the east end of Crete was called the fair, or beautiful haven. Acts xxvii. 8.

HAVI-LAH. (1.) The second son of Cush, and grandchild of Ham. It is probable that he and his posterity peopled and gave name to the land of Havilah, on the north-west of the Persian gulf, and which was the east border of the Ishmaelites and Amalekites. Gen. x. 7. and xiv. 18. 1 Sam. xv. 7. (2.) The twelfth son of JOKTAN, whose posterity were probably the Chaloteans or Avalites, that dwelt near the Sabæans, on the Avalitic bay, southward of the former Havilah. Gen. x. 27. Calmet and Reland will have Havilah to be Colchis, on the east of the Euxine sea; and it is true, there was fine gold there in the earliest ages, which the inhabitants gathered in sheep skins, with the wool on, as it ran down the rivers when swollen; and hence probably sprung the fable of the golden fleece; but as we have already rejected their situation of Eden, and will do Calmet's of Ophir, we cannot admit this of Havilah.

HAVOCK. See RUIN; WASTE.

HAVOTH-JAIR; the villages or hamlets of Jair; which lay on the north or north-east of mount Gilead. Numb. xxxiii. 41.

HA-URAN, or AU'RAN-I-TIS; a country on the north-east of Canaan, near Damascus. Since, according to Luke, Philip ruled over Iturea, Trachonitis, and according to Josephus, over Batanea or Bashan, Auranitis, and Trachonitis, one is tempted to think Iturea is the same with Auranitis. Jerome mentions Hauran as a city in the wilderness of Damascus; but Abulfeda, an Arabic prince, informs us, that Bozrah, or Bostra, was the capital of Hauran. Ezek. xlvii. 18.

HAWK; a well-known bird. There are nine or ten principal kinds of hawks, viz. falcons, gos-hawks, sparrow-hawks, &c. Hawks are quick-sighted, swift-winged, ravenous, and very courageous. Men formerly trained them to catch fowls, hares, &c. In the winter they migrate to warmer climates. Deut. xiv. 15.

HAZ-A'EL. It is probable he was the Syrian general, after Naaman, who possibly gave up his post, rather than lead armies against the Israelites. Elijah had been divinely ordered to anoint Hazael king over Syria. Elisha, about eleven years after Elijah's translation, went north to Syria. Benhadad the king being sick, sent Hazael to the prophet to enquire if he should recover. Elisha replied, that though his disease was not mortal, he would never recover. He also with tears told Hazael, that he foresaw the horrid barbarities which he would exercise on the Israelites. Hazael replied, that he had neither power nor inclination to do these horrid things. Elisha told him that he would become king of Syria and then do them. Hazael returned to his master, and said he would certainly recover; but next day he stifled him with a wet cloth, and, by his influence in the army, seized the throne. Almost immediately afterwards, when Jehu gave up the siege or care of Ramoth-Gilead, to fix himself on the throne of Israel, Hazael took the opportunity to ravage almost all the country of Reuben, Gad, and Manessh, beyond Jordan. He burned their cities with fire; dashed their children to pieces, and ripped up their women with child. 2 Kings viii. 7—13. and x. 32, 33. After the death of Jehu, he invaded the kingdom of the ten tribes westward of Jordan, and reduced the country to a desert. 2 Kings xiii. 3, 7, 22. About the forty-fourth year of his reign, he took Gath from the Philistines, and marched to lay siege to Jerusalem; but Joash, by large presents, diverted him; the very next year, a small army of Syrians invaded Judah, and defeated Joash's mighty host, slew his princes, and carried off a great spoil. 2 Kings xii. 17, 18. 2 Chron. xxiv. 23—25. After Hazael had reigned about fifty years, he was succeeded by Benhadad his son, about A.M. 3170.

HAZAR-MAVETH; the third son of Joktan, and the father of the Adramytæ, Chatramoutæ, or Chatramonitæ, in Arabia-Felix. There is still a place in the south parts of that country, called Hadramaut, which is the Arabic pronunciation of Hazarmaveth. Gen. x. 26.

HAZOR. (1.) A strong city on the west side of the lake of Merom, and the capital of the principal kingdom of the Canaanites in those quarters. Joshua having routed Jabin the king of it, and his allies, burnt it with fire, and afterwards gave it to the tribe of Naphtali. Josh. xi. 10. and xix. 36; but the Canaanites again erected a kingdom in it, and Jabin governed it. Judg. iv. 2. Possibly Barak burned it a second time. Solomon seems to have repaired it. 1 Kings ix. 15. Tiglath-pileser took it, and transported the inhabitants to his eastern territories. 2 Kings xv. 29. (2.) A noted city and capital of a kingdom of Arabia the Rocky. Whether some Canaanites, who had fled from the northern Hazor when it was destroyed had built this, I know not. Some think it was the same with Petra; but it is far more certain that the Chaldeans took and demolished it. Jer. xlix. 28—33.

HEAD. This being the uppermost, and a chief part of the body, is often put for the whole man; so blessings come on the head, the whole person of the just, Prov. x. 6; and men have their way recompensed on their head. Ezek. ix. 10. To endanger one's head, is to expose his life. Dan. i. 10. Covering of the head, imports protection, as with a helmet, Psal. cxl. 7; or grief and mourning, 2 Sam. xv. 30; or modesty and subjection, in the case of women. 1 Cor. xi. 5, 6. To lift up one's own head, is to rejoice. Luke xxi. 28; or to grow proud, rebel against God, in a bold and daring manner, Psal. lxxxiii. 2. To lift up the head of another, is to exalt him to honour. Gen. xl. 13. Jer. lii. 31. Shaking or wagging of the head at one implies contempt, mockery, insult. Psal. xxii. 7. Anointing of the head, imports joy and prosperity. Eccl. ix. 8. Psal. xxiii. 5. and xcii. 10. Matt. vi. 17. Luke vii. 46. Iniquities going over our head, imports that our guilt is very great, and our apprehension of it, and our affliction for it, likely to sink us. Psal. xxxviii. 4. Men riding over our heads, imports great oppression and slavery. Psal. lxxvi. 12.

Whatever is more excellent, or has power over, or gives influence and direction to others, is called the head. God is the head of Christ; he set him up in his mediatorial office, and gave him his power and authority. 1 Cor. xi. 3. Christ is the head of the church, and head of his church, excelling in dignity, governing her, and communicating light, life, provision, and comfort to her; and he is the head of all things to her, as he rules and governs them for her advantage. Col. i. 18. Eph. i. 22. The church's head upon her, like Carmel, or crismson, is the fruitful and bleeding Jesus, and the true hope founded in his blood, and fruitful in good works. Sol. Song vii. 5. Having her crown of twelve stars on her head, imports her bold and open profession of divine truth, preached by the twelve apostles. Rev. xii. 1. The head of the serpent which Christ bruises, is his power, authority, and chief interests. Gen. iii. 15. The head of the leviathan, which God broke in the waters, is the king of Egypt, and his mighty host, drowned in the Red sea. Psal. lxxiv. 13, 14. Isa. li. 9. A husband is the head of a wife, to protect, rule, and direct her. 1 Cor. xi. 3. Kings and great men are the heads of a nation, who excel the rest in power and dignity, and rule and protect them. Exod. xviii. 25. Mic. iii. 1. Isa. i. 6. Capital cities are the head of a kingdom. Isa. vii. 8. The seven heads of the Romish beast, are the seven forms of government at Rome, by kings, consuls, tribunes, dictators, decemvirs, emperors, and popes, and also the seven hills on which Rome is built. Rev. xiii. 1. and xvii. 9. The hurtful heads of the Turkish cavalry, like lions' heads, denote their terrible force, fierceness, and cruelty. Rev. ix. 17, 19. The whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint, there is nothing but wounds and bruises;—men of power, of wisdom, of professed piety, and the more poor and indigent, are all corrupted, and every man is thoroughly tainted in all his powers, with sin. Isa. i. 5, 6.

body. Matt. iv. 24. (2.) To cure the maladies of the soul, by forgiving men their sins, turning them from them to God, and filling them with spiritual comfort. Rev. xxii. 2. Psal. vi. 2. God's saving health, is his salvation, or his Son in his saving offices. Psal. lxxvii. 2; and he is the health of his people's countenance, as, by vouchsafing his salvation, he cheers and exhilarates them. Psal. xlii. 11. (3.) To heal nations and churches, is to redress their grievances, purge out their corruptions and reduce them to a fixed and regular state. Jer. xiv. 19; and their health and cure, is their civil and religious prosperity. Jer. xxx. 17; viii. 22, and li. 8, 9. False prophets heal, by flattering men in their sins, and encouraging them in false hopes of deliverance and prosperity. Jer. vi. 14, and viii. 11.

HEAP, much water, earth, or stones, standing up, &c. Exod. xv. 8. Ruth iii. 7. Zech. ix. 8. Hab. iii. 15. 2 Sam. xviii. 17. Heaps on heaps denote great multitudes. Judg. xv. 16. Cities are reduced to heaps of rubbish, when utterly destroyed. Isa. xvii. 1, and xxv. 2. Mic. i. 6. Jerusalem was built on her own heap, when rebuilt on the hills on which it stood.

HEAR, HEARKEN. Give ear. God's hearing or hearkening, denotes his perfect knowledge and observation of things. Psal. lxxviii. 21, 59. Jer. viii. 6. Exod. ii. 22; his hearing prayers, or hearkening to them, denotes his gracious acceptance of and answer of them, by granting what is requested. Job ix. 13. Christ speaks the things which he has heard of the Father, which, as God, he knows as well as the Father; or rather, which his manhood has learned from or concerning the Father, and which the Father has given him a commission to publish to men. John viii. 26, 40. Men hear, when they perceive what is pointed out, and ponder it, receive it into their heart by faith, and obey or put it in practice: they hear God and Christ, when they receive the truth into their hearts, with a cordial purpose to obey it. Isa. lv. 3. Matt. xvii. 5. John x. 27: they hear his rod, when they ponder the nature and design of it, and study to act accordingly. Mic. vi. 9. False teachers are heard, when their doctrines are regarded, listened to, believed and obeyed. 1 John iv. 5. Men hear but understand not, see but perceive not, when, amid their instruction and natural apprehension of divine truth, they have no spiritual and saving views thereof. Isa. vi. 9, 10. Judges hear causes, when they examine and determine them. 2 Sam. xv. 3. To hear in the ear, is to hear secretly, as it were from a whisper. Matt. x. 27. Cause me (thy Redeemer) to hear thy voice of prayer or praise; or cause me to be heard; commend and speak of me to others. Sol. Song viii. 13. The poor heareth not rebuke; is not molested with reproach; and the poor in spirit is free from the wrathful rebukes of God. Prov. xiii. 6. Hearing sometimes denotes the thing heard; so hearing of faith, is the doctrine believed. Gal. iii. 2, 5.

HEART is used, not only for that part of the body, which is the fountain of life, but for the soul, and all the powers thereof; the understanding, conscience, will, affections, and memory. The heart is clean, good, and new, when washed in the blood of Christ, changed by the Spirit of God, and filled with holy dispositions and thoughts. Psal. li. 10. Luke viii. 15. It is evil, when under the influence of sinful lusts. Heb. iii. 12. It is true, honest, perfect, sound, and upright, when it follows after what is true and good, with candour and sincerity. Heb. x. 22. Luke viii. 16. Isa. xxxviii. 3. It is of flesh, when pliable and ready to receive the impressions of God's word and providence. Ezek. xxxvi. 26. It is broken and contrite, when filled with sorrow and perplexity on account of guilt, prevalence of corruption, divine hiding, and the like. Isa. lxi. 1. and lxvi. 2. It is tender, when easily affected, and afraid of sin. 2 Chron. xlii. 7, and xxxiv. 27. It is large, when one knows much, or is filled with spiritual liberty and joy. 1 Kings iv. 29. Psal. cxix. 32. It is double, divided, deceitful, when men try to serve God and idols at once, pretend one thing and desire and seek after another. Psal. xii. 2. Hos. x. 2. It is stony, hard, stout, froward, perverse, when it can scarcely be impressed with God's word or providence, and is obstinate in sinning and rebelling against the Lord. Ezek. xi. 19. Isa. xlvi. 12. It is gross and fat as grease, when stupid, filled with sensual pleasure, and is unconcerned about, and inattentive to eternal things. Acts xxvii. 27. Psal. cxix. 70. To say in the heart, is inwardly to think; to reason, Rom. x. 6; or earnestly desire. Psal. xiv. 1. To speak to the heart, is kindly to encourage, comfort, and persuade. Hos. ii. 14. To do a thing with the heart, is to do it with much affection and diligence. Matt. xxii. 37. Persons having their heart towards any thing, or having persons in their heart, denotes a fixed remembrance of, desire after, and care for them. 2 Cor. vii. 3. So Christ's people are on his heart. Sol. Song viii. 6. As heart denotes understanding, courage, and activity, the Israelites were without it, when they had no sense of, and no care or concern about their real welfare. Hos. vii. 11. God's heart is his will, purpose, and love, Isa. lxiii. 4; but the turning of his heart within him, and kindling of his repentings, denote only the greatness of his mercy, and compassion. Hos. xi. 8. Jer. xxxi. 26. God's law is in Christ's and his people's heart; they understand, remember, love, and are careful to fulfil it. Psal. xl. 8, and cxix. 11. What people think, love, or purpose, is said to be in their heart: so false prophets prophesy out of their own heart: say what their vain imaginations and corrupt affections prompt them to. Ezek. xiii. 2. In allusion to the heart of animals being in the midst of the body, the midst of any thing, or being within it, is called the heart; so Tyre was in the heart of the sea, being in an island. Ezek. xxvii. 4; and Christ when in the grave, was in the heart of the earth. Matt. xii. 40.

HEARTH: The bones of sorely afflicted persons are likened to a hearth; because the judgments of God, and their own inward vexation, as it were, burn on them, and render their case destitute of comfort, and very tormenting. Psal. cii. 3. The governors of Judah, the Maccabees, and others, were, or shall be as a hearth, or chimney full of fire, among wood: they marvelously did, or shall cut off, and consume their enemies round about. Zech. xii. 6.

HEAT. See HOT.

HEATH; a well-known shrub, that grows on barren moors; it knows not when good cometh; doth not flourish in the spring, but towards the end of summer. Men are likened to it, as they are insufficient and contemptible, and profit not in true godliness amidst the merciful providences of God. Jer. xvii. 6. It likewise represents men in a destitute and wretched condition. Jer. xlviii. 6.

HEATHEN. See GENTILES.

HEAVE: to lift up towards heaven. Num. xv. 20.

HEAVEN. (1.) The region, in which God especially displays his glory, amidst holy angels and glorified saints; this is called the third heaven, and heaven of heavens, because more glorious and distant than the other. 2 Cor. xii. 3. 1 Kings viii. 27. (2.) The region in which the sun, moon, stars, and comets are placed. Psal. xix. 1. The ancients imagined it to be a solid, extended vault; but from the equality of the motion of the planets from time to time, without diminution, it seems to be really void of matter, and the luminaries keep their respective places, by virtue of their own attraction, and gravitation, subject to the preserving power and direction of God. From the long absence of comets, and the late appearance of new stars, it is plain that the extent of this region is inconceivable to mortals. (3.) The atmosphere, or region of AIR, that surrounds our earth, and where birds fly, clouds move, &c. Matt. vi. 26. When a thing goes high up in the air, it is said to be up to heaven: so the flames from Sinai burnt into the midst of heaven, Dent. iv. 11; and the cities of Canaan are said to be walled up to heaven. Dent. i. 28. God, angels, and saints, are called heaven, because they dwell in it; i. e. God, when it is said, the Heavens do rule, and that men sin against Heaven, Dan. iv. 26. Luke xv. 21; or a doctrine to be from Heaven. Luke xx. 4. Angels and glorified saints are signified, when it is said, the heavens are not clean in his sight and the heavens are called to rejoice. Job xv. 15. Rev. xviii. 20. The church is likened to heaven; she is of a heavenly origin; her holiness is similar to that of heaven: in her God, his angels, and holy people, reside; and through her men are brought to the regions of the blessed; its sun, moon, and stars, are scripture-revelation, instituted ordinances, and ministers. Rev. viii. 12. In midst of this heaven ministers do fly, preaching the gospel in a bold and open manner, Rev. viii. 13. and xiv. 6; and in her is the war between Michael and the dragon, Rev. xii. 7; and the ark of God's testament opened. Rev. xi. 15, 19. The new heavens and new earth, may either denote the happy state of the church during the millennium, or the reign of the saints; or the renewed state of nature after the last judgment. Rev. xxi. Isa. lxxv. 17. and lxvii. 22. 2 Pet. iii. 13. A civil state is likened to the visible heavens; and the sun, moon, and stars of it, are its king, councils, and great men; these fall from heaven, or become black, when it is overturned and ruined. Isa. xiv. 12. Matt. xxiv. 29. Rev. vi. 13. and viii. 12. God's wonders, righteousness, &c. are declared by the heavens, when saints and angels celebrate the same; or when they are shown in the most evident and open manner. Psal. lxxxix. 5. and i. 6. God's mercy and faithfulness are in, or established in the heavens; are very great, visible, firm, and cannot be withstood. Psal. xxxvi. 5. and lxxxix. 2. Sins grow up to the heavens, when they are very great, and are boldly committed. Ezra ix. 6. Gen. xviii. 20, 21. Sometimes the prophets address the heavens and earth, in speaking of men's sins to signify the dreadful nature of it; as if sufficient to terrify the very heavens and earth. Isa. i. 2. Jer. ii. 12. Dent. xxxii. 1.

HEAVENLY; what dwells in, belongs to, or comes from heaven. Matt. vi. 14. John iii. 12. Heb. vi. 4.

HEAVY. Whatever is burdensome or afflicting to body or mind, is called heavy; as the hand or judgments of God, 1 Sam. v. 6; an oppressive tax, Neh. v. 18. 1 Kings xii. 4; bad news, 1 Kings xiv. 6; and the outrageous wrath of a foolish man. Prov. xxvii. 3. A heart is heavy, when it is sad and displeased. 1 Kings xxi. 4. Eyes are heavy, when they can scarce look up for drowsiness. Matt. xxvi. 43. Ears are heavy, when men are dull and inattentive. Isa. vi. 10. Hands are heavy, when one is wearied with holding them up. Exod. xvii. 12. Christ was very heavy, when his spirit was oppressed and filled with sorrow under the unspeakable pressure of his Father's wrath. Matt. xxvi. 37.

HEAVINESS: (1.) Great grief and trouble of mind. Ezra ix. 6. Rom. ix. 2. (2.) The cause of great grief of mind. Prov. x. 1.

HEBER, EBER, the son of Shelah, and great-grandchild of Shem. He had two sons, Peleg, and Joktan, whose posterity afterward peopled Mesopotamia, and westward of it, and part of Arabia-Felix. Gen. x. 24-30. and xi. 14-26. 1 Chron. i. 18-42. The children of Eber, afflicted by ships from Chittim, may signify the Mesopotamians afflicted by the Greeks under Alexander and his successors; and the Jews harassed by the Romans under Pompey, Vespasian, Titus, Trajan, Adrian, &c. Numb. xxiv. 24.

HEBREWS. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and his descendants are thus called. We cannot believe they received this name only from HEBER; for why should this branch bear his name rather than any other of his family, unless that they retained his religion? nor is Abraham ever called a Hebrew, till he had passed the Euphrates to the westward. Did they not then rather receive it, from their passing over, or coming from beyond the river? A Hebrew of the Hebrews, is one who is descended from Hebrew parents, both father and mother. Phil. iii. 5. Sometimes only those Jews were called Hebrews, who spoke the Hebrew language, in contradistinction to the Jews, who spoke the Greek. Acts vi. 1. God had promised to Abraham that he would render his seed extremely numerous,

It was long, however, before the promised seed made any remarkable appearance. Abraham's seed by Ishmael, and the sons of Keturah, indeed mightily increased; but neither these, nor the posterity of Esau, were the promised offspring. In Jacob's twelve sons it first began to increase; and in after times they were called Israel, or Jacob, from their progenitor; and in times still later, were called Jeus, such of them as were known, from the name of JUDAH. In about two hundred and ten, or two hundred and fifteen years, they increased in Egypt from seventy persons, to between two and three millions, men, women, and children. While Joseph lived, who had preserved the Egyptian nation amidst a terrible famine, they were kindly used by the Egyptian monarchs: but soon after were terribly oppressed. From a suspicion that they might, in process of time, become too strong for the natives, they were condemned to labour in the most slavish and toilsome employments. The more they were oppressed, the more exceedingly they multiplied. The midwives and others were therefore ordered to murder every male-infant at the time of birth; but the midwives shifted the horrible task. Every body was therefore ordered to kill the Hebrew male-children wherever they were found: the females they intended to incorporate with the Egyptians. After they had been thus miserably oppressed for about a hundred years, and on the very day that finished the four hundred and thirtieth year from God's first promise of a seed to Abraham, and about four hundred years after the birth of Isaac, God, by terrible plagues on the Egyptians, obliged them to let the Hebrews go, under the direction of Moses and Aaron. As the Hebrews' due wages had been denied them, God, the supreme judge and proprietor of all, ordered them to ask a vast deal of precious things from the Egyptians, and carry them off. Thus they departed peaceably, and with great wealth, and without so much as one of their number weak or sickly; and a mixed multitude of heathens attending them, and who were afterwards a snare to them. Gen. xv. and xvii. and xxii. with Exod. i-xiii. Acts vii. Neh. ix.

God directed the Hebrew march by a cloud, which in the day was dusky, and screened them from the heat, and in the night was fiery, and gave them light. He directed them not by the near way to Canaan, lest their early encounters with the Philistines should tempt them to return back into Egypt; but caused them to march towards the south-east, and into the straits of Pihahiroth, where there were mountains on each side, and the Red sea before them. Pharaoh, expecting they were now entangled, pursued them with a mighty army, to bring them back. The Lord opened a passage through the Red sea for the Hebrews; but the Egyptians attempting to follow them, were drowned. The Hebrews were now in a dry and barren desert; nor had they brought along provision for the journey. God supplied them with water from a flinty rock, and with manna from heaven. Moreover, he regaled them with quails in the desert of Sin. By means of Moses' prayers, and Joshua's bravery, he enabled them to rout the Amalekites, who barbarously fell on their rear. Having got officers of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, set over them, they marched southward along the east side of the western gulf of the Red sea, and came to mount Sinai, about fifty days after their departure from Egypt. There God, in a most tremendous manner, from the midst of a terrible fire on the top of the mount, and after the most fearful thundering, avouched them for his peculiar people, intimated to them his laws, and confirmed the authority of Moses as their leader. While Moses tarried in the mount, they so far lost the impression of every thing they had seen and heard, that they formed and worshipped a golden calf. This being destroyed, and 3000 of the principal idolaters cut off by the sword of the zealous Levites, God at the intercession of Moses, spared them; renewed to them the tables of his law, and his tabernacle was erected among them; and Aaron and his sons consecrated to the priesthood; and vast numbers of further ceremonies concerning offerings, purifications, and festivals, prescribed them. The numbers of their fighting men were taken, and arranged in four great divisions, three tribes in each; and the manner of their marching and encampment was appointed: the tabernacle was dedicated, by the oblations of their chief princes, on twelve several days; and the Levites were consecrated to the sacred service of it, in room of the Hebrews' first-born; and the passover was again observed in the first month of the second year, after they had come out of Egypt. After they had continued about a year at the foot of Sinai, they marched northward, loathed the manna, and were punished with a month's eating of flesh, till a plague broke out among them. About this time seventy or seventy-two elders were set over them. They quickly arrived on the south borders of Canaan, at Kadesh-barnea; but, for their rash belief of the ten wicked spies, and their contempt of the promised land, God had already destroyed them, had not Moses' prayers prevented it. They were actually condemned to wander in the desert till the end of forty years, till that whole generation, except Caleb and Joshua, should be cut off by death. During this period, God frequently punished them for their repeated rebellion, murmuring, or loathing of manna. The Canaanites made terrible havoc of them at Hormah, when they attempted to enter Canaan contrary to the will of their God. Above 14,000 of them perished in the matter of Korah; or for their murmuring at his and his accomplices' death. Multitudes of them were bitten by fiery serpents. Twenty four thousand of them were cut off for their idolatry and whoredom with the Midianitish women. But God's marvellous favours were still continued; his cloudy pillar conducted and protected them; his manna from heaven supplied them with meat; the streams issuing from the rock at Meribah followed their camp about thirty-nine years, whether their way was ascending or not. Their clothes never waxed old. At Kadesh and at Beer, God anew supplied them with water. The intended curse of Balaam was turned into a blessing in their favour. During this period, the cloud conducted them from Kadesh-barnea, on the south of Canaan, back to Ezion-geber, which is on the north east of Sinai; and then back to the south border of Canaan. This journey, though of no more than a few hundred miles, took them up about thirty-eight years, and it is like they marched hither and thither, so that it is in vain to pretend an accurate account of their stations. Nor were they yet permitted to enter the promised land, but conducted along the south border of Idumea by a way exceeding rough and fatiguing. At last they marched to the north-east, till they came to about the head of the river Arnon, and turned westward to the Jordan. While they tarried in these quarters, they took possession of the two powerful kingdoms of Sihon and Og, on the east of Canaan, and made terrible slaughter of the Midianites, for enticing them to uncleanness and idolatry. After crossing the Jordan, miraculously divided, under Joshua, the successor of Moses, as their general, they solemnly dedicated themselves to the Lord by circumcision, and eating of the passover; and, in a war of six years, conquered thirty-one kingdoms. On the seventh, the land was divided, and the tabernacle of God set up among them at Shiloh; and, not long after, they solemnly dedicated themselves to the Lord. Under the name of each tribe, it will appear how exactly their station in CANAAN, and their respective fates, corresponded to the prophetic benedictions of Jacob and Moses. Num. xi.—xxxvi. In these things, were not the Hebrews emblems of the chosen people, the true Israel of God? Are they not chosen children of the one Jesus Christ? and by what miracles of grace are they brought from their spiritual bondage, protected by and washed in his blood, and by his Spirit; and therein, to the hurt of their enemies, and the joy of their souls, consecrated to the service of God! How solemnly, and often with terror, they receive the law at his mouth! but how frequent their sins, their idolizing of creatures, and murmurs against the provision and lot assigned them by God! How fearfully they are chastised for their sin! After ravishing enjoyments, as on the frontiers of heaven, how often they are turned back almost to the terrors of the broken law, and their Egyptian slavery! How often the earth swallows up their cares! the fiery judgments of God, and the poison of the old serpent, prey upon them; and their troublesome way makes their life a burden to them! How often their carnal relations harass, tempt, and seek to destroy them! But, nevertheless, how constant and oft repeated are God's favours to them! Jesus, their meat indeed, and their drink indeed, Jesus their director and protector, never leaves them nor forsakes them; nor do the unwasting robes of his righteousness and grace fail them. At last, when the mixed multitude and rebels of indwelling corruptions are purged from among them, they, and often amidst fearful struggles with Satan and their lusts, pass safely through the swelling Jordan of death; and, rendered faultless before God, take possession of the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world.—Nay, with what terrible tossing of mind! what impression of the fiery law! and through what horrid provocations on their side, and wonders of mercy on God's, and often through a number of gracious-like attainments, afterward lost, are they brought into their new-covenant state!—Was not this fate of the Hebrews typical of that of the New-Testament church? Brought out of Egypt by miracles and wonders in the apostolic age, through what a waste-howling desert of persecution from dragons and fiery serpents; through what multitudes of sins, troubles, and mercies, did she arrive on the border of rest, under Constantine the Great, about A. D. 312! But for contempt of her spiritual ordinances, and privileges, how driven back, and plagued under Antichrist's reign! how consumed by fiery troubles and persecutions, and mortally bitten by heretics Arians, Pelagians, and others! At the reformation, we again retouched the borders of the promised felicity, and God anew opened for us wells of living water in the preaching of the gospel; but now we compass the land of Edom, where our soul is much discouraged, because of the way; nor do I expect our entrance into the millennial state till the mixed multitude of carnal and profane persons be purged from among us.

In their entrance to Canaan, God, to give the Hebrews a horror of idolatry, ordered them to cut off every idolatrous Canaanite; they, however, through sinful pity or sloth, spared vast numbers of them, who enticed them to wickedness, and were sometimes God's rod to punish them. For many ages, the Hebrews enjoyed scarce a blink of outward prosperity, but they relapsed into idolatry, worshipping Baalim and Ashtoreth, &c. Micah and the Danites introduced it not long after Joshua's death. About this time, the lewdness of the men of Gibeah occasioned a war of the eleven tribes against their brethren of Benjamin. To punish the tribes for their wickedness, and their neglecting at first to consult the mind of the Lord, they, though more than fourteen to one, were twice routed by the Benjamites, and 40,000 of them slain. In the third all the Benjamites were slain, except six hundred. Heartily vexed for the loss of a tribe, the other Hebrews provided wives for these six hundred, at the expence of slaying most of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, and of eluding their oath, in the affair of the daughters of Shiloh. Judg. i. ii. and xvii.—xxi. Their relapses into idolatry also brought on them repeated turns of slavery from the heathen among or around them. From A. M. 2591 to 2596, they were terribly oppressed by Cushanrishathaim; but delivered by Othniel. From A. M. 2661 to 2679, by Eglon king of Moab; from which they were delivered by Ehud. Soon after which they were delivered from the ravages of the Philistines by Shamgar. From A. M. 2699 to 2719, they were oppressed by Jabin king of the Canaanites; but delivered by Deborah and Barak. From 2752 to 2759, by the Midianites; but delivered by Gideon, whose son Abimelech was a scourge to Israel. From 2799 to 2817, by the Ammonites on the east, and the Philistines on the west; but Jephthah rescued them from the Ammonites. From A. M. 2849 to 2889, they were oppressed by the Philistines, who were harassed by Samson, and routed by Samuel, after the death of Eli. During this last oppression, the Hebrews were almost ruined; the ark was taken, and, for perhaps one hundred and ten or one hundred and thirty years afterwards, was without a settled abode. Judg. i.—xxi. 1 Sam. ii.—vii. Or the servitude of Cushan-rishathaim began A. M. 2600; that of the Moabites, A. M. 2648; that of the Canaanites, 2747; that of the Midianites, 2807; that of the Ammonites, A. M. 2854, just after the death of Gideon, and three hundred years after the death of Moses, Judg. xi. 26; that of the Philistines in A. M. 2872. When the Hebrews had been governed by judges, divinely raised up, for about three hundred and forty years after the death of Joshua, they took a fancy to have a king, like the nations around them. Saul was their first sovereign. Under his reign, of about twenty or forty years, they had almost perpetual struggles with the Ammonites, Moabites, and Philistines; and, at his death, the nation was left on the brink of ruin by the Philistines. After about seven years' struggling between the eleven tribes that clave to Ishbosheth the son of Saul, and the tribe of Judah, which erected themselves into a kingdom under David, David became sole monarch of Israel. Under him the Hebrews subdued their neighbours the Philistines, Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Syrians, and took possession of the whole dominion which had been promised them, from the border of Egypt to the banks of the Euphrates. Under Solomon they had almost no war, but employed themselves in buildings, sea-trade, and other things grand and pompous. It is plain, however, that they disrelished the taxes which he laid upon them in the end of his reign. To punish his and their idolatry in the latter part of his reign, Rezon the Syrian, and Hadad the Edomite, harassed them a little; and after Solomon's death, ten of the Hebrew tribes formed the kingdom of Ephraim or Israel for themselves, under Jeroboam the son of Nebat, in opposition to the kingdom of Judah and Benjamin, ruled by the family of David. This division, which happened about A. M. 3020, and in the hundredth or one hundred and twentieth year of their kingdom, tended not a little to the hurt of both parties, by their mutual contests. The kingdom of Israel, Ephraim, or the ten tribes had never so much as one pious king; and often the royal families were destroyed, and others took their place. Idolatry, particularly of worshipping the golden calves of Bethel and Dan, was always their established religion, and brought miseries unnumbered on their head. The kingdom of Judah had wicked and pious sovereigns by turns; but their frequent relapses into idolatry often occasioned terrible distress to the country. To punish the kingdom of Judah, or the Jews for their apostasy, God delivered them into the band of SHISHAK king of Egypt, who ravaged the country; but appears to have done no hurt to Jeroboam's kingdom, as perhaps he was in league with him. There was almost perpetual war between Jeroboam and Rehoboam, and Abijah his son. In one battle Jeroboam had 500,000 of his forces cut off by the army of Abijah, which was but the half of his own. From A. M. 3049 to 3115, the kingdom of Judah, for the most part, followed the true God, reformed from their corruptions, and had considerable prosperity and success against their enemies, Ethiopians, Edomites, Moabites, &c. Jehoshaphat had an army of 1,160,000 men. Meanwhile the Israelites, under Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram, were generally in a most wretched condition, especially by Ahab's introduction of the worship of Baal; and by various famines, and repeated wars with the Philistines and Syrians; and by civil broils between Omri and Tibni. 1 Sam. viii.—xxxi. 2 Sam. i.—xxiv. 1 Kings i.—xxii. 1 Chron. x.—xxix. 2 Chron. i.—xx.

Not only was the kingdom of Israel, but also the kingdom of Judah, the royal family of which had joined in marriage, and other alliance, with the wicked house of Ahab, brought to the very brink of ruin, after the death of Jehoshaphat; nor indeed did his successors, Jehoram and Ahaziah, deserve a better fate. From A. M. 3120 to 3232, Jehu and his posterity governed the kingdom of Israel: the worship of Baal was abolished: but the idolatry of the calves was still retained. To punish this, the kingdom was terribly ravaged, and the people murdered by the Syrians, during the reign of Jehu, and especially of Jehoahaz his son; but Jehoash, and Jeroboam his son, reduced the Syrians, and rendered the kingdom of the ten tribes more glorious than ever it had been. In the beginning of this period, Athaliah for six years tyrannized over Judah. After her death, religion was a while promoted under Joash by means of his uncle Jehoiada, the high-priest; but they quickly relapsed into idolatry; and during the reigns of Joash, Amaziah, Uzziah, as well as of Jotham, numbers sacrificed in high places, but to the Lord their God. Nor did the kingdom of Judah recover its grandeur till the reign of Uzziah.—Under the reigns of Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, and Pekahiah, the kingdom of the ten tribes was reduced to a most wretched condition, by their intestine broils, murder of sovereigns, and Assyrian ravages. Under Pekah they recovered part of their grandeur; but he being murdered by Hoshea, a civil war of nine years seems to have happened, at the end of which Hoshea found himself master of the crown. Under Jotham the kingdom of Judah was moderately happy: but under Ahaz they relapsed into idolatry, and were terribly harassed by the Philistines, Syrians, and by the ten tribes under Pekah. About A. M. 3280, the kings of the Hebrews were better than they had been ever since the division. Hezekiah of Judah, was an eminent reformer, and Hoshea was less wicked than his predecessors; but the abounding wickedness of both kingdoms had ripened them for ruin. Ignorance, stupidity, idolatry, rebellion against God, and apostacy from his way, forgetfulness of him, ingratitude for his mercies, derision of his threatenings, changing of his ordinances, profane swearing, violation of sacred vows, magical arts, hypocrisy, and obdurate impudence in wickedness, violation of the Sabbath, mingling themselves with the heathen, sinful alliances with the Syrians, Assyrians, and Egyptians, and dependence on them for help; pride, want of natural affection among relations, or between the kingdoms of Israel and Judah; universal corruption of princes, judges, priests, and prophets; murder, drunkenness, luxury, whoredom, covetousness, fraud, oppression, perverting of justice, and falsehood, every where prevailed. Provoked with Hoshea for entering into a league with So, king of Egypt, Shalmaneser king of Assyria invaded the kingdom of the ten tribes, furiously besieged and took their cities, murdered most of the people, ripping up the women with child, and dashing infants to pieces; and carried almost all the rest captive to Hara, Halah, and Habor, by the river Gozan, and to the cities of the Medes, on the north-east of the Assyrian empire; and brought the Samaritans, and placed them in their stead. Thus the kingdom was ruined two hundred and fifty-four years after its erection. Sennacherib king of Assyria, contrary to treaty, invaded the kingdom of Judah, and brought that hypocritical nation to the brink of ruin. Hezekiah's piety, and Isaiah's prayer were a means of preventing it; but, under his son Manasseh, the Jews abandoned themselves to the most horrid impieties. To punish them, Esarhaddon king of Assyria, about the twenty second year of Manasseh's reign, invaded Judea, reduced the kingdom, and carried Manasseh prisoner to Babylon: he also transported the remains of the Israelites to Media, and the countries adjacent. What has become of them since, whether they removed eastward with the Tartars, and partly passed over into America; or how far they mixed with the Jews, when carried to Babylon, we have no certain accounts. 2 Kings i—xxi. 2 Chron. xxi—xxxii. Amos ii—ix. Hos. i—xlii. Mic. i—iii. vi. vii. Isa. i—x. xvii—xxii. xliii—xxxi. xxxiii. and xxxvi—xxxix. 1 Chron. v. 26.

Manasseh repented, and the Lord brought him back to his kingdom, where he promoted the reformation of his subjects during the rest of his reign; but his son Amon defaced all, and rendered matters as wicked as ever. His son Josiah mightily promoted a reformation, and brought it to such a pitch as it had never been since the reign of David and Solomon; but the people were mostly hypocritical in it, and the Lord never forgave the nation the murders and other wickednesses of Manasseh, as to the external punishment thereof. After Josiah was slain by Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, the kingdom of Judah returned to their idolatry and other wickedness; no kind of the above-mentioned sins did they forbear. God gave them up to servitude, first to the Egyptians, and then to the Chaldeans. The fate of their kings, Jehoaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, was unhappy; and so was the case of their subjects during the twenty-two years of their reigns. It is shocking to think what famine, pestilence, and murder, by the Chaldeans, happened among them. Provoked by Zedekiah's treachery, Nebuchadnezzar furiously invaded the kingdom, sacked and burned the cities, murdered such multitudes, that of a kingdom once consisting of about six millions of people under Jehoshaphat, no more than a few thousands were left. The few that were left after the murder of Gedaliah, flying to Egypt, made the Chaldeans suspect them guilty of the murder, and excited their fury against the Jewish nation. Thus the kingdom of Judah was ruined, A. M. 3416, about three hundred and eighty-eight years after its division from that of the ten tribes. In the seventieth year from the begun captivity, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and the fifty-second from the destruction of the city, the Jews, according to the edict of Cyrus king of Persia, who had overturned the empire of Chaldea, returned to their own country, under the direction of Sheshbazzar, or Zerubbabel, the grandson of king Jehoiachin, Joshua the high-priest, and others, to the number of 42,360, and 7337 servants of a heathen original; but as the particulars mentioned by Ezra amount but to 29,818, and those by Nehemiah to 31,031, it seems the overplus of about twelve thousand were of the remains of the ten tribes. The lists of Ezra and Nehemiah are different in many particulars; but the one might be the list of such as gave in their names to return, and the other the list of them that actually returned. Vast numbers of the Jews who had agreeable settlements, preferred their own carnal advantage to their religion, and remained in Babylon. After their return, the Jews, under the direction of Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, and Nehemiah, rebuilt the temple and city of Jerusalem, put away their strange wives, and solemnly renewed their covenant with God; and vast numbers were turned to the Lord, though many were still given to condemn the worship of God, and to rebel against his laws. Isa. xiv. xl—xlv. xlviii. xlix. Jer. ii—xlv. i. lii. Mic. iv. Hab. i. iii. Zeph. i—iii. 2 Kings xxii—xxv. 2 Chron. xxxiii—xxxvi. Ezra i—x. Neh. i—xiii.

The Jews, after their return from Babylon, retained a constant aversion to idolatry, which they justly believed had been a chief reason of their ejection from their land; but many corruptions, as selfishness, marriage of strange wives, rash divorcement of lawful wives, contempt of God's worship, carnal labour on the Sabbath, partiality and scandalous living among their priests still took place; the year of jubilee, and perhaps that of release, was scarce ever punctually observed. Nor were their troubles few. Their temple wanted the ancient ark, cherubim, Shechinah, pot of manna, and budding-rod. The gift of prophecy ceased, after the death of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Tatnai, Shethar-boznai, Rehuc, &c. mightily opposed the building of the temple. Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem, no less maliciously opposed the repairing of the walls of Jerusalem. About A. M. 3490, or 3546, they escaped the ruin devised by Haman. About 3653, Darius Ochus king of Persia, who is by some pretended to be the husband of Esther, and master of Haman, ravaged part of Judea, took Jericho by force, and carried off a great number of prisoners; part of which he sent into Egypt, and the rest he transported to Hyrcania, on the south of the Caspian sea. When Alexander was in Canaan, about A. M. 3670, he was at first provoked with their adherence to the Persians; but, if we believe Josephus, their solemn submission, with their high-priest at their head, entirely pacified him. He caused a great number of victims to be offered for his success to the God whom they worshipped. He confirmed to them all their privileges; and having built Alexandria, he settled vast numbers of them there, endowed with the same privileges as his own Macedonians. About fourteen years after, Ptolemy Lagus, the Greek king of Egypt, to revenge their fidelity to Laomedon his rival, furiously ravaged Judea, took Jerusalem, and carried 100,000 Jews prisoners to Egypt; but used them so kindly, and even assigned them places of power and trust, that many of their countrymen followed them of their own accord. It seems that, about eight years after, he transported another multitude of Jews to Egypt, and every where gave them equal privileges as Alexander had done. About the same time, Seleucus Nicator, having built above thirty new cities in Asia, sixteen of which were called Antioch, nine Seleucia, six Laodicea, settled in them as many Jews as he could; they being reckoned most faithful to their friendly sovereigns; and bestowed on them the same privileges as they had at Alexandria; nor did Antiochus Theos, his grandson, less favour them. Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt, about 3720, at his own expence, bought the freedom of all the Jewish slaves in Egypt; and it is said, he, or his son, procured a translation of their Bible for the use of his famous Alexandrian library. Ptolemy Euergetes offered a vast number of victims at Jerusalem for his victories over the Syro-Grecians, and was extremely kind to Joseph and other Jews. Ptolemy Philopater, having defeated Antiochus the Great, offered a great multitude of victims at Jerusalem; but provoked with the priest for hindering him to enter their holy of holies, and at the affright he had received in attempting it, he issued forth murderous decrees against all the Jews in his dominions; but the beasts prepared to devour them in Egypt turned on and destroyed the heathens who attended for diversion. Antiochus the Great soon after invaded Judea, and the Jews readily revolted to him. To reward this, he repaired their temple at his own expence, and assigned 20,000 pieces of silver, 1400 measures of wheat, and 375 of salt, for its service; and confirmed to them all the privileges which had been ratified to them by Alexander. Such dispersed Jews as settled at Jerusalem he for three years exempted from tribute. Such as were slaves to his subjects he ordered to be set free; but Scopas quickly reduced Judea, and put an Egyptian garrison in Jerusalem under Philometor Onias, who, about 3850, built a temple at On, or Heliopolis, in Egypt, after the model of that at Jerusalem, and Dositheus had almost the whole management of the Egyptian state. About A. M. 3828, Heliodorus, by his master Seleucus's orders, attempted to pillage the temple; but an angel affrighted him. Soon after Antiochus Epiphanes came to the Syrian throne; severely the Jews felt the effects of his fury and madness. Because Onias the high-priest refused to comply with some imitations of the heathen, he turned him out and sold the office to Jason his brother for three hundred and fifty talents of silver. Soon after he took it from him, and sold it to Menelaus, a third brother, for six hundred and fifty talents of silver. About A. M. 3834, a report being spread, that Antiochus was killed in his Egyptian expedition, he attempted to turn out Menelaus, and retake the high-priesthood. Enraged hereat, and with the Jews for rejoicing at the news of his death, and for the peculiar form of their worship, Antiochus, in his return from Egypt, forced his way into Jerusalem, murdered 40,000, and sold as many more for slaves to the heathens around, carried off a great part of the sacred furniture, with about 1800 talents of gold and silver, which he found in the treasury; and appointed two of his most savage friends, Philip, the Phrygian, and Adronicus to govern Judea and Samaria as his deputies. About two years after, enraged at the Romans' check of his designs against Egypt, he, in his return, ordered his troops to pillage the cities of Judea, murder the men, and sell the women and children for slaves. On a Sabbath-day, Apollonius, his general, craftily entered Jerusalem, killed multitudes, and carried off 10,000 prisoners. Antiochus built a fort adjacent to the temple, from whence his garrison might fall on the people who came to worship in the courts; the temple was soon after dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, an idol of Greece, and his statue was erected on the altar of burnt-offering. For 2,300 mornings and evenings, or three years and about two months, the daily sacrifice was stopped, and the temple rendered a shambles of murder, a sty of whoredom, and of all manner of baseness. Such Jews as refused to eat swine's flesh, and comply with idolatry, were exposed to all the horrors of persecution, torture, and death. While Eleazar, and the widow, with her seven sons, and others, bravely suffered martyrdom, and others with ardour taught their brethren the evil of idolatrous compliances, Matathias the priest, with his sons, chiefly Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, who were called Maccabees, bravely fought for their religion and liberties. After a variety of lesser advantages, Judas, who succeeded his father, about 3840, gave Nicanor and the king's troops a terrible defeat, regained the temple, repaired and purified it, dedicated it anew, and restored the daily worship of God, and repaired Jerusalem, which was now almost a ruinous heap. After he had, for four years more, with a small handful of troops, proved a terrible scourge to the Syrians, and other heathens around, the Edomites, Arabs, &c. he was slain; Jonathan his brother succeeded him as high-priest and general. He and his brother Simon, who succeeded him, wisely and bravely promoted the welfare of their church and state, and were both basely murdered. Hircanus, Simon's son, succeeded him, A. M. 3806; he at first procured a peace with the Syrians, and soon after entirely threw off their yoke. He subdued Idumea, and forced the inhabitants to be circumcised, and to accept the Jewish religion; he reduced the Samaritans, and demolished their temple at Gerizim, and Samaria their capital, after a short reign of Aristobulus and Sheckem. His son Alexander Jannæus succeeded him A. M. 3809. He reduced the Philistines, and obliged them to accept circumcision; he also reduced the country of Moab, Ammon, Gilead, and part of Arabia. Under these three reigns alone, the Jewish nation was independent after the captivity. His widow governed nine years with great wisdom and prudence. After her death, the nation was almost ruined with civil broils, hated by the Pharisees, who had raised Alexander, for his cruelties, and their opposers; and in 3039, Aristobulus invited the Romans to assist him against Hircanus, his elder brother. They turning his enemy quickly reduced the country, took Jerusalem by force; and Pompey, and a number of his officers, pushed their way into the sanctuary, if not into the holy of holies, to view the furniture thereof. About nine years after, Crassus the Roman general, to obtain money for his mad Parthian expedition, pillaged the temple of every thing valuable, to the worth of 8000 talents of gold and silver. After Judea had, for more than thirty years, been a scene of rage and blood, and during twenty-four of which had been oppressed by the Romans, Herod the Great, assisted by Antony the Roman triumvir, with much struggling and barbarous murder, got himself installed in the kingdom. Finding that neither force nor flattery could make his reign easy, he, about twenty years before our Saviour's birth, with the Jews' consent began to rebuild the temple; in three years and a half the principal parts were finished, and the rest not till after eight years more, if ever. Mic. v. 3. Ezek. xxi. 27. Dan. ix. 24, 25. Deut. xxviii. 68. Joel iii. 16, 17. Psal. lxxviii. 29, 30. Zech. ix. 8, 13—16. Dan. viii. 9—14. xi. 11, 14, 28—35. About this time, the Jews everywhere had big hopes of the appearance of their Messiah, to free them from their bondage, and bring their nation to the summit of temporal glory. The Messiah, or Christ, and his forerunner John Baptist, actually appeared; both were born about A. M. 4001, which is three years before our common account. Instigated by fear of losing his throne, Herod sought to murder him in his infancy. When he assumed his public character, and after his resurrection, many of the Jews believed on him, and those chiefly of the poorer sort; but the most part, offended with the spiritual nature of his office, his pure and self-debasing doctrine, his mean appearance, and sorry retinue, reproached, persecuted, and at last got him betrayed, and crucified between two thieves, as if he had been a noted malefactor, and wished his blood might be on them and their children. Notwithstanding of the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost, and the multitudes of miracles thereby produced, most of the Jews every where poured contempt on the gospel of Christ, raged at the conversion of the gentiles, and every where stirred up persecution against the apostles and other Christian preachers, as in Judea, in Pisidia, and at Iconium, Lystra, Thessalonica, Berea, Corinth, &c. The Jews' rejection of Christ was wisely ordered of God; it fulfilled the ancient prophecies; it demonstrated that the report of Jesus' Messiahship was far from being supported with carnal influence; and by this means the Jews came to be standing monuments of the truth, amidst almost every nation under heaven.

The sceptre was now wholly departed from Judah. About twenty-seven years before Christ's death, Judea was reduced into a province. Nor does it appear that afterward they had any power of life and death lodged in their hands; for the murder of Stephen appears to have been effected by an outrageous mob: at least it is plain, that, after the conversion of Cornelius the gentile to Jesus, they had not the least vestige of civil power, but were entirely subject to the Romans. After our Saviour's ascension, their misery gradually increased. Some false prophets, as Judas and Theudas had already risen; now their number exceedingly multiplied; Simon Magus, Dositheus the Samaritan, and the Egyptian, who led 4000 men into the wilderness, were of this sort. Under Felix's government, pretended Messiahs were so numerous, that sometimes one was apprehended every day. Caligula had wreaked his rage on the Jews for refusing to worship his statue, if Herod had not soothed him, or death prevented him. At Cesarea, 20,000 of the Jews were killed by the Syrians in their mutual broils, and the rest expelled from the city. To revenge which, the Jews murdered a vast number of Syrians in Syria and Canaan; and were in no smaller numbers murdered in their turn. At Damascus 10,000 unarmed Jews were killed; and at Bethanah the heathen inhabitants caused their Jewish neighbours to assist them against their brethren, and then murdered 13,000 of these assistants. At Alexandria the Jews murdered multitudes of the heathen, and were murdered in their turn to about 50,000. The Jews of Peria warred with their heathen neighbours of Philadelphia about adjusting their territory. Both Jews and Galileans warred on the Samaritans, who had murdered some Galileans in their way to a solemn feast at Jerusalem. War, too, often raged in the empire between the different pretenders to sovereignty; various earthquakes happened in Italy, Lesser Asia, Canaan, and the Mediterranean isles; a terrible famine had oppressed the whole Roman empire. The gospel had been preached in most parts of the Roman empire, and manifold persecutions raised by the Jews, and by Nero, against the believers of it. Various strange tokens took place. A star shaped like a sword hung over Jerusalem for a whole year. At the ninth hour of the night, during the feast of tabernacles, a light as bright as of noon shone for half an hour on the temple, and places adjacent. About the same time, a cow led to be sacrificed brought forth a lamb in the court of the temple. The eastern gate of the temple, all of solid brass, and which twenty men could scarce shunt, though fastened with strong bolts, opened of its own accord, and could scarce be got shut again. Before sunset, armies were seen in the air, as if fighting and besieging cities. In the night, at Pentecost, the priests in the temple heard a noise, and a voice, as of a multitude, crying, Let us go hence. For about seven years and a half, beginning four years before the war broke out, one Jesus, a country-fellow, especially at their solemn feasts, ran up and down the streets of Jerusalem, crying in a rueful manner, "A voice from the four winds!—Woe to Jerusalem! Woe to the city, to the people, and to the temple!"—and at last, as he added,, "Woe to myself!" was struck dead by a stone from a sling; nor could the utmost scourging or torture restrain him from his thus crying till his death.

About A. D. 67, Cestius Gallus, the Roman governor of Syria, laid siege to Jerusalem; but most unaccountably raised it, and was pursued at the heels by some of the Jewish rebels. The Christians, according as Jesus had warned them took this opportunity to leave the city, and the country westward of Jordan, and retired to Pella, a place on the east of Jordan. Soon after the Romans under Vespasian, whom God had marvellously advanced to the empire, invaded the country from the north-east, furiously besieged and took the cities of Galilee, Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum, &c. where Christ had been especially rejected, and sometimes murdered almost all the inhabitants. Almost every where the Jews resisted even unto madness, and sometimes murdered themselves, rather than yield even to the most compassionate generals of Rome. While the Romans destroyed them in multitudes, the zealots of the Jewish nation, with enraged madness fought with one another. At Jerusalem the scene was most wretched of all. At the passover, when there might be two or three millions of people in the city, the Romans surrounded it with troops, trenches, and walls, that none might escape. The three different factions within murdered one another, and some times united to make a desperate but unsuccessful sally on the Romans; they even murdered the inhabitants in sport, to try the sharpness of their swords. At last Eleazar's party was treacherously massacred by their brethren. Titus, one of the most merciful generals that ever breathed, did all in his power to persuade them to an advantageous surrender; but, mad, on their own ruin, they scorned every proposal. The multitudes of unburied carcases corrupted the air, and produced a pestilence. The famine hastened on by their destruction of one another's magazines, prevailed till people fed on one another, and even ladies broiled their suckling infants, and ate them. After a siege of six months, the city was taken; provoked with their obstinacy, the Romans murdered almost every Jew they met with. Titus was bent to save the temple; but a false prophet having persuaded 6000 Jews to take shelter in it, all of whom were burnt or murdered therein, a Roman soldier set it on fire with a brand he cast; nor could all the authority of Titus make his troops, who highly regarded him, attempt to extinguish the flames. The outcries of the Jews, when they saw it on fire, were almost infernal. The whole city, except three towers, and a small part of the wall, was razed to the ground. Turnus Rufus, a Roman commander, caused plough up the foundation of the temple, and other places of the city: and the soldiers dugged up the rubbish in quest of money or like precious things, and it seems ripped up some Jews to procure the gold they had swallowed. Titus wept as he beheld the ruins, and bitterly cursed the obstinate wretches who had forced him to raze it. Soon after, the forts of Herodion and Macheron were taken, and the garrison of Massada murdered themselves rather than surrender. At Jerusalem alone we hear of 1,100,000 that perished by sword, famine and pestilence. Titus, too, crucified of them before the walls, all around the city, till he had no more wood to erect crosses. In other places we hear of 250,000 that were cut off. About 97,000 were taken prisoners, many of whom were sent into Egypt by ships to labour as slaves; part were sent to Syria to be exposed for shows, or devoured by wild beasts, or sold for slaves. All the family of David that could be found were cut off; and that of Herod was not long after extinguished. Every Jew in the empire was required to pay the yearly half-shekel of soul ransom money, which they had paid to their temple, for the maintenance of the idolatrous capitol at Rome.

Prodigious numbers of Jews still remained in almost every part of the Roman empire. About fifty years after, they brought a superadded ruin on their own heads. In Cyrene, Egypt, Cyprus, and Mesopotamia, they murdered about 500,000 of the Roman subjects, heathens and Christians. With terrible bloodshed, and so small difficulty, did the conquering Trajan, about A. D. 119, reduce them. About A. D. 130, the emperor Elus Adrian sent a colony of Romans to rebuild Jerusalem, and called it Elia, after himself: and had prohibited the Jews to circumcise their children. Barcoca, one of those thievish banditti who had infested Canaan for about a hundred years, pretended that he was the Messiah, raised a Jewish army of 300,000, and murdered all the heathens and Christians that came in their way. About A. D. 134, Adrian's forces defeated him in battle, and after a siege of three years, took Bitter his capital; after which fifty of his fortifications quickly surrendered. In this terrible war, it is said, about 600,000 Jews were slain, by the sword, besides what perished by famine and pestilence. It is said the rivers were high swelled with blood, and the sea into which they ran, for several miles, marked therewith. In this war they had about fifty strong castles taken, and nine hundred and eighty-five of their best towns demolished. For some time the emperor caused hold annual fairs for the sale of captive Jews, and transported such as had dwelt in Canaan, to Egypt, and every where loaded with taxes such as adhered to their religion. Adrian built a city on mount Calvary, and erected the marble statue of a sow over the gate that led to Bethlehem. No Jew was allowed to enter the city, or even to look to it at a distance, under pain of death. Constantine further enlarged this city; his troops repressed the Jews' attempt to seize on it. Multitudes of them had their ears cut off, and being marked in their bodies for rebellion, were dispersed through the empire as vagabond slaves. About A. D. 360, the Jews encouraged by Julian, Constantine's nephew, and now emperor, and bent to give Jesus the lie, began to rebuild their city and temple. They had scarce begun to lay one stone upon another in building the temple, when a terrible earthquake, and flames of fire issuing from the earth, killed the workmen, and scattered the materials. Soon after Julian dying, the edict of Adrian was revived against them, and Roman guards prohibited their approach to the city. Nor, till the seventh century durst they so much as creep over the rubbish to bewail it, without bribing the Roman guards. However basely the Jews have complied with the delusions of the countries whither they are scattered, they have been exposed to the most outrageous abuse. In the end of the second century, Niger the usurper persecuted them, because of their adherence to Severus the emperor; and for a while Severus harrassed them on the footing of Adrian's edict. In the third century, Sapor king of Persia furiously harrassed and murdered them; and, much about the same time, Manes, one of them, founded the sect of the Manichees, who believed there were two Gods, a good and a bad. Dioclesian intended to persecute them: but, by huge sums of money, they appeased his fury. In the fourth century, the council of Elvira in Spain prohibited Christians to eat with them. Constantine the Great discharged them to retain any Christians for slaves, and obliged them to undergo their share in public services, of the military, &c. It is even said that he forced multitudes of them to eat swine's flesh, or be murdered. Offended with their insult of the Christians in Egypt, and their insurrection in Palestine, Constantine, his son, terribly chastised them, revived every harsh edict against them, and condemned to death such as had Christians either for their wives or servants. Encouraged by the emperor Theodosius's prohibition to pull down their synagogues, they became very insolent about the beginning of the fifth century; they crucified the image of Haman, and sometimes a Christian, in derision of our Saviour. In Egypt, they insulted the Christians on the Lord's day. Provoked herewith, the Christians in Macedonia, Dacia, Chalcis, Syria, and Egypt, fell upon them, and killed prodigious numbers of them, especially at Alexandria. In the isle of Minorca, vast numbers of them were forced to turn Christians, or hide themselves in dens and caves of the earth. About A. D. 432, one Moses of Crete, pretending that he, as their Messiah, would lead them safe through the sea to Canaan, a vast number threw themselves into the deep from a precipice, and were drowned. Just after, many of them, for the sake of the presents given to new converts, were baptized at Constantinople.

In the sixth century, Cavades, and the two Chosroes, kings of Persia, terribly harrassed them; but the latter Chosroes was afterwards reconciled to them, and gratified their malice with the murder of about 90,000 Christians, at the taking of Jerusalem, A. D. 614. About 530, the emperor Justinian discharged them to make Testaments, or to appear witness against Christians, and prohibited to those in Africa the exercise of their religion. Soon after, one Julian of Canaan set up for Messiah. He and his followers did infinite mischief to the Christians; but in the end 20,000 of them were slain, and as many taken, and sold for slaves. Just after, numbers of Jews were executed for occasioning a revolt at Cesarea. And to revenge their assistance of the Goths at the siege of Naples, the Greek general Belisarius, and his troops, killed as many of them as they could find, men or women. In A. D. 602, they were severely punished for their horrible massacre of the Christians at Antioch. Heraclius the emperor soon after banished them from Jerusalem. Multitudes in Spain and France were forced to become Christians; and the councils of Toledo encouraged their sovereigns to oblige them to do so. About A. D. 700, when Erica, king of Spain complained that the Spanish Jews had conspired with those of Africa against him, the council of Toledo ordered that they should be all enslaved, and their children taken from them and educated in the Christian religion. In France, a variety of edicts were made against them. Chilperic, Dagobert, and other kings, ordered that such as refused baptism should be banished. In this century too, numbers of them in the east imagined Mahomet the Messiah; and one of them assisted him in compiling his Alcoran. In the eighth and ninth centuries, the misery of the Jews still continued. In the east, Caliph Zayd permitted his subjects to abuse them. About 760, Jaafar the Imam ordered that such as embraced Mahometanism should be their parents' sole heirs. About 841, Caliph Wathek persecuted them, because some of their number had embezzled his revenues; and he fined such as refused to embrace Mahometanism. Motawakhel, his successor, deprived them of all their honour and trust; and, marking them with infamy, caused them to wear leathern girdles, and ride without stirrups on asses and mules. Such marks of contemptuous distinction partly still subsist in the east, and have been imitated by other princes. Sundry of his successors persecuted them in a manner still more severe. While the emperor Leo Isaurus, the image-opposer, heartily hated them, the promoters of image-worship obliged the Jews to comply, and to curse themselves with the curse of Gehazi, if they did it not from the heart. In France and Spain, the people terribly insulted them. Probably provoked with this, they invited the Normans into France, and betrayed Bourdeaux, and other places into their hands. About 724, one Serenus of Spain set up for the Messiah. Multitudes followed him, and went so far to take possession of Canaan. The Christians seized what they left in their absence. Another in the east, about 831, pretended to be Moses risen from the dead, and was followed by numbers.

In the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, their miseries rather increased; partly through their own divisions, and partly by the persecutions which they underwent. About A. D. 1037, we find about 900,000 of them near Babylon, if we may believe their own noted traveller; and yet, about two years after, all their academies there, if not also their schools, were ruined. About A. D. 1020, Hakem, the founder of the Drusian religion, for a while, persecuted them in Egypt. Besides the common miseries which they sustained in the east by the Turkish and sacred war, it is shocking to think what multitudes of them the eight crusades, in this or the two following centuries, murdered in Germany, Hungary, Lesser Asia, and wherever they could find them, as they marched to recover Canaan from the Mahometans; and what numbers of Jewish parents murdered their own children, that these crusaders might not get them baptized. The bloody contention between the Moors and Spaniards might have procured them some ease in Spain, had not their own mutual broils rendered them miserable. In France multitudes of them were burnt, others were banished, and others had their goods confiscated, by order of king Philip; and such as offered to sell their effects, and remove, could get none to buy them. About A. D. 1020, they were banished from England, but afterwards they returned, and had some respite; but for their attending at the coronation of king Richard I. the mob fell upon, and murdered a great many of them. This popular fury was prohibited by law, but it still raged, A. D. 1189 and 1190, at London and elsewhere. Richard had scarce gone off to the sacred war, when the populace rose, and murdered multitudes of them, intending not to leave one alive in the country. About 1500 of them got into the city of York, and thought to defend themselves in it. A furious siege obliged them to offer to ransom their lives with money. This being refused, they first killed their wives and children; and then retiring to the palace, burnt it on themselves. Between 1137 and 1200, there appeared nine or ten pretended messiahs; two in France; two in the north-west of Africa; one David of Moravia, who could render himself invisible at pleasure; one near the Euphrates, who had been cured of a leprosy; El David, and two others, in Persia. Most of these occasioned a great deal of mischief to those of their nation, in the places where they lived.

Nor in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries was their condition a whit better. In Egypt, Canaan, and Syria, the crusaders still harrassed and murdered them, till themselves were expelled from these places. The rise of the Mamlukes turned to their misery in Egypt. Provoked by their mad running after pretended messiahs, Califf Nasser left scarce any of them alive in his dominions of Mesopotamia, &c. In Persia, the Tartars murdered them in multitudes; in Spain, Ferdinand persecuted them furiously. About 1260, the populace of Arragon terribly harrassed them. Henry III. of Castile, and his son John, persecuted them; and, in the reign of the last, prodigious numbers were murdered. About 1349, the terrible massacre of them at Toledo forced many of them to murder themselves, or change their religion. After much barbarous murder of them, they were, in A. D. 1253, banished from France. In 1275 they were recalled; but in 1300 king Philip banished them, that he might enrich himself with their wealth. In 1312 they obtained re-admission for a great sum of money; but, in 1320 and 1330, the crusades of the fanatic shepherds who wasted the south of France, terribly massacred them, wherever they could find them; and, besides, 15,000 were murdered on another occasion. In 1358 they were finally banished from France; since which few of them have entered that country. After oft-repeated harassments from both kings and people, and six former banishments, founded on causes mostly pretended, king Edward, in 1291, for ever expelled them from England, to the number of 160,000. He permitted them to carry their effects and money with them over to France, while, in his own dominions, he confiscated all to his own use, so that most of them died for want. Notwithstanding their dissimulation and false swearing, we read little else concerning those in Germany, but of repeated murders and insurrections, and of terrible revenges hereof by the Christians. In Italy they had most respite; yet they underwent some persecution at Naples. Pope John XXII. pretending that they had affronted the holy cross, ordered their banishment from his territories; but recalled the edict for the sum of 100,000 florins. In this period, two false messiahs appeared in Spain; one Zechariah about 1258, and one Moses in 1290. In the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, their misery continued. In Turkey, we know of no persecution which they have suffered but what the common tyranny of the government and their own frauds have brought on them; only in Egypt the populace molest them; nor will the people of Athens and Salonæ in Greece allow them to settle among them. In Persia they have been terribly used, especially by the two Shah Abbas; from 1663 to 1666, the murder of them was so universal, that but a few escaped to Turkey.

In Portugal and Spain they have been miserably handled. About A. D. 1420, Vincent half converted 200,000 of them to Popery. The infernal inquisition was appointed, to render their conversion sincere and complete. About 1492, six or eight hundred thousand Jews were banished from Spain. Partly by drowning in their passage to Africa, and partly by hard usage, the most of these were cut off, and many of their carcasses lay in the fields, till the wild beasts devoured them. The African Mahometans shut their gates against the poor remains, and many were obliged to sell to the Moors their children for slaves, to obtain food for the support of their lives. In Spain and Portugal, thousands of Jews became Papists in appearance, and even monks and bishops, and yet continue hearty in their own religion, and educate their children in it from age to age. If we depend on Orobio's account, we may suppose there are 16,000 or 20,000 such even at present. About 1419, 16,000 Jews were forced to profess Popery at Naples. About 1472, they were barbarously massacred in the dominions of Venice. No where in Popish countries are they better used than in the Pope's own territory; for which, no doubt, their purse must be emptied. In Germany they have had plenty of hardship. In Saxony, and elsewhere, they have been loaded with taxes; they had been banished from Bohemia, Bavaria, Cologne, Noremberg, Augsburg, and Vienna; they have been terribly massacred in Moravia, and plundered in Bonn and Bamberg. Between 1520 and 1500, three false messiahs appeared in Europe, two of whom Charles V. emperor of Germany, burnt to death, and the other he imprisoned for life. About 1666, Zabbathai Tzevi, a pretended messiah, made a great noise in Syria, Palestine, and the countries about; but at last, to save his life, turned Mahometan at Constantinople. About 1682, Mordecai, a Jew of Germany, professed himself the Messiah, and had been punished in Italy, had he not escaped to Poland. Deut. xxviii. 15-68; xxix. 19-26; xxxi. 29. and xxxii. 18-35. Psal. xxi. 8-12. and lxix. 19-26. Isa. v. xxiv. lix. lxx. 1-16. and lxvi. 3-6, 24. Dan. ix. 26, 27. Zech. xi. Matt. viii. 11, 12; xxi. 41; xxii. 1-7; xxiii. and xxiv. Luke xxi. and xix. 41-44. Thus they have continued, scattered, contemned, persecuted, and enslaved, among almost all nations, not mixed with any in the common manner, but as a body distinct by themselves. While they are standing witnesses of the dreadful guilt of his murder, and of the truth of his divine predictions, they continue obstinate rejecters of Jesus, and, proof against all means; they improve their ancient ceremonies, and covenant-relation to God, as a means of hardening themselves in their unbelief. About A. D. 1650, three hundred rabbins, and a multitude of other Jews, assembled in the plain of Ageda in Hungary, and had a serious dispute, Whether the Messiah was come? and whether Jesus of Nazareth was he? Many seemed in a fair way to believe the truth; but the Popish doctors present, by their mad extolling of the papal power, the worship of the Virgin Mary, and other saints, prevented it, and strengthened their prejudice against the Christian faith. At present, their number is computed to be three millions, one million of which is found in the Turkish empire; 200,000 in Persia, China, India on the east and west of the Ganges, or Tartary; and

1,700,000 in the rest of Europe, and Africa, and in America. Except in Portugal and Spain, their present condition is generally tolerable. In Holland, Poland, and at Frankfort and Hamburg, they have plenty of liberty. They have often but in vain, attempted to obtain a naturalization in England or other nations, among whom they are scattered.

About A. D. 1866 or 2016, it is supposed by some that the offspring of Judah, together with the remains of the ten tribes, will, by the power of God, and to the great joy and advantage of the gentiles, be converted to the Christian faith. It seems, they will assist the opposers of Antichrist at Armageddon, and greatly rejoice in his ruin. At their settlement in Canaan, their country will be crowded with multitudes. The Turks and their allies will try to dispossess them, but shall perish in their attempt. Thenceforward the twelve Hebrew tribes shall, in the greatest harmony, peace, piety, and order, reside in their country till the end of the millennium. Dan. xii. Deut. xxxii. 36-43. Hos. iii. 5. Isa. lx. lxx. 17-25. xlix. 11-26. xi. 6-16, and xii. Psal. cxlix. Ezek. xxxvi. -xlvi. Zech. xvi. Rom. xi. Rev. xix. Such Hebrews as received the gospel in the apostolic age, retained a strange affection towards the Mosaic ceremonies. To cure them hereof, Paul wrote them an excellent epistle, wherein he evinces the dignity of Jesus Christ above angels, above Moses and Aaron; explains many of the leading types; and from the imperfection thereof, clearly concludes the necessity of their abolishment. To these he subjoins a number of exhortations to the Christian duties of bold approaching to God through Christ, careful attendance on gospel ordinances, patience under trouble, perseverance in holiness, vigorous exercise of faith in every circumstance, whose power he illustrates in a multitude of instances; and to activity, zeal, and reverence in holy courses, and to hospitality, contentment, submission to Christian teachers, alms-giving, &c. The Latin churches more lately had access to peruse this epistle than those of the Greeks, and so somewhat more lately embraced it, as canonical; but none, except the Arians, who hated it for its clear display of the divinity of Christ, ever denied the inspiration thereof. That this epistle was written by Paul is evident; the similarity of a variety of phrases to those in his other epistles; the similar order of doctrine and duty, the mention of the author's bonds in Italy, and of Timothy as his companion, father it on him. Peter assures us Paul wrote a letter to the Hebrews, in which some things relative to the destruction of their nation, and hard to be understood, were inserted, in which he probably had in view, Heb. x. 25-31. 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16. Peter directed two epistles to these Hebrews; and James, and John, and Jude, each of them another.

The saints are called the Israel of God; Israelites indeed; Jews inwardly; they, like the ancient Hebrews, are God's chosen and peculiar people, whom he wonderfully preserves and provides for; they have his law written in their hearts; do love him with their soul, and serve him under the inward influences of his grace. Gal. vi. 16. John i. 47. Rom. ii. 29.

HEBRON; called Arba, or Kirjath-arba, not because, four, viz. Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Rebekah, were buried in it, but because Arba, the noted giant, was king of it. It was built on a hill, it seems, not long after the flood, and seven years before Zoan in Egypt, Num. xiii. 22; and stood about twenty-two miles south of Jerusalem. Here Anak and his father and sons dwelt; but Caleb receiving it for his inheritance, expelled these giants, and it seems, called it Hebron after one of his sons. Josh. xiv. 13, 14. It was made a city of refuge, and given to the priests. Judg. xxi. 13. To its elders, David sent part of the spoil which he took from the Amalekites; and here he reigned seven years over Judah, and was crowned to be sole monarch of Israel. 2 Sam. ii. 11. and v. 3. Here Absalom first set up for king. 2 Sam. xv. Rehoboam repaired, and probably fortified this place. During the captivity the Edomites seized it, and made it their capital; but the Jews afterward recovered it, and probably Zecharias and Elisabeth were inhabitants of it. Luke i. 39. For many ages after Christ, both Jews and Christians had a great veneration for Hebron, but it is now little else than a heap of ruins.

HEDGE, for protecting fields, gardens, &c. 1 Chron. iv. 13. God's protecting providence, magistrates, government, or whatever defends from hurt and danger, is called a hedge. Job i. 10. Isa. v. 2. Ezek. xiii. 6. Troubles and hindrances are called hedges, as they stop our way, and prevent our doing and obtaining what we please. Lam. iii. 7. Job xix. 8. Hos. ii. 6. The way of the slothful is a hedge of thorns; he always apprehends great difficulties in the way of doing any good, and often he entangles himself in inextricable difficulties. Prov. xv. 19.

HEEL. As heels are the lowest part of the body, Christ's heel, bruised by Satan, is his humbled manhood, and his people who are subject to him. Gen. iii. 15. As heels are used in walking, the first motions of work, or the whole conversation, are called heels, Job xiii. 27. Psal. xlix. 5. See FEET. To have the heels bare, denotes shame, contempt, captivity, or distress. Jer. xiii. 22. To lift up the heel, or kick, is to render evil for good to a superior; as a beast when it strikes its master. So Judas acted in betraying our Lord. Psal. xli. 8. John xiii. 18. Men are taken by the heels in a snare when they suddenly fall into some calamity from which they cannot free themselves. Job xviii. 19.

HEINOUS; very wicked. Job xxxi. 11.

HEIR; one that succeeds to the inheritance of another after his death; and even enemies succeeding a people, driven out of their own land, are called their heirs. Jer. xlix. 2. Mic. i. 15. Christ is heir of all things; as God's Son, he hath an equal right to all things with his Father; as Mediator, he hath his elect, and all things, given into his hand, to dispose of for their good.

Matt. xxi. 38. Heb. i. 2. Saints are heirs of the promise; heirs of righteousness; heirs of salvation; heirs of the grace of life; heirs of the kingdom; heirs of the world; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; as united to Christ, and, by virtue of his death, they have the most free and honourable title to all the promises, blessings, creatures, and fulness of God. Heb. vi. 17. and xi. 7. and i. 14. 1 Pet. iii. 7. Jam. ii. 5. Rom. iv. 13. and viii. 17. But perhaps Abraham's being heir of the world, signifies his having Canaan divinely bequeathed to his seed. Rom. iv. 13. A hand-maid heir to her mistress, cannot be borne with, because of her intolerable pride. Prov. xxx. 25. To inherit is, (1.) To possess by right of heirship. Judg. xxi. 16. (2.) To take possession of and enjoy. Num. xxxii. 12. God inherits all nations, when he makes them to receive his Son, walk in him, and serve him. Psal. lxxxii. 8. Christ causes to inherit the desolate places, when he raiseth up a seed to himself in the gentile world, Isa. xlix. 8; his church's seed inherit the gentiles, when under the gospel, multitudes of gentiles are, by the labours of the apostles and others, converted to Christ. Isa. liv. 3. The saints inherit the earth, inherit promises, and all things; through Christ, as their spiritual Father, they have a free and honourable claim to, and possession of, whatever in time or eternity can tend to their real advantage. Matt. v. 5. Heb. vi. 12. Rev. xxi. 7. Wicked men inherit lies, folly, or wind, when they receive disappointments, the reward of their sins, and what is quite unsubstantial, noisy, and hurtful. Jer. xvi. 19. Prov. xiv. 18. and xi. 29.

INHERITANCE, or HERITAGE; what one possesses by heirship or other right; and when it is hastily gotten by unlawful means, it is attended with the curse of God on it, that often makes it quickly waste away. Prov. xx. 21. The Jews, the land of Canaan, and the saints in general, are God's inheritance, because of his special claim to, care of, and presence with them; and he freely gave Canaan to Abraham and his seed. Psal. lxxviii. 62; lxxix. 1. and xciv. 14. 1 Pet. v. 3. God himself, and his everlasting salvation, are the inheritance of his people, to which, through Jesus their Father, they have a free and honourable claim on which they live, and in which they delight and glory. Psal. xvi. 5. Jer. iii. 19. 1 Pet. i. 4. Christ's glorious character of Mediator, and the heathen, or gentiles, are his inheritance; he hath an honourable claim to his renown and happiness as God-man, and the gentiles are given into his hand to be called and converted by him. Heb. i. 4. Psal. ii. 8. The Jews took their inheritance in themselves, when they were forsaken by God, deprived of their civil and ecclesiastic enjoyments, and left to shift for themselves, under the load of their deserved punishment. Ezek. xxii. 16. The inheritance of the congregation of Jacob is either the Israelites, who were God's inheritance, or the law, which God gave them as a valuable possession. Deut. xxxiii. 4. God was the Levites' inheritance; they lived on his offerings. Deut. x. 9. God's testimonies are his people's inheritance; are of great valne, and they delight in and live on them. Psal. cxix. 111. Children are God's heritage and reward; he freely gives them to parents, and cheerfully ought they to devote them to God. Psal. cxxvii. 3. Fearful punishments and endless woe are the heritage of the wicked; it comes to them through their connexion with fallen Adam and the devil, as their fathers; and is allotted to them as their just portion by God the Father of spirits. Job xx. 29. and xxvii. 13.

HELBON; the same as Chalybon in Syria. It was famed for its excellent wines. Ezek. xxvii. 18. From hence the luxurious kings of Persia brought the wines used at their table. It was probably the same with Aleppo, which the Arabs call Alep or Halah, and which is now the most opulent city of all Syria, may, of all the Turkish dominions, Constantinople and Grand Cairo excepted. It was a seat of one of the Seljukian sultans, and often suffered in the Turkish wars; nevertheless, considering it as in the Ottoman empire, where trade is little encouraged, it is still remarkable for traffic. It was once a thoroughfare for the Indian goods brought up the Euphrates, and transmitted to Europe by the Mediterranean sea; but though that branch of business is mostly gone, it is still a thoroughfare for Persian goods; and here the English, Dutch, French, Italians, Arabs, Persians, and Indians, have their consuls of trade, and who are very civilly used by the Turks. The city is about three miles in circuit, has handsome buildings, and about 250,000 inhabitants. Here are one hundred and twenty Mahometan mosques, or places of public worship, and three colleges. In this city, and especially in its suburbs, you may find all the different parties of eastern Christians; of the Greeks about 16,000; of Armenians about 12,000; of Jacobites or Nestorians 10,000; of Maronites 1200. Besides, the Popish Jesuits, Capuchins, and Carmelites have each of them a church.

HELL. The word SHEOL, or HADES, sometimes signifies the state of the dead or the grave: so David prays that his enemies might quickly go down to it. Psal. lv. 15. Jonah reckoning himself as good as dead and buried, calls the whale's belly sheol, or hell. Jon. ii. 2. See Gen. xxxvii. 35. and xlii. 38. Hell ordinarily signifies the place or state of misery in which wicked men are tormented with the devil and his angels. 2 Pet. ii. 4. Rev. i. 11. and vi. 8. Though this state and place be unseen to us in our present life, yet it is fully open to the eye of God. Job xi. 8. Prov. xv. 11. To represent its dreadful nature, it is held out to us as a prison, a pit, a lake of fire and brimstone, as darkness, &c. There is no reason to doubt of the eternity of its torments: it is represented as a fire that cannot be quenched, and whose smoke ascends up for ever and ever. No stronger word is used to express the duration of the heavenly felicity than to represent the duration of the torments of hell. Matt. xxv. 46. Nor do such as fondly doubt of the eternity of hell torments, and of the proportion between temporary sinning and eternal punishment, seem to attend to the infinite excellency of God, against whom sin is committed. It must then be far wiser to flee from it, and the curse that binds over to it, to Jesus the almighty Saviour, than curiously to dispute where it is; whether in the centre of the earth, in the sun, &c. Dreadful and tormenting troubles are likened to hell. 2 Sam. xxii. 6. Psal. cxvi. 3. At the last day, death and hell give up their dead; the grave the dead bodies, and hell the damned souls, that were in them, in order that both may be judged in a united state, Rev. xx. 13; and are cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, when all misery is connected and carried to the utmost degree. Rev. xx. 14.

HELM. See RUDDER.

HELMET; a kind of metal cap for protecting the head of a warrior. 1 Sam. xvii. 5. The salvation of his people is God's helmet; the deliverance he intends and works for them will appear conspicuous, as if on his head, and he will have the glory of it. Isa. lix. 17. Eternal salvation, and the hope of it, are the saints' helmet; they defend and render them bold and courageous in their spiritual warfare. Eph. vi. 17. 1 Thess. v. 8.

HELP; to assist, support, deliver. Exod. ii. 17. 1 Sam. xvii. 12. God is the help and helper of his people; he assists them in every duty, supports them under every burden, and keeps or frees them from every danger. Psal. xli. 1. and liv. 4. The help of the elect is laid on Christ the mighty One; the purchase and dispensation of their whole salvation are committed to his care. Psal. lxxxix. 10. Ministers are helpers of the truth; as they publish it, stand by and defend it when opposed, and in their holy walk exemplify it unto others; 3 John 8; they are helpers of the saints; they instruct and encourage them under their burdens of labour and trouble, and in their work of faith and love. 2 Cor. i. 24. Acts xviii. 27. Deacons are helpers, or helpers; they assist other church-officers in taking care of the poor, and in serving of tables. 1 Cor. xli. 28. Wives are called a help-meet for men; they assist and comfort them in the business of the family. Gen. ii. 18. Is not my help in me? and is wisdom quite driven from me? What, though I cannot uphold or deliver myself, is my sense or wisdom therefore gone from me. Job vi. 13.

HEMAN, with Zimri, Ethan, Calcol, and Darda, or Dara, were the sons of Zerah, the son of Judah, and were the sons of Mahol; perhaps the one was their grandfather, and the other their father; or Zerah and Mahol may be different names of the same person. They were famous for wisdom. 1 Chron. ii. 6. 1 Kings iv. 31. (2.) Heman, the son of Joel, and grandson of Simeon, and a chief singer in the reign of King David. He had fourteen sons, Bukiah, Mattaniah, Uzziel, Shebuel, or Shubael, Jerimoth, Hananiah, Hanani, Eliathah, Giddalti, Romamtiezer, Joshebekashah, Mallotthi, Hothir, and Mahazioth; their families constituted fourteen classes of the sacred musicians. 1 Chron. vi. 33; xv. 17. and xxv. Which of these two Hemans, or if either of them, was the composer of Psalm lxxxviii, we know not.

HEN. Christ resembles a hen gathering her chickens. How earnestly and tenderly he invites sinners to himself! how readily he receives them! and how fully he protects, provides for, and comforts them. Matt. xxiii. 27.

HEMLOCK; a poisonous herb, of which there are two kinds; it is possible the cicuta of the ancients which procured death so hastily, was different from our hemlock, which effects it more slowly, rendering persons delirious or convulsive. Judgment grows up as hemlock, and is turned into hemlock; when the execution thereof is perverted to the hurt and destruction of men. Hos. x. 4. Amos vi. 12.

HEPH'ZI-BAH was the name of Hezekiah's queen; and given to the church to signify that the Lord delighted in her. Isa. lxii. 4.

HERALD; one that publishes the order of a king. Dan. iii. 4.

HERB; a vegetable; as coleworts, cabbage, and multitudes of others. Many herbs are useful in human food; others are food for cattle; others good for medicine; and others poisonous. Rom. xiv. 2. Gen. i. 29. Men are likened to herbs, to denote their flourishing prosperity, or their sudden distress and ruin. 2 Kings xix. 25. Isa. lxvi. 14. Psal. xxxvii. 2. The Hebrews ate the paschal lamb with bitter herbs, to represent the bitterness of Christ's sufferings, and the grief and sorrow for sin with which we are to receive him. Exod. xii. 8.

HERD. See FLOCK.

HERESY. This word signifies a sect, or choice; but is generally used to signify some fundamental error adhered to with obstinacy. Thus we say the heresy of the Arians, Pelagians, &c. Heresies are works of the flesh, that exclude men from the kingdom of God. Gal. v. 20. Men bring in damnable heresies, when they deny the Lord that bought them. 2 Pet. ii. 1. Not in themselves, but in respect of the wise purpose of God, heresies are necessary in the church, that his people may manifest their sincerity in cleaving to the truth. 1 Cor. xi. 19. From the very beginning of the Christian church there were heresies; some denied the divinity, incarnation, or Messiahship of Christ: against these the apostle John directs his gospel, and much of his first epistle. Some pretended that men's obedience to the moral or ceremonial law was the ground of their justification before God; others as Hymeneus and Philetus, pretended, that the dead rise not, or that the resurrection of the dead was only of a spiritual kind and was past: against these the apostle Paul often inveighs, particularly in his epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, and to Timothy. Others pretended that faith without good works was sufficient: against these the apostle James warmly disputes. Akin, to this, it seems, was the heresy of the Nicolaitans, and of Jezebel, which, it appears, tended to the encouragement of fleshly lusts. Rev. ii.

HERETIC; one who holds some fundamental error: he is to be rejected and cast out of the church, if he remain obstinate, after a first and second admonition; and he is self-condemned, as he publishes what is plainly wicked and contrary to his own profession. Tit. iii. 10. Heretics are the false prophets and teachers which Christ and his apostles foretold should come; who forsake the faith themselves, and seduce others into error. 2 Pet. i. 1. and iii. 6. Matt. xv. 24.

HERITAGE. See HEIR.

HERMON; a mountain on the north-east of the promised land beyond Jordan, a little southward of Lebanon; the Sidonians called it Sirion, and the Amorites Shenir. Deut. iii. 9, 10. Sihon was one of the tops of it, Deut. iv. 48; which seems to have been also called Zion. Psal. cxxxiii. 3. Mount Hermon was the north border of the kingdom of Og, as Arnon was the south border of the kingdom of Sihon. Deut. ii. 36. and iv. 48. There was, it seems, a temple on its top to the idol Baal. The dew that falls on it is beautiful and fine, Psal. cxxxiii. 3; in a summer night it will wet a man to the skin, and yet he is in no danger of sleeping all night in the open field. The snow lies on it the most part of the summer, and was thence carried to Tyre, that people might drink their wine in fresco.

HEROD THE GREAT, the son of Antipater and Cypros, and brother of Phasael, Joseph, and Pheroras, and of a sister called Salome. His father is by some said to have been a Jew; by others an Idumean turned Jew; others will have him to have been a heathen; guardian of Apollo's temple at Askelon, and taken prisoner by the Idumean scouts, and afterwards a Jewish proselyte. Herod was born about seventy years before our Saviour. When he was fifteen, or perhaps twenty-five years of age, his father, with Hyrcanus the high-priest's consent, gave him the government of Galilee. With great prudence and valour he cleared the country of the thievish banditti, who swarmed in it, and apprehended Hezekiah their captain. Hereby he procured the esteem of Sextus governor of Syria; but the Jews, jealous of Antipater's authority, and his son's, instigated Hyrcanus the high-priest to cite Herod to appear before their sanhedrim to answer for his conduct. Herod came attended with his chosen troops. His judges were so terrified that none of them durst speak, except Sameas, who laid the blame of Herod's misconduct on Hyrcanus and the judges, for permitting him to assume too much power. Hyrcanus, however, observing that the judges, though afraid to speak, were disposed to condemn him, deferred bringing the matter to a sentence that day, and advised Herod to make his escape in the night. He retired to Sextus governor of Syria, and was by him intrusted with the government of Hollow Syria. To revenge his late affront, he marched an army to besiege Jerusalem; but his father and brother Phasael prevented him, A. M. 3808, when Mark Antony was at Daphne, near Antioch in Syria, a hundred principal men of the Jews brought accusations against Herod and his brother Phasael; but Hyrcanus the high-priest, who had promised Herod Mariamne his grand-child in marriage, being asked his mind, represented the two brothers as better qualified to govern the Jewish state than their opposers. Hereupon Antony made Herod and his brother tetrarchs, and had killed fifteen of their principal adversaries, had not Herod petitioned for their life. Not long after, Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, invited the Parthians to his assistance, and obliged Herod to flee the country. He had not been long at Rome, when Antony and Augustus got the synod to declare him king of Judea, and Antigonus an enemy to the Romans. Returning to Judea, and assisted by Sosius the Roman deputy in Syria, he, after about three years' war, took Jerusalem, and acted as king. He was disqualified to hold the double office of high-priest and king, as the Maccabees had for some ages done: he therefore made Ananel priest; but quickly turned him out to make way for Aristobulus, the brother of his wife Mariamne, to whom the high-priesthood more rightly belonged; but the Jews loving him too well, Herod, about a year after, caused drown him in a bath. After the ruin of Antony, Herod was obliged to implore the clemency of Augustus. He met the Emperor at Rhodes, and frankly told him he had done all he could for Antony his benefactor, and was now ready to do the same to him, if he allowed him his favour, and permitted him to retain his kingdom. Charmed with his open frankness Augustus granted him his desire. His kingdom was now pretty quiet, but he was plagued with family disorders. He passionately loved Mariamne, and she, disgusted with the murder of her brother, as heartily hated him. His mother and sister persuaded him in his fury to murder Mariamne. He had scarce done it, when he was almost killed with grief. Recovering he ordered Mariamne's mother to be killed, as she had too easily credited the report spread of his death. To divert his tormented mind, he applied himself to building, and to instituting public sports. To ingratiate himself with the Jews, he rebuilt their temple, and rendered it exceeding stately and glorious. He sent his two sons by Mariamne, Aristobulus and Alexander, to be educated at Rome. Soon after their return, he married them, Aristobulus to Bernice, the daughter of Salome his sister, and Alexander to Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. Herod's preference of Antipater, whose mother was but of mean birth, exasperated both his sons against him. By means of Augustus, and afterward of Archelaus of Cappadocia, a reconciliation was twice effected between him and them; but Salome and Antipater never rested till they got him to murder them. Having got rid of his brothers, Antipater next resolved to rid himself of his father. To hide his hand in the conspiracy, he retired to Rome; but the plot being discovered, he was imprisoned upon his return, and Augustus informed of his treachery. Herod was in a languishing way when the wise men informed him that the Messiah was born: he was exceedingly troubled, and the principal Jews, afraid of new wars, were troubled along with him. He, finding out the place of his birth, resolved to murder him, while but an infant; and under pretence of a design to worship him, desired the wise men to bring him back word where and how he might know him. An angel ordered the wise men to go home without returning to Herod. Provoked with this disappointment, he ordered his soldiers to go murder every child about Bethlehem, or near it, under two years old, that he might make sure of murdering the Messiah among them. Some young men hearing that Herod was dead, pulled down the golden eagle, which he, in honour of the Romans, had erected over the principal portal of the temple; for this he ordered forty to be burnt alive. His distemper still increased; his hunger was insatiable; his bowels were ulcerated; his legs swelled; his secret parts rotted, and bred worms; his whole body was afflicted with an intolerable itch. To prevent the Jews rejoicing at his death, he convened all the great men of the kingdom, and shut them up in the circus at Jericho, where he then was, and with tears, constrained his sister Salome and Alexas to see them put to death that moment he should expire; they no doubt promised, but did not execute this horrid device. In his agony, Herod attempted to plunge a knife into his own belly; but Achiab his cousin prevented him. The outcry on this occasion made the family believe he was dead. In his prison, Antipater heard of it, and begged his keepers to allow him to escape. They informed his father, who ordered him to be immediately killed, about A. M. 4002 or 4012. In five days after Herod died, having lived about seventy, and reigned about thirty-seven years. He had eight or ten wives, and fifteen children. He left his kingdom to Archelaus the worst; Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, and Batanea to Philip; and Galilee and Perea to Herod Antipas. Matt. ii. Luke iii. 1.

2. HEROD ANTIPAS had the kingdom of Judea left him in his father's first will, but he altered it, and only gave him the tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea. In this Augustus the Roman emperor confirmed him. With great care and labour he adorned and fortified the principal places of his dominions. He drew upon himself an unfortunate war with the Arabs, by divorcing the daughter of Aretas their king, that he might espouse Herodias, the wife of Philip his brother, who still lived. For this incestuous marriage John Baptist reproved him. On that account he imprisoned the Baptist, and would have killed him, had he not feared an insurrection of the people in his favour. One day, as Herod and his lords celebrated the festival of his birth, Salome, the daughter of Herodias, so pleased Herod with the pretty airs of her dancing, that he swore he would give her any thing she asked.

Instructed by her spiteful mother, she asked the head of John Baptist. To shew regard to his oath, and to the lords that feasted with him, Herod, with great reluctance, ordered John to be beheaded in the prison, and his head delivered to Salome in a charger. Pilate having sent our Saviour to Herod, he ridiculed him, dressed him up as a mock-king, and returned him to Pilate. About A. D. 30, Herodias growing jealous of her brother Agrippa, who was now deputy king of Judea, instigated her husband to solicit that dignity at Rome. Informed hereof, Herod Agrippa accused Herod of Galilee to the emperor, as an accomplice in Sejanus's conspiracy against Tiberius, and of correspondence with the Parthians, and as evidence, alleged that Herod had in his arsenal arms for 70,000 men. Herod could not refuse the number of arms, and so was instantly banished to Lyons in France, where he and Herodias died in exile, miserable enough; and it is said, the pretty dancer Salome, falling through the ice, had her head separated from her body. Matt. xiv. Mark vi. Luke xxiii. 4.

3. HEROD AGRIPPA, the son of Aristobulus, grandson of Herod the Great, and brother of Herodias. His grandfather sent him early to Rome to make his court to Tiberius. Herod quickly won the affection of the famed Drusus, at whose death he was obliged to leave Rome, quite plunged in debt. When he returned, Tiberius ordered him to pay his debt, and be gone. Antonio the empress lent him money to pay his creditors; and after that he recovered the favour of Tiberius. Soon after, Tiberius hearing that Herod wished him dead, that Caligula might reign, threw him into prison. But when Caligula came to be emperor, he liberated Herod, gave him a chain of gold, and a royal diadem, appointing him king of Batanea and Trachonitis, and afterwards of Abilene. When Caligula attempted to erect his own statue for adoration in the Jewish temple, and the Jews refused to admit it, Herod was in no small danger betwixt the two, but by a long letter he prevailed on the emperor to desist. Herod being at Rome when Claudius was made emperor by the army, contributed not a little to establish his dignity. To reward his services, Claudius made him deputy-king of all Judea and Chalcis. Returning home, he governed his dominions much to the satisfaction of his people. About A. D. 44, or perhaps 49, he caused murder JAMES, the son of Zebedee. Observing the Jews pleased with this, he apprehended Peter, intending to murder him also for their further gratification; but Providence defeated his designs. After the passover-feast, he repaired to Cesarea, to celebrate some games in honour of Claudius. Thither the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, who had offended him, after making Blastus his chamberlain their friend, sent their deputies to beg his favour. As he gave audience to the deputies, he appeared dressed in a robe tissue with silver, to which the rising sun shining on it gave a marvellous lustre. As he spoke to the Phœnician deputies, some of his parasites cried out, It is the voice of a god, not of a man. He received the impious flattery with pleasure. To punish him, an angel smote him directly with a most tormenting disease in his bowels, and he was eaten up of vermin, after he had reigned seven or ten years, and been the father of Agrippa, Bernice, Drusilla, and Mariamne. Acts xii. HE-RO'DI-ANS. See SECT.

HERONS are of the same general kind with the crane, bittern, stork, &c.: they have a hanging crest of black feathers; their beaks and legs are long; their under and upper chaps are alike in strength, and there runs a furrow from their nostrils; they have four long connected toes on each foot. Herons are tall, and very furious; though some of them are tamed in Egypt. Some reckon nineteen kinds of herons; but the three principal are the criel, or dwarf heron, the blue heron, and the bitourn. They frequent watery places, and feed on eels, and other fish, and are said to be very lustful. They were unclean under the law; and perhaps figured out men soon angry, lustful, and high minded. Lev. xi. 19. Deut. xiv. 18.

HESHBON; the capital city of the kingdom of Sihon, and about twenty miles eastward of Jordan. From thence his conquering troops, like fire, entered the territories of Moab. After the overthrow of Sihon, it was first given to the Reubenites; and it, or another of the same name, was given to the Gadites, and was one of the cities of the Levites. Numb. xxi. 26, 27. and xxxii. 37. Josh. xiii. 17. and xxi. 37. After the death of Ahab, the Moabites seized on it. It was reduced to an almost desolation by the Assyrians and Chaldeans; but it continued a place of some note for some ages after Christ. Its famous fish-pool is said to have been about three hundred paces broad, and, it seems, was hard by the gate called Bath-rabbim, on account of the multitudes that passed by it. Isa. xv. 4. Jer. xlviii. 45. Sol. Song vii. 4.

HEW; to cut wood or stone. Such as hewed wood, and drew water, for the sanctuary, had a mean office; but it was connected with the happiness of easy attendance on the public worship of God. Josh. ix. 21, 27. Men's natural birth or descent is likened to hewing them out of a rock, and digging them out of a pit; both represent to us our hardness and pollution. Isa. li. 1. Men are hewed by the prophets, and slain by the words of God's mouth, when they are threatened with fearful judgments, Hos. vi. 5; and they are hewed by God's axe, when they are cut off and ruined by his strokes of wrath. Matt. iii. 10.

HEZ-E-KI'AH was born when his father Ahaz was about eleven years of age, and so was twenty-five at his father's death, in the thirty-sixth year of his age. He succeeded him A. M. 3278. His idolatrous father having left the nation plunged into a kind of heathenism, Hezekiah, with great vigour, applied himself to reform it. In the first month of the first year of his reign, he caused the principal doors of the temple to be opened and repaired; he ordered the priests and Levites to purify it, and prepare it for sacrifice. This done, he and his princes solemnized the dedication with a multitude of offerings. As the temple could not be purified, or the priests cleansed, to observe the passover in the first month, they agreed to observe it in the second. Hezekiah invited such of the ten tribes as remained in their country to join with him therein. Some ridiculed his pious invitation, and others complied with it. This passover was observed with more solemnity than it had been for many ages before. They continued the feast of unleavened bread fourteen days instead of seven; many, indeed, were not duly prepared; but Hezekiah prayed for forgiveness of their rashness in approaching to God. Now, and afterward, Hezekiah and his people broke down the idolatrous altars and images in his own dominions, and in those of Hoshea, who, being better than his predecessors, took no offence at his subjects returning to the Lord. Hezekiah also settled proper methods to procure for the priests and Levites their due maintenance. Goniah and Shimei, two brothers, with ten subordinate officers of the tribe of Levi, and Koreh, with six under him, were appointed to superintend the whole.

Encouraging himself in the Lord, Hezekiah shook off the Assyrian yoke, which his father had wickedly taken on himself, and refused to pay them the accustomed tribute; he invaded the country of the Philistines, who had lately ravaged Judea, and reduced them under his yoke; he fortified Jerusalem, and filled his magazines with armour. In the fourteenth year of his reign, Sennacherib king of Assyria invaded his kingdom, and took most of his fenced cities. Hezekiah, after fortifying Jerusalem, and bringing the south stream of Gihon into the city, finding that the king of Ethiopia and Egypt did not timeously assist him, begged conditions of peace from the Assyrian. He demanded three hundred talents of silver and thirty of gold, in all about £351,000 sterling, as the condition of his leaving the country. To raise this sum, Hezekiah was obliged to exhaust his treasures, and pull off the golden plates which he had just before put on the doors of the temple. No sooner had Sennacherib received the money, the loss of which he saw disqualified him for war, than he sent three of his principal officers from Lachish, to demand Hezekiah's immediate surrender of his capital. Hezekiah sent Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah, to converse with them without the city. Rabshakeh, the principal Assyrian messenger, magnified the power of his master, as if neither God nor man could deliver out of his hand: he cried to the Hebrews on the wall, that, if they would not surrender themselves, he would quickly force them to live on their excrements in the terrible siege; and that, if they surrendered themselves quickly, he would place them in a fine country as agreeable as their own. Shocked with these blasphemies, Hezekiah's messengers gave no reply, but rent their clothes, and reported the whole to their master. He begged Isaiah the prophet to intercede with God in behalf of the city, and was assured that the Assyrian army should quickly be ruined, and their king flee home in a precipitate manner, and there perish with the sword. When Sennacherib departed from Lachish to give battle to Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, who came to assist Hezekiah, he sent Hezekiah a most blasphemous and insulting letter. This Hezekiah spread before the Lord in the court of the temple, and begged the Lord would deliver him from this insolent enemy. The Lord, by Isaiah, assured him that he had heard, and would quickly answer his prayer; that Sennacherib should never besiege Jerusalem, nor so much as shoot an arrow against it. That very night the whole Assyrian army was almost ruined by an angel. While Sennacherib was ravaging his kingdom, Hezekiah fell dangerously bad of an ulcer. God, by the prophet Isaiah, ordered him to lay his account with death, and put his affairs into order. Hezekiah observing that he had no child to be the Messiah's progenitor, or govern the broken state of his kingdom, and perhaps being in no proper frame for dying, wept sore, and begged the Lord would not cut him off in the midst of his days, as had often happened with the idolatrous kings. God, by Isaiah, assured him that his prayers were heard; that in three days, he should be able to walk to the temple, and should live fifteen years more; and meanwhile ordered him to apply a lump of dry figs to the boil, in order to his miraculous recovery; and told him, the city should not be delivered into the hand of the Assyrians. For a sign of the certainty of these events, the sun, at Hezekiah's choice, went back ten degrees on the sun-dial of king Ahaz. After Hezekiah's recovery, he composed a hymn of thanksgiving, and a narrative of his temper of mind in his trouble. He, however, grew proud of the miracles wrought in his favour, and was not duly thankful to God. When Merodach Baladan the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent messengers to congratulate his recovery, and get information concerning the ruin of the Assyrian host, and the retrograde motion of the sun, and perhaps to solicit an alliance against the weakened Assyrian empire; Hezekiah vainly shewed them every thing valuable and rare in his treasures. His pride brought wrath from the Lord on himself and his subjects. God, by Isaiah, assured him, that his wealth should be carried to Babylon, and his offspring serve there as eunuchs in the palace. Hezekiah confessed the threatening was just, but wished that peace and truth might continue all his time. Some of his servants copied out several of Solomon's proverbs, and joined them to the rest. After he had lived fifty-four years, and reigned twenty-nine, he died, and was succeeded by Manasseh his son. 2 Chron. xxxi—xxxii. 2 Kings xviii—xx. Isa. xxxvi—xxxix. Prov. xxv. 1.

HID-DE'KEL, called Tigris, from its swift motion, or the multitudes of tygers on its banks, and by the Arabs, Diglat, a noted river that rises in the mountains of Armenia, runs southward between Assyria, or Kurdistan, on the east, and Mesopotamia on the west; and afterward, meeting with the Euphrates, runs along with it a considerable way, after which they divided into the two streams of Gihon and Pison: but perhaps they now run into the sea by four different channels. It is said to go to the eastward or fore-side of Assyria; i. e. that which was next to Moes. Gen. ii. 14. On the banks of this river, the famed cities of Nineveh, Ctesiphon, and Seleucia, stood; and on the ruins of the latter now stands Bagdat. On the banks of Hiddekel, Daniel had one of his visions. Dan. x. 4.

HIDE; (1.) to cover; to keep secret; so God hides his commandments, when he

shews not their meaning. Psal. cxix. 19. To hide his righteousness in our heart, is sinfully to neglect the due publishing and declaring of it. Psal. xl. 10. (2.) To lay up; so saints hide God's word in their heart, when they lay it up in their memories, judgments, consciences, and affections, that it may influence and regulate their whole exercise in heart and life. Psal. cxix. 11. (3.) To protect. God hides his people in his pavilion, in the secret of his presence, and under the shadow of his wings; and is their hiding-place, when, in the exercise of his perfections, he gives them the most safe and refreshing protection from danger and hurt. Psal. xxvii. 5. and xxxii. 7. Jesus Christ is a hiding-place; under the covert of his righteousness are we secured from the vengeance of God; and by his providence, power, and love, are we secured from the danger of sin, Satan, and the world. Isa. xxxii. 2. God hides himself; hides his face, when he forbears kindly to shew his glory and favour, in his word, ordinances, and providence. Psal. lxxxix. 46. His hiding his face from sin, imports his complete forgiveness of it. Psal. li. 9. He hides pride from men, when he disappoints them, and bereaves them of what they are disposed to boast of. Job xxxiii. 17. God hides men's afflictions in his heart, when, amidst multiplied favours, he hath a secret and fixed purpose to afflict them. Job x. 13. Wicked men think God hides his face; i. e. does not observe nor regard what they do. Psal. x. 11. Men hide hatred by lying lips, when they conceal it under high pretences to kindness and love. Prov. x. 18. Men's hiding of themselves, imports their fleeing to some place for protection and secrecy, Rev. vi. 16; or making a small appearance, Prov. xxvii. 12; or refusing to shew kindness. Isa. lviii. 7. Their hiding of sin imports the denial, excusing, and extenuating of it. Psal. xxxii. 5. Prov. xxviii. 13. Men's understanding is hid; when they need to use it, it cannot be found. Isa. xxix. 14. Whatever is secret, hard to be known or found, is called hid or hidden; saints are God's hidden ones; their state and happy privileges are unknown to the world, and they are protected of God. Psal. lxxxiii. 3. The gospel and Christ are a hidden treasure, and hidden wisdom, unknown to natural men. Matt. xiii. 44. 1 Cor. ii. 7.

HI-ER-A'PO-LIS; a place near Colosse, and near to which was a large opening of the earth, whence issued a deadly steam. The Gospel was preached here very early, Col. iv. 13; but not long after, the city was swallowed up of an earthquake.

HIG-GA-I'ON signifies meditation, and imports that what is said deserves to be carefully and frequently thought upon. Psal. ix. 16.

HIGH, relates to stature, station, conceit, or carriage. God is high; his nature is infinitely excellent; he has an unlimited dominion over all, and in the high heavens he manifests his peculiar presence. Psal. xcvi. 9. His righteousness and right hand are very high; his equity, his Son's righteousness, and his almighty power, are unspeakably excellent, and are gloriously displayed. Psal. lxxi. 19. and lxxxix. 18. Men are high; in stature, 1 Chron. xi. 22; in station, when they are nobly descended, and are placed in offices of power and authority, Job xxi. 22. Psal. lxii. 9; and when they think highly of themselves, or behave proudly. Psal. ci. 5. Rom. xi. 20. Things above our station, and capacity of knowing, are called high. Psal. cxxxi. and cxxxix. 6. Israel went out of Egypt with a high hand, in a most public and solemn manner, and under the special and powerful protection of God. Exod. xiv. 8. High, when referred to day, or time, signifies full. Rom. xiii. 11. The heavens are called heights. Psal. cxlviii. 1. Mountains are called the heights, or highest part of the dust, Jer. xlix. 16. Prov. vii. 26; or the chief part of the dust may signify metals, or man. Whatever is above is called height. Rom. viii. 39.

The heathens often worshipped their idols in high places, or on tops of hills, that they might be as near heaven as they could. God commanded the Hebrews to destroy all the high places of the Canaanites. Num. xxxiii. 52. But during the separation of the ark and tabernacle, in the days of Samuel, Saul, and David, he tolerated the worship of himself in high places. 2 Chron. i. 8. 1 Sam. ix. 19. The erection of the temple excluded all sacrificial worship elsewhere, except on very extraordinary occasions. Solomon began to restore idolatry in high places; Jeroboam also promoted it, 1 Kings xi. 7. and xii. 30, 32; nor were they ever abolished in Israel. The wicked kings of Judah encouraged them; nor did any of the godly ones, except Hezekiah and Josiah, sufficiently discountenance them. It seems, in Ezekiel's time, there was scarcely a street without a high place. Ezek. xvi. 24. The men of Judah, however, sometimes worshipped only the true God in their high places. It is probable, the proseuche, or places for prayer, built in the form of the court of the temple, and surrounded with a grove, were much of the same kind as the high places anciently used in sacrifice.

HIN; a liquid measure for oil or wine, &c. It was the sixth part of an ephah, or about two hundred and ninety one solid inches, which is nearly equal to three pints of our measure. Exod. xxix. 40.

HIND. See DEER.

HIN'NOM. See TOPHET.

HIR'AH. See JUDAH.

HIRAM, or HU'RAM. (1.) A king of Tyre, son of Abibal. When David came to the Hebrew throne, Hiram sent messengers to congratulate him; and sent him cedar-trees, and artificers, to build him a palace. 2 Sam. v. 11, 12. He, or his son of the same name, congratulated Solomon on his accession to the crown. He furnished him with timber, stone, and artificers, for his intended buildings, viz. the temple, his own palace, &c.; and lent him one hundred and twenty talents of gold, or £1,657,000 sterling. He assisted him in establishing his trade to Ophir. He was displeased with the twenty cities of Galilee, which Solomon gave him. 1 Kings v. ix. 2 Chron. viii. 18. Darius and Menander, two heathen historians, say, that Hiram and Solomon corresponded by letters, and tried to puzzle one another with hard questions. (2.) A famed artificer: his father is called a Tyrian, perhaps merely because he dwelt for some time at Tyre; but he might be of the tribe of Naphtali; and his mother was a widow of Naphtali, and a daughter of Dan, a native of the city of Dan, or descended of the tribe of Dan. He is represented as the father of king Hiram and Solomon; either because he was the director in their curious works; or perhaps Abi or Ab, which signifies father, was his surname. He was a most skilful artificer, in designing and executing the most curious workmanship of brass, copper, or other metal. He made the brazen pillars, sea, lavers, and basons, &c. of the temple. 1 Kings vii. 18, &c. 2 Chron. ii. 13, 14.

HIRE, to procure service for wages. Isa. xlii. 6. The Israelites hired among the nations; gave presents to the Assyrians to let them alone, and not cut them off. Hos. viii. 10. See SERVANT.

HISS. To hiss one out of his place, is to drive him away with a shout of contempt and insult. Job xxvii. 23. Babylon and Jerusalem were a hissing, when made the object of the most contemptuous sneers in the midst of their distress and ruin. Jer. li. 37. and xix. 8. God's hissing, or whistling, for the Assyrians and Egyptians, imports his calling and bringing them together to invade the nations, as easily as men in some places gather bees with the sound of a whistle. Isa. v. 26. and vii. 18. His hissing for the scattered Jews, imports his easy and powerful bringing them back in companies from their Chaldean captivity, and present dispersion. Zech. x. 8.

HITHER, to this place. Gen. xxiv. 6. HITHERTO; (1.) Until this time. Exod. vii. 16. (2.) To this degree of honour and happiness. 1 Chron. xvii. 16. (3.) To this point of boundary; thus far. Job xxxviii. 11.

HITTITES; the offspring of Heth, the second son of Canaan. They dwelt in the south part of the promised land, near Hebron; and from Ephron, one of them, Abraham, bought his cave of Machpelah. Gen. xxiii. In the days of Joshua, it seems part of them fled southward, and dwelt in the country, where the Canaanite of Beth-el built Luz. Judg. i. 26. Two of David's mighty men were Hittites, viz. Uriah, and Ahimelech. 2 Sam. xi. 6. 1 Sam. xxv. 6. Such of the Hittites as remained, Solomon laid under tribute; but he afterwards married some of their idolatrous women. 2 Kings viii. 7. 1 Kings xi. 1. It seems that about A. M. 3100, the Hittites either in Arabia or Canaan, had kings of their own. 2 Kings vii. 6.

HIVITES; a tribe of the Canaanites, who seem to have been the same with the Avims, whom the Philistines expelled. Driven from the south-west of Canaan, part of them appear to have settled about Avim, Gibeon, and Shechem, whose inhabitants are called Hivites. Josh. ix. 11, 19. and xviii. 23. Gen. xxxiv. 2. Another part of them settled near mount Hermon. Josh. xi. 3. It is probable that a colony of those under Kedem, or Kadmus, and his wife Hermione, about the time of David, removed northward to Bœotia; and the name Hivim, signifying serpents, gave rise to the fable of his companions being turned into serpents, or the people being produced from serpents' teeth.

HOARY; whitish; as the head of an old man. Job xxxviii. 29. and xli. 22. Lev. xix. 32.

HOBAB, the son of Jethro, and brother-in-law to Moses. As the Hebrews were on the point of leaving Mount Sinai, Hobab came to visit Moses, and, at his entreaty, went along with Israel. Num. x. 29. Some think that the Kenites were his descendants.

HOLD. (1.) To keep fast. Gen. xxi. 18. (2.) To restrain. Psal. xxxii. 9. Rev. vii. 1. God's not holding men guiltless, is to account them, and deal with them, as guilty. Exod. xx. 7. He holds his people by their right hand; keeps, strengthens, and comforts them under their weakness. Psal. lxxiii. 23. To take hold of God, and his covenant, is to embrace him as given in the gospel; and by faith to plead his promises and relations. Isa. lxiv. 7. and lvi. 4. Christians hold forth the word of life; they, by practising it in their lives, give light and instruction to others. Phil. ii. 16. Not holding of Christ, the head, is neglecting to draw gracious influence from him, and to yield due subjection to him; and admitting saints and angels as mediators in his stead. Col. ii. 18. See FOOT.

HOLY. (1.) Free from and opposite to sin. God is the Holy One of Israel; he is infinitely free from, and opposite to, every thing sinful. He only is holy; he alone is infinitely and independently holy, and is the author of all holiness that is to be found among angels and men. Lev. xix. 2. Isa. i. 4. 1 Sam. ii. 2. Christ is God's Holy One, and Holy Child; infinitely holy as God, perfectly pure as man. Psal. xvi. 10. and lxxxix. 19. But, in the last text, some think Samuel is meant, to whom God revealed his intention of setting up David. Good angels and saints are holy; they are like God in their nature, haters of sin, and set apart by God and themselves to his service. Rev. xviii. 20. The third person of the God-head is called holy, because he is holy in nature, and gives holiness to men. Acts x. 38. Preserve my soul for I am holy; i. e. innocent of what is laid to my charge; favoured of God, and benevolent to men. Psal. lxxxvi. 2. (2.) Set apart to the service of God: thus the Hebrews, the Levites, priests, tabernacle, temple, Jerusalem, Zion, sacrifices, oil, days, are called holy. Numb. xv. 40. and xviii. 17. Jer. xi. 15. The inmost apartment of the tabernacle or temple was called the holy of holies, or the holy place, or most holy place; and some parts of the offering are called most holy, as they were not to be eaten but by the priests in the holy place. Exod. xxviii. 39. Lev. x. 18. Heaven is a holy place; separated to be the peculiar residence of God, and of his holy angels and saints; and into it enters nothing that defileth. Isa. lvii. 15. Heb. ix. 12. Israel was holiness to the Lord; they were separated to his service, and made a fair shew of holiness and purity at their coming out of Egypt. Jer. ii. 5.

HOMER; the same measure as the COR. Isa. v. 10.

HONEY much abounded in Canaan; and so it is represented as a land flowing with milk and honey. Their bees deposited their honey in rocks, Deut. xxxiii. 13; or on trees, 1 Sam. xiv. 26. John Baptist lived in the desert on locusts and wild honey, Matt. iii. 4; and butter and honey were common fare. Isa. vii. 15. To restrain the Hebrews from imitating the heathens, who used honey in their sacrifices, and to represent the impropriety of carnal pleasure in God's worship, they were prohibited to use honey in their sacrifices. Lev. ii. 11. Whatever is sweet, delightful, and medicinal, is likened to honey; as the word of God, Psal. xix. 10. and cxix. 103; the prayers, praises, and edifying converse of the saints, Sol. Song iv. 11; Christ's gospel truth and his people's graces, Sol. Song v. 1; and the knowledge of wisdom. Prov. xxiv. 10. The lips of harlots drop as a honey-comb; and their mouth is smoother than oil: their speech is soft, flattering, and enticing. Prov. v. 3. The full soul loatheth the honey-comb; but to the hungry even bitter things are pleasant: persons full of goodness in their own conceit, or full of worldly cares loathe the sweetest promises and blessings of God; but such as are sensible of their wants and unworthiness are glad to obtain the very least of God's mercies. Prov. xxvii. 7.

HONEST; seemingly; grave; upright; just. 1 Tim. ii. 3.

HONOUR; to put tokens of respect upon one, in thought, word, and deed. To honour God, is to believe in, love, worship, and serve him, as our chief Good, and great Sovereign, 1 Tim. i. 17; or outwardly to profess to do it. Matt. xv. 8. God honours men, in rendering them respected and happy. 1 Sam. ii. 30. Men honour one another, in esteeming, reverencing, and performing acts of kindness and respect. 1 Pet. ii. 17. The double honour, to which such as rule well in the church are entitled, comprehends esteem, regard, subjection, and proper maintenance. 1 Tim. v. 17.

HONOURABLE; respected and regarded, Isa. v. 13; or worthy of respect and regard. Heb. xiii. 4.

HOODS, among the Jews, were probably like the turbans of the Turks and Persians, consisting of many folds and wreaths, and sometimes raised up to a great height in the middle. Isa. iii. 23.

HOOF; the horny part of the feet of horses, bullocks, &c. The parting or division of the hoof in clean beasts might represent good men's readiness to render to God his due love and obedience, and to men what is their due. Lev. xi. 3. Deut. xiv. 6-8.

HOOK; an instrument to hang things on, Exod. xxxviii. 19, 28; to prune trees with, Isa. ii. 4; and to catch fish with. Matt. xvii. 27. God's restraining power, and providential hinderances and judgments, are called fish-hooks, as by these he can oblige men to act or move as he pleases. Isa. xxxvii. 20. Ezek. xxxviii. 4. The hook and filets of the tabernacle may denote the connection which subsists between all the per-sections of Jesus, and the ordinances which connect the various members of the church. Exod. xxvii. 10. Might not the hooks for hanging up the flesh of sacrifices signify gospel-ordinances, as exhibiting a crucified Redeemer to our souls. Ezek. xl. 43.

HOPE; EXPECTATION. (1.) A confident persuasion of obtaining some future good. Job xi. 18. Luke iii. 15. The saints' hope is a firm expectation of all good things in time and eternity, founded on the promises, relations, and perfections of God, and on the office, righteousness, and intercession of Christ: it has an infinitely precious object, an infallible ground, and a purifying influence, 1 John iii. 2, 3; and it is called the hope of the gospel, as it is begotten by means of the gospel, and is founded on the declarations and promises of the gospel. Col. i. 23. The hope of salvation, as deliverance from sin and misery, and enjoyment of holiness and happiness, is the thing hoped for, 1 Thess. v. 8; and it is a lively hope, proceeds from spiritual life, and renders one active and lively in good works, 1 Pet. i. 3; and a good hope, as it has a good foundation, object, and effect. 2 Thess. ii. 16. (2.) What is hoped for, Jer. xxix. 11; so Christ, in respect of his incarnation, was the hope of Israel. Acts xxviii. 20. Eternal life is called a blessed hope, a hope of righteousness, founded in the righteousness of Christ, and which produces good works, Gal. v. 5; and a hope laid up in heaven, Col. i. 5; and hope, that is, the thing hoped for, deferred, makes the heart sick, with longing for it. Prov. xiii. 12. (3.) The ground of hope: so Ethiopia was the hope or expectation of the Jews; they expected help from them against the Assyrians. Isa. xx. 5. God and Christ are the hope of his people; they are the ground of their hope; and the full enjoyment of God in Christ is the sum of all the good hoped for. 1 Tim. i. 1. Jer. i. 7. and xvii. 13. In the last passage the word might be read, the washing-pool. Compare Zech. xiii. 1. People are the hope, joy, and crown of ministers, when they expect to have them for a pleasure and honour in the day of judgment. 1 Thess. ii. 19. Abraham against hope, believed in hope; hoped for a son, notwithstanding Providence long appeared to deny him one. Rom. iv. 18.

HOPHNI. See ELI.

HOR; the name of two mountains, the one on the south of Canaan, in the south of Idumea, where Aaron died, and near to which perhaps was Horhagidgad, or Gadgodah, where the Hebrews encamped; and another on the north of Canaan, and seems to have been a top of Mount Lebanon. Num. xx. 25. and xxxiv. 7, 8.

HOREB. See SINAI.

HORITES, or HORIMS; an ancient people that dwelt about mount Seir. They were perhaps sprung of one Hori; at least one of that name was a chief man among them. They were anciently governed by dukes: Seir, Lotan, Shobal, Zibeon, Anah, Dishon, Ezer, and Dishan. Chedorlaomer ravaged their country. Some think they had also eight kings in succession, before they were expelled by, or blended with the Edomites. Gen. xiv. and xxxvi. 1 Chron. i.

Horim oft signifies nobles. 1 Kings xxi. 8, 11. Perhaps the Greek Heros, or hero, comes from Horim, as well as Anax, king, from Anak.

HORMAH, or ZEPHAATH, and perhaps also Arad. When the Hebrews approached, for the second time, to the south borders of the promised land, Arad king of this place attacked them; they vowed to the Lord utterly to extirpate his kingdom, if he should deliver it into their hand. They obtained their desire, and fulfilled their vow: but whether in the days of Moses or of Joshua, we know not; and on this account it was called Hormah i. e. destruction. Here the rebellious Hebrews were grievously defeated in the second year after their coming out of Egypt. It was given to the Simeonites; and to the elders of it, David sent a part of the spoil taken from the Amalekites. Num. xiv. 45. and xxi. 1—3. Josh. xix. 4. Judg. i. 16, 17. 1 Sam. xxx. 30.

HORN. As cattle with their horns push their enemies, and defend themselves, horns are the symbol of power and authority. Joseph's horn resembled the horn of the unicorn; the power and dominion of his posterity, in the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim, were vastly great. Deut. xxxiii. 17. Wicked men lift up the horn, when they arrogantly boast of their power and authority, and threaten to destroy others; and their horns are cut off, when their power and authority are taken from them. Psal. lxxv. 4, 10. Jer. xlviii. 25. Hannah's horn was exalted, when God highly honoured her, and gave her a child to be ruler over Israel. 1 Sam. ii. 1. David's horn was exalted as the horn of the unicorn, when his kingdom was exalted to great honour, and his authority was established; and when his soul was eminently advanced in grace and comfort. Psal. xcii. 10. David's being anointed with a horn full of oil, when Saul was anointed with a rial of oil, might mark the abundance of gifts, and the stability of government in the one above the other. 1 Sam. x. 1. xvi. 1. God is the horn of his people's salvation; by his power and authority he protects and saves them, and thrusts and destroys their enemies. The horns of the altar represented Christ's authority, and ability to save sinners from every end of the earth; and, in allusion hereto, he is called a horn of salvation, 1 Kings ii. 28. Luke i. 69; and his having seven horns, denotes the perfection of his power and authority. Rev. v. 6. The horns coming out of God's hand, in which was the hiding of his power, are the rays of the glorious brightness that attended him at Sinai, and the mighty displays of his power, in which his might was nevertheless but very partially displayed. Hab. iii. 4.

Horns also signify kings and kingdoms; the two horns of Daniel's visionary ram, are the united kingdoms of Media and Persia; the notable horn of his he-goat between his eyes, is Alexander the first king of all Greece, in the midst of his sagacious generals: the four horns coming after it are the four kingdoms into which the Grecian empire was divided after his death, viz. Egypt, Syria, Thrace, and Greece; the little horn that sprung out of one of them, is Antiochus Epiphanes, who, from the contemptible rise of a base person, and Roman hostage, rose to so much power, and did so much mischief in Egypt and Judea; or Antichrist. Dan. viii. The ten crowned horns of the Romish empire, and of Antichrist, are the ten toes, or kingdoms, into which the Romish empire was at last divided, and over which the Pope extends his influence. In Bishop Chandler's list, these ten stand thus: the Ostrogoths, in Mæsia: the Visigoths, in Pannonia, or Hungary; the Suevior Alans, in Gascoigne and Spain: the Vandals, in Africa; the Franks, in France; the Burgundi, in Burgundy; the Heruli and Thuringi in Italy; the Saxons and Angles, in Britain; the Huns, in Hungary; and the Lombards, on the banks of the Danube, and afterward in Italy. Mede says they stood thus; in A. D. 456, the Britains, the Saxons, both in Britain; the Franks, the Burgundians, the Visigoths, the Suevi, and Alans, the Vandals, the Alemans, in Germany: the Ostrogoths, and their successors, in Longobards; and the Greeks in the eastern part of the empire. Bishop Lloyd ranks them according to the time of their settlement into states, thus: the Huns, about A. D. 356; Ostrogoths, 377; Visigoths, 378; the Franks, 407; the Vandals, 407; the Burgundians, 407; the Heruli and Rugians, 476; the Longobards in Hungary, 526. Sir Isaac Newton ranks them thus: the kingdoms of the Vandals and Alans, in Africa and Spain; of the Suevions, in Spain; of the Visigoths, of the Alans in Gaul, or France; of the Burgundians, of the Franks, of the Britons, of the Huns, of the Lombards; and, finally, the exarchate of Ravenna. According to Bishop Newton, they stood thus in the eighth century; the senate of Rome; the Greek state of Ravenna; the Lombards; the Huns; the Alemans; the Franks; the Burgundians; the Goths; the Britons; the Saxons. The frequent convulsions of these states occasion their being differently reckoned; and it is observable that, almost ever since, there have been ten principal states; and though they had not been always ten, they might be called ten from their original form. At present we may reckon them thus: the states of Italy; the two Sicilies; Portugal; France; Spain; Britain; Holland; Germany; Switzerland; Hungary; for Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, did not pertain to the ancient Roman empire. The horn with eyes, and a look more stout than his fellows, and who plucked up three horns, is the crafty Romish Pope, whose high pretensions to authority are superior to that of earthly princes, and who has often deposed and excommunicated them; and who, quickly after his rise, got himself made master of three sovereignties; of the dukedom of Rome, the exarchate of Ravenna, and the region of Pentapolis. Dan. vii. 20—26. Rev. xii. 3. and xiii. 1. and xvii. 3, 7, 12. Antichrist's two horns as a lamb, may denote his civil and ecclesiastic power, or his power of binding and loosing church-censures. But perhaps this beast with the two horns, may denote the papal power of monasteries; as the first with the ten, may denote the power as resident in the Pope and his council. Rev. xiii. 11. The four horns that scattered Judah, were their enemies from every place, particularly the Ammonites, Arabs, Samaritans, Philistines, and Syro-Grecians. Zech. i. 21.

HORNETS; a kind of bees with a black breast, and double black spots; they are very troublesome and mischievous; their stings are attended with pain and inflammation, and even danger of death. It seems that great swarms of them plagued the Canaanites in the days of Joshua. Deut. vii. 20. Josh. xxiv. 12. Elian tells us, that the Phaselites, who dwelt about the mountains of Solyma, were driven out of their native country by wasps. As these Phaselites were Phenicians, or Canaanites, it is probable this event is the same that took place in the days of Joshua.

HORRIBLE; dreadfully hateful and affrighting: so, great and aggravated wickedness is horrible. Jer. v. 30. Hos. vi. 10. Fearful affliction or punishment is horrible. Psal. xl. 2. and xi. 6.

HORROR is such excessive fear and terror as almost makes one's hair to stand on end. Psal. lv. and cxix. 53.

HORSE; one of the noblest animals of the brute kind, noted for comeliness, swiftness, pride, wantonness, natural fierceness, sagacity, strength, and fitness for burden, draught or war. Job xxxix. 19—25. God prohibited the Hebrews to multiply horses; he ordered Joshua to hough, hamstring, or cut the sinews of the legs of all the horses of the Canaanites, and to burn their chariots with fire; the design of which laws no doubt, was to prevent their correspondence with foreigners, or trusting in war to their chariots and horsemen. Deut. xvii. 16. Josh. xi. 6. In this manner David treated the horses and chariots of Hadadezer the Syrian. 2 Sam. viii. 4, 5. Solomon having married the daughter of Pharaoh, procured a fine breed of horses from Egypt, some of them at the rate of 600 shekels of silver, (which according to Prideaux, is £90 sterling; and according to Arbuthnot, whom we follow, £68. 9s.) 1 Kings x. 26. He was the first of the Hebrews who began to multiply horses; he had 4000 stables, 40,000 stalls, and 12,000 horsemen. 1 Kings iv. 26. 2 Chron. ix. 25. As the eastern heathens, who worshipped the sun, imagined that he rode along the sky in a chariot drawn with fleet horses, to communicate his light and warmth to mankind, they consecrated to him the finest steeds or chariots: with these they either rode to the eastern gates of their cities as the sun rose, or they held them so sacred that none might ride on them. Josiah removed from the Jewish temple the horses, or images of horses, which his father or grandfather had consecrated to the sun. 2 Kings xxiii. 17. Horses are sometimes put for warriors on horseback. Ezek. xxix. 12.

God's instruments of accomplishing his purpose, and displaying his greatness and might, are represented as his horses or chariots. Zech. x. 5. and xii. 4. Jer. li. 21. White horses denote the gospel, whereby Christ shews his glory, conquers, and comes to his people, and whereby they are supported, borne forward in their heavenly journey, and enabled to conquer their foes; or they may be an emblem of warriors' victory, and of great joy and gladness. Red horses, represent persecution and bloody wars. Pale horses, denote famines in the church or state, which are followed with death, spiritual or temporal, and with hell. Black horses, may represent fearful judgments, that fill men with horror and perplexity. And grizzled, speckled, and bay horses, may denote mingling scenes of mercy and judgment. Rev. vi. 2—8. and xix. 11, 14. Zech. i. 8. and vi. 2, 3. Angels appeared under the form of horses and chariots of fire to intimate that God by them powerfully executes his purposes, subdues his enemies, protects his people, and conveys them to heaven. 2 Kings ii. 11. and vi. 17. Saints are likened to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots: how precious and costly to Christ! how carefully nourished, cleansed, stationed, and cared for by him! how delightfully yoked under his law! and what a glorious means of displaying his power, honour, and greatness! Sol. Song i. 9. The Saracens and Antichristian clergy are likened to horses, for their courage and activity in promoting their projects: and multitudes of the former rode on horses in their warlike ravages. The Ottoman Turks are represented as having a prodigious number of horsemen; anciently they almost all fought on horseback, and even now their Timariots, or cavalry, may amount to about a million, were they all brought to the field. Rev. ix. 7—16.

HO-SANNAH; (i. e. Save now; or, save, I beseech!) A word much used by the Jews in their prayers and exclamations, especially at the feast of tabernacles; and the boughs bound together on that occasion were sometimes called hosanna. The multitudes crying Hosanna to Christ as the Son of David, imported their wishing him all happiness and success: and begging that, as Messiah, he might quickly save them, and advance the glory of their nation to the highest degree. Matt. xxi. 9—15.

HO-SEA, the son of Beeri, a prophet of the Lord. In the course of his work, he, by the direction of God, either parabolically represented the story of, or rather married one Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim, that had once been a whore; and had become penitent; or rather that had an irreproachable character when married, but afterwards played the whore, but in the end became penitent and faithful to his bed; and had by her, or received with her, two sons, Jezreel and Loammī, and a daughter called Loruhamah; by whose names was signified, that God would quickly avenge on Jehu's family the blood which he had shed in Jezreel, and would cast off the ten tribes from being his people, and no more have mercy on them for many generations. After this, he predicted that they should be Ammi, his people; and Ruhamah, obtainers of mercy. After the death of Gomer, he bought another woman that had been a whore, perhaps redeemed Gomer herself, yet living, for little more than thirty-four shillings, and almost two bushels of barley; by which he figured out the marriage relation between God and the ten tribes, and that they were become very contemptible

In his view, and would shortly be cast off, never to be received back till the millennium. He sharply charges the Hebrews with their murders, idolatries, uncleanness, oppression, perversion of judgment, reliance on the Assyrians, &c. He intermingles a variety of calls to repentance and reformation. His style is very brief, and to us, who know so little of ancient customs, is pretty obscure. Hos. i. &c.

HO-SHE-A, the son of Elah. After murdering Pekah his master, and a struggle of eight or nine years' civil war, he became king of Israel, and was less wicked than any of his predecessors, allowing such of his subjects as pleased to worship the Lord at Jerusalem. He was scarce settled on his throne, when he concerted measures with So king of Egypt to throw off the Assyrian yoke, under which his kingdom had long groaned. Informed hereof, Shalmanezzer king of Assyria invaded the country of the ten tribes; and, after three or four years, took all their fenced cities, reduced Samaria and others to ruin, killed Hoshea, ripped up women with child, dashed infants to pieces, and carried the most of the survivors to the territories of his eastern empire. 2 Kings xv. 30. and xvii. Hos. i—xiii. Amos ii—ix.

HOSPITALITY; a kind disposition to entertain and lodge STRANGERS. 1 Tim. iii. 2. Heb. xiii.

HOST. (1.) An entertainer of strangers, lodgers, or guests. Rom. xvi. 23. Ministers are the host, to whose care Jesus commits the charge of wounded souls. Luke x. 35. (2.) AN ARMY; so the Levites and priests are called the Lord's host, who attended him, and protected the order and purity of his worship, 1 Chron. ix. 19; and the saints, on account of their number, are called the hosts of nations, or well-ordered multitudes. Jer. iii. 19.

HOSTAGE; a person delivered into the hand of another as a security for the performance of some engagement. Conquered kings or nations often gave hostages for the payment of their tribute, or continuance of subjection. 2 Kings xiv. 14.

HOT. God's hot wrath, displeasure, or heat of his anger, is his holy and high displeasure against sin, displayed in the most fearful and tormenting judgments. Exod. xxii. 24. Deut. ix. 19. Judg. ii. 19. Such as are lively, zealous, and active in religion are hot. Rev. iii. 15. One's heart is hot, when filled with tormenting trouble, impatience, and passion. Psal. xxxix. 3; and so Ezekiel went to prophesy in the heat of his spirit, with great reluctance and fretting. Ezek. iii. 14. The hottest of the battle, is where it is most fierce, dangerous, and destructive. 2 Sam. xi. 15. To pursue one hotly, is to do it in great wrath, and with much speed. Gen. xxxi. 36.

HOURLY. The Hebrews appear to have known nothing of hours till the Chaldean captivity. The first mention thereof is by Daniel, chap. v. 5. They divided their day into morning, from sun-rising to about nine o'clock; high day, or noon, which ended at mid-day; the first evening, which reached from mid-day to about our three o'clock afternoon; and the second evening which reached to sunset. Exod. xii. 6. The night they divided into night, midnight, and morning watch. Becoming tributary to the Romans, they divided their night into four watches, so called, because the watching sentinels were relieved every three hours, Matt. xiv. 25; and it is said that, in the temple service, the day was divided into four watches, or great hours; the third of which ended about three o'clock afternoon. Mark xv. 25. In the new Testament, the day is plainly divided into twelve hours, which perhaps lengthened and shortened as the day did; the third was about our nine o'clock, the sixth at twelve, the ninth about three afternoon, and the eleventh a little before sunset. Matt. xx. 1—6. John xi. 9. and xix. 14. Hour also signifies any fixed season or opportunity, and especially what is short; hence we read of the hour of temptation, of judgment, of Christ's death or second coming, of the power of Satan and his agents against Christ. Rev. iii. 2—10. and xiv. 7. John viii. 20. Luke xxii. 53. Perhaps an hour may signify the twenty-fourth part of a year, or fifteen days. Rev. ix. 14. The half hour of silence in heaven, is the fifteen years of considerable peace in the Christian church, from A. D. 323 to 338. Rev. viii. 1. In one hour, is much about the same time, Rev. xvii. 12; or suddenly, all at once. Rev. xviii. 10.

HOUSE. (1.) A house to dwell in. Gen. xix. 3; and so the grave is a house to the dead, and the body to the soul. Job xxx. 23. and iv. 19. 2 Cor. v. 1. (2.) The household, family, or nation who dwell together, Acts x. 2; and so the families, tribes, and nation of Israel are called a house. Num. i. 18—45. 1 Chron. xxiv. 4. Isa. xlviii. 1. Hos. v. 1. Mic. iii. 1—9. (3.) Kindred, lineage. Luke i. 27. (4.) The substance and wealth pertaining to a family. In this sense the Pharisees devoured widows' houses. Mark xii. 40. (5.) The affairs belonging to a family: these Hezekiah was to set in order before his death. Isa. xxxviii. 1. Heaven, the church, the tabernacle, temple, and ordinances, are represented as God's house, or a spiritual house; as God planned, formed, furnished, or owned them, so he did or does dwell in them, and display his glory, power, and grace in a peculiar manner. John xiv. 1. Heb. iii. 2. Sol. Song i. 17. Judg. xviii. 31. 2 Chron. v. 14. Psal. lxxiv. 10. The saints are a spiritual house, and household of faith; being formed by the Holy Ghost, and furnished with spiritual graces, and enabled to believe the truth as in Jesus; God dwells in them, and among them, as their master, parent, and householder; and ministers attend them as their servants. 1 Pet. ii. 5. Gal. vi. 10. Matt. xiii. 27. and xxi. 33. The house of God, at which dangerous judgments begin, is either the ruined Jewish temple, or the persecuted Christian church. 1 Pet. iv. 17. The house of David, and inhabitants of Jerusalem, are all ranks, both great and small. Zech. xiii. 1. To join house to house, and field to field, till there be no place, is to join several farms or occupations together, in order to make hastily rich; and by which a great many, especially of the poor, are deprived of livings and subsistence. Isa. v. 8. God made houses to the Hebrews, or to the midwives; he prospered and increased their families. Exod. i. 22. Such as build their hopes on Christ in his word, are houses founded on a rock; their hopes cannot be overturned by any temptation, affliction, death, or judgment to come; but such as found their hopes on any thing else, are like houses built on the sand, which amid temptation and trouble, are easily overthrown or ruined. Matt. vii. 24, 25. As the houses of the Hebrews had ordinarily flat roofs, the house-tops were used to speak from to neighbours, or to gaze on an approaching enemy. Matt. x. 27. Isa. xxii. 1.

HUGE; very great, numerous. 2 Chron. xvi. 8.

HUL, or CHUL, the son of Aram, and grandson of Shem, Josephus says, he peopled Armenia; and here were ancient vestiges of his name. Colbothene, or Colbeth, signifies the dwelling of Hul or Chul. Here also we find Cholana, Colimna, Colsa, Colane, Colnatha. Perhaps his posterity, at least part of them, took up their residence in the desert of Syria, near Tadmor, where the city Cholle once stood. Gen. x. 23.

HULDAH. See JOSIAH.

HUMBLE; lowly in mind before God, and esteeming others better than ourselves. Job xxii. 29. James iv. 6. Humbleness, or humility, consists in having low thoughts of ourselves, and a deep sense of our unworthiness and weakness, and our walking accordingly. This temper is pleasing to God, and prepares us for receiving further degrees of fellowship with him, and blessings from him. Prov. xv. 33. and xxii. 4. In this temper we imitate God, who though high, humbleth himself; i. e. condescends to observe and care for his creatures in heaven and earth, Psal. cxiii. 6; and imitate Christ, who is meek and lowly, and who, for our sakes, condescended to the meanest abasement. Phil. ii. 8. There is also a base humility, that lies in a silly abjectness of mind; of this kind is that which leads men to worship angels, and follow after superstition. Col. ii. 18—23. Men humble themselves, when they consider their sins, repent of them, and readily submit to God's disposal. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 27. They are humbled, when afflicted and brought low in their circumstances. Deut. viii. 2. Isa. x. 33. A woman is said to be humbled, when she loses her honour of virginity, or chastity. Deut. xxi. 14. Ezek. xxii. 10, 11. Christ's humiliation is his low state, in his debased birth, life, death, and interment. Acts viii. 33.

HUNGER. (1.) Earnest desire after food, Matt. iv. 1; and to be hungry, is to have great need, and a great desire after food. 2 Sam. xvii. 29. (2.) Want of food, which causeth a longing appetite: so men are killed by hunger. Jer. xviii. 9. Rev. vi. 8. Spiritual desire after Jesus and his righteousness, is called hunger; how it pains men, till the blessings desired are obtained! Matt. v. 6. Luke i. 53. Such as feed on Christ never hunger nor thirst: finding enough in him, they never desire any thing else, as the chief portion of their soul. John vi. 35. A man's strength is hunger-bitten, when it decays for want of food. Job xviii. 12.

HUNT; to chase wild beasts in order to kill them. Whatever pursues one to ruin him, is represented as a hunter. Job complains that God hunted his soul as a fierce lion, i. e. wrathfully pursued him with his judgments. Job x. 16. Evil hunts the wicked man; one mischief comes upon him after another, notwithstanding all the shifts he can make to escape them. Psal. cxi. 11. Saul hunted for David's life to take it away. 1 Sam. xxiv. 11. Adulteresses, false prophets, and malicious men, hunt men, tempt them to evil, and promote their ruin. Prov. vi. 26. Ezek. xiii. 18, 20. Mic. vii. 2. The Chaldeans hunted the Jews, chased and murdered them in every corner of their land. Jer. xvi. 10. Nimrod was a mighty hunter before the Lord; either much given to the chase of wild beasts, by ridding the country of which he engaged his neighbours to make him their king; or, under a pretence of hunting, he gathered a band of soldiers, who assisted him to erect his tyrannical monarchy. Gen. x. 9.

HUR, the son of Caleb, and grandson of Hezron; perhaps the husband of Miriam, and grandfather of Bazaleel. He and Aaron held up Moses' hands at Rephidim, during the engagement with the Amalekites; and they governed the people when he was on mount Sinai. Exod. xvii. 10. and xxiv. 14. 1 Chron. ii. 19, 20.

HURL; to drive quickly and furiously. Job xxvii. 21.

HUSBAND. See MARRIAGE.

HUSBANDMAN: a dresser of the ground. Gen. ix. 20. God is likened to a husbandman; he sows, plants, cultivates, and expects fruit from his church, head, and members, John xv. 1; and the church is his husbandry, the great object of his care and work. 1 Cor. iii. 9. The Jewish priests, rulers, and others, were the husbandmen to whom God let out his vineyard, church, or ordinances; and who abused his prophets and son, and in the end were miserably destroyed. Matt. xxi. 33—41.

HUSHAI, the Archite, David's faithful friend; who hearing of his flight before Absalom, met him with dust upon his head, and his clothes rent. At David's advice he returned, and pretended to comply with Absalom, at least uttered words that were taken to import friendship. By a humorous and flattering advice he prevailed on Absalom and his party to defer their pursuit of David for some days; and so, contrary to the advice of Ahithophel, their cause was ruined. He, too, communicated proper information to David. 2 Sam. xv. and xvi. Probably Baanah, Solomon's deputy-governor in the tribe of Asher, was his son. 1 Kings iv. 19.

HUZZAB, the queen of, or perhaps some strong fort in, Nineveh, or even Nineveh itself, so called from the firm-like establishment of it. Huzzab was led captive by the Medes and Chaldeans. Nah. ii. 7.

HY-MEN-EUS was probably a native of Ephesus; for a while he professed the Christian faith, and seemed a real believer; but he fell into grievous errors, and perhaps abominable practices. On this account, Paul excommunicated him from the church, delivering him and Alexander to Satan. Sc- veral years after, we find him and Philletus refusing that there was any other resurrection than that from sin to grace, by faith and baptism. 1 Tim. i. 20. 2 Tim. ii. 17.

HYMN. See SING.

HYPOCRISY; a counterfeiting of religion and virtue; an affectation of the name of religious, without any real regard to the thing. Isa. xxxiii. 6. It is a most dangerous evil, and difficult of cure. It is hard to be discerned, and the very means of salvation deceitfully used occasion men's hardening themselves in it. Next to the Divine Spirit dwelling in us, the most effectual remedy of it is, to preserve a constant sense of the omniscience of God. Luke xii. 1—3. A hypocrite, is one, who like a stage-player, feigns himself to be what he is not, assumes an appearance of true religion, without the reality of it. Luke vi. 42. He will not always call on God; will not persevere in prayer: his joy is but for a moment: his hope is unsubstantial, and shall quickly perish. Job xxvii. 8—10. and xx. 5. and viii. 13. The ancient Pharisees were noted hypocrites; they said and did not; talked of virtue, and recommended it to others, but were at no pains to practise it. What good works they did were done to be seen and praised of men; they ambitiously affected vain applause and outward honour; they did these abominable vices under pretences to religion and virtue; they were excessively strict in matters circumstantial, and as lax in the more important duties of religion; very careful of ceremonial purity, but regardless of cleanness of heart, and the spiritual worship of God; they severely censured the faults of others, while they indulged themselves in crimes much greater: they professed a great deal of regard to the ancient prophets, while they hated John Baptist, Christ, and his apostles. Matt. xxiii. 3—31; xii. 1—7; xv. 2—8; and vii. 5.

HYSSOP, in general, is of two kinds, garden and mountain hyssop. It is a shrub which shoots forth a multitude of twigs, or suckers, from one root: it is as hard as any large wood, and ordinarily grows about a foot and a half high, at proper distances. Its stock on both sides emits longish leaves, which are hard, odoriferous, warmish, and a little bitter to the taste. Its blossoms appear on the top of the stem, of an azure colour, and like an ear of corn. It is probable that hyssop grew to a greater height with the Jews than in Europe; for it was so long in stalk that the soldiers filling a sponge with vinegar, and putting it in a reed, or stick of hyssop, held it up to our Saviour's mouth as he hung on the cross, or the bunch of hyssop was fixed on the reed. John xix. 29. In sprinkling the blood of the passover-lamb, and the water of purification, and the mingled blood and water on the leper, a bunch of hyssop was used, which might shadow forth the fragrant and pure ordinances of the gospel, in which Jesus' blood is brought near and applied to our souls. Exod. xii. 22. Num. xix. 18. Lev. xiv. 4, 52. The hyssop burnt along with the flesh of the red heifer, might denote the purity, fragrance, and purifying virtue of Christ's efficacious atonement. Num. xix. 6.

I, J.

I, WHEN it relates to God, is expressive of his dignity, Psal. lxxxi. 14; his power, Gen. xvii. 1; his self-existence and unchangeableness, Exod. iii. 14; or the certainty of his promises and threatenings, Exod. vi. 2; Num. xiv. 35. When used with reference to men, it expresses their pride, Isa. xlviii. 8; the certainty of what they say, Gal. v. 2. Phil. iii. 19; and their readiness to perform their duty. Mic. iii. 8. Matt. xxi. 30.

JAB'AL. See LAMECH.

JAB'BOK; a brook on the east of Jordan, rising in the mountains of Gilead, and falling into Jordan a little on the south of the sea of Tiberias. It separated the kingdom of Sihon from that of Og, king of Bashan. Near to it Jacob wrestled with the Angel of the covenant, and prevailed. Deut. ii. 37. Gen. xxxii. 22.

JAB'ESH, or JAB'ESH-GIL'EAD; a city of the Manassites, at the foot of mount Gilead, about six miles from Pella, where the Christian Jews found refuge when Judea was invaded, and laid waste by the Romans. It was at no great distance from Gadara. The inhabitants of this city, neglecting to join their brethren against the Benjamites in the affair of Gibeah, were all put to the sword, except four hundred virgins who were bestowed on the surviving Benjamites. Judg. xxi. About three hundred and ten years after, this city sustained a furious siege from Nahash king of the Ammonites; and the inhabitants could obtain no milder terms than to have their right eyes pulled out, as a reproach to Israel. Unwilling to submit on such conditions, they obtained a truce of seven days; before the end of which, Saul, at their entreaty, raised an army, routed the Ammonites, and raised the siege. In the grateful remembrance of which, the valiant men of Jabesh, about forty years after, at the hazard of their lives, took the bodies of Saul and his sons from the wall of Bethshan, where the Philistines had hung them, and gave them, a decent burial. 1 Sam. xi. and xxxi. 1 Chron. x. 11, 12.

JAB'EZ, appears to have been a descendant of Judah by Ashur. His mother bare him with much pain and sorrow, which was the cause of his name. His concern for religion, his authority, and seed, rendered him more honourable than his brethren. With distinguished fervour, he begged that God would truly and signally bless him; would enlarge his family and inheritance; would assist and direct him in every undertaking; and preserve him from every thing sinful and dangerous. God graciously granted his request. 1 Chron. iv. 5-10.

JABIN; (1.) A king of Habor, in the north parts of Canaan, and the most powerful of all the sovereigns in these quarters. Struck with the rapidity of Joshua's conquests, he engaged all the kings on the north of Canaan, particularly the kings of Madon, Jobab, Shimron, Achsaph, &c. to assist him. Their whole forces were assembled at the waters of Merom, to attack the Hebrews, but the Lord delivered them into Joshua's hand, who gave them an entire defeat, and pursued the fugitives as far as great Zidon to the north-west, and to Mizrephothaim on the east. He then marched back to Habor, and burnt it, and killed Jabin its king. Josh. xi. (2.) JABIN king of Habor, and perhaps, the great grandson of the former, was a very powerful monarch, had nine hundred chariots armed with iron scythes, and an army under Sisera his general of 997,000 men, according to Philo Byblius. After he had twenty years, from about 2699 to 2719, or 2747 to 2767, mightily oppressed the Hebrews, his army was routed by Deborah and Barak, and, it is probable, a terrible storm of rain, that made the river Kishon sweep away multitudes of them. Sisera, the general, fled away on his feet; and was kindly received by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite. His fatigue occasioned his falling into a deep sleep. Jael, divinely instigated against this oppressor of the Hebrews, killed him, by driving a nail through his head, and afterwards shewed him to Barak. Judg. iv. and v.

JAB'NEH, or JAM'N-A; a city of the Danites, on the sea-shore, and at no great distance southward of Joppa. It seems it had been in the hand of the Philistines for some time before Uzziah broke down the walls of it, along with those of Gath. 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. There was a famous university of the Jews in this place, some ages after Christ.

JACINT, or JACINTH; a precious stone, of a violet and purple colour, not unlike the amethyst. It is very hard; but the diamond will make an impression on it. It was the eleventh foundation in the new Jerusalem. Rev. xxi. 20. That which some moderns call jacinth, has a yellow colour somewhat like a flame.

JACOB, the younger son of Isaac and Rebekah, and twin-brother of Esau, was born A. M. 2168 or 2173. In the womb they struggled with each other, and the Lord informed the mother that she was with child of twins, both of whom should become nations, but of a very different temper, state, and condition; and that the elder should serve the younger. In their birth, the last born took hold of his brother's heel, and for that reason was called Jacob, the heeler, or supplanter. When he grew up, he was of a quiet and peaceable temper, and staid much at home with his mother; while his brother was of a restless temper, and passionately fond of hunting. He bought the birth-right of his brother for a mess of coarse pottage. By presenting some savoury meat which his mother had prepared, to his dim-sighted father, and feigning himself to be Esau, he obtained his principal blessing of a fat land well watered, and of the dominion over all his brethren. Enraged at this, Esau resolved to murder him. Rebekah his mother, who had advised him, being informed of his intention, desired Jacob to retire to Mesopotamia, to her brother Laban's family, and abide there till Esau's fury should be abated. She afterwards communicated the matter to Isaac, and told him what an insupportable burden it would be to her if Jacob should marry a Canaanitish woman. Isaac sent for Jacob, gave him his blessing, and charged him to go to Padan-aram, and there marry one of Laban's uncle's daughters.

Jacob departed privately from Beersheba. After sunset, he, probably on the second day of his journey, lighted on a place called Luz, on account of the multitude of almonds, or hazel-nuts, that grew there. Here, at night, he laid himself down to rest, under the open sky, with a stone under his head for a pillow. In a dream, he saw a ladder, whose foot stood on the earth, and its top reached unto heaven; and the angels of God ascended and descended on it. Above the top of it stood the Lord God, and assured him, he was the God of his fathers Abraham and Isaac, and that he would give him and his seed the land of Canaan for their inheritance, render them numerous as the sand by the sea-shore, and render all nations blessed in him and his seed. This ladder represented the providence of God administered by angels, and managed by God as a God in covenant; and Jesus Christ as the wonder and Lord of angels, and our Mediator between God and man, and the way of access to him; who should descend of Jacob in his humanity, but in his divine nature is the Lord from heaven, and the means of all blessings from God to sinful men. Awaking from his sleep, Jacob was deeply struck with a reverential impression of the divine presence, and took the stone which he had for his pillow, erected it as a monument, poured oil on the top of it, and called the name of the place BETH-EL, or the house of God; and engaged, that since God had promised to protect him, and provide for him, and bring him back to Canaan, he would serve him, give him the tithes of all he acquired, and, at his return, make Bethel a place of solemn worship. Gen. xxv. xxvii. and xxviii. Encouraged by this vision, he hastened forward to Haran, where Laban his uncle lived. Near to the place some shepherds informed him where Laban dwelt, and that his family was well, and that Rachel his daughter was just coming to water her flock. On her coming up, he kindly saluted her, helped her to water her flock, and told her that he was the son of Rebekah her aunt. She informed her father; who came and conducted Jacob to his house. When Jacob had continued here about a month, Laban proposed to give him wages. Jacob offered seven years' service for Rachel his younger, but most beautiful daughter; and with great cheerfulness he fulfilled his engagement, from the great love which he bore to her. When the marriage-night came, as a providential punishment on Jacob for deceiving his aged father, Laban conducted Leah his elder daughter, whose personal appearance was far inferior, to Jacob's bed, instead of Rachel. Next morning the cheat was discovered; and Jacob warmly expostulated with his uncle about it. He pretended that it was contrary to the custom of their country to marry the younger daughter first; but told him he might have Rachel also for seven years' more service. This Jacob agreed to. Of his two wives, Jacob much preferred Rachel; but God favoured Leah with children, (Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah,) and it seems with a thankful heart, while Rachel was barren; on which account she was much grieved, and strongly expressed her discontent to Jacob her husband. With indignation at her rashness, he told her he was not God, to bestow or withhold the fruit of the womb at his pleasure. She next ordered Bilhah her maid, whom her father had given her, to take her place in her husband's bed, that by her she might have children to pass for her own. By this means Jacob had two sons, the one Rachel called Dan, as if she hoped God would judge her, and avenge her want of children on her sister. The other she called Naphtali, as if with great wrestling she had prevailed against her sister. Leah also caused her maid Zilpah to enter Jacob's bed, and she bare him two sons, Gad and Asher, by whose names Leah intended to hint her expectation that a troop of children was coming, and that the daughters would call her blessed.—Soon after, Leah, with her son Reuben's mandrakes, hired her husband for Rachel's night to sleep in her bed, and in consequence hereof, bare Issachar, and not long after, she bare Zebulun, and a daughter called Dinah: nor was it long before the Lord pitied the affliction of Rachel, and gave her a son, whom she called JOSEPH, in hopes that she should have another son added to him.

Jacob's fourteen years' service for his two wives being finished, he begged that Laban his father-in-law would permit him to return to his country, with his family, that he might provide for himself. Sensible of the advantage of his service, Laban offered him what wages he pleased if he would stay. To mark his dependance on the providence of God, Jacob proposed that all the spotted cattle and brown sheep produced afterwards should be his hire. Laban, supposing these could not be many, readily consented. To prevent all disputes, and hinder as much as possible the future product of spotted cattle and brown sheep, all of these kinds were removed to the distance of three days' journey, and intrusted to the care of Laban's sons; and the rest were committed to the oversight of Jacob. Instructed by a vision, Jacob laid speckled, spotted, and ring-streaked rods of poplar, in the watering-troughs, about the time when the stronger cattle coupled and conceived; these striking their imagination as they drank, caused them to conceive a spotted offspring; but he laid them not in when the weaker cattle conceived: by this means all the stronger cattle were Jacob's, and his flocks and herds exceedingly increased. Laban therefore frequently changed his hire: but whatever was allotted to Jacob exceedingly increased. Laban also caused Jacob to bear the loss of whatever was missing of his flocks or herds. After Jacob had served other six years with great labour and fidelity, Laban and his sons, treated him unkindly, pretending that he had made himself rich at their expense. Meanwhile, God, in a dream, directed him to return to Canaan. Resolving to do so, he acquainted his wives that he saw their father's deportment toward him changed, and that he intended to return to Canaan. They being sensible of their father's injurious behaviour, were glad to leave him. Jacob, his wives, children, servants, and flocks, moved towards Canaan, and Rachel carried off some of her father's idols. On the third day after, Laban informed of their departure, pursued them in no small fury; but God, in a dream, charged him to beware of giving Jacob so much as an injurious word. On the seventh day, he overtook them in the mountain of Gilead. Some sharp words were exchanged, and Laban heavily complained that they had carried off his gods; Jacob desired him to search all his store, and if his gods were found with any, let the person be put to death. Laban searched with the utmost care; but Rachel having concealed the idols in the camels' furniture, sat upon them, and plausibly excused herself from rising when her father entered her tent. Nothing belonging to Laban being found, he and Jacob made a solemn covenant of perpetual friendship; in testimony whereof, they reared a heap of stones, which Jacob called Galeed, or Gilead, and Laban, Jegar-sahadutha, both of which designations signified the heap of witness. After Jacob had offered sacrifice, and given an entertainment to his friends, Laban and his company affectionately took leave, and returned to Padan-aram, while Jacob and his family went forward to Canaan. Gen. xxix. xxx. and xxxi.

When Jacob had advanced to the ford of JABBOX, God shewed him that he was guarded with angels on every side, both from Laban and Esau; therefore Jacob called the name of the place Mahanaim, or the double camp. Fearing Esau's resentment, he sent messengers to inform him of his return, and to supplicate his favour. Jacob, informed by his messengers, that Esau came to meet him with four hundred men, justly suspected his intentions were murderous, and sent off before him a large present of two hundred and twenty goats, two hundred and twenty sheep, thirty milk camels with their colts, forty kine and ten bulls, twenty she asses and ten foals. These he divided into five droves, and ordered the drivers of each to tell Esau as they met him that it was a present to him. By this means he hoped to appease his brother's anger. Meanwhile, he spent the whole night in solemn prayer. Our Redeemer appeared to him in the form of a man, and to check him for attempting to detain him by force, touched the hollow of his thigh, till it shrank, and made him always after go halting; to commemorate which, his posterity never ate of the similar sinew in animals. By weeping and supplication to the Angel, (who was no other than the Son of God,) he obtained a change of his name to Israel, because as a prince, he had wrestled with God, and had prevailed, and obtained a solemn blessing on himself and his seed. Having crossed the Jabbok, he divided his family into three divisions, that if Esau murdered the foremost, the others might flee. The two handmaids and their children went foremost; Leah and hers next; and Rachel and Joseph last, that she might have most opportunity to get off if there was danger. According to Jacob's direction, they all in the humblest manner, did obeisance to Esau. Partly moved by this deportment, and chiefly by the providence of God, Esau met Jacob with the most tender affection, generously refused his present, because he had much wealth already; but Jacob urged him, because, said he, I have every thing, and have had the great happiness to meet thee in kindness and love. Esau offered to attend him on his journey to Mount Seir; but Jacob begged he would not trouble himself, as the flocks and little ones could move but very slowly. After Esau's departure, Jacob coming to the spot where Succoth was afterwards built, reared up a house for himself, and booths for his cattle. Not long after he crossed the Jordan westward, and coming to Shalem, he bought a piece of ground from Hamor the father of Shechem, for a hundred pieces of silver, (probably shekels, and so little more than £11. 6s. sterling.) Here he erected an altar, and called it El-Elohe-Israel, importing, that it was sacred to the mighty and worshipful God of Israel. Gen xxxii. and xxxiii. He had not dwelt long here, when Dinah his daughter, a handsome girl of about fourteen years of age, went to see the young women of the country dance at some public rejoicing. Shechem the son of Hamor, and prince of the city of Shechem, captivated with her beauty, took her and defiled her. He and his father begged her in marriage for him, and he offered them any price to obtain her. Jacob waited till his sons came home. They deceitfully proposed that the Shechemites should be all circumcised, as the only terms of obtaining Dinah. This they proposed as a means to render them unable to defend themselves, horribly abusing the seal of God's covenant, to promote their murderous intentions. Dreading nothing, Hamor and Shechem, by stating to their people how much it would gain them the wealth of Jacob's family, persuaded them to undergo the operation. On the third day after, when they were at the sores, Simeon and Levi, and perhaps a number of their servants, entered the city, and murdered the inhabitants; the other sons of Jacob coming up, seized on the spoil. This they did to revenge Shechem's using their sister as if a harlot. Dreading the resentment of the Canaanites around, and directed by God to go up to Bethel and dwell there, Jacob remembering his vow which he had made as he went to Padan-aram, ordered his family to purify themselves, and to put away their strange gods; for several of his servants were heathens. They, and no doubt Rachel among them, delivered up their idols to him, and he hid them under an oak. Protected of God, who caused a dread to seize the Canaanites around, he and his family came safe to Bethel. There he offered sacrifices to God: who again appeared to him, and renewed his former blessing. Soon after, Jacob moved southward to Hebron, to visit Isaac his father. Meanwhile, Deborah his mother's nurse died, to the great grief of the family. Rachel, too, who had said she would die if she obtained not children, died in childbed of her second son, whom she, in her last agonies, called Benoni, the son of my sorrow, but his father called him Benjamin: she was buried near Bethlehem. Not long after, Reuben committed incest with Bilhah his father's concubine. Jacob had scarcely dwelt three years with Isaac his father, when he had Joseph carried off from him: and for twenty-two years bewailed his loss, imagining that some wild beast had devoured him. About twelve years after, Isaac died, and was buried by Jacob and Esau. It seems the two brothers inclined to have lived together, but the vast number of their herds and flocks would not admit it: therefore Esau retired to Seir, leaving Jacob in the south of Canaan. Meanwhile he had his share of affliction, from the disorders in the family of Judah. Gen. xxxv.—xxxviii.

About nine years after the death of Isaac, Jacob, distressed by a famine, sent his ten elder sons to Egypt, to buy corn for their subsistence. At their return, he was shocked to find that each man's money was returned in his sack; but more so, that Simeon was detained a prisoner, and that the governor of Egypt had demanded to see Benjamin, his darling, and, as he thought, the only surviving son of his beloved Rachel. Famine, and the repeated entreaties of his children, particularly of Rueben and Judah, obliged him to permit Benjamin to go with the rest on their second journey to Egypt, not without complaining that all these things were against him, and that he was bereaved of his children. On their return, he found that Joseph was yet alive, and governor of Egypt, and that he had sent for him and his family to come hither for subsistence. He, with great joy left the plain of Mamre near Hebron, and moved towards Egypt. At Beersheba he offered sacrifices to the Lord, and the Lord encouraged him to go down into Egypt, and assured him, that his seed should thence return to Canaan, in the time fixed by the promise; and that there Joseph should attend him in his last moments, closing his eyes. He, and sixty-six of his descendants, with eight wives, went down into Egypt, where were already Joseph and his two sons. Informed by Judah, who went before the rest, Joseph met him with the utmost expressions of tender affection. Jacob was by him presented to Pharaoh. He wished that monarch all true happiness; and informed him, that he had lived one hundred and thirty years chiefly in trouble. Let us learn the fruit of unbrotherly conduct, and of obtaining blessings by unhallowed means. Jacob and his family had lived but seventeen years in Egypt, when he fell into his last sickness. Joseph, whom a little before he had made to swear he would bury him in Canaan, with his two sons Manasseh and Ephraim, came to visit him. He informed them of God's blessing him at Luz or Bethel: he blessed Joseph, assured him his sons should form two distinct tribes of the Hebrew nation, but that of Ephraim should be the most numerous and honoured. He assured him God would bring all his posterity back to Canaan in due time: and assigned to Joseph's seed a piece of ground near Shechem, which he had first bought, and afterwards recovered by force out of the hand of the Amorites. After this he convened his twelve sons, gave them his last benediction, and foretold what would befall their families in future ages. Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, he reproached with their sinful conduct; and predicted how God would chastise it in the fate of their seed. He especially commended Judah and Joseph, and foretold the future glory of their families. He foretold the coming of Christ, and the gathering of the gentiles to him. Amidst the blessings of his children, he expressed his strong desires of the Messiah's incarnation, and of his own full enjoyment of God. After charging his sons to bury him in the cave of Machpelah, where Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, and Leah had been buried, he laid himself down on the bed, and breathed out his last, about A. M. 2316, or 2320, and in the one hundred and forty-seventh year of his life. After his body was embalmed, and a solemn mourning of seventy days observed for him in Egypt, Joseph and his brethren, with the chief men of Egypt, attended his corpse to its interment in Canaan. At the thrashing-floor of Atad they stopped, and had a second mourning of seven days: on account of which, the Canaanites called the spot Abel-mizraim, the mourning of the Egyptians. He was interred in the cave of Machpelah. Gen. xlii. 1. His posterity, as well as himself, are called Jacob, or Israel. A well which he used and perhaps digged, near Shechem, is called his well. John iv. 12. Deut. x. 22. Josh. xxiii. 4. Psal. cv. 10—23. Acts vii—11—16. Hos. xii.

Was not our Redeemer, who is called JACOB and ISRAEL, prefigured by this patriarch? How long expected, earnestly desired, and supernatural his birth! How divinely was he chosen to be the father of the saved nations of elect men! how he took the first Adam by the heel, fulfilling the covenant which he had broken! how he supplanted and overthrew sin and Satan! By what severe and bloody sufferings he purchased the mediatorial heirship of all things! What inestimable and irreversible blessings he obtained, by offering himself to God in the likeness of sinful flesh! How fearfully was he exposed to trouble, from Jewish brethren, from Satan the father of his bride, and from his offended Father! How direful his earthly exile! how hard his service! How numerous his sorrows! How unsettled his lot among men! But how noted his plainness and integrity! What love he bears to his mother and spouse the church! How faithful in his work! How prevalent his intercession! How glorious his reward! Having finished his work, and blessed his disciples, he retired to his rest in the heavenly Canaan! What a multitude of spiritual seed spring from the twelve apostles, those patriarchal fathers of the gospel-church! Psal. xxiv. 6. Isa. xlix. 3.

JAD-DU'A, or JAD'DUS, the son of Jonathan, and high-priest of the Jews. He officiated a considerable time after the captivity. Neh. xii. 11. He is thought to be the Jaddus that lived in the time of Alexander the Great. Josephus says, that Alexander, when besieging Tyre, demanded some assistance, Jaddus begged to be excused, as he had sworn fidelity to Darius the Persian. Highly provoked, Alexander vowed to be revenged. Having taken Tyre, he marched towards Jerusalem. After the people had exercised themselves in fasting and prayer, Jaddus and his fellow-priests, being directed of God, met Alexander in their sacred robes. Struck with the appearance of the high-priest, he, instead of reproaching him, fell at his feet, and told Parmenio, his general, that such a form had appeared to him in Macedonia, and promised him the empire of the world: and, at the high priest's request, relieved the Jews of their tribute. But as none of Alexander's historians mention this matter, it is possibly a Jewish fable.

JAH. See JEMOVAH.

JA'HAZ, JA-HA'ZAH, or JA'H'ZAH; probably the Ziza of Ptolemy; a city near Arero, between Medeba and Diblathaim, on the north frontiers of Moab, and near to the spot where Moses defeated the army of Sihon. It was given to the Reubenites, and by them to the Levites. Num. xxi. 23. Josh. xiii. 18. 1 Chron. vi. 78. After the death of Ahab, it seems the Moabites seized on it. It suffered much in the ruinous ravages of the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Isa. xv. 4. Jer. xlviii. 21.

JAIR. (1.) The son of Segub, the son of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah. By his grandmother, the daughter of Machir the Manassite, he fell heir to an estate eastward of Jordan, and conquered the whole country of Argob, as far as the borders of Geshuri and Maachathi. 1 Chron. li. 21—23. Num. xxxii. 40, 41. (2.) A judge of Israel, who succeeded Tola A. M. 2795, or 2837, and governed twenty-two years. He was a Gileadite, probably of Manasseh. He had thirty sons, who rode on thirty asscolts, and were lords of thirty towns, called Havoth-jair, or the towns of Jair. Judg. x. 3—5.

JA'IR, or JA'I-RUS a chief ruler of the synagogue at Capernaum. His daughter falling dangerously sick, he begged that Jesus would come, lay his hands on her, and cure her. On their way to the house, some from it met him, and told him it was needless to trouble the Saviour, as his daughter was dead. Jesus bade him fear not, but only believe. When they entered the house, they found the mourners prepared to attend the corpse to the grave, and making great lamentation. Jesus bade them be silent, as the maid was not to be given up for dead. They laughed at him. To punish their deriding of him, he put them out of the door; and when no more than her father and mother and three of his disciples were present, he took her by the hand, and bade her arise. She did so, and Jesus ordered to give her some food. Matt. ix. 18—26. Mark v. 21—43. Luke viii. 41—56.

JAMES the Great, or Elder, and JOHN the Evangelist, sons of Zebedee and Salome, were originally fishermen of Bethsaida in Galilee, and left every thing at our Saviour's call to follow him. Matt. iv. 21. Both were constituted apostles; and both were witnesses of our Lord's transfiguration. Matt. x. 2. and xvii. 2. Both sought his permission to call down fire from heaven on the Samaritans, who refused to receive him; and on this account, as well as for their bold preaching, were called Boanerges, or Bane regem, the sons of thunder. He checked their furious zeal, and told them that they knew not what unreasonable temper they were of. Luke ix. 54. Our Saviour's singular honour of them, and regard to them, occasioned their mother's solicitation that they might be made chief ministers of state in his temporal kingdom. After they had professed their ability to undergo sufferings with him, he told them, that suffer they must, but his Father had the disposal of the eminent places in his kingdom. Matt. xx. 20—24. Mark x. 35—45. They witnessed his agony in the garden. Matt. xxvi. 37. After our Saviour's resurrection, it seems they for a while returned to their business of fishing. John xxi. 2, 3. About A. D. 42 or 44, if not 49, James was taken and murdered by Herod. Acts xii. 1. He is now the pretended patron of Spain. Whether his brother John was the bridegroom at Cana of Galilee we know not; but he was our Saviour's beloved disciple. To him Jesus, as he sat next to him on the couch at the passover, intimated who should be the traitor. It is believed, that he went up to the high-priest's hall, and, being known to the servants introduced Peter; but perhaps that disciple might be Nicodemus, or Joseph of Arimathea. John xviii. 15, 16. He, at our Saviour's dying direction, took home the Virgin Mary to his house, and provided for her. He first discovered our Saviour on the shore of the Galilean sea to Peter. John xix. 25—27. and xxi. 1—7. After dining with our Saviour there, Peter asked him what should become of John? Jesus replied, that was none of his business, though he should live till his coming. The meaning of this expression, being mistaken, many of the primitive Christians imagined that John should never die; but the testimony of John himself, and of authentic history, fully contradicts this ill-grounded fancy. John xxi. 18—26. He for a time accompanied Peter, in preaching, working miracles, and enduring persecution from the Jews at Jerusalem; and at Samaria they conferred the Holy Ghost, by the laying on of hands. Acts iii—v. and viii. About A. D. 51, John was a noted pillar of the Christian church in Judea. Gal. ii. 7. It is said, he afterwards preached the gospel to the Parthians and Indians; but it is more certain that he preached some time in Lesser Asia. In Domitian's persecution, about A. D. 95, it is said, he was cast into a caldron of boiling oil, and coming out unhurt, was banished to Patmos, to be there starved to death. Under the Emperor Nerva he was recalled from exile, and returning to Ephesus, preached the gospel there till he died, about ninety or one hundred years old. He appears to have been of a most kind and affectionate temper; and yet, it is said, he from his great zeal for the honour of his lord, leaped out of the bath whenever he understood that Cerinthus, who denied the divinity of our Saviour, was in it. In his old age, he wrote three epistles, one to the Jewish Christians in general, another to a noted lady, and a third to one Gaius. Their design is to inculcate brotherly love, holy conversation, self-examination, and cautious avoiding of false teachers, particularly such, as deny the incarnation and true Godhead of our Saviour. He wrote a history of our Saviour's life, containing many things omitted by the other three evangelists, chiefly a number of excellent discourses. It is principally calculated to prove our Saviour's divinity. In the isle of Patmos he had various revelations and visions. Thence, from the mouth of Jesus, he wrote seven epistles to the Asiatic churches; and in this book of Revelation, under the visions of seals opened, trumpets sounded, and vials poured out, he exhibits the whole state of the Christian church to the end of the world. From the sublimity of his revelations, and his vindication of our Saviour's divinity, he came to be called John the Divine. The book of his travels, and of his acts, and of the Virgin Mary's death, and assumption to heaven, and the creed ascribed to him, are plainly forgeries.

2. JAMES the Less, called the brother of our Lord. He was the son of Cleophas by Mary the sister of the blessed Virgin. For the admirable holiness of his life, he was surnamed the Just. Our Saviour appeared to him, alone, after his resurrection. 1 Cor. xv. 7. About three years after Paul's conversion he was at Jerusalem, and was considered as an able supporter of the church there. Gal. i. 19. About fourteen years after, he was present at the apostolic council; and, speaking among the last, he gave his judgment, that as God, according to the ancient promises, had called a church from among the gentiles to himself, it was not proper to burden them with Jewish ceremonies; but merely to require them, for the sake of edification, in the present circumstances, to forbear eating, of things strangled, or blood; and to abstain from fornication, and meats offered to idols. To this all present agreed. About nine years after, he wrote an epistle to the Jewish believers, in which he sharply reprov'd such as pretended to faith without good works, indulging themselves in naughtiness, partiality, reviling, covetousness, oppression, vain swearing, &c. About A. D. 63, when Festus was dead, and before Albinus had arrived to succeed him, the Jews, being exceedingly enraged at the success of the gospel, Annanus, son of ANNAS, it is said, ordered James to ascend one of the galleries of the temple, and inform the people that they had without ground believed Je-mus of Nazareth to be the Messiah. He got up, and cried with a loud voice, that Jesus was the Son of God, and would quickly appear in the clouds to judge the world. Many glorified God and believed; but the Pharisees threw him over the battlement. He was sorely bruised, but rose on his knees, and prayed for his murderers, amid a shower of stones which they cast at him, till one beat out his brains with a fuller's club. To the death of this just man some of the Jews ascribed the ruin of their nation. The Talmud ascribes a variety of miracles to James, the disciple of Jesus, there called the Carpenter.

JANGLING; vain or contentious talking about trifles, or of what people do not understand. 1 Tim. i. 6.

JAN'NES and JAN'BRES, called by Pliny, Janne and Jotape, and by some Jewish writers, Johanne and Mamre, were two principal magicians of Egypt, who withstood Moses, by pretending to work as great miracles as he performed, in the change of their rods into serpents, turning the waters into blood, and producing frogs. 2 Tim. iii. 8. Exod. vii. viii. Jonathan, the Chaldee Paraphrast, fabulously says, they were Balaam's sons, and attended him when he went to Balak.

JA-NO'AH, JA-NO'HAN; a city of the Ephraimites, on their north border, and about twelve miles eastward from Shechem Josh. xvi. 6. It was taken and destroyed by Tiglathpileser, king of Assyria. 2 Kings xv. 29.

JAP'HETH, the elder son of Noah, and born A. M. 1556. Gen. x. 21. and v. 32. To reward his kind and modest covering of his father's nakedness as he lay drunk, his father blessed him, saying, that God would enlarge, and persuade him, and make him to dwell in the tents of Shem, and render the offspring of Canaan his servants. His posterity were prodigiously numerous; he had seven sons, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. Their posterity peopled the north half of Asia, almost all the Mediterranean isles, all Europe, and, possibly, most of America. How the GREEKS and ROMANS seized on the original residence of the descendants of Shem, in Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, &c.; and how the Scythians, Tartars, Turks, or Moguls, the descendants of Gog and Magog, have made themselves masters of Southern Asia, may be seen under those articles. The manner in which the Dutch, English, Portuguese, Spaniards, and Danes, have seized the islands or other settlements in Southern Asia and its adjacents, is well known. There is no country of note originally belonging to the offspring of Shem, part of Arabia excepted, that has not been, or is not now claimed or possessed by the offspring of Japheth. God has persuaded multitudes of them to become his peculiar people, while the Jewish descendants of Shem are cast off. How the CANAANITES in Canaan, Phœnicia, North Africa, Bœotia, Heraclea, Arcadia, or Italy, have been enslaved by Japheth's Grecian, Roman, Vandal, or Turkish descendants, is stated in that article. Gen. ix. 27. As Japheth, or Japetus, was the father of the Greeks, it is no wonder that he is so often mentioned in their ancient fables.

JAPH-IA, probably the same as Japha, a city belonging to the Zebulunites, surrounded with a double wall, but taken and cruelly ravaged by the Romans. Josh. xix. 12.

JAPHO. See JOPPA.

JAR'EB. We find no certain evidence that there was such a king of Assyria; perhaps it might be read the king of Jareb, because he might dwell at a place called Jareb; or the word may be rendered, the king that shall strive, i. e. fight against, and ruin them. Hos. v. 13. and x. 6.

JAR'MUTH, or JER'MUS; a city about ten miles south-west of Jerusalem, and as much north-east of Eleutheropolis, once a famed city of Judea. It was a village about 1400 years ago. Josh. x. 5.

THE BOOK OF JA'SHER, was probably some noted history of the Jewish nation, in which events were recorded with great care and integrity, but it was not inspired. Josh. x. 13. 2 Sam. i. 18.

JA-SHO-BE'AM, the Hachmonite, or Tachmonite, the same as Adino the Eznite. It seems he sat on a kind of throne at the head of David's mighty men. He in one instance attacked 800, and in another 300, and cut them off to a man: or he routed 800; slew 300 of them, and his followers slew the other 500. He, with Eleazar and Shammah, broke through the army of the Philistines, and brought David water from the well of Bethlehem. 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, 16, 17. 1 Chron. xi. 11, 18, 19. It was he who commanded the royal guard of 24,000 for the first month. 1 Chron. xxvii. 2. That he was the descendant of Benjamin by Koreh, though asserted by some authors, is more than can be proved. 1 Chron. xii. 6.

JASON, a kinsman of Paul's, and his host at Thessalonica, who hazarded his life in a mob to preserve him. It seems he afterwards removed to Rome. Acts xvii. 7. Rom. xvi. 21.

JASPER, a precious stone, or a kind of scrupus, being probably an opaque crystalline mass, debased with a mixture of earth; hence proceed its various colours of white, red, brown, and bluish green. It is somewhat like the finer marble, or the half-transparent gems. It strikes fire with steel; but has no boiling appearance when touched with aquafortis. It is found in the Indies, in Persia, Syria, Armenia, Bohemia, &c. It was the third stone in the fourth row of the high-priest's breast-plate, and might figure out saints, having much earthliness mixed with their grace. Exod. xxviii. 26. It was the first foundation of the new Jerusalem, and might represent Jesus as at once the Lord from heaven, and the fruit of the earth. Rev. xxi. 19. God is likened to a jasper, to denote his manifold and well-connected excellencies, the perpetual shining thereof, and the pleasure there is in beholding him. Rev. iv. 3. and xxi. 11. The medicinal virtues attributed to jasper are not to be depended on.

JAVAN. See GREECE.

JAVELIN. See DART.

JAW. The power of wicked men, or instruments of holding what they have, or of doing brutish and outrageous mischief, are called jaws, or jaw-teeth. Job xxix. 17. Prov. xxx. 14.

JA'ZER, or JA-A'ZER; a city about fifteen miles north from Heshbon, and a little south of Ramoth-gilead, at the foot of the mountains of Gilead, near the brook or lake of Jazer. It was given by the tribe of Gad to the Levites, but afterwards fell into the hand of the Moabites. Josh. xxi. 39. Isa. xvi. 9.

IB'LE-AM, or BI'LE-AM; a city of the western Manassites, on the border of Issachar. It seems to have been given to the Levites for Gathrimmon, but the Canaanites kept possession of it. Josh. xvii. 11, 12. 1 Chron. vi. 70. Judg. i. 27. Gur, where Ahaziah, king of Judah, was slain, was hard by Ibleam. 2 Kings ix. 27.

IB'ZAN, of the tribe of Judah, succeeded Jephthah about A. M. 2823, or 2878, and judged Israel seven years. He had thirty sons, and as many daughters, all whom were married in his lifetime. He was buried in Bethlehem, and succeeded by Elon. Judg. xii. 8—10.

ICH-A-BOD. See ELI.

I-CO'NI-UM, now COGN, was formerly the capital of Lycaonia in Lesser Asia, and stands in a most fertile plain near the lake Trogolis, which supplies it with fish. About A. D. 45, Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel here, and it is said the famous Thecla was converted. A persecution raised by the malicious Jews, obliged them to flee; but a Christian church continued about 800 years after. The ravages of the Saracens, but especially the Seljukian Turks, making it the capital of one of their four sultanies or kingdoms, reduced the Christians to a very low condition. At present it is the most noted place in Caramania, and the seat of an Ottoman Beglerbeg. It is surrounded by a strong wall of about four miles, and fortified with 108 stately towers, at equal distances; but a considerable part of the inclosed space lies waste. None but Turks are allowed to inhabit the city; but Jews, Armenians, and Christians of the Greek church, with their archbishop, live in the suburbs. Acts xiii. 51. and xiv. 1—5. and xiv. 2.

IDLE; without work; without usefulness. Exod. v. 8, 17. Matt. xx. 3, 6. Idleness was part of Sodom's sin; it brings men's outward circumstances to ruin, and induces them to be tattlers and busybodies; nor ought those given to it to be supported by the industry of others. Ezek. xvi. 49. Eccl. x. 19. 1 Tim. v. 13. 2 Thess. iii. 10. Idle words are such as neither tend to the glory of God, nor the real welfare of men. Matth. xii. 36. In God's account those are idle who are unconcerned about the great work of their salvation, as no other labour can yield comfort or advantage. Matt. x. 6.

IDOL; any thing worshipped instead of the true God; and particularly an image or representation of a true or false God. 1 John v. 21. 1 Cor. viii. 4. Idols are represented in scripture as horrors at which men ought to be terrified, 2 Chron. xv. 16; as tormenting pangs, Psal. cvi. 36. Isa. xlv. 16; as dung-gods, Deut. xxix. 17; and about forty-six other places; stumbling-blocks, Zeph. i. 3; as a shameful thing, Jer. xi. 13; as NO-

THINGS, VANITIES, Lev. xix. 4. 1 Cor. viii. 4; strange gods; new gods; mere upstart deities, and which the Hebrews had not been used to. Deut. xxxii. 16, 17. Some good authors suspect that idolatry, or worshipping of false gods, or of the true God by images of human devices, began before the deluge; and some vainly imagine that Enoch introduced it, because it is said, that in his days men began to call on or profane the name of the Lord. Soon after the flood, almost all the world were guilty of idolatry. Abraham's father's family served other gods beyond the river Euphrates. It is plain that Laban had idols, which Rachel, who also evidently loved them too well, brought along with her. These and other idols retained by some of his family, Jacob hid under an oak, that they might see them no more. Josh. xxiv. 2. Gen. xxxi. 30. and xxxv. 2—4. Probably the sun, moon, and stars, were the first objects of men's avowed idolatry, and the fire might be worshipped as a symbol of the sun. Job xxxi. 26—28. The other idols mentioned in scripture, are the Teraphim, Golden Calves, Baal, Bel, Baal-peor, Baalberith, Beelzebub, Moloch, Anammelech, Adramelech, Remphan, Dagon, Nergal, Ashima, Nibhaz, Tartack, Rimmon, Nisroch, Tammuz, Sheshach, Nebo, Meni, Gad, Mahuzim, god of forces, or protecting gods of the Papiasts, Ashtoreth, and Succoth-benoth; many of which are, no doubt, the same under different names. In process of time, celebrated parents or kings deceased, animals of various kinds, as apes and bulls; plants, stones, and, in short, whatever people took a fancy for, as whores, or even imaginary beings, came to be worshipped. Men's minds forsaking their true rest in the Most High, and finding no rest in one idol, added others: hence, while almost every nation had idols peculiar to themselves, they were ready to receive those of their neighbors. Nor did the highest pretences to philosophy in the least reform any country. The Egyptians, though high pretenders to wisdom, worshipped pied bulls, snakes, leeks, onions, &c. The Greeks had about 30,000 gods. The Gomerians deified their ancient kings and others. Nor were the Chaldeans, Romans, Chinese, &c. a whit less absurd. Nor did they stick at violating the most natural affections, by murdering multitudes of their neighbors and children, under pretence of sacrificing them to their gods. Some nations of Germany, Scandinavia, and Tartary, imagined that violent death in war, or by self-murder, was the proper method of securing the future enjoyment of their gods. In far later times, about 64,000 persons were sacrificed, in four days, at the dedication of one idolatrous temple in America.

The Hebrews never had any idols of their own; but they adopted those of the nations around. Their readiness to worship the golden calf at Sinai affords ground to believe they had practised such abomination in Egypt. Exod. xxxii. Ezek. xx. 7, 8. They afterward adopted the idols of the Moabites, Ammonites, Canaanites, Syrians, &c. During their 862 years' residence in Canaan, before the Chaldean captivity, they relapsed fourteen or fifteen times into idolatry. Judg.

ii. 2 Kings xxiv. The kingdom of the ten tribes long had idolatry for their established religion; and it was but seldom the kingdom of Judah was fully purged from it, the idolatrous high places being seldom removed. 2 Kings xvii. Ezek. xvi. xx. xxiii. Jer. iii. Since their return from Babylon, the Jews have generally abhorred idols, and suffered great hardships on that account. The Mahometans, also, are great pretenders to zeal against idolatry. The Papists' worship of the Virgin Mary, and of saints and angels unnumbered, and of the bread in the sacrament, and of relics and images, is a stumbling-block to them, and leads them to consider Christianity as sanctioning idolatry. Nor indeed are the Christians of the Greek church, generally taken, much more free from idolatry than the Papists. Covetousness, in which is implied, a setting of the affections on worldly things instead of God, and all inordinate care for the belly, or sinful love to, or trust in any creature, is idolatry in God's account, and constitutes the person guilty, an IDOLATER, or worshipper of idols. Eph. v. 5. Col. iii. 5. Phil. iii. 19.

JEALOUS; much given to suspect ADULTERY, or danger. God's jealousy, or ZEAL, denotes his distrust of creatures; his eminent care for his people and ordinances, and his readiness to punish such as injure them. Zech. i. 14. Zeph. i. 18. Exod. xx. 5. Paul's holy jealousy over the Corinthians, was an earnest concern for their welfare; and a painful fear that they had, or might do somewhat amiss. 2 Cor. xi. 7. The saints' jealousy, cruel as the grave, is an earnest desire to enjoy fellowship with Christ, and a painful fear of losing it. Sol. Song viii. 6.

JEBU-SITES; a tribe of the Canaanites that dwelt about Jerusalem, and the mountainous country adjacent. Num. xiii. 29. Joshua cut off multitudes of them, and soon after Jeru alem was taken from them; but they quickly recovered it. Judg. i. 21. When, about four hundred years after, David attempted to wrest this city from them, they rudely insulted him, as if their blind and lame were capable to defend their well fortified walls against all his army. Joab however took the city, and no doubt killed multitudes of them. Numbers, however, seem to have been spared, of which Araunah was one. 2 Sam. v. and xxiv. 16. Ekrón shall be as a Jebusite; the Philistines shall be reduced by, and incorporated with the Jewish nation; or shall be converted to Christianity by the power of Jesus, as the Jebusites were reduced by David. Zech. ix. 7.

JE-HO-AHAZ; (1.) The same as AHAZIAH, grandson of Jehoshaphat. (2.) The son of Jehu: he wickedly followed the pattern of Jeroboam the son of Nebat. To punish him and his people's wickedness, God gave them up to the fury of Hazael the Syrian, who so reduced the ten tribes, that Jehoahaz had but ten chariots, fifty horsemen, and 10,000 footmen left him in his army. After he had reigned seventeen years, from A. M. 3148 to 3165, he died, and Jehoash, who had been installed two years before, became sole king. 2 Kings xiii. (3.) JEHOAHAZ, or SHALLUM, the son of Josiah. He was not the eldest; but the people judged him the fittest to govern in that critical juncture, when Pharaoh-necho had but just killed his father, and it seems, to prevent disputes about his right, they solemnly anointed him. He had only reigned three months, when Pharaoh, returning from Carchemish a conqueror, ordered him to attend him at Riblah, stripped him of his royalty, and carried him a prisoner to Egypt, where he died; and placed Jehoiaxim his elder brother, who perhaps was then a prisoner in Pharaoh's army, king in his stead. 1 Chron. iii. 15. 2 Kings xxiii. 30—32. Jer. xxii. 11. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1—4.

JE-HO'ASH. See JOASH.

JE-HOI'A-CHIN, CO-NAH, or JE-CO-NAH, the son of Jehoiaxim, and grandson of Josiah. His father installed him when he was but eight years of age; and after his father's death, A. M. 3404, he at the age of eighteen, succeeded to the sole government. After a short and wicked reign of three months and ten days, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up and besieged Jerusalem; Jehoiachin, with Nehushta his mother, and his wives, princes, and servants, surrendered themselves; and with the principal artificers, judges and warriors, to the number of 18,000, and the treasures, and part of the vessels of the temple, were carried to Babylon. Jer. xxii. 24. 2 Kings xxiv. 8—16. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, 10. After thirty-seven years' imprisonment in Chaldea, Evil-merodach released him, and raised him to a considerable dignity. 2 Kings xxv. 27—30. Jer. lii. 31—34. Jeremiah was divinely ordered to write him childless; but either that related only to his having no children sitting on the throne of Judah, or he had adopted a variety of children; for we find Salathiel, Malchiram, Pedaiash, Shenazar, Jecamiah, Hoshama, and Nedabiah, mentioned as his children. Jer. xxii. 24—30. 1 Chron. iii. 17, 18. Jeconias, in Matt. i. 11. seems to signify Jehoiaxim.

JE-HOI'A-DA. See JOASH.

JE-HOI'A-KIM, the elder son of Josiah. When Pharaoh-necho killed Josiah, he perhaps took Eliakim prisoner: in his return home, he made him king instead of Jehoahaz, and changed his name to Jehoiaxim and laid him under a tribute of £39,603. 15s. sterling. This money Jehoiaxim exacted of his subjects, according to their ability. At twenty-five years of age he began his reign, and sat on the throne eleven years. He wickedly oppressed his subjects to procure money to build himself a palace; and kept back part of the hire of his workmen; he abandoned himself to inhumanity and avarice, Jer. xxii. 13—23: he hated the prophets, who warned him or his people to repent of their wickedness, or threatened the judgments of God against him. Urijah, one of them, fled for his life into Egypt; but Jehoiaxim sent Elnathan the son of Achbor, to bring him back; he then murdered him, and cast his corpse into the graves of the common people. Jer. xxvi. 20—23. In the fourth year of his reign, he had a copy of Jeremiah's predictions brought before him by Elishama the scribe, Delaiash the son of Shemaiah, Elmathan the son of Achbor, Gemariah the son of Shaphan, and Michaiah his son, and Zedekiah the son of Hananiah. Jehudi, who perhaps was a scribe, had scarcely read three or four leaves, when Jehoiakim, notwithstanding the intercession of Elmathan, Delaiah, and Gemariah, cut the roll with a pen-knife, and cast it into the fire; and sent Jerahmeel the son of Hammelech, Seraiah, the son of Azriel, and Shelemiah the son of Abdeel to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch; but the Lord knowing his murderous intentions, kept them out of his hands. This impious conduct hastened his destruction. Nebuchadnezzar, having routed the army of Pharaoh at Carchemish, pursued his victory, rendered himself master of Canaan and part of Phenice. Jehoiakim was taken prisoner in Jerusalem, and put in chains, to be carried to Babylon; but on his submission to the conqueror's terms, was restored to his kingdom. After he had continued three years a peaceful tributary, he thought to shake off the yoke. Nebuchadnezzar detached a part of his army against him, the rest being it seems employed in the siege of Nineveh: these, with bands of Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, terribly harassed the kingdom of Judah. After four years, Nebuchadnezzar, having taken Nineveh, came in person. Jehoiakim was taken prisoner, put to death, and his body cast into a common sewer, in the manner of the unburied carcase of an ass. 2 Kings xxiv. 2 Chron. xxxvi. Jer. xxii. 18, 19. and xxxvi. 30. Perhaps Jehoiakim is put for the brother of Jehoiakim, viz. Zedekiah; or the yokes were made under Jehoiakim, but not sent till Zedekiah was king. Jer. xxvii. 1.

JE-HOSH'A-PHAT, the son of Asa king of Judah, by Azubah the daughter of Shilhi. At thirty-five years of age, he succeeded his father, A. M. 3090, and reigned twenty-five years. To strengthen himself against the kingdom of the ten tribes, he placed strong garrisons in all the cities of Judah, and in those cities which his father had taken from the Israelites. The more his riches and honour increased, the more his heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord. In the third year of his reign, he ordered Benhall, Obadiah, Zechariah, Nathaneel, and Michaiah, princes, with Elishama and Jehoram, priests, and Shemaiah, Nathaniah, Zebadiah, Asahel, Shemiramoth, Jehonathan, Adonijah, Tobijah, and Tob-adonijah, Levites, to go through the cities of Judah, and teach the people the law of the Lord. To reward his zeal, God made his neighbours to revere him: the Philistines and Arabs brought him large presents of flocks or money; while, besides his garrisons, he had an enrolled militia of 1,160,000 under his generals Adnah, Jehohanan, Amasiah, Eliada, and Jehozabad. 2 Chron. xvii. Unhappily he joined in affinity with the wicked AHAH, and united his son Jehoram to Athaliah the daughter of Ahab. This occasioned his being at Samaria, and assisting Ahab to retake Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians; in which war, by the treacherous artifice of Ahab, he would have lost his life by the Syrian forces, had not God, at his request, caused them to leave him. On his return to Jerusalem, Jehu the son of Hanani, a prophet, rebuked him sharply for assisting Ahab, a noted idolater; and assured him, that wrath from the Lord hung over his family and kingdom on that account. Taking this faithful admonition in good part, Jehoshaphat applied himself with the utmost earnestness, to establish the best civil and religious order in his kingdom; the Sodomites, but not the high places, were removed. Scarcely was this finished, when he was informed, that a powerful league of Edomites, Ishmaelites, Hagarenes, Gibletes, Moabites, Ammonites, Amalekites, Philistines, Tyrians, and Ashurites, was formed against him; and that the army of Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, were advanced to Engedi, a place about thirty-eight miles south-east of Jerusalem. Fearing that the threatened judgments were at hand, he and his people at Jerusalem observed a solemn fast, to implore the protection of Heaven; and he himself prayed, as the mouth of the multitude, in the new court of the temple. His prayers were heard. Jahaziel, a prophet of the Lord, assured him of an easy and miraculous victory, near the rock Ziz, and on the east of the wilderness of Jeruel. The very next day, as the Hebrew singers before the army began to praise the Lord, God struck his enemies with a panic, that they murdered one another: and first the Edomites, who had a treacherous, and perhaps a principal hand in this alliance, formed to root out the Israelites from under heaven, were destroyed. Jehoshaphat and his people, had no occasion to fight: but the gathering of the spoil took them up three days: the fourth day they observed in solemn thanksgiving to God, in the valley called, from that event, the valley of Berchah, or blessing. A few months after, Jehoshaphat joined his fleet bound for Tarshish, with that of the impious Ahaziah, elder son of Ahab. According to the prediction of Eliezer, the son of Dodavah, of Maresha, the fleet was dashed to pieces by a storm before Ezion-gebar. Not very long after, Jehoshaphat, and his ally, the king of Edom, marched with the wicked Jehoram, second son of Ahab, against the Moabites, and had all perished with thirst had not Elisha procured them a miraculous supply of water. Jehoshaphat was scarcely dead, when the vengeance of God, occasioned by his alliance with the family of Ahab, in the time of his son Jehoram, and grandson Ahaziah, almost quite destroyed his family, and reduced his kingdom to the most wretched condition. 1 Kings xxii. and 2 Kings iii. 2 Chron. xviii—xx. Psal. lxxxiii.

The Valley of Jehoshaphat, was either the same with the valley of Berchah, or a valley between Jerusalem and the mount of Olives; or perhaps that mentioned by Joel, signifies no more than the valley or place where the Lord shall judge, and punish them. Joel iii. 2, 12.

JE-HOVAH, JAH, and EHYEH-ASHER-EHYEH, I am that I am, or will be what I will be, are the incommunicable names of God, and signify his absolute independency, self-existence, eternity, and being, the cause of existence to all creatures. This name seems not to have been much used in the primitive ages; it is not compounded with any of their names; nor is it found in the speeches of Job or his friends: yet when God says, that by his name JEHOVAH he was not known to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, it means, that they had not seen it so gloriously displayed in his giving a being too, or fulfilling his promises. Exod. vi. 2. This name, often rendered LORD in our Bibles, is printed in capital letters, to distinguish it from Lord, signifying a governor. It is often joined in sacred inscriptions with other words, as, Jehovah-jireh, the Lord will see, or provide; Jehovah-nisi, the Lord is my banner; Jehovah-shalom, the Lord will perfect, or send peace; and Jehovah-shammah, the Lord is there. It is also compounded with other words in a multitude of names, as in those beginning with JEHO, and many of those with Jo, and in those ending with JAH. Whenever the name JEHOVAH is given to an angel, it signifies, that he is the Angel of the Covenant, i. e. the Son of God. Nor is it given to the church, in Jer. xxxiii. 16; for the words there would be better rendered, He who shall call her, is the Lord our Righteousness; or He shall be called by her, the Lord our Righteousness. The modern Jews superstitiously decline pronouncing the name Jehovah—Jeco, Jao, Jahoh, Jaou, Jaod, and even the Juda of the Moors, seem to be but different pronunciations of JEHOVAH.

JEHU. (1.) A prophet that rebuked BAASHA and JEHOSEPHAT. 1 Kings xvi. 1, 7. 2 Chron. xix. 1, 2. (2.) The son of Jehoshaphat, and grandson of Nimshi, captain of the army to Joram king of Israel. In consequence of a divine commission given to Elijah, Elisha, about eleven years after his master's translation, sent a young prophet to anoint him to be king of Israel, as he commanded the army at Ramoth-gilead in Jehoram's absence. The young prophet called him aside from his fellow officers, took him into a private chamber, anointed him with oil in the name of the Lord; and told him, he should cut off the whole house of Ahab. The prophet immediately fled, that he might not be known. Jehu informed his fellows what had happened and they acknowledged him king. After giving orders that none should stir from the camp to carry tidings, Jehu posted off in his chariot, to surprise Joram at Jezreel. Informed of his approach, Joram sent one to meet him, and ask if all was well in the army. At Jehu's orders, the messenger joined the company. A second messenger came up and did the same. Supposing by the furious driving of the chariot, that it was Jehu his general, Joram, and Ahaziah king of Judah, who had come to visit him, set off in their chariots to meet him. Joram asked Jehu, if all things in the army were well, and at peace? Jehu told him, he ought not to expect peace while the whoredoms and witchcrafts of Jezebel his mother were so many. Joram cried to Ahaziah, that certainly a plot was laid for their life, and fled off: but Jehu killed him with an arrow shot after him; and ordered Bidkar to cast his dead body into the field of NABOTH. By his orders too, Ahaziah was pursued, and slain. As Jehu rode through Jezreel, Jezebel, with her face painted, looking over a window, asked him, if Zimri, who slew his master, had prosperity? Jehu looking up, asked, if any body within favoured him? and two or three eunuchs looked out. At his orders, they immediately threw Jezebel over the window: the horses trod her to death, and in a few minutes the dogs ate up her whole body, except some of the larger bones which Jehu ordered to be interred. Having killed all that pertained to Ahab in Jezreel, he ordered the nobles of Samaria to send him the heads of the seventy children of Ahab, who had been committed to their care. Next day he went to Samaria, and having met forty-two near relations of Ahaziah king of Judah going to visit Joram and his queen, he ordered them to be killed on the spot. A little farther, he met with Jonadab the son of Rechab, and finding him hearty in his interest, took him into his chariot, and bade him accompany him to see his zeal for the Lord. When he came to Samaria, he slew all that remained of the family of Ahab. Under pretence of honouring Baal with a very solemn festival, he ordered all the priests of Baal in the kingdom to attend in his temple, and to take especial care that not one worshipper of God was among them. They did so. He then ordered his guards to fall upon them in the temple, and kill them to a man. He broke down the image of Baal, and totally demolished his temple. To reward Jehu's labour in cutting off the idolatrous family of Ahab, and destroying Baal, God promised that he and his seed, to the fourth generation, should wear the crown of Israel; but offended with the ambition and resentment which influenced his conduct, he threatened to revenge the blood of Ahab's family on his seed. As Jehu persisted in the worship of the golden calves, and in other wickedness, God permitted Hazael king of Syria, terribly to ravage his territories. After a reign of twenty-eight years, Jehu died. A. M. 3148. 2 Kings ix. x. Hos. i. 4.

JEPHTHAH, who succeeded JAIR in judging the Hebrews. He was the son of Gilead, (not the son of Machir,) by a harlot, a native of East Mizpeh beyond Jordan. When his father's legitimate children expelled him from the family, he retired into the land of Tob, and commanded a gang of robbers. The Hebrews on the east of Jordan, having been long oppressed by the Ammonites, and knowing his valour, begged that he would be their captain, and lead them against the enemy. He reproached them with their expulsion of him from his father's house; but on their repeated entreaties, he consented to be their leader, if they would submit to him, as their chief, after the war should be ended. They gave him their oath that they would. After his instalment, he, without success, expostulated with the king of the Ammonites, on the unjustness of his pretensions to the land of Gilead: and represented, that neither Balak, nor any other, for about three hundred years, pretended to any such claim; that as the Israelites claimed no territory but what had been given them of God, he would refer the matter to a decision by the sword, unless the Ammonites gave up their groundless pretensions. As the haughty Ammonites despised these expostulations, Jephthah, animated by God, levied an army of the Hebrews, on the east of Jordan. As he prepared for battle, he rashly vowed, that if the Lord would grant him success, he would devote, or sacrifice, whatever should first meet him from his house. A battle was fought; and Jephthah being conqueror, ravaged the country of Ammon. (On his return home, his only daughter, with timbrels and dances, was the first who met him from his house. At the sight of her, Jephthah cried out that he was ruined. On hearing the matter, his daughter consented, that he should do with her according to his vow. She only begged he would allow her two months, to go up and down in the mountains, along with her companions, and bewail her virginity. After she had done with this mourning, she returned to her father, who did with her according to his vow; but whether he offered her in sacrifice, or only devoted her to perpetual virginity, is not agreed. Such as maintain the latter, contend how unlawful such sacrifice would have been; that neither he nor the priest could be ignorant that he might have redeemed her at, perhaps, no more than ten pieces of silver; that she did not bewail her death, but her virginity, which would occasion the extirpation of her father's family; and that the word relative to the yearly custom of the Hebrew girls, which we render lament, signifies to talk with, and so implied that Jephthah's daughter was in life. Those on the other side, and to which I am chiefly inclined, allow the sacrifice to have been abominable; but remark, that the law allowed of the redemption of nothing devoted under the form of a curse; that in Jephthah's age, idolatry and ignorance chiefly prevailed; that Jephthah's manner of life was highly unfavourable to a correct acquaintance with the law; that about this time the high priesthood was transmitted from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, which was probably occasioned by some horrible crime; that vows of perpetual virginity are of a far later date; that if there had been no more in it but perpetual virginity, Jephthah had, comparatively little occasion for such agony of mind, and tearing his clothes at the sight of his daughter; that the plain tendency of the whole passage leads to the conclusion that she was sacrificed; that not long after this, the story of one Iphigenia, or the daughter of Jephthah, being sacrificed by her father, was spread through no small part of the east, though a different scene was fixed for it. Be it as it may, let us believe that he acted in the sincerity of his heart; and remember that in the list of ancient worthies who obtained victories by faith, the apostle places Jephthah. Judg. xi. Heb. xi. 32. Whatever hazard and loss this victory over the Ammonites cost Jephthah, the haughty Ephraimites were so ungrateful, as to march over Jordan in a body, and threatened to burn his house, for fighting without their concurrence. He told them, he had invited them to a share in the war, but they came not. They continued their insults, and railed at the Gileadites, as a parcel of vagabonds, that had been obliged to flee their country, and settle on the east of Jordan. Enraged at this, Jephthah and his army attacked and cut off 42,000 of them. He judged Israel six years, and died about A. M. 2823 or 2878.

JE-RE-MIAH, the son of Hilkiyah, a priest, probably of the race of Ithamar, and a native of Anathoth. As God very early called him to the prophetic work, he begged to be excused because of his youth; but God promised to be with him, and render him as bold as if he were a brazen wall, in opposition to the wicked princes and people of Judah. He began his work in the thirteenth year of Josiah. The first part of his prophecy chiefly consists of a mixture of invectives against the sins of the Jews, and of alarming threatenings of heavy judgments, and of some calls to repentance, and complaints of his own afflictions. Sometimes the mind of God was represented to him by figurative emblems. By the visionary emblem of an almond branch, and boiling pot, with its face towards the north, God represented that ruinous calamities should quickly come from Chaldea on the Jewish nation. By the marring of a girdle in the bank of the Euphrates, was signified the ruinous condition of the Jews in Chaldea. By the emblem of a potter making his vessels, is figured out God's sovereign power to form and destroy the nations at his pleasure. By the breaking of a vessel on the wheel is signified the unprofitable state of the Jewish nation in Chaldea. Jer. i. xiii. xviii. and xix. Perhaps the greater part of the first nineteen chapters was pronounced before Josiah had carried his reformation to perfection; or, during it, there might remain great obstinacy in sinning, and a secret cleaving to their idols. It was also perhaps during this period of Josiah's reign, that his fellow citizens of Anathoth sought to murder him, and were threatened with ruinous vengeance on account of it. Or, rather, a great part of these prophecies relate to the time of Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim. Chap. i—xix.

When about the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, he foretold that Judah and Jerusalem should be rendered a desolation, Pashur, the son of Immer the priest, chief governor of the temple, smote him, and put him up in the stocks in the gate of Benjamin. Jeremiah assured him that he should be terribly punished in his person, and that he and his family should be carried, along with other Jews, into a wretched captivity. He complained of the slanders that were circulated about him, and cursed the day of his birth. Jer. xix. and xx. He warned the Jews to repent of their wicked courses, if they wished to prevent their ruin. The priests and false prophets attempted to stir up the princes to put him to death; but the people and princes opposed it, and observed, that Micah had predicted the desolation of Jerusalem, and the ruin of the temple, and yet Hezekiah did him no hurt; but he and his people turned to the Lord, and the judgments were prevented. Not long after, he predicted the calamities that should come upon the Egyptians, Philistines, Phœnicians, Edomites, Arabians, Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, and Persians, by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar. Jer. xxv. xlii—xlix. It was, perhaps, about this time that he formed yokes of wood, to be sent by the ambassadors of those nations to their respective masters, as a token of their servitude to Nebuchadnezzar and his son and grandson; though he did not send them till the reign of Zedekiah. Jer. xxvii. 1. During the fourth year of Jehoiakim, he, under the emblem of a cup given successively to these nations, and to the Jews, Medes, and, after all, to the Chaldeans, predicted terrible and astounding calamities which should come on them. Jer. xxv. In the ninth month of this year, he caused Baruch to write out a copy of all his prophecies which he had uttered, and read them before the people on a fast-day appointed by the king, in order to excite them to repentance. Michaiah, a young prince, informed his father, Gemariah, Delaiah, and other princes; they sent Jehudi to bring Baruch and the roll. Baruch read it to them, and they were much affected; they advised Baruch and Jeremiah to hide themselves, while they informed the king of these predictions. Scarcely had the king heard a few leaves read, when he cut and burnt the roll, and sought for Jeremiah and Baruch, to put them to death; but the Lord preserved them. At the direction of God, Jeremiah caused Baruch to write a new roll, with several threatenings not in the former, and added a circumstantial prediction of Jehoiakim's unhappy death. Jer. xxxvi. It was also during the reign of Jehoiakim, that, by trying the Rechabites with drinking of wine, he figuratively shewed the unreasonable nature of the Jews' rebellion against the commands of Jehovah, their Father; and predicted suitable reward to the Rechabites, for their obedience to their earthly parent. chap. xxxv. Towards the end of this reign, he denounced judgments on Jehoiakim, for his pride, oppression, and other wickedness; and soon after, on Jehoiachin, and the rulers of church and state in Judah. Chaps. xxii. and xxiii. In the beginning of Zedekiah's reign, he delivered the yokes, emblematic of slavery, to the ambassadors of the various nations concerned, to be sent to their masters. To represent the hastening ruin and slavery of the Jews, he wore a yoke and chain on his own neck, and advised Zedekiah to submit to bondage as the means of escaping ruin. Hananiah the son of Azur, of Gibeon, a false prophet, broke this yoke, and told the people present, in the court of the temple, that so the Lord would in two years break or finish the bondage of the nations to the Chaldeans. Jeremiah ironically wished it might be as he had said, but hinted there was little ground to expect it; and soon after told Hananiah, that his uttering falsehood in the name of the Lord should be punished with death that very year; which accordingly happened. Chaps. xxvii. and xxviii. About this time he had his vision of two baskets of figs; the one very good, and the other very bad; by which was represented the piety and happiness of many that had been carried captive to Babylon along with Jehoiachin, and the wickedness and ruin of those who remained in Jerusalem. Chap. xxiv. Soon after, he sent a letter to the captives in Babylon, advising them to cultivate fields, and build houses, and pray for the peace of the country, as they might expect seventy years' continuance in Babylon, at the end of which they should be delivered; and denounced terrible judgments of burning to death by the Chaldeans, to Ahab the son of Kolaiah, and Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, two false prophets. This letter he sent by the hand of Elasah the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah the son of Hilkiah, whom Zedekiah sent probably with his tribute to Nebuchadnezzar. On account of this letter, Shemaiah, a Nehelamite, (or dreamer,) informed Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah, the priest at Jerusalem, and desired him to put Jeremiah in the stocks as a madman. This letter was read to Jeremiah; and he predicted the ruin of Shemaiah and his family. Chap. xxix. Twice this same Zephaniah was sent by Zedekiah to Jeremiah, to beg his prayers for the kingdom, as it was in danger from the Chaldeans; but he assured the king that the city and nation should be destroyed for their wickedness. Chap. xxxi. and xxxvii. This happened about the ninth year of Zedekiah. His warnings had such effect, that Zedekiah and his people covenanted to leave off their oppressive detention of their servants; but they had scarcely dismissed them, when they forced them back; on which account Jeremiah predicted God's giving the sword a commission to destroy them. Chap. xxxiv. When the Chaldeans raised the siege of Jerusalem, to go to fight the Egyptians, Jeremiah assured the Jews, they need expect no real advantage from the Egyptians, and that the Chaldeans would take Jerusalem, and burn it with fire. Meanwhile, Jeremiah preparing to leave the city, Urijah, the son of Shelamiah, apprehended him, as if he had intended to surrender himself to the Chaldeans. The princes cast him into the dungeon. Being sent for, he told Zedekiah that he should fall into the hands of the king of Babylon; and begged he might not be returned to his dungeon, as he had given no offence. He was allowed to continue in the court of the prison. But Shephatiah the son of Mattan, and Gedaliah the son of Pashur, and two other princes, offended with his faithful predictions, urged Zedekiah to put him to death. Zedekiah bade them do with him as they pleased. They threw him into a dungeon, whose bottom was a deep mire, into which Jeremiah sank; but Ebedmelech soon after procured his liberty from thence, and he was returned to the court of the prison, and had a certain supply of food allowed him every day: He predicted Ebedmelech's preservation: he told Zedekiah that his surrendering himself to the Chaldeans would save himself and his capital; but if he did not surrender, it should be destroyed, and himself taken and cruelly treated. Chap. xxxvii. and xxxviii. It was during, or about the time of his imprisonment, that he foretold the happy return of the Jews from their mournful captivity; and bought a field from Hanameel his cousin, and laid up the writings in an earthen vessel, as a token that he believed his seed should return and possess it. Jer. xxx—xxxii. When Jerusalem was taken, he was relieved; and Nebuzar-adan offered him his choice, either to go to Chaldea, and be there well provided for, or to abide in Canaan with GEDALIAH. He chose to remain with Gedaliah. After that prince was basely murdered, Johanan the son of Kareah, and his followers, desired Jeremiah to consult the Lord whether they should go to Egypt or not. He, in God's name, charged them with their dissimulation, and warned them not to go to Egypt; but they pretended, that not the Lord, but Baruch, had directed him to say these things, and forced him along with them into Egypt. There, without success, he rebuked their idolatry, and threatened them with ruin from the hand of the Chaldeans. Jer. xv. 10—14, and xxxix—xli. After prophesying above forty years, he died; but where, or in what manner, we know not.

Besides his book of prophecies, the last chapter of which was added by some other hand, Jeremiah wrote the book of LAMENTATIONS. Those which he composed on the occasion of Josiah's death, we suppose are lost: and that those which remain, are what he composed on the destruction of Jerusalem. They consist of five chapters. In the first two, he bewails the miseries of the siege: in the third, his own particular afflictions; in the fourth he bewails the ruin of the temple and city, and the miseries of all ranks, the king, princes, and Nazarites and denounces ruin on the Edomites for their cruelty: in the fifth, he further deplores the misery of his nation, and prays for its deliverance. He chiefly insists on subjects mournful and afflictive; but has here and there the clearest displays of free grace, as in chaps. iii. xxiii. xxx. xxxi. xxxii. and xxxiii. His style is generally very plain, frequently enlivened with bold figures, and is tender and affecting to admiration. His Lamentations, and part of his prophecy, as chap. iv. 19—26, and ix. 1, are pathetic. Every letter seems written with a tear; every word is as the sound of a breaking heart; and the writer appears to be a man of sorrows, who scarcely ever breathed but in sighs, or spoke but in groans.

A prophecy relative to the purchase of the potter's field for thirty pieces of silver, found in Zech. xi. is ascribed to Jeremiah. Matt. xxvii. 9. Perhaps Jeremiah might utter that prediction; Matthew does not say that he wrote it; and it might be again uttered, and also written, by Zechariah; or, as Jeremiah anciently stood in the front of the prophetic writings, the Jews might call the whole book by his name, as they did the books of Moses by their first word; or, as the ancient Greek copies were often full of contractions, perhaps zou was altered into jou. Or the word Jeremiah may be an addition of the transcribers, as well as Cainan. Luke iii. 36.

JER1-CHO, a noted city of the Benja-mites, nearly eight miles west from Jordan, and nineteen east from Jerusalem, and a little southward from the lot of Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 1, 7. It lay lower than Jerusalem, Luke x. 30; it was extremely fertile, and was noted for palm-trees, and for the best kind of balm; was much infested with venomous serpents. Jericho was the first city that Joshua took in a miraculous manner; he devoted every person, save Rahab and her family, to death, and all the wealth to the fire, or to the Lord; predicted that the man who should rebuild it, should lose his eldest son as he laid the foundation, and his youngest as he raised the gates. Though another city of the same name, or called the city of Palm-trees, was built near it, in or before the days of Ehud, and from which the Kenites went up. Judg. iii. 12. and i. 16. yet, for about five hundred and thirty years, no man dared to rebuild Jericho itself. At last, in the days of Ahab, when men had cast off all fear of God, Hiel, a Bethelite, rebuilt it, and lost his sons Abiram and Segub, according to the tenor of Joshua's curse. 1 Kings xvi. 34. After it was rebuilt, there seems to have been no fear to inhabit it; and there was here a noted college of young prophets, for whose benefit Elisha cured the bad taste of the water, and the barrenness of the soil, which, possibly, had followed Joshua's curse. 2 Kings ii. Great numbers of priests and Rabbins often dwelt in it. In Christ's time, it was a splendid city, and one of the seats of the courts for government of the Hebrews. Near it, our Lord cured two, if not three, blind-men. Mark ix. Luke xix. If it was not almost surrounded with hills, it had one that as it were hung over it. Since the Romans destroyed it, it has made no great appearance. It is now a poor village of about thirty houses.

JE-RO-BOAM, the son of Nebat and Zeruah of Zereda, in the tribe of Ephraim. Solomon observing him to be a bold and enterprising youth, appointed him to levy the tax from the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. Ahijah the prophet, having found him, rent his garment into twelve parts, and gave Jeroboam ten of them, as a token that God would make him king over ten of the Hebrew tribes. He, without waiting for Solomon's death, began to prepare the people for a revolt. Being informed of it, Solomon sought to apprehend him, but he fled into Egypt, whose king, Shishak, was displeased with Solomon. Provoked with the haughty answer of Jeroboam to their petition for redress of their burdens, ten of the tribes revolted, and set up Jeroboam, who was just returned from Egypt, for their king. To awe his subjects into proper subjection, he fortified Shechem, where he was made king, and rebuilt Penuel. God had promised to establish the kingdom to him and his seed, on condition they would walk in the ways of king David. Instead of regarding these terms, he, fearing that the frequent attendance of his subjects at Jerusalem, in the worship of God, might issue in their return to their allegiance to the family of David, formed two golden calves; placed the one at Bethel in the south part of his kingdom, and the other at Dan on the north : and ordered his subjects not to burden themselves with travelling to Jerusalem, but to worship the God who had brought them out of the land of Egypt, as represented by these calves. He built high places, and made priests of the lowest of the people, regardless whether they were Levites or not. He appointed a solemn feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, which was a month after the feast of tabernacles.

When he had assembled the people to commence the worship of his idols, he went up to the altar at Bethel, to offer sacrifices thereon. A prophet from Judah, (but not Iddo, who lived a considerable time after) cried out, that in some future time, one Josiah, a descendant of David, should pollute that altar, burning thereon the bones of the idolatrous priests that should serve at it; in token whereof, it should be now rent, and the ashes thereof poured out. Jeroboam stretched out his hand, and gave orders to apprehend the prophet; but his hand was immediately so withered, that he could not draw it in; the altar was rent, and the ashes poured on the ground. At Jeroboam's request, the prophet, by prayer, procured the healing of his arm; but refused to eat his food, or accept his present, as the Lord in token of his detestation of the place, had forbade him to eat or drink in it, or to return by the way he came to it: but by the false representations of a lying prophet, he was brought back, and decoyed to eat and drink. To punish his disobedience, a lion soon after met him and killed him, but touched not his ass. None of these alarming events in the least reformed Jeroboam. He continued to oblige his subjects to follow his idols, and so established that idolatry which at last ruined the nation. Nor did Providence forbear to punish him; his best subjects forsook his dominions; and retired into the kingdom of Judah: he had almost constant wars with the family of David, Rehoboam, and Abijah, in which he had 600,000 of his subjects cut off in one battle. His only pious son, Abijah, fell sick. Fearing to go himself, being unwilling to set an example of consulting the prophets of the Lord, he sent his wife in disguise to consult Abijah if he should recover. She received an awful denunciation of death on her child, and of ruin on the whole family. Jeroboam died, after a reign of twenty-two years: his son Nadab succeeded him, and, in the second year of his reign, was murdered by Baasha at the siege of Gibbethon, the whole family destroyed in a most inhuman manner, and their carcases left to be eaten by the dogs and wild beasts. 1 Kings xi. 26—40. xii—xv. 2 Chron. x. xiii.

2. JE-RO-BOAM, the son of Joash, and great grandson of Jehu, began his reign about A. M. 8179, and reigned forty-one years. He imitated the former Jeroboam in his idolatrous worship of the calves. God however, by him, according to the predictions of the prophet Jonah, restored the kingdom of the ten tribes to its greatest splendor. All the countries on the east of Jordan he reduced. It appears from the writings of Hosea and Amos, that idleness, effeminacy, pride, oppression, injustice, idolatry, and luxury, mightily prevailed in his reign. Nor was it long after his death, before the Lord, according to the predictions of Amos, cut off his family with the sword. It was twenty-three years after his death, before his son Zachariah could get himself settled on the throne; and in six months, he, and the whole family of Jehu were murdered. 2 Kings xiv. and xv. Hos. i. 4, &c. Amos vii. &c.

J E-RUB-BA'AL, or JERUBBESHETH, the same as GIDEON.

J E-RU-SA'LEM, JE'BUS, or SA'LEM, the most noted city of Canaan, about twenty-five miles westward of Jordan, and forty-two east of the Mediterranean sea. It was built on, and had hills around it. Some have thought it as ancient as the days of Melchizedek, and to have been his capital; but it is far more certain, that it was one of the more powerful kingdoms of Canaan, in the days of Joshua, who defeated Adoniselek the king of it; but that he reduced the city, is not said. It was partly given to the tribe of Judah, and partly to the Benjamites. Josh. xv. 63. and xviii. 28. Not long after Joshua's death, the tribe of Judah took and burnt it. Judg. i. 8. The Jebusites rebuilt and fortified it to such a degree, that they thought their blind and lame sufficient to defend it against all David's forces. David, however, by means of Joab, made himself master of it. He built a new city on the north-west of the former; and a valley ran from west to east between the two hills of Zion on the south, and Acra on the north: and over against the north-east end of Zion, the temple was built on mount Moriah. Under David and Solomon, this city was exceedingly enlarged. We find ten or eleven gates of it mentioned, which are supposed to have been situated in the following manner: the sheep-gate, near to which was the sheep-market, on the north-east, and northward of the temple; the fish-gate, at some considerable distance to the westward; the old gate, or gate of Damascus, still further westward, and which is perhaps the same as the high gate of Benjamin; the gate of Ephraim, on the north-west; the valley gate, at the west end; the dung-gate, on the south-west; east from it, the fountain gate: on the south-east corner, the water gate; and at the east end, south of the temple, the horse-gate; and the Miphkad, or prison-gate. Jerusalem never seems to have been more than four miles and a half, within the walls, if originally so much. On these walls towers were built, 2 Chron. xvi. 9; the tower of Meah, on the east; of Hananeel, on the north-east; of Hattanoirim, or the furnaces, on the west; and of Ophel, on the south. The city had but a scanty supply of water; and that was brackish. In order to prevent Sennacherib from having sufficient water in the siege, Hezekiah brought the stream of Gihon, which used to run along the south of the city, into it, and caused it to run straight eastward. Pilate brought water from Etam, by an aqueduct, into the city. Being chosen as the residence of the symbols of the Divine Presence, or the Holy City, Jerusalem became as it were, common to all the tribes of Israel; they visited it thrice a year at the solemn feasts. Under Rehoboam, it was taken, and pillaged by Shishak. 1 Kings xiv. 26, 27. 2 Chron. xii. 2-9. Under Amaziah, it was taken by Joash King of Israel. 2 Kings xiv. 2 Chron. xxv. No doubt the Assyrians took it in the time of Manasseh. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. Pharaoh-necho entered it; but we do not find that he plundered it, when he made Jehoiakim king. Nebuchadnezzar ravaged it more than once, and, after a siege of about two years, burned it with fire, in the 11th year of Zedekiah. 2 Kings xxiv. and xxv. 2 Chron. xxxvi. lii. After it had lain almost in ruins about one hundred and thirty-six years, Nehemiah, together with Eliashib the high-priest, and a great number of others, repaired its walls, and it became populous, as in former times. Long after, Ptolemy took it by a stratagem, and carried off vast multitudes of the inhabitants to Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes ravaged it, and slew about 40,000, and sold as many more to be slaves. Two years after, Apollonius took it, and destroyed multitudes of the inhabitants. Many of the survivors left it to the heathen, and their idolatries. Judas Maccabeus retook it, and built a third part on the north side, which was chiefly inhabited by artificers. Pompey, the Roman, took it about sixty years before our Saviour's death. About twenty-four years after, it was taken by Socius the Roman, and Herod. About A. D. 70, after a most miserable siege, it was reduced to a heap of ruins by Titus. Fifty or sixty years after, a new city was built on Mount Calvary, where was for some ages a Christian church; but the Jews were not allowed to come near it. About A. D. 300, Julian, the apostate emperor, to falsify our Saviour's prediction, encouraged the rebuilding of the city and temple; but alarming convulsions of nature, deterred them from proceeding. About A. D. 614, the Persians took Jerusalem, and 90,000 of the Christian inhabitants were sacrificed to the malice of the Jews; but it was quickly retaken by Heraclius the Roman emperor, and the malice of the Jews was retaliated on their heads. In A. D. 637, the Arabic Saracens seized on it. In 1079, the Seljukian Turks took it from them. In 1099, Godfrey of Bouillon, with his European crusaders, wrested it from these. In 1187, Saladin, the sultan of Egypt took it from the Christian crusaders. In 1517, the Ottoman Turks took it from the Egyptians, and remain still masters of it. At present it is a place of three miles about, poor, and thinly inhabited. On Mount Moriah, there is built, by whom, is not known, a mock temple, inclosed by a court of five hundred and seventy paces in length, and three hundred and seventy in breadth; and where the holy of holies stood, is a Mahometan mosque. No Christian dares enter this inclosure, under pain of death; but those of different denominations, viz. Papists, Greeks, Armenians, visit the church of our Lord's sepulchre, with abundance of idle ceremonies. It seems that about the beginning of the millennium, Jerusalem, with the Jews in it, shall sustain a terrible siege from the armies of Gog and Magog; but the besiegers shall be divinely destroyed. Luke xix. 41-44. and xxi. 24. Zech. xiv. 1-5.

The gospel church is called Jerusalem: In her is the peculiar presence and ordinances of God; in her the tribes of redeemed men meet, and serve him. Oh! how beautiful and compact her form! How firm her foundation! How strongly fortified and protected, by the laws, perfections, and providences of God! How rich, wealthy, and free, her true members! How readily they welcome others to reside with them! Gal. iv. 26. Perhaps the heavenly state of glory is called Jerusalem, or the New Jerusalem, for similar reasons. Rev. iii. 12.

JESSE, the son of Obed, and grandson of Boaz. His sons were Eliab, Abinadab, Shimea, Nathaneel, Raddai, Ozem, and David. His daughters were Zeruiah the mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, and Abigail the mother of Amasa. 1 Chron. iii. 13-16. From his family the most and best of the Hebrew kings, and even the Messiah, proceeded. 1 Sam. xvi. 1 Chron. iii. 1. As, by reason of his extreme old age, he was unable to attend David in his exile, David placed him and his wife under the protection of the king of Moab. It is said that the Moabites murdered them, and so drew David's resentment on themselves. 1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4. 2 Sam. viii.

JESUS. See JOSHUA the son of Nun; CHRIST; GOD.

JETHRO; either the son of, or the same with Reuel, a descendant of Abraham, and priest of Midian. From his sacrificing when he came to visit Moses at the foot of Sinai, it is probable that the true worship of God remained in his family. He had a son called Hobab, and seven daughters, one of which, Zipporah by name, married Moses. It is probable that he continued with the Hebrews, after he had got a set of new officers established among them, till they were departing from Sinai; and then left Hobab with Moses. Exod. ii. and xviii. Numb. x.

JEWEL; a precious and costly ornament of gold, silver, &c. Jewels were worn on the forehead, nose, ears, and hands, especially in the service of idols. Ezek. xvi. 14, 17. God's people are his jewels, or peculiar treasure; they are dear to him, rendered glorious by his righteousness and grace; he carefully preserves them; and by them he shews forth his honour, greatness, and wealth. Mal. iii. 17. The lips of knowledge are as a precious jewel; prudent and sensible speech is valuable and honourable. Prov. xx. 15. A fair woman without discretion is like a jewel of gold in a swine's snout: she makes but a ridiculous appearance, and debases her comeliness by her filthy practices. Prov. xi. 22.

JEWES. There is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, in Christ: none is regarded before God on account of any outward circumstances; and now, under the gospel, all have equal access to him, and warrant to enjoy fellowship with him in all the blessings of grace and glory. Gal. iii. 28. Col. iii. 11. A Jew outwardly, is one who is a descendant of Jacob, or a professor of the Jewish religion. A Jew inwardly, is a real believer in and servant of God, answerable to his profession. See HEBREWS; JUDAH.

JEZE-BEL, the daughter of Ethbaal king of Zidon, and wife of king Ahab. She, it seems, used witchcraft; and after her husband's death, if not before it, committed whoredom. She was so zealous for idolatry, that she maintained, at her own expence, four hundred priests of the grove, sacred to Ashtorath; while her husband maintained four hundred and fifty for Baal. She instigated her husband to murder the prophets of God, wherever they could be found. Enraged at Elijah for the slaughter of the four-hundred and fifty idolatrous priests of Baal, she vowed to kill him; but his flight prevented her. In the most unjust and cruel manner, she murdered Naboth, and procured his vineyard for Ahab. 1 Kings xvi. xviii. xix. and xxi. At last, according to the prediction of Elijah, she was thrown out of a window by the wall of Jezreel, and trodden to death by horses. Immediately the dogs devoured her body, that nothing remained to be buried, but her scull, her feet, and the palms of her hands. 2 Kings ix. 30—37.

The name JEZEBEL has often been proverbially used to signify any woman excessively cruel, wicked, or given to idolatry. In this sense perhaps it is applied to that wicked woman in the church of Thyatira, who so diligently seduced people to commit fornication, and eat things sacrificed to idols. Rev. ii. 20.

JEZREEL; a celebrated city of the western Manassites, situated on the south border of Issachar. The beautiful plain of Jezreel, now Esdraelon, of about ten miles in length, lay near it. Ahab had his palace in Jezreel, and here his family was extirpated: but revenged on Jehu the blood which he had shed in Jezreel, because he cut them off, not in obedience to God, but from a selfish desire to obtain the throne. 1 Kings xxi. 2 Kings ix. and x. Hos. i. 4. See HOSEA.

IF, is used to express, (1.) A condition. Deut. xxviii. 15. Luke ix. 23. (2.) A supposition. Rom. iv. 2. (3.) The reason of a thing. It signifies, (1.) Surely: in this sense it is taken in oaths and asseverations; and supposes an imprecation of something hurtful and destructive, if what is threatened, promised, or asserted, do not prove true. Num. xiv. 23. Heb. iii. 11. (2.) Seeing. Gen. xxviii. 20. (3.) Whether or not. Gen. viii. 8. (4.) When. Judg. xxi. 21. John xii. 32.

IGNOMINY; shame; slander. Prov. xviii. 3.

IGNORANCE. (1.) Want of the true knowledge of God and his truths. Eph. iv. 18. (2.) Mistake; surprise. Lev. iv. 2, 13. Heathens are ignorant; destitute of the true knowledge of God. Acts xvii. 23. Wicked teachers are ignorant; they know not what they ought to teach others. Isa. lvi. 10. Paul sinned ignorantly against Christ before his conversion, not knowing the truth of the Christian religion. 1 Tim. i. 13. Peter and John were ignorant, i. e. not trained up in the schools of polite learning. Acts iv. 13. Abraham in heaven is ignorant of his children on earth; he neither knows their case, acknowledges, nor helps them. Isa. lxiii. 16.

ILLUMINATED; endowed with the saving knowledge of Christ and divine things. Heb. x. 32.

IL-LYR'I-CUM; a country on the east of the gulf of Venice: about four hundred and eighty miles in length, and one hundred and twenty in breadth. It has Austria and part of Hungary on the north, Mysia or Servia on the east, and part of Macedonia on the south. Counting from north-west to south-east it was divided into Sclavonia, Bosnia, Dalmatia, and Albania; but sometimes it was taken in a more extensive sense. To relate the reduction of this country by Cadmus, by Philip the father of Alexander, or by the Romans; and its ravages by the Quadi, Goths, and Huns, and by the Ottoman Turks, under whom the most of it is at present; would be to little purpose in this work. Here the gospel was preached, and a Christian church planted by Paul. The Centuriators of Magdeburgh trace their bishops through eight centuries: and to this day there are not a few in it who have the name of Christians. Rom. xv. 19.

IMAGE, the representation or likeness of a thing; as pictures or statues are of men. Christ is the image of the invisible God: as God's Son, he possesses the same nature as his Father, and resembles him in power; and in his person, God-man and mediatorial office, he is a bright representation of all the perfections of God. Heb. i. 3. Col. i. 13. Man was made in the image of God, he resembled God in the spiritual and immortal nature of his soul, and in his true knowledge, righteousness, and holiness; and in his dominion over the creatures. Gen. i. 26, 27. Man, with respect to his wife, is the image of God, in respect of dominion and power. 1 Cor. xi. 7. We are born in the image of Adam; like him in our natural form, and in our rebellion against God, Gen. v. 3; and we bear the image of Christ, and are renewed after it, when our corrupt nature is changed, and we are therein made like God in spiritual knowledge, righteousness, holiness, and every other grace. 1 Cor. xv. 49. Col. iii. 10. All images in worship are expressly condemned, and are represented as teachers of falsehood, as none can justly represent any divine person. Exod. xx. 4. Jer. x. 3—16. Hab. ii. 18. Psal. cxv. 4—8. and cxxxv. 15—18. Many of the heathen images of their gods were pictures of human and brutal animals unnaturally blended. Some were monstrously large. That of Belus, erected by Nebuchadnezzar in the plain of Dura, was at least ninety feet high, and nine feet thick. Dan. iii. 1. That of Apollo at Rhodes, was almost one hundred and twenty-eight feet high; and the tallest ships of those times might sail between its legs. The image of the wicked, which God despieth, is their outward appearance, glory, and happiness. Psal. lxxiii. 20. The image of the beast, is a likeness to the form of the heathen empire, or the shadow of the Roman empire in that of Germany. Rev. xiii. 14, 15.

IMAGINE; to form a representation in our mind; to devise. Psal. xxxviii. 12.

IMAGINATION denotes, (1.) The first ideas, purposes, and inclinations of the soul. Gen. vi. 5. (2.) Corrupt reasonings. 2 Cor. x. 5. In several places, the original word might be rendered stubbornness. Jer. iii. 17, &c.

IMMEDIATELY; in a moment; in a short time. John v. 9. Luke xix. 11.

IMMORTAL; that which does not or cannot die. God is immortal, and only hath immortality; he hath life in and of himself, and is necessarily secure against death, hurt, or ruin of any kind. 1 Tim. i. 17. and vi. 16. The eternal blessedness of the saints is called immortality; it can never cease, and is free from such pain, corruption, or unsightliness, as attend death. Rom. ii. 7; and it is brought to light, i. e. more clearly discovered by the gospel-dispensation. 2 Tim. i. 10. Our mortal body shall put on immortality, when it shall gloriously rise from the dead, and be no more subject to dissolution or wasting. 1 Cor. xv. 53.

IMMUTABILITY; unchangeableness. Heb. iv. 17, 18.

IMPART; to bestow of one's fulness on others. Luke iii. 11. The apostles were willing to impart their souls, spending their strength, exerting their skill, and exposing their life, to edify their hearers. 2 Thes. ii. 8.

IMPEDIMENT in speech, is that which prevents a person from speaking plainly, and makes him stutler or stammer. Mark vii. 32.

IMPENITENT; not disposed to repent of sins committed. Rom. ii. 5.

IMPERIOUS; disposed to bear rule proudly. Ezek. xiv. 30.

IMPLACABLE; scarcely to be pacified or reconciled. Rom. i. 31.

IMPLEAD; to charge with crimes before a judge. Acts xix. 38.

IMPORTUNITY; earnestness in requesting. It might be translated shamelessness. Luke xi. 8.

IMPOSE; to lay or bind upon one. Heb. ix. 10.

IMPOSSIBLE; what cannot be done. In respect of God's nature, it is impossible for him to lie, or deny himself. Heb. vi. 18. Tit. i. 2. In respect of his power, nothing good is impossible to him. Luke i. 37. and xviii. 27. In respect of God's purposes and providential dispensations, it is impossible that offences should not come, or that the elect should be deceived. Luke xvii. 1. Matt. xxiv. 24. In respect of his attendant power, nothing miraculous was impossible to the apostles. Matt. xvii. 20. That is impossible for men, which is above their strength. Matt. xix. 16.

IMPOTENT; weak; diseased; without strength in the legs, feet, &c. John v. 8.

IMPOVERISH; to make poor; to carry off wealth from one. Jer. v. 17.

IMPRISON; to shut up in prison. Acts xxiii. 19.

IMPUDENT; shameless in sinning. Whores, and persons bold in wickedness, are impudent. Prov. vii. Ezek. iii. 7.

IMPUTE; to account to one, in law-reckoning, what himself, or another in his room, hath done, in order to reward or punish him for it. We have righteousness without works imputed to us, when the obedience and sufferings of Jesus Christ in our stead, are legally reckoned to the account of us guilty sinners, to render us righteous in law before God as a judge. Rom. iv. 6, 11. Sin is imputed, when one is charged with it, in order to his suffering of punishment for it. 2 Sam. xix. 19. Lev. xvii. 4; and the not imputing it, imports the free and full forgiveness of it. Rom. v. 18. In order to warrant such imputation, the actor, and the one to whom it is imputed, must be one either really or legally. The Chaldean king imputed his power to his god; he believed that his idol had assisted him in conquering the nations. Hab. i. 11.

IN; the midst of a thing, or having some very close connection with it. God is in Christ; is one with him as God; has the closest connection, is well pleased with, and reconciled to men in him: and Christ is in him; has the same nature as his Father. John xiv. 10. 2 Cor. v. 19. God is in all the saints, is specially united to, and dwells in them by his Spirit. Eph. iv. 6. God purposed in Christ; connected with him as our covenant-head, he purposed to effect our whole salvation through Christ. Eph. iii. 11. The law of the Spirit of life is in Christ; the new covenant is established with him; he is the great agent in it, and the means of its operation. The Holy Ghost, as the Spirit of Christ, operates in us, by uniting us to and maintaining our fellowship with Christ. Rom. viii. 2. To believe or trust in Christ, or in God, or in his name, is, in a way of receiving Christ, and God in him, as the Husband and Saviour of our souls, offered in the promises, to expect from his perfections, relations, and work, whatever is good and necessary for us. John xiv. 1. To live, move, and have our being in God, is to exist and act by virtue of our connexion with him, and by his supporting and actuating influence. Acts xvii. 28. Col. i. 8. The truth is in Christ: He is the substance and exemplification of it; by his death it is ratified; and in beholding and receiving of him, its light and glory are perceived, and its power felt. Eph. iv. 21. 2 Cor. i. 21. We are blessed, chosen, called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and obtain an inheritance in Christ; our whole salvation was concerted with him as our Surety, purchased by him as our Ransomer, is lodged in him as our Treasury, and in a state of union to him, we share of it; and the enjoyment of him, as the Lord our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, is the sum of it. Eph. i. 3, 4, 6, &c. We are in Christ, and he in us. He dwells in our hearts by faith, and we are closely united to him as our Surety, our Head, Husband, and Root of spiritual influence. John xvii. 26. Rom. xvi. 7. But persons are said to be in Christ, if they are members of his visible church, and in outward profession joined to him. John xv. 6. To glory in the Lord, is to make him the object of our spiritual boasting. 1 Cor. i. 31. To be strong in the Lord; faithful in the Lord; to labour in the Lord; and salute others in the Lord; is, in a state of union to Christ's person, and exercise of daily receiving out of his fulness, to study faithfulness and diligence in the work of preaching the gospel, or practising holiness; and to salute others from love to the Lord, and on account of their bearing his image. Eph. vi. 10. 1 Cor. iv. 17. Rom. xvi. 12, 22. To be dead in sin, or to perish in iniquity, is to be under the reigning power of it, and to be dead and perish by means of it. Eph. ii. 1. Josh. xxii. 20. John viii. 21. The accurate consideration of the sense of this preposition IN, is often of great use to lead to the true meaning of many texts of Scripture.

INCENSE; that which is ordinarily so called, is a precious and fragrant gum, issuing from the frankincense-tree. The incense used in the Jewish offerings, at least that which was burnt on the altar of incense, and before the ark, was a costly mixture of sweet spices, stacte, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense, beaten very small. None but priests were to burn it; nor was any, under pain of death, to make any like it. This incense was burnt twice a-day on the golden altar. On the fast of expiation, two handfuls of it were burnt before the ark, in the Holy of Holies, to prevent curious and dangerous prying into the ark. By it was signified, Christ's precious, powerful, and constant intercession within the vail, on the ground of his own righteousness, which renders us and our spiritual services acceptable to God. Exod. xxx. 34-38. Lev. xvi. 12-14. Acceptable prayers and praises are called incense and offering. Mal. i. 11. Psal. cxli. 2.

INCENSED. To be incensed against one, is to be filled with rage and enmity. Isa. xli. 11. and xlv. 24.

INCHANT. See DIVINATION.

INCLINE. The ear is inclined, when it carefully hearkens. Prov. v. 12. The heart is inclined, when it earnestly affects, desires, or studies. Judg. ix. 3. The house of a harlot inclines to death. Men who go into it, or indulge themselves in whoredoms, confirm spiritual death, and hasten forward to temporal and eternal death. Prov. ii. 18.

INCLOSE; (1.) To compass; shut up round about, as with a wall or hedge. Psal. xxii. 16. (2.) To fix in the middle of a surrounding piece of metal. Exod. xxxix. 6. The church is inclosed; protected by God, and consecrated to his sole honour and use. Sol. Song iv. 12. Men are inclosed in their own fat, when they can scarcely see for corpulency; when their wealth abounds on every side, and their hearts are stupid, and destitute of the fear of God. Psal. xvii. 10. God incloses men's ways with hewn stone, when, by outward calamities, he bereaves them of liberty, ease, or hope of deliverance. Lam. iii. 9.

INCONTINENT; given to unchastity and intemperance. 2 Tim. iii. 3.

INCONTINENCY; an inability to repress desire of the lawful pleasures of marriage. 2 Cor. vii. 5.

INCORRUPTIBLE; that which cannot grow worse, or rot. Corruption puts on in corruption, when our once corrupted and rotten bodies are rendered altogether free from all vileness or tendency towards death. 1 Cor. xv. 50.

INCREASE. See GROW.

INCREDIBLE; what cannot be believed. The resurrection of the dead is not incredible; God's power and wisdom can effect it; his justice and goodness require it; his word plainly foretels it; and his providence has already given pledges of it. Acts xxvi. 8.

INCURABLE; what cannot be healed, 2 Chron. xxi. 18; or what can hardly be healed. Jer. xxx. 12.

INDEED. (1.) Truly; assuredly. Deut. ii. 15. (2.) Eminently; in a very singular manner. So Christ makes free indeed, with a glorious liberty, which can never be taken away. John viii. 31, 36. His flesh and blood are meat indeed, suited to every person, and are quickening to the soul; secure everlasting life and strength; and are infinitely sweet and substantial. John vi. 56. And an Israelite indeed, is one truly and eminently holy, and noted for wrestling with God. John i. 47. Widows indeed, are such as behave gravely and piously, suitably to their condition, and are really poor and destitute. 1 Tim. v. 3, 5, 16.

INDIA; a large country on the south of Asia, extending from north to south about 2400 miles, and from east to west 1800. It is chiefly watered by the Indus on the west, and the Ganges in the middle of the country, and the various rivers that run into these two. The soil is very fruitful in rice, millet, fruits, and spices. This country produces elephants, camels, monkeys, mines of gold and silver, diamonds, rubies, and almost all kinds of precious stones. The empires of the Persians and Greeks extended to the north-west parts of it. Esth. i. 1.

INDIGNATION; ANGER kindled to a very high degree. Jeremiah was filled with indignation by God; he was appointed to deliver messages of wrath; he was exposed to trouble and to the fury of the Jews, and moved with holy zeal against their evil ways. Jer. xv. 17.

INDITE; to form thoughts for speech or writing. The word signifies to boil up, as water in a spring, or as the sacred oil in the frying-pan. Psal. xlv. 1.

INDUSTRIOUS; sensible, and active in business. 1 Kings xi. 28.

INFALLIBLE; which cannot fail; cannot admit of any doubt. Acts i. 3.

INFAMY. See REPROACH.

INFANT; a child newly born. Luke xviii. 15. During the millennium, there shall not be an infant of days; professors of Christianity shall not be so ignorant, or so easily tempted to sin, as they are now; nor perhaps shall infants so frequently die. Isa. lxv. 20.

INFERIOR; lower in honour, wealth, wisdom, or excellency. Job xii. 3.

INFIDEL; a heathen, who believes not the revelation of God in scripture. 2 Cor. vi. 15. 1 Tim. v. 8.

INFINITE; (1.) Exceeding great. Nah. iii. 9. (2.) Altogether unbounded. Psal. cxlviii. 5.

INFIRMITY. See WEAKNESS.

INFLAME; to set on fire. Wine inflames men, if drunk to excess; it heats the bodily constitution, and provokes fleshly lusts. Isa. v. 11. Men inflame themselves with idols, when they have an ardent zeal for their service and worship, and are ready to expend their wealth, honour, and strength in it. Isa. lviii. 5.

INFLAMMATION; a burning boil, either in the inner or outer part of the body, occasioned by an excessive flow of the blood into that part; or the blood becomes too thick, or the fibres are relaxed or bruised. Deut. xxviii. 22.

INFLUENCE; the virtue that flows from one thing to another, as from the sun, moon, stars, or rain; to cause the earth to bring forth fruit. Job xxxviii. 31.

INFOLD; to wrap up; catch hold of. Ezek. i. 4.

INGATHERING; the feast of ingathering, viz. after all the fruits of fields and vineyards were gathered in, was the same with the FEAST of tabernacles. Exod. xxiii. 16.

INGRAFT. See GRAFF.

INHABIT; to dwell in. See HABITATION.

INHERIT. See HEIR.

INIQUITY. See SIN.

INJURE; to do one wrong or injustice. Gal. iv. 12. An injurious person is one that does wrong to God or his people. 1 Tim. i. 13.

INK; a liquor for writing with on paper or parchment. Common ink is made of galls, copperas, gum arabic, vitriol, &c. Printers' ink is made of nut or linseed oil, turpentine, and lamp-black. Chinese or Indian ink is a rare composition of smoke-black, especially of that of fat pork, with some oil and odoriferous ingredients; and is made up in solid pieces, which must be dissolved in water. Jer. xxxvi. 18. 2 John 12. 3 John 13. The people of the East were wont to carry their INK-HORNS by their sides; and to this day the secretaries, or writers, in Turkey do so. Jesus Christ is represented as having an ink-horn at his side, to denote his readiness to mark his people for preservation amidst common calamities. Ezek. ix. 2, 3, 11.

INN; a place for travellers to lodge or refresh themselves. In ancient times, hospitality was so common, that inns were much less necessary than now: yet it appears there were some. Gen. xlii. 27. Christ's church is an inn; there his people travelling to glory, lodge and refresh themselves, and are under the care of his angels and ministers. Luke x. 34.

INNOCENT; not GUILTY of crimes; not guilty of some particular crime. Job xxii. 30.

INNUMERABLE; so many as cannot be numbered. Job xxi. 33.

INORDINATE; disorderly; excessive. Ezek. xxiii. 11. Col. iii. 5.

INQUISITION; search; examination. Deut. xix. 18. God makes inquisition for blood, when in his providence he discovers and punishes murderers and oppressors. Psal. ix. 12.

INSCRIPTION, or SUPERSCRPTION; a writing on pillars, altars, marble, or coins. Acts xvii. 23. Matt. xxii. 20. Anciently the history of nations, and the principles of science, were thus inscribed. The Grecian history of about 1318 years, was inscribed on the Arundelian marbles. Grævius has filled three volumes in folio with inscriptions of the ancient Greeks and Romans. At least, an abridgement of the law of Moses, or a copy of the blessings and curses, was inscribed on the altar at Ebal. Deut. xxvii. 8.

INSPIRATION; God's conveying of directive and exciting influence to the souls of men. Job xxxii. 8. The inspiration by which God indited his word, was not merely his influencing the minds of the sacred writers, so as to keep them from grosser faults, but his impressing their minds in such a manner as fully convinced them they were moved of God, and his suggesting to them what they should write, and the very words fit for expressing it. Should we, with some learned men, admit superintendence to preserve from gross errors, and no more, our Bible may be a mass of smaller errors, even in its original languages; and if we admit the writers to have been left to themselves in the choice of their words, for aught we know, they may have every where expressed the just ideas in words very improper. 2 Tim. iii. 16.

INSTANT; very eager and earnest. Rom. xii. 12. An instant, is a moment, or short period of time. Jer. xviii. 7. Luke ii. 38.

INSTRUCT. See TEACH.

INSTRUMENT; a tool with which to labour, play music, &c. Exod. xxv. 9. The second causes, whereby God executes his works of mercy or judgment, are his instruments. Isa. xli. 15. Sword, famine, pestilence, and diseases, are his instruments of death. Psal. vii. 13. Men's bodies, or members, are instruments of righteousness or unrighteousness; are, as it were, tools by which they work the one or the other in outward acts. Rom. vi. 15. The evil instruments of the churl, are the sinful methods which he uses to increase his wealth. Isa. xxxii. 7. Zechariah took to him the instruments of a foolish shepherd, a scrip, and staff, and behaved as a foolish shepherd: this signified the foolishness and tyranny of the Jewish rulers after the time of Christ. Some think it also marked the foolishness and tyranny of the Romish popes. Zech. xi. 15, 16. The instruments of cruelty in Simeon and Levi's habitations, were their swords, wherewith they had murdered the Shechemites. Gen. xlix. 5.

INSURRECTION; a rebellious rising of subjects against their governors. Psal. lix. 2. Mark xv. 2.

INTANGLE; to bring into trouble or danger, that one can hardly escape. The Hebrews were intangled at the Red sea, the sea being before them, the Egyptians behind them, and rocks on each side of them. Exod. xiv. 3. The Jews thought to intangle Christ in his talk, by decoying him to speak something criminal, and which he could not excuse, or defend. Matt. xxii. 15. The Jews were intangled with the enslaving yoke of ceremonies; so fully accustomed to it, as neither to be able or willing to free themselves from it. Gal. v. 1. Men are intangled by their lusts, when so invigorated and fixed in a course of sin that they neither will nor can leave it. 2 Pet. ii. 20. Men are intangled in the affairs of this life, when their care of, and labour therein, distract and captivate their minds. 2 Tim. ii. 4.

INTEGRITY; downright honesty, sincerity. Job xxvii. 5.

INTELLIGENCE; correspondence for information. Dan. xi. 30.

INTEND; to aim; to purpose. Acts v. 28, 35.

INTENT; end. 2 Sam. xvii. 14. Acts x. 20. The intents of the heart, are its secret purposes and aims. Jer. xxx. 24.

INTERCESSION; a pleading in behalf of others. Christ makes intercession for us; he appears before God in our nature, and pleads that the blessings purchased with his blood may be given to us. Isa. liii. 12. Rom. iii. 34. The Holy Ghost makes intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered; he excites to prayer, directs what to ask, and enables us to offer our requests to God, in a duly earnest manner. Rom. viii. 26. We make intercession for men, when we plead with God on their behalf, and for his gifts and graces to them. 1 Tim. ii. 1. In a time of universal apostasy, God wondered that there was no intercessor, none to stand up in behalf of religion, and wrestle with him for the turning away of his wrath. Isa. lix. 16.

INTERMEDDLE; (1.) To attempt to deal in. Prov. xviii. 1. (2.) To share of. Prov. xiv. 10.

INTERMISSION; ceasing, breaking off a little. Lam. iii. 49.

INTERPRET; (1.) To translate the words of one language into those of another. 1 Cor. xii. 30. (2.) To shew the sense of something mysterious and obscure. Gen. xli. 1. Jesus is an interpreter, one among a thousand; he, by the powerful illumination of his word and Spirit, explains and shews unto men the deep and dark things of God. Job xxxiii. 23.

INTREAT; (1.) To beseech; to beg earnestly; to pray. Exod. viii. 8. Gen. xxiii. 8. Ruth i. 16. (2.) To entertain; deal with. Gen. xii. 16. Exod. v. 22. To be intreated is kindly to regard and grant a request. Gen. xxv. 21.

INTRUDE; proudly to press in by force; to pry into things above our reach, and which we have no call nor need to know. Col. ii. 18.

INVADE; to enter a country, with a view to cut off or subdue the inhabitants, or to carry off their wealth. 2 Kings xiii. 20.

INVENT; to contrive; find out.

INVENTIONS; are, (1.) Wise contrivances respecting knowledge, arts, management. Prov. viii. 12. (2.) Idolatrous and other sinful devices and practices, contrived by men, to render themselves happy or honourable. Psal. cvi. 29. and xcix. 8. Eccl. vii. 29.

INVISIBLE; what cannot be seen by the mere bodily eye. Rom. ii. 20.

INWARD. Inward parts denote the soul, or heart; and inward signifies what belongs to the soul. Psal. li. 6. An inward friend is one who truly and from the heart loves us, or who is very familiar with us, and shares our secrets. Job xix. 19.

JO'AB, the son of Zeruiah, brother of Abishai and Asahel, the nephew and general of king David, was a faithful and valiant commander; but imperious, cruel, and revengeful. No doubt he attended his uncle in his exile in the reign of Saul. At Gibeon, he sinfully complied with Abner's proposal of a duel betwixt twelve on each side of David's and Ishbosheth's men. That very day he defeated the troops under Abner, but lost Asahel his brother. To revenge his death, he afterwards treacherously murdered Abner; nor durst David punish him for so doing, as he and his brother Abishai had the troops so much at their command. By first entering the city of Jerusalem, and driving back the Jebusite guards, he obtained the command of all the Hebrew troops. Chiefly under his direction of the army, the Moabites, Philistines, Edomites, Syrians, and Ammonites, were rendered tributary to Israel. By David's direction, he basely promoted the murder of Uriah. By his instruction, the widow of Tekoah procured Absalom's return from exile. He afterward procured his admission to court; but was his hearty opposer when he rebelled against his father; and, contrary to David's orders, slew him as he hung by his hair from an oak-tree. He wisely, but harshly, rebuked David for his excessive and ill-timed sorrow for Absalom's death, and his neglect of the brave warriors who had routed the rebellious host. The killing of Absalom, and this harsh usage, David resented, by displacing him from his generalship, and putting Amasa his cousin, and the commander of Absalom's host, in his room. Joab, however, attended his brother Abishai's troop as a volunteer, in the pursuit of Sheba the son of Bichri, who had raised a new rebellion. He soon murdered Amasa, when he came up, and resumed his command. He pursued and quickly procured the head of Sheba, and thus quashed his rebellion. He wisely remonstrated against David's numbering the people, but was obliged to execute that task, and in ten months performed the greater part of it. 2 Sam. ii. iii. and v. and viii. to xli. and xiv. and xviii—xx. and xxiv. When, through old age, David concerned himself but little in the government of the kingdom, Joab and Abiathar, contrary to their master's known intentions, thought to have set up Adonijah to be his successor. The attempt miscarried, but tended to increase David's dislike of Joab. On his death-bed he urged Solomon to punish him for the murder of Abner and Amasa. Some time after David's death, Joab, hearing that Adonijah was executed by Solomon's orders, fled to the horns of the brazen altar at Gibeon for refuge. Solomon sent Benaiah, the general of the host, to require him to quit his place of protection. Joab refused, and said he would die on the spot. Solomon ordered him to be killed where he was. This being done, he was buried in his own house in the wilderness. 1 Kings i. and ii.

JO'ASH, or JE-HO'ASH, the son of Ahaziah king of Judah. Jehoshaphat, the wife of Jehoiada the high-priest, his aunt, preserved him from the murderous designs of ATHALIAH his grandmother, when he was but a year old, and kept him hid six years in a chamber of the temple. When he was seven years of age, Jehoiada entered into a solemn covenant with Azariah the son of Jeroham, Ishmael the son of Jehohanan, Azariah the son of Obed, Maaseiah the son of Adaiah, and Elishaphat the son of Zichri, to set up young Joash for their sovereign, and dethrone the wicked Athaliah. After preparing matters in the kingdom, and bringing the Levites, and such others as they could trust, to Jerusalem, they crowned him in the court of the temple, with great solemnity. Alarmed by the acclamations, Athaliah ran to the court, but was quickly carried forth and slain. Joash and his subjects covenanted with the Lord, and with one another, to serve the Lord only. No sooner was Joash placed in the palace, than the people pulled down the statue of Baal, and demolished his temple, and slew Mattan his priest; but the high places were not removed. Jehoiada, the adviser of Joash, set on foot the repairs of the temple; but it was so slowly done, that in the twenty-third year of Joash the work was scarcely begun. Instigated by Joash, Jehoiada set about it earnestly, by a voluntary collection. While Jehoiada lived, Joash zealously promoted reformation; but no sooner was that good high-priest in his grave, than Joash hearkened to his wicked courtiers. The worship of God was neglected, and idolatry prevailed. Zechariah the priest, the son of Jehoiada, faithfully warned the people of their sin and danger. By order of Joash, his ungrateful cousin, he was stoned to death, between the porch and the altar. This martyr, when dying, assured them that his death should be divinely revenged. His prediction was quickly accomplished. Hazael invaded the kingdom; but, with a large sum of money, Joash redeemed his capital from plunder. About a year after, a small host of Syrians ravaged the country, defeated the numerous army of Joash, pillaged his capital, and murdered his princes. After loading him with ignominy and disgrace, they left him; but his own servants, soon after, murdered him in his own bed, in the forty-first year of his reign, A. M. 3116; and he was buried in the royal city, but not in the sepulchres of the kings. 2 Kings xi. and xii. 2 Chron. xxiii. xxiv.

JOASH, or JE-HOASH, son of Jehoahaz, and grandson of Jehu. After a reign of two years, in conjunction with his father, he reigned fourteen years more alone, over the kingdom of Israel. He imitated the wickedness of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and perhaps honoured him with the name of his son. By Joash, God delivered the Israelites from their Syrian oppressors. With no small concern, he visited the prophet Elisha in his dying moments; and from him had the prediction of a threefold victory over the Syrians. Joash had not long routed the Syrians, and recovered the cities which they had taken from Israel, when Amaziah king of Judah provoked him to war; but Joash defeated him, pillaged his capital, and returned to Samaria in triumph, and died, A. M. 3179. 2 Kings xiii. 2 Chron. xxv.

JOB, a celebrated inhabitant of the land of Uz, eastward of Gilead. An addition to the Septuagint version of his book, as well as Philo, Aristæus, and Polyhistor, and a great many of the fathers, reckoned him the same as Jobab, one of the ancient kings of Edom, and third in descent from Esau; but it is more probable that he was a descendant of Nahor, by Huz his eldest son, as Elihu was by Buz his second. Dr. Owen thinks Job was contemporary with Abraham: but how then could Eliphaz, a descendant of Esau, have been his aged friend? Some place him as late as the times of Ezekiel: but how shall it be accounted for that there is no allusion in his book, to the passage of the Hebrews through the Red sea, or their entrance into Canaan, though there is to the deluge, and to the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah with fire and brimstone? This renders it probable that his affliction was before the Hebrews' departure from Egypt; though perhaps a great part of his life might be posterior to it. This is confirmed by the consideration of Eliphaz, his aged friend, who spoke first, being a Temanite, and consequently at least, a great grandchild of Esau. Some have pretended that the whole book of Job is but a dramatic fiction, and that no such person ever existed: but God's mention of him as a righteous man together with Noah and Daniel, and the testimony of the apostle James to his patience and happy end, sufficiently refute that opinion. Ezek. xiv. and James v. 11.

Job was at first, in very prosperous circumstances: he had seven sons and three daughters, who lived in the utmost harmony and affluence: he had a prodigious number of flocks, herds, and servants; and was the greatest man in that country. His piety and integrity were distinguished; his freedom from idolatry and unchastity; his abhorrence of pride and injustice were remarkably so. Not only did he regulate his own personal conduct, but took care of the piety of his children. When his sons held their annual feasts, perhaps on their respective birth-days, he always rose early next morning, and offered up sacrifices with prayer, for them, fearing, lest they might have sinned, and cursed, contemned, or forsaken God in their hearts. Job i. 1-5. and xxix. and xxxi.

Upon a certain day, when the angels, or the human sons of God, were assembled together before God, Satan presented himself among them. In a manner we cannot comprehend, God questioned Satan, as to where he had been employed? and if he had considered, or set his heart against, his servant Job, so distinguished for piety and goodness? Satan replied, that Job was but a mercenary hypocrite, who served God to obtain and preserve his great wealth; but if he was sharply, or even a little afflicted, he would contemptuously curse his Maker, and renounce his service. For the manifestation and exercise of Job's grace, Satan was permitted to ruin all he had; but prohibited from touching his person. He immediately vented his malice against Job: he stirred up the Sabæans to fall on his cattle. These they drove away, and his servants they murdered. He next caused fire from heaven to fall on his flocks, and burnt them up, and the servants that kept them. Next, he induced the Chaldeans to fall on the camels, and murder the servants who attended them. Much about the same time, while Job's ten children feasted in the house of their elder brother, he raised a terrible storm, that buried them all in the ruins of the house. In each of these disasters, only one was preserved, to bring the tidings to Job. Scarcely had one finished his doleful story, when another came up with his more woeful tale. With great composure, Job heard all; and at last, to mark his grief, rent his clothes, and shaved the hair off his head. With resignation, under the whole, he blessed God, who had given him his children and wealth, and who had taken them away. Job i. Not long after, Satan presented himself again before God in the former manner, and was as before, asked, where he had been? and if he had observed how piously Job had behaved himself under his heavy afflictions, which had not been merited by any peculiar wickedness? He suggested, that there was very little in Job's being content to lose his children and wealth, when his person was untouched; but alleged, if that were touched, he would contemptuously curse God, and abandon his service. For the further discovery and trial of Job's grace, Satan was permitted to do all that he could, against his body, if he but spared his life. He immediately infected his body all over with most loathsome boils. Job laid himself down on a dunghill, and with a potsherd scraped off the putrid matter that ran from his boils. In an upbraiding tone, his wife bade him curse God, and put an end to his life. He replied, that the motion was quite absurd, as it becomes us to receive affliction out of God's hand, as willingly as the most agreeable outward favours. Job ii. His friends, hearing of his disasters, came to visit him. The chief were Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, Zophar the Naamathite, with a young man named Elihu. When they saw him at a distance, they could scarcely recognize him: when they came near, they could not speak to him for seven days, they were so shocked at his trouble, and saw him so affected with his pain. At last Job's patience was overcome, and he cursed the day of his birth, and wished, that either he had never been born, or had soon after been cut off by death. This occasioned a conference betwixt him and his friends. Eliphaz and Bildad took three different turns in the conversation, and Zophar two. To add to his trouble, they insisted that God never punishes men with uncommon strokes, but for uncommon sins. They insisted that certainly he was a wicked hypocrite, since he had been so uncommonly punished. They intermingled a great many excellent hints concerning God, and advices to duty: He answered them all in their turns. He maintained that he was no hypocrite, but a true fearer of God; and that distinguished afflictions in this world were often the lot of the godly, though eternal punishments in hell were reserved only for the wicked. By his reasonings, and his solemn protestations of his integrity he put them to silence. Elihu then spoke, and admitting Job to be a saint, he sharply reproved him for his unguarded speeches, and his desire to justify himself, at the expense of the divine honour. His discourse introduced Job's conviction. God, by a solemn speech, declaratory of his power and sovereignty in the works of nature, particularly with respect to the earth, the sea, air, stars, lions, goats, hinds, wild asses, unicorn, ostriches, horse, hawks, eagles, behemoth, and leviathan, and by a number of pungent queries, convinced Job of his ignorance and vileness, to a great degree. Job no sooner repented of his misarranges, than God reproved his three friends for their misrepresentation of his providence, and charged them to offer sacrifice, and to desire Job to pray for forgiveness to them. Thereon, Job was relieved from his distress. His friends came to him on every side, and each presented him with large sums of money. It was not long before his riches were double what they had been, and he had as many children as before. These were not doubled, as the former were not lost, but gone to the eternal state. To his three daughters, the most beautiful in the country, he gave names, Jemima, Kezia, Keren-happuch; signifying, that his prosperity, happiness, and glory, were recovered. After this, Job lived one hundred and forty years, and saw his posterity to the fourth generation.

Was Job a type of our blessed Redeemer? How infinitely rich and righteous was he! yet for our sakes he became poor! How quickly reduced to depths of abasement! How stupendous the trouble he suffered from God—from Satan—from men, both good and bad! How tempted, reproached, afflicted; but how marvellous his resignation and patience! How reasonable and necessary his sacrifice! How undeserved and powerful his intercession! How illustrious the glory and honour, and his numerous family among the gentiles that succeeded his poverty and suffering! Who was the writer of the inspired account of Job; whether Job, Elihu, Moses, or some other, is not certainly known. From chap. iii. to xlii. 6. it is generally written in a kind of poetry; but the peculiar rules of the metre are not easy to be discovered. The style is for the most part extremely sublime, and the figures are bold and striking, in no common degree. The poetic part of it is perhaps in the very language of the Arabs in the days of Job. The frequent allusions in it to things which we are unacquainted with, render a variety of passages not easily intelligible to us. Though the historical account of Job be inspired, we must not therefore conclude that every sentence narrated in it is so too. From God's finding no fault with Elihu, it seems that what he said is divinely sustained as true. From God's finding fault with Job, and his friends for their speeches, it is plain that we must not look to them as a standard of our faith and practice, but only in as far as supported by other scriptures. Only Job's sentiments with respect to the outward providences of God, making no distinction as to men's states is divinely approved.

JOEL, the son of Pethuel, whom some, without ground, take for Samuel, was one of the lesser prophets. As he makes no mention of the ten tribes, it seems, that he prophesied after their captivity, in the time of Hezekiah or Manasseh. He represents a fearful famine, occasioned by excessive drought, and by destructive vermin: he directs to fasting and prayer, as the means of deliverance: he foretels the deliverance from the famine, and the effusion of the Holy Ghost on multitudes in the apostolic age: he predicts the ruin of the Philistines and Phœnicians, and perhaps of the Assyrian army in the valley of Jehoshaphat: and concludes with promises of deliverance to the Jews in the latter days.

JO-HA'NAN, the son of Kareah, with his brother Jonathan, and Seraiah, and Jezaniah, and some other captains, who had fled off in small bodies, came to Gedaliah at western Mizpeh; and he, with an oath, undertook for their safety, if they should continue subject to the Chaldeans. They informed Gedaliah of Ishmael's intention to murder him. After it was over, and they had pursued Ishmael, and recovered the captives he had carried off, they retired to Chimham, which is by Bethlehem. There they desired Jeremiah to ask direction of God, whether they should go to Egypt or not. As they were determined to go thither at any rate, they disregarded his warnings against it, and pretended, that not God, but Baruch the son of Neriah, had prompted him to speak so, that he might deliver them up to the enraged Chaldeans. As Jeremiah had told them of their dissimulation, now it appeared. Johanan, and his fellow-captains, carried all the people left in the land, Jeremiah not excepted, into Egypt; where, in about fourteen years after, they had a miserable end by the Chaldean invasion. Jer. xi—xliv.

JOHN BAPTIST, the celebrated forerunner of our Saviour, and the Elias of the New Testament. He was the son of Zacharias the aged priest, and the long barren Elizabeth. His birth and work were predicted by the angel Gabriel; and his unbelieving father's dumbness while he was in the womb, was the miraculous token of its fulfilment. Being conceived six months before our Saviour, he leaped in his mother's womb, at the salutation of the Blessed Virgin, then with child of our Saviour. At his birth, his parents were exceeding glad; and his father soon after had his tongue loosed, and predicted the Saviour's appearance and work. From his infancy, he was endowed with the Holy Ghost in an extraordinary manner; through his whole life, he was a Nazarite, drinking neither wine nor strong drink. After spending his earliest years in his father's house, he retired to the deserts, where he lived on locusts and wild honey, and was occupied in meditation and prayer. His garments were of camels' hair, and he was girt about the waist with a leather girdle. About A. D. 28, he began to publish the approaching appearance of the Messiah, and called the people to repent, because the kingdom of God, or the New Testament dispensation of the gospel, was at hand; he assured them, that their circumstances were very critical; and, if they did not speedily repent, the axe of God's judgments would certainly cut them off. Such as professed their repentance, and made confession of their sins, he baptized with water, charging them to believe on the Messiah, who was to be immediately revealed, and would endow them with the Holy Ghost, and grant them the forgiveness of their sin: he directed them how to behave in their various stations. Many came to him as his disciples, and assisted him in calling the people to repentance. Such were his virtue and fame, that many of the Jews supposed him to be the Messiah. He assured them, he was not; and, by divine direction, he informed them, that he on whom they should soon see the Holy Ghost descend, and remain, was the Messiah, Jesus came, and desired to be baptized. John discerning his true character, would have excused himself, as unfit for the office; but Jesus, hinting that it was necessary to his fulfilment of all righteousness, he complied. To the messengers sent by the priests and rulers to know who and what he was; he replied, that he was neither the Messiah nor the ancient Elijah, nor an old prophet risen from the dead; but was a mere voice, or herald, in the wilderness, calling them to prepare for the Messiah, and to remove every hindrance of receiving him. Next day, John pointed out Jesus to the multitude, and soon after to two of his disciples, as the Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world. Luke i. and iii. Matt. iii. John i.

Not long after, when John was baptizing at Ænon, near Salim, where was a number of small rivulets, some of his disciples informed him that Jesus Christ had begun to baptize by his disciples, and was likely to be followed by all the country; he replied, that he had no honour but what was freely given him of God; that as Christ was the divine Bridegroom of the church, he was glad to have his own honour veiled and diminished, that that of Jesus might increase and shine forth; and that as Jesus was a divine person, endowed with an unmeasurable fulness of the Holy Ghost, and Ruler over all, they could not escape the vengeance of God, if they believed not on him. John iii. 23—36. He was for a while revered and heard by Herod the tetrarch of Galilee; but having reproved that wicked man for marrying his brother's wife, he was imprisoned in the castle of Macherus. From hence he sent two of his disciples, to ask Jesus if he was the true Messiah, or if they should look for another? Perhaps his imprisonment, which laid him aside from his work, had made his faith to stagger; or perhaps they were sent for their own confirmation in the faith. Jesus bade them go and tell John what miracles they saw performed, and what tidings of salvation they heard preached to the poor. Matt. xi. Soon after, to gratify the malice of Herodias, and to reward her daughter's fine dancing, his head was cut off, and delivered as a present to the damsel. His disciples, permitted by Herod, carried off his body, and buried it. He died about a year before our Saviour. Jesus assures us, that John was no wavering believer or preacher, no reed shaken with the wind; but one of the greatest men that had appeared in the world; and yet that there is none in heaven but is more holy and perfect than he was; and no believer in the New Testament church but hath clearer views of the method of salvation, and better tidings to tell, than he; even, that Jesus hath died for our offences, and is raised again for our justification. As John's life was very austere, the wicked Pharisees said, he had a devil, but were afraid openly to avow their sentiments. Matt. xi. and xiv.

JOHN the EVANGELIST. See JAMES the son of Zebedee.

JOIN; (1.) To knit or unite together. Job xli. 17. (2.) To make an alliance or league. Dan. xi. 6. (3.) To enter into intimacy with. Acts viii. 29. (4.) To be reckoned with. Job iii. 6.

JOINING, is applied, (1.) To things: so house is joined to house, when one is added to another under the same master. Isa. v. 8. (2.) To persons, when they are united in marriage. Eph. v. 31; in affinity, 2 Chron. xviii. 1; in assistance, Exod. i. 10; or in church fellowship, Acts ix. 26; or in battle, army fighting close with army. 1 Sam. iv. 2. (3.) To minds, when people are united in judgment and affection. To be joined to the Lord, is to be spiritually espoused to his Son, and solemnly devoted to his service. 1 Cor. vi. 17. Jer. l. 5. To be joined to idols, is to be firmly intent on worshipping them. Hos. iv. 17. To be joined to a harlot, is to have the affections set upon her, and to commit whoredom with her. 1 Cor. vi. 16.

JOINTS are, (1.) The uniting of the bones in an animal body. Dan. v. 6. (2.) The uniting parts of a harness. 2 Chron. xviii. 33. The joints and bands, which unite Christ's mystical body, are his Spirit, ordinances, and influences, and their mutual relations to him, and to one another, and their graces of faith and love fixed on him, and in him loving one another. Col. ii. 19. Eph. iv. 16. The joints of the church's thighs, may be her public standards of doctrine, worship, discipline, and government; and her young converts; which add greatly to her comely deportment. In particular saints, the joints of the thighs, may denote their inward gospel-principles of action. Sol. Song vii. 1. The joints and marrow of men's hearts, are their secret dispositions, which the convincing word of God, with no small pain to them, shews and affects them with. Heb. iv. 12.

JOKTAN, the eldest son of Heber: not Jokhan, the second son of Keturah, as Calmet will have it; but this Joktan was the Kahtan, or father of the ancient ARABS, part of whom are called Catanitæ by Ptolemy. About a mile west from Mecca, there was, if there is not still, a place called Baisath-yektan or the dwelling of Joktan. Joktan had thirteen sons, Almodad the father of the Almodæ, or Alumetæ; Sheleph, the father of the Thalapani, or Alapani; Hazarmaveth, from whom sprung the Atramitæ, Chatramotitæ, or Chatramonitæ; Jerah, or, as the Arabs call him, Yarab, or Yorham, the father of the Yeracheans, or Yorhamites; Hadoram, the father of the Adramitæ, or Drimitæ; Uzal, the father of the Auzalites, Ausarites, in the kingdom of the Gebanites; Diklah; Obal, the father of the Avalites, Abulites, or Adulites; Abimael, the father of the Malites; Sheba, the father of a tribe of the Sabeans; Ophir, who perhaps gave name to Copher a village on the Arabian gulph, or to Urphe, an island in the Red sea, and might be the father of the Cassanites, or Ghassanites; Havilah, whose posterity inhabited Chaulan, on the border of the Sabeans; and Jobab, of whom came the Jobarites, or Jobabites. The Arabs descended from Joktan, dwelt from Mesha, which is perhaps the same as Muza, or Mecca, on the east of the Red sea, to Sephar, a mount of the south-east of Arabia Felix. Gen. x. 25, 30. 1 Chron. i. 19, 23.

JO-NADAB, or JE-HON-A'DAB. See KENITES.

JO'NAH, the son of Amittai, a prophet of Gath-hepher in Galilee. Some Jews state him to be the widow of Sarepta's son, raised to life by Elijah; but the distance of time renders it almost impossible. Nor is it a whit more certain, that he was the son of the Shunamite restored to life by Elisha, or the young prophet who anointed Jehu. He predicted, that God would restore to the Hebrews the cities which the Syrians had taken from them, during the reigns of Ahab, Jehoram, Jehu, and Jehoahaz. 2 Kings xiv. 25. God ordered this prophet to go to Nineveh, and warn the inhabitants of their approaching destruction. Fearing that the merciful Lord might forbear punishing them, if they repented, and so seemingly tarnish his honour, Jonah shipped off himself at Joppa for Tarshish, whether in Silicia, Africa, or Spain, is uncertain; that being out of the promised land, the spirit of prophecy might forbear to excite him. A storm quickly pursued the ship wherein he was. The heathen mariners awakened him, and required him to call on his God for deliverance. Lots being cast to discern for whose sake the storm rose, the lot fell on Jonah. With shame he confessed his guilt to the mariners; and desired them to cast him into the sea, that the storm might be stayed. With great reluctance they at last were obliged to do it; and the storm immediately ceased. A large fish swallowed up Jonah, and retained him safe in her belly for three days. There he earnestly prayed to the Lord, at whose command the fish cast him alive on the dry land; but whether on the east end of the Syrian sea, near Scanderoon, we know not, though that is most probable. His commission to warn the Ninevites of their approaching destruction was immediately renewed; and he hastened to that vast city. He had not travelled in it above a day's journey, denouncing their ruin, when the king, whom we cannot suppose Pul, but one about fifty or sixty years earlier, and all his people applied themselves to solemn fasting and prayer. Hereupon God forbore to execute his vengeance upon them, which had been but conditionally threatened. Displeased with the divine mercy, Jonah angrily wished to die, rather than live, and see his prediction unfulfilled. While he sat without the gates of the city, waiting for Nineveh's ruin, God caused a gourd to spring up quickly, to overshadow him from the scorching heat of the sun: but next day, a worm having bitten its root, it suddenly withered. The scorching sun, and blasting wind, vehemently beating on Jonah, he fainted, and angrily wished to die, and averred to God himself, that he was right in so doing. God bade him reflect, if he had pity on the short-lived gourd, was there not far more reason for his and their Maker to pity the penitent inhabitants of Nineveh, in which were above 120,000 infants, and much cattle? Jonah i—iv. Did not the fate of this prophet typify our Saviour, who was to be cast into the raging sea of divine wrath; his lying a part of three days in the grave; his glorious resurrection from the dead; and the effectual publication of the gospel to multitudes of sinners, for their everlasting salvation?

JONATHAN, 1. The son of Gershon, and perhaps grandson of Moses. After he had officiated for some time as idol-priest to Micah, at the yearly rate of his victuals, a suit of clothes, and not quite twenty-three shillings sterling; he, pretending to consult his idol, assured the Danites, that their undertaking at Laish would prosper; and afterward went along with six hundred Danites, and he and his posterity were priests to that idol at Dan, till the captivity of the land. Judg. xvii. and xviii.

2. JONATHAN, the son of Saul, was a pious prince, of distinguished valour. When the Philistines had invaded, and terrified the whole Hebrew nation, near Michmash, where stood the rocks Bozez and Seneh, Jonathan, and his armour-bearer, taking it as a divine signal that the Philistines bade them come up to them on the rock where the garrison were posted, climbed up on their hands and feet, and slew twenty men, within about half an acre of ground. At the view of this discomfiture, the Philistines were put into the utmost confusion; Saul, and his frightened troops, observing it, pursued them. Not hearing his father's rash sentence of death against the man who should stop the pursuit till night, by taking of food, Jonathan, by tasting a little honey on the top of his staff, as it dropped in a wood, brought himself into the utmost danger. But the people boldly told his father, that they would not suffer his innocent son, by whom the Lord had wrought so great a deliverance, to be thus unnaturally murdered. 2 Sam. xiv. After David had killed Goliath, Jonathan conceived the strongest affection for him; he presented him with his robe, his bow, and girdle; he vindicated his character to his angry father, and faithfully informed him of the danger he was in, even though he knew he was to be king in his stead, after his father. During David's exile, Jonathan twice resorted to him, and there was a covenant of mutual friendship betwixt them; he even encouraged him to hope for the Hebrew throne, at his own expense. Some years after, to the great grief of David, Jonathan was slain with his father at Gilboa. David tenderly bewailed his death, and showed the most affectionate kindness to Mephibosheth his son. 1 Sam. xix. and xx. 2 Sam. i. and ix.

JOPPA, or JAPHO: a beautiful sea-port on the west of Canaan, about thirty-four miles north-west of Jerusalem, from which it was seen, as it stood on a hill amidst a delightful plain. It is thought by some to have been built before the flood; but afterwards it perhaps belonged to the Danites. In the days of Solomon, it was a noted seaport, where the wood brought from Lebanon was unloaded. It was probably so in the time of Jeroboam the Second, when Jonah sailed from it to Tarshish. Before its harbour, the Maccabees burnt the Syro-Grecian fleet. Here Peter restored Dorcas to life, and received the messages of Cornelius. The Romans destroyed it. We read of no bishops here, till the fifth and sixth centuries. In the time of the Antichristian war of the croisades, Louis of France, and Godfrey of Brillon, and others, repaired and adorned it: but in these unhappy times, what was one year a beautiful city, was often in the next a heap of ruins. At present, and for ages past, it has but a bad harbour, and is remarkable for nothing but some ruins remains of antiquity. Joh. xix. 46. 2 Chron. ii. 16. Acts ix. and x.

JORAM, or JEHORAM, the son of Jehoshaphat, and son-in-law of king Ahab. Instigated by Athaliah his wife, he was exceedingly wicked. His father made him his partner in the kingdom about A. M. 3109, and about five years after he began to reign by himself. He murdered his brethren, Azariah, Jehiel, Zechariah, Michael, and Shephatiah, whom their father had endowed with rich presents, and made governors of fenced cities. In idolatry, and other wickedness, he made Ahab his pattern. To punish his impiety, the Edomites revolted, and harassed the kingdom of Judah. Though he defeated them, yet they continued their revolt. About the same time Libnah, a city of the priests, shook off his government. Letters written by EIJAH, reproached him with his wickedness, and denounced fearful judgments against him and his family. These threatenings were fulfilled; the Philistines and Arabians ravaged his kingdom, plundered his palace, carried captive all his wives and children, save Ahaziah the youngest, who succeeded him, and soon after, with almost all his family came to a miserable end. Jehoram was seized with a terrible distemper, of which, after two years, his bowels fell out, and he died. His subjects refused him the ordinary honours of their deceased sovereigns. They neither burnt any spices for him, nor interred him in the royal sepulchres. 2 Kings i. 17. and viii. 16—25. 3 Chr. xxi.

JORAM, or JEHORAM, the son of Ahab, succeeded his elder brother Ahaziah, A. M. 3108. While Jehoram of Judah introduced the worship of Baal into his kingdom, this Jehoram of Israel removed the statues of Baal which his father had erected. Having Jehoshaphat of Judah, and the Edomites, for his allies, he marched to reduce Mesha, the king of the revolted Moabites. In their march around the south of the Dead sea, they had almost perished for want of water. After sharply reproving, and ironically directing Jehoram to apply for relief to the prophets of his father and mother, Eliaha procured a miraculous supply of water, without either wind or rain. The Moabites, in the morning, mistaking this water, reddened with the beams of the rising sun, for the blood of the allies, furiously hastened to the spot, and vast numbers were cut off. When Benhadad sent Naaman to be healed of his leprosy, Jehoram rent his clothes, reckoning that it was done to seek a quarrel with him; but Elisha removed his fears. The Syrian invaders frequently laid snares for his life; but Elisha discovered them, and the intention was prevented. When the Syrians besieged Samaria, till women ate their own children, Jehoram intended to have murdered Elisha, because he did not deliver the city from its misery; but that being prevented, Jehoram desperately concluded it was needless to expect or wait for deliverance from God. Jehoram sometimes took pleasure in hearing Gehazi relate the miracles of Elisha his master; and readily restored to the Shunamite her whole inheritance, because Elisha had restored her son to life. After the Lord had by a miracle, terrified the Syrians, and made them hastily leave the kingdom, Joram, it seems, took Ramoth-gilead out of their hands, at least he laid siege to it; but being wounded, he went home to Jezreel, to be healed of his wounds; nor was he long there, before Jehu came and murdered him, and cast his dead body into the field, or vineyard, of Naboth the Jezreelite, whose murder God had threatened to avenge on the family of Ahab; which Jehu destroyed at the same time he killed Joram his master, which took place A. M. 3120. 2 Kings ii. 17. iii. v. vi. and viii.—x. 2 Chron. xxii.

JORDAN; a river of considerable note in Canaan; but whether the name signifies the spring of Dan, or the descending river, we shall not determine. The uppermost spring of Jordan is in Mount Lebanon, about twelve miles north of Cesarea-philippi. After it has run about twelve miles to the south, it receives a considerable branch, which proceeds under ground from the lake Phiala. About fifteen miles farther south it forms the waters of Merom, or lake of Samechon; both names signifying the Higher Lake, which is near four miles broad, and seven miles and a half long. After running about twenty-eight miles farther south, it forms the lake of Genesareth, which is about twelve miles in length, and five in breadth. From thence it runs southward through a long valley, the air of which is unwholesome, and most of it desert, till it loses itself in the Dead sea. Its whole course is about one hundred and sixty miles. It once overflowed its banks in March or April, by means of the melting of the snow on Lebanon and Hermon; but according to the joint testimony of Maundrel and Thomson, it seems it does not so now, to any degree. Perhaps the reason is, that its channel is now sunk so deep. Before it enters the Dead sea, its ordinary current is about thirty yards in breadth, according to Shaw; and no more than twenty-five according to Thomson; but is exceedingly deep, even at the edge of its inner bank. It has an outer bank, about a furlong's distance from the other: such it seems was its width when it swelled. The banks of a great part of it are so covered with thickets, that in many places one cannot see it, till at the very brink of it; and in these thickets lions were accustomed to lodge, but were driven thence by the overflowing of the river; at which season, they wandered about, and were dangerous to such as dwelt near. Jer. xlix. 19. The deep stream of Jordan was divided under Joshua, and by Elijah and Elisha. In it John baptized multitudes, and our Saviour among them. Josh. iii. 2 Kings ii. Matt. iii.

JOSEPH, the son of Jacob and Rachel, was born in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2259. Very early in life God favoured him with a prophetic dream, of the eleven sheaves of his brethren doing obeisance to his sheaf; and of the sun, moon, and eleven stars doing reverence to him. These emblems indicated, that all his father's family should be under his rule. On account of his piety, and for the sake of Rachel his mother, Jacob was extremely fond of him, and made him a party-coloured coat, such as young princes then wore. Joseph, too, informed him of some wickedness his brethren, sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, had been guilty of. On these accounts, his brethren heartily hated him. When he was seventeen years of age, his father, who generally kept him at home, sent him to see where his brethren were feeding their flocks, and what were their circumstances. Going to Shechem, and thence to Dothan, he carefully sought them out. At first sight of him, they resolved to murder him, and tell their father that some ravenous beast had devoured him. They seized and stripped him. His affecting entreaties made no impression on the most of them; but Reuben, who detested the murder, begged they would cast him into a dry pit; whence he intended to convey him secretly, that he might escape to his father. During his temporary absence, some Ishmaelitic and Midianitic merchants passed that way, carrying spices and gums from Mount Gilead to the land of Egypt. On sight of them, Joseph's nine brethren immediately resolved to sell him to them for a slave. His price was twenty pieces of silver, or about £2. 6s. sterling. His coat of divers colours they dipped in the blood of a kid, and carried it to their father, desiring him to determine whether it were Joseph's, or not. He knew the coat, and was overwhelmed with grief for the loss of his son, whom he believed to have been devoured by some wild beast. Gen. xxx. and xxxvii.

The Arabian merchants sold him to Potiphar, the captain of the royal guards of the Egyptian king. Joseph's good behaviour quickly gained him the esteem of his master, and he made him his steward. Meanwhile, his mistress conceived a criminal passion for him. He resisted her impudent solicitations for the gratification of her abominable lust. When she one day urged him with the greatest earnestness, he remonstrated, that it would be the highest ingratitude to his kind master, who had given him so much power, and the most horrid wickedness against God. Unmoved, she caught hold of his garment to force him to comply. He fled off, leaving his coat in her hand. Enraged with this disappointment, she raised a terrible outcry, pretending to the servants, and to her husband, when he came home, that Joseph had attempted to debauch her, and at her outcries had run off, leaving his garment in her hand. Potiphar believed his wife, and cast Joseph into prison. Here his virtuous behaviour gained him the favour of the keeper, if not also regained him the favour of Potiphar. The other prisoners were entrusted to his care. The king's butler and baker were prisoners at that time, and each of them dreamed a dream the same night; the butler, that he saw three branches of vine, and pressed the grapes, and gave the wine into Pharaoh's hand. This, Joseph told him, signified, that in three days he should be restored to his office. The baker dreamed, that he had three baskets full of baked meats on his head, of which the birds came and ate. This, Joseph told him, meant, that in three days he should be beheaded. Both interpretations were verified by the event; but the butler, contrary to Joseph's request, neglected to exert himself, when restored to his office, to procure Joseph his liberty. Gen. xl.

Joseph had lain about three years in prison, when Pharaoh dreamed a dream, of seven fat kine devoured by seven lean kine; and afterward, of seven good ears of corn consumed by seven ears empty and withered. While Pharaoh was uneasy that no one could explain his dreams, the butler remembered Joseph, who interpreted his and the baker's according to truth; and told Pharaoh of him. Pharaoh ordered him directly from prison. Joseph, after shaving himself, and changing his clothes, presented himself before Pharaoh. Scarcely had Pharaoh related his dreams, when Joseph told him, that both the dreams signified, that there should quickly be seven years of great plenty, succeeded by as many of terrible famine. He also hinted, that it would be proper to appoint some prudent persons to collect into the royal granaries a fifth part of the crop, during the seven plentiful years, that there might be a reserve of food in the years of famine. This advice was readily prosecuted; and Joseph himself was made master of the stores, and second governor in all the land of Egypt. He was gorgeously arrayed. His name was called Zaphnath-paaneah, which, in the old Egyptian tongue, signified the saviour of the world; but in the Hebrew, might be rendered the revealer of secrets. He was married to Asenath, the daughter of Potiphar, priest or prince of On; and had by her two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. During the years of plenty, Joseph, with the utmost prudence and activity, bought with Pharaoh's money great quantities of corn, and laid it up in public granaries.

The neighbouring nations, who had made no such provision, soon felt the pressure of the famine, and came to buy corn in Egypt. Jacob sent his ten sons among the rest; but he retained Benjamin at home lest some mischief should happen to him. Joseph knew his brethren; but they knew him not.

Waiting for the operation of Divine Providence, he had still concealed himself; and now, to awaken his brethren's consciences, he spoke roughly to them, charged them with being spies, who had come to see how the country might be most easily conquered. After inquiring into their family circumstances, he dismissed them, on this condition, that Benjamin, their younger brother, should come along with them next time; and to secure this, kept Simeon (who perhaps had been most cruel to him) prisoner and hostage for the bringing of Benjamin. On this, their consciences terribly accused them of their cruelty to Joseph. To try their honesty, he caused each man's money to be secretly returned in their sacks. Next year, Jacob, with great reluctance, sent Benjamin along with the rest; and they brought the returned money, with more for a new supply. Finding his brother Benjamin with them, Joseph prepared them a feast. When they came to the steward, they told him of the return of their money in their sacks. He told them, that God had given them treasure in their sacks; for their money was paid in his reckoning. When they were called into Joseph's house, they were mightily afraid; they bowed to him with the greatest reverence. He asked them of the welfare of their father, and if Benjamin was their younger brother; and Simeon was released. They dined at a separate table from the Egyptians; and to their surprise, Joseph placed them at the table according to their age. To try his brother's temperance, and mark his peculiar love, he ordered a five-fold mess for Benjamin. His brethren were quite astonished at these things. Next morning their sacks were filled with corn; and Joseph's silver cup was, by his orders, privately put into Benjamin's sack. They had scarcely gone out of the city, when Joseph sent his steward after them, to upbraid them for ungratefully stealing his silver cup, in which he used to drink. Their sacks were searched, and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack. Greatly alarmed, they returned to Joseph, and surrendered themselves to his mercy, to make slaves of them all. Joseph refused to detain any of them, except Benjamin, in whose sack the cup was found. Judah, in the most prudent and affectionate manner, begged that he would accept of him, instead of Benjamin, as his father could not possibly live bereaved of his favourite son; and he himself could not witness the anguish of his father, if they returned without him. Overcome with affection, Joseph ordered the Egyptians to leave him; and then with a plentiful flood of tears, he told his brethren, that he was Joseph their brother, whom they had sold; and kindly encouraged them not to fear, as God had sent him hither for their preservation. He ordered them to return home in peace, and to bring their father and all they had down to Egypt, as the famine would continue five years longer. He sent wagons along with them, to bring his father's family and furniture. At the news of Joseph's being alive, and governor of Egypt, Jacob fainted; but when he saw the waggon, he revived, and proceeded on the journey. Joseph met his father on the north-east frontier of Egypt, and great were their transports of mutual affection and joy. Joseph presented his father to Pharaoh, and, at his direction, placed his father and brethren in the land of Goshen, whence their return to Canaan might be easy.

The famine still increased, and Joseph, by the sale of corn, drew all the money of Egypt into the king's treasury. When money failed, he gave the Egyptians corn for their flocks and herds: and when these were exhausted, he sold them corn for their lands and persons. Thus all the Egyptians became in a manner the property of their king; and they paid him yearly a fifth part of their crop, as the proprietor of their land. Neither the priests nor their lands, were thus purchased, as they had their maintenance from the state. When Jacob died, about seventeen years after, Joseph and his sons were prophetically blessed by him. The blessing implied that his posterity, by Manasseh, but especially by Ephraim, should be signally numerous and greatly honoured. When his father died, Joseph melted into tears; and according to his oath, buried him with great solemnity, in the cave of Machpelah. After his return from the interment, his brethren, as in their father's name, by messengers, begged that he would forgive them the injury they had done him, in resolving to murder him, and in selling him for a slave. Joseph wept, and assured them, that they had nothing but kindness to expect from him, as God had ordered their evil designs for the preservation of multitudes. After Joseph had lived one hundred and ten years, he sickened. He assured his brethren, that God would bring up their posterity from Egypt; and he made them swear, they would carry his bones to Canaan along with them. After his death, A. M. 2266, his body was put into a coffin, but remained in Egypt one hundred and forty-four years. When the Hebrews left Egypt, they carried it with them; and, in the time of Joshua, it was buried near Shechem, in the very spot which Jacob, by his blessing had pointed out. The Egyptians, to this day, ascribe almost every thing grand and wise to Joseph. Gen. xxxix.—I. Exod. xiii. 19. Josh. xxiv. 32.

Was not this patriarch a signal type of our adored Saviour? How certain a pledge was he, that God would add to the church, and add blessings to men! What a distinguished darling of his heavenly father! How precious and only beloved in the sight of his mother, the church! How beautiful the robe of his humanity, adorned with every grace! How abundantly blessed, of his Father! and how delightfully God is in and with him! What an affectionate brother, who visits us in our wilderness state; is patient under the injuries we commit against him; deals roughly with us, to humble and prove us, and to do us good in our last end! How heart-melting his discoveries of himself; and how richly he makes us share the fatness of his house! What a wise, faithful, and successful servant! What an illuminated prophet, who foretels his own future honours, and the future happiness or misery of men! How noted a conqueror of temptations from Satan and the world! How numerous and heavy his sufferings! How hated, reviled, sold, falsely accused, condemned, crucified, and for three days imprisoned in the grave! How patient under his sorrows! How attentive to the hand of God therein! How ready to forgive his injurers, and to render them good for evil! To what amazing glory has he entered, through suffering! How blessed his marriage with the gospel-church! How numerous his spiritual seed! who are the ten thousands of gentiles, and thousands of Judah.

2. JOSEPH the carpenter was probably dead before our Saviour began his public ministry, as no mention is made of him at the marriage of Cana, or elsewhere; and CHRIST, when dying, recommended his mother to the care of John. Matt. i. and ii. See CHRIST.

3. JOSEPH of Arimathea, a private disciple of our Saviour's, and a Jewish senator, who consented not to the deed of the sanhedrim, in condemning and crucifying Christ. He begged his body from Pilate; and he and Nicodemus, who had more openly avowed themselves followers of Jesus than before, honourably interred it in Joseph's new sepulchre. John xix. 38—41. Matt. xxvii. 6. It does not appear that he attended the sanhedrim after our Lord's crucifixion.

4. JOSEPH, or JOSES, the brother of James the Less, and the son of Cleophas, is perhaps the same with Barsabas. Mark xv. 40. Matt. xiii. 55. and xxvii. 36.

JOSHUA, or JESUS, Acts vii. 45. Heb. iv. 8; a descendant of Ephraim, born A. M. 2460. His first name was Hoshua; but to mark that he would render Israel safe and happy, he was called Jehoshua, or Joshua. He was a faithful and an active assistant to Moses: at whose direction, he engaged and routed the Amalekites, and was divinely informed of God's perpetual indignation against that people. When Moses was on the Mount, Joshua tarried near it, and came down with him. His residence was near the tabernacle. Zealous for Moses' honour, he wished to prohibit Eldad and Medad from prophesying. He was one of the spies that searched the promised land. Exod. vii. xxiv. xxxii. and xxxiii. 12. Num. xi. 28, 29; xiii. and xiv. A little before Moses' death, Joshua was solemnly installed in the government of the Hebrew nation; and such honour was by Moses put upon him, as induced the people to reverence and obey him. Num. xxvii. 18—23. Deut. iii. xxi. and xxxi. 14—23.

After Moses' death, God directed and encouraged Joshua to take on him the government of the Hebrews, and promised to afford him his continual presence and support. Joshua warned the Reubenites, Gadites, and eastern Manassites, who were settled by Moses, to prepare for crossing the Jordan, and conquering Canaan along with their brethren. Spies were sent to view Jericho. These, by means of RAHAB, were preserved, and returned safe, though close search had been made for them: They reported, that the Canaanites were in the utmost consternation for fear of the Hebrew invasion. At this time, the Jordan overflowed all its banks; but as soon as the feet of the priests who bore the ark of the Lord, at the distance of 2000 cubits, or 3648 feet, before the host, touched the brink of the waters of Jordan, they parted asunder: those above stood like a mountain, and those below ran off into the Dead sea, leaving an empty space of about six miles, for the Hebrew tribes to pass over. The priests, with the ark, continued in the middle of the channel, till all the people had safely landed on the other side. To commemorate this event, Joshua erected twelve large stones on the very spot where the ark had stood; and taking twelve other stones from the mid channel of the river, erected them on the bank. Some days after, he ordered all that had been born during the last thirty-eight years, to be circumcised; fully assured of God's protecting them from the enemy. Next, the passover was celebrated. On the morrow after, they began to eat of the corn of Canaan, and the manna fell no more about their tents. Soon after, the Son of God appeared to Joshua as a man with a drawn sword, and told him he was come as commander of the Hebrew troops, in their approaching wars. He fell on his face, and reverently plucked off his shoes. Josh. i-v.

Directed by God, Joshua caused his troops to encompass Jericho seven days, and seven times on the seventh, with the ark carried before them, and some sounding with rams' horns. When they had finished the thirteenth circuit, they gave a great shout, and all the walls of Jericho fell to the ground. None but Rahab and her family were saved. The metal found in the city was devoted to the service of God, but every thing else to ruin; and a curse was denounced against the rebuilder of the city. Achan, however, coveted, and took part of the spoil. Advised by some, Joshua, to ease his troops, sent no more but 3000 to attack Ai. To punish Achan's theft, they were repulsed, and thirty-six of the number slain. This exceedingly grieved Joshua, as he thought it would make the Canaanites triumph over God and his people. After solemn prayer, he was informed of the cause, and the sacrilege was punished, by the death of Achan and his family. Next, the Lord ordered the whole Hebrew host to attack Ai, and to use stratagems beside. After it was taken, Joshua and the Hebrews seem to have marched northward to Ebal and Gerizzim. On Ebal they erected stones, plastered them with plaster, and plainly inscribed thereon a copy of the Mosaic laws, or rather an abridgment, or perhaps no more than the blessings and curses mentioned in Deut. xxvii. and xxviii. An altar of rough stones was raised, and the burnt-offerings and peace-offering being finished, the people feasted on the flesh of the last with joy and gladness, that they were thus the covenant people of God. The priests then went down to the valley of Moreh between two hills, and with a loud voice read the blessings and curses. Six of the tribes, descended from free women, with their wives, and the strangers among them, stood on Gerizzim, and echoed AMEN to the bless-sings. Six of the tribes, four of which were descended of bond women, and one of Reuben, who had lost his birthright, with their wives, and the strangers stood on mount Ebal, and echoed their AMEN to the curses as they were read. After this solemn dedication of themselves to God's service, the Hebrews returned to Gilgal. Josh. vi-viii. Deut. xxvii. Next, Joshua and the princes entered into a league with the Gibeonites; and being convinced of his mistake, he devoted that people to the laborious part of the service of God. Enraged that the Gibeonites had made peace with Joshua, Adonizedek, and four of his neighbouring princes, entered into a league to destroy them. Informed of this, Joshua marched to their assistance, and routed the five kings. In their flight, hailstones killed multitudes of them; and at Joshua's request, the sun and moon stood still, for a whole day, to give him light to pursue the fugitive Canaanites, and such as assisted them. A little before sunset, Joshua brought these kings out of the cave of Makedah, where he had shut them up, and after causing his captains to trample on their necks, he hanged them. Joshua proceeded to burn their cities, and slay the inhabitants throughout the south part of the promised land.—Perhaps it was some years after, that he routed Jabin of Hazor, and his allies, and made himself master of the north parts of the country. After employing his troops six years in the conquest of Canaan, he began to divide it among the Hebrew tribes. Caleb, and after him his brethren of Judah, and next the tribe of Ephraim, and the western Manassites, had their shares assigned them. After this, the tabernacle was fixed at Shiloh, and the tribes of Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulun, Issachar, Naphtali, and Dan, received their portion, and three other cities of refuge were appointed, and the REUBENITES, Gadites, and eastern Manassites, were dismissed to their homes. After Joshua had governed the Hebrews seventeen, or perhaps twenty-five years, he, finding his end approaching, assembled the Hebrews, rehearsed to them what God had done for them, and made them renew their solemn engagements to worship, and serve him. He died aged one hundred and ten, and was buried at Timnath-serah. Josh ix-xxiv. Probably he himself wrote the book that records his transactions. The Samaritans have another book of Joshua, different from ours, consisting of forty-seven chapters, which brings down the history within about one hundred years after our Saviour's death, and is filled with fables the most childish and trifling.

Was not Joshua a distinguished type of our Redeemer? He was trained up under Moses' broken law; God solemnly called, and fitted him for his office; nor did he ever fail or forsake him. How pregnant his name with salvation! Through what rivers of trouble he brings his church into their gospel state, and her true members into their gracious state! how he circumcises their hearts; feasts them on his flesh and blood; powerfully intercedes for them; miraculously conquers their foes, and enables them to tread on their necks; purchases and prepares for them the heavenly inheritance; and puts them into possession thereof; and by bringing them into covenant, causes them to serve the Lord after his own example. How ready to receive returning sinners of the gentiles! Nor, till his victories be finished, shall the luminaries of heaven, or of the church, withdraw their shining.

JOSHUA, or JESHU'A; the son of Jozadak, or Josedech, was high priest of the Jews when they returned from Babylon. He assisted Zerubbabel in rebuilding the temple. Zechariah saw him represented as standing before the Lord in filthy garments, and Satan standing at his right hand to accuse and resist him; but the Angel JEOVAH rebuked the devil, and arrayed Joshua in pure raiment. Not long after, Zechariah was directed to make a golden crown for him. Did not he prefigure Jesus, as the High Priest, Builder, and Saviour of his church, who, though once laden with our iniquities, and in the likeness of sinful flesh, is now glorious in his apparel, and crowned with many crowns. Exra iv. 3. Hag. i. 1, 2. Zech. iii. and vi.

JO-STAH, the son of Amon, and king of Judah, began his reign in the eighth year of his age, A. M. 3363. In the eighth year of his reign, he began to be noted for his piety and zeal. In the twelfth, he began to purge Jerusalem and Judah from idols, and burned the deceased priests' bones on the altars of the false gods which they had served. As the Assyrians had no more power to protect their whole territories, or perhaps had given him the inspection of it, he extended his power over the country of the ten tribes, and destroyed the idols and monuments of their false worship. The altar of Bethel he quite demolished, and burned dead men's bones on it; but spared the bones of the prophet who had foretold its ruin. Having destroyed the monuments of idolatry, he repaired the temple of the Lord. As they were repairing the temple, Hilkiah the high priest found a copy, perhaps the original, of the law of Moses, which had been put into the side of the ark. Informed of this book by Shaphan the scribe, Josiah, who it seems had been formerly little acquainted with it, having heard a part of it read, was extremely affected that the divine laws had been so broken, and such fearful judgments incurred. After rending his clothes for grief, he sent Hilkiah, Ahikam, Achbor, Shaphan, and Assaiah, to Huldah the prophetess, wife of Shallum the keeper of the wardrobe, to consult her what was to be done. She assured his messengers, that what was threatened should be fulfilled; but on account of Josiah's piety, and grief for the wickedness that had prevailed, the stroke should be delayed, and he should be interred in his grave before the ruinous calamities were begun. Finding, by this book of the law, what a shameful neglect there had been of the three solemn feasts, he ordered his subjects to celebrate the passover with such solemnity and exactness, as had not been done since the days of Samuel. Not long before, if not afterwards, he convened the elders of Judah, and without using any force, caused his subjects to renew their solemn covenant with God.—He gave orders to destroy the soothsayers and Sodomites out of the land, and to pull down every remainder of superstition and idolatry in Judah and Jerusalem. To defile the valley of Hinnom, where Molech, and perhaps other idols, had been worshipped; he filled it with dead men's bones, and broke down the statues. Josiah proceeded in his reformation, and while he lived, continued an eminent fearer of God: but it appears from the prophecies of Jeremiah and Zephaniah, that most of his subjects turned to the Lord, but in a feigned manner. After he had born to him four sons, Jehoiakim, Jehoahaz, Zedekiah, and Johanan, three of which succeeded him in the throne, and had lived thirty-nine years, and reigned thirty-one, Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, marched his forces that way. Josiah, either being in league with Nabopolassar king of Babylon, or with the Assyrians, levied an army to stop him. In the battle he was slain, to the excessive loss and grief of his subjects. He died in peace with God and his conscience, and in a war in which his nation was not concerned. Jeremiah composed lamentations over his death; and it seems his army at Hadadrimmon, in the valley of Megiddo, bewailed his death in the most rueful manner. 1 Kings xiii. 2. 2 Kings xxii. and xxiii. 2 Chron. xxiv. and xxxv. Zech. xii. 11.

JOT, the smallest part. There is an allusion to the letter Jod, (which in the Hebrew alphabet is very small,) in Matt. v. 11.

JOTHAM; the youngest son of Gideon, who escaped, while his seventy brethren were slain by Abimelech their bastard brother. By a parable of the olives, figs, and vines, refusing to reign over the trees, while the bramble consented, which he uttered with a loud voice from the top of an adjacent mount, he suggested to the men of Shechem, that since, while his father and worthy brethren refused to reign over Israel, they had made the worst and basest their king, they might expect that he and they should quickly turn out mutual plagues to each other. After he had finished this parable, he fled away to BEER, and concealed himself, and probably lived to see his parable fulfilled. Judg. ix.

JO'THAM, or JO-ATHAM; the son and successor of Uziah king of Judah. When his father became leprosy, Jotham for some years ruled as his deputy. In the twenty-fifth year of his age, he commenced sole governor, A. M. 3346. On the main he did that which pleased the Lord, but permitted the people to continue sacrificing in the high places. He built the great gate of the temple, fortified part of the wall of Jerusalem, built castles in mountains and forests, reduced the revolting Ammonites, and laid them under tribute. But in the end of his reign, his kingdom was harassed by the Syrians under Rezin, and the Israelites under Pekah. After he had reigned sixteen years, he died, and was succeeded by Ahaz; and so the twentieth year from the beginning of his reign is the fourth of the reign of Ahaz. 2 Kings xv. 30—38. 2 Chron. xxvii.

JOURNEY; a removal from one place to another. A day's journey is reckoned about sixteen or twenty miles. To this distance, around the Hebrew camp, were the quails scattered for food for the people. Numb. xi. 31. Shaw computes the eleven days' journey from Sinai to Kadesh-barnea, to be about one hundred and ten miles. Deut. i. 2. A Sabbath day's journey is reckoned by the Hebrews, at 2000 cubits, or nearly seven hundred and thirty paces; and it is said, that if any Jew travelled above this from the city on the Sabbath, he was beaten; but it is probable they were allowed to travel as far to the synagogue, as was necessary. Acts i. 12. 2 Kings iv. 23. The Hebrews seem to have had fifty-two journeys or marches from Rameses to Gilgal. Numb. xxxiii.

JOY, or GLADNESS, is an agreeable mental sensation arising from conscious possession of, or from hope of enjoying, something pleasant or valuable; and the expression thereof in praise, MIRTH, &c. 1 Chron. xii. 4. Joy is either, (1.) Divine, which denotes that infinite pleasure God takes in his people and works, and to do good to, and support the same. Isa. lxiii. 5. Zeph. iii. 17. Psal. civ. 31. (2.) Natural, among creatures, consisting in natural cheerfulness, and arising from some outward pleasure or profit. Prov. xxiii. 24. (3.) Spiritual, excited by the Holy Ghost, and arising from union to, possession of, and hope to enjoy for ever, a God reconciled in Christ. This joy produces an agreeable earnestness in promoting his honour. Gal. v. 22. Thus the saints rejoice in Christ, or in God; they take pleasure in, and boast of their connection with him; they praise him for his kindness to them, and for what he is in himself. Luke i. 47. Their rejoicing in hope, is their delightful views, holy boasting, and cheerful praise, on account of their infallible perseverance, and eternal happiness. Heb. iii. 6. A saint's rejoicing in himself, means his inward satisfaction in the testimony of a good conscience. Gal. vi. 4. (4.) Shadowy and hypocritical, arising from a fancied persuasion of relation to, and fellowship with God, and an ill-grounded hope of the everlasting enjoyment of him. Matt. xiii. 20. (5.) Sinful, when men rejoice in their sin. Prov. xv. 21. Even carnal joy or mirth becomes sinful, if it be excessive, or is indulged when God calls to mourning and grief. Isa. xxii. 13. Gladness is sown for the upright, and their hope is gladness; i. e. spiritual pleasure, and endless joy, are prepared for, and shall be enjoyed by them. Psal. xcvi. 11. Prov. x. 28. The day of our spiritual marriage occasions gladness to Christ's heart: he then enjoys the promised reward of his service; he beholds the efficacy of his Father's love, and plucks lost sinners as brands out of the burning. Sol. Song iii. 11.

The ground or object of one's rejoicing, is called his joy: thus God is the joy, the exceeding joy, of his people: he, as theirs, and as enjoyed by them, is the cause and ground of their eternal and superlative joy. Psal. xliii. 4. Christ's exaltation, promised to him, to encourage him in his work, is the joy set before him. Heb. xii. 2. The heavenly blessedness is called the joy of the Lord. It consists in the delightful enjoyment of God in Christ, and it much resembles the pleasure he has in our redemption. Matt. xxv. 21—23. But the joy of the Lord, which is the strength of saints, is the grounds of joy contained in the gospel-promises, and the inward gladness arising from a believing view of them; both which increase their spiritual vigour and might. Neh. viii. 10. Converts are the joy of ministers, who are instrumental in bringing them to Christ. 1 Thess. ii. 20. The temple, and its worship, were the joy of the Jews. Ezek. xxiv. 25. Jerusalem and Zion were the joy of the whole earth; as God was there present, and acceptably worshipped, there was more ground of joy than elsewhere; or the words may signify, that they were the joy of the whole land, as all the Jews took pleasure therein, and boasted of them. Psal. xlviii. 2. Lam. ii. 15. The church is created a rejoicing, and her people a joy, when she is so reformed, settled, cleansed, and blessed, as to abound with spiritual gladness, and to rejoice the heart of every pious beholder. Isa. xlv. 18. Falling into temptations, or trials, is to be accounted all joy, as trials work exceedingly for our real good. Jam. i. 2. The joy of God's salvation, is the exhilarating blessings contained therein, and the spiritual gladness that issues from it. Psal. li. 12. Spiritual gladness is called joy in the Holy Ghost, as it proceeds from his dwelling and working in the heart. Rom. xiv. 17. A desert place is called a joy of wild asses; these animals, who abhor the noise and multitudes in cities, haunt and feed there with pleasure. Isa. xxxiii. 14. The Medes rejoiced in God's highness; they cheerfully executed his awful judgments on the Chaldeans. Isa. xlii. 3. MIRTH is chiefly the outward expression of joy. The mirth at the return of the prodigal, is the amazing pleasure on God's side, and the joy and praise on the side of men and angels, occasioned by it, which begins, but shall never end. Luke xv. 23—32.

JOYOUS; (1.) Pleasant and delightful. Heb. xii. 11. (2.) Full of mirth and revelling. Isa. xxii. 2.

IRON; a well-known strong and useful metal, which, by a peculiar process, is rendered steel. Warlike instruments were made of iron. Perhaps no iron was used in the tabernacle, to hint, that great is the peace with God, the conscience, and the saints, enjoyed in Christ and his church. The stones of Canaan were iron; were hard, and contained iron-ore. Deut. viii. 9. The heavens are iron, and the earth brass, when the air yields no rain, and the hardened earth no crop. Lev. xxvi. 19. Iron connected with yoke, furnace, sceptre, denotes what is galling and severe. Jer. xxviii. 13. and xi. 4. Deut. iv. 20. Psal. ii. 9. Rev. ii. 27. and xii. 5. 1 Kings viii. 61. When applied to hoofs, or teeth, it denotes great power to defeat, and ability to destroy. Mic. iv. 13. Dan. vii. 7. Can iron break the northern iron and the steel? i. e. In vain the obstinate Jews thought to outbrave the prophet Jeremiah, whom God made like an iron pillar: in vain they attempted to resist the Chaldean army. Jer. xv. 12.

ISA-AC; the son of Abraham by Sarah; so called, to mark the laughter and gladness occasioned by his birth. His mother, though ninety years old, suckled him herself. He was but young when he received some harsh usage from ISHMAEL. When Isaac was about twenty-five, -or perhaps thirty-three years of age, his father was ordered by God to offer him for a burnt-offering. Isaac himself carried the wood for consuming his body. When the knife was just about to be plunged into his throat, the sacrifice was divinely stayed, and a ram provided in his stead. When he was about forty, his father, by means of Eliezer, provided him with Rebekah the Syrian to wife. Isaac met her in the field, as she came, and lodged her in her mother's tent, who was now dead. Rebekah continued long barren; but Isaac, by prayer, procured children by her. In the twentieth year of their marriage, Rebekah bare twins, which struggled in her womb. Upon inquiry, the Lord informed her, that the two children in her womb should be very different in their tempers, and the nations to spring from them very different in their fate, and that the elder should serve the younger. These two children were ESAU and JACOB; of whom the first was the darling of his father, and the last of his mother. Gen. xxi. xxii. xxiii. xxiv. and xxv. After Isaac became heir to Abraham, a famine happened in Canaan. He retired to Gerar, where ABIMELECH was king, in his way towards Egypt: but God forbade him to go down to it, and established his covenant with him and his seed.

Fearing that the Philistines of Gerar might kill him for the sake of his beautiful wife, Isaac and Rebekah agreed to pretend that she was his sister. But Abimelech, from his window, observing Isaac use such familiarity with Rebekah as was not proper between brother and sister, called him, and chid him for pretending that she was his sister, and thus laying a snare to involve his kingdom in guilt. All the subjects were charged to beware of injuring Isaac or Rebekah. Isaac had abundant crops, and his flocks multiplied exceedingly. He opened the wells which his father had digged, and which the Philistines had stopped. Finding Abimelech wearied of him, Isaac retired eastward to the valley of Gerar. Here his servants digged wells. For two of them the Philistines strove, and pretended that the water was theirs. Isaac called the one Ezek, i. e. contention, and the other Sitnah, i. e. hatred. For a third they strove not, and he called it Rehoboth, as a memorial that the Lord had made room for him. Weary of strife, he retired eastward to Beersheba, where God again renewed his promise and covenant with him; and Abimelech, dreading the increase of his wealth, came to make an alliance with him. When he was about the 100th year of his age, he and Rebekah were mightily grieved with the conduct of Esau, in his marriage of two Canaanitish women. Gen. xxvi.

When he was about one hundred and thirty seven years of age, his sight failed him exceedingly. Supposing his death to be at hand, he desired his darling Esau to bring him some savoury venison, that he might eat, and give him his tenderest blessing before his decease. Rebekah overhearing this, caused Jacob to go to the fold, and bring home some flesh, of which she made savoury meat for Isaac. This she caused Jacob, (whom she had dressed, to appear as like Esau as possible,) to carry to his father, and pretend that he was Esau. He complied with her sinful directions, that he might obtain the promised blessing. His father suspected, and felt him; but he confidently asserted that he was Esau. Isaac, thereon, blessed Jacob with the promise of a fruitful land, and dominion over all his brethren. Jacob had scarcely retired, when Esau came with his venison, and demanded his father's blessing. Finding that Jacob had imposed on him, Isaac trembled to think how the providence of God was to work; he strongly inclined to recal the blessing of Jacob, but he could not. At Esau's urgent entreaties, he blessed him also, but in an inferior degree. Finding that Jacob's life was in danger from Esau, whom he had defrauded of his birth-right and blessing, Isaac and Rebekah agreed to send him to Mesopotamia, and charged him to beware of espousing a Canaanitess. About forty three years after, and ten years before Jacob went down into Egypt, Isaac died, and was honourably buried by Jacob and Esau, in the cave of Machpelah. Here also, Rebekah was buried. Gen. xxvii. and xxviii. and xxv. 27-29.—Was not this patriarch a distinguished type of our Saviour? How often promised! How earnestly desired! How long expected; and how supernatural his birth! What joy it gave to angels and men! and in his name is the whole joy and consolation of Israel wrapt up. He is the only begotten son of JEHOVAH, and the darling of his heart; but, at the expense of their own rejection from the church of God, how hated, mocked, persecuted, and murdered by his Jewish brethren! In his doctrine and work, how he re-opened the wells of his Father's love! and how opposed by Jews and gentiles therein! With what cheerfulness he assumed and bore our guilt, carried his cross, and laid down his life a sacrifice for us! How willingly he went with his Father into inconceivable scenes of woe. Oh! the numerous seed, and the unbounded blessings for them, that are the reward of his work! and how firmly the new covenant is ratified in his death! Having risen from the dead, and having a church, a spouse, chiefly of gentiles, allotted to him by his Father, how quickly his blood and his prayers produced a multitude of spiritual seed! For a while, what a struggle between the Jewish and gentile church! At last the Jews, like Esau, rejected their birth-right, and, forfeiting the blessing, were cast out; while the gentiles, his younger seed, became the highly favoured, but much afflicted people of God.

I-SAAH, or E-SAI'AS, the prophet, the son of Amos; and it is said, but without any proof, that he was the cousin of king Uzziah; in the latter end of whose reign he began his predictions. Perhaps the first five chapters were uttered before the death of that king. In the year of Uzziah's death, he had a glorious vision of our Redeemer, attended and praised by seraphic angels and ministers. All self-debased, he be-walled his own loathsomeness; but a seraph touching his mouth with a burning coal from the altar, intimated, that his pollution was purged away. Readily he offered himself to the prophetic work, and was informed, that his preaching should occasion the hardening and ruin of his hearers, till the Assyrians should have rendered the land almost wholly desolate. When Ahaz and his people were thrown into the utmost consternation by the ravages of Pekah and Rezin, Isaiah told Ahaz that he had no reason to be afraid of these kings, as the ruin of them and their kingdoms was at hand. When Ahaz refused to ask a sign of the preservation of his kingdom, God gave him the sign of the Messiah's proceeding from the Jewish royal family, as an indubitable security. Pointing to Shearjashab, his child, then in his arms, he told Ahaz, that before that child should come to the years of discretion, both Syria, and the ten tribes should be destitute of a king. He, however, also told him, that the Assyrians would lay the land of Judah almost desolate, when they ruined the kingdom of Israel. Isaiah had another son, whom the Lord ordered him to call Maher-shalal-hash-baz; i. e. in hastening to the spoil, make haste to the prey: he assured the Jews, before witnesses, that before that child should be able to cry, my father, or mother, the kingdoms of Syria and Samaria should be ruined by the Assyrians; and not long after, Judah be brought to the brink of ruin, chap. i.—viii. When Hezekiah was sore distressed by a dangerous bodily distemper, and by the Assyrian invasion, Isaiah prayed for, directed, and comforted him: but afterwards prophesied, that, for his vanity, his seed should be eunuchs in the palace of Babylon. While Sargon's army besieged Ashdod, Isaiah, by going barefoot, and with few clothes for three years, prefigured the distressed condition of the Egyptians and Ethiopians for three years under the Assyrian yoke. Isa. xxxvi.—xxxix. and xx. Notwithstanding Isaiah's excellent qualifications for his work, and his faithful discharge of his commission, his success was small. Isa. xlix. 1—6. After he had prophesied forty-five, or rather sixty years, he was slain, (perhaps sawn asunder) or died a natural death, about the beginning of Manasseh's reign.

A detached history of king Uzziah's reign, by Isaiah, was uninspired, and is now lost. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22. His inspired prophecy remains. The first part of it consists chiefly of declarations of sins, and threatenings of judgments: the last twenty-seven chapters, together with chaps. iv. xi. xii. xxv. xxxii. and xxxv. consist chiefly of promises. In chaps. i. ii. iii. and v. the general scope is to represent the ingratitude, unfruitfulness in good works, idolatry, profaneness, pride of women, oppression, drunkenness, perverting of judgment, &c. among the Hebrews, and to predict their terrible miseries by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, or Romans. This, too, is the scope of chaps. vii. 17—25. viii. ix. xxii. xxiv. xxvii. 7—11. xxviii. xxix. xxx. 1—17. xxxi. 1—8. lix. lxx. and lxxvi. In chaps. vii. 5—9. viii. 4. ix. 8—21. and xvii. he predicts the ruin of Syria, and of the kingdom of the ten tribes; and the calamities of the Philistines, chaps. xiv. 20—31. of Moab, chaps. xv. xvi. and xxv. 10: of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, chaps. xviii—xx; of the Arabians, chap. xxi. 13—17; of the Edomites, chaps. xxi. 11, 12. and xxxiv; of Tyre, chap. xxxiii; of the Assyrians before Jerusalem, chaps. x. xiv. 24—27; xviii. 12, 13. xxvii. 1. xxx. 27—33. xxxi. 4—9. xxxiii. and xxxvii; and of the Chaldeans, chaps. xiii. xiv. xxi. 1—10. xliii. 14. xlv. 1—4. xlvi. 1, 2, 11. and xlvii. Amidst these denunciations of wrath, we have many encouraging promises of the redemption and glorious kingdom of the Messiah; as chaps. i. 18, 25, 27; ii. 1—5; iv. 2—6; vii. 14. viii. 14. ix. 6, 7. xi. xii. xxv. xxvi. xxviii. 17. and xxxv. From chap. xl. to the end, the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon, and the vanity of idols, are often occasionally declared; but the chief scope is to foretel the incarnation, sufferings, and glory of the Messiah; the erection of the gospel-church among the gentiles; the rejection of the Jews, and their future restoration. The style of this prophet is sublime in the highest degree, and his views are extremely evangelical.

ISHBO-SHETH, or ESH'BA-AL, the son and successor of king Saul. In the fortieth year of his life, Abner made him king in the room of his father, over all the Hebrew tribes, except that of Judah, which clave to David. He reigned two years peaceably; but Abner's zeal drew on a war between the party of Ishbosheth and the subjects of David. It never seems to have gone beyond small skirmishes. Abner, taking offence at Ishbosheth's accusing him of an intrigue with Rizpah the concubine of Saul, deserted him, and began to promote the interest of David; but he was murdered by Joab. Informed of this, Ishbosheth lost all courage; and as he took his noon-tide sleep, Baanah and Rechab, his captains, and perhaps kinsmen, murdered him, brought his head to David, and were rewarded with the ignominious loss of their life. Ishbosheth's head was decently interred in the sepulchre of Abner. Thus fell the royal dignity of the house of Saul, A. M. 3056.

ISHI. Thou shalt no more call me Baali, but thou shalt call me Ishi; i. e. thou shalt look on me not as a rigid lord, but as a kind and affectionate husband; and shalt worship me in a manner quite free from the idolatry of Baal. Hos. ii. 16.

ISHMA-EL; 1. The son of Abraham by Hagar. When about eighteen years of age, he sported too roughly with Isaac, a child of four or five. On this account, he and his mother were expelled the family. After being almost destroyed by thirst, in his way to Egypt, and miraculously refreshed, he and his mother took up their residence in the wilderness of Paran, and lived by his shooting of venison. He married an Egyptian, at his mother's direction. According to the divine predictions to his father and mother, he had twelve sons, Nebaioth, Kedar, Abdeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Haddar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah; parents and princes of twelve Arabian tribes. He had also a daughter called Mahalath, or Bashemath, who was the wife of Esau her cousin. His posterity took up their residence between Havilah and Shur in Arabia the Stony, and in part of Arabia Deserta, and were called Ishmaelites, Hagarenes, and, in the latter times, Saracens. See ARABIA. After Ishmael had lived one hundred and thirty years, he died amidst his friends, the offspring of Keturah, &c. Gen. xvi. xxi. and xxv.

2. ISH'MA-EL, the son of Nethaniah, being one of the royal family of Judah, was sent by Baalis, king of the Ammonites, to murder Gedaliah, the deputy of Nebuchadnezzar over the Jews who were left in Canaan. After he had ungratefully murdered that good man, so averse to suspect his wicked designs, and a number of Jews and Chaldeans along with him, he murdered other seventy, whom he met with, except ten who begged him to spare them, that they might discover to him their hidden treasures. The rest of the Jews present, women and children, he carried captive, and marched towards his country of Ammon, where he had dwelt for some time. But Johanan the son of Kareah, and the other warriors, returning to Mizpeh, and finding what he had done, pursued him, recovered his captives and spoil; but he himself, with eight of his band, escaped safe to the Ammonites. Jer. xl. and xli.

ISLE; ISLAND; properly a spot of earth surrounded by the sea. The most noted isles on the north of Europe, are Britain, Ireland, and Iceland, and about three or four hundred smaller ones. The most noted in the Mediterranean, are Cyprus, Crete, Rhodes, Eubœa, Sicily, Malta, Sardinia, Corsica, Minorca, Majorca, and a multitude of lesser ones. Between Europe and America, are the Azores, and Newfoundland; and on the west of Africa, are the Canaries; and almost straight west from these, as in the eastern bosom of America, are the Caribbees and Antilles islands, the largest of which are Cuba, Hispaniola, Jamaica, and Martinico. On the east of Africa, is the isle of Madagascar. On the south and south-east of East Indies, are Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, Celebes, Gilolo, Mindano, and Manilla, with about 12,000 others. On the south east of Tartary, are Japan and Jesso. The Hebrews called any place separated by sea from their country, or even a place on the sea-coast, an island. Thus Lesser Asia and Europe, peopled by the descendants of Japheth, are called the Isles of the Gentiles; and to these a number of promises of the spread of the gospel relate. Gen. x. 5. Isa. xlii. 4, 10. and xlix. 1. The isles on which Ahasuerus laid his tribute, were the maritime countries of Lesser Asia, and the isles in the eastern part of the Mediterranean sea. Esth. x. 1. Canaan is called an isle. Isa. xx. 6.

IS'RA-EL. See JACOB and HEBREWS.

IS'SA-CHAR, the fifth son of Jacob by Leah. The name Issachar, signifying HIRE, was given him, because the occasion of his birth was by some mandrakes which Leah gave to Rachel. He had four sons, Tola, Phuvah or Phua, Job or Jashub, and Shimron. When this tribe came out of Egypt, they amounted to 54,400, under the government of Nathaneel the son of Zuar. Their spy to view the promised land, was Igal the son of Joseph; and their agent to divide it, was Paltiel the son of Asnan: they were stationed before the tabernacle, in the camp of Judah, and increased in the wilderness to 64,600. Gen. xxx. 14—18. and xli. 18. Numb. i.

8, 29. x. 14, 15. xiii. 7. xxvi. 23—26. and xxxiv. 26. They had their lot in one of the most fruitful places of Canaan, between the Zebulunites on the north, and the western Manassites on the south. They were extremely laborious and wealthy, ready, like the obedient ass, to bear the heaviest burden of labour or tribute. Nor did they forget to invite one another to the worship of God. Gen. xlix. 14, 15. Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19. Tola the judge, and Baasha the king of Israel, were the most noted of this tribe. It seems their princes were very active in the overthrow of Jabin's army by Barak. Judg. v. 15. Two hundred of the principal men, who had the rest at their direction, attended at David's coronation, and brought much provision with them. Under his reign, Omri, the son of Michael, was their deputy-governor, and their number able to draw sword was 143,600. 1 Chron. xii. 30, 40. xxvii. 18. and vii. 1—6. Many of this tribe attended at Hezekiah's solemn passover. 2 Chron. xxx. 18.

ISSUE; (1.) Children; posterity. Gen. xlviii. 6. (2.) A running of blood, seed, &c. Lev. xii. 7. and xv. 2. Ezek. xxiii. 20. An issue of this kind was very polluting; but a mother's did not pollute her sucking-child. Did it not represent scandalous sins, that are very infecting? The issues from death, that is, all the means of escape from sin or misery, and all the persons redeemed, belong to the Lord. Psal. lxxviii. 20. Out of the heart are the issues of life; the holy thoughts and good works of men, demonstrate life to be in their heart, and prepare them for eternal life. Prov. iv. 23. To issue, is to spring forth, flow along, Ezek. xlvii. 8. 2 Kings xx. 10; or to march forth in haste. Josh. viii. 23.

ITA-LY; a noted country in the south of Europe, stretched out to the south-east, between the gulph of Venice on the east, and the Tuscan sea on the south-west; it has part of France, Switzerland, and part of Germany, on the north; and in shape resembles a boot. It was anciently inhabited by the Umbri, who are perhaps the same with the Gomerians. The Etruscans came afterward, who are supposed to be of Canaanitish origin; and the Greeks also seized on a part of it. It was possessed by a great many different tribes, Etruscans, Samnites, Campanians, &c.; but the Romans swallowed up all. At present, it is divided into a variety of states. Piedmont, Montserrat, Milan, and Venice, lie in the north part, or head of the boot. Southward of these, are Genoa, Parma, and Mantua. Still further south, and in what may be called the mid-leg, are Lucca, Modena, Romagna, Tuscany, Florence, and the Pope's territory. The ankle and foot contain the kingdom of Naples; and the Tarrantese is the heel. The Italians are great pretenders to polite learning; but are generally devoted slaves of the Pope, or, what is no better, a scandal to the Christian name, with their impiety and profaneness. Acts xxvii. 1. Hence Paul wrote his letter to the Hebrews. chap. xiii. 24.

ITCH; a disease of the skin, in which violent humours ooze forth, and form themselves into small boils, which occasion itching. Probably it is produced by certain animalcules nestling in, and preying on the skin, and there breeding their young. Hence, one by touching the infected, catches the contagion, as these vermin fasten on his flesh. In curing the itch, not only must all the animalcules, but their eggs, be destroyed, by salts, sulphur, and mercury. The itch is two-fold; the moist, which is more easy of cure; and the dry, which can scarce be healed. Deut. xxviii. 27.

ITH-A'MAR, the fourth son of Aaron. Never, but in Eli's family, was the high priesthood vested in his family; but his descendants constituted eight of the orders of the priests. 1 Chron. xxiv. 1—3.

IT-UREA, a country on the south-east of Syria, and eastward of Bashan. Probably it was denominated from Jetur the son of Ishmael, and peopled by his posterity. Aristobulus, king of the Jews, compelled them to receive circumcision in the Jewish manner. Philip, a son of Herod the Great, was tetrarch here in our Saviour's time. Luke iii. 1.

JUBILEE. See FEAST.

JUDAH, the fourth son of Jacob by Leah; his name imports, that his mother praised the Lord for giving her children. When about fourteen years of age, he contracted a familiarity with Hira, a Canaanite of Adullam; in consequence of which he married one Shua, a Canaanitess, by whom he had three sons; Er, Onan, and Shelah. Judah, married Er, when very young, to Tamar, a Canaanitess: for a horrid wickedness the Lord cut him off by an untimely death. According to the then custom of the east, Judah made Onan her husband, that he might raise up seed to his brother. Onan, knowing that the seed should not be reckoned his, did, in an abominable manner prevent his wife's pregnancy. For this, the Lord cut him off by death. Instead of giving Tamar, Shelah his third son, to be her husband, Judah amused her with empty promises. This offended her, and hearing that he was to pass that way to shear his sheep, she dressed herself as a harlot, and sat by the way-side till he came by. Caught in the snare, Judah, now a widower, went in unto her; agreed to give her a kid, and gave his staff and bracelets as a pledge of it. Immediately after, he sent the kid by his friend Hira; but she could not be found, and the men of the place told him that there was no harlot among them. Not long after, Judah heard that Tamar was with child, and was for burning her alive: but her exhibiting his own bracelets and staff, made him quite ashamed, and he acknowledged his fault in tempting her to what she had done, by not giving her Shelah for her husband. She quickly bare to him Pharez and Zerah. Gen. xxxviii. Judah recommended to his brethren the selling of Joseph to the Arabian merchants, rather than to kill him. Gen. xxxvii. 26, 27. He solemnly engaged to return Benjamin safe to his father, if he permitted him to go with them to Egypt. By a most affecting oration, he pleaded the cause of Benjamin, when charged with stealing Joseph's cup; and by offering himself a slave for him, he melted the heart of Joseph. Gen. xlv. In his last benediction, Jacob constituted Judah the superior of his brethren; predicted that the promised Messiah should be born of his line; and allotted him a land abounding with vines. The event answered the predictions. Judah's tribe, by his three sons, Shelah, Pharez, and Zerah, prodigiously increased. At their coming out of Egypt, their fighting men amounted to 74,600, under Nahshon the son of Aminadab. In the wilderness, they increased to 76,500. Their spy to view, and agent to divide the promised land, was Caleb, the son of Jephunneh. They, with the tribes of Issachar and Zebulun, marched in the first division, through the wilderness. Num. i. 10. xiii. xxvi. and xxxiv. They had the first, the southmost, and by far the largest portion on the west of Jordan. Soon after their settlement, they, instigated by Caleb, were the most active to expel the Canaanites from their territory. They marched first of the Hebrew tribes, against the wicked Gibeathites. Josh. xv. Judg. i. 1—10. and xx. 18. Othniel, the first judge and deliverer of Israel, was of this tribe. Judg. iii. In Saul's war with Nabal, the men of Judah in his army were but 300,000, and of the other tribes 30,000. In his war with Amalek, no more than 10,000 of this tribe assisted him, though the other tribes furnished him 200,000. Whether the Philistines had greatly reduced the tribe of Judah, or what else was the cause of this great disproportion on these occasions, we know not. After Saul's death, the Hebrew kings began to be of the tribe of Judah, and family of David: nor did the government ever depart from them till the Messiah appeared. 1 Sam. xi. 8. and xv. 4. Gen. xlix. 10. See HEBREWS. Judah's posterity are often called by his name. Bethlehem is called the city of Judah, or Bethlehem-Judah; it was the native place of David their king. 2 Chron. xxv. 28. But there was another city called Judah, on the south-east corner of the portion of Naphtali; but whether on the east or west side of Jordan, we cannot positively determine. Josh. xix. 34.

JU-DEA, or JEWRY. The country of Judah was never so called till after the captivity. The whole land of Canaan seems sometimes to have been called Judea, Matt. xxiv. 16. Gal. i. 21; but more properly, it was divided into Perea beyond Jordan; Galilee, Samaria, and Judea, on the west of Jordan. Judea, thus taken, contained the original portions of the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, Dan, and Simeon. It consisted of three parts; the plain country on the west; the hill country southward of Jerusalem; and the south on the north borders of the land of Edom. Matt. iii. 1. Acts ii. 9. Zech. vii. 7.

JUDAS IS-CARI-OT. Why he was called Is-carriot, whether because he was Ish-karioth, an inhabitant of Kerieth; or because he was Ish-scariota, the man who had the bag; or Ish-carat, the man that cuts off; or Ish-shakrat, the man of the reward or bribe, affords matter for conjecture.

ture among the learned. Our Saviour chose him to be one of his disciples, and gave him the charge of what money or provision he carried about with him. There is no evidence that his outward conversation, or his preaching, or miracles, were inferior to those of his brethren: but covetousness still reigned in his heart. Highly provoked that Mary had spent so much oil in anointing our Saviour's head, and that he justified her conduct, he resolved, in revenge, to betray him. He agreed with the chief priests and elders to deliver him into their hands, for thirty pieces of silver, or about £3:8:5. He returned, and ate the pass-over with his Master and fellow disciples. At the supper of bitter herbs, Jesus, to gratify John, and manifest his own divine omniscience, pointed him out as the traitor. Filled with rage, he went directly to the chief priests, and brought a band of men to apprehend his master. He led them to the garden, where Jesus was accustomed to retire for his devotion. He, by a kiss, gave the signal whom they should apprehend. No sooner had he seen his Master condemned by the Jewish council, than his conscience upbraided him; he brought back the thirty pieces of silver, and confessed he had betrayed his innocent Master. When the Jewish rulers told him, that that was none of their business, he might blame himself; he cast down the money, and, as they thought the price of blood was not fit for the treasury, they, as agents for Judas, gave it for the potters' field, to bury strangers in. Meanwhile, Judas hanged himself; but the rope breaking, or the tree giving way, he fell, his body burst asunder, and his bowels gushed out. Some think, the word we render hanged, imports, that he was choked with grief; and that in the extremity of his agony, he fell on his face, and burst asunder. Matt. xxvii. and xxviii. Acts i. 16-20.

JUDAS, or JUDE; the same as Thaddæus Labæus, the son of Cleophas, and brother of James the Less, and the cousin and apostle of our Lord. Matt. x. 3. At his last supper, he asked Jesus, how he would manifest himself to his people, and not to the world? John xiv. 22. It is said, he was married, and had two grandchildren who were martyrs for the Christian faith: and that having preached at Edessa, and in Mesopotamia, Judea, Samaria, Idumea, and chiefly in Persia and Armenia, he died in Lybia: but it is more certain, that, to confute the Gnostics, and other heretics, he wrote an epistle to the scattered Jews. His allusions to the second epistle of Peter, and to the second of Paul to Timothy, renders it probable that it was written after A. D. 66. From the character of saints, and the various judgments of God on the fallen angels and men, past or future, and from the odious character of seducers; he urges on them a constant zeal for truth, and a continued practice of holiness. His quoting a saying of Enoch, (not the book that goes by his name) and a passage concerning the body of Moses, caused some to dispute the authenticity of his epistle.

ing sentence was different in different nations. The Jewish judges gave sentence, by simply declaring to the accused, Thou art guilty, or, Thou art innocent. The Romans did it by casting various tables into a box or urn, marked with an A, if they absolved; and with a C, if they condemned the accused. Some of the Greeks intimated the sentence of absolution, by giving a white stone; and of condemnation by giving a black one; to this allusion is made in Rev. ii. 17. (2.) To understand a matter: so the spiritual man judgeth all things, and is judged of no man; he has a solid knowledge of all things important; but no natural man can understand his views and experiences. 1 Cor. ii. 15. (3.) To esteem; account, as if on trial. Acts xvi. 15. (4.) To rule and govern, as one having power to try and determine causes. Psal. xlviii. 4. (5.) To punish, as in consequence of trial and sentence; and to declare and denounce such punishments. Heb. xiii. 4. Ezek. vii. 3-8. and xxii. 2. (6.) To censure rashly. Matt. vii. 1. (7.) To appear upon one's side, as in consequence of trial of his cause. Prov. xviii. 18. Christ does not judge according to the seeing of the eye, or hearing of the ear; i. e. does not esteem persons or things, or give sentence, merely according to outward appearances. Isa. xi. 3. Saints judge the world—judge angels; they now condemn the wickedness of the world, by their holy profession and practice; at the last day, they shall assent to the sentences of damnation pronounced against wicked angels and men. 1 Cor. vi. 2. The saints are judged according to men in the flesh, and live according to God in the spirit; when they are outwardly corrected for their sin, or persecuted by wicked men, and yet inwardly live a life of fellowship with God. 1 Pet. iv. 6. Men become judges of evil thoughts, when, in a partial manner, they prefer one person to another. Jam. ii. 4.

JUDGE, one that tries the causes of others, and passes sentence upon them. Psal. ii. 10. God is the Judge of all the earth; he rules over, ties the cause, and pronounces sentence on all its inhabitants. Heb. xii. 28. Gen. xviii. 25. Christ is called the Judge; he is appointed of God to try the state and actions of all men, and to pass the sentence of everlasting happiness or misery upon them. 2 Tim. iv. 1-8. Authority, wisdom, courage, activity, and impartial equity, are necessary to qualify one to be a judge. The Jews had ordinary judges, both for civil and religious causes. In reforming the nation, Jehoshaphat established two classes or courts of judges; one took cognizance of matters pertaining to the Lord, the other of those which belonged to the state. 2 Chron. xix. These Judges, or ELDERS, it is said, were formed into three courts: (1.) The court of three judges, which decided small affairs of loss, gain, restitution, intercalation of months, &c. and had only power to punish with whipping. Perhaps this was no more than a court of arbitration; each party chose a judge, and the two chosen judges chose a third. The second court consisted of twenty-three judges. This determined matters of great moment relative to men's lives. And the third court, or sanhedrim, consisted of seventy or seventy-two judges. This determined the highest affairs relative to church and state. The high priest was a kind of supreme judge. No judge was allowed to receive presents, nor to regard men for either poverty or greatness, or to follow a multitude; and all were required to honour them. Exod. xxiii. Deut. xvi. Exod. xxii. 28. No man was to be condemned unheard, nor on the testimony of less than two or three witnesses. John vii. 51. Deut. xvii. 6. The Hebrews had also extraordinary judges, who being raised up by God, on necessary occasions, had a kind of sovereign power. Some of them were immediately called of God, others were elected by the people. Jud. iii. and xi. Nor does it appear, that their power extended over all Israel. Perhaps Jephthah did not exercise his power on the west of Jordan, nor Barak his to the east of it. These judges had the sole management of peace and war, and decided causes with an absolute authority; they executed the laws, reformed or protected religion, and punished idolaters and other malefactors; but they levied no taxes, nor had any attendants but what their own revenues could afford; and, in fine, were much the same as the archons of Athens, the dictators of Rome, the suffetes of Carthage, and the governors of Germany, Gaul, and Britain, before the Roman invasion. After the death of Joshua, and the elders which outlived him, their judges were, Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Barak, Gideon, Abimelech, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, Samson along with Eli, and Samuel. As the temple is expressly said to have been founded in the four hundred and eightieth year after the Hebrews came out of Egypt, it is not easy to calculate the time of the judges, so as to correspond herewith; and the difficulty is increased by the statement of Paul, that God gave them judges about four hundred and fifty years. 1 Kings vi. 1. Acts xiii. 20. But perhaps Paul's expression denotes, not the time of the judges, but the period between the birth of Isaac and the settlement in Canaan, which was 447, or about four hundred and fifty years; or if it relate to the period of the judges, the one hundred and eleven years of servitude must be taken into the account; though, according to the other account in the book of Kings, these years of servitude must be comprehended under the years of the judges, or the deliverances procured by them. And it may be added, that when it is said, the land, under Othniel, had rest forty years, that perhaps means till the fortieth year of their settlement; and under Ehud and Shamgar, eighty years perhaps means no more than till the eightieth year of their settlement. Besides, the years of some of the judges might run into those of their successors: or those of Samuel and Saul were perhaps but forty years between them. Or, the four hundred and eighty years may be reckoned thus: from the departure from Egypt to the settlement in Canaan, forty-seven; from thence, during the rests of forty, of eighty, of forty, of forty years, under Othniel, Ehud, Barak, Gideon, two hundred; to which add, for the duration of the government of Abimelech, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, Samson, and Eli, one hundred and nine; and for Samuel, Saul, David, and the first four years of Solomon, one hundred and twenty-four; and then we have precisely four hundred and eighty. Or, from the departure from Egypt, to the settlement of the Reubenites and Gadites, forty years; from thence to the invasion of the Ammonites, three hundred, Judg. xi. 26; thence to the reign of Saul, thirty-six; and from thence to the building of the temple, eighty-four years; in all four hundred and eighty. After the death of Gideon, two if not sometimes three judges ruled at the same time in different places. Probably the book of Judges was written by Samuel, and the book of Ruth written as an appendix thereto. At the close of the second chapter, he gives us a summary of the whole. The Jebusites were masters of Jerusalem when it was written, chap. i. 21; the house of God was no more at Shiloh. chap. xviii. 31. His so often remarking that there was then no king in Israel, during the period of that history, insinuates, that there was a king in Israel when the penman of this book lived. The mention of the captivity of the land, chap. xviii. 31. seems to point this book to some writer of later date than Samuel: but he might call that judgment on the land under Eli, a captivity; or that clause might be long after added by Ezra.

JUDGMENT. (1.) Wisdom and prudence, whereby one can judge of what is proper or improper, right or wrong. Jer. x. 24. Isa. xxx. 18. Psal. lxxii. 1. (2.) Strict equity; such as should appear in judging. Luke xi. 42. (3.) The power of judging the world: this God has committed to Christ. John v. 22. and xvi. 8. (4.) The wise separation of men one from another, some to damnation, others for salvation. John ix. 39. (5.) The decision of a judge. 1 Kings iii. 28. (6.) God's purposes, and the execution of them. Rom. xi. 33. (7.) The solemn trial of men at the last day, that the wicked may be condemned, and the righteous appointed to everlasting life. Eccl. xii. 14. Jude 6, 15. (8.) The punishment inflicted for sin. Prov. xix. 29. Ezek. xxx. 14. Isa. liii. 8. (9.) Chastisement inflicted on saints. 1 Pet. iv. 17. (10.) The statutes or commandment of God, or what he has decided in his word, particularly in what relates to civil punishments. Psal. xix. 7. Matt. xii. 18. Exod. xxi. 1. (11.) Courts for trying causes. Matt. v. 21. (12.) Controversies to be tried and decided. 1 Cor. vi. 4. (13.) Sentiment, opinion, advice. 1 Cor. i. 10. and vii. 25. God brings forth men's judgment as the noon-day, when, in his wise and righteous providence, he openly manifests and rewards them according to the goodness and equity of their cause. Psal. xxxvii. 6. Zion shall be redeemed with judgment; shall be delivered according to the wisdom and equity of God, and through the infliction of punishment on God's Son. Isa. i. 27. Christ brings forth judgment to the gentiles, and sends it forth unto victory; when he effectually reveals the truths of God, fully satisfies his offended justice, and, in a way of executing vengeance on Satan and his interests, forms a people to himself. Isa. xlii. 2, 3. Matt. xii. 18, 20. Now is the judgment of this world come; now shall the prince of this world be cast out. Now shall God separate multitudes to himself; now shall he bring down their carnal lusts and imaginations; now shall the Jewish nation be punished; now shall Satan be cast out from men's hearts, and lose his authority in the world. John xii. 31. The Holy Ghost shall convince men of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged; by dislodging Satan from men's bodies, and casting him out of their hearts, he shall demonstrate Jesus' power and authority, and evince his future appearance to judgment. John xvi. 11. God's judgments are true and righteous; his conduct in delivering his people, and punishing his enemies, corresponds with the predictions and threatenings of his word, and the equity of his nature. Rev. xix. 2.

JULIUS, the centurion of Augustus's band. Into his hands Festus committed Paul, to convey him prisoner to Rome. He showed a great regard for that apostle. See PAUL. Acts xxvii.

JUNIA; an early convert to the Christian faith, and of note among the apostles. But whether this person to whom Paul sends his salutation, was a man, or a woman, and the wife of Andronicus, cannot be determined. Rom. xvi. 7.

JUNIPER; a well known shrub, whose male flowers are of the amentaceous kind, and consist of many small prickly leaves; the fruit is a roundish fleshy kind of berry; the kernels are angular, and the seed oblong. The leaves are ever green, and are plain and simple, not unlike those of the cypress. Its appearance is similar to that of the cedar, and it seems some of the Greeks called it by that name. Tournefort mentions five kinds of the juniper. Whether the Hebrew Rethem signifies juniper, is not altogether certain. So the ancient interpreters, Aquila, and Jerome, indeed render it; but the valuable Syriac translation renders it turpentine tree; the Chaldaic paraphrase, and the great Schultens, render it broom. It is certain that a turpentine tree was fit for Elijah to rest under, and that the fuel of it burns very fiercely. 1 Kings xix. 4, 5. Psal. cxx. 4; but whether the root of either it or juniper could be food, I know not: but it is certain, broom has sometimes a rape or navey about its root that may be eaten. Job xxx. 4. As coals of juniper, or turpentine tree, burn long or fiercely, they are an emblem of terrible calamities here, and of everlasting torments hereafter. Psal. cxx. 4. Calmet thinks Rethem, signifies any wild shrub.

IVORY; a hard white substance, capable of a fine polish. It is the tusks of elephants, which are hollow from the base to a certain height, and the cavity is filled up with a marrowy substance mingled with glands. These ivory tusks resemble horns. Ezek. xxvii. 15. Some ivory tusks are from ninety to one hundred and twenty-five pounds weight; and one found in the isle of Sumatra in the East Indies, is said to have weighed three hundred and thirty pounds. The Ivory of Ceylon and Achem does not become yellow by age. In Russia, and other parts of Europe, a species of ivory is found buried in the ground; and at Petersburg is a tusk of a hundred and eighty pounds' weight; but whether these be the real teeth of elephants, long ago there deposited, or horns of fishes brought thither at the flood, or a kind of substance formed in the earth, we cannot determine. Ivory was anciently very plentiful in Canaan; wardrobes, it seems, were cased with it, to prevent the entrance of moths. Psal. xlv. 8. Solomon had a throne made of it. 1 Kings x. 18, 22. Ahab, and some of the Israelitish nobles had their houses ornamented with it and their beds made of it. 1 Kings xxii. 39. Amos iii. 15, and vi. 4. At Tyre, they sometimes made the seats for the rowers of their ships of it. Ezek. xxvii. 6. In metaphorical language, it represents what is comely, pure strong, and durable. See BULLY, NECK.

JUPITER; the great god of the heathens. Perhaps the name is derived from Jao, Jeve, or JEHOVAH, and pater, father. It is certain, the Jupiter of the Latins, and Zeus of the Greeks, were as common as Baal in the east. Three Jupiters were principally famous, the son of Æther, the son of Cœlus, but chiefly the son of Saturn. His father is said to have been king of Crete, about the time of Moses, or perhaps three hundred years later, and to have endeavoured the destruction of all his children. When Jupiter, who was secretly brought up, came to manhood, he stripped his father of his kingdom, and appears to have been one of the most adulterous and otherwise unclean wretches that ever breathed. The heathens, however, believed he had the government of heaven and earth; and that he gave to his brother Neptune the government of the sea, and to Pluto the government of hell. See NOAH. The Jews appear to have known nothing of Jupiter or Zeus, till the time of Alexander the Great. Antiochus Epiphanes placed a statue of Jupiter Olympius in the temple of Jerusalem; another of Jupiter, the defender of strangers, in the Samaritan temple of Gerizzim. On account of his gravity, and majestic mien, Barnabas was taken for Jupiter at Lystra. Acts xiv. 11, 12.

JUST, or RIGHTEOUS; signifies the rendering to every one his due. God is just and righteous; of his own nature, he is infallibly disposed to render to himself, and to every one of his creatures, what is just and equal, agreeable to their nature, or according to their deserts, or the deserts of another in their stead. Dent. xxxii. 4. Psal. xi. 7. Christ is just and righteous; he is infinitely just and holy as God, perfectly holy and obedient as man, and has fulfilled in our stead the whole demands of the broken covenant of works. 1 Pet. iii. 18. 1 John ii. 1. The saints are just and righteous; through the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, they are constituted complete fulfillers of the law as a covenant before God as an impartial judge, and, in consequence hereof, are, by the Spirit of God in them, conformed to God's image and law in their nature and life, and are inclined to do to every one what is just and equal. Rom. i. 17. Luke xxiii. 50. Joseph the husband of Mary. was a just man; not rigid, and averse to do Mary, who he supposed had been unwillingly defiled, any injury in procuring her death. Matt. i. 19. Masters give servants what is just and equal, when they are sufficiently compassionate of, kind to, and give them due maintenance and reward for their service. Col. iv. 1.

JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS, or EQUITY; the giving of every one his due. God's justice or righteousness, is that essential perfection of his nature, whereby he is disposed to render to every one his due; gives creatures laws suited to their nature, and which he originally gives them sufficient strength to perform; and renders to them the due reward of that moral good or evil, which is justly charged to their account. Ignorance of this righteousness of God occasions men to go about to establish their own righteousness. Rom. x. 3. God's righteousness sometimes may signify, his mercy, goodness, and faithfulness. Deut. vi. 25. Isa. xlii. 6. The righteousness of Jesus Christ, is that equity which he observes in all his mediatorial work. 2 Tim. iv. 8; particularly his complete fulfilment of the precepts, and satisfaction of the penalty of the broken covenant in our stead. Matt. iii. 15. Isa. xlii. 21. It is called the righteousness of the law, because it fully answers all its demands. Rom. viii. 4. It is called the righteousness of, or by faith, because it is not fulfilled in our person, but received by faith, as offered in the gospel. Rom. iii. 22; iv. 13; and x. 6. It is called the righteousness of God; God the Father devised and exacted it, God the Son fulfilled it, God the Holy Ghost applies it; and it is infinitely worthy of the divine acceptance and reward. Rom. i. 17. and iii. 21. Believers are made the righteousness of God in Christ; having his righteousness imputed to them, they are constituted perfectly righteous before God as a judge. 2 Cor. v. 21. Men's righteousness, is either their universal holiness of nature and life, in conformity to the divine law, 1 Cor. xv. 34; or their justice and equity in their dealings with men, Luke i. 75; or a signal act of obedience to the divine law, Psal. cvi. 31; or their freedom from the guilt of any particular crime, Gen. xxxvii. 26; or the free gifts they give to the poor, Psal. cxlii. 9. 2 Cor. viii. 10; or their proof of honesty. Gen. xxx. 33. The saints have a three-fold righteousness: (1.) The righteousness of their person, as in Christ: this is the Saviour's holiness in human nature; his obedient life, and satisfactory sufferings, imputed to them; of this they glory and boast. Isa. xlv. 24. (2.) The righteousness of their nature and life, as renewed, assisted, and directed by the Spirit of God: this they disclaim, in the case of justification; and, as performed by them, count dung and filthy rags before God as a judge. Isa. xlv. 6. Phil. iii. 9. (3.) Their righteousness, or innocency with respect to a particular sin. Psal. vii. 8. This kind of righteousness Job defended too much, to the charging of God with injustice. Job. xxxv. 2. They believe unto righteousness; and their faith is counted to them for righteousness; by faith they receive Christ's righteousness; and this object of their faith is accounted to them as their justifying righteousness before God. Rom. x. 10. and iv. 3, 5, 9. The Holy Ghost convinces of righteousness: i. e. that we have no righteousness of our own; that Jesus was a righteous person, and has fully completed his mediatorial righteousness for us. John xvi. 10. Righteousness also signifies, the reward of righteousness imputed or implanted, or the blessings that flow therefrom. Psal. xxiv. 5. Isa. lviii. 8. Judgment is before God; he attends to equity, wisdom, and prudence, in all his conduct. Job xxxv. 14. God enters into judgment, when he calls men to account for their conduct, that he may deal with them according to their works. Psal. cxliii. 2. Judgment returns to righteousness, when, either by God or men, the wicked are remarkably punished, and the righteous remarkably favoured. Psal. xciv. 14.

JUSTIFY; to sustain, or declare one righteous. It never signifies to render one holy; God or Christ cannot be rendered holy. It is represented as sinful to justify the wicked, or for a man to justify himself; but it could never be sinful to render holy the wicked, or a man's self. Justification is the opposite of condemnation. Prov. xvii. 15. Dent. xxv. 1. Matt. xii. 37. God is justified, when the righteousness of his conduct is openly manifested and declared: David's sin justified God; God appeared perfectly righteous in threatening or punishing it; and his confession justified God, as therein he acknowledged God's holiness and righteousness in all that came upon him for it. Psal. li. 4. God justified Christ, in accepting his service in our stead, in bringing him from the dead, and giving him glory, as the full evidence of his having fully finished what was required of him as our surety. Isa. l. 8. Christ was justified in the Spirit. By the power of his divine nature he rose from the grave, as our justified head; and by the miraculous and saving influences of the Holy Ghost, he was manifested to be the righteous Son of God, and the Mediator who had finished the work of righteousness which the Father gave him to do. 1 Tim. iii. 16. God justifies men, when he considers them as perfectly righteous in his sight as their judge, freed from the guilt of sin, and accepted into his favour, and entitled to endless felicity. Rom. iii. 24, 28, 40; viii. 33; and v. 9. They are considered as ungodly in themselves. Rom. iv. 5. This justification is founded on no works done or to be done by us; none of these can satisfy the unchanging law of God, and all of them are, in every shape, excluded from the matter of our justifying righteousness before God. Gal. iii. 10, 12. Rom. iii. 20, 24, 28. Gal. ii. 16. But it springs from the absolutely free grace of God, Tit. iii. 7. Rom. iii. 24; and is founded on the righteousness of Jesus Christ, as fulfilled in our stead, and imputed to our persons. Gal. ii. 16. Rom. iii. 24. and v. 9, 19. Phil. iii. 8, 9. Isa. xlv. 24. Jer. xxiii. 6. and xxxiii. 16; and it is by the faith or knowledge of Christ, as by faith we receive Jesus' person, righteousness, and a full justification thereby. Gal. iii. 8. Rom. v. 1; iii. 28. and iv. 5. Isa. liii. 11. Good works, (being the infallible fruits of justification) justify the saints; they manifest to their own consciences, and to the world, that they are justified, and righteous before God. James ii. 21—25. Ministers justify many, or turn them to righteousness; they preach the justifying righteousness of Jesus Christ, that men may receive it; they publish the sentence of justification, contained in the gospel, and they absolve men from scandals. Dan. xii. 3. Our justification is through the death and resurrection of Christ; his death, blood, or righteousness, is the price and ground of it, or the very righteousness in which we are sustained righteous before God; and in his resurrection, he was justified as our public head, and begun to be exalted, that he might give us repentance and remission of sins. Rom. iv. 25. and viii. 34; and it is called justifica- tion of life, inasmuch as we are therein entitled to eternal life of holiness and happiness; and all the perfections of God are deeply engaged to bestow the same upon us. Rom. v. 16, 18. Men justify God, when they acknowledge and declare the righteousness of his conduct. Luke vii. 29, 35. They justify themselves, when they imagine, or declare themselves to be blameless in whole or in part. Luke x. 29. and xvi. 15. They justify others, when they believe, or declare them righteous. Deut. xxiv. 1. Prov. xvii. 15; or by a worse practice, shew and vindicate them as less guilty than themselves. Ezek. xvi. 51. Jer. iii. 11.

JUTTAH; a city of the portion of Judah; but whether the same as the city Juda, Luke i. 39; is doubtful. Josh. xv. 55.

K.

KAB; a measure of about ninety-six solid inches, which is about six less than a Scotch pint, and is somewhat more than three pints and a half English wine measure. 2 Kings vi. 25.

KAB'ZE-EL, or JE-KAB'ZE-EL, was a city of Judah, it seems, near the west shore of the Dead sea. Josh. xv. 21; and here Benaiah, the general of Solomon's army, was born. 2 Sam. xxiii. 20.

KA'DESH, KE'DESH, or KA'DESH-BAR-KEA; was a place on the south of Canaan, about twenty-four miles south from Hebron, and on the edge of the wilderness of Paran. It was anciently called Emishpat, because there the Canaanites had judged their people near to a well. Gen. xiv. 7. Perhaps it was called Rithmah, from the junipers, or turpentine trees, or other shrubs, that grew near to it. Compare Num. xxxiii. 18. with xii. 16. and xiii. 1. and xxxii. 8. Here the Hebrews long sojourned, and from hence Moses sent the spies to view the promised land. Deut. i. 46. Whether this be the Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin, where Miriam died, is doubtful, Lightfoot is positive it was; and Wells thinks it was not. There was another KEDESH in the lot of Naphtali, which was given to the Gershonites, and made a city of refuge. Josh. xxi. 32. and xx. 7. Kishon, of the tribe of Issachar, which was also given to the Gershonites, was also called Kedesh. 1 Chron. vi. 72.

KAD-MON-ITES, or EASTERLINGS; a tribe of the Canaanites who dwelt to the north-east of Canaan, near mount Hermon. Possibly Cadmus, who retired to Boeotia in the time of Joshua or David, was one of them, and his wife Hermoine had her name from Hermon.

KA'NAH; (1.) A river on the south border of the western Manassites; by some thought to be the same as CHERITH, so called from the reeds or canes growing about it; but perhaps it was a different river, and run westward into the Mediterranean sea. Josh. xvi. 8. and xvii. 9, 10. (2.) Kanaah; a city of the tribe of Asher, and not far from Zidon, Josh. xix. 28; but whether this, or another place about four miles north of Nazareth, was the Cana of Galilee, where our Saviour attended at a marriage, cannot be certainly determined. Phocas and Maundrel consider it to be the latter, as it was much nearer the residence of Christ's mother. John ii.

KANKOR, Nobah and Jogbeah, were all cities about the head of the river Arnon, or a little northward from it. Judg. viii. 10.

KE'DAR, a son of Ishmael, and father of the Kedarenes, who resided about the south parts of Arabia the Desert, ordinarily in tents, but sometimes in villages, and whose glory and wealth chiefly consisted in their flocks and herds. Sol. Song. i. 5. Isa. xlii. 11. and xxi. 16. Here David concealed himself during the persecution of Saul, Psal. cxx. 5; but it is more certain that the inhabitants of Kedar traded with the ancient Tyrians in sheep and goats, Ezek. xxvii. 21; and that they were terribly harrassed by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, in their turn. Isa. xxi. 17. Jer. xlix. 28.

KE'DE-MAH, the youngest son of Ishmael. He could not be the father of the Kadmonites, as they existed before he was born. Compare Gen. xv. 19. with xxv. 15. His posterity roved about the south-east of Gilead, and perhaps gave name to the city of Kedemoth, near the river Arnon, and given by the Reubenites to the Levites of Merari's family. Deut. ii. 16. Josh. xiii. 18. and xxi. 37.

KEEP; (1.) To hold fast, preserve firmly. 2 Tim. i. 12, 14. (2.) To watch over, protect. Psal. cxxvii. 1. (3.) To save, preserve, deliver. John xvii. 15. (4.) To observe, to put in practice sincerely or perfectly. Psal. cxix. 4. Matt. xix. 17. God keeps covenant and mercy: according to the tenor of his covenant, he is ever ready to forgive his people's sins, and to grant free favours to them. 1 Kings viii. 23. He keeps the door of men's lips, in preserving them from vain, imprudent, and sinful words. Psal. cxli. 3. Ministers are keepers of the vineyard; they watch over, and labour in the church, and preserve the truths, ordinances, and members thereof, from spiritual injuries. Sol. Song viii. 11. The sahts are made slavish keepers of the vineyard, to the neglect of their own, when, by administering public offices, intermeddling too much with carnal business, or by oppression from the impositions of men, they are made to neglect the due management of their own heart or life. Sol. Song i. 6. To keep the heart with all diligence, is watchfully to observe its inclinations and motions, that it comply with no temptation, no appearance of evil; and earnestly to study that its whole temper, thoughts, and the words and works proceeding therefrom, correspond with the unerring law of God. Prov. iv. 23. To keep God's word, statutes, or laws, is to believe them firmly as indeed the word of God; to love, esteem, and delight in them; and diligently endeavour to have our whole life exactly conformed thereto. Psal. cxix. 17, 34. The barren woman keeps house, when she is made to conceive, bring forth, and attend children. Psal. cxliii. 9. The arms are called keepers of the house, which shake in old age. Eccl. xii. 3.

KE-ILAH; a city belonging to the tribe of Judah. It stood north-west of Hebron, and about sixteen or twenty miles south-west of Jerusalem. Josh. xv. 44. Naham, or Achetmaham, was the prince or chief proprietor of it in the days of Joshua. 1 Chron. iv. 19. David saved it from the inroads of the Philistines during his exile; and yet, had he continued in it, the inhabitants would have ungratefully delivered him up into the hands of Saul. 1 Sam. xxiii. 1—12. In the time of Nehemiah, it was a considerable place. Neh. iii. 17, 18. About four hundred years after Christ, it was a place of some note.

KEMU-EL, the third son of Nahor, and father of Aram; from him probably sprung the Kamelites, who, Strabo says, dwelt on the east of Syria, and westward of the Euphrates. Gen. xxii. 21.

KE'NAH; a town of the eastern Manassites. Nobah, one of them, took it from the Canaanites, and called it after himself. Numb. xxxii. 42. It seems that it afterwards recovered its ancient name, and is placed by Pliny in Decapolis, but by Muebius in Trachonitis, about four miles from Jogbehah.

KE'NITES; an ancient tribe, that resided somewhere in the Desert of Arabia, between the Dead sea and the Gulph of Elath, if not further to the north-west. It seems they coalesced with the Midianites: for Jethro, priest of Midian, was a Kenite. Judg. i. 16. Their land was promised to the Hebrews, Gen. xv. 19; but for the sake of Jethro, it seems, they were generally spared, and dwelt mostly in the inaccessible rocks of Arabia. Numb. xxiv. 21. Such as dwell in the south coasts of Canaan, seem to have become mingled with the Amalekites, perhaps to elude the ravages of the Philistines: but, at Saul's direction, as he marched to destroy the Amalekites, they separated from them, and returned to the south parts of the lot of Judah. 1 Sam. xv. 6. and xxvii. 10. They were often harassed by their enemies, and at last the Assyrians carried the most of them captive, into countries more to the eastward. Num. xxiv. 21. One Rechab, whom we suppose to have descended from Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses, was one of the most considerable chiefs of the Kenites, and gave name to a tribe of them. These Rechabites appear to have been subdivided into three tribes, the Tirathites, the Shimeathites, and the Suchathites; they were proselytes to the Jewish religion, and many of them followed the business of scribes. 1 Chron. ii. 55. Jonadab the son of Rechab, and friend of Jehu, having seen the terrible case of the Jews who lived in cities in the time of Ahab and Jehoram, and perhaps seen some fatal consequences of the drinking of wine, solemnly charged the Rechabites never to drink wine or strong drink, nor to build any houses; but to dwell in tents, and feed cattle. This charge they so carefully observed, that when they had fled into Jerusalem, in the time of Zedekiah, which was about three hundred years after, and Jeremiah took them into an apartment belonging to the temple, and urged them to drink wine, they begged to be excused, that they might not transgress the charge of their ancestor. The Lord declared his high approbation of their obedience, and promised to reward it with the perpetual preservation of their family, whether in the Chaldean captivity, or the present dispersion of the Hebrew nation. Jer. xxxv.

KEN-IZZITES; a tribe of the ancient Canaanites, who seem to have resided in the mountains of Judah. Gen. xv. 19.

KERCHIEFS; an article of dress used by the false prophetesses, are thought to have been head-tires, or veils bound to the head, so as to cover most, if not all, of the face. They make kerchiefs on the head of every statue to hunt souls; they put them on the head of the idolatrous statues; or they put them on the head of those they spoke to, as if a divine token of their protection; or it may mean, that they blindfolded people with their delusive speeches. Ezek. xlii. 18.

KERTH-HEZ'RON, was also called HAZOR, and was a city of the tribe of Judah. Josh. xv. 25. There was another city called Kerioth, in the country of Moab, and which the Assyrians and Chaldeans terribly wasted. Amos ii. 2. Jer. xlviii. 24, 41.

KE-TURAH. See ABRAHAM.

KEY, is often used to denote power and authority, whereby persons are shut up, or set at liberty. Eliakim's key of the house of David, was power to transact affairs in the kingdom of Judah, as minister of state to Hezekiah, the descendant of David. Isa. xxii. 22. Christ has the key of David, and openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth; has full power and authority to admit or exclude men from the church or from heaven, and to open or shut men's hearts, and to open up or seal the oracles of God, as he pleaseth. Rev. iii. 7. He hath the keys of the bottomless pit; the keys of hell and death; hath power and authority to permit or restrain Satan, and his agents, as he pleaseth; and to save from, or condemn to death and hell, as seemeth good in his sight. Rev. xx. 1. and i. 18. Ability and authority to explain the scriptures to men, are called the key of knowledge. Luke xi. 52. The keys of the kingdom of heaven, are power and authority to preach the gospel, and administer the sacraments, and to exercise government and discipline, that men may be admitted to, or excluded from the church, as is proper. Matt. xvi. 19. The key of the bottomless pit given to the fallen star, is power and authority permitted by God to Antichrist and Mahomet, to send forth and employ the policy and legions of hell to assist them in their delusive projects. Rom. ix. 1.

KICK; a metaphor taken from a fed horse, or like animal, kicking with his HEELS at his owner when he gives him provision, pricks him forward, or the like. To kick against God, is wantonly and stubbornly to rebel against him, and make his benefits an occasion of rebelling against him. Deut. xxxii. 15. To kick at his sacrifice, is wantonly to profane and abuse it in contempt and hatred of him. 1 Sam. ii. 19. It was hard for Paul to kick against the pricks; it was not only without success, but infinitely absurd and hazardous, wantonly and outrageously to rebel against the Almighty God, to the pricking, tormenting, and ruining of his own soul. Acts ix. 5.

KID; a young GOAT, very often used in sin-offerings; and represented Jesus as in the likeness of sinful flesh, and through weakness, crucified to make atonement for our sin. Num. vii. xv. xxviii. xlix. Kids were sometimes given in presents, and their flesh was esteemed a delicious dish, but was never to be boiled in its mother's milk, as that would have been an appearance of cruelty, and an imitation of heathen superstition. Gen. xxxviii. 17. Judg. xv. 1. 1 Sam. xvi. 20. Judg. vi. 19. and xliii. 10. Gen. xvii. 9. Exod. xxviii. 19. and xxxiv. 26. In allusion to which it is said, Thou never gavest me a kid, to make merry with my friends; thou never gavest me any distinguished token of thy favour, or such a delightful experience of thy redeeming goodness, as I might mention to the great joy of my friends. Luke xv. 25. Saints harmless, tender, weak, somewhat comely in their conversation, but still polluted with and remains of corruption, are called kids. Sol. Song i. 8. See FLOCA.

KIDNEYS; (1.) Inward parts of some animals. Lev. iii. 4. (2.) The kernel or substantial part of grains of wheat. Deut. xxxii. 14. (3.) The inmost powers, thoughts, and desires of the soul, and which are sometimes called reins. Psal. xv. 7.

KID'RON, or CENNON; a brook which runs south-eastward, along the east side of Jerusalem, through what is called the valley of Jehoshaphat, or valley of the son of Hinnom. It runs along the west side of the mount of Olives, between it and the city, and then runs south-eastward into the Dead sea. David crossed it in his escape from Absalom, and Jesus in his way to the garden of Gethsemane. 2 Sam. xv. 23. John xviii. 1. The brook Kidron, though it receives all the rivalets about Jerusalem, is generally but small, and sometimes dry; but amidst sudden and heavy rains, it swells exceedingly, and runs with great violence; and on such occasions, carries off the filth of the city, which, by the common sewers, is carried into it. The valley through which this brook runs, for about twelve miles, is considerably unsightly. About the west end of it, Aza, Hezekiah, and Josiah, burnt the idols of their apostate predecessors. 1 Kings xv. 3. 2 Chron. xxix. 16. 2 Kings xxxiii. 3.

KILL; SLAY. God kills men, not only with natural, but with spiritual and eternal death. Rev. ii. 23. Matt. x. 28. The killing of wisdom's beasts, of God's oxen, fallings, or fatted calf, signifies the whole sufferings and death of our Saviour, to render him a fit Redeemer of, and provision for, our souls. Prov. ix. 2. Matt. xxii. 4. Luke xv. 27. The saints are killed all day long, when they are grievously oppressed and persecuted. Psal. xlii. 23. Rom. viii. 36. The killing of Christ's witnesses by Antichrist, includes not only the murder of their bodies, but I think, chiefly the seduction of Protestants from their holy profession, and zeal for God. Rev. xi. 7. To kill with the sword, includes all kinds of violent deaths. Rev. xiii. 10. Not only the wrath and jealousy of God, but a man's own wrath and envy, kill him; they waste the vital spirit, and prompt him to such rash and wicked things as hasten his death. Job v. 2. God slays men by the words of his mouth, when he denounces and executes his destructive judgments upon them. Hos. vi. 3. The letter, or covenant of works, killeth; it is the strength of sin, and condemns men to death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal. The letter, or external part of ceremonies, without regard to the gospel-signification, killed men, and hindered them from Christ and salvation, and cleaving thereto, hastened ruin on the Jewish nation. The letter, or unsanctified head-knowledge of divine truth, kills; it encourageth pride and makes men esteem themselves, and condemn Christ, and, to their own ruin, refuse the offers of the gospel. 2 Cor. iii. 6. The desire of the slothful kills them; their delight in ease hurts their constitution, and exposes them to great straits and poverty: or their desire after things for which they care not to labour, leads them to methods that bring them to an unhappy end. Prov. xxi. 25. Sin slays men, when the prevalence of its reigning power, and the apprehension of its guilt, render them worse, and undo all their hopes of felicity. Rom. vii. 11. The Hebrews slaying children in the valleys, signifies their offering them in sacrifice to Moloch, or other idols, in the valley of the son of Hinnom, or other concealed places. Isa. lvii. 5.

KIND; (1.) A sort. Gen. i. 11. and viii. 19. (2.) Courteous, loving, and ready to do good offices. Luke vi. 35. 1 Cor. xiii. 4. 2 Chron. x. 7. The Hebrews' kindness of youth, and love of espousals, denote God's ancient favours to them, and their zealous profession of regard and obedience to God in the wilderness, as they had passed the Red sea, and came to Mount Sinai. Jer. ii. 2.

KINDLE; (1.) To cause to burn; to stir up strife, anger, judgments, compassion. Prov. xxvi. 21. Psal. ii. 12. Ezek. xx. 48. Hos. xi. 8.

KINDRED; a number of people related to one another by blood, or marriage. The kindreds of the earth, that shall mourn at Christ's second appearing, are the vast multitudes of wicked and worldly men. Rev. i. 7. The kindreds over which Antichrist rules, are vast multitudes of different nations, sexes, and conditions. Rev. xiii. 7. and xi. 9. God's New Testament people, are gathered out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; they are of many different nations, families, languages, and conditions. Rev. v. 9. and vii. 9.

KING; a chief ruler of a tribe, or nation. At first the power of kings was of very limited extent, sometimes over but one city, or large village. Benhadad had thirty-two kings subject to him. 1 Kings xx. 1—16. In Canaan, Adonibezek conquered seventy kings, and made them eat bread under his table; Joshua conquered thirty-one. Judg. i. 7. Josh. xii. Nimrod, of Babylon, was the first king of whom we read; but soon after, we find kings in Egypt, Persia, Canaan, Edom, &c. Gen. x. 10; xiii; xiv; xx; and xxxvi. After the Hebrews were formed into a separate nation, God was properly their king: he gave them their civil laws; and by the Urim and Thummim, and by the prophets, or by visions, was his mind declared to them. Moses, who is called king in Jeshurun, or the upright people, as well as Joshua, and the judges, were but the deputies of Heaven, and had no legislative power. After the Hebrews had been under this government for about three hundred and ninety-six years, they, pretending that Samuel's sons behaved unjustly, begged to have a king like the nations around. As God had hinted to Moses that the Hebrews should have kings chosen from among their brethren, and required them to write each for himself a copy of the law, and observe the same in their whole conduct, and prohibited them to multiply horses, wives, or treasures; it seems their desire of a king was not sinful in itself, but only in its manner; as it implied a weariness of the divine government; and in its end, to be like the nations around. After laying before them the manner in which most of the kings they should have would oppress them, seizing their fields, crops, sons, and daughters at pleasure; God gave them king Saul in his anger, and afterward cut him off in his wrath. Hos. xiii. 11. After this their theocracy was in a languishing condition, and their king's power resembled the power of kings in our own times.

Besides Saul, David, and Solomon, their general sovereigns, the tribe of Judah was governed by Rehoboam, Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, Joash, Amaziah, Azariah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, Manasseh, Ammon, Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, twenty in all; and the ten tribes by Ishbosheth, Jeroboam, Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah, Joram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam, Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah, and Hoshea, twenty in all. After their return from Babylon, the Hebrews had no kings of their own for about four hundred years, but had their own deputy-governors under the Persians, or Greeks. After that Hircanus, Aristobulus, Janneus, and his sons, Hircanus and Aristobulus, all high-priests, ruled with supreme power. After these, Herod the Great, Archelaus, Herod Agrippa, and Agrippa his son, were kings tributary to the Romans; the last had scarcely any power at all, but to manage the affairs of the temple. The two books containing the history of the Hebrew kings for about four hundred and fifty-six years from the death of David, to the release of Jehoiachin, seem to have been written at separate times by Ahijah the Shilonite, Iddo the seer, Isaiah, &c.; and to have been formed into one work by Jeremiah, or Ezra. The joint reign of some kings, the father with the son, the reckoning of the same year to the deceased king and to his successor, and the inter-reigns that happened before the settlement of some kings, as before the reign of Omri, Zachariah, and Hoshea, kings of Israel, and before the reign of Azariah in Judah, render it sometimes difficult to fix the dates in this book.

God is a King, and King of nations: with great wisdom and power he governs, and protects all things in heaven and earth. Psal. xlv. 4. Christ is a King; King of kings; Lord of lords; and King of saints. By his Father's appointment, he subdues, governs, and defends his church: and hath all power in heaven and earth given him for the promoting of her welfare: he restrains and conquers her enemies; and at the last day, he will pass an irreversible sentence of judgment on the whole world. Psal. ii. 6. and xlv. 1. Matt. xxv. 34. Rev. xvii. 14. and xix. 16. The king that reigned in righteousness, and princes that ruled in judgment, were Hezekiah and his governors, and Christ and his apostles and ministers. Isa. xxxii. 1. Saints are kings: they have the kingdom of God within them; they are heirs of the kingdom of glory; they war against, and conquer sin, Satan, and the world; they rule their own spirits, and govern their bodies, and have no small influence on God's government of nations and churches. Rev. i. 6. and v. 10. and xv. 4. Leviathan is king over all the children of pride, or fierce-looking monsters; in strength or bulk, he exceeds all the animals. Job xli. 34. Four kings and king of the north and south. Dan. ix. See PERSIANS and GREEKS.

KINGDOM; (1.) The country or countries subject to one king. Deut. iii. 4. (2.) The power of acting as king, or of supreme administration. 1 Sam. xviii. 8. and xx. 31. God's universal dominion over all things, is called his kingdom; by this he preserves, protects, gives laws to, and regulates all his creatures, as he pleaseth. 1 Chron. xxix. 11. Psal. cxlv. 12.

The visible church, especially under the New Testament, is called a kingdom; Christ and his Father rule in it, and maintain order, safety, and happiness therein. It is called the kingdom of heaven; it is of a heavenly origin, has a heavenly governor and laws, and is erected to render multitudes fit for heaven. Matt. iii. 2, 5, 19, 30. and xiii. 47. and xvi. 18. Col. i. 13. The saints' new covenant state, and the work of saving grace in their hearts, are called the kingdom of God, and the kingdom of heaven.

In it God erects his throne in their hearts, gives laws and privileges to them, renders them heavenly-minded, and meet to enter the heavenly glory. Matt. vi. 33. and xiii. 31. Luke xvii. 20, 21.—The state of glory in heaven is called a kingdom. How great is its glory, happiness, and order! How ready the obedience of all the unnumbered subjects of God, and the Lamb therein. Matt. v. 10. Luke xxii. 16. 1 Cor. vi. 9.—The Hebrew nation, and the saints, are a kingdom of priests; they were, or are a numerous and honoured body, who have access to offer up sacrifices, prayer, praise, and good works, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. Exod. xix. 6. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Heathenish and Popish nations, are called the kingdoms of this world; their ends, maxims, and manner of government, are carnal and earthly. Rev. xi. 15.

KINSMAN. See REDEEMER.

KIR, KIR-HERES, KIR-HARESH, KIR-HARE-SHESH; a principal city of the Moabites, ravaged by the Hebrews under Jehoram, 2 Kings iii. 25; and long after ruined by the Assyrians, and by the Chaldeans. Isa. xv. 1. and xvi. 7, 11. Jer. xlviii. 31. (2.) KIR, a place in Media, whither the Syrians, and part of the Hebrews, were carried captive by the Assyrians, and part of the inhabitants of which served in Sennacherib's army against Judah. 2 Kings xvi. 19. Amos i. 5. and ix. 7. Isa. xxii. 6.

KIRJATH-AIM, or double city, a city on the east of Jordan, about ten miles west of Medeba. It seems to have been built before Chedorlamer's ravages. Gen. xiv. 15. Probably Sihon took it from the Moabites, and Moses took it from him, and gave it to the Reubenites; but the Moabites long after retook it. It was destroyed by the Chaldeans, but was rebuilt; and about four hundred years after Christ it was called Kariatha. Num. xxiii. 37. Jer. xlviii. 1, 23. (2.) KIRJATHAIM, or KARTAN, in the tribe of Naphtali, and given to the Levites. Josh. xxi. 32. 1 Chron. vi. 76.

KIRJATH-ARIM, KIRJATH-JEA-RIM, KIRJATH-BA'AL, or BAALAH; a city of Judah, situated in or near to a wood about nine or ten miles north-west of Jerusalem. It was one of the cities of the Gibeonites. Here the ark of God continued for perhaps about eighty or ninety years after it came back from the land of the Philistines. Josh. ix. 17. and xv. 9, 60. 1 Sam. vii. 1. 1 Chron. xiii.

KI'SHON, probably the same with Ptolemy's Pagida; a river that is said to take its rise in the valley of Jezreel, and run almost straight westward into the Mediterranean sea, by the port of Acco. Dr. Shaw, however, denies that its source is so far east as some make it; and affirms, that rising near Mount Carmel, it runs north-west till it enters the sea. It has a multitude of turnings in the manner of Forth near Stirling. As a multitude of rivulets fall into it from the adjacent hills, it swells exceedingly in the time of rain. About the east end of it, Jabin's army was routed, and multitudes of them were carried down by the swelling current of this river. It was called ancient, because it seems it had been early famed on some account. Judges v. 21. Psal. lxxxiii. 9. The city Kedesh, or Kadesh, was called Kishon, or Kishion, probably because it stood on the bank of this river, or had its streets winding hither and thither. Josh. xix. 20. and xxi. 28. with 1 Chron. vi. 72.

KISS, is used as a token of affection to a friend, or of reverence and subjection to a superior. Gen. xxvii. 26, 27. 1 Sam. xx. 41. and x. 1. At their meetings for religious worship, the primitive Christians seem to have been wont to kiss one another. This the scripture requires to be a holy kiss, and a kiss of charity, i. e. proceeding from a pure heart, and the most Christian and chaste affection, Rom. xvi. 16. 1 Pet. v. 14: but as this kiss, and the love-feasts, began to be early abused to promote unchastity or disorder, they were laid aside. KISSING has been often abused to cover treachery; as by Judas and Joab. 2 Sam. xx. 9. Matt. xxvi. 49. To pretend affection; as by Absalom. 2 Sam. xv. 5. To excite unchaste inclinations; as by the harlot. Prov. vii. 13. Also to express idolatrous reverence to an idol; either by kissing the idol itself, or by kissing of the hand, and directing it towards the idol. Hos. xiii. 2. 1 Kings xix. 18. Job xxxi. 27. Every man shall kiss his lips that giveth a right answer; i. e. shall love and reverence him who bears a proper testimony, or gives a right decision in an affair. Prov. xxiv. 26. The kisses of Christ's mouth, are the sensible, familiar, and frequently repeated applications of his love, by his word and Spirit: these testify his friendship and affection, and encourage and draw out our hearts to him. Sol. Song i. 2. The saints' kissing of Christ, or kissing him without, denotes their receiving of him by faith, their submission to him, their public profession and adoring of him. Psal. ii. 12. Sol. Song viii. 1. Righteousness and peace kiss each other; the justice of God, through the imputed righteousness of Christ, kindly promotes our peace with God, and with one another. Psal. lxxxv. 10.

KITE. See VULTURE.

KITTIM. See CHITTIM.

KNEE, not only signifies that part of the body so called, but the whole body, a part being put for the whole. Psal. cix. 24. Also for persons; so weak and feeble knees, denote weak and disconsolate persons. Job iv. 4. Heb. xii. 12. Isa. xxxv. 3. To bow the knee to one, imports adoration of, or prayer to him, 1 Kings xix. 18. Eph. iii. 14; or to reverence and be in subjection to him. Gen. xli. 43. Phil. ii. 10. To bring up, or dandle on the knees, is affectionately to nourish, as a mother does her own child. Gen. xxx. 3. and i. 23. Isa. lxvi. 12. The smiling of the knees one against another, is expressive of extraordinary terror and amazement. Dan. v. 6.

KNIFE. To put a knife to one's throat, at the table of the churi, is carefully to restrain our appetite, as if we were in the utmost hazard of eating too much. Prov. xxiii. 2. The knives used in killing and cutting the sacrifices, might represent Pilate, Herod, and other instruments of our Saviour's death. Ezra i. 9.

KNOCK. Jesus knocks at the door of our heart; by his word, Spirit, and providence, he awakens, invites, and urges us to receive himself as the free gift of God, and Saviour come to seek and save that which is lost. Rev. iii. 20. Sol. Song v. 2. Our knocking at his door of mercy, is fervent and frequent prayer for his distinguished presence and favours. Matt. vii. 7, 8. Luke xi. 10.

KNOW; (1.) To understand; to perceive. Ruth iii. 11. (2.) To have the experience of. 2 Cor. v. 21. (3.) To acknowledge, to take particular notice, to approve, delight in, and shew distinguished regard to. Isa. lv. 5. 1 Cor. viii. 3. John x. 27. Amos iii. 2. Gen. xxxix. 6. 1 Thess. v. 12. (4.) To make known, and see discovered. 1 Cor. ii. 2. (5.) To have carnal dealing with. Gen. iv. 1. and xix. 5. Judg. xix. 22. I know nothing by myself; I am not conscious of any allowed wickedness. 2 Cor. iv. 4. We make known our requests unto God, when directed by his Spirit, we express the desires of our hearts in prayer to him. Phil. iv. 6. He that perverteth his way is known, when God exposes him to shame and punishment on account of it. Prov. x. 9.

KNOWLEDGE; (1.) The infinite understanding of God, by which he perfectly perceives and comprehends himself, and all things possible or real. 1 Sam. ii. 3. (2.) A speculative knowledge, by which a man has a merely rational perception of things natural or divine, without any faith in, or love to God produced or strengthened by it. 1 Cor. viii. 1. Rom. i. 21. Eccl. i. 18. (3.) A spiritual reception of divine things, by which, through the instruction of God's word and Spirit, we not only perceive, but are powerfully and sweetly disposed to believe in, and love God in Christ as our God. 2 Cor. vii. 6. John xvii. 8. (4.) The supernatural gift of interpreting dreams, explaining hard passages of scripture, or foreseeing things to come. Dan. v. 12. 1 Cor. xiii. 2. (5.) Spiritual prudence, and gracious experience in the ways of God. Prov. xxviii. 2. (6.) The perfect and immediate views of the glory of God in heaven; in this we know God, as we are known; apprehend his existence, and glorious excellencies and work, without any mistake. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. (7.) Instruction by which knowledge is communicated. Prov. xxii. 17. (8.) Faith is called knowledge, as it supposes knowledge, and is an apprehending of things invisible, on the testimony of God. Isa. liii. 11. But this text may also mean, that by the Redeemer's infinitely skillful fulfilment of his work, he shall justify many. Saints are enriched with all knowledge; they are made wise unto salvation, and know every thing important concerning it. Rom. xv. 14. 1 Cor. i. 5. 1 John ii. 20. Through knowledge the just shall be delivered; i. e. by the infinite wisdom of God, and by means of their faith, spiritual knowledge, and prudence, they shall avoid trouble, or get out of it. Prov. xi. 9.

KO'HATH; the second son of Levi, and father of Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel. From him, by Aaron, the son of Amram, sprung the Hebrew priests. The rest of his family, at their departure from Egypt, were 8600 males, 2750 of whom were fit for service. Under Elzaphan the son of Uzziel, they pitched on the south side of the tabernacle; and they marched after the host of Reuben. Their business was, to carry on their shoulders the ark and other sacred utensils of the tabernacle; but were not, under pain of death, allowed to look at any of these, except perhaps the brazen laver. Exod. vi. 16—25. Num. iii. iv. and x. 21. Besides the thirteen cities of the priests, the Kohathites had, from the Ephraimites, Shechem, Gezer, Kibzaim, or Jokneon, and Bethoron; from the Danites, Eltheke, Gibbethon, Ajalon, and Gathrimmon; from the western Manassites, Tenuach and Gathrimmon, which either were the same, or afterward exchanged for Aner and Ibleam. Josh. xxi. 20—26. 1 Chron. vi. 66—70. In the days of David, Shebuel, Rehabiah, Jeriah, and Micah, were the chief of the Kohathites; and Shebuel and Rehabiah, descendants of Moses, had the charge of the sacred treasures. Four thousand four hundred of the descendants of Hebron, and sundry of the Izharites, were officers on the east and west of Jordan, in affairs civil and sacred. 1 Chron. xxiii. 12—20. and xxvi. 23—32.

KORAH, KOREH, CORE; the cousin of Moses, son of Izhar, and father of Assir, Elkanah, and Abiasaph. Envyng the authority of Moses and Aaron, Korah, together with Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab, and On the son of Peleth, chief men of the Rembenites, with two hundred and fifty other chiefs of the congregation, formed a party against them. It seems On deserted them, but the rest stuck in a body. They haughtily upbraided Moses and Aaron, as taking too much upon them, since the whole congregation were sacred to God. Moses replied, that they were too arrogant to find fault with the prescriptions of God, and that to-morrow the Lord would shew whom he allowed to officiate in the high priesthood. He advised Korah, and his two hundred and fifty accomplices, to appear with their censers full of incense on that occasion, to stand the trial. They did so, and put sacred fire into their censers. They also convened a great body of the people, to rail on Moses and Aaron, at least to witness God's acceptance of their incense. From a bright cloud hovering over the tabernacle, God ordered Moses and Aaron to separate themselves from the assembly, that he might destroy them in an instant. Moses and Aaron prayed that he would not destroy the whole congregation for the sin of a few who had stirred them up. The Lord granted their request, and directed them to order the congregation to flee as fast as they could, from the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. They had scarce retired, when the earth, according to Moses' prediction, opened her mouth, and swallowed them up alive, and all their tents and families. Meanwhile, a fire from God consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense along with Korah. It seems the sons of Korah detested their father's arrogance, and were perhaps miraculously preserved, and continued in their sacred office. Their descendants were Samuel, Heman, and others, sacred musicians in the time of David; and to them were eleven of the Psalms, viz. Ps. 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 54, 55, 57, 58, delivered to be set to music. Exod. vi. 24. Num. xvi. and xxvi. 9, 11. 1 Chron. vi. 33—38. and xxv. Some of them were porters to the temple. chap. xxvi.

LA'BAN, the son of Bethuel, the brother of Rebekah, and father of Leah and Rachel. He appears to have been of a very active mind, and to have had considerable power in his father's lifetime; but he was an idolater, and a most covetous and deceitful man. See ELIZER and JACOB.

LABOUR. (1.) Diligent care and pains; and so the diligent and hard work of the ministry is called labour, and ministers labourers; and travelling is called labour. Prov. xiv. 23. Eccl. i. 3. 1 Thess. v. 12. 1 Tim. v. 17. Josh. vii. 3. (2.) The pangs of a woman in child-birth. Gen. xxxv. 16, 17. (3.) The fruit, or effect of labour and diligence. Exod. xxiii. 16. Eccl. ii. 10, 11. Hab. iii. 17. (4.) The evil of sin and misery, and the painful service of God. Rev. xiv. 13. The labour of saints and ministers includes both their obedience and suffering. 2 Cor. v. 9. To labour in the Lord, is, in a state of union to the Lord Jesus, and deriving strength from him, to be earnestly employed in his service, whether of preaching the gospel, supporting such as do it, privately instructing others, or caring for the poor. 1 Thess. v. 12. Rom. xvi. 12. Christ's airing labourers into his vineyard, at the third, sixth, ninth, and eleventh hours, signifies his calling men effectually in very different periods of life; in early, middle, declining, or decrepit age, or in different periods of times under the Old Testament, in the apostolic, or in the millennial age, or in the different periods of John Baptist, Christ, and his apostles' ministrations. Matt. xx. 1-16.

LA'CHISH; a city of Judah, about twenty miles south-east of Jerusalem, and seven south-west of Eleutheropolis. The king of it was one of the assistants of Adonizedek against the Gibeonites, and had his kingdom destroyed by Joshua. Josh. x. 5, 32. xii. 11. and xv. 39. Rehoboam fortified it. Amaziab fled to it when his servants conspired against him. 2 Chron. xi. 9. 2 Kings xiv. 19. As it had been most early, or most eminently involved in idolatry, the inhabitants are ironically warned to flee off whenever Sennacherib invaded Judea. Mic. i. 13. When he came, he besieged it with his whole force, and hence he directed his threatening letter to Hezekiah; but whether Lachish was taken, or whether Sennacherib raised the siege to take Libnah, before Tirhakah should come up with his Ethiopian troops, we know not. 2 Kings xviii. 17. and xix. 8. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. Isa. xxxvi. 2. and xxxvii. 8. It is certain, that Nebuchadnezzar took and demolished it, Jer. xxxiv. 7; but it was afterwards rebuilt, and was a place of some note about four hundred years after Christ.

LADE. Men are said to be laden, when oppressed with grievous taxes and hard servitude, 1 Kings xii. 11; or oppressed with burdensome ceremonies and traditions, Luke xi. 46; or oppressed with the guilt and the care of getting or keeping ill-gotten wealth, Hab. ii. 6; or when under the guilt and power of much sin, Isa. i. 4. 2 Tim. iii. 6; or when under the guilt and power of sin, and also under trouble outward or inward. Matt. xi. 28.

LADY. See LORD.

LA'ISH, or LE'SHEM. See DAN.

LAKE; a large pool of standing water; such as the lake of Merom, Gennesaret, Sodoma, &c. See JORDAN; SEA. Hell is called a lake burning with fire and brimstone, to represent the terrible, tormenting, and lasting nature of its flame. Rev. xix. 20. and xx. 10-15.

LAMB. See SHEEP.

LAME; maimed, or enfeebled in the limbs. 2 Sam. iv. 4. Lameness disqualified from officiating in the priesthood, or for being offered in sacrifice. Did not this intimate, that in Jesus, our great Priest and Sacrifice, there is no want of ability to perform his work, and no predisposition to be turned out of the way? Lev. xxi. 18. Deut. xv. 21. Persons weak in body, or in their intellect and grace, and halting between different opinions, are called lame. Isa. xxxiii. 23. Heb. xii. 13.

LAMECH; a descendant of Cain by Methusael. He is stated to be the first who married more wives than one; his wives were Adah and Zillah. One day, he with a solemn air told them that he had slain, or could slay, a man to or in his wounding, and a young man to or in his hurt; and that if Cain should be avenged seven-fold, Lamech should be seventy times seven-fold. The meaning of this speech is not agreed on. Some think, that in ignorance he slew Cain, who was hid in a bush, mistaking him for a wild beast, and afterward slew his own son Tubal-cain, for directing him to shoot at that bush: others think, he had slain two godly persons; and that the name of Tubal-cain, his son, imported his daring resolution to defy the vengeance of Heaven, and bring back Cain to his native soil. Perhaps rather he meant no more but to threaten his unruly wives with some dreadful mischief, if they were not duly submissive: boasting that he was able to slay a man suppose he were wounded; and threatening, that if the murder of Cain, who killed his brother, was to be seven-fold punished of God, they might expect that the murderer of Lamech, who had killed no body, should be seventy times more punished.

By Adah, Lamech had two sons; Jubal, who first invented dwelling in tents, and roving about with herds of cattle; and Jubal, who was the first inventor of music on harps and organs. By Zillah, he had Tubal-cain, the first inventor of foundery and smith-work, and is supposed to be the Vulcan, or god of smiths among the Heathen; and a daughter called Naamah, or the comely one, who is perhaps the most ancient Venus of the Pagans. Gen. iv. 18—24. (2.) Lamech the son of Methuselah, and father of Noah, who lived seven hundred and seventy seven years, and died five years before the flood. Gen. v. 25—31. 1 Chron. i. 3. Luke xii. 36.

LAMENT. See MOURN.

LAMPS; a kind of lights made with oil, in a vessel; they were ordinarily placed on a high stand, or candlestick, which stood on the ground. Perhaps those used by Gideon and his soldiers, were a kind of torches of old linen rags wrapped about a piece of iron or potters' earth, and from time to time moistened with oil. Judg. vii. 20. It seems that Nineveh was taken in the night, when the enemy needed torches to illuminate their chariots. Nah. ii. 3, 4. Successors are called a lamp, because they increase or continue the glory of their predecessors. 1 Kings xv. 4. Psal. cxxxii. 17. The governors of Judah, are like a torch in a sheaf, amidst their enemies; the Maccabees, and their successors for about one hundred years, were noted destroyers of the Syro-grecians, Arabians, Edomites, Philistines, and others; and in the beginning of the millennium, their governors shall still more signally cut off their foes. Zech. xii. 6. The burning lamp, issuing out of a smoking furnace, that passed between the pieces of Abraham's divided pieces of animals, imported the peculiar presence of God with the Hebrews in their Egyptian bondage, and that their salvation from thence, should at last be gloriously effected. Gen. xv. 17. God is likened to a lamp; he enlightens, comforts, and honours his people. 2 Sam. xxii. 29. The seven lamps of the golden candlestick, figured out Jesus and his church, as possessed of the fulness of the Holy Ghost, and of divine oracles and knowledge. Exod. xxv. 37. The Holy Ghost is likened to seven lamps of fire burning before God's throne, to mark the instructive, comforting, heart-warming, and sin-destroying nature of his influence. Rev. iv. 5. The seven lamps of the golden candlestick in Zechariah's vision, which received their oil from the bowl or fountain by pipes, are a sufficient number of ministers, deriving their light, comfort, gifts, and grace, from Jesus, by the pipes of ordinances, reading the scriptures, meditation, prayer, and by faith. Zech. iv. 2. Christ's eyes of infinite knowledge, and of discovered affection or wrath, are as lamps of fire, most penetrating and pure, and yet how terrible to his enemies? Dan. x. 6. The word of God is a lamp and light: it discovers manifold mysteries; it directs men's course, and comforts their hearts amidst the darkness of this world. Psal. cxix. 105. The lamp ordained for God's anointed, is either Jesus, who is the light of the world, and the continued honour of David's family; or it is the gospel, which from age to age maintains the fame and honour of our Redeemer in the world. Psal. cxxxii. 17. A profession of religion is called a lamp; it renders men shining and useful, and instructors of others. Matt. xxv. 3, 4. Prosperity is a lamp; it renders men cheerful, noted, and glorious. Prov. xiii. 9. and xx. 20. See CANDLE, FIRE, LIGHT. The salvation of the church from her troubles, is likened to a burning lamp; it is bright and visible, and its effects are instructive and comforting. Isa. lxii. 1.

LANCE; a spear; but the word chibow is translated a target in 1 Sam. xii. 6.

LANCETS; javelins, short spears. 1 Kings xviii. 28.

LAUNCH; to put from the shore into the sea. Luke viii. 22.

LAND: (1.) The whole continent of the earth, as distinguished from the sea. Matt. xxiii. 5. (2.) A particular country, especially parts of it which are fit to be ploughed. Matt. ix. 26. Gen. xxvi. 12. Acts iv. 37. Matt. xix. 29. (3.) The inhabitants of a country. Isa. xxxvii. 11. Canaan is called Immanuel's land, or the Lord's land. It enjoyed the peculiar care, protection, presence, and ordinances of the Redeemer, and in it he long dwelt in our nature. Isa. viii. 8. It was a land of promise, as given by promise to Abraham and his seed. Heb. xi. 9. It was a land of uprightness; as there, men having the oracles of God, ought to have behaved uprightly towards God and man. Isa. xxvi. 10. It is called a land of uncalled villages, as it seems, the Jews, at their return, in the beginning of the millennium, will not fortify their cities. Ezek. xxxviii. 11. Egypt is called a land of trouble and anguish, because there the Hebrews were exceedingly distressed, and it has long been a scene of terrible calamities. Isa. xxx. 6. Babylon was a land of graven images; because idolatry mightily prevailed in it. Jer. l. 38. The land of the living, is this world, wherein men are before death, and the heavenly state where no death ever enters. Psal. cxvi. 9. and xxvii. 13. The grave is the land of darkness and of the shadow of death, Job x. 21, 23; and of forgetfulness, as men are soon forgotten after they are buried. Psal. lxxxviii. 13.

LANES; narrow avenues in a city, where poor people generally dwell. Luke xiv. 21.

LANGUAGE; a set of words made use of by the people of any particular country or countries, to express their thoughts. No doubt God at first inspired men with language. Without supposing this, we see not how they could so early converse with God: or the man converse with his wife. While men lived so long, and applied only to the more simple methods of life, as before the flood, their ideas were few, and their language, was easily preserved without alteration. For some time after the flood, mankind were still of one language and speech; but what it was, is not so readily agreed. If we believe, with Shuckford, that Noah went almost directly eastward to China, we should conclude that the Chinese language, which is but simple, and its original words very few, was the first. But as it is certain that Noah did not retire to these eastern regions before the building of Babel, and not evident that he did so afterwards, we cannot give into this opinion. When we observe the simplicity and expression of the Hebrew tongue; when we consider how exactly the Hebrew names of animals suit their natures, and how exactly the names of persons suit to the reason of their imposition, we cannot but declare for the Hebrew. It is absurd for the Chaldee, Assyrian, Arabic, or Ethiopic, to compete in this claim. Every unbiassed observer will plainly see that they are but dialects of the Hebrew tongue; and perhaps they, as well as the Phœnician, were for many ages nearly the same with the Hebrew. As the Jews lived in a manner so distinct from other people, they were most likely to preserve their language uncorrupted. As we have no standard book in the Hebrew, besides the Old Testament, the signification of not a few of its words, seldom used, is not altogether certain to us; but by tracing them in similar words of the Arabic, &c. we may arrive at what is very probable. How God confounded the language of mankind at Babel: whether he made them forget the meaning of their words, and put one for another, or whether he inspired the most of them with new languages, is not easy to say. It is certain that the ancient language of the Gomerians, Huns, Greeks, &c. nearly resembled the Hebrew; and that there are other languages, as the Slavonic, and several of America, between which and the Hebrew we can scarcely trace the smallest resemblance. Into how many languages speech was divided at Babel, it is impossible to say. Alstedius enumerates about 400; but makes only seventy-two distinguished ones, and five chief ones, viz. the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Germanic, and Slavonic. At present, a sort of Arabic mightily prevails in western Asia, and in the north of Africa. Mingled dialects of the Latin and Teutonic, &c. mostly prevail in the west of Europe. The French and English are the most esteemed.—When God cast off the gentiles, he confounded the language; when he called them back to his church, he gave his apostles the miraculous gift of speaking with tongues. Gen. xi. Acts ii. The language of Canaan, or a pure language, is a proper manner of speech in prayer to God, and edifying converse with men. Isa. xix. 18. Zeph. iii. 9. As the use of language is to convey ideas from one to another, that must be the best style which conveys them in the most just, clear, and affecting manner, suiting, at once, the subject spoken of, and the persons speaking, and those to whom he speaks. To render language perspicuous, every word and phrase if possible, should be pure, belonging to the idiom in which one speaks; should be proper, authorized by the best speakers and writers in that language; and should precisely express the idea to be conveyed, without any foreign or superfluous circumstance added thereto. In sentences, there ought to be clearness; the words, especially those which express the principal ideas, being so placed as to mark the relation of one idea to another without the least ambiguity; there ought to be unity, the principal object being still kept unchanged, and no way obscured or diverted from, by a mention of things slightly related to it, whether included in parentheses or not: there ought to be strength, so as it may make the more impression; useless words ought to be rejected, and the principal words placed where they appear most brightly, and the members of the sentence made to rise in their importance: there ought to be HARMONY, the words being so chosen or disposed, as the sound may be expressive of the sense, at least not disagreeable, to the ear. In every language, especially of the eastern nations, whose imaginations were warm, there is a great use of tropes and figures, and which if they rise naturally from the subject, and from the genius of the speaker, and are but sparingly used, and that only to express thoughts of proper dignity, tend not a little to explain a subject, and to embellish the style, by rendering it more copious, more dignified, more expressive, and more picturesque. Metaphor, hyperbole, personification, address, comparison, interrogation, exclamation, vision, repetition, and amplification, are the principal figures of speech. To preserve the world from counterfeit writings, God has endowed every man with a style, or manner of language, peculiar to himself, and often it is concise; diffuse; perplexed; manly; smooth; sprightly; smart; gloomy, or dull, &c. according to the turn of the person's passion, imagination, or thought. To hide pride from man, scarcely any possess all the graces of language; few towering writers are very correct, and as few very correct writers have much fire: nay, few authors write always like themselves: but even the elegant sometimes sink into the frigid, or soar into airy bombast. As sublimity of style lies in the expression of grand thoughts in few and plain words, it must indeed be opposite to airy bombast, or pompous language, without sentiment; or to convey thoughts, puny and common; and to childish conceits, silly puns, forced and unnatural antitheses, unnatural, and self-opposing comparisons, affected jingles of sound;—and to every ill-timed elevation or fall of the language, that corresponds not with the rise or fall of the thought; but it is so far from being contrary to real simplicity and plainness, that simplicity is one of the principal beauties of sublime language; and nothing is more contrary to the true sublimity of style, than the airy bombast, and pert conceited manner which some absurdly imagine to be the perfection of language. In respect of ornament, style is either dry, where there is scarcely a word to embellish, or plain, or neat, or elegant, or florid. As both the first and last are extremes, the first approaching to the frigid and grovelling, and the last to the airy bombast, neither are much to be coveted.

As the true propriety of language lies in its suitableness to the subject, and the persons concerned, nothing can be supposed more proper to be used on religious subjects, or more truly sublime, than the style of the only wise, and the most gracious God, in his word. Nor can I imagine, what can tempt any to think otherwise, except it be their vain affectation of idle romances, their ignorance of the scriptures, especially in the original tongues, and their hatred of their Divine Author. Can any language more beautifully correspond with its subject? In the descriptions of God, and his appearances, how grand and majestic! Exod. xv.

1—18. Deut. xxxiii. 2—43. Psal. xviii. 1—18. Isa. lx. 10—28. and lvii. 15. Amos iv. 13. Hab. iii. In describing the overthrow of nature, cities, or nations, how noisy and terrifying! 2 Pet. iii. 9, 10. Rev. vi. 14—18. Isa. xxiv. Jer. i. and li. Nah. i. 8—6. and ii. to 10. and iii. 17, 18. In describing the Messiah, and the glory and peace of his kingdom, how sweet and delightful! Isa. xi. and xii. and xxxv. In gospel-invitations to receive him as the free gift of God, how soft and captivating! Psal. xxxiv. 8. and lxxvi. 10—12. Deut. xxxii. 39. Prov. i. 23. and ix. 4, 5. and xxiii. 26. Song iv. x and v. 1, 2. Isa. i. 18. and lv. 1, 3, 7. In expostulation, how rapid and urgent. Prov. i. 22. Ezek. xxxiii. 11. Isa. lv. 2. In lamentation how pathetic and tender! as if every word was a groan. Jer. ix. 1. Lam. i—iv. Matt. xxiii. 37. Luke xix. 41—44. In the discourses of Jesus, and the epistles of John, how familiar, but never frigid, grovelling, or vulgar. In God's promulgation of the ten commandments from Sinai, how plain, but truly sublime!

No book has its style more adorned with beautiful tropes or figures, than the oracles of God. As the historical parts are generally plain, so the poetical and other parts are ornamented with all the graces of language. Tropes remove the words used from their natural signification to another, connected with it. Those in scripture, are drawn from things obvious and well known, and represent the object expressed under the intended idea. When the name of the cause is put for that of the effect, or that of the subject for that of the adjunct, or the reverse, it is called a metonymy. Rev. i. 10. Zech. xi. 1. 1 John i. 3. When more universal terms are put for such as are more restricted, or a whole for a part, or the contrary, it is called a synecdoche. Matt. iii. 5. John xix. 43. Psal. i. 1. Acts ii. 41. When more is signified than the expression necessarily bears, it is a meiosis, or abatement, as is oft the case in negative precepts and promises. Exod. xx. 3—17. Isa. xlii. 3, 4. When less is meant than the expression naturally bears, it is a hyperbole, or excess of the language. Gen. xi. 4. and xiii. 16. Job xxix. 6. 2 Sam. i. 23. When the contrary of what the expression naturally signifies is meant, it is an irony. Deut. xxxii. 38. Eccl. xi. 9. 1 Kings xviii. 27. When one thing is represented in words that natively mean a thing somewhat similar, it is a metaphor. John x. 8. and xiv. 6. A metaphor continued, or often repeated, forms an allegory, or parable. Sol. Song i—viii. Luke xv. Figures relate to a whole sentence. Their principal kinds are, (1.) Exclamation; by which, as with an outcry, the vehemence of some particular passion is expressed. Zech. ix. 17. Rom. vii. 24. (2.) Doubt, where a debate in one's mind, what he should do, is expressed. Gen. xxxviii. 20. (3.) Correction; by which one retracts what he had said, as too little, or too much, or as an entire mistake. Gal. ii. 20. 1 Cor. xv. 10. (4.) Suppression; when one stops before he finishes the sentence, as overwhelmed with wonder, grief, rage, &c. Psal. vi. 3. (5.) Omission; when one seems to pass what he plainly but briefly hints.

Heb. vi. 1. (6.) Address to persons or things. Psal. xxv. 10. 1 Kings xxii. 28. Job xvi. 18. (7.) Suspension; when the principal point is reserved till the last, and the reader or hearer kept in expectation of it. Luke xvii. 26, 30. (8.) Interrogation; when questions are asked, and sometimes answered in a discourse; to which, expostulatory reasoning with one, may be reduced. John iii. 4. Gen. xviii. 14. Isa. lv. 2. and x. 3. (9.) Prevention; when an objection is directly or indirectly started and answered. To which may be added Premunition; when one, in the beginning of his discourse, guards himself against the prejudice and misapprehension of those he speaks to. Rom. ix. 1—6. 19—23. (10.) Concession; in which something is granted in order to infer some other things from it. Job xix. 4. Rom. ii. 17—24. Jam. ii. 19. (11.) Repetition of the same ideas, in the same or in different words. Psal. xviii. 1—3. and xxii. 1. Isa. lxi. 10. (12.) Circumlocution; whereby to avoid indecency, or the like, a thing is described in words more in number, or less plain. Jer. xxii. 28. Job xviii. 4. (13.) Amplification; when every principal expression in a passage adds plainness, strength, or grandeur, to what went before. To these may be added, Climax or Gradation, where the term or phrase conclusive of the former expression begins the next. Isa. i. 22, 23. Rom. viii. 29, 30. (14.) Omission of copulatives, to mark eagerness of passion. Rom. i. 29—31; and sometimes frequent repetition of copulatives, renders a sentence solemn, and every verb or substantive in it emphatic. Rev. v. 12. (15.) Opposition; by which things different, or contrary, are placed together, that the nature of either, or both, may be shown with more clearness and force. 1 Tim. i. 13. 2 Cor. v. 7. Rom. viii. 1. Mark xvi. 16. Ezek. xx. (16.) Comparison; whereby things similar are likened to one another to illustrate one of them. Sol. Song ii. 2, 3; of this kind are parables. (17.) Lively description; when, by a nice arrangement of the principal ideas, the thing is almost as clearly represented as if it were before our eyes. 3 Pet. iii. 9, 10. (18.) Vision or imagery; by which things distant, or unseen, are represented in a lively and emphatical manner, to excite wonder, terror, compassion, care. Rev. xviii. 9—19. Heb. xii. 1. (19.) Personification; when qualities, or things inanimate, are represented, as if thinking, speaking, hearing, or acting, as rational persons. Isa. i. 2. and xiv. 8—13. Rom. viii. 22. Job xviii. 22. (20.) Change of person, or time; as when a speaker puts himself for others, or the present time for the past or future, &c. Isa. xvi. 9. and liii. 12. To this may be reduced, Introduction of persons speaking. Isa. iii. 7. and iv. 1. (21.) Transition from one subject to another, in which a subject tending to illustrate the principal, is sometimes abruptly introduced. 1 Cor. xii. 1. Isa. xi. xii. Rom. xiv. 1. (22.) Sentence is a short and lively remark on what is treated of. Rom. iii. 31. To which may be reduced, epiphonema, or a concluding observation on a discourse. Rom. xi. 33.

LANGUISH; the world, or earth. languisheth, when its surface is withered, its cities destroyed, and inhabitants slain. Isa. xxiv. 4. and xxxiii. 9. Vines, olives, flowers, and other vegetables, languish, when they wither and fade. Jer. xxiv. 7. Joel i. 10. Nuh. i. 4. Persons languish, when they become weak, and their comeliness fades. Jer. xv. 9. Psal. lxi. 2.

LA-O-DI-CEA. There were at least six cities of this name; but the scripture mentions only that of Phrygia, on the river Lycus near Colosse. It was anciently called Jupiter's city, and then Rheas; but Soloncus, or perhaps Antiochus the Syro-grecian king, rebuilt it, and called it Laodicea, after his wife. Though Paul never preached here, yet a Christian church was early planted in this place. They were in the same danger from false teachers as the Colossians, and therefore Paul directed his epistle to the Colossians to be read to them. He also mentions a letter from Laodicea; but whether it was the epistle to Timothy, or that to the Ephesians, which the Laodiceans had the opportunity of perusing; or whether it was some letter the Laodiceans had sent him, we know not. There is still extant, an epistle pretending to be that of Paul to the Laodicean church; but it is agreed to be spurious; and Timotheus, a priest of Constantinople, says, it was forged by the Manichees. Col. ii. 1. and iv. 15, 16. About A. D. 96, the Christians of Laodicea were become extremely ignorant, proud, self-conceited, and careless about eternal things: Jesus Christ therefore directed John to write them an epistle, for their conviction and amendment. At present Laodicea is not only without a church, but is a mere desert, with some ruins scarcely sufficient to mark that ever such a city was in the place. It is called Eshkissar by the Turks. Rev. i. 11. and iii. 15-21.

LAPWING. Calmet thinks the Duck-shak is the hoopopoo, which is a bird about the size of a thrush. Its beak is long, black, thin, and a little hooked. It has a tuft of feathers on its head, which it raises or lowers at pleasure. Its legs are grey and short; its neck and stomach reddish; its wings and tail black, with white streaks; its wings rather round at the point; its flight slow. In northern countries, it is seen but about three months of the year; during the rest of it, it probably removes to warmer regions. Its form is beautiful, but its voice is hoarse and unmusical. It generally makes its nest in ruins, or on way-sides. It feeds much on worms, and on human excrement, of which it partly makes its nest. Others take this bird to be the black-breasted Tringa, with a hanging crest or top on its head. It is a beautiful bird about the size of a pigeon, and very common in fen countries through most of Europe. On each foot it has four toes, connected as those of a duck. It is very dexterous in decoying persons from its nest. Lev. xi. 19.

LARGE. Assyria was a large or extensive country, or place. Isa. xxii. 18. Hos. iv. 16. David was set in a large place, or room, when he had great liberty and comfort, and was advanced to extensive power and authority. Psal. xviii. 19. xxxi. 8. and xxviii. 5.

LAST; (1.) Late, later, or latest in time. Gen. xlix. 1. God is the first and the last; is from eternity to eternity. Isa. xlv. 6. (2.) Worst in condition: Many that are first shall be last, and the last shall be first: i. e. the Jews, that were first brought into a church-state, and had the gospel first preached to them, shall in the end be most miserable; and the gentiles, who were last called to the fellowship of God's Son, shall, multitudes of them, be for ever most happy. Matt. xix. 30. and xx. 16.

The LATIN tongue was the language of the ancient Romans, but now it is only taught in the schools. The Italian, French, Spanish, and, in part, the English and Portuguese languages are derived from it. John xix. 20.

LAUD; to praise, extol. Rom. xv. 11.

LAVER; a vessel for washing. The Mosaic laver was made of the fine brazen looking-glasses, which the Hebrew women brought to him, for the service of the tabernacle. This laver held the sacred water for the priests to wash their hands and feet with, by cocks at which, it seems, the water ran into basins. It stood between the altar and the entrance of the tabernacle. Exod. xxxviii. 8. Solomon made ten new laviers. According to Calmet, these consisted of two vessels, a square one placed above one shaped like a basin. The square vessel was adorned with the figures of the heads of an ox, a lion, and cherubim. The basin was supported by a cherubim standing on a pedestal, which was mounted on brazen wheels, more easily to remove it from one place to another. Each of these contained forty baths, or about six hundred and eighty-five and a half Scotch pints. These laviers contained water to wash the pieces of the sacrifice, and were placed five on the south side, and five on the north side of the entrance to the temple; but Ahab removed them off their bases, to make way for his idolatrous worship. 1 Kings vii. 27-39. 2 Chron. iv. 6-14. 2 Kings xvi. 17. Solomon also made a laver, containing 2000 baths for ordinary, and 3000, or about 6426 gallons and three pints, on a stretch. This was supported by twelve brazen oxen, three of which had their heads toward each quarter of the hemisphere; this was for the priests to wash at, and was called the brazen sea. 1 Kings vii. 22-44. 2 Chron. iv. Did not these laviers represent Jesus, in his fulness of righteousness and Spirit, to justify and sanctify his people, who are priests unto God; and to render their sacrifices of prayer and praise acceptable in his sight?

LAUGH. God laughs at men, when he disregards their trouble, contemns their opposition, and takes pleasure in punishing them. Job ix. 23. Psal. ii. 4. and xxxvii. 13. Prov. i. 26. Men's laughter, imports, (1.) Their rejoicing in the blessings promised to, or possessed by them; and in their divine security from the calamities of famine, pestilence, &c. Gen. xvii. 17. and xxi. 6. Luke vi. 21. Job v. 23. (2.) Their sinful mirth, doubts of God's fulfilment of his promise, or their derision of other men. Luke vi. 25. Gen. xviii. 12, 13. If I had laughed on them, they believed it not; and the light of my countenance they cast not down. When I looked cheerfully on them, or even innocently jested with them, they did not become presumptuous, or too familiar, but supposed I had a serious meaning, and they were afraid of abusing my smiles. Job xxix. 24. Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful; amidst sinful or excessive mirth, an evil conscience often stings, and sad calamities happen. Prov. xix. 13. Laughter is mad, and as the crackling of thorns; i. e. foolish and excessive mirth shews one so far destitute of reason, is very dangerous to be meddled with, and, as it is senseless, so it is short-lived. Eccl. ii. 2. and vii. 6.

LAW. A law properly, is the declared will of a superior binding his subjects to perform what is pleasing to him, and to avoid what displeases him; but the scripture uses this word to express any thing that communicates instruction to, or occasions any obligation on an inferior. It is the same with commandments, precepts, statutes. When God created man at first, he imprinted the knowledge, love, and awe of his law on his mind. Sin has defaced, but not utterly obliterated this inwrought impression, as to the knowledge and awe of the divine law. Rom. ii. 14, 15. Our consciences still suggest to us, our obligations to believe in, worship, and serve the Supreme Being; to honour our parents and governors; to promote our own real welfare and happiness in time and eternity; and to do to others as we would reasonably wish they would do unto us, &c. But how to perform these things truly and acceptably, or how to obtain pardon of what we do amiss, they inform us not. In the state of innocence, God added the positive laws of observing a Sabbath, of abstinence from the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and of fruitfulness in, and government of the earth. Gen. i. and ii. After the fall, the law of sacrifices was imposed. Gen. iii. 21. The Jews often mention the seven precepts imposed on Noah and his family. The first of which, they say, enjoined subjection to governors; the second prohibited blasphemy; the third prohibited idolatry and superstition; the fourth forbade incest, sodomy, bestiality, and the like impurities; the fifth prohibited murder; the sixth prohibited all kinds of theft; and the seventh forbade the eating any part of an animal while it was yet living: but we cannot safely depend on their accounts of this sevenfold law. Gen. ix. God imposed the law of circumcision on Abraham and his family. Gen. xvii. To Moses, and the Hebrews in the desert, God gave a threefold system of laws; a moral system, which binds all persons of mankind in every nation and age; a ceremonial; which prescribed the rites of their worship and sacred things, and thereby pointed out Jesus Christ in his person and work, and the blessings of his New-Testament church and heavenly kingdom; and which were obligatory only till Jesus had finished his atoning work, and began to erect his gospel-church, Heb. x. 1. and vii. 9—11. Eph. ii. 15, 16. Col. ii. 14. Gal. v. 2, 3; and a judicial or political system, which directed the policy of the Jewish nation, as under the peculiar dominion of God as their Supreme Magistrate, and never, except in things relative to moral equity, was binding on any but the Hebrew nation, especially while they enjoyed the possession of the promised land.

The moral law was most solemnly proclaimed by God himself, after a terrible thunder, lightning, and earthquake, and from the midst of the flames of fire; and was divided into ten precepts, written by God himself upon two tables of stone. Four of these respect our duty to God, and were written on the first, which, in sum, require our loving him as the Lord our God, with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength: six were written on the second, which in sum require our loving our neighbour as ourselves. Exod. xix. xx. xxxii. and xxxiv. Matt. xxii. 37—39. More particularly, the first commandment requires, that God alone should, both in heart and life, be acknowledged, worshipped, and glorified, as the true God, and our God; and that all Atheism, profaneness, and idolatry, be abstained from. The second requires, that all the ordinances of worship instituted by God in his word, should be received, observed, and kept pure and entire; and all carnal conceptions of God, all idolatry and superstition, and monuments, or occasions thereof be detested. The third requires that God's names, titles, attributes, ordinances, words, and works, should be, under the severest penalties, used only in a holy and reverend manner. The fourth requires, that whatever times God has appointed in his word, particularly one whole day in seven, be carefully observed in spiritual exercises, as holy to the Lord. The fifth requires the preservation of honour, and performance of relative duties between parents and children, husbands and wives, masters and servants, magistrates and subjects, ministers and people; and, in fine, between superiors and inferiors, in age, station, gifts, or grace: and between equals, one to another. The sixth requires that all lawful endeavours shall be used to promote and preserve the life of ourselves and others, temporal, spiritual, or eternal; and prohibits all malice, envy, murder, angry words, drunkenness, and every thing else tending to the hurt of soul or body. The seventh prohibits all kinds of whoredom, fornication, adultery, incest, bestiality, self-defilement, and other uncleanness, and every thing in heart speech, or behaviour, tending thereto. The eighth requires, that every thing lawful be done to promote our own and our neighbour's outward estate; and all dishonesty, stealing, robbery, extortion, oppression, sacrilege, &c. be detested. The ninth requires that the utmost care be taken to maintain and preserve truth, and our own and our neighbour's good name; and prohibits all falsehood, lying, dissimulation, flattery, railing, or reproachful language. The tenth prohibits the very root of wickedness in the heart, and first motions thereof, and all discontent, envy, inordinate affections towards our neighbour, or any thing that is his. These precepts may be considered in a threefold light. (1.) As the law of nature; in which view, they require perfect obedience under the penalty of infinite punishment, but entail no reward of eternal life on the perfect observer of them. (2.) As formed into a covenant of works, in which sense they are called the law of works, and require perfect obedience, under pain of death, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, and entail eternal happiness on the complete fulfiller thereof, which, in our lapsed state, it is impossible for any of mankind to be. Rom. x. 5. Gal. iii. 10, 12, 21. All men, by nature, are under; and desire to be under, this law, and are of the works of it; as they ignorantly and proudly imagine they can fulfil it, at least in a good degree; and, heartily detesting the Lord Jesus Christ and his righteousness, and the whole method of salvation through him, they cleave to it, and expect happiness by the works of it. Rom. ix. 31—33, and x. 3. (3.) As the law of Christ, or a rule of duty in the hand of Jesus Christ, as Mediator: in this sense, they require perfect obedience in the highest degree; but admit of the acceptance of whatever obedience is done in faith; and they have no sanction of divine wrath, or of servile reward, but only of fatherly chastisements for sin, and gracious rewards of duty; and in the heavenly state it hath no sanction at all, nor are any but believers under the law in this form. Matt. v. 48. and xi. 30. 1 Cor. ix. 21. Whether the divine oracles, published from Sinai, exhibited the covenant of grace, or the covenant of works, or a national covenant between God and Israel, has been controverted. The whole dispute seems easy to be compromised thus: When we consider the ten commandments, as ushered in with such terrible thunders and lightnings, and as attended with a curse to the violator, they appear plainly a republication of the covenant of works, in order to alarm the Hebrews to flee from it to Jesus, the deliverer. Exod. xix. and xx. and Deut. xxvii. When we consider the ten commandments as founded on the preface, and laid up in the ark, and attended with the sacrifices and other ceremonies considered in their gospel-signification, there appears a declaration of the covenant of grace, and of the law as a rule of life embosomed therein. When we consider these laws as required to be observed, in order to secure a happy entrance into Canaan, and a peaceful residence therein, we justly take them up as the matter of a national covenant between God and Israel.

The ceremonial law regulated the office and conduct of PRIESTS, LEVITES, NETHINIMS, NAZARITES, and of CIRCUMCISION, FEASTS, OFFERINGS, TABERNACLE, TEMPLE, and utensils thereof, vows, purifications, &c. In respect of observance, this law was a heavy yoke, and partition-wall; but in respect of the signification of its ceremonies, it was an obscure gospel. Gal. v. 1. Eph. ii. 14. Col. ii. 17.

The judicial law regulated the affairs of their kings, judges, fields, marriages, punishments, &c. Some laws relative to redeemers, murders, adultery, cities of refuge, malefactors, strangers, &c. seem to have been partly ceremonial, and partly judicial. Great care was taken to preserve the knowledge of the divine law. Besides the table of the ten commandments deposited in the ark, a copy of the books of Moses was laid up somewhere in the side of the ark. The Jews say that every tribe had a copy of it. From this, other copies were taken. Every king was obliged to transcribe one for himself. The whole law was to be publicly read over at the feast of tabernacles, in the year of release, besides the reading of it on other public occasions. Nay, they were required to have it written on their hearts, and to teach it diligently unto their children. Dent. xvii. and xxxi. 9—19; vi. and x. To this day, the Jews have the utmost regard for their law, reading in the ancient manner so much of it every Sabbath, in their synagogues. The book of it publicly used, is written with the greatest exactness, and is carefully preserved from every thing tending to defile it. See TRADITION. With a great parade of ancient learning, Spenser attempts to prove that most of the Jewish laws, of the ceremonial kind, are but an imitation of the customs of Egypt; and some the very reverse of others, of the abominations used there, to render these odious to them. That some of the ceremonies were intended to render the vile customs of the heathen around detested by the Hebrews, we doubt not; but that God formed the rites of his worship after those of idolaters, we dare not suppose. His own infinite wisdom, and the nature of the things to be represented, were a standard of regulation, much more becoming the Majesty of heaven. Many of the Egyptian rites were still very different from the Jewish; and as to the similarity of some, it is reasonable to suppose, that the Egyptians, in the time of Joseph, Solomon, Hezekiah, or afterwards, borrowed them from the Hebrews.

Some think, that by laws, precepts, or commandments, in the books of Moses, is meant the moral law; by statutes, the ceremonial; and that by judgments, the judicial laws, are signified; but this observation will not always hold. It is certain, that by law, commandment, precept, statute, and judgment, used in this signification, is often meant one and the same thing. The name law, or commandment, may denote a thing as the will of a superior; statute, represents it as ordained and established by high authority; judgment represents it as full of wisdom, and as the standard by which God will judge men. Those passages of scripture which require any good quality in us, or good work to be performed by us, are the law in a strict sense. John i. 17. The ten commandments are called the law, or commandment; nay, sometimes the last six are so called. Jam. xxiii. 11. Rev. xxii. 14. Rom. ii. 25. and vii. 7, 8. xiii. 8. The commandment of loving one another, is old, as it was contained in the moral law ever since the creation; and it is new, as enjoined afresh by our Saviour, as exemplified in his life, and enforced with the new motive of his dying love. John ii. 7, 8. and xiii. 14. The whole constitution of the covenant between God and the Hebrews, and the rites of worship thereto belonging, are called a law, or law of ordinances, and a ceremonial command- ment, as, by the authority of God, so many rites, especially relating to carnal sacrifices, washings, and the like, were therein required. Heb. x. 1. and vii. 16. Eph. ii. 15. The five books of Moses are called the law, as they abound with the requirements and prohibitions of God. Mal. iv. 4. Matt. v. 17. For the same reason, the Old Testament is called a law. John x. 34. and xv. 85. 1 Cor. iv. 21. The whole word of God is called a law, statutes, &c. as it is the sole rule of our faith and practice. Psal. i. 2. and xix. 7, 8. The doctrines of the gospel are called a law, and the law of faith: they teach and instruct men; and, when believed by faith, they strongly influence to holy obedience. Isa. ii. 3. and xlii. 4. Rom. iii. 27. They are a perfect law of liberty; proclaim a perfect deliverance and redemption to us through the blood of God's Son, and instigate to a pleasant and free obedience to him; or, this perfect law of liberty may be taken for the law as a rule in the hands of Christ, which is pleasant to the saints. Jam. i. 25. and ii. 12. The law may sometimes denote men's observance of God's commandments, as that corresponds to the law imposed in the scripture, or impressed on the heart. Rom. iii. 21. Gal. iii. 11. Phil. iii. 11. The commandments of men, were the traditions of the Jewish elders. Matt. xv. 9. The commandments by willingly walking after which the Jews ruined themselves, and the statutes not good given to them, were the idolatrous laws of Jeroboam, Omri, and Ahab, requiring them to worship the golden calves, Baal, &c. Hos. v. 11. Ezek. xx. 25. Mic. vi. 16.

The commandments and word of God, are a law ordained to life, and are statutes of life. In believing and obeying them, we receive or possess life temporal and spiritual, and are prepared for life eternal. Rom. vii. 10. Ezek. xxxiii. 15. One is without the law, when not under the ceremonial law, or not bound by the law, 1 Cor. ix. 21; or when he is without the knowledge of it, and destitute of the experience of its convincing power on the conscience, Rom. ii. 12. and vii. 8, 9; or when they have not the word of God revealed to them. Rom. ii. 14. Those under the law are either Jews under the ceremonial, or sinners under the broken covenant, or saints under the law as a rule. By the law is the knowledge of sin; by our consciences comparing our dispositions and conduct with the commands and prohibitions of the divine law, our sinfulness is perceived. Rom. iii. 20. A man through the law is dead to the law; and dies, when the commandment comes home in its convincing power on his conscience. Through its convincing force on men's consciences, they are made to give up all expectations of life by their own works, and flee to Jesus and the new covenant for relief. Gal. ii. 19. Rom. vii. 9. The law is the strength of sin; the law as a covenant, occasionally irritates the corruption of men's nature, they being offended with the strictness of its precepts, and the terrible nature of its curse; and its curse binds them over to lie under the dominion of sin, as a chief branch of their punishment. 1 Cor. xv. 56. Rom. vi. 14. The law as a covenant worketh wrath: it condemns us to the everlasting wrath of God, and occasionally stirs up our corrupt heart to rage against him more and more. Rom. ix. 15. This law has dominion over a man as long as it or he liveth. While we are connected with it, and not married to Jesus as the end of the law for righteousness, it constantly demands perfect obedience, under pain of eternal wrath, and full satisfaction for the crimes we have already committed, and retains full power to curse and condemn us to infernal punishments, for the least fault. Rom. vii. 2. A man is dead to the law, and redeemed from under it, by the body or mediation of Christ, when, through the application of Christ's law-filling and magnifying righteousness to his person and conscience, he is united to him, justified, and infallibly fixed in a new-covenant state. Rom. vii. 4. and vi. 14. Gal. iv. 4, 5. The law is not made for a righteous man; it is not made for him as a covenant of works, to terrify, curse, and condemn him; but the law is good if a man use it lawfully; if he improve it as a covenant, to drive him to Jesus Christ, and improve it as a rule, to instigate and direct him how to walk in Christ. 1 Tim. i. 8, 9. The law entered, that the offence might abound; i. e. the publishing of the law, moral, or ceremonial, from Sinai, occasioned the increase of sin, and mightily tended to discover it. Rom. v. 20. It was added because of transgression; i. e. in order to restrain and discover it; but could not make any alteration on the free promises of grace, as they are established in the law-magnifying righteousness of our Redeemer. Gal. iii. 17-19. The law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ; the ceremonial law pointed him out, and led to him as the end and antitype of all its rites; the law as a covenant, applied by the Holy Ghost, instigates us to flee to Jesus, to obtain in him that righteousness which it requires, and escape that wrath which it denounces. Gal. iv. 24. God puts his law into men's hearts, and writes it in their inward parts, when, by the powerful application of his word, he sanctifies their nature, and renders it conformed to his law as a rule. Heb. viii. 10. and x. 16. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, makes free from the law of sin and death. The covenant of grace, or gospel, powerfully applied by the quickening Spirit of Christ, frees us from the broken covenant of works, which is the strength, irritator, and discoverer of sin, and condemns to death: the energy of the Holy Ghost, as in, and uniting us to Jesus Christ, frees us from the corruption of our nature, which is sin, and instigates to sinful deeds, and renders us obnoxious to death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal. Rom. viii. 2. The principle of grace in the saints, is called the law of their mind; influenced by the views of God in Christ, it reigns, and determines the soul to obedience. The principle of corruption in men is called the law of sin, as it is altogether sinful, and determines to sinful thoughts, words, and actions; and is called the law in the members, as though dislodged from its throne in the heart, it continues strongly to actuate the powers of the soul and members of the body to what is filthy and wicked. Rom. vii. 26, 25. Precept upon precept, line upon line, &c. import instructions given in small portions, and often repeated, as to children weak in capacity. Isa. xxviii. 10.

LAWFUL; agreeable to all. All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient: it is lawful, simply considered, to eat any kind of provision; but we may be so circumstanced, as thus to hinder the edification of others. 1 Cor. vi. 12. In his trance, Paul heard things which were not lawful to be uttered; so mysterious and grand that it was not proper to declare them to men in their embodied state, as they could not be profited by them. 2 Cor. xii. 4.

LAWGIVER. God, or Christ, is a Lawgiver; his sovereign will is the infallible rule of our conduct; and he has prescribed laws to us in his word. Isa. xxxiii. 22. James iv. 12. He is the only Lord of our conscience, whose mere will binds it to obedience, and whose laws are subject to no examination, being absolutely supreme and infallible. Moses was a lawgiver; by him God gave his system of laws to the Hebrews; the law is called his, and he is said to give its commandments. Num. xxi. 18. Dent. xxxiii. 21. David and his successors are called lawgivers; they had power of enacting laws for civil government of the Hebrew nation. Gen. xlix. 10. Psal. lx. 7.

LAWYER, an explainer of the Jewish laws. The lawyers were generally enemies to our Saviour in the days of his flesh, rejected the counsel of God against themselves, and were condemned by him for binding heavier burdens on others than themselves chose to bear. Tit. iii. 13. Matt. xxii. 35. Luke vii. 30. and xi. 45—52.

LAZARUS, together with his sisters Martha and Mary, dwelt at Bethany. Jesus sometimes lodged in their house. Once when he was there, Martha, the elder sister, was extremely careful to have him handsomely entertained; and complained to him that Mary, who anxiously attended his instructions, did not assist her in preparing the dinner. Jesus told her, that she herself was too attentive to unnecessary things, while the one thing, securing eternal salvation, was alone absolutely needful; and that Mary had chosen the good part of an interest in, and fellowship with God, which should never be taken from her. Luke x. 38—43. Not many months before our Saviour's death, Lazarus fell dangerously sick; his sisters sent to Jesus, who was then beyond Jordan, to come with all expedition to cure him. Upon hearing of it, Jesus told his disciples that this sickness would not shut up Lazarus into the state of the dead, but tend to the signal illustration of the glory of God. That the intended miracle might be the more noted, Jesus continued two days longer where he was, till Lazarus was actually dead. He then told the disciples, that their friend Lazarus slept, (he meant in death,) and that he went to awake him. Thomas, imagining that he spoke of common sleep, replied, that if Lazarus had fallen into a sound sleep, it was a good sign that the principal danger of the fever was over. Jesus then told them plainly, that Lazarus was actually dead. On the fourth day after his death, and when he had been for some time interred, Jesus came to Bethany. Martha, hearing that he was at hand, met him, and, forgetful of his omnipotent power, suggested that had he been present, her brother had not died. Jesus told her, that her brother should be raised from the dead. She told him, that she knew he would be raised at the last day. Jesus told her, that as he himself was the resurrection and life, he could raise him when he pleased; and enquiring if she believed this; she replied, that she believed he was the Christ, the Son of the living God. Martha went in, and informed Mary, that Jesus, the Master, was come, and called for her. Mary went forth, and the Jews supposed she was going to her brother's grave to weep. Mary met our Saviour, fell at his feet weeping, and said, If he had been present, her brother had not died. When he saw the extreme grief she and the Jews who came with her were oppressed with, and reflected on the miseries to which sin had subjected men, he affectionately groaned in himself, and asked where Lazarus was buried. The Jews present observing him weep, said, Behold, how he loved him! and added, Could not this man, who opened the eyes of the blind, have prevented his friend's death? After coming to the grave, he ordered them to remove the stone from the mouth of it. This Martha was averse to, and objected, that now the smell of her brother's body would be very offensive, as he had been dead four days. Jesus admonished her to believe, and she should quickly see a display of the glorious power of God. After thanking his Father, for hearing him always, he cried, Lazarus, come forth! The dead body immediately started up alive, and Jesus ordered those present to take off his dead clothes, that he might be able to walk. This miracle, wrought almost at the gates of Jerusalem, so enraged the Jewish rulers, that they resolved to murder both Jesus and Lazarus, that the report of it might be crushed. Six days before his crucifixion, Jesus lodged again in the house of Lazarus. Lazarus sat at the table, Martha served, and Mary, to the great vexation of Judas, anointed our Saviour's head. Jesus vindicated her conduct, and told his disciples, that this deed of hers should, to her honour, be divulged through the whole world. John xi. and xii. 1—8. Matt. xxvi. 6—13. Mark xiv. 3—9.

LAZARUS, the name of the poor man in Christ's parable. He is represented as covered with ulcers; as laid at a rich man's gate, and in vain begging for some of the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table; as having his sores licked by the dogs; and, in fine, as dying, and carried by angels into the heavenly state. Soon after, according to the parable, the rich man died, and was buried; but his soul being tormented in hell, he, seeing Abraham and Lazarus afar off, in glory, begged that Abraham would send Lazarus to dip his finger in water, and cool the tip of his tongue. Abraham bade him remember that Lazarus in his lifetime had been afflicted, but was now comforted; and that he had enjoyed sinful prosperity, and was now tormented; and declared that there was no passing from the heavenly state to the infernal regions. The rich man then begged that Lazarus might be sent to his five brethren, to warn them to flee from the wrath to come: but this was also refused, as even a return from the dead could be no more effectual to convince them than the inspired writings which they had. In this parable, perhaps, our Saviour partly alludes to some real event. It teaches the danger and ruin of such as, amidst wealth and prosperity, condemn the indigent, afflicted, and pious. Perhaps, too, it hints the tremendous ruin that fell upon the Jewish rulers and people, for their despising of Jesus; while he, after much suffering and contempt, and amidst multitudes of angels, ascended to heaven, never more to appear in the world till the end of time. Luke xvi. 19—31.

LEAD; a coarse, heavy, but useful metal, from which an oil and spirit, something like vinegar, is sometimes extracted, and with the ore of which silver is ordinarily mixed. It seems, that as early as the age of Job it was used in engraving; and that they poured it into the incisions of the characters to preserve them from obliteration. Job xix. 24. It is certain that the Midianites, not long after, had considerable quantities of it among them. Num. xxxi. 22. The Tyrians had plenty of it, from Tarshish. Ezek. xxvii. 12. The Jews were as lead, much abounding in guilt and corruption, and easily melted and afflicted in the fire of God's wrath. Ezek. xxii. 18, 20. Great wickedness, or the judgments of God on account of it, on the Jews or Chaldeans, are likened to a talent of lead on the mouth of an ephah. Zech. v. 7, 8.

LEAD; (1.) To direct. Psal. xxxi. 3. (2.) To govern, conduct. Psal. lxxx. 1. (3.) To seduce; draw into error and wickedness. 2 Tim. iii. 6. God led the Hebrews in the wilderness, by the symbol of his presence, in the pillar of cloud, that directed their motions, Psal. cxxxv. 16. Isa. lxiii. 12: and leads his people in every age, by the direction, and drawing influence of his word, Spirit, and providence. Psal. xliii. 3. His goodness leads men to repentance; it points forth the duty and advantage of it; and is calculated to stir up men to bewail their offences against God, so gracious and kind. Rom. in 4. Jesus is a leader, who by his authoritative word, Holy Spirit, and exemplary pattern, teaches them how to walk and act. Isa. lv. 4. The Holy Ghost leads men; by applying the word of God to their hearts, and by his directing and drawing influences, he causes them to walk aright in the path of holiness. Rom. viii. 14. Gal. v. 18. Ministers are leaders, by their guiding and exciting doctrines, and by their exemplary practice: and magistrates are such, by their laws, and the pattern of their conduct. Isa. ix. 16. The chiefs of a class, or army, are the leaders, who direct and govern them. 1 Chron. xii. 27. and xiii. 1. The saints lead and bring Jesus to their mother's house, when they earnestly and frequently request his presence in his church and ordinances, prepare for his coming, and affectionately wait for the motions of his Spirit. Sol. Song viii. 2.

LEAF; there are leaves of trees, of books, of doors. Gen. viii. 11. Jer. xxxvi. 23. 1 Kings vi. 34. Adam and Eve's first clothing of fig-leaves, was an emblem of our self-righteousness, which must be put off, to put on the Lord Jesus, our glorious sacrifice. Gen. iii.

7. Christ's leaves for the healing of the nations, are his offices, appearances, word, ordinances, and influences, whereby our spiritual maladies are cured. Rev. xxii. 2. A profession of the true religion is called leaves; it is very adorning and beautiful. In the saints, it, and the happiness attending it, never wither away or perish; and it is for medicine, is a blessed means of bringing others to Christ, for the cure and health of their souls, but in hypocrites, the Jews, or others, how quickly it faded away, and had no good fruits attending it. Psal. i. 5. Jer. xvii. 9. Ezek. xlvii. 12. Matt. xxi. 19. Prosperity is likened to a leaf; how comely and pleasant for a while; but how quickly it withers and perishes! Dan. iv. 12, 14. To mark his troubled, restless, and comfortless condition, Job compares himself to a tossed leaf and dry stubble. Job xiii. 25. To fall, or fade as a leaf, is to be destroyed, or lose every good appearance, easily and suddenly. Isa. xxxiv. 4. and lxiv. 6.

LEAGUE; a COVENANT, or solemn agreement, for peace, protection or assistance, or subjection between nations, or between prince and people. Josh. ix. 11—16. 2 Sam. v. 3. 1 Kings v. 12. and xv. 17. After the league made with Antiochus Epiphanes, he wrought deceitfully; after a covenant of friendship with Demetrius, his nephew, the true heir, he deceitfully procured the kingdom of Syria to himself: after a covenant of friendship with his other nephew, Philometer king of Egypt, he deceitfully invaded that country to seize it for himself. Dan. xi. 23. To be in league with the stones of the field, fowls, or beasts, is, by virtue of an interest in God's new covenant of peace, to be secured by God their proprietor and manager, from receiving any hurt by them. Job v. 23. Ezek. xxxiv. 25. Hos. ii. 18.

LEAH. See JACOB.

LEAN. An animal body is lean, when there is so little flesh that the bones stick out. Gen. xli. 3, 4. A land is lean, when it is a poor barren soil, and produces little of what is useful. Num. xiii. 20. A soul is lean, when destitute of the grace and comfort of God's Spirit, and so rendered unsightly in his presence, and incapable to perform his service. Psal. cvi. 15. Persons poor and debased in this world, and poor in their own eyes, are called lean cattle. Ezek. xxxiv. 20. Jacob's fat flesh became lean, when his once numerous and wealthy posterity were reduced to a small number, and rendered miserable by the Assyrians overturning the kingdom of the ten tribes, and almost ruining that of Judah. Isa. xvii. 4. My leanness! my leanness! Wo unto me. Their wickedness in the time of Hezekiah, and after the death of Josiah, and forty years after Christ, brought fearful and wasting judgments of sword, famine, and pestilence on the Hebrews: and still they are in a wretched condition, as to both spirituals and temporals. Isa. xxiv. 16. God sent leanness on Sennacherib's fat ones, when his captains and valiant men, to the number of 185,000, were destroyed by an angel in one night, and but a small part of his army left. Isa. x. 16.

LEAN as upon a staff, pillar, or supporting assistant. Heb. xi. 21. Judg. xvi. 26. To lean, in metaphorical language, signifies to trust or depend upon any person or thing for assistance or comfort. 2 Kings xviii. 21. Saints lean upon Christ, when, trusting in his word, they cleave to his person, depend on his righteousness and strength, and delight themselves in his love. Sol. Song viii. 5. Hypocrites lean on the Lord, when they profess a strong attachment to his truths, ordinances, and ways; and expect that he will shew them singular favours and deliverances. Mic. iii. 11. Men lean to their own understanding, when without serious consulting of God, they trust to their own wisdom and prudence to direct their management. Prov. xii. 5. They lean on their house, when they depend on the increase and continuance of their children and wealth to be the portion and comfort of their souls. Job xvi. 15.

LEAP; skip; to jump to and fro, especially to express joy. Jer. xlvi. 27. Acts iii. 8. (2.) To move, or march with great cheerfulness and speed; so the Danites leaped from Bashan, when they, by a speedy march, seized on Laish, on the north border of Bashan. Dent. xxxiii. 22. Jesus Christ comes leaping on mountains, and skipping on hills, when, notwithstanding our many and great provocations, he comes, by his spiritual power, in his ordinances, to comfort and save us. Sol. Song ii. 8. The lame man shall leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing. Many lame and dumb persons were, to their great joy, perfectly healed by Jesus and his apostles; and many, by the influences of his Spirit, have the maladies of their souls removed, and are made joyful in the Lord. Isa. xxxv. 6. By God's assistance, David overleaped a wall; he surmounted great difficulties, and took strong towers and fenced cities. Psal. xviii. 20. Those who leaped on the threshold, were either such as irreverently entered the courts of the Lord, or who entered the temple of idols, as Dagon's priests did, by jumping over the threshold; or who, by violence or theft, entered people's houses, and returning with their ill-gotten goods, joyfully jumped in at their master's doors. Zeph. i. 9. The possessed person leaped upon the sons of Sceva, and violently attacked them. Acts xix. 16.

LEARN; (1.) To get the knowledge of things by hearing or observing. 1 Cor. xiv. 31. Psal. cxix. 71. (2.) To imitate; to follow as a pattern. Psal. cvi. 35. Matt. xi. 29. (3.) To take heed. 1 Tim. i. 20. (4.) To know the sentiments of others. Gal. iii. 2. Christ learned obedience by the things which he suffered; by his sufferings he experimentally felt what it was to obey the divine law; and he improved them all to excite his holy manhood to fulfil the obedience required of him. Heb. v. 8. None besides the witnesses for Christ could learn their new song; none but saints can heartily ascribe all salvation and glory to God and the Lamb. None of the papists can join in pure gospel-worship, where all the glory of our salvation is ascribed to Jesus alone, because they make angels and saints sharers of it; as if they were mediators with him.

Rev. xiv. 3. Some are ever learning, and yet never come to the knowledge of truth: have long the means of instruction, and profess to use them, and yet never have any solid knowledge of divine things. 2 Tim. iii. 7.

LEASING; falsehood; lies. Psal. iv. 2. and v. 6.

LEAST; (1.) The smallest quantity. Num. xi. 32. (2.) Such as are meanest, of lowest rank, value, and usefulness. Judg. vi. 15. Eph. iii. 8. (3.) Most humble and self-debased. Luke ix. 48. The wilful breaker of the least of God's commandments, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven, i. e. shall be of little use or esteem in the visible church, and, without repentance, shall never be admitted into the kingdom of glory. Matt. v. 19.

LEAVE; (1.) To depart from, Job xvi. 18; to cease dwelling with. Gen. ii. 24; to cease insisting further on. Heb. vi. 1. (2.) To let remain behind. Lev. vii. 15. Exod. xvi. 19. Joel ii. 14. God may leave his people, so as to withdraw his sensible presence and comfort for a time; but never leaves them nor forakes them, so as to break his covenant-relation to them, as their God, Saviour, and Portion: or as to withhold what continued supplies of gracious influence are necessary to maintain the existence of their new nature. Psal. cxli. 8. Heb. xiii. 5. Dying parents leave their fatherless children on God, when, by the effectual fervent prayer of faith, they commit them to his care, and trust in his promise, that he will preserve, direct, and provide for them. Jer. xlix. 11.

LEAVEN; a piece of dough, but especially what is salted and soured for fermenting. Such bread as was made of dough unsoured and unfermented, was called unleavened; and what was made of fermented dough, was called leavened. Exod. xii. 15. To leaven, which is souring and infecting, are compared, (1.) The gospel-church of God, which, from small beginnings, gradually spreads in the world; the gospel of Christ, which gradually prevails to reform and convert the nations of the world; and the work of inward grace, which gradually prevails in, and assimilates the hearts of men to its own likeness. Matt. xiii. 33. (2.) The erroneous doctrines, corrupt glosses of the scripture, or vain traditions of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, and their corrupt examples, whereby many were infected. Matt. xvi. 6, 12. (3.) Scandal and scandalous sinners, who infect and cast a blot on the church. 1 Cor. v. 6. (4.) Malice, hypocrisy, and like corruptions in the heart, which exceedingly defile us, and render us infectious to others. 1 Cor. v. 7. To commemorate Israel's hasty departure from Egypt, without having time to leaven their dough, they were prohibited to use any leaven at the passover-feast, or to offer it on God's altar, in any of their meat-offerings. Did this signify the perfect purity of Jesus our all comprehending oblation; and that, in our whole worship of God, we ought to beware of the infecting influence of our sinful corruption, but act with sincerity and truth. Exod. xii. 15—19. Lev. ii. 11. Amos iv. 5. 1 Cor. v. 8. A portion of leavened bread was allowed in thank-offerings, though it was not put on the altar; and might hint, that our grateful service of God may be accepted, though mingled with imperfections. Lev. vii. 13. Two loaves of leavened bread were required in the festival offering of Pentecost, perhaps to denote the spreading influence of the gospel, and the operations of the Holy Ghost in the New-Testament church. Lev. xxiii. 17.

LEBANON; a famous mountain in the south of Syria, and north of Canaan. When taken at large, it is about three hundred miles in circumference, and consists of two large mountains, Lebanon or Libanus, and Antilibanus. According to the ancients, these mountains lay east and west; but the moderns say, that they lie south and north; Lebanon on the west side, and Antilibanus on the east, with Hollow Syria, or the pleasant valley of Lebanon between them. Josh. xi. 17. According to Calmet, mount Lebanon is shaped like a horse-shoe, with its opening towards the north. It begins about ten miles from the Mediterranean sea, well northward in Syria, and runs south till almost over against Zidon, then turns eastward on the northern frontiers of Galilee, and lastly, turns northward, running as far as Laodicea Scabiosa, in Syria. But according to Maundrel and Reland, the valley between the two mountains is much more long and narrow than Calmet's representation will allow. But the truth is, travellers are in so much danger from the wild beasts that haunt it, and from the scarce tamer Arabs that rove about it, that they dare not search it with such care and deliberation as an exact description would require. In Lebanon, it is said; four mountains, as it were, rise one above another; the first has a fruitful soil, excellent for vines: the second is barren: the third enjoys an almost perpetual spring: the fourth is often, but not always covered with snow. This mountain is thought to be higher than the Pyrenees between France and Spain, or the Alps between the east of France and Italy. The vines in the lower parts of it, and the cedars on the top of it, which were anciently very numerous, but now reduced to a few, rendered it extremely beautiful and fragrant. But vast numbers of lions, leopards, and other wild beasts, made it dangerous to walk on. Hos. xiv. 5-7. Sol. Song iv. 8, 11. and v. 15. The springs in it, and the water that descended from it, in the rivers of Jordan and Eleutherns, Abana and Parpar, that run to the southward, and in the rivers of Rossian, Cadichæ, and Abvati, that run west or north, are fine water. Jer. xviii. 14. Moses had a strong desire to see Lebanon; but was only allowed a distant prospect of it. Dent. iii. 25. and xxiv. From Lebanon, Solomon had his wood for the building of the temple and other structures: from Lebanon, the Tyrians and Sidonians had their wood for shipping and building: from Lebanon, the Assyrians and Chaldeans had a great part of the wood they used in their sieges of the cities of Syria, Canaan, and Phœnicia: but all its wood was not sufficient to burn one sacrifice that could truly expiate sin. Isa. xxxiii. 9. Hab. ii. 17. Isa. xl. 16. The tower of Lebanon, looking towards Damascus, was perhaps a castle built by David or Solomon, at the south-east of Lebanon, to keep in awe the Syrians; if it was not rather the house of the forest of Lebanon, a stately structure at Jerusalem, mostly built with cedars from Lebanon. Sol. Song vii. 4. 1 Kings vii. 2. At present, a kind of Popish monks, called Maronites, dwell about the lower parts of Lebanon, in circumstances sufficiently wretched. Wild Arabs of the Mahometan sect of Ali, swarm almost in every part of it. Here also, I think in the western parts dwell the Druses, who are said to be chiefly the remains of the European croisades, that went to those parts in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, for the recovery of the Holy Land. They are baptized, and heartily hate the Jews and Mahometans, and have hitherto refused to submit to the Turkish yoke; but the bulk of them have little more religion than the wild beasts among whom they dwell, allowing lewdness with mothers, sisters, daughters, &c.

Jesus Christ, and his church, are likened to Lebanon, for their spiritual comeliness and perpetual flourish, and for their fragrant and fruitfulness. Sol. Song v. 15. Psal. lxxii. 16. Isa. xxxv. 2. and lx. 13. Hos. xiv. 5-7. Jerusalem, and the temple thereof, are called Lebanon, because much built of the cedars of Lebanon; and the houses of Jerusalem were so many and high as to resemble the forest of Lebanon. Hab. ii. 17. Zeph. xi. 1. Ezek. xvii. 3. Jer. xxii. 23. Sennacherib's army, and the Assyrian empire, are called Lebanon. How great was once their glory and strength! but how cut down at last by the axe of God's judgments! Isa. x. 34. Ezek. xxxi. 3, 15, 16. This world is likened to Lebanon, Amanah, Shenir, and Hermon, where are dens of lions and leopards: amidst all its carnal pleasures, profits, and honours, there is great danger, and manifold temptations; and therefore saints should forsake it, to seek for, and enjoy fellowship with Christ. Sol. Song iv. 8. Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be esteemed a forest. The gentile nations shall become a flourishing church, and the Jews shall be cast out, and live without God, and without Christ, and without hope in the world. Isa. xxix. 17. and xxx. 15. To go up to Lebanon and Bashan, or mount Gilead, and cry, signifies, that the Jews would have none to help them. Jer. xxii. 21.

LEEK. See ONION.

LEDGE; a roll of short brazen staves, with a plate of brass along their heads. 1 Kings vii. 28, 35, 37.

LEES; the dregs of wine settled to the bottom; and so, wines on the lees, are wines strong and purified, by the lees settling to the bottom. Isa. xxv. 6. Men are settled on their lees, when, through long prosperity, they have arrived at much outward strength, and are fixed in, and delighted with corrupt courses. Isa. xlviii. 11. Zeph. i. 12.

LEG. Men's legs are taken for their strength, Psal. cxlvii. 10; and are called strong men, who bow themselves, becoming feeble in old age. Eccl. xii. 3. Christ's legs as pillars of marble, are his strength to bear whatever sin or punishment was laid upon him, or the exceeding weight of glory that is given him; his ability to finish his whole work of meditation; and his wise and skillful providences, and the stability of his kingdom and government. Sol. Song v. 15. The iron legs of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary image, and the feet and toes, partly of iron and partly of clay, not rightly coalescing together, represented the strong Roman empire, with two consuls at its head; and after many ages, divided into the eastern and western empires, which at last was mingled with Goths, Huns, Vandals, &c. but did not rightly incorporate with them, nor retain its strength, after they had begun their invasions; and which was divided at last into ten kingdoms. See HORNS. Dan. ii. 33. A parable in the month of fools, is like the unequal legs of the lame: a wise sentence, or scriptural expression, looks ill from the mouth of foolish and wicked people, and is disagreeable and inconsistent. Prov. xxvi. 7.

LEGION; a band of soldiers in the Roman army. When that state was but in its increase, the legion was smaller; but in its glory, the legion ordinarily consisted of about 6200 foot, and 730 horse. In scripture, it signifies a great number. Matt. xxvi. 58. Luke viii. 30.

LEND, hoping for nothing again, is to give freely, or lend without usury. Luke vi. 35. Lending to the needy is a very necessary duty. Deut. xv. 8. and xxiii. 19. In ordinary cases, borrowers must, in some measure, submit themselves to the will of lenders, Prov. xxii. 7. Deut. xxviii. 12; but desolating judgments make both alike poor and miserable. Isa. xxiv. 2.

LENTILES; a kind of grain like vetches or pease, of which was made a coarse kind of food used by mourners. Gen. xxv. 34.

LEOPARD; the long-tailed Felis. Its upper part is beautifully spotted, and the lower streaked. It is smaller than the tiger; but surprisingly swift, strong, and active, and no less voracious and fierce. Its feet are formed for climbing, and it can draw back its claws at pleasure. It watches for its prey by way-sides, or where animals are wont to haunt. It is said to allure them with a sweet smell, and then to spring or leap from a tree upon them, and devour them. It is so inveterate an enemy to mankind, that, it is said, it will fly upon their very picture painted on paper. God compares himself to a leopard: with what patience he waits for the proper season of vengeance! with what fierce indignation he breaks forth upon, and tears to pieces his incorrigible opposers, chiefly wicked professors of the true religion! Hos. xiii. 7. Wicked men are likened to leopards; how spotted with corruptions in heart and life! how fierce and intractable to what is good, till God by his grace subdues them! Isa. xi. 6. Jer. xiii. 23. Nebuchadnezzar and his army are likened to leopards; with what guileful cruelty and fierce rage they watched over, and besieged the cities of Judah, and the nations around, till they took them, and murdered the inhabitants! Jer. v. 6. Hab. i. 8. The Grecian empire is likened to a leopard with four wings and four heads; from small beginnings, and with much craft, rapidity and bloodshed, it was founded. Alexander who formed it, was spotted with many vices; his army was adorned with many skillful commanders, and he quickly made himself master of nations unnumbered. After his death, his empire was divided into four parts. See GREECE, HORNS. Dan. vii. 6. The Antichristian Pope, and his agents, are likened to a leopard, to mark their outward glory and splendour, and their crafty, cruel, and bloody persecution of the saints. Rev. xiii. 2.

LEPER; one affected with the leprosy. Lepers were excluded from the society of other people, and hence sometimes formed one of their own. We find four of them in one society in the days of Elisha, and ten of them in another, in the days of our Saviour. 2 Kings vii. 8. Luke xvii. 12. The leprosy is two-fold in kind or degree. That of the Jews was probably much the same with the Elephantiasis, or leprosy of the Arabs, Egyptians, &c. which came into, and raged in Italy about sixty years before the birth of our Saviour. It is chiefly found in warmer climates. It begins within the body, and throws out a sanious moisture, that corrupts the outside of it, covering it with a kind of white scales, attended with a most tormenting itch. The afflicted person becomes hoarse; his blood becomes mingled with whitish particles, and the serum of it so dry that vinegar poured thereon boils up, and salt applied to it does not dissolve; and so strongly bound together with imperceptible threads, that calcined lead thrown into it swims above; his hair becomes stiff, and if plucked, brings away rotten flesh with it; his eyes become red and inflamed, similar to those of a cat; his tongue becomes dry, black, swollen, ulcerated, and furrowed; his face resembles a half-burnt coal, furrowed with hard knobs, greenish at bottom, and white at the top. The body becomes so hot, that a fresh apple held but an hour in the hand, will be considerably withered and wrinkled; the parts infected become insensible, and at the last, the nose, fingers, privy members, &c. fall off, being rotten. In the tenth and eleventh centuries, this terrible distemper was common in Europe, introduced, it is supposed by the Arabs and Moors; and it is said that there was about 15,000, or, according to Matthew Paris, 9000 hospitals for lepers. At present it is scarcely known in Europe, unless we suppose the syphilis to be a kind of it. Some time ago, a leprosy resembling that of the Africans, terribly afflicted the people of Barbadoes, especially the blacks.

The Jews generally supposed the leprosy to be inflicted by God, for the punishment of some horrible crime. For reproaching Moses, the distinguished deputy of God, Miriam was infected: for treacherous and dishonest procuring of clothes and money, Gehazi was smitten: for profanely presuming to offer incense, king Uzziah was punished with it. Num. xii. 2 Kings v. 2 Chron xxvi. Moses mentions no medicine for the cure of it; and it does not appear that the Jews applied any remedies, but waited the remedies only from God. Whenever a Hebrew suspected himself, or was suspected by others, to be infected with this fearful disease, he presented himself for inspection to the priest, who, in trying him, was in no danger of catching the plague. A freckle, a boil, a spot, or scab in the skin, or the falling off of part of the hair, was no token of leprosy. Nevertheless, the suspected person was to wash himself and his clothes in water. A swelling with a white spot bright and reddish, created strong suspicions; in which case, the leper was to be shut up seven days, and the end thereof again inspected by the priest. If the hair in the sore had turned white or yellow, if the plague was in sight deeper than the skin, if it continued to spread in the flesh after the first inspection, if there was quick raw flesh in the swollen part, if there was a white reddish sore in the bald head, the priest pronounced him unclean; and as the disease was extremely infectious to such as touched or drunk after those who had it, he was excluded from the city or camp till God should heal him, and was obliged to cover his upper lip, and call out to every one that was approaching him, that he was unclean. If, on the second inspection, the sore was not in sight deeper than the skin, if it had spread nothing during the seven days, if the hair of the infected place was not turned white, or if the plague, being thrown out from the inside, had covered the whole body with a universal, leprosy, the priest pronounced him clean; only he was to wash himself in water, on account of his scabs.

When it pleased God to heal one that had been pronounced unclean, the priest went out of the camp or city and inspected him. For his ceremonial purgation, two birds were taken; the one was slain over a vessel full of fresh water, mingled with cedar-wood, scarlet, wool, and hyssop. The other bird was dipped into this mixture of water and blood, and then dismissed to fly whither it pleased. The healed leper was seven times sprinkled with the mingled blood and water. He then shaved off all the hair of his body, washed his clothes and flesh in water; after which, he might come into the city or camp; but not into his own house. On the seventh day, he again shaved and washed himself. On the eighth, he offered two he-lambs, and one ewe-lamb, for a trespass offering, burnt-offering, and sin offering, with a quantity of oil; or, if poor, offered one lamb, and two young doves. Part of the blood of his trespass-offering was, by the priest, sprinkled on the tip of his right ear, and on his right thumb and right toe. After sprinkling so much of the oil seven times towards the tabernacle, the above parts of the leper's body were anointed with another part, and the rest was poured on his head; and after the offering of the burnt-offering and sin-offering, he was dismissed to go to his house, or to the house of God, whenever he pleased.—Did not this leprosy represent the corruption of our nature, in the reigning power thereof, and which is of a most penal, dreadful, defiling, spreading, and obstinate nature, separating from God? Not every sinful act of infirmity marks this uncleanness. Inward uprightness, bitter repentance for, and heartily striving against sin, and particularly, an affecting sense of the universal vileness of our heart and life, are certain tokens that we are not under the dominion of sin; but every appearance of evil, must lead us to wash ourselves in a Saviour's blood. Delight, or pining away in iniquity; wilful increasing unto more ungodliness; dependence on self-righteousness, as the ground of our acceptance before God; habitual raging at reproof; fixedly embracing of gross heresies and boasting of what is plainly sinful, marks us under the dominion of our filthy lusts. Nor is there any deliverance from this plague, but by the grace of God, and through the application of Jesus' blood and Spirit to our soul: nor on our justification, are we immediately admitted to heaven, but by again and again mortifying the deeds of the body: and at the end of life, by making use of the blood and Spirit of our Redeemer, we shall at last enter into the full enjoyment of that free fellowship with God and his holy angels and glorified saints. Perhaps the leprosy of a garment was produced by a small kind of vermin; if greenish or reddish spots rendered a garment suspicious, the priest was to inspect it, and shut it up seven days. If, on his second examination, he found the tokens of leprosy spread, he tore out the infected threads, and ordered it to be washed. If the tokens were not spread, he ordered it to be washed;—and if, on the third inspection, he found the tokens departed, it was again washed, and declared to be clean. If on the third or fourth examination, the plague continued after the infected threads had been torn out the whole garment was to be burnt in the fire. Did not this leprosy denote scandals in the conversation from which Christ's blood alone can cleanse us; and unto which if we again and again relapse, if we be saved, it must be so as by fire, our works being burnt up and lost? Probably the leprosy of a house was produced by vermin of the same kind; if pale reddish spots in the wall, lower than the rest, rendered a house suspicious, the priest, after inspecting it, shut it up seven days. If, on the seventh, the symptoms were increased, the infected materials were carefully removed, and pure ones put in their place. If the leprosy again appeared, the house was demolished, and its materials cast into an unclean place. If the house was got cleansed, a sprinkling with the mixture of the water and blood of the offering of birds, removed the ceremonial defilement. Did not this leprosy hint, that the obstinate continuance of indwelling sin, brings on the dissolution of our mortal frame? and that obstinacy in wickedness, brings ruin and destruction upon families, nations, churches, and the world itself? Lev. xiii. and xiv.

LET; is expressive, (1.) Of command. Deut. v. 12. (2.) Of entreaty. 2 Sam. xiii. 6. (3.) Of permission. Gen. xlix. 31. (4.) Of entrusting, or assigning by lease. Song viii. 11. To let, also signifies to hinder, keep back. Isa. xliii. 13. 2 Thess. ii. 7.

LETTER; (1.) A mark of sound used in writing. The Egyptian method of writing, by a kind of pictures of the things themselves, was perhaps the most ancient in the world. The Chinese method of using a distinct character for every word, somewhat like our short hand, is also very ancient; but it is very inconvenient, as it would take a man's life to learn the half of their 80,000 letters, unless these letters, as some say, be formed from simple ones, by stated rules. The invention of letters, that may be combined in so many thousand different forms, is so marvellous and useful, that I am almost tempted to believe God himself the author of it, perhaps in the Tables of the Law. No letters were known in Europe, till Cadmus, about the time of David, brought sixteen of the Phœnician characters hither. From these, the Greek, Roman, Coptic, Gothic, and Slavonic characters were formed, one after another. From the Hebrew or Assyrian characters, the Phœnician, Syrian, Samaritan, Ethiopic, and Arabic characters, seem to have been formed, though with considerable alterations. (2.) A missive or epistle sent by one person to another. 2 Sam. xi. 24. (3.) Learning, knowledge of the mysterious sense of God's word. John vii. 15. (4.) The outside of things; so circumcision of the flesh, is called circumcision of the letter. Rom. ii. 29. The outward observance of Moses' ceremonies, outward service of God, or walking according to our corrupt lusts, is called the oldness of the letter. Rom. vii. 6. See KILL.

LEVI; the third son of Jacob, by Leah, was born about A. M. 2254. He assisted Simeon in murdering the Shechemites, and for that reason had his father's dying denunciation, that his seed should be scattered among the Hebrew tribes in Canaan. Gen. xxiv. 25—33. and xlix. 5—7. He had three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, and a daughter called Jochebed. He died, aged one hundred and thirty seven years; and his three sons produced three different families. At their return from Egypt, the tribe of Levi was by far the least of all the Hebrews, consisting of but 22,273 males above a month old. The Levites faithfully cut off their idolatrous friends, for their worshipping the golden calf. God rewarded their zeal, constituting them his sacred ministers. Aaron, and his male descendants, were chosen to be priests. The rest of the tribe were made a kind of inferior agents in holy things. As after five years' probation, they were to enter their service at thirty years of age, and leave it at fifty, no more than 8580 were fit for service. In their consecration, they were sprinkled with the holy water of separation; they shaved off their hair, and washed their clothes: they brought two bullocks to the door of the tabernacle: the first-born Israelites, or some in their name, laid their hands on them, to denote their resigning to them their station in the public worship of God. The Levites then laid their hands on the two young bullocks, and one was offered for a burnt-offering, and the other for a sin-offering. To signify their being dedicated to the service of the God of all the ends of the earth, they were made to walk to and fro before the tabernacle; and thus entered on their work, which, in the wilderness, was to bear the things pertaining to the tabernacle, and in that and after ages, to take care of the tabernacle, temple, and furniture thereof, to teach the people, and to assist the priests. They had no sacred apparel; but, though the tribe of Levi were but about the fortieth part of the people, they had forty-eight cities, with the suburbs thereof, assigned for their dwelling, and had about the fifth part of the Hebrew numbers. Exod. vi. and xxxii. 16—26. xix. Num. iii. and iv. and viii. and x. xviii.

Did these Levites prefigure Jesus? From the earliest ages of eternity, he was chosen to his work; from the earliest ages of time, he was promised; early was he circumcised and initiated: and at twelve years, he began his service in the temple.—Divinely was our place in law, and our sins transferred upon him; and solemnly was he, in his birth, and in his unction at his baptism, set apart to his work of obedience and ministry in holy things. At thirty year of age, he entered on his public service, and having wasted his body till, it seems, he appeared as one of fifty, he retired, by death, resurrection, and ascension, to his eternal rest. He is the great burden-bearer of his church, that bears all his people's sins, and bears their persons and cares, and supports the whole frame and government of the church; honours his Father to the highest; teaches, governs, and saves his people; and for his reward, is crowned with glory and honour. Terrible is the curse that falls on such as continue to deny him his dues. Did these Levites represent gospel-ministers, who being chosen to their work by God and his people, are to enter on it in a solemn manner, sanctified by the blood of the Lamb, and by his purifying Spirit; and who spend, and are spent in the service of the church, bearing Christ's name before the gentiles, teaching and ruling the people, and assisting the saints, those spiritual priests, in their sacred work; and who are to be duly provided with subsistence, and at the end, are to have their faithful service rewarded with endless honours and happiness?

Did they resemble the saints, who are early enrolled in the Lamb's book of life, and in due time are solemnly set apart to the holy service of God, to care for, and in their stations in trust, and promote order; and after they have finished their course, retire to their everlasting rest, to enjoy the wholefulness of God? Isa. xli. 21. When Joshua divided Canaan to the Hebrew tribes, he gave the Levites no inheritance, as they were to live on sacred oblations; but they had forty-eight cities scattered among the other tribes, with a field of 3000 cubits around for pasture and gardens. Six of these cities were cities of refuge, and others of them were retained by the Canaanites. Their tithes too, and other dues, were but ill paid, as oft as religion was in a languishing condition. Josh. xx. and xxi. with Judg. i. Neh. xiii. Soon after, a vagrant Levite helped Micah, and the Danites of Laish, to introduce idolatry; and his descendants were, for many ages, priests to that idol. Another, by the affair of his whorish wife abused at Gibeah, occasioned the death of 40,000 Israelites, and of the whole tribe of Benjamin except six hundred, and all the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead except four hundred virgins. Judg. xvii.—xxi. Eli and Samuel, both Levites, were judges of Israel. 1 Sam. i.—viii. Eight thousand three hundred Levites attended at David's coronation; and in his days, they began to enter on their service at twenty-five years of age, and there were of them fit for service, 38,000; of which, 24,000 were appointed to officiate in the service of the tabernacle or temple; 6000 of them were judges; 4000 were porters; and 4000 sacred musicians. It seems that the officiating Levites, as well as the priests and singers, if not also the porters were divided into twenty-four classes, and had their turns of service assigned them by lot. 1 Chron. xii. and xxiii.—xxvi. When Jeroboam the son of Nebat, established his idolatrous worship of the golden calves, many of the Levites left his kingdom, and retired to the kingdom of Judah. Jehoshaphat dispersed them through his dominions, along with some of his princes, to teach the people. Those of Libna revolted from king Jehoram. Under the direction of Jehoiada, the Levites, being furnished with arms, mightily assisted to establish Joash on the throne. In Hezekiah's time, they were more hearty for promoting reformation than the priests; and as few of the priests sanctified themselves, the Levites assisted in killing the burnt offerings. Under Josiah, they directed the repairs of the temple, and zealously assisted at the solemn passover. 2 Chron. xi. 12, 13, and xix. and xxi. 10. and xxiii. and xxix.—xxxi. and xxxiv. and xxxv. A considerable number of them returned from Babylon, some along with Zerubbabel, others with Ezra; and 1760 priests, and two hundred and twelve Levites, dwelt at Jerusalem. Ezra ii. 40—42. and viii. 18, 19. 1 Chron. ix. 18. Ten of them, at Ezra's direction, put away their strange wives. Ezra x. 23, 24. Under Nehemiah, they assisted at his solemn fast, in reading the law, Neh. viii. 7. and ix. 4, 5; and seventeen of them subscribed his covenant for reformation, chap. x. About this time, or not long after it, Nehemiah ordered their tithes to be punctually given them, as the withholding thereof had obliged them to desert the service of the temple, and betake themselves to civil employments. Neh. xiii. 10—13. After our Saviour's death, we find the tribe of Levi in the utmost disorder; the high priesthood was disposed of to the highest bidder; the Levites were allowed by Agrippa to wear the sacerdotal robes of the common priest, and the porters to become singers.

LEVITICUS, the third book of Moses, so called because it chiefly consists of the laws relating to the Levitical priesthood. In the first seven chapters, are prescribed the laws of the various offerings. In the next three, we have an account of the consecration of Aaron and his sons, the death of Nadab and Abihu, and some rules relative to priests' mourning, and their drinking no wine, during their attendance on their sacred work. From chap. xi. to xv. are inserted the laws relative to ceremonial purification from uncleanness of eating, or touching of unclean beasts, and of childbirth, leprosies, running issues. In chap.

xvi. are the laws relative to the fast of expiation. In the six following chapters, are the laws prohibiting the eating of blood, the sacrificing to devils, and all alliances with the Canaanites, and all heathenish superstition, divination, idolatry, theft, perjury, incest, sodomy, and bestiality: and those requiring four years' abstinence from the fruit of trees, or leaving of gleanings to strangers, and the poor; and those regulating the blemishes which rendered priests unfit for sacrificing, or eating the more sacred food, and which rendered animals unfit to be sacrificed. In chap. xxiii. are the laws for the sacred feast of the passover, pentecost, feast of trumpets, feast of expiation, and feast of tabernacles. In ch. xxiv. we have an instance of blasphemy, and the law appointing death for that crime. In chapter xxv. the rules of the years of release and Jubilee are prescribed. In chap. xxvi. are promises of mercy to the obedient and penitent, and fearful threatenings of vengeance against the disobedient and obstinate. The last regulates the devoting of things to the Lord, and of redeeming what had been devoted. All these laws were given at the foot of Sinai, perhaps in a few days after the erection of the tabernacle. To a carnal reader, nothing appears more trifling than some part of this book: but to one truly evangelical, and sensible, the book is a rich mine of the gospel of Christ.

LEVIATHAN; a monstrous animal; but whether it be the crocodile, the toothed whale, or the huge land dragon, is not agreed; and indeed all the three might be known to Job. The crocodile is of the lizard kind, with a two-edged tail, and triangular feet: on each of the two fore feet are four toes, and on the hinder ones five. Crocodiles grow to about twenty-five or thirty feet or more in length, and it is said some grow to a hundred, and they are about the thickness of a human body. About the thirty-third degree of north latitude, they abound in America, and in the north parts of Africa, and no where more than in the river Nile, in the land of Egypt. They deposit their eggs, which are not bigger than those of a turkey, in the sand on the shores, that they may be hatched by the solar heat: and unless the ichneumon sought out and destroyed their eggs, they would quickly plague the adjacent countries with their prodigious increase. It is said, the Tentyrite, a tribe of the ancient Egyptians, caught them with nets, or bridled them; but none else were so daring: they are so frightful, that it is said some have been terrified out of their wits at the sight of them. It is extremely dangerous to awaken one that is asleep. They are covered with scales, like a coat of mail, almost impenetrable, and which cannot be separated; but their belly is soft, and easily pierced. They have scarcely any tongue; but their teeth, to the number of thirty-six, if not sixty, are very sharp and terrible, and are closely joined together. Their mouth can take in a whole man, or even a cow. Their eyes are sparkling, especially when they sun themselves, and sneeze. Their breath is excessive warm, and is emitted like smoke; and with their motion, they occasion a froth in the water. They generally live on fish; but ordinarily lie among rushes and reeds, and thence dart on men, or other land-animals, and drag them into the water, that, being drowned, they may be the more easily mastered. Unterrified, they will attack any creature, and with a sweep of their tail, break their legs, and so bring them down; but their back bone being stiff, they can only run straight forward. In cold climates, the crocodiles are smaller, and are called alligators, and their flesh is said not to be unsavoury meat.

Whales are much larger than crocodiles. Pliny speaks of one in the Red sea, or Arabian river, six hundred feet long, and three hundred and sixty broad; and Pontopidian says, there are some in the north seas one hundred fathoms long, and mentions a monster called the kraken, still larger. But, ordinarily, whales are from fifty to one hundred feet in length. They breathe by lungs, bring forth their young alive, and suckle them, and carry them along with them. Their body is thick, their head very large, the lower jaw larger than the other; their eyes are small, like those of a bullock, and placed at a great distance from one another; their tail is a little forked. From their fat is made oil and spermaceti. Some whales have jaws twelve or fourteen feet long, and teeth of six, eight, or twelve feet in length, which closely join into one another. Of the many kinds of whales, the toothed ones are represented as the most fierce, and seldom taken. They have eyes of about a foot long, and some say ten or twelve times longer, of a reddish colour, like that of the morning sky. They oft lie among hard rocks, and ice, and are extremely bold and daring. They throw great quantities of water out of their mouth, and sometimes a glistening and oily mucus, called spermaceti.

Land-dragons were known among the Troglodites on the banks of the Red sea. They haunt lakes and sea shores, and can plunge into rivers and seas. They are exceedingly large and terrible in their appearance. Their jaws are wide, their tongue three-forked: they have three rows of sharp teeth, and are all over covered with hard scales, impenetrable by arrows or darts. Their breath is fiery, and eyes flaming. They are terrible to, and fearless of every other animal: will attack and conquer an elephant. That one which at Bagrada was like to destroy the Roman army, is said to have been one hundred and twenty feet long, and was destroyed by engines that threw great stones at it. The kings of Egypt, if not also of Assyria, are likened to this monster, which is also called a dragon, and serpent, to denote their terrible and destructive influence. Psal. lxxiv. 13, 14. Ezek. xxix. 3. Isa. xxvii. 1.

LEVY: to raise, by taking a part from among the rest, as tribute is raised from the rest of the incomes of a nation; or an army, or number of workmen raised in a nation. 1 Kings ix. 21. and v. 13, 14.

LEWD: openly wicked, given to the most shameful course of uncleanness. Acts xvii. 5. Ezek. xxiii. 44. In thy filthiness is lewdness; thou art become shameless and obstinate in thy wickedness, idolatry, &c. Ezek.

xxiv. 13. Lewdness is discovered and borne, when sinners are openly and heavily punished for it. Ezek. xxiii. 35.

LIBERAL; ready to give to the poor and needy. Men stand by liberal things, as showing kindness to the poor is an especial means of procuring and establishing one's wealth. Isa. xxxii. 8. Prov. xi. 25. God giveth liberally, with a willing and bountiful heart, and in great abundance. James i. 5.

LIBERALITY, is either what is given to the poor, or the bountiful disposition wherewith one gives it. 1 Cor. xvi. 13. and 2 Cor. viii. 2.

LIBERTY; (1.) FREEDOM, to do or forbear a particular action as one pleaseth. 1 Cor. vii. 39. viii. 9. and x. 29. (2.) Freedom from human slavery or imprisonment. Lev. xxv. 10. Heb. xiii. 23. (3.) Freedom from the ceremonial and broken covenant of works. Gal. v. 1. (4.) The happy state of eternal glory, where one is delivered from all misery and servitude. Rom. viii. 21. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty; i. e. freedom from the slavery of sin, Satan, and the broken law, and now, under the gospel, from the ceremonial yoke, and great pleasure and boldness in fellowship with God. 2 Cor. iii. 17. It is heinously wicked, to use Christian liberty, to the hurt of our weak brethren, or to cover a loose practice. Rom. xiv. 1 Cor. viii. 1 Pet. ii. 16.

LIBERTINES; such Jews as were free citizens or burgesses of Rome; they had a separate synagogue at Jerusalem, and sundry of them concurred in the persecution of Stephen. Acts xi. 9.

LIB'NAH; (1.) A place in the Arabian Desert, where the wandering Hebrews encamped. Num. xxxiii. 20. (2.) A city of Judah, given to the priests, and which it is supposed stood about twelve or sixteen miles south-west of Jerusalem, Josh. xxi. 13; the inhabitants of it, offended with Jehoram for his idolatry and murder, revolted from his government. 2 Kings viii. 22. This city sustained a terrible siege from Sennacherib. Isa. xxxviii. 8. About three hundred years after Christ, it still existed as a village, and was called Labina, and also Lobna.

LIBYA; a large country westward of Egypt. A number of the inhabitants lived anciently in a vagabond manner, roving from place to place. They were, we suppose, the descendants of Lelabim the son of Mizraim, and are called Lubim. The eastern part of Libya was generally subject to Egypt. The Lubims assisted Shishak and Zerah in their warlike expeditions. 2 Chron. xii. 3. and xvi. 8. They assisted Pharaoh-necho and Pharaoh-hophrah, against the Assyrians or Chaldeans, and suffered terrible ravage and ruin from the latter. Neh. iii. 9. Jer. xlv. 9. Ezek. xxx. 5. The western Libyans had bloody wars with the Carthaginians, and in the end were miserably ruined. Some Jews who generally resided in Libya, were converted by Peter's sermon at Pentecost, and it seems carried Christianity to those quarters; where, for some ages after, we find a Christian church; but which, for about 1200 years past, has scarce made any appearance. For about 2000 years past, the country has been enslaved by the Greeks, Romans, Saracens, and Ottoman Turks, in their turn.

LICE; well known insects, with six legs, and two simple eyes; with which most other animals are infected. The crab and common kind especially attend mankind, and where people live nastily, as in East Tartary, are excessively numerous. Swarms of lice was one of the plagues of Egypt, nor could the magicians produce any. But the seventy interpreters render chinnim, gnat; flies. Exod. viii. 16—19.

LIE, or LYE; (1.) An untruth told with a design to deceive, or at least tending to it. Judg. xvi. 10. (2.) False doctrine. John ii. 21. Rom. iii. 7. All lying, falsehood, and equivocation, are condemned in scripture, under pain of eternal damnation. Exod. xxiii. 1, 7. Rev. xxi. 8. An idolatrous picture of God, is called a lie, as it gives a false and deceiving representation of him. Rom. i. 25. Great men, and the houses of Achzib, are or were a lie, very unsubstantial, and ready to disappoint such as trust in them. Psal. lxii. 9. Mic. i. 14.

LIFE. See LIVE.

LIFT; (1.) To raise higher. Gen. vii. 17. (2.) To render more honourable and conspicuous. 1 Chron. xiv. 2. 1 Sam. ii. 7. God lifts up himself, or lifts up his feet, when he hastens to deliver his people. Psal. lxxiv. 8; and when he displays his power and greatness, and overthrows his and his people's enemies. Psal. xciv. 2. Isa. xxxiii. 8, 10. Christ was lifted up, when he hung on the cross, when exalted to heaven, and when publicly offered in the gospel. John viii. 28, and xii. 32, 34. He and his people lift up the head, when they are filled with joy, glory, and honour. Luke xxi. 28. Psal. cx. 7. Men lift up the eyes, when they view carefully. Gen. xlii. 20. Isa. xl. 26; or when they pray with expectation of a gracious answer. Psal. cxxi. 1. The lifting up of the hands, imports swearing. Deut. xxxii. 40; threatening, Ezek. xx. 15; threatening and oppression, Job xxxi. 21; invitation, Isa. xlix. 22; blessing of others, Lev. ix. 22; prayer to God, Psal. xxviii. 2; applying earnestly to work, Psal. cxix. 48; rebelling against a sovereign, 2 Sam. xviii. 28; or helping, encouraging, and comforting a distressed and disconsolate neighbour. Heb. xii. 12. The lifting up of the heart or soul to God, imports solemn dedication to God, joy in his service, and earnest prayer to him. 2 Chron. xvii. 6. Lam. iii. 41. Psal. xxv. 1.

LIGHT; (1.) Of small weight; not heavy. Num. xxi. 5. (2.) Of small moment, value, or use. 1 Sam. xviii. 23. 1 Kings xvi. 31. Persons are light, when they are inconstant, vain, frothy, and unchaste. Judg. ix. 4. Zeph. iii. 4. And so lightness, is either frothiness and lewdness, Jer. lii. 9, and xxiii. 32; or a vain and thoughtless inconstancy of mind. 2 Cor. i. 17. The saints' afflictions are light; far easier to be borne than what they deserve, and than what Christ bore for them; and made easy, by his assisting and supporting them; and small, in comparison of the glorious reward. See BURDEN. To set light by, or make light of, is to contemn and mock. Deut. xxvii. 16. Matt. xxii. 5.

LIGHT; a very marvellous and delightful substance. Its motion is extremely quick, and is said to move about ten millions of miles in a minute. It renders other bodies visible and agreeable. Eccl. xi. 7. After God had formed the heavens, and the substance of the earth, he formed light; and by including it in a kind of luminous cloud, moving round the earth, or having the earth moving round it, he divided it from the darkness. On the fourth day, he made the sun, moon, and stars, to be means of communicating this light to our lower world; and they, and all other things tending to give, or transmit, or receive light, as windows, eyes, sight, candles, and return of the day, &c. are called lights. Gen. i. 3—16. 1 Kings vii. 5. Psal. xxxviii. 10. Job xxiv. 14. God is light; his nature is infinitely pure and glorious; he has all wisdom, excellency, and usefulness; and is the author of all knowledge and comfort to his creatures. 1 John i. 5. Isa. x. 17. Psal. xxvii. 1. He is in the light, possesses his own excellencies; is in Christ; and is clearly manifested in his word and works. 1 John i. 7. Christ is the light; he is the fountain of all light and knowledge, natural, spiritual, and eternal, and in him we discern every thing important. Luke ii. 32. The light of God's countenance, or light of the Lord, is the instruction given by him, the discoveries of his glory and love, the comforts of his Spirit, and joy of his salvation. Psal. iv. 6. Isa. ii. 5. God's judgments are as the light that goeth forth; his laws are clear and plain, and his sentences and punishments are righteous, pure, speedy, and irresistible. Hos. vi. 5. John Baptist, and other ministers, are called light, or lights; they are endowed with the knowledge of divine things, and are a delightful means of instructing, directing, and comforting others. John v. 35. Matt. v. 14. Saints are compared to light; they have the saving knowledge of divine things, and by their instruction and holy conversation, are agreeable means of conveying knowledge and comfort to others. Eph. v. 8. Luke xvi. 8. Good kings are called light, to denote their agreeable splendour, and the counsel and comfort which their subjects receive from them. 2 Sam. xxi. 7. A son, or successor, is called light, as he honours, and keeps his ancestors in view. 1 Kings xi. 36. The word of God, particularly the gospel, is a light, or a lamp: it discovers to us things divine and eternal, and guides us to glory and happiness. Psal. cxix. 105. Matt. iv. 16. The saving knowledge produced by God's word in our heart, is light; we thereby discern the most glorious and eternal objects, and are wise unto salvation. Prosperity, joy, or comfort, is called light, and light of life, to represent the excellency, purity, knowledge, and comfort thereof. Col. i. 12. The saints' whole new-covenant state is called marvellous light. What knowledge, comfort, and happiness, are therein bestowed! 1 Pet. ii. 6. The light of the saints shines more and more unto the perfect day, when their inward gifts and graces increase more and more, and are more and more manifested in their holy conversation. Matt. v. 16. Prov. iv. 18. Their light rejoiceth, when their sound knowledge, grace, and good works, delight themselves and others, and gradually increase in brightness. Prov. xiii. 9. and xv. 30. The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be as the light of seven days. Great shall be the comfort of the Jews, when delivered from the Assyrians, or from their Chaldean captivity, &c.; and much superior to that under the Old Testament, shall be the spiritual knowledge and comfort of the New Testament church, in the apostolic and millennial age. Isa. xxx. 26.

LIGHTNING; flashes of fire that attend thunder. The motion thereof is quick and majestic; and it is called God's light, that is, as it were, spread along the sky, as he forms it, and it is grand and glorious. Job xxviii. 26. and xxxvi. 30. Christ's face is as lightning, shining to his people, but awful and terrible to his enemies. Dan. x. 6. His coming to destroy the Jews, and judge the world, is as lightning, very sudden, alarming, and of a wide-spread influence; and as lightning springs from the east even unto the west, so the Roman armies, beginning on the north-east of the Jewish country, spread ravage and ruin through the whole of it. Matt. xxiv. 27. Luke xvii. 24. Divine judgments are likened to lightning: how terrible and spreading! and how oft, in the execution of it, cities are set on flames, and burnt! Rev. viii. 5. xvi. 18. and xi. 19. Satan falls as lightning from heaven, when his power and interest are suddenly ruined. Luke xi. 18.

LIGHTEN; (1.) To make light by unloading. Acts xxvii. 18. (2.) To make to see or shine; or to fill with comfort. Psal. lxxvii. 18. and xxxiv. 5. See ENLIGHTEN.

FIGURE; a precious stone, said to be spotted like the animal called the lynx or ounce; and others take it for the jacinth. It was the first in the third row of the high-priest's breast-plate, and had the name of God inscribed on it. Exod. xxviii. 19.

LIKEN. See COMPARE.

LIKENESS; similitude; (1.) The outward form of any thing. Ezek. i. 5. (2.) An image, representing a person or thing. Deut. iv. 12, 15. (3.) A resemblance between one person or thing and another. Acts xiv. 11. Adam was made after the likeness of God, in the spiritual nature of his soul, and in the knowledge, righteousness, and holiness wherewith it was qualified: but he begat Seth in his own likeness, corrupt in dispositions, as well as himself. Gen. i. 26. and v. 3. Jesus was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh; appeared in outward form as another man. Rom. viii. 3. Moses saw the similitude of the Lord; had a singular display of his glory; or perhaps saw the second Person of the Godhead in the form of a man, but saw not the face, or essential glory of God. Num. xii. 8. The Hebrews saw no similitude; that is, no bodily shape or form of God, at Sinai. Deut. iv. 12, 15. Those who have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, are infants who have not sinned actually, and others who have not sinned presumptuously, as he did. Rom. v. 14. God used similitudes by the ministry of the prophets; he, by parables and comparisons of things spiritual and future to what was earthly and present, instructed the Jews. Hos. x. 12.

LILY; one of the principal flowers. This flower consists of six leaves formed into the shape of a bell; the pistil is in the centre of the flower, and becomes an oblong and three cornered fruit, containing two rows of seed. The root is of a bulbous form. Lilies are very high flowers, and many spring from one root; they are fragrant, comely, and medicinal, and the roots of white lilies are excellent for softening and for ripening swellings. Tournefort mentions forty-six kinds of lilies: and besides, there is the lily of the valley, which has but one leaf, formed in the manner of a bell; and of which there are seven kinds. Lilies were so plentiful in Canaan, that it seems they heated their ovens with withered ones. Matt. vi. 28, 30. In some countries, lilies grow to the height of four feet; but their neck is so weak, that it can scarce support the head. Christ is likened to the lily of the valley, to express his excellency, purity, superiority to angels and men, and his fulness of the fruits and blessings of grace; deeply was he humbled, and with the lowly he dwells; and from him, as their root, do the multitudes of saints proceed. Saints are lilies among thorns. Amidst wicked men, and manifold troubles, they grow up more excellent than their neighbours; how filled with fruits of righteousness! how humble and self-denied! and how delightful and healing are their graces and conversation! Sol. Song ii. 1, 2. Perhaps gospel-promises, as well as saints, are called lilies; for, how delightful, healing, and fructifying, are they to men's souls! Sol. Song vii. 2. and v. 13.

LIME; a kind of substance formed from chaff, burnt stones, shells, or bones, &c. It is of great use in building, and for manuring fields. One of the kings of Moab, having got a king of Edom, perhaps that one who assisted Jehoram, either dead or alive, burnt his bones into lime. Amos ii. 1. The Assyrian army was like the burnings of lime, when, by a kind of pestilence, they were mostly cut off in the fire of God's vengeance. Isa. xxxiii. 12.

LIMIT; the utmost boundary of a place. The limit of God's house, round about, being most holy, imports, that even the most circumstantial things belonging to the church are holy in themselves, and tend to promote holiness. Ezek. xliii. 12. To LIMIT, is to point out, and fix. Heb. iv. 7. To limit the Holy One of Israel, is to doubt of, or defy the power of God, its going beyond certain bounds, which we, in our imagination, fix for it. Psal. lxxviii. 41.

LINE; (1.) A cord or instrument to measure and adjust things by. 1 Kings vii. 15. Isa. xxxiv. 17. 2 Sam. viii. 2. (2.) A province or course of motion. Psal. xix. 4. Thus the apostles' line or voice went to the ends of the earth, Rom. x. 18; and to boast in another man's line, was to go where he had laboured, and pretend we had done it. 2 Cor. x. 16. (3.) A portion, which is as it were measured out by lines. Psal. xvi. 6. (4.) A short instruction, that might be as it were written in one line. Isa. xxviii. 10. The word of God is a measuring line; as our whole conduct, and all the forms and ordinances of the church, must be adjusted thereby. Ezek. xl. 3. In a promise the stretching out of the line upon a place, imports the measuring of the ground to build houses on it. Jer. xxxi. 39. Zech. i. 16. and ii. 1. But to stretch the line of confusion and stones of emptiness on a place, is to render it altogether waste. Isa. xxxiv. 11, 17. Judgments laid on according to men's deserts, and which lay cities razed on the ground, are called a line, Lam. ii. 8; and the line of Samaria, and plummet of the house of Ahab, is such ruin as Samaria and the family of Ahab met with, 2 Kings xxi. 13: and to lay judgment to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, is to punish people according to the due desert of their deeds. Isa. xxviii. 17.

LINEN. The three Hebrew words for it, are BAD, SHESH, and BUTZ. Calmet thinks the first ought to be rendered linen, and of this the priests' garments consisted; the second cotton, of which the curtains of the tabernacle consisted; and the third, the silk growing on the shell-fish called pinna: but it is certain that the priests' coats and mitre are sometimes said to be of BAD, and sometimes of SHESH, which infers that both words signify the same thing. Exod. xxviii. 39. with Lev. xvi. 4. Solomon too uses BUTZ to express the stuff of the sacred vails, for which SHESH is put at other times. 2 Chron. iii. 14. Nor can I believe, a manufacture of fish silk existed so early at Beersheba, that lay at a considerable distance from the sea. 1 Chron. iv. 21. The best linen was anciently made in Egypt, as their country afforded the finest flax; and Solomon, it seems, bought linen-yarn in Egypt, and established a factory for weaving it in Judea. Prov. vii. 16. 1 Kings x. 28. Christ and the angels who destroy antichrist, are represented as clothed in pure and white linen, to mark the equity and holiness of their conduct. Ezek. ix. 2. Rev. xv. 6. The righteousness of the saints, their holiness of nature and life, but chiefly the righteousness of Jesus imputed to them, is called fine linen, clean and white; how glorious, pure, and ornamental! Rev. xix. 8, 14.

LION. The strongest and fiercest of beasts. In size, he is larger than a mastiff; his head is big, his breast broad, his legs thick and strong, his claws long and thick; he is of a yellowish tawny colour, and has a large mane on his neck, the want of which makes the lioness appear as if of another species. Lions sleep little, and with their eyes not wholly covered: they are exceedingly fierce, and their roaring is terrible. When provoked, scarcely any thing can withstand them; when they see their prey, they terrify it with roaring, that it cannot flee away. They are extremely kind to their young, who, it is said, sleep some days after their birth, till the roaring of the lion awakens them. They readily spare such as submit to their mercy and throw themselves at their feet, but cannot endure to be looked upon asquint: they are exceedingly mindful of favours done them, and grateful to their benefactors. Lions abounded not only in Lebanon, but also in the thickets of Jordan, and in other places of Canaan, where there were woods. Samson tore a lion to pieces with his hands. Judges xiv. David killed both a lion and a bear. 1 Sam. xvii. 24. Benaiah slew a lion in a pit. 2 Sam. xxiii. 20. A lion killed the man of God from Judah, who prophesied the ruin of the idolatrous altar at Bethel; and, contrary to nature, spared his ass. 1 Kings xiii. 24—26. Daniel was cast into a den full of hungry lions, but received no hurt. Dan. vi. 27. The heathen persecutors often exposed the Christians to the fury of lions and other wild beasts. God is compared to a lion; how strong and terrible! how he tears his enemies, and protects his friends! how fearful the voice of his threatenings and judgments! how great the terror of his chastisements! Hos. v. 14. Amos i. 2, and iii. 8. Christ is the lion of the tribe of Judah, descending from Judah in respect of his manhood; he is the almighty awakener and conqueror of souls; he destroys his and his people's enemies. Rev. v. 5. The church is compared to a lion strengthened by God; she overcomes, and is terrible to all that oppose her, Mic. v. 8; her ministers, especially in the primitive ages, were like lions, bold, courageous, and active in their work, and conquered multitudes to Christ. Rev. iv. 7. The saints are represented as lions, because of their boldness and activity in the cause of God. Prov. xxviii. 1. The tribes of Judah and Dan are likened to lions, to denote their courage, activity, bravery, and conquests: the tribe of Judah had kings courageous and terrible, who attacked and subdued their enemies. In Samson, the Danites, as lions, greatly harassed their enemies the Philistines. Gen. xlix. 9. Deut. xxxiii. 22. The devil is a roaring lion; he furiously goes about to terrify the saints, and destroy mankind. 1 Pet. v. 8. Tyrants, oppressors, such as the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Persian conquerors, and the four last kings of Judah, are called lions: how cruelly the former prevailed, and ruined the nations around! and how the last murdered their own subjects! Amos iii. 8. Nah. ii. 12. Jer. iv. 7. v. 6. Isa. xxi. 8. and Ezek. xix. Men, outrageous in wickedness, persecution, or oppression, are likened to lions, as they terrify, and murder others around. Isa. xi. 7. and Ezek. xxii. 25. The Chaldean monarchy was as a lion: what a proud, powerful, courageous, and cruel terror, and destroyer of nations! Dan. vii. 4. Pretended difficulties are compared to a lion in the way and streets: they as effectually deter the slothful from their proper work of nature or duty, as if they were real lions, ready to tear them to pieces if he proceeded in his course. Prov. ii. 13. and xxvi. 13. Job and his sons, represented as tyrannic oppressors, seem to be the lion and whelps referred to as ruined. Job iv. 10, 11. Will a lion roar, when he hath no prey?—Can a bird fall in a snare, where no gin is for him? Shall one take up a snare, and have taken nothing? God and his prophets do not threaten men but when destruction is approaching, and sin has made them a fit prey for his wrath. Judgments do not happen without God's providential direction, nor are they removed until they answer his end. Amos iii. 4, 5. The threatening words and providences of God, the wrath of a king, and the furious noise of the Assyrian and other invaders of Judah, are terrible as the roaring of lions, and are an awful presage of ruin to such as they roar against. Jer. xxv. 30. Amos i. 2. iii. 8. Prov. xix. 12. and Isa. v. 29.

LIP. See MOUTH.

LIST; to think fit. Matt. xvii. 12.

LISTEN; to hear attentively. Isa. xlix. 1.

1. LITTERS; a kind of close wagons. Their Hebrew name almost inclines us to think their form had been copied from the tortoiseshell. Isa. lxvi. 20.

LITTLE, SMALL; (1.) Small in quantity. Exod. xvi. 18. (2.) Few in number. Exod. xii. 4. (3.) Short in measure or time. 2 Sam. xvi. 1. Job x. 20. Low in stature. Luke xix. 3. (5.) Young in age. Esth. iii. 13. (6.) Weak in strength. Luke xii. 28. (7.) Small in value or importance. Josh. xxii. 17. (8.) Poor, contemptible, and afflicted. 1 Sam. xv. 17. Rev. xx. 12. Psal. cxix. 41. and Zech. iv. 10.

LIVE; (1.) To have a power of motion and action. Gen. xlv. 3. (2.) To recover from dangerous sickness. John iv. 50, 51. (3.) To have food and other things proper for the maintenance of life. 1 Cor. ix. 13. (4.) To be inwardly quickened, nourished, and actuated by the influence of God. Gal. ii. 20. (5.) To be greatly refreshed and comforted. Psal. xxii. 16. 1 Thess. iii. 8. (6.) To have the continued possession of grace here, and glory hereafter. John xiv. 19. God lives in and of himself; he has incomprehensible and everlasting activity and happiness. Numb. xiv. 21. Christ now lives, possessed of all happiness for himself. Rev. i. 18. He lives for his people, perpetually interceding for them, and conveying to them his purchased blessings. Heb. vii. 25; and he lives in them as a quickening Spirit; he dwells in their hearts by faith, and is the life-giving principle from which their spiritual activity and comforts proceed; and they live on him by faith, drawing virtue from his word, person, righteousness, and fulness, for their quickening, activity, and comfort. Gal. ii. 20. Men live not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Even when there is no apparent means of subsistence, we are to trust to the power and promise of God for our support in life. Matt. iv. 4. Men live not to themselves but unto God, or Christ, when they make, not their carnal ease, profit, or honour, their great end, but his glory, and the edification of his church. Rom. xiv. 7, 8. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15. To live in God's sight, is to be preserved by his favour, live under his special care, and in the exercise of fearing and honouring him. Hos. vi. 2. Gen. xvii. 18. Men live by the sword, when they support themselves and families by plunder and war. Gen. xxvii. 40. Peter lived after the manner of the gentiles, when he used clean provision, without regard to the ceremonial law. Gal. ii. 14. LIVING, is either (1.) that which has life: and even water that runs is called living. 1 Kings iii. 22. Numb. xix. 17. Or, (2.) A man's substance, by which his life is maintained. Luke xv. 12. Mark xii. 44. Christ is a living stone, and living way: he has life in himself, and he quickens, and brings to life eternal, such as come to unite with and walk in him. 1 Pet. ii. 4. Heb. x. 20. The influences of his Spirit are called living water, as they constantly issue forth fresh virtue, to beget, preserve, restore, and perfect our spiritual life. Sol. Song iv. 15. John iv. 10. Rev. xxii. 17. The living, are either such as live in this world. Ezek. xxvi. 20. Or such as live in the eternal state. Matt. xxii. 32. The religious service of saints is called a living and reasonable sacrifice to distinguish it from the ancient sacrifices of beasts; and because proceeding from a soul spiritually quickened, it is performed in a lively and an active manner. Rom. xii. 1.

LIVELY; full of life; strong and active. Exod. i. 19. Psal. xxxviii. 19. God's oracles are lively; they proceed from and resemble the living God, and quicken and comfort our souls. Acts vii. 38. Saints are lively stones, quickened by the Spirit, and active in holiness. 1 Pet. ii. 7; and their hope is lively, as it proceeds from spiritual life, and powerfully excites to holiness. 1 Pet. i. 3.

LIFE: (1.) A natural power of acting. Job iii. 20. Eccl. ii. 17. (2.) Spiritual life, consisting in our being instated in the favour of God, quickened by his Spirit, and conformed to his image; in consequence of which, we, by supernatural influence, live on God's fulness of grace, enjoy fellowship with him, and act to his glory. Rom. viii. 6. Col. iii. 3. (3.) The eternal holiness and happiness which the saints possess in heaven. Rom. v. 17. Jesus Christ is the life, and our life; he is the source and maintainer of life to all creatures: he purchased eternal life for his people; he bestows it on them: he, dwelling in their heart, quickens and comforts them, and he will eventually raise them from the dead, and give them eternal blessedness. John xi. 25. xiv. 6. 1 John i. 2. Col. iii. 4. By his life, that is, by his resurrection and intercession, we are saved in consequence of our reconciliation unto God by his death. Rom. v. 10. His life is manifested, in his people's cheerful endurance of suffering for his sake: and by it are clearly evinced his eternal life in heaven, his intercession for them, and his living in them, as their quickening and comforting head. 2 Cor. iv. 10; his words are life, as they, through the Spirit, quicken dead souls, and preserve and restore spiritual life in the saints. John vi. 63. The life of God, from which the wicked are alienated, is that life of grace and holiness, by which he, as it were, lives in his people, and of which he is the author, director, supporter, and end. Eph. iv. 18. Wisdom, understanding, or knowledge of God, is life, or eternal life. To have true knowledge and wisdom, is to have the matter and means of spiritual life, and the means and pledge of eternal life: and to possess Jesus, the wisdom of God, is to have the true fountain of life in us. Prov. iv. 13. John xvii. 3. A sound heart is the life of the flesh; inward holiness and candour promote the comforts of natural life, and issue in eternal life. Prov. xiv. 30. To be spiritually minded, is life and peace;

it implies an interest in the life-giving covenant of peace, and union and communion with Jesus the life and peace; it produces a lively and peaceful frame in the soul, and prepares for eternal life and peace in heaven. Rom. viii. 6. To lose life, is to forego it, or have it taken away. Judg. xviii. 25. He that findeth his life, shall lose it; and he that loses it for Christ, shall find it. He that preserves his life and outward comforts at the expence of denying Christ and his truth shall but injure himself, and forfeit eternal life; and he that hazards his life for Christ, shall be rewarded with eternal happiness. Matt. x. 39. and xviii. 25. Life is in the light of the king's countenance; the king with a smile may give the countenance, or the outward comfort of life to men. Prov. xvi. 15. Life and death are in the power of the tongue; by our words we do much to promote, or to hurt and undo our own life, and the life of others. Prov. xviii. 21. Blood is called the life of an animal, as its motion is the immediate means of it; and the stomach, is called the life, as it receives that which supports it; and food that enters into the stomach, is called life, because the means of it. Gen. ix. 4. Job xxxiii. 20. and Deut. xx. 19. The time in which we live is called life, as it is the measure of its duration. Prov. iii. 2. Comforts and blessings are called life, as they render it truly happy and useful. 1 Tim. iv. 10. Our acts and employments are called life, as they manifest it, and are the improvement that renders it useful or wicked. Acts xxvi. 4.

LIVER; an inward part of an animal and which was one of the entrails of beasts inspected by the Chaldeans and other heathens, in their DIVINATION. Ezek. xxi. 21. To have the liver poured out, is expressive of great grief and inward vexation. Lam. ii. 11. To be struck through the liver, imports painful wasting of the inwards, and complete ruin by means of it. Prov. vii. 23.

LIZARDS; animals that live partly in water, and partly on land: their body is oblong and roundish; they have four legs, and hinder parts terminated by a tapering tail, as may be seen in the common csk. Lizards are of many different kinds, as newts, crocodiles, guanas, &c. In Arabia, there are newts of about a yard long; and in India, it is said, some of them are eight yards in length. One of the American guanas is said to be sufficient diet for four men. About Cairo in Egypt, many poor people feed on lizards, or perhaps camelions, a particular kind of them. Lizards were unclean under the law, and might represent men whose minds are earthly and covetous, and their appearance in conversation unholly and disagreeable. Lev. xi. 30.

LO; the same as BEHOLD; it is frequently used to point to a person or thing in sight; and sometimes it expresses cheerful readiness. Gen. xxix. 7. Psal. xl. 7.

LOAD; to put as much upon a person or beast as it can bear. God loads men with benefits, when he gives them in great number and abundance. Psal. xlviii. 19.

LOAVES of bread were anciently sent as presents, even to persons of considerable rank. 1 Sam. xvii. 17. xxv. 18. 1 Kings xiv. 3. 2 Kings iv. 42.

LOCK; (1.) An instrument for shutting a door. Unbelief is the principal lock of the heart, that shuts out Jesus and his Spirit; and lukewarmness and sloth are the handles of it. Sol. Song v. 3. (2.) A bunch of hair on the side of a person's head. Samson, it seems, tied up his hair into seven bunches or locks. Judg. xvi. 13. Christ's locks black and bushy as a raven, are his mysterious, unfading, and well connected purposes; his ever fresh appearance, and the wise administration of his government. Sol. Song v. 11; but the filling of his head with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night, imports his fearful and numerous sufferings, and his receiving contempt and neglect from men. Sol. Song v. 2. The church's having beautiful eyes, cheeks, or temples within her locks, imports the modesty and self-denial of her true members. Her locks, also, may denote well-connected assemblies of saints, and numbers of good works, all fixed in, or proceeding from Jesus Christ her head. Sol. Song iv. 1, 3. and vi. 7. The uncovering of locks, is expressive of great shame, disgrace, and grief. Isa. xlvii. 2.

LO-AMMI, i. e. Not my people. See HOSEA.

LOCUSTS; flying insects, most destructive to the fruits of the ground: they are of various kinds; very fruitful, and go forth by bands. The great green locusts, with a sword-formed tail, are nearly two inches long, and about the thickness of a man's finger. In A. D. 1556, there appeared locusts at Milan in Italy, of a span long; and Pliny speaks of locusts in India, of about a yard long. Locusts continue about five months in the summer season, and are very numerous in Asia and Africa; but in cold countries, their eggs are often ruined in the winter. Sometimes they fall like a cloud on a country, and in their flight, so intercept the rays of the sun, as to obscure the day, and fill the people with terror, lest they should light on their fields; and if trenches be dug, or fires kindled, to stop their progress, they press on, regardless of danger, till they fill the trenches, and quench the fires. Where they alight, they readily eat up every green thing they meet with. Their very touch and moisture are infectious. When they die in great numbers they infect the air and almost produce a pestilence; but Providence often carries them into some sea at last. Locusts were one of the plagues of Egypt. They were, by a strong wind, carried into the Red sea. Exod. x. 14—19. It seems a wind drove into the sea those terrible swarms that wasted Canaan, and occasioned a famine in the days of Joel; and the sea driving them ashore in heaps, the Hebrews buried them. Joel ii. Isa. xxxiii. 4, 5. The locusts were ceremonially clean; John Baptist, and many others, particularly in Abyssinia, eat them: and being salted and fried, they taste like river cray fish. Lev. xii. 22. The Assyrians were like locusts, for their number, and their destructive influence, in the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, Isa. xxxiii. 4, 5. Nah. iii. 15, 17; and they ruined them after they had been terribly reduced by the Syrians. Amos vii. 1. The Saracens and Popish clergy were like terrible locusts issuing out of the smoke of the bottomless pit, and for five months ravaging all around. Animated with the stupid and infernal delusion of Mahomet, the Saracens, for about one hundred and fifty years, made terrible progress in wasting the countries, from the west of Africa and Spain, to almost the western borders of China. From ignorance and superstition, sprung the Romish bands of Cardinals, Bishops, Monks, &c. with the Pope at their head, and for the time appointed of God, they have, or shall spiritually waste the nations. Rev. ix. 1—11.

LODGE; (1.) To continue for a night or more. Gen. xxviii. 11. Psal. xlix. 12. (2.) To make nests for lodging in. Mark iv. 32. Righteousness lodged in Jerusalem, when it was much practised and esteemed by the inhabitants. Isa. i. 21. Prepare me a lodging, i. e. every thing proper to accommodate a stranger. Philem. 22.

LOFT; a story of a house. Acts xx. 9.

LOFTY; very high. God is the Lefty One, his excellence and authority are infinitely superior to those of any other. Isa. lviii. 15. Lefty applied to men, denotes their pride and arrogance, manifested in their haughty looks, speeches, or behaviour. Prov. xxx. A lofty city, is one wealthy and honourable. Isa. xxvi. 5.

LOG; a measure for liquid things, containing about twenty-four and a quarter solid inches, which is nearly a wine-pint English. Lev. xiv. 10.

LOINS; the lower parts of the back, near which the seminal vessels are lodged, Exod. xxviii. 42. 1 Kings viii. 19; and sometimes they are put for the whole man. Psal. lxvii. 11.

LONG; of great extent or duration. Psal. cxxix. 8. and cii. 6.

LONG; to desire very earnestly, as a lover does for his beloved, or one hungry or thirsty desires refreshment, Gen. xxxiv. 8. 2 Sam. xxiii. 15: so persons grievously afflicted, long for death. Job iii. 21. David's soul longed for his banished son Absalom. 2 Sam. xiii. 39. Exiles long to see their native country. Gen. xxxi. 30. Faithful ministers, sick or imprisoned, long to visit their people. Phil. ii. 26. Saints long for the experience of God's presence or power in his ordinances, and for his salvation from the guilt, power, and pollution of sin, to perfect holiness and happiness. Psal. lxxxiv. 2. and cxix. 40, 174. God's LONG SUFFERING, is his patient bearing with numerous affronts, while he forbears to execute deserved wrath upon men, and waits to be gracious to them. Rom. ii. 4. The saints' long suffering, is their unwearied firmness of mind under troubles, their constant hope of the performance of God's promises, and their patient bearing with others to promote their reformation. Col. iii. 12.

LOOK; (1.) To behold; see. Dent. xviii. 32. (2.) To take a careful view of. Lev. xiii. 5. (3.) Fully to understand and reveal. Rev. v. 5. (4.) To choose. Acts vi. 3. (5.) To care for. Jer. xl. 4. (6.) To expect, wait for. Matt. xi. 3. (7.) To believe and trust in. Isa. xlv. 22. and xvii. 8. God's looking on men, imports his perfect knowledge of their conduct; his care of, and kindness to them, Psal. lxxi. 2. Lam. iii. 50; his delightful contemplation of their graces, Sol. Song vi. 13; or his apparent unconcern about them, as if he was a mere by-stander. Hab. i. 13. Psal. xxxv. 17; or his terrifying and punishing them. Exod. xiv. 24. Men's looking to God or Christ, imports their viewing him by faith in his excellencies and new-covenant relations, desiring direction, support, and every blessing of salvation from him, and their viewing him as their pattern. Psal. xxxiv. 5. Isa. xlv. 22. and xvii. 7. Heb. xii. 2. Look not upon me, for I am black, for the sun hath looked upon me: i. e. Look not upon me with contempt or angry frowns; look not upon me, so as to observe merely or chiefly, my sins and troubles, and so stumble at religion for my sake: for fiery troubles and temptations have fearfully scorched and afflicted me. Sol. Song i. 5. The sinful looking of the Edomites on the Jews, was their taking pleasure to see them murdered, and their cities burnt with fire, and their instigating the Chaldeans to cruelty. Obad. 12.

LOOSE; (1.) To unbind. John xi. 44. (2.) To open. Rev. v. 12. (3.) To put off shoes. Josh. v. 15. (4.) To free from church censure. Matt. xvi. 16. (5.) To set at liberty. Psal. cii. 20. and cv. 20. (6.) To set sail. Acts xiii. 13. and xxvii. 21. God looses the loins, bond, or girdle of men, when he weakens them, and takes away their power and authority. Isa. xlv. 1. Job xii. 18, 21. His loosing of the Turkish four angels, imports his permitting and enabling them to execute his judgments on the nations, westward of the Euphrates. Rev. ix. 15. God looses Satan, when he permits him to exercise his power. Rev. xx. 7. He looseth the prisoners, when, in his providence, he brings men out of common gaols, but chiefly when he powerfully brings the bond slaves of Satan out of their sinful and miserable state, or brings his saints out of great trouble, spiritual or temporal, and fills their heart with gladness. Psal. cxlvi. 7. and cxvii. 16. Christ's loosing the seven seals of his Father's book, and reading and looking in it, imports his perfect knowledge and actual discovery of his most hidden purposes, in their due order. Rev. v. and vi.

LOP; to cut off the top or BRANCHES of a tree. See BOUGH.

LORD; one that has rule and authority, such as a husband, Gen. xviii. 12; a master, John xv. 15; a prophet, 1 Kings xviii. 7; a prince or noted person. Gen. xxiv. 18. And the wives or daughters of such great men, are called ladies. Judg. v. 39. When, in the Old Testament, LORD is printed in capitals, it is ordinarily the translation of Jehovah. In smaller characters, it is the translation of Adon, which signifies a connecting and supporting ruler. God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is often called LORD, to denote his self-existence, his giving being to, and his supporting and ruling every creature. Psal. cx. 1. 2 Thess. iii. 5. He is called Lord of hosts, or Lord of sabaoth; as he made, owns, supports, and rules all the armies of angels, men, and other creatures. Psal. xxiv. 10. James v. 4. When Lord, in the New Testament, is the translation of kyrios, it very often signifies Christ, Rev. xiv. 13; but Lord, the translation of despotes, or master, is perhaps never ascribed to Christ, but to God essentially. See Acts iv. 24. Luke ii. 29. Jude 4. Rev. vi. 10. 2 Pet. ii. 1. Jesus Christ is called Lord of lords, and Lord of all; he supports and governs all kings, masters, and other rulers, nay, all persons and things in heaven, and earth. Rev. xix. 16. Acts x. 36. He is the Lord of glory; he possesses infinite glory in himself, purchases everlasting glory for, and bestows it upon his people. 1 Cor. ii. 8.

He is the Lord of the church, and especially of saints, her true members; he planned and erected the church, he institutes every ordinance in her, and stands in a peculiar relation to church-members, as their husband, supreme teacher, and ruler; and he is the spiritual husband, director, governor, and source of endless happiness to the saints. Rom. v. 1. To say unto Jesus, Lord, Lord, is to make a public profession of subjection to him. Matt. vii. 1. To call Jesus Lord, in a proper manner, is heartily to believe in, submit to, and witness for him, as the Son of God, and true Messiah. 1 Cor. xii. 3. Men think themselves lords, when filled with self-conceit of their wealth, honour, and wisdom. Jer. ii. 31. Babylon was a lady of kingdoms; an honoured ruler of nations. Isa. xlvii. 5, 7.

LO-RUHAMAH, not obtaining mercy; as Ruhamah signifies, having obtained mercy. See HOSEA.

LOSE; to suffer, to perish. John vi. 39. Christ loses none of his elect; suffers none of them to be eternally ruined. John xvii. 12. Cattle, or money is lost, when the owner knows not what is become thereof. Exod. xxix. 9. Men are lost, when in a state of sin and misery, in which they have no happiness, and are of no spiritual use; or when they go on in a course of open wickedness, or of wilful wandering from God. Luke xix. 10. and xv. 6, 9, 32. Psal. cxix. 176. Matt. xviii. 11.

LOT, the son of HARAN, and nephew of Abraham, and, as we suppose, brother of Sarah. After the death of his father, he lived and travelled with Abraham. After their return from Egypt, the number of their flocks, and the strife of their herdmen, obliged them to separate. On Abraham's humble and peaceful offer, Lot too proudly took his choice, preferring himself to his uncle. Charmed with the fertile appearances of the country around Sodom, he, perhaps without consulting his Maker, chose that for his place of sojourning. His pride and carnal mindedness were severely punished. The wicked behaviour of the Sodomites, made his life a continual burden to him. Nor had he been long there, when he, if not also the most of what he had, was carried captive by Chedorlaomer. He was recovered by Abraham; and had it not been for Abraham's intercession with God in his behalf, he had about sixteen years after perished in the overthrow of Sodom. On the evening before that fatal event, two of the angels which had just feasted with Abraham, appeared to Lot at the gate of Sodom, as travellers. Lot humbly begged they would lodge in his house. At first they, to try his hospitality, spoke as if they inclined to lodge all night in the street; but, on his farther entreaty, they entered his house, and supped with him, in a manner we do not understand. Supper was scarcely finished, when a multitude of the men of the city, came and demanded of Lot the two strangers, that they might abuse them in a shocking manner. Lot in his confusion, begged they would rather take his two virgin daughters, than so horribly abuse the strangers, who had committed themselves to his protection. They upbraided him as a saucy impertinent fellow, who, though but lately come to sojourn among them, would act the part of a judge, and dictate to them, who were natives of the place; and they threatened to use him worse than they had intended to do with the strangers. Upon this, they furiously rushed forward to break up the door, which Lot had shut behind him. The angels pulled Lot in, and bolted the door, and smote the Sodomites about it, with such blindness and stupidity, that they could not perceive where it was; and being wearied with groping, they at last went home. Meanwhile, the angels informed Lot of their intentions to destroy Sodom, and the adjacent cities, for the wickedness of them, and warned him and all his relations to leave the place immediately. He sent and warned his sons-in-law, and begged them to flee; but they contemned his message. About break of day, Lot, his wife, and two unmarried daughters, unwilling to leave their substance, or waiting for the other daughters, continued to put off the time. The angels took them by the hand, and hastened them out of their house, and from the city; and leaving them, warned them to run with all their might to a neighbouring mountain; and that they should be consumed, if they so much as looked back. At Lot's intercession, who was afraid of the wild beasts of the mountain, the angels, directed of God, promised to spare Zoar, the least of the five cities marked for ruin, as a place of refuge to him and his family. Through carnal affection to her country and wealth, or a vain curiosity to see the vengeance of God, Lot's wife looked behind her. The flames of divine vengeance seized her immediately, and transformed her into a statue of petrified salt; thus making her a standing monument of the danger of incredulity, impudence, love of the world, apostasy from, and disobedience to God. How long this pillar continued, we know not. Josephus says, it remained in his time, which was nearly 2000 years after it was formed. Irenæus and Tertullian say, it was standing about A. D. 200. Benjamin of Tudela, the Jewish traveller, asserts, that it was standing nearly 1000 years after; which would make its duration of above 3000 years. Some modern travellers pretend to have seen it; but their accounts so much resemble the fabulous, and differ so widely, that we cannot accredit them. It is certain, that Mandrel, Shaw, Thompson, and other travellers of known veracity, do not pretend that there are now the least remains of this noted statue. Shocked with the death of his wife, and the ruin of his country, Lot was afraid to dwell in Zoar; but he and his daughters retired to the adjacent mountains. Lot's daughters, whom he but lately offered as prostitutes to the unclean Sodomites, decoyed himself into drunkenness and incest. Anxious for posterity, and perhaps desirous to be mother of the Messiah, and fearing there was no man left on the earth besides their father, or at least none to whom they could have access, they resolved to have children by him. On two different nights they intoxicated him with wine, and lay with him, the one after the other. They both fell with child by him. The elder daughter impudently called her son MOAB, to mark that he was begotten by her father. The younger called her son Ben-ammi, the son of my people. From these two sprung the Moabites and Ammonites, against whom the curse of Heaven was denounced. Gen. xi. 31. xiii. xiv. and xix. 2 Pet. ii. 6—8. Luke xvii. 32. Some think Baal-peor, the deity worshipped by the Ammonites and Moabites, with indecent ceremonies, was a representation of Lot, in his shameful drunkenness and incest.

LOT; any thing cast, or drawn forth, in order to determine a point in debate. It is a solemn appeal to God for an immediate interposition of his directive power for determining the affair; and, on that account, ought to be used in nothing but what is important, and cannot otherwise be peacefully determined. It is to be used with reverence and prayer. Prov. xvi. 33. and xviii. 18. Acts i. 24—26. 1 Sam. xiv. 41. It was determined by lot which of the expiatory goats should be offered, and which dismissed. Lev. xvi. 8—10. By lot, the land of Canaan was divided to the Hebrew tribes, and the Levites had their cities assigned, and their order of sacred service determined. Num. xxvi. 55, 56. xxxiii. 54. and xxxiv. Josh. xiv—xxi. 1 Chron. vi. 54, 61. xiv. and xxv. By lot, the Hebrews selected the men that should demand for punishment the delinquents of Gibeah, and discovered who had taken the accursed spoil of Jericho. Judg. xx. 9. Josh. vii. 14—18. By lot, Saul was marked out for the Hebrew kingdom, and his son Jonathan discovered to have tasted the honey. 1 Sam. x. 19—21. and xiv. 41, 42. By lot, Jonah was discovered to be the cause of the storm, and Matthias marked for the apostleship. Jonah i. 7. Acts i. 24—26. By lot, the heathen divided their shares of the spoil, and the impious soldiers determined who should have Christ's vesture. Obad. 11. Nah. iii. 10. Psal. xxii. 19. To pretend that chance, which is but the want of design, determines in any lot, is too absurd for rational beings to believe. God, or the devil, must therefore be the arbitrator, to whose determination the matter is by lot referred. God challenges it as his province to direct lots. Prov. xvi. 33. Nor, I suppose, will many be found, even of players at cards and dice, that will avow Satan as their referee. How base, then, and how sinful, to use lotteries in trifles, or in sports or games, or to direct in sinful attempts! Ezek. xxi. 18, 19. Esth. iii. Whatever falls to one's share by casting of the lot, or the providence of God, is called his LOT. Josh. xv. 1. Psal. cxxv.

3. and xvi. 5. Isa. xvii. 14. Acts viii. 21. Luke i. 9.

LOATHE; to dislike; AMOR: as the stomach does lukewarm water. God loathes men, when, on account of sin, he is angry with them, hides himself from them, and refuses to regard or help them. Jer. xiv. 19. Zech. xi. 8. Men loathe and abhor themselves, when they are deeply ashamed of, and grieved for their sinfulness in heart and life. Ezek. vi. 9. xx. 43. and xxxvi. 31. Men are LOATHSOME, when filled with sin, that abominable thing which God bates. Prov. xiii. 5.

LOUD; that can be heard afar. A loud cry, noise, or voice, is expressive of great danger, earnest desire, or great joy. A whorish woman is loud and stubborn; she is given to scold and trouble her husband; and is talkative, and obstinate in seducing men. Prov. vii. 11.

LOUR; to look sad. Matt. xvi. 3.

LOVE; CHARITY; (1.) A natural affection of rational creatures, inclining them to show kindness to, or desire fellowship with, or sole possession of some person or thing, on account of its possessing some real or supposed excellence. This affection is good according to its object, manner, or degree. To love relations and neighbours, and one's self, in subordination to God, is good. Psal. xxxiv. 12. Eph. v. 25. Love to idols, sins, or wicked persons, as such, or in order to carnal lust, is unlawful. Jer. ii. 25. John xii. 25. 2 Tim. iii. 2. 2 Sam. xiii. 4. Prov. vii. 18. (2.) A gracious habit, principle, or disposition, wrought in the soul by the Spirit of God, by which we esteem, desire, and delight in God in Christ, as our chief good and sum of all perfection and excellence, and the fountain of all blessings, and take pleasure to obey his laws; and by which we are inclined and enabled to esteem, desire, and delight in spiritual fellowship with such as bear his image, and to do good to all men, even to enemies. 1 John iv. 19, 21. This love, or CHARITY, is of great importance; without it no gifts can be truly valuable; where it is not, there can be no true faith. Love continues for ever, when once implanted; and it renders us patient under trouble, slow to anger, ready to forgive injuries, and inclines us to deny ourselves; to help our neighbour; makes us mourn for his faults and afflictions, and kindly bear with his infirmities; it is the bond of perfection; and, in fine, if pure and fervent, tends to render the present life a heaven upon earth. Gal. vi. 5. 1 Cor. xiii. (3.) Divine love, which is either God's natural delight in that which is good, Isa. lxi. 8; or that gracious affection which he manifests to men, in giving his Son for them, as their surety and ransom; and in giving him and all his fulness of blessings to them as their portion. Rom. v. 8. 1 John iv. 19. The love of God, or Christ, is either the love they bear to us; or our love of which they are the objects. Rom. v. 5. Jude 20. John xv. 9. (4.) The object beloved. Sol. Song ii. 2, 7. God and Christ are called LOVE; they contain whatever is lovely; deserve the highest love and esteem; their love is the great motive of all they do; and, to astonishment, is displayed in all the works of nature; but chiefly of grace. John iv. 8, 18. Sol. Song ii. 7. The love of Christ has a breadth, length, depth, and height; it is like a mighty ocean; it reaches over all the world; covers every sin, and comprehends every blessing: it reaches from eternity to eternity; it condescends to the lowest sinner and case; it brought Jesus to the lowest state of suffering; and saves from the lowest hell, to the most inconceivable heights of holiness and happiness. Eph. iii. 18, 19. To be directed into the love of God, is to be instructed, excited, and enabled, to believe his redeeming love to us, and to live in the exercise of fervent love to him. 2 Thess. iii. 5. To give Christ our loves, or lovely flowers, is to exert the various graces of faith, love, hope, repentance, relatively to him, and to pour out our hearts in prayer and praise before him. Sol. Song vii. 12. Not to love our lives unto the death, is to prefer the honour of Christ, and the interests of his truth to our outward enjoyments, and even to natural life itself. Rev. xii. 11. Christ is altogether lovely; he is in every respect and degree, precious, useful, agreeable, and attractive, in his person, office, relation, states, and work. Sol. Song v. 16; and his ordinances are lovely or amiable, as he is their author, substance, and end. Psal. lxxxiv. 1.

LOW. Men are low, or sit in a low place, when they are poor, debased, and disregarded. Deut. xxviii. 43. Eccl. x. 6. During the hail-storm, the city is in a low place. Amidst Sennacherib's ravages, Jerusalem was protected; and amid storms of persecution, the church is preserved. Isa. xxxii. 19. Let the rich Christian rejoice in that he is made low; humble in the temper of his mind; or even that he has his outward wealth and honour taken from him, as that tends to his real good. James i. 10. Christ was made for a little while, or in a little degree, lower than the angels, in his state of humiliation. Psal. viii. 5. Heb. ii. 7, 9. The lower parts of the earth, are, (1.) The earth itself, which is the lower region of this world. Eph. vi. 9. (2.) The valleys and their inhabitants; or rather, the gentile world. Isa. xlii. 23. (3.) The womb; in which the unborn child is hid as in a deep pit. Psal. cxxxix. 15. (4.) The grave, or state of the dead. Psal. lxxiii. 9. To be lowly, is to be meek and humble. Psal. cxlxxxiii. 6. Zech. ix. 9.

LUD; the son of Shem. If he was the father of the Lydians in Lesser Asia, which some very learned men think he was not, it is probable his posterity took up their first residence near the Euphrates, and then moved westward, and settled among the children of Japheth. It is more certain, that Lydia was situate on the east of Ionia, south of Mysia, west of greater Phrygia, and north of Caria, and lay between the thirty-seventh and 39th degree of north latitude; but in the more flourishing times of their last kings, Alayates and Cræsus, the Lydian territories were far more extensive. The principal cities of Lydia were Sardis, Philadelphia, Thyatira, Magnesia, &c. The Lydians had kings of three different races, who are supposed to have governed them about six hundred or seven hundred years. After the country had been over-run by the Gomerians, or Cimmerians, about A. M. 3368, and had not long after engaged in a furious war against the Medes, Milesians, and others, and just after Cræsus had extended his empire from the Ægean sea to the river Halys, he having entered into an alliance with the Chaldeans against the Medes and Persians, Cyrus conquered the kingdom of Lydia: since which it is has by turns been subject to the Persians, Greeks, Romans, Saracens, or Turks. The Lydians were extremely wicked; the women had to earn their portion for marriage by whoredom; and after the fall of their monarchy, they generally became a most idle and effeminate race. The gospel, however, was early planted here; and a Christian church formed, which never has been wholly extirpated. Gen. x. 22. Isa. lxvi. 19. (2.) LUD, the son of Mizraim, and father of the Ludim in Africa. These are supposed to be the same with the Nubians, or Ethiopians on the south or west of Egypt. They were famed archers, and assisted Pharaoh-necho against the Chaldeans; but soon after, by the ravage of their country, paid dear for their alliance with him. Jer. xli. 9. Ezek. xxx. 5. The gospel was preached here very early by some of the Jews. Isa. lxvi. 19; but in Nubia, no vestige of Christianity is at present to be met with.

LUHITH; a town in the land of Moab, probably built on a hill, between Ar and Zoar, and certainly ravaged by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Isa. xv. 5. Jer. xlviii. 5.

LUKE, or LUCAS, the Evangelist; a native of Antioch in Syria. He was by profession a physician. Whether he was a Jew or gentile, or whether he was the same as Lucius, the kinsman of Paul, Rom. xvi. 21; or whether he was converted by Paul at Antioch, or whether Paul at first met with him at Troas, we know not. His mention of himself as Paul's companion, begins at Troas; and after that, he often speaks of himself as travelling with him. Acts xvi. &c. Compare Col. iv. 14. Philemon 23. 2 Tim. iv. 11. Luke wrote the history of Christ's life, and the history of the Acts of the Apostles, and dedicated them both to one Theophilus, who it seems was one of his pious friends. In his history of Christ he relates many circumstances of his birth and private life, and of his harbinger, John the Baptist, which are not mentioned by Matthew and Mark, who are generally, though uncertainly, thought to have composed their gospels before he wrote his. He also records a variety of incidents and parables of Jesus' public life, omitted by them. Nor is this order always the same with theirs; the reason of which is, either that Jesus repeated, or reacted similar things, on different occasions; or that the Holy Ghost in these histories, does not intend to inform us of the order, but of the facts that were really done. In his Acts of the Apostles, Luke principally gives us the history of Paul, whom he so much attended. The New Testament has no purer Greek than the language of Luke; which is admirably adapted to history.

LUKE-WARM; neither cold nor hot. The professed Christians of Laodicea are so called, because they neither wholly disregarded Christ and his cause, nor were they zealous in loving him, and promoting his honour; and so were loathsome to him. Rev. iii. 16.

LUMP; a piece of clay, dough, or bunch of figs. 2 Kings xx. 7. To it are likened, (1.) All mankind, who have all the same earthly and sinful nature. Rom. ix. 21. (2.) The Jews descending from holy parents. Rom. xi. 16. (3.) A particular congregation or church. 1 Cor. v. 6.

LUNATIC; persons affected with a mental disease, divided into melancholy, madness, and raving. The diseased are often worst at the new and full moon. Perhaps Satan rendered the persons he possessed, worst at these times, that the moon might be reckoned the cause of the malady. Our Saviour healed divers lunatics. Matt. iv. 24. and xvii. 5.

LURK; to hide one's self. Wicked men lurk to do mischief, when they use secret and crafty methods to oppress and ruin the righteous, poor, or innocent. Prov. i. 11. Psal. x. 8.

LUST; earnestly to desire. Dent. xii. 15. The Spirit lusteth against the flesh, and the flesh against the Spirit. The Holy Ghost, and his grace implanted in the saints, earnestly oppose and desire the ruin of our indwelling corruption; and indwelling sin earnestly opposes every inclination proceeding from them. Corruption of nature is called lust, as it strongly inclines us to evil. James i. 14, 15. 2 Pet. i. 4. Rom. vii. 7. This general lust is distinguished into the lust of the flesh, such as, unclean desire of carnal pleasure, intemperate desire of liquor or food. Gal. v. 17. 1 Pet. ii. 11. 2 Pet. ii. 10. Psal. lxxviii. 18; and the lusts of the mind, such as pride, covetousness, unbelief, attachment to the law of works. Eph. ii. 3. 1 Pet. iv. 2. These lusts are ungodly, unlike God, and tending to dishonour him, Jude 18; are devilish, of Satan's implantation, instigated by him, and rendering men like him, John viii. 44; are warring against the Holy Ghost and his grace, and even among themselves, James iv. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 11; are deceitful lusts, imposing on men, and making them to deceive others, Eph. iv. 22; are insatiable, as the more a man fulfils them, they require the more, Isa. lvii. 10. Eccl. i. 8; are worldly, as they reign in worldly men, and relate to the things of the world, Tit. ii. 12; are former lusts to the saints, as they have begun to mortify them. 1 Pet. i. 14. They are hurtful, as they pierce men through with many sorrows, outrageously burn in them, waste their constitutions, and drown them in perdition. 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10. Rom. i. 27.

LUZ. The most ancient Luz was called ΒΕΤΛΗΓ; but a Canaanitish inhabitant of it, being saved alive for discovering to the Hebrews a secret entrance into the city, he and his family retired into the land of the Hittites, and built another city called Luz. Whether this was the Luz near Shechem, or the Loussa or Lysa in Arabia, the same perhaps as Lasha, where the Canaanites had their south-east border, and which seems to have stood near the south point of the Dead sea, cannot now be ascertained. Judg. i. 25, 26. Gen. x. 19.

LYBIA. See LIBYA.

LY-CA-O-NI-A; a province of Lesser Asia, having Cappadocia on the east, Galatia on the north, Phrygia on the west, and Pisidia on the south. Lystra, Derbe, and Iconium, were cities of this province. They seem to have had a corrupt Greek for their language. Christian churches were planted here by PAUL and BARNABAS, which continued of some note, till the country was over-run by the Saracens. Acts xiv. 6, 11, 18.

LYCIA; a province of Lesser Asia, having Caria on the west, the Mediterranean sea northward of Syria, on the south, and Pamphylia on the north-east. It anciently contained about twenty-three cities, and several other large towns; the chief were Telmessus, Patara, Myra, Olympus, and Phaselis. The Lycians were a colony of the Cretians, and were famed for equity in more ancient times; but about sixty years before our Saviour's birth, many of them on the sea-coast exercised piracy. Acts xxvii. 5.

LYD'DA, or LOD, was built by Shamed the son of Elpaal, and stood about fourteen miles north-east from Joppa, and thirty-two westward from Jerusalem. It belonged to the Ephraimites; but after the Chaldean captivity, the Benjamites inhabited it. 1 Chron. viii. 12. Neh. xi. 35. In the time of the Macabees, the country of Lydda was taken from Samaria, and added to Judea. At Lydda, Peter miraculously healed Æneas of a palsy, which had for eight years confined him to his bed; this was a blessed means of turning many to the Christian faith. Here a church continued till the Saracens ruined it. There was a college of the Jews at Lydda, which produced many celebrated doctors.

LYD'I-A; (1.) A woman who was a native of Thyatira, but a seller of purple-dye, or purple-silks, in Philippi. Whether she was a Jewess, or gentile, we know not; but she and her family, being converted to, and baptized in the Christian faith, Paul, upon her entreaty, lodged in her house. Acts xvi. 14, 15, 40. (2.) A country in Asia, and another, in Africa. See LUD.

LYSTRA; a city of Lycaonia; but some think it rather pertained to Isauria. Here Timothy was born; here Paul and Barnabas healed a man who had been lame from his birth, and were taken for Mercury and Jupiter; here Paul some years after confirmed the Christians. Acts xiv. 6, 18. and xvi. 1.

M.

MA-A-CH'AH, the son of Nahor, by his concubine Reumah. Gen. xxii. 24. Some will have him the father of Makæti in Arabia the Happy, and imagine the city of Maca near the Straits of Ormus on the east, or Mocha on the south coast, may have been called by his name. Probably he was the father of the Maachathites, who inhabited a small tract on the east of the springs of Jordan, called Maachah, Maachathi, or Bethmaachah, as this country was not far distant from Nahor's country of Padan-aram, and hereabouts the rest of Nahor's posterity dwelt. It was perhaps from regard to kindred that the Hebrews spared the Maachathites and Geshurites. Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xii. 5. As the Maachathites assisted the Ammonites against David, he no doubt subdued their country. 2 Sam. x. 8, 9. (2.) Maachah, or Michaiah: she is called the daughter of Abishalom, and of Uriel, which, perhaps, were but different names for the same person: or she might be the daughter of Uriel, who married Tamar the daughter of Absalom. She was the wife of Rehoboam, and grandmother of king Asa. As she was a noted idolater; and perhaps debased herself to be the priestess of the obscene idol Priapus, Asa stripped her of her authority, broke to pieces her idol, stamped it under foot, and burnt it at the brook Kidron. 1 Kings xv. 2. 2 Chron. xiii. 2. and xv. 16.

MA-A'LECH AC-RAB'BIM; i. e. the ascent of Acrabbim; so called for the multitude of serpents and scorpions that frequented that place. Acrabbim is probably the same as Acrabatene in the land of Edom, which appears to have been a part of Mount Hor, and is now called Accaba, which hangs over Elath, and was the black mountain of Ptolemy. Over this mountain there is a steep rugged path. Numb. xxxiv. 4. Josh. xv. 3.

MA-CE-DO'NI-A; a large country on the north-east of GREECE, anciently called Æmathia, from one of its kings. It had the mountains Scodrus and Hæmus, on the north and north-east; the Egean sea, or Archipelago, with part of Thrace on the east; Thessaly on the south, Epirus on the south-west, and Albania on the west. It was peopled by a vast number of tribes, which were mostly descended from Chittim, the son of Javan. The monarchy of the Macedonians had stood about 400 years, when king Philip added Thessaly, with part of Epirus and Albania, to his territories. His son Alexander, it is said, subdued one hundred and fifty nations. It is certain that he made himself master of Greece, of the Persian empire, and of part of India. His empire was quickly broken to pieces; and Macedonia, after having continued a kingdom about six hundred and forty-six years, fell into the hands of the Romans, A. M. 3856. When the Roman empire was divided, Macedonia fell to the share of the emperor of the east. After it had continued subject to the Romans almost 1600 years, it fell under the power of the Ottoman Turks, who are the present masters of it. Some of its principal cities were Thessalonica, Amphipolis, Philippi, Berea, Pella, &c. A vision directed Paul to preach the gospel in this country; he did it with great success; many believed, and turned to the Lord. The Macedonian Christians were very charitable to the poor saints at Jerusalem, and liberally supplied the necessities of the apostle Paul. They also zealously dedicated themselves to the service of Christ. Acts xvi. 9-40. and xxvii. 1-14. 2 Cor. viii. 1-5. and xi. 8, 9. Notwithstanding the ravages of the Goths, Bulgars, and others, and the terrible oppression of the Ottoman Turks, Christianity, though its members are much oppressed, remains here to this day.

MA'CHIR, the son of Manassah, grandson of Joseph, and chief of the family of the Machirites. His sons were Gilead, Peresh, and Shereah; he had also a daughter married to one Hezron of the tribe of Judah, who bore Segub the father of Jair, who had twenty-three cities in the land of Gilead, and took Geshuri, Aram, &c. from the ancient inhabitants. Numb. xxvi. 29. 1 Chron. vii. 16. and ii. 21, 22. Not to Machir himself, but to his seed, did Moses give the land of Gilead. Numb. xxxii. 40. Some of them appear to have held commissions in the Hebrew army, under DEBORAH and Barak. Judg. v. 14.

MACH-PELAH, where Abraham and several of his family were buried in a cave, was near HEBRON. Gen. xxiii. xxv. 9. xlix. 31. and i. 13.

MAD; (1.) Destitute of reason. David feigned himself mad at the court of Achish. 1 Sam. xxi. 13, 14. 1 Cor. xiv. 23. (2.) Furious and outrageous in persecuting men; so Paul was exceedingly mad against the Christians. Acts xxvi. 11. (3.) Exceedingly distressed and perplexed, that one knows not what he does, or what to do; so the terrors or judgments of God, render men mad or distracted. Dent. xxviii. 34. Isa. xlv. 25. Psal. lxxxviii. 15. (4.) Outrageously violent in desire or action, notwithstanding strong reasons to the contrary; so the Chaldeans were mad on their idols and vanities. Jer. i. 18. False teachers are mad; they foolishly declare falsehoods of their own invention, instead of the truths of God, and at last God's judgments demonstrate the folly and falsehood of what they have said; and men reckon them to have been out of their wits. Hos. ix. 7. He that deceiveth his neighbour in sport, is like a madman, casting firebrands, arrows, and death. Contrary to reason, he spreads hurt, and even everlasting destruction, all around him. Prov. xxvi. 18.

MA-DA'I, the third son of Japheth. Gen.

x. 2. Some suppose him to be the father of the Macedonians, and observe that Æmæthia, the ancient name of Macedonia, is the same as Al or Aia Madia, the isle, country, or land of Madai. In Macedonia there was an ancient king called Medus, or Madai; and near to it was a tribe called Mædi, or Madi. The name of Media they derive from Medea a famed sorceress that lived in Colchis, near the north-west corner of it, about the time of Asa. But as Macedonia is too remote for a son of Japheth to have travelled to, and as Media both in name and situation answers so well for Madia, he was most probably the father of the Medes. Media, now called Aiderbeitzan, is a mountainous country on the south-west of the Caspian sea, east of Armenia, north of Persia, and west of Parthia and Hyrkania. Its principal cities, in ancient times, were Ecbatan, Rages, &c. The Medes were subdued by Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria: and Shalmaneser carried his Jewish and Syrian captives into Media. As the Medes were excellent warriors, part of them of the city or country of Kir, assisted Sennacherib in his invasion of Judea. Isa. xxii. 6. After Sennacherib's army was destroyed at Jerusalem, the Medes shook off the Assyrian yoke. Arbaces seems to have begun the work. About the twentieth year of Hezekiah, and A. M. 3298, or perhaps three years sooner, Dejoces, or Arphaxad, by fair means got himself settled on the throne. After building Ecbatan, he invaded Assyria; but Esarhaddon gave him a terrible defeat in the plain of Ragau. His son Phraortes, whom some think Arphaxad, succeeded him, A. M. 3348. He subdued the neighbouring nations of Upper Asia, and invaded Assyria: but was slain at the siege of Nineveh. Cyaxares his son succeeded him, A. M. 3370. He conquered Persia; and to avenge his father's death, and the ruin of Ecbatan the capital of Media, he invaded Assyria, and laid siege to Nineveh. An invasion of the Tartars under Madyes, or Oguz-kan, diverted him: they remained twenty-eight years in Media. After the Medes had massacred the Tartars, and a peace had been made with the Lydians, who in a war of five years attempted to revenge the murder of the Tartars, Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar joined their forces, and besieged Nineveh; took and razed it, about A. M. 3403: Nebuchadnezzar then marched against and reduced Hollow-Syria, Judea, and most of Phœnicia: Cyaxares reduced Armenia, Pontus, and Cappadocia; and he and Nebuchadnezzar conquered Persia. About A. M. 3409, Astyages, or Ahasuerus his son, succeeded him: his sister Amytis was the wife of Nebuchadnezzar; his daughter Nitocris was married to Evil-merodach the son of Nebuchadnezzar, and Mandane to Cambyses the father of Cyrus. His son Cyaxares, or Darius, succeeded him, A. M. 3444. After a war of twenty years, and terrible murder of the people, he, assisted by Cyrus his son-in-law and nephew, made himself master of Babylon and the whole empire of Chaldea. Isa. xxi. 2. and xiv. 17, 18. Jer. li. 11, 27, 28. Dan. v. 31. vi. and ix. 1. Cyrus, by his wife, fell heir to the Median kingdom, and united it with that of Persia, A. M. 3470, or 3468.

MAD-MAN'NAH, or MAD'MEN; a city of Judah near their west border, not far from Ziklag, and inhabited by the posterity of Shaaaph, was deserted for fear of the invading Assyrians. Josh. xv. 31. 1 Chron. ii. 49. Isa. x. 31.

MAG-DALA. See DALMANUTHA.

MAGICIANS. See DIVINATION.

MAGISTRATES; civil rulers; particularly such as rule over particular cities. Judg. xviii. 7. Ezra vii. 25.

MAGNIFY; to make great, or to declare to be great. God magnifies his own mercy, or name, when, by the fulfilment or powerful application of his word, he discovers the unbounded nature of his mercy, and other perfections. Gen. xix. 19. Acts. xix. 7. He magnifies his word above all his name, when he clearly discovers his mercy and faithfulness contained and pledged in it. Psal. cxxxviii. 2. Jesus magnified the law, and made it honourable; his subjection to it, as he was the great Law-giver, highly demonstrated the honour and immutable obligation of it: and he rendered to it an infinitely more valuable obedience than ever it could have received of men. Isa. xlii. 21. God magnifies men, when he renders them honourable, wealthy, or powerful, Josh. iii. 7. and iv. 4. 1 Chron. xxix. 15. 2 Chron. xxxii. 23; or even when, by his afflicting them, he shews that he takes notice of them. Job vii. 17. Men magnify God, or his works, when they publish and declare his greatness and glory. Psal. xxxiv. 2. Job xxxvi. 24. Men magnify themselves, when they boast of their power and wealth, and behave arrogantly to others. Lam. i. 9.

MA'GOG. See Gog.

MA-HA-NA'IM; a city on the east of Jordan, given by the tribe of Gad to the Levites of Merari's family. Josh. xxi. 38. It received its name from Jacob's seeing near the spot two camps of angels. Gen. xxxii. 1, 2. Here Ishbosheth fixed his residence during his short reign. 2 Sam. ii. 9. Hither David retired from the fury of Absalom; and near to it his army defeated the troops of that usurper. 2 Sam. xvii. and xviii.

MA-HAN-EH-DAN; i. e. the camp of Dan; a place near Kirjath-jearim, where the six hundred Danites encamped in their way to Laiash. Judg. xviii. 12.

MAID; (1.) A young woman, particularly one in service. 2 Kings v. 4. Gen. xvi. 2. (2.) A virgin, as young women generally are, or ought to be. Deut. xxii. 13. Judg. xix. 24.

MAJESTY; the royal greatness of God, or men, which commands reverence and awe. Jude 25. Esth. i. 4.

MAIMED; properly signifies such as want members of their body, Matt. xviii. 8: but the maimed, whom Christ healed, appear to be such as had legs, but by the palsy or otherwise, had lost the use of them; for we never read of his giving people new members. Matt. xv. 30.

MAINTAIN. See UPHOLD.

MAKE; (1.) To cause a thing to be that did not before exist; so God at first made all things. Gen. i. 31. (2.) To put persons or things into such a form, office, or condition, as they had not before. Isa. xlv. 9. God is our Makers. Makers or Creators: by joint operation, the Three Divine Persons give us our being and condition as they see meet. Isa. liv. 5. God makes persons of such an office, when he calls them to, and qualifies them for it. Matt. iv. 19. Acts xxvi. 16. In sickness, God makes the bed of him who wisely considers the case of the poor; by mitigating and delivering from trouble, he, as it were, refreshes and makes his bed easy to him. 1st sal. xlii. 3. The Word was made flesh, not by any change of the Son of God's divine nature into flesh, or manhood, but by his assuming a manhood into personal union with his divine nature. John i. 14. Water was made wine, by turning the substance of the one into the other. John ii. 9.

MAK'KE-DAH; a city of the tribe of Judah, about two miles east from Libnah, and ten or fourteen west of Jerusalem. Near this place Joshua defeated and hanged Adonizedeck, and his four allied kings; he then destroyed the place, and marched westward to Libnah. Josh. x. 10—23.

MAKTESH; a street in Jerusalem; whether that of the valley of Shiloah, which almost surrounded the temple, and was shaped somewhat like a mortar: or that of the Cheesemongers, between the hills of Acra and Zion; or any other street of the city where they used mortars for bruising the spice which they sold, cannot be determined. The merchants that dwelt in it had reason to howl, when, by the Chaldean invasion, their trade was stopped, and their shops rifled. Zeph. i. 11.

MALA-CHI; the twelfth of the lesser prophets. It has been foolishly pretended that he was Zerubbabel, Ezra, Mordecai, or Nehemiah; but none of these are ever called prophets; nor had they any cause to change their name: nor is it more certain, that he was of the tribe of Zebulun, and a native of the city of Sephoris, and died young. It is plain that he prophesied after the building of the second temple; probably about A. M. 3607, about sixteen years after the death of Nehemiah. After mentioning the distinguished favours of God to Jacob and his seed, above what had been shewn to Esau, whose land was by this time consigned to barrenness and drought, he reproves the Jews for their ungrateful and unbecoming deportment towards their God; hints that the Gentiles should be called to the church in their room; charges the Jews with profanation and weariness of the worship of God, and with offering him sacrifices, blemished, and corrupt. Chap. i. He reprehends the priests' neglect of instructing the people; reproves their marriage of strange wives, and their frequent and groundless divorces. Chap. ii. After informing them of the Messiah's near approach, to try and refine them, he rebukes the Jews for their sacrilege and blasphemy, and declares the Lord's distinguished regard for such as feared him, and, in a time of general corruption, walked in his way. Chap. iii. He concludes with a prediction of terrible judgments on such Jews, and others, who should reject the Messiah, and of signal mercy to such as should believe on him; and refers to John the Baptist's mission, to prepare the Jewish nation to receive the Messiah. Chap. iv.

MALES. The male animals offered in sacrifice, figured out the superior dignity, strength, and usefulness of our Redeemer. Thrice in the year, at the passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles, all the Hebrew males able to travel were to attend at the tabernacle or temple, each with his gifts.

Did this prefigure the gathering of the elect to Christ, in the apostolic and millennial ages, and of all the saints to him at the last day? Exod. xxiii. 17. None but the males of Aaron's family were allowed to eat of the sin-offerings or trespass-offerings. Lev. vi. 18, 29.

MALICE; deep-rooted and violent hatred, disposing us to render evil for good. Wicked men are filled with, and live in it. Rom. i. 29. Tit. iii. 3. It is exceedingly unbecoming in the saints, and unfits them for fellowship with Christ at his table, or otherwise. 1 Pet. ii. 1. 1 Cor. v. 8. We ought to be children in malice, quite unacquainted with it; but men in understanding, having a large measure of solid knowledge. 1 Cor. xiv. 20.

MALIGNITY; a perverse temper of mind, disposing its subject to delight in, and endeavour by all means to effect, the destruction of others; doing mischief for mischief's sake. Rom. i. 29.

MALLOWS; a kind of plant whose flower consists of one leaf, and is very open at the top, and divided into several segments. From the bottom of the flower there arises a tube shaped like a pyramid; and from the cup arises a pistil, which is fixed like a nail to the lower part of the flower: this ripens into a flat round fruit, which contains the seed, which is usually formed as a kidney. There are about fifty or sixty kinds of mallows. Mallows are very useful in medicine. The leaves are useful in softening fomentations, and cataplasms. A decoction of the roots is a good drink in pleurisies, peripneumonies, gravel, inflammation of the kidneys, and in stranguries, and all kinds of suppressions of the urine. Plutarch and Horace represent mallows as eaten for food by the poor; but perhaps the malluchim, are some kind of bramble, whose tops and leaves are eaten by poor people, and are still called mallechia by the Moors. Job xxx. 4.

MAMMON; a Syriac word, signifying multitude, or worldly riches. No man can serve God and mammon; none can at the same time love and serve God with his heart; while his great aim and desire is to heap up, enjoy, and retain worldly wealth. Matt. vi. 24. Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when these fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations: i. e. spend worldly riches, which so many get unjustly, and use as instruments of dishonesty and wickedness, in a pious and charitable manner, that the poor saints, benefitted by them, may be stirred up to pray for you; and that when your riches are no more retained by you, ye may obtain the gracious reward of your charity in heaven; and these poor saints, whom you have supported, may with pleasure welcome you into the celestial abodes. Luke xvi. 13.

MAMRE; the brother of Aner and Eshcol; these Amorites assisted Abraham against Chedorlaomer. Gen. xiv. Mamre communicated his name to a plain near Hebron, where he lived. Some think, that instead of the plain of Mamre, we should read the oak of Mamre. Sozomen, the ecclesiastical historian, says, that this oak was standing about three hundred years after our Saviour's death, about six miles from Hebron, and was much honoured by pilgrimages to it, and annual feasts at it; he adds, that near it was Abraham's well, much resorted to by heathens and Christians, for the purposes of devotion or trade. Gen. xiii. 18. and xxiii. 17.

MAN, or MANKIND. In man, the animal and angelic natures are, as it were, conjoined. An animal body is endowed with a rational and immortal soul. At first, man was created male and female, after the image of God, in knowledge, righteousness, and holiness, with dominion over the creatures; and quickly after, they were admitted into a federal relation with God. Adam, their common father, and whom, had they been all in being, they could not have but centered in by their choice, was divinely constituted their covenant-head. Though he had sufficient strength to have fulfilled the condition of perfect obedience, and so for ever secured his and their eternal happiness, he was so far from doing it, that, on the first temptation, he broke the covenant, violating the express law thereof relative to the forbidden fruit. His disobedience involved himself, and all his natural offspring, in a sinful and miserable state. The offence he committed in their name, being chargeable and justly charged on them, in the very commencement of their relation to him, the curse, condemning to spiritual death, as well as temporal and eternal, prevents God from infusing into their souls, in the creation thereof, any sanctity of nature, and lays them under the power of sin. Hence every man is shapen in iniquity, and conceived in sin. Gen. i—iii. Rom. v. 12—19. Eph. ii. 1—3. Job xiv. 4. John iii. 6. Psal. li. 5. In this fallen state, every imagination of men's hearts is only evil from their youth, and that continually. They are transgressors from the womb, and go astray, speaking lies; their heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, and their carnal mind enmity against God; out of their corrupt heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies; they are filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness, envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; they are whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despisers, proud, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful; they are lovers of themselves, boasters, blasphemers, unthankful, unholy, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of every thing good, traitors, heady, high minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another. No man, in his natural state, is righteous, no not one. There is none that understandeth and seeketh after God; they are altogether corrupt and abominable, drinking up iniquity as the ox drinketh up the water; with their tongues they use deceit; their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness; their feet are swift to shed blood; destruction and misery are in all their ways, and the way of peace have they not known: there is no fear of God before their eyes. Gen. vi. 5. and viii. 21. Jer. xvii. 9. Rom. viii. 7. Matt. xv. 9. Rom. i. 29—31. 2 Tim. iii. 2—4. Tit. iii. 3. Psal. xiv. Rom. iii. 9—18. By reason of sin, men are rendered miserable; the frame of this lower world is much altered; the fields are blasted with the curse; the air infected with pestilential vapours; winds and seas frequently swallow up the guilty. Men are by nature destitute of any happy interest in, or fellowship with God; they are under his wrath and curse; they are exposed to famine, war, pestilence, poverty, reproach, sickness, disappointment, toil, and to judicial blindness of mind, hardness of heart, vile affections, seariness and horror of conscience, a reprobate sense, and slavery of Satan; and at the end to be in death driven away in their wickedness, and to be in hell for ever tormented; punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power. Gen. iii. 18, 19. Eph. ii. 12. Psal. v. 4, 5. and vii. 10—16. Dent. xxvii. 16—68. 2 Cor. iv. 4. 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12. Rom. i. 26, 28. Prov. xiv. 22. Rev. xiv. 10, 11. 2 Thess. i. 8, 9.

Man being utterly unconcerned and unable to recover himself from this sinful and miserable state, our sin and misery had eternally continued and increased, had not a three-one God graciously provided for our relief. The electing and covenanting love of the Father, the mediation of the Son, in his person, office, and state, and the Spirit's almighty application to the soul, of the blessings his mediation purchases and procures, are the means of our redemption. Union with Jesus Christ as our righteousness and strength; justification of our persons, through his obedience and suffering imputed to us; adoption into his family; regeneration, and sanctification, by which we are renewed after his image in heart and life, comfort in his friendship and fulness, and endless felicity in his immediate presence, are the summary blessings therein contained. By faith in Christ, as offered in the gospel, we must receive them; by repentance, and new obedience to all the precepts of his law, and by walking with him in all the ordinances of his grace, must we mark our gratitude to God, for his kindness. Hos. xiii. 9. Rom. iii. and v. Eph. i—iii. Gal. iii. and iv. Tit. iii. 2—6. Rom. vi. and xii—xv. Eph. iv—vi. Matt. v. 48. and xxviii. 20.

Notwithstanding this prepared and published redemption, the wickedness of man has still been great in the earth. As men multiplied, their immoralities increased; Cain and his seed introduced a deluge of profaneness, and by intermarriages with them, the posterity of Seth were corrupted. God, who has generally severely punished the first introducers of wickedness, was provoked to drown all the inhabitants of the world, except Noah and seven other persons. Not long after the flood, those preserved from it began to re-people the earth, and wickedness revived in all the former horrors; they proudly conspired against the Lord, to establish their own fame, and prevent their dispersion. Scattered by the just vengeance of Heaven, they generally cast off all proper fear and reverence of God. For nearly two thousand years, the true worship of God, or true religion, was almost wholly confined to the family of Abraham; and for about 1520 years, to the Hebrew part of it. Whilst the rest of the world were plunged in the grossest ignorance, the most absurd superstition, and the vilest idolatry, and lived in the most unnatural, lust, oppression, and murder, how often did the Hebrews madly apostatize from their Maker, and act as the heathen! The resurrection of our Saviour issued in the spread of the gospel; multitudes both of Jews and gentiles, especially of the latter, were turned to the Lord. These sanctified ones, their malicious brethren of mankind, for almost three hundred years, barbarously persecuted and murdered. Delivered from heathen persecution, the professed Christians indulged themselves in ignorance, pride, superstition, contention, idolatry; and many of them embraced the Arian, or other heresies, and furiously persecuted and murdered the adherents to the truth.

During the 1200 years of Antichrist's reign, most of the nominal Christians have or shall scarcely differ from heathens in ignorance, superstition, idolatry, and profaneness. At present, of thirty parts of mankind, about nineteen are merely heathens, without Christ, strangers to the covenants of promise, without God, and without hope in the world. About five parts are adherents to the abominable delusions of Mahomet; and only one-sixth of the inhabitants of the earth even bear the Christian name. Of this sixth part of mankind, comprehending the Eastern Christians of various denominations, and the Papists and Protestants in Europe and America, it is hard to say if the one hundredth part gives any proper evidence of possessing the true knowledge and fear of God, as in Christ reconciling the world to himself. Nor is God's leaving such multitudes to walk after their own lusts more inconsistent with his goodness, than his suffering the angels that fell to continue unredeemed. Rom. ix. It is remarkable, that as God erected this world chiefly for the execution of his plan of redemption, he has always disposed of men as best served to answer the designs of it. When the multitude of the wicked threatened to bury all knowledge of the redemption-scheme, he drowned them by a general flood; when they afterwards threatened the same, he established the knowledge thereof in the one family of Jacob, and by miracles and laws rendered it almost impossible for them to forget it. By most of the typical honours beginning to decay as soon as they arrived at their glory, he taught them to expect the things thereby typified. By means of the Assyrian, Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires, which Satan expected to be bulwarks of wickedness, he spread the Jews and part of the Bible among the gentiles, and marvellously prepared them for the more peaceable spread of the gospel.

No government, laws, covenants, ties of nature, or gratitude, have been able to check the wickedness of men. Governments, and punishments of different forms, have been tried for the prevention of particular kinds of wickedness; but all has been in vain, while the hearts of men continued unrenewed. Nor have the external instructions of God or men repressed the torrent of crimes, though they have sometimes occasioned a change in their form. By horrible and desolating wars, the most of the extensive kingdoms, the Egyptian, Assyrian, Lydian, Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, Roman, Saracen, Turkish, Tartar, German, Spanish, French, and other kingdoms or empires, have been established, and most have already shared of murder and slavery in their turn. And, shocking to think, the most noted murderers and robbers of mankind, as Sesostrius, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, Cæsar, Pompey, Louis XIV. of France, and multitudes of others, have been extolled as persons of distinguished merit.

Passing the various distinctions of men founded on their different degrees of wealth or authority, their different endowments of mind or behaviour in life, their different occupations, &c. it is proper to observe, that before God, they stand distinguished into the righteous and the wicked, saints and sinners. The wicked are such as are still in their natural state, under the law as a broken covenant, under the dominion of sin, and heirs of wrath; though in respect of their outward appearance, they may be under the dispensation of the gospel. The righteous are such, as united to Jesus, are reinstated in the favour of God, delivered from the reign of sin, heirs of salvation, and are by sanctification training up to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Of the five words used by the Hebrews to signify m.n., ADAM denotes him earthly; ISH denotes him strong and courageous; GERER denotes strength and prevailing excellency; ENOSH represents him frail, diseased, and wretched; and METH denotes his mortality, or rather sociality. When Adam and Ish are joined in contrast, Adam denotes a mean man, and Ish a rich or honourable one. Psal. xlix. 2. Isa. ii. 9. And that man is often put for males of the human kind, as for a son, Gen. iv. 1. Jer. xxxvii. 17, 18; a husband, 1 Cor. xi. 3; a magistrate. By man shall his blood be shed. Gen. ix. 6. Mankind signifies males. Lev. xviii. 22. and xx. 13. 1 Cor. vi. 9. 1 Tim. i. 10. God is often compared to a man; to denote his excellency, wisdom, prudence, compassion, and almost every thing about men, their members, adjuncts, relations, acts, &c. are constituted emblems of his properties, relations, and works. He is a man of war; he is infinite in strength and courage, and he manages all the wars in the world, and the conflicts in the hearts of his people, to the honour of himself. Exod. xv. 3. Christ is called a man; he often appeared to the Old Testament saints in form of a man; in the fulness of time he assumed, and for ever retains our nature; and the various members, adjuncts, relations, and acts of men, are used in scripture to represent his excellencies, office, and conduct. Gen. xxxii. 24. Josh. v. 13. He is the man of God's right hand; the person whom God has installed in his mediatorial office with his solemn oath, and whom he peculiarly upholds and assists, and whom he has raised up to the most dignified station. Psal. lxxx. 17. He is the man among the myrtle-trees, as he walks and acts among his people. Zech. i. 10.

Angels are called men, because they often appeared in the form of men. Gen. xix. Men of God are prophets, or ministers, if not also saints, holy as God is holy, and devoted to the service of God. Deut. xxxiii. 1. 1 Tim. vi. 11. 2 Tim. iii. 17. Antichrist is called a man of sin. Most of the popes were monsters of whoredom, deceit, profaneness, and the like. The papal system consists of sinful and erroneous tenets, sinful and filthy practices of superstition and idolatry, and sinful offices, and wicked officers; and, in fine, its whole tendency is to promote wickedness. 2 Thess. ii. 3. A man of the earth, is either one that cultivates the earth, a husbandman, Gen. ix. 20; or men that have carnal principles reigning in them, and choose earthly things for their chief portion. Psal. x. 18. A man or son of Belial, is one extremely wicked and worthless, a true child of the devil. 1 Kings xxi. 13. A natural man, is one, who, whatever way his faculties or life may be improved, has no special and saving grace; and a spiritual man, is one renewed by the Holy Ghost dwelling in him, and who is disposed to perceive and relish spiritual things. 1 Cor. ii. 14, 15. The principle of grace in the soul, is a new, an inward and hidden man, consisting of various particular graces, answering to the various members of the human body; it secretly rules and acts in the soul, and conforms it to its own likeness. Eph. iv. 24. Rom. vii. 22. Inner or hidden man, may also denote the soul. Though our outward man perish, our inward man is renewed day by day. Though the body waste, and its health and strength decay, the soul and inward principles of grace are daily quickened and strengthened. 2 Cor. iv. 16. To come to a perfect man, to the stature of the fulness of Christ is to arrive at the full perfection of spiritual knowledge, holiness, and righteousness. Eph. iv. 13. The inward principle of corruption is called the old man: it consists of various lusts, which answer to the members of the human body; it craftily rules and reigns in men, and conforms them to itself; and as it very early, and always before grace in men, so in the saints, is in a decaying and dying condition. Col. iii. 10. Men know themselves to be but men, when they are made to feel and understand their own folly and weakness. Psal. ix. 20. To quit ourselves like men, is to act with the utmost courage and activity, natural or spiritual.

1 Sam. iv. 9. 1 Cor. xvi. 13. To speak as a man, or after the manner of men, is to draw a comparison or argument from the customs of men in their civil affairs. Gal. iii. 15. The gospel is not of, or after man; it is not of human invention, nor does it depend on human authority. Gal. i. 11. Christ makes of twain one new man, when he joins Jews and gentiles, formerly at variance, into one church, and in one way of spiritual worship. Eph. ii. 15. Men of one's secret, tabernacle, or peace, are familiar and intimate members of our family, or an apparent agreement or covenant with us. Job xix. 19. and xxxi. 31. Jer. xx. 10. The desire of a man is his kindness; he, if wise, desires the mercy and kindness of God; desires ability and opportunities for shewing kindness to others; and this disposition renders him agreeable and beloved. Prov. xix. 22.

WOMAN was formed last of all creatures, to be an assistant to man. Women's beauty, fond affection, weakness, and infirmities, ordinarily exceed those of men. Before the fall, the woman seems to have been more on a level of authority with the man; but to punish the introduction of sin by a woman, the sex was subjected to further degrees of inequality with their husband, and to manifold pains in the conception and bringing forth of children. Till the Messiah came, and restored all things, the ordinances of worship marked them with standing intimations of inferiority. To one of the seals of the new covenant they had no access. Nor had they any divine call to attend the three solemn feasts. Their natural infirmities brought on them a number of burdensome purifications. Lev. xii. and xv. With the Jews they were subjected to divorce; or to trial by the waters of cursing; and to stoning if they violated the marriage vow after betrothing; or if the tokens of their virginity were not found. Num. v. Deut. xxii. and xxiv. A priest's daughter was to be burnt if she was guilty of fornication; and a slave was scourged if she was guilty of it with her master. Lev. xxi. 9. and xix. 20—22. In the Christian church, women, have equal access as men to all the privileges of private members, but are not allowed to officiate as rulers, Col. iii. 11. Gal. iii. 28. 1 Cor. xiv. 34; they are required to have their heads covered in public worshipping assemblies. 1 Cor. xi; to study the utmost degree of modesty, and to shun all vain apparel, by the sinful use of which they have sometimes brought God's judgments on nations. 1 Pet. iii. 1—3. Isa. iii. 16—26. But perhaps in a way of triumph over Satan, the female converts to Christ are more numerous, and many of them more lively in their religion than men. In most nations, women are used as slaves, or rather as beasts, than companions. To preserve the chastity of their young women till they were lawfully admitted to their husbands, the Jews, and other eastern nations kept them shut up, if their circumstances allowed it; and the very name of virgin among the Hebrews, signifies shut up, and hidden; this made it so difficult for Amnon to defile his sister Tamar. 2 Sam. xiii. 2. Perhaps young women are called virgins in some texts, though they were not properly

so. Joel i. 8. To keep one's virgin, is to retain a daughter, or allow a young woman to continue unmarried, and in a state of virginity. 1 Cor. vii. 37. The true church, and her true members, are likened to women; to intimate their spiritual comeliness, tender affection to Christ, and to one another; the church's fruitfulness of saints, and the saints' fruitfulness in good works, together with the weakness of both, and their frequent exposure to trouble. Isa. iv. 6. Sol. Song i. 8. In the patriarchal age, this woman looked forth fresh as the morning; in the Mosaic age, she looked fair as the moon, with a multitude of changeable and moon-ruled ceremonies; and under the gospel, is clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners; and in every age, is far superior to every other society. Sol. Song vi. 10, 11. She is clothed with the unchanging sun, Jesus and his righteousness, and crowned with the star-like doctrines of the twelve apostles, and now has the moon of the world, and of Jewish ceremonies, under her feet; and by earnest prayer and patient endurance of persecution, she travelled till delivered by Constantine and after that was carried into a wilderness of distress. Rev. xii. She, and her true members, are likened to virgins, to mark their integrity and purity of profession, heart, and life, chaste affection to Christ, particularly their freedom from the whorish abominations of Antichrist, Sol. Song i. 3. and vi. 8. Psal. xlv. 14. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Rev. xiv. 4; and to mark Jesus' connexion with them in this character, the Jewish high-priest was only to marry a pure virgin. Lev. xxi. 13. Professors of Christianity in general, are called virgins, five wise and five foolish; because while they profess a pure religion, and lead a practice somewhat blameless, some wisely receive Christ into their heart, and others foolishly reject him, and are content with a mere profession. Matt. xxv. 1-10. The Jews, Chaldeans, and other nations, together with the Papists, are called women, to mark their care to set forth their own glory, their readiness to entice or be enticed into alliances, their numerous progeny, and their weakness when God punishes them. Ezek. xxiii. Zech. v. 7. Isa. xlvii. Rev. xvii. Nations or cities, especially if never subdued by the enemy, are called virgins. 2 Kings xix. 21. Isa. xxlii. 12. and xlvii. 1. Jer. xvi. 11. Lam. i. 15. Amos v. 2. The virtuous woman, Prov. xxxi. 10-31. may represent the saints. Persons weak, and unfit for government, are represented as women. Isa. iii. 12. Harlots are called strange women, and women whose heart is snares, and their hands as bands, to entice and retain men to uncleanness and ruin. Prov. ii. 16. Eccl. vii. 26.

MA-NAS'SEH, the eldest son of Joseph; but, as Jacob his grandfather had predicted, this tribe was less numerous and honoured than that of Ephraim, his younger brother. Gen. xli. 50, 51. and xlviii. Manasseh seems to have had two sons, Ashriel and Machir. When the Manassites came out of Egypt, their fighting men amounted only to 32,200, under the command of Gammaliel the son of Pedahzur; but in the wilderness they increased to 52,700. 1

Chron. vii. 14. Numb. i. 30, 31, 35. and xxviii. 34. They pitched in the camp of Ephraim, and marched next after that tribe. Num. ii. and x. Their spy to search the promised land, was Gaddi, the son of Susi; and their prince to divide it, was Hanniel, the son of Ephod. Num. xiii. 11. and xxiv. 23. The one half of this tribe received their inheritance on the east and north-east of the sea of Tiberias; the other half received their inheritance on the west of Jordan, on the north of the tribe of Ephraim. Num. xxxii. 33-42. Josh. xiv. 29-31. xvi. and xvii. Though Joshua advised the western Manassites to enlarge their territory, by expelling the Canaanites, yet they suffered them to remain in Bethshan, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megiddo. Judg. i. 27. Four of the Hebrew judges, Gideon, Abimelech, Jair, and Jephthah, together with Barzillai, and Elijah, the prophet, were of this tribe. Adnah, Joabab, Jedaiel, Michael, Joabab, Elihu, and Zilthai, valiant captains of this tribe, joined with David, as he retired from the host of the Philistines near Gilboah, and helped him against the Amalekites, who had smitten Ziklag. About 18,000 of the western Manassites, and many of the eastern, attended at his coronation, asking over Israel. 1 Chron. xii. 19-21, 31, 37. The whole tribe revolted from the family of David along with the other nine; but many of them in the reign of Asa, left their country, and dwelt in the kingdom of Judah, that they might enjoy the pure worship of God. 2 Chron. xv. 9. After the death of Pekah there seems to have been a civil war between this tribe and that of Ephraim. Isa. ix. 21. A part of the Manassites that remained in the land, joined in king Hezekiah's solemn passover, and their country was purged of idols by him and Josiah. 3 Chron. xxx. xxxi. and xxxiv. Part of this tribe returned to Canaan, and dwelt in Jerusalem, after the captivity. 1 Chron. ix. 8.

2. MA-NAS'SEH, the son of Hezekiah by his wife Hephzibah. At the age of twelve years, he succeeded his father in the kingdom of Judah, and reigned fifty-five years. He was impious to an uncommon degree. He rebuilt the high places which his father had destroyed: he re-established the worship of Baal, and planted groves in honour of his idols: he worshipped the sun, moon, and stars, and reared to them altars in the court of the temple: one of his idols he set up in the temple itself: he also burnt one of his sons as a sacrifice to Molech. He had familiar intercourse with devils, and practised sorcery and witchcraft. By causing his subjects to follow these impious courses, he rendered them more wicked than even the Canaanites had been. By murdering such as refused compliance, or who warned him of his danger, he made the streets of Jerusalem to run with innocent blood; and it is said, that he sawed the prophet Isaiah asunder with a wooden saw. About the twenty-second year of his reign, Esarhaddon, king of Assyria and Babylon, invaded his kingdom, routed his troops, and caught Manasseh himself hid among thorns, and carried him prisoner to Babylon. In his affliction, God gave him grace to repent of his wickedness. He was restored to his throne, perhaps by Saisduchin the successor of Esarhaddon. After his return to Judea, he abolished the vestiges of his former idolatry; but the high places were permitted to continue. He fortified Jerusalem, and added a kind of new city on the west side. He put garrisons into all the fenced cities of Judah. He died, A. M. 3361, and was buried in his own garden, and left his son Amon for his successor. A larger history of his life was written by Hozai, or the seers, but it is now lost. 2 Kings xxi. 2 Chron. xxxiii. God forgave him his sin with respect to the eternal punishment thereof; but the temporal punishment of the Jewish nation, for their compliance with it, was never forgiven. Jer. xv. 4.

MANDRAKES; a kind of the pentandria monogynia class of plants, the corolla of which consists of a single erect hollow petal, growing gradually wider from the base. A little beyond the middle, it is divided into five parts, somewhat formed in the manner of spears. The fruit is a large roundish berry, containing two cells, and a great number of seeds. The male mandrake has a long and thick root, which gradually diminishes towards the end, and is frequently divided into two, three, or more parts. From this root spring a number of leaves, narrow at the base, and obtuse at the end. These are about a foot in length, and five inches in breadth, and are of a dusky disagreeable green colour, and of a stinking smell. The female mandrake has long and narrower leaves, and is of a darker colour. It has been ignorantly imagined that mandrakes conciliate affection, or cure barrenness; but they are a soporific of considerable virtue; small doses of its bark have done good in hysteric disorders; but if used in large quantities, it brings on convulsions, and other mischievous symptoms. According to our English translation, Reuben having found mandrakes in the field, Rachel coveted them, and Leah, Reuben's mother, allowed her to have them at the rate of Jacob's sleeping with herself on the night which belonged to Rachel. But what the dudaim were, which Reuben found, whether mandrakes, jessamine, violets, lilies, pleasant flowers, mushrooms, or citron apples, we cannot determine. Dioscoride, Lemnius, and Augustine, affirm, that mandrakes have a sweet smell; but if so, these must have been different from ours. Some tell us, that though the leaves of the female mandrake have a very disagreeable, those of the male have a pleasant scent. It is said, that in the province of Pekin, in China, there is a kind of mandrakes so valuable, that a pound of its root is worth three pounds' weight of silver. It so powerfully restores sinking spirits, as to restore to vivacity and health such whose condition was otherwise reckoned desperate. To denote their comeliness, fragrance, and delightfulness to Christ, the saints, and their graces and good works, are likened to mandrakes, or dudaim. Sol. Song vii. 13.

MA'NEH; the fiftieth part of a talent. To constitute a maneh, it took a piece of fifteen shekels, another of twenty, and a third of twenty five, which are in all sixty;

but though it required sixty shekels to constitute a maneh in weight, it is said that it required but fifty to constitute one in reckoning of money. Ezek. xiv. 12. The mina, or pound, mentioned in the New Testament, consisted but of a hundred drams, or twenty-five shekels, or not much more; and there was a less mina of seventy-five drams, which was about nineteen shekels.

MANIFEST; to shew a thing clearly, and render it visible. Eccl. iii. 19. 1 Tim. iii. 16. The Son of God was manifest, when he appeared visibly in our nature. 1 John iii. 5. The apostles were manifest, when it fully appeared by their behaviour, doctrine, and success, that they were sent of God. 2 Cor. xi. 6. The saints and the wicked are manifest, when the difference between their characters and states, is clearly discovered. 1 John iii. 10. The manifestation of the Spirit, is either that which the Holy Ghost shews to men, the doctrines of the gospel, the love of God, and our interest in it, and the things of another world; or, his gifts and graces, whereby his power and residence in us are plainly evinced. 1 Cor. xii. 7. The manifestation of the sons of God, is the public display of their station and happiness, in their being openly acknowledged and honoured by Christ at the last day. Rom. viii. 19.

MANIFOLD; God's wisdom, mercy, and grace, are manifold; unbounded in their nature, shewed forth in a variety of ways, and numerous in their fruits. Eph. iii. 10. Neh. ix. 19. 1 Pet. iv. 10. Temptations and trials are manifold, when very numerous, and in many different forms, and from various sources. 1 Pet. i. 6. Transgressions are manifold, when many in number, and of many different forms, and in many various degrees of aggravation. Amos v. 12.

MANNA. There is even now a kind of manna produced in Poland, Calabria, Dauphine, Lebanon, and Arabia. That of Calabria, in Italy, is a juice proceeding from ash-trees about the dog-days; but that in Arabia is found on leaves of trees, or herbs, or even on the sand; but its quality is rather purgative than nourishing, and for that effect is now used in medicine. Besides the nourishing virtue of the manna that sustained the Hebrews in the desert, it was altogether miraculous on other accounts. It fell on six days of every week, not on the seventh: it fell in such prodigious quantities around the Hebrew camp, as to sustain almost three millions of men, women, and children. According to Scheuchzer, they consumed 94,466 bushels in a day, and 1,379,203,600 in forty years. It fell in double quantities on the sixth day, that there might be enough for the seventh. It fell round about their tents. It remained fresh all the seventh day, but at any other time bred worms, and stunk if kept over night. It constantly continued for forty years, and ceased as soon as the Hebrews had access to eat of the old corn of Canaan. Since these circumstances must be allowed to be miraculous, how foolish must it be to dispute the supernatural origin of the whole! When the small quantity of provision which the Hebrews had brought out of Egypt was spent, they outrageously exclaimed against Moses and Aaron, for bringing them into the desert. God, their miraculous guide, was highly displeased; but, for his name's sake, he promised and gave them this wonderful provision, and taught them how to gather and prepare it. It consisted of small grains, white as the hoar frost, and about the bigness of coriander seed. In the morning, it fell along with the dew; and when that was exhaled, the manna was ready for gathering. Every person capable was to gather it early, before the sun had waxed hot to melt it. When they had gathered it into one common heap, an omer was measured out for each eater, as his daily provision. This was bruised in a mortar, or ground in a mill, and then baked into bread, which was exceedingly wholesome, and suited to every appetite. To denote its divine origin, perhaps by the ministry of angels, and its excellency, it is called corn of heaven, and angels' food. Psal. lxxviii. 25, 26. When the Hebrews first saw it lie around their tents, they cried out Manna! i. e. What is this? for they wist not what it was; and from this outcry, as well as to indicate that it was bread prepared of God for them, it was called, manna. Notwithstanding the divine prohibition, some Hebrews reserved part of their share of it over night; it bred worms, probably of the weevil kind, and stank. Others went out to gather it on the Sabbath, but found none. Oftener than once, they despised and loathed this miraculous provision, and were punished with destruction by the flesh which they desired, and by the bite of fiery serpents. To commemorate the Hebrews living on omers or tenth deals of manna, one omer of it was put into a golden pot, and there preserved for many generations by the side of the ark; and the meat-offerings were adjusted by tenth deals, and the sacred shares by tenths or tithes. Exod. xvi. Num. xi. 15. and xxi.

Was not this manna a figure of Christ? Amidst our insolent rebellion, he is the free gift of God to us, when we are ready to be starved into eternal death. He comes from above; and in the camp of the visible church, he comes down in the dewy offers and ordinances of the gospel, early, daily and plentifully. However small and unknown to most, and even to saints, and however contemned by many that hear of him; yet what divinely prepared, mysterious, pure, glorious, sweet, wholesome, nutritive, all-sufficient, and suitable provision for souls! How necessary to retire from the hurry of this world, and early embrace him, before the wrath of God wax hot against us, and deprive us of the offers of him, and so give us up to judicial plagues! How liberally and constantly God distributes him to men! And with what care ought we daily to receive him; and the more so, as we draw near to the eternal Sabbath, when no more offers of him shall be had! As he was bruised and ground in the mortar and mill of his sufferings, and, as it were, baked in the oven of his Father's wrath; so we must receive him into a wounded conscience, and with a broken heart. As the honoured memorial of his coming down from heaven, the golden pot of gospel ordinances shall for ages contain his fulness for men, and the heavens shall contain his holy humanity. To such as receive him, he is food that never needs seasoning; and till they retire to the Canaan above, to feed on God's ancient love, shall he, as given in the gospel, be the sole support of our souls, never withdrawn, notwithstanding ten thousand provocations. But how dreadful the case of those who hoard up his gospel truth in vain speculation, and make it the savour of death unto death! how God curses outward enjoyments to such as despise him! how he gives them up to be stung by Satan, and by destructive judgments!—Christ, and his fulness, as enjoyed in the heavenly state, are hidden manna, quite unknown to carnal men, and but very darkly apprehended by saints here on earth. Rev. ii. 17.

MANNER; (1.) Custom; fashion; practice; behaviour. Ezek. xi. 12. 2 Cor. xv. 33. (2.) Way; method. 1 Kings xxii. 20. (3.) Sort; kind. Gen. xxv. 23. Matt. v. 11. and viii. 27. God spake unto the fathers under the Old Testament, in divers manners; not fully, and all at once, but by little and little, sometimes more and sometimes less clearly; and by the different means of angels, prophets, visions, dreams, voices from heaven, Urim and Thummim, &c. Heb. i. 1. God suffered the manners of the Hebrews in the desert; he patiently bore with their continued course of wickedness, their rebellion, murmuring, and unbelief, and did not destroy them. Acts xiii. 18. The Samaritans did not know the manner of the God of Israel; i. e. the true method of serving and worshipping him. 2 Kings xvii. 26, 27. Samuel shewed the Hebrews the manner of a king; not what he ought to be, but what the heathen kings around were, and what they might fear theirs would be. 1 Sam. viii. 9. To say, the manner of Ecrsheba lieth, was to swear by the idol there worshipped. Amos viii. 14.

MA-NO'AH. See SAMSON.

MANSIONS; fixed dwelling places: these are in heaven, as there the saints for ever reside in the most delightful and orderly manner. John xiv. 2.

MANSAYER. See MURDER.

MANTLE; a kind of cloak that hung loosely about one. Judg. iv. 18.

MANY; (1.) A great number. Judg. ix. 40. (2.) All men: thus many were made sinners by Adam's disobedience. Rom. v. 19. (3.) All the elect, Matt. xxvi. 28; and thus many are made righteous by Christ's obedience. Rom. v. 19. (4.) All the wicked. Matt. vii. 13. Thou shalt abide for me many days, i. e. till death.—Israel shall abide many days without a king, prince, sacrifice, ephod, teraphim. For about 2600, or 2700 years, the ten tribes of Israel have been, or shall be, without the true religion, and without a civil government of their own; and for about 1800 or 1900 years, the Jews have been, or shall be scattered and enslaved among the nations, neither practising their ancient religion, nor the Christian, nor the heathen. Hos. iii. 3, 4.

MA'ON; a city on the south-east, or south frontiers of Judah, where Nabal dwelt, and near to which was a wilderness, where David lurked. Perhaps one Maon, the father of the inhabitants of Bethzur, gave it this name. Josh. xv. 55. 1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25. and xxv. 2. 1 Chron. ii. 45. The MAONITES were a tribe of Arabians, which perhaps had anciently dwelt about Maon; they oppressed the Hebrews in the time of the Judges. Judg. x. 12. We suppose them the same with the Meamonim, which our translation renders others besides the Ammonites, who came against Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. 1. and with the Meunim, whom king Uzziah subdued. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7.

MAR; (1.) To cut off; render uncomely; disfigure. Lev. xix. 27. (2.) To spoil; render disagreeable or useless. 2 Kings iii. 19. Mark ii. 1. God marred the pride of Jerusalem, when he ruined their temple and kingdom, and what else they were proud of, and brought them to ruin by sword, famine, pestilence, and captivity. Jer. xiii. 9. Job's friends and neighbours marred his path, when they hindered him from the worship of God, and duties of holiness; or when they reproached his religion as hypocrisy, and poured contempt on godliness, because of his trouble. Job xxx. 13.

MARAH, or bitterness; a place on the east side of the western gulf of the Red sea, where the Hebrews, after three days' thirst, found the water so bitter that they could not drink it; but by casting a tree into it, which was divinely pointed out, Moses rendered it sweet.

Did this figure out, that by Jesus the tree of life being under and fulfilling the covenant of works for us, the holy law of God is made sweet to our taste; and by faith in his sufferings, afflictions are relished by us, and work for us an exceeding and eternal weight of glory? Exod. xv. 23—25. Diodorus, Shaw, and others, mention springs of bitter water about this place.

MA-RAN-A'THA; i. e. our Lord cometh. See ACCURSED.

MARBLE; a hard stone, which receives a fine polish. It is dug out of quarries in large masses, and is much used in splendid buildings, ornamental pillars, &c. It is of different colours, black, white, &c. and is sometimes streaked with different colours; but scarcely any of it becomes transparent in thin polished slices, but the white. Tables of marble were anciently used for writing on. Perhaps God wrote the ten commandments on tables of marble. On the tables of marble procured from the east by the Earl of Arundel, and now belonging to the University of Oxford, there is a chronology of Greece, from the earliest times of that nation, to A. M. 5741. We suppose the stones of Solomon's temple were fine marble. 1 Chron. xxix. 2. Ahasuerus king of Persia had the court of his garden surrounded with pillars of marble, to hang the curtains on by silver rings, and the pavement was of red, blue, white, and black marble. Esth. i. 6. Marble is an emblem of comeliness, firmness, and duration. Sol. Song v. 15.

MARCH; as soldiers, or armies do to fields of battle. Jer. xli. 22. God's marching denotes the motions of the pillar of cloud before the Hebrews in the desert, who, considering their orderly arrangement, might, in an open country, march twelve or more miles a day Psal. lxxviii. 7. Judg. v. 4; or his display of his power, in gradually cutting off the Canaanites by the hand of Joshua. Hab. iii. 12.

MARINERS. See SAILORS.

MARK; to notice with great care, set a mark upon. God marks iniquity, when he brings men into judgment, and punishes them for their sin. Psal. cxxx. 3. Job x. 14. Men mark our steps, when they observe our conduct, in order to find occasion to accuse us, and thereby ruin us. Psal. lvi. 6. A mark, sign, or token, is, (1.) That by which a thing is pointed out, either as past, present, or future; and so is of use to commemorate things past, demonstrate things present, confirm things dubious, and assure of things to come: or, (2.) That which distinguishes one thing from another; as landmarks distinguish between the fields of one and of another. The mark of the beast in the forehead or hand, required by Antichrist, is an open profession, solemn adherence to, or practice of Popish abominations; such as, subjection to the Pope, belief of transubstantiation, worship of images, angels, saints, relics; for refusing which, thousands have been deprived of life and property. Rev. xiii. 16, 17. Whether God set a mark on Cain's person, to distinguish him from others, or only gave him some token, (as he did Gideon, that he would make him conquer the Midianites,) and that he would preserve him, we know not. Gen. iv. 15. Suffering for the sake of Christ, is his marks; it is a likeness to him in his sufferings, and proves the sufferer to be his follower. Gal. v. 17. Paul's subscription was the mark, or token, an epistle was his. 2 Thess. iii. 17. What one directs his shot or stroke at, is called his mark, 1 Sam. xx. 20: and so God sets up one as a mark, when he directs the peculiar strokes of his judgments against him. Job vii. 20. Lam. iii. 12. The goal to which the contenders run in a race, is called a mark; and in allusion to this, perfection in holiness is the mark Christians aim at, and run toward, in their race of duty. Phil. iii. 14.

Jesus Christ and his people are signs and wonders: how much gazed at, spoken against, and exposed to injuries! Luke ii. 24. Isa. viii. 18. And how is Jesus set up in the gospel, that men may come to him! Isa. lxvi. 19. xi. 10. and lix. 19. Prophets were signs, when their condition and behaviour pointed out what was coming on nations. Isa. xx. 3. Ezek. iv. 3. Wicked men are a sign, when the justice and faithfulness of God are marked in their conspicuous ruin, and others are warned to beware of their sins. Ezek. xiv. 8. The sun, moon, and stars, are for signs and seasons; their stations and appearances are general marks to point out what the seasons and weather shall be; and their uncommon appearances have often marked out approaching calamities. Gen. i. 14. The twelve signs of heaven are twelve clusters of stars, in that part of the visible heaven, through which the sun, moon, and other planets, have their motions. Those through which the sun moves in the spring quarter, are Aries, Taurus, Gemini; those through which he moves in our summer, are Cancer, Leo, Virgo; those of the harvest season are Libra, Scorpio, Sagittarius; those of the winter, are Capricorn, Aquarius, and Pisces. It seems that these signs were known in the days of Job; (Job xxviii. 32.) and were worshipped by the Jews under Manasseh and Amon. 2 Kings xxiii. 5. But the signs of heaven, and tokens of soothsaying liars, are the natural appearance of the sky; as a red and lowering sun is a mark of the approach of foul weather; and the tokens which diviners give as presages of that happening which they foretold. Jer. x. 2. Isa. xlv. 25. The signs of Christ's coming against the Jews, were the spread of the gospel, the persecution of Christians, the rise of false prophets, uncommon appearances in the sky, and about the temple, &c. these intimated, that the ruin of their nation fast approached. Matt. xxiv. 3—29. But the sign of the Son of man, afterward appearing in heaven, was the plain evidence or mark of his Messiahship, in the punishment of the Jewish nation, who rejected him; or the awful appearances that shall precede his last manifestation in the clouds. Matt. xxiv. 30. The sun's going back was a sign or mark, that Hezekiah should go up to the temple. 2 Kings xx. 8. The rainbow was a sign, or token, that God had established his covenant with Noah and his seed, and a sure evidence that he would no more destroy the earth with a flood. Gen. ix. 12, 13. Circumcision, the Sabbath in its ceremonial observation, and other rites, were signs, sure tokens, that God had established his peculiar covenant with the Hebrews, and would give, or had given them, the land of Canaan for their possession. Gen. xvii. 11. Rom. iv. 11. Exod. xxxi. 13. God's law was to be a sign, token, and memorial, on the hands of the Hebrews; they were to have it continually before their eyes, and to be always obeying it. Exod. xiii. 9, 16. The blood of the paschal lamb, sprinkled on the doors of the Hebrew houses, was a token, or mark, to the destroying angel, that God would the preservation of all within that house. Exod. xii. 13. In allusion to which, Christ is said to set a mark upon pious mourners for the sins of their country, when he singularly preserves them, amid common ruin, from a furious enemy. Ezek. ix. 4, 6. God shews men a token for good, when he either shews them some noted discovery of his love, or destroys their enemies, or gives them some certain evidence that he will do so. Psal. lxxxvi. 17. The saints' courage and patience under tribulation and persecutions, are an evident token of approaching perdition or ruin to their enemies, and of remarkable relief and eternal salvation to themselves. Phil. i. 28. 2 Thess. i. 5. The altar and pillar, the gospel ordinances of a crucified Redeemer, and their church's state, in the land of Egypt, shall be a sign and witness to the Lord; an evident mark and proof, that God has shewn singular mercy to that people, and that they have chosen him to be their God. Isa. xix. 19, 20. The tokens of such as went by the way, were either the instances which common travellers could give of the hospitality and piety which prevailed in Job's family, or the instances which they, or any one in the course of life, could give of the prosperity of the wicked, and the affliction of the godly, in this world. Job xxi. 29. Miracles, or wonderful works, are called signs or tokens; they shew God's power, and prove the mission of his servants. Exod. iv. 17. Heb. ii. 4. Psal. cxxxv. 9.

MARE-SHAH; a city of Judah, about eighteen miles west from Jerusalem. Near to this place, Asa routed the Ethiopians. 2 Chron. xiv. 9. Moresheth, where Micah the prophet was born, seems not to have been this place, but one near Gath. Mic. i. 1—14.

MARK, (John) or MARCUS, the son of one Mary; in whose house Peter found the Christians praying together for his deliverance from prison, Acts xii. 12; and the cousin of Barnabas. Mark attended Paul and Barnabas as far as Perga in Lesser Asia; but finding they intended to carry the gospel into Pamphylia, and places adjacent, he deserted them, and returned to Jerusalem. After the synod was held at Jerusalem, Paul and Barnabas, having preached for some time in Antioch of Syria, resolved to visit the places northward, where they had formerly preached. Barnabas intended to take his cousin with them; but as Paul was unwilling to take one with them who had formerly deserted the work in these quarters, Barnabas and Mark went to Cyprus by themselves. Mark was afterwards reconciled to Paul, and was very useful to him at Rome, and, along with him salutes the Colossians and Philemon. Acts xv. 36—40. Col. iv. 10. Philen. 24. It seems Paul afterward sent him into Asia, for he desires Timothy to bring him back to Rome, when himself should come, as a useful minister. 2 Tim. iv. 11. When Peter wrote his first epistle, Mark was with him in Chaldea. It is said that he afterwards preached in Egypt and Cyrene; and that the Alexandrians, seizing him in the pulpit, bound and dragged him through the streets that day, and the day after, till he died. Calmet and some others, will have John Mark to be a different person from the Evangelist; but without success is the attempt to distinguish them. In his gospel, Mark begins with the preaching of John Baptist. He often, as it were abridges Matthew, but adds several particulars that further illustrate the subject. He relates several miracles omitted by Matthew, as the cure of the demoniac, chap. i; of a deaf man of Decapolis, and a blind one of Bethsaida, chap. vii. and viii. In what Matthew has recorded from chap. iv. 12. to xiv. 13; Mark does not generally follow his order, but that of Luke and John.

MARRIAGE, a solemn contract, by which a man and woman, for their mutual benefit, and the production of children, engage to live together in a kind and affectionate manner. This contract seems to partake also of the nature of a vow, and cannot, like civil contracts, be dissolved by the mutual consent of parties. In no case can marriage between parents and children be allowed. This is so contrary to nature, as to sink those who practise it below some of the beasts. In cases of absolute necessity, as in Adam's family, marriage between brothers and sisters, was not unlawful; but, as one end of marriage is to promote love, and spread friendship, and to prevent all indecency between the sexes, when mankind increased, such marriages became improper. To us it appears, that Abraham married his niece, and Anram married Jochebed his aunt. Perhaps this might be owing to the darkness of the times. It is certain, that the law of Moses prohibits marriage between all that are more nearly related than cousins. Lev. xviii. and xx. Only, by a particular law, which, it seems, had been more anciently revealed, the unmarried younger brother of one who died childless, was to espouse his brother's widow and raise up seed to him; and if he refused, the widow summoned him before the judges, spat in his face, and loosed his shoe, as a mark of contempt to continue on him and his family. The design of this law was to keep families distinct, and to point out the duty of Christ's apostles, ministers, and people, to raise up seed of new converts, and of good works, to the honour of Christ their elder brother, and the dishonour that awaits such as do not. Gen. xxxviii. Dent. xxv. To keep the tribes distinct, no Hebrew heiress was allowed to marry out of her own tribe; only they might marry Levites, or priests, as these had no inheritance to give them, and no inheritance could come into their tribe; and it was perhaps in consequence of such marriage with an heiress of the tribe of Judah, that the Maccabean priests, who ruled the Jews for about one hundred and thirty years before our Saviour's birth, may be reckoned to the tribe of Judah. Numb. xxxvi. Gen. xlix. 10. Priests were only to marry virgins, or priests' widows of good report; and the high-priest was only to marry a virgin. Lev. xxi. 7—14. Ezek. xlv. 22. In times of persecution, marriage is not convenient, as it is difficult to carry about and shelter families, or to provide for them; but it is always better to marry than to burn in lustful desires. Marriage is honourable in all persons capable of it, and the bed undefiled. It is the Popish doctrine of devils, to forbid their clergy to marry, or to reproach the natural desire of women. But marriage is to be made only in the Lord, in a way agreeable to his law, and tending to his honour; and not in a way of unequal yoking with such as have opposite stations, inconsistent tempers, or between professors of a true and a false religion. 1 Cor. vii. Heb. xiii. 4. 1 Tim. iv. 3. Dan. xi. 37. 2 Cor. vi. 14. As unequal marriages tend so effectually to lead professors of the true religion into apostasy therefrom, Abraham and Isaac were careful to prevent their children marrying with Canaanites. Gen. xxiv. 27. and xxviii. God prohibited the Hebrews from marrying with any heathens, and especially with the Canaanites. Exod. xxiii. 32. and xxxvi. 12—16. Dent. vii. 2—5. With the Hebrews, marriages with Heathen women were reckoned null in themselves; and so Ezra and Nehemiah caused the Jews to put away their heathen wives. Ezra ix. and x. Neh. xiii. Unequal marriages between the sons of Sheth, who professed the true religion, and the beautiful women of Cain's progeny, were the original causes of the ancient flood. Gen. vi. The Hebrews intermarrying with the Canaanites, brought fearful and repeated ruin on their nation. Judge ii. Solomon's marrying heathenish women rent the kingdom of Israel into twain, and occasioned many civil wars; and led to the establishment of idolatry in one kingdom, for many generations. Ahab's marriage with Jezebel, and Jehoram's marriage with Ahab's daughter, brought not only their families, but the whole Hebrew nation, to the brink of ruin. 1 Kings xviii—xxii. 2 Kings i—xi.

Polygamy, or having several wives at the same time, is evidently contrary to the law of God. At first, when there was the greatest need for a speedy increase of children to replenish the world, God provided but one wife for Adam. Gen. ii. He expressly forbids the taking one wife to another, to vex her, in her lifetime. Lev. xviii. 18. The near equality of males and females of the human species, in every age, especially if it be considered that the small difference is on the side of the males, strongly remonstrates against polygamy, as unnatural and adulterous. It tends to counteract the general law of the married state, to increase and multiply, and replenish the earth, as it hinders the procreation of children. How often has a man by one wife, had more children than Jacob by two wives and as many concubines! nay, as many as David had by a great many wives, and ten concubines; if not as many as Solomon had by his 1000 wives and concubines? Whereas, had these 1000 been married to as many husbands, they might have produced 10,000 or 12,000 children. Who knows not that the unnatural practice of polygamy has occasioned the unnatural practices of castration of males, and abominable sodomy, as in the eastern and other nations; even as sodomy, bestiality, and every horrid crime are the attendants of the Popish prohibition of marriage to their clergy? Polygamy was introduced by Lamech, an abandoned descendant of Cain. The disorder and trouble it breeds in families, the case of Abraham, Jacob, Elkanah, and others fully attest. The having concubines, or secondary wives, was near akin to polygamy, and as little sanctioned by God. The example of some godly men can no more warrant either, than it can warrant us to commit drunkenness, incest, lying, idolatry, or murder. God's prohibition to make the son of a beloved wife heir, instead of the elder son of one who was hated, no way approves polygamy; but at most, was a provision against the bad consequences thereof: nay, it does not so much as hint that this hated and beloved wife was alive at the same time. Dent. xxi. 15—17. Anciently, wives were in a manner purchased; and in some places it is so still; which is perhaps one reason why their wives are so unnaturally used. When Rebekah consented to be Isaac's wife, Eliezer gave many valuable presents to the family. Jacob served fourteen years for his two wives. Shechem offered Jacob what dowry, or marriage-price, he pleased to ask for Dinah. Gen. xxiv. 59. xxix. and xxxiv. 11, 12. David, confessing that he could not pay a dowry answerable to the station of Saul's daughter, Saul offered to accept, in lieu thereof, two hundred foreskins of the Philistines. 1 Sam. xviii. Hosea bought his second wife for fifteen shekels of silver, and a homer and a half of barley. Hos. iii. 2. If any young man defiled a young woman, he was required to marry her; and if her father refused to give her, the young man was to give her a dowry, as he had robbed her of her honour and chastity. Exod. xxii. 16, 17.

As celibacy and barrenness were reckoned a reproach in Israel, the Hebrews often married very young; the men about thirteen, and the women at twelve years of age; which was an additional reason why the parents had almost the whole disposal of marriages in their hand. Betrothing, or what we call contracting, preceded the marriage, and often took place before the parties were capable of the marriage state. Betrothing was sometimes performed by the writing of a contract legally attested by witnesses, in which the intended husband engaged to pay his bride a certain dowry on the marriage-day, for the portion of her virginity, and pledged all he had for securing the payment; and the bride declared her acceptance of him on such conditions. Sometimes the betrothing was transacted by the bridegroom's giving the bride a piece of silver before witnesses, and saying, "Receive this as a pledge that you shall be my future spouse." After betrothing, the bridegroom and bride had access to visit one another; and if the bride admitted another to her embraces, she and her paramour were regarded as guilty of adultery, and stoned to death. Deut. xxiii. 24. On the marriage-day, another contract was drawn, by which the bridegroom protested, that he gave his bride two hundred zuzims, or fifty shekels of silver, as the price of her virginity; and engaged to maintain, and every way deal with her as a wife; and to take care of what she brought with her, and what he had given, or should give her; and gave bond on all he had, for securing the same to her in his life, or at his death.

Anciently, the Hebrews wore crowns on their marriage-day; and it seems the bridegroom's was put on by his mother. Sol. Song iii. 11. The ceremonies of marriage continued three days for a widow, and seven days for a virgin. Gen. xxix. 27. Judg. xiv. 17, 18. During this time, the young men and young women attended the bridegroom and bride in their different apartments, and the former amused one another with riddles. Sol. Song v. 1. Psal. xiv. 9, 14, 15. Judg. xiv. A friend of the bridegroom's governed the feast, that no drunkenness or disorder might be committed. John ii. 9. and iii. 29. At the end of the feast, the parties were with lighted lamps, conducted to the bridegroom's house. The bridegroom leaving his apartment, called forth the bride and her attendants, who, it seems, were generally about ten persons. Matt. xxv. 1-10. The modern Jews retain most of these ceremonies: only, since the ruin of their city and temple, the bridegrooms wear no crowns on the marriage-day. They generally marry widows on Thursday, and virgins on Friday. On the evening before, the bride is led to the bath by her companions, making a sound with kitchen instruments, as they go along. Being washed, she returns, and her friends sing the marriage song at the door of her father's house. On the marriage-day, the bridegroom, and especially the bride, dress themselves as fine as possible. A number of young men attend the bridegroom, and young women the bride. They are generally married in the open air, on the bank of a river, or in a court, garden, &c. The parties each covered with a black veil, and with another square veil, with four hanging tufts on their head, are placed under a canopy. The rabbin of the place, the chanter of the synagogue, or the nearest friend of the bridegroom, taking a cup full of wine, and having blessed it, and thanked God for the creation and marriage of the sexes, causes the parties to taste the wine. Next, the bridegroom, by putting a golden ring on the hand of the bride, takes her to be his wife. The contract of marriage is then read, and the bridegroom delivers it into the hands of the bride's relations. Wine is brought in a brittle vessel, and being six times blessed, the married couple drink thereof; and the rest of it, in token of joy, is cast on the ground; then the bridegroom, in memory of the ruin of their city and temple, with force dashes the vessel to the ground. When, at the end of the marriage-feast, they come into the bridegroom's house, and after a long blessing, sung over in Hebrew, they take supper, after which, the men and women, at least sometimes, dance a little, not in the promiscuous manner of common dances, but the men and the women in different apartments. After the rehearsal of another long blessing or prayer, the bride is led to her bed-chamber, and the bridegroom soon follows. Two persons, the one a friend of the bridegroom, and another a friend of the bride, tarry all night in the next room. These next morning take and deliver the linen whereon the new married parties had slept, to be retained by the bride's mother. If afterward the man pretended that his wife had not been a maid at her marriage, her parents, if they could, produced the proper tokens of her virginity; and if they did, the husband paid one hundred shekels of silver to her parents, as a fine for slandering their daughter, and was obliged to retain her as his wife while she lived; but if these were not found, the woman was stoned to death as an adulteress. Deut. xxii. 13-21. As the Jews were a cruel kind of people, God, to prevent their direct or indirect murder of their wives, permitted them, in a solemn and deliberate manner, to put them away, by giving them a bill of divorce, if they found some disagreeable disease on their body or their temper, which prevented them from living together; but they were never allowed to return to one another. Under the gospel, no cause of divorce is sustained as valid by God, except adultery and wilful desertion. On account of the first, the innocent party may dismiss the guilty: by the second, the guilty dismisses himself or herself. In both cases, the guilty person remains bound by the marriage vow; and hence none can marry them, without committing adultery. Matt. xix. 3-9. 1 Cor. vii. 11, 15.—If a master betrothed his bondmaid, that had been sold to him, and did not marry her, he was to allow her to be redeemed. If he betrothed a bondmaid to his son, she was to be used as an ordinary wife; and if she was not used well, she might go off as a free woman. Exod. xxi. 7-11. If a Hebrew intended to marry a captive, she was first to tarry at his house a whole month, that he might have time to deliberate; she was to shave her head, and pare her nails, change her clothes, and for a month bewail her loss of her parents, and then he might marry her; but if he did not retain her, she was to go out free, and not to be sold. Deut. xxi. 10-14. By the laws of our country, it is required, that persons intending to marry, have their intentions proclaimed on three several Sabbaths, that all concerned may have time and opportunity to offer their objections; and it is enacted, that all such as marry in a clandestine manner, or are witnesses thereof, be severely fined, or otherwise punished; and that whosoever marries any person clandestinely, be imprisoned or banished. Is it not then shameful, that church and state so much overlook this pernicious course? How can the giving of an oath to a worthless fellow having no authority, perhaps a vagabond, fail to be a horrid profanation of God's name? Is it not sinful to trample on good order established by both church and state? How wicked to rush into marriage without a deliberate thought! How base to enter that state in a method calculated to rob parents of their power over children, and to cover lewdness, and to promote treacherous, and even incestuous connections!

The scripture invariably represents it as the right of parents to give their sons and daughters in marriage. Gen. xxi. 21. xxiv. 3. xxviii. 1, 6. xxxiv. 4, 6. and xxviii. 18, 19. Josh. xv. 16, 17. Judg. xiv. 2, 3. Exod. xxii. 16, 17. and xxxiv. 16. Deut. vii. 3. Jer. xxix. 6. 1 Cor. vii. 36, 38. No where is the least shadow of power given to children to marry without their parents' consent. Nor is there a single instance of marriage in Scripture contracted without regard to the consent of parents which was not followed with some visible judgment, temporal or spiritual, sooner or later. Gen. vi. 2. xxvi. 34. xxviii. 9. and xxxviii. 2, &c. Protestant divines generally hold marriage null and void, if the consent of parents be disregarded. Even the infamous Popish council of Trent, denounced a curse upon them on this account. Papists generally hold the marriage of children valid without the consent of parents: but Bellarmine and others admit that it is not equally honourable. The too easy reconciliation of parents to their children's contempt of that authority, which God has given them over them in this point, tends not a little to the multiplication of such marriages in our times, to the manifest ruin of their children in spiritual matters, and often also in temporal.

The duty of married persons is tenderly to love one another; to be faithful to one another; to bear with one another's infirmities; and, in their different stations, study to please, profit, and provide for one another, the husband as the head, and the wife as subject to him. Eph. v. Col. iii. 1 Pet. iii. The relation between God and the church, whether Jewish or gentile, is represented as a marriage, wherein God is the Husband, who chooses, rules, and provides for it; and his church is the spouse, who consents to be his, and to accept of his ordinances and laws, and love and obey him, because he has first loved it. With deliberation this relation is constituted; and how firm, lasting, close, pleasant, honourable to God, and profitable to his church! how solemn his promises to bless it; and its engagements to obey him! How fearfully the Jews, and many Christian churches, have been punished for their adulterous apostasy from him! Jer. iii. Ezek. xvi. Hos. ii. The spiritual relation between the saints and Christ, and God in him, is called a marriage; by which Jesus and his Father are the Husband, and the saints the spouse. From eternity they were loved, chosen, and betrothed in the covenant of peace. In time they are invited, and do consent to be his, and are united to him by the Spirit and faith. Hereby he and they have mutual interest in one another's person and concerns, and mutual love for one another; and have familiar intimacy, especially in the heavenly state; while he rules, protects, and provides for them, they obey him, and bring forth fruits of righteousness, to the praise of his glory. Matt. xxii. 1-14. Jer. liv. 5. Eph. v. 30-32. 2 Cor. xi. 2. The connection of sinners with the law as a broken covenant, is represented as a marriage; how closely they cleave to it as the terms of life, and it to them! and how, for the breach thereof, they are ruined along with its honour. Rom. vii. 1-4. Gal. iii. 10. and iv. 21.

MARROW; a soft, fat, and very nourishing substance, contained in the hollow of some animal bones, and which strengthens them, and mightily promotes the healing of them when broken. To marrow are likened, (1.) The most secret dispositions, thoughts, designs, and desires of our souls. Heb. iv. 12. (2.) Christ, and his fulness of righteousness, grace, and glory, and all the fulness of God in him, which form the delightful nourishment and strength of churches, saints, and their holy dispositions. Psal. lxxiii. 5. Isa. xxv. 6. (3.) The fear of the Lord, and departing from evil, which mightily promote the health and true welfare of both soul and body. Prov. iii. 8.

MARTYR. See WITNESS.

MARVEL. See WONDER.

MARY; the virgin mother of our Lord, she was the daughter of Eli, or Joachim, of the royal, though then the debased family of David. That she vowed perpetual virginity, and remained always a virgin, has no proof, but originated in the idle fancies of men. It is certain that she lived at Nazareth, and was betrothed to one Joseph of the same place and family. The angel Gabriel appeared to her, and hailed her as one highly favoured of the Lord, as she should quickly conceive and bear the Messiah. She believed, and asked, with wonder, how that could be? Gabriel told her, that the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost upon her should make her conceive, as nothing was impossible with God. Mary believed, and soon after, finding that she had conceived, she went to Hebron, which was about ninety miles southward of Nazareth, to visit her cousin Elizabeth, who was near her time with John Baptist. No sooner had Elizabeth heard Mary's voice, than the babe leaped for joy in her womb. After much conversation on their miraculous pregnancy, Elizabeth, under inspiration, uttered one song of praise, and Mary another still more exalted and rapturous. At Mary's return, she was on the point of being privately divorced, but an angel prevented it. Luke i. 26-58. Matt. i. 18-25. An edict of the Roman emperor caused Joseph and Mary to repair to Bethlehem, at the time she was to bring forth her divine child. What Simeon and Anna said of him, when they beheld him, Mary laid up in her mind, and deeply pondered in her heart; as she did also what Jesus said to her, when she found him disputing in the temple at twelve years of age. Luke ii. About eighteen years after, she too rashly hinted to him, at the marriage of Cana in Galilee, that he should miraculously supply them with wine. John ii. 2-5. Some time after, she sought to speak with him. Mark iii. 30. Joseph it seems being dead, our Saviour affectionately observing her from his cross, recommended her to the care of the apostle John, who provided for her till her death. John xix. 25-27. After our Saviour's resurrection, she no doubt saw him. After his ascension she attended the religious meetings of the disciples. Acts i. 14. The dispute among the Papists, whether she was tainted with original sin, has occasioned plenty of pretended miracles, and a prodigious number of volumes.

2. MARY, the wife of Cleophas, and mother of James, Jude, Josea, Simeon, and Salome their sister, is supposed to have been the sister of the virgin, and so her children are represented as the brothers of our Lord. John xix. 25. Matt. xxvii. 56. Mark xv. 41. Luke xxiv. 10. Mark vi. 3. Matt. xiii. 55. She early believed on our Saviour, attended his preaching, and ministered to him for his support. From a distance, she with grief witnessed his crucifixion. Mark xv. 40, 41. She was present at his burial, and prepared spices for embalming his dead body. Luke xxiii. 56.

MARY MAG-DA-LENE. She seems to have been an inhabitant of Magdala; and it is supposed by some, that she was a plaiter of hair to the harlots and vain women of her city. It is certain that she was possessed of seven devils, whom Jesus cast out. Perhaps she was the scandalous sinner, who, in the house of Simon the Pharisee, washed our Saviour's feet with her tears, and wiped them with her hair, and kissed and anointed them with precious ointment. Simon thought our Lord's admission of her to such familiarity, similar to that of an affectionate daughter towards her father, was an evidence that he knew not her character, or was not sufficiently strict in his conduct. Jesus, knowing his thoughts, uttered a parable of two debtors, to whom their creditors had forgiven very different accounts, and asked Simon, which of the two would love him most? Simon replied, that he thought it would be the debtor to whom the greatest sum had been forgiven: Jesus approved his judgment, and, after observing how far superior this woman's kindness was to that of Simon, who had neither saluted him with a kiss, nor given him water for his feet, nor oil for his head, hinted, that her great love was an evidence that her multiplied transgressions were forgiven; and then declared to the woman, that they were so. As some murmured within themselves, that Jesus took upon him to forgive sins, he said to her, Thy faith hath saved thee. Soon after, she is mentioned as one of his ministering attendants. Luke vii. 36-50. and viii. 1-3. She attended him in his last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, where she sorrowfully witnessed his crucifixion, and assisted in preparing spices for his embalming. John xix. 25. Luke xxiii. 55, 56. Early on the third day, she, and Mary, the wife of Cleophas, went to his sepulchre; but missing his body, an angel informed them he was risen. As they were going to inform the disciples, Mary Magdalene returned, and stood weeping at the grave. There Jesus met her; she supposed he was the gardener, and asked him if he knew what was become of the dead body, that she might take care of it? In his usual tone of speech, Jesus called her by her name. Knowing him immediately, she cried out in a rapture of joy, Rabboni! which signifies, My great Master, and fell at his feet to embrace them; but he bade her forbear, and go and inform his disciples that he was risen. As she went and overtook the other Mary, and other women, Jesus appeared to them: they held him by the feet, and worshipped him, but were directed to go and inform his apostles and followers, and particularly Peter, that he was risen. They did as he directed, but their information was not fully credited. Matt. xxviii. 9, 10. John xx. 1-18.

MARY. See LAZARUS; PETER.

MASH, or MESHECH; the fourth son of Aram, and grandson of Shem. He was probably the father of the Moscheni, or Masiani, who resided about the south parts of Armenia; and from him the mount Masius, and the river Mazecha, or Mosecha, in these quarters seem to have had their name. Gen. x. 23. 1 Chron. i. 17.

MASONS. From the history of the temple, and of the ruins of Baalbeck, Tadmor, Persepolis, and other places, it appears that their art was in as great perfection long ago as at present. Those of Tyre were among the first noted; and David hired them to build his palace. 2 Sam. v. 11.

MASTB. The Tyrians made the masts of their ships of cedar. Ezek. xxvii. 5. As it is dangerous to lie down in the sea, or on the top of a mast, as the ship sails, so he who indulges himself in drunkenness, is in danger of death and damnation. Prov. xxiii. 34. See SHIP.

MASTER; one who rules, or teaches. It is a title applied, (1.) To Jesus Christ, who is our great lawgiver and teacher, and who alone can inwardly and powerfully instruct our soul; and in matters of faith and worship, is only to be followed. Matt. xxiii. 8, 10. (2.) To preachers and ministers, who, to regular congregations, declare and explain the oracles of God. Eccl. xii. 11. (3.) To such as more privately teach scholars, or disciples. Luke vi. 40. (4.) To such as possess, and rule over servants. Eph. vi. 5. (5.) To such as proudly affect vain applause, and a superiority above others. Matt. xxiii. 10. (6.) To such as judge, condemn, censure, and reprove others, or do it beyond the merits of the cause, uncharitably wrestling things to the worst meaning, or aggravating real faults; or who do it from a spirit of pride and contradiction; or who affect to be many teachers, instead of the one teacher Christ. James iii. 1.

MATTHEW, or LEVI, the son of Alphaeus, is generally supposed to be a different person from Cleophas. He was a Galilean by birth, a Jew by religion, and a publican by office. His ordinary residence was at Capernaum, and he had his house for gathering his toll, or tax, nigh to the sea of Tiberias. Jesus called him to be one of his apostles. He directly obeyed, without taking time to settle his affairs. At his request, Jesus, perhaps some time after, took an entertainment at his house, along with some other publicans. As the Pharisees rallied at him for eating with publicans and such notorious sinners, he told them that it was sin-sick souls that needed the Divine Physician; and that God loved mercy more than sacrifice and pretensions to strictness. He also told them, that he was come into the world, not to have fellowship with persons who were without sin, but to call sinners to repentance. Matt. ix. 9—13. Mark ii. 14—17. Grotius thinks, Matthew and Levi were two different persons; the former the clerk or servant, and the latter the master. Whether Matthew suffered martyrdom in Persia, or died in Abyssinia, after he had preached there, is now known.

It is said that he began to write his gospel about A. D. 41; but in what language, is controverted. There was, very early, a copy of it in Hebrew or Syriac, to which the Judaizing pretenders to Christianity added so many interpolations of their own, that it was generally condemned. As early as Origen's time it was despised; and Epiphanius considers it as spurious. The Hebrew copies published by Munster and Tillet, are but modern translations from the Latin or Greek. It is certain, that a Greek copy of this gospel existed in the apostolic age; and not long after it was translated into Latin. We cannot therefore accede to the opinion of the Christian Fathers, who will have its original to have been the Hebrew; for why might it not be as easily translated from Greek into Hebrew, as from Hebrew into Greek? About A. D. 184, a Greek copy of it was found in the East Indies, which, it is supposed, was carried thither by Bartholomew. In 488, a Greek copy was found at Cyprus, which was inscribed on hard wood, and was supposed to be most ancient. Moreover, if Matthew had written in Hebrew, with what sense could he have given us a literal interpretation of Hebrew names, Emmanuel, &c.? Matthew has exhibited to us the royal descent of our Saviour, and the obvious parts of his conduct and sufferings. His order is sometimes different from that of the other Evangelists; as the Holy Ghost did not intend to exhibit the facts in their order of time, but in the truth of their performance. He is grave, without formal stiffness, plain, with dignity, copious, and full in his rehearsal of our Lord's divine discourses and wonderful works. Whatever other works were once ascribed to him, every body capable of judging, believes now to be but a forgery.

MAT-THIAS; a disciple of Jesus Christ, perhaps one of the seventy. After our Saviour's ascension, Peter proposed, that one who had been a constant witness of his marvellous sufferings and conduct, should be chosen in the stead of Judas, who, after betraying his Lord, had hanged himself. The disciples chose Barsabas and Matthias for the candidates. As the office was extraordinary, and perhaps the votes equal, the final determination, which of the two should be the apostle, was left to the decision of God, by the lot. After prayer, the lots were cast, and it fell upon Matthias: he was therefore numbered with the eleven apostles. Acts i. 15—26. It is probable that he preached the gospel somewhere in the east, but whether he died a violent or a natural death, we know not.

MATTOCK; an iron instrument for digging stones, roots, and sand; or for breaking down walls. 1 Sam. xlii. 20, 21. Isa. vii. 25. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 6.

MAUL; a hammer, such as is used by coppersmiths. A false witness, is like a maul, a sword, or an arrow; he wounds the reputation, he ruins the health, and takes away the life of his neighbour. Prov. xxv. 18.

MAZZA-ROTH; whether they be the twelve signs, (see MARK) or the chambers of the south, or the Mazzerim, stars scattered about the north pole is not determined. Job xxxviii. 32. ix. 9. and xxxvii. 9.

MEADOW; fat and well watered ground for feeding cattle, or producing hay. Gen. xli. 2.

MEAL; (1.) That substance of which bread, and like eatables are formed. Isa. xlvii. 2. (2.) A particular diet; a dinner, supper, or the like. Ruth ii. 14.

MEASURE; (1.) That by which the quantity, length, or breadth of any thing is adjusted. Tables of measure follow:

A measure, in 2 Kings vii. 1. signifies a seah or satum; but in Rev. vi. 6. it signifies but a chenix, which contained almost fifty solid inches, which is not quite the half of our pint; and this being sold for a penny, or sevenpence three farthings sterling, imports, that the famine would be so severe that a man would scarce be able to work for enough to keep him in life. (2.) The length, breadth, or quantity to be measured. Ezek. xl. 10. (3.) Measure signifies the determined length, boundary, or degree of any thing, as of life, Psal. xxxix. 4; of sin, Jer. li. 13; or of grace, Eph. iv. 11. The measure of the apostles, was the extent of their power and office. 2 Cor. x. 13—15. The Jews filled up the measure of their fathers, by adding to their sin, and so hastening on the judgments of God. Matt. xxiii. 32. In measure, is moderately, sparingly. Isa. xxvii. 8. Jer. xxx. 11. Ezek. iv. 11—15. Without measure, is very largely. Isa. v. 14. John iii. 34. As the measure of a man, is six feet, so the New Jerusalem being measured with the measure of a man, that is of the angel, may import, how exact and heavenly the saints shall be during the millennium, and the eternal state.

MEASURE, or METE; (1.) To take the dimensions or quantity of things. Num. xxxv. 5. Ruth iii. 15. (2.) To take possession of, especially in order to build. Zech. ii. 2. (3.) To repay, reward. Isa. lxxv. 7. God's measuring the dust, or waters, in the hollow of his hand, imports, his full knowledge of, his absolute power over, and his easy management of the earth. Job xxviii. 25. Isa. xl. 12. The angel's visionary measuring of the temple and city in Ezekiel's and John's visions, imports, that every thing in the gospel church ought to correspond with the line and reed of God's word, and that in the millennium they shall do so. Ezek. xl—xlii. and xlvii. Rev. xxi. The measuring of the temple, altar, and of them that worship in it, under Antichrist, may denote the trials of Christ's witnesses; but chiefly their enjoying the singular care and protection of God, while others are abandoned to delusion. Rev. xi. 1, 2. Men's measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, is foolishly to imagine themselves standards of true excellence; and reckoning every thing good that is their own, while they overlook the superior excellencies of others. 2 Cor. x. 12.

MEAT. The food of the Hebrews was regulated by the appointment of God. What animals they might eat, and what they ought not, was particularly marked. Lev. xi. Deut. xiv. No blood, nor flesh with the blood, nor the fat of animals offered in sacrifice was to be eaten. What the Hebrews reckoned high living, may appear from what Solomon had at his table; his daily provision was thirty cors or measures of fine flour, with sixty cors of coarser meal; in all about 58,320 pounds weight of meal, with ten fed oxen, twenty pasture oxen, a hundred sheep, beside venison, deer, roebuck, does, wild fowl, &c. The Jews say, 60,000 were maintained in his court: but it is more probable they were not above the half. 1 Kings iv. 22, 23. It does not appear, that they were very exact in the seasoning or dressing of their food. Salt was the only seasoning of what was prepared in the temple, if we do not add the oil with which meat-offerings were baked. The paschal lamb was eaten with bitter herbs, salt, honey, butter, oil; and perhaps sometimes aromatic herbs were used in their common dishes. Anciently, it seems, every one of the guests used to have a table by himself; the Chinese, and other eastern nations, we are told, still use this fashion; and the greatest honour done a guest, was to give him a large share. 1 Sam. i. 4, 5. Gen. xviii. 6—8. and xliii. 43. Nations were sometimes averse from eating with one another. The Egyptians hated to eat with shepherds. Gen. xliii. 31. The Jews shunned to eat with heathens, particularly with the Samaritans, John iv. 9; they reproached our Saviour for eating with publicans. Matt. ix. 11. Luke xv. 2. The Jews washed their hands before they took their meals. Mark vii. Anciently they sat at tables, Prov. xxiii. 1; but in after ages, they copied after the Persian, Chaldean, and Roman manner of lying on couches; and hence John leaned on Jesus' bosom at his last supper. John xiii. The different sexes feasted in different apartments, as was the common manner in some places of the East, and which still prevails in Italy and Spain. Perfumes on their hair, or on their beds, together with music and dancing, were common at their feasts. Luke vii. 37. and xv. John xii. Among the modern Jews, the master of the house, or the chief person present, blesses the bread, and afterwards blesses the wine. Just before they take their last glass, he recites a long prayer and thanksgiving, and the company recite the ninth and tenth verses of the xxxiv. Psalm. They are so superstitiously nice that they will have no meat dressed by Christians or heathens. They never mix any milk with flesh; nor will they take milk, butter, or cheese, immediately after flesh; they will not even use the same instruments or vessels in dressing or holding milk, which they use for flesh.

The abolition of the ceremonial law, by the death of Jesus Christ, took away the legal distinction of meats; but, to avoid offending the weak Jews, who had embraced Christianity, and were still attached to their ancient customs, the synod of Jerusalem required their Christian brethren to abstain from meats offered to idols, and from things strangled, and from blood. This matter, especially that of eating things offered to idols, which were sometimes, after the oblation, sold in the public markets, occasioned considerable disturbance. Paul determines, that all food was clean and indifferent in itself, and that whatever was bought in the public market might be eaten without any scruple of conscience; but strongly inculcates the abstinence from flesh offered to idols, and from any thing indifferent, if it tended to lay a stumbling-block before any person, or grieved any tender conscience; and charges such as did otherwise, with being murderers of their Christian brethren, for whom Christ died. Tit. i. 15. Rom. xiv. 1 Cor. vi. 11—13; viii. and x. Christ's mediatorial work is represented as his meat; it was more delightful to him than his necessary food. John iv. 32, 34. He in his person, righteousness, and fullness, and God in him, are represented as meat; as true and satisfying food, the receiving and enjoyment of which nourishes up men's souls to eternal life. John vi. 55. Gal. ii. 20. Psal. xxxiv. 8. The truths of God in the Scripture are meat; they refresh and nourish men's souls; and the deeper mysteries are strong meat, which can only edify and nourish strong Christians. Jer. xv. 16. Heb. v. 12, 14. Ceremonial ordinances are called meats and drinks; much of them related to eatables. Heb. xiii. 9. Col. ii. 16. The kingdom of God consists not in meat and drink, but in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost: the gospel-dispensation does not relate to meats and drinks; nor does true inward religion consist in observances of these, but in applying Christ's righteousness, and studying to have fellowship with and conformity to God. Rom. xiv. 17. The fruit of the saints is for meat and medicine; their godly instructions and holy examples are most edifying. Ezek. xlvii. 11. Men are meat to others, when they are given up to be destroyed by them. Psal. xlv. 11. and lili. 4. Num. xiv. 9. and xxiv. 8. Sin is meat to men; they delight in it, and promise themselves nourishment from it; but it becomes the gall of asps within them. Job xx. 14. Sorrowful meat, is coarse provision, which mourners ate. Job vi. 7. Tears are meat, when sorrow takes away all appetite for meat. Psal. xliii. 3. The year of release was meat for the Hebrews; they ate what grew of its own accord on it. Luke xxv. 6. Israel's ordinary food, which God diminished, was their accustomed prosperity. Ezek. xvi. 27. See BAT; BREAD.

MEDDLE; to provoke to anger. 2 Kings xiv. 19. (3.) To attack in war. Deut. xxv. 19. (8.) To be familiar with. Prov. xx. 19. and xxiv. 21. (4.) To interfere; seek to have to do with. Prov. xxvi. 17.

ME-DEBA; a city a considerable way eastward of Jordan, and not far from Heshbon. It seems Sihon took it from the Moabites, or Ammonites. Num. xxi. 30. It is certain that it fell to the share of the Reubenites, and was one of those on the south-east border. Near it there was a delightful plain, along the river Arnon. Josh. xiii. 16. In David's time it was in the hand of the Ammonites; and here their army encamped under the walls, and afterwards fled into the city. 2 Sam. x. It afterwards belonged to the Moabites, and was ravaged by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Isa. xv. ii. and Jer. xlviii. It was, however, rebuilt and inhabited by the Arabs, with whom the poor remains of the Moabites were blended. It continued some ages after Christ, and is called Medeba by Ptolemy.

MEDI-A. See MADAI.

MEDIATOR; one who transacts between parties at variance, in order to bring them to an agreement. Gal. iii. 20. Jesus Christ is the one Mediator. He alone, by satisfaction to God, and intercession with him, and by powerful and gracious instruction and influence on sinful men, brings both together into a new-covenant state of agreement. 2 Tim. ii. 5. He is the Mediator of the better, or new covenant: according to the tenor of the new covenant of grace, he satisfies and intercedes for us, and bestows upon us all necessary grace. Heb. viii. 6. ix. 15. and xii. 24. Moses was a typical mediator, interposing between God and the Hebrew nation; he received the law for them, declared it to them, and interceded with God for them. Gal. iii. 19. Deut. v. 5.

MEDICINE; whatever tends to heal or prevent diseases of soul and body; so the fear of God promotes the real health of both soul and body; and a merry heart, or good conscience, doth good like a medicine. As natural cheerfulness promotes the health of the body, so a conscience sprinkled with Jesus' blood, directed by his word, and ruled by his Spirit, greatly promotes the strength and comfort of the soul. Prov. iii. 8. and xvii. 22. Spiritual medicines are such as tend to remove ignorance, profaneness, and to introduce true life, strength, and comfort, into men's souls. Ezek. xlvii. 12. Medicines for nations, are either the gospel preached among them for the redemption of their souls, Rev. xxii. 2; or means of relief and deliverance. Jer. xxx. 13. and xlvii. 11.

MEDITATION; (1.) Thinking in a fixed manner. Psal. civ. 34. (2.) Prayer is called meditation; because what is prayed for, ought first to be deliberately thought of. Psal. v. 1.

MEEKNESS; a temper of mind humble and submissive to the will of God, and not easily provoked by injuries. Moses was very meek, Num. xii. 3; but Jesus Christ is infinitely more so, and is to be our pattern. Matt. xi. 29.

MEET. Persons, or things, meet together, either by accident or design; and either in a way of wrath, to fight against and destroy, Hos. xiii. 8. Luke xiv. 21; or in a way of friendship, Gen. xiv. 17; or in assembling to worship God. Isa. i. 13.

MEET. See FIT, ANSWERABLE, READY. Col. i. 12. 2 Tim. ii. 21.

ME-GID'DO, or ME-GID'DON: a city of the western Manassites, said to have been forty-four miles north of Jerusalem; but it was, most likely, more. The Canaanites retained it; and near to it, Jabin's army was routed by Deborah and Barak. Judg. i. 27. and v. 19. Solomon rebuilt it. 1 Kings ix. 15. Ahaziah fled to it, when pursued by Jehu's orders, and died there. 2 Kings ix. 27. Josiah was slain near to it. 2 Chron. xxxv. 22. It was a place of great mourning to the Canaanites when Jabin's army was destroyed, and to the Jews when Josiah was slain. Zech. xii. 11.

MEL-CHISE-DEK, king of Salem, and priest of the most high God. Who he was, has afforded much dispute. Some will have him to be Christ, or the Holy Ghost; but Paul distinguishes between him and our Saviour, and says, he was made like unto the Son of God. Both Moses and Paul represent him as a mere man, who reigned in Salem in Canaan. But what man he was, is as little agreed. The Jews and Samaritans assert him to be Shem, their ancestor. The Arabians say he was the grandson of Shem by the father's side, and the great grandson of Japheth by his mother's; and pretend to give us the names of his ancestors. Jurien will have him to be Ham. Dr. Owen is of opinion that he was a descendant of Japheth, and a pledge of the offspring of Japheth's becoming the principal church of God. But how a descendant of Japheth became king of the Canaanites, we know not. Why may we not rather, with Suidas, suppose him to be a descendant of Ham, sprung of a cursed family, and ruling over subjects cursed in their progenitor? Would he be thereby one whit more dissimilar to Jesus Christ? But why all this enquiry after a genealogy which God has concealed; and to render him a distinguished type of our Saviour, hath brought him before us as if dropped from heaven, and, after his work, returning thither? His blessing Abraham, the great heir of promise, and receiving tithes from him, shews him to be superior to Levi and Aaron, who were then in his loins. When Abraham returned from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and his allies, Melchisedek met him in the valley of Shaveh, afterward called the King's Dale, and tendered to him a present of bread and wine, for the refreshment of himself and his wearied troops. He also blessed Abraham, and thanked God for giving him the victory. Abraham acknowledged him priest of the most High God, and gave him a tenth part of the spoil. Gen. xiv. 17-20. Heb. vii. 1-11.

Jesus is a priest after the order of Melchisedek: As God, he was without beginning, without mother: as man, his origin was miraculous, without father; he was installed in his office only by God, and is consequently superior to all the Aaronic and ransomed priests. He communicates all blessings to them, and ought to receive from them proper glory and honour. He, with his flesh that is meat indeed, and his blood that is drink indeed, refreshes his people, when likely to faint in their spiritual warfare; he has no successor, but is possessed of an unchangeable priesthood. Psal. cx. 4. Heb. vii. 1-11. vi. 30. and v. 10.

MEL-ITA, or MAL'TA; is a small island of the Mediterranean sea, about fifty-four miles south of Sicily, and one hundred and fifty north of Africa. It is about eighteen miles long, and twelve broad, and sixty in circumference. It seems to have had its name from its being MELET, or a place of refuge to the ancient Tyrians in their voyages to Carthage and Spain. The Carthaginians took this island from Battus, a prince of Cyrene. The Romans took it from them. About A. D. 63, Paul and his companions were shipwrecked on this island, and kindly entertained by the natives, who, it is probable, were mostly descended from the Tyrians. They imagined Paul to be a god, because he shook a viper off his hand without receiving any hurt from it. Publius, the governor's father, was cured of a bloody flux; and others, informed of this, brought their sick to Paul, and they were healed. When Paul and his companions departed for Italy, the Maltese cheerfully furnished them with necessary provisions. Acts xxviii. 1-11. It is said that no venomous beasts can since live in that country; and that earth is carried from it, to expel venomous animals, and to cure the bites of serpents. It is more probable that ever since there has been some remains of Christianity in this place; though, for many ages past, little more than the name. About A. D. 828, the Mahomedan Saracens seized on it. About 1000, Roger of Sicily took it from them. About 1530, Charles the V. emperor of Germany, and king of Spain, gave it to the military knights, whom the Turks had about seven years before, with terrible bloodshed, driven from Rhodes. When they came thither, the inhabitants were about 12,000, very wretched, and the soil exceedingly barren. It is now quite the reverse; the soil bears excellent fruit, melons, cotton, &c. The inhabitants are between 40,000 and 50,000, and the natives still retain a great deal of the ancient Phœnician or Carthaginian language.

MELODY; a sweet musical sound. Amos v. 23. To make melody in the heart to the Lord, is, from a joyful and thankful disposition, to please him with the praising ascription of glory and honour to him. Col. iii. 16. Eph. v. 19.

MELONS; a kind of pompion, of an agreeable smell, cooling to the blood, and tending to promote urine; and are therefore useful in fevers and stranguries, but of little use for food. Tournefort mentions seven kinds of melons. The Egyptian are the worst; but the Hebrews wickedly preferred these, with coarse cucumbers, fit only for beasts, and leeks and onions to the manna. Num. xi. 4.

MELT; (1.) To render metal or hard bodies, liquid. Ezek. xxii. 22. A molten image is one made by casting the metal in a mould. Exod. xxxii. 4. (2.) To be diminished, and waste away, as snow in a thaw. 1 Sam. xiv. 16. (3.) To faint, or be discouraged. Psal. cxix. 28. Josh. ii. 11. Exod. xv. 15. The earth or mountains melted before, or at the voice of God. The ore on the top of Sinai was melted by the terrible fire on it; hills on earth are depressed by earthquakes or thunder; and his opposers, however strong and fixed, are easily subdued. Judg. v. 5. Psal. xlii. 6. xcvi. 5. Isa. lxiv. 1, 2.

MEMBER; (1.) A part of an animal body, legs, hands, ears, eyes, &c. Psal. cxxxix. 16. Because our whole man, i. e. soul and body, is united into one system, the faculties of the soul, as well as the parts of the body, are called members. Rom. vi. 18, 19. Christ and his people, being considered as a body, the saints are called his members, and members of one another; they are closely united to him as their head, and joined to one another as his, by having the same spirit, engagements, profession and practice. Eph. iv. 25. and v. 30. Our inward principle of corruption being likened to a body, the various affections and lusts thereof belonging, are called members, and members on the earth, that are inclined to earthly things, and much excited and acted by the earthly body. Rom. vii. 23. Col. iii. 5.

MEMORY; (1.) That power of the mind by which we retain or recollect ideas of things formerly seen, imagined, or understood. 1 Cor. xv. 2. The best way to strengthen it is to exercise it, by committing many and important matters to its keeping. (2.) Memorial; name; report. Prov. x. 7. Isa. xxvi. 14.

MEMORIAL; whatever tends to bring a person or thing to remembrance. God's name, JEHOVAH, is his memorial in all generations; the name by which he will be remembered, called upon, and thought and spoken of. Exod. iii. 15. The soul ransom-money, the part of the meat-offering burnt on the altar, and the frankincense set on the shew-bread, are called a memorial; they, as it were, put God in mind of his covenant with, and of the mercies necessary to be shown to the Hebrews; and they also reminded the Hebrews of Jesus as a ransom, offering, and intercessor. Exod. xxx. 16. Lev. ii. 2. and xxiv. 7. The stones of the high-priest's breast-plate, and shoulder-piece, were for a memorial; they tended to put him in mind to pray earnestly for the Hebrew tribes; and, as it were, called down mercies from God upon them. Exod. xxviii. 12, 29.

MEMPHIS, ΜΟΡΗ, or ΝΟΡΗ; a famous city of middle Egypt, about fifteen miles above the parting of the Nile; and on the south-west of which, stood the famed pyramids. It is thought to have been built by Menes, or Mizraim, and before Alexander's time was long the royal city. Here was kept their bull deity, in a stately temple. The princes of it were trepanned or conquered by Psumatichus, their rival, and the country was terribly ravaged, that he might obtain the kingdom. Isa. xix. 18. About the same time, a multitude of the Israelites fled from the Assyrians into Egypt, and being cut off by the sword and pestilence, were buried about Memphis. Hos. ix. 6. The princes or kings of Memphis, often deceived the Jews with empty promises of help, and occasioned the ruin of their state by the Chaldeans. Jer. ii. 16. Terrible was the distress it suffered from the Chaldeans, and Persians. Jer. xvi. 14, 19. and Ezek. xxx. 13, 16. It was however rebuilt, and the Grecian kings of Egypt greatly adorned it. About the time of our Saviour's birth, it was, next to Alexandria, the principal city of Egypt. Notwithstanding numerous disasters, it continued to make some figure till about A. D. 640, when the Saracens destroyed it, and built another almost opposite to it, on the east side of the Nile; which, with the additions made to it by the Fatemite Caliphs, is now called Grand Cairo, or Alkahir. There scarcely remains the least vestige of Memphis, to point out where it stood; probably the Nile runs over its foundations.

MENSTRUOUS; Monthly. To approach a woman under her natural infirmity, is wicked and abominable; and if done wittingly, was punished with the death of both parties by the Hebrew law. Ezek. xviii. 6. Lev. xx. 18. Jerusalem was like a menstruous woman, when rendered weak and detestable to the neighbouring nations. Lam. i. 17. To cast away idols as a menstruous cloth, is to reject them as filthy and detestable. Isa. xxx. 22.

MEN'A-HEM, the son of Gadi, seems to have been general to Zachariah, the son of Jeroboam the Second. No sooner he heard that his master was murdered by Shallum the son of Jabesh, in Samaria, than he marched from Tirzah, and cut off Shallum, and seized the crown for him elf. Provoked that the citizens of Tiphseah did not readily acknowledge him, and open their gates to him, he murdered most of the people, ripped up the women with child, and dashed the infants to pieces. Pul the king of Assyria, soon after invaded his kingdom; but with a thousand talents of silver, or £342,187. 10s. sterling, Menahem procured his friendship. This money Menahem exacted of his people at the rate of fifty shekels from all such as were able to bear it. After a reign of ten years, Menahem died, A. M. 2341; and Pekaiiah his son, after a reign of two years, was murdered by Pekah. 2 Kings xv. 14—26.

MENTION, or make mention, is, (1.) To name, or speak of, especially with pleasure. Exod. xxiii. 13. (2.) To pray for, or recommend one. Rom. i. 9. Gen. xl. 14. To make mention of the God of Israel, but not in truth, is hypocritically to profess to be worshippers of him, and members of his church. Isa. xlviii. 1.

ME-PHIBO-SHETH; (1.) A son of king Saul by RIZPAH. 2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9. (2.) MEPHIBOSHETH, the son of Jonathan, and grandchild of Saul. When his father and friends were killed at the battle of Gilboa, his nurse was so struck with terror at the news, that she let Mephibosheth fall: this fall rendered him ever afterward lame of both his feet. 2 Sam. iv. In his childhood, he was secretly brought up in the family of one Machir of Lodebar, in the land of Gilead. When David was established on the throne of Israel, and had avenged himself on the Philistines and Moabites, he examined Ziba, who had been one of Saul's principal servants, whether any of the house of Saul yet lived, that he might shew them kindness, for the sake of Jonathan. Ziba told him of Mephibosheth. With great earnestness, David sent and brought him to his house, and told him he must eat bread continually at his table. Mephibosheth accepted the favour with the utmost humility and complaisance. David ordered Ziba, and his family of fifteen sons and twenty servants to cultivate for Mephibosheth and his child Micah, the whole inheritance of Saul. 2 Sam. ix.

Some years afterwards when Absalom's rebellion forced David to quit his capital, Mephibosheth desired Ziba to saddle him his ass, that he might ride off with his benefactor as he could not walk. Ziba, instead of obeying him, resolved secretly to deprive him of his whole estate. He went after David with a present of two ass-loads of provisions, and told him that Mephibosheth waited at Jerusalem in hope that the Hebrews, who were in arms against David, would now restore him to the throne of his grandfather and uncle. Hereon David too rashly made a grant of all Mephibosheth's estate to his villanous servant. When, after the defeat of Absalom, David returned to Jerusalem, Mephibosheth met him in deep mourning, his feet neither washed, nor his beard trimmed, since David had gone off from his capital. David asked him, Why he had not gone with him? Mephibosheth told him how Ziba his servant had deceived and slandered him; but added, that David might do with himself as he pleased; and that since, while his father's whole family were all obnoxious to death at his hand, he had made him his table companion, he had no reason to complain of the disposal of his lands to Ziba, nor was it proper the king should trouble himself to provide for him. David told him he need say no more, as he had ordered him and Ziba to share the land between them in equal portions. Mephibosheth replied, that he was content that Ziba should take it all, as the king had safely returned to his throne. By his son Micah, whose sons were Pithon, Melech, Tahrea, and Abaz, he had a numerous posterity. 2 Sam. xvi. 1-4. and xix. 24-30. 1 Chron. viii. 34-40.

ME-RA'RI, the third son of Levi, and father of Mahli and Mushi. When the Hebrews came out of Egypt, the Merrari males, from a month old and upward, were 6,200; and those fit for service, between thirty and fifty years of age, were 3,200. To them it pertained, to bear in their wagons, and to fix the pillars, bars, and boards of the tabernacle. They went first of all the Levites in their march through the wilderness, that the pillars might be set up, and boards fastened, before the hangings came forward to be laid on, as these last were spread before the sacred furniture came up. Num. iii. 33-37. and iv. 29-45. Some of his posterity were sacred porters. 1 Chron. xxvi. 19. Their cities were Jokneam, Kartah, Dimnah, Nahalah, Bezer, Kedemoth, Jahazah, Mephaath, Ramoth-gilead, Mahanaim, Heshbon, Jazer. Josh. xxi. 34-40. 1 Chron. vi. 63, 77-81.

ME-RA-THA'IM; a province of Chaldea, on both sides of the Tigris, and it seems, Pekod, Koa, and Shoa, were places near it; Pekod, it is said, lay near Nineveh. Jer. i. 21. Ezek. xiii. 28.

MERCHANTS. Those of Midian, and other parts of Arabia, were the most ancient. Gen. xxxvii. 28. Those of Nineveh and Jerusalem, were numerous and wealthy. Nah. iii. 16. Ezek. xvii. 4. Christ is likened to a merchant; having all fulness of grace and glory in his hand, he earnestly calls and invites sinful men deliberately to buy, that is, receive freely from him according to their need, and state themselves debtors to his account. Saints are merchants, because, sensible of their great necessity, and persuaded of their having infinite advantage, they trade with him on these terms, and reckon themselves everlasting debtors to the riches of his free grace. Sol. Song iii. 6. Rev. iii. 18. Matt. xiii. 45.

MERCURY the son of Jupiter and Maia, was one of the fabulous deities of the heathen, and messenger to the rest. His Greek name Hermes, denotes him the interpreter of their will. He was worshipped as the god of learning, eloquence, and trade, and famous for lying and deceit. Perhaps he was an ancient king of the Gauls; or what if he was the Egyptian philosopher Hermes Trismegistus, or the very great interpreter worshipped after his death? Or, what if the exploits of Mercury be but those of Moses and Aaron, quite disguised with fable? At Lystra, Paul was taken for Mercury, because of his fine manner of speaking. Acts xiv. 8-12.

MERCY; (1.) Affectionate pity to such as are in misery and distress, and readiness to do them good. Tit. iii. 5. Phil. ii. 1. Col. iii. 12. (2.) Kind acts proceeding from inward compassion, and desire to relieve such as are in pity and want. 1 Tim. i. 13, 16. Psal. cxlv. 9. All God's paths are mercy and truth, to such as keep his covenant: all his dealings with them are the effects of mercy and kindness to them, and are the accomplishment of his promises to them. Psal. xxv. 10. To shew, have, or give mercy, is to discover inward pity and compassion, by acts of kindness to the distressed. Gen. xxxix. 21. Exod. xx. 6. Psal. iv. 1. 2 Tim. i. 18. To find or obtain mercy, to receive acts of kindness, and valuable blessings, proceeding from pity and compassion. Heb. iv. 16. Matt. v. 7. To keep mercy, is to be in a constant readiness to do good freely to the distressed and miserable. Dan. ix. 4. To remember mercy, is to pass injuries unresented, and do acts of undeserved kindness. Hab. iii. 2. To love mercy, is to love Jesus the mercy promised to the fathers, and love to receive the free gifts of God through him and to take a pleasure in doing undeserved good to such as are in misery and want. Mic. vi. 8. To follow mercy, is earnestly to seek after a share in the blessings of the new covenant, and study to exercise acts of pity towards those in misery. Prov. xxi. 21. A man is followed by mercy, when every day he receives multitudes of new blessings proceeding from the love of God, and suited to his need. Psal. xxiii. 6. To forsake one's own mercy, is to neglect or refuse to accept of Jesus, and his everlasting salvation, suited to their case, and tendered to them in the offers of the gospel. John ii. 8. God will have mercy, and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God, rather than burnt-offering. Charitable compassion and kindness toward others, attending and flowing from a spiritual knowledge of, and faith in God as our God, is more highly valued by him than any legal sacrifice. Hos. vi. 6. Matt. ix. 10. Mercy rejoiceth against judgment, as God takes peculiar delight in shewing mercy and kindness to men: and as there is more real pleasure for us to be employed in acts of kindness than in acts of severity, so those merciful men, who, from a principle of true affection, have shewn pity and kindness to the saints, need not fear damnation, but may, and ought to rejoice in the hopes of a future judgment, and a gracious God will take pleasure in their eternal redemption. Jam. ii. 13. God's mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace kiss each other. In the work of our redemption, mercy is shewn in full consistency with every promise, nay, with every threatening as executed on Christ; and justice being fully satisfied, through the finished and law-magnifying righteousness of our Redeemer, accords with, and promotes the peace and reconciliation of sinful men with God. Psal. lxxxv. 10. God's mercy is multiplied to his people, when it is more fully and clearly discovered in greater or more numerous acts of kindness. Jude 2. Christ is the mercy promised to the fathers, he is the free gift of God to sinful and miserable men, suited to supply all their miseries and wants. Luke i. 72. Mic. vii. 20. Eternal life, and the blessings of the new covenant, are called mercies, and sure mercies of David; they proceed from the infinite compassion of God, are purchased by the blood, lodged in the hand, and communicated to undeserving and miserable men, by Jesus our antitypical David, and are in him secured by the love, power, promise, and new-covenant relations of God in him. 2 Tim. i. 18. Isa. lv. 3. With the merciful, God will shew himself merciful. To those disposed by his grace to shew undeserved kindness to their distressed brethren on earth, God will signally manifest his pity in granting them undeserved help and comfort in their distress, and a proper deliverance therefrom. Psal. xviii. 25.

MERCY-SEAT. See ARK.

ME-RO'DACH, or BERODACHBALADAN, or MARDOKEMPAD, was the son of Balaadan king of Babylon. About A. M. 3292, he sent messengers to congratulate Hezekiah on his miraculous recovery, and the deliverance of his capital from the Assyrians, and the retrograde motion of the sun, and perhaps to form an alliance against the Assyrians, now in a very reduced condition. Isa. xxxix. 2 Kings xx. It seems Merodach was a great king, and was worshipped after his death in Babylon: when Cyrus took that city, Merodach's image was broken to pieces. Jer. i. 2. Nebuchadnezzar, it seems, expected his son would be another great Merodach, but he turned out a fool, i. e. Ecil Merodach, or foolish Merodach.

MEROM. The waters of Merom are generally supposed to be the Samachon, or upper lake of JORDAN. Merom in Hebrew, and Samachon in Arabic, signify high. Near these waters, Joshua defeated the allied armies of Jabin. Others think these Canaanites would not abandon so much of their country to the conqueror, and wait for him at the lake of Samachon; and will have the waters of Merom to have been situated near mount Tabor, and the river Kishon, at some important pass, where Barak defeated the army of Jabin the Second. It is certain, what we render high places, is, in the Hebrew, Merome. Judg. v. 18.

MEROZ; a city in the neighbourhood of the river Kishon, the inhabitants of which refused to assist Barak against the army of Jabin. At the direction of an angel, Deborah and Barak denounced a grievous curse upon them. Jud. v. 23; but what effect it had, and whether this be the Merrus of Eusebius and Jerome, about twelve miles north from Sebaste, there is no proof.

MESHA; a place where the posterity of Joktan had their west border. Calmet will have it to be Mount Masius in Armenia; but as all the Oriental writers agree, that Joktan's posterity peopled Arabia the Happy, we cannot believe him. We must therefore seek Mesha in the west parts of Arabia. But whether it was Munza, a seaport town on the Red Sea, or the famed Mecca, to which multitudes of Mahometans now travel in pilgrimage, and which was anciently called Mesha, cannot now be determined. Gen. x. 80.

MESHA, the king of Moab. After the death of Ahab, he revolted from the yoke of the ten tribes, and refused his yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs, and as many rams, with the wool. Provoked at this, Joram king of Israel, assisted by the Jews and Edomites, invaded his kingdom, and routed his army before they could put themselves in battle-array. Mesha shut himself up in Ar, his capital; and finding that he could not decoy the king of Edom, nor break through his troops, though he reckoned them the weakest of the besiegers, he, filled with rage against the Israelites, took his eldest son and heir to the crown, and offered him for a burnt-sacrifice on the wall, as the last and only effectual means to procure the favour and assistance of his idol-god. The enemy seeing this token of his desperation, went home with their booty. Whether it was this king who afterward invaded the land of Edom, and having taken the king of it, dead or alive, burnt his body to lime, is not altogether certain. 2 Kings ii. and iii. Amos ii. 1.

MESHECH; the sixth son of Japheth. He is supposed to be the father of the Moscheni, who inhabited the Moschic mountains on the north-east of Cappadocia; and that the Muscovites are partly his descendants. Before the Chaldean conquests, the Moscheni traded with the Tyrians, in vessels of brass, and in slaves. But whether they brought them by land, or whether the Tyrians sailed up the Euxine or Black Sea, and obtained them there, is uncertain. Ezek. xxvii. 13. The Meshech-Tubal, and their multitude, whose graves were round about their prince, are supposed to be the Scythians, that were massacred in Media about the end of Josiah's reign, or perhaps also the Gauls and Scythians, who were cut off by the kings of Lydia. Ezek. xxxii. 26. Meshech's posterity will assist the Turks against the Jews at the beginning of the millennium, but will perish in their attempt. Ezek. xxxviii. 23. and xxxix. 1.

ME-SO-PO-TAMI-A; a famous province between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. The Hebrews called it Padan-aram, or the Field of Aram; and the north-west of it, if not the whole of it, was called Aram-naharaim, or Syria of the two rivers. This country, in the largest acceptation of the term, was the first residence of mankind, both before and after the flood. Here were situated Eden, Shinar, and Babylon. Here Abraham, Nahor, Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, Rachel, and all the children of Jacob, except Benjamin, were born. Acts vii. 2. Gen. ix. 31; xxix; xxx. Neh. ix. 7. From this country Balaam came to curse Israel. Deut. xxiii. 4. Here reigned Cushanrishathaim, who was the first oppressor of the Hebrews after their settlement. Judg. iii. 8. Great numbers of the Syrians of Mesopotamia assisted the Ammonites against David; and it seems dismayed his troops, if they did not gain some victory over them, which occasioned his penning of the sixtieth Psalm. In after times, Mesopotamia was reduced by the Assyrians, and afterward by the Chaldeans. It afterwards came under the yoke of the Persians, Greeks, Romans, Parthians, Saracens, Seljukian Turks, Tartars, Turkman, and Ottoman Turks, in succession. No country in the universe has been more deluged with human blood. According to Ptolemy, it anciently contained twenty cities on the east bank of the Euphrates, fourteen on the west banks of the Tigris, and thirty-five in the inland country. At present, with the exception of Chaldea, it contains no places of note; but Karahmet, Rakka, Moussul, Orfa, Nisibis, Bir, Gezir, Meriden, Amad, Carasara, Felajah, and Kornah. Great numbers of Jews remained in this country, after Cyrus gave them liberty to return to their own land. Many of the Mesopotamian Jews attended Peter's first sermon, and believed in Christ. Christianity has never since been wholly extirpated from the country. Acts ii. 9.

MESSAGE. The message from God to Eglon by Ehud, was a violent death, by the divine appointment. Judg. iii. 20. The Jewish citizens, in the parable delivered by our Saviour, sent a message after him, that they would not have him to reign over them; after his ascension, they openly and contemptuously rejected his person, office, grace, and law. Luke xix. 14.

MESSENGER; one sent on an errand, to carry a message, or the like. Christ is called the messenger of the covenant. In his Father's name, he came to fulfil the condition of the new covenant, and to publish and apply its contents to men by his word and Spirit. Mal. iii. 1. Job xxxiii. 23. John Baptist, and other prophets and teachers, are Christ's messengers; they are sent by God to declare his will, and publish the approach of his Son into our world, and into his public ministry; or into men's hearts. Mal. iii. 1. and ii. 7. Ministers are messengers of the churches; they bring messages from God for the salvation of men; they act in the church's work and errands; and by them the churches, as it were, return answer to, or present their requests before God. 2 Cor. viii. 23. Angels, the Assyrians, or other instruments of God's wrath, who quickly execute his judgments, are swift messengers. Isa. xviii. 2. The messengers of the nations to be informed that the Lord ad founded Zion, are those who came from the heathen around, to enquire concerning Hezekiah's marvellous recovery, the going back of the sun, and the overthrow of Sennacherib's host. Isa. xiv. 32. Satan, and the judgments of God, are the evil and cruel messengers sent against men obstinately wicked, or the unmerciful officer who carries them to prison, or takes away their life. Psal. lxxviii. 49. Prov. xvii. 11. Evil angels, persecuting men, horrid temptations, sore afflictions, strongly excited corruptions, are the messengers of Satan. 2 Cor. xii. 7. The king's wrath is a messenger of death; it threatens death or ruin to the objects of it, and has sometimes frightened persons out of their life. Prov. xvi. 14.

MESS; a portion of meat at table. Gen. xliii. 34.

MES-SIAH. See CHRIST; JEWS.

METHEG-AMMAH, was either Gath, or some other city near it, by which, as a bride of bondage, the Philistines were enabled to keep the Hebrews of the country adjacent in slavery. David took it from the Philistines. 2 Sam. viii. 1.

MICAH; an Ephraimite of Mount Ephraim, near SHILOH, the son of a rich but superstitious widow. Micah stole from her 1100 shekels of silver, or about £125. 10s. sterling. She pronounced a bitter curse against the thief who had stolen her money. Micah at length told her that he had taken her money, or had recovered it. Overjoyed with this news, she blessed him, and bade him keep it to himself; he, however, restored it. She told him it had been dedicated to the service of God, to make images of it, for their family-worship. The images (one graven, and another molten) were made, and also an ephod for their idolatrous priest: Micah placed them in a chamber, and consecrated one of his sons to be the priest. As Jonathan the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh or Moses, a vagrant Levite, passed that way, Micah imagined it would be more propitious to have him for his priest, and more effectual to procure the blessing of heaven upon the family. He, therefore, hired him at the low rate of his victuals, a suit of clothes, and ten shekels, or 22s. 10d. a-year. Ah! how base are abandoned clergymen. Soon after, he gave Micah the slip, and carrying his idols with him, went with six hundred Danites to Laish. Micah, overwhelmed with grief for the loss of his gods, assembled his neighbours, and overtaking the Danites, complained that they had rendered him superlatively wretched, by carrying off his gods. They were so far from pitying him, that they threatened his life, unless he and his attendants speedily departed. Judg. xvii. and xviii.

MICAH, the Morasthite, an inhabitant of Moresbeth, near Gath, one of the lesser prophets, was contemporary with Isaiah, whom he somewhat resembles in his style. Isa. i. 1. ii. 1—4. and xli. 15. with Mic. i. 1. and iv. 1—4, 13. He continued prophesying about fifty years, in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, and seems to have had a considerable share of contempt and affliction. Mic. i. 1. and vii. 1—10. In the first three chapters of his prophecy, he exclaims against the wickedness of the ten tribes, but chiefly of the rulers, priests, and false prophets of Judah; foretells the Assyrian invasion, and the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans and Romans. In the fourth and fifth, he foretells their deliverance from the Assyrian and Chaldean captivity, and their subsequent flourishing condition; but chiefly the birth of the Messiah, the spread of his gospel, the spiritual conquest of the nations to his sway, and the spiritual peace and prosperity of the New-Testament church. In the last two, he reproves Israel and Judah for their ingratitude, oppression, fraud, and lying, their observance of the idolatrous laws of Omri and Ahab; and their want of natural affection; also with their treachery, and mocking of the pious: he predicts the Assyrian ravages and ruin of their city and temple; remarks the astonishing mercy and faithfulness of God; and concludes with a prediction of God's re-establishment of the Jews, as in the days of old.

MI-CA'I-AH, the son of Imlah, an Ephraimite, a faithful prophet, who used to reprove Ahab very freely for his wickedness. Whether he is the same prophet who foretold to Ahab his repeated victories over the Syrians, is doubtful; but it was, most probably, he who in disguise met Ahab as he returned from Aphek to Samaria. He had just before, in the name of the Lord, desired his neighbour to smite him, who declined it; and, as the prophet declared, a lion soon after met him, and killed him. The prophet bade another who came by smite him; the fellow did so, and wounded him. The prophet then looking like a wounded soldier, covered himself with ashes, as one come from a field of battle. When Ahab came up, he, in his disguise, called out to him, and stopped him. He parabolically represented, that having been at the battle, one had committed to him a prisoner, to be kept under pain of death, or of paying a talent of silver: and that while he was busied in other matters, the prisoner had escaped. Ahab told him he must stand to the agreement, and pay the penalty. The prophet then threw off his disguise, and Ahab knew who he was. He told Ahab, that since he had suffered Benhadad to escape with life and honour, who was a vile blasphemer, and whom God had providentially delivered into his hands; his life, and that of his subjects, should go for that of Benhadad and his people. 1 Kings xx. When Ahab intended to take Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians, he, to gratify Jehoshaphat his ally, sent for Micaiah, who, he said, had always prophesied evil concerning him, that he might consult him whether he should go and besiege Ramoth-gilead or not. As Micaiah was introduced into the king's presence, some courtiers told him how the prophets of Baal had unanimously assured the king of success in the war, and begged he would also give a favourable opinion. He told them he would say what the Lord directed him. When he was come into Ahab's presence, and interrogated on the affair, he ironically bade him go up to Ramoth-gilead, and expect the Lord would deliver it into his hand. Ahab observing his manner of pronouncement, adjured him by God, to tell him nothing but the truth. Micaiah then seriously told him, that in a vision he had seen the army of Israel returning from the war without a king to head them; and had it represented to him, that God had permitted Satan, as a lying spirit, to enter into the prophets of Baal, that they might entice him to go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead. Zedekiah, the son of Chenaanah, who had made himself horns of iron, and told Ahab that with these he should push the Syrians till he had consumed them, smote Micaiah on the cheek, and asked him which way the Spirit of the Lord had come from him to speak with him? Micaiah replied, he should know that, when, for fear of the Syrians, he would run into an inner chamber to hide himself. Ahab then ordered Micaiah to be taken to the prison of Samaria, and there fed on bread and water till he returned in peace. Micaiah took all the assembly to witness, that if ever Ahab returned safe, he would consent to be regarded as a false prophet. But the event fully justified his prediction. 1 Kings xxii. 7-23.

MI'CHA-EL, the archangel, at least sometimes, signifies Jesus Christ. He is the person who is as God, which this name signifies: against him and his angels, his ministers, and followers, the devil and the heathen empire of Rome, and their agents, fought by reproaches, laws, persecutions, &c. Rev. xii. 7. He is the great prince of the Jewish nation, who, in the millennium, shall recover them from their present misery, and shall raise the dead. Dan. xii. 1-3. But perhaps when Michael is called one of the chief princes, i. e. principal angels, or is said to dispute with the devil about the body of Moses, and durst not, that is, thought it not becoming his dignity, to bring a railing accusation against the devil, but rebuked him in the name of the Lord, it may also signify a created angel. Dan. x. 13. Jude 9.

MICHAL, the daughter of Saul. Her father after his deceitful disposal of Merab, her eldest sister, to Adriel the Meholahite, when she ought to have been given to David, being informed that Michal had a strong affection to David, promised her to him in marriage; but in order to ruin him, required a hundred foreskins of the Philistines as her dowry. Two hundred were given, and Michal was married. Not long after, her father designing to murder David in her house, she got notice of it, and let him down from a window in the night, and begged him to escape for his life. To amuse her father's messengers, she put an image and teraphim, (which it seems she kept for private idolatry,) and laid it in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for the bolster, and pretended it was David lying sick. When next morning new messengers came to apprehend David, sick as he was thought to be, the bed was searched, and the deception discovered. Michal told her father, that David threatened to kill her if she did not assist him to make his escape. 1 Sam. xix. 11-17. Not many years after, when David was in a state of exile, Saul married Michal to Phalti, or Phaltiel, the son of Laish, a Benjamite of Gallim. 1 Sam. xxv. 44. When, about eight or nine years after, Abner proposed to make David king of all Israel, David required the restoration of Michal his wife, as one of the preliminaries of the treaty. Ishbosheth, her brother, sent her, on David's demand. Phalti, her last, but adulterous husband, by whom, perhaps, she had children, attended her, weeping, till they came to Bahurim, where Abner ordered him back. Her upbraiding David with his joyful attendance on the ark to Jerusalem, as if too base for one of his station, was divinely punished with perpetual barrenness; but it seems she took and educated the five children which her sister Merab bore to Adriel; or Michal is put for the sister of Michal. 2 Sam. iii. 12-16. vi. 16-23. and xxi. 8, 9.

MICH'MASH; a city of the Benjamites, about nine miles north-east of Jerusalem, and perhaps four south-east of Bethel.

Here the vast host of the Philistines encamped. Near to it was a high rock, with two sharp sides, or two sharp rocks, viz. Seneh and Bozez, the one fronting Michmash on the north, and the other Gibeah on the south; up one of which Jonathan and his armour-bearer climbed, and commenced the rout of the Philistines' army. Here too was a strait passage. 1 Sam. xiii. 5, 23. and xiv. 1-16. Here Sennacherib laid up his heavy carriages and provision, and perhaps mustered his army, when he invaded Judea. Isa. x. 28. Michmash was rebuilt after the captivity, Neh. xi. 31; and was a place of some note about A. D. 400.

MIDI-AN, the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah, and father of the Midianites, who inhabited the land of Midian. Gen. xxv. 2. In scripture, two different places are spoken of as the land of Midian; the one about the north-east point of the Red sea, where Abulfeda places the city of Midian, or Madian, and where Jethro dwelt. These western or southern Midianites were also called Cushites, because they dwelt in the country originally pertaining to Cush. They retained the true religion, when it seems to have been lost by the eastern or northern Midianites. Exod. ii. Num. xii. 1. The northern Midianites dwelt on the east of the Dead sea, and were neighbours to the Moabites. The Midianites consisted of five principal tribes, descended from Ephah, Ephraim, Hanoah, Abideh, and Eldaah, each of which seems to have had its own king. The Midianites very early applied themselves to traffic, particularly with Egypt, in spices, balm, &c.; some of them were engaged in the conveyance of Joseph into Egypt; and it seems, some ages after, they had a war with the Edomites under king Hadad. Gen. xxv. 2, 4. xxxvii. 28, 36. and xxxvi. 35. The Midianites were mightily alarmed at the passage of the Hebrews through the Red sea, and at the marvellous appearances on Sinai, and in the wilderness. Heb. iii. 7. Most of the southern Midianites, it is likely, removed from the neighbourhood of the Red sea on that occasion, and settled with their brethren on the borders of Moab. It seems Sihon had conquered their country; for their five kings are called dukes of Sihon. Josh. xiii. 21. Some of the elders of Midian attended those of Moab, to bring Balaam to curse Israel. By his advice, a multitude of the Midianitish women entered the Hebrew camp, which was at Abeshittim, on their north border, and enticed the Hebrews to whoredom and idolatry. This brought a plague from the Lord upon the Hebrews, in which 24,000 were cut off. To revenge this, the Lord directed Moses to send 12,000 Hebrews into the country of Midian, to slay every person they could find, virgins excepted. The Hebrews did so, and killed Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, kings of Midian, together with Balaam, and multitudes more. They burnt their cities, and carried off a rich booty of 32,000 virgins, 675,000 sheep, 72,000 oxen, 61,000 asses, which were equally divided betwixt the 12,000 warriors and the rest of the Hebrews. The fiftieth part of the congregation's moiety, and the five hundredth part of the warriors' moiety, were assigned to the Lord. Num. xxii. xxv. and xxxi. Josh. xiii. Some ages after, the Midianites, who had escaped this destruction, were mightily increased, and for seven years grievously oppressed the Hebrews; but were at last overthrown by Gideon; and their kings Oreb and Zeeb, Zebah and Zalmunna, with about 135,000 men, fell by the sword. Judg. vi. vii. and viii. Isa. ix. 4. and x. 26. Psal. lxxxiii. 9-12. The remains of the Midianites seem to have become incorporated with the Moabites and Arabians. Some of their descendants, or the inhabitants of their country, did in the apostolic age, and shall in the millennium, embrace the Christian faith. Isa. lx. 6.

MIDST: (1.) In the inmost part, which is equally distant from both extremities. Num. xxxv. 5. Ezek. xlvi. 15. (2.) Among. Deut. xviii. 15. Mark x. 16. (3.) The thickest throng. Luke iv. 30. (4.) The most convenient place. Deut. xix. 2. God walked in the midst of the Hebrew camp: his tabernacle was settled and carried about in the midst of them. Deut. xxiii. 14. He is in the midst of his church, and Jesus is in the midst of the golden candlesticks: he is among them by his ordinances; he is in their hearts by faith, and is equally near to, present with, and ready to help the churches, and their true members. Zeph. iii. 17. Rev. i. 13. Christ is in the midst of the throne: he is the middle person in the adorable Trinity: he is the Mediator between God and men: he is equally accessible by all sinners that come to him, or are worshippers of him, and is infallibly established in his glory and exaltation. Rev. vii. 17.

MIG'DOL, or MAG'DO-LUM; a place near the north-west point of the Red sea, and not far from Sin. On the east or south-east of it, the Hebrews encamped, before they passed through the sea. Exod. xiv. 2. Here Johanan the son of Kareah, and the rebellious Jews, took up their residence. Jer. xlv. 1. The ravages of Egypt from Migdol to Syene, imported a conquest of the whole country, by the Chaldeans and Persians in their turns. Ezek. xxix. 10.

MIGHTILY; (1.) Greatly. Deut. vi. 3. (2.) With great force. Rev. xviii. 2.

MIGHTY; (1.) Of great power and activity. Jer. ix. 23. (2.) Very great and aggravated. Amos v. 12.

MILCOM. See MOLECH.

MILDEW; a blight which falls on grass, corn, and leaves, in the form of dew, and when dried on them by the heat of the sun, prevents them from spreading themselves; they then shrink and soon wither. Shaking off the leaves, corns, or grass, just after it falls, before it be dried, may do some good; but the only effectual cure is wind and rain quickly after, which at once washes and shakes it off. Deut. xxviii. 22. Amos iv. 9. Hag. ii. 17.

MILE. The ancient Hebrews had no miles, furlongs, or feet, in their reckonings of measure, but measured by cubits, reeds, and lines. Ezek. xl-xlviii. The Greeks measured by stadia, or furlongs; the Romans measured by miles, each of which was equal to eight of the Greek furlongs, and contained 5000 feet. The miles of the modern nations are very different. Reckoning by the Roman foot, which is nearly four-tenths of an inch less than ours, or is to ours as 967 is to 1000, the Russian mile consists of 3750 feet, the Italian of 5000, the English of 5454, the Scotch of 6130, the French mile, or league, of 15,750; the mile of Burgundy of 18,000; the Lithuanian, of 18,508; the Persian mile, or parasanga, of 18,750; the Polish mile, of 19,853; the Flandrian, of 20,000; the German, of 20,000, 22,500, or 25,000; the Spanish, of 21,270; the Dutch, of 24,000; the Egyptian, of 25,000 feet.—We may observe, that the Italian mile contains but 4835 English feet; the English mile, 5280; the Scottish, 5920. Travellers into the east often calculate their journeys by hours, one of which is about a French league, or rather less.

MILETUS, or MILETUM, a city and sea-port of Caria in Lesser Asia, and the capital city of both Caria and Ionia. It is said to have been built by Miletus, the son of the idol-god Apollo. Here were four harbours, sufficient to contain all the Persian fleet. Here was a magnificent temple of Apollo. Here Thales and Anaximenes, the famed philosophers, were born, and also Timotheus the famous musician. The place was also famed for its milote, or milate, a soft kind of wool, of which they made fine carpet. The Milesians had anciently kings of their own. The Persians destroyed their city, and transplanted the inhabitants. They returned and rebuilt it, but were afterwards made slaves by the Persians. When they came under the power of the Greeks and the Romans, they were kindly used. They planted colonies in Spain and other places. Some think they peopled Ireland. Miletus lay about thirty-six miles south-west of Ephesus. Here Paul sent for, and gave solemn charges to the elders of that church. Acts xx. 15–38. For about three hundred years after Christ, we find no indications of a Christian church at Miletus; but in the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries of the Christian era, there were bishops in this place. Since the Saracens ravaged these parts, Miletus has gone to ruin, so that nothing is to be now seen but rubbish, and a few cottages for shepherds.

MILK; a well known substance in the breasts of females for the nourishment of their young, and has sometimes been produced in males. It consists of three different substances, whence butter, cheese, and whey are formed. To the corruption of milk in the stomachs of infants, is owing most of their diseases. The milk of goats, asses, mares, and cows, is often used as a medicine in consumptive cases; but when the juices of the stomach are sharp and sour, milk is readily turned into curd, and it then hurts the health. A land flowing with milk and honey, is one abounding with these and other delightful provisions. Josh. v. 6. To milk are compared, (1.) The soul-nourishing, restoring, and comforting blessings of redemption. Isa. lv. i. (2.) The pure word of God, especially the more easy and plain truths of the gospel, by which the saints, even in their spiritual infancy and weakness, are delighted, nourished, healed, and restored. 1 Pet. ii. 1. (3.) Edifying converse on gospel-truths, which mightily delights and refreshes the sincere hearers thereof. Sol. Song iv. 11. See WINE.

MILL, MILLSTONE. See GRIND.

MILLET; a coarse kind of grain, which was given to beasts, and little used by men, except in times of great scarcity; but whether the DOHHAN appointed of God for Ezekiel, as part of his provision, was millet, cannot be determined. Ezek. iv. 9.

MILLO; a noted person, or a place near Shechem, whose family, or inhabitants, assisted the Shechemites in making Abimelech king, and were ruined by him at last. Judg. ix. 6, 20. (2.) A place in Jerusalem, adjacent to the city of David, but whether it was a citadel between the city of David and Old Jebus, or if it was the sitting up of the valley between the two, we know not. David began to build about Millo, and gave the command of the place to Joab. 2 Sam. v. 9. 1 Chron. xi. 8. At great expence, Solomon carried on the buildings of Millo; and perhaps here was erected the palace for Pharaoh's daughter. This building occasioned some disgust to Jeroboam the son of Nebat. 1 Kings ix. 14, 24. and xi. 27. King Joash was murdered in the house of Millo, in the going down to the Silla, or causeway that led to the palace. 2 Kings xii. 20.

MILLION; a thousand thousand. Gen. xxiv. 60.

MINCE; to walk nicely. Isa. iii. 16.

MIND, properly signifies the conceiving, judging, and reasoning faculty of the soul; but it is also put for, (1.) The heart, or soul, in general. Gen. xxvi. 35. (2.) The will and affections; and hence we read of readiness of mind. 1 Pet. v. 2. Acts xvii. 11. (3.) The memory, which retains what passes in, or is adverted to, by the understanding. Psal. xxxi. 13. Isa. xlv. 8. (4.) The implanted habit, or principle of grace in the soul, which rules the understanding, and other powers. Rom. vii. 23, 25. (5.) The thoughts and sentiments formed in the understanding. Judg. xix. 30. Isa. xxvi. 8. God is of one mind; his thoughts and purposes are ever the same. Job xxiii. 13. None knows his mind; that is, his purposes are unsearchable to creatures. Rom. xi. 34. What carnal man hath known the mind of the Lord; his counsels, and the mysteries of our redemption; that he may instruct the spiritual man? but spiritual men have the mind of Christ; they are experimentally acquainted with the mysteries of the gospel. 1 Cor. ii. 16. To have the same mind that was in Christ Jesus, is to have similar views of created enjoyments; the same humility and lowliness of disposition, and the same inclination to suffer rather than sin; the same love to souls, and the same willingness to obtain glory through suffering. Phil. ii. 5. A spiritual mind, is one that is renewed by the Holy Ghost dwelling in it, and which chiefly thinks of and delights in divine and spiritual things. Rom. viii. 6. A sound mind, is one ended with the saving knowledge of God in Christ, and the things which concern our everlasting peace. 1 Tim. i. 7. A pure mind, is one cleansed by the blood of Christ, and filled with his Spirit and grace. 2 Pet. iii. 1. A fervent mind, or ready mind, is one filled with strong and lively affections. 1 Pet. v. 2. A sober mind, is one humble and averse to all vanity or intemperance. Tit. ii. 6. A right mind, is one capable of exercising reason without distraction. Mark v. 15. To have the same mind, or to be of one mind, is to agree in sentiment and affection. 1 Pet. iii. 8. Rom. xii. 16. 1 Cor. i. 10. A feeble mind, is one of narrow understanding, and ready to despond at every hardship felt or feared. 1 Thess. v. 14. A carнал, fleshly, or defiled mind, is one in which sin reigns, and attaches it to vile and earthly thoughts, desires and delights. Rom. viii. 7. Col. ii. 18. Tit. i. 15. A corrupt mind, is one full of errors and sinful inclinations. 2 Tim. iii. 8. A double mind, is one inconstant, and even inconsistent with itself, in thoughts, sentiments, and appearances. Jam. i. 8. A hight mind, is one proud and self-conceited. 1 Tim. vi. 17. A reprobate mind, is one given up of God, to entertain and delight in the most absurd errors and impiety. Rom. i. 28. A wicked mind, is one full of malicious, or rather sinful ends and designs. Prov. xxi. 27. To MIND, is to think of, purpose, care for. Rom. xii. 16. Acts xx. 13. Phil. iii. 16.

MINGLE; MIX. God mingled the Jews' adversaries, when he raised up many at once. Isa. ix. 11. His mingling the Egyptians with the Egyptians, and mingling a perverse spirit among them, imports his kindling of civil wars among them by Psammaticus, and his eleven rivals, and between Amasis and Pharaoh-hopbra, &c. Isa. xix. 2, 14. The Romans mingled themselves with the seed of men, but did not cleave to them: they dwelt in the same countries with the Goths, Huns, and other invaders of the empire; but they never had any heartiness of affection, or unity of design with them. Dan. ii. 43. Mingled people, are such as belonged to different tribes in their original state. Jer. xxv. 20, 24. and i. 37. Ezek. xxx. 5. The mixed multitude that attended the Hebrews in their departure from Egypt, were Arabs, Egyptians, Lybians, &c. They first tempted the Hebrews to despise the manna. Num. xi. 4. They generally either died in the wilderness, returned to Egypt, or settled in Arabia. The mixed multitude which Nehemiah separated from the Jews, were the Philistines, Ammonites, Moabites, and others who had come and intermarried among them. Neh. xlii. 8. God's word is mixed with faith, when it is received by faith into the heart. Heb. iv. 2. God's cup of wrath is full of mixture; like strong wine, his wrath is most powerful and penetrating, and comprehends unnumbered judgments. Psal. lxxv. 8. It is without mixture, as no mercy or comfort is mingled with it. Rev. xiv. 10.

MINISTER; (1.) To serve. Exod. xxviii. 1, 4, 41, 43. (2.) To execute an office. Deut. xviii. 5. (3.) To render charitable aid. Matt. xxv. 41. (4.) To effect, produce. Eph. iv. 20.

MINISTER, one who attends upon, and serves another. Exod. xxiv. 13. Jesus Christ was the Minister of the circumcision, as he exercised his public ministry almost solely among the Jews. Rom. xv. 8. He is called the Minister of the sanctuary, and true tabernacle; he exercised his office in his holy human nature; and in heaven he still executes it, interceding for, and pouring down blessings on us. Heb. viii. 2. Angels are God's ministers; they attend his throne, are always ready to execute his commandments, and to help and comfort his people. Psal. civ. 4; and they are called ministering spirits to the elect, as they instruct, direct, guard, provide for, comfort, protect, or deliver them, as God appoints. Heb. i. 14. Apostles, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, are ministers; they attend the service of God and his church, and did, or do, faithfully and wisely dispense Christ's word, sacraments, and discipline to his people. 1 Cor. iv. 1. Magistrates are God's ministers: their office is to serve him and their country, in promoting true religion, punishing evil-doers, and in protecting and encouraging such as do well. Rom. xiii. 4, 6. A minister of sin, is one who encourages and assists in the commission of sin. Gal. ii. 17.

MINISTRY; (1.) The office of a minister in the church. Acts i. 17. (2.) The discharge of such an office. Hos. xii. 10. (3.) The service belonging to deacons. Rom. xii. 7. The ministry of reconciliation, is either the gospel itself, which declares, offers, and effects peace between God and men, or the office of preaching it. 2 Cor. v. 8.

MINISTRATION; (1.) Service in the work of a minister. Luke i. 23. 2 Cor. ix. 13. The law of Moses is the ministration of death and condemnation. It convinces men that they are guilty of death spiritual, and condemns them to death eternal; and for many of the breaches of it, God required men to be cut off by a temporal and violent death. The gospel is the ministration of the Spirit that giveth life: it proceeds from the Holy Ghost; is confirmed and applied by him; and by means of it he conveys life, and all spiritual graces and benefits, to the souls of men. 2 Cor. iii. 7, 8.

MINSTREL; a musician, or piper. Perhaps the minstrel which Elisha called for, to allay his ruffled spirit, might be one of the singers of the temple, who played to him one of David's Psalms. 2 Kings iii. 15. From minstrels playing at the death of Jairus's daughter, it seems that the Jews had introduced the heathenish custom of diverting themselves on occasions of death; and which still appears in those foolish wakes, and revelling dirges, invented no doubt by Satan, to prevent all serious thoughts of, or concern about death, that might then be excited. Matt. ix. 23.

MIN'NI; an ancient kingdom, whose king and troops assisted the Medes and Persians to destroy Babylon. Probably it was the same with Minias. Jer. li. 27.

MINNITH; a city about four miles from Heshbon, on the road to Rabbah. In the days of Jephthah, Minnith belonged to the Ammonites, and to this place Jephthah pursued them. Judg. xi. 23. It was famed for its fine wheat. Ezek. xxvii. 17.

MINT; a well-known herb. Its flower is a single leaf, and its seeds are at the bottom of the cup. It generally yields three crops a-year: and is very useful for the cure of the head and stomach. Its water, its oil, and decoction, are well known. Tournefort mentions twenty-three kinds of mint. If mint grow in a glass, and a glass of salt water be set near it, it will imbibe a saltish flavour; or if a glass full of ink be set near it, it will become blackish, and taste of copperas; or if a little of the decoction of garlic seeds be put into the water in which mint grows, it will quickly wither and have the taste of garlic. Matt. xxiii. 23.

MIRACLE; a wonderful effect, superior or contrary to the laws of nature. To pretend that there can be no miracles, as the laws of nature are fixed by the divine will, and so very good, is stupidly and blasphemously to chain down the Almighty as a slave, to the order of second causes. To pretend that no miracles ought to be credited, because they are contrary to the common observation of mankind, is stupid in a superlative degree. If miracles were not contrary to the common observation of mankind, they could be no miracles at all, nor have any effect as such. The negative testimony of unnumbered millions as to an event which they are allowed to be absent from the place of at the time of its happening, is of no force at all. Miracles are not a whit more real discoveries of the power of God, than the common preservation and government of things; but are an exertion of his power in an uncommon manner, to alarm the world, and answer some important end. As we are not able to understand how far the powers of second causes may go, or the power of evil angels may extend, God has not allowed us to rest the proof of a revelation upon miracles alone, but to examine also the doctrine confirmed by them, whether it be worthy of God. Nor are the miracles by which he has confirmed the mission of the principal publishers of his revelation, a few, or any way doubtful, but multitudes, all of the uncontrolled kind, neither wrought to confirm any thing trifling nor base, nor contradicted by a superior power; and most of them in the most open manner, before friends and foes. Many of them were often repeated; they concurred to establish a system of religion, honourable to God, and unspeakably useful to men, calculated to render them happy in this and in a future state. Nor did the workers of them make any proud boasting of these wondrous exploits. The miracles pretended to have been wrought by Apollonius and Vespasian were neither evidently superior to the power of second causes, nor have we any proper evidence of the facts, but the mere report of zealous partizans, or flatterers. The pretended miracles of the papists, either relate to trifles unworthy of the divine interposition, or they were wrought before persons drowned in gross ignorance, and incapable of trying them, or before persons resolved at any rate to believe them. Nothing of the delusive kind ever exceeded the exploits of the Egyptian magicians: but the miracles of Moses exceeded them; his rod, when turned into a serpent, swallowed up their rods, which were transformed in like manner. He produced many miraculous plagues, which they could not. Our Saviour's miracles were so transcendent in their nature, so benevolent in their tendency, so divine in their manner, (by a touch, or a word) so full in their evidence, (before thousands of friends and foes) so correspondent to the ancient prophecies concerning the Messiah, and therefore so calculated to confirm the most exalted and benevolent system of doctrines and laws, and the history of them so plain and simple, and so exposed to the trial of his worst enemies, that nothing but want of capacity to examine and perceive them, or hearty hatred of him and his doctrine, can hinder us from believing them, and that the gospel is confirmed thereby. When the form of true religion is once established in the world, there is no need of the continuance of miracles for its confirmation; as the attention of men has been already sufficiently awakened to consider it, and the mission of its publishers sufficiently attested; and the prevalence of the true religion, in opposition to the inclinations and endeavours of men, with the fulfilment of prophecies, succeed in their room. The miracles of Moses were similar to his fiery law, mostly ruinous and destructive. The miracles of Jesus, like his gospel, were almost wholly of the benevolent kind.

MIRE; (1.) Mud, dirt. 2 Sam. xxii. 43. (2.) A fenny moist place. Job vii. 11. Reprobates are likened to marshes and miry places: How sour and corrupting their nature! how entangling their practice! and how, notwithstanding what fair pretences they may have, they sink towards hell! Ezek. xlvii. 11. Wicked courses are likened to mire and dirt: How base and polluting! how entangling, and drowning of men in perdition! and how often, after a seeming escape therefrom, men return thereto! 2 Pet. ii. 22. Sore afflictions are likened to mire, and miry clay: How base, contemptible, and disagreeable, in the view of a carnal world, they render men! and how hard it is to get out of them, or avoid sinking deeper and deeper in them! Job xxx. 19. Psal. lxxix. 2, 14.

MIRIAM, the sister of MOSES, who, at the desire of Pharaoh's daughter, called his own mother to nurse him. It is said she was married to HUR. She directed the Hebrew women in their songs of praise, after their safe passage through the Red sea. For her railing at Moses, she was smitten with a leprosy, but cured by his prayers; and died, and was buried at Kadesh, A. M. 2552. Exod. ii. and xv. 21, 22. Num. xii. and xx. 1.

MIRTH. See JOY.

MISCHIEF; hurt, injury. To conceive, devise, imagine, or have mischief in one's heart, and to practise it, is to contrive, resolve on, and put in execution, the hurting of others. Job xv. 35. Psal. xxxvi. 4. and xxviii. 3. 1 Sam. xxiii. 9. To frame mischief by a law, is to enact laws tending to men's hurt and ruin. Psal. xciv. 20. To imagine mischief against God, is to contrive methods of dishonouring him. Hos. viii. 15. Wicked men have mischief under their tongue, in their heart, and are in readiness to utter words, tending to their own or others' hurt. Psal. x. 7. They sleep not except they have done mischief, and caused some to fall; they daily hurt somebody, and are never more delighted than when so employed. Prov. iv. 16. and vi. 18. and x. 23.

and xxiv. 2. Their mischiefs returns on their head, and the mischiefs of their lips consumes them, when their purposes, endeavours, and speeches, designed for the hurt of others, turn to their own ruin, as happened in the case of Haman. Psal. vii. 16. and xli. 9. Mischievous, is what tends or intends to hurt. Psal. xxi. 11. Prov. xxiv. 8.

MISERY, is whatever tends to distress and render one wretched. Jud. x. 16. Job's friends were miserable comforters, who, instead of comforting and encouraging him, much added to his distress by their uncharitable speeches. Job xvi. 2. If the dead should not be raised, gospel ministers and saints would be of all men the most miserable; as through their endeavours to follow and serve Christ, they are deprived of many pleasures of this life, and exposed to the hatred and persecution of men. 1 Cor. xv. 19.

MIS'RE-PHOTH-MA'IM, or the burnings of waters, was either hot baths, or a glass-work, near Zidon, or, more probably, hot baths in the north of Gilead. To this place Joshua's troops pursued that part of Jabin's army that fled to the westward. Josh. xi. 8.

MISS; (1.) To fail of hitting an intended mark. Judg. xx. 16. (2.) To be wanting. 1 Sam. xxv. 15. (3.) To take notice of one's absence. 1 Sam. xx. 18.

MIST; (1.) A moist, dusky vapour of the air, that waters and refreshes the earth; it chiefly hovers over hills and moist places. Gen. ii. 6. (2.) A partial blindness. Acts xiii. 11. Eternal misery is the mist of darkness: How perplexing and uncomfortable! and how impossible to get out of it! 2 Pet. ii. 17.

MISTRESS. Nineveh was a mistress of witchcraft, that sold nations through her whoredoms and witchcrafts. The Assyrians were famed for enchantments, and other diabolical arts; and by their flattery, carnal policy, and charms of wealth and luxury, decoyed nations into slavery and idolatry. Nah. iii. 4.

MISUSE; to condemn, persecute, murder. 2 Chron. iii. 16.

MITE. See FARTHING. But some make the mite much less than we have there done, and fourteen of them are reckoned at little more than a farthing and one fourth of a farthing of English money. Mark xii. 16.

MITRE. See BONNET.

MIT-Y-LENE; the capital city of the island of Lesbos, in the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean Sea, and about seven or eight miles from the continent of Lesser Asia. It was handsome in its form and buildings, but unwholesome as to the air, when the south or south-west winds blew. It was famous for the birth of Pittacus the wise Grecian, Theophrastus the historian, Alcæus the poet, and Diophanes the rhetorician. Paul touched here, as he sailed from Corinth to Jerusalem. Acts xx. 14; but we find no appearance of a Christian church, except in the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries. It is now a place of but little consequence.

MIX. See MINGLE.

MIZPAH, or MIZPEH; (1.) A city of Judah, about eighteen miles west of Jerusalem, in the large plain. Josh. xv. 38: but it seems to have been given to the Benjamites, Josh. xviii. 26; or perhaps that of Benjamin was a different place. Here the Hebrews held their meeting about the affair of the Levite's concubine, who was basely murdered by the men of Gibeah. Judg. xx. 1. Here Sammel dwelt, and the Hebrews, under his direction, observed a solemn fast, to obtain a deliverance from the Philistines. 1 Sam. vii. 5, 6. Here Saul was anointed to be king. 1 Sam. x. 17. Asa built a great part of it with the stones he transported from Ramah. 1 Kings xv. 22. Here Gedaliah dwelt, and for a short time ruled the remnant of the Jews. Jer. xl. 41. Ezer and Shallum, rulers, and some other inhabitants of this place, were very active in repairing the wall of Jerusalem, under the direction of Nehemiah. Neh. iii. 7, 15, 19. (2.) A city in the mountains of Gilead, and near Mount Hermon; the place was so called, because here, Jacob having made a covenant with Laban, wished the Lord might watch between them, that the one might never pass it to hurt the other. Gen. xxxi. 49. Thus far it seems Joshua's troops pursued such of Jabin's army as fled to the eastward. Josh. ix. 3, 8. Here was the city in which Jephthah dwelt, and where he mustered his army against the Ammonites. Judg. xi. 3, 11, 20, 24. Whether this be the Mizpeh of Moab, where David for a while sojourned, cannot be ascertained; but it is supposed that Mizpeh of Moab was further south, as we cannot imagine how the Moabites could have obtained Mizpeh of Gilead; though otherwise this situation would suit very well with its being in the land of the Hermonites, and near the hill MIZAR, which stood near Hermon, if it was not a part of it. 1 Sam. xxii. 3. Psal. xlii. 6.

MIZ-RA'IM, or MIZ'ER, the son of Ham, and father of Ludim, Anamim, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim, and Casluhim, from whom sprang the Philistines, and Caphtorim. These descendants of his, and the tribes called by their names, had no doubt their original residence in Egypt; but some of them moved towards the west; and as Casluhim seems to have dwelt in the east of Egypt, his posterity partly settled in the south-west of Canaan. Some learned men have imagined that these names ending in im, a plural termination in the Hebrew, must signify tribes, not particular persons; but we know not of sufficient reasons to support this inference. Gen. x. 6, 13, 14. The Arabs still call Egypt Mesr; and they called Memphis, and now call Grand Cairo, Mesr, from Misraim.

MO'AB, the son of Lot by his eldest daughter, was born about the same time as Isaac, in A. M. 2106. He and his posterity dwelt in the land called by his name, eastward of the Dead Sea, and about the river Arnon, with the Ammonites on the north-east, and the Midianites on the south-west of them. They expelled the Emims, and seized on their country. They had not been long a nation, when they became idolaters, and worshipped Chemosh, and Baal-peor. Num. xxi. 29. and xxv. 1, 3. Sihon king of the Amorites, took from them all their territory northward of the river Ar-non. Not long after, Balak the son of Zip-por was king of Moab. He vainly hired Balaam to curse the Hebrews, who encamped on his borders. Num. xxi—xxiv. To revenge this, no Moabite or Ammonite were allowed to enter the Hebrew congregation of the Lord, to their tenth generation. Dent. xxii. 3—6. About A. M. 2861, the Moabites, under Eglon, reduced the Hebrews under their yoke, and mightily oppressed them for eighteen years; but Ehud killed their king, and his troops slew 10,000 of the most valiant Moabites, and recovered to the Hebrews their liberty. Judg. iii. Some time after, Elimelech and Naomi, on account of a famine, left Canaan, and sojourned in the land of Moab: his sons Mahlon and Chilion married two Moabitish women, some say of the royal family. Ruth i. Saul successfully waged war with the Moabites. 1 Sam. xiv. 47. When David was persecuted by Saul, he fled to the land of Moab, whence Ruth, his great-grandmother had come, and committed his parents to the protection of the king of Moab. 1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4. Provoked with the Moabites, perhaps for the murder of his parents, David, about twelve years after, terribly ravaged their country, and reduced them to the basest servitude: such of them, at least of the soldiery, as he took prisoners, he caused to lie down, or stand close together, and measured over them with lines, to mark them for death or life, he killed the half, if not two thirds of them. 2 Sam. viii. 1, 2. Psal. lx. 8. For about a hundred and fifty years, they continued subject to Israel, and Saraph a Jew was one of their governors, and one Ithmah a Moabite was one of David's mighties. 1 Chron. iv. 22, and xi. 46. Solomon married some Moabitish women, and established the worship of Chemosh their idol at Jerusalem. 1 Kings xi. 1, 7, 33. After the division of the Hebrew kingdom, the Moabites fell to the share of the ten tribes, as their territories were contiguous to the Reubenites; but after the death of Ahab, MESHA their king, a noted sheep-master, refused to pay his tribute. This occasioned a terrible defeat of the Moabites by Joram king of Israel and his allies, and a furious ravage of their country. 2 Kings iii. Not long after, or perhaps before, they entered into a league with the Edomites, Amalekites, Ishmaelites, Philistines, Ammonites, Hagarenes, Ashurites, Gebalites, and Tyrians, to destroy the whole race of Israel; but their army that came against Jehoshaphat, was miraculously destroyed. 2 Chron. xx. Psal. lxxxi. Some time after, the Moabites seem to have invaded the land of Edom, and burnt the bones of the king of it into lime. Amos ii. 1. About the time of Elisha's death, straggling bands of the Moabites ravaged the country of the ten tribes. 2 Kings xiii. 20. During the decline of the kingdom of the ten tribes, or during their captivity by Tiglath-pileser, the Moabites seized on a great part of what pertained to the Reubenites, if not more of the land of Gilead. The Assyrians under Salmanser, ravaged their country, and rendered it almost desolate. Isa. xvi. and xxv. 10. Amos ii. 1, 2. They however recovered this shock, and again became a flourishing nation. Their principal cities were Nebo, Kirjathaim, Kir, Misgab, Heshbon, Madmen, Horonaim, Ar, Dibon, Aroer, Diblath or Beth-diblathaim, Holon, Jahazah, Mephaath, Bethgumul, Bethmeon, Kerioth, Bozrah, Medeba, Elealeh, Jazer, and Sibmah, the most of which had once pertained to the Hebrews. It seems they early joined the Chaldeans, and bands of them harassed the Jews, under Jehoikim; but as they formed a league with Zedekiah for shaking off the Chaldean yoke, Nebuchadnezzar about four or five years after he had destroyed Jerusalem, invaded their country and reduced it to a desert, and carried multitudes of them captive into his eastern dominions. 2 Kings xxiv. 2. Jer. xlviii. 9, 26, and xxv. 21. Ezek. xxv. Zeph. ii. 8. It does not appear that they ever much recovered this overthrow. Some of their women were married to the Jews, who had come back to their own land, and were put away by Nehemiah's orders. Neh. xiii. 23. The remains of them were subject to the Persians and Greeks in their turns; to the Jews under Alexander; Janneus, and Herod; and, finally to the Romans. Long ago their very name was lost, as they incorporated with the Jews or Arabians; and their country is almost quite desolate, and is not properly subject to the Turks, but to the wild Arabs of Hejaz, Zeph. ii. 8—10. Isa. xxv. 10, and xi. 14. Dan. xi. 41; but in Isa. xxv. 10, Moab may be understood of the enemies of the church in general.

MOCK; (1.) To deride, scoff, laugh at. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16. (2.) Merrily to make a jest; so fools make a mock at sin. Prov. xiv. 9. (3.) To deceive one with words. Judg. xvi. 10, 13. (4.) To ravish or abuse a woman. Gen. xxxix. 17. God mocks at men's fear, when, without pity, he brings his fearful strokes of judgment upon them. Prov. i. 26. God is not mocked; he will not be deceived or jested with. If men live in sin, they shall certainly be for ever punished. Gal. vi. 7. Men mock God, when, in words or behaviour, they jest at his being, his purposes, words, works, ordinances, ministers, or people. Job. xlii. 9. Wine is a mocker, and strong drink is raging; if drunk to excess, it deceives men, and renders them dishonoured, unhappy, and outrageous. Prov. xx. 1.

MOCKERS, are such as habitually scoff and jest at spiritual and divine things, and who beguile men with deceitful words. Isa. xxviii. 22. Jude 18.

MODERATE; to abate, to keep in due bounds. To moderate threatening, is to restrain it within due bounds. Eph. vi. 9. Our moderation should be known to all men, because the Lord is at hand: we should exercise softness and tenderness towards all men; interpret their words and behaviour in the best sense; use inferiors with kindness and respect; and bear injuries, because the Lord observes our conduct, and will quickly judge us, and resent the injuries done us. Phil. iv. 8.

MODEST; humble, chaste. Modest apparel, is such as becomes an humble, sober, and modest person. 1 Tim. ii. 9.

MOISTURE; sap. Luke viii. 6. My moisture is turned into the drought of summer:

my body is parched, and its natural moisture exhausted; my soul is bereaved of prosperity, gracious influence, and comfort, by the impressions and fears of thy fatherly wrath. Psal. xxxii. 4.

MOLE; a small four-footed animal, which ferrets in the earth, has its feet formed for digging; its eyes very small, and hence believed by the vulgar to be blind. It lives on roots, toads, and worms; but that the Hebrew Tinshemeth signifies a mole, we dare not affirm, though the Jewish Rabbins, and the Chaldee paraphrases, so interpret it. Bochart will have it a camelion; Castalio a toad; and others a weazel. It is certain it was legally unclean; the same word is translated a swan. Compare Lev. xi. 30. with 18. To cast idols to the moles and to the bats, is to leave them to ignorant, hateful, and worldly men, or rather to throw them away with the utmost contempt. Isa. ii. 20.

MOLECH, MO'LOCH, MIL'COM, MAL'CHAM; the principal idol of the Ammonites. He had the face of an ox; his hands were stretched out as if ready to receive presents. He was hollow within, and there the fire was placed to heat the image, that it might burn the offerings. There were seven different apartments, for receiving the different oblations of meal, turtles, ewes, rams, calves, oxen, and children. It is said the unhappy parent who offered his child to Molech, put him into the burning arms of the idol, where he expired in torture, while drums beat to drown his cries. Though some interpret this of causing children to pass between two fires in honour of this idol, it is pretty plain that the actual burning of them in sacrifice is intended. Psal. cvi. 37. Ezek. xvi. 20. and xxiii. 27, 29. The sacrificed child was burnt, in order to obtain a blessing on the rest of the family. That Molech was derived from the Egyptians, and is the same with Rephan, Remphan, Chiun, or Serapis, and worshipped under the form of a bull, and with the Anamelech and Adramelech, to which the inhabitants of Sepharvaim burnt their children, we believe; but whether he was the same with Saturn, to whom human sacrifices were offered, or with Mercury, or Mars, or Venus, or Mithra, or the sun, we shall not now determine. It is certain, Molech was very early worshipped among the Ammonites: and perhaps it was the crown of Molech, not of the Ammonitish king, that David took at Rabbah, and which weighed a talent. 2 Sam. xii. 30. God very early prohibited the worship of Molech to his people. Lev. xviii. 21. and xx. 2—4. They, however, were often guilty of it: they carried the tabernacle of their Molech, in the worship of the golden calf, which was a kind of representation of the Egyptian Serapis. Acts vii. 43. Solomon built a temple to Molech on the Mount of Olives. 1 Kings xi. 7. Ahaz, Manasseh, and other Jews, burnt their children in honour to this idol, particularly in Tophet. 2 Kings xvi. 3. and xxi. 3, 4. Jer. xix. 5, 6.

MOMENT; a very short space of time in comparison of eternal duration. God hides himself from, is angry with, and afflicts his people but for a moment. Isa. liv. 7, 8. Psal. xxx. 5. 2 Cor. iv. 17. And the joy of hypocrites is but for a moment; it is quickly changed into eternal sorrow. Job xx. 5. A lying tongue is but for a moment, as truth will quickly be discovered to the liar's shame. Prov. xii. 19.

MONEY. The most ancient method of trade was by barter, exchanging one thing for another; in after times the most precious metals were used as the price in merchandise. The gold and silver, however, were long weighed, not coined. Abraham weighed the four hundred shekels which he gave for his burying place. Gen. xxiii. 15, 16. Joseph was sold for twenty shekels' weight of silver, and his brethren carried back to Egypt the same weight of money that had been returned in their sacks. Gen. xxxvii. 28. and xliii. 21. Jeremiah weighed the seventeen shekels of silver which he gave for his cousin's field. Jer. xxxii. 10. Shekels and talents by which money was estimated, were weights, not coins. 2 Sam. xii. 30. and xiv. 26. We are not certain that there was any coined money in the world, till about A. M. 3460, when Cræsus king of Lydia coined his Cræsi, and Darius the Mede, his Daries or Darkmoons. Nor do we know that the Jews coined any till about four hundred years after, when Antiochus Sidesces gave Simon the Maccabee a privilege for that purpose. The Romans began to coin silver about A. M. 3735, and gold in A. M. 3797. The ancient Britons used rings or plates of iron for money. The Lacedemonians used bars of iron. Anciently, and in straitened circumstances, leather, wood, pasteboard, &c. have been used for money. To this day, the Chinese do not coin, but cut and weigh their gold and silver for trade: and in some nations, they trade with shells and fruits instead of money.—Christ's blessings are without money and without price; they are altogether free; neither price, nor promise of price, being required from us. Isa. lv. 1.

MONEY-CHANGERS, were such as at a certain rate of profit, gave lesser pieces of money for greater, or greater for lesser, to accommodate such as came to the solemn feasts, or other worship at Jerusalem. Jesus twice drove these from the stations which they had taken in the courts of the temple. John ii. 14, 15. Matt. xxi. 12.

MONSTERS; huge and unshapely animals, such as whales, &c. Lam. iv. 3.

MONTH. See YEAR.

MONUMENTS. These in which idolaters lodged, were either tombs, idol-temples, desert places, or any where with idols, or their supposed resident devils, by sleeping in which they expected fellowship with their false gods, in dreams, visions, or the like. Isa. lxv. 4.

MOON; a secondary planet always attendant on our earth. Many astronomers represent her face as if diversified with hills, valleys, continents, and seas; but we doubt of this, and if she has so much as an atmosphere to produce clouds, rain, snow, or other like meteors. The diameter of the moon is reckoned 2175 miles; her surface 14,000,000 square miles; and her distance from the earth 240,000 miles. She performs her revolution from a fixed star to the same again, in twenty-seven days seven hours and forty minutes; but as the sun is still advancing in the ecliptic circle, the time from one conjunction with the sun to another, is twenty-nine days, twelve hours, forty-four minutes, and three seconds. She moves about her own axis in the same time she moves about the earth, and hence shews always the same face to us. The moon is of herself a dark body, but reflects the light of the sun to us; and perhaps our earth reflects as much light, if not more towards the moon. When, at her change, she comes directly between us and the sun, the sun is eclipsed to us. When, at her full, the earth is directly between her and the sun, she is eclipsed to us. The moon was formed to give light in, and rule the night, and to distinguish times and seasons. Gen. i. 14. She has a mighty influence on the ebbing and flowing of the sea; and was the great marker of the time of the Jewish FEASTS. The heathens have generally worshipped the moon, under the names of Queen of heaven, Venus, Urania, Succothbenoth, Ashtorath, Diana, Hecate, or perhaps Meni, &c. Job xxxi. 26, 27. Deut. iv. 19. and xvii. 3. The church is likened to the moon: How comely, useful, and illuminating to the world in the dark night of time! how only illuminated by Jesus the Sun of righteousness shining on her! and how changing her militant state and condition! Sol. Song vi. 10. The world and ceremonial dispensation, are likened to the moon; both are very unsettled and changeable; and the time of the ceremonies was regulated by the moon. Rev. xii. 1. Outward prosperity, and subjective grace, are likened to a moon; they borrow all their glory and usefulness from Jesus the Sun of righteousness. Isa. lx. 20.

MORDECAI, the son of Jair, grandson of Kish, and descendant of the family of Saul, was carried to Babylon along with Jehoiachin king of Judah, when he was very young. If he was one of the chiefs who conducted the Jews from Babylon to Judea, he must have returned to Shushan in Persia. When Esther his cousin, whom he had trained up, was married to Ahasuerus, Mordecai waited about the palace-gate, that he might have information concerning her from time to time. Here having got information of Bigthan and Terish's intention to murder the king, he informed Esther of it, and the traitors were hanged; and it was recorded in the annals of the kingdom, that Mordecai had given the information against them. When Haman was made prime minister of Persia, all the servants were ordered to bow the knee to him as he passed by them. Mordecai conceiving this an approach towards divine honour, or reckoning it sinful to revere an Amalekite, declined compliance. Scorning to punish Mordecai alone, Haman procured a royal edict for a universal massacre of the Jewish nation. Informed of this, Mordecai communicated the same to Esther, and earnestly begged her to interpose with the king for the life of her people. At her desire, Mordecai caused all the Jews in Shushan to fast three days, for success from God, to her attempt. Neh. vii. 7. Esth. ii. 5. to chap. iv. Meanwhile Providence directed to be read to Ahasuerus, one night as he could not sleep, that part of the royal annals which mentioned Mordecai's discovery of the treacherous eunuchs. Ahasuerus finding that he had received no reward, asked Haman, who was just come to obtain the king's permission to hang Mordecal on his lofty gallows, what should be done to honour the king's great favourite? As Haman imagined it could be none other than himself, he proposed the highest honours he could think of. According to the tenor of his own proposal, he was ordered to array Mordecai in the king's ordinary robes, set him on the king's own horse, and lead the horse with Mordecai on it, through all the city of Shushan, and proclaim before him, 'Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour!' No way inflated with these extraordinary honours, Mordecai returned to the king's gate; but Haman being hanged that very day, he was advanced to his office. After he and Esther had by letters to the various provinces, stopped the massacre of their nation, he for some time continued to discharge his high trust with great fidelity and usefulness. Esth. vi.—x.

MO-RI'AH, a hill on the north-east part of Jerusalem, and which is sometimes reckoned as a part of Zion. Here, it is supposed, Isaac was intentionally offered; and here Araunah had his thrashing-floor; and hereon the temple was built. 2 Chron. iii. 1. The whole place where Jerusalem stood, was anciently called the land of Moriah. Gen. xxii. 2; but the plain of MORREH lay further north, between Gerizim and Ebal. Gen. xii. 6. Deut. xi. 29, 30; and the hill of MOREH was perhaps a top of Gilboa. Judg. vii. 1.

MORNING; (1.) That part of the day before or about the rising of the sun. Mark xvi. 2. (2.) The light, which by its spread forms the morning. Joel ii. 2. The morning is represented as having eye-lids to represent the first appearance of the rising light in the reddish sky, Job xli. 18; as having wings, to denote the quick spread of light, Psal. cxxxix. 9; and as having a womb, from which the dew is produced. Psal. cx. 3. Every morning, is daily, often. Psal. lxxiii. 14. In the morning, is early, seasonably, earnestly, suddenly. Psal. v. 3. and xxx. 5. To execute judgment in the morning, is to do it readily, and as seasonably and speedily as possible. Jer. xxi. 12. Psal. ci. 8. To eat in the morning, denotes unseasonable and intemperate eating and drinking, luxury. Eccl. x. 16. Jer. v. 8. The church is likened to the morning. In the patriarchal age, her light was but small, but gradually increased. After the night of ceremonies, how glorious a morning of gospel light! In the patriarch age her light is but partial, and growing to the noon-tide blaze of glory: and how delightful her appearance! what a blessed presage of future happiness! Sol. Song vi. 10. A state of grace is called a morning. It comes after a sad night of sin and misery; and how happily one is awakened, enlightened, and refreshed, by the gradual increase of its spiritual discovery and application of heart-warming love, till it issues in the high day of eternal happiness! Isa. viii. 20. A season of prosperity, or gospel opportunity, is called a morning; it comes after a night of distress or dark ignorance; and how delightful and refreshing! Isa. xxi. 12. The general resurrection is called a morning; after a night of darkness and death-like sleep, how shall men be awakened by the last trumpet, enlightened by the glory of, and manifold discoveries made by the Son of man! and into what an everlasting day it ushers the saints! Psal. xlix. 14. Fearful judgments are likened to the morning; they overtake transgressors in their spiritual sleep and carnal security, often suddenly, and always seasonably, when their sins richly deserve them. Ezek. vii. 7, 10. To-morrow, next day, or in a short time. Luke xiii. 32, 33.

MORSEL; a small piece of bread. Psal. cxlvii. 17. (2.) A meal of meat. Heb. xii. 16. Better is a dry morsel with quietness, than a house full of sacrifices with strife. Better is the meanest fare in a state of peace with God, in the enjoyment of peace of conscience and of true peace with men, than the most abundant and delicate provision without it. Prov. xvii. 1.

MORTAR; a hollow vessel for braying things in with a pestle. The Hebrews ground the manna in mortars, to prepare it for being baked into bread. Num. xi. 8. To bray a fool with a pestle in a mortar, is to punish him severely for his folly. Prov. xxvii. 22.

MORTER: a well-known composition used to fasten stones in buildings. It was anciently made by the treading of the feet of men or beasts; so the Ninevites are bid to go into the clay, and tread the mortar; that is, to prepare materials for repairing the breaches of their walls. Nah. iii. 14. To come upon princes as upon mortar, is easily to subdue, enslave, and oppress them. Isa. xli. 25. Flattering and false doctrines and predictions are likened to daubing with untempered mortar: however they may for awhile seem to strengthen, yet in the end, they but ruin those nations, churches, and persons which receive them. One built a wall, and another daubed it with untempered mortar: one false prophet said, Jerusalem would stand the Chaldean siege, and another to no purpose falsely confirmed his word. So one legal preacher encourages his hearers to hope for acceptance with God through their own righteousness, and another confirms them therein, till they are eternally ruined. Ezek. xiii. 10, 11.

MORTGAGE. To mortgage land, is to consign it over to a creditor to be his property, if it be not redeemed by the payment of the debt within a limited time. Neh. v. 3.

MORTIFY; to put to death. To mortify the deeds of the body and our members which are on the earth, is, by the Spirit, and through the word of God, to apply the blood and influence of Jesus Christ, for the weakening and destroying of our sinful corruptions. Rom. viii. 13. Col. iii. 5.

MOSES, the brother of AARON and MIRIAM, and younger than either, was born A. M. 2433. Before his birth, Pharaoh king of Egypt had issued forth orders to murder every male infant of the Hebrews. His parents, however, perceiving something about him which they regarded as a presage of his future greatness, hid him three months. When they could hide him no longer, his mother Jochebed made an ark of bulrushes, and having pitched it that it might be water-proof, she put Moses therein, and laid it near the banks of the Nile, where the princes and other noble Egyptians used to walk. He had not lain long in this condition, when Pharaoh's daughter Thermutis, coming to wash herself, or some of her linen, observed the ark, and caused one of her maids to fetch it; and opening it, found the child. Struck with the beauty and weeping of the babe, she, knowing it to be one of the Hebrew children, resolved to bring it up for herself, as a child of her own. Miriam, the sister of Moses, then about ten or twelve years of age, who waited hard by, asked leave to find a nurse: being allowed to do so, she called Jochebed his mother. Pharaoh's daughter named him Mosheh, because she drew him out of the water. She took care to have him instructed in all the sciences then known in Egypt. In his earliest years, Jochebed and Amram no doubt took care to instruct him in the Hebrew language, and in the principles of the true religion, and in the knowledge of the promises that God had made concerning Israel. Affected with these, and endowed with the grace of God, he, when grown up, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than enjoy the short-lived pleasures of sin. Trusting in the invisible God, and encouraged by the hopes of an everlasting reward, he feared not the wrath of the Egyptian king, nor whatever ridicule, threatening, or persecution, he had to endure. It is scarcely to our purpose to relate the perhaps fabulous story of his successful expedition against the Ethiopians, who about this time emigrated from Arabia to Abyssinia southward of Egypt, at the head of the Egyptian forces. It is certain, that being forty years of age, and divinely instructed that he was to be the deliverer of Israel, he went to visit his brethren at their hard labour. Observing an Egyptian cruelly abuse a Hebrew, and attempt to murder him, he hastened to them, assisted the Hebrew, killed the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand. Next day, he observed two Hebrews at variance, and begged the aggressor not to hurt his brother. The fellow saucily replied, Who made thee a ruler or judge over us? wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday? Finding that his killing of the Egyptian was known, he fled into the country of Midian, near the Red sea. Sitting down by a well, the seven daughters of Jethro came up to it, with their flocks; they had scarcely filled the troughs with the water which they drew, when some barbarous fellows came up, and attempted to take the water for their flocks. Moses assisted the damsels, and drove away the injurious shepherds. When Jethro heard of his kindness to his daughters, he ordered him to be called in, and take refreshment. Moses hired himself to feed Jethro's flock, and received his daughter Zipporah in marriage, by whom he had two sons. The first he called Gershom, to denote his being a stranger in that place; the other he called Ephraim, to denote that his God was his help. Exod. ii. Acts vii. 20-29. Heb. xi. 24-26. About the beginning of A. M. 2513, the king of Egypt, by whose daughter or sister Moses had been educated, was dead; but the bondage of the Hebrews still continued under their new tyrant. As Moses one day led his flocks near to the north or west side of Sinai, the Lord appeared to him in a bush burning, but not consumed. Moses astonished, went near to see the miracle. The Lord spake to him out of the bush, and bade him put off his shoes before he came any nearer, as the spot was sacred by the presence of God. He then declared himself to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and that from regard to his promise, and to the groans of his oppressed people, he now intended to deliver them, and bring them into Canaan, by Moses as the instrument. Moses began to excuse himself, as the Hebrews would not believe that he had a mission. God promised him his presence, and bade him tell the Hebrews that the Great I AM, who is being itself, and gives being to his creatures, and fulfils every promise, had sent him to inform them of their approaching deliverance; and assured him that they then would believe him. He ordered him to go to Pharaoh, and, in the name of Jehovah to require him to let the Hebrews go three days' journey into the Arabian Desert, to offer a solemn sacrifice to the Lord. Meanwhile, he told him that Pharaoh would not grant this request, till he and his country should be almost ruined by fearful plagues. Moses still excusing himself, God encouraged him by a fourfold sign: His rod was turned into a serpent, to signify what plagues it would bring on the Egyptians. It was returned to a rod, to mark how useful it would prove for the support of the Hebrews. To mark how easily God would weaken the power of the Egyptians, and strengthen the Israelites, Moses' hand, being put into his bosom, became leprous, white as snow; and again returned into his bosom, became sound as the other. These miracles he was ordered to repeat before the Hebrews, for the confirmation of his mission; and if necessary, to add the taking of water out of the river, and it should become blood. Moses then urged that he had not a ready utterance of speech, and begged to be excused; and urged the Lord would send some more proper person. Offended with his unbelief, God told him that he could qualify him with speech; and that Aaron, who was just coming to meet him, should be his assistant and spokesman. Moses being at last persuaded, went and obtained the leave of his father-in-law to go and visit his brethren in Egypt. He took his wife and children along with him. As they were in an inn by the way, an angel threatened to slay Moses, it is supposed on account of his neglect to circumcise his child, or children. To prevent his death, Zipporah took a sharp stone, and having cut off her child's foreskin, cast or laid it at the feet, either of her husband or of the child, and said, that now she had preserved his life by bloodshed, and he or his son was now her bloody bridegroom. Zipporah and her children returned to her father; but Moses pursued his course into Egypt, and was met by Aaron his brother. They told the Hebrews what God had said, and shewed them the signs; the people believed, and were filled with joyful expectation of deliverance. Exod. iii. and iv.

Moses and Aaron went to Pharaoh, and, in the name of the God of the Hebrews, demanded his permission for that people to go three days' journey into the Arabian Desert, to serve their God. He replied, that he neither knew nor would pay the least regard to the Hebrew God, nor would he suffer them to stir a foot out of his dominions. He increased their misery, by requiring them to provide straw for themselves, and yet to furnish the daily tale of their bricks. He thought hard labour would put religion out of their heads. Beaten by the Egyptian task-masters, for not fulfilling what was impossible for them, the Hebrews complained to Pharaoh; but he gave them no hopes of relief, and told them that their idleness had filled their heads with whims of religion. The Hebrews bitterly reflected on Moses and Aaron as the cause of this additional misery. Moses cried to the Lord, and was answered that Pharaoh would not let them go, till terrible plagues on his land should force him to it. God assured him, that he was JEHOVAH, a promise-performing God, and would speedily deliver the Hebrews, and bring them to Canaan. Moses told this to the Hebrews; but their grievous servitude made them disregard what he said. Moses and Aaron again demanded Pharaoh's permission for the people to go into the Desert. To verify their commission, Aaron flung down his rod, and it became a serpent. The magicians of Egypt were brought to confront this miracle; they cast down their rods, and they became serpents, at least in appearance; but whether Satan privately removed their rods, and put serpents in their place, or whether he himself acted upon the rods, or only deceived the eyes of the spectators, it is certain that Aaron's rod swallowed up theirs, as a mark of superior authority and influence. Soon after this, the Lord by Moses smote the Egyptians with ten plagues, within the space of less than a month. About the 18th day of Adar, the waters of the Nile, where so many Hebrew children had been drowned, were turned into blood, and so continued for seven days. About the 25th day the river produced immense swarms of frogs, which spread through the country, and filling the houses, and covering the land, were a terrible nuisance. These two plagues the magicians imitated, but could imitate no more. The plague of lice happened about the 27th; and that of flies on the 29th of Adar. On the second day of Abib, there happened a grievous murrain among their cattle; on the third and fourth, the plague of boils; on the fifth, the plague of hail, thunder, and lightning; on the eighth, that of locusts and grasshoppers; on the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth, that of the darkness; on the fourteenth, the death of their first-born. None of these plagues afflicted the Hebrews. While some of these plagues continued, Pharaoh seemed willing to let the Hebrews go; but whenever they were removed, he was as obstinate as ever, or refused to let their flocks go with them, and of these Moses refused to leave so much as one; but when the first-born were slain, Pharaoh's servants urged him to give the Hebrews their dismissal. By the sprinkling of the blood of the passover lambs on the door-posts and upper lintels, they had their families protected from the destroying angel. Exod. v—xii. Dent. iv. 34. and xi. 3. Heb. xi. 23—29.

The Hebrews having taken their departure from Egypt in great haste, and having carried along with them a good part of the wealth of the Egyptians, took their journey to the south-east. Pharaoh and his people repented of letting them go; and with a mighty army pursued them, and almost overtook them on the west of the Red sea. The Hebrews murmured against Moses, for bringing them out of Egypt. Moses prayed to the Lord for deliverance. By God's direction, he stretched his rod over the Red sea, and it, (where perhaps about eighteen miles broad,) parted asunder, and gave the Hebrews an easy passage. By taking off the wheels of their chariots, and darkening their way, the Lord retarded the march of the Egyptians; and when the Hebrews were all over, and the Egyptians all in the channel, Moses, at God's direction, stretched his rod to the sea, and it, moved by a strong wind, suddenly returned, and drowned the whole of them. On the east side of the sea, Moses and the men, and Miriam and the women of Israel, sung a song of praise for their miraculous deliverance. Directing their course to the south-east, the Hebrews were three days without water; and when they found some in Marah, it was so bitter they could not drink it, they murmured against Moses, saying he had brought them into the wilderness to kill them with thirst. Moses cried to God for their relief; and God shewed him a tree, (perhaps the bitter Ardiphine,) and he cast it into the waters and they became sweet. Marching thence, they came to Elim, where were twelve fountains of excellent water, and seventy palm-trees. On the fifteenth day of the second month, which was the thirty-first from their departure, they came to the wilderness of Sin: their food was quite spent, and now they murmured again, saying, that Moses had brought them into the wilderness to kill them with hunger. Moses cried to the Lord. That very night a multitude of quails fell about their tents; and next morning the manna, which continued with them forty years, began to fall. When they came to Rephidim, Moses, by God's direction, smote a rock with his rod, and thence came water, whose streams seem to have followed them about thirty-nine years. Here, chiefly by Moses' intercession, and by his holding up the rod of God in his hand, the Amalekites were defeated; and to commemorate the victory, Moses reared up an altar, and called it, Jehorah-nissi, that is, The Lord is my banner. While they tarried here, Jethro brought Moses his wife and children: and to ease him of his great burden in judging the people, advised him to appoint heads of thousands, hundreds, and fifties, and tens; and let these judge all the lesser causes. This measure being approved by God, was immediately put in execution. Exod. xiii-xviii. Deut. xi. 4. Josh. xxiv. 5-7. Neh. ix. 9-15. Psal. lxxviii. 11-29. cv. 26-43. cvi. 7-14. cxxxv. 8, 9. and cxxxvi. 11-15.

On the first day of the third sacred month, the Hebrews came to Sinai. On this mount, God had told Moses the Hebrews would serve him. When Moses first ascended the mount, God told him his intention to enter into a covenant with the people. When Moses rehearsed this to the people, they professed their readiness to do whatsoever the Lord should command them. When Moses returned to the mount, and represented their ready compliance with the divine will, God ordered him down to direct the people to sanctify themselves, and wash their clothes, as, on the third day, God would descend on the mountain, and enter into covenant with them. After they had purified themselves, flames from the top of the mount, and terrible claps of thunder, made all the congregation, Moses not excepted, to tremble and quake; and all the country about shook, and was illuminated. Boundaries were fixed around the mount, that neither man nor beast might touch it; and all were commanded not to gaze, as if curious to behold any corporeal similitude of God amidst the fire. With an audible voice, that all Israel might hear, God proclaimed the covenant relation between him and them, and the ten summary precepts of the moral law, in a manner adapted to every particular person. The terrible thunders so frightened the Hebrew assembly, that they begged the Lord would speak his mind only to Moses, and Moses declare it to them. Moses returned to the mount, and there received a variety of political and ceremonial laws. Descending, he erected twelve pillars for the twelve tribes, and offered by the hands of some young men, burnt-offerings and peace offerings on an altar erected of rough stones. The half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar: with the other half he sprinkled the book in which he had written the laws he had received, and the people. After which, he and Aaron, and his sons, and seventy of the elders of Israel, went a little way up the mount, and feasted before the symbols of the presence of God. Thus was the covenant solemnly ratified. Exod. xix-xxiv. Deut. iv-v.

Leaving Aaron and Hur, and the seventy elders, to govern the people, Moses took Joshua along with him, at least part of his way, and went up to the mount, where they continued without any food for the space of forty days. God then gave Moses directions concerning the formation of the ark, altars, vails, curtains, candlestick, and other things pertaining to the tabernacle; and concerning the priests' garments, and their consecration, and concerning burnt-offerings, incense, and perfume, and concerning the Sabbath: and ordered Bezaleel and Aholiab to frame the work of the tabernacle. After giving to him the two tables of stone, probably of marble, on which the ten commandments had been divinely inscribed, he bade him go down hastily, as the Hebrews had already broken their engagements, and were worshipping a golden calf. He offered to make Moses' family a great nation, if he would but forbear interceding for his guilty brethren. Moses fell on his face before the Lord, and begged he would not destroy them, as they were his covenant-people. When he came down from the mount, and observed their idolatry, his holy zeal was so excited, that he threw down the tables of the law, and broke them to pieces before them, as a token of their breaking God's covenant, and exposing themselves to be broken in his wrath. He took their idol-calf and reduced it to powder, and caused the idolaters to drink the water, with the dust mixed with it, as a token that their guilt should be punished. After sharply rebuking Aaron his brother, for his part in their sin, he placed himself at the door of a tent, which he erected without the camp, and bade all that detested this idolatry to come to him. Three thousand Levites quickly joined him. These he ordered to go through the camp, and slay every man his friend, or near kinsman, who had been active in the idolatry. After representing to the people the greatness of their sin, he returned to the mount, and fasted and prayed for the space of forty days. He begged that if God would not forgive the Hebrews' sin, he himself might be blotted out of the book of providential preservation, and not live to see them ruined, or have the honour of his family established on their ruin. God replied, he would only cut off from life in that quarrel, such as had offended; that though they could not expect himself to go with them, he would send his angel to guide them in the way. The Hebrews were extremely afflicted to hear of God's refusal to go with them; but Moses continued his intercession, till God promised his presence; promised, and gave him a signal manifestation of his mercy, goodness, and equity. Hereon Moses begged that God would glorify the exceeding riches of his grace, in going up with them, who were a most rebellious and stiff-necked people. After hewing two new tables of stone, Moses returned again to the mount; and continuing there forty days, came down with the moral law divinely inscribed on the tables. His face shone with the reflection of the divine glory. When he knew this, he covered his face with a veil, that the Hebrews might converse with him. Exod. xxv-xxxiv. Deut. xi. and x. The tabernacle was now to be reared by voluntary contribution. The people brought materials, till Moses restrained them. Every male paid half a shekel, as the ransom-money of his soul. After six months' work, the tabernacle was finished, every thing being exactly according to the direction of God by Moses. After divine directions issued therefrom concerning the various offerings, Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the service of it, and then a number of other ceremonial laws were by God uttered therefrom. See LEVITICUS. An account of the Hebrews was then taken, and all were directed in their station and march, and their princes offered the oblations for the dedication of the tabernacle. After this, the Levites were consecrated, and a second passover was kept. Now Hobab the the brother-in-law of Moses, who had perhaps tarried about ten months, intended to have returned home; but Moses begged he would go along with them, and receive his share of the blessings that awaited them. Exod. xxxv—xl. Lev. i—xxvii. Num. i—x.

Scarcely had the Hebrews departed from Sinai, when they, (chiefly the mixed multitude) fell a murmuring at the manna, and lusted for flesh. A burning pestilence began in the outside of the camp, which made the spot receive the name of taberah, or burning. It was stayed at Moses' prayer; but the murmuring was not. Moses himself became peevish, and doubted how God could give them a month's flesh, as he had engaged; and complained that he could not govern so unruly a mob; and that it was unreasonable to require him to do it, as he was not their common parent. To ease him, God ordered seventy or seventy-two elders to be his assistants; and by the effusion of a prophetic spirit on them, they were selected and qualified for the work. Soon after, quails were brought in such plenty, that the Hebrews ate of them a whole month, till the flesh, cursed of God to them, came out at their nostrils, and occasioned a pestilence, which cut off many of them; and the place was called Kibroth-hattaavah, the graves of lust. At Hazereth, Aaron and Miriam quarrelled with Moses, as if he now managed matters by the advice of Zipporah his wife, and had not consulted them in the affair of the elders. Miriam was smitten with a leprosy to punish her insolence; but at Moses' request, the Lord healed it, after a few days. When they came to Kadesh-barnea, on the south border of Canaan, Moses, excited by the people, and permitted of God, sent twelve spies to view the land of Canaan. After they had spent forty days in this search, and had gone to the northern borders thereof, they returned, and two of them, perhaps Caleb and Joshua, brought a large bunch of grapes, carried on a rod between them, to shew the fertility of the land. All the spies acknowledged the land to be fertile; but ten of them maintained that it was unwholesome; and that the cities and people were so strong that they could not hope to conquer it. Caleb and Joshua with great concern remonstrated, that the land was exceedingly good; and that with God's assistance, they could as easily conquer the inhabitants, as a man eats his food. The congregation crediting the ten, were on the point of stoning the two last, and urged to be directly led back into Egypt. Provoked with their outrageous contempt of his promised land, God would have destroyed them on the spot, had not Moses interceded for them; but he declared that none of them able to bear arms, except Caleb and Joshua, should ever enter it; but they should wander in the wilderness for forty years, till all the rest were consumed by death, and that their children should enter in. To confirm his threatening, the ten spies who occasioned this uproar, were struck dead on the spot. Contrary to God's declaration and Moses' prohibition, the congregation now became bent on invading Canaan, and immediately attempted it; but the Amalekites and Canaanites easily drove them back, with considerable loss. The Hebrews continued long at Kadesh-barnea; but whether the affair of Korah, and of Aaron's budding-rod, and his making atonement for the congregation at Moses' orders, or the giving of the laws relative to meat-offerings, breach of Sabbath, Levites' portion, and red heifer, happened here cannot be determined. Num. xii—xix.

After the Hebrews had long encamped at Kadesh, they, at God's direction, moved southward, by seventeen different marches, many of which might be circuitous, to Ezion-geber, on the eastern gulf of the Red sea. They then returned to Kadesh-barnea, by much the same route. Here, after the death of Miriam, their water failed; the people murmured, and God bade Moses speak to a rock in that place. Neither Moses nor Aaron discovered proper confidence in God; and Moses, with an angry address to the Hebrews, struck the rock, instead of speaking to it. For this offence both of them were excluded from the promised land. The Hebrews were not yet allowed to enter Canaan, but were ordered to take a long circuit to the eastward. From Kadesh, Moses sent to the king of Edom, and begged a free passage through his territories; which was at first refused, but it was afterwards granted. Soon after Aaron's death in Mount Hor, the Hebrews were harassed by Arad king of Hormah, but they quickly prevailed against him. Fiery serpents too bit them for despising the manna; but they were miraculously healed, by looking at a brazen serpent lifted up on a pole. God did not permit Moses to attack the Moabites or Ammonites; but when they came to the borders of the eastern Canaanites, governed by Sihon and Og, these kings came against the Israelites in battle; but their troops were routed, and themselves slain, and their country seized.—After winding to the west for some time, the Hebrews encamped in Shittim, on the east of Jordan. Here Balaam in vain attempted to curse them; and here the Midianitish women having seduced many of them to whoredom and idolatry, Moses ordered 1000 of the idolaters to be put to death, and a plague cut off 23,000 more. Moses then numbered the people, and found that none of those capable of war when they came out of Egypt, (except Caleb and Joshua,) were alive. Here too, Moses received some new laws, concerning offerings, feasts, vows, and the marriage of daughters who were heirs to their father, and cities of refuge. He punished the Midianites with almost utter extinction; divided the territories he had taken from the Amorites, to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and part of Manasseh, on condition they should go over Jordan, and assist their brethren to conquer the rest of Canaan; and he appointed three of their cities for cities of refuge. God pointed out to him the borders of Canaan westward of Jordan, and directed that Eleazar the high priest, and Joshua, who had already been marked out for his successor, and ten princes belonging to the tribes concerned, should divide it according to the proportion of the tribes and their families. Num. xx—xxvii.

The eleventh month of the fortieth year of the Hebrews' travels was now begun. Moses finding that no intercession with God could procure for him an entrance into the promised land, and knowing that his end drew near, he rehearsed to the Hebrews a summary of what God had done for them, and a number of the laws he had given them, with some additional ones, and caused them to renew their solemn covenant with God. He also set before them the manifold blessings which would attend their obedience, and the curses that would follow on their disobedience. He left a written copy of his law, to be placed at the side of the ark; and ordered the reading of it to the people at their public meetings, especially on the year of release. After giving Joshua a solemn charge with respect to his behaviour, he composed an elegant hymn, that represented the excellency of God, their duty to him, and their danger if they apostatized from it. He then blessed the tribes of Israel; that of Simeon (perhaps because it was the most guilty in the Midianitish whoredom and idolatry,) only excepted; and concluded with a lofty commendation of God, as the source of true happiness. This finished, he went up to the top of Pisgah, where God strengthened his sight to take a clear view of the whole of the western Canaan. His natural strength was now abated, but, perhaps, in a trance of wonder at the goodness of God, he breathed out his last. To intimate the future burial of his ceremonial law, and to hinder the Hebrews from idolizing his relics, the Lord buried him in the valley over against Beth-peor; but his grave could never be found. Satan, it seems, thought to have discovered his body; but Michael the archangel prevented it, and solemnly commanded Satan to give up his attempt.—Moses and Elias appeared to our Saviour on the holy mount: and if Moses then resumed his natural body, we can hardly forbear thinking he must now wear it as glorified in heaven. Deut. i.—xxxiv. Matt. xvii. 1—6. Besides the five books ascribed to him, Moses also wrote the 90th Psalm. It has been pretended, that these five books were not written by him; but as the Holy Ghost always ascribes them to him, and sometimes calls them by his name, the pretence is absurd. Josh. viii. 34. 1 Kings ii. 3. 2 Chron. xxiii. 18. xxv. 4. xxxiv. 14. and Luke xvi. 29. The Jews have unanimously ascribed them to him, and so have several of the heathen. In the character of Moses, every thing is opposite to that of an impostor: his narratives are faithful and disinterested; his style is every where the reverse of flattery; his miracles were wrought before multitudes, and in things in which they could not be deceived. Notwithstanding his loading them with ceremonies, and representing them in a shameful light, the Jews extol him to this day. The Mahometans regard him as next to Jesus and Mahomet. Numbers of the ancient heathen spread his renown; and much of what they ascribe to their god Bacchus is perhaps but the history of Moses blended with fable.

Was not Moses a distinguished type of our Saviour? What a proper, nay divine child, was he! But how early and often exposed to danger! To what exile, reproach, contradiction of sinners, and murder, was he exposed! But how divinely supported in his numerous trials! How amiable his qualities, his contempt of the pleasures, honour, and wealth of this world; his compassion towards his hard-hearted brethren! his amazing meekness! his signal fidelity, boldness, prudence, and zeal! —How solemn and special his call to his work; and by what multitudes of miracles in favour of his people, and by what ruin on his Jewish, Antichristian, and other enemies, is it confirmed! How extensive his office! What a mighty deliverer, who frees us from worse than Egyptian bondage, the tyranny of sin, Satan, the world, and of heathenism and Popery! What a marvellous provider of spiritual food, hidden manna, and living water, and enduring robes of righteousness for his people! What a glorious leader, who opens a safe passage through every difficulty; and by power and intercession subdues every enemy, and brings his people, not merely to the border, but to the enjoyment of their promised rest! Nor can murmuring, unbelief, or other base usage, make him leave them or forsake them. What a renowned Mediator between God and men, with whom God entered into covenant, and who confirms the new covenant by the shedding and sprinkling of his blood! He had his Father's law written on the tables of his heart, fulfilled it as a covenant for us, and gives it to us as a rule. He not only fasted and prayed, but died for a rebellious and stiff-necked race, and is our infallible security against our ever experiencing the breach of God's promise, and for our everlasting enjoyment of his presence. What an illuminated and incomparable Prophet, who knows the whole mind of God, and can teach us to profit! He is the brightness of his Father's glory; but we behold his countenance as veiled in human nature, and so we can have familiar intercourse with him. What a glorious Priest, who sheds and sprinkles his blood on the altar, to satisfy his Father; on the book of the law, fulfilling it; and on the people, purging their consciences from dead works to serve the living God; and who sends all the ministers of the church, and consecrates all the saints, those spiritual priests, to the service of God! He is king in Jeshurun, among his upright ones, his true Israel, and settles the whole frame, and every ordinance of his church, and has the whole government thereof committed to him.—His death was voluntary, his grave was divinely assigned him; but in it he saw no corruption; and with him was buried the law of Moses, and the sins of his people.

MOTE. Small sins are likened to motes in the eye; they are very troublesome to an awakened and tender conscience, and greatly mar our comfortable looking on God as our sun and shield. Matt. vii. 3.

MOTH; a kind of insect which insensibly consumes that in which it takes up its lodging. Some moths lodge in, and eat clothes; others lodge in and eat flowers and leaves; and it is said, perhaps without ground, that some nestle in, and eat the very substance of walls. Somemoths wrap themselves up in a kind of silk, which they spin out of their own bowels. Secret curses or judgments, that insensibly consume men's characters, or estate, are likened to a moth. Isa. i. 9. and li. 1. God likens himself to a moth and rottenness, because by his judgments he gradually and insensibly weakened the Jews, and rendered them contemptible. Hos. v. 12. The wicked man buildeth his house as a moth; he builds it by covetousness and anxious care: imagines his lot agreeable, but how easily do the judgments of God burn or shake him out of it! Job xxvii. 18. Man's beauty, glory, and wealth, waste like a moth; they are secretly and insensibly, but quickly consumed. Psal. xxxix. 11.

MOTHER. See FATHER.

'MOVE; (1.) To stir out of a place. 2 Kings' xxi. 8. (2.) To stir up, provoke. Deut. xxxii. 21. (3.) To persuade. Josh. xv. 18. (4.) To stir up, and strengthen. Judg. xiii. 26. (5.) To assist in bearing, or to practise. Matt. xxiii. 4. (6.) To tremble, shake out of its place. Psal. xviii. 7. (7.) To raise up, move to and fro. Job xl. 17. (8.) To terrify and discourage from doing any thing. Acts xx. 24. (9.) To be all in a stir. Matt. xxi. 10. Acts xxi. 30. (10.) To be exceedingly affected with wonder and pity. Ruth i. 19. The Holy Spirit moved or sat brooding on the waters, when his creative influence prepared the waters for producing fishes and fowls, and the earthly particles mixed therewith to produce herbs, grass, and trees. Gen. i. 2. The moving of my lips should assuage my grief; a free bewailing of my case should give me ease. Job xvi. 5. The ways of a harlot are moveable; she goes from place to place, that her character may not be known; she uses a thousand different arts to entice men to whoredom, and is quite inconstant in her temper and pretended affection. Prov. v. 6. The motions of sin in our members, are the inward activity of it, stirring us up to actual sin; and they are by the law, as its curse binds us under the power of sin, as our punishment; and the corruption of our nature is irritated and stirred up occasionally by the precepts and threatenings of the law. Rom. vii. 5.

MOUNT; (1.) To grow great. Job xx. 6. (2.) To go upward. Isa. xv. 5. The saints mount up, when they are exercised in holy and heavenly desires, thoughts, meditations, hopes, conversation. Isa. x. 31. The Jews mounted up, went into dust, or walked proudly, as the lifting up of smoke; i. e. however proud they were, they should quickly be scattered, and fall into ruin. Isa. ix. 18.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN, HILL. That there were mountains before the flood, is manifest; for the waters are said to have covered the highest mountains. Gen. vii. 20. It is probable, however, that the flood made great alterations in the existence or form of mountains. Some have been since cast up by earthquakes; and some are mere heaps of sand collected by the wind. Mountains are very useful, as they produce minerals and herbage not found elsewhere; and they keep off the east or north winds, and prevent the vapours deserting the hot countries, and leaving them parched, they also emit prodigious numbers of excellent springs. Upon a careful inspection the mountains will in general appear regularly disposed, as various links in a chain that goes quite round the earth. A chain of them commences in Iceland, if not in Greenland, and runs with some interruption through Britain, Italy, Sicily, and through Africa, to the mountains of the Moon. Another chain runs from the north of Tartary to the Cape of Comorin in the East Indies. One of these chains is continued on the other side of the globe, in the mountains that run from the south to the north of America. Another chain of mountains runs across the above-mentioned, from east to west, beginning near the east of China, and running westward through Tartary, Media, Macedonia, Switzerland, France, &c.

Canaan abounded with mountains and hills. In the middle of the country, to the west of Jordan, there was (the plain of Jezreel excepted) little else than a beautiful arrangement of hills from the north to the south. The east part of the country beyond Jordan, was also one continued arrangement of hills from north to south. On the north of Canaan were the mountains Lebanon and Amana. On the east of Jordan, going southward, were mounts Hermon, Zion, or Mizar, Gilead, Abarim, Nebo, Pisgah. On the south of Canaan, in Arabia, were mounts Sinai and Horeb, Paran, Hor, Seir, Halak; in the south part of Canaan, we find the hills of Hachilah, Engedi, and Ziz; and at Jerusalem, we find the mounts of Olives, Calvary, Zion, Moriah, and Careb. In the middle of the country north of Jerusalem, we find the hills of Qnarantana, Ephraim, Ebal, Gerizzim, Gaash, Samaria, Tzemaraim, Zalmon, and Amalek, Moreh, and Gilboa. In the northern parts, were Carmel, Tabor, and the Ladder of Tyre. The mountains of Samaria, are those about Samaria; or at least in the territories of the ten tribes, Jer. xxxi. 5; but what Mount Israel was, whether some hill anciently denominated from Jacob or Jerusalem, or the hill of Samaria, or rather the mountainous part of the land of Israel, cannot be determined. Josh. xi. 16. Heaps of earth raised for taking of cities, were called mounts. Ezek. xvii. 17. Jer. xxxiii. 4. Mountains have been sometimes absorbed, or sunk into the earth. Long ago, the great mountains Cymbotus and Sytelus, and the vast promontory of Phlegium in Ethiopia, thus disappeared. The burning mountains of Vesuvius and Strompylus have lost half of their former height. In latter times, Picus, an exceedingly lofty mountain in one of the Molucca islands, was swallowed up in an instant, and a lake left in its stead. In A. D. 1556, a mountainous province of China sank into an immense lake. In the terrible earthquake of Chili in America, A. D. 1646, several whole mountains of the lofty Andes sunk into the earth, one after another. In A. D. 1618, a mountain in the north-east of Switzerland, fell upon an adjacent town, and overwhelmed it, with near 2000 persons.

Mountains and hills are used to represent, (1.) The people that dwell in a mountainous and hilly country. Ezek. vi. 2, 2. (2.) The temple, which was built on the top of a hill. Isa. xxx. 29. Jer. xvii. 3, 12. (3.) The church of God, typified by mount Zion, and which is firmly settled, conspicuous, and useful in the world, Psal. ii. 6. Isa. ii. 2; and which, as a great mountain, shall fill the whole earth, when all nations shall be gathered to Christ. Dan. ii. 35, 44. (4.) The ordinances of Christ, which elevate his people heavenward, and afford them much rich and medicinal provision for their souls, Joel iii. 18. Sol. Song ii. 8. and iv. 6. (5.) Men high in station, power, and authority, as magistrates in the state, and apostles and ministers in the church. Psal. lxxii. 3. Isa. xlv. 23. and lv. 12. (6.) Powerful hindrances and provocations, and enemies of the gospel, and of the people of Christ. Isa. xl. 4. xlix. 11. and xli. 15. (7.) The places where idols were worshipped, which were often in hills and high places. Ezek. xviii. 6, 11. (8.) Idols worshipped in these places, or any thing we trust to, instead of God. Jer. iii. 23. (9.) The heavens, which are higher than mountains. Psal. cxxi. 1. God is likened to the mountains round about Jerusalem, as he is the sure defence and protector of his people, and the source of all their consolation. Psal. cxxv. 2. The mountain of myrrh, and hill of frankincense, that Christ frequents, is either the church, where saints, precious gospel-truths and ordinances, and acceptable prayers and praises are to be found; or heaven, where every thing delightful dwells. Sol. Song iv. 6. and viii. 4. Samaria is called a mountain, because built on a hill. Amos iv. 1. and vi. 1. Babylon is called a mountain, because of her lofty buildings, and great power: a destroying mountain, because it overwhelmed and destroyed the nations around; and a burning mountain, because it was at last burned with fire, and the rubbish looked like a burned mountain. Jer. li. 25. Under the second apocalyptic trumpet, a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea; the Arian heresy, denying the Godhead of Christ, and of his Spirit, was spread in the church, supported by authority, and attended with persecution and ruin to multitudes. Rome was taken and burned; and terrible were the ravages of the Goths, Huns, Vandals, Suevi, &c. in almost every part of the empire. Rev. viii. 8. At Antichrist's destruction the islands are removed, and the mountains are not found; monasteries, and every thing secure, and apparently beyond danger, are ruined. Rev. xvi. 20.

MOURN; LAMENT, WEEP, WAIL. When gates, walls, ramparts, Lebanon, and high ways, new wine, or a country, are said to lament, mourn, or weep, it denotes their being in a most doleful and wretched condition, deserted or ruinous. Isa. iii. 6. and xxiv. 4. Lam. i. 4. and ii. 8. Ezek. xxxi. 5. Mourning, lamentation, weeping, wailing, denote, (1.) GRIEF, and the expression of it, whether godly, Matt. v. 4. Isa. lxvi. 10; professedly religious and solemn, Ezra x. 6; or natural, Gen. xxiii. 2. and i. 2; or desperate, as in hell. Matt. xxii. 13. and xxiv. 30. (2.) Judgments and afflictions, that cause grief and sorrow. Ezek. ii. 10. Lamentation also signifies an oration, in which some misery or loss is bewailed. 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. At the death of their friends, the Hebrews used all possible demonstrations of grief; they sometimes mourned several weeks, as thirty days for Aaron, and as many for Moses: but the ordinary term of mourning was seven days. So long the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead mourned for Saul. Num. xx. 29. Deut. xxiv. 8. 1 Sam. xxxi. 18. During this time of mourning they rent their clothes, smote their breasts, fasted, lay on the ground, and went barefoot; they ate their food on the ground; and whatever food they took was reckoned unclean, and polluted every partaker. Hos. ix. 4. They neither dressed themselves, nor shaved themselves, nor pared their nails, nor saluted any body; their faces and heads were covered: they also hired mourners, both men and women, who made a trade of it, and could raise the most doleful outcries and howlings; they were used to curse the days whereon some eminent disaster had happened. Amos v. 16. Jer. ix. 17. Job iii. 8. They mourned excessively for an only son, and for a first-born, as his death cut off the remembrance, or at least the honour of their family. Zech. xii. 10. The priests mourned only for near relations, and the high-priest for none. Lev. xxi. 1—12. After the death of such as had no friends left to bewail them, some persons of character of the place acted the part of mourning friends, and were in like manner comforted. It was reckoned a very pious work to comfort mourners; and when they came to the mourners, they stood around them, ten in a row, and approaching towards them, one by one, wished them comfort from heaven. If they sat, it was on the ground, and the mourner had the chief seat. The friends came not to comfort them till after the interment, and not many, till the third or fourth day after the decease. John xi. 19, 39. They sometimes went to the graves to lament their dead, and so the Turkish women do to this day. The Jews had a kind of prayer, or rather benediction of God, as the raiser of the dead, which they repeated as they mourned, or even passed the graves of their dead. The Jews in Chaldea did not mourn and weep, but mourned one towards another; they durst not openly bewail their misery, but did it secretly. Ezek. xxiv. 23.

MOUSE; a small, but well-known animal, whose fore-teeth are sharp, its feet divided, and its ears naked of hair. Mice are extremely prolific, especially in wet harvests. As they frequently feed on dung and swine's flesh, it is no wonder they were declared unclean by the Mosaic law, but they were used as food by the ancient Romans. Lev. xi. 29. Isa. lxvi. 17. In some parts of Palestine they were so numerous, that had it not been for birds which devoured them, they would have destroyed the whole seed or crop of corn; and it seems they had exceedingly injured the Philistines' crop that year in which the ark of God was a captive in the country. 1 Sam. vi. 5.

MOUTH, LIPS, and TONGUE, are well known in their natural signification; only mouth is sometimes put for a particular part of it, as the throat, roof of the mouth, &c. and, in figurative language, have in many things the same meaning. As mouth signifies any door or entrance, outward or inward, of a thing; lip signifies, the brim or edge of it, Dan. iii. 26. 2 Kings ii. 13; and the tongue, the uttermost part of it. Isa. xi. 15. Mouth sometimes signifies the desire or appetite, as the natural appetite is satiated by the mouth. Psal. ciii. 5. The three words very frequently denote language or speech, Job xix. 16. and ii. 10. Prov. xii. 18; and sometimes tongue signifies a particular language, 1 Cor. xiv. 5; or even the persons that speak in various languages. Rev. vii. 9. and x. 11. Mouth or lips ascribed to God or Christ, denote his will, authority, word, or promise. Isa. i. 20. Job xi. 5. Sol. Song i. 2. Christ's lips are like lilies, dropping sweet smelling myrrh; and his mouth is most sweet: how delightful, refreshing, healing, and fructifying to the soul, are his ordinances, words, promises, and manifestations of his love! Sol. Song v. 13, 16. To have God's law in our mouth, or tongue, is to delight in, and converse much on it. Exod. xiii. 9. Josh. i. 8. 2 Sam. xxiii. 2. To draw near to God with the mouth, and honour him with the lips, is to make an outward appearance of devotion, of prayer, and praise, while there is no regard to him in the heart. Isa. xxix. 13. Matt. xv. 8. A deceitful or double tongue, is that which utters things false, deceiving, and inconsistent. Zeph. iii. 13. 1 Tim. iii. 8. A wholesome tongue, is speech that shews a sincere heart, and tends to the edification of others. Prov. xv. 4. A bridled tongue, or watched mouth, is one restrained from sinful reproaches, or passionate language. James i. 26. Psal. xxxix. 1. and cxli. 3. A tamed tongue, is one restrained from evil language, and applied to good. James iii. 8. A soft tongue, is kind and courteous speech. Prov. xxv. 15. The tongue of the learned, is ability to speak, to the conviction, edification, and comfort of men's souls. Isa. i. 4. A froward mouth, is one full of outrageous contradictions and disobedient speech. Prov. iv. 24. A smooth mouth, is one full of soft and flattering language. Prov. v. 3. Unclean lips, are such as are polluted with sinful words. Isa. vi. 5. Burning lips, denote fine and handsome language, or words apparently full of love. Prov. xxvi. 23. The mouth of the foolish is a rod of pride, is near destruction, and is its owner's destruction; wicked and foolish speeches injure neighbours, and ruin the speakers themselves. Prov. x. 14. xiv. 3. and xviii. 7. To open the mouth, is to cause one to speak, Num. xxii. 28; or to speak, Isa. liv. 7; or to speak with full freedom and boldness, Psal. cix. 2. Job iii. 1; or to listen attentively, as deaf people open their mouth to help their hearing; and to desire earnestly. Psal. cxix. 131. To open the mouth or lips wide, is to talk rashly, boastingly, reproachfully, Psal. xxxv. 21. Prov. viii. 8; or to listen with the utmost attention, earnestly desiring instruction, Job xxiv. 23; or earnestly to desire satisfaction and blessings to our soul. Psal. lxxxi. 10. The earth opened her mouth, when rent asunder, and a gulf was made. Num. xvi. 32. Hell opens her mouth, when multitudes go into it. Isa. v. 14. Stopping or shutting of the mouth, or keeping the door of the mouth, imports a sense of guilt, shame, silence, restraint of speech, or inability to speak.

Rom. iii. 19. Psal. lxxiii. 11. Mic. vii. 5. Eccl. xii. 4. Iniquity stops its mouth, when wicked men are restrained from the exercise of their power, and are ashamed to sin openly. Psal. cvii. 42. To lay the hand on the mouth, and have the ears deaf, is to be struck silent with shame and terror. Mic. vii. 16. To have the mouth or lips covered, imports shame and grief. Lev. xiii. 45. Ezek. xxiv. 17, 20. Mic. iii. 7. To refrain the lips, is to speak little, and seasonably; as the talk of the lips, vain and idle speech, and empty boasting without practice, tends only to poverty. Prov. x. 19. and xiv. 23. To set the mouth against the heavens, is to speak arrogantly and blasphemously, without fear of God or men. Psal. lxxiii. 9. To wet the tongue, is, with great diligence and activity, to backbite, slander, and revile. Psal. lxiv. 4. To gnaw the tongue, or gnash the teeth, is expressive of great torment, rage, and despair. Rev. xvi. 10. Under the tongue, or lips, or in the mouth, sometimes denotes in the heart, but ready to be uttered by the tongue or lips. Psal. x. 7. and cix. 3. Sometimes the tongue is put for the heart. Psal. liii. 2.

God divides men's tongues, when he founds their joint plots against, and persecutions of his people. Psal. lv. 9. The church's lips are like a thread of scarlet; drop as a honey-comb; and honey and milk are under her tongue: her ministers, who utter divine truth, are washed in, and chiefly speak of Christ's bleeding love, and dispense precious and sweet gospel-truths, to the edification of souls: The saints' prayer, praise, and mutual converse, and brotherly reproof, are performed by faith in a crucified Redeemer, and tend much to the edification and comfort of others. Sol. Song iv. 3, 11. Their mouth delivers, and satisfies; their prayers and godly instructions are means of the salvation and comfort of others. Prov. xii. 6. and xiv. 7. Out of the mouth of Christ's witnesses proceeds fire to devour their enemies; according to their prayers, hopes, and declarations, divine wrath is executed on Antichrist. Rev. xi. 5. The mouth of the dragon, and beast, and false prophet, is the authority, influence, or doctrine of Satan, the heathen Romish empire, Antichrist, and Mahomet. Rev. xii. 16. xiii. 2. and xvi. 13. The Turks have power in their mouth, and in their tails; in their terrible fire-arms, and numerous infantry, or in their soldiers and false teachers. Rev. ix. 17—19. God will divide the tongue of the Egyptian sea, in removing every hindrance to the conversion of the gentiles, or impediment to the recalling of the Jews to their own land, and to a church-state. Isa. xi. 15.

MUFFLERS; women's vails or masks, which covered the whole face except the eyes; such pieces of apparel were common among the Arabs and Jews. Isa. liii. 19.

MULBERRY-TREES have their flowers of the amentaceous kind, consisting of a great number of stamina, with points arising from a four-leaved cup; the berries contain roundish seeds, and are soft, and full of juice. There are five kinds of mulberry-trees. The fruit, when unripe, is of a very binding quality: but when ripe, it is rather purgative, and is most cooling, delicious, and good for quenching of thirst. The syrup made of it also is very pleasant. The Romans preferred mulberry-apples to every kind of foreign fruit. At present, the leaves of this tree are much used to feed silk-worms; and the leaves, fruit, juice, bark, and root, are used in medicine. Multitudes of mulberry-trees grew in the drier soils of Canaan, as in the valley of Rephaim, Bacha, &c. By a sound made, no doubt by angels, on the tops of the mulberry-trees in the valley of Rephaim, was David warned when to attack the Philistines. 2 Sam. v. 23. 24.

MULE; a mongrel animal, produced by a horse and an ass, or by a mare and he-ass. Neither mules, nor any other mongrel animals, are capable of procreation, God having wisely so ordered, to prevent the filling of the world with monsters. The Jewish law expressly prohibited every attempt to confound the species of animals. Some have pretended, that ANAH the Horite was inventor of the unnatural practice of gendering mules; but the text is capable of another meaning. See ANAH. It is certain there were plenty of mules in the time of David. He and his sons rode on mules. 2 Sam. xiii. 29. and xviii. 9. Solomon rode upon one at his coronation, and procured a considerable number of them. 1 Kings iv. 28. and x. 25. Ahab had vast numbers of them. 1 Kings xvii. 5. Naaman had several of them in his train. 2 Kings v. 17. The people of Togarmah sold numbers of them to the Tyrians. Ezek. xxvii. 14. The Jews had two hundred and forty-five of them, to bear their furniture from Babylon. Ezra ii. The Persians used them for their posts to ride on. Esth. viii. 10. They are still much used in several countries, where the ways are hard and rocky. Great numbers of them are kept about the Alps, on the north of Italy, and the Pyrenean mountains, between France and Spain. These mules are generally black, well limbed, and mostly bred of Spanish mares. Some of them are fifteen or sixteen hands high. They are much stronger, hardier, and more sure-footed than horses, and will live and work to double their age: they are light, and fit for riding, but gallop roughly.

MULTIPLY, to increase in number or quantity. In multiplying, God multiplied Abraham, when his posterity, and their blessings, were rendered exceedingly numerous and great. Gen. xxii. 17. Heb. vi. 14. God's mercy is multiplied, not by increase in him, but by the increase of its fruits to men, and their being more abundantly assured of his favour. Jude 2. His word is multiplied when it is more abundantly and success fully preached for the conversion and edification of men. Acts xii. 24.

MULTITUDE: (1.) A great company of persons or things. Gen. xxx. 30. and xlviii. 4. (2.) The common people, which are more numerous. Matt. xiv. 5. (3.) The whole assembly, both senators and common people. Acts xxiii. 7. (4.) A great company of professed Christians. Acts xxi. 22. (5.) Great store and variety. Jer. x. 13. Eccl. v. 3, 7. The horses that remain are as the multitude of Israel; they are as lean and starving as the people are, and so it will be no great matter suppose they fall into the hands of the Syrians. 2 Kings vii. 13.

MUNITION; FORT. Nah. ii. 1. Christ, and God in him, are as a munition of rocks to his people: they are safely protected from curses and condemnation, from the guilt and dominion of sin, and from Satan and his agents. Isa. xxxiii. 16.

MURDER; (1.) The unlawful taking away of a person's life. Mark xv. 7. (2.) Hatred of, and cruelty to, our neighbour, in thought, word, or deed. Matt. xix. 11. 1 John iii. 15. The voluntary killing of any person, except in lawful war, execution of public justice, or necessary self-defence, has been peculiarly marked out by the vengeance of God. Cain, the first murderer, was preserved as a monument of the divine indignation. Gen. iv. 15; but in ordinary cases God requires that murderers be put to death by the magistrate. No sacrifice was accepted for this sin: no money was to ransom the life of the guilty person. If he fled to God's altar for protection, he was to be dragged thence, and executed. Gen. ix. 6. Psal. li. 16. Num. xxxv. 27—31. If a man had even involuntarily and accidentally slain his neighbour, God, to mark his abhorrence of murder, ordered that involuntary man-slayer to be banished from his native abode, and confined to a city of refuge till the death of the high-priest; and if found without it by the slain person's friend, might be put to death. Num. xxxv. Deut. xix. If a body was found murdered in the field, and the murderer was unknown, the rulers of the nearest city slew a heifer, and, with washing of hands, solemnly protested their innocence of the crime, and their ignorance of the perpetrators; and with the priests or Levites present, begged that the Lord would not lay the sin to the charge of the land. Deut. xxi. 1—8.

MURMUR; to repine, and angrily complain of a person or thing. John vi. 41, 61. Habitual murmuring is a token of a wicked heart. Jude 16. Terribly did the Lord punish the murmurings so often repeated by the Hebrews in the desert; and yet where sin abounded there did grace much more abound. See Moses. Exod. v. xiv. xvi. and xxi. Psal. lxxviii. and cvi.

MURRAIN; a kind of pestilence that killed numbers of the Egyptian cattle. Exod. ix. 3. Psal. lxxviii. 50.

MUSE; to think; to consider. Psal. cxliii. 5.

MUSIC is of a very ancient origin. Tubal, a descendant of Cain, long before the flood, taught men to play on the harp and organ. Laban complained that Jacob deprived him of an opportunity of sending off his daughters with music. Gen. iv. 21. and xxxi. 27. The ancient Hebrews had a very great taste for music: when they had passed the Red sea, both men and women sang hymns to the praise of God, their miraculous deliverer. Exod. xv. Silver trumpets were ordered by God to be made for sounding over their sacrifices, especially at solemn feasts. Num. x. With music Jephthah's daughter welcomed him home from his victory, Judg. xi. 34; and with music the Hebrew women welcomed David back from the slaughter of Goliath. 1 Sam. xviii. 6. David himself was an excellent musician; and, it seems, had many singing men and singing women in his court. 1 Sam. xvi. 2 Sam. vi. and xix. 21. Solomon had them perhaps in far greater numbers. Eccl. ii. 8. In the time of Jeroboam the son of Joash, the Israelites prided themselves upon inventing new musical instruments. Amos vi. 5. At his idolatrous festival, Nebuchadnezzar had a large concert of music; and music was the ordinary recreation of the Median king. Dan. iii. and vi. 18. The temple-music makes the chief figure in scripture. David, in his own time, composed a variety of psalms, and caused his skilful players to set them to music; as appears by their inscriptions to Jeduthun, Asaph, or the sons of Korah. 1 Chron. xv. and xvi. As now the Levites were eased of a great part of the burdensome work of their charge, by the tabernacle and ark being fixed in a place, David before his death distributed the 4000 sacred singers into twenty-four classes, who should serve at the temple in their turns. The three chief musicians were Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun. The four sons of Asaph, six of Jeduthun, and fourteen of Heman, were constituted the chief of the twenty-four classes. It is probable that they all, or most of them, attended at the solemn festivals. They were thus arranged: the Gershonites on the south of the brazen altar; the Merarites on the north; and the Kohathites between them possibly on the east and west of it. 1 Chron. xxv. The Jews, or their singers, were taunted about their sacred songs at Babylon. Psal. cxxxvii. 2. Two hundred singing men and singing women returned from the Chaldean captivity along with Zerubbabel. Ezra ii. 65. From the heathen the Jews adopted music into their funeral ceremonies. Matt. ix. 23. Their REGINOTH, or stringed instruments, were the psaltery and harp; to which may perhaps be added the sheminith, shushan or shushanim, and the alamoth, and dulcimer, and sackbut: and the HEHILOTH, or wind instruments, were the organ, cornet, flute, pipe, and trumpet: their drum instruments were timbrels, cymbals, and bells.

MUST, denotes that a thing is necessary, either as an event to be fulfilled for answering the predictions, purposes, or ends of God, Acts i. 16. John iii. 7. Matt. xviii. 7. Rev. xx. 3; or as a duty to be done. 2 Tim. ii. 6.

MUSTARD; a plant whose flower consists of four leaves, and is formed like a cross. The pistil arises from the cup, and finally becomes a long pod, divided by an intermediate membrane into two cells containing roundish seeds. The pod also usually terminates in a fungose horn, with some seeds in it. There are eleven or twelve kinds of mustard. The seeds are of a hot, sharp, and biting taste. The mustard in Canaan grew to much larger size than ours. The Jewish Talmud mentions a stalk of it that was sufficient to bear a man climbing up on it, and another whose principal branch bore three barrels of mustard-seed. Our Saviour represents its stem as growing to the height of a tree, sufficient to lodge birds among its branches. The kingdom of heaven is compared to it, to represent the small beginning, and yet the wonderful increase, of the gospel church, and of the work of grace in men's hearts. Matt. xiii. 31.

MUSTER; to array, to put an army into proper rank and order. 2 Kings xxv. 19. The Lord mustereth the host: by his providence he collects, and ranks into order, the armies which execute his vengeance. Isa. xlii. 4.

MUTTER; to speak softly. It seems wizards muttered and peeped to their familiar spirits. Isa. viii. 19.

MUTUAL; belonging to both parties. Rom. i. 12.

MUZZLE; to put any thing in or on the mouth of a beast to restrain it from eating. Deut. xxv. 4.

MYRA; a city of Lycia, where Paul embarked in an Alexandrian ship bound for Rome. Acts xxvii. 5. Whether he founded a church here, we are uncertain; but from the fourth to the ninth century, when the Saracens seized it, there were bishops there.

MYRRH; a kind of gum issuing from the trunk and larger branches of the myrrh-tree, which is common in Arabia, Egypt, and Abyssinia. Sometimes it issues spontaneously; but chiefly flows out by means of incision. The incisions are made twice a-year, and the gum or resin is received on rush mats spread below. It comes to Europe in loose grains, from the size of a pepper-corn to that of a walnut, but mostly about the size of pease or horse-beans, and but seldom of a round form. Myrrh is of a reddish brown colour, with somewhat of a mixture of yellow. It dissolves in common water, and its purest pieces are somewhat transparent. Its taste is disagreeable, bitter, and acrid, with a peculiar flavour. Its smell is strong, but not disagreeable. The best myrrh is that which is clear, light, easily broken, and of the bitterest taste. Myrrh is of a purifying and preserving nature, and was used by the ancients in the embalming of their dead, and in perfuming garments, beds, and women. John xix. 39. Psal. xlv. 8. Prov. vii. 17. Esth. ii. 12. Being valuable, it was often given in presents. Gen. xliii. 11. Matt. ii. 12. It was an ingredient in the sacred perfume or incense of the Jews. Exod. xxx. 23. Christ is a bundle of myrrh, that lies all night between his people's breasts: how precious, delightful, purifying and perfuming is he in his person, righteousness, and influence, to the souls of his people, while the night of time continues! and how delightful to them are his garments of mediatorial office, his human nature, his word, and ordinances! Sol. Song i. 13. Psal. xlv. 8. His influences, and the graces that flow from him to his people, are like myrrh: how precious, purifying, and preserving to their souls! and how they endear them to him, and render them as myrrh, for the purification, and preservation of others! Sol. Song v. 1, 5, 13. iii. 6. and iv. 14.

MYRTLE; a comely and fragrant ever green tree, which grows best in low and well-watered valleys. The flower is of the rose kind, and is composed of several petals arranged in a circular form. The fruit is a berry shaped as an olive, and contains kidney-shaped seeds. The berries are cooling and astringent. Tournefort mentions twelve kinds of myrtles. Saints are likened to myrtles, for their spiritual comeliness, their delightful savour, their perseverance in grace, their peculiar growth in trouble, when humble and well watered by Christ. Isa. xli. 19. and lv. 13. Zech. i. 8. In the last text, myrtle-trees, with a man among them, may denote the Jews in their low and enslaved condition in Babylon, with Christ, and God in him, among them, as their preserver.

MY'SIA. There was a Mysia in Europe, on the east of Dalmatia, and north of Macedonia; but the Mysia mentioned in scripture, is that in Lesser Asia, which had the Hellespont sea on the north-west, Bithynia on the north-east, and Phrygia on the south. The inhabitants were stupid and contemptible to a proverb; but here Paul preached the gospel, and ever since there have been some vestiges of a Christian church. Acts xvi. 7, 8.

MYSTERY; what is wonderful, and above our reason to comprehend. Upon accurate inspection, every work of nature will be found mysterious; but the method of our redemption, and the gospel that discovers it, and the person and appearances of our incarnate God, are mysteries of a higher kind. Col. i. 26, 27. 1 Tim. iii. 16. Eph. v. 32. They are the mystery of faith, as by faith they are believed, 1 Tim. iii. 9; the mystery of godliness, as the faith thereof promotes godliness, 1 Tim. ii. 16; they are the mysteries of the kingdom; pertain to, and are discovered in God's kingdom of grace and glory; and the faith thereof renders men heirs of the kingdom which God has promised to them that love him. Matt. xiii. 11. and the hidden mystery which was long veiled under types and shadows, was gradually revealed under the Old Testament, and is still unknown to most, and is comprehended by no creature. Col. i. 26, 27. 1 Cor. ii. 7. The mystery of God will be finished, when all the dark prophecies relative to the church, and all the wonderful providences in the fulfilment thereof, shall be fully accomplished. Rev. x. 7. Antichrist is called a mystery, or mystery of iniquity; marvellous was the craft and wickedness wherewith the popish constitution was formed, and has been supported; and horrid are the scenes of secret impieties therein perpetrated. Rev. xvii. 5. 2 Thess. ii. 7.

N.

NA-AMAN the general of BENHADAD the Syrian's army. He was highly esteemed by his master, because he had saved Syria from ruin, probably in the battle in which Ahab gave Benhadad his last defeat, or at the siege of Ramoth-gilead, when Ahab was slain: but he was sorely afflicted with a leprosy. A Hebrew captive, who served in his family, happened to say to her mistress, that if Naaman would apply to Elisha the prophet in Israel, he would quickly cure him. On this hint, Naaman resolved to make a trial; and Benhadad imagining that Jehoram king of Israel had the prophets under his direction, wrote him a letter requesting him to obtain the cure of his general. Elisha soon eased Jehoram of his perplexity, by bidding him send Naaman to him, and the power of the God of Israel should be discovered in his cure. Naaman, with his chariots and train, presented himself at the door of Elisha. That Elisha might maintain a due distance from lepers, and might mortify Naaman's pride, and manifest that the cure was wholly of God, he only sent him forth directions to go and wash himself seven times in Jordan. Angry that Elisha shewed so little regard for him, and that he came not forth, and by prayer and touching of his body, cured him, Naaman refused to comply; and the rather, as he thought Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, were preferable to all the rivers of Israel. His servants begged him to think how cheerfully he would have done or undergone the most difficult operation to get rid of his disease, had the prophet commanded it; and why should he then object to a thing so very simple and easy? Naaman was persuaded, and in conformity with the seven-fold sprinkling of the leper, washed himself seven times in Jordan, and was perfectly cured. He returned to Elisha, and offered him a present; but it was not accepted. He then professed his faith in the God of Israel as the only true God, and craved two mules' burden of Israelitish earth to build an altar for sacrificing to him alone; and asked the forgiveness of his bowing of himself in the house of Rimmon, to the idol of Syria, as he attended his master to the temple. Elisha granted him his desired quantity of earth, and bade him go in peace. Some imagine, he asked indulgence in future idolatry, which he thought his office of supporting the king obliged him to sanction; but it is perhaps as just to understand the text, of forgiveness of what he had done; for it may be read, When my master went to the house of Rimmon,—he leaned on my hand, and I bowed down myself in the house of Rimmon,— the Lord pardon thy servant concerning this thing.

Naaman went off very joyful; but Gehazi, Elisha's servant, displeased with his master for refusing his present, soon overtook him. Naaman alighted from his chariot, and asked him what was his desire. He falsely told him, that two young prophets from Mount Ephraim were just come to his master, who were in necessitous circumstances, and needed each a suit of clothes and some money. Naaman was so touched with gratitude, that he never once considered how unlikely it was that Elisha would ask a talent of silver for two young scholars, urged Genazi to take two talents instead of one, (amounting to £684. 7s. 6d. sterling,) and sent his servants to carry them as far as Gehazi would permit. When Gehazi had secreted the present, he presented himself before Elisha, who asked him where he had been. He denied that he had been any where out of the way. Elisha told him, that by the discoveries of God's Spirit, he saw him, when Naaman turned back to meet him; and added, you, at this season, so very improper, intend to buy fields, vineyards, and oliveyards, with the money you got; but, to punish your covetousness, falsehood, and treachery, the leprosy of Naaman shall cleave to you and your posterity. We suppose Naaman soon after either died, or quitted his post in the Syrian army, that he might not lead it against the Hebrews; and Hazael became general in his room. 2 Kings v. Luke iv. 27.

NABAL, a rich, but very churlish man, of the tribe of Judah, and race of Caleb. He had numerous flocks which had their pasture about South Carmel, near Maon. David, in his exile, frequented the neighbouring wilderness of Paran. He and his men not only did no hurt to Nabal's flocks, but protected them from the Arabs, and from wild beasts, and assisted the herdsmen in every thing they could. When Nabal held his shearing-feast, David, in the most civil manner, sent to desire a present of what part of the provision he pleased. Nabal most harshly told David's messengers, that he knew better than to give his servants' provision to a contemptible fellow, who had ran away from his master, and to his followers. Informed of this rudeness, David resolved immediately to put Nabal and all that he had, to the sword, as a means of deterring others from using him in like manner. Abigail, by her prudent behaviour, disarmed David's rage, and won his affection. As soon as Nabal her husband was sober, she told him into what danger his conduct had brought himself and family. The poor creature was so terrified, that he fell sick, and in ten days after died, as stupidly as he had lived; and not long after Abigail was espoused to David. 1 Sam. xxv.

NABOTH, an Israelite of the city of Jezreel. He had a convenient garden near Ahab's palace; which Ahab required him either to sell it to him, or to exchange it for another. Naboth, attentive to the divine law, which prohibited the alienation of inheritances without necessity, or to sell them irredeemably, refused to sell or exchange the inheritance of his fathers. Ahab having taken the refusal extremely ill, Jezrebel his wife bade him make himself easy, and she would obtain for him the vineyard. She wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his ring, requiring the magistrates of Jezreel to hold a fast, or perhaps rather a general court, and to suborn two or three wicked fellows to bear false witness against Naboth, that he had blasphemed God and the king, and thus condemn and put him to death. The abandoned magistrates directly executed her orders. Naboth was stoned to death as a blasphemer, and Ahab took possession of the vineyard; but the vengeance of heaven pursued him and his family, for the covetousness, hypocrisy, perjury, and murder committed in this affair. 1 Kings xxi. 2 Kings ix. 10.

NA'DAB. See AARON; JEROBOAM.

NA'HASH. See AMMON; JABESH.

NA'HOR, the son of Terah, grandson of another Nahor, and brother of Abraham. He fixed his residence at Haran in Mesopotamia, which was sometimes called by his name. He married Milcch the daughter of his brother Haran, who was already deceased. By her he had eight sons, viz. Huz, or Uz, the father of the Ausites, on the west of the Euphrates, in the land of Uz; Buz, the father of the Bazites, of whom Elihu was descended; Kemuel the father of the Camelites, and the Arameans, or Syrians; Chesed, the father of at least one tribe of the Chaldeans; Hazo, whom some settle in Persia, and make the father of the Hazoye, or Huzzeans in Chusistan, or the Chosseans; Pildash, whom Dr. Hyde considers the father of the Persians; and Jidlaph, and Bethuel, the father of Laban and Rebekah. By a concubine called Reumah, Nahor had four other sons, viz. Tebah, Gaham, Thabash, and Maachah. Gen. xi. 22, 24, 26. xxi. 20—22. and xxiv. 10.

NAHUM; a prophet of the city of El-kosh, or Elkosai, in Galilee. As he speaks of the Assyrian ravages of Egypt, and the destruction of No, as a thing past, and represents the Assyrian king as imagining an evil thing against the Lord, it is probable he prophesied about the time that either Sennacherib or Esarhaddon was returning from the ravage of Egypt, with an intention to destroy the kingdom of Judah. Nah. iii. 8—10. and i. 9, 11. After a lofty description of God, the great subject of his short prophecy is the ruin of NINEVEH and the Assyrian empire. This he describes in a manner so pathetic, and yet so plain, as is not to be exceeded by the greatest masters of oratory. Had Herodotus written his history of the Assyrians, or had it come to our hands, with what pleasure should we have seen the exact fulfilment of these predictions!

NAIL; (1.) A horny substance on the point of men's fingers or toes. Deut. xxi. 12. (2.) A nail of iron, brass, or the like, for fixing boards together, or hanging things on. Judg. iv. 21. Eliakim, and Jesus Christ, as prefigured by him, are likened to a nail in a sure place, for hanging of vessels on. God made Eliakim the Jewish minister of state, and on him did the subordinate rulers and the people depend. God established Jesus in the office of Mediator, and on him do all the persons of the elect, all their privileges, graces, and duties, and all the oracles of God, and ordinances and government of the church, depend. Isa. xxii. 22—25. The nail that came forth of Judah, is either Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, or the Maccabees, who established the Jewish state; or rather Jesus Christ, who connects and establishes his church, and bears her and all her concerns. Zech. x. 4. The words of the wise are as nails fastened: the truths of God fixed in the heart, remain there perpetually, and make the soul cleave to Jesus and his church and ordinances. Eccl. xii. 14. The nails of brass, which Daniel's fourth beast had, denotes the robberies and ravages of the Romans, and their power to retain their conquered provinces. Dan. vii. 16. Christ's nailing of the ceremonial law to his cross, imports, that by his death he fulfilled the signification of it, and has abolished its binding force. Col. ii. 14.

NA'IN, or NA'IM; a city where our Saviour restored the son of a widow to life, as they were carrying him out to his burial. It is generally said, that this place was near Endor, and about two miles south of Tabor; but Maundrell seems to think it was situated near the foot of Mount Hermon. Lake viii. 8—11.

NA'OTHO. See RAMAH.

NAKED; (1.) Altogether unclothed or uncovered. Gen. ii. 25. (2.) Having few clothes on. 1 Sam. xix. 24. John xxi. 7. (3.) Clearly seen, and fully known. Job xxvi. 6. Heb. iv. 13. (4.) Destitute of worldly comforts. Job i. 21. (5.) Destitute of innocence, holiness, and righteousness, inherent or imputed, and therefore exposed to shame and misery. Rev. iii. 17, 18. (6.) Deprived of the divine favour and protection, and ready to be a prey to their enemies. Exod. xxii. 25. 2 Chron. xxviii. 19. Before the fall, there was no sinful, shameful, or hurtful nakedness: as there was no sinful dispositions, no part of the human body was improper for view; but sin entering, they knew they were naked; that they were become unholy and unrighteous, and that they needed a covering for these parts of the body afterwards called nakedness. Gen. iii. 7, 10, 11. and ix. 22. The nakedness of the soul consists in its being without holiness and righteousness imputed and inherent, but corrupt and guilty before God. Rev. iii. 18. The nakedness of a land, is its poverty, weakness, and ruinous condition, or its shameful wickedness. Ezek. xvi. 8, 36, 37. Going naked, or almost so, was an emblem of distress, and of deprivation of comfort. Isa. xx. 3. Mic. i. 8.

NAME, is properly that by which a person or thing is called, to distinguish it from another. Many of the names of persons and places mentioned in the scripture, were founded on and express some particular reason. Those that begin or end in EL, or begin with JE, JEHO, or end in IAH, bear a relation to God. As many persons and things had different names, they are sometimes called by one name, and sometimes by the other. So Moses' father-in-law was called Ruel, and Jethro; Isaac's younger son, Jacob and Israel; Jehoshaphat's grandson, Jehoahaz, Ahaziah, and Azariah, &c. &c. Some letters too, especially vowels, E for A, &c. are altered in the spelling of the same name, as Gashmu, or Gashem, Achan, or Achar, &c.

Name, when ascribed to God or Christ, comprehends whatever he makes himself known by. The name of God signifies, (1.) Himself. Psal. xxix. 2. xxxiv. 3. and lxi. 5. (2.) His titles. Exod. iii. 13, 14. and vi. 3. (3.) His attributes, or properties. Exod. xxxiii. 19. and xxxiv. 6, 7. (4.) His word. Psal. v. 11. Acts ix. 15. (5.) His worship and service. 1 Kings v. 5. Mal. i. 6. (6.)

His will and purpose concerning our salvation, and his grace and mercy displayed therein. Psal. xxii. 22. John xvi. 6, 26. (7.) His power, help, and favourable assistance. 1 Sam. xvii. 45. Psal. xxi. 1, 7. (8.) His wisdom, power, and goodness, displayed in the works of creation and providence. Psal. viii. 1, 9. (9.) His authority, commission. Mic. v. 4. (10.) His honour, glory, and renown. Psal. lxxvi. 1. The name of Christ denotes, (1.) Himself, what he really is, the Wonderful, Mighty God, God with us. Isa. ix. 6. and vii. 14. (2.) His titles, as Saviour, Prophet, Priest, King, &c. Matt. i. 21. Rev. xxi. 14. (3.) His authority and commission. Matt. vii. 22. Acts iv. 7. His word and gospel, and the profession of it. Acts ix. 15. Matt. x. 22. and xix. 29. Rev. ii. 18. (5.) His exaltation to the highest honour, power, and glory, as the Mediator. Phil. ii. 9, 10. The name of men denotes, (1.) That particular designation by which they are usually known. (2.) The persons themselves. Luke x. 20. Rev. iii. 4. and xi. 11. (3.) Reputation, good or evil. Prov. xxii. 1. Deut. xxii. 14. (4.) Honour, glory, renown. Deut. xxvi. 19. Zeph. iii. 20. 2 Chron. xxvi. 8, 15. (5.) Memory, or remembrance. Deut. xxix. 20. (6.) Posterity, which keeps up one's name, or renown. Deut. xxv. 7. Isa. lxvi. 22.

God's name is in Christ: his nature and authority are in him; he has sent him to be our Redeemer; and by his execution of his office, is his honour chiefly exalted. Exod. xxiii. 21. To be baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or of Jesus, is to be baptized by the warrant and authority, and into the profession, faith, and obedience of these divine persons as one God. Matt. xxviii. 19. Acts xix. 5. To trust or believe in the name of God, or Christ, is to credit his word, and rely on his perfections, titles, and relations, as a certain ground of receiving all blessings and salvation from him. John iii. 18. To name the name of Christ, is openly to profess that we are his, and to regard his honour and service. 2 Tim. ii. 19. The new name that Christ gives, and writes on his people, is the redeemed of the Lord, the righteousness of God in him, &c. which answers to their new-covenant state, and their new nature; and in heaven, their character is made to appear gloriously. Rev. ii. 17. This is better than of sons and daughters, as it is more honourable to be the children of God, and spouse of Christ, than to be parents of sinful men. Isa. lvi. 4, 5. God's changing the name of his church, denotes his changing her condition from distress and grief to happiness and joy. Isa. lxii. 3, 4. The saints pray, and do all things in the name of Christ, when they perform them in the faith of his promise, in obedience to his command, and with a total dependence on his righteousness and intercession for acceptance. John xiv. 13. Col. iii. 17. To take the name of God in vain, is to make an unholy and irreverent use of any thing by which he makes himself known, whether titles, attributes, ordinances, words, or works; and particularly by ignorant, rash, irreverent, and false swearing. Exod. xx. 7. The Hebrews were forbidden to mention the names of the heathen idols, except when it was necessary to warn against, or shew their detestation of them, Exod. xxlii. 15; and so a thing not named, is what is not mentioned with pleasure, or is scarcely known or heard of, or is not practised, but abhorred. 1 Cor. v. 1. Eph. v. 3. To know one by name, is to have a peculiar favour for, and familiarity with a person. Exod. xxxiii. 12. To give names to persons or animals, imports dominion over them. Gen. ii. 19. To have a name to live, and yet be dead, is to have a profession and appearance of saintship, and yet be under the reign of spiritual death. Rev. iii. 1. The names of the twelve tribes of Israel being on the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem, imports that the Jews shall be brought into the church in the millennium, and all the elect enter into the church here, and the heavenly glory hereafter. Rev. xxi. 12. The names of the twelve apostles being in the twelve foundations, imports, that it is Jesus as represented in the doctrine of the twelve apostles, that is the foundation of the church, and of our everlasting happiness. Rev. xxi. 14. To have the mark, name, or number, of the name of Antichrist, is to believe, profess, and practise, according to the errors, idolatry, and superstition of the church of Rome. The names of blasphemy; the doctrine of the Pope's supremacy, and of men's perfecting Christ's sacrifices with their oblations and good works, &c. are a reproach to Christ and his Father. Rev. xlii. 1, 17.

NA-OMI, and her husband Elimelech, retired to the country of Moab, on account of a famine that happened in Canaan. There her two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, married two Moabitish young women, Orpah and Ruth. They had been about ten years in the country of Moab, when Elimelech and his sons died without leaving any issue. Naomi resolved to return to her country. Her daughters-in-law were desirous to accompany her. She represented to them the difficulties they might expect in so doing, and begged they would return home; and added, that she was grieved on account of their affliction. At last Orpah was prevailed with to return, but Ruth continued resolute to go with her, and to embrace the Jewish religion. When they arrived in Bethlehem, the place of Naomi's former abode, the people crowded about them, and some in pity, and others perhaps in contempt, asked if this was Naomi? She begged they would not call her Naomi, my pleasant one; but Marah, because the Lord had dealt very bitterly with her, inasmuch that having departed full, with a husband, children, and some wealth, she had returned a poor destitute widow. It being the harvest season, Ruth went forth to glean, and Providence conducted her to the field of Boaz, a near kinsman of her deceased husband. Informed who she was, he commended her for her kindness to her mother-in-law, and bade her continue gleaning on his field, and take her food with his reapers, who, by his orders, let fall handfuls of the corn for her use. Ruth most humbly thanked him for his kindness to a poor stranger. Informed of all this at night, Naomi told Ruth that Boaz was their near kinsman.

When harvest was ended, and Boaz one night watched his corn on the thrashing-floor, Naomi directed Ruth to go and lie down at his feet, and to bid him cast his skirt over her, or marry her, as he was her near kinsman. The modesty of both parties prevented all suspicion of unseemly conduct. When Boaz awaked, he observed a woman at his feet, and asked who she was? She told him, and begged he would spread his skirt over her as a token of his intention to espouse her. Boaz blessed her for so closely adhering to the Hebrew law in the affair of her marriage; and in the morning sent her home loaded with corn for herself and Naomi, and promised he would speedily accomplish her marriage, either with himself, or with a nearer kinsman. Naomi hearing of this, assured Ruth that Boaz would without fail be as good as his word. It was scarcely day, when Boaz convened the elders of the city at the gate, and called Elimelech's nearest kinsman to declare whether he would redeem the inheritance of Elimelech, and marry Ruth the widow of Chilion, or not. The kinsman, after offering to redeem the inheritance, recalled his word, and bade Boaz do it; and by plucking off his shoe, resigned his right to Boaz. Boaz at the same time espoused Ruth, and soon after had by her a son called Obed, in hope he would be a servant of the Lord, and would be serviceable to his family. The neighbours congratulated Naomi, as having now got an heir, and a restorer of her old age. With great tenderness she nursed the child. Ruth i—iv. By whom the short history of Ruth was written is not quite certain. The ancient fathers considered it as an appendix to Judges. The affair happened about the time of DEBORAH.

NAPHTA-LI, the sixth son of Jacob, by Bilhah the handmaid of Rachel. His sons were Jahlzeel, Guni, Jezer, and Shilem, all of them parents of a numerous progeny. In his blessing of Naphtali, Jacob said, Naphtali is a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words. This might express the activity and courtesy of that tribe; or the activity of Jesus and his apostles, who resided much in the territories of that tribe, in their preaching of the glad tidings of salvation to lost sinners; but some prefer the translation of the Seventy, which reads the passage thus: Naphtali is a tree shot out, bringing forth goodly branches; and so would import the fertility and increase of that tribe: but the Hebrew accents do not countenance this reading, nor is it different from the blessing of Joseph in the very next verse. When this tribe came out of Egypt, it consisted of 53,400 fighting men, under the command of Ahira the son of Enan, but they decreased in the wilderness to 45,400. They encamped on the north of the tabernacle, and marched in the rear of the Hebrew host, in the camp of Dan. Their spy to search Canaan, was Nahbi the son of Vophsi; and their agent to divide it was Pedahel the son of Ammihud. Their inheritance was the sea, and the south, along the south of Lebanon, and the west of the seas of Merom and Tiberias, and was extremely fertile. Gen. xlii. 24. and xlix. 21. Num. xxvi. 48—51. i. 15, 49, 43. ii. 25, 30. x. 27.

xiii. 14. and xxxiv. 28. Dent. xxxiii. 23. Josh. xix. 32-39. But they permitted the Canaanites to retain Bethanath and Bethshemesli, two of their cities, on condition of their paying them tribute. Judg. i. 34. Under Barak, their general, they and the Zebulunites fought with distinguished bravery against the army of Jabin the younger, and at the desire of Gideon, they pursued the Midianites. Judg. iv. 10. v. 18. and vii. 23. A thousand of their captains, with 37,000 of their troops, assisted at David's coronation, and brought great quantities of provision with them. 1 Chron. xiii. 34, 40. We find no person of distinguished note among them, save Barak, and Hiram the artificer. Instigated by Asa, Benhadad the elder, king of Syria, terribly ravaged the land of Naphtali; what it suffered in after invasions by the Syrians, we are not told. 1 Kings xv. 20. The Naphtalites were many, if not most of them carried captive by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. 2 Kings xv. 29. Josiah purged their country from idols. Our Saviour and his disciples, during his public ministry, resided and preached much in the land of Naphtali. Isa. ix. 1. Matt. iv. 13, 15.

NAPHTU-HIM, the fourth son of Mizraim. Calmet thinks he peopled that part of African-Ethiopia between Syene and Meroe, and of which Nepata was the capital: but Bochart states, that his posterity peopled Marmorica, west of Egypt, and on the south shore of the Mediterranean sea. Hereabouts we find the temple of the god Aptachas; nor is it unlikely that Naphtuhim may be the Neptune of the heathens, who was originally a Lybian, and had his temples ordinarily built on sea shores. Gen. x. 13.

NAR-CISSUS. If he was the wicked but famous freedman of the emperor Claudius, he died before Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans; but the Christians of his family are saluted, Rom. xvi. 11.

NARROW. God looked narrowly to Job's ways; observed his crimes in order to punish him, and carefully prevented every possible way of his escape from trouble. Job xiii. 27. The nations looked narrowly upon Babylon when ruined; with great attention and amazement, thought how quickly an empire, lately so strong and powerful, had come to ruin. Isa. xiv. 6.

NATHAN; a celebrated prophet, and a friend of king David. Not long after David's advancement to the throne of Israel, he intended to build a temple for the Lord. Nathan, without waiting the divine direction, encouraged him to do it; but soon after was directed of God to forbid him, and to tell him that that work was allotted to his son and successor. Some years after, when David had defied Bathsheba, and murdered her husband, Nathan, directed of God, reproved him. He addressed him in a parable of a man who had many flocks and herds of his own, and yet when his friend came to visit him, he by force took from a poor neighbour his only lamb, which was very dear to him, to entertain his friend. With great indignation, David replied, that such a person should be obliged to restore fourfold to the poor man, and then be put to death. Nathan told him, that he himself was the guilty criminal intended; for God had made him ruler over the whole Hebrew nation, had put into his power all the wives and concubines of Saul, and was about to bestow on him other favours; and yet he had defied Bathsheba, the only wife of Uriah, whom he had murdered. On which account, Nathan told him that he and his family should be severely punished. David was so affected with the plainness of Nathan's rebuke, that it seems, he named one of Bathsheba's sons after him. When Adonijah attempted to settle himself on the throne, Nathan, and Bathsheba, by his direction, prevented it; and he and Benaiah, and others, were immediately appointed to crown Solomon. 2 Sam. vii. and xii. 1 Kings i. Nathan and Gad wrote the history of David, probably the second book of Samuel, and the last part of the first. He and Abijah wrote the history of Solomon, 1 Chron. xxix. 29. 2 Chron. ix. 27; but whether this Nathan was the father of Azariah and Zabud, who were officers of considerable dignity under Solomon, is not known. 1 Kings iv. 5.

NA-THAN'-EL. See BARTHOLOMEW. NATION. See PEOPLE.

NATIVITY; (1.) The birth of a person. Gen. xi. 28. (2.) The original rise of nations. Ezek. xvi. 3, 4.

NATURE; (1.) The ordinary course of things, which God has settled in the world. Rom. i. 26, 27. (2.) The light of reason naturally implanted in our mind. Rom. ii. 14. (3.) Common sense, or the general consent of nations. 1 Cor. xi. 14. (4.) The substance or essential parts and properties. Heb. ii. 16. (5.) Birth, or natural descent. Gal. ii. 15. We are by nature children of wrath; we are born under the guilt of Adam's first sin, and with a corrupt principle inclining us to all evil, and so must be detested of God, and condemned to everlasting punishment. Eph. ii. 3. Through the gospel-promises, we are made partakers of the divine nature; we have fellowship with the divine nature, and have implanted in our soul a principle or habit of grace, and are conformed to God, in spiritual knowledge, righteousness, and holiness. 2 Pet. i. 4. Idols are by nature no gods; they have no self-existence; nothing of the essential perfections of God-head in them. Gal. iv. 8.

NATURAL, is, (1.) What proceeds from birth and natural causes. 1 Cor. xv. 44. (2.) What is agreeable to natural design, form, or inclination. Rom. i. 26, 27.

NAVEL; that part of the belly by which nourishment is conveyed to the child in the womb, and which is cut and fastened at the birth. Behemoth had his strength in his navel, belly, or trunk of his body. Job xl. 16. It is put for the whole man, soul and body. Godliness is health to the navel, and marrow to the bones; it produces and secures the welfare of both soul and body, arising from a conscience washed in the blood of Jesus, and a heart renewed by his grace. Prov. iii. 8. The navel of the Hebrews not being cut, imported that their sinful nature was not corrected or changed; and that in Egypt, they, as a nation, were in a most forlorn and dangerous condition. See GOBLET.

NAUGHT; (1.) Worth nothing. Prov. xx. 14. (2.) Unwholesome and hurtful.

2 Kings ii. 19. Naughty persons are such as are useless for good, and active in doing mischief. Jer. xxiv. 2. Prov. vi. 12. Naughtiness is base wickedness; and this men are taken in, when punished for it. Prov. xi. 6. NAVY; a fleet of ships. 1 Kings ix. 26, 27.

NAZA-RETH; a small city of the Zebulunites in Galilee, about seventy or seventy-five miles north of Jerusalem, to the west of mount Tabor, and east of Ptolemais. It was built on a hill, and noted for the wickedness of its inhabitants. Mark i. 9. Luke iv. 29. John i. 46. Here our Saviour was conceived, and laboured the most part of the thirty years of his private life; but their contempt of his ministry; and early attempt to murder him, by casting him from the brow of the hill on which their city was built, occasioned his residing there but little afterwards, and working few miracles among them. Luke iv. 16, 20. Matt. xiv. 57. It was a place of some note for about 1200 years after Christ; but is at present of small consequence. It is not within the design of this work to mention the various curiosities collected and imagined here by fantastic superstition, and shown to travellers; and far less to relate the Papists' ridiculous fable of the angels transporting the house of the blessed virgin from hence to Dalmatia, and after some more removes, to Loretto in Italy. Christ's dwelling at Nazareth, occasioned his being called a NAZARENE; and by means of it, the prophecies that represented him as a NAZIR, typified by Joseph and the Nazarites, or as the NETZER or branch, or the NOTZER or preserver of men, were in some sense fulfilled. Gen. xlix. 26. Num. vi. Isa. xi. 1. and lx. 21. Job vii. 20. Matt. ii. 24. The Jews called his followers Nazarenes, Acts xxiv. 5; but those mongrel professors, who were for mingling Christianity with Judaism, came afterward to be called Nazarenes, Naziræans. It is said, they detested the traditions of the Pharisees.

NAZA-RITES were persons devoted to the peculiar service of God for a week, a month, a year, or for life. Some of them devoted themselves; and some (as Samson and John the Baptist) were expressly claimed by God. During their vow, they were not to cut their hair, or drink any wine or strong drink; and it was extremely wicked to offer them any. Amos ii. 12. Nor were they to attend a funeral, or enter a house defiled by the dead. If they accidentally contracted any defilement, or any ways broke their vow, they had the time and duty of Nazaritship to begin again. They shaved off all their hair on the seventh day, and offered unto the Lord two turtle doves, or pigeons, the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering, and a lamb for a trespass-offering. When their vow was finished, Nazarites presented themselves at the door of the tabernacle or temple, with a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a she-lamb for a sin-offering, and a ram for a peace-offering, with their respective meat-offerings and drink-offerings, and a basket full of cakes of unleavened bread, and wafers anointed with oil. After these were offered, the Nazarite shaved his head at the door of the sanctuary, and burnt it under the pot in which the flesh of his peace-offering was boiled. The priests then put into his hand the roasted shoulder of the ram of peace-offering, with a cake and wafer of unleavened bread. These he returned to the priest, who waved them to and fro, dedicating them to the all-present God of every end of the earth, and so the vow was finished. As the oblations at the breach of the vow atoned for the same, the offerings at the finishing of it were designed to expiate the unknown breaches of it, and to render God thanks for enabling him to fulfil it so much. Num. vi. Such as, like Samuel, Samson, and John the Baptist, who were dedicated for life, had no occasion for these offerings. Those who lived out of Canaan, cut their hair in the places where the days of their vow were finished; but deferred the offerings till they arrived at the sanctuary: so Paul shaved off his hair at Cenchrea, but deferred his oblation till he came to Jerusalem. Acts xviii. 18. and xxi. 23, 24. Some who had not opportunity to perform the duties of the Nazarite themselves, contributed to bear the expences of those who had taken the vow.

Were not the Nazarites typical of Jesus Christ? Altogether holy, he was solemnly devoted to the service of God. Never was he defiled with carnal comforts and pleasures, nor intoxicated with sinful lusts or earthly cares: never was he defiled by irregular affections towards his nearest relations, nor polluted by his gracious connections with men, in whom spiritual death or deadness works. Instead of hair, his graces and good works increased more and more, and his people, rooted in him, grow up and flourish in God's holy place. Never did he break his vow, but finished it in giving himself for an all-comprehensive offering for us; and in his resurrection, laid aside every token of continual subjection to an angry God or broken law, and purges and inflames the hearts of his people by his bleeding love.—Were not these Nazarites also emblems of ministers and saints, who, denying themselves, and mortifying the deeds of the body, consecrate themselves to God, renounce this world, and the pleasures of sin; and by every breach of their vow, through inadvertent fellowship with dead works, ought to be excited to an application of Jesus' atonement to their conscience; and after they have done all, to trust only in his all-comprehensive sacrifice of himself?

NE-A-PŌ-LIS, now called Christopolis; a city on the east of Macedonia. Since ever Paul was here, it seems there has been less or more of Christianity in it; and in the sixth and seventh centuries of the Christian era, we find bishops here. Acts xvi. 11.

NEAR; at hand. God is near: he is every where present, and is ready to help his people in every case; or when he offers to save, uphold, and comfort. Jer. xxiii. 23. Isa. lv. 6. and xli. 5. Deut. iv. 7. 1 Kings ii. 7. Psal. lxxix. 18. and lxxv. 1. and cxix. 151. and xxxii. 9. Lam. iii. 57. He is near in people's mouth, but far from their reins, when they are oft talking of him, but are far from loving, desiring, and delighting in him. Jer. xii. 2. God's name is near; he is closely related to his people, and intimate is their fellowship with him. His work is near, exerted in upholding, protecting, and comforting them. His word is nigh, in their mouth and in their heart, preached to their ear, spoken by their lips, conceived by their mind, and powerfully applied to, and believed by their heart. His Son is near; of old was quickly to be, and now is in our nature, and is closely connected with us as our Surety, Mediator, and Redeemer. Psal. lxxv. 1. Rom. x. 8. God's righteousness is near, when he offers Jesus' righteousness in his word to guilty sinners, applies it by his Spirit, and when he shews the righteousness of his nature in justifying the ungodly through it. Isa. xlv. 13. and li. 5. Salvation is near, when it is to be wrought without delay, when in a very little we shall enter the state of perfect holiness and happiness. Rom. xiii. 11. Israel was a people near to God: while the gentiles were far off, they were closely related to him as his peculiar people; they had his ordinances and symbols of his presence among them; and he was ready to support and defend them. Psal. cxlviii. 14. and lvii. 19. We draw near to God, when we worship him, and by faith, prayer, &c. have intimate fellowship with him. Lev. xvi. 1. 1 Sam. xiv. 36. Psal. lxxiii. 28. Isa. lviii. 2. Zeph. iii. 2. Prayer comes near, when it is graciously heard and accepted. 1 Kings viii. 59. Psal. cxix. 169. In courts there is a drawing near, as a judge, witness, defendant, or advocate. Mal. iii. 5. Job xxxi. 37. Isa. xli. 1. and i. 8. Trouble is near, when it is actually inflicted, and pierces even to the soul, or is just going to do so. Psal. xxii. 11.

NE-BA'T-OTH, the eldest son of Ishmael, the father of the Nabatheans, who appear to have been one of the most civilized tribes of the Arabians, and the most friendly to the Jews, and part of whom were converted to Christ. Gen. xxv. 18. Isa. lx. 7.

NE'BO, or A-NAM'BO; an idol of the Chaldeans: perhaps they derived him from the Moabites, who had a hill called Nebo, and a city near it of the same name, about eight miles south of Heshbon, and which was taken both by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Isa. xlv. 1. Dent. xxiv. 4. Num. xxxii. 38. Isa. xv. 2. Jer. xlviii. 11. Or Nebo might be the same as Chemosh, or as Beltus, the queen of Belus, and so might represent the moon. The Seventy call this idol Dagon, and Calmêt, Bel; but some suppose both these opinions to be groundless. It is certain that Nebo is by Isaiah represented as different from Bel, and that the word is compounded with many of the Chaldean names, as Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, Nebopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzaradan, Nebushasban, &c.

NE-BU-CHAD-NEZZAR, NE-BU-CHAD-REZZAR, or NAB-O-POL-ASSAR; the most famed king of Babylon. When Pharaoh-necho had taken Carchemish, a city on the Euphrates, the Phenicians, and part of the Syrians, revolted from the Chaldeans, who it seems had just before reduced them. Nabopolassar, being then stricken in years, sent Nebuchadnezzar his son with an army to recover them. He gained a complete victory over the Egyptians at Carchemish; retook the place, and put the garrison to the sword. He then with an army of 180,000 foot, 120,000 horse, and 10,000 chariots, according to Eupolemus, ravaged Phenicia and Canaan, took Jerusalem, and bound Jehoiachim the tributary of the Egyptians, in chains, to carry him to Babylon; but afterward allowed him to retain his kingdom, as a vassal of the Chaldeans. He carried to Babylon, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishaël, and Azariah, and others of the princes of Judah. To the above four young men, he gave new names, importing connection with his idol-gods, calling them Belteshazzar, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. These, and other young captives, he caused to be trained up in all the learning of the Chaldeans, that they might serve in the court. 2 Kings xxiv. Dan. i. About A. M. 3399, his father died, and he was sole king of Babylon. In the second year of his reign, he had a surprising dream, but entirely forgot it. He assembled his diviners, and charged them to tell him his dream, and the interpretation thereof. They told him, that though they could interpret dreams, yet none but the gods could tell a man what he had dreamed; and that never a king had demanded any such thing from his diviners. Being exceedingly provoked, he ordered Arioch, the captain of his guard, to put every wise man in Babylon to death. DANIEL, however, obtained leave to tell the king his dream, and the interpretation thereof. He was so satisfied with the account and interpretation, that he fell on his face before Daniel, and ordered an oblation of spices to be presented to him, and acknowledged his God, to be the God of gods, and Lord of kings. He made Daniel chief of the wise men, and governor of the province of Babylon; and made Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, subordinate governors in the same place. Dan. ii.

Meanwhile a peace being concluded between the Medes and Lydians, by the mediation of Nebuchadnezzar, and of Cyrenesis king of Cilicia, Cyaxares king of Media, gave his daughter Amyite in marriage to Nebuchadnezzar; and they two marched their troops against Nineveh, and levelled it with the ground. Some of Nebuchadnezzar's troops had already ravaged Judea; but the Assyrian war being finished, he sent his army into that country, and laid it waste. Soon after, he upon what provocation we know not, marched his army against Jehoiachin; but that young monarch, with his whole family, surrendered themselves to his mercy, and were made prisoners, and carried to Babylon. He carried off a part of the sacred furniture of the temple, and a multitude of captives. The Moabites, Ammonites, and Phenicians, together with the Egyptians, encouraged Zedekiah king of Judah to revolt from the Chaldeans. Nebuchadnezzar, with great fury, marched to chastise them. On the south-east of Syria, he was in doubt whether to begin with the Ammonites or the Jews: he referred the matter to the decision of divination; the divination directed him, first to march against the Jews. This war took him up nearly two years; he himself retired to Riblah, and left his generals, Nebuzaradan, Nergal-shezzer, Samgar-nebo, Sar-sechim, Rabсарis, and Rag-mag, to carry it on. They, after raising the siege of Jerusalem, to march against the Egyptians, returned to it, and took the city; and they left the poor of the land under the charge of Gedaliah, a prince who had early surrendered himself. According to Nebuchadnezzar's express orders, they took especial care of Jeremiah; but the prisoners of distinction, which were carried to him at Riblah, Seraiah, and Zephaniah, the two principal priests, Zedekiah's children and general, and sixty-eight others, were all put to death. Zedekiah had his eyes put out, and was carried captive to Babylon. 2 Kings xxiv. and xxv. 2 Chron. xxxvi. Ezra xxi. 19-24. Jer. vi.-xl. and lii. It was perhaps at this time, about the twentieth year of his reign, that he, with the gold which he had amassed in his western expedition, erected the monstrous image to his god Belus, in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon. It was at least ninety feet high, and nine broad; and having convened his princes, governors, captains, judges, and other officers under him, to the dedication of this idol, he issued a proclamation that whenever the concert of music, by cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psalter, dulcimer, &c. should begin to play, every body should fall down, and adore this monstrous image, under pain of being cast into a fiery furnace. Daniel either was absent, or for fear of his great power, was not informed against; but Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, were accused of refusing to worship the idol. Nebuchadnezzar called them before him, and interrogated them if it was so. They told him they would not worship his image, and were confident their God was able to deliver them from his burning fiery furnace. Filled with rage, he ordered the furnace to be heated to a seven-fold degree, and them to be cast into it bound. The flames seized those that cast them in, and burnt them to ashes. The Son of God, appearing in human shape, amidst the fire, caused it to burn their bonds, but not so much as to singe their clothes, or a hair of their heads, and walked with them up and down the furnace. Nebuchadnezzar observing this, hinted it to his attendants, and called to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, to come forth out of the furnace. They were quite unhurt, and not so much as the smell of fire about them. Nebuchadnezzar extolled the power of the true God, and ordered, that whoever should speak reproachfully of him, should be put to death, and his house made a dunghill. He promoted these three Hebrews to higher governments in the province of Babylon. Dan. ix. 8.

About the twenty-second year of his reign, he marched his troops into Phœnicia, and laid siege to Tyre. Meanwhile, by detached parties, he reduced the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, and northern Arabians; and Nebuzaradan carried off seven hundred and forty-five Jews, whom he found in their land. After he had besieged Tyre thirteen years, till his army was almost ruined with fatigue, and at the end obtained nothing but a deserted place, the inhabitants having transported themselves and their effects to a neighbouring island, he reduced the city to ashes, and cast the rubbish into the adjacent sea. He then marched against the Egyptians, who had supplied the Tyrians during the siege; and after ravaging their country, and murdering the inhabitants, and particularly the Jews, who had fled thither after the murder of Gedaliah his deputy, he and his army returned to Babylon, laden with rich spoils. He also subdued Persia; and Media was in a kind of subjection. The date of this expedition is uncertain. Jer. xxv. xxvii. xliii. and xli.-xlix. Isa. xxiii. Ezek. xxv.-xxxii. and xxv.

By this time, in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, his astonishing structures at Babylon were almost finished. He dreamed of a tall and flourishing tree laden with fruit, and a place of refuge to birds and beasts unnumbered; and yet all of a sudden, orders were given by an angel to hew it down, shake off its leaves and fruit, but to fasten its root in the earth, as if with a band of iron and brass, for seven years, that it might be wet with the dew of heaven, and have its portion with the beasts of the field. None of his diviners could interpret this dream. Daniel came, and being encouraged by the king to tell him the interpretation, he what it would, he told him, that it meant, that for seven years he should be reduced to the condition of a beast, and driven from the society of men, and after his acknowledgment of the divine supremacy, he should be restored to his throne. Daniel entreated him to break off from his sinful and unjust courses, and shew mercy to the poor captives or others. Regardless of Daniel's admonitions, Nebuchadnezzar continued as proud as ever. One day, as he walked on the top of his palace, perhaps in his hanging gardens, and looked on his august city, he said, either to himself, or some companions, Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for my metropolis, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? A voice from heaven replied to him, that he should be immediately driven from human society, and reduced to the condition of a beast. He was immediately struck with some strange distemper, similar to what we call a lycanthropy, under which a person fancies himself a dog, cat, &c. and howls, bites, and eats in their manner, and shuns human society. Nebuchadnezzar fancied he was an ox, and imitated the manner of one. No doubt his astonished friends bound him as a madman; but he escaped out of their hands, fled to the fields, and lived there seven years on the grass, and went naked, till his hair grew like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws. At the end of seven years, God restored him the use of his reason; he humbled himself, and glorified God, and ordered an account of his dream, and the fulfilment thereof, to be published to all his subjects. It is said, that after he was restored to his government, he cast his son Evil-merodach into prison, perhaps that in which Jehoiachin had lain about thirty-six years, either for the follies he had been guilty of during his father's distemper, or to secure the peace of the kingdom. Dan. iv. About a year after, Nebuchadnezzar died, in the forty-third or forty-fourth year of his reign. It is said, that just before his death, he, seized with some supernatural impression, got up to the top of his palace, and cried to the Babylonians, that a mule, assisted by a Mede, (i. e. Cyrus, whose father was a Persian, and his mother a Mede, assisted by his uncle Darius the Mede,) should ruin their empire, and reduce them to slavery.

NEB-U-ZAR-ADAN. See NEBUCHAD-NEZZAR.

NECESSARY; NEEDFUL; what must be, or ought to be. 1 Cor. xii. 22. One thing is needful; an interest in Jesus Christ as our righteousness and strength, must be had; without it, we cannot live, but under a curse; we cannot live without going into everlasting punishment; we cannot honour God, profit ourselves, or be truly useful to our neighbours. Luke x. 42.

NECESSITY; (1.) The state of a thing that must needs be. Heb. ix. 16. (2.) Poverty, or want of temporal good things. Rom. xii. 13. (3.) Force, or outward constraint: thus, alms are not to be given out of necessity. 2 Cor. ix. 7. Of necessity he must release one unto them at the feast; that is, according to the wonted custom, he must, for the peace and welfare of the city, release a prisoner, whom they pleased. Luke xxiii. 17. A necessity was laid on Paul to preach the gospel; he could not execute his office, fulfil his duty, or have peace in his own mind, without preaching it. 1 Cor. ix. 16.

NECHO. See PHARAOH.

NECK; (1.) That part of an animal body between the head and shoulders. Judg. v. 30. (2.) Both head and neck. Deut. xxi. 4. (3.) The heart: and so a hard, stiff, or iron neck, imports men's obstinacy in their love to, and practice of sin. Neh. ix. 29. Psal. lxxv. 5. Isa. xlvi. 4. (4.) The whole man; and so to have a yoke or bands on the neck, imports being in slavery and bondage. Deut. xxviii. 48. Isa. lli. 2. Jer. xxvii. 2. The neck of the church is like a tower of ivory, or the tower of David builded for an armoury, whereon hang a thousand shields of mighty men. How beautiful, straight, comely, fixed, strong, adorning, and well furnished with spiritual armour, are the scriptures, ordinances, and ministers, which connect the church! and faith, which connects every particular saint with Christ the head, and are so exceedingly useful in their receiving nourishment from him, or breathing forth prayer and praise to him! Sol. Song iv. 4, 9. and vii. 4. Transgressions come upon, or are wreathed about the neck, when they are punished with bondage and slavery. Lam. i. 14. The Assyrians reached even to the neck; they almost totally overflowed and ruined Judah, taking all the cities thereof, for Jerusalem the capital. Isa. viii. 8. and xxx. 28. The Ammonites came upon the necks of the slain Jews, when they were murdered in a similar manner, by the Chaldeans. Ezek. xxi. 9. To lay down the neck, is to be ready to suffer slavery or death. Rom. xvi. 4. God discovers the foundations unto the neck, when he utterly unsettles, and almost utterly destroys his enemies. Hab. iii. 13.

NECROMANCER. See DIVINATION.

NEGLECT: (2.) To take no care of. Acts vi. 1. (2.) To despise; refuse; make no proper improvement of. Matt. xviii. 17. 1 Tim. iv. 14. Heb. ii. 3.

NEGLIGENT; careless, inactive. 2 Chr. xxix. 11.

NE-HE-MIAH, the son of Hachaliah, was perhaps of the royal family of David. His being the royal cup-bearer in the Persian court, and his succeeding Zernbbabel in the government of the Jews, tend to confirm this opinion. About A. M. 3558, or 3560, ninety years after their return from Chaldea, he was informed by Hanani, that Jerusalem still remained in ruins, and was a reproach or object of derision to all the nations around. Deeply affected with this narrative, Nehemiah fasted, and prayed that the Lord would prosper his intention to ask the king's permission to go and rebuild it. He indeed attended to the bearing of the royal cup, but his countenance marked him sad and dejected. King Artaxerxes observing it, asked him the cause, probably suspecting he had some bad design in hand. Nehemiah was afraid; but lifting up his heart to God, he represented his grief to the king, as the queen (some say Esther) sat by him. Upon his request, Artaxerxes, in the twentieth year of his reign, empowered him to go and rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. He gave him letters of safe conduct to the governors on the west of the Euphrates, and one to Asaph, the keeper of the forest of Lebanon, ordering him to furnish Nehemiah with timber, and every other thing necessary for the repairs of Jerusalem, and for Nehemiah's own house.

Having arrived at Jerusalem with the king's commission, he and his servant went round the wall of the city in the night, and found it wholly in ruins. He then assembled the chief men of the Jews, informed them of his powers and intention, and encouraged them to begin the work. They readily agreed to his proposal, and different parts of the wall were assigned to the various principal men. Thirty-two of these, together with the companies of the Priests, Levites, Nethinims, and the goldsmiths and merchants, exerted themselves in this good work. Some repaired over against their own house; and some, as the inhabitants of Tekoah, Gibeon, and Mizpel, generously repaired a part of it, though they lived in other cities. Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the Ammonite, originally a servant, but now a governor, and Gashm the Arabian, were extremely angry on hearing of Nehemiah's arrival, to help and encourage the Jews; and when they saw the repairs of the wall of Jerusalem carried on with so much ardour, they first scoffed at the Jews and their work; but seeing it go on, they and their country men made several attempts to surprise and murder the Jews at it. To frustrate their intention, Nehemiah placed a guard on the out side of the builders, and caused every builder to keep his sword by him, while he wrought; they never put off their clothes, either day or night, except for washing; and the trumpeter went along with Nehemiah, ready to sound the alarm in case of danger. Finding that they could do nothing by open violence, Sanballat and Tobiah had recourse to stratagem. Tobiah having married the daughter of Shechaniah, a prince of Judah, had a powerful part of the Jews in his interest. These, with the Jews that lived in the neighbouring country, did what they could to intimidate Nehemiah and his friends, as if it were impossible to withstand so many enemies, who would of a sudden attack them from every quarter. Sanballat and his companions wrote four letters, inviting Nehemiah to a friendly conference in the plain of Ono; but they caused a party to lie in wait to murder him by the way. He returned them answer, that the great and important work which he was about, required such constant attendance that he could not come. Sanballat then wrote him an open letter, importing, that a report was spread, and was affirmed by Gashmu, a man of credit and influence, that he and the Jews rebuilt Jerusalem with a design to revolt, and that he had suborned the prophets to stir up the people to choose him for their king; and that as king Artaxerxes could not but hear this report, it was necessary to consult together how to confute it. Nehemiah, conscious of his innocence, trusting in his God, and persuaded of the king's favour, returned no other answer but that the whole report was false, and had been forged by Sanballat himself. Sanballat and Tobiah then bribed the prophet Shemaiah, and the prophetess Noadiah, to endeavour the murder of Nehemiah, and the hindrance of the work. Shemaiah shut up himself in his chamber, as if habitually given to meditation, fasting, and prayer. This imposed on Nehemiah a little, and made him think him remarkably pious, and a real friend. One time as Nehemiah was in his house, he told him that he would be slain that very night, unless they two should shut up themselves in a secret place of the temple. Nehemiah replied, that it was quite improper, that he whose conduct was so innocent, and his presence and active co-operation so necessary, should hide himself anywhere. Thus, notwithstanding all that Sanballat, Tobiah, Geshem, and their partizans of treacherous Jews could do, the wall was finished in fifty-two days after they began to repair it; and almost a year after, it was dedicated with solemn sacrifices and thanksgiving. Neh. i.-iv. vi. and xii. 27-43. Meanwhile, Nehemiah applied himself to rectify disorders. He curbed the inhumanity of the nobles and rich men, who retained the lands of their poor brethren in mortgage, and held their children in slavery. To shew himself a distinguished pattern of generosity, he never demanded the salary prescribed him by the Persian king, but maintained his family on the product of his own fields, and on the salary which he received as the king's cup-bearer. He settled the genealogies by an old register which he found. The feasts of trumpets and of tabernacles were observed with more exactness than had ever been done since the time of Joshua the son of Nun; and Ezra, assisted with thirteen others, on both occasions read and explained the book of the law to the people. Immediately after, he caused the Jews who had married heathenish women to put them away; and after solemn fasting, and confession of sins, they renewed their covenant with God, and solemnly vowed obedience to his law. They particularly vowed to espouse no heathen women; to buy no goods on the Sabbath; to observe the year of release; to give their first fruits and firstlings to the Levites, with more exactness than had been done for some time past; and to allow the third part of a shekel extraordinary every year, for the service of the temple; twenty-two priests, seventeen Levites, and forty-four chief men of the people, subscribed this covenant; and all the rest of the people, who understood it, declared their adherence. As Jerusalem was poorly inhabited, the tenth man was chosen by lot to dwell in it, and Nehemiah blessed such as offered themselves willingly to dwell in it; and the charge of the city was given to Hanani, the brother of Nehemiah, and to Hananiah the son of Zerubbabel, one eminently faithful and pious; and a guard was placed at every gate to prevent the enemies from entering it. The order of the Levites, priests, singers, and porters, was rectified and established. Neh. v. and vii.-xiii.

After Nehemiah had governed the Jews twelve years, he returned to King Artaxerxes, and after remaining some time in Persia, returned to Judea. The Jews, contrary to their covenant, had married strange wives: they profaned the Sabbath, by bearing of burdens, and buying of fish and other wares from the Tyrians thereon; they had withheld the dues of the Levites, and obliged them to desert the service of the temple; all these disorders, partly by expostulation to convince them of the sinfulness thereof, and partly by force, Nehemiah quickly rectified. Tobiah had fixed his residence at Jerusalem; and Manasseh, the grandson of Eliahib the high priest, who had married the daughter of Sanballat, had procured him a lodging in the court of the temple. Nehemiah expelled Tobiah from his lodging, cast out his furniture, and banished Manasseh the priest from the city. Sanballat, his father-in-law, obtaining the consent, not of Alexander, as Josephus says, but of Darius Nothus, built a temple for him on Mount Gerizim, where he, and perhaps his descendants, officiated as priests to the Samaritans. After Nehemiah had governed the Jewish state about thirty-six years, he died. Probably he wrote his own history; for as he died about A. M. 3593, Jaddua, who officiated as high priest when Alexander passed that way, A. M. 3670, might be a boy of ten or twelve years of age. Neh. xii. 11. As from Ezra's commission to rectify the affairs of Judea, to the year in which Nehemiah is here supposed to die, is forty-nine years; this may correspond to the seven weeks of Daniel, in which the city and wall of Jerusalem were built in troublesome times. Dan. ix. 25. The NEHEMIAH that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, was a different person from him who is the subject of this article; as he had occasion to see the ruins of Jerusalem, and could scarcely have been below one hundred and ten years of age, and so not very proper for a cup-bearer in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes.

NEIGH; to cry as a horse, particularly a stallion. Whoremongers' enticement of women to unchastity, is called a neighing, because brutish and shameless. Jer. v. 8. and xiii. 27.

NEIGHBOUR; (1.) One that dwells near us. Exod. iii. 22. (2.) A fellow-labourer. Acts vii. 27. (3.) One that stands in need of our help, and to whom we have an opportunity of doing good. Prov. iii. 28. Matt. xxiii. 39. (4.) One that pities and relieves us in distress. Luke x. 36. Job xvi. 21. In our Saviour's time, the Jews generally imagined, that only those of their own nation were their neighbours, who ought to be loved; and that they might hate every body else; but he shewed them, that all men living, even such as hated them, were their neighbours, to whom love and beneficence ought to be extended. Matt. v. 43-48. Luke x. 29-37. The evil neighbours whom God would pluck out of their land, were the Egyptians, Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, and Phœnicians, who dwelt near to, and often harassed the Jews, who were his people. Jer. xii. 14.

NEPHEWS; (1.) Grandchildren. Judg. xii. 14. 1 Tim. v. 4. (2.) Posterity in general. Job xviii. 9. Isa. xiv. 22.

NERGAL; an idol of the Cuthites, who were a tribe of the Chaldeans or Persians. The Jews represent it in the form of a cock; but as the word signifies the revealing or rolling lamp, it is more probable that it signifies the fire, or the sun. Two of Nebuchadnezzar's generals were, in honour of it, called Nergal-sharezzer. 2 Kings xvii. 30. Jer. xxxix. 3.

NERO; an infamous emperor of Rome, who ruled from A. D. 54, to 67 or 68. In the first part of his reign, he behaved with some decency and justice, pretending to copy after Augustus. In the end of it, he turned one of the most tyrannical wretches that ever breathed. He murdered his mother, and almost all his friends and principal subjects; he encouraged stage-plays, and every thing lewd and foolish. About A. D. 65, he burned the city of Rome, and sang one of his poems at the view of the flames. To appease the senate, he transferred the blame to the innocent Christians. Multitudes of them were apprehended; some were sewed up in the skins of wild beasts; and torn to pieces by dogs; others were crucified; others were burned in Nero's gardens, as nocturnal illuminations to the city, while he, with great pleasure, beheld the spectacle from his window. Perhaps he was the more enraged, that some of his own family, and, it is said, one of his darling concubines, had embraced the Christian faith. Phil. iv. 22. In this persecution raised by him, perhaps most of the apostles were cut off. After his tyranny and murders had rendered him quite intolerable, the senate declared him the enemy of the state. In despair, he fled; and, to avoid falling into the hands of his pursuers, he murdered himself, with the assistance of Epaphroditus his freed-man.

NEST; (1.) A small lodgment where fowls hatch their young. Deut. xxii. 6. (2.) The eggs, or young birds in a nest. Isa. x. 14. Deut. xxxii. 11. (3.) A habitation seemingly very secure and undisturbed. Jer. xlix. 16. Obad. 4. Hab. ii. 9. A nest in cedars, is houses built of cedar-wood. Jer. xxii. 23.

NET, DRAG; (1.) An instrument for catching fish, birds, or wild beasts. Matt. iv. 18. Isa. li. 20. (2.) Artificial work, wrought or woven in the form of a net. 1 Kings vii. 17. God's net, is the entangling afflictions wherewith he chastises or punishes men, Job xix. 6; or the church, or the dispensation of the gospel, whereby many are drawn to Christ. This is cast into the sea of this world, and many are either really, or in appearance, drawn by it. At last it will be emptied into the eternal state; all the good rendered happy, and the bad cast into everlasting fire. Matt. xiii. 47-50. The net of wicked men, with which they ensnare others, and draw wealth and power to themselves, is their crafty plots, and vigorously-executed purposes of mischief. Psal. ix. 15. Mic. vii. 2. Psal. cxi. 5. Hab. i. 16. The Jewish rulers and priests were a net, a means of drawing others into sin and ruin. Hos. v. 1. In vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird: without cause, traps are laid to ensnare and destroy innocent persons; and to no purpose are sinners warned by the misery and destruction that happened to their fellow-criminals before them. Prov. i. 17.

NE-TO'PHAH, or NE-TO'PHA-THI; a city of Judah, between Bethlehem and Anathoth, and peopled by the posterity of Salma, the father of Bethlehem. It is said to have been noted for olives and artichokes. 1 Chron. ii. 51, 54. Whether it be the same as Nephthah, cannot be ascertained; but Maharai, one of David's mighties, and Epilai, a captain that submitted to GEDALIAH, were natives of this place. 2 Sam. xxiii. 21. Jer. xl. 8.

NEW; (1.) But lately formed, appointed, or begun to be used. Josh. ix. 13. 1 Kings xi. 29. (2.) Strange, extraordinary. Num. xvi. 30. (3.) Different from, or more excellent than what went before. Thus the saints are new creatures, and have a new spirit, a new heart, and all things new: instead of the old corrupt and carnal views, and dispositions, and manner of life, they have spiritual knowledge, holy dispositions, and pious lives, springing from a conscience purified by the blood of Christ, and a heart actuated by his Spirit, excited by his love, and directed to his glory. Gal. vi. 15. 2 Cor. v. 17. Ezek. xl. 19. and xxxvi. 26. Rev. xxi. 7. God created a new thing in the earth, when he made the Virgin Mary to conceive and bring forth his Son in our nature. Jer. xxxi. 22. Christ's blood opens a new and living way; one not afforded by the old covenant of works, but one more excellent, in which life is given to dead sinners. Heb. x. 20. Christ's new name is Redeemer, Lord our righteousness, King of kings, and Lord of lords. Rev. iii. 12. The covenant of grace is called new; it succeeds to the old broken covenant of works; it is ever fresh, flourishing, and excellent; and under the gospel, it is dispensed in a more clear, spiritual, extensive, and powerful manner, than of old. Jer. xxxi. 33. The glorious state of the church during the millennium, and eternal state, is called a New Jerusalem, as much more glorious or lasting than the old Jerusalem. Rev. iii. 12. and xxi. 1. The saints' songs are called new; they are most sweet, hearty, and excellent, proceeding from new hearts, and for God's mercies, that are new, fresh, and ever repeated every morning. Psal. xl. 3. and cxlix. Lam. iii. 23. There is nothing new under the sun; the same kind of events return from age to age; and, except in the case of miracles, there is rarely or never any event but had its like in former times. Eccl. i. 9, 10, and iii. 15.

NIBBAZ, the seeing barker; the idol god of the Avites, who, it is said, was worshipped in the likeness of a dog. Possibly he is the same with the Egyptian Anubis; or, perhaps, the same with Nebo; and then his name signifies the all-seeing Nebo. 2 Kings xvii. 31.

NIC-ODEMUS, a follower of Jesus Christ. He was a Pharisee, and a ruler of the Jews. At first, though he conceived some esteem for our Saviour, yet he was ashamed to profess it, and so came to him by night for instruction. When he had complimented our Saviour with the title of an extraordinary teacher, and hinted his desire to learn something of his doctrine, Jesus told him he could not become a true member of his church, except he were born again, and his nature wholly renewed. Grossly ignorant of regeneration, and of the Old Testament oracles relative to it, Nicodemus asked, How one could re-enter into his mother's womb, and be born again? Jesus asked, If he were a teacher in Israel, and knew not these things? and told him, that the new birth he spoke of, was effected by spiritual influence; and that if he could not believe what was so often experienced on earth, how would he believe information concerning heavenly and eternal things, known only to the Son of man, present in heaven as to his divine nature, while his human was upon earth? He informed him, that as the brazen serpent was lifted up in the wilderness for the general means of cure to the serpent-bitten Hebrews so he himself should be quickly lifted up on the cross, and in the gospel, for the salvation of all the ends of the earth: that God, in infinite kindness, had given him to be the Saviour of the world: that whosoever believed on him, should not perish, but have eternal life; and whoever believed not should be damned; and added, that the reason why many believed not his instructions was, because their deeds were evil, and ready to be discovered by means thereof. John iii. 1-21. After this conference, there is reason to hope that Nicodemus became a real disciple of Jesus Christ, and attended his ministrations as he had opportunity. When afterward he sat in the sanhedrim, and heard the members censuring their officers for not apprehending our Saviour, and deriding the people who believed on him as ignorant and accursed, he asked, If it was according to the law, which they pretended to know so well, to condemn a man before they heard him? These furious bigots demanded of Nicodemus, If he too were a Galilean? and bade him read the Prophets, and he would find that never a prophet came out of Galilee. Ignorant men! both Jonah and Nahum came out of it. When our Saviour was crucified, Nicodemus still more openly avowed himself a Christian, and assisted Joseph of Arimathea to inter the sacred corpse. John vii. 45-52. and xix. 39, 40. It is said, that when the other members of the sanhedrim heard of Nicodemus's baptism, they deposed him from his office of senator, and excommunicated him from their synagogue; but Gamaliel his cousin took him to his country-house, where he lived the rest of his time, and was honourably buried near to Stephen the deacon. A spurious gospel, called by some The Acts of Pilate, is ascribed to Nicodemus; but it is plainly a forgery.

NICHO-LAS, one of the first seven deacons; he was a native of Antioch, a proselyte to the Jewish religion, and lastly, a convert to the Christian faith. He was much distinguished for holiness and zeal. Acts vi. Whether by some imprudent or sinful conduct, he gave any occasion to the rise of the abandoned sect of the NICOLAITANS; or whether they, knowing his fame for sanctity, screened themselves under his name; or whether the Nicholas that founded that sect be a different person, is not agreed. Perhaps this sect was a part of, or the very same with, the Gnostics. It is said, they had their women in common, reckoned adultery, and the use of meats offered to idols, indifferent things; that they imputed their wickedness to God as the cause; and received a multitude of fables concerning the generation of angels, and the creation of the world by subordinate powers. This sect had a considerable spread in Asia for a time. At Ephesus they were detected; but at Pergamos and Thyatira, they were sinfully tolerated by the Christians. Rev. ii. It does not appear that they continued long under the name of Nicolaitans; but perhaps they, in reality, continued under the character of Cainites.

NICOPO-LIS; a city where Paul informed Titus, that he determined to winter; but whether it was Nicopolis in Epirus, on the Ambracian Gulf, or Nicopolis in Thracia, on the east of Macedonia, and near the river Nessus, cannot be positively determined, though most likely the latter. Tit. iii. 12.

NIGH. See NEAR.

NIGHT; (1.) The time when the sun is below the horizon. Exod. xii. 30. (2.) The time of heathenish ignorance and profaneness in which, what spiritual darkness, danger, sloth, and stumbling into sin abound! Rom. xiii. 12. (3.) Adversity, which, like the night, is perplexing, comfortless, and disagreeable, or the season of it. Isa. xxi. 12. Sol. Song v. 2. (4.) Death, when we are laid asleep, and are quite inactive. John ix. 4. (5.) The season in which any event comes suddenly and unexpectedly upon us. 1 Thess. v. 2. Isa. xv. 1. Luke xii. 30. (6.) The whole time of our life on earth, during which, dark ignorance, danger, and sinful stumbling, much prevail. Sol. Song i. 13. Rom. xiii. 13. (7.) A very short time. Psal. xxx. 6. The day is made dark with night; the sun goes down at noon; and the earth is darkened in the clear day; night is unto men, and the day dark over the prophets; when suddenly prosperity is turned into misery, and even public teachers are under the power of delusion, or are so perplexed that they know not what to think or say. Amos v. 8. and viii. 9. Mic. iii. 8. There shall be no night in the New Jerusalem; during the millennium, there shall not be such ignorance, distress, or wickedness in the church as at present; and in heaven, there shall be no ignorance, no sin, or distress. Rev. xxi. 25. By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth; amidst distress, ignorance, and sloth, I sought to have fellowship with him. Sol. Song iii. 1.

NILE; ΣΙΝΩ; the noted river of Egypt. It has its source in Upper Ethiopia. Father Pars says, it springs from two wells about twenty paces distant, and the one about twenty-five, and the other about sixteen palms or handbreadths deep; but Thevenot says it springs from one. About three days' journey from its source, this river becomes wide, and navigable for small vessels. After receiving a river called Jama, it pursues its course westward about ninety miles: it then winds to the east, and falls into the large lake of Zaïre or Dambea; from hence it winds about to the south-east, and then to the north-west, till it comes within about twenty miles of its source. It then runs northward; not without several windings, till at last it falls into Egypt. Perhaps about Sennar, a long way south of Egypt, it is parted into two branches, the one of which runs westward through Africa, and is called the Niger, Nigir, or Senegal river; and the other runs northward through Egypt, and is called the Nile, i. e. Nahal, or Ne l river, and is called the Sihor, or Shihor, for its blackness, by reason of the black mud which it carries along with it; and the river of Egypt, as there is none else in that country, that deserves the name. It has seven remarkable falls or cataracts. At one of them the water falls as a white sheet from a rock two hundred feet high, and with such violence that it makes an arch, leaving a broad way for travellers to pass below at the bottom of the rock without being wet, and with a noise louder than thunder, which is heard at the distance of nine or ten miles. Though it runs about 1500 miles, and receives a great many rivers, especially before it enters Egypt, its stream, on ordinary occasions, is not so great as might be expected. Villamont indeed says, its width at Cairo is about three miles; but others, of no less credit, make it much less. About sixty or eighty miles before it falls into the Mediterranean sea, it divides into two streams, which leave the Delta between them; and these two currents divide into others. It appears from the scripture, and the ancient writers, that it then had seven streams. Isa. xi. 15. How many it has at present is not agreed: some have reckoned nine, others eleven, others fourteen; but it seems there are but four, or rather three, of any account, viz. the Pelusiæ at the east, the Canopic on the west, and the Pathmetic in the middle. In the end of June, July, and August, the excessive rains in Abyssinia cause an annual swell of this river, till it overflows the country. In August, twenty miles on each side are covered with water, and nothing seen except the houses and trees; but travellers do not agree in the height of its rise. It is certain, that as the soil is now much higher by the yearly increase of mud, perhaps at the rate of a foot in a hundred years, according to Shaw, it requires a much higher rise to fertilize the country than it did of old. Some travellers will have the rise of twenty-nine feet perpendicular to be best; but others will have one about thirty-six or forty feet to be the most; which last, perhaps is nearest the truth. If the rise of the water be too small, the country is not duly fattened with the mud. If its rise be too great, it deluges the country, and the waters recede too late for the sowing of the seed. The overflow is less remarkable in Lower Egypt than in the southern part of that kingdom, perhaps on account of the multitudes of ditches and canals, and partly because there is less need of it on account of the frequent rains. In Upper Egypt, where they have almost no rain, they retain the water in large cisterns or canals that they may therewith water their fields at pleasure. To prevent excessive inundations of the country, they digged the immense lake of Mæris; and from it, they water the country on proper occasions. They too employ about 200,000 oxen in drawing water out of deep pits and wells, to water their fields and gardens. After the waters of the Nile are withdrawn, the Egyptians, in October and November, sow their seed among the mud, which being trampled down by the swine, which they allow to range among it, or covered by other like careless methods, brings forth a plentiful crop.

NIM'RAH, or BETH-NIM'RAH, a city of the Gadites, somewhere about the head of the river Arnon. Num. xxxii. 3, 36. If Nimrim stood where Jerome places Benamerium, near the Dead sea, and a little north-east of Zoar, it must have been a different place from Nimrah. These places seem to have had their names from the plenty of leopards about them. The waters of Nimrim were desolate, when the fishers there, or the inhabitants on its banks, were cut off, or carried into captivity by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Isa. xv. 6. Jer. xlviii. 34.

NIM'ROD, the son of Cush. He was a mighty hunter; and having rendered himself useful by killing many wild beasts, or by violent oppression of his neighbours, he procured himself a kingdom. He first set up for king at Babylon, and then extended his dominion to Erech, Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar. He was no doubt a promoter of the building of Babel; and it seems his tyranny had obliged Ashur, the son of Shem, to leave the country, and retire eastward to the other side of the Hiddekel or Tigris. There is no proper evidence that Nimrod was the Nimus who founded Nineveh, though he may be one of the Belus concerned in the building of Babylon. Part of his history, dressed up in fable, is contained in the Grecian history of Bacchus. Gen. x. 8—11.

NINE-VEH; the capital of Assyria, and built by Asher the son of Shem. Gen. x. 11. Nineveh was built on the bank of the river Tigris; but whether on the western or eastern, is not agreed. We suppose it stood on the eastern, almost opposite to the present Mosul. It was one of the largest cities in the world. In Jonah's time it was a city of three days' journey around the walls, or would require him three days to go through it, proclaiming its overthrow. It then had above 120,000 infants in it, whom we cannot suppose above the eighth or tenth part of the inhabitants. Diodorus says, it was sixty miles in circumference; and Strabo says, it was larger than Babylon. Its wall was two hundred feet high, and so thick that three chariots a-breast, might have been driven along the top. On the wall were built 1500 towers, each 200 feet higher than the wall. This city was very early noted for wealth, idolatry, and whoredom. When Jonah the prophet, about A. M. 3142, warned the inhabitants, that if they did not repent, they should be destroyed within forty days, they were mightily affected. A fast of three days both for man and beast was appointed, and they cried mightily to God for the preventing of this stroke. He heard their prayers, and long delayed their ruin. Some say it was destroyed about a hundred years after Jonah, under Sardanapalus, or Sardan-pul; but, from the reasons given in the article ASSYRIA, this opinion is doubtful, especially as the Scripture expressly declares, that Nineveh's ruin would be so complete as to need no repetition. The kings of Assyria had collected into it the most of the wealth of the east. Nah. ii. 9, 12. Nahum describes the ruin of Nineveh in the most striking manner; that the rivers should break through the walls, chap. i. 8. and ii. 6; that their troops and inhabitants should be quite dispirited, chap. iii. 13; and seized in their drunkenness, chap. i. 10; and iii. 11, 18; their allies should desert them, or their merchants forsake the city, chap. iii. 16; their own officers, through drunkenness or stupidity, desert their station, chap. iii. 17; and the Medes and Chaldeans ride with torches through the city in the night. Chap. ii. 3, 4.

The Medes and Persians had several times laid siege to this city, and were induced to abandon their attempt by various accidents; but after the massacre of the Tartars in Media, they repeated the siege, Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar being the commanders. After they had lain before it three years, the river Tigris or Lycus, became exceedingly swollen, and broke down two miles and a half of the wall. Whenever the water assuaged, the besiegers rushed into the city, and murdered the inhabitants, who lay buried in their drunkenness, occasioned by an advantage which they had just before gained over the enemy. When the king of it, whose name we suppose was Sardanapalus, heard the city was taken, he shut up himself and his family, and wealth, it is said to the value of about £25,000,000 sterling, in the palace, and then set fire to it, and destroyed all that was in it. It is said, it was fifteen days before the flames were quenched. This happened about A. M. 3403. This city was never rebuilt; but another Nineveh, or Ninus was built near it, which continued till the first ages of Christianity; but at present there is scarcely a vestige to be discerned, either of the one or the other. Nah. i—iii. Zeph. ii. 13, 15.

-NIS'ROCH; an idol of the Assyrians. Under what form he was represented, it is hard to determine. Perhaps Vitringa is right in supposing he was Belus, worshipped under the form of a god of war. 2 Kings xix. 37.

NITRE; that which we now call so is saltpetre, a well known substance, of a whitish colour, and sharp bitterish taste. In its crude state, it seems to have no acidity at all, but affords an acid spirit, capable of dissolving almost any substance. Saltpetre is naturally blended with particles of earth, which constitute its ore. Any kind of earth, well moistened by the dung or urine of animals, will yield it in considerable quantities. The nitre of the ancients seems to have been different from ours, being a genuine, native, and pure salt, a fixed alkali, which being dissolved in vinegar, removed spots from the clothes or skin. There were mines of it south of Memphis in Egypt. Prov. xxv. 20. Though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, thine iniquity is marked before me: thy guilt is so great, that no pretences to reformation can turn away thy punishment. Jer. ii. 22.

NO, a populous city of Egypt; but where, is not agreed. It could not be Alexandria, as that was not built when No was ruined. Calmet supposes it to be Diospolis, in the Delta, which had Busiris on the south, and Mendesium on the north. But no reason can be assigned why this should be called populous, in an eminent degree. Vitringa inclines to think it Noph or Memphis; but it was more probably Thebes or Diospolis, which is much the same as No-ammon, the habitation of Jupiter-ammon; as that idol had a famous temple here. It was the capital of Upper Egypt, and was built chiefly on the east of the Nile. In its glory, it is said to have had a hundred gates, each capable of sending forth 20,000 men, and that 700,000 soldiers had their residence in it; but these accounts are doubtless exaggerated. It is certain that it was very populous, and No-ammon may signify the dwelling of multitudes. Under Sennacherib, or his son, the Assyrians took Thebes, and reduced it to a desolation, while Egypt and Ethiopia were under one king. Nah. iii. 8—10. It was rebuilt, but Cambyzes the Persian destroyed it when it was about fifty-two miles in circumference, or, as some say, in length. The wealth they found in it was immense. It was again rebuilt, but on a smaller scale, and was destroyed by Cornelius Gallus the Roman general. The ruins of its four noted temples were long very discernible, if they are not so still. The city Said, or perhaps Luxor, is built near to where the ancient Thebes stood.

NOAH, Nox; the son of that Lamech who was descended of Sheth. He was the lenth in descent from Adam, and it seems the eighth preacher of righteousness. 2 Pet. ii. 5. At his birth, his father Lamech expressed his hopes that he would be a signal comfort to him and his family, and so gave him a name signifying rest and comfort. In his time wickedness universally prevailed. Noah not only walked piously himself, but admonished his neighbours to do so. To reward his strict piety, amid so many temptations to the contrary, God preserved him and his family from the universal deluge. To effect this, he at God's direction built an ark sufficient to accommodate him, and pairs of all the animals that could not live in the water. Perhaps he spent a hundred and twenty years in building it, that the corrupt antediluvians might have the more time to repent of their sins ere the flood should be sent. In A. M. 1656, when Noah was six hundred years of age, he, his wife, and his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and their wives, and seven pair of all clean animals, male and female, and two pair of unclean animals, entered the ark, and were shut up in it by the Lord. When Noah, almost a year after found that the waters had considerably decreased, he sent out a raven to see if the earth were dry. It lived on the floating carcasses, and never returned to him. He next sent forth a dove, which finding no dry place to rest on, returned, and Noah put out his hand, and brought her into the ark: after seven days, he sent her out a second time, and she returned with a fresh olive leaf in her mouth. When he sent her out a third time, she returned not. After he and his family, and the other animals, had lodged a year and ten days in the ark, they came out. Noah offered a sacrifice of thanksgiving for his preservation; and the Lord accepted it, and promised that no wickedness of men should hereafter provoke him to destroy the earth, or the animals thereof, or to deny the regular return of the seasons. The Lord also charged Noah and his sons to multiply and replenish the earth: he allowed them to eat the flesh of clean animals, provided they did not eat them with the blood, raw, in the manner of beasts, or having the blood run through the flesh; and he commanded that every murderer of men should be put to death. To mark the establishment of his covenant for the preservation of the world, he promised to set his rainbow in the cloud, in wet weather, as a token that the water should no more cover the earth. Soon after the flood, Noah commenced husbandman, and cultivated the vine, and, it seems, insensible of its intoxicating virtue, drank of the wine till he was drunk, and lay uncovered in his tent. Ham, his younger son, perhaps informed by Canaan, went and saw him in this condition, and in a sportive manner told his two brethren thereof. They took a mantle, and going backward that they might not behold their father's shame, spread it over him. When Noah awakened, and was quite sober, he, aware of the behaviour of his sons, and inspired of God, denounced a curse of servitude upon the posterity of Ham, chiefly the descendants of Canaan. These he predicted should be slaves to the offspring of the two brothers who had covered him; and be oppressed by the Hebrews, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Saracens, and by the Greeks, Romans, Vandals, and Turks: that of Shem's posterity should be early and long the peculiar church of God, that of him the Messiah should proceed: and that the posterity of Japheth should be exceeding numerous, and at last seize on the territories of Shem, and enter into a state of church fellowship with God. At last he died, aged nine hundred and fifty years, a little before the birth of Abraham. Whether Noah consented to the building of Babel, or whether before his death he assigned to his three sons their different shares of the then known world, cannot be ascertained. Possibly after the building of Babel, he removed eastward to China, and became the Fohi, or founder of that kingdom, though the arguments of Shuckford and others in favour of this journey cannot hardly be deemed conclusive to this point. It is said, that Noah is the Saturn of the heathen; and that Ham is their Jupiter; Japheth their Neptune; and Shem Pluto. Perhaps their Ouranus or Cælus, their Ogyges, Deucalion, Janus, Prometheus, &c. are no other than Noah dressed up in fable.

Did not this patriarch prefigure Jesus Christ? His name is a bed of rest, and source of consolation. Amidst a crooked and perverse generation, he was singularly upright and holy, and preached righteousness in the great congregation. Through him, how the patience of God is displayed towards men! By him, the ark of the church is gradually reared: and in it, and chiefly in himself, are his chosen few, Jews or gentiles, saved from eternal ruin. His sweet smelling sacrifice removes the curse and vengeance of God. With him and his seed is the new covenant established, and on them is the true heirship of all things bestowed. As by him, the church, the vineyard of the Lord of hosts, is planted and cultivated, the future state of his professed seed is declared in his sacred testaments. Such as despise him, and turn his grace into licentiousness, or the infirmities of the saints into ridicule, he condemns to endless slavery and woe; such as love his person, and hide the infirmities of his saints, he blesses with high advancement, and delightful fellowship with God.

NOB; a small city not far from Jerusalem. Here the tabernacle for some time continued. Here Doeg, by Saul's order, murdered all the families of the eighty-four priests who were slain with Abimelech. 1 Sam. xxii. Here Sennacherib halted in his march to the siege of Jerusalem. Isa. x. 32. The children of Benjamin dwelt here, after the captivity. Neh. xi. 32.

NOBLE; (1.) Of honourable and high birth, or station. Neh. vi. 17. Acts xxiv. 3. (2.) Of a commendable and excellent disposition, so as to receive nothing in religion but as it is founded on the word of God. Acts xvii. 11. (3.) Of the best kind. Jer. ii. 21. Christ is a noble man; a noble governor, that proceeded from among the Jews. How divine his generation, as the Son of God! How royal his descent as man!

How high and honoured his office as our Mediator, Prince, and King! Luke xix. 12. Jer. xxx. 21.

NOISE; the thunder that roars above us in the air or heaven, is called the noise of God's tabernacle. Job xxxvi. 29.

NOON; (1.) The middle of the day, when the sun is at its highest in our hemisphere, and his heat and light about the strongest. Psal. lv. 17. (2.) A time of clear light. Job v. 14. So to shine as the noon-day, is to appear in a clear and glorious manner. Psal. xxxvii. 6. To waste, war, spoil, at noon, is to do it fearlessly and suddenly, after great prosperity. Psal. xci. 6. Jer. vi. 4. and xv. 8. Zeph. ii. 4. A time of prosperity is called noon, because of its glory, pleasantness, and brightness: how men delight to enjoy it! how pleased with the shining smiles of Providence! and yet how common a presage of an approaching night of adversity! Amos viii. 9. Isa. lviii. 10. A time of affliction, persecution, or temptation, is called noon, because men are distressed with the scorching heat of Providence, fiery trials, and fiery darts of Satan. Isa. xvi. 8. Sol. Song i. 8.

NOPH. See MEMPHIS.

NORTH and SOUTH are represented relatively to Canaan, or the way of entrance to it, or to some other place spoken of in the text. So Syria was north from Canaan, and Egypt was south of it. Dan. xi. 1—43. Assyria and Babylon were north of Judea, either in situation, or that their armies invaded Canaan from the north. Jer. iii. 12. and vi. 1. and Media lay north-east of Babylon. Jer. i. 3. The north of Europe, and north-east of Tartary, are north of the Ottoman Turks. Dan. xi. 44. The one raised from the north to be a mighty conqueror, is either Nebuchadnezzar, or rather Cyrus: or Constantine the Great, who was raised from Britain to deliver the Christian church. Isa. xlii. 25. I will say to the North, give up, and to the South, keep not back; bring my sons from afar, and my daughters from the ends of earth, i. e. I will bring the Hebrews from all the countries, whether north or south of Canaan, and settle them in their own land; and from countries on both sides of Canaan, as from Lesser Asia, Europe, and Tartary, &c. on the north, and from Egypt and Abyssinia, &c. on the south, shall multitudes be converted to Christ. Isa. xliii. 6. Perhaps Ezekiel's visionary chambers on the north, may respect the Protestant churches in Europe and North America. Ezek. xlii. 1, 11, 13. The order to go out by the south gate, if entering by the north gate; and to go out at the north gate, if entering by the south gate, may import, that Christians should go straight forward in their course of holiness, whether they meet with prosperity or adversity therein. Ezek. xli. 9.

NOSE, NOSTRILS. Camels and oxen were managed by iron rings in their nostrils, and thereto the allusion is made. 2 Kings xix. 28. As the Hebrews placed anger in the nose, and the same word signified both; nose and nostrils ascribed to God, denote his discernment of provocation, and his wrath to be executed on account thereof. Isa. lxxv. 6. Exod. xv. 8. Psal. xviii. 8.

NO, NOT, always signifies denial. (1.) Sometimes it imports it absolutely; i. e. not at all, in any respect or circumstance. Exod. xx. 3—17. (2.) Sometimes it imports a conditional denial; those that are guilty of envy, murder, &c. shall not inherit the kingdom of God; i. e. unless they repent of their sin. Gal. v. 21. Pharaoh did not let the Hebrews go, no not by a strong hand; no not, unless constrained thereto by the mighty and destructive plagues of God; or perhaps, no not after some plagues inflicted on his kingdom. Exod. iv. 19. (3.) Sometimes it imports a comparative denial. Christ sent me not to baptize; that is, not chiefly to baptize, but to preach the gospel. 1 Cor. i. 17. I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; i. e. mercifulness in temper and behaviour, rather than sacrifice. Hos. vi. 6. Matt. xii. 7. I came not to send peace but a sword: persecution and division, especially to the Jews, rather than carnal peace and prosperity, are the consequents of my coming in the flesh. Matt. x. 34. Luke xii. 51. When NOT is in precepts or promises, it is ordinarily to be understood as importing the contrary of what is prohibited or forbidden. Thus, when God saith, Thou shalt not kill; it means, that we should not merely abstain from killing, but should use all lawful endeavours to preserve and promote our own life, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, and that of others. Exod. xx. 13. Or when he promiseth, I will not fail thee nor forsake thee; it means, I will abide with, and encourage and strengthen thee. Josh. i. 5. God desired not sacrifices or offerings in order to merit, or in the case of capital crimes. Psal. xl. 5. and li. 16.

NOTABLE, or of NOTE; very remarkable, more than ordinary. Dan. viii. 5. Rom. xvi. 7.

NOTHING. NOUGHT; (1.) Not any thing at all. Gen. xix. 8. (2.) For no good purpose or end. Matt. v. 13. (3.) No works truly good and acceptable to God. John xv. 5. (4.) Of no binding force. Matt. xxiii. 16, 18. (5.) Entirely false, and without ground. Acts xxi. 24. (6.) No other means. Mark ix. 29. (7.) No reward or wages. 3 John 7. (8.) No new doctrine relative to men's salvation; no new knowledge or authority. Gal. ii. 6. (9.) No guilt or corruption to work upon. John xiv. 30. Nothing is sometimes taken comparatively: thus our age is nothing before God, bears no proportion to his eternal duration. Psal. xxxix. 5. All nations are nothing, and less than nothing, and vanity; i. e. they bear no proportion to his unbounded excellency and greatness. Isa. xl. 17. Sometimes it is taken relatively: so Paul was nothing valuable in his own estimation of himself. 2 Cor. xii. 11. Circumcision, or uncircumcision, is nothing; is of no avail to render us accepted with God. 1 Cor. vii. 19. To come to nought, is to be ruined, turn out to no good purpose. Job viii. 22. Isa. viii. 1. To bring to nought, is to render unsuccessful, base, and contemptible. Psal. xxxiii. 10. 1 Cor. i. 28. To set at nought, is to undervalue, despise. Prov. i. 25.

NOVICE; one newly planted in the church; one newly converted to the Christian faith. Such an one was not to be made a bishop, lest, being puffed up with pride, he should fall under such condemnation and punishment as did the devil. 1 Tim. iii. 6.

NOURISH; (1.) To furnish with food. Gen. xlvii. 12. Acts xii. 20. (2.) Kindly to bring up. Acts vii. 21. (3.) To cause, or use all proper means to make to grow. Isa. xlv. 14. (4.) To cherish, comfort. James v. 5. Ruth iv. 15. (5.) To instruct. And to be nourished in the word of faith and good doctrine, is to be affectionately and carefully instructed in the true principles of the gospel, and well experienced in its power, for the edification, progress in holiness, and spiritual comfort of the soul. 1 Tim. iv. 6. Jesus Christ, and his fulness, as exhibited in the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and applied by the Holy Ghost, are the nourishment, by which the saints are delightfully instructed, comforted, and strengthened to every good word and work. Col. ii. 19.

NUMBER; (1.) A reckoning of persons or things, whether they be few or many. Gen. xxxiv. 30. (2.) A society or company. Luke xxii. 3. Acts i. 17. So Matthias was numbered, i. e. by suffrages he was added to the society of the apostles. Acts i. 26. The number of the Antichristian beast is six hundred and sixty-six. The numeral letters contained in his Greek name Laetinos, or in his Hebrew one Romith, Latin or Romish, or in Sethua, which signifies MYSTERY, when added together, amount to just six hundred and sixty-six. It was perhaps in A. D. 666, that Pope Vitelian restricted the public liturgy to the Latin language, and so brought the church into an implicit subjection to Rome. From the time that John had his visions in Patmos, to A. D. 756, when the pope became a temporal prince, was, perhaps, precisely six hundred and sixty-six years. This number too may denote a vast number of offices, errors, and corruptions, which, to carnal view, have a regular, well connected, and beautiful appearance: as six hundred and sixty-six has a more regular gradation and appearance than 144,000, the number of the Lamb's followers. Moreover, if the square root of six hundred and sixty-six be extracted, it will turn out twenty-five, with a small fraction. Now, multitudes of things in the popish system, are precisely twenty-five. They have twenty-five articles of faith. The council of Trent that established them had twenty-five sessions. It was begun with twenty-five prelates: and its acts were subscribed by twenty-five Archbishops. Rome has twenty-five gates. There were originally twenty-five parishes in Rome. The college of Cardinals consisted of twenty-five persons. The cross of St. Peter's church, is twenty-five hand-breadths in height. In this church are twenty-five altars, and twenty-five marks of Christ's wounds are imprinted on each altar. The celebration of their jubilee was reduced to every twenty-fifth year. The twenty-fifth day of months is peculiarly marked with their superstition. Rev. xiii. 18. God numbered Belshazzar's kingdom, and finished it; allowed it to continue for the years he had determined, and not one day more.

Dan. v. 26. He numbers men to the slaughter, when he sets them apart by his providence to destruction and death, as a shepherd does his sheep to be slain. Isa. lxx. 12. We number our days, when we seriously consider how frail, and short, and uncertain our life is; how great the necessity and business of our souls; and what hindrances of it are in our way. Psal. xc. 12. The inspired book of NUMBERS is so called, because it relates so much to the numbering of the warriors, and journeys of the Hebrews in the desert. It is a history of about thirty-nine years. It relates the history of the numbers, station, and marching order of the various tribes of Israel, and of the offerings of their princes at the dedication of the tabernacle; the consecration of the Levites; the observation of the second passover; the institution of the seventy elders; the destruction of the people, by a fiery plague, and by the quails they lusted for; Miriam's leprosy; the search and contempt of Canaan, and the doom of the spies, and the people; the punishment of Korah and his companions, and the plague among the people for murmuring at their destruction; the budding of Aaron's rod; Moses and Aaron's misbehaviour when the people murmured at Kadesh; the death of Miriam and Aaron; the plague and cure of the bites of fiery serpents; the conquest and division of the kingdom of Sihon and Og; the often defeated attempts of Balak and Balaam to curse Israel; the Hebrews' enticement to whoredom and idolatry by the Midianitish women, and the punishment thereof in the death of 24,000 Hebrews, and the almost total ruin of the Midianitish nation; a delineation of the borders of Canaan, and an appointment of twelve persons to divide it. With these narratives are interspersed a variety of laws concerning suspicion of adultery, Nazariteship, blessing of the people, chaps. v. and vi; concerning the lighting of the lamps, the observance of the passover in the second month; the blowing of the silver trumpets, chaps. viii. ix. and x; concerning meat-offerings, drink-offerings, heave-offerings, sin-offerings, stoning to death for breach of Sabbath, and fringes on the borders of their garments; chap. xv; concerning the office and portion of the Priests and Levites, and the purification from the uncleanness of dead bodies by the ashes of the red heifer, chaps. xviii. and xix; concerning the offerings at festivals; and concerning vows, manslayers, cities of refuge, chaps. xxvii. xxix. xxx. and xxxv; and concerning the marriage of heireesses, chaps. xxviii. and xxxvi.

NUTS; that kind of fruit which is included in a hard shell, such as hazel-nuts, chestnuts, walnuts, nutmegs, &c. Those called the female nutmegs, are, for ought we know, the most valuable of all nuts. Nutmegs have four different coverings. Tournefort mentions nine kinds of walnuts; and no doubt there are many kinds of the other nuts. The saints are likened to nuts: their outward appearance on earth is despicable and mean; but they are safely protected, and covered with Christ's righteousness and grace, and are all precious and glorious within. Sol. Song vi. 11.

O.

O, or on, is expressive of earnestness in lamentation, Luke xiii. 34; in prayer, 1 Kings viii. 26; in admiration, Rom. xi. 33; in reproving, or expostulating, Gal. iii. 1; or in calling and inviting. Psal. xcv. 6.

OAK TREES, have male flowers that are barren; but the embryo fruit appears in other parts of the tree, which grows into acorns, the kernels of which readily split into two parts. There are about twenty kinds of oak; but the holm oaks, of which there are six kinds, differ considerably from the others. Oaks are very thick in their foliage; slow in their growth, very firm and durable in their wood, and will continue fresh for many ages, if kept always wet, or always dry. Oaks were very plentiful in Canaan; and those of Bashan were the best. Perhaps the Hebrew words eloh, allah, and elon, signify the Jewish turpentine, and only the word ALON an oak. It was common to sit under the shadow of oaks, 1 Kings xiii. 14; to bury under them, Gen. xxxv. 8. 1 Chron. x. 12; to make idolatrous statues of them, Isa. xlv. 14; and to worship idols under them. Ezek. vi. 13. Isa. i. 29. Hos. iv. 13. Isa. lvii. 5. The Tyrians made their oars for rowing of their ships, of the fine oaks of Bashan. Ezek. xxvii. 6. The Hebrews were like an oak, whose leaf fadeth; stripped of their confidence in themselves and others, and bereaved of their honour, wealth, prosperity, and pleasure, Isa. i. 30; yet like an oak or teel-tree, whose substance is in it, could never be utterly destroyed by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, or Romans. Isa. vi. 13. Governors, and great and valiant men, are likened to the tall and strong oaks of Bashan, to mark their apparent power, strength, and firmness, and their fitness to protect others. Isa. ii. 13. Zech. xi. 2.

OATH; a solemn appeal to God, by which he is solemnly appealed to, to witness the truth of what we assert or promise; and to avenge us in time and eternity, if we swear what is false or unknown to us, or if we do not perform what we engage. An oath must never be taken but in matters of importance, nor sworn by the name of any but the true God, as it is an act of solemn worship. Josh. xxiii. 7. James v. 12. Deut. vi. 13. Matt. v. 34, 35. Jer. v. 7. Nor irreverently, without godly fear and awe of the Most High; as he is represented as a wicked man, who is not deeply impressed with an oath, Eccl. ix. 2; nor rashly, without due caution, Lev. v. 4. Matt. xiv. 7. Gen. xxiv. 5, 8; nor falsely, or deceitfully, affirming what is false, or without a candid intention and due care to perform our solemn engagements. Lev. vi. 3. and xix. 12. Jer. xlii. 5. But every oath ought to be sworn in truth, the thing sworn being true in itself, and we having certain evidence and persuasion that it is truth, and swearing it without fraud or deceit; and in judgment, with understanding of the nature of an oath, and of the thing we swear, and with a heart-awing knowledge of him by whom we swear; and in righteousness, swearing only things that are good, and which we certainly know to be lawful and good; and swearing for a good end, to glorify God, and do real good to ourselves and others, by clearing the innocent, and ending a controversy. Jer. iv. 2. 1 Cor. x. 31. Heb. vi. 18. The phrases expressive of oaths or solemn affirmations, are, As the Lord liveth. Judg. viii. 19. God is my witness, or record. Rom. i. 9. 2 Thess. ii. 5, 10. Phil. i. 8. God knoweth. 2 Cor. xi. 11, 31. Behold, before God I lie not. Rom. ix. 1. I say the truth in Christ, and lie not. 1 Tim. ii. 7. As the truth of Christ is in me. 2 Cor. iv. 10. Verily, verily, I say unto you. John i. 51. Sometimes the patriarchs used the putting the hand under the thigh of him to whom the oath was given, which perhaps signified their faith in the Messiah, who was to proceed out of that person's loins. Gen. xxiv. 2, 3. and xlvii. 29. But lifting up of the hand towards heaven, was the most common gesture used in swearing. Gen. xiv. 22. Dan. xii. 7. Rev. x. 5, 6. The danger of swearing unnecessarily, ignorantly, irreverently, falsely, is, that God will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. Exod. xx. 7. He will make their plagues wonderful, Deut. xxviii. 58, 59; and his extensive curse fixes on them, to consume them and what belongs to them. Zech. v. 3, 4. The Jews, however, in latter times, were much given to profane swearing; on account of which God terribly threatened and punished them. Jer. xxiii. 10. Hos. iv. 2. They swore by various creatures, by heaven, by Jerusalem, by the head, &c. They pretended that if a man swore only by the altar, his oath was not binding; but if he swore by the gift presented on it, it was obligatory. Matt. xxiii. 16—20. Scarcely any thing can more evidently mark men's hatred against their Maker, than the most universal practice of profane swearing, particularly in common conversation. It is not to men's honour; it renders their language absurd and incoherent; it betrays their inward consciousness that they are liars; or why do they add an oath, when the simple affirmation of any honest man, who regards truth and honour in his words, is sufficient? It procures them neither pleasure nor profit, as whoredom, drunkenness, and theft, in some sense do. What then must profane swearers be but volunteers for Satan, and mad provokers of the vengeance of him who will not suffer them to escape his righteous judgments? Multitudes, who, it seems, blesh at the open profanation of their Maker's name, at once commit idolatry and profane swearing, in swearing by their truth, their faith, their conscience, soul, or the devil. It is abundantly plain, that such as swear profanely, without any temptation, will make no scruple, if they have a proper temptation, to swear falsely. Partly by means of this profane swearing; partly by the great irreverence used in taking of judicial oaths; partly by the frequent repetition of the same oath, or one of the very same import; partly by imposing oaths, sinful, dubious, or dark in their meaning; and partly by the easy admission of multitudes to swear on the occasion of elections, who understand neither what they swear, nor even the general nature of an oath; in our country oaths are almost become of no use with many, but to ensnare their souls, and to dishonour God. Our state-oaths have plainly no usefulness to mark the loyalty of the subjects. None are more ready to take them than such as intend to break them on the first opportunity. Shall not God visit for these things? Shall not his soul be avenged on such a nation as this? How can he hold us guiltless, where taking of his name in vain so prevails? God's swearing or giving his oath, denotes his solemn declaration of a truth, threatening, or promise, in order to impress men with the infinite importance and absolute certainty of it. Ezek. xxxiii. 11. Psal. xcv. 11. Gen. xxii. 16, 17. Thus his making Christ Priest with an oath, denotes the infinite importance, and the certainty, though wonderful nature of that office in the Son of God. Psal. cx. 4. Heb. vii. 29, 21. God swore by himself, or soul, as there is none greater, Heb. vi. 13. Jer. li. 14; by his life, Isa. xlix. 18; by his great name or perfections, Jer. xlv. 26; by his excellency, Amos viii. 7; by his holiness, Psal. lxxxix. 35; by his right hand or strength. Isa. lxii. 8. Men's swearing is either to one another, in order to end controversies, or to secure the performance of what is engaged, 1 Sam. xxx. 15; or to God, in engaging to forbear something sinful, or to perform something lawful or indifferent. Psal. cxix. 106. This is often called a vow; and a solemn promise to God, without the formality of an oath, is also called a vow. That we may conceive more exactly of the nature and importance of promises, covenants, promissory oaths, and vows, it may not be amiss to observe, (1.) That all authority which can bind men to any thing as their duty, is naturally, necessarily, independently, and originally in God himself. He alone, as the Most High, hath a sovereign dominion over all, working in, by, and upon them, and disposing of them as he pleaseth. He alone is Lord of the consciences of men, to whose revealed will, without any other reason perceived, they ought to submit, under pain of eternal damnation; and he hath left them free from the doctrines or commandments of men, which are in any thing contrary to his word, or beside it, in matters of faith or worship. Psal. lxxxiii. 18. Dan. iv. 35. Rom. xi. 36. Isa. xxxiii. 22. and xlii. 8. James iv. 12. (2.) That while God necessarily retains the supreme authority, and legislation attending it, in himself, or in his own hand, he, for the better promotion of obedience to his own laws, and of their own order and happiness, in their state of imperfection in this world, has communicated to some men a deputed and subordinate authority, by which they, as husbands, parents, masters, ministers, or magistrates, may in his name, enact rules for their inferiors precisely answerable to their different stations or departments, and govern them thereby; and to every adult person a power of self-government, to rule his own spirit and body; and, for that end, to bind, engage, or oblige, themselves, by promises, covenants, oaths, or vows, correspondent to their stations and circumstances. Prov. xvi. 32. and xxv. 28. 1 Cor. ix. 27. James iii. 2. This whole authority taking rise from the will of God, it can in nothing extend further than his grant, and must be wholly subordinated to his own authority, manifested in his law. It can extend no further than the station in correspondence to which it is granted. It cannot possibly interfere with, or oppose God's authority in his law. As it contains no power against the truth, but for the truth, no power for destruction, but for edification. 2 Cor. xiii. 8. and x. 8; no command requiring, or bond engaging, to any thing sinful, can include in it any real and valid obligations; nor can subordinate authority bind, in opposition to the supreme authority of God. But if the deputed authority be regularly exercised, God's supreme authority, manifested in his law, necessarily ratifies the commands and engagements thereby constituted, and enforces obedience and fulfilment, under pain of damnation. The manner of exercising or subjecting ourselves to this subordinate authority, is therefore a matter of very high importance, that we may not act unworthily as God's deputies, and may not pour contempt on God, by undervaluing his deputed authority, and the obligations arising from it. (3.) As, no deputed authority derived from God, can increase that supreme, that infinite authority which he has in himself, so no human command or engagement can increase that infinite obligation to duty which his law has in itself; but, if lawful, they have in them a real obligation, distinct, though not separated, or separable, from that of the obligation of God's law. To pretend with Belarmine, and other papists, that our promises or vows do not bind us in moral duties commanded by the law of God, because our vow cannot add any obligation to the law of God, is manifestly absurd. Self-binding, self-obligation, self-engagement, is so much the essential form of vows, and of all covenants, promises, or promissory oaths, whether of God or man, that they cannot exist at all, or even be conceived of without it, any more than a man without a soul, or an angel without an understanding and will. Nothing can be more manifest, than that we may bind ourselves to what is just and lawful, to necessary duties; and that though a promise, oath, or vow, cannot bind to sin, yet in any thing not sinful being taken, it binds to performance. Admit once this popish doctrine, it must naturally follow, that all human commands of superiors, as well as human promises, oaths, vows, and covenants, are in themselves destitute of all binding force, except in so far as they relate to such trifling things as the law of God doth not require of men in such particular circumstances. Commands of superiors must be mere declarations of the will of God in his law; and promises, oaths, vows, and covenants, must be mere acknowledgments that God's law requires such things from us, in so far as relating to moral duties. The authority which God has in him. If, and that which he has invested men with as his deputies, must be so inconsistent and mutually destructive, that the same thing cannot be bound to by both. The law of God must be held destructive of the being of an ordinance appointed by itself, in so far as that ordinance binds to a conscientious and diligent obedience to that law. To imagine that human laws or engagements cannot bind to moral duties, is at once highly absurd in itself, and contrary to the common sense of mankind in every age, who have all along considered men's promises, covenants, vows, and oaths, as binding them to pay their just debt, perform their just duties of allegiance, and to deliver the truth, and nothing but the truth, in cases of witness-bearing, &c. It is contrary to Scripture, which represents promises, covenants, promissory oaths, or vows, as things which are to be fulfilled, performed, or paid, and which may possibly be transgressed and broken. Matt. v. 33. Deut. xxiii. 21—23. Eccl. v. 4. Psal. xxii. 25; l. 14. lxi. 8. lxi. 13. lxxvi. 11. cxv. 13—18, and cxix. 106. Isa. xix. 21. Judg. xi. 36. Isa. xxiv. 5. Jer. xxxiv. 18; and which, in one of the plainest and least figurative chapters of the Bible, represents a vow as constituted by our binding ourselves, binding our own souls with a bond, and represents a vow as a bond, or obligation, Hebrew ISSAR, a very fast binding bond or obligation, as our own bond, that stands upon, or against us. Num. xxx. To represent vowing as a placing ourselves more directly under the law of God, or any commandment of it, or as placing ourselves in a new relation to the law, is but an attempt to render unintelligible what the Holy Ghost in that chapter has rendered plain, if it does not also import that we can place ourselves more directly under the moral law, than God has or can place us. To pretend that men's commands or engagements derive their whole obligation from the law of God's requiring us to obey the one, and pay or fulfil or perform the other, is no less absurd. These divine commands suppose an intrinsic obligation in the human law or engagement, and enforce it. But no law of God can require me to OBEY a human law, or FULFIL an engagement which has no obligation in itself any more than the laws of Britain can oblige me to pay a bill, or fulfil a bond, consisting of nothing but ciphers. While intrinsic obligation is the very essence of every promise, covenant, vow, or promissory oath, as well as of every just human law, this obligation is totally and manifestly distinct from the obligation of the law of God. (1.) In his law, God, by the declaration of his will as our supreme ruler, binds us. Deut. xii. 32. In promises, vows, covenants, and promissory oaths, we, as his deputy-governors over ourselves, by a declaration of our will, bind ourselves with a bond, bind our souls with our own bond. Num. xxx. 2—14. Psal. lxi. 13, 14. cxix. 106, &c.: and hence they are generally represented in Scripture, as our vows, oaths, &c. (2.) The obligation of our promises, vows, &c. as well as of human laws, is always subject to an examination by the standard of God's law, both as to matter and manner. 1 Thess. v.

21. But it would be presumption, blasphemous presumption, to examine whether what we know to be the law of God be right or not. Jam. iv. 11. (3.) The law of God binds all men to absolute perfection in holiness, be they as incapable of it as they may. Matt. v. 48. 1 Pet. i. 15, 16. But no man can, without mocking and tempting God, bind himself by oath to any thing but what he is able to perform. No man may vow to do any thing which is not in his own power, and for the performance of which he has no promise of ability from God. But no mere man since the fall is able in this life, either of himself or by any grace received from God, perfectly to keep the commandments of God. Eccl. vii. 20. Jam. iii. 2. 1 John i. 9. While God remains God, his law can demand no less than absolute perfection in holiness. While his word remains true, no mere man since the fall, in this life, can possibly attain to it, and therefore must never vow it. The least imperfection in holiness, however involuntary, breaks the law of God; But it is only by what is in some respect voluntary sinfulness, that we break our vows. Psal. xlv. 17. Nothing can more clearly mark the distinction of the two obligations than this particular. There is no evading the force of it, but either by adopting the Arminian new law of sincere obedience, or adopting the popish perfection of saints in this life. (4.) The law of God binds all men for ever. Psal. cxi. 7, 8. No human law, or self-engagement, binds men, but in this life, in which they remain imperfect, and are encompassed with temptations, to seduce them from their duty. In heaven they have no need of such helps to duty; and in hell they can have no profit by them. But, in heaven and hell, all are for ever bound by the authority of God manifested in his law. (5.) The obligation of human promises, covenants, vows, and promissory oaths, as well as of human laws, relating to things lawful, is not separable from, but many ways connected with the law of God, and its obligation. In binding ourselves to necessary duties, and to other things, so long and so far as is conducive thereto, God's law is made the rule of our engagement. Our vow is no new rule of duty, but a new bond to make the law of God our rule. Even Adam's engagement to present obedience in the covenant of works, was nothing else. It is in God's law that all our deputed authority to command others, or bind ourselves, is allotted to us. The demand of duties by the law of God, requires the use of all lawful means to promote the performance of them; and hence it requires human laws, and self-engagements, and the observance thereof, as far as conducive thereto. Nay they are expressly required in his law, or his ordinances, for means of helping and hedging us in to our duty. In making lawful vows, as well as human laws, we exert the deputed authority of the law-giver, granted to us in his law, in the manner his law prescribes, and precisely in obedience to its prescription. In the vow, we, according to the prescription of his own law, solemnly constitute the Divine Lawgiver the witness of our engagement, and the guarantee of it, graciously to reward our evangelic fulfilment of it, and to punish our perfidious violation of it. The more punctual observation of God's law, notwithstanding manifold infirmities and temptations, and of his glory therein, is the end of our self-engagements, as well as of human laws; and, by a due regard to their binding force, is this end promoted, as hereby the obligation of God's law is more deeply impressed on our minds, and we are shut up to obedience, and deterred from the contrary. On all which accounts, the law of God necessarily sustains as valid, the obligation of our self-engagements, as well as of human laws which are lawful, and ratifies the same in all the solemnities thereof as an ordinance appointed by itself, and, as it were, adopts the same, requiring, under the most awful pains, that the human laws be obeyed as things that bind by authority, and the self-engagements be paid and fulfilled as having in them a real obligation to performance; and whoever doth not, in his attempts to observe them, view these laws and self-engagements as having that binding force which the law of God allows them, pours contempt on them as ordinances of God, and on the law of God for allowing them a binding force. Thus, through maintaining the superadded or subordinate obligation of human laws, and of self-engagements to moral duties, we do not make void, but establish the obligation of God's law. (5.) In no respect can we disobey the lawful command of a superior, or violate a lawful promise, covenant, oath, or vow, without want of conformity to, and transgression of the law of God. In violating our vows, for instance, we manifest a contempt of that law which regulated the matter and making thereof: we rebel against that divine authority, from which, through his law, we derived our power to bind ourselves to duty, and so strike against the foundation of the whole law: we profane the vow, as it is a binding ordinance of God, appointed in his law: by trampling on a powerful means of promoting obedience to all the commandments, we mark our hatred of them, and prepare ourselves to transgress them, and endeavour to remove the awe of God's authority, or terror of his judgments from our consciences: we represent the Divine Lawgiver as a willing witness of treachery and fraud: we pour contempt on him as the guarantee of the vow, as if he did not incline, or durst not avenge our villany: contrary to the truth required in the law, we plunge ourselves into the most criminal deceit and falsehood: contrary to equity, we rob God and his church of what we have solemnly devoted to their service: contrary to devotion, we banish serious impressions of God's adorable perfections: contrary to good neighbourhood, we render ourselves a plague and curse, and encourage others to the most enormous wickedness: contrary to the end of our creation and preservation, we reject the glory of God, and obedience to his law from being our end: meanwhile, we trample under foot the divine laws, ratification of our vow, in all its awful solemnities, and manifold connections with itself, and requirement to pay it.

In all vows and promissory oaths, the matter must be both lawful and expedient, and in our power to perform, and the end must be to glorify God. The vows of wives and children, with respect to indifferent things, were not binding, except their husbands and parents consented thereto, when they knew of the engagement, as they had nothing of their own to give to the Lord, and he hates robbery for burnt-offering. Num. xxx. When vows or promissory oaths are once made, the utmost care ought to be taken to fulfil them, otherwise the breaker entails on himself the terrible vengeance of God. Psal. lxxvi. 11. Eccl. v. 5. Prov. xx. 25. To deter the Hebrews from rash vows, even in dedicating things to the Lord, nothing devoted was to be got back but at a fifth part more than the priest esteemed it worth: and if it was devoted under the form of a curse, it was not to be redeemed at all; nor was any thing belonging to the Lord by a former claim, as the tithes or first fruits, to be devoted by a singular vow, because these were not the man's own to dispose of. Lev. xviii. Keep the King's commandment, and that in regard of the oath of God; i. e. obey Jesus the King of kings, and even civil rulers, because thy oath to, or by God binds thee to it; and God has sworn to punish such as are disobedient. Eccl. viii. 2. Men's swearing to God, or Christ, or vowing to him, denotes not only their entering into a covenant of duty to him, but their subjection to, homage, worship, and service of him in general. 2 Chron. xv. 14. Isa. xix. 18. and xv. 23. Rom. xiv. 11. Phil. ii. 10, 11.

O-BA-DIAH; (1.) A godly man, who was one of the governors in the family of wicked Ahab. When Jezebel sought out the Lord's prophets, to have them all murdered, Obadiah hid a hundred of them in two caves, and notwithstanding the prevailing dearth, fed them with bread and water. With some difficulty, Elijah persuaded him to inform Ahab that he wished to see him. 1 Kings xviii. (2.) One of the lesser prophets, and whose prophecy consists but of one single chapter, wherein he severely inveighs against the Edomites, for their rejoicing over, and helping forward the destruction of the Jews, and foretells their own speedy and utter ruin, and the deliverance of the Hebrews from all the places whither they were or should be scattered. When he lived is not agreed. Lightfoot thinks, his prophecy refers to the behaviour of the Edomites at the sacking of Jerusalem by Shishak, or by the Arabians in the reign of Jehoram, or by the Syrians, or Israelites, in the time of Joash or Amaziah; and he is generally thought to have been contemporary with Hosea, Amos, and Joel. But when we compare his predictions with those of Jeremiah, chap. xlix; of Ezekiel, chap. xxv; and of Psal. cxxxvii. and find how similar they are thereto, we cannot forbear thinking with the great Usher, that he prophesied within a year or two after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

O'BED-EDOM, the son of Jeduthun, (not the sacred musician), and father of Shemaiah, Jozabad, Joah, Sacar, Nathaniel, Ammiel, Uzza, and Peulthai. When Uziah was struck dead for touching the ark of the Lord on the cart, David was so terrified that he was glad to defer bringing it to Jerusalem. As Obbededom's house was near, they carried it thither. Obbededom readily received it, and gave it a place in his house. His family not only suffered no injury, but mightily increased in numbers, health, and otherwise; so that when some years after they were appointed porters of the temple, they amounted to sixty-two able-bodied men. 1 Chron. xvi. 38. xiii. 9—14. xv. 24. and xxvi. 4—8. This Obbededom is called a Gittite, because he was a native of Gath-rimmon, or had sojourned awhile in Gath of the Philistines. 2 Sam. vi. 10.

OBEEDIENCE; the fulfilment of a superior's command, from regard to his authority. Christ's obedience, is his perfect fulfilment of the precepts, and his satisfaction of the penalty, of the broken covenant of works in our stead. Rom. v. 19. Heb. v. 8. Angels obey God by cheerfully and perfectly fulfilling his law, and executing whatever he commands. Psal. ciii. 20. The saints' obedience lies in their believing the truths of the gospel, and therein receiving Jesus and his fulness as the free gift of God; and, in consequence thereof, sincerely studying conformity to his image, and cheerful fulfilment of his whole law. Rom. vi. 16. This is called obedience to the faith, because it begins in embracing the truths of the gospel, and is a fulfilment of the divine law, as revealed in the Scripture. Rom. i. 5. Acts vi. 7. It is an obedience of faith: it corresponds with the principles received by faith in the Scripture, and proceeds from, and shews a living and actuating principle or habit of faith in the heart. Rom. xvi. 26. It is an obedience of Christ; it flows from his dwelling in, and influencing the heart; it corresponds with his law, is influenced by his authority and love, and tends to his honour. 2 Cor. x. 5. It is an obedience unto righteousness; it manifests the sanctifying virtue of Christ's righteousness imputed, and constitutes a personal righteousness, by which we glorify God, and profit ourselves and others. Rom. vi. 16. To constitute our conformity to the law, is an obedience of the gospel; it must be built on a gospel foundation; the truths relative to a free and eternal salvation, from the free grace of God reigning through the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ; and the law through his fulfilment of it, becomes a law of liberty to direct us, being received into the heart. John viii. 32. and xiii. 17. It must proceed from gospel principles in the heart; a mind enlightened in the knowledge of Christ, as our Saviour, Portion, and Lord; a conscience sprinkled with his blood; and a heart renewed and actuated by his indwelling Spirit. Matt. vii. 18. Gal. i. 16. Heb. ix. 14. 1 Tim. i. 5. Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27. It must be influenced by gospel-motives: the redeeming love of Christ shed abroad in the heart, and impressing it: the authority of God, as our God in Christ, manifested in the law, as a rule of duty; the example of Christ, and of God in him, as our Father and Friend; and the well-grounded hope of eternal life, as the free gift of God through Christ. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15. 1 John iv. 19. 1 Thess. v. 4. Eph. v. 1, 2.

Heb. xii. 2, 3. 1 John iii. 2, 3. 1 Cor. xv. 58. It must be performed in a gospel-manner, in the exercise of faith on Christ, as our righteousness and strength; in the exercise of grateful love to him, as dying for us; and with great humility; as reckoning ourselves infinite debtors to his grace, and after all we do, less than the least of his mercies. 1 Tim. i. 5. Phil. iv. 13. Zech. x. 12. Psal. cxvi. 16. Mic. vi. 8. Luke xvii. 10. It must be performed to a gospel-end, to render us like God our Saviour; to glorify God our Maker and Redeemer; to profit our neighbour, and bring him to God in Christ; and to prepare us for the free and full enjoyment of God in Christ. Luke vi. 27—36. 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20. 1 Pet. iii. 1. Isa. lxiv. 5. This obeying of the truth purifies the heart, as it receives the grace of Jesus into the soul, and tends to weaken pride, malice, and every other indwelling lust. 1 Pet. i. 22.

Obedience is feigned; when what is commanded is done, or professed to be done, not from love to God, or real regard to his authority; but from hope of some temporal reward, or fear of punishment: such is the obedience of hypocrites to Christ; and of David's enemies to him. 2 Sam. xxii. 45. Isa. xxix. 13. Sometimes the mere execution of the will of a superior, is called an obeying him: so wicked men, devils, and seas, and winds, obeyed Christ, when they were made to do what he pleased. Mark i. 27. Luke iv. 36. Exod. xi. 1. and xiii. 31. Not in this manner, but in love, ought children to obey parents, wives their husbands, servants their masters, subjects their magistrates, and people their pastors. Eph. vi. 1, 5. Tit. ii. 5. Rom. xiii. 1. Heb. xiii. 17. Men obey the lusts of indwelling corruption, when they consent to, and practise the evil inclinations of their hearts. Rom. vi. 12.

OBEISANCE; an expression of reverence to a superior, by bowing the body or knee, &c. Gen. xxxvii. 7, 9.

OBJECT; to lay to one's charge; to speak against. Acts xxiv. 19.

OBLATION. See OFFERING.

OBSCURE; that which is dark, or little known; and so obscure darkness may denote a base condition, and everlasting misery. Prov. xx. 20.

OBSCURITY is much the same as darkness, and denotes that which is opposed to the light of knowledge or prosperity, viz. ignorance and distressing calamities. Isa. lix. 9. The blind see out of obscurity, and out of darkness, when their natural sight is miraculously given them, or rather when their ignorant minds are enlightened in the spiritual knowledge of Christ and his truth. Isa. xxix. 18. Light rises in obscurity and darkness, and is made as the noon day, when great ignorance and distress are dispersed, and knowledge, prosperity, and joy, come in their room; or when the saints, amidst their debasement and outward distress, have eminent fellowship with, and joy in their God; and the church flourishes in persecution. Isa. lviii. 10.

OBSERVE; (1.) To take special notice of, to take good heed. Gen. xxxvii. 11. Deut. xi. 32. (2.) To put in practice; thus rules are observed, when one acts up to them. 1 Tim. v. 21. To observe the word, is to take notice from whence and in what degree it blows, in order to refrain from business till it answer our wish. Eccl. xi. 4. To observe times sinfully, is to reckon some days propitiations, and others not so, and to transact or abstain from business accordingly. Deut. xviii. 10, 14. But to observe the ceremonial feasts and their times, was to keep these feasts in their proper season, and according to all the rites and ordinances thereof. Exod. xii. 7. Deut. xvi. 1.

OBSTINATE; so attached to a bad inclination or course, as to regard no reasons to the contrary. Deut. ii. 30. Isa. xlviii. 4.

OBTAIN; (1.) To get possession. Jam. iv. 2. (2.) To receive as the free gift of God. 1 Cor. ix. 24.

OCCUPY; (1.) To labour, do business in merchandise, &c. Ezek. xxvii. 16—27; and hence a trade is called an occupation. Acts xviii. 3. We are to occupy till Christ come; by a steady, laborious course of glorifying God, and edifying our neighbour, and promoting our own salvation, till Christ come to judgment. Luke ix. 13. (2.) To make use of. Exod. xxxviii. 24. To occupy the room of the unlearned, is to be really weak and ignorant. 1 Cor. xv. 16.

OCCASION; (1.) A season, or opportunity. Gen. xliiii. 18. Jer. ii. 24. (2.) A ground or cause; whatever directly or indirectly tempts to a thing. Dent. xxii. 14. An occasion of stumbling, is any thing which tends to make one offend God, and stumble out of his way. 1 John ii. 10. Rom. xiv. 13.

OCCUR; to happen. Occurrent; happening. 1 Kings v. 4.

O'DED; a prophet who remonstrated with the Israelites, who, under Pekah, had slain 120,000 of the Jews, and made 200,000 prisoners, that they had done wickedly in so outrageously slaughtering their brethren, though for their sin they had been delivered into their hand; and that their retaining their captives for slaves would effectually draw the wrath of God upon themselves. Moved by his remonstrances, the princes were persuaded to send home the prisoners in a kindly and affectionate manner. 2 Chron. xxviii. See AHAZ.

ODIOUS; hateful. 1 Chron. xix. 6. Prov. xxx. 23.

ODOUR; (1.) The fragrant scent that flows from spices, herbs, and ointment. John xii. 3. (2.) The spices and ointment that produce this scent. 2 Chron. xvi. 14. Jer. xxxiv. 5. Dan. ii. 46. The prayers and praises of the saints, and their cheerful presents to ministers and fellow-Christians, when in need, are likened to odours, to represent how delightful and acceptable they are to God. Rev. v. 8. Phil. iv. 18. The odours and frankincense of Antichrist, may denote the Popish paternosters, ave-marias, prayers for the dead, &c. which the people hire the clergy to say for them. Rev. xviii. 13.

OF; denotes, (1.) The matter of which a thing is made. 1 Kings xxii. 11. (2.) The cause. Matt. v. 18. (3.) The object. Gal. ii. 16. (4.) The proprietor to which a person or thing belongs, as his properly, possession, or party. 1 Cor. i. 12. and iii. 4. Of God, and by him, and to him, are all things; he made them; by him they are preserved; and to his glory, as their end, is their creation, preservation, and government directed. Rom. xi. 36. Christ could do nothing of himself; i. e. without his Father's will and commission. John v. 19. The saints are of God; are redeemed, regenerated by him, belong to him, and desire to be like him. 1 John iv. 4. They are of faith, as by the belief of God's truth, their state and nature are changed; and by a principle or habit of faith, they are influenced in the tenor of their life. Gal. iii. 9. To them is given of God's Spirit; he dwells in, and excites and directs them. 1 John iv. 13. Wicked men are of the devil; are his children and slaves, and resemble him. John viii. 44. They are of the world, as their affections are sinful and carnal, and they take worldly things to be their portion, worldly men to be their companions, and worldly courses to be their pattern. 1 John iv. 5. They are of the works of the law, as they seek justification and happiness by them. Gal. iii. 10. Satan speaks of himself, i. e. what proceeds from his own corrupt nature. John viii. 44.

OFFEND; to give offence or scandal; (1.) To commit a fault; to break the laws of God or men. James iii. 2. Acts xxv. 8, 11. Rom. iv. 25. (2.) To displease, grieve. Prov. xviii. 19. 1 Sam. xxv. 31. Eccl. x. 4. Matt. xvi. 23. (3.) To induce another to sin, or hinder him from duty. Matt. v. 29, 30. An offence, is whatever causes or occasions sin, or hinders from duty, whether by seduction, or by grief and vexation of mind. Matt. xviii. 7. We cause a brother to offend, when we lead him by our conduct into an improper temper, or evil course. 1 Cor. viii. 13. To offend in Baal, is to break God's law by the worshipping of Baal. Hos. xii. 1, 10. I will not offend any more; through Christ's working for and in me, I will watch and strive against offending of God and men, as I have done. Job xxxiv. 31. To offend the generation of the righteous, is to do whatever tends to grieve their spirits, or lead them into sin. Psal. lxxiii. 15. Sometimes offence is taken, when none is given: so men are offended in, or because of Christ; and he is to them a rock of offence, when they take occasion, from his deep humiliation, or from his doctrines or laws, to shew disregard and contempt of him. Matt. xiii. 57. xi. 6. xv. 12. and xxvi. 31. Isa. viii. 14. If Paul had preached circumcision as necessary to salvation, the offence of the cross had ceased; the doctrine of redemption, through the incarnation and death of the Messiah, at which the Jews took offence, would have been laid aside, and so the Jews' hatred and persecution of him had ceased. Gal. v. 11. and vi. 12. The giving of offence especially to weak Christians, is permitted of God; but dreadful is his sin and punishment, who indulges himself in giving it, even in dubious things, or by things in themselves lawful, but not necessarily required by the divine law. He is guilty of an express breach of the divine law, which no command of earthly sovereigns, no outward hurt or danger, can possibly justify. 1 Cor. x. 32.

In God's account, he sins against Christ, and destroys his brother, for whom Christ died. Rom. xiv. 13, 15, 20, 21. 1 Cor. viii. 9—13. He draws the heavy woe and curse of God upon himself; and it had been better for him that a millstone had been hanged about his neck, and he cast into the depth of the sea. Matt. xviii. 6, 7. How terribly must this woe fall on those professors of Christianity, who, instead of always exercising themselves to keep a conscience void of offence to God and men, (Acts xxiv. 16.) disdain to deny themselves the most trifling gratification, for the sake of any weak brother! When a Christian receives a private offence, he should, in a serious and calm manner, reprove the offender by himself; if he obtain not satisfaction, he ought to reprove him before one or two more; if he can then obtain no satisfaction, he ought to lay it before the church; and if the offender still continue impenitent, and the scandal be plainly sinful, and evidently proved, he is to be excommunicated from the society of church-members: but all dealing with offending brethren should be managed with the utmost meekness, plainness, and tender affection, and with the utmost care to avoid all unnecessary blazing abroad of their fault. Matt. xviii. 15—18. Lev. xix. 17.

OFFERING, OBULATION, chiefly denotes what is given to God. Offerings were in general of two kinds; viz. Gifts, where no life was destroyed; and Sacrifices, in which the life of the thing offered was taken away. Heb. v. 1. The design of all offerings was either to make atonement for sin; to thank God for mercies received; or to procure some new favour: all these pointed out the Redeemer, who, by one offering, for ever perfected them that are sanctified; and his people's surrender of themselves and their services to God through him. Heb. x. 1. Col. ii. 17. Rom. xii. 1. Immediately after the fall, God instructed Adam and Eve to offer sacrifices; and it seems their first clothes were the skins of sacrificed animals. Gen. iii. 21. When Abel was grown up, he, by faith in the divine appointment, and in the promised Messiah, offered, not the milk as some think, but sacrificed the best of his flock; for his oblation is called THY-SIA, i. e. a slain sacrifice. Gen. iv. 4, 10. Heb. xi. 4. When Noah went forth from his ark, he offered an acceptable sacrifice to God. Gen. viii. 20. In different places, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, built altars, and sacrificed to the Lord. Gen. xii. xiii. xxvi. xxviii. xxxiii. &c. Job offered sacrifices for his children and friends. Job i. 5. and xlii. 8. From the injunction of sacrifices to the ancient patriarchs before and after the flood, the custom of sacrificing spread into the world. The very heathens retained the rite, and loaded it with vain ceremonies, but lost the knowledge of its signification. As their natural consciences dictated to them the insufficiency of animal sacrifices to atone for the sins of men, it is not to be wondered at, that the murderous oblation of human sacrifices was so generally instigated by Satan, and practised by them.

Before the Hebrew tabernacle was erected, there was no limitation as to the place of offering sacrifices; and, we may suppose, those offered in faith, were generally consumed by fire from heaven; and most of them seem to have been of the nature of burnt-offerings. The ceremonial law, given by God to Moses, added various distinctions, and rites of oblations. The sacrifices, properly so called, in which animals were slain, and offered to God on an altar by priests of his appointment, were distinguished into Burnt-Offerings, Peace-Offerings, Sin-Offerings, and Trespass-Offerings.

(1.) The burnt-offering consisted of a bullock, a male-lamb, or kid; or, if the offerer was poor, a turtle, or pigeon. The animal destined for sacrifice was led to the east end of the tabernacle or temple; the offerer laid his hands on its head, confessing his guilt, and transferring his desert of death on the animal. The priest then slew the victim on the north side of the brazen altar, and sprinkled its blood round about the altar. The skin was then taken off, and the priest had it for his share. The entrails and legs were washed, and the whole flesh salted, and burnt on the altar with sacred fire. If the offering were a turtle or pigeon, the priest pinched off its head with his nails: the blood was wrung out at the side of the altar, the body freed from the entrails and feathers; and being almost, but not wholly cleft, was burnt on the altar. The priest arrayed himself in common apparel, and carried the ashes and excrements of the bullock, sheep, or goat, and the ashes, feathers, and entrails of the fowl, into a clean place without the camp. Every burnt-offering, except that of the turtle and pigeon, was attended with a meat-offering and drink-offering. The burnt-offering was the chief of all the oblations. Besides those which were voluntary, the law required burnt-offerings on nine stated occasions, viz. at all the daily, weekly, monthly, or annual FEASTS; and in the different occasional cases of consecration of priests, defilement of a Nazarite, or expiration of his vow; and in purification from child-birth, leprosies, issues, &c. Lev. i. ii. 13. vi. 8—13. vii. 8. and xxii. 19—24. Num. xv. 1—16. Exod. xxviii. and xxix. Num. xxviii. and xxix. Lev. xii. and xiv. 15.

Did not this prefigure the Lord Jesus Christ, as brought into the world, having our sins imputed to him, and offered by himself a sweet smelling sacrifice, without spot, to God, to atone, and honour his perfections, and expiate our sin? How willingly he presented himself! How grievously painful his sufferings, in the fire of his Father's wrath! How he expired on the cross, to the north-west of Jerusalem, and hitherto has chiefly extended the virtue of his death to the northern part of the world! How, for us poor criminals, his soul and body were divided asunder; but neither separated from his Godhead! How he, after lying in a clean grave, put off every badge of mortality and guilt! And of what blessed provision for our soul is his sacrifice productive!

(2.) By the peace-offering, the offerer thanked God for mercies received, paid vows, or sought to obtain favours. At the consecration of a priest, (for we reckon this a peace-offering,) and at the expiration of a Nazarite's vow, it was to be a ram. At Pentecost, too, perhaps the two lambs were to be males; but in other cases the offered animals might be either male or female: only here, as in every other oblation, they were required to be without blemish; and their number might be few, or many, as the offerer pleased. Perhaps it was common for almost every Hebrew, who was the head of a family, to offer peace-offerings at the three solemn feasts. After the offerer had laid his hand on this victim, it was killed at the north side of the altar, and its blood sprinkled round about the altar; the fat that covered the rump, and the inwards, and kidneys, and the caul above the liver, was salted, and burnt on the brazen altar above the burnt-offering: the right breast and shoulder, with the cheeks and the maw, being heaved and waved, together with a portion of the attendant meat-offering, were given to the priests, that they and their sons and daughters might feed thereon in any clean place. The rest of the flesh and the rest of the meat-offering, were returned to the offerer, that he and his friends might feast on it. If it was a thank-offering, the flesh was to be eaten that very day: if it was a vow or voluntary offering, it was to be eaten that day and the next; and if aught remained after the appointed time, it was to be burnt with fire. Lev. iii. vii. 11—24. xix. 5—8. and xxiii. 19, 20. Deut. xviii. 8. Did this also represent Jesus, as at once the Son of God, and the seed of the woman, offering himself to pay our debt, procure our peace with God, and lay the foundation of his and our mutual and delightful feasting for ever on his work of redemption? Does not this, and the burnt-offering, teach us cheerfully to devote our whole man to God; to mortify every inward lust, and to be all inflamed with love to our dear Redeemer; and to be early and active in our gratitude, having every sinful delay of duty prevented by the strength of our inward love to him.

(3.) The sin-offering was diversified in its matter, to point out the different degrees of the crime, or to answer the ability of the offerer. For the sin of a priest, or the occasional sin of the whole congregation, or for the Levites at their consecration, it was a bullock. Exod. xxix. 10—14. Lev. iv. 3—21. and xvi. 6. Num. viii. 12. A male kid was the stated sin-offering for the whole nation at their solemn feasts, and for the occasional sins of a ruler. Num. xv. 24. xxviii. 29. and vii. Lev. iv. 22—26. A female kid, or lamb, for the occasional sins of a private person; or, if the man was so poor that he could not afford a female kid, he brought two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering; or, if he could not afford these, he gave a homer of fine flour, without either oil or frankincense. Lev. iv. 28—35. and v. 9—11. A ewe-lamb was the sin-offering for a Nazarite at the expiration of his vow; and for a woman's purification after child-birth; for a leper; and for the breach of a Nazarite's vow; or for a running issue: or, in case of inability to offer a ewe-lamb in the former cases, it was a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons. Num. vi. Lev. xii. xiv. 22. and xv. 14, 15, 20, 30. The animal sin-offering was placed at the brazen altar; the offender transferred his guilt on it, by laying his hand on its head. Except the blood of the priest's bullock, and of the people's goat, which was carried into the sanctuary, the blood of sin-offerings was poured out at the side, or at the bottom of the brazen altar; and the fat being salted, was burnt on the altar to the Lord; the other oblations were the priest's, on the flesh of which he and his sons feasted in the holy place. The very pots in which the flesh was boiled were rendered unclean; and, if of earth, were broken to pieces; but if of metal, were to be rinsed in water. When the blood was carried into the sanctuary, the flesh and skin were carried into the place assigned for the ashes of the burnt-offerings, and there burnt; so the priests had no share at all of their own sin-offerings; and he who burnt the flesh and skin was rendered unclean. As the sin-offerings of fowls had no fat, two were necessary, that the one might be used instead of the fat, in form of a burnt-offering; and the other, after its blood was poured at the altar, might, as the sin-offering, be given to the priest. No blood of a sin-offering was to be carried out of the sacred courts, so much as in a spot on the priest's garment, but was to be washed out before he went forth. If the sin-offering was of meal, a handful of it was burnt on the altar, instead of the fat, and the residue belonged to the priest. Lev. iv—vi. 4.

That the trespass-offering was really different from the sin-offering, is evident in the case of the leper, where both were conjoined. Lev. xiv. 10—20; but it is not easy to state the difference between them. Some think that sin-offerings respected sins of omission; and the trespass-offering sins of commission; others think that the former atoned for sins committed through ignorance of the law, and the latter for sins which one committed through inattention to his conduct. Neither of these agree with the law of Moses. Perhaps Dr. Owen is right in supposing that the trespass-offering related only to some particular cases, not comprised in the general rules for sin-offerings. If one, when required, did not declare the truth against a perjured person, or profane swearer; if he inadvertently defiled himself by touching unclean bodies; or if he swore rashly; a she-lamb, or kid, was to be his trespass-offering, or a pair of turtles or pigeons if he were poor, or a homer of fine flour if he were very poor: but if the trespass was sacrilege, or other dishonesty, he was first to make restitution to the value of what he had unjustly taken, and a fifth part more; and then to offer a ram for his trespass-offering. The leper's trespass-offering was a he-lamb. Except in the case of the leper, the trespass-offering was ordered precisely in the manner of the sin-offering. Lev. 5. Did not both represent the Redeemer, as bearing our sins, and enduring the punishment thereof in dreadful sufferings, that he might remove them from us, as far as the east is from the west?

5. The meat-offerings, and such as follow, were not sacrifices, but gifts. Meat-offerings were always to attend burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and the sin-offering and trespass-offering of the leper; but whether they attended other sin-offerings and trespass-offerings, we can hardly determine. In cases in which the meat-offering was stated, three homers or tenth-deals of fine flour attended the sacrifice of a bullock, two that of a ram, and one that of a lamb or kid. Half a hin of oil attended the three homers, to fry it with; and one third of a hin attended the two homers, and a fourth part attended the one homer. Frankincense was also an ingredient in this offering, and salt was added to it. When meat-offerings were presented by themselves, and voluntary, the quantity was not stated. Sometimes the materials were baked into unleavened cakes, and sometimes were offered unbaked. In thank-offerings, some cakes of unleavened bread were to be offered with it; and to this the two leavened loaves offered at Pentecost, may be reduced; but no leaven was laid on the altar. When a meat-offering was presented, the priest took part of the meal, or of the bread crumbled down; and having poured oil, salt, wine, and frankincense on it, burnt it on the altar, and the priest had the residue for himself and his sons, to be eaten in the sacred court: but a meat-offering for the priests was wholly burnt. The offering of the sheaf or homer of barley at the Passover, and of the loaves at Pentecost, and of the first-fruits of oil, barley, of flour, was akin to the meat-offering; but the suspected wife's offering of a homer of barley, was akin to the meal sin-offering. Did not these meat-offerings represent Jesus as the fruit of the earth, prepared by the Holy Ghost, and by atoning sufferings, and powerful intercession, to be, as Mediator, the eternal delight of ЖЕHOVAH, and the suitable provision of his people in a state of holy fellowship with him? Were they not emblems of the saints, and their holy services presented to, and adopted by God through Christ. Lev. ii. vi. 15—23. and vii. 9, 10, 13, 14. Num. xv. 1—16. and xviii. 9, 10.

(6.) The drink-offering, it appears, was never offered alone, but with the meat-offering. The proportion of wine was to be the same with that of oil. Part of the wine was poured on the meat-offering, which was burnt, and the rest was the priest's; and if the whole meat-offering was burnt, no doubt the wine went along with it. Did not this oblation represent the Holy Ghost, as plentifully poured on our Redeemer, and his people, for their support, under sufferings, and for their endless consolation? Num. xv. 1—16.

(7.) The half shekel of money which every adult Jew was to give, it seems yearly, for the ransom of his soul, to the service of the tabernacle or temple. No man, however rich, was to give more, or, however poor, to give less. Did not this represent Jesus, who laid down his life a ransom, equally necessary for and suited to the case of both poor and rich? Exod. xxx. 12—16. xxxviii. 25—28.

TITHES, FIRST-BORN, FIRSTLINGS, FIRST-FRUIT, CONSECRATED things, and the SACRED OIL, and INCENSE, also pertained to the offered GIFTS. See under these articles.

Sometimes the offerings were complex, as at the FEASTS, FAST of expiation, and purification of LEPERS, consecration of PRIESTS, dedication of TABERNACLE or TEMPLE. (See also BULL.) The heave and wave-offerings were not different in their matter from those already mentioned, but were so called because they were heaved or lifted up toward heaven, and waved toward the four quarters of the world, as a token they belonged to Him whose throne is in Heaven, and is Creator and governor of all the ends of the earth. The Levites at their consecration, were such an offering; being lifted up or chosen from among the congregation, and perhaps walking to and fro towards every quarter. The fat, kidneys, caul, breast, and right shoulder of the priest's consecration-offering, together with a loaf and wafer of unleavened bread, and a cake of oiled bread, were heaved and waved, and all burnt on the altar, except the breast. Lev. viii. 11—19. Exod. xxix. 22—26. The breast, right shoulder, and perhaps the fat of all peace-offerings, and leavened cake of the thank-offerings, Lev. vii. 13, 14, 30. and x. 15; the leper's trespass-offering, with its log of oil, Lev. xiv. 12, 14; the jealousy-offering, Num. vi. 20; the sheaf or homer of ripe ears. Lev. xxiii. 15; the two lambs of Pentecost, with their attendant peace-offering, Lev. xxiii. 19, 20; the oblation of dough, Num. xv. 19, 21; the tithes of the Levites and priests, Num. xviii. 24, 28, 30; the Lord's tribute of the spoil of Midian, Num. xxxi. 29, 41; were waved, and, it appears, also heaved. Did this heaving and waving of their oblations represent the solemn dedication of Jesus and his people to the spiritual and universal service of God?

God never required these oblations as good in themselves, nor as effectual for the real atonement or purgation of sin: he never required them, as equally necessary with moral duties; nor did he regard them at all, when offered in a wicked manner; and after the death of Christ, the great Sacrifice, he detested them. Psal. xl. 6. and li. 16. Jer. vii. 22. 1 Sam. x. 15, 22. Hos. vi. 6. Psal. lxi. 30, 31. and i. 9—14. Isa. i. 11—13. and lxvi. 3. Sacrifices of righteousness, are either such as are justly gotten, or spiritual sacrifices of one's self, prayers, and holy services. Psal. iv. 5. and li. 19. The oblation sacrifice, and pure offering of righteousness offered by the Egyptians, and others under the New Testament, is their dedication of themselves, and their broken hearts, prayers, praises, and holy services, and alms, presented to God through Jesus as their altar, for the advancement of his honour and glory, Mal. i. 11. Psal. li. 17. Rom. xii. 1. and xv. 16. Heb. xiii. 16; and they are salted with fiery troubles, and bitter repentance, Mark ix. 49; or the decent maintenance of ministers. Ezek. xlii. 30. The damned in hell are represented as sacrifices salted in the fire of God's wrath, for ever tormented for the satisfaction of his justice, and punishment of their sins. Mark ix. 49.

OFFICE; (1.) A relation to any particular kind of work, by which one has a standing title to perform it, as he has opportunity. Psal. cix. 11. (2.) The work pertaining to an office. Exod. i. 16. (3.) The place where men employ themselves together in their work. 2 Chron. xxiv. 21.

OFFICER; one who has an office under Christ in the church, or under the king, or other rulers in the state. 2 Chron. xix. 11. Esth. ix. 3. John vii. 32, 45. Exod. v. 6, 10, 15.

OFFSCOURING; (1.) The most baes, the refuse and dross. Lam. iii. 45. (2.) One who, on account of his villainess, is appointed to ruin, for the sake of others. 1 Cor. iv. 13.

OFFSPRING; (1.) Crop; product of the earth. Job. xxxi. 8. (2.) POSTERITY, children, grandchildren, &c. Job xxxi. 8. Isa. xlviii. 49. In respect of his manhood, Christ is the offspring and descendant of David. Rev. xxi. 16. We are God's offspring; in respect of our natural and spiritual existence, we are produced by the agency of his power, wisdom, and goodness. Acts xvii. 28.

OG, the king of Bashan was one of the GIANTS. His bedstead was of iron, and was nine cubits long and four broad, which, according to our reckoning, is sixteen feet and nearly five inches long, and seven feet, and more than three inches broad; but Calmet makes it only fifteen feet and four inches long, and six feet and ten inches broad. Wolfius represents Og to have been more than thirteen feet high. To relate the rabbinical fables of his living before the flood, hanging on the side of the ark, and receiving food from Noah during the time of it, is unworthy of this work: but it is certain, that when he heard of the overthrow of Sihon by Moses, he collected all his subjects able to bear arms, to attack the Hebrews at Edrei. His host was routed, himself killed, and his country seized: but, the Ammonites some time after carried off his iron bedstead, and kept it in Rabbath, their capital, as a curiosity. Num. xxi. Deut. iii. 1—14. Psal. cxv. 20, 21, 23—25.

OIL; ointment; is now extracted from the fat of fishes, from linseed, and a multitude of other materials. There is no doubt but it may be extracted from almost every kind of vegetable, mineral, or animal. The most ancient kind of oil, is that extracted from olives. Oil is easily inflammable, burns fiercely, and is hurtful to the growth of many vegetables; but very beneficial to mankind, for seasoning of food, for benefitting stiff limbs, healing of wounds, embalming dead bodies, purifying of virgins, and rendering comely the countenance; for making friendship by presents, and for anointing one set apart to the office of prophet, priest, or king. Oil was exceedingly plenteous in the country of Job; hence we read of riers of it. Job xxix. 6. It was no less plentiful in Canaan, particularly in the lot of Asher: they sucked oil out of the fenny rock; obtained it from olives planted on rocks, and, as it were, dipped their feet in the plenty of it. Deut. xxxii. 13. and xxxiii. 24. The Hebrews used common oil in their meat-offerings, in their sacred lamps, and in their common use; but there was an ointment very precious and sacred, compounded of oil-olive, sweet cinnamon, calamus, cassia, and pure myrrh. It contained twice as much of the cassia and myrrh, as of the cinnamon and calamus. This was used in the anointing of the priests, and the tabernacle and furniture. None of it was to be applied to any other use; nor was any for common use to be made like to it. Did not this represent the Holy Ghost's precious and diversified operations and graces, by which Jesus and his people, and none other, are anointed to the service of God. Exod. xxx. 22—23. Sol. Song i. 3. and iv. 10. Persons receive the oil of joy for mourning, when, by the comforting gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost, their hearts are healed, purified, invigorated, and honoured, Isa. lxi. 3; but Jesus is anointed with the oil of gladness above them; having an unmeasurable fulness of the graces and comforts of the Holy Ghost, Psal. xlv. 7.; and his name, character, office, and works, are like ointment poured forth, most healing, refreshing, invigorating and adorning to our soul. Sol. Song i. 3. The golden oil emptied out of the two olive trees which stand before the Lord, is not so much intended to represent the comfort arising to the Hebrews, from the government of Zerubbabel and Joshua, or of Ezra and Nehemiah; as the gracious endowments of the saints, proceeding from the Redeemer's two natures, or the execution of his prophetic and kingly office on and in them. Zech. iv. 12; this poured into their wounds, heals them. Luke x. 34. The oil which true saints have in their lamps, is real grace, which abides in them, and makes them shine as lights in the world. Matt. xxv. 4. Prosperity, spiritual or temporal, is likened to oil; it comforts, invigorates, and renders men noted and useful. Psal. xxiii. 5. Christian reproof is like oil; it tends to heal spiritual diseases, restores the character, and renders men who regard it, honoured and agreeable. Psal. cxli. 5. Unity among brethren is like ointment; it procures delight, honour, cheerfulness, and activity, to all concerned. Psal. cxxxiii. 2. God made the river of Egypt run like oil, i. e. very slowly, as in mourning, and when it was so dried up that it did not fructify the country. Ezek. xxxii. 14. The Hebrews went to the king with ointments, and increased their perfumes; they dressed out their affairs as well as they could, and sent presents to the kings of Assyria or Egypt, to procure their friendship and assistance. Isa. lvii. 9. Hos. xii. 1. Antichrist's ointments, are the chrism the Papists use in baptism, or their pretending to anoint kings. Rev. xviii. 13. A contentious wife is like ointment in her husband's right hand; she will quickly discover her naughtiness, let her husband do what he can to conceal it. Prov. xxvii. 16.

OLD; (1.) Far gone in years. Gen. xviii. 11. (2.) First, or before the present time. Deut. ii. 20. (3.) In a decaying condition. Isa. i. 9. The covenant of works, and the Jewish dispensation, are called old, as the one was in execution before the covenant of grace, and the other took place before the gospel dispensation. Heb. viii. 13. Satan is old; has long existed, and is much experienced and crafty in doing mischief. Rev. xii. 9. Indwelling sin is old; is in the heart before grace, and is subtle and crafty; and, in the saints is in decaying condition. Rom. vi. 6; and in the oldness of the letter, is according to the principles of corrupt nature, and in a mere external performance of ceremonial and other duties. Rom. vii. 6. Even unto old age, I am he: when you shall become weak, peevish, poor, and despised, I will continue to you such a God and Saviour as ye have experienced me, and what I have promised, and ye have hoped and wish I would be. Isa. xli. 4.

OLIVES; trees full of fat substance, which produces plenty of oil. Tournefort mentions eighteen kinds of olives; but in the scripture we only read of the cultivated and wild olive. The cultivated olive is of a moderate height, and thrives best in a warm soil. Its trunk is knotty; its bark smooth, and of an ash colour; its wood is solid, and yellowish; its leaves are oblong, and almost like those of the willow, of a dark green colour on the upper side, and whitish below. In the month of June it puts forth white flowers, growing in bunches, each of one piece, and widening toward the top, and dividing into four parts. After this flower, succeeds the fruit, which is oblong and plump. It is first green, then pale, and when quite ripe, becomes black. Within it is enclosed a hard stone, filled with oblong seeds. The wild olives were of a less kind. Canaan much abounded with olives. Deut. xxviii. 40. vi. 11. and viii. 8. Almost every land proprietor, whether king, or subject, had his olive-yards. 1 Chron. xxvii. 28. 1 Sam. viii. 14. Neh. v. 11. As olives were emblems of peace, the olive-leaf brought to Noah by his dove might mark God's being reconciled to men, and the intimation thereof by the Holy Ghost. Gen. viii. 11. To figure out Jesus as the peaceful means of our access to God, and supporter of the church, the door, and posts of the entrance to the holy of holies, and the posts of the door of the temple, were of olive-wood: and to mark the peaceful illuminating ministration of angels and ministers to the church, Solomon made his two large cherubim for covering the ark, of olive-trees. 1 Kings vi. 23, 31, 33. The two anointed olive-trees before the Lord, may denote Jesus in his two natures, or in his offices of Prophet and Priest, or him and his Spirit. Zech. iv. 3, 12, 14. Saints and ministers are like olive-trees: How full of gracious sap! How they thrive under the nourishing influence of Jesus' love! How constant their flourishing state of grace! How sure a token of God's reconciliation to men! And how useful for the enlightening, beautifying, softening, and healing of others! Judg. ix. 8, 9. Psal. lli. 8. Rev. xi. 4. The Jews are likened to green, flourishing, cultivated olives: How beautiful and prosperous their condition under the smiles of Providence! And what glory to God, and good to men, they might have promoted, had they improved their privileges! Jer. xi. 16. Hos. xiv. 6. The gentiles were wild olives, grafted upon the root of a cultivated olive-tree, while the natural branches were broken off: being the Jews rejected from the church, they, who had for many ages been wicked and useless, were brought into it, partook of the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and were edified by the doctrines of the Jewish prophets and apostles. Rom. xi. 17, 24.

Wicked men are like olives, which cast their leaves before their season, and so bear no fruit; their apparent piety, and their prosperity come quickly to an end. Job xv. 32. Children are like olive-plants about their parents' table: How quick their growth! How delightful and fresh their beauty! And what an extensive prospect of their usefulness! Psal. cxxviii. 3.

OLI-VET, or MOUNT OF OLIVES, about two hundred and fifty-six paces east of Jerusalem, and separated from it by the valley of Jehoshaphat and brook Kidron. It had three tops; the most northern was the highest, and, as it were, hung over the city, and, it is said, was called Galilee. The southern top, which was called the Mount of Corruption, because of Solomon's idolatrous temple built upon it, was the lowest; and it is said our Saviour ascended to heaven from the middle top. Luke xix. 40—44. Matt. xxiv. 3. Acts i. 12. From the Mount of Olives, the Hebrews were furnished with olive branches at the feast of tabernacles. Neh. viii. 15. In the time of king Uzziah, an earthquake rent this mount, and rolled the one half of it to about half a mile westward upon the high way, and royal gardens: but its removing half towards the south, and half towards the north, may signify the marvellous removal of all impediments of the gospel; and the apostles, after receiving their commission in Mount Olivet, separating into the different quarters of the world; or, perhaps, some such event may take place at the Turkish siege of the city, in the beginning of the millennium. Zech. xiv. 4. At present, travellers are shown in this mount a great many arched vaults, or grottos, under ground, which are pretended to have been the sepulchres of the prophets, or the cells of the apostles.

OMNIPOTENT. See ALMIGHTY.

OMER; the tenth part of an ephah, containing 17½ solid inches. Exod. xvi. 36.

OMRI was general of the forces to Elah king of Israel. Being informed, as he besieged Gibbethon, that Zimri had murdered his master, and his whole family, and had usurped the throne at Tirzah, he hastened thither, and laid siege to the place. When Zimri found himself unable to defend the city against Omri, he, in the seventh day of his reign, burnt the palace with himself and his family. For about four years there ensued a civil war between Omri and Tibni the son of Ginath. At last, Tibni being dead, Omri obtained the throne, and reigned about eight years alone, and twelve in all. Having purchased a hill from one Shemir, he built a fine city thereon, called it Samaria, and made it the capital of his kingdom. He was more wicked than Jeroboam, or any of his predecessors. He enacted a number of idolatrous laws, which were but too well observed many ages afterward. He died at Samaria, A. M. 3086, and was succeeded by Ahab. 1 Kings xvi. 15—29. Mic. vi. 16.

ON. See AVEN; KORAH.

ON'AN. See JUDAH.

ONCE; not once or twice, or once, you twice; i. e. frequently. 2 Kings vi. 10. Job xxxiii. 14. God's speaking once, you twice, may signify his declaring of his nature and will in the works of creation and providence, and in the revelation of his word. Psal. lxii. 11.

ONE; (1.) One only, besides which there is none other of the kind; so God is one, and Christ is the one Mediator, and Master: but in the phrase God is one, it may denote one of the parties to be reconciled. 1 Tim. ii. 5. Eccl. xii. 11. Gal. iii. 20. (2.) The same, either in substance: so the divine persons are one. 1 John v. 7. John x. 30; or in number; thus all the world had one language after the flood. Gen. xi. 1; or in kind; thus one plague was on the Philistines and their lords, 1 Sam. vi. 4; or in office: so Paul that planted the churches, and Apollos that watered them, were one in their general office and aim as ministers of Christ. 1 Cor. iii. 8. (3.) United together; so Christ and his people are one; they are one by his representing them in the covenant of grace, and are united to him by his Spirit dwelling in them, and by their faith and love to him, their intimate fellowship with him, and their likeness to him:—and they are one among themselves. They are all members of his one mystical body, have one Lord, one Spirit, one faith, one baptism, one hope; love one another, possess the same privileges, have the same kind of views, aims, and works, John xvii. 21, 23. Rom. xii. 5. Eph. iv. 3–6; and they are of one heart, and mind, and mouth, when they ardently love one another as Christians, and have much the same views of divine truth, and much the same profession and manner of speech. Acts iv. 32. Rom. xv. 6. God made but one woman, though having the residue of the Spirit, he had power to create multitudes, that he might seek a godly seed, have children regularly produced, and religiously educated. Mal. ii. 15. To have one lot, and one purse, is to be joined in the closest fellowship. Prov. i. 14.

O-NE-SI-MUS. See PHILEMON.

O-NE-SIPHON-RUS; a native of Asia, perhaps of Ephesus. There he was extremely kind to the apostle Paul. Coming to Rome, when Paul was in prison, he sought him out, and to the utmost of his power, comforted and assisted him. Paul begs that the Lord would graciously reward him and his family at the last day. 2 Tim. i. 16–18.

ONION; a well known root, of which Tournefort mentions thirteen kinds, and to which what we call leeks are reducible. The Strasburg, the red, the Spanish, and the white onion, are propagated chiefly for their bulbous root. If eaten in moderation, they are very useful to thin the blood, cleanse the stomach, excite appetite, &c.; but if they are too largely eaten, they breed windy disorders, affect the head, and disturb the sleep. Onions, whether boiled, roasted, or raw, are excellent for ripening boils. Onions macerated in the spirit of wine, are good for the head-ach. The juice of onions, mixed with the spirit of wine, is said to cure deafness. The Hebrews and other poor people in Egypt, lived much on leeks and onions. Num. xi. 5.

O-NY'CHA. Jarchi, the Jewish interpreter, thinks it the root of a certain pice; others think it the same as landasum; and others think it bellium. Perhaps it was rather the shell of the onyx fish, which is very odoriferous, and is a principal ingredient in the Indian perfumes, as aloes are in their pills. The best onyx fish were caught in the Red sea, from whence Moses might easily obtain what onycha was necessary for his sacred incense, or perfume. Exod. xxx. 34.

O'NYX; a precious stone, somewhat like a human nail, and which is thought by modern naturalists to be a kind of agate. It seems transparent, and has belt and veins of a different colour; perhaps it is a kind of crystal mingled with earth. We know of five kinds of it, (1.) The bluish white, with broad white streaks around it; this is very common in the East Indies, and is found in New Spain, Germany, and Italy. (2.) The onyx of a bluish white, with snow-white veins scattered through it. (3.) The onyx with red veins, called the sardonyx, as if it were a mixture of the sardius and onyx. It was the fifth foundation of the New Jerusalem, and might represent Jesus, as white and ruddy, the chief among ten thousand. Rev. xxi. 20. (4.) The onyx similar to the jasper. (5.) The brown onyx with bluish white veins around it. The first of these kinds was the onyx of the ancients; but whether the שׁוֹהַם of the Hebrews signify that, or the emerald, we can hardly determine. It is certain, there was plenty of shoham in the land of Havilah; and Pliny says, there were quarries of onyx-marble in Arabia. Gen. ii. 12. It was the eleventh stone in the high-priest's breast-plate. Exod. xxviii. 20.

OPEN; what every one has access to enter into, or to behold. Nah. iii. 13. Gen. i. 20. To OPEN, is, (1.) To set open a door, that any body may enter in, or go out. Acts xvi. 26. (2.) To uncover; render visible or manifest. Exod. xxi. 23. (3.) To declare, unfold, explain. Luke xxiv. 32. (4.) To cause to bring forth. Isa. xli. 18. God's eyes and ears being open, denotes his exact observation of men's conduct, his regard to his people's case, and his readiness to answer their prayers. Neh. i. 6. Jer. xxxii. 19. 1 Pet. iii. 12. His hands and treasures are opened, when, by his power and goodness, he liberally confers his favours on his creatures. Psal. civ. 26. Dent. xxviii. 12. God opens his armoury, when, in his providence, he raises armies, and furnishes them with weapons of war, to execute his just wrath on sinners. Jer. i. 25. He opens his lips against men, when, by his word and providence, he, in a plain and powerful manner, convinces them of their guilt. Job xi. 5. He opens the hearts, when he enlightens the eyes of the understanding to discern revealed truths, and thereby determines the will to receive Jesus and his salvation into the soul. Luke xxiv. 32, 45. Acts xxvi. 18. and xvi. 14. His opening, boring, and digging of Christ's ears, may denote his taking him for a perpetual servant, and furnishing him with an obedient manhood. Psal. xl. 6. He opens men's ears, when he renders them attentive to his word and providence. Job xxxvi. 10, 15. He opens their lips, when he gives them encouragement to pray, and reason to praise him; and by his Spirit gives a holy freedom in these exercises. Psal. li. 15. God opens to men, when he grants them his presence and blessings. Matt. vii. 7. He opened the side of Moab, when he gave the enemy an easy entrance into their countries or cities. Ezek. xxv. 9. In this sense, too, the gates of Assyria, and of Nineveh, and Babylon, are said to be opened by him. Nah. iii. 13. and ii. 6. Isa. xlv. 1. Christ opens, and none shuts, and shuts, and none opens; he bestows the gospel, saving grace, or other privileges, or withholds them, as he pleases. Rev. iii. 7. Men open, or reveal their cause to God, when they, by the prayer of faith, represent it to him, and commit it to him to redress their wrongs. Jer. xi. 20. and xx. 12. To open prisons, is to dismiss prisoners to their liberty: this the Chaldeans did not, but retained them in bonds till they died. Isa. lxi. 1. and xiv. 17. Men's opening their doors to travellers, imports their cheerful inviting of strangers to entertainment and lodging. Job xxxi. 32. Their opening their hearts, gates, or doors, to Christ, imports their ready reception of him by faith and love. Sol. Song v. 2, 6. Rev. iii. 20. Psal. xxiv. 8—10. Heaven, the temple, or tabernacle, or the church of God, is open, before the rise, and after the ruin of Antichrist, where there is free access to gospel-worship, when gospel mysteries are clearly explained and understood, and when God's providences in her favour are clear and manifest. Rev. iv. 1. xi. 12. xv. 5. and xix. 11. Perhaps this is the open door set before the Philadelphian church. Rev. iii. 8. Under the gospel, men with open face behold the glory of the Lord; they see divine truths clearly, and stripped of ceremonial veils, even as the sight of any thing in a glass is much more distinct and clear than to see them only by their shadows. 2 Cor. iii. 18. Perhaps instead of having his eyes open, we should rather read, having his eyes shut. Num. xxiv. 2, 15.

OPERATION; work.

O'PHEL; a wall and tower of Jerusalem, which seems to have been near the temple, and is rendered strong-hold. Mic. iv. 8. King Jotham erected several structures on the wall of Ophel: Manasseh built a well to the west of Jerusalem, and the fountain of Gihon beyond the city of David, from the fish-gate as far as Ophel. After the captivity, the Nethinims, that they might be near their temple service, dwelt at Ophel. From these circumstances it may be inferred that it was about the south-east corner of Jerusalem. 2 Chron. xxvii. 8. and xxxiii. 14. Neh. iii. 26. and xi. 21.

O'PHIR, the son of Joktan. Whether he gave name to the country so famous for gold, or where that country was, we can hardly determine. It is certain that its gold was renowned in the time of Job, Job xxii. 24. and xxviii. 16; and that from the time of David to the time of Jehoshaphat, the Hebrews traded with it; and that Uzziah revived this trade: when he made himself master of Elath, a noted port on the Red sea. In Solomon's time, the Hebrew fleet took up three years in their voyage to Ophir, and brought home gold, apes, peacocks, spices, ivory, ebony, and almug-trees.

1 Kings ix. 28. x. 11. and xxii. 48. 2 Chron. xxvi. viii. 18. and ix. 10. Some have placed it at Urphe, an island in the Red sea; others, justly reckoning this too near, have placed it at Sophala, or in Zanguebar, on the south-east of Africa; others have placed it about Guinea, on the west of Africa; and some at Carthage, on the north of Africa; others have still more fancifully removed it to Peru, or some other place in America. Leland and Calmet place it in Armenia, where Ptolemy mentions Oupara or Sophara: but to what purpose the Jews should carry on a trade with Armenia by the circuitous route of the Red Sea, cannot be conceived; nor can it be supposed that ships fit for coursing around Arabia, could have sailed up the Tigris, or Euphrates. Some will have Ophir to have been situated in the East Indies, either on the west, near Goa, or at the south-east part, or at Malabar. Bochart with great industry, labours to fix it at Taprobane, or Ceylon, an East Indian isle. Perhaps there was an Ophir in the south or east of Arabia Felix, whose fine gold was known to Job and David; and another more distant place in the East Indies, in Malacca or Ceylon, whether Solomon's mariners carried their trade, and called it Ophir, because they found gold in it as good as that of Arabia: or if there was no other than that in Arabia, the East Indians must have brought thither their apes, &c.

OPPORTUNITY; (1.) A fit time. Matt. xxvi. 16. (2.) Fit circumstances. Phil. iv. 10.

OPPOSE; RESIST; to strive by word or deed against a person or thing. Men oppose themselves, when they hold opinions, and follow courses contrary to their own profession, or contrary to the scriptures, which they acknowledge their only standard and rule of faith and practice. 2 Tim. ii. 25. Antichrist opposeth all that is called God; sets up himself against or above the bethen gods; nay, the angels and magistrates; nay, Jesus Christ and his Father, by enacting contrary laws, offices, &c. 2 Thess. ii. 4. Oppositions of science falsely so called, are the terroneous principles of the heathen philosophy; as that a virgin could not possibly conceive a son; or the dead be raised; or the vain notions by which the Gnostics, under pretence of great knowledge, opposed the simplicity of the gospel. 1 Tim. vi. 20. God resisteth the proud, by baffling their purposes and endeavours, disappointing their hopes, and punishing their wickedness. James iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 5. Satan resists men, when he accuses them to God, and by harassing and tempting them, hinders them from doing good. Zech. iii. 1. Good men resist not their wicked persecutors, by outrageous fighting against them, and rendering evil for evil, James v. 6. Matt. v. 39; but they resist unto blood, striving against sin, choosing rather to lose their lives, than yield to any wicked law or custom. Heb. xii. 4. They resist Satan by watching, praying, and striving against his temptations. James iv. 7. 1 Pet. v. 9. Wicked men resist the Holy Ghost, when they oppose his convictions, and contemn his miraculous operations. Acts vi. 10. and vii. 51. They resist the truth, when they dispute against it, and act contrary to it. 2 Tim. iii. 8. They resist magistrates, when they rebel against their persons or authority, and disobey or condemn their laws. Rom. xiii. 2.

OPPRESS. Men oppress one another, when they fraudulently, or by force, take their property from them. Lev. xxv. 14. Mal. iii. 5. Job xx. 19. 1 Thess. iv. 6; or when they grievously harass and enslave them. Deut. xxvii. 29. Exod. iii. 9. Satan oppresseth men, when by temptation or possession, he terribly torments them. Acts x. 38.

ORACLE; (1.) A divine declaration of God's will; and by this name the whole of his inspired revelations are called. 1 Sam. xvi. 23. 1 Pet. iv. 11. (2.) The holy of holies, from whence God uttered his ceremonial laws to the Hebrew nation in the time of Moses, and declared his mind on other occasions. Exod. xxv. 22. 1 Kings vi. 16. and viii. 6. Psal. xxviii. 2. God uttered his oracles in various manners. (1.) Sometimes by a voice, and conversing with the person informed: thus he spake to Moses and to Samuel, as a man to his friend. (2.) By prophetic dreams, as of Joseph, Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, &c. (3.) By visions, in which his declaration of his mind was attended with some apparition, as to Abraham, Jacob, Solomon. (4.) By the Urim and Thummin, by means of which the high-priest was infallibly qualified to declare the will of God. This was a common method from the death of Moses, till after the building of Solomon's temple. (5.) By prophets, to whom, either by dreams, visions, voices, or inspiration, he, in an infallible manner, communicated the knowledge of his will. On some particular occasions he made wicked men, as Balaam, Caiaphas, and the false prophets of Bethel, the channels of communicating his mind. (6.) By his Son appearing in our nature, and preaching in Canaan. (7.) By inspiring his apostles and evangelists with the knowledge of his mind, and by them communicating it to others. Heb. i. 1. and ii. 3, 4.

The Jewish oracle of Bathcol, or daughter of the voice, which they boast to have had after the death of Malachi, seems to have been a mere fancy, similar to that wicked practice which some have of taking the first verse of the Bible they look upon at opening, to be suited to their case. The heathen oracles were partly the illusions of Satan; he, in the likeness of Samuel predicted, that on the morrow, Saul and his sons should be with him, 1 Sam. xxviii; and inspired Ahab's prophets to promise him victory at Ramoth-gilead, 1 Kings xxii; but it is likely enough that many of the oracles among the heathens were merely the devices of the villainous priests and priestesses, who generally prophesied as they were paid, and favourable oracles made a man's friends or armies rush through every thing to accomplish them. Boyle, Van Dale, and Fontenelle, have strongly maintained, that all the heathen oracles were but the impostures of men; and the two latter have pretended, that they did not cease by the death of Christ, or spread of the gospel, but by means of people's discontinuing to consult them.

Möbius, a Protestant professor of Leipsic, and Balthus, a learned Jesuit, have attempted a refutation of this opinion. Perhaps the truth is, that the delusive arts of Satan, and the villany of the interested priests, conjoined to produce the effect. Nor can we, with Eusebius, believe, that these oracles entirely ceased at the death of our Saviour, for we find them consulted some ages after; but the spread of the gospel made multitudes condemn them, and the priests were afraid to risk their oracles among such as were willing to discover the cheat. No doubt, Satan was also divinely restrained. Whoever were the authors of these oracles, they were generally delivered in such dark and equivocal expressions as might answer the event, much like the nonsense that passes in our own country, for the prophecies of Merlin, Thomas de Rymer, &c.

ORATION; a fine speech. Acts xii. 21. An ORATOR was one that composed and pronounced fine speeches, like our advocates. Acts xxiv. 1. Where a place was under popular government, as Athens, &c. oratory was much studied, and the orators were often able to bring the populace to what side they pleased. This occasioned their being often the hired tools of those great men who were intent on their selfish designs.

ORCHARD; a fruit-garden. Eccl. ii. 5. The saints are compared to one. Sol. Song iv. 15. See GARDEN.

ORDAIN; the same as APPOINT. ORDINANCES of God are, (1.) His fixed purpose and appointment concerning the state and motions of irrational creatures, whether the luminaries of heaven, &c. Psal. cxix. 91. Job xxxviii. 33. Jer. xxxi. 33. (2.) His commandments in general. Lev. xviii. 4. (3.) His rules and directions relative to his worship. Heb. ix. 10. 1 Cor. xi. 2. (4.) An office appointed by him. Rom. xiii. 2. Forms of magistracy, or their laws for regulating the commonwealth, are called an ordinance of man. 1 Pet. ii. 13. 1 Sam. xxx. 25.

ORDER; (1.) To command. Judg. vi. 26. (2.) To arrange every person or thing in proper order. Prov. iv. 26. The various classes or bands into which the priests and singers were divided, were called their orders. 1 Kings xxiii. 4. God sets men's sins in order before them; he presents them as so many witnesses, or as a well-stated charge against them. Psal. i. 21. Men order their cause before God, and fill their mouth with arguments, when they represent it to him truly as it is, and produce and plead manifold reasons for his shewing them favour. Job xxiii. 4. To walk orderly, or to order one's conversation aright, is to endeavour earnestly to perform every duty relative to God or men, in the proper place, time, and manner thereof. Acts xxi. 24. Psal. i. 23.

ORGAN, a wind instrument of music, invented by Jubal, the sixth in descent from Cain; but perhaps Jubal's was very different from ours, which are composed of various pipes, and some of them are thirty or forty feet long; and whose form is not more than eight hundred years old. Gen. iv. 21. Psal. cli. 4.

ORNAMENT; whatever tends to decorate the clothes or body, as jewels, rings, bracelets, ribands, &c. The Hebrew women, especially their maidens, were extremely fond of them; and in the days of Saul, they became more so than before. Jer. ii. 32. 2 Sam. i. 24. In Isaiah's time, they were sinfully mad upon them. Isa. iii. 16—26. The laws, religion, and prosperity, which God gave the Hebrews, are called excellent ornaments; they rendered their nation distinguished from, and more glorious than others. Ezek. xvi. 7, 11. The Saviour's righteousness imputed, his grace implanted, and a holy conversation springing from both, form an ornament, or ornament of grace, to the saints; how glorious and comely they render them! how high in favour with God, good angels, and men! Isa. lxi. 10. Prov. iv. 9. 1 Pet. iii. 4. Useful instruction, and faithful reproof, are an ornament; they ought to be highly prized, readily received and complied with, and will then render one truly honourable and respected. Prov. i. 9. and xxv. 12.

O-RION; a constellation just before the sign Taurus. It consists of about eighty stars; appears about the middle of November; and its rise is often accompanied with storms, and its bands are the cold and frost, which only God can remove. Job xxxviii. 31. and ix. 9.

OR'NAN. See ARAUNAH.

ORPHANS; persons very early deprived of their parents, and so in a most destitute condition. We are orphans, our mothers are widows; our governors and fathers being almost wholly cut off by the sword. Lam. iii. 5.

OSPREY and OSSIFRAGE. See EAGLE.

OSTRICH; the tallest of all the fowl kind, being seven or eight feet high when it stands erect. Its neck is about four or five spans in length: its legs are long and naked; and has only two toes on a foot, both turned forward; but its wings are short, and rather serve for sails than for flight. Assisted by these, it will outrun the swiftest horse, and will throw stones at its pursuers. Its feathers are handsome and used as ornaments for hats, beds, canopies; they are of different colours, and formed into pretty tufts. It is very foolish, and easily deceived. It is said, that if it can hide its head in a thicket it imagines itself quite safe. If a man put on an ostrich's skin, and hold out fruits or seeds to it, it will receive them, and so be taken. Ostriches make a most doleful and hideous noise, are very careless of their young, lay their eggs in the sand, and leave them there to be hatched by the sun, perhaps forgetting where they were laid. Job xxxix. 13—19. Lam. iv. 3. Its eggs, of which it lays from ten to twenty, or even from thirty to fifty in a course, are so large, that the Ethiopians make drinking cups of the shells. It is said, that though ostriches do not sit on their eggs to hatch them, yet the male and female watch them by turns; and when driven away, they cannot find them out again; and often their young are found half-starved. They chiefly haunt desolate places, Isa. xlii. 21: they were pretty common in Arabia, and mightily abounded in Ethiopia, and are used for food, but their flesh is said to be dry. Some of them are so strong, that the Arabs ride upon their backs. The YAAANAH, rendered ostriches, in Lam. iv. 3. is rendered owls, Lev. xi. 16. Dent. xiv. 15. Job xxx. 29. Isa. xlii. 20; and reckoned among unclean beasts. Owls are also cruel; they eat their own eggs, and even their young.

OTHNIEL, the son of Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah, and first Judge of Israel. By the taking of Debir from the Canaanitish giants, he obtained ACHISAH, the daughter of Caleb his uncle, to wife. Josh. xv. 16—19. When Cushan-rishathaim had oppressed Israel eight years, God stirred up Othniel to collect an army against him. With these he routed the Mesopotamian troops, and delivered Israel; after which the Hebrews' land enjoyed rest forty years, or till the fortieth year of their settlement. Judg. iii. 8—11.

OUCHES; bezails, or sockets, for fastening the precious stones in the shoulder-pieces of the high-priest's ephod. These ouches, with their stones, served for buttons to fasten the golden chains, by which the breast-plate was suspended. Exod. xxviii. 11, 25.

OVEN; a place for baking bread. Lev. ii. 4. Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace, into which he cast Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, seems to have been of this form. Dan. iii. 21—26. God makes his enemies a fiery oven, and his judgments burn as an oven. In how quick and terrible a manner he consumed the Jews after our Saviour's death, as withered grass, in a fiery oven. How dreadful the case of his foes, when the earth, and the works thereof, shall be burnt up! and when they shall be cast into the lake that burns with fire and brimstone! Psal. xxi. 9. Mal. iv. 1. Whorish persons are likened to an oven; by their yielding to temptations and lusts, their souls and bodies are inflamed with unclean desires, and the disorders that proceed from them, as an oven is heated by a continued supply of fuel. Hos. vii. 4—7.

OVER; (1.) On the whole outside. Gen. xxv. 25. (2.) Above. Gen. xxvii. 20. Psal. lxx. 13. (3.) More than measure. Exod. xvi. 18. Psal. xxiii. 5. (4.) From one side or hand, or proprietor to another. Psal. xxvii. 12. and cxviii. 18. (5.) Passed by. Sol. Song ii. 11. (6.) On account of. Hos. x. 5.

OVERCHARGE; to burden too much. Thus excessive sorrow, immoderate eating and drinking, or carnal care, overload men's souls, that they cannot desire or attain heavenly things. 2 Cor. ii. 5. Luke xxi. 34.

OVERFLOW. Liquor overflows in a vessel, when it runs over the brim; rivers overflow, when they swell, and run over their banks. Josh. iii. 15. The inhabitants of the whole world had their foundation overflowed with a flood, when the deluge covered them and their dwellings. Job xxii. 16. Armies and calamities being compared to floods, or waters, are said to overflow, when they bear down all before them. Isa. viii. 8. Jer. xlvii. 2. Dan. xi. 10. Isa. x. 22. xxviii. 15, 17. and xliii. 2. Prosperity, and the truths and blessings of the gospel, being compared to wine, or oil, the fats overflowing therewith, imports great prosperity, and an extensive spread and prevalence of the truth and grace of God in the world. Joel ii. 24. The fats overflowing with the wine of God's wrath, intimates its spread, and the fearful havoc it shall make among nations. Joel iii. 13.

OVERLAY; (1.) To cover. Exod. xxvi. 32. (2.) To cover too closely or heavily. 1 Kings iii. 19.

OVERMUCH. To be overmuch righteous, is to make an uncommon shew of strictness, pretending to more holiness than is possessed; rigorously exacting the extremity of justice; and doing many things under pretence of piety, which God's law does not require.—To be over-wise, is to pretend to great degrees of knowledge; and to be ready to quarrel with the conduct of others, and even of God himself; to attempt knowledge above our reach, and station; this tends to destroy the man, rendering him foppish, stupid, or contemptible.—To be overmuch wicked, is to add sin to sin; to labour to do evil, and to run into riot and wickedness of every sort; this assuredly will bring swift destruction. Eccl. vii. 16, 17.

OVERPASS. Professors of the true religion overpass the deeds of the wicked, when they do worse than heathens and profligates, and judges do so, when they allow themselves to be worse than the criminals they try and condemn at the bar. Jer. v. 28.

OVERPLUS; the difference of value between things exchanged. Lev. xxv. 27.

OVERSEE. (See BISHOP.) OVERSIGHT; (1.) The office of overseeing and taking care that things be rightly done; and the discharge of this office by performing the duties belonging thereto. Num. iii. 52. 1 Pet. v. 2.

OVERSIGHT; A mistake. Gen. xliii. 12.

OVERSHADOW; to cover with a shadow. The cloud from which the Father declared the Saviour to be his well beloved Son, overshadowed the three disciples on the mount. Matt. xvii. 5. To intimate the mysterious and incomprehensible work of the Holy Ghost, in forming our Saviour's manhood in the womb of the virgin, it is called an overshadowing of her. Luke i. 35.

OVERTAKE; (1.) To come up with such as had before gone off. Exod. xv. 9. (2.) To seize upon. Psal. xviii. 37. A man is overtaken in a fault, when temptations successfully attack him, and draw him into some sinful word or deed before he is aware. Gal. vi. 1. The sword overtakes men, when the enemy comes upon them, and they are killed, wounded, taken captives, or otherwise reduced to misery. Jer. xlii. 16. Blessings overtake men, when they are bestowed on them; and justice, evil, or curses, overtake them, when their due and threatened punishment comes upon them. Dent. xxviii. 2, 15. Isa. lix. 9. The day of judgment overtakes men, when, notwithstanding all their unthoughtfulness of it, and their desire and study to escape it, it comes upon them. 1 Thess. v. 4. The battle in Gibeah, did not overtake the children of iniquity: the Hebrews did not attack the Sodomitical Benjamites at Gibeah with a due and holy zeal; nor were they sufficiently careful to cut off similar criminals wherever they were found. Hos. x. 9.

OVERTHROW; turning of things upside down; an utter destruction. Gen. xix. 29.

OVERWHELM; to swallow up as by a drowning flood. Job vi. 27. Psal. cxxiv. 4. The heart or spirit is overwhelmed, when grief, fear, perplexity, and care, so burden and afflict that the man knows not what to do. Psal. lxi. 2, and lxxvii. 8.

OUGHT, imports necessity; thus Christ ought to suffer, that he might fulfil his engagements, and save our souls. Luke xxiv. 26. (2.) Duty; thus men ought always to pray without fainting. Luke xviii. 1. OUGHT, (or AUGHT) also signifies any thing. Gen. xxxix. J.

OUTCASTS; such as are driven from their house and country. The outcasts of Israel and Judah needed shelter and pity in the land of Moab, when they were driven out of their country by the Assyrian ravages. Isa. xvi. 3, 4. The outcasts of the Persians wandered far and wide, when they were carried or driven from their country by the Chaldeans. Jer. xlix. 36. God gathereth the outcasts of Israel; he gathered the Jews after Sennacherib and Esarhaddon had scattered them; he brought them back from their Chaldean captivity; he will bring them from their present dispersion; he gathers the outcast gentiles, and joins them unto his church, with all the true Israel of God. Isa. lvi. 8, and xi. 12.

OUTGOINGS; the outmost borders. Josh. xvii. 9, 18. God makes the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice, when he bestows and renders agreeable the earliest and latest parts of the day; or when he gives heart-cheering blessings to the inhabitants of the remotest eastern and western nations. Psal. lxxv. 8.

OUTLANDISH; pertaining to another country or nation. Neh. xiii. 26.

OWE; (1.) To own, have a right to. Lev. xiv. 35. Acts xxi. 11. (2.) To be indebted. Rom. xiii. 9. Matt. xviii. 28.

OWL; a fowl of the hawk kind. Its beak is hooked; its head and claws are somewhat like those of a cat; its legs are hairy to the very claws; its eyes are black, large, and sparkling; but cannot bear the light of the sun; its voice is very disagreeable and mournful. There are a great many kinds of owls, viz. the small owl, the great owl, the horned owl, &c. The large horned owl, is almost as big as an eagle, and has feathers ash-coloured and whitish; the small horned owl is of a more dun and rusty colour: the small unhorned owl, is about the bulk of a pigeon; the larger one has a crown of fine soft feathers around its whole face, and has no visible ears: its back is of a lead colour, marked with white spots; its breast and belly are whitish, marked with black spots; its body is scarcely larger than a chicken, but its multitude of feathers renders it as large in appearance as a capon. It will swallow, without difficulty, a mouse or bird, and after digesting the flesh, it vomits up the hair and the bones. Owls seldom fly abroad in the day; and if they do, are a grazing-stock to the rest of the birds. They are said to be enemies to the crows, and that the two are mutual destroyers of each other's eggs. They generally haunt desolate places, as ruined cities or houses, Isa. xlii. 21. and xxxiv. 11—15. Jer. i. 39; and make a most doleful and despondent-like mourning. Mic. i. 8. Perhaps YAHHANAH denotes not the owl, but the female ostrich, Job xxx. 29. Isa. xlii. 21. xxxiv. 13. and xliii. 20. Jer. i. 39. Mic. i. 8. Lev. xi. 16. Deut. xiv. 15. with Lam. iv. 3; and the kip-poz, a most poisonous serpent. Isa. xxxiv. 15. Saints become like owls, when, forsaken of God and their friends, they are left to mourn in a forlorn and heartless manner. Job xxx. 29. Psal. cii. 6. Wicked men are like owls; how unsightly to God and good men! how inclined to distance from him and his people! what haters of the Sun of righteousness, and of the light of God's word! and how hurtful to others! Isa. xliii. 20.

OX. See BULL. Where no oxen are, the crib is clean: i. e. there is neither food for men nor beasts. But the words, the crib, &c. might be rendered, there is no wheat or corn on the thrashing-floor. Prov. xiv. 4.

P.

PADAN-ARAM. See MESOPOTAMIA. Perhaps Padan-aram was the north-west part of Mesopotamia.

PACE; a measure of five feet in length; but it appears to signify no more than a step, in 2 Sam. vi. 13.

PADDLE; a small iron instrument for digging holes in the earth. Deut. xxii. 13.

PA'HATH-MO'AB, was, most probably, a city built near the place where Ehud routed the Moabites. Jeshua and Joab were two of its ancient princes; 2812 persons belonging to Pahath-moab, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and 200 more with Ezra. Ezra ii. 6. and viii. 4. Some assert that Pahath-moab is the name of a man; and, it is certain, one of that name sealed Nehemiah's covenant of reformation. Neh. x. 14.

PAIN, or PANG, denotes the uneasiness arising to body or mind from what hurts it. When it is very violent, it is called TORMENT. Job xxxiii. 19. Psal. xxv. 18. and lv. 4. Ezek. xxx. 4. Jer. xxii. 23. Matt. iv. 24. To travail in pain all one's days, is to live in sore trouble, inward disquiet, and terror of mind. Job xv. 20. The wicked man's flesh upon him hath pain; in his dying moments, he is in sore trouble; in the grave, the worms eat him up; in hell, he is for ever tormented. Job xiv. 22. Be in pain, and labour to bring forth; bear thy troubles with patience, hoping for a merciful and joyful deliverance: or, Thou shalt be in sore trouble before the deliverance from Babylon, or the gospel, or the millennial deliverance come. Mic. iv. 10. Pains of death, or hell, are such violent torments as cut off life, or render one most miserable. Acts ii. 24. Psal. cxvi. 3. The terrible calamities of Antichrist, when ruined, and the inconceivable miseries of the damned, are called torment. Rev. xvii. 7, 10. xx. 10. Christ's witnesses torment the carnal Antichristians; they preach the truths which they detest; they practise the good works which they abhor; and are the innocent occasion of God's executing his fearful judgments on them. Rev. xi. 10. The tormentors to whom God delivers the wicked, are the lashes of his wrath, the tortures of an awakened conscience, and malicious and enraged devils and men. Matt. xvlii. 34.

PAINFUL; that which is very difficult, and cannot without great fatigue and pain be effected. Psal. lxxiii. 16.

PAINFULNESS; labour joined with great care and grief. 2 Cor. xi. 27.

PAINT. Women, especially harlots, painted their faces. 2 Kings ix. 30. The Jews painting of their eyes, and redding their faces with powk, or lead ore, may denote their setting off themselves to their neighbouring nations in all the shews of idolatry and false grandeur they could invent. Esek. xliii. 40. Jer. iv. 30.

PALACE; a stately and magnificent house, suitable for kings or princes to dwell in. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19. Amos iii. 9—11. 1 Kings xvi. 18. The Jewish temple is called a palace: it was extremely magnificent and grand; and there the Lord, as King of Israel, dwelt, in the symbols of his presence. 1 Chron. xxix. 1, 19. The New-Testament church is called a palace of silver, to intimate its excellency and duration, as the residence of God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and of the saints, who are made kings and priests unto God; and the fulness of his ordinances and graces therein. Sol. Song vii. 9. Heaven is the palace of God and Christ: How glorious its structure! how rich its furniture! There God, angels, and redeemed men for ever reside. Psal. xlv. 15.

PALE. The face of Jacob wearing pale, imports the shame, contempt, and ruin of his posterity. Isa. xxix. 22. The paleness of John's visionary horse, may denote the inactivity and spiritual deadness of ministers and others in the church, and the great destruction of men, by pestilence, famine, and other calamities, between A. D. 235, and 286.

PALES-TINE. See PHILISTIA.

PALM-TREE; a tree found in most of the countries in the north of Africa, and in the south of Asia, &c. Many palms grew on the banks of Jordan; but the best were those about Jericho and Engedi; the last is for that reason called Hazazon-tamor, the cutting of the palm-tree. Palm-trees grow very tall and upright; and their leaves retain their greenness through the whole year. The more they are exposed to the sun, their growth is the quicker. They produce little fruit till they are thirty years old; after which, while their juice continues, the older they are, they are the more fruitful, and will bear three or four hundred pounds of dates every year; but it is said the female bears no fruit, except it be planted along with the male. The trees produce dates, a most sweet and luscious kind of fruit. They also extract from it a kind of wine, which is perhaps what the scripture call shichar, or strong drink. It likewise yields a kind of honey. As its sap is chiefly in the top, when they intend to extract a liquor from it, they cut off the top, where there is always a tuft of spiraling leaves about four feet long, and scoop the trunk into the shape of a bason. Here the sap ascending, lodges itself, at the rate of three or four English pints a day for the first week or fortnight; after which, it gradually decreases; and in six weeks, or two months, the whole juice will be extracted. As palm-trees were accounted symbols of victory, branches of palm were carried before conquerors in their triumphs; and, in allusion hereto, the saints are said to have palms in their hands, to denote their victory over sin, Satan, the world, the persecutions of Antichrist, &c. Rev. vii. 9. To mark their constant perseverance, heavenly and upright disposition, their necessity of fellowship with Christ, their spiritual comeliness, and fruitfulness in good works, and their certain victory over all enemies, they are compared to palm-trees. Psal. xcii. 12. Sol. Song vii. 7. To represent them in their connection with angels and ministers, there were figures of palm-trees and cherubim alternately mingled in Solomon's temple, and in Ezekiel's visionary one. 1 Kings vi. 29. Ezek. xi. 16. Idols were upright as the palm-tree; they could make no motion, but merely stand like so many erect logs of wood. Jer. x. 5.

PALSY; a common disease, by which the body, or some part of it, loses its power of motion, and sometimes also its feeling. It is occasioned by a hindrance of the nervous spirits from flowing into its villi, or the muscles, or of the arterious blood from flowing into its vessels: which may happen from some disease in the brain, the nerves, the muscles, or their vessels. Anointing the back bone, with spirituous and penetrating medicines; and white mustard, mercury, sudorifics, &c. taken inwardly, and perhaps electricity may be of use when the disease is not fixed; but when it is confirmed, nothing less than a miraculous interposition can relieve the sufferer. Matt. vii. 6. and iv. 4. John v. Acts ix. 13.

PAM-PHYLIA; a province of Lesser Asia, having the Mediterranean sea on the south, Lysia on the west, Pisidia on the north, and Cilicia on the east. Attalia and Perga were the principal cities of it. Many of the Jewish inhabitants of this place heard Peter's sermon at Pentecost, and perhaps first carried the gospel thither. Paul and Barnabas afterwards preached the gospel here; since which, Christianity has never been wholly extinct, though owing to the ravages of the Saracens, it has made but little progress. Acts ii. 10. The country is at present under the Turks, and is of no political importance.

PANT; to grasp for breath, as one dying or over-burdened. It is expressive of extreme grief. Isa. xxi. 4. Psal. xxxviii. 10; or eager desire. Psal. xlii. 1. and cxix. 131. Amos ii. 7.

PANNAG; whether this is the same with Phenicia, or a place near Minnith; or whether it signifies oil, or balsam, is doubtful; but either in Pannag, or in fine wheat of Pannag, the Jews traded with the Tyrians. Esek. xxvii. 17.

PAPER-REEDS; a description of bulrushes that grow in Egypt, along the banks of the Nile. Isa. xix. 7. Of these the Egyptians made baskets, shoes, clothes, and small boats for sailing on the Nile. Exod. ii. 3. Isa. xviii. 2. To make paper of this bulrush, they peeled off the different skins or films, one after another; these they stretched on a table, to the intended length or breadth of the paper, and overlaid them with a thin paste, or the muddy water of the Nile a little warmed: above this they spread a cross layer of other films, or leaves, and then dried it in the sun. The films nearest the heart of the plant, made the finest paper. When Ptolemy king of Egypt denied Attalus, king of Pergamus, this kind of paper for writing his library, he invented, or improved, the making of parchment or paper of skins. After which, books of note were ordinarily written on parchment, for almost 1300 years. The parc ments that Paul left at Troas, and directs Timothy to bring with him, were probably either the original draught of some of his epistles, or a copy of the Old Testament. 2 Tim. iv. 13. Paper manufactured from linen rags has been in use about 600 years.

PAPHOS. There were two cities of this name, about seven miles distant from each other, on the west end of the isle of Cyprus; in both, Venns, the goddess of uncleanness, had a temple. The old Paphos was built by Agapenor, soon after the destruction of Troy. At Paphos Paul preached the gospel, converted Sergius the Roman governor of the island, and struck Elymas the sorcerer blind. Acts xiii. 16. The worship of Venns continued about four hundred years afterwards. Nevertheless, we find here a Christian church about the same time; and Paphos still continues a seat of a bishop of the Greek church.

PARABLE; a figurative representation of truth. It was anciently common for the philosophers to utter their sentiments in parables; but it was reckoned very inconsistent for fools to utter parables. Prov. xxvi. 7. By a parable of the trea choosing a king, Jotham shewed the Shechemites their folly in choosing his bastard brother Abimelech. By a kind of parables or riddles, Samson entertained his companions during his marriage-feasting. Judg. ix. and xiv. By a parable, Nathan conveyed reproof to David for his adultery and murder; and the widow of Tekoah persuaded him to recal Absalom. 2 Sam. xii. and xiv. Not only did the prophets often use parabolic language, representing idolaters and adulterers, &c.; but sometimes added parabolic actions; as when Isaiah walked almost naked and barefoot for three years; Jeremiah hid his girdle by the Euphrates; Ezekiel lay before his iron pan, shaved and divided his hair, carried out his household stuff, &c. Isa. xx. Jer. xiii. Ezek. iv. v. and xii. Many of their visions were also a kind of parables; as Jeremiah's boiling pot, the baskets of figs, &c. Jer. i. and xxiv. In our Saviour's time, the mode of instruction by parables was quite common. He carried it to the height of excellency and usefulness. As parables very often represent truth, as if by a kind of short history; so in them, especially those of our Saviour, there may be often an allusion to real facts, which gives additional interest to the parable. His parable of the travels of the unclean spirit, and of the sower, the tares, the growth of corn, the mustard-seed, the leaven, the hidden treasure, the pearl, the net, the two debtors, the Samaritan, the rich glutton, the servants waiting for their Lord, the barren fig-tree, the lost sheep, the lost piece of silver, the prodigal son, the dishonest steward, Lazarus and the rich man, the unjust judge, the pharisee and publican, the two servants that were debtors, the labourers, the pounds, the two sons, the vineyard let out to husbandmen, the marriage feast, the ten virgins, the talents, the sheep and goats, are drawn from obvious and common things; and yet how exalted the instruction they convey! To understand parables, the following rules must be attended to. (1.) It is not necessary that the representation of natural things in a parable should be strictly matter of fact: because the design is not to inform concerning these, but concerning some more momentous truth; nor is it necessary that all the actions in a parable be strictly just. 2 Sam. xiv. Luke xvi. 1-8. (2.) We must chiefly attend to the scope of the parable, which is to be gathered from the inspired explication of it, or from the introduction to it, or from the conclusion of it. (3.) Hence it follows, that we are not to expect that every circumstance in the parable should be illustrated in the explication; for several circumstances may be added for the sake of decorum, or mere allusion to that whence the figure of the parable is taken. (4.) Yet a parable may inform us of several truths, besides the scope of it.

PARA-DISE, or the GARDEN of EDEN. Its local situation has never been satisfactorily fixed. The opinion of those who place it in Syria, near the head of the Jordan, or rather farther south; and those who place it in Armenia, whence flow the rivers of Euphrates and Hiddekel, which run south, and of Araxes, which runs east, are merely conjectures. The first of these has no marks of the Mosaic paradise at all; no four rivers; no river parted into four heads. Nor indeed is that which fixes it in Armenia better founded; the springs of Euphrates, Tigris, and Araxes, are too distant to be said to proceed out of the same garden; and the Phasis, which they call Pison, has its head much more distant, in the mountain Caucasus. We suppose that Paradise stood in Eden in Chaldaea, at the conflux of the Tigris, or Hiddekel, and the Euphrates, or a little below it. Here we find two of Moses' rivers by name; and lower down the stream is parted into two large divisions, the eastern one of which may have been the Gihon, and the western the Pison. It may be proper to observe, that when some of these rivers are said to compass such lands, the word may be rendered runs along, i. e. along the side: and Hiddekel went not to the east of Assyria, but ran from Assyria eastward, or ran before Assyria, that is between Moses and Assyria. Gen. ii. 11-14. It is probable that the heathen derived their fancy of fortunate islands, and Elysian fields, and drew their tastes for gardens of perfumes, from the ancient paradise. Heaven is called a paradise, because of the complete happiness, manifold delights, and intimate fellowship with God, that are there enjoyed. Luke xxiii. 44. 2 Cor. xii. 4. Rev. ii. 7.

PARAMOURS; illicit lovers. The heathen nations, on whom the Jews depended for relief, instead of their God, and whose idolatries they followed, are called their paramours. Ezek. xxiii. 20.

PARAN, or EL-PARAN; a track of country in Arabia the Stony, between the south of Canaan, and the eastern gulph of the Red sea; or rather it extended, when taken at large, as far as Sinai. Deut. xxxiii. 2. Hab. iii. 3. It is said that the part of it next mount Sinai abounded with bushes: but on the whole, it was, and still is, a fruitful desert. It is said the houses in it were generally holes dug in the earth: but there was a city called Paran in it, whence Hadad took his guides to conduct him to Egypt. 1 Kings xi. 18. Dr. Shaw computes its extent from Kadesh-barnea, on the north to Sinai, to be about one hundred and ten miles; but it seems to have extended to the north-east of Kadesh, as David lurked in it when he was near Moab and South Carmel, 1 Sam. xxv. 2; and perhaps it was this part of it that Chedorlaomer ravaged, before he attacked the Sodomites. Gen. xiv. 6. In the wilderness of Paran, to the south-west of Beer-sheba, Ishmael, and his mother Hagar, took up their residence, Gen. xxi. 21; and from hence the Ishmaelites dispersed themselves into the regions round about. There seems to have been another place called Paran, on the east of Jordan. Deut. i. 1.

PARCHED; exceedingly dried; so parched ground is land burnt up with excessive drought. Jer. xvii. 6. Parched corn is corn roasted in the fire, that it may be eaten. 2 Sam. xvii. 28. To inhabit parched places, is to be in a most wretched and destitute condition. Jer. xvii. 6. The gentile world, and unregenerate men, are likened to parched ground: How destitute of the sap of divine truth, and gracious habits and influences! how barren of good works! how scorched with the power of temptation, with corrupt inclinations and customs, and with divine judgments! Jer. xxv. 7.

PARLOUR; a cooling chamber. Judg. iii. 20.

PART; (1.) A piece. Ruth ii. 3. (2.) A share. Josh. xix. 9. (3.) Duty, business.

Ruth iii. 13. 1 Sam. xxxiii. 20. (4.) Side, party. Mark ix. 40. The inward or hidden part of the soul and heart. Psal. v. 9. and li. 6. God smote the Philistines in the hinder parts, and put them to a perpetual reproach, when he plagued them with emerods. Psal. lxxvii. 66. A third or fourth part is often used to signify a great quantity; a multitude. Ezek. v. 2, 12. Zech. xiii. 8, 9. Rev. vii. 8, iii. 7—12. and ix. 18.

PART; (1.) To separate, go asunder. 2 Kings ii. 11. (2.) To divide. Gen. ii. 10. (3.) To determine a controversy, giving each his share. Prov. xviii. 1.

PARTAKE; to receive a share. The saints are partakers of Christ, and of the heavenly calling. By receiving Jesus Christ and his Spirit into their hearts, they possess them, and their blessings and influences, as their own, and are effectually called to the heavenly glory. Heb. iii. 1, 14. and vi. 4. They are partakers of God's promises and benefits; they have an interest in all the promises, and shall receive every blessing therein contained. Eph. iii. 6. 1 Tim. vi. 2. They are partakers of the divine nature, and of Christ's holiness, when, through union to Christ, and fellowship with him in his righteousness and Spirit, their nature is conformed to Christ. 2 Pet. i. 4. They partake of Christ's sufferings, and of the afflictions of the gospel, when they are persecuted for their adherence to the truth and example of Christ. 1 Pet. iv. 13. 2 Cor. i. 7. 2 Tim. i. 8. They partake of the grace of Paul, and other ministers, when they receive spiritual edification from their ministry. Phil. i. 7. Hypocrites are partakers of the Holy Ghost. Some of them in the apostolic age enjoyed his distinguished influences and operations; and in every age they receive such convictions, or other influences, as are separable from a state of grace. Heb. vi. 4. Men become partakers in other men's sins, by contriving, consenting, inclining to, rejoicing in, assisting to commit, or sharing the profits or pleasures of their sin; or by occasioning them by an evil example, or offensive use of things indifferent; by provoking or tempting to, or not doing all we can to hinder their sin; or by commanding, exciting, or hiring men to sin; or by defending, extenuating, or commending their sin; by neglecting to reprove, and promote the proper punishment of sin; and by not mourning over, and praying against sin. Rev. xviii. 4. Eph. v. 11.

PARTHIA, had Media on the west, Hyrcania on the north, Aria or Ariana on the east, and the desert of Carmania, now Kerman, on the south. The Parthians appear to have descended from the Gauls which invaded Asia, and part of whom peopled Galatia; but others, perhaps on grounds equally strong, suppose them to be of Persian origin. It is certain, that about A. M. 3754, Arsaces, a noble Parthian, revolted from Antiochus Theos of Syria, and erected a kingdom for himself. This, in process of time, became very powerful, and a terror to the Romans themselves. It sometimes extended from the head of the Euphrates, nay, from the Hellespont, to beyond the river Indus in Asia, together with Egypt and Lybia in Africa. About A. D. 222, this monarchy, at least the family of Arsaces, was ruined by Artaxerxes the Persian. About A. D. 640, Parthia was over-run by the Saracens. The ancient Parthia is now the Persian Irak, and is in the heart of the Persian empire. It is about six hundred miles in length, and four hundred and fifty broad. The country is somewhat hilly, but the air is pure and salubrious. Ispahan is the capital; it also contains Casahan, Hamdan, and other cities of note. Probably some of these Jews of Parthia, who were present at Peter's sermon, first carried thither the knowledge of the Christian faith; but for many ages there have been no traces of Christianity, except amongst the Armenians, who settled here for the purposes of trade. Acts ii. 9.

PARTIAL; showing an unjust regard or disregard to some persons or things, on account of some carnal motive. Mal. ii. 9. 1 Tim. v. 21.

PARTICULARLY; one by one. Paul could not in an epistle enlarge particularly, in explaining the signification of every particular utensil of the temple. Heb. ix. 5.

PARTITION; a wall or hanging that divides between two apartments. 1 Kingsvi. 21.

PARTRIDGE; a well-known bird. Their flesh is very good to eat, their flight is low, and of a small compass, but they run about almost as soon as they are hatched. The grey brown partridges, with a naked scarlet mark behind their eyes, are the most common; but the red legged ones are the largest. In the Alps, there are white partridges with hairy feet. It is said that female partridges have so strong an inclination to hatch, that if their own eggs be taken away, they will steal some of their neighbours'; and that the young hatched from these eggs forsake their hatcher, and follow the true dam. Partridges are said to be contentious; and by pursuing the fowler's tame partridge, they will run into his net. Bochart, and some others, think the KORE is not the partridge, but the woodcock, or snipe. 1 Sam. xxvi. 20. As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not, they being broken or carried away; so is the covetous fool, who, after he has taken every method to amass wealth, has it taken from him, amidst his delight in its possession. Jer. xvii. 11.

PAR-VATM; either Parbatia in the land of Havilah, or Ophir. Perhaps Taprobane is the same as Taphparvan, the shore of Parvain, Provan, or Parvaim. From Parvaim Solomon had the gold with which he overlaid the inside of the temple. 2 Chron. iii. 6.

PASHUR. See JEREMIAH.

PASSAGE. A passage of a river is a ford or bridge. Judg. xii. 16. In a country, a passage often signifies a narrow way between mountains, lakes, &c.; such as the passages of Michmash and Abarim, that were rendered narrow by the hills or rocks on both sides. 1 Sam. xiii. 23. Jer. xxii. 20.

PASSION; (1.) Suffering and death. Acts i. 3. (2.) Affections; infirmities natural or sinful. Acts xiv. 15. James v. 17.

PASSOVER. See FEAST. In the time of Joshua, Samnel, Hezekiah, and Josiah, and after the return from Babylon, the passover was kept with great solemnity. Josh. v. 2 Chron. xxx. 2 Kings xxiii. Ezra vi.

19. Perhaps, after the blood of the pass-over-lambs was commanded to be sprinkled on the altar, they no more sprinkled it on their doors. It is certain from the instance of our Saviour, that they did not that night confine themselves to their houses. He no doubt kept it on the very night on which the other Jews observed it; otherwise his adversaries, who so eagerly sought for matter of accusation, would have fixed on this. Nor was the day of his death, the day of preparation for eating the paschal lamb, but for the Sabbath, and the feast of unleavened bread, which is also called the passover. As the blood of ten lambs, or more, might be in one bason, it is easy to see how the blood of 10,000 or 20,000 such basons of blood might in one afternoon be sprinkled by so many priests. The Jews still observe a kind of passover, mingling most of the ancient rites with modern inventions.

PASTORS, or SHEPHERDS; those watch over flocks of sheep, &c. directing them to their right pasture, leading them to water, gathering them, when proper, to their fold, and protecting them from hurt. It seems that their flocks often followed them. John x. 1—27. As of old, rich men's wealth consisted chiefly in their flocks and herds, the office of feeding them was accounted very honourable. Abel, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, nay the female members of their families, as the daughters of Laban and Jethro, employed themselves in this service. Why shepherds were held as an abomination to the Egyptians, has been already explained. Christ is called a Shepherd; with what tender care did he lead, provide for, protect, and govern the Hebrews in the desert, and in Canaan! With what tender care he gathers, governs, protects, heals, and provides for the welfare of his church and people! Gen. xlix. 21. Psal. lxxx. 1. and xxlii. 1. Isa. xl. 11. Christ is God's Shepherd; because his father has given him his flock of chosen men, and appointed him to die for, call, and feed them. Zech. xiii. 7. He is called the One Shepherd; because he alone owns the sheep, and can in every respect answer and supply all their wants. Ezek. xxxiv. 23. John x. 16. He is called the great and chief Shepherd; he is infinitely great in himself; he is highly exalted as our Mediator; he has the supreme management of the church in his hand; and ministers and magistrates are but instruments subject to him. Heb. xiii. 20. 1 Pet. v. 4. He is the Good Shepherd; in infinite kindness he redeemed his sheep from ruin, by the price of his blood; kindly he sympathizes with them, and gives them his own flesh and blood for their provision; and nothing good will he withhold from them. John x. 14. He is the Shepherd and Bishop of souls; it is men's souls he leads, restores, and satisfies; and their spiritual and eternal interests are the great object of his care. 1 Pet. ii. 25. Psal. xxiii. 2, 3. Jer. xxxi. 27. Ministers are shepherds; it is their work to gather, lead, ~~watch~~ over, feed with sound doctrine, and every way endeavour to promote the spiritual life, safety, growth, health, and comfort of their people. Jer. xvii. 6. Eph. iv. 11. 1 Pet. v. 1—4. The pastoral or ministerial office and work is described in scripture as inexpressibly important and solemn. It is at men's infinite hazard if they rush into it without being regenerated in the whole man, after the image of God, the old things having passed away, and all things become new; without having the Spirit of God dwelling in their hearts, to show them the things of Christ, and enable them to know, win, and rejoice in him, and worship God in spirit and in truth, having no confidence in the flesh; to make them experimentally know and believe what they declare to others; and to render them apt to teach; capable of unfolding and applying the mysteries of the gospel in a plain and heart affecting manner. Gal. i. 15, 16. 2 Cor. v. 17. John xiv. 16, 17, 26. xv. 26, 27. xvi. 13—15. and xx. 22. Phil. iii. 3, 7—14. 1 Cor. ii. 10—16. 2 Cor. iv. 14. 1 John i. 3. They must have a real call and mission from Jesus Christ to their work, otherwise they cannot expect to have any true success in it. Jer. xxiii. 21, 22, 32. Isa. vi. 8, 9. and xlix. 1, 2. Jer. i. Ezek. ii. iii. and xxxiii. Matt. x. Luke x. John x. Acts i. and xxvi. 17, 18. Rom. x. 15. Heb. v. 4. Their ends ought to be single and disinterested, not seeking great things to themselves; coveting no man's silver, gold, or apparel, but seeking to bring men to Christ, and salvation through him; not looking to, or aiming at, their own ease, profit, or honour, but at the things of Christ and his people; not seek glory of men, but the honour of Christ and his Father, in the eternal salvation of souls. Jer. xlv. 5. 1 Sam. xii. 8. Acts xx. 33. 1 Cor. ix. 12, 16. 2 Cor. vii. 2. vi. 9. and xii. 13, 14. Phil. ii. 21. 2 Cor. vi. 4—10. 1 Thess. ii. 4—9. John vii. 18. As ambassadors for Christ, as stewards of the mysteries and manifold grace of God, it is required of them to be faithful; to serve the Lord with their spirit, and with much humility in the gospel of his Son; to testify repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, keeping back no part of the counsel of God, no profitable instruction, reproof, encouragement, and not moved with any reproach, persecution, hunger, or nakedness, but ready not only to be bound, but to die for the name of Jesus, in order to finish their course with joy; they must labour with much fear and trembling, determined to know, to glory in, and make known nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified; preaching the gospel, not with enticing words of man's wisdom, as men-pleasers, but with great plainness of speech, in demonstration of the Spirit, and with power; speaking the things freely given them by God; not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual; as having the mind of Christ; always triumphing in him; and making manifest the savour of his knowledge in every place; that they may be to God a sweet savour of Christ in them that are saved, and in them that perish; as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God, speaking in Christ, and through the mercy of God not fainting, but renouncing the hidden things of dishonesty; not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully, but manifesting the truth to every man's conscience in the sight of God; not preaching themselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and themselves servants to the church for his sake, always bearing about his dying, that his life may be manifested in them. Knowing the terror of the Lord, and deeply impressed with the account which they and their hearers shall give to him in the day of judgment; awed with his authority, and constrained by his love; they must persuade men, making themselves manifest to God and to their consciences; must change their voice, and turn themselves every way, and become all things to and for all men, in order to bring them to Christ: jealous over them with a godly jealousy, in order to espouse them to him as chaste virgins; travelling in birth, till he be formed in their hearts; they must take heed to their ministry, which they have received in the Lord, that they may fulfil it, giving themselves wholly to reading, exhortation, and doctrine; taking heed to themselves, and to what they preach, that they may save themselves and their hearers; watching for their souls, as expecting to give an account for them;—rightly dividing the word of truth, and giving every man his portion in due season;—faithfully warning every man, and teaching every man, and labouring to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus;—and warring not after the flesh, nor with carnal weapons, but with such as are mighty through God, to the pulling down of strong holds, and casting down imaginations, as subduing every thought and affection to the obedience of Christ. Having him for the end of their conversation, and holding fast the form of sound words, in faith in, and love to him;—they must go forth without the camp, bearing his reproach, and exposed as spectacles of sufferings to angels and men, feed the flock of God purchased with his blood, over which the Holy Ghost hath made them overseers;—preaching sound doctrine in faith and verity;—preaching the word in season, and out of season;—reproving, rebuking, and exhorting, with all long suffering, and doctrine;—taking the oversight of their people, not by constraint, but willingly, not for filthy lucre, (worldly gain,) but of a ready mind; and not entangling themselves with the affairs of this life, neither as being lords over God's heritage, but as examples to the flock;—exercised unto godliness, kindly affectioned, disinterested, holy, just, and unblameable;—prudent examples of the believers in conversation, in charity, in faith, in purity;—fleeing youthful lusts, and following after righteousness, peace, faith, charity;—not striving, but being gentle unto all men; in meekness instructing them that oppose themselves;—avoiding foolish and unlearned questions;—fleeing from perverse disputings, and worldly mindedness, as most dangerous snares; and following after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness;—fighting the good fight of faith, and laying hold on eternal life;—keeping their trust of gospel-truth and office; and without partiality, or precipitancy, committing the same to faithful men, who may be able to teach others;—and, in fine, to try and confute false teachers; rebuke before all such as sin openly; restore such as have been overtaken in a fault, in the spirit of meekness; and, having compassion on them, to pull them out of the fire, hating the garment spotted by the flesh; never conniving at, or partaking with any in their sins. Alas! how few of the clerical order are answerable to this scriptural description of their character and work! Ezek. ii. 7. iii. 9, 17—21. and xxiii. 7—9. Isa. lviii. 1. Jer. i. 17, 18. and xv. 19, 20. Mic. iii. 8. Mal. ii. 6, 7. Matt. x. 16—39. xix. 28, 29. xx. 25—28. xxiii. 3—12. xxiv. 42—51. and xxviii. 18—20. Acts xviii. xx. 18—35. xxiv. 16. and xxvi. 16—23. 1 Cor. ii—iv. v. ix. xi. xiii. xiv. 2 Cor. ii—vi. x—xiii. Rom. i. 9, 16; ix. 12; x. 1. and xii. xv. Gal. i. 8—16. and iv. 19. Eph. iii. 7—9. and iv. 11—15. Col. iv. 7, 17. 1 Thess. ii. iii. 1 Tim. iii—vi. 2 Tim. ii—iv. Tit. i—iii. Heb. xii. 7, 17. 1 Pet. iv. 10, 11. and v. 1—4. Rev. ii. iii. xi. 3—7. and xiv. 6—11.

Political rulers in the state, and captains in the army, are called pastors, or shepherds; their office requires them to gather, lead, protect, and provide for the welfare of their subjects and armies, which are their flocks; but how often do they act the contrary parts! Isa. xlv. 28. and lxiii. 14. Jer. xii. 10. and xxv. 34. Nah. iii. 18. Jer. xxiii. Ezek. xxxiv. Perhaps the shepherd and stone of Israel, signifies not God, the source of all blessings, but Joshua, Gideon, and other rulers of Israel, descended from the tribes of Ephraim, or Manasseh, who as shepherds, ruled, and as a stone established the Hebrew nation. Gen. xlix. 24. The Chaldean princes and their armies were the shepherds and flocks that ruined Judah. Jer. vi. 3. and xii. 10. Calmet thinks the seven shepherds and eight principal men, raised up to waste the land of Assyria, and Nimrod, to be Darius Hystaspes, and his fellows, who cut off the Magi from the Persian throne: but we rather understand them of the eight inspired writers, and other seven apostles of Christ under the New Testament, by whom God wonderfully brought down the kingdom of Satan in the world. Mic. v. 5, 6. God's cutting off three shepherds in one month, may denote his frequent displacing from their station the Jewish rulers of church and state, for a considerable time before the final destruction of Jerusalem. Zech. xi. 8. The foolish shepherd or idle shepherd, set over the Jews, may denote either the Romans, who heavily oppressed them, or the heads of their various parties at the ruin of their city; or Barcoaba, and other false messiahs, who have occasioned so much evil to their nation. Zech. xi. 15—17.

PASTURE; a place for feeding flocks. 1 Chron. iv. 40. Job xxxix. 8. When men are likened to flocks, or herds, their country, or what they enjoy in it, is called their pasture. Hos. xiii. 6. When saints are likened to flocks, the church, their new-covenant state, the ordinances, and word of God, and the blessings conveyed by it, are their good, green, fresh, and flourishing pasture. Psal. lxxiv. 1. and xxiii. 2. Ezek. xxxiv. 14.

PATE; the crown of the head. Psal. vii. 16.

PAT-ARA; a sea-port of Lycia. Here was a famous temple of Apollo, where oracles, equal in repute to those of Delphos, were delivered during six months of the year. Paul touched here in his way from Macedonia to Jerusalem; but we hear nothing of Christianity settled till the fourth century, and it continued till the ninth, when the Saracens wasted the country. Acts xxi. 1.

PATH. See WAY.

PATHROS; a city or canton of Egypt. Some imagine it to be the Phaturis of Ptolemy and Pliny. Wells makes it a city in Upper Egypt, on the west of the Nile. Some consider it the same with Thebes in Upper Egypt. It no doubt had its name from Pathurism, the fifth son of Mizraim, who built or peopled it. Gen. x. 14. When it is remembered the Jews under Johanan the son of Kareah fled hither from Judea, and that the desolation of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar and Cambyes began with Patros, (Jer. xlv. 1, 15. Ezek. xxix. 14. and xxx. 14.) it must be concluded to be somewhere to the north-east of Egypt. From Pathros, God will recal the Jews to their own land, and has, or will, gather many to the gospel-church. Isa. xi. 11.

PATIENCE, or LONG-SUFFERING. God's patience, is his bearing long with offenders, without punishing them. Rom. ii. 4. Matt. xviii. 26, 29. The patience of the saints, is that grace by which they meekly endure injuries, and with a continued calmness of temper, and submission of spirit to the will of God, bear afflictions, and humbly wait for the accomplishment of his promises. Rom. v. 8. and viii. 25. It is called the patience of Jesus Christ, as he exemplifies it, and bestows it: it is exercised in the way of waiting, and honouring him, and in a patient waiting for his coming in the power of his Spirit, and to judge the world. 2 Thes. iii. 4. Rev. i. 9. The word of his patience, is the truth which is opposed, and which the saints are called to maintain and suffer for. Rev. iii. 10. Herein is the patience and faith of the saints; in enduring Antichristian persecution, and waiting for their deliverance from God, will their patience and faith be exceedingly exercised and tried. Rev. xiii. 10.

PATMOS; an island of the Egean sea, not far from Melitus, and about forty miles westward of Ephesus. It is about twenty-five or thirty miles in circumference, and is of a barren soil, and is now called Patmo, Patmol, or Palmosa. Hither John the apostle was banished, and here he had his revelations. Rev. i. 9. Here they pretend to shew his cell; with a number of other superstitious fooleries. During the Cretian or Candian war, about one hundred and fifty years since, the Venetian fleet wintered in the harbours of this island. At present it is inhabited only by Christians of the Greek church, subject to the Turks. The males are reckoned about three hundred; but the females are much more numerous.

PATRIARCH; one of the principal fathers of mankind, particularly of the Jews; so Abraham, Jacob, and his sons, and David, are called. Heb. vii. 4. Acts vii. 8, 9. and ii. 29.

PATRIMONY; the goods or inheritance left by a father to his child. Deut. xviii. 8.

PATTERN; (1.) An example or model. Exod. xxv. 9. Tit. ii. 7. (2.) A type. Heb. ix. 23.

PAVEMENT; the floor of a court or street, laid with polished and precious stones. 2 Kings xvi. 17. 2 Chron. vii. 3. The pavement of the court in Ezekiel's visionary temple, may denote the gospel-truths which are the foundation of the saints' holy and lovely deportment. Ezek. xl. 17, 18. and xlii. 3. See GABBATHA.

PAVILION; a tent, chiefly one for a king, general, or prince. 1 Kings xx. 12. Jer. xliii. 10. God made darkness his partition; he displayed his peculiar presence in the cloudy pillar that directed the Hebrews: he often accompanied his greatest works by dark and mysterious providences. Psal. xviii. 11. God hides his people in his pavilion: in intimate fellowship with him, they are most safe, as prisoners are in the conquering general's tent; and by his providence he safely, but mysteriously protects them. Psal. xxvii. 5. and xxxi. 20.

PAUL, the Apostle, was of the tribe of Benjamin, and both his parents were Hebrews. He was born at Tarsus in Cilicia, and so was by birth a free citizen of Rome. He was at first called Saul, and never Paul, till the conversion of Sergius Paulus. Perhaps Saul was his Hebrew name, and Paul his Roman one, which he used among the gentiles; or perhaps Sergius honoured him with his surname. His parents sent him early to Jerusalem, to study the Jewish law under the direction of Gamaliel, the most famed doctor of that age. He made great progress in his studies, and lived a very blameless life. He was of the sect of the Pharisees, and was beyond many, a strict observer of the law of Moses. He thought it is duty, by every way he could devise, to vilify the name, and oppose the religion and followers of Jesus; he was zealous even to madness against them. When Stephen was murdered by the mob, he was present, and heartily consented, taking care of their clothes who stoned him to death. He was very active in the persecution that followed. He entered the houses of the Christians, and hauled them to prison, men and women. He entered the synagogues where the Christians at any time were; caused them to be beaten with rods; and compelled them to blaspheme the name of Jesus, as the condition of their liberation. Not satisfied with the mischief he could do them at Jerusalem, he obtained credentials from Caiaphas the high priest, and the elders of the Jews, to the principal persons of Damascus, with power to bring to Jerusalem such believing Jews as had fled thither, that they might be punished. He went off, breathing and threatening nothing less than cruelty and death against them. When he and his attendants had almost finished their journey to Damascus, they were all of a sudden surrounded by a surprising light from heaven. Terrified almost out of their senses, they cast themselves on the ground. Saul alone heard our Saviour's voice, which in a majestic manner said to him, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Saul trembling, asked him, Who art thou, Lord? He replied, that he was Jesus, whom he had persecuted; and added, that it was very dangerous to strive against his power. In the utmost consternation, Saul asked him, what he would have him do? Jesus bade him rise and stand on his feet; for he had chosen him to be a noted minister and apostle, to preach his doctrines among the gentiles, for their conversion and salvation. He directed him to go to Damascus, and he should there be further informed of his will. As Saul was struck blind, his companions had to lead him by the way. He had formerly accounted himself one of the best of men, and a certain heir of eternal life; now the law of God, applied to his conscience, convinced him that he was a distinguished transgressor, dead in trespasses and sins, and condemned of God to endless ruin. After he had lodged three days in the house of one Judas, without either sight or food, Ananias a Christian preacher, was directed of God to go and enquire for him, and, by laying on of hands, recover him to his sight. Saul had no sooner recovered his sight, than he made a solemn profession of his faith, was baptized, and afterwards filled with the Holy Ghost. Phil. iii. 5-8. Gal. i. 13-16. Acts viii. 1. ix. 1-19. xxii. 1-16. and xxvi. 9-18. Rom. vii. 8-13. After eating and recovering his strength, he, regardless of whatever poverty, reproach, or persecution might await him, began to preach the gospel at Damascus, and many were converted. The Jews were shocked, and knew not what to think or say. To stifle the account of his conversion, and stop his usefulness, they resolved to murder him; obtained the governor's leave to do so; and watched the gates night and day to prevent his escape, and effect their purpose. Informed of their design, his friends let him down in a basket from a window of a house built on the wall of the city. After he had preached some time in Arabia, south of Damascus, he returned to that city. In the third year of his conversion, he went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, who had begun the conversion of the gentiles. It was not till Barnabas related the manner and consequences of his conversion, that the disciples at Jerusalem admitted him into their society: he saw none of the apostles at that time, but Peter, and James the less; the rest, it seems, being in the country preaching the gospel; nor did he receive any instruction from them. At Jerusalem he preached the gospel with such power and zeal, as the Jews could not resist, but resolved to kill him. As he was praying in the temple, he fell into a trance, wherein he was caught up into the third heaven, and heard things which could not be understood on earth. The Lord warned him to leave Jerusalem, as the Jews had laid snares for his life, and to go and preach among the gentiles. Attended with some Christian brethren, he went down to Cesarea, and there embarked for Tarsus. Acts ix. 19-31. and xxii. 17-21. 2 Cor. xi. 31-33. and xii. Gal. i. 15-21.

After he had preached about Cilicia near five years, Barnabas brought him south to Antioch in Syria, where the converts to Christianity exceedingly increased. After he had preached here about a year, he and Barnabas carried the collection for the poor saints to Jerusalem. They had not long returned to Antioch, when Simeon called Niger, Lucias, Mannen, and other preachers, directed of the Holy Ghost, sent them off to preach the gospel in other places, recommending them to the Lord by solemn fasting and prayer. They went to Cyprus, and there preached every where in the Jewish synagogues. Sergius Paulus, the Roman governor of the island, and many others, were converted to Christ; and Barjesus the magician, who withstood them, was struck blind. From Cyprus they came to Perga in Pamphylia, where John-Mark hearing of their intended progress to the northward, left them, and returned to Antioch in Syria. Paul and Barnabas went to Pisidia. Here, as they on the Sabbath were in a Jewish synagogue, the ruler of it desired them to give a word of exhortation after the reading of the law. In a long oration, Paul rehearsed the marvellous providences of God towards the Hebrew nation, and that Jesus is the true Messiah, whom the Prophets and John Baptist foretold; and called them to believe on his name. He was heard with great attention, and invited to discourse the next Sabbath on the same subject. When the day came, almost all the people of the city assembled to hear him. Offended at this concourse of the gentiles, many of the Jews outrageously contradicted and blasphemed what was spoken. Paul and Barnabas told them, that it was necessary, in respect of the purpose of God, that the gospel should be first preached to them: but since they had rejected it, they would now preach it to the gentiles. The gentiles were extremely glad to hear this; and multitudes, such had been elected to everlasting life, believed. But as the Jews stirred up some honourable devotees of the gentile party, and raised a persecution against them, Paul and Barnabas were driven out, and shook off the dust of their feet as a testimony against them. Acts xiii.

They then came to Iconium, and preached in the synagogues. Many miracles were wrought, and multitudes were turned to the Lord; but the Jews stirred up the heathens against them. Being in danger of stoning, they retired to Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lyconia. Having at Lystra healed a man who had been lame from his birth, the people took them for gods in the likeness of men; Barnabas for Jupiter, and Paul for Mercury. The priest of Jupiter brought oxen adorned with garlands, for a sacrifice to them. Paul and Barnabas rushed in among the mob; and told them they were but men like themselves; and begged them to turn from those vanities to serve the only true God. With difficulty they got the sacrifice stopped. Soon after, some Jews of Antioch in Pisidia, and of Iconium, came hither, and stirred up the people against the apostles. Paul was stoned and dragged out of the city apparently dead; but as the Christians gathered about him, and no doubt prayed over him, he recovered; and having lodged that night in the city, departed next morning for Derbe. After preaching there for some time, they returned to Iconium and Antioch in Pisidia. In all these places, they, with prayer and fasting, and the laying on of hands, ordained such to be presbyters, or elders, as had been chosen to that office by the church. After preaching some time in Perga and Attalia, cities of Pamphylia, they returned to Antioch in Syria, where they rehearsed what God had wrought by their means.

After they had continued here a considerable time, the churches of Syria and Cilicia were exceedingly injured by false teachers, who, pretending a commission from the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, taught, that circumcision, and the observance of the ceremonial law, were necessary to salvation. After much disputing, it was resolved to settle this matter by an appeal to a general meeting of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas were sent as representatives from Antioch. After the apostles and elders had met together, with the deputies from Syria and Cilicia, Paul and Barnabas rehearsed to them, and to the other Christians present, what things the Lord had done by their means. The cause was then reasoned on, and determined that the gentile converts were under no moral obligation to observe the ceremonial law; but to avoid the offending of the Jewish Christians, they were required to abstain from blood, and from things strangled, and meats offered to idols, as well as from fornication. Paul, Barnabas, Barsabas, and Silas, were sent to Antioch, and the churches adjacent with the decision of the council. The churches were exceedingly pleased with the decree, as at once it secured to the gentiles their liberty, and bore with the weakness of the Jewish converts. When Paul was at Jerusalem, he both publicly and privately declared what doctrines he had taught. Neither Peter, James, John, nor any other apostle, found the least fault with his conduct, but cordially acknowledged him the apostle of the gentiles, and desired him to make collections for the poor, as he himself proposed to do. Acts xiv. and xv. Gal. ii. 1—10.

When Paul and Barnabas had continued some time at Antioch of Syria, Peter came thither; at the first he cheerfully ate with the believing gentiles; but when some Jewish converts followed him, he abstained eating with the gentiles, and Barnabas was near being drawn by him into the same practice. Paul sharply rebuked Peter for this dissimulation, as being opposed to Christian liberty, and contrary to the late decision of the council at Jerusalem. Paul afterwards proposed to Barnabas, that they should visit the churches they had planted. Barnabas readily agreed; but as he insisted to have MARK, his cousin, with them, and Paul as warmly urged the contrary, they parted, and Barnabas and Mark went to Cyprus, while Paul and Silas journeyed northwards through Syria and Cilicia. They came to Derbe and Lystra. Here Paul found Timothy; and intending to take him for his companion, he caused him to be circumcised, in order to render him more acceptable to the Jews. They travelled through Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Galatia; but the Holy Ghost prohibiting them from preaching in proconsular Asia, they went to Mysia, and came to Troas. Here an angel in the form of a man of Macedonia, appeared in a vision to Paul, and desired him to come and help their country, by preaching the gospel there. They took ship at Troas, sailed to the isle of Samothracia, and thence to Neapolis. They soon after travelled thence to Philippi. Here they resorted to the river-side, where was a place of Jewish devotion. Lydia, and her family, and many others, were turned to the Lord. As they went from their lodging in the house of Lydia, a maid, possessed with a spirit of divination, followed them several days, crying out, that they were the servants of the most high God, who showed to men the way of salvation. Disclaiming this mode of attestation, which tended to render them suspected as diviners, Paul, in the name of Jesus, commanded the evil spirit to leave her. Enraged at this, her masters, who had made much gain by her soothsaying, carried Paul and Silas before the magistrates, as introducers of a new religion. They were beaten with rods, and committed to prison. At midnight, Paul and Silas sang praises to God; an earthquake shook the prison; all the doors burst open, and the chains of the prisoners fell off them. Awakened with the noise, the jailor, seeing the doors open, supposed the prisoners had fled, and was about to murder himself, to prevent what he apprehended would be worse. Paul cried to him to do himself no harm, as all the prisoners were safe. Having got a light he sprang in trembling, and inquired of Paul and Silas concerning the way of salvation. Paul having informed him of the Christian doctrine, and that the only way of salvation was by believing in Jesus Christ, as the only Saviour, he and his whole family were baptized. He brought water, and washed the wounds of Paul and Silas, and gave them some food. On the morrow, the magistrates, by their sergeants or messengers, ordered him to set Paul and Silas at liberty. Paul returned for answer, that since the magistrates had beaten and imprisoned Roman citizens uncondemned, it was proper they should come and dismiss them themselves. On hearing of their being citizens of Rome, the magistrates were alarmed; they came and begged their pardon, and bringing them out from the prison, desired them to leave the place; which they did after they had comforted the disciples in the house of Lydia. Acts xvi.

Having passed southward through Amphipolis and Apollonia, cities of Macedonia, they came to Thessalonica, the capital. Here Paul preached three sabbaths in a Jewish synagogue, and many believed; but the Jews raising a mob, beset the house of Jason where Paul lodged; but as neither Paul nor his brethren were found there, they dragged Jason before the magistrates, and accused him as a harbinger of rebels against the emperor, and preachers of one King Jesus. After Jason had found security for his loyality, he was dismissed. That very night, the Christians conducted Paul and Silas out of the place. Notwithstanding the wealth of Thessalonica, Paul was here in considerable straits for his daily bread. He and Silas went next to Berea, where both Jews and gentiles heard the gospel with great readiness of mind, and carefully compared what they heard with the writings of the prophets; and here not a few persons of note believed. It was not long when the malicious Jews of Thessalonica came and raised the mob against them. Paul was obliged to withdraw; but Silas and Timothy abode behind, to instruct the new converts. Paul's guides brought him to Athens, whence he sent back word to his two companions to follow him. The excessive idolatry and vanity of this place, so famed for wisdom, was extremely grievous to Paul. He preached in the Jewish synagogues; and on various occasions, he disputed with the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers. After treating his doctrine with contempt, they accused him to the court of Areopagus, as an introducer of a new religion. Multitudes of vain persons attended his trial. In his defence, he stated, that among their too numerous superstitious, he had observed an altar to the unknown God; and that this unknown God, whom they ignorantly worshipped, was the Jesus whom he preached to them. He hinted, how absurd it was for men that believed themselves the offspring of God, to imagine, that the Deity resembled silver, gold, or any pictures or statues made by men; and that God had appointed a day for judging the world by Jesus Christ, whom he had raised from the dead. He had scarcely mentioned the resurrection, when some mocked him, and others said they would hear him afterward of that matter. Dionysius, however, one of his judges, and Damaris, perhaps his wife, and some others, believed. Timothy having come up to him, and informed him of the suffering state of the Christians of Thessalonica, he sent him back to comfort them. Acts xvii. 1 Thess. ii.

Leaving Athens, Paul preached at Corinth with considerable success. That he might shew his unwillingness to burden the church with his support, he lodged with Aquila and Priscilla, and wrought at their trade of tent-making, which it seems he had learnt in his youth. Every day, or at least every Sabbath, he preached in the Jewish synagogues. Numbers were converted, particularly Stephanas and his family, with Crispus and Gaius. He had not been long here, when Silas and Timothy arrived, and informed him of the flourishing state of the Christians at Thessalonica; and the church there. He wrote his first epistle. As some took occasion from it to disturb their minds, as if the day of judgment were at hand, he soon after wrote them the second, to correct their mistakes. Assisted by Silas and Timothy, he went on with his work at Corinth. The Jews opposed him with rage and blasphemy; he shook his lap at them, and told them, that their blood was on their own head, and that now he would turn to the gentiles. He removed his lodging to the house of one Justus, a person of some note; and being encouraged by a vision, importing, that the Lord would support and mightily succeed him in his work, he continued here about eighteen months. The Jews accused him before Gallio the deputy, as an enemy to the Roman governor; but the deputy was too wise to give them any encouragement. Nay Sosthenes, the ruler of their synagogue was beaten by the mob, before the tribunal. At last, Paul set out for Jerusalem, intending to be there against Pentecost, when there would be multitudes assembled; but before he took ship at Cenchrea, a sea-port belonging to Corinth, he cut his hair, and having fulfilled his vow, Aquila and Priscilla attended him to Ephesus, from whence he sailed to Cesarea, and then went up to Jerusalem. Acts xviii. 1 Cor. xvi. Returning northward, he visited the churches of Syria, Galatia, Phrygia, and other places of Asia, confirming the disciples. Arriving at Ephesus, he found some who had been initiated into the Christian faith by Apollos, and baptized with the baptism of John only. These, to the number of twelve, he instructed in the truths of the gospel; and by laying on of his hands conferred on them the miraculous influence of the Holy Ghost, the gifts of prophecy, and of speaking with tongues. During three months Paul preached to the Jews, in their synagogues; but finding them obstinate, he separated from them, and taught daily in the school of one Tyrannus a gentile. Many miracles were wrought; when the linen that had touched his body was applied to the diseased, their maladies were cured, and the evil spirits cast out. Multitudes who had used divination and other black arts, believed the gospel, and burnt their magical books. During the three years Paul preached at Ephesus, he was cast to wild beasts in the theatre, or had to contend with men as fierce as wild beasts, when Demetrius the silversmith raised the mob against him. Some time before he left Ephesus, he was informed of the disorders in the church of Corinth, by some members of the family of Chloe, and perhaps more fully by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, who it seems brought him some pecuniary supply. He wrote that church his first epistle, and therein sends them the salutation of the Christians in Asia. Calmet thinks it was from hence that he wrote his epistle to the Galatians. He had sent Timothy to Greece; but it seems he was returned, and was left at Ephesus to settle the affairs of that church. Paul, meanwhile, went off for Greece. His not meeting with Titus at Troas, whom he expected from Corinth, gave him great uneasiness; but at last he found him in Macedonia, and was by him informed of the good effects of his first epistle on the Corinthians. On this, he wrote his second letter to that church, for their comfort, establishment, and further direction; and hinted at the danger he had often been in, from Jews, pretended Christians, robbers, and the sea; and what hunger, thirst, nakedness, cold, fasting, and watching, he had suffered; that the Jews had five times beaten him, to the utmost rigour of their law; twice the heathen magistrates had caused him to be beaten with rods; thrice he had suffered shipwreck, and it seems had once, for a whole night and day, struggled with the waves in the open sea. About this time, it is probable, he wrote his first epistle to Timothy. Perhaps he went westward from Macedonia, and preached the gospel in Illyricum. Returning southward, he visited the church at Corinth, and wrote his epistle to the Romans. Having received the collection which those of Macedonia and Achaia had made for the poor Christians of Judea, he took his route for Jerusalem through Macedonia, whence, either from Philippi, or Nicopolis, he seems to have written his epistle to Titus.

Departing from Macedonia, he landed at Troas, in five days. There Sopater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus of Thessalonica, Timothy, and Gaius of Derbe, with Tychicus and Trophimus, who were probably of Ephesus, waited till he came up. After resting a whole week, he, on the Lord's day, dispensed the Lord's supper to the Christians there, and preached till midnight. One Eutychus, who sat in a window, in a manner shamefully common in our times, and without the half of his temptation, fell asleep under the sermon, and falling from the third story, was taken up dead; but Paul, by a miracle, restored him to life. He taught the disciples till break of day, and then set off on his journey. Paul's companions took ship; but he travelled on foot to Assos, and embarked with them at Mitylene. Thence he came to Miletus, and sending for the elders of the church of Ephesus, spoke to them of his own sufferings at Jerusalem, and of their danger from false teachers; and having exhorted them to patience and faithfulness, he prayed with them, and to their great grief, took his last farewell of them in time. Acts xix. and xx. 1 Cor. xv. 32. and xvi. 8, 9, 19. 2 Cor. vii. 5, 6. and xi. 23-28. Rom. xv. 19-26.

From Miletus Paul sailed to Coos; thence to Rhodes, thence to Patara, and thence to Tyre. After stopping here a week, he and his companions proceeded to Ptolemais, and thence to Cesarea. Here they found Philip the deacon and evangelist. Here too Agabus met them, and binding his hands and feet with Paul's girdle, signified that Paul should be bound by the Jews at Jerusalem, and delivered up to the gentiles. Paul's friends dissuaded him from going up to Jerusalem, but could not prevail, as he told them his life was not dear to him, if he might but finish his course with joy; and that he was ready to suffer imprisonment and death for the honour of Jesus. When he came to Jerusalem, the Christians joyfully welcomed him thither; and the elders of the church, meeting at the house of James the apostle, with great pleasure, heard him report his travels and success. James represented to him, that as many of the believers at Jerusalem believed the report that he had taught the Jews among the gentiles to undervalue circumcision and other ceremonies, it would be proper for the removal of the offence which they had conceived, to inform them of the contrary; and to confirm their belief of his due regard to the ceremonies, it would be fit he should join himself to the four men who were to offer their oblations for their finished Nazariteship. Paul, therefore went up to the temple, and signified to the priests, that he and these Nazarites would in seven days be ready with their offerings. He had scarcely appeared in the court of the temple with his offering, when some Jews of Lesser Asia cried for help to apprehend him, as one who had every where taught the abolition of the ceremonial law, and had brought Greeks into the temple to pollute it. He was directly seized, and the gates of the sacred courts were shut. He had been beaten to death, had not Lysias the tribune come with his Roman guard to rescue him. The enraged mob followed him to the castle Antonia. As he entered the castle, he begged the captain to hear him a word. Lysias asked him, if he could speak Greek, and whether he was the Egyptian who had infested the country with 4000 assassins? Paul replied, that he was a Jew, born in the famous city of Tarsus. He was then allowed to speak to the mob. Upon his affectionately addressing them in the Hebrew language, they listened the more quietly. He rehearsed to them his former rage against the Christians, his manner of conversion, and his mission to preach among the gentiles. He had scarcely mentioned this last, when the Jews, in the most outrageous manner, cried out, that he ought not to live. To prevent a general insurrection, Lysias ordered Paul into the castle, and groundlessly supposing that he was certainly guilty of some horrible crime, he ordered him to be scourged till he confessed it. As they bound him to the pillar to be scourged, Paul asked the centurion, if it was according to law to scourge a citizen of Rome without hearing his defence? The centurion ran to the tribune, and begged him to take heed, as Paul was a freeman of Rome. Lysias finding he had been born such, gave orders to loose him. Next day Lysias called a council of the Jewish priests and elders, to have Paul deliberately tried. He had scarcely begun his defence, affirming, that he had always studied to live blameless before God and men, when Ananias ordered such as stood next him to smite him on the mouth. Paul, directing his speech to Ananias, said, God would smite him, who hypocritically pretended to judge him according to law, and yet ordered him to be smitten contrary to it. Some present asked him, how he durst revile God's high-priest? Paul replied, that he did not know, (i. e. did not acknowledge) him to be high priest. Looking around on the assembly, and observing that it consisted of an almost equal number of Pharisees and Sadducees, he cried out, that he was a Pharisee, and was called in question touching the resurrection of the dead. Upon this the Pharisees took his part, and fell into a dissension with the Sadducees. Lysias fearing that he would be torn to pieces between the two parties, ordered him back to the castle. That very night, God encouraged Paul, and assured him that he should live, and bear witness of his truths also at Rome. Next day, above forty of the Jews bound themselves under a terrible curse, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul; and, that they might have an opportunity, the Jewish priests and rulers agreed to desire Lysias to bring him back to the council, to be farther examined. Informed of this plot by his sister's son, who perhaps was not a Christian, Paul procured him access to relate the matter to Lysias, who, to prevent it, the next night, sent Paul to Felix the governor at Cesarea, with an account of his case, attended by a strong guard. Acts xxi—xxiii.

Within five days after, Ananias the high priest and others of the Jewish rulers, went down to Cesarea to carry on the prosecution against Paul. Tertullus their orator, after a flattering address to Felix, who was one of the basest of men, accused Paul as a notorious disturber of the public peace, and a profaner of the temple. When Paul had liberty to speak, he refuted the charge, and defied them to prove any thing against him, except that he professed his faith in the resurrection of the dead, and worshipped God in the Christian manner, believing every thing said by the prophets. Felix put off further trial, till Lysias should come and give him more full information; and meanwhile made Paul's imprisonment easy, giving him full liberty to receive the visits of his friends. Some days after, Felix and Drusilla his wife sent for Paul. He discoursed to them of righteousness, temperance and judgment, till Felix, who was extremely guilty on these points, trembled under his faithful preaching, and dismissed him. As Felix expected Paul's friends would ransom him, he often sent for him, and talked with him. Having received no bribe for his liberty, Felix, to please the Jews at the last, whom he had so often offended with his oppressive measures, left Paul bound. Scarcely had Festus entered on his government, when the Jewish rulers accused Paul, (who had now been a prisoner two years) to him, and intending to have him murdered by the way, requested that he would bring him up to Jerusalem for trial. Festus ordered them to come to Cesarea. They came, but could prove nothing which the Roman law made criminal. To gratify them as far as possible, Festus asked Paul, if he would go up and be tried at Jerusalem? Convinced of the murderous designs of the Jews, Paul, to prevent them, appealed to Nero the emperor, who had not then commenced his persecuting course. After conferring with his council, Festus told Paul, that he admitted his appeal, and would send him to Rome. Not long after, king Agrippa and his sister Bernice came to pay Festus a visit. Festus told them the affair of Paul. Agrippa desired to hear him. Paul being required to speak for himself, after a fine address to Agrippa, rehearsed his case, his conversion, and call to the ministry. When Festus, quite ignorant of these matters, said, learning had rendered him mad; Paul, with the most winning eloquence, told him, he was not mad, but spake the words of truth and soberness. When Agrippa said he had almost persuaded him to be a Christian, Paul expressed his earnest wish, that Agrippa, and all present, were such as himself, except as to his troubles. Agrippa gave his opinion, that Paul might have been set at liberty had he not appealed to Cæsar. Acts xxiv—xxvi. Paul and other prisoners were embarked for Rome, in a ship of Adramyttium, under the care of Julius, a centurion of the Augustan band of soldiers. Julius was very kind to Paul, and at Sidon allowed him to go on shore and visit his friends. After they had sailed along the coast of Phœnicia, a contrary wind obliged them to sail to the eastward of Cyprus. When they came to Myra, a sea-port of Lycia, they were put into a ship of Alexandria, bound for Rome. As the Jewish fast of expiation was past, and the winter had commenced, the weather began to be stormy; and it was with no small difficulty they arrived at the fair havens, on the east of Crete. Paul advised them to winter there; but others insisted they should go to Phenice, on the west of that island, where they would have a more commodious harbour. For some time they sailed slowly, but safely, along the south side of Crete; but at length a terrible storm from the east drove them on a small island called Claudia. To prevent their being dashed on the rock, the mariners lowered the sails, and committed themselves to the sea. After three days they cast out part of their cargo. For fourteen days they neither saw sun, moon, nor stars. Instructed by God, Paul assured them, that none of their lives should be lost, but only the ship. The mariners finding by their line, that the water was not very deep, supposed they drew near to some land, and let down their boat that they might escape in it. Paul directed by God, desired the centurion to retain them, as the passengers could not otherwise be preserved. The soldiers cut off the boat, and let her drive by the sea. After they had fasted almost fourteen days, Paul begged they would take some meat, as they might assure themselves they should not be lost, but be cast on some island. Observing land, the mariners attempted to thrust the ship into a creek. She struck a-ground upon a neck of land, and was broken to pieces. The soldiers advised to kill the prisoners, that they might not escape; but Julius, from regard to Paul, refused. All that were in the ship to the number of two hundred and seventy-six, some by swimming, and others on planks and broken boards, got safe to land on the isle of Malta. The heathens shewed them great kindness. A viper from among a bundle of sticks, which they had gathered to warm them with, fastened on Paul's hand; and the Barbarians seeing it, concluded that certainly he had been a murderer, and that though he had escaped the sea, yet divine vengeance suffered him not to live; but when they saw Paul shake off the viper into the fire, and receive no harm from it, they changed their mind and thought him a god. Here Paul miraculously healed the father of Publius the governor, of his bloody flux, and the other diseased people that were in the island. At the end of three months they re-embarked, and arrived first at Syracuse, in the south-east of Sicily, then at Rhegium, on the south of Italy. They coasted to the northward, till they came to Puteoli, where they landed.

After Paul had continued here seven days with his Christian friends, he set out for Rome. The Christians of that city met him at Appii-forum, and the Three Taverns; this mightily encouraged him. Whether the Jews did not prosecute their appeal, or whether it was at the time that nobody assisted the apostle to plead his cause, we know not. It is certain, he was permitted to live two years in his own hired house, with a soldier that kept him, and to preach the gospel to them that pleased to hear him. He sent for the principal Jews of the place, and related his case to them, to prevent their being imposed on by their brethren of Judea. They told him they had received no particular information concerning him; only they knew the Christians were every where spoken against, and they would be glad to hear an account of their doctrines from himself. From morning to night he explained to them the things concerning Jesus, out of Moses and the prophets. Observing that many of them believed not, he hinted, that according to Isaiah's prediction, they had heard the gospel, and hardened themselves against it, and that therefore it was sent to the gentiles, who were willing to receive it. Whether after these two years of imprisonment at large, he was dismissed, and went to Spain or Macedonia, and afterwards returned to Rome, or whether he was made a close prisoner, we know not; but it is certain his imprisonment turned out to the glory of Christ, and the spread of the gospel. Several of Nero's own household were converted. Many of the Christians in Lesser Asia were much alienated from him by means of their false teachers, Phygellus, Hermogenes, &c.; yet some from mere opposition against Paul, became more diligent in preaching the gospel. Providence however raised him up friends. Onesiphorus sought him out, and ministered to him. Onesimus, a slave who had run away from Philemon, was converted, and became very useful to him. The Philippians sent Epaphroditus to comfort him, and with some money to supply his wants. About this time, he wrote his epistle to the Colossians, and to Philemon; both which, it seems, he sent by Onesimus. Soon after, Demas forsook him, and he wrote his epistle to the Philippians, and probably sent it by Epaphroditus; that to the Galatians, by Crescens; and that to the Ephesians, by Tychicus. About the same time, he wrote his second epistle to Timothy, in which he desires him to come to Rome. After Timothy had come to Rome, and had been imprisoned and liberated, he wrote his epistle to the Hebrews. At last, it is said, his preaching converted one of Nero's favourite concubines. Enraged for the loss of his harlot, Nero caused Paul to be beheaded. Acts xxvii. xxviii. Phil. i. 12—19. and iv. 22. 2 Tim. i. 15—18. Phil. 10—14. Col. iv. 14. 2 Tim. iv. 9—21. As before his conversion, he was an outrageous enemy of Christ; after it, he became one of the most holy and humble men, and laborious preachers that ever lived; nor is his magnifying of his office and labour, in opposition to the false teachers, any evidence to the contrary, as he therein confutes them upon their own principles, and continually ascribes all he was and had done in the service of Christ, to the grace of God. Gal. i. and ii. 2 Cor. x. —xii. and 1 Cor. xv. 8—10.

PAW; the fore-foot of lions, bears, or such wild beasts, by which they catch and hold their prey. 1 Sam. xvii. 37. The horse paweth in the valley, when he stamps, and, as it were, tears up the ground with his fore-feet. Job xxxix. 21.

PAY; (1.) To give the price for a thing. Exod. xxii. 7. (2.) To give what a superior requires as his due. 2 Chron. viii. 8. Heb. vii. 9. (3.) To perform fully what one has vowed or promised. Eccl. v. 4. Deut. xxiii. 21, 23. Psal. xxxviii. 21; l. 14; lxi. 9. and lxxvi. 11. (4.) To give full satisfaction for every offence, is to pay the utmost farthing. Matt. v. 26.

PEACE, sometimes signifies prosperity of every kind. Gen. xli. 16. Num. vi. 26. Particularly, there is, (1.) Peace with God, or that happy privilege, whereby he, in Christ, becomes our reconciled Father and Friend, disposed and engaged to promote our real welfare, and do us no hurt, but good, in time and eternity. This is founded on our union to Christ, as the Lord our righteousness; but the comfortable enjoyment of it is obtained in the way of sanctification by his Spirit. Eph. ii. 14. 1 John iii. 19, 20. (2.) Peace of conscience, which is not that sleep and stupor of conscience common with wicked men; but a holy quietude of mind, arising from the belief and sense of our reconciliation with God, and of our being, by his grace, enabled to walk in gospel holiness. Rom. iv. 14, 17. Phil. iv. 7. 2 Cor. i. 12. (3.) Peace, or mutual agreement, among men, when they forbear warring against, and hurting one another. Psal. xxxiv. 14. cxii. 6. and vi. 4. 2 Kings xx. 10. Prov. xvi. 7. The state of heavenly blessedness, is called peace; there the most perfect rest and felicity abound; there is the most perfect friendship between God, angels, and men, and no enemy has access to disturb or molest. Isa. lvii. 2. God speaks peace, when he promises, proclaims, communicates, and accomplishes it for his people. Isa. lvii. 19. Psal. lxxv. 8. The peace of God, which rules in the saints, is peace with God, with their consciences, and with one another, which disposes them to live holily and peaceably. Col. iii. 15. The peace that Paul wishes to the churches, comprehends the friendship of God discovered to the soul: an inward quietude of conscience, as sprinkled with Jesus' blood, and directed by his law; mutual harmony with one another; and freedom from the molestation of the world; as far as can tend to the glory of God. Rom. i. 7. 1 Cor. i. 3.

PEACE-MAKERS; such as from love to God, are active in reconciling men one to another, in every thing good. Matt. v. 9.

PEACOCKS are of various kinds. Their head is ornamented with a crest of feathers. The peacock of the common kind, is perhaps the most showy fowl in nature. His tail, in its various colours, and the forms into which he spreads it, are sufficiently known and admired. He is extremely proud: but has a disagreeable voice, ugly feet, and soft pace. They shed their feathers when the trees cast their leaves; their flesh is hard and unpalatable. Peacocks are numerous in the East Indies. Alexander, when there, prohibited his army to kill them. Our translation of Job mentions peacocks; but probably the word ought to be rendered ostriches, as the feathers of their wings are more valuable than those of the wings of peacocks: Nor do we know whether the TOUCHIN, which Solomon's fleet brought from Ophir, be peacocks, or parrots. Job xxxix. 18. 1 Kings x. 22. There is also a fish with most beautiful fins, called the peacock-fish.

PEARL; a hard, white, shining body, found in some shell-fishes. It proceeds from a disease in the animal. The matter proper to enlarge the shell, bursting from the vessels that convey it to the outside, forms into a pearl. Common oysters, the pinna merina, and several other fish, form pearls; but the pearl-oysters of the East Indies, and of the Gulf of Mexico, in America, generally produce the best. The chief fisheries for pearl are at Bahrein in the Persian Gulf, and near the Isle of Ceylon in the East Indies. The next to these are the five pearl fisheries in the Gulf of Mexico. The pearls fished on the coast of Japan and Tartary, are far less valuable. The finest European pearls are chiefly procured upon the coasts of Scotland, or in the rivers of Bavaria in Germany. In fifty years, pearls generally lose their beauty; and in one hundred they are scarcely worth any thing. Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, had a pearl valued at £80,000 sterling. The Persian emperor had one worth £110,000 sterling: and Philip II. of Spain, had one as large as a pigeon's egg, valued at 144,000 ducats. Those our ladies wear in their necklaces, are generally false pearls, made of fish-scales, bruised, and inclosed in glass. Whatever is very excellent, as Christ, and the mysteries of the gospel, is likened to pearls: How mysterious their production! how precious! how difficult of attainment in a proper manner! how truly ornamental! and how apt are men to form base counterfeits of them! Matt. xiii. 46. Rev. xxi. 21, 22. The pearls of Antichrist are the relics of saints, pretended wood of the cross, and the like. Rev. xviii. 16. To cast pearls before swine, is to preach the gospel to persecutors; apply the promises and privileges proper to saints, to men really wicked; to dispense sacraments to persons naturally profane; or to administer reproofs to obstinate scoffers. Matt. vii. 6.

PECULIAR; whatever is separated to a special use. God's people are called peculiar; they are separated from the rest of the world, to his honour and service; they share special privileges, and are carefully preserved, and highly regarded by him. Exod. xix. 5. 1 Pet. ii. 9.

PEDIGREE; descent by parentage. Num. i. 18.

PEELED; stripped of bark, skin, clothes, or hair. The shoulders of the Chaldean besiegers of TYRE were peeled; the clothes, hair, and even the skin, were worn off them, by bearing so many burdens. Ezek.

xxix. 18. The Ethiopians were a people peeled; the scorching heat hindered the hair of their head or body to grow, and the Assyrians stripped them of their wealth. Isa. xviii. 2, 7.

PEEP; to speak softly, as a bird when it comes first out of its shell; to speak with a hollow voice, and, as it were, out of the belly, without opening of the lips. Isa. viii. 19.

PEKAH, the son of Remaliah, was general of Pekahiah king of Israel's army. In company with Argob and Arieah, and fifty Gileadites, he murdered his master in the second year of his reign, and reigned twenty years. Entering into a league with Rezin king of Syria, they intended to dethrone AHAB and the whole family of David, and set up the son of one Tabeel, to govern Judea as their tributary. Pekah's army cut off 120,000 men of Judah, and took 200,000 prisoners; by which he incurred the anger of God. They restored the prisoners with great humanity. Instigated by Abaz, Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria invaded the kingdom of Pekah, and murdered or carried away into captivity a great part of the Naphtalites, Eastern Manassites, Reubenites, and Gadites. At last Hoshea murdered Pekah, and reigned in his stead. Isa. vii. 1-7. 2 Kings xv. 25-30. 2 Chron. xxviii. 6-10.

PEKOD. See MEROTHAIM.

PEL-ATTAH. See ZEDEKIAH.

PE'LEG, or PHA'LEG, the son of Eber, and brother of Joktan. This name was given him, because in his days the language of men was confounded, and they were divided. As he was born but one hundred years after the flood, some can hardly believe the division of men at Babel could be so early as his birth; but as it is certain men might increase so fast as to afford a sufficient number of hands to build the tower of Babel at the time of his birth, so it is possible his father might give him this name by the spirit of prophecy, because the earth would be divided just before his death, which was 299 years later. Gen. x. 25. Luke iii. 35.

PELICAN; a fowl of the goose kind, with a long crooked beak, and the fore part of the head (towards the throat) naked. Cormorants and shags are of the pelican kind: but pelicans, properly so called, are about twice as big as a swan, and have a bag at their throat sufficiently large to hold two human heads. They frequent deserts, and are extremely careful of their young. It is said they sometimes feed them with their own blood, and will flap their wings over their kindled nest, to blow out the fire, till themselves be burnt. Deut. xiv. 17. David, in his distress, was like a pelican, or bittern of the wilderness; in a very lonely and mournful condition. Psal. cii. 6.

PEN; an instrument for writing with. Isaiah wrote with a man's pen; in characters easy to be read, not like those written by the angel on Belshazzar's wall. Isa. viii. 1. The saints' tongues are like the pen of a ready writer, when their hearts promptly conceive, and their mouths readily proclaim the praises of Jesus Christ. Psal. xiv. 1. Men's sins are written with a pen of iron, end point of a diamond, when they are so fixed in their heart, that they still remember, hold fast, and practise them. Jer. xvii. 1.

PE-N'IEL, or PE-NU'EL; a place on the east of Jordan, near the brook Jabbok; so called, because here Jacob, in his wrestling, saw the face of God, or enjoyed familiar intercourse with him. Gen. xxxii. 24—28. Here the Gadites built a city; but as a punishment for the inhabitants' refusal of refreshment to Gideon's troops, many of them were killed, and their tower demolished. Judg. viii. 8, 9, 15, 17. Jeroboam the son of Nebat rebuilt it, and perhaps, erected a palace for himself there. 1 Kings xii. 25.

PE-NIN'NAH. See HANNAH.

PEN'TE-COST. See FEAST.

PENNY; a Roman coin, equal to sevenpence three-farthings sterling. It was the hire of a labourer for a day's work; and hence the reward of eternal life, for which we prepare in our day of life, is spoken of as a penny. Matt. xx. 1—15. The two pence, given by Jesus to his ministers, who take care of his people in the church militant, are the two testaments of his word; or the law and gospel, or gifts and graces; or the reward of grace here, and glory hereafter. Luke x. 35.

PEOPLE; NATION, FOLE; (1.) The fathers of particular nations, Gen. xxv. 13; and so one is made a great nation, when his seed are multiplied into one. Exod. xxxii. 10. (2.) The persons that compose a kingdom or nation, whether poor or rich. 1 Sam. xv. 30. (3.) The vulgar or common inhabitants of a city or nation. Matt. xii. 37. Luke xxiii. 14. (4.) The gentiles. Psal. cxvii. 1. Gen. xlix. 10. (5.) Both Jews and gentiles. Luke ii. 10. (6.) A kind of animals. Prov. xxx. 25, 26. Israel and the church are called God's people; the Hebrews were separated from other nations, to enter into his covenant, enjoy his favour, and observe his laws. Church-members in general are his by outward profession; and real saints are actually his people; chosen from eternity, purchased with his blood united to his person, enriched with his blessing, and employed in his service. Exod. vi. 7. Matt. i. 21. And they are the people of his holiness, or holy people, or nation; separated by God to himself, sanctified by his Spirit, and qualified for his holy service. Isa. lxiii. 18. and lxiii. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Those who are not God's people, are represented as no people. Hos. i. 10. and ii. 23. Rom. x. 19. 1 Pet. ii. 10. The Jews were the rebellious people that imagined a vain thing against Christ, and refused the offers of his grace. Psal. ii. 1. Isa. lxx. 2. The people of Chemosh, are the Moabites, who worshipped that idol. Num. xxi. 25. The Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, &c. were the unknown people that served David. 2 Sam. xxii. 54. The people of the prince that destroyed Jerusalem, were the Roman army, directed by Titus the emperor's son. Dan. ix. 26. The people inhabiting the wilderness, that had the heads of Pharaoh and his army drowned in the Red sea for food, are either the wild beasts about the shores, who fed on their carcases, or the Hebrews, who mightily rejoiced at their overthrow. Psal. lxxiv. 13, 14.

PE'OR. See ABARIM; BAALPEOR.

PERCEIVE; (1.) To take notice; to have sure knowledge of. Gen. xix. 33. Acts x. 34. (2.) To discover, find out. 2 Sam. xiv. 1. Jer. xxxviii. 27. (3.) Spiritually to consider things, in order to a right improvement thereof. Deut. xxix. 4. He passeth on, and I perceive him not; God proceeds on in his course of providence towards men; but I cannot understand the ground, manner, or end of his work. Job ix. 11.

PERDITION; destruction. Judas was a son of perdition, i. e. one that richly deserved it, and was divinely appointed to it. John xvii. 12. Antichrist is a son of perdition; a noted destroyer of others; and Popes, and other chief agents, are divinely destined to endless ruin. 2 Thess. ii. 3.

PERFECT; to finish a work, and render it full and complete. Psal. cxxxviii. 8.

PERFECT; (1.) That which is complete, and wants nothing. Deut. xxv. 15. (2.) That which is fully manifested in its perfection; so Christ's strength is made perfect, by occasion of his people's weakness. 2 Cor. xii. 9; and faith is made perfect by works. James ii. 22. God is perfect; possesses every possible excellency in an unbounded degree. Matt. v. 48. His work is perfect; is altogether righteous and holy, and leaves nothing necessary undone. Deut. xxxii. 4. Christ is perfected, or made perfect, when his course of bond-service in our room is finished. Luke xiii. 32. Heb. ii. 10. and v. 9. Christ, by one offering, hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified; hath paid the full price of their salvation, and infallibly secured its perfection and eternal duration. Heb. x. 14. God's law is perfect; enjoins every duty by the highest authority, and enforces with the strongest motives. Psal. xix. 7. Ministers are perfect, when they are thoroughly instructed, and fitted for their office. 2 Tim. iii. 17. The saints are perfect. (1.) As they stand in Christ, having his righteousness imputed to them. Col. i. 28. and ii. 10. (2.) When fully sanctified, and no remains of sin left in them. Heb. xii. 23. (3.) As even in their imperfect condition, they have every particular grace, and aim at the highest degree of each; they want nothing absolutely necessary to a state of salvation; they have more excellent dispositions and behaviour than their neighbours, and are blameless in their holy conversation. Job viii. 20. Gen. vi. 9. 2 Cor. xiii. 11. The love of God is perfected in their loving one another; God's love to them is manifested in drawing their heart to this, and theirs to God is manifested in loving others for his sake. 1 John ii. 5. and iv. 12. The Jewish teachers were perfect, i. e. blameless, and almost without error or sin, in their own conceit. Isa. xlii. 19. Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul, I would despise my life; though God should assail me, I would not esteem, nor request long life; or suppose I had no sin, I would not plead upon that before God, but undervalue the holiness of my life. Job ix. 21.

PERFECTION is, (1.) The full ripeness of fruit. Luke viii. 14. (2.) The most excellent things on earth, as honour, wealth, pleasure, learning; and to see an end of this, is to see how insufficient it, or any thing but God himself, is to satisfy an immortal soul. Psal. cxix. 96. (3.) The more mysterious principles of the Christian faith. Heb. vi. 1. (4.) The full measure and degree of excellency, holiness, or happiness. 2 Cor. xiii. 9. To find out the Almighty to perfection, is fully to know and comprehend all his unnumbered and unbounded excellencies. Job. xi. 7. If perfection had been by the Levitical priesthood; if sin had been truly and fully expiated, and the complete and endless holiness and happiness of men secured, by the sacrifices and other ceremonies of the Old Testament. Heb. vii. 11. The perfecting of the saints, is the rendering their graces more strong and active, till they become perfectly holy, without the least remains of sinful imperfection. Eph. iv. 11.

PERFORM; much the same as to FULFIL a promise, request, law, or work. Jer. xxviii. 6. Esth. v. 8. Jer. xxiv. 18. Phil. i. 6. God performs all things for his people; whatever tends to their real good, whatever they ask in faith, he does for, and in them; and enables them to every good word and work. Psal. lvii. 2. Job xxiii. 14. God performs the counsel of his messengers, when he executes the purposes declared by the prophets, in promises and threatenings. Isa. xlv. 26.

PERFUME; whatever emits an agreeable scent. The Hebrews had two sacred perfumes, one of INCENSE, and the other an OIL. Exod. xxx. 23—38. They perfumed dead bodies, clothes, beds, &c. Gen. xxvii. 27. Sol. Song iii. 6. Prov. vii. 17. Psal. xlv. 8. See EMBALMING; SPICES.

PERGA; an inland city of Pamphylia, on the river Caystrus, near to which, on an eminence, stood a temple of Diana. It was famed for the birth of Apollonius, the renowned geometrician. Here Paul and Barnabas preached oftener than once, Acts xiii. 14. and xiv. 25; and to the end of the eighth century we find a Christian church here, sometimes not a little eminent. It is at present of little or no importance. There was another Perga in Epirus.

PERGA-MOS; a city of Proconsular Asia, on the river Caicus, about forty miles north-west of Thyatira, and sixty-four northward of Smyrna, and in a country very fertile of corn. The place was famed for a temple to Esculapius the god of physic, and more so for the famed library of 200,000 volumes collected by Attalus one of its kings. For about one hundred and fifty years, from A. M. 3721, to 3870, Pergamos was the capital of a considerable kingdom, which was generally in friendship with the Romans, and was bequeathed by the last king to them; but perhaps the Romans forged this testament, at least they explained it as they pleased. A Christian church was very early planted at Pergamos: but they quickly degenerated from their purity, and tolerated the Nicolaitans, and such as taught to commit fornication, and eat things sacrificed to idols. For these things, Jesus sharply reproves them in a letter by John. It is hoped this missive produced their reformation. Rev. ii. 12—17. For seven or eight hundred years, the church here was of considerable note; but at present the Christians are reduced to about fifteen miserable families, and the Turks are but about 2000 or 3000.

PERILOUS; full of danger. 2 Tim. iii. 1.

PERISH; (1.) To lose natural life. John i. 6. (2.) To be rooted out of honour, happiness, or life. 2 Kings ix. 8. Mic. vii. 2. (3.) To be rendered useless. Jer. ix. 12. (4.) To cease to be. James i. 11. (5.) To starve for hunger. Luke xv. 17. (6.) To be tormented in soul, and hurt in practice. 1 Cor. viii. 11. (7.) To be damned, and cast into hell. 2 Pet. ii. 12.

PERJURED; one who swears falsely, or breaks a lawful oath. 1 Tim. i. 10.

PE-RIZ'ZITES; a tribe of the ancient Canaanites, so called, perhaps, because they dwelt in unvalled villages. They seem to have been dispersed among the other tribes, as near Bethel, Gen. xiii. 7; and in Mount Ephraim. Josh. xvii. 15. Judg. iii. 5. The tribe of Judah expelled such as dwelt within their bounds. Judg. i. 4. Solomon laid the remains of them under tribute. 2 Chron. viii. 7. Some of them remained after the captivity, and intermarried with the Hebrews. Ezra ix. 1.

PERMIT; (1.) To cease from hindering. 1 Cor. vii. 6. (2.) To allow. 1 Cor. xiv. 34.

PERNICIOUS; extremely hurtful and ruinous. 2 Pet. ii. 2.

PERPETUAL: (1.) Continual, uninterrupted. Ezek. xxxv. 5. The incense was perpetual, i. e. offered every evening and morning. Exod. xxx. 9. (2.) What continues for a long time, as to the death of Christ: so the ceremonial laws were perpetual, Exod. xxix. 9; or to the end of the world. Jer. xxv. 9.

PERPLEXED; in such fear or distress as not to know what to do. Esth. iii. 15.

PERSECUTE; to seek after and improve all occasions of doing one hurt, especially on account of his steadfast cleaving to the truths and ways of God. Job xix. 22. Matt. v. 11. Ishmael persecuted Isaac, by mocking and reproaching him. Gal. iv. 29. God persecutes men, when he pursues them with his judgments in every place and condition they are in. Lam. iii. 66. Psal. xxxv. 6. Christ is persecuted, when his people, who are united with, and dear to him, are for his cause reproached, harassed, and murdered. Acts ix. 4. Though persecution for conscience' sake is contrary to the genius of Christianity, yet pretenders to it have very often, for their own carnal ends, persecuted their fellow-professors.

PERSEVERANCE; the continuance in a state, or in a course of action, notwithstanding of much opposition. Eph. vi. 18. Whatever partial decays of grace the saints really have; and though, if left to themselves, they would lose their whole stock of grace; and though the use of watchfulness, and of other means of steadfastness, is necessary to their perseverance in their gracious state, nature, and course; yet their total or final fall from the same is evidently inconsistent with a multitude of scriptures; inconsistent with the unchangeable love, the justice, the wisdom, and faithfulness of God; inconsistent with his unchangeable purposes, promises, covenant, and oath; inconsistent with the honour of the Father as their choicer, as the giver of them to Christ for his reward, and as their establisher and keeper; inconsistent with the honour of the Son as their purchaser, advocate, builder, shepherd, husband, life, and one body and spirit with them; inconsistent with the honour of the Holy Ghost, who is in them as a perpetual inhabitant, worker, comforter, fountain springing up to everlasting life, the seal of redemption, and earnest of their glory. Job xvii. 9. Prov. iv. 18. and x. 25. Psal. ii. 8. cxv. 2. and cii. 28. Isa. xlv. 10. liv. 8—10. lix. 20, 21. and liii. 10. Jer. xxxii. 39—42. Hos. ii. 19, 20. Matt. xvi. 18. and xxiv. 24. Luke xxii. 32. John iv. 14. vi. 27, 35, 39, 40, 54—58. x. 10, 28, 29. xiii. 1. xiv. 16, 17, 19. and xvii. 6, 12, 15, 20, 24. Acts xiii. 48. Rom. v. 21. viii. 28—39. ix. 23. and xi. 28. 1 Cor. i. 8, 9. vi. 15—19. x. 13. 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. and iii. 3. Gal. ii. 20. Eph. i. 13, 14. iv. 30. and v. 25—30. Phil. i. 6. and ii. 13. Col. iii. 3. 1 Thess. v. 8, 9, 23, 34. 2 Thess. iii. 3. 2 Tim. ii. 19. Tit. ii. 14. Heb. iii. 3. vi. 17—19. 1 Pet. i. 5. and ii. 9. 1 John ii. 19. and iii. 9.

PERSI-A, or ELAM; an ancient kingdom in Middle Asia, on the south side of Media, and south-east of Assyria and Chaldaea. The Persians were anciently called Elamites, and sprung from Elam the eldest son of Shem, and their original residence was called Elymais. Chedorlaomer, one of their first kings, was a noted conqueror. Gen. xiv. About the time of Jehoshaphat, one Memnon the son of Aurora, seems to have been their king. The Oriental histories tempt me to suppose that their kingdom still continued with perhaps some small interruptions. The Assyrians extended their conquests over the Persians; but under Achenides, they revolted about the same time with the Medes. The government continued in his family till the Chaldeans ravaged their country. Jer. xxv. 25, 27. and xlix. 35—39. After this the country was in a wretched condition till Cyrus appeared on the stage. He connected it with the kingdom of Media, and subdued the kingdoms of Assyria, Egypt, and Lybia; and by his great wisdom, settled the empire on so very solid a foundation, that notwithstanding the folly of many of his successors, it continued about two hundred and eight years. His son Cambyzes, during the seven years of his reign, was famous almost for nothing, besides mad murders, and the furious ravage of Egypt. Darius Hystaspessoon killed the pretended Smerdis, and reigned thirty-six years. He took and demolished part of the walls of Babylon, but supplied the inhabitants who survived his cruelties with 50,000 women, instead of their wives, which themselves had murdered during the siege. To revenge the Scythian invasion of Upper Asia about a hundred and twenty years before, he invaded Scythia. He conquered Thrace in Europe, and part of East India; reduced the rebellious Ionians in Asia; but his expedition into Greece cost him the ruin of a great part of his army. Xerxes his son having fallen heir to the kingdom, and excessive wealth of his covetous father, reduced the rebellious Egyptians; stirred up the Carthaginians to attack the Greeks in Sicily, while himself with an army of about 5,283,000 persons, but not half of them warriors, invaded Greece. These were mostly cut off by the Greeks at Thermopylae, Plataea, Salamis, and Mycale. After twelve years, he was succeeded by Artaxerxes Longimanus his son, who sent Ezra and Nehemiah to promote the welfare of the Jews. He reduced the Egyptians to a still more grievous servitude. After a reign of forty-one years, he was succeeded by Xerxes his son. He, after one year, was murdered by Sogdianus his bastard brother; and he, in other seven months, by Darius Nothus, or Ochus, another bastard brother. After a reign of eighteen years, he was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes Mnemon. His defeating of his brother Cyrus, his victory over the Lacedaemonians, his difficult reduction of Cyprus, and his struggles with the Egyptians, are the most noted events of his long reign of about forty-five years. Artaxerxes Ochus his son, after murdering his two elder brethren, succeeded him. After a cruel reign of twenty-three years, in which he ravaged Egypt, Phœnicia, and part of Judea, he, and soon after Arses his son, were murdered by Bagoas a eunuch; and Darius Codomannus, a very distant relation, was placed on the throne, in whose time the Persian empire was quite overturned by Alexander and the Greeks. Isa. xlv. 11. xli. 2, 3, 25. xlv. 1—5, 13. and xlv. 28. Dan. ii. 32. vii. 4, 5, 12. x. 13, 20. viii. 2—7, 20, 21, and xi. 2, 3. Numb. xxiv. 24.

From A. M. 3675 to 3754, Persia was wholly under the dominion of the Greeks; and Elymais, and other of the western parts, were so long afterwards; but the Parthians gradually rendered themselves masters of the whole of it. About A. M. 4236, or A. D. 332, Artaxerxes, a noble prince of the Persians, seized the kingdom. Twenty-eight kings of his family reigned in succession above four hundred years. Some of them were cruel persecutors of the Christians. Many of them had violent struggles of war with the Roman emperors.

Hitherto a kind of Deism had been the established religion of Persia. They had neither temples, nor statues, nor altars, nor did they believe there was need for any, as God was every where. They sacrificed to the elements and heavenly luminaries, as symbols of him. They learned much of their idolatry from the Assyrians and Chaldeans; but Zoroaster or Zerdush, a subtle fellow, perhaps an apostate disciple of the prophet Ezekiel, about the time of Darius Hystaspes, mightily reformed their religious system. His scheme continued as long as their kingdom: nay, those who call themselves Persees, and pretend to be the true Persians, still retain it. They hold one eternal God, and a good and evil principle under him: they regard light as the symbol of the good, and darkness of the bad one. They maintain that the world was created in six days, and one man and one woman created to be the common parents of mankind; and that the good principle of light withdrawing himself, the child of darkness will, at the last day, produce a dissolution of nature. About A.D. 634, the Saracens spread themselves into Persia, and established their Mahometan delusion: but for the most part, the Persians have been of the sect of Ali, the son-in-law of Mahomet; and are heartily despised by the Turks, and others of the sect of Omar. After the Saracen Caliphs had governed Persia by their sultans about four hundred and twenty years, the Turks, who for some ages before had poured themselves into it while it was under the government of the Buïdes, seized the sovereignty, A.D. 1055. Tangrolipix, and his Seljukian successors, ruled it till about A.D. 1260, when Halon the son of Jenghis-kan the famed Tartar, wrested it from them. After he, and eight of his descendants, had swayed the sceptre, Tamerlane, another Tartarian prince, seized it, about A.D. 1400, and left it to Mirza his son. Contention raged in his family till they were all driven from the throne, and Usumcassan the Turkman king of Armenia seized on it A.D. 1472. His male line quickly failed; but Ishmael, his grandson by his daughter, whom he had married to Sheik Eïdar the famed preacher, after his father had been murdered, struggled into the throne A.D. 1499. The sovereignty continued in his family for eleven generations. Some of his successors were absolute infernals in cruelty and murder. Husseyn, the last, and one of the best of them, was wickedly dethroned in 1722, and afterwards murdered by the wretch Myr-weis. Not long after his death, the famous Kuli-kan mounted the throne, subdued the Moguls, chastised the Turks, and attempted to change the religion of his country into a conformity with that of other Mahometans; but he was murdered. With terrible struggling, Kerimkan, we hear, got himself enthroned about 1768, after the country had almost forty years been a shocking scene of treachery and murder. Millions had perished in ways the most wretched. At present, the Persian empire is very large, bounded with the Turkish on the west, with the Russian on the north, and with that of the Mogul on the south, and with Tartary on the east. I know of few Christians in it, except the Armenians, who have fifteen or sixteen churches at Zulpha, the famed suburb of Ispahan the capital; and some others on the south and west of the Caspian sea, who scarcely deserve the name.

PERSOE; (1.) A particular man. Gen. xiv. 21. Job xxii. 29. (2.) When joined with accept, person, or face, it denotes external qualities, conditions, country, friends, wealth, poverty, or the like. Luke xx. 21. Acts x. 34. The word Person when applied to the Godhead denotes the Godhead itself, as subsisting with some distinct and natural relation to another person possessed of the same nature: thus the first person stands related as a father to the second, and the second stands related as a son to him. Heb. l. 3.

By the person of Christ is ordinarily meant, the Son of God as our Mediator, clothed with our nature: and to forgive a thing in the person of Christ, is to absolve from censure in his name and authority; as he who acts in the stead or authority of another, sustains their person in a law-sense 2 Cor. ii. 10.

PERSUADE; (1.) To convince, to make to believe. Luke xvi. 31. (2.) Effectually to advise or excite to the performance of something. 9 Chron. xxii. 11. 1 Kings xxxii. 20. Prov. xxii. 15. Acts xiv. 19. God persuades Japheth, when he makes multitudes of his offspring believe the gospel, and become members of his church. Gen. ix. 27. Men are persuaded, when they are truly and satisfactorily assured of a thing. Heb. vi. 9. and xi. 13. Rom. viii. 38. and xiv. 5. Do I persuade men, or God? Do I preach the things of men, or of God? Is it for the sake of men or of God, that I excite men to believe and obey the gospel? Gal. i. 10.

PERVERSENESS; PROWARDNESS; a contentious disposition, ready to oppose what is reasonable and good. Prov. xi. 33. Men go on prowardly, when, contrary to the commands, invitations, threatenings, promises, corrections of God, and their own interest and consciences, they persevere in evil courses. Isa. lvii. 17. With the proward, God shews himself proward; with such as rebel against his word and providence, he shews himself their hearty opposer, and almighty resister and punisher. 2 Sam. xxii. 27.

PERVERT; to put out of order; turn things upside down. To pervert persons, is to seduce them into sinful courses. Isa. xlvii. 10. Luke xxiii. 2. To pervert one's way, is forwardly to do wickedness. Jer. lii. 21. Prov. xix. 8. To pervert the right ways of the Lord, is falsely to reproach and misrepresent the truths and ordinances of Jesus Christ, and his people's compliance with them. Acts xiii. 10. To pervert the gospel, or words of the living God, is to mix them with error, or improve them to support wickedness. Gal. i. 7. Jer. xxiii. 30. To pervert judgment, is to dispense it unjustly, for the sake of gain, favour, or like carnal motives. Deut. xxvii. 19.

PESTILENCE. See PLAGUE.

PETER, the son of Jonas, and brother of Andrew. He was a native of Bethsaida: his original name was Simon; but Jesus called him Cephas, or Peter, i. e. a stone, or rock, to mark his need of steadiness in his faith and practice. He married a woman of Capernaum; and his mother-in-law was cured of a fever by our Saviour. Mark i. 29. Invited by Andrew his brother, he went and saw Jesus, and staid with him a night. About a year after, Jesus found them washing their nets, as they ceased from fishing on the sea of Galilee. He requested the use of their boat to sit in and teach the people. After he had done so, to reward their kindness, and manifest his own power, he ordered them to cast their net into the sea for a draught. They had fished the whole night before, and caught nothing; but, in obedience to our Saviour, they now caught such a multitude of fishes as loaded their own boat, and also that of James and John. Astonished at the draught, Peter begged our Saviour to depart, as he was too holy and great to stay in the company of one so sinful. Instead of complying with his request, Jesus called Peter and Andrew, James and John, to be his disciples. John i. 40, 41, 43. Luke v. 1—11. Matt. iv. Peter and Andrew were the two who were first sent forth of the apostles, being, it is probable, the eldest. Luke vi. 14. Matt. x. 2. Peter being extremely forward in his temper, when he saw our Saviour coming, walking on the sea, requested permission to meet him on the water. He had scarcely entered the water, when doubting of his safety, he cried for help. Jesus preserved him, and rebuked him for the weakness of his faith. Matt. xiv. 28—31. When, some time after, Jesus asked his disciples, if they would leave him, as many others had lately done, Peter replied, they could go with safety no where else, as he alone had the words of, and the power to bestow, eternal life. John vi. 66—68. When at Caesarea Philippi, Jesus asked his disciples, whom they believed him to be. Peter replied, that they were firmly persuaded he was Christ the Son of the living God. Jesus blessed him, and hinted, that such knowledge and faith had been given him by the Spirit of God; and assured him, that as certainly as he was Peter, he would so build his church by his means, upon that person and truth he had confessed, that all the gates (or powers) of hell should not overthrow it. He added, that to him and his fellow apostles, and their successors in the ministry, he would give the power of founding, instructing, and governing his church; and that whatever condemnation or absolution they should, according to his word, give either in doctrine or discipline, should be ratified in heaven. When Jesus, almost immediately after, foretold his sufferings, Peter rebuked him, and bade him spare himself. Jesus sharply reproved him, and told him, Satan had tempted him to say so; and that his speech savoured not of God, but of carnal indulgence. It was scarcely eight days after, when Peter was admitted to witness our Saviour's transfiguration. He, on the sight of Moses and Elias, foolishly asked leave to build three tabernacles, one for his Master, and one for each of those prophets. Matt. xvi. 13—23. and xvii. 1—4. As Peter and his Master, some time after, entered into Capernaum, where it seems they were enrolled as residents, the collectors of the Roman tribute asked him, if his Master paid tribute. Jesus, knowing it, ordered Peter to cast a line into the sea, and open the mouth of the fish that came first up, and he should find a shekel of silver to give as tribute for them both. Matt. xxvii. 24—27. When Jesus afterward discoursed of forgiveness of injuries, Peter asked him, if it was proper to forgive any oftener than seven times. Jesus told him, he must forgive as often as was necessary, though it were even to seventy times seven. Matt. xviii. 21, 22. When our Saviour disconsred of the danger of riches, Peter asked him what reward he and his fellow disciples should have, who had left their boats, nets, and all they had in the world, to follow him. Jesus replied, that such as, in the commencement of his gospel church, truly followed him, from an inward principle of grace, should have distinguished honour in the church, and at the last day; and that every one who truly followed him amid his persecutions, should enjoy fellowship with him a hundred times more excellent than all they could have in this world. Matt. xix. 27—30. On the Tuesday before our Saviour's passion, Peter observed to him, how quickly the fig-tree he had cursed was withered; and was advised to improve the event, as an excitement to faith and fervent prayer. Matt. xxi. 19, 20, 23. Mark xi. 11—21. Either on that, or the Thursday evening, Peter refused to allow Jesus to wash his feet; but being told that unless he washed him, he could have no part in him, begged to have not only his feet, but also his hands and his head washed. Jesus told him, that such as had once been washed in his blood, needed no repeated justification, but only to have their daily blots of infirmity purged off. John xiii. 1—17. At the one or other of these times, Peter instigated John to ask that Jesus would point out which of them was to be the traitor. John xiii. 24—26. He, together with Andrew, James, and John, asked Jesus, when the temple should be destroyed, and he would return to judge the world. Matt. xxiv. 1—3. On Thursday, he and John, by their Master's order, found an upper room, and there prepared every thing necessary for the passover feast. Luke xxii. 8—12.

When, after the sacred supper, Jesus warned his apostles of their being offended because of him that night, Peter, with his ordinary rashness, declared, that though every other should forsake his Master, he never would; but would follow and die with him, rather than in the least deny him. Jesus assured him, that before the cock crew twice, he would deny him thrice; and that Satan had desired to have permission to sift and tempt him and his fellow disciples, but he had prayed for him, that his faith might not quite fail; and he admonished him to comfort and encourage his brethren as soon as he himself was recovered. John xiii. 36—31. Matt. xxvi. 31—35. Luke xxii. 31—34.

When Peter, James, and John, were taken by our Lord into the garden, to witness his bloody agony, they quickly fell asleep. Jesus, after his three different prayers, awakened them. He asked them if they could not watch with him one hour. He kindly hinted that their spirit was willing, but their flesh was weak. When he awakened them, as Judas approached, he ironically bade them sleep on. When Judas came with his band, Peter, being one of the two disciples that had swords, drew his, and cut off the ear of Malchus, the high priest's servant. Jesus rebuked him, and ordered him to put up his sword, otherwise it might occasion his death. Peter at a distance followed our Saviour to the palace of Caiaphas; and by means of another disciple got access into the hall, and waited among the high priest's servants to see the issue. A maid looked at him, and said, she had certainly seen him with Jesus of Nazareth. He denied that he so much as knew him. Peter went out to the porch, and the cock crew for the first time. Soon after, another maid said to those that stood by, that certainly he was one of the followers of Jesus.

He denied it with an oath. About an hour after, one of the company affirmed he was a disciple of Jesus; and others insisted, that he certainly was, and that his very speech proved him to be a Galilean; and finally, a kinsman of Malchus said, Did not I see thee in the garden with him? To give them what he thought full assurance he was no follower of Jesus, he began to curse and to swear that he did not so much as know him. At that very instant the cock crew for the second time, and Jesus gave Peter a look. He remembered his Master's prediction of his treachery, and went out and wept bitterly, and it is probable, continued his mourning till he heard our Saviour was risen from the dead. Matt. xxvi. 40—47, 69—75. John xviii. 10, 11, 15—27.

On the morning of the resurrection, Peter and John, hearing that their Master's body was removed from the grave, ran to see if it was so. Peter went down into the sepulchre, and saw the grave clothes laid in order, but the body was gone. Filled with perplexity, they returned to the rest of the disciples. When Jesus appeared to the women, he ordered them in a particular manner to inform disconsolate Peter, that he was risen from the dead. It was not long after when Peter had the pleasure to see his Master repeatedly at Jerusalem, along with the other apostles. When, some time after, Peter and some other of the apostles were fishing on the sea of Tiberias, Jesus appeared on the shore. No sooner had Peter heard that it was their Lord, than, impelled by strong affection, he threw himself into the sea, and swam to the shore. After they had dined, Jesus thrice asked him, if he loved him above every thing else. Peter as often, and at the third time with some vehemence and grief, appealed to him, that he knew he did: Jesus thrice charged him to feed his people, sheep, or lambs. Much about the same time, Jesus told him that he must endure bonds and imprisonment for his sake, in his old age. He asked Jesus what then should become of John the beloved disciple? Jesus directed him to follow his own example and cleave to his cause, and leave the fate of John to him. Mark xvi. 6, 7. John xx. 1—8. and xxi.

Very soon after our Saviour's ascension, Peter proposed to the Christians at Jerusalem, to elect another, to fill the place of Judas; and Matthias was chosen. On the tenth day, when the Hebrews from every part, were gathered to the feast of Pentecost, Peter and his fellow apostles, endowed with the Holy Ghost, spoke in a diversity of languages to the assembly. The Jews from Parthia, Media, Persia, Mesopotamia, Judea, Cappadocia, Pontus, Proconsular Asia, Phrygia, Pamphylia, Egypt, Lybia, Rome, Crete, and Arabia, heard them in the respective languages of their countries. The people were astonished, but some profane scoffers said they were drunken. Peter, standing up with the other eleven, declared that not wine, but the Holy Ghost, which according to the ancient promises, had descended on them, enabled them thus to speak with tongues, and that it afforded demonstrative proof that Jesus was risen from the dead, and gone to his Father's right hand; and was constituted the Sovereign and sole Saviour of men. Multitudes were deeply convinced of sin, and besought the apostle to inform them how they might be saved. Peter, as the mouth of the rest, directed them to believe the new covenant promises made to them and their seed, and to repent and be baptized, for the remission of their sins, through Jesus' blood. That very day 3000 believed, and were added to the Christian church. Acts i. and ii.

When, some days after, Peter and John went up to the temple about nine o'clock in the morning, which was the hour of prayer, a man who had been a cripple from his birth, sitting at the beautiful gate of the temple, asked alms of them. Peter told him he had neither silver nor gold to give him; but in the name of Jesus charged him to rise and walk. The man was immediately cured, and went along with them through the court of the temple, leaping and praising God. He held Peter and John, and declared to the assembling multitude how they had healed him. Peter told the admiring crowd, that they had not made this man to walk by their own power, but by the influence of Jesus Christ, whom they had lately murdered, and who had risen from the dead, and ascended to glory. He shewed them that Jesus was the promised Messiah, which whosoever rejected, should certainly perish; and that God having raised him from the dead, had sent him to them first, in the offer of the gospel, and power of his Spirit, to bless them, in turning them from their iniquities. This sermon was blessed for the conversion of 5000. About even tide, the priests and Sadducees apprehended Peter, and John, and put them in prison. Next day they were brought before the council, and interrogated how they had cured the lame man. They replied, it was done by the authority and power of Christ, whom the council had lately crucified, but God had raised from the dead. As the council knew that Peter and John were men of no education, they were surprised at their answers. They charged them to preach no more concerning Jesus, or as authorized by him. Peter and John bade them to judge whether it was best to disobey God or the council. After further threatenings, they went to their brethren the apostles and believers, and related what had happened. They all praised God, and solemnly prayed for further strength for his work. The house shook, and the Holy Ghost fell upon them in a further degree. Acts iii. and iv.

As the believers expected the approaching ruin of their country, according to their Master's prediction, or the loss of their estates by persecution, many of them sold them, and gave the apostles the money, to be laid out for pious uses. ANANIAS, and Sapphira his wife, sold theirs; but deceitfully kept part of the price to themselves. Peter detected their fraud. Both of them were judiciously cut off by sudden death. This tended to increase the awe felt for the character of the apostles. Multitudes believed the gospel, and vast numbers of diseased persons were miraculously healed. Peter and the other apostles were imprisoned; but an angel released them, and they returned directly to preach in the courts of the temple. Their escape surprised the council; but they apprehended them again, and reminded them of their former charge. Peter replied, that they determined to obey God rather men; and told them, that God had highly exalted Jesus, whom they had murdered, to be a Prince and Saviour; and had testified this by the gifts and miracles of the Holy Ghost, so notorious among his followers. Provoked by this, the council were for murdering them directly, had not Gamaliel in a sensible speech prevailed on them to abandon their purpose. Acts v.

After the deacons were chosen, Stephen, one of them, was murdered, and a persecution scattered the Christian preachers; the Samaritans received the gospel by Philip the deacon; Peter and John went thither to confer the Holy Ghost by laying on of their hands. Simon the sorcerer, who had been lately baptized, offered them a sum of money for a share of their miraculous powers. Peter bade him and his money perish together, as he had supposed the gifts of God could be purchased with money; and told him, that he had no title to the ministerial work, but was evidently in the gall of bitterness, and bonds of iniquity, under the reigning power of his corrupt lusts; and directed him to pray to God, if perhaps the wickedness of his heart might be forgiven him. After preaching through most of Samaria, Peter and John returned to Jerusalem.

The conversion of Paul having stopped, or at least abated the Jewish persecution, Peter went to visit the believers in Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. At Lydda, he recovered Eneas, who had been ill of a palsy eight years. At Joppa, he restored Tabitha to life. Acts viii. 1—26. and ix. 32—43. While he lodged at Joppa with one Simon a tanner, CORNELIUS, a gentile centurion, directed of God, sent messengers for him, to instruct him and his friends in the way of the Lord. Meanwhile, God prepared Peter by a vision for this mission. About mid-day, as he was alone on the top of the house, the roof being flat, and was very hungry, he fell into a trance, wherein he saw, as it were, a great sheet full of animals, clean and unclean, let down from heaven; and heard a voice calling him to rise, kill, and eat. He replied, that he never had eaten of any unclean animals; the voice replied, that it was improper he should think that unclean which God hath cleansed. All this was thrice repeated; and then the sheet was apparently carried up into heaven. He had scarcely awakened out of his trance, when the messengers of Cornelius arrived to invite him to preach to these gentiles. After hearing what had led their master to call him, and considering the import of his vision, he went along with them, and instructed and baptized Cornelius and his family. The Jewish converts at Jerusalem were at first offended with his going to the gentiles; but when they heard how Cornelius was divinely directed to call him; how he was by his vision directed to undervalue none whom God had regarded; and how the miraculous influences of the Holy Ghost fell upon Cornelius and his friends, as he preached to them, they were satisfied, and blessed God for granting unto the gentiles repentance unto life. Acts x. and xi. 1—18.

While he continued at Jerusalem, Paul lodged with him two weeks. Gal. i. 18. To gratify the Jews, Herod Agrippa imprisoned him, intending to kill him, as he had done James the brother of John. The very night before his intended execution, and while his Christian friends were met in the house of one Mary, to pray for his deliverance, an angel came to him in the prison, as he slept between two soldiers, awakened him, took off his chains, opened the prison, and conducted him to the street. He went directly to the house of Mary, and knocked at the door. Rhoda, a damsel who came to open the door, hearing his voice, ran back in a transport of joy, and told the Christians that it was Peter. They believed her not; but imagining every good man had his attendant angel, they said it must be Peter's angel that had knocked. Peter continuing to knock, was at last admitted, and to their great joy, he informed them of what had befallen him. Whether, after this, he went to Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Proconsular Asia, and Bithynia, to the scattered Jews of which places he writes his epistles, we know not. It is certain, that about eight years after, he was at Jerusalem at the council, and there related how God by him had first granted the gospel to the gentiles; and suggested, that since God had made no difference between Jews and gentiles in his saving or extraordinary gifts, they ought to impose on them no yoke of ceremonial rites. About this time he and James and John gave Paul the right hand of fellowship, and agreed that he should chiefly preach to the gentiles. When Peter was travelling northward, perhaps to the places above-mentioned, he came to Antioch. At first he joined with the utmost familiarity with the gentile converts: but when some who were attached to the ceremonies of Judaism came down from Jerusalem, he forbore it, and had nearly seduced Barnabas into the same course. Knowing that it encouraged the imposition of the ceremonies upon the new converts, Paul sharply expostulated with Peter for his dissimulation, and practical contradiction of the very speech he had before delivered in the council. Peter received this rebuke with great humility. In his old age, it is supposed, Peter travelled from the south coasts of the Black sea, into Mesopotamia and Chaldaea; for he writes his first epistle from the province of Babylon, where there were multitudes of Jews. After great sufferings for his Master, he was martyred; but whether by crucifixion, with his head downwards or not, cannot be determined. It is said, he could never hear a cock crow, but it revived his grief for the denial of his Lord. Acts xii. and xv. Gal. ii. 1 Pet. i. 1. and v. 13.

Of the two inspired epistles which he wrote to the dispersed Jews, the first is designed to comfort and confirm them in the truth, amidst the fiery trials and temptations to which they were exposed; to direct them in the hearing of God's word, and in their diversified stations, civil or religious; and to warn them to take no part in the insurrections then formed by their countrymen against the Roman government. In the second, which was written a little before his death, (perhaps about A. D. 66 or 68,) he inculcates upon them, abounding in Christian virtues, and watching against false teachers; warns them against apostatizing from the truth; but to live in the holiest manner, as in the immediate view of the ruin of their nation, and of the last judgment. A noble majesty and rapidity of style, with a becoming freedom, is visible in his epistles. A devout and judicious person can scarcely read them without solemn attention and deep concern. The conflagration of the earth, and the future judgment, are so described, that we almost see the flames ascending, feel the elements melting with fervent heat, hear the groans of an expiring world, and the crashes of nature, falling into universal ruin. Grotius asserts that the second epistle was written by one Simon, bishop of Jerusalem; but he must have strangely overlooked that this was the second epistle to the Jews, by one who had been with Christ in the holy mount of transfiguration; 2 Pet. i. 18. and iii. 1; nor is the style so different from that of the first as is pretended, except where the subject requires it.

A number of spurious tracts, as a Gospel, Acts, Revelation, with a Treatise on preaching, and another on the last judgment, have been falsely ascribed to Peter. The papists pretend he was about twenty-four or twenty-five years bishop of Rome from whence he wrote his epistles, and was there crucified under Nero; and they pretend that he was possessed of a supremacy over all the other apostles, which from him is conveyed to all their popes down to the present time. But it is certain, that three years after Paul's conversion he was at Jerusalem, and also when Herod died; and was there at the council; and was at Antioch in Syria some time after, about A. D. 52. No intimation is given that he was at Rome, when Paul wrote his epistle to the church there, and sends his salutations to many of her members. Not a word of his being at Rome, when Paul came there; for, at his first answer, no man stood by him. Nor is any mention made of him in all the epistles which Paul wrote from Rome, though persons of a far inferior character are often mentioned. How could he then be bishop of Rome, unless he exercised his power under ground where nobody perceived him? Or suppose he had been at Rome, that no more establishes the supremacy there than at Jerusalem, Joppa, and Antioch, where we are sure he was for a time. Or suppose he had lived 1000 years at Rome, how does that prove that he left his office to their popes, many of whom were atheists, adulterers, sodomites, murderers, blasphemers? And, in fine, what proof have we that he had a supremacy over the other apostles? None at all, except that he was perhaps the oldest, most forward in his temper, and more characterized by infirmities than any of them, Judas excepted.

PETHOR, or PATHORA; the native place of Balaam, situated in Mesopotamia, about the east bank of the Euphrates, and not far from Thapsacus. Numb. xxii. 6.

PHARA-OH, was long a common name of the kings of Egypt, and is often added to other names. Josephus says, that in the old Egyptian language, it signified king. It is certain, that in the Arabic language, it signifies one that excels all the rest; and in the Hebrew, signifies one that is free, or is a revenger. It is said, the Egyptians had sixty kings of this name, from Mizraim or Menes, to the ruin of their kingdom by Cambyaes, or Alexander. In scripture we have mentioned, (1.) That Pharaoh, who had his family smitten with plagues, for taking Sarah the wife of ABRAHAM into it. Gen. xii. (2.) Pharaoh who had the dream relating to the noted plenty and famine of Egypt; who exalted JOSEPH, and kindly settled JACOB's family in Goshen. Gen. xli—xlvii. (3.) Pharaoh who began to oppress the Hebrews with hard labour; and finding that ineffectual to stop their increase, ordered the midwives to kill their male-children in the birth; and finding that they disobeyed him, ordered all his subjects to destroy the Hebrew male infants wherever they could find them. His daughter saved and educated MOSES the Hebrew deliverer. Whether it was this Pharaoh, or his son, who sought to slay Moses after he had killed the Egyptian, we know not. Exod. i. and ii. (4.) Pharaoh, from whom MOSES demanded for the Hebrews their liberty to go and serve their God; and who, after ten plagues on his kingdom, and frequent changes in his resolution, was obliged to let them go, and afterwards in endeavouring to overtake them, was drowned with his host in the Red sea. Exod. v—xiv. (5.) Pharaoh, who protected, and gave his sister in marriage to Hadad the fugitive Edomite. Whether he was the father-in-law of Solomon, who took Gezer from the Canaanites, and gave it as a portion with his daughter, cannot be proved. 1 Kings xi. iii. 1. and ix. 16. (6.) Pharaoh-necho, the son of Psammeticus, who fitted out great fleets in the Mediterranean sea, marched a prodigious army to the Euphrates; took Carchemish; defeated Josiah in his way thither, made Jehoahaz his prisoner, and set up Jehoiakim as king of Judea, in his return home. In about four years after, his army at Carchemish was entirely routed, the city taken, the garrison put to the sword, and the fugitives pursued to the border of Egypt by the Chaldeans. 2 Kings xxiii. and xxiv. 2 Chron. xxxv. Jer. xli. (7.) Pharaoh-hophra, the grandson of the former, reigned twenty five years, and was for a while reckoned one of the happiest of princes. He invaded Cyprus, and made himself master of all Phœnicia. Depending on his assistance, Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon. Pharaoh sent an army to assist him against the Chaldeans, who were besieging his capital; but when the Chaldeans marched to attack them, the Egyptians retreated home with precipitation.

About sixteen years after, the Chaldeans furiously invaded his country, murdered the inhabitants, and carried off their wealth. Just before, Pharaoh had invaded Cyrene, by sea and land, and had lost the bulk of his army in that attempt. His subjects, enraged by his ill success, took up arms against him, alleging that he had ruined his array, in order that he might rule in a tyrannical manner. He sent Amasis one of his generals, to crush this rebellion; but when Amasis begun to expostulate with the rebels, they placed a helmet for a crown upon his head, and proclaimed him their king. Amasis then headed the rebels; and after various battles, took king Pharaoh prisoner. He would have treated him with kindness, but the people forced him out of his hands, and strangled him. Jer. xliii. 9-13. and xlv. 30.

PHARLSEES. See SECT.

PHE-NICE; a harbour on the south-west of the isle of Crete. It lay chiefly to the south-west, but had a winding to the north-west, and was a very safe harbour. Acts xxvii. 12.

PHŒ-NICIA; a country on the shore of the Mediterranean sea, on the north-west of Canaan, and south-west of Syria, whose principal cities were Tripoli, Botyrs, Byblus, Beryptus, Ecdippa, Ptolemais, Dora, Tyre, and Zidon. This country was anciently peopled with inhabitants descended from Canaan. The Zidonians, Arvadites, Arkites, and perhaps the Zemarites and Sinites, dwelt here. No doubt, in the time of Joshua and Barak, others of their Canaanitish brethren poured in upon them. The increase of their population made them apply to navigation and trade. They, especially the Tyrians and Zidonians, had almost all the trade of the then known world. There was scarcely a shore or isle of the Mediterranean sea, where they did not plant colonies; the most noted of which was that of the Carthaginians, who long contended with Rome. It is thought the Phœnicians pushed their trade as far as Britain. It appears that they had settlements on the Red sea and Persian Gulf. Sir Isaac Newton thinks, vast numbers of Edomites fled thither in the days of David, and carried their arts along with them.

The ancient Phœnicians were famed for learning, and are said to have been the inventors of letters. Sanchoniachon, the most ancient historian, except the inspired, was a Phœnician; but his work is a mixture of absurdity and fable. The Phœnicians were noted for their idolatries, worship of Baal, Ashtoreth, Hercules, Apollo, Tam-muz, &c. Herodotus extends the boundaries of Phœnicia along the sea-coast, from the border of Egypt, to almost the north of Syria. Some Greek writers call the whole of Canaan, Phœnicia; and some ecclesiastical historians include in it a great part of the south of Syria.

The chief cities of Phœnicia were Sidon and Tyre. Sidon, or Zidon, was built on the east-shore of the Mediterranean sea, perhaps not long after the flood, by Zidon the eldest son of Canaan; and the inhabitants thereof, some ages after, built old Tyre, on a high hill on the same shore, about twenty five miles to the south. The circumference of this old city was about three miles; but in process of time, they built another on the adjacent island, and joining the two by an isthmus, or neck of land, the whole city in its chief splendour is said to have been about nineteen miles in circumference, which I suppose included the suburbs. Both Tyre and Sidon pertained to the tribe of Asher, but were never taken from the Canaanites. The Zidonians very early oppressed the Israelites. Judg. x. 1, 2. Sometimes Tyre and Sidon had distinct kings, and sometimes they had but one over both. Many of them make but little figure in history. About the time of David, Cilix and Cadmus, the sons of Agenor king of Zidon, alarmed by David's repeated victories, left their country, and sought out new seats of empire for themselves. Hiram king of Tyre, who appears to have had the Sidonians under him, assisted Solomon in building the temple, and other structures; and it seems there had been a covenant of amity established between the two nations. Ethbaal, the father of JEZEABEL, was one of his successors; but he probably lived at Zidon. Perhaps Phœnis, who reigned in the time of the Trojan war, was his son. During the reign of Pygmalion, the great grandson of Ethbaal, Dido, or Eliza, his sister, with a multitude of others, fled from his oppression, and built Carthage, on the north of Africa, to the south-west of Sicily. The Tyrians, and perhaps other Phœnicians, were in the league against the Israelites in the time of Jehoshaphat. Psal. lxxxiii. 7.

About the time of Jotham, the Phœnicians seem to have been masters of at least a part of the country of the Philistines; and it seems in the days of Abaz, they carried off numbers of the Jews, and sold them to the Greeks for slaves. Joel iii. 4. Soon after, Eulæus their king, attempting to reduce the revolted inhabitants of Gath, these supplicated the protection of Shalmaneser king of Assyria. He turned his arms against the Phœnicians. The Zidonians quickly revolted from Tyre, proclaimed him their king, and assisted him against the Tyrians. Five years he besieged Tyre; but twelve of their ships defeating sixty of his, and death cutting him off, the siege was raised. The glory of Tyre quickly increased and the most of Phœnicia became subject to them. They traded with the Egyptians, Eolians, Cilicians, Spaniards, Greeks, Capadocians, Arabians, Syrians, Hebrews, Mesopotamians, Medes, Persians, Lydians, Africans, and Islanders of the Mediterranean sea. Provoked with the Phœnicians, for entering into a league with Zedekiah king of Judah, and assisting him in his rebellion, Nebuchadnezzar invaded the country, Zidon quickly surrendered. Tyre was besieged for thirteen years, during which time, Ethbaal, their proud and politic prince, was slain. In A. M. 3433, Tyre was taken; but during the siege, the inhabitants had transported themselves and their effects to the neighbouring island, about seventy paces from the shore. Missing their expected booty, the Chaldeans vented their rage on the few they found, burnt the city, and cast the rubbish into the sea. The Tyrians, now pretty safe in their island, afterwards sent their submission to the Chaldeans, under whom, and their Persian successors, the cities of Tyre and Zidon had still kings of their own. Tetramnestos, or Zidon, assisted Xerxes of Persia with three hundred galleys, in his expedition against Greece. Wearied by the tyranny of Darius Ochus of Persia, they entered into a league against him with Nectanebus of Egypt. Ochus laid siege to their city; Tennes their king, and Mentor a Greek general, betrayed it into his hands. Enraged at this, and their ships being burnt that none might leave the place, they in desperation burnt the city on themselves, and perished to the number of 40,000. Ochus got a considerable sum for the rubbish, as there was much gold and silver among it. The rest of the country readily submitted to him. About this time, it is said, the slaves of Tyre, in one night, murdered all their masters, except one Strato, who was made king. About the same time, one Strato was king of Zidon, which was now rebuilt. Alexander the Great deposed him, to make way for one Ballonymus a very poor man, but of the ancient blood-royal. When Alexander approached towards Tyre, the governor sent him presents; but trusting to their wall of one hundred and fifty feet thick, built completely round the island, they refused to admit him into their city, to sacrifice to Hercules. After a costly and terrible siege of seven months, he took the city by force, put 8000 of the inhabitants to the sword, crucified 2000, and sold 30,000 for slaves to the Jews and others. The city he repopled from the continent, and made Azelmis the king, who had been abroad during the siege, governor. Previous to the capture of the island, the Tyrians had sent off their wives and children to Carthage; and about 15,000 others were secretly carried off in the Zidonian ships. About nineteen years after, Antigonus again took it after a siege of fifteen months. After Alexander, Phœnicia never recovered its ancient glory, a great part of their trade being carried off to Alexandria, and themselves so often changing their Syro-grecian and Egypto-grecian masters. Having fallen into the hand of the Romans, Augustus, to punish their frequent revolts, and their siding with Cassius, deprived Tyre and Zidon of their charters. About A. D. 194, Niger, the usurping emperor, burnt Tyre, and slew most of the inhabitants. In A. D. 636, the Saracens took Tyre and Zidon. After they and the Seljukian Turks had possessed it 494 years, the Christian crusaders, seized the country; but in A. D. 1289, Alphiz, sultan of Egypt retook it, and utterly destroyed Tyre and Zidon, and other strong places adjacent, that they might never more afford any shelter to the Christians. In 1516, Phœnicia was taken by the Ottoman Turks; but the Druses of Lebanon claimed a share of it; and the famed Faccardin blocked up the harbour of Zidon, that the Turkish galleys might not visit his coasts. The Phœnicians in part became proselytes to the Jewish religion: many from that quarter attended our Saviour's instructions, and received his cures. A Syro-phœnician woman he extolled for her faith. Mark iii. 8. and vii. 24—31. The gospel was early preached here. Acts xi. 19. Paul tarried a while with the Christians at Tyre and Zidon. Acts xxii. 4. and xxvii. 3. For many ages, there were noted churches in these places; but for a long time past, Tyre has been a mere heap of ruins, inhabited by a few wretched fishermen. Zidon is still of some note, having about 16,000 inhabitants, Christians, and others, not absolutely wretched. Gen. ix. 25—27. Amos i. 9, 10. Joel iii. 4—8. Isa. xxiii. Ezek. xxvi—xxviii. Jer. xxv. 11, 22. and xxvii. 3—7. Zech. ix. 1—5. Psal. xlv. 12. lxxii. 10. and lxxxiv. 4.

PHIL-A-DELPHIA, a city of Mysia, or Lydia, at the north foot of mount Timolus, was so called, either from Attakus Philadelphus, who at least mightily adorned, if he did not build it; or, because there the Asiatic Greeks held their kind and brotherly feast. It stood about twenty-four miles east of Sardis, and seventy-two from Smyrna. Here a Christian church was very early planted, to which John was directed to write a consolatory and instructive epistle. Rev. iii. 7—13. This was the last city in these quarters that submitted to the Turks, after a terrible siege of six years. We can trace the history of Christianity in this country for about eight hundred years: and at present there are in it about 2000 Christians.

PHILE-MON; a citizen of Colosse. He and his wife were very early converted to the Christian faith, by Paul or Epaphras, and the Christians held their meetings in his house. His slave, Onesimus, having eloped from him, and come to Rome, was converted by Paul's ministry, and was very useful to him in his imprisonment. Paul sent him back with a recommendatory letter, requesting Philemon to forgive him, and charge what he might have wronged him to Paul's own account.

PHILIP, an apostle and brother of Andrew, was a native of Bethsaida. Having been introduced by his brother to Jesus, and invited by Jesus to his lodging, he afterwards brought Nathaniel to him. John i. 43—51. To try him, Jesus asked him how they could procure bread for the 5000 men, besides women and children? Philip replied, that two hundred pennyworth of bread, would not furnish each with a scanty morsel. John vi. 5—7. He and his brother introduced the Greeks to Jesus. John xii. 21, 22. He, at our Saviour's last supper, asked for a sight of the Father's glory, as what would suffice them. Jesus told him, that as he and his Father were one, he that by faith had seen him had seen the Father also. John xiv. 8—10. It is said that Philip preached the gospel in Upper Asia, south of the Hellespont and Euxine sea, and died a martyr at Hierapolis.

PHILIP, the second of the seven deacons. Acts vi. 5. He seems to have resided at Cesarea, on the west of Canaan. Endowed with the Holy Ghost for preaching the gospel, he, after the death of Stephen, went and preached in the country of Samaria, where he wrought miracles, and baptized many. Directed by an angel, he repaired to the south-west of Canaan, near Gaza. Here he met with a eunuch, treasurer to Candace the queen of Ethiopia, who being a Jewish proselyte, had been to attend at some of the sacred feasts. Directed of God, he went close to the eunuch's chariot. He was reading in the 53d of Isaiah, a passage relative to our Saviour's sufferings, and his meek submission under them. Philip asked him if he understood what he read? The eunuch replied, that he could not without a teacher. At his desire, Philip entered his chariot, and rode along with him, and from that passage instructed him concerning Jesus and the Christian faith. The eunuch received his instructions with great readiness and affection; and seeing water by the way-side, asked if he might not be baptized? Philip told him he might if he believed with all his heart. He replied, that he believed Jesus Christ to be the Son of God. Philip and he went out of the chariot to the water. Immediately after the baptism, the Lord carried Philip to Azotus, where he preached the gospel. He had four daughters, who prophesied. Acts viii. and xxi. 8, 9. Whether Philip afterwards repaired to Tralleis, in Lesser Asia, and there founded a church, as some assert, is doubtful.

PHILIP. See HEROD.

PHILIP-PI; a city of Macedonia, anciently called Datos; but being repaired by Philip the father of Alexander the Great, it received its name from him. It stood to the north-west of Neapolis, and about seventy miles north-east of Thessalonica, and is about one hundred and ninety west of Constantinople. It was rendered famous by the defeat of Brutus and Cassius, two noble Roman contenders for liberty, in the neighbourhood. Here there was a Roman colony. Here Paul preached about A. D. 53, and Lydia and many others were converted. A persecution soon obliged Paul to leave the place; but a famous church was founded. None so readily supplied the apostle with necessities, even after he was gone from them. At Thessalonica, they more than once supplied his necessities. They sent him a supply when prisoner at Rome, by Epaphroditus, one of their preachers. Acts xvi. Phil. iv. 15—18. He returned them a most affectionate epistle, in which he declares his tender love of them, his care to prevent their stumbling at his sufferings, and his readiness to glorify God either by life or death. He exhorts them to a strict holiness of life, to constancy in well-doing, to imitation of Christ in humility, to activity and seriousness in their Christian course, and to adorn their profession with suitable and mutual Christian graces. He recommends to them Timothy and Epaphroditus; warns them against false teachers, and having fellowship with wicked persons; and proposes his own example as their pattern.

PHI-LISTIA, or PALÆ-TIM, is, with some writers, a name for the whole of Canaan; but in scripture, it means only a narrow strip of land along the sea-coast, in the south-west of Canaan, about forty miles long, and except at the south part, scarce ever above fifteen miles broad. Its cities were Gerar, Gaza, Majuma, Askelon, Ekron, Ashdod, and Gath. The Philistines, and the Caphtorim, descended from Caslunim, the son of Mizraim, who peopled Egypt; and their country is perhaps called the Isle or country of Caphtor. Jer. xlvii. 4. When they returned from Egypt, and settled in Canaan, has not been ascertained. It is certain their kingdom of Gerar was erected and governed by the ABIMELECHS, in the days of ABRAHAM and ISAAC. Their territory was divided to the Hebrews; but they neglecting to take possession of it, the Philistines were made a severe lasting scourge to them. Josh. xiii. 2, 3. and xv. 45, 46, 47. Judg. iii. 1—3. In the days of Shamgar, they ravaged the adjacent territories; but he defeated them, and killed six hundred of them at once, with an ox-goad. Judg. iii. 25. In the days of Jephthah, they also ravaged the Hebrew territories; but perhaps the terror of his arms made them desist. Judg. x. 6. In the days of Samson and Eli, they, under their five lords, or kings, forty years, terribly tyrannized over the Hebrews. Samson made great havoc of them; but by fraud they at length made him their prisoner; but they suffered grievously at his death. At the time of Eli's death, by defeating the Hebrews in sundry battles, and taking captive the ark, they had reduced them to the very brink of ruin. The maiming of their idol Dagon, and a plague of emerods, if not also of mice, attended the captive ark, and obliged them to send it back, with a present of the images of the emerods and the mice in gold. Some time after, Samson defeated them at Eben-ezer, the Lord assisting the Hebrews with thunder. 1 Sam. iv—vii. Not long after the coronation of Saul, the Philistines, with a terrible host of perhaps 300,000 footmen, 6000 horsemen, and 30,000 chariots for war or baggage, invaded the country of Israel. Newton thinks, this host was rendered thus numerous, especially in carriages, by the return of the Phœnician shepherds from Egypt at that time. This huge army quite terrified the Hebrews, and at the same time they had carried off all the smiths from the land of Israel, that no arms might be forged; but by Jonathan, and his armour-bearer only was the rout of this mighty host begun, and the Hebrews pursued them to the very borders of their country. Not long after, the Philistines, with Goliath, invaded the Hebrew territories; but he being slain by David, the rest fled home with the utmost precipitation. 1 Sam. xiii. xiv. and xvii. As they continued the enemies of Saul, and made inroads into his kingdom, David, after giving them several checks, for some time sheltered himself among them. 1 Sam. xviii. xxiii. xxvii. and xxix. About the end of Saul's reign they invaded the Hebrew territories, to the very heart of the country, killed Saul and his sons, and spread such terror among the Hebrews on the west of Jordan, that many of them left their dwellings, and took up their residence in Gilead. 1 Sam. xxxix. and xxxi. David having taught his subjects the use of the bow, attacked the Philistines, and in several battles slew their giants, and rendered them his tributaries. 2 Sam. v. viii. 1, 12. xxi. and xxiii. 10, 12, 16. For about one hundred and fifty years, they continued subject to the Jews. Nadab the son of Jeroboam, and some of his successors, carried on a war with the Philistines for the city of Gibeon. 1 Kings xv. and xvi. They formed a party in the combination against Jehoshaphat. Psal. lxxxi. 7. In the reign of Jehoram, they formally revolted; nor, though harassed by the Syrians under Hazael, were they reduced by the Jews till the reign of Uzziah. 2 Kings xii. 17. 2 Chron. viii. and xxvi. In the days of Ahaz, they again revolted, invaded the low or west country of Judah, took Bethshemesh, Ajalon, Gederoth, Shoch, and Gimzo, and sold the Jews to the Tyrians for slaves. 2 Chron. xxviii. 28. Isa. ix. 12. Joel iii. 6. Hezekiah reduced them to the lowest ebb, and took all their country to Gaza; and, by sword and famine, vast numbers of them were ruined. 2 Kings xviii. 8. Isa. xiv. 29, 30. Their country was seized by the Assyrians, and was on that account invaded by Psammeticus king of Egypt. Isa. xx. It was afterwards seized by the Chaldeans, the Persians, and Greeks in their turn. Tryphon, the Greek usurper of Syria, gave it to Jonathan the Maccabee. Alexander Jannæus reduced it entirely, and obliged the inhabitants to submit to the Jewish religion; and about one hundred and forty after, many of them became Christians. Amos i. 6-8. Isa. xiv. 27-31. Jer. xxv. 20, 27. and xlviii. Ezek. xxv. 15, 16, 17. Zeph. ii. 1-7. Zech. ix. 5-7. Obad. 19. Isa. xi. 14. Psal. lxxvii. 4.

PHILOSOPHY, the knowledge of things founded on reason and experience. At present, philosophy might be divided into Logic, or the science of perception, judgment, reasoning, and method; Ontology, or the knowledge of the general properties and relations of beings; Natural Philosophy, or the knowledge of material substances, earth, sea, air, fire, celestial luminaries, &c.; to which mathematics, optics, hydrostatics, medicine, astronomy, &c. may be reduced; Pneumatics, or the knowledge of spirits; Moral Philosophy, which directs men to act to a right end, and in a right manner, as rational beings subject to God: but from the beginning, philosophy was not so formal and distinct. Solomon indeed was the greatest philosopher that ever existed; but his works of that kind are long ago lost. The most ancient philosophers of the Greeks, called their science, sophia, wisdom. Pythagoras was more modest, and would have his only called Philosophia, desire of wisdom. The Greek philosophers partly through ignorance, and partly through vanity soon divided into a vast number of sects, of which the Epicureans, Stoics, and Academics, were the most noted, and to which the Jewish sects of Sadducees, Pharisees, and Essenes, were somewhat similar. Till within these two hundred years past, that men have more attended to experience and common sense, most of the philosophy that was for many ages in vogue, was but unmeaning jargon and nonsense. Then it was imagined, almost every thing was understood: now, repeated discoveries manifest the wonderful and unsearchable nature of God's works; and how much more of himself! That the works of creation and providence really manifest the being, and part of the perfections of God, and of our duty to him, or to one another; or that the human mind, abstractly considered, is capable of apprehending these matters, cannot justly be denied. But it is no less evident, that through the prevalence of men's lusts over their reason, there is little actual knowledge in the earth, but what owes its origin one way or other to revelation. Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Augustine, and most of the Christian fathers, believed the heathens derived their proper sentiments from the oracles of God; and Celsus, the heathen philosopher, acknowledges the similarity of Plato to Moses and the prophets. Gale, in his Court of the Gentiles, has with great labour shown the derivation of the sensible notions of the heathen, from the oracles of God. Nothing is more plain, than that the nations which have had no access to revelation, are akin to brutes in ignorance and barbarity. Let the south of Africa, the east of Tartary, and various parts of America, bear witness. It is easy to trace an access to revelation, wherever any sensible philosophy, especially respecting morals and worship, has been found. Might not much traditional knowledge be derived from Noah? Who knows how little real wisdom the Egyptians possess, except what they owed to Joseph, Moses, Solomon, or other Hebrews they were conversant with, and highly regarded? What hindered the Chaldeans from learning not a little from Abraham their countryman, or from Jewish captives carried thither by the Assyrians or Nebuchadnezzar, or from their countrymen the most ancient Samaritans? Perhaps every thing sensible in the ancient Persian religion, is owing to Zoroaster, who had access to learn it from the Jews, if he was not, as some think, a renegade one himself? It is certain, that neither the ancient Chinese philosophy of Confucius, nor their modern, had half the correctness that some pretend; but if it had, how easy for them to have derived it from revelation! If Noah went thither, and settled their forms of government, they must have been originally good. Probably thousands of Jews removed eastward when Oguz-kan the Tartar made his irruption into western Asia, and about the same time founded a kingdom on the north-west of China; and from their notions of the incarnation of God, and other things, we cannot but think that some such thing happened. I find no evidence of any consistent philosophy in the East Indies, till after the time in which it is said Nebuchadnezzar transported thither a colony of the Jews; nay, nor till after they had access to converse with Jews in the empire of Darius (the husband of Esther) to whom Mordecai a Jew was for a while chief minister of state; and till after almost all the East sounded with the wisdom of Daniel the Jew. To turn our eyes towards Europe, where was the learning of Greece before Cadmus, a fugitive from the country of Israel, carried letters thither? How probabable, that Orpheus the reformer of their religion, or his father, was a Phœnician, and his mother Calliope, perhaps a Jewish minstrel, carried northward by the conquering Shishak king of Egypt? The Colchians on the east of the Euxine sea, with whom the Greeks had the earliest intercourse, and who used circumcision, and had a language not a little similar to the Hebrew, were, perhaps, a colony of the Jews and Egyptians, left there by Shishak as he hastened home to check his rebellious brother? Who has not heard of the early intercourse between Egypt and Greece? Who knows not, that the Phœnicians, who in a manner lived among the Hebrews, or at their side, by their extensive sea trade, and their numerous colonies, might propagate hints borrowed from revelation, far and wide, even to the Celtæ of Britain? Who may not observe in the Tuscan lucumonies of Italy, not a little resemblance to the early order of the Hebrew tribes? Were not Pherecydes the Syrian, and Thales the Milesian, the most ancient philosophers of the Greeks? and were they not born, especially the first, at no great distance from Israel? Did not Pythagoras, Solon, Plato, and other renowned philosophers, travel into Egypt and Chaldea to collect wisdom? and could they do so without visiting the Jewish land, which lay in their way from the one to the other? Did not the Romans derive their philosophy from the Greeks; and had they not access to the oracles of God in the Grecian language? Since it is so extremely probable that almost every thing sensible in the Pagan learning derives its origin from revelation, how superlatively base and unmanly must it be for our modern infidels to boast of their own or the heathen science, in opposition to the gospel of Christ. Let us have a sensible system of natural religion from the Cafres, Hottentots, or Soldinians, in the south of Africa; or from the Kamtschatkans, in the east corner of Tartary, or Patagonians, in the south of America; or from the Islanders, in the most southern, or northern parts of the ocean, whom we allow to owe very little of their knowledge to revelation; and then we shall esteem the religion and light of nature more than at present we can; though after all, the case of ancient Greece and Rome, and of modern Europe, would effectually prove that philosophy is incapable to reform the world. The apostle decries not true, but vain philosophy, i. e. the vain fancies which the heathens blended with truth. Col. ii. 8. Scripture mysteries transcend true philosophy, but never oppose it. Nay, philosophy, when used as a handmaid, is of great use to promote the knowledge of the scripture; and indeed in the book of Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, there is more true philosophy than in all the writings of the heathen.

PHINE-HAS, the son of Eleazar, and third high priest of the Jews. His zeal for the honour of God was very remarkable. When the Midianitish women came into the Hebrew camp to seduce them to uncleanness and idolatry, Phinehas seeing one Zimri a prince of the Simeonites, lead Coz-bi the daughter of Sur a prince of Midian, into his tent, followed them into the tent, and with a javelin thrust them both through the belly in the very act of adultery. To reward his zeal, God immediately stopped the plague which then raged among the Israelites, assigned the high priesthood to him and his family for many generations, and appointed him to attend the 12,000 Israelites who punished the Midianites. Numb. xxv. xxxi. and Psal. cvi. 30, 31. He and other princes were sent to expostulate with the Reubenites and their brethren of Gilead, concerning their erection of the altar of En, and on hearing their reasons, were entirely satisfied. Josh. xxii. He attended the army that defeated the Benjaminites in the affair of Gibeah. Judg. xx. 28. He died about A. M. 2590. and was succeeded by Abishua, or Abiezer his son. See PRIESTS.

Did he not prefigure our blessed Redeemer? How zeal for the honour of his Father, and the salvation of his people ate him up! how he slaughtered sin, Satan, and a wicked world! how acceptable to God his service! how highly rewarded, and counted for an everlasting righteousness! how it prevents a universal spread of divine wrath! establishes the new covenant of peace, and founds a perpetual priesthood to him and his seed! and in what honourable, but terrible manner, he punishes such as wander from him, or wallow in their lusts!

PHINE-HAS. See ELI.

PHRYGIA; a country of Lesser Asia, having the Mediterranean sea and Hellespont on the north-west, Galatia on the east, and Lydia on the south. It was divided into two parts, the Lesser Phrygia on the west, and the Greater on the east. The principal cities of the Western, were Tross, Cyzicus, Lampascus, Abydos, Antandros, &c. Those of the Greater, were Hierapolis, Colosse, Gordium, Lysias. Some Greek authors imagine the Phrygians sprung from the Bryges, a tribe of Macedonians; but it is more probable they were the descendants of GOMER, by his son Askenaz, or Togormah. The Phrygians had anciently sovereigns of their own. Those of Troy are not a little famous in the ancient fables. For about 2500 years past, they have been subject to the Lydians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, and Turks, in their turn. The gospel was very early preached in Phrygia, and a church settled, which for many ages made a considerable appearance; Acts xvi. 6. and xviii. 28; nor is Christianity yet quite abolished.

PHUT, the third son of Ham. Calmet supposes his posterity settled in the canton of Ptemphis in Lower Egypt, or in Pthenotis, whose capital was Butbus; but if they did so, we are persuaded they in after times removed west-ward to Mauritania, where we find the region Phute; and probably the Pythian Apollo is no other than PHUT, deified by his posterity. We suppose Shishak conquered all Mauritania, as far as the Straits of Gibraltar, and gave to his brother Atlas the government of it. It is certain the Phuteans were in league with, or subject to the Egyptians, about the time of Hezekiah. Gen. x. 6. Nah. iii. 6.

PHY'GEL-LUS and HER-MOG'E-NES, were professed Christians of Asia. It is said they were originally magicians; but it is more probable they forsook Paul in the time of his distress and imprisonment. 2 Tim. i. 15.

PHYLACTERIES. See FRONTLETS.

PHYSICIAN; (1.) One who practises the art of medicine. Mark v. 26. (2.) An embalmer of dead bodies. Gen. i. 2. (3.) Such as comfort and relieve from distress by their advice or counsel. Job xiii. 4. Jesus Christ is called a Physician by the application of his word, his blood, and his Spirit, he removes the guilt, the ignorance, hardness, and other spiritual diseases of men's souls. Matt. ix. 12. Prophets, teachers, and deliverers of nations, are physicians; by their instructions and examples, or by their wisdom and activity, they are useful in removing the corruptions of persons or churches, and redressing the grievances of states. Jer. viii. 22.

As anciently diseases were often supposed to be the immediate strokes of divine vengeance, scarcely any use was made of medicine, except in outward sores, fractures, wounds, or the like: but when Asa was diseased in his feet, he depended too much on the skill of the physicians. 2 Chron. xvi. 12. Among the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, Lybians, and Greeks, we have hints of skilful physicians; but till Hippocrates the Coan, about A. M. 3540, digested medicine into a kind of system, it was very little considered. Aretæus the Cappadocian, long afterwards further improved it. Galen, who lived in the second century of the Christian era, put the art into a still clearer order; but by pretending to found every thing on the four elements, and the humours, and by his cardinal qualities and the like, he embarrassed it with unintelligible jargon. Between the sixth and ninth centuries of Christianity, the art of medicine was in a manner lost; but from that to the thirteenth, the Arabs cultivated it with a great deal of pomp. It was not, however, until within these two centuries past, that it was handled in a proper manner; nor is it so even now except among the Europeans of the Christian name. Perhaps it never was carried to higher perfection than it is at present in Edinburgh.

PICTURE. The Hebrews were required to destroy every picture or image of the Canaanites' false gods. Numb. xxxiii. 52. Deut. vii. 5. What Christianity there is then in adorning our orchards or house, or even our Bibles, with pictures of heathenish or popish idols, is easy to judge. The day of the Lord is on all pleasant pictures, when he brings to ruin heathenish or Romish idolaters, their idols and images, and destroys their sumptuous and gaudy furniture. Isa. ii. 16.

PIECE of money, a SHEKEL of gold or SILVER. 2 Kings v. 5. and vi. 25. For a piece of bread, i. e. a very small advantage, that man will transgress. Prov. xxviii. 21. To be reduced to a piece of bread, is to be in extreme poverty, glad to eat any thing. Prov. vi. 26. 1 Sam. ii. 36.

PIERCE; (1.) To bore through. Judg. v. 26. (2.) To pain exceedingly. Job xxx.

17. 1 Tim. vi. 10. Christ's hands and feet were pierced, when, by nails driven through them, he was fixed to the cross; and he is pierced, when he is grieved and offended by our unbelief. Psal. xxii. 16. Zech. xii. 10. Rev. i. 7. One speaks like the piercings of a sword, when by passionate and reproachful speeches, or by false accusations, he wounds the character, hurts the outward estate, and endangers the life of his neighbour. Prov. xii. 18.

PIETY, or GODLINESS.

PI'HA-HI-ROTH; the pass through which the Hebrews marched to the west bank of the Red sea. Whether the rocks on either hand were called Hiroth, and so the name signifies the gullet, or pass of Hiroth; or whether the name signifies the mouth, or gullet of liberty, because here the Hebrews were delivered by the opening of the sea before them, we cannot determine. Probably the city Heroum or Heroopolis stood near this place. Exod. xiv. 2.

PILATE (PONTIUS), was probably an Italian, and was the successor of Gratus in the government of Judea, A. D. 26 or 27. He was a most obstinate, passionate, covetous, cruel, and bloody wretch, tormenting even the innocent, and putting people to death without so much as a form of trial. Taking offence at some Galileans, he murdered them in the court of the temple, as they offered their sacrifices. This, as our Saviour hinted, was a prelude of the Jews being shut up in their city and unorderd when they assembled to eat the passover. Luke xiii. 1, 2. Wicked as he was, his conviction of our Saviour's innocence caused him to try several methods to preserve his life. His wife also sent him word to have nothing to do in condemning him, as she had had a terrible dream about him. He was the more intent to preserve him. When the Jews accused our Saviour of calling himself the Son of God, Pilate was the more afraid, as he suspected he might be so. They then cried out, he would be a traitor to Cæsar, if he dismissed Jesus. Fearing a charge of this nature, he washed his hands, and protested, that he was innocent of the death of Jesus, and then condemned him to be crucified. Guided by Providence, he, instead of an abstract of the causes of condemnation, caused to be written on our Saviour's cross, This is Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews, which at once declared his innocence, royalty, and Messiahship: nor could all the entreaties of the Jews cause him in the least to alter the inscription. He readily allowed Joseph the dead body, to give it a decent interment; and permitted the Jews to seal and guard the sacred tomb; and so our Saviour's resurrection became the more notorious. About three years afterwards, Pilate, for his cruelty and oppression, was deposed by Vitellius governor of Syria, and sent to Rome to give an account of his conduct. Caligula the emperor soon afterwards banished him to Vienne in Gaul, where extreme poverty and distress influenced him to put a wretched end to his own life. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Eusebins, and after them many others, inform us, that it was the custom of the Roman governors in the different provinces, to send copies of all their judicial acts to the emperor: and that Pilate wrote such an account of our Saviour's miracles and death to the emperor Tiberias, that he inclined to have him worshipped as a God, but the senate being against it, the matter was dropped. We can scarcely believe these authors would have published this in the midst of the heathens, if it had not been true; and yet we know of no author that pretends to have seen the real acts of Pilate. See CHRIST.

PILE; a heap of wood for burning dead bodies in. In allusion to this, God is said to make the pile for the fire great in Jerusalem, when multitudes were there cast as fuel into the fire of his wrath, and a powerful army of Chaldeans executed his indignation. Ezek. xxiv. 9. See TOPHER.

PILGRIM; one that travels from one country or place to another: and pilgrimage is a wandering and travelling from one place to another. Gen. xlvii. 9. See TRAVEL.

PILLAR; (1.) A prop to support a house or building. Judg. xvi. 25, 26, 29. (2.) A monument raised to commemorate a person or deed. Gen. xxxv. 20. 2 Sam. xviii. 18. The pillars of the earth, are the foundations or rocks which support and strengthen it. Job ix. 6. The pillars of heaven, are the mountains, on whose tops the skies seem to rest. Job xxvi. 11. Might not the pillars or boards of the tabernacle, and the two pillars of the porch of Solomon's temple, adorned with net-work, and two hundred pomegranates, represent Jesus in the stability of his person and office: and his supporting his church, and being the glorious means of our access to God? Exod. xxvi. 15—30. 1 Kings vii. 18, 42. Christ's legs are like pillars of marble, and his feet like pillars of fire; how sufficient and firm to support his whole charge, is his power! and how terrible in chastising his people, and punishing his enemies, is his providential conduct! Sol. Song v. 15. Rev. x. 1. The church is called the pillar and ground of truth: in and by her are exhibited and maintained, the truths of God, as the edicts of civil rulers were formerly held up to public view on the pillars to which they were affixed; or the pillar and ground of truth, may be the mystery of godliness, mentioned in verse 16. 1 Tim. iii. 15. Saints and ministers, especially the more distinguished ones, are like pillars; they are fixed on the foundations of divine truth; they have their affections bent heavenwards; and they greatly tend to support the churches and nations in which they live. Sol. Song iii. 10. Gal. ii. 9. Saints are like the pillars of smoke, which towered from the brazen or golden altar: amidst numerous storms, they ascend towards God, in affections and exercises, prayer, praise, and thanksgiving. Sol. Song iii. 6. They are as pillars in the temple of God: to the honour of his grace, they are fixed in his church and new covenant state, and are at last unalterably fixed in their celestial happiness. Rev. iii. 12. Magistrates, and fundamental rules of government, are pillars which connect and support the structure of a state; and which when removed, the ruin of the kingdom or nation quickly ensues. Psal. lxxv. 3. The silver pillars of Christ's chariot, may denote the excellent graces of his manhood, the precious promises of his covenant, the truths of his gospel, and the ministers of his church. Sol. Song iii. 10. The seven pillars hewn out by Christ for his house, is whatever tends to the complete support of his church in heaven or earth, as the grace and power of God, the office and righteousness of Christ, the fundamental truths of the gospel, and a sufficiency of well-furnished ministers for every period of time. Prov. ix. 1.

PILLOW; a cushion for one's head to rest on in sleep. The peace and prosperity which false prophets promise their hearers, to sooth their spirits into carnal security, is likened to pillows sowed to their arm-holes, that they may be ever at hand. Ezek. xiii. 18, 20.

PILOT; one that directs a ship; he that steers the helm. Ezek. xxvii. 8.

PINNACLE: That of the temple can hardly be supposed to have been a spire on the top of it, as the top was set thick with golden pikes, that no birds might light on, and defile it; but rather some battlement that surrounded part, if not the whole of the roof, especially that towards the east, the height of which was dreadful. Matt. iv. 5.

PINE; to waste gradually as in a consumption. Lam. iv. 9. A people pines away in their iniquity, when, for the punishment of it, their number, wealth, power, and honour, gradually decrease. Lev. xxvi. 39. Ezek. xxiv. 8.

PINE-TREE, is somewhat like to the fir. It yields a rosin and pitch, and the heart of it, when fully lighted, will burn as a torch. It thrives best in mountains and sandy places; and if its under branches are cut, it grows the higher. It is the better if it be often watered while young. It bears its fruit in the winter. Unless the bark be pulled off, its abundant moisture makes worms lurk between the bark and the wood. Sometimes its excess of fatness stifles its growth. If laid under water, or kept perfectly dry, the wood of it will last a long time. The Hebrews used branches of it, to form their booths at the feast of tabernacles. Saints are likened to pine trees; they, when planted in the soil of a moderate outward emotion, and watered by the Holy Ghost, bring forth fruit even in winters of affliction; and how full of the grace of God, that makes them shine as lights in the world. Isa. xli. 19. and ix. 15.

PIPE; (1.) A wind instrument of the musical kind. 1 Sam. x. 5. (2.) An instrument somewhat of the same form, for the conveyance of liquids. The golden pipes, which convey oil to the seven lamps, are the precious and divinely instituted ordinances of the gospel, by which influences are conveyed from Jesus to his ministers and people, for their spiritual illumination. Zech. iv. 2, 12. The Jews were like children in the streets, that would not dance when their fellows piped, nor lament when they mourned. Christ and his faithful prophets and apostles, could neither by soft nor severe methods, gain their attention to eternal things; neither John with his mournful, nor Jesus with his winning airs and speeches, could have any effect upon them. Matt. ix. 17.

PIS-GAH; the highest top of that chain of mountains called ABARIM, and a part of mount Nebo; and so Moses is sometimes said to view Canaan from Nebo, and sometimes from Pisgah. Deut. iii. 27. and xxiv. There were fine springs of water at its bottom, called Ashdodth-pisgah. Deut. iv. 49.

PI-SID'IA; a province of Lesser Asia, at the west end of mount Taurus, and on the south-west of Lycaonia, north of Pamphylia, and east of Caria and Ionia. It was anciently a populous country. Ptolemy mentions eighteen cities in it, viz. Antioch, Seleucia, Telmessus, &c. Here Paul and Barnabas, amidst no small persecution, planted a Christian church, which, we are told, increased till they had ninety episcopal sees. This continued for five or eight centuries. Now the country is in a most wretched condition; and any remains of Christians, so called, are oppressed by their Turkish masters. Acts xiii. 14—49. and xiv. 24.

PISON; the name of the first branch of the river of Eden. This Calmet and Reland will have to be the Phasis, which they say runs northward through Colchis (with them Havilah), from near the head of the Euphrates, till at last it falls into the Euxine sea: but these great men are egregiously mistaken; for Phasis, instead of taking its rise near the head of the Euphrates, and running north-west, has its spring-head about three or four hundred miles north of the head of the Euphrates, and runs south-west into the Euxine sea. We, with Borchart and many others, take Pison to be the western branch of the divided stream of the Tigris and Euphrates, which runs along the side of Havilah in Arabia, and in the best maps may be seen to compass a considerable territory. Gen. ii. 12, 13.

PISS; the phrase, every one that pisseth against the wall, might uniformly be read, every male. 1 Sam. xxv. 22, 34. 1 Kings xiv. 10. and xvi. 11. and xxii. 21. 2 Kings ix. 8.

PIT; (1.) A natural or artificial hole in the ground, of some considerable extent. One is ready to fall into them; it is hard to get out of them; and miserable to be in them. The Asiatic nations used to shut up their captives in pits all night, and the Africans serve their slaves so still. Isa. xxiv. 22. (2.) The grave, which is digged like a pit. Psal. xxx. 3. (3.) Hell, where the damned for ever sink into despair, perplexity, and ruin. Rev. xx. 1. (4.) Great distress and misery, spiritual, temporal, or eternal. Isa. xxxviii. 17. Matt. xv. 14; and so Christ's sufferings are called a horrible pit; how dark, dismal, and uneasy to escape! Psal. xl. 2. (5.) Whatever ensnares men, and tends to render them miserable, and from which it is hard to escape; so a harlot and her enticing language are called a deep and narrow pit. Prov. xxii. 14. and xxiii. 27.

PITCH; a kind of rosin for plastering ships, and securing them against drawing of water. That which Noah overlaid his ark with, was perhaps the same as SLIME, and has the same Hebrew name as propitiation, and might represent Jesus' atonement as the great means of securing the church and the consciences of men against the floods of divine wrath. Gen. vi. 14.

PITCHER; a vessel, commonly of earth, for carrying liquids. Gen. xxiv. 14. To mark the contempt and weakness of the Jews and their priests, these sons of Zion, they are likened to earthen pitchers. Lam. iv. 2. The blood vessels which convey the vital juice to the several parts of the body, and keep it in a perpetual circulation from the right ventricle of the heart to the left, are called a pitcher, and is broken at the fountain when death renders it quite unserviceable for conveying the blood. Eccl. xii. 6.

PITHOM and RAM'ESSES were the two cities for the building of which the Hebrews made brick. Whether they were erected for treasure-cities, or for frontier-cities, for securing against the departure of the Hebrews, and against the inroads of the Amalekites and Philistines, is not agreed. Nor is it agreed where these cities stood. Some imagine Pithom to be Pelusium; but it is more probable it was Pathmos, which stood almost straight west of the north end of the Red sea. Dr. Shaw thinks Rameses stood where Cairo is now built. Gen. xlvii. 11. Exod. i. 11.

PLACE; (1.) A space or room where one is. Gen. xl. 3. (2.) A city or dwelling. Gen. xviii. 26, 33. (3.) A state or condition. Eccl. x. 4. (4.) An employment. Gen. xl. 13. (5.) A text of scripture. Acts viii. 32. To have place, is to receive welcome, room, or proper entertainment. John viii. 37. To give place, is to make way or room for one. Luke xiv. 9. We give place to the devil, when we encourage or listen to his temptations. Eph. iv. 27. We give place to wrath, when we overlook the passionate injuries done us, and render good for evil. Rom. xii. 19. The Romans took away the Jews' place, when they destroyed their cities and country. John xi. 48. To be in the place of another, is to be his deputy, acting for, and accounting to him. Joseph was in the place of God; as his deputy, he shewed kindness to his brethren. Gen. i. 19. The place of the holy, and the place where God's honour dwelleth, is the temple and ordinances of his grace, where he is represented to, and found by his people. Eccl. viii. 10. Psal. xxvi. 8. God returns to his place, when he hides himself, as if shut up in heaven. Hos. v. 15; or when he, as it were, steps into his judgment seat, and according to equity, delivers his friends, and punishes his foes. Psal. vii. 7. He comes out of his place, when he manifests his perfections in the just display of his wrath. Isa. xxvi. 21. HIGH places denote. (1.) Tops of mountains, or any thing high and elevated. Amos iv. 1. (2.) Places where the true God, or idols, were worshipped. 1 Kings iii. 2. and xii. 31. The high places that God sets his people on, are a high station in church or state, a prosperous and comfortable condition. 2 Sam. xxii. 34. Hab. iii. 19. The high places where spiritual wickednesses are stationed, is the air where evil spirits roam, the powers of the soul where inward corruptions prevail, and the outward supports of heathenish idolatry and wickedness. Eph. vi. 12.

PLAGUE; any great distress or calamity. Psal. xci. 10. But the plague of the heart, is the inward corruptions of it. 1 Kings viii. 38. The seven last plagues, are those that shall come on the Antichristians for their ruin. Rev. xxi. 9. Christ is the plague of death and destruction of the grave; as by his death and interment he removed the curse and sting of death and the grave from his people, and rendered them noted blessings to them. Hos. xiii. 14. But the plague is often taken for the pestilence. Num. xiv. 37. What is the cause of this terrible distemper, is not universally agreed. Some will have a kind of vermin carried through the air to occasion it. Boyle and others attribute it to the poisonous exhalations from minerals, as orpiment, sandaric, white arsenic, &c. which, in some places, lying near the surface, yield their exhalations every summer, as in Egypt, where they are also suddenly checked by the rise of the Nile; and in other places, lie deeper in the earth, and so cannot emit their effluvia, except when the earth is shaken by an earthquake. The poisoning of the air with the stench of unburied carcases, at the siege of cities, if in warm weather, tends to promote pestilence. There have been plagues which preyed only on young men, or on young women, or attacked only such persons as were of a particular nation. According to Sydenham, the plague usually begins with a chilliness and shivering; then follow a vehement inclination to vomit, intense pain about the heart, and a burning fever, which preys on the person until he dies, or the putrid matter discharges itself by some bursting boils. Sometimes too, it begins without any fever, and is marked by swellings in the flesh. When purple spots suddenly appear, it is a sign of death being at hand. Juice of lemons, camphire, viperine salt, and smoking of tobacco, are said to be excellent medicines in the plague. It would be endless to narrate the plagues of particular nations. In A. D. 543, one rose in Egypt, and spread over the world; in 563, it revived, and continued fifty years; another in Asia, and Europe of three years, in 1006. In 589, 1010, 1063, 1125, 1239, 1316, and 1348, there happened most terrible plagues, which spread far and wide. The plague of Italy in 1359, which, in some places, scarce ten of 1000 survived, and innumerable others, were terrible. But the most dreadful pestilence that I read to have happened, was that which begun A. D. 250, and continued fifteen years spreading through the whole Roman empire, from Ethiopia on the south, where it began, to Britain on the north. Rev. vi. 8.

Pestilences were, and still are, very common in Asia and Africa. By a kind of pestilence were the first-born of Egypt cut off. Psal. lxxviii. 50. By it were the Hebrew lusters for flesh, the murmurers at Korah and his party's destruction, and the joiners to Baal-peor, punished. Num. xi. and xvi. and xxv. By it were multitudes of the Canaanites cut off, to prepare the country for Israel. Hab. iii. 5. By a kind of it were 70,000 of David's subjects destroyed in perhaps a few hours, and 185,000 of the Assyrians cut off in one night. 2 Sam. xxiv. 16. Isa. xxxvii. 36.

PESTILENT. A pestilent fellow, is one sufficient to corrupt and ruin a multitude. Acts xxiv. 5.

PLAIN. A plain or plain place, is what is smooth and even, without hills. Gen. xi. 2. Plain words or speeches are such as are easily understood. Mark vii. 35. A plain path or way is one without hindrances, temptations, stumbling, or inconsistency. Psal. xxvii. 11. Prov. xv. 19. A plain man, is one candid, kind, and much disposed to civil society. Gen. xxv. 27.

PLANETS. See STAR.

PLANT; a herb or tree chiefly when young. Gen. ii. 5. 1 Chron. iv. 23. Jesus Christ, in his humiliation, was a tender plant; his condition was low; he was compassed with infirmity, and exposed to extreme suffering. Isa. liii. 2. He is a plant of renown; great are his excellence and fame, as our Mediator, and elder brother. Ezek. xxxiv. 29. To mark their pleasant growth, and promising usefulness, children, and the inhabitants of a country, are called plants. Psal. cxliv. 12. Jer. xlviii. 32. The Jews were God's pleasant plants; he placed them in the vineyard of his church, that they might increase and bring forth fruits of holy obedience. Isa. v. 7. They became degenerate plants of a strange vine, when they apostatized from God and his way, and became fruitful in idolatry and wickedness. Jer. ii. 21. They planted strange slips and plants; introduced foreign trees and herbs, and false and foreign doctrines and customs, idolatry, superstition, profaneness. Isa. xvii. 10, 11. Saints are plants, as an orchard of pomegranates, camphire, spikenard, saffron, calamus, cinnamon, trees of frankincense, myrrh, aloes, and all the chief spices: fixed by God in their new-covenant state, joined to Jesus as their root, and watered with the influences of his blood and Spirit, and warmed with his love, how delightful their appearance, and how diversified, useful and precious their various graces! Sol. Song iv. 13, 14. But the plants not of God's planting, that shall be plucked up, are heretical and wicked professors, and their errors and evil courses. Matt. xv. 13.

PLANT; (1.) To fix trees or herbs in the ground, that they may grow. Gen. xxi. 33. (2.) To bring a people from one place, to settle them in another, that they may increase in number, honour, or wealth. Psal. xlv. 2. and lxxx. 8. (3.) To grant to a people increase of number, peace, and prosperity. Jer. xxxi. 28. and xviii. 9. (4.) To foretel the settlement and prosperity of a nation. Jer. i. 10. (5.) To found churches, preach the gospel to such as never before heard it, and be useful in converting men to Christ. 1 Cor. iii. 6. (6.) To unite men to Jesus Christ, and fix them in a state of fellowship with him, that they may be useful members of his church. Psal. xcii. 12.

PLATTER; a large vessel for the boiling of meat, or for bringing it to the table. Matt. xxiii. 5.

PLAY; (1.) To sport, dance, about, sing: thus the Hebrews played around the golden calf. Exod. xxxii. 6. (2.) To fight for the diversion of lookers on: thus Abner and Joab caused twenty-four men to play, until they were all unnaturally murdered. 2 Sam.

ii. 14. (3.) To make melody on a musical instrument. Psal. xxxiii. 2. To play the man, the fool, the whore, is to act the part of such a one. 2 Sam. x. 13. Ezek. xvi. 28. 1 Sam. xvi. 15.

PLEA; dispute; what is said for or against a cause. Deut. xvii. 18.

PLEAD; to debate a contested point. Job xvi. 21. God pleads with men, when, by his word, Spirit, and providence, he convinces them of, and reproves them for their sin, or when he chastises or punishes them by his judgments. Isa. xliii. and iii. 13. He pleads the cause of his people, when he manifests their righteousness, redresses their grievances, and punishes their enemies. Psal. xxv. 1. and xliii. 1. Lam. iii. 28. Professors plead with their mother, when they lay out themselves by all humble and gaining methods to reform their church or nation.

PLEASE; to do what is agreeable to him. It pleased God to bruise Christ; he did it of his own will, and with a delight in the tendency thereof to promote our salvation. Isa. liii. 10. He is well pleased with Christ, and for his righteousness sake; he delights in him as his own Son, and as our Mediator: he accepts his obedience and suffering in our stead, and thereby is reconciled to, and ready to bless such as believe. Matt. iii. 17. John viii. 29. Isa. xlii. 21. He is pleased with men, and their works, when he accepts their persons, approves their conduct as good, and rewards it for Christ's sake. Heb. xi. 5. and xiii. 16. Christ and his people please not themselves, when they forego their own ease or honour, in order to do good to others, and bear with their infirmities. Rom. xv. 1. 2. The pleasing of men is either lawful, when we comply with their humour in things indifferent, or in doing what tends to promote the real advantage of their souls, 1 Cor. x. 33; thus Paul became all things to all men, in order to gain them to Christ, 1 Cor. ix. 19—23: or it is sinful, when we flatter them, suit our conduct or doctrine to their carnal inclinations, and study to please, without profiting them. Gal. i. 10. Eph. vi. 6.

PLEASURE; (1.) Delight, joy. Psal. cii. 14. (2.) What tends to give, or occasion delight and joy. Eccl. ii. 1. Acts xxv. 9. (3.) Purpose, resolution. Ezra v. 17. 21. (4.) The command of a superior. Psal. ciii. (5.) Sensual delights, or the pleasures of sin. Isa. xlvii. 8. Luke viii. 14. 1 Tim. v. 6. Heb. xi. 25.

PLEDGE; a pawn which a lender takes from a borrower, to secure the payment of his money. No millstone was ever to be taken in pledge; the widow's ox, or person's clothing for body or hed, was not at all to be taken, or at least to be restored that very night. No Hebrew was to take a pledge from a poor man of his own nation, nor to go into the borrower's house to take a pledge for himself; but the borrower was to bring out to him what could be best spared, Exod. xxii. 26. Deut. xxiv. 10—17. Ezek. xviii. 7—12, 16: but in direct contradiction to these laws, we find the Hebrews, in the time of Amos, lying beside their altars on pledged clothes, in order to obtain lucky dreams. Amos ii. 8. To take a pledge for a strange woman, imports, that nobody is safe to depend on the honesty of a harlot. Prov. xx. 16.

PLEIADES; that cluster of stars which we call the seven stars, and which are in the neck of the constellation Taurus. They appear about the end of March. Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades or Chima? Canst thou hinder their rise in their season? or canst thou restrain the fresh wind and warmth which attend their rise, and render the earth open, fruitful, and fragrant. Job xxxviii. 31.

PLENTEOUS; PLENTIFUL; very large and fruitful. Gen. xli. 34. God is plenteous in mercy, able and ready to exercise it, in saving men from great misery, and to great happiness, notwithstanding great and long provocations. Psal. lxxxvi. 5, 15. His redemption is plenteous, contains sufficiency of pardons, deliverance, and happiness, for multitudes of the greatest transgressors. Psal. cxxx. 7. The harvest for preachers is plenteous, when multitudes are ready and found to hear the gospel. Matt. ix. 37. The rain of gospel-doctrines and influences, is plentiful, when frequently bestowed on many persons, and in different places. Psal. lxxviii. 9.

PLOT; to form devices, especially to hurt others. Psal. xxxvii. 12.

PLOUGH; a well-known instrument for tilling ground. To put one's hand to the plough and look back, signifies to engage in Christ's service, particularly that of the ministry, and afterward turn away to a worldly or wicked course. Luke ix. 26. The ploughshare, is that part of it which cuts and turns up the tilted ground. Isa. ii. 4. To plough, (1.) To till the ground. (2.) To labour in a calling or work. 1 Cor. ix. 10. Prov. xx. 4. Judah shall plough, and Jacob shall break his clods; the Hebrews were obliged to hard and servile, though useful labour, in their Assyrian or Chaldean captivity, or shall be made active in the performance of good works. Hos. x. 11. Samson's companions ploughed with his heifer, when they dealt with his wife, to get the meaning of his riddle. Judg. xiv. 18. To plough wickedness, and reap it, is to devise and practise it, and at last suffer the punishment of it. Job iv. 8. Hos. x. 13. To plough on the back, is to scourge severely, till the lashes make, as it were, furrows in the flesh; to persecute and torment grievously. Psal. cxxix. 3. Zion was ploughed as a field, when the temple was destroyed; and it is said, Turnus Rufus the Roman, caused the foundations of it to be ploughed up. Jer. xxvi. 18. Mic. iii. 12.

PLUCK; to tear or draw away with force. Lev. i. 16. Mic. iii. 2. To pluck up, or pluck down, is to demolish or destroy. Ezek. xvii. 9. Prov. xiv. 1; or to foretel and threaten the destruction of. Jer. i. 10.

PLUMB-LINE, that on which the plummet of masons and carpenters hangs, for discovering the exactness of their work. The Lord sets a plumb-line in the midst of his people, and lays judgment to the line, and righteousness to the plummet; when he manifests how opposite their conduct is to the rule of his word, and executes just judgments upon them. Amos vii. 7, 8. Isa.

xxviii. 17. The Jews saw the plummet in the hands of Zerubbabel, when they beheld the second temple founded and built by his direction. Zech. iv. 10. But the plummet of the house of Ahab, signifies terrible, and almost universal ruin, like, that of the family of Ahab. 2 Kings xxi. 13.

POETS; such as compose songs or verses in metre. Acts xiv. 28. The art of composing verses has been esteemed in all civilized nations; we know of Homer, Pindar, Anacreon, Æschylus, Aristophanes, and Sappho, excellent herein among the Greeks; Virgil, Juvenal, Ovid, and Horace, among the Latins; Tasso, among the Italians; Corneille, Moliere, Voltaire, and Boileau, among the French; Milton, Cowley, Dryden, Addison, Watts, Pope, Thomson, &c. among the English; and Ossian, among the Gaels, or ancient Scots. It is said, the Arabs have more poems in their language than all the world besides. The songs of Moses, Deborah, and Hannah, the prayer of Hezekiah and Habakkuk, if not also of Mary and Zecharias. Exod. xv. Judg. v. 1 Sam. ii. Isa. xxviii. Hab. iii. Luke i. and the Psalms, most of Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, and Lamentations, appear to be of the poetic kind. But after all the pains of the learned, we cannot understand the rules of their metre; nor can we say whether they attended to any fixed rules: and the truth is, no rules in the world will render a man a true poet, who has not a proper stock of imagery and fire in his own mind. Besides the unequalled fire, and bold strokes of imagery in scripture poems, their principal excellence is their being calculated to promote the honour of God, and the everlasting happiness of mankind; whereas many other poems serve only to dress up folly and vice, and render monsters of lust, or other wickedness, apparently amiable.

POINT; (1.) The sharp top of any thing, Jer. xvii. 1; and so when any thing is near to another, it is said to be at the point of it. John iv. 47. (2.) A particular point or article however small. James ii. 10.

POISON, or VENOM. That there is a variety of vegetable and mineral poisons, as hemlock, arsenic, &c. is sufficiently known; but what the scripture calls poison, is that liquor which asps, serpents, dragons, vipers, &c. convey by their sting or bite, for the killing of other animals. What is poisonous and destructive to some animals, is harmless and medicinal to others. Wickedness in false doctrine, wicked language, or evil courses, are likened to poison or venom: how hurtful and deadly to men's souls and bodies! how sinners delight in it, and are fond of infecting others with it! how they have it in or under their lips or tongue, in their heart, and ever ready to be vented! Deut. xxxii. 33. Psal. lviii. 4. Rom. iii. 13. James iii. 8. The destructive judgments of God are likened to poison; how often they come insensibly on men! how they spread, torment, and destroy them! Job vi. 4. and xx. 16.

POLL; a HEAD. Numb. i. 2. Ezekiel's visionary priests polling or cutting short the hair of their heads, but not shaving them, imports their avoiding every mark of effeminacy on the one hand, and every heathenish and monkish custom of superstition on the other. Ezek. xlv. 20.

POLLUTE; to defile. See PROFANE.

POMEGRANATE-TREE; a tree of the apple kind. Its breadth is greater than its height. Its wood is hard and knotty; its bark is reddish; its leaves are greenish, inclining to red, and somewhat like those of myrrh. Its blossoms are large, comely, and reddish, and the cup, formed by them, is of the shape of a bell. When the flowers are double, no fruit follows. Wild pomegranate trees are more prickly than the cultivated kind. The pomegranate apple is extremely beautiful, reddish both within and without. Its juice is like wine, mixed with little kernels: nay, wine is frequently made of it. Sol. Song viii. 2. The rind or shell is large and hard; and it seems, in Peru, is sometimes used for a barrel. The high priest's long robe was hung round the lower hem with bells and pomegranates alternately. Exod. xxviii. 33, 34; and on the net-work which covered the two pillars of the temple, Jachin and Boaz, there were two hundred figures of pomegranates, ninety-six of which were seen on a side. 1 Kings xvii. 18, 42. 2 Kings xxv. 17.

Did these mark the glorious and fructifying nature and influence of Jesus' righteousness, office, intercession, and gospel? The saints, and their graces, particularly their humility, are likened to pomegranates; how comely, various, delightful, and all deeply affected with Jesus' blood! Sol. Song iv. 13. and vi. 11. and vii. 13. and ix. 5.

POMMEL; a kind of bowl, or roundish knob. 2 Chron. iv. 12.

POMP; a noise or gaudy appearance. Isa. v. 14. Acts xv. 23.

PONDER; (1.) To consider a thing. Luke ii. 19. (2.) To observe exactly. Prov. v. 21. and iv. 26.

POND, or POOL. The Egyptians had many of them, partly for detaining the fish when the Nile decreased, and partly for keeping them fresh. Exod. vii. 19. When they are called ponds of soul, either soul is put for fish, or it imports the ponds were for pleasure and diversion. Isa. xix. 10. The fish pools of Heshbon were very celebrated. Sol. Song vii. 4. The upper pool of Jerusalem, was that of Gihon on the west of the city, and the lower was perhaps that of Siloam or Bethesda. Isa. vii. 3. 2 Kings xviii. 17. Isa. xxii. 9. Nineveh was of old like a pool of water; her bustling inhabitants swarmed in her like multitudes of fish, nor, for a long time, was she troubled with distress and commotions. Nah. ii. 8. God dried up the herbs and pools, and made the rivers islands, when Cyrus diverted the stream of the Euphrates, and marching his army along the channel, entered Babylon; or when he cut off the common people, and their supporters; or when he removed every hindrance of the return of the Jews to their own country. Isa. xlii. 15. Jer. i. 23. Babylon was made like a pool of water, when the very place where the city stood, was partly turned into a fen or marsh. Isa. xiv. 23. He makes the parched ground, or wilderness, pools of water, when the gentle world, so long barren of goodness, are abundantly blessed with the doctrines and influences of the gospel. Isa. xxxv. 7. and xli. 18.

POOR. Men are poor, either, (1.) In outward condition, having scarcely any means of subsistence. As these are ready to be overlooked, despised, and injured by men, God claims the peculiar inspection of them. Prov. xiv. 31. Under the Jewish dispensation, he accommodated almost every kind of OFFERING to the case of the poor; charged to take special notice of them; appointed the gleanings of fields and vineyards, and the increase of the seventh year, and part of the third tithe, to be theirs. Lev. xlv. 25—47. and xix. 10. Christians are also charged to provide for them, and a blessing is promised on such as wisely consider their case, and help them. Gal. ii. 10. Psal. 1—3. Prov. xix. 7. Judges are charged to do them justice, but not unjustly to favour them for their poverty. Psal. lxxxii. 4. Exod. xxiii. 3. Lev. xix. 15. (2.) Poor in spiritual estate, when, however full they may be of self-conceit, and abounding in outward wealth and honour, they are destitute of Jesus' righteousness and grace, have no saving interest in the favour of God, but are condemned by him, and exposed to everlasting misery and want. Rev. iii. 17. (3.) Poor in spirit, who, though possessed of an interest in the new covenant, and all its fulness, are sensible of their own sinfulness and emptiness, and humbly supplicate every gracious supply from our all-liberal Redeemer. Matt. v. 3. A Jew was poorer than the priest's estimation, when he could not pay the price at which the priest valued his redemption. Lev. xxvii. 8. The poor and rich, and the poor and deceitful creditor meet together; God is equally their former, preserver, and judge, they will quickly be in the grave and in the eternal state, where their poverty or wealth will be of no consequence. Prov. xxii. 2. and xxix. 13.

POPLAR-TREE; a tree somewhat like the willow, it takes root in the same easy manner, and will grow twelve or fourteen feet in a year, and in four or five become a large tree. There are four kinds of poplar; two whitish kinds, the black kind, and the aspen with trembling leaves. Sometimes the Hebrews made groves of it, where they burned incense to the idols. Hos. iv. 13.

POPULOUS; full of people. Dent. xxvi. 5.

PORCH; an entrance to a lodging. Judg. iii. 23.

PORTERS; such as keep the gates of a city or house, and shut or open the same when it is proper. David appointed 4000 of the Levites to be porters in the temple, each in his respective place. 1 Chron. xxiii. 5. and xxvi. They resided at Jerusalem, and its environs, and were a kind of military guard to the temple. Neh. vii. 73. It seems the Jews had sometimes porters to watch the doors of their sheep-fold; but the porter that opened to Jesus, as our Shepherd, is his Father, who admitted him to his office; the Holy Ghost who, by the preaching of the gospel, introduces him into countries, and the hearts of his people; or the prophets and John the Baptist, who foretold his coming into the world. John x. 3.

PORTION; the share which belongs to one. Gen. xiv. 24. God is the portion of his people; he freely gives himself to them to supply all their need; and enriches them with every thing great and useful. Psal. lxxiii. 26. Jer. x. 16. The Jewish nation, the church, and her true members, are God's portion; he claimed, or claims a special right to them, and did or does shew a peculiar regard to them. Dent. xxxii. 9. Psal. cxxxv. 4. Christ has a portion with the great, and divides the spoil with the strong, when, notwithstanding all opposition from sin, Satan, and the world, he obtains a glorious church, and great honour among men. Isa. liii. 12. The portion of adulterers, and other sinners, from God, is fearful plagues here, and endless destruction hereafter. Job xxxi. 2. and xx. 29. Psal. xi. 6. The portion of goods given to prodigal sinners, is their natural abilities, and worldly enjoyments which they consume in the service of sin. Luke xv. 12. Men give a portion to seven, and also to eight, when they abound more and more in relieving the necessities of the poor. Eccl. xi. 2. They have their portion among smooth stones, when they are wholly taken with idols formed out of stones, or metal, or the like, and the worshipping of them. Isa. lvii. 6. God's portion of the lawgiver, was an inheritance assigned to that tribe by Moses. Dent. xxxiii. 21.

POSSESS; to hold, or enjoy, as one's own property. Lev. xx. 24. One possesseth his soul in patience, when, to the advantage of his soul, he exercises it in a calm and constant patience. Luke xxi. 26. To possess one's vessel, in sanctification and honour, is to exercise our body, or whole man, in what is holy and pure. 1 Thess. iv. 4. Saints possess all things; they have an interest in all the fulness of God, they have whatever is for their real advantage; all things work together for their good; and they are, or ought to be content, with such things as they have. 2 Cor. vi. 10. The Jews possessed the Chaldeans, Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites; perhaps many Chaldeans came to Judea with them as their servants; the Maccabees subdued the last three of these nations; and under the gospel they were joined to the true church. Isa. xiv. 2. Obad. 17—20. Zeph. ii. 9.

POSSESSION, is either, (1.) The actual enjoyment of things; 1 Kings xli. 19; or, (2.) The thing enjoyed, whether lands, houses, goods, or servants. Eccl. ii. 7. Matt. xix. 11. God is the possession of Ezekiel's priests; saints have a right to, and derive their help and comfort from God: and on what is devoted to him, ministers ought to live. Ezek. xlv. 23. The church, or heaven, is a purchased possession; the saints are redeemed by the blood of Christ, and God is united to, and delights in them; and the heavenly glory which the saints for ever enjoy; is the reward of Christ's obedience and suffering. Eph. i. 14.

POSSESSORS; those who slew the Jews, and held themselves not guilty, were their rulers, scribes, and Pharisees, who ruined the common people by their erroneous doctrines, wicked laws, and bad examples. Zech. xi. 5.

POSSIBLE; (1.) What may be expected. Rom. xii. 18. (2.) That which is profitable and necessary. Gal. iv. 15. (3.) What is agreeable to the will of God, and consistent with his purpose. Matt. xxvi. 39. Acts xx. 16.

POST; (1.) A pillar, such as those which support the upper lintels of doors or gates. Exod. xlii. 7. Judg. xvi. 3. The Jews set up their posts by God's posts, when they valued and observed their idolatries and traditions, on a level with his statutes and worship. Ezek. xliii. 8. A courier or swift messenger, for riding or running with letters or other intelligence. To convey intelligence quickly, the Persian kings had sentinels placed at proper distances, who, by crying one to another, gave notice of public occurrences. This method, however, being improper for secrets, Cyrus settled posts that rode night and day, in the manner of ours. Esth. iii. 13. The Asiatics and others had also pigeons who carried letters, especially from besieged cities. They had posts in Babylon that ran from one part of the city to another. Jer. li. 31. Man's life is swifter than a post; it continually hurries on to an end. Job ix. 25.

POSTERITY. See OFFSPRING.

POT. To lie among the pots, is to be exceedingly defiled, enslaved, and distressed. Psal. lxxviii. 13. The Hebrews were freed from pots and burdens, when delivered from their slavish making of bricks in Egypt. Psal. lxxxi. 6. Jerusalem is likened to a boiling pot, the fire of which faced the north; by means of the Chaldeans who marched from the north, Jerusalem was besieged and burnt, and the inhabitants tormented to death, as in boiling water, or as in a dry, but red hot pot. Jer. i. 13. Ezek. xxiv. 3—14. It, or the Jewish state, was like a pot marred in the hand of the potter; by God, the framer thereof, they were ruined and broken to pieces by means of the Chaldeans. Jer. xlvii. 6. The golden pot, wherein the manna was laid up, may denote the precious ordinances of the everlasting gospel, wherein the fulness of Christ is laid up, before and under the special inspection of God. Exod. xvi. 33. As the fining pot for silver, and the furnace for gold, i. e. for the trial and discovery of these metals, so is a man to his praise; by the character of the persons who commend him, and by his behaviour under commendations, it will appear what sort of a person he is. Prov. xxvii. 21.

POTSHERD; a piece of a broken earthen vessel. Job ii. 8. Christ's strength was dried like a potsherd; the blood and moisture of his body were extracted by the sweat, the scourging, the nailing to, and hanging on the cross; the consolation of his soul was withheld, and he tormented in his Father's wrath, was like a potsherd dried in a furnace. Psal. xxiii. 15. To mark men's frailty, and exposure to trouble, they are likened to potsherds, or broken pots. Isa. xlv. 9.

POTTER; one that makes pots or earthen ware. Jer. xviii. 3. God is called the Potter; he forms our bodies of clay, and forms and disposes of us as he pleases. Rom. ix. 21. Isa. lxiv. 8.

POTENTATE; a powerful ruler. God is the only Potentate, King of kings, and Lord of lords; he is the sole supreme Ruler of all persons and things. 1 Tim. vi. 15.

POTIPHAR; an officer of Pharaoh, the second in our list. Some will have him to be his general, or captain of his guard, others will have him to be the chief of his cooks or butchers. He bought Joseph from the Midianites, and finding every thing prosper in his hand, he conceived an affection for him, and committed to his care the whole management of his household affairs; but he too easily credited his whorish wife, and cast Joseph into prison. Either this, or another captain of the guard, afterward favoured Joseph. Gen. xxxvii. 36. and xxxix. and xl.

Whether POTIPHERAH, priest or prince of On, and father-in-law of Joseph, was the same as the above Potiphar, is controverted. We think him a different person. On was about forty-five miles distant from Zoan, where Pharaoh and Potiphar dwelt. Potipherah appears to have been one of the greatest men of Egypt, which Potiphar does not. Nor can we believe Joseph would have been fond of a whore's daughter for his wife. Gen. xli. 45.

POUND, the same as the MANEH. See TALENT.

POUR, SHED. When this word relates to things not material, it signifies to bestow them plentifully, and with care; so God sheds forth the Holy Ghost, pours out his Spirit, his wrath, &c. Prov. i. 23. Ezek. vii. 8; and we pour out our heart, when we plentifully utter the lamentations and requests thereof. Lam. ii. 19. Psal. lxxii. 8. God's love is shed abroad in our hearts, when plentifully applied and believed. Rom. v. 5. Shedding of blood, denotes a violent death. Gen. ix. 6. Heb. ix. 22.

POURTRAY; to paint; draw a picture of. Ezek. iv. 1.

POWDER; (1.) Small and dry dust. Exod. xxxii. 20. The rain of a land is powder and dust, when in excessive drought the wind tosses about the dust, instead of the fall of refreshing dews or rain. Dent. xxviii. 24. Isa. v. 24. (2.) Precious perfumes beaten very small; and to this the intercession of Christ, and the various graces which the saints receive from him, and their holy exercises of prayer, praise, and good works, are likened. Sol. Song iii. 6.

POWER; (1.) Ability or strength. Hos. xii. 3. (2.) Authority, and right to govern kingdoms, cities, or classes of men. Matt. iv. 6. and ix. 6. (3.) Privilege. John i. 12. (4.) Freedom, liberty. 1 Cor. ix. 4, 6. (5.) Force, violence. Ezra iv. 25. God is called power, because of his unbounded strength and authority. Matt. xxvi. 64. Jesus Christ crucified is called the power of God: in the constitution of his person, Godman, and in his office, and the execution of it, in ransoming, forgiving, and converting sinners, are God's strength and authority marvelously displayed. 1 Cor. i. 24. The Holy Ghost is called the power of the Highest, to denote the infinite authority and might by which he acted in the incarnation of Christ.

and does act in the salvation of men. Luke i. 35. Angels, good or bad, are called powers; they when authorized, or permitted of God, are able to do great and marvellous exploits. Col. i. 16. Eph. vi. 12. Magistrates are powers; vested with authority, they rule over others, and are able to do much. Rom. xiii. 1. Christ has all power and authority given him in heaven and in earth; he has an ever prevalent intercession; he has power to send the Holy Ghost to the church, and to make angels and every creature act in subserviency to the calling, conversation, and sanctification of his people. Matt. xxviii. 18. He puts down all power and authority, when he causes the office of magistracy and ministry to cease at the end of the world. 1 Cor. xv. 24. Jacob had power with the angel, and prevailed; by the fervent prayer of faith, he obtained the blessing he desired, and got the better of Laban and Esau. Gen. xxxii. 28. The powers of the world to come, are the mighty influences and miraculous operations of the Holy Ghost. Heb. vi. 6. The powers of heaven shaken before Christ's coming, may denote the fearful tokens in the sky, and the overturning of the governors of the Jewish church and state, and the celestial luminaries of heaven shaken and darkened before the last judgment. Matt. xxiv. 29. Satan has the power of death; he introduced sin the cause of death; he terrifies men with the fear of death; and he torments them in the second death. Heb. ii. 14. Death and life are in the power of the tongue. By their words, teachers, witnesses, judges, and others, have no small hand in occasioning death or life. Prov. xviii. 21. A woman's veil, or head-covering, is called power, as it marks her subjection to the power of her husband. 1 Cor. xi. 10. At the resurrection, the saints shall be raised in power; their body shall be quite active, and able to attend their soul in all her operations; for ever freed from every infirmity and danger, and able to bear their exceeding and eternal weight of glory. 1 Cor. xv. 43.

PRAISE; (1.) A confession of the wonderful excellencies of God. Psal. cxxxviii. 1. Rev. xix. 5. (2.) A declaring of the good qualifications of men, Psal. xxvii. 2; and the fancied excellencies of idols. Dan. v. 14. (3.) The person or good deeds commended. Deut. x. 20. Psal. cxviii. 14. and cvi. 2. So God is the praise of his people, i. e. the object whom they praise. Jer. xvii. 14. Magistrates are for the praise, commendation, and encouragement of them that do well. Rom. xiii. 3.

PRANCE; to tread the ground, as a galloping horse. Judg. v. 22. Nah. iii. 2.

PRATE; to babble forth a great deal of words. Prov. x. 8.

PRAY; to ask. Our prayer to God lies in offering our sincere requests to him, either with or without words, with confession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of his mercies. It is either private or public, and either relates to the bestowing of good things, or the preventing of evil things. Dan. ix. It is to be made for all sorts of men living, but not for the dead, whose state cannot be changed. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. It is to be for things agreeable to the will of God, revealed in his precept or promise, 1 John v. 14; and it is to be performed in Christ's name, with knowledge, faith, repentance, sincerity, fervency, and perseverance. 1 John xv. 18. James v. 15, 16. Psal. lxxvi. 16. and xvii. 1. Col. iv. 12. Nor, if persons have the knowledge of God and themselves, are forms necessary; nor is there any evidence of confinement to forms of words in prayer, to be found in the scripture. Our Saviour's pattern is not expressed in the same words in both places where it is found; and where it is most full, he only requires us to pray after that manner: nor have we the least evidence of the apostles ever using it as a form; but the contrary, in a variety of instances of their prayers mentioned in the Acts, or in their Epistles. To represent the nature of prayer, it is called an asking, John xv. 16; a seeking and knocking, Matt. vii. 7; a lifting up of the soul, pouring out of the heart, Psal. xxv. 1. and lxxii. 8; a looking up to, and talking with God, Psal. v. 3. Job xv. 4: a wrestling with God, Rom. xv. 30; a taking hold of God, Isa. lxvi. 7; meditation, Psal. v. 1; enquiring, Gen. xxv. 22; crying, 1 Sam. vii. 8; sighing, mourning, mourning, groaning, weeping, Psal. xii. 5. and lv. 3. and vi. 6. Joel ii. 17; breathing, Lam. iii. 56; supplication, entreaty, Zech. xii. 10. Exod. viii. 8. Sometimes prayer is expressed by the postures used in it, as standing, falling down, Dent. ix. 18; bowing the knee, Eph. iii. 14; spreading, stretching forth, or lifting up the hands. Exod. ix. 29. and xvii. 11. Job xi. 13.

If we consider the express law of God; if we consider him as our stay, the fountain of all our blessings; or as the gracious all-seeing, and almighty hearer of prayer, and the forgiver of our sins, and bestower of favours;—if we consider Jesus as the way to God, as the intercessor with him, as the purchaser of all necessary blessings, as our instructing Prophet and lofty King;—if we consider the Holy Ghost as a Spirit of adoption and prayer; if we consider the saints as friends, servants, children, and priests unto God; if we consider our own necessities, and the duties incumbent on us; if we consider our relations to one another; if we consider the various directions which God has given us for the right performance of prayer; it is evident that we cannot, without great sin against the divine persons, and without great hurt to ourselves, neglect this important duty. We pray in faith, when we offer our requests to God, believing that in correspondence to his relations and promises, he will, for the righteousness and intercession of his Son, grant them. James i. 6. We pray in the Spirit or Holy Ghost, when we perform it as directed and influenced by him. Jude 20.

The pious Jews used to pray at three stated times in the day: at noon, and at the time of the morning and evening sacrifices. Dan. vi. 10. Psal. lv. 17. Acts ii. 1, 15. and iii. 1. and x. 3, 9. Those about Jerusalem often performed their prayers in the court of the temple; others had recourse to the synagogues: such as had opportunity of neither, had proscuter, or places for prayer, which were open above, except when covered with the shadow of trees, in the form of groves. The modern Jews have nineteen forms of prayer, one of which is a kind of curse against the Christians. Nor have we proper certainty that any of these forms were compiled before our Saviour's time, though the Jewish Rabbins say otherwise. Nor are these nineteen considered as proper forms, but as the ground-work of thir prayers, to which additional requests are added as the occasion calls for. They often pray with their face toward Jerusalem. Their other rites of prayer are scarce worthy of a place here.

PREACH. See GOSPEL. To preach is loudly to proclaim the will of God, as his appointed heralds, Eph. iii. 1. The gospel is preached to the dead, &c. to mortal men, that they, through the power of God attending it, may have their sinful lusts destroyed, while carnal men condemn and persecute them, and may, by the quickening influence of the Holy Ghost, live conformed to the image and will of God, in fellowship with him, and to his glory. 1 Pet. iv. 6. To preach in a proper manner, requires no small attention, in order that no fault in the pronunciation, the gesture, the LANGUAGE, the order, or matter, tend to bring the truths of the gospel into contempt; or by feeding the carnal fancy of dry fops, divert them from the important subject. To speak with an overstrained voice or with one so low as scarcely to be heard, or with a thick and clattering voice, or in a hasty, or a heavy droning manner, or to have the voice rising and falling by starts, or to have a dull uniform pronunciation, without emphasis or cadence, or to have an awkward canting tone, or to hem, hawk, and cough between periods, can hardly fail to mar the attention, and hence the edification of hearers. These ought therefore to be carefully laid aside; and a natural, easy, and graceful variation of the voice, suited to the ideas and passions represented in the discourse, to be studied. Vitiating habits must be corrected by a proper method of reading: and to obtain this, the utmost regard ought to be had to the points, the emphasis, and cadence, of the discourse. The rough, violent, soft, or tender air of expressing the emphatic words, ought to correspond with, and, as it were, exhibit the ideas spoken of: So love ought to be expressed by a soft and languishing air; anger, by one strong and vehement; joy, by one quick, clear, and sweet; sorrow, by one flexible, interrupted, and low; fear, by one dejected, tremulous, and hesitating; courage, by one full, bold, and loud; perplexity, by one grave, steady, and earnest. Or, should I add, in the introduction, the voice should be low; in narration, distinct; reasoning, slow; in persuasion, strong. An attention to emphasis ought also to point out the figures of the LANGUAGE.

As disagreeable appearances of the face, and violent or awkward motions of the hands or head, as well as a motionless stillness, tempt an audience to inattention, they ought to be carefully shunned; and instead thereof, an easy and graceful action, correspondent to the ideas represented in the words, to be studied; particularly, in the countenance, boldness, terror, joy, grief, love, delight, and other passions, suited to the subject, ought to appear.

When one has got rid of vitiated habits in pronunciation and action, he will almost of course fall into a right method, if he but carefully avoid mimicking of others, and study to copy nature, attending to his own natural disposition, and to the characters of his hearers, and what tends most to arrest their attention; and if he maintain a full composure of mind, being master of his subject, and conscious that he delivers nothing unworthy of immortal souls, or to be taught in the name of God; and especially, if he have a thorough experience, and deep impression on his own soul, of the important truths of the gospel, and of the worth and danger of the immortal souls he addresses, and of the solemn account he must quickly give unto God of his management. Nay, a firm persuasion, and heart-captivating impression of these delightful, dreadful, and eternal realities, will make one even of ordinary talent, pronounce with a natural energy and vehemence, more beautiful, and more effectual to arrest the attention of an audience, than all the strains of art. After all, as affectation of novelty or of antiquity in language and pronunciation, shows a preacher foppish or whimsical; so an exclusive attention to elocution or language, as if these were the principal things, and in order to gain himself honour, proves him to be a profane sporter with matters of infinite consequence, and a resolute destroyer of souls; starving them to death with sound and gesture, instead of bringing forth that which is meat indeed and drink indeed. It is not every well-delivered discourse that is worthy of a pulpit. If a preacher descant on duties, of privileges, of evidences of grace, and the like, without ever explaining their nature; if, in an abstract manner, he merely explain, without endeavouring to apply them to his hearers' consciences; if he run on with strings of particulars, without supporting them from the oracles of God; or quote his authorities in so profuse and indistinct a manner, as to leave it doubtful whether they bear upon the point; if he preaches smooth things; wholly dwelling upon God's mercy and goodness, or Christ's dying for men; if he explain the divine law, as chiefly relating to external vices or virtues, and mark out wicked men solely by the characters of theft, murder, adultery, malice, blasphemy, drunkenness, and perhaps not by all these; or if he is much given to handle dry controversies, especially where his humour or honour may be displayed; or if he deck his discourse with wild airy notions, or bombastic phrases, or with impertinent illustrations, and strong blustering assertions, consisting of words, and almost nothing else; what does such arguing prove? How can the word of God herein, like a sharp two-edged sword, pierce to the dividing asunder of the joints and marrow, and be a discern-er of the thoughts and intents of the heart? How can the preacher be cleared of prophesying deceits, and preaching himself, and not Christ Jesus the Lord? Is he not a sounding brass, and tinkling cymbal?—If the time is chiefly spent in prefaces, premises, and introductions, or in proving what was scarcely ever denied, and which none of the audience have apparent temptations to doubt of; if, in an abstruse manner, he crowd together his matter, that only the learned can trace his method; if, in a confused way, he jumble together a multiplicity of propositions in an improper order; if, in a blundering manner, he derive a doctrine from a text that has none, or at least a very remote connection with it, or offer reasons and arguments quite foreign to the point, drag texts into his service, which, in their primary sense, have no relation to the subject; or if he skip from one head or particular to another, without any decent transition; or if he retail his impertinent similes or dry criticisms on the original, perhaps not understood by himself; if, through sloth, he insist chiefly on subjects of particulars easiest to himself, not consulting the edification of his hearers, and perhaps, at every turn, repeat his old sermons; if his subjects correspond not with the circumstances in which they are preached, a rude ignorant people being entertained with abstruse mysteries; wicked men have the privileges and duties of saints continually sounded in their ears; or if subjects quite foreign to the exercise, are insisted on at fasts, thanksgivings, and sacramental occasions; or if, amidst great temptations, manifold outbreaks, terrible judgments, or noted deliverances, nothing relative to such providences is touched; how can the man appear to be an active, prudent, and faithful minister of Christ, who knows how to speake a word in season?

A preacher, not inspired, ought to have his understanding stored with an extensive knowledge of philosophy and history; but, above all, he ought to be mighty in the scriptures, acquainted with their original languages, and having them not only in his memory, but deeply impressed on his heart, that believing he may therefore speak. Though the leading truths of the gospel ought to be his grand theme, yet after earnestly asking direction from God, and in the exercise of dependence upon him, he ought to choose his particular subjects according to the spiritual state of his hearers, according to their capacity, and the sins to which they are exposed, temptations apparent, or duties necessary among them; and according to the providential effects of affliction, or deliverance, of striving, or withdrawals of the divine Spirit, and the occasions of fasting, thanksgiving, communicating, &c. The subject being chosen, the method of handling it ought to be natural, distinct, easily taken up and remembered, and having all its parts so placed as they may best concur for illustrating one another, and the common point in which they all meet. In lecturing, the preacher should point out, and still keep in view, the principal scope of the book, or passages; his division of the paragraph, or verse, ought to be distinct in parts, and these not too numerous to load the memory, or confound the mind: the explication ought to be just, clear, and brief, and may, at the end, be summed up in a short paraphrase. The practical observations ought to be important and edifying, and to contain such hints as were neither plainly expressed in the text or the explication, nor are so remote as to have their foundation scarcely visible in the passage. Whether the galloping over a whole chapter in one lecture, be it as full of matter as it may, or the decanting on a text, as if one was making a sermon, be the most improper method of lecturing, I know not. In sermons, after a short introduction, giving a view of the context, or suggesting some striking hint to quicken the attention of the audience, the sense of the text ought to be exhibited in a few words, and, if convenient, by a natural and easy division; but by no means is it to be cruelly hacked into as many pieces as a luxuriant fancy can devise. No doctrinal observation ought to be deduced, but what is plain and simple, and clearly founded in the text: and often the text itself is more plain or emphatic, than any observation which can be deduced. In explaining the point, neither the general heads, nor the particulars, ought to be too numerous; and all subdivision, if possible, ought to be shunned, that the mind and memory be not confounded therewith. In placing the heads and particulars in the most natural order, and where they may best stand for casting true light on the subject, and making the sermon one true whole, the utmost attention and judgment is necessary to be exercised, and the assistance of God diligently sought. No doubt a sermon ought to be every where practical, and its language scriptural; and it is nothing the worse if it be enlivened with frequent addresses to the consciences of the hearers; but a close and well studied application is, after all, proper to finish it. Every inference ought to be natural and important; every mark of trial plain, and clearly founded on God's word. Reproofs ought to be plain, pointed, and convincing; addresses very warm, awakening, and engaging; directions clear, proper, seasonable, weighty, and well enforced. In fine, the excellency of a sermon lies in its having the word of God so introduced into it, as to enlighten the mind, impress the conscience, and engage the affections and heart. A preacher's life, too, must correspond with his instructions, otherwise he becomes guilty of attempting to make his hearers believe that all he says is but a cunningly devised fable: nor can he deserve the name of a preacher, who does not by frequent and effectual fervent prayer, apply for the blessing of God on his labours; for Paul may plant and Apollos water, but it is God alone that giveth the increase.

PRECEPT. See LAW.

PRECIOUS; (1.) Much esteemed on account of its rarity. 1 Sam. iii. 1. Isa. xiii. 12. (2.) Of a great price. Matt. xxvi. 7.

PREDESTINATE; to appoint beforehand to some particular end: thus God's elect are from eternity set aside from the rest of mankind to receive eternal life for the obedience and death of Christ, and in the way of receiving and walking in him: thus they are predestinated to be his children by adoption, and to be conformed to his image in grace and glory. Eph. i. 5, 11. Rom. viii. 29, 30. The Calvinists maintain God's fixed predestination of some men to everlasting life; while the Jesuits, Molinists, Pelagians, Arminians, and most of the Lutherans, represent this doctrine as pregnant with horror. See DECREE.

PRE-EMINENCE; higher power and honour. In all things, in nature, in person, in office, work, power and honour, Christ has the pre-eminence above angels and men, or any other creature. Col. i. 18. A man has no pre-eminence above a beast as to his body; he is liable to the same diseases and death. Eccl. iii. 19.

PREFER; to honour or esteem one person or thing above another. Dan. vi. 3. Rom. xii. 10.

PREMEDITATE; to think of and consider a matter before hand. Mark xiii. 11.

PREPARE; (1.) To make ready. Josh. i. 11. (2.) To fit and qualify. Rom. ix. 23. (3.) To appoint. Matt. xx. 23. (4.) To direct, establish. 1 Chron. xxix. 18. God prepares mercy and truth for men, when he graciously fulfils his promises and blesses them. Psal. lxi. 7. To prepare the way of the Lord Jesus, is to consider the predictions concerning him, lay aside every prejudice against him, and readily receive him as the promised Messiah and Saviour of the world. Isa. xl. 3. To prepare the heart, is to mortify its various lusts, and put it into a frame of holy submission to, and earnest longing for a God in Christ. 1 Sam. vii. 3. 1 Chron. xxix. 18. The preparation of the heart, and the answer of the tongue are both from the Lord: the arranging and fixing of the thoughts and inclinations of the heart about civil, and much more about spiritual things, and the giving ability to speak readily, distinctly, and to edification, are from the Lord, as his free gift and effectual work. Prov. xvi. 1. The belly of the wicked prepares deceit; his soul contrives how to execute it. Job xv. 25. The Chaldeans prepared the table when they kept a sumptuous feast, as the Medes and Persians besieged their capital. Isa. xxi. 5. The Hebrews prepared a table for that troop and number; they erected altars, and offered sacrifices to their vast number of idols, the heavenly luminaries, and others. Isa. lxxv. 11. The preparation-day on which Christ suffered, was not the preparation of the passover, for that was the day before, but of the Sabbath of the week. Matt. xxvii. 62. John xix. 14.

PRESBYTERY; a court of ecclesiastical elders for ordaining officers, and governing the church. 1 Tim. iv. 14.

PRESENT; (1.) At hand, and within view, as to place. 1 Sam. xiii. 15. (2.) Just now, as to time. 1 Cor. iv. 11. God is represented as present, when he utters his mind, displays his glory, favour, or wrath, or some symbol of his presence: so he is represented as present in heaven. Psal. xvi. 11; in Canaan, John i. 3; in the courts of the temple, Psal. c. 2; in the church, Gen. iv. 16; in his noted providences, Isa. xix. 1. and lxiv. 1; and in his ordinances, and fellowship with him. Luke xiii. 26. Psal. li. 11. God in Christ is present with the saints in the ordinances of the gospel, in the influences of grace, and continued care of his outward providence. Psal. xlv. 1. Matt. xviii. 20. To be present with the Lord, is to be in heaven, enjoying the immediate view of his glory, and fruition of his love. 3 Cor. v. 8. To be present in spirit, is to be near in respect of direction, will, and inclination. 1 Cor. v. 3. This present world is one abounding with fleshly delights, and with troubles, temptations, and corruptions. Tit. ii. 12. The present truth, is the truth greatly opposed, and which is so difficult, and yet much for the honour of Christ, to be cleaved to in principle and practice. 2 Pet. i. 12.

PRESENT; (1.) To shew; and to arraign in the presence or view. 1 Sam. xvii. 16. Acts xxiii. 33. (2.) To offer, Matt. ii. 11; and so a present is a gift, rendered to testify regard or subjection, or to procure or confirm friendship. 1 Kings iv. 21. 2 Kings xvii. 3. Kings offer presents to Christ, when they give their hearts to him, believing in and obeying him, and give up their people and wealth to his service. Psal. lxxix. 10. Ministers present their hearers as chaste virgins before Christ; when, by their means, they come to appear at his judgment-seat, sound in principle, lively in faith, single in affection to Christ, and holy in their lives and conversation. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Col. i. 22, 23.

PRESERVE; (1.) To cause to continue. Psal. xxxvi. 6. Gen. xix. 22. (2.) To keep safe. Psal. xvi. 1. God is the preserver, Saviour, or observer of men; he upholds and protects them; he exactly marks and judges every inclination, thought, word, and deed. How then can they profit him; how oppose him? how appease his anger? or how can they clear themselves before him? Job vii. 20. The eyes of the Lord preserve knowledge; his watchful providence keeps up the light of nature, of revelation, and of grace, among men. Prov. xxii. 12. Integrity and uprightness preserve the saints, are means of their preservation from much sin and trouble. Psal. xxv. 21.

PRESIDENTS; chief rulers under a king, who govern and direct subordinate rulers. Dan. vi. 2.

PRESS; (1.) To tread or squeeze close together. Gen. xl. 11. And so the instrument for squeezing grapes for wine, or large trough in which the grapes were trodden, and the vessel into which the wine runs from the former, are called a press; the last was ordinarily a subterraneous cistern, where the wine was received, and kept till it was put into other vessels. Isa. xvi. 10. and lxiii. 2. Lam. i. 15. Joel iii. 4, 13. Judg. vi. 11. Neh. xiii. 15. Matt. xxi. 33. Hag. ii. 16. Prov. lili. 10. (2.) To throng or crowd thick together. Luke viii. 45. and xix. 3. (3.) To urge earnestly. Gen. xix. 3. (4.) Earnestly seek to get forward: and so to press into the kingdom of heaven, or towards the mark, is with great diligence and resolution to seek after and take hold of God's salvation purchased by his Son, and offered in his word. Luke xvi. 16. Phil. iii. 14. (5.) To burden, afflict. Psal. xxxviii. 2. God is pressed under men as a laden cart is under sheaves, when he is greatly dishonoured and provoked by their sins. Amos ii. 13.

PRESUME; to be bold and daring. Dent. xviii. 20. Presumptuous persons, are such as boldly commit wickedness as they have opportunity. 2 Pet. ii. 10. Presumptuous sins, are such as are committed against knowledge, warning, conviction, reproof, chastisement. Psal. xix. 13. No sacrifice was to be offered for sins evidently presumptuous. Numb. xv. 20. Dent. xvii. 12.

PREVAIL; (1.) To have the advantage of, or power over. Judg. xvi. 5. (2.) To rise higher. Gen. vii. 18, 20. Jesus prevailed to open the sealed book of his Father's purposes: he had sufficient knowledge and authority for that work. Rev. v. 5. The word of God prevails, when, by the Holy Ghost, it gains the attention of multitudes, converts them to Christ, and disposes them to lay aside their sinful practices. Acts xix. 20. Jacob's blessings, particularly of Joseph, prevailed above the blessings of his progenitors in the extent of the plainness, and the nearness of their accomplishment. None of his seed were excluded from the blessing, as in the case of Abraham and Isaac. In his blessing, Canaan was particularly divided; and by the increase of his posterity, there was a near prospect of their inheriting it. Gen. xlix. 26. The dragon and his angels prevailed not: the heathen emperors and their supporters, instead of gaining the victory over Constantine, were defeated and reduced to the most deplorable condition. Rev. xii. 8. Wicked men prevail, when permitted to act as they please in dishonouring God and afflicting his people. Psal. ix. 19. Iniquities prevail against a saint, when the apprehensions of his guilt greatly afflict and distress him, or his powerful corruptions lead him, contrary to his inclination and the convictions of his judgment, to commit sin. Psal. xv. 3.

PREVENT; (1.) To come before one is expected or sought. Job xxx. 27. (2.) To go before, or be sooner. Psal. cxix. 147. One is happily prevented, when distress is hindered, and favours come unasked, Job iii. 12. Psal. xviii. 18; or unhappily, when snares and afflictions come unexpected. 2 Sam. xxii. 6.

PREY. See BOOTY.

PRICE; (1.) The rate of any thing bought or sold. 2 Chron. i. 16. (2.) Worth or value. Prov. xxxi. 10. The price of our redemption, is the righteousness of Jesus Christ. 1 Cor. vi. 20. The price in the hand of fools, is the valuable offers of salvation, which through pride and sloth they contemn and neglect. Prov. xvi. 16.

PRICK; to be pricked in the heart and reins, is to be inwardly convinced of, and distressed for sin. Acts ii. 37. Psal. lxxiii. 21.

PRIDE; (1.) The disposition of a mind filled with self-conceit, contempt of God, and disdain of men. 1 Sam. xvii. 23. (2.) What one is proud of, as power, wealth, church, ordinances, and relation to God, &c. Isa. xxiii. 9. Jer. xiii. 9. Zeph. iii. 11. (3.) Persons who are very proud and haughty, as if much more excellent than their neighbours. Psal. xxxvi. 11. (4.) The haughty looks and words, or wicked deeds, whereby they discover the pride of their hearts. Hos. v. 5. The pride of Jordan is spoiled; the trees on the banks of it are cut down to be employed in the siege, the cities near it are ruined, and the glory and wealth of Judea destroyed by the Romans. Zech. xi. 3.

PRIEST. The word COHEN signifies one who intercedes or deals familiarly with a sovereign. When it relates to civil affairs, it denotes such as are chief and powerful rulers under a king. 1 Chron. xvii. 18. When it relates to religion, COHEN signifies a priest, or one who, by virtue of a divine appointment, offers sacrifices, and intercedes for guilty men. Before the consecration of Aaron, fathers, elder-brothers, princes, or every man for himself, offered his sacrifice, as is evident from the conduct of Abel, Cain, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job. When God at Sinai ratified his covenant with the Hebrews, young men, perhaps the eldest sons of their princes, officiated as priests. Exod. xxiv. 5, 6. The whole Hebrew nation are called priests, because they were devoted to God, and much employed in his service. Exod. xix. 6. In the consecration of Aaron, and of the tabernacle, Moses acted as priest. Exod. xl. Lev. viii. After which the priesthood, in ordinary cases, pertained solely to the family of Aaron; and KORAH, UZZA, and king AZARIAH, were severely punished for interfering with their work; but some extraordinary persons, as Gideon, Samuel, and Elijah, in extraordinary cases, offered sacrifices. Judg. vi. 1 Sam. vii. ix. and xvi. 1 Kings xviii.

None of the Aaronical family were admitted priests, except their genealogy was well attested, and their bodies sound; being neither blind nor lame, flat nosed, superfluous in any thing, broken-footed, broken-handed, crook-backed, dwarfish, blemished in the eye, scurvy, scabbed, &c.; to prevent their being a dishonour to their office, they were to drink no wine or strong drink when they intended to officiate. They were never to leave the holy place to mourn; nor were they to defile themselves for any deceased persons, but very near relations, such as parents, brothers, or virgin-sisters; nor were they to shave off their hair or cut their flesh even for these. They were to marry no infamous or divorced woman, but either a Hebrew virgin, or the widow of another priest. If any of their daughters played the harlot in her father's house, she was burnt with fire. Their sacred robes were a linen bonnet, coat, girdle, and breeches, without which it was death for them to officiate at the altar of God. At least their first consecration was solemn; their bodies were washed in water; their sacred robes were put on; a bullock was offered for a sin-offering, a ram for a burnt-offering, another ram for a consecration or kind of peace-offering, with their respective meat-offerings, and drink-offerings; part of the blood of the ram of consecration was sprinkled about the altar; another part of it was put on the extremities of their bodies, the right toe, thumb, and ear, to signify that atonement was made for the sins of their whole man, and to consecrate them to the service of God; another part of the blood mingled with anointing oil, was sprinkled on the above-mentioned extremities of their body, and on their garments. After these ceremonies, perhaps all of them, had been repeated seven days, during which the priests remained at the tabernacle, a sin-offering to expiate former guilt, and a burnt-offering to procure acceptance, were offered for them. Being thus consecrated, their business was to take the oversight of the tabernacle or temple, and all the furniture; they slew, burnt, and poured out the blood of the sacrifices; they put the shew-bread on the golden table; they offered the incense on the golden altar; they blew the silver trumpets; they supplied with oil, and lighted and snuffed the sacred lamps; they took down and set up the tabernacle, as was proper; they blessed the people, encouraged them in their wars; judged of the leprosy, and in other doubtful cases, and purified the unclean; they themselves were always to be washed in holy water before they offered any oblations. They were maintained by the sacred revenues; they had the tenth part of the tithes from the Levites; the skin of all the burnt-offerings of the herd or flocks; the skin and flesh of all sin and trespass-offerings for rulers and private persons; the shew-bread after it was removed from the golden table; the people's meat-offerings, except the handful that was burnt on the altar; also the right shoulder, breast, cheeks, and maw of the peace-offerings; and all the poll-money, except what was spent in the purchase of the daily burnt-offerings, shew-bread, and oil for the lamps; they had likewise a share of the first-fruits, and had all restitutions where the true owner was not found. Besides, they received the price of devoted persons and unclean beasts, and a great many presents at the sacred feasts; and had thirteen cities for residences allowed them out of the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin. All the unblemished males of Aaron's family might eat of the sin-offerings and simple meat-offerings. None but priests in actual service might eat of the shew-bread or pentecostal peace-offering, and that in the holy place; their wives, children, and household servants, partook in any place of the peace-offerings. Heb. v. 1. Ezra ii. 62, 63. Lev. xxi. 1-13. xxiv. 5-9. i-x. xiii. and xiv. Exod. xviii. 40-43. and xxix. Numb. x. 1-10. ii. 3. iv. 5-16. vi. 23-26. xvi-xviii. Deut. xvii. 8-13. xviii. 1-5. and xx. 1-4. They were divided by David into twenty-four classes, sixteen of the family of Eleazar, and eight of the family of Ithamar; these served in their turns at the temple. 2 Chron. xxix. They were generally inactive in the reformation of Jehoiada, or of Hezekiah. 2 Chron. xxiv. xxix. and xxx. It seems there returned only four of their orders from Babylon; and of these were 4289, which were divided into twenty-four courses. Neh. vii. 39, 42. Sometimes, it is said, about 12,000 priests resided in Jerusalem. Seventeen priests put away their strange wives at the command of Ezra. Ezra x. 13-22. Twenty-two of them subscribed Nehemiah's covenant of reformation. Neh. x. 1-8.

Did these priests typify our adored Priest of good things to come? How fully attested his divine generation, and his royal descent! How perfect are his person and nature! How free from every corruption and every weakness tending to disqualify him for his work! How solemn his call and consecration by the Holy Ghost, and by his own blood! How sacred his robes of manhood, mediatorial office, and complete righteousness! How extensive his charge to atone for his people; to illuminate, nourish, order, judge, bless, encourage, and purify his church. How extensive his reward, on which he and his people for ever feast in the church here, or in the heavenly state! How terrible the punishment of such as oppose him, and by their self-righteous attempts, study to share in his proper work! How proper for such, as appear married to him, to depart from iniquity! And shall not such as, professing to be his children, indulge themselves in whoredom and apostasy, depart from him into everlasting fire?

Were not these priests emblems of gospel ministers? They must be divinely called to their work, and qualified with gifts and graces for it, richly furnished with spiritual knowledge, blameless, sober, temperate, holy, and prudent, wholly given to their work, not entangling themselves with the deadening affairs of this life, nor joined in marriage with impious and infamous women, nor in ecclesiastical fellowship with unfaithful and Antichristian churches. Always applying to themselves the blood and Spirit of Jesus, they must preach the great atonement, and devote themselves and hearers to God, and anew every Sabbath, exhibit Jesus on the gospel-table as the shew-bread of life; daily offer the incense of fervent prayers; blow the gospel-trumpet, calling and beseeching sinners to be reconciled to God, sounding alarms of impending danger, and exciting to war against sin, Satan, and the world. It is for them to explain the oracles of God, to snuff off erroneous glosses, and to cast out noisome professors. It is theirs to bless their people, solve their doubts, purge and restore the scandalous, equally caring for the true happiness of the poor as of the rich; and, according to their faithfulness and diligence, should be their encouragement from their people, and shall be their everlasting reward. Ezek. xliii-xlv.

Were they not emblems of the saints? Their spiritual descent from Jesus is certain and ought to be evident; they are free from the reigning love of every sin; they desire soundness in their heart and life; nor are they stained with habitual scandal: they are married to the virgin law of faith, and ought not to be members of apostate churches, nor to bewail deceased relations as those who have no hope, or indulge themselves in excessive grief, as if earthly enjoyments were their portion. Their sacred robes are the Saviour's righteousness and grace, evidenced by a holy, humble, sober, chaste, and grave conversation. Being called of God, and consecrated in soul, body, and spirit, by the blood of Jesus, and the influences of the Holy Ghost, it is theirs daily to wash themselves therein, and thus worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness: theirs to offer to God the burnt-offering of their whole man, mortifying every lust, and surrendering their very life to the service and honour of Christ; to offer the peace-offering of praise and thanksgiving, the heave-offering of prayer and heavenly desires, the wave-offering of universal obedience, the meat-offering of charitable distributions, and the drink-offering of godly sorrow. A reconciled God is the object of their worship; themselves are living temples; Christ is the altar which sanctifies their gifts, his Spirit and love inflame, his blood and grace cleanse their oblations, his intercession perfumes them. It is theirs daily to present the incense of prayer and praise, and to present their good works, as shew-bread, accepted in Christ; and to grow in grace and spiritual knowledge, shine as lights in the world, snuff off every mistake in principle and practice; and to blow the trumpet, instruct the ignorant, warn the unruly, and excite the inactive; and by their intercessions for all men, to bring a blessing on the places where they live; and to try the spirits, and judge their own hearts, and promote purity in themselves, their families, and all around them.—How rich their reward! they live on Jesus, their divine and all comprehensive oblation; and to them angels and men do service; and even troubles and temptations work an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9. Rev. i. 6.

Sometimes we read as if there were several CHIEF PRIESTS at once, for the leaders of the twenty four classes were so called: the second priest, or sagan, who officiated instead of the high priest in case of his sickness or defilement, was also called a chief priest. About the time of our Saviour, too, as the high priests were put in and out by the civil governors, there was sometimes a variety of persons in life who had been high priests. But according to order, there was but one HIGH PRIEST at one time. He was the most honourable person of the sacerdotal family, and was allowed to marry none but a respectable virgin, not to mourn or defile himself for any relation however near. Besides his suit of apparel common to him with his brethren, and which he wore on the day of expiation, he had other robes, called the golden garments, and which he wore while attending his ordinary employ. This suit consisted of breeches, and an embroidered coat of fine linen, with a girdle of silk and fine twined linen to fasten it. Over this was a blue robe hanging down to his feet, and its lower hem hung round alternately with bells and embroidered pomegranates: Above this was put on the short robes of the ephod, with the breast-plate of judgment; and on his head was a golden mitre, inscribed with Holiness to the Lord. Every high priest had his head plentifully anointed with oil when he was consecrated. He had his lodging in an apartment of the tabernacle or temple, or near to it. Besides his right to interfere with the work of the other priests, he was the supreme judge of all controversies in the Jewish church, and directed all his brethren in their work. Perhaps he alone made atonement for the other priests. It is certain he alone entered the Holy of holies, and performed the whole work of expiation for Israel on their annual FAST. Exod. xxviii. and xxix. 6. Lev. xxi. 10—12. viii. ix. and xvi.

From the death of Aaron to the last destruction of Jerusalem, the high priesthood, except for about one hundred and twenty years, continued in the family of Eleazar, Phinehas, Abishua, Bukki, and Uzzi were of this line: but instead of Zerabiah, Meraioth, Amaria, and Abitub, their descendants; Eli, Abitub, Abiah, Abimelech, and Abiathar, of the family of Ithamar, had the office of high priesthood. When Abiathar was deposed, it reverted to the family of Eleazar. Zadok, Ahimaz, Azariah or Amariah, Johanan or Jehoiada, Azariah, perhaps the same as the Zechariah murdered by Joash, Amariah, or Azariah, who withstood king AZARIAH, Abitub, Zadok, Urijah who made the idolatrous altar for Ahop, Shallum, Azariah, Hilkiah, Seraiah, Jehozadak, Jeshua, Jojakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Jonathan, Jaddua, officiated from A. M. 2514 to 3682. To these succeeded Onias, Simon the Just, Eleazar, Manasseh, Onias, Simon, Onias, Jason, Menelaus, Lysimachus, Alcimus; the last four were most abandoned wretches, and bought the office over one another's heads from the heathen monarch of Syria. To them succeeded, in the family of the Maccabees, Judas, Jonathan, Simon, Hircanus, Aristobulus, Janneus, Hircanus, Aristobulus, his usurping brother, and Antigonus his usurping nephew: these were both high priests and civil rulers, but had not by birthright a claim to the office. To them succeeded, from A. M. 3964 to 4072, twenty seven others, noted for nothing but disorder in their mode of entrance, or wickedness in their management of their office; viz. Ananeel, Aristobulus, Jesus, Simon, Matthias, Boethus, Joazar, Eleazar, Jesus, Annas, Ishmael, Eleazar the son of Annas, Simon, Caiaphas, Jonathan the son of Annas, Theophilus, Simon, Matthias the son of Annas, Elioneus, Ananias, Ishmael, Joseph, Ananias the son of Annas, Jesus, Matthias, and Phanias. Since the last, there has been no occasion for priests either supreme or subordinate, their city and temple having lain in ruins.

Were not the Hebrew high priests notable types of our Redeemer? He is the first begotten, an elder brother of God's spiritual family of chosen priests. He directs his people, offers sacrifice for them, and by his blood and Spirit consecrates them to God. How transcendent his unction to, and preparation for his work! He wears his manhood, and executes his office, in the double estate of debasement and glory. How shining his robes of righteousness and garments of salvation! and how fixed for ever, as on his shoulder and heart, are all the Israelites indeed! As he espoused a pure and virgin nature into personal union with himself, none but virgin saints and churches are really his people. On his head are many crowns; and by him, as our righteousness and sanctification, are we sanctified, and made holiness to the Lord. He is the great High Priest of our profession, and of good things to come. His person, as God-man, is infinitely dignified in his sacrificial and intercessory work; his priesthood is the great foundation and object of our gospel-profession, and the cause of all the precious blessings that come upon us in time and eternity. Heb. iii. 1. and viii. 1. If Christ had remained on earth, he could not have been a priest: being descended of the tribe of Judah, he had no right to officiate in the sacerdotal work of the earthly tabernacle or temple; and if he had remained on earth after his oblation of himself, he could not have shewed himself the true Messiah, nor by his intercession finished his work, and rendered the shedding of his blood effectual. Heb. viii. 4.

PRIESTHOOD; (1.) The office of a priest. Numb. xvi. 10. The anointing of Aaron and his sons was an everlasting priesthood: it secured to them and their seed the office of priest for many generations. Exod. xl. 15. Numb. xxv. 13. Christ's priesthood is unchangeable, as it never passes from him to another. Heb. vii. 24. (2.) The execution of this office: and the iniquity of the priesthood is sin committed in performing the work of that office. Numb. xviii. 1. (3.) A class of priests: so the saints are a holy and royal priesthood: a company of spiritual persons, washed in the Redeemer's blood, sanctified by his word and Spirit, and all of them kings and priests to God. 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9.

PRINCE; one who, whether as the son of a king or otherwise, is possessed of rank and authority. When the Hebrews came out of Egypt, they had twelve princes to govern their twelve tribes. These princes, on twelve several days, offered their oblations for the dedication of the tabernacle. The offering of each was one silver charger of a hundred and thirty shekels' weight, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil, for a meat-offering; one golden spoon of ten shekels full of incense, one bullock, one ram, and one lamb, for a meat-offering; one kid for a sin-offering; and two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and as many lambs, for a peace-offering. Numb. i. 5—16. and vii. 12—89. Ten princes of the congregation, with Joshua and Eleazar, were appointed to divide the land of Canaan westward of Jordan. Numb. xxxiv. 17—19. David had twelve princes, who commanded the standing militia in their respective months; and Solomon had twelve princes, who provided for his family. These, perhaps, represented the twelve apostles of our Saviour, who were the chief governors and procurers of provision to the Christian church: perhaps also, David's mighties, though not all princes, might represent the apostles and evangelists, so noted for establishing the Christian church. 1 Chron. xxvii. 1 Kings iv. 2 Sam. xxiii. David's princes contributed largely towards the expences of building the temple; Jehoshaphat's were active in reforming the country; and those of Joash active in corrupting it with idolatry. Hezekiah's princes were active in his reformation; and gave to the people for offerings at the solemn passover, 1000 bullocks and 10,000 sheep. Josiah's princes did the same. 1 Chron. xxix. 6—7. 2 Chron. xvii. xix. xxiv. 17, 18. and xxx. xxiv. and xxxv. After Josiah's death, some of the princes were furious persecutors of Jeremiah and other prophets, and some of them were not. Jer. xxvi. and xxxvi.—xxxviii. Persons of great excellency and worth, chief officers of an army, and counsellors in a state, are called princes. Eccl. x. 7. Isa. x. 8. and xix. 11. For the transgression of a land its princes are many; the pretenders to royalty or high power are numerous, and are soon cut off. Prov. xxviii. 2. The princes and thousands of Judah denote the same thing, the governor being put for the governed, or whole body. Matt. ii. 6. Mic. v. 2. God is called the Prince of the host, and Prince of princes; he rules over all, and in a peculiar manner was the governor of the Jewish nation. Dan. viii. 11, 25. Jesus Christ is the Prince of the kings of the earth; in his person, he surpasses every creature in excellency, and he bestows rule and authority on men as he sees fit. Rev. i. 5. He is the Prince of life: as God, he is the author and disposer of all life, temporal, spiritual, and eternal; as Mediator, he purchases, bestows, and brings men to everlasting happiness. Acts ii. 15. He is the Prince of peace: he is the God of peace: he purchased peace for guilty man, he made peace between Jews and gentiles; he left peace to his disciples and people; and he governs his church in the most peaceful manner. Isa. ix. 6. Angels are called chief princes and principalities: How excellent their nature; how high their station! and how great their influence in ruling the world! Dan. x. 13. Satan is called a princality; the prince of this world; and of the power of the air: How great his power and dominion! most men are his subjects; and he boasts that he has the disposal of earthly kingdoms: he is the head of such angels as rove about in the air to do mischief. John xii. 31. Eph. ii. 2. The apostles, ministers, and saints, are called princes; spiritually descended from, and authorised by Jesus the king of saints, and who is over his holy hill of Zion. How dignified their state, and how great their influence on the government of the world, especially in what relates to the church! Psal. xlv. 16. The Hebrew priests are called the princes of the sanctuary, because they ruled in and managed the affairs of it. Isa. xliii. 28. Titus, or his father Vespasian, both Roman emperors, is the prince whose people came and destroyed Jerusalem. Dan. ix. 26. The prince of the covenant, whom Antiochus Epiphanes overthrew, is either Onias the Jewish high priest, whom he deposed, and sold the office to his brother; or Demetrius, to whom the kingdom of Syria belonged; or rather Ptolemy king of Egypt, with whom he had just before made a league. Dan. xi. 22.

PRINCESS; the wife or daughter of a king. Jerusalem is so called, because the capital city of Judea, and a principal city in that part of the world. Jam. i. 1.

PRINCIPAL; chief, best. Exod. xxx. 25. The principal of the flock, are the chief men of a nation, their rulers and rich people. Jer. xxv. 34. The principal to be restored, is the thing stolen, or the value thereof. Lev. vi. 5. Numb. v. 7.

PRINCIPALITY, (1.) Royal state, or the attire of the head marking the same. Jer. xlii. 18. (2.) Chief rulers. Tit. iii. 1 (3.) Good angels. Eph. i. 21. and iii. 10. (4.) Bad angels. Eph. vi. 12. Col. ii. 15.

PRINCIPLE; a point of belief. The first principles of the oracles of Christ, are such truths as must be understood and believed, in order to our introduction to a further acquaintance with divine truth: Such as that in every thing we ought to make the glory of God, and the enjoyment of him, our chief end, and make his word the standard of all we believe and do in religion; that there is one God in three persons, who has purposed, created, and who preserves and governs all things; that man, having fallen from his happy state of holiness and covenant friendship with God, is absolutely unable to recover himself; but his salvation must be purchased with the Redeemer's blood, and graciously applied by his Holy Spirit; that being united to Christ, and justified, adopted, and sanctified, we must perfect holiness in the fear of God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. Heb. v. 12.

PRINT; a deep and conspicuous mark. Job xx. 25. According to the Jews, the marks upon men's bodies, prohibited in the law, were made by cutting the flesh, and filling the incision with stibium, ink, or other colours. Lev. xix. 28. God sets a print on men's heels, when he with anger observes their sins, and takes care to prevent their escape from trouble. Job xiii. 27.

PRISON; a place for confining mad people or evil-doers. Luke xxiii. 19. To it are compared whatever tends to restrict liberty, and renders a person disgraceful and wretched; as (1.) A low, obscure, and afflicted condition. Eccl. iv. 14. (2.) The state of restraint in which God keeps Satan from seducing mankind. Rev. xx. 7. (3.) The state of spiritual thralldom in which sinners are kept by the curse of the law, and by Satan and their own lusts. Isa. xlii. 7. (4.) The grave, out of which men cannot move, and in which they are shut up as evil-doers. Isa. liii. 8. Perhaps, in allusion to this, David calls the cave in which he was, as if one buried alive, a prison. Psal. cxlii. 7. (5.) Hell, where damned sinners are shamefully and miserably, but securely confined. 1 Pet. iii. 19. Such as are shut up in any of these, or are in a captive condition, are called PRISONERS. Isa. xlix. 9. Psal. lxi. 8. Job iii. 18. Paul was a prisoner of Christ; in bonds and imprisonment for his adherence to Christ's truths. Eph. iii. 1. The Jews in Babylon, and those sinners invited to Jesus Christ, are prisoners of hope; the promise secured deliverance to the former, it offers deliverance to the latter. Zech. ix. 12.

PRIVATE; secret; apart from others. Matt. xxiv. 3. No scripture is of private interpretation; it is not to be explained according to men's own particular fancies, but according to the analogy of faith, or common declaration of other scriptures, and by the direction of the Holy Ghost, and those helps he has openly granted to the church. 2 Pet. i. 20.

PRIVY; (1.) Secret, hidden. Deut. xxiii. 1. (2.) Conscious and consenting. Acts v. 2. To bring in damnable heresies privily, is to introduce them by little and little; or, under a shew of knowledge, holiness, or gospel-liberty, hiding their real meaning and tendency. 2 Pet. ii. 1.

PRIZE; in races, &c. is the reward given to him who outruns or does more than the rest. 1 Cor. ix. 24. The prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, is everlasting happiness in heaven. It is the reward that God in Christ promises graciously to his people, to encourage them in their spiritual race and warfare; and which he for Jesus' sake gives them, after they have finished their course. Phil. iii. 15.

PROCEED; (1.) To go out from. Isa. vi. 10. (2.) To go forward in a journey, a speech, or course of action. 2 Tim. iii. 9. Job xl. 5. Acts xii. 3. Christ proceeded from the Father; he was begotten of him as his Son, received from him his mediatorial commission, and came into the world by his appointment. John viii. 42. The proceeding of the Holy Ghost from the Father and Son, denotes his inconceivable relation to these persons, as prior to himself in order of subsistence, and his acting by commission from them in the application of redemption. John xvi. 26. Out of the mouth of the Most High proceedeth not evil and good; he commands and effects no evil of sin, but only good. Lam. iii. 31.

PROCESS, In process of time; after many days, Gen. xxxvii. 12; perhaps on the Sabbath, the end of the week. Gen. iv. 3.

PROCLAIM; to give public notice of a matter, that all may know it. The name of the Lord is proclaimed, when his excellencies and mighty works are openly and loudly declared. Exod. xxxiii. 19.

PROCLAMATION; giving public notice of the will of a superior, by a herald, or crier. Dan. v. 29.

PROCURE; to obtain; bring on. Jer. ii. 17. Prov. xi. 27.

PRODUCE; to bring forth. To produce cause, and bring forth strong reasons before God, is to say all we justly can in defence of ourselves and our conduct. Isa. xli. 21.

PROFANE; not holy, but allowed for common use. Ezek. xlii. 20. and xlviii. 15. Profane fables or babblings, are notions or speeches, obscene, heathenish, and tending to bring reproach on the true religion. 1 Tim. iv. 9. and vi. 20. Profane persons are such as defile themselves by shameful actions, particularly a contempt of things sacred. Lev. xxi. 7. Ezek. xxi. 25. Esau rendered himself profane, by despising his birthright, and the promise of the Messiah annexed thereto. Heb. xii. 16. To PROFLUTE things, is to defile them; and to PROFANE, is to use them as base or common. Lev. xxii. 15. Ezek. xxiv. 21. God and his name are profaned, or polluted, when any thing by which he makes himself known, as his authority, ordinances, &c. are used in an irreverent manner, and to promote some sinful end of error or wickedness. Lev. xviii. 21. Ezek. xiii. 9. God's Sabbaths, sanctuary, ordinances and statutes, are profaned, when not used in the manner he requires, but to promote carnal or idolatrous purposes. Lev. xxi. 19 and xxii. 7. Neh. xiii. 17. Psal. lxxxix. 31. Ezek. xx. 13. Zeph. iii. 4. Jer. vii. 30. God profaned the princes of his sanctuary, and polluted his people, when he gave up the Jewish priests and the people to the power of their enemies, and punished them with debasing calamities. Isa. xliii. 28. and xlvii. 6. The Jews profaned the holiness of the Lord, when they prostituted themselves, who were his people, to sinful courses; when they used his temple and altar in irreverent and idolatrous worship, and thus poured contempt on the holiness of his nature. They profaned his covenant when they haughtily boasted of it, and contrary to its solemn obligations, gave up themselves to wicked practices. Mal. ii. 10. The Chaldeans polluted God's secret place, when they entered into and burnt the temple, the Holy of holies not excepted. Ezek. vii. 21. Antiochus Epiphanes polluted the sanctuary of strength, when he set up in the Jewish temple the image of Jupiter, and offered swine's flesh, made it a garrison for his soldiers, and a place of revelling and whoredom. Dan. xi. 31. Antichrist pollutes the church with idolatry, superstition, and every other wickedness.—The Jewish priests profaned the Sabbath, and were blameless; they killed their sacrifices on it, as if it were a common day. Matth. xii. 6. The Jews profaned their fruit-trees, when on the fifth year they eat their fruit as a common food. Dent. xx. 6. Jer. xxxi. 5. The high priest profaned himself, when, by defiling himself for his deceased relations, he degraded his character, and made himself appear as a common person. Lev. xxi. 4. A woman profaned herself, when, by turning whore, she rendered herself common, base, and contemptible. Lev. xix. 7. A priest's daughter profaned her father, when, by whoredom, she brought a stain on his character. Lev. xxi. 9. The pollutions of this world, are gross and scandalous sins, which wicked men live in. 2 Pet. ii. 20.

PROFESS; to declare openly and solemnly. Deut. xxvi. 3. Matt. vii. 23.

PROFESSION is either, (1.) Openly to avow our belief of and adherence to: or, (2.) Our act of boldly avowing these truths. Heb. iii. 1. and iv. 14. and x. 23. Timothy professed a good profession; in his baptism and ordination, and in his preaching of the gospel, he solemnly avowed his belief of, and resolved adherence to, the precious and useful truths of God. 1 Tim. vi. 12.

PROFIT; (1.) To grow better, to become more intelligent and consistent; to improve in gifts and grace. Gal. i. 14. 1 Tim. iv. 15. (2.) To make better. Heb. ix. 3. Our good works profit men, as they promote their conviction, conversion, holiness, or comfort; but they cannot profit God by rendering him better or happier. Tit. iii. 1. Job xxii. 2. and xxxv. 1. Luke xvii. 10.

PROFOUND; deep. To be profound to make slaughter, is to be firmly resolved, deeply engaged, thoroughly skilled, and earnestly industrious, to commit murder in the most subtle and secret manner. Hos. v. 2.

PROGENITORS; forefathers. Gen. xlix. 26.

PROGNOSTICATORS; such as pretend to foretell the various events of the months of the year. Isa. xlvii. 13.

PROLONG; (1.) To make long. Deut. iv. 26. (2.) To stay long in a place. Numb.

ix. 19. God's words are prolonged, when it is a long time before they are fulfilled. Ezek. xii. 25, 28. The fear of the Lord prolongs life: a holy conversation prevents intemperance and rash and sinful conduct, which tend to shorten men's lives; and God, if it is for his honour, lengthens out the days of such as fear him. Prov. x. 27. Wicked men prolong not the perfection of riches; God cuts them off before they get their wealth brought to its intended amount. Job xv. 20.

PROMISE; (1.) An engagement to bestow some benefit. 2 Pet. ii. 19; o God's promise is his declaration of his readiness to bestow his favours on men. 1 Kings viii. 56. (2.) The good thing promised: so the Holy Ghost, in his saving and miraculous operations, is the promise of the Father. Acts i. 4. Eternal life in heaven is called the promises; it is the thing promised in many of them. Heb. vi. 12. The promise to the Jews and their seed, and every one called by the gospel, is God's offer and engagement to be their God, and to make them his people. Acts ii. 39. Isaac was, by promise, procreated by God's fulfilment of his promise to his parents, not by their natural strength for generation. Gal. iv. 23. Promises are given, when set before us in the scripture, that we may believe them, and plead the fulfilment thereof; and their being given, denotes their being granted to us freely, sovereignly, and irrevocably. 2 Pet. ii. 4. To obtain or receive promises, is to enjoy their fulfilment in receiving the good things promised. Heb. vi. 15. and xl. 39. The fifth commandment is the first with promise; it is the first of the second table, and is the first that has a promise of long life and prosperity to such as are obedient to it. Eph. vi. 2. The promises of God are either absolute, i. e. their fulfilment depends on no condition to be performed by us; and, to manifest the exceeding riches of God's grace, these are generally directed to men, as sinful, guilty, polluted, hard-hearted, poor, ungodly, &c. 1 Tim. i. 15. Isa. i. 18. xliii. 25. and iv. 6, 7. Zech. xiii. 1, 8, 9. Ezek. xxxvi. 25—29. Isa. xlvii. 12, 13. Psal. lxxii. 12—14. Jer. xxx. 22. and xxxi. 33; and some of them, as the promises of Christ's incarnation and death, have properly no condition at all: or conditional, when the fulfilment depends on some act or quality in us, as, as, &c. Every one of these conditions required of us is promised in some absolute promise, and thus free grace reigns through the whole of the gospel-scheme; and yet, by making such duties conditions of connection with some further privileges, holiness is powerfully encouraged.

Some promises relate to outward things; as health, strength, food, raiment, peace, comfort, success to men and to their seed. Prov. iii. 7, 8. Psal. ciii. 5. and xxxvii. 3. 11. Deut. x. 18. Job v. 24. Psal. xci. 10. and cxxi. 8. Job xi. 18, 19. Prov. iii. 24. Psal. cxxviii. 2, 3. Deut. xlviii. 4, 5, 12. Psal. i. 3. ciii. 17. cil. 28. xlv. 16. and xxxiv. 13, 18. Isa. lvii. 1. Prov. x. 7, 22. Psal. xxiii. 5, 6. Job. xxii. 24—26. Deut. viii. 10. Joel ii. 26. Gen. xii. 2. Deut. xxvi. 11. Some promises relate to God's preventing, moderating, and shortening afflictions, supporting them under, and delivering them from afflictions, and bringing good out of them. Psal. cxxi. 7. Job v. 19. Isa. xxvi. 8. Jer. xli. 28. Psal. xxv. 3. Mark xiii. 19. 20. Gen. xv. 1. Ezek. xi. 16. Psal. xxxvii. 24. 1 Cor. xii. 9. Isa. xliiii. 2. Psal. xli. 3. Deut. vii. 15. Exod. xxiii. 25. Matt. xix. 29. x. 30. and v. 11, 12. 1 Pet. iv. 19. Psal. xli. 5. and lxviii. 5. Jer. xxxiii. 3. Isa. xxvii. 9. Psal. xcvii. 11. Zech. xiii. 9. But the principal promises relate to spiritual good things; as, union to Christ, Hos. ii. 19, 20. Isa. liv. 5; of the Spirit, Ezek. xxxvii. 27. Prov. i. 25; justification, Isa. i. 18. xlii. 25. xli. 23. and xiv. 24, 25; adoption, Jer. iii. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 18; sanctification, change of heart, and life, Ezek. xi. 19, 20. and xxxvi. 26, 27; spiritual knowledge, Prov. ii. 2-6. James i. 5; faith, John vi. 37. Eph. ii. 8; repentance, Rom. xi. 26. Ezek. xvi. 63, and xx. 43; love to God, 2 Thess. iii. 5. Deut. xxx. 6; filial fear of God. Hos. iii. 5. Jer. xxxii. 39, 40; new obedience, Deut. xxx. 8; hope, 2 Thess. ii. 16. Rom. xv. 4; peace and joy, Isa. lviii. 18, 19. and xxvi. 3. Psal. lxi. 10. and xcvi. 11, 12; and unflinching perseverance in a state of grace, Jer. xxxii. 39, 40. John iv. 11. xvi. 19. and x. 27, 28; a happy death, Rev. xiv. 13; and eternal happiness, Isa. xxxv. 10. 2 Tim. iv. 8. Some promises are permanent, fulfilling in every age; and others are periodical, fulfilled in certain particular periods: and thus are prophecies, as they foretel what is future; but promises, as they secure the bestowal of good.

PROMOTE; to raise to higher honour. Esth. v. 11. Shame is the promotion of fools; when, instead of being raised to higher honours, they fall into shame and disgrace. Prov. iii. 35. Promotion comes not from the east, west, north, or south; not by chance, or merely by human means. Psal. lxxv. 6.

PRONOUNCE; (1.) To declare plainly, as a judge doth a sentence. Lev. v. 4. (2.) To express the sound of a word. Judg. xii. 6.

PROOF; a clear token of the truth or excellency of things. 2 Cor. viii. 24. and ii. 9. One makes full proof of his ministry, when his hearers have sufficient evidence given them that he is furnished and sent of God. 2 Tim. iv. 5.

PROPER; (1.) Belonging to a man's self. 1 Chron. xxix. 3. (2.) Handsome, agreeable. Heb. xi. 23; and hence the qualities of a thing are called its properties.

PROPHECY; (1.) A declaration of future things. Neh. vi. 12. (2.) A declaration of hidden, obscure, and important things. Prov. xxx. 1. (3.) The preaching of the gospel. 1 Tim. iv. 14. Rom. xii. 6. (4.) The gift of explaining obscure passages of scripture, or of foretelling things to come. 1 Cor. xii. 10. and xiii. 8. (5.) To join in the public praises and worship of God. 1 Cor. xi. 5. The prophecy of Christ's two witnesses, denotes both the preaching and the open profession of his truths, in opposition to the delusions of Antichrist. Rev. xi. 3.

PROPHET. (1.) One who foretels future events. Amos iii. 6. (2.) One who explains obscure mysteries, or passages of scripture, under the peculiar direction of the Holy Ghost. 1 Cor. xiv. 26. (3.) One who is under special influence of the Spirit. 1 Sam. xix. 24. (4.) A false pretender to inspiration, Jer. xix. 15; and so the heathen poets are called prophets, because they were supposed to speak under divine influence. Tit. i. 12. (5.) One who declares the mind of another to the people; thus Aaron was the prophet of Moses. Exod. vii. 1. (6.) The inspired books of the Old Testament are called The Prophets, besides the books of Moses, or besides these and the Psalms. Luke xvi. 31. and xxiv. 27, 44. Anciently, prophets were called seers, because they had more knowledge than others. 1 Sam. ix. 9. Sometimes God revealed his mind to the prophets by dreams, voices, visions: sometimes he did so by an efficacious impression of his will on their understandings, and an excitement of their will to declare it to others. Enoch, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron, Samuel, Gad, Nathan, David, Solomon, Iddo, Ahijah, Shemaiah, the man of God from Judah, Azariah, Hanani, Jehu, Elijah, Micah, Elisha, Elisha, Jonah, Amos, Hosea, Joel, Isaiah, Micah, Oded, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Urijah, Ezekiel, Obadiah, Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Zacharias, Simeon, John Baptist, and Agabus, were true and pious prophets.

PROPHETESS; not merely the wife of a prophet, as Isa. viii. 3; but also a woman that foretold future things. Among these may be reckoned Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, Huldah, Elizabeth, the Virgin Mary, Anna, and the four daughters of Philip the deacon. Among the wicked prophets may be reckoned Balaam, and the old prophet of Bethel, who, pretending a revelation, decoyed the man of God from Judah to return and eat bread with him, and then foretold his death by a lion, for disobeying the contrary orders from God, 1 Kings xiii; Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah, Hananiah, Shemaiah the Nehelamite, Ahab the son of Kolaiah, Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, Caiaphas, &c. Noadiah, and Jezebel of Thyatira, were two pretended prophetesses. When the priests, about the time of Samuel, neglected the instruction of the people, schools of prophets were formed, in which young men were piously educated to prepare them for receiving the gift of prophecy. Such schools we find at Bethel, Gilgar, Najoth, Jericho, and Jerusalem, &c. which were superintended by Samuel, Elijah, Elisha, &c.; but it does not appear that all the young men educated in them were afterwards inspired. 1 Sam. x. xi. and xix. 2 Kings ii. Whether the most of the noted prophets were anointed at their entrance on their office, cannot be ascertained. It is certain they generally lived in a very humble and temperate manner. The presents given them were simply such as oil, bread, fruits, honey. 2 Kings iv. 42. 1 Sam. ix. 7, 8. and x. 3. Elijah had nothing but simple provision provided him at the brook Chereth, in the widow's house, or in the wilderness of Judah. The hundred prophets whom Obadiah maintained in two caves, had nothing but bread and water.

The Shunnamite provided only mere necessities for Elisha. As there were many true prophets, there were also numerous false ones: Ahab and his wife had eight hundred and fifty of them at one time; and it appears from the prophecies of Hosea, Micah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, that the countries of Israel and Judah then swarmed with them. The Hebrews were therefore required to try pretenders to prophecy in the most strict manner. None were to be regarded as true prophets except their prophecies were fulfilled, and also their doctrines and lives tended to promote the honour and service of God. Dent. xiii. Jer. xxviii. and xxix.

Moses was superior to the rest of the prophets. He appears to have been habitually disposed to receive the revelations of God; and to him God in a more familiar manner uttered his mind, and revealed a complete system of rules for his worship, and which were explained and inculcated by those who succeeded him. Dent. xxxiv. 10. John the Baptist was more than a prophet, as he pointed out Jesus Christ as actually come in the flesh. Matt. xi. 9. Paul, Peter, and John may be called prophets, as their writings contain a variety of predictions. 2 Thess. i. and ii. 1 Tim. iv. and 2 Tim. iii. and iv. 1 Pet. ii. 2 Pet. ii. and iii. 1 John ii. Rev. iv.—xxii. But Jesus Christ is called that Prophet; he was infinitely superior to all the rest in dignity of person, in extent of knowledge, in high authority, and efficacious instruction. John vi. 14. He was a Prophet like unto Moses; How noted his meekness, his intimacy with God, and his faithful discharge of his work! By him God revealed a whole system of gospel-worship; and at what infinite hazard do men despise him! Dent. xviii. 15—19. Acts iii. 22. The Romish clergy are called the false prophet; they pretend to peculiar intimacy with God, and infallibility in the knowledge of his will, and to rule in his church, but deceive the most part of the world called Christian: or, the false prophet may denote Mahometans, whose original deluder pretended to receive a system of revelations from God. Rev. xvi. 13.

In order to understand the prophetic parts of scripture, the following rules may be useful; (1.) The symbolical language of prophecies must be carefully studied, particularly the names given to Christ, the church, Antichrist, nations, armies, &c. (2.) There ought to be an acquaintance with the plan of salvation, and the nature of Christ's spiritual kingdom, that every interpretation may be clearly agreeable to the analogy or proportion of faith. Rom. xii. 6. (3.) There ought to be an acquaintance with the scriptures in general, in order that the various prophecies relating to the same subject may be compared together for their mutual illustration. (4.) There ought to be an acquaintance with the events of Providence; in order to examine what events the predictions tally with. (5.) One must come with a mind unbiassed, and humbly dependent on and earnestly looking up to the Spirit of God for guidance into all truth, and nothing else, as he alone fully understands the meaning of his own words. (6.)

Though the sense of a prophecy be simple, and not manifold, yet it may be fulfilled in a variety of ways or events: Thus, the predictions of Moses, Lev. xxvi. Dent. xxviii. and xxxii. and others, have their fulfilment in every similar event happening to the Jews after that time. And prophecies often respect the type in a lower, as well as the Antitype in a more exalted sense: Thus, what relates to David and Solomon in their typical characters, have their more full accomplishment in Christ. Many of those relating at first hand to the Jewish nation, have their complete fulfilment in the gospel or heavenly church: Thus, Isa. xxxv. 10. was accomplished in the deliverance from Sennacherib's army, in the deliverance from Babylon in the spread of the gospel by the apostles, in the deliverance of the church by Constantine, and will have a more complete fulfilment in the millennial and eternal states. Many predictions relative to the church and the conversion of the nations, relate both to the apostolic, and millennial periods, as Isa. lx. Ezek. xl—xlviii. &c.; but the grandeur and glory of the description is such, that their full accomplishment must be looked for only in heaven. As no prophecy can have a retrospective view, that in Rev. xxi. and xxii. can respect only the millennial and eternal states. (7.) Great care must be taken to know the time of every prediction, as nearly as it can be ascertained, that it may be applied only to events posterior to that date; and to know the subject of which it treats whether it be simple or complex, and whether it speaks of its subject, in literal or figurative language. Acts viii. 34. In order to know the subject of a prophecy, we must collect in our minds the principal characters referred to in that prophecy; nay, though it should be named, we are by these to find out whether it is to be interpreted properly or mystically, or in both ways. By this rule it is easily known, that David, in Ezek. xxxiv. and xxxvii. Hos. iii. 5. means Christ; and that Isai. lxxxix. xlv. and lxxii. have at most but a subordinate reference to David and Solomon, and the principal to Jesus Christ. (8.) When a subject is called by its own name, and the whole or principal characters agree to that subject, we must never depart from the literal sense; as in the predictions relative to the Canaanites, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Philistines, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Arabians, Greeks, and most of those relating to the Hebrews, &c.; but if the characters do not agree with the subject expressed by name, we must seek for a similar subject to which they can agree; as in the case of Edom. Isa. lxiii. 1; Elijah, Mal. iv. 5; David, Jer. xxx. 20. (9.) The order in which events are introduced in the prophetic books, directs us to the period and things which the predictions belong to: Thus, as the last twenty-seven chapters of Isaiah are introduced with the preaching of John Baptist, it is proper to understand the most part of them as relating to Christ and the gospel church, and what follows the fifty-third chapter, which treats of Christ's suffering, as relating to the establishment and glory of the Christian church. In the book of Revelation, the events relating to the seals, trumpets, vials, and New Jerusalem, must be understood, as succeeding one another. However, this rule must be followed with great caution, as the prophecies are often intermixed with addresses to the people to whom the prophets spake, and with different predictions or explications of what had been before said; so Revelation xii—xxii. contains an explication of much of what had been said in chaps. viii. ix. and xi. (10.) As the directions given by Jesus and his apostles furnish an infallible key for directing to the sense of prophetic passages; so it is plain from thence, that whatever in Moses, in the Psalms, or the Prophets can be applied to Jesus Christ, his church and spiritual things, without doing violence to the context, ought to be so applied, especially if the descriptions are too high for other subjects; as Isa. xlii. and xlix. &c. This sense will most display the force of the language, and the wisdom of the Holy Ghost; in his testifying of Christ, and will most suit the nature of Christ's spiritual kingdom, and as David was a type, his condition represented in the Psalms may be expected to be very often typical of Christ's. (11.) An arrangement of the various predictions, so as all relating to a particular subject and event may be classed together, and by setting over against the same the similar events recorded in scripture, or other history, is of great use. A person well acquainted with his Bible, and with the history of nations and churches, will find that the dispensations of Providence are little else than a daily commentary on the oracles of God; and that though miracles have ceased, the continued fulfilment of prophecies in so circumstantial a manner, is no less proof of the divine inspiration of the scriptures than miracles could be.

PROPITIATION; that which atones for and covers guilt; as the mercy-seat covered the tables of the law. Jesus Christ is called the propitiation or ATONEMENT, as his perfect satisfaction appeases his Father, and satisfies his law and justice, for all our transgressions. Rom. iii. 25. 1 John ii. 2.

PROPORTION; the answerableness of one thing to another. 1 Kings vii. 36. Job xli. 12. The proportion or analogy of faith, is the agreement of one part of scripture with another, or the measure of men's knowledge of it. Rom. xii. 6.

PROSELYTE; one converted from heathenism to the Jewish religion. Acts ii. 13. According to most authors, some were only proselytes to the gate, who, though they renounced the heathen idolatries, observed what the rabbins call the seven precepts of Noah, and attended the Jewish instructions, yet were not circumcised, nor partook of the passover. To these the Jews gave hopes of eternal life, and allowed them to dwell in Canaan. They also sold them the flesh of animals strangled or dying of themselves. Of this kind of proselytes, we suppose Naaman, Cornelius, the Ethiopian eunuch, and Solomon's 150,000 servants, to have been. Others were proselytes of righteousness, or of the covenant; and were obliged to fulfil the whole law of Moses. At their admission, their motives influencing them to change their religion were examined, and they were instructed in the principles of Judaism. Next, if males, they were circumcised, and then baptized with water by plunging them into a cistern, and then presented their oblation to the Lord. Their females were baptized, and then they offered their offering before God. No boys under twelve years of age, or girls under thirteen, were admitted, without the consent of their parents, or, if these refused, without the consent of the judges of the place. After admission, children or slaves were declared free from the authority of their parents or masters. Some assert that no Edomites or Egyptians could be admitted proselytes till their third generation, and the Ammonites or Moabites till the tenth; but we suppose this exclusion only debarr'd them from places of civil government. Deut. xxiii. 1—8.

PROSPERITY; (1.) Wealth, abundance of temporal good. Psal. lxxiii. 3. (2.) Established rest, peace, and wealth. Psal. xxx. 9. (3.) Success in worldly undertakings as in going a journey, in outward life, or in trade. Rom. i. 10. Psal. i. 3. 1 Cor. xvi. 3. A man's soul prospers, when his knowledge of divine things, faith in the promises and offers of the gospel, the quieting sense of reconciliation with God, and comfortable intimacy with him, and conformity to him in heart and life increase more and more. 3 John 2.

PROSTITUTE; to give up a person or thing to a base use, as when a woman gives up herself to be a whore. Lev. xix. 20.

PROTECT and PROTECTION, the same as DEFEND and DEFENCE.

PROTEST; to declare a matter with great solemnity and concern. Jer. xl. 7. 1 Sam. xii. 9.

PROVE; (1.) To try or examine our own state, sentiments, or case. 2 Cor. xiii. 5. John vi. 6. Psal. xxvi. 2. (2.) To find true by trial and experience. Eccl. vii. 23. Rom. xii. 2. (3.) To manifest the truth of a point by argument, or by the testimony of proper witnesses. Acts ix. 22. and xxiv. 13. (4.) To make manifest what is in men's hearts, by afflicting them, or permitting them to be tempted, so God proves men. Dent. viii. 2. and xiii. 3. Men prove God, when by their continued wickedness they, as it were, put his patience to trial how much it will bear. Psal. xc. 7; or, by diligence in repentance and good works, make trial how much God will countenance and reward such conduct. Mal. iii. 10.

PROVENDER; grain for beasts to eat. The Hebrews provender seems to have been a mixture of oats, beans, and pease. Gen. xxiv. 25. Isa. xxx. 24.

PROVERB; (1.) A short sentence containing much sense in it. Eccl. xii. 9. (2.) A short taunting speech. Isa. xiv. 4. Persons or things become a proverb or by-word, when often mentioned in a way of contempt and ridicule. 1 Kings ix. 7. 2 Chron. vii. 20. Proverbs were anciently very much in use, and were ordinarily a kind of short parables. Numb. xxi. 27. Solomon spake 8000 proverbs; but many of these never being intended for a standard to the church, are now lost. Such as remain are in the Hebrew called MISHLE, parables, well-pressed or ruling sentences. In the book of PROVERBS, we have rules for every period and station of life; for kings, courtiers, tradesmen, masters, servants, parents, children, &c. Probably Solomon collected the first twenty four chapters, and left them in writing; Hezekiah appointed some persons to copy the rest. Chap. xxv. 1. Probably Solomon wrote the Proverbs in middle age, when his son Rehoboam was young, and in danger of seduction by women and bad companions, if not rather after he repented of his apostasy occasioned by his naughty wives. The latter part of chap. i. exhibits the gospel-call, and the terrible calamities brought on the Jews or others by their rejecting the same. The eighth and beginning of the ninth, contain a representation of Jesus Christ in his person, office, and benefits. The rest of the book generally relates to moral virtues, and their contrary vices. Young people may here learn much more relative to real politeness, than in 10,000 romances, novels, plays, &c. The Greek interpreters, and such as followed him, have used intolerable freedom with this book, adding a variety of hints not in the original.

PROVIDE; to look out, prepare. Acts xxlii. 24.

PROVIDENCE; prudent foresight, and tender care in managing affairs. Acts xxiv. 2. God's providence is his holy, wise, and uncontrollable management of his creatures, supporting them in their being and form, and governing them in all their actions, natural, civil, virtuous, or sinful, to the glory of his name and the good of his people. Rom. xi. 36. Dan. iv. 34, 35. Providence extends to every creature, but is chiefly interested about rational creatures, in giving them laws, enabling them to obey, yet permitting sin, and in rewarding or punishing in time and eternity, as is meet; and Christ and his church are the most peculiar objects of this care. Psal. cvii. Isa. i. lii, and liii. The events of providence are either common, wherein things are produced by second causes in an ordinary manner; or miraculous, wherein the powers of second causes are exceeded or counteracted. To imagine that the purposes of God are, in respect of their object and plan, different from the events of providence, is blasphemously to suppose that God acts without design, and is obliged to do things as he can, when he cannot as he would. A careful observation of providence tends much to increase our knowledge of the scriptures and of the divine perfections, and to render our minds composed amidst the various changes we may pass through. Psal. civ. —cvii.

PROVINCE; a country, or part of a kingdom or empire. Ezra iv. 15. The Romans termed those places provinces which they had conquered and reduced under their form of civil government. Acts xv. 1.

PROVISION; victuals and other things necessary for maintaining a person or thing. Zion's provision is not chiefly the sacred food of the Jewish priests, but God's word and ordinances assigned for the spiritual food of the church. Psal. cxxxii. 13. Provision for the flesh, is what tends to strengthen our inward corruption, and to excite sinful thoughts, words, and deeds. Rom. xlii. 14.

PROVOKE; to stir up, whether to anger, Psal. cvi. 26; or to careful concern about salvation, Rom. xi. 18; or to love and good works. Heb. x. 24.

PROVOCATION; whatever tends to make one angry, as sin does God, Neh. ix. 18; and the idolatrous offerings of the Hebrews were such to him. Ezek. xx. 28. Jerusalem was a provocation to God, because of the abominable sins there committed. Jer. xxxii. 31. Job's eye continued in his friend's provocation, he was wearied and angry with seeing and hearing them sneer at him, and charge him with hypocrisy; and even in the night the grief thereat restrained his eyes from closing in sleep. Job xvii. 12.

PRUDENT; wise; skilful in finding out truth, or managing matters to the best advantage. 1 Sam. xvi. 18.

PRUNE; to cut off superfluous branches from trees and vines that they may not waste the sap, and so render the tree less fruitful. Lev. xxv. 3.

PSALM; a song consisting of short sentences, where every thing luxurious is lopped off, and the manner of composition renders it fit to be sung. When psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, are mentioned together, psalms may denote such as were sung on instruments; hymns, such as contain only matter of praise; and spiritual songs, such as contain doctrines, history, and prophecy, for men's instruction. Eph. v. 19.

The Book of PSALMS is one of the most extensive and useful in scripture, suiting every case of the saints; and indeed like their condition, which is at first much mixed with complaints and sorrows, and at last issues in high and endless praise. That David composed most of the psalms, is beyond doubt; Heman composed the lxxviii, Ethan the lxxxix, Moses the xc. Whether those under the name of Asaph were penned by one of that name, or whether they were only assigned to be sung by him as others were to the sons of Korah, we cannot positively determine. Some, as the lxxv, lxxvi, and cxxxviii, appear to have been composed after the begun captivity to Babylon. The rest, including those two marked with the name of Solomon, might be composed by David, who on that account is called the sweet psalmist of Israel. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. In their matter, some psalms are doctrinal, as Psal. 1; some historical, as Psal. lxxviii. and cv. and cvi; some prophetic, as Psal. cx; some consist of prayer and complaints, as Psal. vi. xxxviii. &c.; others consist of prayer and thanksgiving, as Psal. cxlv—cl. In some, most or all of these subjects are connected. Psal. lxxxix. Whether the titles of the psalms are of divine authority, is not agreed. The Hebrew words therein mentioned are by some considered as names of instruments of music, or the first words of some song, or to denote the subject-matter of the psalm.

We think, Maschil always signifies that the psalm is designed for instruction. Psal. xxxii; that Michlam denotes the precious or golden nature of the psalm; and perhaps all the psalms so marked relate to Jesus Christ, as Gussetius observes. xvi. lvi—lx. All-taschik may denote, that the scope of the psalm was to deprecate destruction. lvii—xlii. Mushlabben may denote, that the psalm was composed on the occasion of the death of his son, or of Goliath the dueller. Psal. ix. Ajeleth Shahar, that its subject is Jesus Christ the hind of the morning. Psal. xxii. Jonathalem-rechokim, that David is therein represented as a mute dove among foreigners. Psal. lvi. Shoshanin, Shoshanin-eduth, or Shushan-eduth, may either signify that the subject of the psalm is Christ and his people, who are lilies, or lilies of the testimony, or congregation, or may signify a harp of six strings, as Sheminit does one of eight. Psal. xlv. lx. lxxx. and xlii. Mahalath may either signify the disease, and Mahalath leannoth the afflicting disease, or Mahalath may signify a wind instrument. Psal. liii. lxxxviii. Neginoth or Neginath, signifies stringed instruments. Psal. iv. and lxi. Ne-hiloth, wind instruments. Psal. v. Gittith, a kind of instrument invented at Gath. Psal. viii. Alamoth, the virginals, or a song to be sung by virgins. Psal. xlii. Shiggaion or Shigionoth may denote that the psalm is to be sung with diversified tunes, or has a very diversified matter. Psal. vii. Hab. iii. 1. The cxth, and fourteen following, are entitled songs of degrees, probably because they were sung on the stairs of the temple, or sung at certain halts made by David and the Israelites when they brought up the ark of God from Kirjath-jearim. The Hebrews divided the Psalms into five books, ending with xli. lxxii. lxxxix. cvi. and cl; the four first of which are concluded with AMEN. By joining the ixth with the xth, and civth, with cvth, and again dividing the cxvth, and cxlviii, into two, the Greek version and the Vulgate Latin differ one or two in their reckoning from us. Some arrogant Greek, too, has added one at the end.

PSALTERY; a musical instrument much used by the Hebrews. It was made of wood, with strings fixed thereto. It is said to have been of a triangular form, with a hollow belly, and with strings from top to bottom, which being touched with the finger or bow, gave a very agreeable sound, and to have differed little from the harp, only it was played on below, and the harp above. In Josephus' time, the psaltery, or nabblon, had twelve strings. Our modern psaltery is a flat instrument of a triangular form, strung from side to side with iron and brass wire, and played on with a kind of bow.

PTO-LE-MA'IS. See AC'CNO.

PUBLICAN; an inferior collector of the Roman tribute. The principal farmers of this revenue were men of great credit and influence: but the under farmers or publicans, were accounted as oppressive thieves and pick-pockets. As they were both cruel oppressors and badges of slavery, the Jews detested them to the last degree. If either farmers or publicans were convicted of oppression, the Roman law ordered them to restore fourfold. Luke xix. 8. Our Saviour shewed a compassionate regard to the publicans; and told the Pharisees, who were enraged hereat, that publicans and harlots, being more ready to receive conviction, stood fairer to enter into the kingdom of God than themselves. Matthew, Zaccheus, and perhaps other publicans, became his disciples. Luke xv. 2. Matt. xxi. 31. Luke xviii. 10—14. and xix. 10.

PUBLIC; known to many. Matt. i. 19.

PUBLISH; to make known to many. Dent. xxxii. 3.

PUB'LI-US. See MEL-LI'TA.

PUFF; to hiss and make mouths at any one. Psal. xii. 5. To be puffed up, is to be filled with self-conceit, as a bladder is with wind. 1 Cor. v. 2. and viii. 1.

PUL; (1.) The first king of ASSYRIA who invaded Canaan, and by a present of 1000 talents of silver, was prevailed on by Menahem to withdraw his troops, and recognize the title of that wicked usurper. 2 Kings xv. 19. But who he was, the learned are not agreed. Usher, Rollin, Calmet, and Prideaux, reckon him the father of Sardana-palis; and Patrick is no less confident that he was the same with Baladan or Belesis the Chaldean. Sir Isaac Newton, and the authors of the Universal History, consider him to be the first founder of the Assyrian empire. His name is a pure Assyrian word, without the least tincture of the Chaldean idiom; and is plainly a part of the compound names of Tiglath-pul-assur, Nebo-pul-assur, and Sardan-pul, his successors. It is probable he was worshipped under the name of the Assyrian Belus. (2.) A place where the gospel was preached in the apostolic age. The Vulgate version calls this Africa; others will have it to be Lybia: But Bochart and Vitringa are probably more in the right, who reckon it the same as Philas, an island of the Nile on the north border of Abyssinia; only in this passage, it is probably put for the whole neighbouring country. Isa. lxi. 19.

PULL; to draw with force. Gen. xix. 10. PULSE; coarse grain, as peas, beans, and the like. Dan. i. 12.

PUNISHMENT; whatever is inflicted upon any one for his faults, whether in a way of proper wrath, or of kind correction. Lam. iii. 39; but properly taken, it denotes the infliction of deserved wrath. Matt. xxv. 45. It also denotes church-censure for correcting and reforming offenders. 2 Cor. ii. 6. In scripture we find a variety of civil punishments, as, (1.) Retaliation, according to which the offender was treated as he had injured his neighbour, stripe for stripe, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, &c. but this might be committed for some other satisfaction, as money, &c. Exod. xxi. 23—25. Dent. xix. 21. (2.) Flogging in a certain value or sum of money: He that hurt a woman with child, but not so as to make her miscarry, he that reproached his wife with unchastity before marriage, and he that hurt his servant or neighbour, was fined. Exod. xxi. Dent. xxii. 13—19. To this may be reduced whatever part of restitution was above the value of the principal. Exod. xxii. Lev. xxvii; and confiscation of goods to the king's use. Ezra vii. 26. (3.) Scourging; so the slave who committed fornication was to be punished. But among the Jews, one was never to receive above forty stripes at once. Deut. xxv. 1—3. 2 Cor. xi. 21. (4.) Imprisonment: sometimes, indeed, this was not a proper punishment but used as a means to retain persons; so Joseph imprisoned all his ten brethren three days, and Simeon much longer. Gen. xlii. 17—24. The blasphemer, and the gatherer of sticks on the Sabbath-day, were imprisoned till the Lord should declare their punishment. Lev. xxiv. 12. Numb. xv. 34. Sometimes it was proper punishment, especially when attended with severities of another kind. Joseph was imprisoned and put in chains by Potiphar. Gen. xxxix. 20. Psal. cv. 18. Samson was imprisoned by the Philistines, and while there had his eyes put out, and was obliged to grind at a mill. Hosea, Manasseh, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, were all shut up in prison by their conquerors, and the latter had his eyes put out. 2 Kings xvii. 4. 2 Chron xxxiii. 11. 2 Kings xxiv. 12. and xxv. 7—27. The prophets who rebuked Aza, Micaiah, Jeremiah, Peter, John, Paul, &c. were all put in prison for their faithfulness. Sometimes there was an imprisonment at large; as when Paul had leave to dwell at his own hired house, with a soldier that kept him. Bonds, fetters, stocks, hard fare, &c. ordinarily attended imprisonment. (5.) Plucking out of the eyes. This happened in the case of Samson and Zedekiah, and was intended to the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead. Exod. xxi. 28. Judg. xvi. 21. 2 Kings xxv. 7. 1 Sam. xi. 2. (6.) Cutting off particular members of the body, as of the toes or thumbs: so Adonibezek served seventy of his fellow kings of Canaan, and at last was so served by the Hebrews himself. Judg. i. 5—7. Baanah and Rechab who murdered Ishbosheth, had first their hands and feet cut off, and then were hanged. 2 Sam. iv. 12. (7.) Plucking off the hair, was once a very shameful and painful punishment. Isa. i. 6; so Nehemiah punished some who had married idolatrous women. Neh. xiii. 25. At Athens, after the hair of adulterers was plucked off, they applied burning ashes to the skin. (8.) Killing with the sword; so Zeba, Zalmunna, Adonijah, and Joab, were executed. Judg. viii. 21. 1 Kings ii. 24, 34. (9.) Crucifixion; in which the criminal being stretched, and bound or nailed to a cross, hung there till he expired. Matt. xxvii. (10.) Hanging. According to the Jews, none but idolaters and blasphemers were hanged among them. Some, as Haman and his sons, and the king of Ai, were hung up alive, Esth. vii. and ix. Josh. vii. 29. Saul's seven descendants were hung up till they died, and a considerable time after. 1 Sam. xxxi. 12. Pharaoh's baker was first beheaded, and then hung up in chains. Gen. xl. 19. (11.) Stoning to death was a very common punishment. It is said to have been used wherever death was the penalty, and the kind of it not mentioned; as in the case of incestuous persons; defilers of women betrothed or married, or by force; Sodomites, idolaters, blasphemers, magicians, witches, Sabbath-profaners, rebellious children, &c. (12.) Burning alive. He that married, or had carnal knowledge of both mother and daughter, or of a priest's daughter who committed fornication, was thus punished. Lev. xx. 14. and xxi. 9. Thus Judah proposed to punish Tamar; and Nebuchadnezzar attempted to destroy Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Gen. xxxvii. 24. Dan. iii. 21. (13.) Castng from the top of a rock, with or without a stone about the neck, or into the sea. Amariah threw 10,000 Edomite prisoners from the top of a rock. 2 Chron. xxv. 12. The people of Nazareth attempted to cast our Saviour from the top of a rock. Luke'iv. 29. Behanding: so Pharaoh's baker was cut off; so Abimelech murdered his seventy brethren, and the elders of Samaria, at Jehu's orders, murdered seventy of Ahab's posterity, and sent their heads in baskets to him; and thus Herod murdered John. Gen. xl. 19. Judg. ix. 5. 2 Kings x. 7. Matt. xiv. 10. (15.) Tearing to pieces alive; so Gideon tore off the flesh of the rulers of Succoth with briars and thorns. David, according to our version, tore off the flesh of the Ammonites, by causing them to pass under saws, harrows, and axes of iron, or caused them to pass through the burning brick-kiln. It is also supposed he tortured to death two thirds of the Moabites. Judg. viii. 16. 2 Sam. xii. 31. and viii. 2. (16.) Exposure to wild beasts, to be torn to pieces by them; so Daniel and his accusers were cast into the den of lions. Chap. vi. The heathens frequently exposed the primitive Christians to wild beasts, and sometimes wrapped them in wild beasts' skins, that they might be the more readily torn asunder. Perhaps Paul was actually exposed to beasts at Ephesus. 1 Cor. xv. 32. (17.) Racking or tympanising: what this punishment was, whether that of the tressel or chivale, or flaying alive, or the bastinado, is not agreed. Heb. xi. 35. (18.) Sawing asunder, beginning either at the feet or at the head; so it is said Isaiah was murdered by Manasseh, and so it is certain some godly Hebrews were murdered by their persecutors. Heb. xi. 37. This terrible punishment is said to have had its rise among the Chaldeans or Persians; and not long ago it was inflicted in Morocco and Switzerland, if it is not so still. (19.) Sometimes the very houses of offenders were demolished, and made dunghills. Dan. ii. 5. and iii. 30. Jehu thus demolished the temple of Baal. 2 Kings x. 27.

PUNON, where the Hebrews encamped in the desert, is probably the same as the Phanos or Phenos, which Eusebius places four miles from Dedan, between Petra and Zoar, and whose bishops we find among the subscribers in the ancient councils. Whether it was here or at Zalmonah that the brazen serpent was erected, cannot be fixed with certainty; but near to this place there were mines so dangerous to work, that the condemned malefactors lived in them but a few days. Numb. xxxiii. 42, 48.

PUR. See FEAST.

PURE; PURGE, PURIFY. See CLEAN

PURLOIN, to take what belongs to another in a secret and thievish manner. Th. ii. 10.

PURPLE-DYE, especially that of Tyre, was much esteemed, and was much worn by kings and emperors. It was procured from the blood of a shell-fish, found in the sea on the north-west of Canaan, and still found about the Caribbee-islands, other parts of America, and sometimes on the western coasts of England. Purple was used in the curtains of the tabernacle, and robes of the priests; if the word we render purple and scarlet ought not rather to be rendered scarlet and crimson Exod. xxv—xxviii. xxxv—xxxix. The Chaldeans clothed their idols with habits of purple and aznre colour. The husband of the virtuous woman, and the rich glutton are represented as clothed in purple. Prov. xxxi. 23. Luke xvi. 19. To reward Daniel for explaining Belshazzar's dream, he was clothed in purple or scarlet, and had a chain of gold put about his neck. Dan. v. 7, 20. Mordecai, when made chief minister of state in Persia, was clothed in purple and fine linen. Esth. viii. 15. Purple was much used in Phœnicia, Ezek. xxvii. 7, 10; and the popish cardinals wear clothes of it. Rev. xvii. 4. To ridicule our Saviour's claim to royalty, his enemies arrayed him in purple. Mark xv. 17. See CHARIOT-HAIR.

PURPOSE; (1.) A fixed design to do some act. Jer. li. 29. (2.) The end for which any thing is done. Neh. viii. 4. God purposed in himself; fixed his decrees merely according to his own free and sovereign love. Eph. i. 9.

PURSE; a small bag to carry money in, and which was wont to be in the folds of men's girdles. Matt. x. 9. Christ prohibited his disciples to take with them purse or scrip, to mark that they had no intention to acquire money, and constantly depended on God for their daily bread. Luke xxii. 35.

PURSUE; to follow hard after one, either as an enemy to do him hurt. Gen. xxxv. 5; or as a suppliant, to entreat him earnestly. Prov. xix. 7. To pursue good or evil, is earnestly to endeavour the practice of it. Psal. xxxiv. 14. Prov. xi. 9. Evil or blood pursues men, when the just punishment of murder and other wickedness is hastened upon them. Prov. xiii. 21. Ezek. xxxv. 6. Psal. cxi. 11.

PURTENANCE; belonging to a thing: the inwards, heart, liver, &c. of the paschal lamb was its purtenance, which was to be roasted along with the rest. Exod. xii. 9.

PUSH; to thrust, as a goring ox, or fighting ram. Exod. xxi. 29. To push away one's feet, it to thrust him out of his place or station. Job xxx. 12. To push nations, is to make war upon them with fury and violence. Dan. viii. 4. and xi. 40.

PUR. God puts away sin, by forgiving it. 2 Sam. xii. 13. Christ put away sin, by satisfying the law and justice of God for it. Heb. ix. 26. Men put away the evil of their doings, when they reform their wicked lives. Isa. i. 16. They put far away the evil day, and cause the seat of violence to come nigh, when, in hopes that affliction will be long or for ever delayed, they give up themselves to oppression, perverting of judgment, murder, and the like. Amos vi. 3. They put away their wives, when they divorce them, and expel them from their families. Mal. ii. 16. To put on the Lord Jesus, is by faith to receive and depend on him for righteousness and sanctification. Rom. xiii. 14. He is put on, as to a solemn profession, in baptism. Gal. iii. 27. To put on the whole armour of God, is to be in constant readiness to improve it, and defend one's self with it, against sin, Satan, and the world. Eph. vi. 11. To put off the old man, or body of sin, and put on the new, or the graces of the Spirit, is to have our state and nature changed by the word, Spirit, and blood of Christ; and to repent of and turn from sin, and be conformed to God in knowledge, righteousness, holiness, meekness, and love. Col. iii. 11. and iii. 9—14. Eph. iv. 24.

PU-TEO-LI; a city in Campania in Italy, so called from the stench of its hot waters, or the multitude of its wells. It stood about eight miles from Naples, and a hundred south of Rome. From hence a considerable trade was carried on with Alexandria in Egypt. Here Paul halted seven days as he was conducted prisoner to Rome. Acts xxviii. 13. We find several of its bishops in the primitive councils of the Christian church.

PUTRIFYING; ROTTING.

PYGARG, or WHITE BUTTOCKS, is a name sometimes given to the eagle with a white tail; but with Moses it signifies a four-footed beast. Its Hebrew name, dison, intimates it to be ash-coloured; and so it is likely to be the tragelaphus, or goat-deer, whose back and sides are partly ash-coloured. It was a clean beast: but whether the same with the pygarg of Herodotus, Pliny, and Elian, we cannot say. Deut. xiv. 5.

Q.

QUAILS; a species of birds of a size between sparrows and pigeons. They are extremely numerous in warm countries. A hundred thousand of them have been caught in Italy, within the space of five miles, every day for a whole month. When wearied in their flight over the sea, it is said that such multitudes of them have alighted on a ship as to sink her; but this is too extravagant to be credited. They hatch four times a year, fifteen or twenty at a time; and their flesh is very delicious and agreeable. But whether these were the flying animals with which God, in the desert of Sin, and at Kibroth-hattaavab, feasted the wandering Hebrews, a wind bringing such multitudes of them that they were heaped above a yard high, for a day's journey, all around their camp. (Exod. xvi. 13. and Numb. xi. 32.) is not agreed. The great Ludolphus, in his History of Ethiopia, contends that the shelav means locusts, not quails. To confirm this, he observes that an army in Africa was preserved from starving, by a cloud of locusts falling among them; that locusts often fly in such multitudes as to darken the sky, and have driven nations from their dwellings; that they abound in Arabia, and are often eaten by the inhabitants, and are declared clean food by the Mosaic law; that clouds of them are easily carried before the wind; that they are more fit to be heaped around the camp, and measured by omers, than quails; and that quail-flesh, when exposed to the sun, quickly breeds worms. To this it may be replied, that all the ancient versions and commentators, take the shelay for quails, and the scripture calls them feathered fowls, Psal. lxxxviii. 27; the bringing or preserving the flesh of quails and of locusts, is equally easy to Omnipotence; and there is no reason to imagine the Hebrews would have eaten to excess of locusts; or the murderers been contented with their disagreeable flesh.

QUANTITY; measure, bigness, size. Isa. xxii. 24.

QUARREL; strife, occasion to do one hurt. 2 Kings v. 6. The quarrel of God's covenant, is the violation and breach of it, which caused him to punish the Hebrews. Lev. xxvi. 25.

QUARRIES, from whence stones are digged; but some render PESSILIM graven images, which perhaps were set up near Eglon's camp. Judg. iii. 19.

QUARTER, a part of a city or country. Gen. xix. 4. Josh. xviii. 14.

QUATERNION; four in company. Acts xii. 4.

QUEEN; a woman who is married to a king, or who governs a kingdom. Neh. ii. 6. 1 Kings x. 1. Acts vii. 27. The church and her true members are called queens; they are espoused to Jesus the king of kings, and are eminently high, happy, and glorious, in their new-covenant station. Psal. xlv. 9. Sol. Song vi. 8. As the Chaldeans thought their empire-grown governess of all other, so Antichrist sits a queen. In their pride and carnal security, the Papists boast of themselves as the infallible and impregnable church, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail. Rev. xviii. 7. The queen, or frame of heaven, to which the Jews erected altars on the tops of their houses, or near their doors, and the corners of their streets, or in groves, and to which they offered incense, cakes baked with oil and honey, and drink-offerings of wine and other liquors, was either the moon, or perhaps the whole system of the heavenly luminaries, sun, moon and stars. Jer. xlix. 17-25.

QUENCH; to put out fire. Psal. cxviii. 12; in allusion to which, the allaying of thirst by a satisfying draught of liquor is called quenching. Psal. civ. 11. As the Spirit of God and his wrath are compared to fire, they are said to be quenched when the Spirit's influence is checked by the prevalence of sinful lusts, 1 Thess. v. 19. and the judgments of God are stopped. Ezek. xx. 48. Children, as the coal of comfort to parents, and kings, as the light of kingdoms, are quenched when cut off by death. 2 Sam. xiv. 7. and xxi. 17. Men are quenched as tow, when their glory, and power to hurt, are easily taken from them. Isa. xliiii. 17.

The violence of fire was quenched, when it could not hurt Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Heb. xi. 24. Christ will not quench saints, though weak as smoking flax: he will not destroy, but tenderly encourage and strengthen them. Isa. xliii. 3.

QUESTION; (1.) A demand to which an answer is at least seemingly required. Matt. xxii. 35. (2.) Contentions, disputes. 2 Tim. ii. 23. Questions are either religious, Deut. vi. 20; blasphemous, John, viii. 48; curious, Luke xiii. 23; foolish and unlearned about trifles, Tit. iii. 9; hard or uneasy to be answered, 1 Kings x. 1; capitions, tending to ensnare the answerer, Mark xii. 14; hypocritical, Matt. ii. 7; accusing, Neh. ii. 19; reproving, 1 Sam. i. 14; denying and affirming, Numb. xii. 2; proud and vain. Matt. xxvii. To question a person, is the same as EXAMINE.

QUICK; (1.) Living. Acts x. 42. (2.) Very sensible. Lev. xiii. 10. (3.) Very readily; and so quickly, is with all possible haste. John xi. 29. The word of God is quick and powerful: Christ, the personal Word of God, is the living God, and Author of all created life; and is infinitely able to save men, and to convince and turn their hearts as he pleases, the revealed word of God powerfully awakens, convinces, and converts men to him. Heb. iv. 12. To QUICKEN, is, (1.) To give natural life to the dead. Rom. iv. 17. (2.) To give spiritual life to men dead in trespasses and sins, removing their guilt, instating them in favour with God, and producing in them a living principle of grace. Eph. ii. 1, 5. (3.) To restore, re-invigorate, and cheer up saints who are under spiritual languor and weakness, by imparting to them new supplies of grace and comfort. Psal. cxix. Jesus, the last Adam, is a quickening Spirit; as the second representative of men in the new covenant; he, being possessed of a divine nature, and of the fullness of the Holy Ghost, is the fountain of life, spiritual and eternal, to all his members, in whose hearts he dwells by faith. 1 Cor. xv. 35.

QUICKSANDS, or SYRTES; two sands on the North of Africa, almost over against Sicily, which, either by the slime, or the attractive quality of the sand, draw ships to them, or hold them fast. Acts xxvii. 17.

QUIET. See REST.

QUIT; free. To QUIT; to behave. 1 Sam. iv. 9.

QUITE; wholly. Hab. iii. 9.

QUIVER; a case for holding arrows. When children are compared to arrows, the house is the quiver. Psal. cxlvii. 5. When God's judgments are likened to arrows, his purpose and providence are the quiver. Lam. iii. 13. When Christ, or Isaiah, are likened to an arrow, God's protection, in which they are hid and preserved, is the quiver. Isa. xlix. 2. Sometimes quiver is put for arrows in it: thus the quiver, i.e. the arrows from it, rattle against the horse in battle. Job xxxix. 23; and the quiver of the Chaldeans was an open sepulchre; their arrows killed multitudes of persons. Jer. v. 16.

QUIVER, to pant for breath, and tremble for fear. Hab. iii. 61.

R.

RA-AMAH, the fourth son of Cush, and who peopled a country in Arabia the Happy, supposed to be at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. The posterity of Raamah carried on trade with the Tyrians, in spices, precious stones, and gold. Gen. x. 7. Ezek. xxvii. 22.

RABBAH, or RAB'ATH, the capital city of the Ammonites, stood near the source of the river Arnon. It seems to have been a considerable city in the time of Moses; and to it the iron bedstead of Og was transported. Deut. iii. 11. After Joab had besieged it a long time, and Uriah had been slain before it, David went thither with a reinforcement, and quickly after took it, and used the principal inhabitants, if not others, in a terrible manner. Some time after, Shobi, the conquered king's brother, and David's deputy in it, brought him beds for his soldiers at Mahanaim. 2 Sam. xi. and xii. and xvii. The city was, long after, pillaged by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Amos i. 14. Jer. xlix. 2, 3. Ezek. xxi. 20. and xxv. 5. Ptolemy Philadelphus, the Greek monarch of Egypt, repaired it, and called it Philadelphia; and not long after, Antiochus the Great of Syria seized it. In the primitive ages of Christianity, there was a church of some note here. At present the place is of very small consequence. Rab-bath-moab is the same as AR.

RAB'BI, RAB, RAB'BAN, RAB'BON; a title signifying master. It seems to have come originally from Assyria. In Sennacherib's army we find Rab-shakeh the master of the drinking, or butler, and Rab-saris the master of the eunuchs. In Nebuchadnezzar's, we find also Rab-mag the chief of the magi; and Nebuzar-adan is called Rab-tehachim, the master of the butchers, cooks, or guards.

We find also at Babylon, Rab-saganim, the master of the governors, and Rab-chartumim, the master of the interpreters of dreams. Jer. xxxix. 3. 2 Kings xxv. 8. Dan. i. 3. ii. 48. and v. 11. To keep order, Ahasuerus set a rab, or governor, at every table of his splendid feast. Esth. i. 6. Rab is now with the Jews reckoned a more dignified title than rabbi, and rabbim or rabbim greater than either; and to become such, one must ascend by several degrees. The rector of their school is called rab-chacham, the wise master. He that attends it in order to obtain a doctorship is called bachur, the candidate. After that, he is called chabar-lerah, the master's companion. At his next degree, he is called rab, rabbi, and morenu, our teacher. The rab-chacham decides religious, and frequently civil affairs. He celebrates marriages, and declares divorces. He is head of the colleges, and preaches, if he has a talent for it. He reproves the unruly, and excommunicates offenders. Both in the school and synagogue he sits in the chief seat, and in the school his scholars sit at his feet. Where the synagogue is small, he is both preacher and judge; but where the Jews are numerous, they have ordinarily a council for their civil matters; but if the rabbin be called to it, he usually takes the chief seat. Our Saviour inveighs against the rabbins, whether Scribes or Pharisees, of his time, as extremely proud, ambitious of honorary titles and honorary seats, and as given to impose on others vast numbers of traditions not warranted in the word of God. Matt. xv. and xxiii. Since that time, God has given up the Jewish rabbins to the most astonishing folly and trifling; they chiefly deal in idle and stupid traditions, and whimsical decisions on points of no consequence, except to render the observers ridiculous. In geography and history they make wretched work. Inconsistencies of time, things, absurdities, and dry rehearsals, crowd their page. In their commentaries on the scripture, they are ordinarily blind to what an ordinary reader might perceive, and retail multitudes of silly fancies fit to move our pity or contempt. The judicious Onkelos, the laborious Nathan-mordecai, the famed Maimonides, the two Kimchis, Aben-ezra, Solomon, Jarchi, Jachiades, Sephornio, Ben-melech, and some others, however, deserve a better character. See TRADITION.

RAB'SHA-KEH. SENNACHERIB.

RACE. See RUN.

RA'CA; an empty despicable sop, who is ashamed of nothing base, as robbery, or murder; a scoundrel. Matt. v. 22. with Judg. ix. 4. 2 Sam. vi. 20. 2 Chron. xiii. 7. Prov. xii. 11.

RA'CHEL. The account of her beauty; of Jacob's great love to, and marriage of her; her barrenness for a time, and fretfulness under it; her putting her maid to her husband's bed, for the sake of children, and the names she gave them; her stealing of her father's idols, and crafty concealment of them, when her father searched her tent, and her delivery of them afterwards to Jacob; his peculiar care to secure her and her child from the fury of Esau; her having Joseph for her first-born son, her purchase of Reuben's mandrakes, and at last her dying in giving birth to Benjamin, and being buried at Zelzah, a little north of Bethlehem, have been related in the article JACOB. The voice heard in Ramah, Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted because they were not to be found in life, signifies, that at the Chaldean captivity, and when the babes of Bethlehem were murdered by Herod, her daughters of the tribe of Benjamin, and their sisters of the tribe of Judah, so bitterly bewailed the loss of their children, that their weeping was heard unto Ramah; and that if Rachel, who lay buried near by, could have risen from her grave, she, who was so fond of her children, would have joined them in their lamentations. Jer. xxxi. 15. Matt. ii. 18.

RAFTER; the beam that supports the galleries, or flat roof of houses. See FIR.

RAGE; violent fury; by which a man is thrown into a tumult of passion as the sea in a storm, and is mad upon destroying what gives the offence. 2 Kings v. 12. A man's jealousy is his rage; the detection of his wife's unfaithfulness to his bed, puts him into such a rage, that he is ready to cut off both her and her paramour without the least mercy. Prov. vi. 34. Men rage, when they bestir themselves, as if mad and furious, and assemble in a tumultuous manner. Psal. ii. 2. Chariots rage, when, being furiously driven, they jostle one against another, as the swelling waves of the sea in a storm. Isa. xli. 9.

RAGS; to be clothed with them denotes deep poverty. Prov. xxiii. 21. Men's self-righteousness is likened to filthy rags, or a menstruous cloth; it can no more adorn the soul, or render it accepted before God as their Judge, than filthy rags; but with its vileness provokes his detestation. Isa. lxiv. 6.

RAHAB; (1.) A name given to Egypt to denote the pride and strength of that kingdom. Psal. lxxviii. 3. and lxxxix. 10. Isa. li. 9. (2.) A Canaanitish harlot, or inn-keeper of Jericho. Some say she was only a inn-keeper; and that if she had been an harlot, the spies would not have lodged with her, nor Salmon have married her; but this reasoning is inconclusive; the spies might not know her character when they took up their lodging, and she was wholly reformed before Salmon married her. It is certain the word ZONAH signifies a harlot, and the name PORNE, ascribed to her by James, chap. ii. 25. and by Paul, Heb. xi. 31. signifies nothing else. Inwardly wrought upon and converted by the Spirit of God, she kindly lodged the messengers whom Joshua sent to spy the place. The king hearing of them, sent to apprehend them; but she hid them on the top of her house, and told the king's messengers that they were gone, and might be overtaken if they were quickly pursued. She then went to the Hebrew spies, and told them that she believed the Lord would deliver the country into their hand, and knew that the inhabitants were already in a panic of terror. She insisted upon their taking an oath, that herself and her family should be spared when Jericho should be taken. They solemnly engaged that every body found in her house should be unhurt, provided her window should be marked with a scarlet cord. Her house being on the wall, she let them down from her window by a rope, and directed them to hide themselves three days in the adjacent mountain, till the searchers after them should have returned. They followed her directions, and got safe to their camp. When, a few weeks after, Jericho was taken, having marked her house according to agreement, she and all her friends, by Joshua's order and the care of the spies, were preserved therein. She joined herself to the Jewish religion; and behaved in a manner so prudent and pious, that Salmon, or Salma, son of Nashon, and prince of the children of Judah, espoused her, and had by her the famed Boaz. The Spirit of God highly commends her faith and good works, but not the lie which she told to conceal the spies. Heb. xi. 31. Jam. ii. 25.

RAIL. See REVILE.

RAIN, the moist vapours exhaled by the heat of the sun, which, being collected into clouds, falls upon the earth in drops: and when it freezes in or before its fall, it is called hail or snow. When it falls down as in water-spouts the windows, or flood-gates, of heaven, are said to be opened. In the time of drought, the earth is represented as crying to the heavens, and the heavens or clouds as crying to God, for his permission to pour down their treasures in rain and dew upon the earth. Hos. ii. 21. In Upper Egypt, it seldom rains. In some parts of the Persian empire, it rains but little for eight months successively. In Syria and Barbary, there is scarcely any rain during the summer. Canaan generally had a plentiful rain twice a-year: the former rain commenced in September, and the latter about the beginning of March, just before their harvest. Joel ii. 23. Zech. x. 1. Rain, when seasonable, is called showers of blessing. Ezek. xxxiv. 26. The loosening of the earth in the spring, produces a multitude of moist vapours; and in September, the withdrawing of the sun, occasioning the fall of the higher vapours on the lower, produces rain. In some places near seas, lakes, and great rivers, the quantity of rain is very considerable. In Lancashire, (England) the yearly depth of it, taken all together, is about forty-two inches: at Pisa in Italy, about forty-three. Near the equator, the rains are often excessive during the summer; and were it not so, the inhabitants would be scorched by the heat. Thunder and lightning dissolve the clouds, and rain usually follows. Psal. cxxxv. 7. Whatever is very refreshing, nourishing, delightful, and tending to make persons useful in good works, as important instructions, outward blessings, and the word, ordinances, and influences of Jesus Christ and his Spirit, are likened to rain and blessed showers. Dent. xxxii. 2. Job xxiv. 23, 23. Isa. v. 6. Psal. lxxviii. 9. Ezek. xxxiv. 26. Thus rain coming on mown grass, and on the earth, may import that it comes on persons afflicted and carnal. Psal. lxxii. 6. The remnant of Jacob is likened to showers; the Jewish apostles and believers, and saints and ministers of every nation, are useful to promote the spiritual growth and fruitfulness of the places they live in. Mic. v. 7. Destructive judgments are likened to an overflowing shower, to mark how sudden, wasting, and ruinous they are to a country. Ezek. xiii. 11. Whatever falls plentifully out of the air, as fire and brimstone, or manna, is said to be reined from it. Gen. xi. 24. Psal. lxxviii. 24, 27.

The RAINBOW is never seen but when the sun shines; and in direct opposition to him. It is formed by the refraction of his rays on a watery cloud; nor can the sun form such refraction, if he is above forty-two degrees higher than the horizon, as then his refraction is lower than the earth. The bright rainbow is often invested with a fainter one at some distance, and of greater extent. There are also rainbows formed by the reflection of the moon-light, or of the raging sea; but these last have their arms inverted upwards. One may form a kind of artificial rainbow, by hanging a black cloth opposite to the sun, and, turning his back to the sun and face to the cloth, cause water to fall like a shower of rain between him and it; thus a rainbow will be formed in these drops. Whether the common rainbow produced by natural causes, appeared before the flood, is not agreed. Perhaps it did not; and then it became the more striking as a token, and the more effectual to confirm Noah's faith in the divine promise, that a flood should never again overflow the earth. It is certain, that every disposition of a rainy cloud will not produce a rainbow; and probably, before the flood, the clouds might be always so disposed as not to form one. Its appearance, though now frequent, remains still a divine token, that the earth shall no more be drowned with a universal flood. Gen. ix. 8-17. The covenant of grace is compared to a rainbow round about God's throne, and about Christ's head: this glorious display of the excellencies of the Son of righteousness, by which all our clouds of trouble and wretchedness are illuminated, is our undoubted security against the overflowing vengeance of God; and Jesus and his Father ever delight in, and attend to it, in all their dispensations of providence. Rev. iv. 3. and x. 1.

RAISE; (1.) To lift up. 1 Sam. ii. 8. (2.) To invent, or relate. Exod. xxiii. 1. (3.) To beget. Gen. xxxviii. 8. (4.) To keep in remembrance. Ruth iv. 5. (5^r) To call and fit persons to perform a piece of work. Judg. ii. 16. (6.) To build, repair. Isa. xxiii. 13. (7.) To rouse, stir up. Psal. cvii. 26. Acts xxiv. 12. God raised up Pharaoh to his dignity, with a view to display his power in bringing him low; he permitted him to stand obstinate; he suffered him to continue in life while many were cut off, with a view to display his power in ruining him at the Red sea. Rom. ix. 18. Exod. ix. 18.

RAISINS; a well-known species of grape, dried in the sun. The largest are those of Damascus, a bunch of which sometimes weighs twenty-five pounds; but their taste is faintish, and not very agreeable. The Spanish raisins of the sun are also noted. The spirit of raisins is very useful to distillers in rectifying their liquors. Raisins fermented with water, produce a kind of wine; and a kind of brandy is extracted from them.

RAM, is sometimes put for A'RAM. See SHEEP.

RA'MAH, or RA-MA-THA'IM; a city of Benjamin, about six miles northward from Jerusalem, Josh. xviii. 25; not far distant from Geba and Gibeah. Isa. x. 29. Hos. v. 8. Near to it Deborah dwelt, Judg. iv. 5. Elkanah and Samuel resided in it. 1 Sam. i. 1, 19. vii. 17. viii. 4. and xxv. 1; and at Naioth, or the meadows of Ramah, was a college of young prophets. 1 Sam. xix. As it stood in a pass between the kingdom of Israel and Judah, BAASHA king of Israel seized it, and began to fortify it, that none of his subjects might pass that way into the kingdom of Judah. 1 Kings xv. 17, 21. The inhabitants were much affrighted when Sennacherib marched this way against Hezekiah. Hos. v. 8. Isa. x. 20. Here Nebuzaradan, the Chaldean general, disposed of his Jewish prisoners after their capital was taken, which occasioned a dreadful mourning to the daughters of Rachel. Jer. xl. 1-3. and xxxi. 15. Ramah was afterward rebuilt by its inhabitants, who returned from Babylon. Neh. vii. 30. and xi. 33. There was another Ramah on the west border of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 36; and a Ramath, or Ramoth, which some suppose to be the same as Baalath-beer, in the lot of Simeon. Josh. xix. 8. 1 Sam. xxx. 27. (See GILEAD.) Also a Ramoth, Remeth, or Jarmuth, in the lot of Issachar. Josh. xix. 21.

RAM'E-SES. See PI'THOM.

RAMPART; a fence to a city. The Mediterranean sea, or rather the river Nile, was a rampart that defended the city of No. Nah. iii. 8.

RANGE; to go up and down at pleasure. Prov. xxviii. 11. Range of the mountains, is any place on or about them. Job xxxviii. 8.

RANGES; ranks of men, who were as protecting rails about the king. 2 Kings xi. 8.

RANK; (1.) Order, station. 1 Chron. xii. 33. (2.) High-grown and fruitful. Gen. xli. 5.

RANSOM; (1.) The price paid for the pardon of an offence, or the redemption of a slave or captive. Prov. vi. 35. Exod. xxi. 30. (2.) A bribe. 1 Sam. xii. 3. To prevent the plague, and make ceremonial atonement for their souls, every adult Hebrew paid half a shekel yearly as a ransom. Exod. xxx. 12. The obedience and death of Christ, are the only proper ransom and price of our deliverance from sin and misery. Matt. xx. 28. Job xxxiii. 24. Egypt and Seba were a ransom for the Jews; God recompensed Cyrus for his gracious deliverance of the Jews, by giving him the wealth of the Egyptians and Sabaeans. Isa. xliii. 8. The wicked is a ransom for the righteous, when he is punished in order that the righteous may be delivered and preserved. Prov. xxi. 18. A man's riches are the ransom of his life; they are the means of his support, and which he would give to preserve an endangered life; and sometimes they are the occasion of attempts against his life. Prov. xiii. 1. To ransom, is to deliver, REDEEM from bondage and misery, by price or power. Jer. xxxi. 11. Hos. xiii. 14.

RARE; uncommon, very difficult. Dan. ii. 11.

RASE; to demolish completely. Psal. cxxxvii. 7.

RASOR. Doeg's tongue was like a deceitful rasor, which, under pretence of cutting the hair and smoothing the face, cuts the throat: he pretended to clear himself from disloyalty, but really intended to denounce the priests as friends of David, to the fury of Saul. Psal. lii. 2. The Assyrians and Chaldeans were God's hired rasor; providentially hired with the spoils, to cut off multitudes of the Jews. Isa. vii. 20.

RAVEN; a bird of prey, ceremonially unclean. Lev. xi. 15. It is of the size of a common hen, and of a black colour, with a bluish back. Its head is small, depressed on the crown, and flattened on the sides. Its eyes are bright, large, and piercing, and can see far. Its beak is long and thick, somewhat ridged on the back, and sharp at the point. We are not certain if old ravens either forsake or expel their young from their nest, as some affirm. The raven sent forth by Noah to try if the waters were dried up from the earth, returned not to him, as it could live on the floating carrion; and in this was a true emblem of wicked men, who delighting in sinful and sensual pleasures, refuse to come to Jesus and his new-covenant state. Gen. viii. 6, 7. Though ready to devour every thing themselves, ravens, directed by God nourished the prophet Elijah at Cherith with bread and flesh every morning. To pretend with some that the HOREBIM were not ravens, but Arabian merchants, or inhabitants of Oreb, shows only a disposition to rob God of the honour of the miracle. And we may add, why did not these pretended feeder bring him water after the brook was dried, as long as they had any for themselves. 1 Kings xvii. 4, 6.

RAVEN; to search for prey; to kill and tear asunder, as ravens do smaller birds, in order to eat them. Matt. vii. 15. Wicked men are represented as ravenous, to mark their cruelty, oppression, and murder. Psal. xxii. 13. Ezek. xxii. 25, 27.

RAVIN, is wealth or spoil procured by oppression and murder. Nah. ii. 12.

RAVISH; to take by force. Lam. v. 11. One is ravished in heart, when greatly delighted, and powerfully constrained to love. Prov. v. 19, 20. Christ's heart is ravished by his people, when by the vigorous exercise of faith and love, they exceedingly delight him, and, as it were, strongly excite him to hold fellowship with their souls. Sol. Song iv. 9.

RAW; not fully roasted. Exod. xii. 9. The quick raw flesh in the leper's sore, might appear as if partly roasted. Lev. xiii. 10.

REACH; to stretch out, extend. John xx. 27. Zech. xiv. 5. When things are very high or great, they are said to reach unto heaven. Dan. iv. 11. Rev. xviii. 5. 2 Chron. xxviii. 9. Psal. xxxvi. 5. Saints reach to the things before, when they earnestly endeavour to grow in grace, and think of, love, desire, and seek to enjoy things eternal. Phil. iii. 13. The sword or stroke reacheth to the heart, or soul, when it cuts off men's lives, cuts off the best fortified places, and the best and greatest of the nation. Jer. iv. 10, 18.

READ. There is a twofold reading of the scriptures required; one private and daily by particular persons, whether princes or others, Deut. xvii. 19. John v. 39; the other public in the congregations of professed worshippers of God. Neh. viii. 3.

READY; (1.) Strongly inclined and disposed. Tit. iii. 1. (2.) Near at hand. 1 Pet. iv. 5. (3.) Well prepared and furnished. 1 Pet. iii. 15. Those ready to perish, are such as are on the point of being utterly miserable. The Jews were in a most wretched condition before Cyrus gave them liberty to return to Canaan. The gentiles were in a most deplorable condition with respect to spiritual things, just before the gospel was preached to them. Isa. xxvii. 13. The good things of a church are ready to die, when her members are growing few, and their graces weak, and the purity and power of gospel-truths and ordinances are much decayed. Rev. iii. 2.

REALM; kingdom, empire. 2 Chron. xx. 30. Ezra vii. 13.

REAP; (1.) To cut down corn in HARVEST. Jam. v. 4. (2.) To receive the fruits of work, whether good or bad; such as sow in righteousness reap in mercy, reap everlasting life; i. e. receive it as their gracious reward. Hos. x. 12. Such as sow iniquity or corruption, reap wickedness, vanity, thorns, whirlwind, &c. i. e. they are punished with destruction and misery as their deeds deserve. Job iv. 8. Prov. xxii. 8. Jer. xii. 13. Hos. vii. 7. To reap where one sowed not, and gather where one sowed not, and take up what was not laid down, is to expect and demand good works where no gifts or opportunities were given. Matt. xxv. 26. Luke xix. 21. The earth will be reaped by the angel's sharp sickle, when, by the just vengeance of God our Saviour, Antichrist and his supporters shall be utterly and fearfully destroyed. Rev. xiv. 15. Angels are called reapers; God employs them to overturn and cut off nations, and by them he will gather his people to him at the last day. Matt. xiii. 30, 39. Ministers are reapers; they not only sow the seed of divine truth among men, but are the honoured instruments of cutting them off from their natural root, and bringing them to Christ. John iv. 36, 37.

REASON; (1.) That power of the human soul by which we conceive and judge of the fitness of things. Dan. iv. 36. (2.) Ground, argument, proof. 1 Pet. iii. 15.

REASON; to converse together, dispute, argue. Matt. xvi. 8. Mark viii. 16. The saints offering themselves soul and body, and their holy conversation, to promote the honour of God, is a reasonable, not brutal sacrifice, and corresponds with the wise injunctions and grounds assigned by both reason and revelation. Rom. xii. 1.

RE-BEK'AH, RE-BECCA, daughter of Bethuel, sister of Laban, and wife of Isaac. Her being providentially marked out for Isaac, by her offer to draw water for Eliexer's camels, as well as for herself; her ready offer to leave her country, and to be Isaac's wife; her modest veiling of herself when she came near Isaac; her long barrenness, and, after twenty years, conceiving in answer to her husband's prayers; her consulting of, and receiving answer from God concerning the struggling of the twins in her womb; her bearing of Esau and Jacob, and her peculiar love to the latter; her joining with Isaac in the pretence that she was his sister, that the Philistines of Gerar might not slay her husband for the sake of her extreme beauty; her grief at Esau's marriage with two Canaanitish women; her sinful directing and assisting Jacob to impose on Isaac, in order to obtain his principal blessing; her advising him to flee to Padanaram, and stay there in her brother's family till Esau's fury should be cooled; her care to prevent her marrying a Canaanitess; and, in fine, her death, and burial in the cave of Machpelah, have been already related under ELIEZER, ISAAC, JACOB. Gen. xiv—xxviii. and xlix. 31.

REBEL; to cast off the authority of, or make war against a superior. Numb. xvi. 1, 2. 2 Sam. xv. 20. Men rebel against God, when they contemn his authority and do what he forbids. Numb. xiv. 9. They rebel against his Spirit, when they resist his motions and slight his reproofs. Isa. lxiii. 10. They rebel against his word, when they refuse to believe his promises, receive his offers, or obey his laws. Psal. cvii. 11.

REBUKE, REPROVE; (1.) To check for a fault privately or publicly, and either by words or by a contrary practice. Lev. xix. 17. Eccl. vii. 5. Prov. xxvii. 5. 1 Tim. v. 20. (2.) To convince of a fault; to make it manifest, in order to promote repentance. John xvi. 8. and iii. 20. (3.) To restrain, check the designs of, overthrow, and render incapable to perform their purposes. Zech. iii. 2. Isa. xvii. 13. (4.) To chasten or punish for sin. Psal. vi. 1. and xxxix. 11. Hos. v. 9. Ezek. v. 15. (5.) To order silence. Luke xix. 39. To rebuke a disease, is to cure it by a word. Luke xi. 30. To rebuke the wind and sea, is to calm both, or dry up the last. Matt. xvi. 26. Isa. l. 2. Psal. civ. 7. To be without rebuke, is to live blamelessly, soberly, righteously, and godly, so as not to deserve rebuke. Phil. ii. 15. To suffer rebuke for God's sake, is to endure the reproach and persecution of men for adherence to his ways. Jer. xv. 15. A wise reprover is one that carefully observes the circumstances of the fault, the station and temper of the offender, and the proper time and place for administering the reproof. Prov. xxv. 12. A rebuker in the gate, is one who reproves sin openly, and with plainness and authority. Amos v. 10.

RECAL; to call back.

RECEIVE; (1.) To take what is given, ascribed to, paid, or put into our hands. 2 Sam. xviii. 12. 2 Kings v. 26. Rev. v. 2. (2.) To be endowed with, to enjoy, possess. Acts i. 8. Heb. x. 36. (3.) To give welcome to, to lodge, entertain. Acts xxviii. 2, 7. (4.) To admit into membership of the church or family of God. Rom. xiv. 1, 3. (5.) To hold, contain. 1 Kings viii. 64. (6.) To accept kindly, and bear patiently. Job ii. 10. 2 Cor. xi. 10.—Christ receives power, wisdom, strength, honour, glory, and blessing, when they are heartily ascribed to him in his people's praise. Rev. v. 11. To receive Christ, is to believe the promise of the gospel, in which he is freely offered, as made of God to us, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. John i. 12. To receive his word or law, is to hear, consider, understand, believe, and love it. Prov. ii. 1. To receive Christ's ministers as such, is to hear them as invested with his authority, and earnestly endeavour to believe and obey their instructions. Matt. x. 40, 41. Hypocrites receive the word of God merely by a rational consideration of, and assent to it, but not so as to have it impressed on their heart. Matt. xiii. 20. Unregenerate men receive not the things of God; they have not the spiritual knowledge, love, or possession of them in their heart. 1 Cor. ii. 10.

RECHAB. See BA-AN'AH and KE-NITES.

RECKON. See COUNT.

RECOMMEND; to endeavour to procure any one the esteem and care of some person. Acts xiv. 26. To recommend to the grace of God, is, by the prayer of faith, to commit any one to the care and favour of a gracious God, and request every necessary blessing to him. Acts xv. 10.

RECOMPENCE; an amends or requital of deeds either in good or evil. Deut. xxxii. 35. The recompence of the heathen's abuse of their natural knowledge, and of their wilful apostasy from God as their Creator and Preserver, was their being given up to unnatural desires. Rom. i. 27. The recompence or punishment of the Jews for idolizing their ceremonies to the rejection of Christ, was God's making these ordinances an occasion of their hardening and ruin. Rom. xi. 9. The gracious reward of the saints' good works, is their recompence. Heb. x. 35. and xi. 20.

RECOMPENSE; (1.) To render to men according to their deeds. Psal. xviii. 20, 24. Judg. i. 7. 1 Tim. v. 4; but sometimes good is requited with evil, 2 Sam. xxv. 21; and evil with good. 2 Sam. xvi. 12. (2.) To make restitution, giving back the value of what was wrongfully taken away. Numb. v. 7. The righteous are recompensed in the earth; they are rewarded even here with proper comforts, or rather they are chastised here for their sins; but much more fearfully shall the wicked be punished. Prov. xi. 31.

RECONCILE; (1.) To make peace between parties at variance; to secure favour. Matt. v. 24. (2.) To atone for, consecrate. Lev. vi. 30. Ezek. xlv. 20. God reconciles the world to himself: he devised the whole plan of our reconciliation and peace with him, he sent his Son to atone for our offences, accepted of his righteousness in our stead, sends him to bless us; justifies, sanctifies, and glorifies us, according to the riches of his grace. 2 Cor. v. 19. Christ reconciles us: he fulfils all righteousness in our stead; he intercedes with God in our behalf; and dwelling in us by faith, he secures our everlasting peace with God. Eph. ii. 16. He reconciles all things: through his obedience and death. God is reconciled to men; Jews and gentiles are reconciled into one church; holy angels and men are at peace with one another; men become peaceably disposed among themselves, and enjoy a real inward peace of conscience; and are in a covenant of peace with the irrational and inanimate creation. Col. i. 20. The gospel is the word or ministry of reconciliation: by means of it, this peace with God, angels, men, conscience, and other creatures, is declared, offered, and applied to us. 2 Cor. v. 18, 19.

RECORD; (1.) To bear witness: and so a record is a solemn testimony and declaration. Acts xx. 26. John i. 19. 1 John v. 7, 10, 11; and to call God for a record upon one's soul, is to make a solemn appeal to him. 2 Cor. i. 23. (2.) To declare, make mention of. 1 Chron. vi. 14. Exod. xx. 24. (3.) To write in a register. Neh. xii. 8, 22; and so a historical register is called a record. Ezra vi. 2; and a RECORDER was an officer that noted things in a register, or book of account, and put the king in mind of what ought to be considered. 2 Sam. viii. 16.

RECOVER; (1.) To regain what had been lost, taken away, or wanting, as health, &c. 1 Sam. xxx. 8. Luke iv. 18. (2.) To restore to usual health. 2 Kings v. 3, 6, 7, 11. (3.) To deliver from bondage and distress. Isa. xi. 11. 2 Tim. ii. 26. (4.) To take away what had been abused. Hos. ii. 9.

RECOUNT; to number over by name, to muster, and take a view of. Nah. ii. 5.

RED. This colour applied to Christ, as by the red heifer and his red apparel, denotes his bloody suffering, or bloody conquest of his enemies, Numb. xix. 2. Isa. lxiii. 2; but the red dye of the ram's skins which covered the tabernacle, might denote both his sufferings, and the persecutions and troubles of his church. Exod. xxvi. 14. and xxxix. 34. Redness of horses, and redness of the wine of God's wrath, denote the fearful and bloody effects of God's judgments. Zech. i. 8. and vi. 2. Rev. vi. 4. Psal. lxxv. 8. Redness ascribed to the church as a vine, denotes her exposure to bloody trouble and persecution, and their bringing forth good fruit to God. Isa. xxvii. 2. The redness of the heathen dragon, signified the bloody persecutions of the Christians by the Roman emperors. Rev. xii. 3. The redness of a leprous infection in flesh or garments, might denote angry refusal of reproof, and furious defence of faults. Lev. xiii. 19, 42, 49. and xiv. 37. Redness of eyes, imports having plenty of wine, or being drunk with it. Gen. xlix. 12. Prov. xxiii. 29.

REDEEM; (1.) To buy back persons or things formerly sold, by paying a due price for them. Lev. xxv. 25. (2.) To deliver from distress and bondage, by the exertion of great power and love. Deut. vii. 5. and xxxii. 6. (3.) To deliver men from the broken law, sin, Satan, an evil world, death, and hell, by the price of Christ's obedience and suffering, and by means of the enlightening and sanctifying power of his Spirit, Gal. iv. 4, 5. Tit. ii. 14. Luke i. 68. 1 Pet. i. 19; they are redeemed from the earth, from among carnal men, and to God, into a state of fellowship with, and voluntary subjection to him. Rev. xiv. 3. and v. 9. To redeem time, is, under the conviction of having mispent much of it, to double our diligence in the improvement of what remains for us. Eph. v. 16. To oblige the Hebrews to be deliberate in their vows, nothing once devoted was to be redeemed, without paying the whole worth of it, and a fifth part more; nor was that which had been devoted under the form of a curse to be redeemed at all: nor could the tithes, or any thing which the Lord had a stated claim to, be redeemed at all, except the FIRSTLINGS, improper for sacrifice. The price of redemption for persons under twenty years of age, was five shekels for a boy, and three for a girl: for persons between twenty and sixty years of age, it was fifty shekels for a man, and thirty for a woman; and for all above sixty, it was twenty for a man, and ten for a woman: but, if a person was so poor that he could not pay at this rate, the priest was to fix a price upon him according to his ability. The nearer it was to the year of jubilee, the price for buying or redeeming fields was proportionally the less: In the first year after the jubilee, the price was to be forty-eight years' purchase: in the forty-fifth, it was but three years purchase; in the forty-fifth, it was but three years' purchase, or little more.

REDEEMER. The Hebrew word GOEL, or kinsman-redeemer, who was also the nearest of kin, was to exert himself in favour of his destitute kinsman. If he had through poverty mortgaged his inheritance, the goel was to buy it back. If he had sold himself into slavery, the goel was to pay his ransom. If he was murdered, the goel was to avenge his blood. If he died childless, the goel might espouse his widow, and raise up seed to him; but it does not appear that he was obliged to this, except he was an unmarried brother. Numb. v. 8. xxvii. 11. and xxxv. Deut. xxv. 1-8. Rnth iii. and iv. Did not this GOEL typify Christ's assuming our nature, purchasing our happiness, recovering our liberty, avenging our blood on Satan and his agents, and raising up to our widowed nature a seed of saints and good works? God is called a Redeemer: with mighty power and kindness, he rescued the Hebrews from their bondage and trouble, and often delivers the oppressed; and he, through the blood of his Son, saves from deep slavery and woe, under the broken law, to endless glory and happiness. Isa. lxiii. 10. Christ is a Redeemer: by his righteousness, he paid the price of our redemption; by his intercession, he pleads for and procures it; by his Spirit, he applies it to our souls. Isa. lix. 20. Job xix. 25. Our redemption or deliverance from sin, and all its effects, is through his blood and Spirit, Eph. i. 4. Col. i. 14. Heb. ix. 12; and begins in our forgiveness, is carried on in our sanctification, and perfected in our eternal blessedness, when, at the resurrection, our very bodies shall be delivered from all the deathful effects of sin; and this entrance on eternal glory is called our redemption, as it brings the deliverance to its perfection. Luke xxi. 28. Rom. viii. 23. It is called the redemption of the purchased possession, as we then enter on the full possession of what Christ has purchased; or it is the redemption of the peculiar people. Eph. i. 14. Christ died for the redemption of transgressions, i. e. that he might make full satisfaction for them. Heb. ix. 15. He is made of God to us redemption; he is prepared and given of God to us, as an all-sufficient Saviour, as the purchaser, price, treasury, and substance of our everlasting deliverance from sin and misery, to holiness and happiness. 1 Cor. i. 30. We are justified through the redemption that is in him, the redemption-price of his righteousness, and in partaking of him as made of God to us redemption. Rom. iii. 23.

REDOUND; to tend towards. 2 Cor. iv. 15.

REEDS grow in fenny and watery places, and are of many different kinds. The common reeds in our country are of no great use, except for thatching of houses. The paper reeds of Egypt, the sugar reeds or canes, and the Spanish reeds, of which walking staves and weavers' reeds are formed, are of much more account. (3.) A staff made of reed: such a one, by way of derision, was put into our Saviour's hand instead of a sceptre; and with this they held up to him on the cross the sponge full of gall and vinegar. Matt. xxvii. 35, 36, 48. (4.) A measure of six cubits, or 11 feet 2,388 inches. Ezek. xl. 3. Christ will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax; he will not utterly destroy, but kindly help, care for, and comfort the weak saints and their weak graces, that are upon the point of losing all their grace and comfort. Isa. xii. 3. In allusion to the multitude of reeds growing about Egypt, the Egyptians and their king are likened to a staff of reed; and broken reed, to denote their inability to help, and their readiness to hurt the Jews, and such others as trusted in them for support or protection. Ezek. xxix. 6. Isa. xxxvi. 6. The ten tribes of Israel were smitten as a reed, when tossed to and fro as to their outward estate, by the force of God's judgments upon them. 1 Kings xiv. 15. John Baptist was not a reed shaken with the wind; was not unsettled in his doctrine or practice, but constant and steady in bearing testimony to Christ, and following a course of strict holiness, amid storms of trouble. Matt. xi. 7. The measuring reed in Ezekiel and John's vision, may denote the word of God, according to which all the things of the church ought to be adjusted; or, that the providence of God should with great exactness protect and defend them. Ezek. xl. 3. and xlii. 16. Rev. xi. 1. and xxi. 15. The reeds at Babylon were burnt with fire; either those that were growing in the Euphrates were deprived of their moisture when the current was diverted, or they, or those on the roofs of houses, were burnt by the Persians. Jer. li. 32.

REEL, or STAGGER, is to move as men mad or stupid with drink, or as men that cannot hold their feet in a ship tossed by a tempest. Psal. cvii. 27. The earth reels, when its inhabitants are thrown into great terror, perplexity, and disorder. Isa. xlv. 20; and staggers when shaken to and fro by earthquakes. Psal. xcix. 1. Men stagger at God's promise, when any faith they have is much mixed with unbelieving fears and doubts. Rom. iv. 20. They stagger under affliction, when they are so perplexed that they know not what to do, or whither to go. Job xii. 25. Isa. xix. 13. and xxix. 9.

REFINE; to purge, as founders do metal from dross, or as vintners do wine from dregs. 1 Chron. xxviii. 18. Isa. xxv. 6. Christ is a refiner and purifier; by his word, his blood, his Spirit, and by sanctified troubles, he purges out the dross of error, corruption, and scandalous persons from the church, and the dross of sinful defilement from the heart and life of his people. Mal. iii. 2, 3. Isa. xlvi. 10. Zech. xiii. 9. The word of the Lord is refined; there is no dross, error, wickedness, or vanity to be found therein. 2 Sam. xxii. 31. Psal. cxix. 140.

REFORM; to bring into a new shape or course. The Hebrews were reformed when they left their idolatries and other evil courses, and turned to the Lord. Lev. xxvi. 23. The gospel dispensation is called the reformation; the ceremonial ordinances being fulfilled in Christ, were laid aside for more clear, easy, and spiritual ones; and multitudes of Jews and gentiles were turned from their legal, superstitious, idolatrous, and other wicked courses, to the profession, faith, and obedience of a God in Christ. Heb. ix. 10.

REFRAIN; to withhold, keep back. Gen. iv. 1. Psal. cxix. 101.

REFRESH; (1.) To strengthen one by food. 1 Kings xiii. 7. (2.) To take rest, and recover strength after fatigue. Exod. xxiii. 12. (3.) To revive and comfort. 1 Cor. xvi. 18. Men's spirits, souls, or bowels, are refreshed, when they get new inward ease, strength, vigour, and comfort. Job xxxii. 20. 2 Cor. vii. 13. Prov. xxv. 13. Philm. 7. The refreshing promised to the penitent Jews, may comprehend the comfortable declaration and application of a free and full redemption through the person, obedience, death, and intercession of Christ; a comfortable deliverance and preservation from the general ruin of their nation, and chiefly the complete happiness of both soul and body at the last day. Acts iii. 19. See REST.

REFUGE, SHELTER; a place of safety in time of storms or danger. Job xxiv. 8. God and Christ are a refuge or shelter: by them the saints are graciously protected against every storm of wrath, against every danger, and against the assaults of every foe. Psal. xiv. 6. and xli. 1. and lxi. 3. Refuge of lies, are vain imaginations and ill-grounded hopes of safety; or, persons we trusted disappointing us, as the Assyrians, who, instead of helping Ahaz, distressed him. Isa. xxviii. 15, 17. To inspire the Hebrews with a horror of bloodshed, and mercifully to provide for the relief of the involuntary manslaughter, God appointed six of their cities, Bezer, Golan, and Ramoth-gilead, on the east of Jordan, Kedesh-Naphtali, Shechem, and Hebron, on the west of it, all of them belonging to the priests or Levites, to be cities of refuge; and they were commanded to add to these when their territories should be enlarged; but we find no account of any such addition. These cities were of easy access, situated in mountains or large plains. That nothing might retard the manslayer in his flight to them, the roads, to the width of fifty eight feet four inches, were kept in good repair, and the rivers of note had bridges thrown over them. Where any other way crossed or parted from them, posts, marked with REFUGE, directed to the city of refuge. On the fifteenth day of the twelfth month, at the end of the winter, the roads were inspected by the magistrates, and repairs were ordered. These cities were plentifully stored with necessary provisions, but no weapons of war were made or sold therein. When a Hebrew, or a stranger among them, unwittingly killed his neighbour, he fled with all possible expedition to the city of refuge that was next to him; for, if any of the friends of the slain person could overtake him before he got thither, they were warranted to slay him. Whenever the manslayer entered the city, he used to send some prudent and moderate persons to meet the pursuing avenger of blood, to soften his rage. When he came up, he presented an accusation to the judges of the place, upon the footing of which the manslayer was cited to their bar. If upon trial it appeared he had slain his neighbour unwittingly, he was received as a lodger into the city: only it is said, that the cause was again tried in the manslayer's own city; and if he was again found to have done it unwittingly, he was safely conducted back to the city of refuge, and abode there till the death of the high priest; but he was obliged to apply himself to some business, that he might not be chargeable to the inhabitants. The altar of burnt-offering was also a refuge for petty criminals; and such as fled to it, if found to have done it undesignedly, were conducted to a city of refuge. Numb. xxxv. Deut. xix. 11, 12. Josh. xx. Did these refuges or asylums represent Jesus Christ as the sole refuge for guilty sinners, who have murdered their souls, their neighbour, their Saviour, and attempted to murder their God, how patient and open our way to him! how certain our peace and safety in him! nor, till his endless life be concluded, shall those who once come to him ever go forth, or be cast out; but if law and justice, those avengers of blood, find us without him, how great our danger of eternal death!

REFUSE. The gentiles were refused of God; before he called them by the gospel, they were most wretched, justly overlooked, and hated by God for their wickedness, and condemned by the members of the Jewish church. Isa. liv. 6. Men refuse Christ, when they neglect the knowledge of his truth, the cordial belief of his promises, in which he and all his fulness are offered to them as the free gift of God, and the observance of his ordinances. Heb. xii. 25. The refuse of any thing, is its dross, filth, or naughty part. 1 Sam. xv. 9. Amos viii. 6. The Jews were made as the refuse, when rendered weak, poor, contemptible, and wretched. Lam. iii. 45.

REGARD; (1.) To think of, seriously consider, lay to heart. Isa. v. 12. 1 Sam. xxv. 25. (2.) To look upon one with pity and concern. Deut. xxviii. 50. (3.) To have or show a distinguished love to, esteem of, or care for. 2 Kings iii. 14. Rom. xiv. 6. God regards the prayer of the destitute, when he graciously accepts it, and in a remarkable manner bestows what is asked, or what is better. Psal. cii. 17. Men regard sin, when they love and esteem it, and delight to practise it. Psal. lxxvi. 18. and xxxi. 6. Jon. ii. 8. To regard men's persons, is to value them for their onward honour, power, or wealth. Matt. xxii. 16.

REGENERATION; a new birth. See RENEW.

REGION. See COUNTRY.

REGISTER; a public record for marking genealogies and events worthy of remembrance. Ezra ii. 62.

REHEARSE; to tell over. Exod. xvii. 14. 1 Sam. xvii. 31.

RE'HOB; a city of the tribe of Asher, given to the Levites. It seems to have stood on the north border of Canaan, and to have been a very different place from the Rooba of Jerome, which he says was but four miles from Bethshan. Numb. xiii. 21. Josh. xix. 28. and xxi. 31.

RE-HO-BO'AM, the son and successor of Solomon, born by one Naamah an Ammonitess, about the end of David's reign. It appears from the book of Proverbs, that his father was at great pains to teach him wisdom; but these instructions were not blessed of God to him, nor were they duly exemplified in his father's life. When he began to reign A. M. 3080, he being about forty-one years of age, repaired to Shechem, where the Hebrews had assembled to make him king. Instigated by Jeroboam, who had begun to raise sedition a little before Solomon's death, they offered Rehoboam the sovereignty, provided he would ease them of the hard service and excessive taxes which his father had laid upon them as he carried on his buildings. He took three days to deliberate on the proposal. His aged counsellors, who had served with his father in that station, advised him to give the people an obliging answer, and he would soon fix them in his interest. Unwilling to do so, he consulted with his young counsellors who had been brought up with him. They advised him to tell the people, that he intended to load them with far more grievous burdens, and to punish them far more severely, than ever his father had done. This advice suited his haughty and foolish disposition, and he followed it. The ten tribes of Reuben, Simeon, Ephraim, Manasseh, Dan, Zebulun, Issachar, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher, provoked herewith, cried out, that they were under no obligation to, and had no interest in the family of David, and so would go home, and let Rehoboam and the family of David care for themselves. Upon their defection in a body, Rehoboam sent Hadoram his treasurer after them, to persuade them to return. Perhaps supposing him the author of their late hardships, they stoned him to death. Rehoboam seeing this, posted off to Jerusalem in his chariot, where the tribes of Judah and Benjamin acknowledged him king. Of these he formed an army of 180,000 to reduce the ten revolting tribes by force; but Shemaiah the prophet, in God's name, forbade him and his army from attempting this, as it would not prosper. Rehoboam and his people then returned to their homes. He, to strengthen his kingdom, fortified Bethlehem, Etam, Tekoah, Beth-zur, Socho, Adullam, Gath, Mareshah, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachish, Azekah, Zorah, Aijalon, and Hebron, and put garrisons of men and magazines of armour and provision in them. As Jeroboam, who had been chosen king of the ten tribes, cast off the true worship of God, many of the priests and Levites, and no doubt others, retired to the kingdom of Judah, and strengthened it.

For three years, Rehoboam and his subjects followed the Lord, and prospered exceedingly; but afterwards they abandoned themselves to every enormity. Idolatrous altars, statues, groves, and high places, were every where formed; and both men and women were publicly prostituted. To punish this wickedness, God brought Shishak king of Egypt to invade the land, A.M. 3035. He ravaged the country, and carried off the treasures of the temple and palace. Shemaiah the prophet told Rehoboam and his princes, that their idolatry and other wickedness had occasioned these disasters. They humbled themselves under a sense of their guilt, and acknowledged the justice of God in their miseries. Shemaiah then assured them that God would not utterly forsake them, but would prove to them the difference between the hardships of serving the Lord and of serving Shishak. When Shishak left the country, after he had held it in subjection about three or four years, Rehoboam and his people restored in some degree the worship of God, but the high places were not removed. He caused brazen shields to be made for his guard who attended him to the temple, instead of the golden ones made by command of his father, which Shishak had carried off: these were laid up in his arsenal when they were not used. After Rehoboam had reigned seventeen years, he died, and was buried in the city of David; and left Abijah his son, whom he intended to have made his colleague on the throne, to be his successor. There were almost perpetual wars between him and Jeroboam, the history of which, and of his life, was written by the prophets Shemaiah and Iddo; but not being intended as canonical, has not reached our times. 1 Kings xii. and xiv. 21—31. 2 Chron. x—xii.

REHO-BOTH; (1.) A city near Nineveh, perhaps the same as the Oroba of Pliny; but some translate it to signify the streets of the city Nineveh. Gen. x. 11. (2.) A city of Edom, where Saul king of that country was born; for it is absurd to imagine he could be of the other Rehoboth on the Tigris. Gen. xxxvi. 37. (3.) A well digged by Isaac eastward of Gerar, so called, because there the Lord had made room for him. Gen. xxvi. 22.

REHUM. See SAMARITANS.

REJECT; (1.) To despise. Hos. iv. 6. (2.) To cast off, forsake. Jer. vii. 29. and xiv. 19. (3.) To refuse a request. Mark vi. 26. Obstinate abusers of gospel-ordinances, whether Jews or gentiles, are rejected as barren ground; are deprived of the strivings of God's Spirit, and of divine ordinances, and exposed to temporal or eternal ruin, or both. Heb. vi. 3.

REIGN; to rule or command as a king. 2 Sam. v. 4, 6. God reigns; as the absolute ruler of all things, he governs and disposes of them, and to him must all persons give account. Psal. xciii. 1. Christ reigns as supreme Governor of his church; he alone gives her laws, appoints officers, and orders or disposes her concerns as he pleases. 1 Cor. xv. 25. The saints reign; they have a spiritual dominion over sin, Satan, and the corrupt influence of this world; and by their prayers have considerable influence in the management of it; and during the millennium, they shall possess the chief power in church and state. Rev. v. 10. and xx. 6. They reign in life spiritual, being more than conquerors through him that loved them, of sin, Satan, and the world; and reign in life eternal, when they are advanced to the highest glory, and have every thing to their wish. Rom. v. 17. Sin reigns, and reigns unto death, when indwelling sin has the chief power in the heart, and when sin in general hastens forward, and condemns to death temporal, spiritual, and eternal. Rom. vi. 12. and v. 25. Grace reigns, and reigns to eternal life, through the finished and imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, the free favour of God, in a glorious and irresistible manner, disposes of the elect and all their concerns, so as to promote their eternal life: the gracious habits implanted in their souls conquer their inward corruptions, and prepare them for eternal life; nor can sin reign over them as before. Rom. vi. 14. and v. 21.

REINS; (1.) The kidneys, or inward parts of an animal. Lev. xv. 2. Job xxi. 27. Psal. cxxxix. 13. (2.) Men's souls, with the dispositions and thoughts. Lam. ii. 13. Rev. ii. 28. God is far from men's reins, when they have no true knowledge, fear, love, desire of, or delight in him, and perform no true obedience to him. Jer. xli. 2. Men are pricked in their reins, when their soul is wounded with disquieting thoughts, tormenting passions, envy, sorrow, anger. Psal. lxxiii. 21. Men's reins instruct them, when God, by inspiration or otherwise, stirs up instructive and directive thoughts in their minds. Psal. xvi. 7.

RELEASE; (1.) To set a prisoner or slave at liberty. Matt. xxvii. 15. (2.) To forgive a debt or tribute. Deut. xv. 2. Esth. ii. 18. See FEAST.

RELY; to lean; to depend upon for help and victory. 2 Chron. xvi. 7, 8.

RELIEVE; to free one from hardship; as, from oppression by righteous judgment, Isa. i. 17; from deep poverty by proper gifts and presents, 1 Tim. v. 17. Acts xi. 29; from hunger by refreshing food, Lam. i. 11, 19; from excessive grief by encouragement and comfort. Lam. i. 16. God relieves the fatherless and widow; he comforts them when in grief, he delivers them from oppression, and provides for them in poverty and want. Psal. cxlvi. 9.

RELIGION; (1.) The true religion which consists in an inward and spiritual knowledge and belief of divine truth, faith in and love to Christ, and to God in him, manifested in a regular acknowledgment and worship of, and obedience to him, and in shewing proper regard to men, chiefly to such as are in distress and want. Jam. i. 27. (2.) The external and ceremonial worship of the Jews. Acts xxvi. 5. (3.) A superstitious worshipping of angels. Col. ii. 18.

RELIGIOUS, or devout, are such as are much given to a religious course or profession. Acts xiii. 43.

REMAIN: (1.) To continue. Gen. viii. 22. (2.) To be left behind. Judg. v. 13.

REMAINDER, or remnant, what is over and above, what is left behind. Exod. xxvi. 13. 2 Kings xix. 4. God restrains the remnant of man's wrath, when he represses, and hinders from breaking out, whatever portion of it he does not intend for his own glory and the good of his people. Psal. lxxvi. 10. Remnant often signifies a small part left behind: and so the remnant of a people are the small part that are saved from ruin, temporal or eternal. Rom. ix. 4. The remnant of the church's seed warred upon by the dragon, are the small remains of the opposers of Antichrist scattered here and there. Rev. xii. 17. The remnant of Baal, is what was left of his worship and worshippers. Zeph. i. 4.

REMEDY; a cure for preventing or removing of evil. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16.

REMEMBER; (1.) To call to mind what is past. Deut. xv. 15. (2.) To keep in mind some event future and important, that we may prepare for it, or take notice of it when it comes. Exod. xx. 8. (3.) To think of and consider. Psal. lxxiii. 6. Matt. xvi. 9. (4.) To esteem, reward. Eccl. ix. 15. (5.) To mention in the way of praise and commendation. 1 Chron. xvi. 12. (6.) To take care of. God remembers men, when he shews regard to, cares for, favours, and saves them, especially after a delay and suspension of his agreeable benefits. Psal. lxxiv. 2. So he remembered Noah, and the animals with him in the ark, when he provided for their deliverance. Gen. viii. 1. He remembered Abraham, when, from regard to his prayer, he delivered Lot from the destruction of Sodom. Gen. xix. 29. He remembers mercy, when he signally exercises it. Psal. xlv. 6. Hab. iii. 2. He remembers or mentions sin or righteousness, when he punishes the one and rewards the other. Jer. xxxi. 34. Ezek. xviii. 22, 24. Antichristians and other wicked men are remembered, when their sins are censured or punished. 3 John 10. Psal. cxxxvii. 7. Rev. xvi. 19. Men remember God, or his name, when they think of, believe in, and depend on him for help and assistance. Psal. xx. 7.

REMEMBRANCE, memory, consideration. Deut. xxxii. 20, 26. Your remembrances are like unto ashes, your bodies to bodies of clay; your memory, or renown, and your body, or mortal life, are contemptible, and will soon perish; or, your memorials, your admonitions, are pitiful as ashes, and your strongest reasonings are weak and brittle as clay. Job xiii. 12.

REMIT, to forgive, declare forgiven, absolve from censure. John xx. 23.

REMPHAN, an Egyptian idol. Some think him to have been Remphis, a king of Egypt, worshipped after his death. Perhaps he is the same as Moloch, Chiun, and the Egyptian Serapis and Osiris. To commemorate the dream of the kine, by which Egypt was saved, a deity was there worshipped in the form of a bull; and the Hebrews imitated this idolatry in the wilderness, when they worshipped their golden calf. Amos v. 26. Acts vii. 43. Others think Remphan to be the same as Ham, Chronus, or Saturn, the father of the Rephaim, or giants.

REMOVE; (1.) To go from one place to another. Numb. xii. 16. (2.) To take away, set aside. Gen. viii. 13. Judg. ix. 29. (3.) To pass, to change. Numb. xxxvi. 7. (4.) To cause persons or things to pass from one place, or state to another. Gen. xlvii. 21. Prov. xxii. 8.

REND; (1.) To TEAR asunder, pull in pieces. Psal. vii. 2. (3.) To reproach. Psal.

xxxv. 15. Rendering of garments, imported one's being overwhelmed with grief, or shocked with something terrible. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 27. Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34. As the priests were not allowed to rend their garments, when Caiaphas rent his garments, it was a token that the priesthood was about to be abolished. Matt. xxvi. 65. Rendering of the heart, imports great and bitter sorrow for sin. Joel ii. 13. God rends the heavens, and comes down, when, in a majestic manner, he powerfully delivers his people. Isa. lxi. 1. God tore the Jews, when he divided and terribly afflicted them. Hos. v. 14. The anger of the Edomites did tear perpetually; they on every opportunity harassed and murdered the Jews. Amos i. 11. The Assyrian kings did tear enough for their whelps; they enriched their country with the wealth they procured, by spoiling and overthrowing the nations around. Nah. ii. 12.

RENDER; (1.) To give. Numb. xviii. 9. (2.) To return in thanksgiving. Psal. cxvi. 12. (3.) To return like for like, to recompense. Psal. xciv. 2.

RENEW; (1.) To make over again. Rom. xii. 2. (2.) To repair and purge. 2 Chron. xv. 8. (3.) To confirm, establish. 1 Sam. xi. 14. God renews the earth, when he returns the spring, and gives a new succession of creatures to replenish the earth. Psal. civ. 39. He renews his people's days, when he brings them out of captivity, and restores them to a flourishing estate. Lam. v. 21. He renewed his witnesses against Job, when he brought one fresh plague on him after another, as testimonies of his displeasure with him. Job x. 17. The saints are renewed day by day, and renew their youth and strength, when, by fresh communications of grace from the fulness of Christ, they recover from spiritual decays, and grow in holiness and spiritual vigour and comfort. 2 Cor. iv. 16. Psal. ciii. 5. Isa. xl. 31. and xli. 1.

RENEWING, REGENERATION; (1.) That work of the Holy Spirit, by which, through the imputation of Christ's righteousness, his grace is implanted in us, and we are born again, and spiritually changed in our whole man. The mind is made new; being endowed with spiritual light, it apprehends, judges, esteems, devises, searches, reasons, thinks, and deliberates on new matters, and after a new manner: The conscience is renewed, sprinkled by Jesus' blood, brought under the filial fear of God, and directed by his Spirit; captivated with the changing influence of God's redeeming love, the will has new inclinations, intentions, choice, delight, purposes, and a power over the animal passions: the affections are renewed, rectified as to their objects, and in their order and degrees; the memory is renewed, qualified to hide the word of God, and retain the impressions of his love; the body is renewed, in respect of its state of subjection to the soul, and its use as an instrument of righteousness. Tit. iii. 5. 2 Cor. v. 17. Gal. vi. 15. John iii. 3-5. (2.) The reviving, repairing, and strengthening of what was decayed and blemished by sin, in a particular saint, or in the church. Psal. li. 10. Rev. xxi. 5. Isa. lxxv. 17. Regeneration in Matt. xix. 28. if joined with what goes before, may either denote the new birth, or rather the putting of the church into a new state by the preaching of the gospel; if joined with what follows, it denotes the day of judgment, when the bodies of the saints shall be put into a new state of life, and there shall be a new heaven and a new earth.

Pelagians and Socinians, who deny original sin, deny also all implanted habits of grace; and Antinomians deny all inherent habits or principles of grace, pretending to substitute Christ, and Spirit, and word, in the room thereof. According to these, our regeneration consists in, or is effected by our minds perceiving the light of divine truth, and our heart being thereby determined to credit the certainty of it by faith. Those who hold these opinions, allow the word of God to have all the influence conceivable on the human soul, provided no vital habit or principle of grace be implanted, by an almighty and creating act of God attending the word. But, when we consider that the motions and acts of all beings, created or divine, flow from inward and abiding principles answerable to their motions and actions, it must be absurd to imagine that gracious acts of faith, love, hope, repentance, and new obedience, flow from no gracious principle dwelling in the heart. The scripture account of men's hearts being by nature unclean, deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked,—enmity against God,—dead in trespasses and sins, renders it manifest that no good act can be performed by them without new habits or principles of grace implanted in them. Job xiv. 4. Jer. xvii. 9. Rom. vii. 7, 8. Eph. ii. 1, 2. Matt. xiv. 19. vii. 16, 17. and xii. 33—35. Neither the love, nor the wisdom, nor the sufficiency of Christ, can appear in our redemption, unless the remedy answer to the malady, and gracious habits be implanted instead of the natural habits of indwelling corruption, spiritual knowledge instead of ignorance, faith instead of an evil heart of unbelief, love instead of enmity, &c. Ezek. x. 19. and xxxvi. 26. 1 Cor. vii. 11. Tit. iii. 5, 5. The scripture never represents any gracious acts of men as either their regeneration or the means of it, but always as the fruit of it. We see and know spiritual things, because we are born again, and have had eyes to see and ears to hear given us. Deut. xix. 4. 1 John v. 20. John iii. 3. 1 Cor. ii. 14. We believe that Jesus is the Christ, and receive him by faith, because we are born of God. 1 John v. 1. John i. 12, 13. We love God and his people, because we are born of God, and know God. 1 John iv. 7. The sight-giving, dead-quickening, heart-circumcising, renewing, begetting, and creating influence, ascribed to God in this matter, at once represents us as entirely passive in our regeneration; and that the power of God works not by mere moral suasion, or any natural influence upon the rational soul, but by a supernatural and almighty influence similar to that through which by a word he created the world, healed desperate diseases, or raiseth the dead; and that, by this divine agency, there is produced in us an abiding vital habit or principle of grace, disposing and enabling to acts of faith, love, &c. Acts xxvi. 18. 2 Cor. iv. 6. Deut. xxix. 4. John v. 25. Rom. iv. 17. Eph. ii. 1, 5. Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14: Dent. xxx. 6. Col. ii. 11, 12. with Gen. xvii. 10, 11. Tit. iii. 5. Eph. iv. 23. John i. 13. and iii. 3, 5, 6, 8. Jam. i. 18. 1 Pet. i. 3, 23. Eph. ii. 10. and iv. 24. Col. iii. 10. The inspired representations of that which is produced by this supernatural and all-powerful agency of God, as, a mind serving the law of God, a law of the mind that warreth, Rom. vii. 23, 25; as a copy of God's law in the heart, which Adam had in his creation, Jer. xxxi. 33. 2 Cor. iii. 3; as life, eternal life, abiding in one, 1 John v. 12. and iii. 14, 15; a heart, a new heart, a pure heart, one heart, a heart to know and fear God, a heart of flesh, Ezek. xix. 11, 19. and xxvi. 6. and xviii. 31. Jer. xiv. 7. and xxxii. 39. Deut. xxix. 4. 1 Tim. i. 5. Heb. x. 22; a divine nature, God's workmanship created not in or by, but unto good works, 2 Pet. i. 4. Eph. ii. 10; the image of God, opposed to the image of the devil, which is in them by nature, and answerable in the substance of it to Adam's likeness to God. Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 10. 2 Cor. iii. 18. with Gen. i. 26, 27. A new creature that has a real subsistence in us, and rendering us new in our qualities, and which is contrary to and exclusive of old sinful lusts. 2 Cor. v. 17. Gal. vi. 15. Eph. ii. 10. and iv. 24. Col. iii. 10. A new man, the reverse of the old man, which must be put off, and is crucified with Christ, Eph. iv. 22, 24. Col. iii. 9, 10. Rom. vi. 6; a new man, having eyes to see, ears to hear, and a heart to understand, Deut. xxix. 4; an inward or inner man, which delights in God's law, and is renewed and strengthened day by day. Rom. vii. 22. 2 Cor. iv. 16. Eph. iii. 16. A spirit born of God's Spirit, a new spirit, put within one, and which lusteth against the flesh, or habits of sinful corruption, and directs and draws in a good walk, and produces gracious fruits of actual holiness. John iii. 5, 6. Ezek. xxxvi. 26. and xi. 19. Rom. viii. 4. Gal. v. 17, 22. As fleshly tables of the heart, in which Christ's truths are written by the Holy Ghost. 2 Cor. iii. 3. An inward root, which produces good fruits. Matt. vii. 17, 18. xii. 33. and xiii. 6, 21. A good treasure of the heart, out of which good acts are brought forth, Matt. xii. 35; Good ground of an honest and good heart, in which the seed of gospel-truth is sown. Luke viii. 15. Matt. xiii. 23. As incorruptible seed, distinct from, and conveyed into the heart by the word of God, 1 Pet. i. 23; seed that abideth in every one born of God, whether infants or adult, 1 John iii. 9; and which is manifest in an implanted habit of grace in every saint.—This gracious habit or principle, under the different forms of knowledge, faith, love, hope, &c. is represented as obtained, 2 Pet. i. 1; had, 2 Thess. iii. 2; kept, 2 Tim. iv. 7; as abiding, Luke xxi. 32. 1 Cor. xiii. 8, 13; dwelling, 2 Tim. i. 6. Eph. iii. 17; as working, Gal. v. 6, 22. Jam. ii. 22. 1 Cor. xiii. 4, 8; as increased, 2 Cor. x. 15; growing, 2 Pet. iii. 18: all which descriptions manifest, that in every regenerate person, there is divinely implanted, preserved, strengthened, and excited, a supernatural gracious habit, or vital principle of holiness, altogether distinct from Christ and his Spirit or word.

This implanted and inherent grace and holiness may either be viewed as one simple habit or principle filling and disposing the whole soul to holy acts, or, in respect of the different powers of the soul in which it is seated and acts, and in respect of its different forms of acting on objects, it may be distinguished into the different habits or graces of knowledge, faith, love, hope, repentance, &c. But the thing is so important, that whoever denies this implanted, inherent, habitual grace, holiness, or righteousness, overthrows the gospel, and all the work of the Spirit of God, the grace of Christ, and the new covenant. Without allowing this habitual grace, we must deny original sin, the sinful corruption of man's whole nature, and the spiritual extent and indispensable obligation of God's law, as a rule of life. We must deny the salvation of infants, or pretend they are admitted to heaven without any gracious dispositions. We must deny all spiritual union with Christ, justification by the imputation of his righteousness, or adoption into his family. We must deny all indwelling of Christ, his Spirit, and word, in our hearts; and leave it to be filled, acted upon, and governed by the indwelling habits of sinful corruption. We must deny all sanctification of our nature, all renovation of the whole man after the image of God, all experience and exercise truly gracious or acceptable to God, all spiritual warfare between the flesh and spirit; all growth and perseverance of grace, and perfection therein at last; all marks of a gracious state, and examination of ourselves, whether we be in the faith, or Christ be in us; all habitual, nay actual preparation for the Lord's supper, or for death, or heaven; all meetness of nature or temper for the blessedness of heaven; and all admission to it, unless it be with hearts filled with all unrighteousness. In short, the whole experience and exercises of religion must be reduced to those of the stony-ground hearers; some kind of moral influence of the Holy Ghost by the word, and some rootless, chimerical, and transient acts of faith, love, or the like.

RENOUNCE; solemnly to give up. 2 Cor. iv. 2.

RENOWN; a wide-spread fame of any one's excellencies, and good or mighty deeds. Dan. ix. 15. To be renowned, is to have a high character of wisdom, honour, wealth, victories. Numb. i. 16. Ezek. xxvi. 17, and xxxiv. 29. Isa. xiv. 20.

REPAIR; to build up what is rent or broken down. Judg. ii. 23. 2 Chron. xxix. 8. The Jews were repairers of breaches, and restorers of paths to duell in, when, after the reformatations of Manasseh and Amon, Josiah re-established the pure worship of God, and abolished idolatry; and when, after the Chaldean captivity, they returned and built their temple and houses, and re-established the worship of God; but chiefly, when in the apostolic age and the millennium, they shall return to the Lord, and all division between them and the gentiles be removed. Isa. lviii. 12.

REPENT, is with grief to change one's mind to what is thought more proper. Matt. xxi. 29. God repents not by changing of his mind, affection, or purpose, but by changing the manner of his work: so he repented that he had made man, or made Saul king, when he changed the course of his providence towards them, as men would do, when they repent and change their mind, acting as one determined to destroy and pull them down. Gen. vi. 6, 7. 1 Sam. xv. 11. His repenting himself concerning his servants, or his repentings kindling, imports his compassionately rising up for their deliverance after he had seemed determined to ruin them in the world. Deut. xxxii. 36. Psal. cxxxv. 14. Hos. xi. 8. His repenting of the evil or the good he had conditionally threatened or promised, denotes his not inflicting the one or bestowing the other. Psal. cvi. 45. Jer. xviii. 10. His gifts and calling are without repentance; can never be recalled or taken back, as his love and faithfulness render them unalterable. Rom. xi. 29.

Men's repentance is, (1.) A change of mind, earnestly wishing something undone that is done. Isaac found no place for repentance; though Esau with tears begged it, and he himself earnestly desired it, yet he could not possibly recal the blessing of Jacob, and transfer it to Esau. Heb. xii. 17. Or a change of opinion concerning the Messiah, or sinful acts, &c. Matt. iii. 2. and iv. 17. (2.) A legal repentance, by which one is grieved for and turns from his sin to outward appearances of religion, merely on account of the hurt it has done or is like to do to him: thus, a malefactor, who still loves his sin, repents of having done it, because it has brought him to punishment; o Judas repented of having betrayed his Master, because he saw it would bring him to everlasting shame and torment. Matt. xxvii. 3. (3.) Gospel-repentance, which is a saving grace wrought in the heart of a sinful person by the word and Spirit of God, by which, from a sight and sense of his sin, as offensive to God, murderous to Christ, and defiling to his own soul, and from an apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ, he, with grief and hatred of all his known sins, turns from them to God as his Saviour, portion, and Lord, with full purpose of, and endeavour after new obedience. This is called repentance towards God, because we then turn from sin to him; repentance unto life, as it proceeds from and manifests our spiritual life, and daily increases it, and issues in and prepares for eternal life. Matt. iii. 2. Acts iii. 19. xx. 21. and xi. 18. In every case, a correspondent faith must precede repentance; the faith of the law must precede legal repentance, Rom. xii. 19; and the faith of the gospel must precede true evangelical repentance. We must first by faith look on Jesus, and then mourn: he that cometh to God must believe, and come by Christ as the way: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin. Zech. xii. 10. Heb. xi. 6. John xiv. 6. Rom. xiv. 23. But repentance is sometimes mentioned first, perhaps, because repentance is the end, and faith is the means. Acts xx. 21: or, in that expression, Repent and believe the gospel, the sense may be, Change your carnal notions of the Messiah and his kingdom, and believe the truths and offers of the gospel. Mark i. 15. Repentance is an absolutely necessary fruit of pardon of sin in justification, Ezek. xvi. 62, 63. and xxvi. 25—31; part of salvation begun, and preparative for the complete degrees of salvation. Luke xi. 3, 5. See FORGIVE.

REPETITIONS. The vain repetitions of the Pharisees, were the saying the same things over and over in their prayers, as if the more they spake they would be the better heard. Matt. vi. 9.

REPLENISH; to fill with inhabitants or wealth. Ezek. xxvi. 2. God replenishes sorrowful souls, when he fills them with joy and comfort. Jer. xxxi. 25. The Jews were replenished from the east; they entertained numbers of idolatrous magicians, and their abominations from Chaldaea and Assyria; or, were proud of their alliance with the Assyrians. Isa. ii. 6.

RE-PHA'IM; a valley on the south or west of Jerusalem, very fruitful in corn. Isa. xvii. 5. It seems to have had its name from the GIANTS that anciently inhabited it; and here the host of the Philistines encamped oftener than once. 1 Chron. xi. 15. and xiv. 19.

RE-PHI'DIM; a place on the east side of the western gulf of the Red Sea, where the Hebrews tempted God, and quarrelled with Moses for want of water; and so it was called Meribah, contention, and Massah, temptation. Here Moses brought them water from a rock; and here they, under the direction of Joshua, routed the Amalekites.

REPLY. To reply against God, is to quarrel with his purpose or providence. Rom. ix. 20.

REPORT. To report a thing, is, (1.) To declare how it was done, how orders were executed. Ezek. ix. 11. (2.) To declare openly, or again and again. 1 Cor. v. 1. Report and we will report it; tell us what you can against Jeremiah, and we will rehearse it to the king to have him punished. Jer. xx. 10. The gospel is called a report, or hearing; by it the famed excellencies and works of God in Christ are declared: and the prophets, apostles, and ministers, receiving it from Christ, publish it to men. Isa. liii. 1.

REPROACH; INFAMY; (1.) The bad character of any one, whether procured by his own wicked deed, or occasioned by false accusation, outrageous upbraiding, or scornful derision. Prov. vi. 35. Isa. li. 7. Ezek. xxxvi. 3. Neh. ii. 12. (2.) Slandorous speech, by which men give disgraceful characters to others. Psal. lxxxix. 12. Persons or things are said to be a reproach, when loaded with a bad character, and made a common bye-word. Psal. xxii. 6. and lxxxix. 41. Sin is the reproach of any people; it is a disgrace to them, and tends to render them contemptible. Prov. xiv. 34. Oppression, or mocking of the poor, is a reproaching of God, as if his image on them deserved no respect, as if by making them poor he had devoted them to hard usage, and as if he could not protect them. Prov. xiv. 31. and xvii. 5. The reproach of Christ, is scorn and calumny endured for adherence to him and his ways.

Heb. xi. 26. and xiii. 13. Among the Hebrews, barrenness was accounted a reproach, as it excluded from a share in the multiplication of Abraham's seed, and from being the honoured progenitors of the Messiah. Gen. xxx. 23. Isa. iv. 1. Luke i. 25. Uncircumcision was the reproach of Egypt, as it anciently shewed men to be aliens from God, like the Egyptians; and perhaps many of the Jews neglected to circumcise their children in Egypt. Josh. v. 9. God put the Philistines to a perpetual reproach, when he smote them with the long-remembered and shameful disease of the emerods. Psal. lxxxviii. 60. Reproach breaks the heart, as it not only tends to bereave a man of his outward enjoyments, but renders him contemptible and useless for advancing the honour of God, or doing real service to mankind. Psal. lxxxix. 20.

REPROBATE, not approved. Among metalists, it signifies what cannot abide the trial, without shewing itself drossy, or of a coarse alloy. Thus wicked men are reprobate silver; they are not purged nor refined, nor will they pass current, according to the standard of God's law. Jer. vi. 30. When used concerning wrestling games and races, it signifies him who miscarries and loses the prize. Let I should be a reprobate, or cast-away; lest I should be found a hypocritical counterfeit, one void of true grace; one whom God will never reward as a runner of the Christian race, or as a victorious fighter of the good fight of faith. 1 Cor. ix. 27. A reprobate mind, is one hardened in wickedness, and which cannot discern between good and evil. Rom. iii. 28. Men are reprobate concerning the faith, when they apostatize from the doctrines of Christ, and abandon themselves to the most horrible errors. 2 Tim. iii. 8. They are reprobate to every good work, when quite incapable and averse to the performance of them, and to others performing of them. Tit. i. 16. See DECREE.

REPROVE. See REBUKE.

REPUTE; to reckon, esteem. Job xviii. 3. Reputation, a high character. Gal. ii. 2.

REQUEST; to crave, pray for. Judg. viii. 26. 1 Kings xix. 4.

REQUIRE; (1.) To ask as a favour. Ezra vii. 22. (2.) To demand as a debt, or as due obedience. Luke xix. 23. Dent. x. 12. (3.) To call to account for. Ezek. xxxiv. 10. (4.) To avenge, punish for. 1 Sam. xx. 16. God requireth things that are past; he orders that which was past and driven away to be renewed and brought back, and requires men for their past deeds. Eccl. iii. 15. This night shall thy soul be required of thee; it shall be separated from thy body, and called to give an account of itself and its deeds at the tribunal of God. Luke xii. 20.

REQUIRE. See RECOMPENSE.

REWARD; the last body or hindmost part of the troops in a marching army, who, as it were, guard the back of the army. Josh. vi. 13. The Lord, or his glory, is the reward of his people, when he affords them full protection, even from unseen enemies; so he was to the Jews in their return from Babylon. Isa. lii. 12. and lviii. 8.

RESCUE; (1.) To recover back from captivity. 1 Sam. xxx. 18. (2.) To save from imminent danger. Acts xxiii. 27.

RESEMBLE; (1.) To be like to other persons or things. Judg. viii. 18. (2.) To liken or compare. Luke xiii. 18.

RESEN; a noted city of Assyria, built by Ashur, between Nineveh and Calah. Some think all the three, together with Rehoboth, were at last united into Nineveh; but perhaps Resen is the same as La-rissa on the Tigris, which was eight miles in circumference, its walls a hundred feet high, and twenty-five broad. Gen. x. 12.

RESERVE; (1.) To leave, set aside for a particular use. 2 Sam. viii. 4. (2.) To keep firmly and carefully. Jude 6. (3.) To keep things in store in order to give them out afterwards. 1 Pet. i. 4.

RESIDUE; what is left or remains behind. Exod. x. 5. Neh. xi. 20.

RESIST. See OPPOSE.

RESORT; (1.) To meet together. Neh. iv. 20. (2.) To come to. Psal. lxxi. 3.

RESPECT; to esteem, regard. Sinful respect of persons, is to regard and esteem them in giving sentences of judgment, for their outward honour, power, and wealth, not attending to truth and equity. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. i. 15. In this sense, God and Christ respect not persons for their nation, family, or outward circumstances, nor should judges or others do so. Acts x. 34. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. i. 17. James ii. 1, 9. 1 Pet. i. 17. God has respect to the lowly, he delights to have fellowship with them, and to do them good. Psal. cxxxviii. 6. He had respect to Abel and his offering; esteeming his person as united to Jesus, he, by causing fire to descend from heaven and consume it, shewed a regard to his offering, which was offered in faith. Gen. iv. 4.

RESPITE; a breathing, a time in which to advise. Exod. viii. 15. 1 Sam. xi. 3.

REST; (1.) To cease from work. Exod. xxiii. 12. (2.) To sit or nestle quietly. Gen. xviii. 4. Isa. xxxix. 14. (3.) To lean, or to trust in. 2 Chron. xxxii. 8. (4.) To continue fixed. Isa. li. 4. (5.) To come to an end. Ezek. xvi. 42. and xxi. 17. God rested from creation-work, and was refreshed; he ceased to make new kinds of creatures, and took pleasure in what he had made. Heb. iv. 4. Exod. xxxi. 17. His resting in his love, implies his unchanging pleasure in the past effects of it, and his taking delight in shewing it more abundantly. Zeph. iii. 17. His taking his rest during the Assyrian ravages of Egypt and Ethiopia, imports his forbearing to interpose remarkably between the contending parties. Isa. xlviii. 4. Men rest on the Lord, when, with a strong faith in his promise and righteousness, they commit themselves to his care, and depend on him for all necessary blessings. Psal. xxxvii. 7. The saints rest at noon, when, amid scorching persecution and temptation, God bestows upon them distinguished protection, inward patience, and comfort. Sol. Song i. 7. The dead rest in their graves, from all labour, disturbance and pain. Isa. lvii. 2. To QUIET, is to cause to rest, make still. God's spirit was quieted in the north country, when the Persians, Greeks, and after them the Romans, executed the destined vengeance on Chaldea, where his people had been oppressed; or, when the spread of the gospel was the means of converting multitudes to Christ. Zech. vi. 8. God quieteth the earth with the south wind, when he makes its gentle gales to blow on it. Job xxxvii. 17.

REST; QUIETNESS; (1.) A ceasing from labour. Exod. v. 5. (2.) A ceasing from open war. Josh. xiv. 15. (3.) Ceasing from tillage and husbandry. Lev. xxv. 5. (4.) A state of peace and reconciliation with God and men's own conscience. Matt. xi. 29. Heb. iv. 3. (5.) A calm composure of mind, produced by the love of God shed abroad in the heart, and by the Holy Ghost's witnessing to the conscience, justification, reconciliation, regeneration, adoption, and sure title to eternal glory; this is attended with a cheerful confidence in the promises, and a submission to the providences of God. Psal. cxvi. 7. (6.) REST also signifies a peaceful and comfortable settlement, such as Canaan to the Hebrews, and the temple to the ark. Deut. iii. 20. Psal. cxxxii. 3, 14. (7.) A part of a wall for the ends of a beam to lie on. 1 Kings vi. 6. (8.) The remainder, these beside. Gen. xxx. 6.

Christ in his person, offices, relations, righteousness, power, and love, and in his promises, is a rest and refreshing, which, if applied and improved, yield a most sweet pleasure and quiet to men. Isa. xxviii. 12. Christ's rest is glorious: his gospel-church, and his new-covenant state, in which his people enjoy sweet delight and repose, is the product of his glorious power and bleeding love, and is glorious in its properties and ends. Isa. xi. 10. The rest remaining for the people of God is the gospel state of the church, in which men enjoy freedom from the burdensome services of the ceremonial law, and have Jesus and his delightful promises clearly exhibited to them; and the heavenly state, in which the saints shall be for ever free from sin, sorrow, temptation, and trouble or toil, and for ever delighted in the full enjoyment of, and conformity to a God in Christ. Heb. iv. 9. Canaan and the temple are called God's rest, because there the symbols of his presence resided, and the former was given by him to the Hebrews to dwell in. Heb. iii. 11. Psal. cxxxii. 14: but it was not their rest, because it was polluted, as God expelled them from it. Mic. ii. 10. If God give quietness, who then can make trouble? If God give inward peace and comfort, or even outward, who can vex his people? Job xxiv. 29. The wicked shall not feel quietness in his belly; no ease in his mind concerning his ill-gotten goods. Job xx. 20. Damascus was the rest of God's wrath; his judgments continued long upon it. Zech. ix. 1.—QUIET; (1.) Still, calm, and peaceable, composed in mind. 1 Thes. iv. 11. Psal. xli. 10. and iv. 4. (2.) Idle, inactive. Judg. xviii. 7, 27. (3.) Free from noise and war. 2 Chron. xiv. 1, 5. To STILL, is to render pleased, calm, and silent. Numb. xiii. 30.

RESTORE; (1.) To give back again. Gen. xx. 14. (2.) To re-establish one in his former office or station. Gen. xl. 13. Isa. i. 29. (3.) To make restitution, by giving back to an owner what was unjustly taken or detained from him, or which had been lost. In holy things, and where there was the least appearance of fraud, restitution was at least to be made to the full value, and a fifth part more. Four sheep were given for one that had been stolen, and five oxen for one, as these animals were easily stolen, and the want of the last hindered the tillage of the field; and for fraudulent exaction of tribute, the restitution was to be fourfold. If the owner and his heirs were all dead or unknown, the restitution was to be made to the priest, as the Lord's deputy, and no atonement could be made for the person's injustice till once the restitution was made. Did not this hint, that no man has any ground to expect forgiveness of his stealing or injustice till he makes restitution of what he unjustly obtained, at least do what he can to give every one his due? but he may make it in as secret a way as he can. Exod. xxii. 1-4. Numb. v. 7, 8. Lev. xxii. 14. and vi. 4. Luke xix. 8. According to his substance shall his restitution be; all his estate shall be taken from him to pay what he fraudulently got. Job xx. 18. (4.) To recover, take back, put again in possession of, 2 Kings xiv. 25. (5.) To heal or cure. Matt. xii. 13. (6.) To reform the church from her corruptions in doctrine, worship, and practice. Matt. xvii. 11. Christ restored what he took not away, when by his mediation he brought glory to God, and righteousness, holiness, and happiness to men. Psal. lxxix. 4. To restore a scandalous professor, (or set him in joint, for so the word means) is to bring him to a sense of his sin, a belief of God's pardoning mercy, and an amendment of practice, and so to an access to sealing ordinances, as before. Gal. vi. 1. The restitution of all things, is the putting of the world into a holy and happy state, which it shall be at the last day. Acts iii. 21.

RESTRAIN; WITHHOLD; (1.) To keep back, as with a bridle. Psal. lxxvi. 10. Gen. xx. 6. (2.) To detain, cease from giving. Job xv. 4. (3.) To confine. Job xv. 8.

RESURRECTION, or rising again from the dead, is either, (1.) Civil, when a person or nation are recovered from a state of distress and bondage, as in the case of David, Hezekiah, Paul, Psal. xxv. 3, 4. Isa. xxxviii. 16. 2 Cor. i. 9, 10; and of the Jewish nation. Lam. iv. 20. Hos. vi. 1, 2. Ezek. xxxvii. 1-14. (2.) Spiritual, from a state of death in sin to spiritual life and happiness; and this is either of particular persons when they are regenerated and born again, John v. 25. Eph. ii. 1, 5. Col. ii. 12. and iii. 1; or of the church, when, by the influences of Christ, she is mightily increased in her members, and they in their lively walking with God, and in their outward comfort and prosperity. This will take place in the beginning of the millennium, and is called the first resurrection. Isa. vi. 20, 21. and ix. 1. Rom. xi. 14. Rev. xx. 1-8. (3.) Corporeal, when dead bodies are restored to life. That there will be a general raising of the dead bodies of men and women at the last day, is most agreeable to reason. Reason hints, that the law of God is given to our whole man, and is violated by our soul and body in connection. The body, as an open port, admits incentives of good, and temptation to evil; the carnal affections depending on the body, corrupt and mislead the mind and affections. What outward acts the soul designs, whether good or evil, the body executes. When the heart is filled with hatred of God, and all unrighteousness, the tongue and other bodily members are instruments to execute it. When the renewed soul loves and cleaves to Jesus Christ, the tongue utters his praise, and other bodily members labour, or endure suffering, for his sake. If these different parts of human nature share thus in actions good or bad; it is reasonable that they share together the everlasting reward or punishment; and hence the body must be restored to life, and reunited with the soul never more to be separated. The dying of seeds, that they may revive and grow up, the revival of withered trees and roots in the spring, are natural presages of this resurrection. John xii. 24. 1 Cor. v. 36. The translation of Enoch and Elias to heaven, both soul and body; the restoration of many to life by the hand of Elijah, Elisha, and of Jesus and his apostles; but chiefly the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, are incontestible proofs of a general resurrection. Jesus rose as the first fruits of them that slept; to intimate which, numbers of dead saints arose about the same time, who it is scarcely probable ever returned to corruption. 1 Cor. xv. 20. Matt. xxvii. 52, 53. In his resurrection, he exerted his own divine power, and was solemnly owned by his Father as his only begotten Son. Rom. i. 4. Acts xiii. 35. He rose for our justification; as he was then discharged from all our debt which he had taken on himself, and exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness of sins. Rom. iv. 25. He is the resurrection and the life; the spring and cause of our spiritual resurrection from a state of sin, and of our revival after languishing and distress, and of our happy resurrection, at the last day. John xi. 25. That there shall be a future resurrection of the dead in general is also evident from many passages of scripture. God shewed the truth hereof to Moses at the bush in calling himself the God of the patriarchs after they were deceased; which imported that their souls did, and their bodies would live unto God. Luke xx. 37, 38. Amidst all his trouble, Job firmly believed, not that he would have a return to prosperity in this life, for this he did not, (Job vi. 8, 9. vii. 7, 8. x. 21, 22. xvi. 22. xvii. 1, 15. and xix. 10. and his words are too grand to express such an event;) but that at the last his Redeemer should raise him from the dead, and make him, in his flesh, in the very same body he then had, to see God as his friend and portion. Job xix. 25-27. With the view hereof, God comforts his church. Isa. xxvi. 19. and Dan. xii. 2, 3. In the New Testament, this truth is evidently asserted in a multitude of places. Luke xiv. 18. John vi. 69, 40, 44, 54. xi. 24-26. and xiv. 19. Acts iv. 2. xvii. 18. and xxvi. 8. Rom. viii. 11. 1 Cor. vi. 14. and xv. 2 Cor. i. 9. and iv. 14. 1 Thess. iv. 14. 2 Tim. iv. 1. Heb. vi. 2. and Rev. xx. 12, 13. That the same body will be raised, is evident from the reasons above mentioned, as well as from the very nature of a resurrection; for, if the same body were not raised, it could be no resurrection, but a new creation. It is the body that was once vile, mortal, diseased, and dead and buried, and that bore the image of the earthly Adam, that shall be raised, changed, and glorified. Phil. iii. 21. Rom. viii. 11. Job xix. 26, 27. John v. 28. 1 Cor. xv. 42, 43, 51, 53, 54. That the saints' bodies shall rise first; and be rendered glorious like unto Christ's glorified body; and spiritual, so as to need no meat or drink, and to be no clog to the soul, is also plain. The vain questions concerning the time of the resurrection, the apparent difficulties of the raising of the same body, the difference of sex in them that are raised, are dismissed as improper for discussion here. Nothing proper is impossible for the power and wisdom of God. But let us know and earnestly remember, that by the resurrection of life, the godly shall, first in order, and in a glorious manner, be raised to enjoy everlasting happiness; and by the resurrection of damnation, the wicked shall rise to everlasting shame and torment; while hell shall give up their departed souls, the sea and earth shall produce their dead bodies. John v. 28, 29. Rev. xx. 12—14.

RETAIN; to hold fast in power or possession. Judg. vii. 8. and xix. 14. God retaineth not his anger for ever; he will not alway continue to punish and afflict. Mic. vii. 18. Wicked men like not to retain God in their knowledge; they are not inclined to cherish and increase their thoughts of God, and the impressions of his greatness, goodness, and justice, on their consciences. Rom. i. 28. Sins are retained, when the sinner is continued under censure or condemnation. John xx. 23. Bernice did not retain the power of the arm; did not by her marriage establish a firm union between the two kingdoms of Egypt and Syria: nor did she long maintain her interest in the favour of her husband Antiochus Theos; for he after the death of her father Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, divorced her, and retook Laodicea, by whom he himself, Bernice, and her child and friends, were soon after murdered. Dan. xi. 6.

RETIRE; to march backward; to go aside. Judg. xx. 39.

RETURN; (1.) To go back from whence one came. Exod. xiii. 17. (2.) To come again. 2 Chron. xviii. 26. (3.) To requite. 1 Kings ii. 32, 44. (4.) To rehearse, tell over. Exod. xix. 8. God returns to men, when, after some judgments and afflictions he bestows fresh favours upon them. Psal. vi. 4. Joel ii. 14. He returns on high, when he as a judge gives sentence for his people, and against their enemies; and displays his authority and power in the execution of it. Psal. vii. 7. Men return to God, when they repent of their sinful wandering out of the way of his commandments, and begin anew to obey and serve him. Isa. x. 21. Ezek. xviii. 21. The return of the year, is the spring tide, when it began anew in the season and in the sacred reckoning of the Jews. 1 Kings xx. 22. In returning and rest, ye shall be saved; by means of returning to God in Christ by faith and repentance, and by resting quietly on him as your support and deliverer, without going to Egypt for help, shall ye have deliverance. Isa. xxx. 15. Let them return to thee, but return thou not to them; let them hearken to thy words, and follow thy pattern; but comply thou not with them in their courses, nor flatter them in their sins. Jer. xv. 19.

RE'U, or RAGAU, the son of Peleg, and father of Serug, was born A. M. 1787, and died, A. M. 2026. Gen. xi. 18.

REUBEN, the eldest son of Jacob by Leah, born A. M. 2246. When he was very young, he found dudaim, which we render mandrakes in the field, about the time of wheat harvest. These his mother sold to Rachel, who coveted them, for her night with Jacob. When he was about forty years of age, he, to the great grief of his father, committed incest with his concubine, but seems to have deeply repented of his sin. Though Joseph was likely to come between him and his father's inheritance, he did all that lay in him to preserve Joseph in safety. He begged the rest of his brethren would not murder him. With a view to protect him, he persuaded them to throw him into a dry pit, and leave him there to die of his own accord; but he intended to draw him out and send him home in safety. His brethren had, during his absence, taken Joseph out, and sold him to the Midianites. When he found him taken out, he rent his clothes, and cried that he knew not what to do. When afterwards Joseph's rough usage of them brought them to a sense of their guilt concerning his blood, Reuben reminded them how obstinately deaf they were to all his entreaties for the preservation of his life. When his father refused to let Benjamin go with them into Egypt, he offered to pledge the life of his two sons that he would bring him safely back. In his last benediction, Jacob told him that for his incest he should lose his birth-right, and should never excel. Gen. xxiv. 32. xxx. 14. xxxv. 22. xxxvii. 29, 30. xlii. 21, 22, 27, and xlix. 8, 4. 1 Chron. v. 1.

His sons were Hanoch, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi, all of whom were parents of considerable families. Numb. xxvi. 5, 6. When the Reubenites came out of Egypt, their number fit for war amounted to 46,500, under the command of Elizur, the son of Shedeur. They, with their brethren of Simeon and Gad, formed the second division in the march of the Hebrews, and went just before the ark. Their spy for searching the promised land, was Shammua the son of Zacchur. Dathan, Abiram, and On, who rebelled against Moses and Aaron along with Korah, were of this tribe. In the plains of Moab, their warriors amounted to 43,730. When Moses seized the kingdoms of Sihon and Og, the Reubenites and Gadites observing how proper the country was for their vast numbers of flocks and herds, begged to have it as their portion. At first Moses refused; but on their proposing to assist their brethren with all their force in the conquest of western Canaan, he granted the country to them and the half tribe of Manasseh. There they repaired the cities, and settled their wives and children. Their warriors wrest over Jordan; and though perhaps they sometimes visited their families, yet they continued with their brethren for the greater part of seven years, till all the tribes had got their settlements; after which they were honourably dismissed. In their return home, they erected the altar of Ed on the bank of Jordan, not for offering sacrifices or incense, but for a testimony that they were of the same Hebrew stock and religion with their brethren. The design of this was at first mistaken by the other tribes; and Phinehas, and several of the princes, were sent to expostulate with them about this matter, as they took it to be a step towards apostasy from the worship of God; but when they heard the true design of erecting the altar, they were satisfied. According to the predictions of Jacob and Moses, this tribe never excelled, there never being any noted person born of it. The possessions of this tribe were much exposed to enemies, the Moabites on the south, the Ammonites on the east, and the Syrians from the north. Numb. xxvi. 5, 6. i. 5, 21. x. 18, 21. xvi. and xxxii. Josh. xxii. Dent. xxxiii. 6.

In the days of Deborah, the Reubenites were so embarrassed with intestine broils or foreign invasions, that they could send no assistance to Barak. During the reign of Saul, they, (perhaps under the command of Bela the son of Azaz,) conquered a tribe of the Hagarites on the east of Gilead, and seized on their country. Them and their brethren, the Gadites, and Manassites, to the number of 120,000, attended at David's coronation. In that period, Eliezer the son of Zichri was their governor, and Adina the son of Shiza was one of David's worthies. Hazael king of Syria greatly ravaged their country; but it seems that afterwards, in the reign of Jeroboam II, they and their brethren of Gilead smote the Hagarites, and took from them their country, and a prodigious spoil of flocks. Not long after, when Beerah was their prince, Tiglath-pileser carried them captive into the north-east parts of his empire. Judg. v. 15, 16. 1 Chron. xii. 37. xxvii. 16. and xii. 42. 2 Kings x. 37.

REVEAL; to make manifest what was before concealed or unknown. Rom. ii. 5. Christ is revealed, when God savingly enlightens men's minds in the saving knowledge of him, Gal. i. 16; when, by fearful judgments on the Jewish nation, he manifested his power and Messiahship, Luke xvii. 30; and when he will, at the last day, come openly to judge the world. 2 Thess. i. 7. The arm of the Lord is revealed, when Christ is savingly discovered, and when the power of God in his mighty effects is savingly felt, sins being forgiven, the conscience purified, and the heart changed. Isa. liii. 1. His righteousness is revealed, when the obedience and sufferings of Christ, in which the equity of God's nature and law shine forth, are declared and offered to sinful men. Isa. lvi. 1. Rom. i. 17. The heavens reveal men's iniquity, when God brings it to light, and punishes them signally for it. Job xx. 27. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness, when, by the stings of conscience, and by his judgments on them, his displeasure with the conduct of sinners is clearly manifested. Rom. i. 18. The popish man of sin was revealed, when he openly appeared as head of the church, or as a civil prince. 2 Thess. ii. 8. Men reveal their cause to God, when they lay it before him in prayer. Jer. xi. 20. By Christ's coming into the world, and being preached in the gospel, the thoughts of many hearts are revealed: some have their consciences fully searched by his word; and many, by their evidence of regard to, or hatred of him, declare what is in their hearts. Luke ii. 35. Every man's work shall be tried and revealed by fire; by the fire of God's word trying it, by fiery trials and persecutions, and especially by a thorough trial in the last judgment, its nature and quality shall be plainly discovered. 1 Cor. iii. 13.

REVELATION. Any immediate discovery of God's mind, is called a revelation, Gal. i. 12. 1 Cor. xiv. 6, 26; but the last book of the scripture, in which God discovered to John the apostle a multitude of things relative to his will and purpose towards the church, is particularly so called. Rev. i. 1. After an introduction and description of a vision which John had of Jesus Christ in the isle of Patmos, it contains seven epistles to the Asiatic churches of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, in which Jesus commends their good things, reproves their defects, and calls upon them to reform, and encourages them under their trials. Chaps. i—iii. In chaps. iv. and v. we have an introduction to the prophetic part, consisting of a vision of God upon a throne, and praised by ministers and saints; and of Christ's opening the seven-sealed book of his purposes, to the great joy of angels and redeemed men. In chap. vi. is the opening of six seals, exhibiting the state of the church, and of the Roman empire, from Christ's ascension to the fall of the heathenish form of the empire about A. D. 325. In chap. vii. is an emblematic representation of the security of the saints under the trumpets, and their happy release from their troubles. In chaps. viii. and ix. is the opening of the seventh seal, and the sounding of six trumpets, by which is exhibited the fate of the church, by the Arians, Donatists, Pelagians, Papists, and Saracens; and the fate of the Roman empire, by the Goths, Vandals, Huns, Heruli, Saracens, and Turks, from A. D. 323 to 1866, or 2016. In chap. x. is another introductory vision of Jesus Christ with a little open book, the seals being now loosed, in his hand importing a further discovery of the events of providence. In chap. xi. is a view of the rise, power, duration of, and opposition to Antichrist, and of his fall, and the glorious millennium; and so reaches from A. D. 606, to the end of the 1000 years' reign of the saints; and of it chaps. xiii. to xxii. are but an explication. In chap. xii. is a repeated view of the state of the church under heathenism and Antichrist. In chaps. xiii. and xiv. we have a view of the rise of Antichrist in his civil and ecclesiastical power, together with preludes, warnings, and emblematical representations of his ruin. In chaps. xv. and xvi. we have the preparation for, and the pouring out of the destructive vials of God's wrath on Antichrist. In chaps. xvii. and xviii. and xix. are exhibited the marks of Antichrist, and the causes and terrible nature of his overthrow, and the grief of his friends and joy of the saints thereat. In chap. xx. is represented the glorious millennium, and the last judgment. In chaps. xxi. and xxii. is represented the happiness of the millennial and of the eternal state, and a terrible denunciation of wrath to such as take from or add to the words of God.

REVELLINGS; luxurious feasting attended with wanton songs and behaviour. Gal. v. 21.

REVENGE, or VENGEANCE; (1.) An angry resentment of an injury that has been or is supposed to have been done us. Jer. xx. 10. (2.) A just censure of a scandal. 2 Cor. x. 6. (3.) A hatred of sin, manifested in using all proper methods to destroy it. 2 Cor. vii. 11. When revenge or vengeance is attributed to God, it includes no passion, but merely a righteous disposition to punish evil doers, Acts xviii. 4; and the just punishment inflicted on them, Psal. lvi. 10, or chastisement of his people. Psal. xcix. 8. Vengeance belongeth only unto God: he alone can fully resent injuries; he alone has the right to resent injuries done to himself, as the God and supreme Governor of the world; and he prohibits private persons from revenging any injuries done them, Lev. xix. 17, 18. Rom. xii. 17, 19; and by the law of requital, he did not allow, but set bounds to private revenge. Exod. xxi. 4. When magistrates punish injuries, or when the nearest kinsman killed him who had accidentally slain his friend, they acted as the deputies of God the supreme ruler. Rom. xiii. 4. Num. xxxv. 19, 24. The punishment taken by God on the Chaldeans for destroying his people and temple, is called the vengeance of his temple. Jer. i. 28.

REVENUE; profit, income. Ezra iv. 13. Isa. xliii. 3. Christ's revenue is the blessings he gives to men, which are more precious, enriching, and useful, than choice silver. Prov. viii. 19. In the revenue of the wicked is trouble; in acquiring, preserving, and parting with their wealth, they have trouble, and a curse and trouble often punish their wicked manner of procuring it. Prov. xv. 6. The Jews were ashamed of their revenue; ashamed of what they had sinfully procured to themselves, and of the issue of their giving presents to, and trusting in the Egyptians. Jer. xii. 13.

REVERENCE; a submissive and humble deportment. To do reverence to God, is to have a humble and filial awe of his greatness, fear of his displeasure, and a self-abased temper of spirit in worshipping him, or bearing his chastisements. Heb. xii. 28. To reverence his sanctuary, is to pay a reverential and solemn regard to his ordinances. Lev. xix. 30. God's name is reverend: all things by which he makes himself known are to be reverently regarded, as being connected with him who is infinitely great, and to be feared of all his creatures. Psal. cxi. 9. To do reverence to men, is to treat our superiors with the respect due to their rank and station. 2 Sam. ix. 6.

REVERSE; to make null; to overturn. Numb. xxiii. 20.

REVILE; RAIL; to speak evil or indiscreetly of persons or things. Matt. xxvii. 30. 1 Sam. xxv. 14. As their words are, like spears and swords, destructive to men's persons, characters, and interest, revilers or railers ought to be expelled from human society and the church, 1 Cor. v. 11; and God has excluded them from his kingdom. 1 Cor. vi. 10. It was highly criminal to revile rulers in church or state, and revilers of parents were appointed to death, Exod. xxii. 28. and xxi. 17. They are blessed of God who bless, and from the heart wish well to such as revile them. Matt. v. 11. 1 Cor. iv. 12.

REVIVE; (1.) To become lively and cheerful after much fainting and sorrow. Gen. xiv. 27. (2.) To live again, after being dead or dead-like. Rom. xiv. 9. Hos. xiv. 7. (3.) To quicken, and render lively and active. Psal. lxxxv. 6. God revives men, when he grants deliverance to them from great calamities, and gives his quickening Spirit and grace to render them active and cheerful in his service. Hos. vi. 2. Ezra ix. 8. Isa. lvii. 15. The Jews revived the stones out of the heaps of rubbish, when they digged them up, and rebuilt the wall of Jerusalem with them. Neh. v. 3. Sin revives, when the commandment is closely applied to men's consciences, and the guilt, pollution, and power of their sin is manifested, and when it acts with greater vigour than before. Rom. vii. 9.

REWARD, WAGES; (1.) What is gained by service, or as the subsistence of ministers. 1 Tim. v. 18. 2 Cor. xi. 8. What is gained by sinful works is the wages of unrighteousness. 2 Pet. ii. 15. (2.) The fruit of men's labour. Eccl. ix. 5, (3.) A bribe given to a judge for his favour in a cause. Deut. xxvii. 25. The reward of the godly from God, is the blessings he bestows on them in consequence of their good works, and particularly the unmerited gift of eternal life in heaven, which is bestowed upon them from the mercy of God, and through the righteousness of Jesus Christ. Matt. v. 12. The reward of the wicked, or the wages of their sin, is that fearful and just punishment of death temporal, spiritual, or eternal, which God inflicts upon them. Psal. xci. 8. Children are God's reward, which he bestows as a blessing on parents, or which parents devote to God as an acknowledgment of his kindness. Psal. cxxvii. 3. The praise and high esteem of men, is the reward of hypocritical appearance of religion. Matt. vi. 2, 5. The Jews loved a reward on every corn-floor; like harlots ready to prostitute themselves on corn-floors or any where, and for a measure of corn or a piece of bread, they ascribed their plentiful crops to their idols, and gave them tithes of all they had, and were ready to join with the idols of any neighbouring country, for the sake of the most pitiful advantage. Hos. ix. 1.

REZIN; the last king of the ancient Syrians, perhaps a descendant of Hazael. Having entered into a league with Pekah king of Israel, they invaded the kingdom of Judah, then governed by Ahaz. Not being able to take Jerusalem, they ravaged the country and returned home. Soon after Rezin's army again plundered the country; and about this time he marched to the Red sea, and took Elath, and restored it, whether to Syria or the Edomites we are uncertain, as in the Hebrew, ARAM, and EDMOM are so very similar. But it is certain, that not long after, Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, at the desire of Ahaz, invaded Syria, slew Rezin, and carried his subjects captive to Media. 2 Kings xvi. 2 Chron. xxviii. Isa. vii. and viii.

RE'ZON, the son of Eliadah, having revolted from his master Hadadezer, the Syrian king of Zobah, while David made war upon him, put himself at the head of a band of robbers; and after ravaging the country about Damascus, he seized on that city, and set up for king of that place. Whether he did so in the time of David, or only in the time of Solomon, is uncertain; nor can it be known at what time he began to give disturbance to Solomon. It is certain, that at the time of his death, he could scarce be less than ninety years of age; and it is likely he was succeeded by his son Hezion. 1 Kings xi. 23—25. and xv. 18.

RHE'GI-UM; a city in the kingdom of Naples on the south point of Italy, about six miles east of Messina in Sicily, and 180 south of Naples. It is said to have been originally built by a colony from Chalcia. It was splendidly rebuilt by Julius Cæsar after his defeat of Pompey, and driving him out of Sicily. Here Paul touched as he went prisoner to Rome. Acts xxviii. 12, 14. It has been often plundered by the Turks, and injured by earthquakes. It is nevertheless still in a tolerable condition, and is the seat of an archbishop and of two colleges; but the inhabitants are not numerous, nor is their trade great. Their harbours are not good: being exposed to all winds, and proper only for small ships.

RHODA. See PERA.

RHODES; an island of the Mediterranean sea; about seventy-five miles east of Crete, and eight south of Caria and Lycia in Lesser Asia, and of about 120 miles in circumference. Some think it was peopled by Dodanim or Rodanum, the grandson of Japheth; but it was most probably peopled by the posterity of Shem, who dwelt on the adjacent continent, and received its name from the multitude of roses that grew on it. It is certain that the Rhodians were famous about the time of the Trojan war. Their most ancient cities were Lindus, Camirus, Jalyus, and Rhodes, which soon eclipsed all the rest, and is still a place of note. This island was famed for the fineness of the weather, for its excellent wines; and for the excellent laws relative to sea-trade, which furnished a rule to the sea-faring men of the adjacent parts; also for the birth of several excellent artists in painting, statuary-work, &c.; but for nothing so much as the famed Colossus, or image of Apollo, which was fixed on the mouth of their harbour at Rhodes, so that the ships sailed in between the legs of it. It was seventy cubits high, or, according to Sextus Empericus, eighty, and all its parts in proportion, few men being able to grasp its thumb. It was begun by Chares of Lindus, and was finished by Laches, and cost about 300 talents, and contained about 720,000 pounds' weight of brass. It was erected about A. M. 3716; and after standing sixty years, was thrown down by an earthquake. The Rhodians procured a contribution from the neighbouring nations, to restore it; but having got about five times the worth of it, they were too covetous to apply the money to any such use. Nobody, however, ventured to carry off the brass of the fallen statue, till about 894 years after, when Mauvias, the sixth Caliph of the Saracens, sold it to a Jew, who loaded 900 camels with it. After two different races of kings had governed the Rhodians, they introduced a republican form of government. After they had undergone a variety of changes, sometimes oppressed by the Carians or Greeks, and sometimes in great prosperity, being lords of Caria and Lycia on the continent, and courted by almost every state around, they at last fell a prey to the victorious arms of the Romans, about A. M. 3963, and about a hundred years after, Rhodes was made a part of the province of the islands. The Saracens seized it A. D. 654; but the Greeks afterwards retook it, and kept it till 1223, when it was taken by the Seljukian Turks. In 1308, the warlike knights of St. John of Jerusalem wrested it from them, and kept possession of it till 1522, when Solymán the Ottoman Turk, attacked them with 200,000 men, and 300 ships. After almost a year's siege of the city of Rhodes, and the loss of 90,000 of his troops, the knights, whose army was now reduced to 6000, were obliged to quit the island, and soon after settled in Malta. Most of the Rhodians deserted the place about the same time. The Turks therefore granted distinguished liberties and privileges to such Greeks as they could induce to reinhabit it. Paul touched here as he went to Jerusalem. A. D. 60. We find no vestige of Christianity till the fourth century, since which it has never been wholly exterminated. At present, the inhabitants are generally Greeks, who are poor and oppressed; but the Jews who fled from Spain are the principal inhabitants of the city and castle.

RIBS; the bones on the sides of many animals which form the protection of the heart and bowels. Eve's being formed of a rib taken out of Adam's side, imported the equality and strong affection that ought to subsist between husbands and wives. Gen. ii. 21, 22. The three kingdoms of Lydia, Babylon, and Egypt, conquered by Cyrus and his Medo-persian troops, are likened to three ribs in the mouth of a bear. Dan. vii. 5.

RIB'LAH; a city of Syria, in the land of Hamath. It was a most agreeable place. Here Pharaoh-necho, in his return from Carchemish, ordered Jehoahaz to meet him, and deprived him of his crown, giving it to Jehoiakim his brother. 2 Kings xxiii. 33, 34. Here Nebuchadnezzar spent his time while his generals besieged Jerusalem; and here he murdered Zedekiah's children and several of the Jewish princes, put out Zedekiah's eyes, and put him in chains. 2 Kings xxv. Jer. xxxix. 5. and lii. 9. Some think Riblah was the same as Antioch, or as Daphne in Syria; but as the scripture represents it as on the way between Carchemish and Jerusa-

Jerusalem, we can scarcely believe it was either of the two, but rather a city not far from Damascus, of which even the vestiges are now gone.

RICH, WEALTHY; (1.) Such as have great incomes, and plenty of worldly good things. 1 Tim. vi. 17. Jer. xlix. 34. (2.) Such as place their happiness and confidence in their outward prosperity. Matt. xix. 24. Luke vi. 24. (3.) Such as have plenty of spiritual gifts and graces, and are entitled to everlasting happiness. Jam. ii. 5. (4.) Such as in their own opinion abound with spiritual gifts and graces, though destitute of them. Rev. iii. 17. (5.) Wise and worthy men, largely furnished with excellent endowments. Eccl. x. 6. (6.) Precious, plentiful. Ezek. xxvii. 24. 1 Tim. vi. 18. God is rich, has all fulness in himself, and is very ready to bestow great and good things on sinful men. Rom. x. 12. Eph. ii. 4. Men are rich in themselves, not towards God, when they are full of self-conceit, but destitute of true spiritual excellency. Luke vi. 21. To make one's self rich, is to boast of wealth or valuable endowments; and to make one's self poor, is to have a humble view of our own gifts or property. Prov. xiii. 7. Canaan was a wealthy place, as the soil was good; and there the Hebrews got the riches, flocks, and herds of the Canaanites. Psal. lxxvi. 12.

RICHES, or WEALTH, denotes plenty, whether of outward good things, Gen. xxxvi. 7. Job xxi. 13. Eccl. v. 19; or of spiritual and eternal blessings, Luke xvi. 11; or the real welfare and advantage of either soul or body. 1 Cor. x. 24. The riches of God are his unbounded fulness of wisdom, power, mercy, grace, and glory, Eph. i. 7, 18, and ii. 7; or the effects of his power and goodness; all which pertain to him as their owner. Psal. civ. 24. The riches of Christ, are his unnumbered multitude of spiritual and eternal blessings fit to be bestowed on sinful men, Prov. viii. 15. Eph. i. 3; and the abundant ascriptions of the praise and glory thereof. Rev. v. 12. The riches of the glory of the gospel, are the wonderful mysteries revealed in it; and the infinite blessings it offers, which render it exceedingly glorious. Col. i. 27. The fall or diminishing of the Jews, their calamities and expulsion from the church of God, was the riches of the gentiles; occasioned their receiving the precious ordinances of the gospel, and many of them being admitted to the enriching state of fellowship with God. Rom. xi. 12.

RICHLY, plentifully, abundantly. Col. iii. 16.

RID; (1.) To deliver from danger. Gen. xxxvii. 22. (2.) To clear away, destroy. Lev. xxvii. 6.

RIDDANCE; an utter destruction or putting of things clean away. Zeph. i. 18.

RIDE, sometimes denotes honour and triumph. Isa. lvi. 14. When God or Christ are in metaphorical language, said to ride, it denotes their speedy and majestic appearance to protect and deliver his people, or destroy his enemies. Deut. xxxiii. 26. Psal. lxxviii. 4. and lxxviii. 10. Isa. xix. 1. Psal. xiv. 4.

RIFLE; to plunder, spoil. Zech. xiv. 2.

RIGHT, besides its signification relative to hand, side, &c. also signifies, (1.) Straight. Prov. ix. 15. (2.) Just and proper, opposite to wrong. Gen. xviii. 25; and so a right is either a just cause, Job xxxiv. 17. Psal. xvii. 1; or a just sentence, Job xxxvi. 6; or a just title to any thing, or privilege of it: and so they that do God's commandment have a right to enter by the gates into the city of the New Jerusalem; they have a meetness for it, manifesting their title to it. Rev. xxii. 14.

RIGHTEOUSNESS. See JUSTICE.

RIMMON, or REMMON; (1.) A city belonging to the Simeonites, and which was rebuilt after the captivity of Babylon. It seems to have stood about twenty-five miles south-west of Jerusalem. Josh. xix. 7. Neh. xi. 29. (2.) Remmon-methoar, a city of Zebulun given to the Levites. Josh. xix. 8. and 1 Chron. vi. 77. (3.) A steep rock near Gibeath, whither six hundred Benjamites fled when the rest of their tribe was destroyed. Judg. xx. 45. Perhaps it was under this rock, not under a pomegranate tree, that Saul stood. 1 Sam. xiv. 2. (4.) A principal idol of the Syrians worshipped at Damascus. The name signifies elevation; but whether that idol be the Elion or Most High of the Phenicians, or the Sun, or Saturn, or Juno, or Venus, is not agreed. Perhaps it was none of these, but Jupiter Cassius, who had a temple on the north-east of Egypt, and was figured with his hand stretched out. Probably he was Caphtor, the father of Caphtorim, whose name, as well as that of Rimmon, signifies, a pomegranate tree. 2 Kings v. 18.

RINGS were either for suspending curtains or other things from, or for ornaments for the hands, fingers, ears, &c. Judah, Pharaoh, the Midianites, and Hebrews, wore rings on their fingers, and sometimes they were finely engraved. Gen. xxxviii. 18. and xli. 42. Numb. xxxi. 50. Exod. xxviii. 11. Nay, idolatrous pictures and magical devices were sometimes engraved in them; hence Jacob hid the idolatrous ear-rings of those in his family. Gen. xxxv. 4. The Jewish women wore rings, not only on their fingers and in their ears, but in their nostrils.—Persons of dignity sealed their letters and decrees with their rings; and so, when Pharaoh conferred great authority on Joseph, he gave him his ring as an emblem of it. 1 Kings xxi. 8. Eath. iii. 10. Dan. vi. 17. Gen. xli. 42. The dreadful rings of the wheels in Ezekiel's vision, full of eyes, may denote the marvellous and wise revolutions of Divine Providence, and the majestic appearance of saints in the church, when filled with the knowledge of Christ. Ezek. i. 18. The rings on the finger of the returning prodigal son, may denote the everlasting love of God shed abroad in the heart, by which its passions are excited to good works; or the Spirit of God by which the saints are sealed to the day of redemption. Luke xv. 22. To be as the ring or signet on God's right hand, is to be very familiar with and dear to him. Jer. xxii. 24. Hag. ii. 23.

RINGLEADER; one who, as a captain of the vanguard, lead on the rest; one who, by his doctrine and example, stirs up others to any particular course. Acts xiv. 5.

RING-STRAKED; having spots on their legs where they used to be tied for the slaughter or for shearing. Gen. xxx. 35.

RINSE; to make clean by washing and rubbing. Lev. xv. 11.

RIOT, RIOTING; excessive and expensive feasting. 2 Pet. ii. 13. Rom. xiii. 13. RIOTOUS, intemperate, lascivious. Prov. xxviii. 7.

RIPE; ready to be cut down or plucked. The Antichristians and others are ripe for the sickle of God's judgments, when their sin universally abounds; they have long gone on in the most aggravated wickedness, and the patience of God can no longer bear with them. Rev. xiv. 18. Joel iii. 13.

RIPHATH, the second son of Gomer, and grandson of Japheth. His offspring, it is supposed, peopled Paphlagonia or Bithynia in Lesser Asia, where Meia the ancient geographer places a tribe called the Riphatai or Riphates. From this country, it is probable part of them removed northward, and gave name to and resided near the Rhiphaean mountains. Gen. x. 3.

RISE. See ARISE.

RITES; laws, customs, ceremonies. Numb. ix. 3.

RIVER; a current of fresh water flowing towards the sea in a hollow channel. The chief rivers of Asia are Euphrates, Tigris, Indus, Ganges, Kyang, Lena, Jenisea, and Ob. Those in the continent of Europe are Volga, Don, Nieper, Niester, Danube, Dwina, Duna, Weissel, Oder, Elbe, Weser, Rhine, Po, Tiber, Rhone, Seine, Loire, Garonne, Ebro, Tajo, Guadiana, Guadalquivir. Those of Africa, are the Nile, Senegal, Zaire, and Bravagal. Those of America are the River de la Plata, the river of the Amazons, the Mississippi, and St. Lawrence. The chief rivers of Britain are the Severn, Thames, Humber, Tyne, Esk, Clyde, Tweed, Forth, Tay, Spey, and Nesse. The rivers mentioned in scripture, are Nile in Egypt, Jordan, Kishon, Jabok and Arnon in Canaan. The waters of Nephtoh and Etam ought rather to be ranked among the brooks. In Syria, we read of the Abana and Parphar. In Chaldaea and thereabouts, we find Euphrates, Hiddekel, Gihon, Pison, Cheber, Ahavah, Ulai. The Euphrates and Nile are sometimes called the river, by way of eminence. Ezra iv. 10, 16. Psal. lxxx. 11. Isa. xix. 5. The Red sea, and perhaps also the Mediterranean is called a river. Psal. lxxiv. 15. Hab. iii. 8. Isa. xxiii. 3. From the river to the ends of the earth, is from the Euphrates to the shore of the Mediterranean sea; or it may import, that the Christian church should for many ages exist, between the Euphrates on the east, and the west of Spain. Psal. lxxii. 8. Zech. ix. 10. God is likened to broad rivers; how large and abundant the refreshing influences he bestows on his people! and how full his protection of them! Isa. xxxiii. 21. Christ is likened to rivers of water in a dry place; how plentiful, free, and constant the cleansing and refreshing influences of his blood and Spirit! Isa. xxxii. 2. The gospel, its ordinances and blessings, the Holy Ghost and his influences, and the joys of the heavenly state, are likened to a river, to denote their plenty, purity, perpetuity, purifying, and defensive influences. Ezek. xlvii. 5, 9. John vii. 38. Joel iii. 18. Psal. xlv. 4. and John xvi. 11. God shakes his hand over the river, he smites its streams, and dries up rivers, when he easily and effectually removes every difficulty that like an interposing river, lies in the way of the execution of his purpose, and the salvation and deliverance of his people. Isa. xi. 15. and xlv. 27. The rivers and fountains of the Antichristian state may denote their doctors and the defences of their cause, which tend to the support and increase of it, or the well-watered countries of northern Italy and Switzerland. Rev. xvi. 4. To pass through the land as a river, is to flee off as speedily as possible in multitudes, not to return. Isa. xxiii. 10. Pharaoh's river made by him, may denote his power and wealth. Ezek. xxix. 3. Whatever is very plentiful, is likened to a river, as plenty of tears, of peace, of oil, or of pleasure. 2 Sam. ii. 18. Isa. xlviii. 18. Job xxix. 6. Psal. xvi. 11. Behemoth's large draught of water is called a river, Job xi. 23; and plentiful rain is called the river of God. Psal. xlv. 9. Rivers of living water flow out of the saints' bellies, when their inward fullness of spiritual grace appears in the multitude of their good works. John vii. 38.

RIZPAH. See SAUL.

ROAR; to make a hideous noise, as the raging sea, or angry lions. God's roaring imports the fearful displays of his will, his power, and wrath. Jer. xxv. 30. Joel iii. 16. Amos i. 2. Satan's roaring denotes the terrible nature of his temptations. 1 Pet. v. 8. Men's roaring is expressive of their outrageous or mournful outcries. Jer. i. 24. Job iii. 24.

ROB; to take away what belongs to another by force. Lev. xix. 13. Men rob God, when they withhold his due tithes, offerings, or worship. Mal. iii. 8, 9. Paul's robbing of other churches, was his receiving supplies from them to maintain him while preaching the gospel at Corinth. 2 Cor. xi. 26.

ROBBERS; such as by force take away what belongs to others, Job xii. 6; or unjust invaders of a country; as the Assyrians and Chaldeans were of Canaan, Isa. xlii. 24; or persons ambitious of stations not belonging to them, and ready to oppress their neighbours, Dan. xi. 14; or false teachers, who attempt to rob God of his honour, Christ of his office, and men of their happiness and outward wealth. John x.

ROBBERY; (1.) The violent taking away of our neighbour's goods. Prov. xxi. 7. (2.) Whatever is procured by violence and injustice. Isa. lxi. 8. Christ thought it no robbery to be equal with God; he claimed equal honours with the Father as his proper due. Phil. ii. 6.

ROBE. See CLOTHES.

ROCKS; large masses of stone connected together either above or below the surface of the ground. Rocks standing out above the surface of the earth were very common in Canaan, and many of them were a shelter for the inhabitants in time of danger. In scripture, we find mentioned the rocks of Lebanon and Hermon in the north, and the rocks of the hills by the river Arnon on the east, Jer. xvii. 14. Numb. xxiii. 2; Oreb, near Mount Tabor. Judg. vii. 25; and Zoheleth, Bozez, Seneh, and Rimmon, in the tribe of Benjamin; and the rocks of Engedi, Adullam, Selah-hammalekoth, and Etam, in the tribe of Judah; of the rock Joktheel in the land of Edom; and indeed the whole country abounded with rocks; as did Arabia the Rocky; though we read in scripture of no more there but the rock of Horeb, and of Meribah in Rephidim, and of Kadesh. From these two last, God supplied the Hebrews with water most of the time they were in the desert. According to Thevenot, Shaw, Pocock, and other travellers of credit, the rock of Meribah in Rephidim seems to have been a cleft fallen off from the side of Sinai, and lies like a large loose stone in the midst of the valley. It is of red granite, of the hardness of flint; and, is, according to Shaw, about six yards square; though Pocock says, it is fifteen feet long, twelve high, and ten broad; and there are twelve openings in it, may Pocock says twelve on every side; from hence the water issued out during the thirty-nine years' journeyings of the Hebrews, and the stone is worn where the water flowed down.

Did this rock signify Jesus, who was as a root out of a dry ground, but was the firm and unchangeable God and Mediator of his people; and being smitten by Moses' rod, his fiery law, till he gave up the ghost, does through the doctrines of his twelve apostles, convey refreshing blessings to his church, in every age and period of her wandering and eternal state? Exod. xvii. The rock of Kadesh, called also Meribah, was not to be smitten, but spoken to, that it might yield water; so, in the millennium, Jesus must not be crucified afresh, but only preached to men, that his blessings may flow out upon them. Numb. xx. 1—13.

God is called a rock, and a rock of ages; he is a high, firm, never-failing foundation, hiding-place, and source of blessings to his people. Psal. xviii. 2. Isa. xxvi. 4. Jesus Christ is the rock on which his church and people are built; he alone bears their weight and all their concerns; he is their refuge, their occasion of wide prospects in divine things, and the source of all-purifying and refreshing influence to them. Isa. xxxii. 2. Matt. vii. 25. As rocks are barren and unfruitful places, Job xxix. 6. Psal. xviii. 16; hard-hearted sinners, unfruitful in good works, are compared to rocks. Luke viii. 13. As rock denotes a quarry out of which stones are digged, Abraham and Sarah, who were once likely to have no children, are likened to a rock and pit. Isa. li. 1.

ROD; STAFF: SCEPTRE; (1.) A rod, in its original signification, is a twig, or small branch of a tree; and Jesus Christ is called a Rod or BRANCH, Isa. xi. 1: and so the word shebet, which we sometimes render rod, Gen. xxx. 27. is also used for tribes; because they grow as branches from a common root. And the two sticks of Judah and Ephraim becoming one, denotes the junction of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which were one kingdom, with those of Ephraim and his fellows, which formed another.

Ezek. xxxvii. 15—22. (2.) In the hand of one walking, it signifies a STAFF, to support and assist on a journey. With these the heathen of old used to divine what course they should follow, Hos. iv. 12; and in allusion to this, food that supports men in life and action is called a staff and stay. Isa. iii. 1. The Egyptians were a staff of reed to the house of Israel, i. e. an ally on which they depended, but which always failed them in a time of need. Ezek. xxxix. 6. (3.) In the hand of a shepherd, it signifies his crook by which he directs and lays hold of such of his flock as he pleases. Lev. xxvii. 32. Christ's staves of beauty and bands, which he cut asunder with respect to the Jews, were his peculiar concern with them as their Shepherd, and their brotherly connection amongst themselves, which had been their glory and support; and which being dissolved, they not only lost their church-state, but fell into such furious contentions as hastened their ruin. Zech. xi. 10—14. (4.) In the hand of a surveyor, it signifies his measure for meting fields; and so the thing measured is called the rod; thus the Jewish nation is called the rod of God's inheritance, as it was set apart to be his peculiar property. Psal. lxxxiv. 2. The word may also be rendered TRIBE. Jer. x. 16. (5.) In the hand of a thrasher, it denotes a flail, or thrashing staff. Isa. xxvii. 21. In allusion to this, in the hand of an offended person, it signifies an instrument to beat, correct, or punish the offender. Prov. xxiii. 13. In allusion to this correction, church-censures and punishment are called a rod. Mic. vi. 9. and vii. 14. 1 Cor. iv. 21. Prov. xxix. 15. God's chastisements of his people are called the rod of men; as they are indited with the kindness and compassion of a father. 2 Sam. vii. 14. (6.) In the hand of a warrior, it signifies the trancheon, the staff of his spear, or his walking staff. 2 Sam. xxiv. 21. (7.) In the hand of a ruler, it is a sceptre, or badge of authority, to direct, govern, chastise, and reward. Eath. viii. 4; and hence it is put for power and authority, Isa. xiv. 5; and also for the rulers themselves; so where we have SUBST in one place, we have JUDGES in the parallel place. Compare 2 Sam. vii. 7. 1 Chron. xvii. 6. The princes of Judah are called rods, because with authority they ruled and corrected others. Ezek. xix. 14.

The rod of Christ's strength sent out of Zion, is the gospel, attended with miraculous and saving influences, for the conversion of multitudes, and the support and direction of saints. Psal. cx. 2. It is a sceptre of righteousness, by which the righteousness of God's nature and law is glorified to the highest: Christ's righteousness is brought near, offered, and applied to us; and by which we are effectually made righteous in all manner of conversation. This sceptre may also denote our Lord's righteous execution of his whole office. Psal. xiv. 6. God's rod and staff that comfort his people, are his gospel-truths, and his supporting influence, by which he preserves and draws them to himself. Psal. xxiii. 4. Christ's rod of iron, with which he rules the nations, is his absolute authority over them, and his righteous judgments executed upon them, particularly in the overthrow of the Jewish nation, the ruin of heathenism in the Roman empire, and of Antichrist and Mahomet. Psal. ii. 9. Rev. xix. 15. The saints, by their prayers and otherwise, have a share in ruling the nations with this rod of iron. Rev. ii. 27. The Assyrians, and their conquests, are called the rod of God's anger, and a staff in his hand; and they corrected with a rod: afflicted, but could not destroy the Jews. Isa. ix. 4. x. 5, 15. and xxx. 32. Nebuchadnezzar and his army are called the blossoming rod, and rod of wickedness; they prospered in their conquests, but were very wicked; by them God punished the increasing pride and growing violence of the Jews. Ezek. vii. 10, 11. The kingdom of Moab is likened to a strong staff and beautiful rod, for their strong and beautiful appearance, their ruling over others, and being instruments of God's wrath against them. God broke this rod, and the staff of the wicked, when he ruined the authority and power of the Moabites and Chaldeans. Jer. xlviii. 17. Isa. xiv. 5. The contemned rod of God's Son, may signify the royal family of Judah, and their authority over his peculiar people, which were contemned by the Chaldeans, and depressed by the calamities which they inflicted. Ezek. xxi. 10, 13. The rod of the wicked, is their authority, power, and oppressive usage of others. Psal. cxv. 3. The rod of pride in the mouth of the foolish, is proud, passionate language, which wounds the soul, credit, health, or property of themselves and others. Prov. xiv. 3. The grounded staff, denotes the appointed judgments of God, inflicted on the Jews or Assyrians. Isa. xxx. 32. See SHILOH.

ROE; ROEBUCK. See DEER.

ROLL. One rolls himself on the Lord, when he depends on him for direction. Psal. xxxvii. 5. The Chaldeans were rolled down from the rocks, when driven out of their strong and lofty city, perhaps some of them thrown over the walls, and deprived of all means of shelter, by the Persians. Jer. li. 25. Nations are like a rolling thing before the whirlwind, when tossed to and fro with the judgments of God. Isa. xlvii. 13.

ROLL; a piece of paper for folding up. Anciently, before the binding of books was invented, all writings were in rolls of paper; and the Jews in their synagogues still read the scriptures out of copies in loose sheets, that are rolled upon a staff. The roll in Ezekiel and Zechariah's vision, is represented as containing denunciations of heavy judgments against wicked men. Ezek. ii. Zech. v. The roll, or VOLUME of the book, as it relates to David, may signify some written vow of his, wherein he had solemnly devoted himself to the service of God. As it relates to Jesus Christ, it may denote the purpose of God, by which every thing relative to his mediation was settled, or the scriptures which testify of him, and almost from the very beginning intimated that he should bruise the serpent's head, and have his heel bruised. Psal. xl. 7. Gen. iii. 15.

ROME, the most noted city of Italy, and long the mistress of the world, was built by the Etrurians, and enlarged by Romulus, and a number of little else than banditti under his direction, about A.M. 5254. It gradually increased, till it extended over seven hills; and at last it took in thirteen. The river Tiber, which runs through it, when swelled with rain, and blown back by the south-west wind, often did it a great deal of mischief; but was of great use on ordinary occasions, to afford water to the city, and to carry off the filth which was conveyed to it by canals under ground. Its walls never seem to have been above thirteen miles in circumference; and if deductions be made for their various windings, they will be found much less: but the country around was formed into a vast extent of suburbs. To mention the diversified fate of this city, its burnings, and pillage by the Gauls, and by the Goths, Vandals, Heruli, Greeks, &c.; and the various massacres, famines, and pestilences, which have happened in it, would be improper in this work. In the time of Romulus, it contained about 3000 inhabitants; in the time of Augustus, they were about two millions, which is more than all Scotland contains at present. At present they scarcely amount to 800,600; and no more than about the third part of what is within the walls is inhabited. It is now noted for its ancient ruins, and for St. Peter's church, which was one hundred years in building, and the Vatican, or winter-palace of the pope, which consists of about 12,500 chambers, halls, and closets, and has a famous library, garden, and arsenal. Its hospitals are under excellent regulations; but the morals of the inhabitants are licentious to an awful degree.

The ancient Romans were noted idolaters, making gods and goddesses of almost every thing. There was but little philosophy among them till they conquered the Greeks. It seems too, that for some ages, chastity and honesty were in repute among them; but as their power increased, they decreased in every thing virtuous, and refrained from nothing villanous or wanton. Rom. i. 21—32. They were first governed by seven kings, for about two hundred and twenty years. During the next four hundred and eighty-eight years, they were governed by consuls, tribunes, decemvirs, and dictators, in their turns. They were afterward governed by sixty-five emperors, for the space of five hundred and eighteen years. Their power gradually increased, till they first subdued a great part of Italy; afterwards, partly by force, and partly by villany, made themselves masters of all the countries from the north parts of Britain to the south borders of Egypt, and from the western parts of Persia to the western coasts of Spain. Thus their empire extended about 2660 miles from north to south, and about as much from east to west. Their wars with the Carthaginians, Spaniard, Gauls, Greeks, Mithridates of Pontus, Parthians, and Jews, were the most noted. They had scarcely extended their powers so far and wide, when their leading men, Marius, Sylla, Pompey, Julius Cæsar, &c. by their civil contentions, and massacres of each other's adherents were likely to ruin the empire. Julius Cæsar, by terrible bloodshed, got himself the sovereign power; but, long after, the senate retained some faint shadow of authority. His ambitious overthrow of the commonwealth form of government, soon cost him his life; and Cassius and Brutus afterwards made a most vigorous attempt to restore the freedom of the empire; but they perished in the attempt. The long, prosperous, and mild government of Augustus, made the Romans give up almost all their care about their ancient liberty. Most of his successors in the empire were monsters of pride, cruelty, and almost every other vice. This, together with the civil contentions occasioned by pumbers who endeavoured to seize on the supreme power; with the terrible ravages of the Goths, Vandals, Huns, Heruli, &c. and the divisions of the empire into different parts, the eastern and western, gradually wasted it, till it was entirely ruined.

About A. D. 46, a famine of seven years' continuance terribly distressed the empire, and, not long after, a multitude of earthquakes happened. The persecution of the Christians, the butchery of their subjects by Nero and Domitian, and the terrible wars with the Jews, cut off prodigious numbers of the Romans. The Jews were subdued; but the vengeance of Heaven still pursued the Roman persecutors. Even under the two Severus's, terrible famines devastated the empire. The next period under the fourth seal, was unspeakably worse. In fifty years, above twenty emperors were mostly cut off in a miserable manner, and thirty other usurpers came to a wretched end, after making no small disturbance in the empire. While the Parthians, or Persians, invaded Syria, and places adjacent, the Goths, Quadi, Sarmatæ, Suevi, and Vandals, terribly ravaged almost the whole empire; few cities, and scarce an unwall'd town, was left unpillaged. Famines attended the carnage of war. A pestilence too, of fifteen years' continuance, gradually depopulated the whole empire. Dogs, wolves, and other wild beasts, were so accustomed to eat unburied corpses, that they began to enter the towns, and devour the living. In the beginning of the fourth century, after Dioclesian's ten years' persecution of the Christians, Constantine the Great, after much bloodshed, overturned Heathenism, about A. D. 323; the emperors and their idolatrous priests were killed; the worship of the sun, moon, stars, and other idola, was prohibited. For a short space the Roman empire enjoyed a gleam of prosperity; but Constantine had scarcely removed the seat of government to Constantinople, and at his death divided the empire among his three sons, Constantine, Constantius, and Constans, than the intestine rebellions of Maxentius and Sylvanus, who struggled for the crown, with the ravages of the Persians and Armenians in the East, of the Alemans in Europe, and of the Scots and Picts in Britain, miserably distracted it. The eastern and western empires were sometimes united under the same sovereign; and Theodosius the Great almost restored it to its ancient honour; but on his death, A. D. 395, the Goths under Rhodagasius, and those under Alaric, in their turn, terribly harassed it; seized on France and Spain; and about a third part of the people were murdered by them. Italy was ravaged twice; Rome was besieged, and some years after, in 410, was taken and burnt. About the same time, other Goths, with the Alans, Burgundians, and Vandals, spread havoc and ruin in France and Spain. At last Attila, who called himself the scourge of God, with his savage Huns, for fourteen years, overrun Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, France, and part of Italy, destroying with fire and sword wherever they came. The emperor Valentinian III. had scarcely diverted them by a promise of tribute, when he was murdered. His empress Eudoxa invited the Vandals from Africa, to avenge his murder. After ravaging Sicily and Italy, and taking and pillaging Rome, they, under Genseric their king, returned home laden with booty, and with multitudes of slaves, A. D. 455. After the western empire had languished out twenty-one years more, under eight turbulent reigns, Odoacer, afterwards king of the Heruli, and other Barbarians, deposed Augustulus, and translated the government to Ravenna, another city of Italy. His government had continued only sixteen years, when it was abolished by Theodoric the king of the Goths. Their royal government continued at Rome about sixty years, when Justinian, the emperor of the East, recovered part of Italy, and abolished the Roman senate. By this time, the Romans in the western empire joined the ancient Goths, and the various tribes of Barbarians, who had poured in themselves from the East, and were divided into ten sovereignties or states. [See HORN.] The eastern part of the Roman empire, whose emperors resided at Constantinople, notwithstanding of hard struggles with the Persians, Saracens, and Turks, &c. continued till about the middle of the fifteenth century, when it was seized by the Ottoman Turks. About the end of the eighth century, when the pope had got himself made a civil prince, a shadow of the Roman empire was erected in Germany, by which the deadly wound given to that of Rome, seemed to be healed. This will probably continue till the beginning of the millennium, when the kingdom of Jesus shall fill the whole earth. Gen. ix. 27. Zech. vi. 1-7. Dan. ii. 33, 34, 40-44. and vii. 7, 8, 19-27. and xi. 30-35, 40. Acts xi. 28. Rev. vi. viii. xii. and xiii. 3.

A Christian church was very early planted at Rome; to which Paul wrote an excellent epistle. After assuring them of his regard for them, he describes the deplorably corrupt state of all men by nature, whether gentiles or Jews; and the impossibility of justification before God by works of our own; he shews, that as in Adam we are all counted sinners, so in Jesus Christ, we are first in order rendered righteous in justification, and then made holy in sanctification. After rehearsing several of the happy fruits of our union with Christ, such as freedom from the law, and from the power of sin, adoption into the family of God, possession of his indwelling Spirit, assurance of his love, perpetual care of his providence, and endless enjoyment of his presence, he treats of the purpose of election, and of God's sovereignty, in rejecting the Jews, and calling the gentiles to a state of church-membership; and foretels the happy state of both Jews and gentiles in the happy millennium. Chap. i—xi. In the last part, he applies his subject, exhorting to a variety of duties towards God, towards each other, towards magistrates, weak brethren, and ministers, and concludes with several salutations, and a warning against schism. Chaps. xii—xvi. A Christian church, real or pretended, has still continued at Rome. According to the lists we have, there have been about two hundred and thirty bishops or popes at Rome. Among the first sixty five, I find nothing remarkably good, none of them remarkable in learning, nor excelling their fellows in piety; though, no doubt, many of the primitive ones were holy men: and it is as certain many of them were ambitious wretches, who studied to exalt themselves to a lordship over their brethren. Of the last one hundred and sixty five, I find not one giving any tolerable evidence of the grace of God in him; but all of them pretenders to headship over the Christian church; and many of them noted for falsehood, perjury, murder, whoredom, magic, and almost every thing horrid. There have been also about thirty five antipopes, and these much of the same temper and practice with their rivals. See ANTICHRIST, and CHURCH. While the Romans governed a great part of the world, they, either for money, or good deeds, or of free favour, conferred the right of citizens on such as were not of their nation, and even sometimes on the inhabitants of a whole city. In this sense, Paul and Silas were Romans, having a legal title to all the privileges of the citizens of Rome, or her colonies. Acts xxi. 37, 38. and xxii. 25—27.

ROOF; (1.) The covering of a house. The Jews had theirs flat, for walking on, or even erecting booths on, Neh. viii. 17; and a battlement, breast high, around, to prevent any body falling from them. As this rendered them private places, they often performed their devotions on them, and burnt incense to idols, particularly the queen, or frame of the heavens. Deut. xxii. 8. Acts x. 9. Jer. xix. 14. and xxxii. 29. (2.) The upper part of the mouth, which is an instrument of speaking and tasting. The roof of the church's mouth is like the best wine; the gospel-ministrations of pastors, and the holy prayers, praises, and converse of saints, are precious, refreshing, and quickening. Sol. Song vii. 9.

ROOM; (1.) A place. Gen. xxiv. 23. (2.) The stead, or office. 2 Sam. xix. 13. (3.) A state of liberty and comfort. Psal. xxxi. 8. (4.) Chamber, apartments. As upper rooms were most retired, strangers at the passover and other solemn feasts had the upper rooms allotted for their lodging, Mark xiv. 15: and here the disciples attended their devotions. Acts i. 13. (5.) A seat, Luke xiv. 8. Notwithstanding multitudes coming to Christ, there is always room; abundant station in his love, his covenant, and his righteousness, for their spiritual and eternal happiness. Luke xiv. 32.

ROOT; (1.) That part of a plant which is fastened in the earth. Job xiv. 8. (2.) A foundation which establishes what is built on it. Job xxviii. 9. (3.) That from which any thing proceeds: so the love of money is the root or cause of all evil. 1 Tim. vi. 10. A wicked person, or vile error, is a root of bitterness, which secretly infects and corrupts others with the poison of sin. Deut. xxix. 18. Christ is called the Root of Jesse, or David, as he is the author of their being, and immutably establishes the glory of their family. Isa. xi. 10. Rev. v. 5. and xxii. 16. If the root be holy, so are the branches; if the ancient patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the parents of the Hebrews, were in covenant with God, their children must be consecrated to his service, and not cast off for ever. Rom. xi. 16. The root of nations goes up as rottenness, and their blossoms as dust, and they have neither root nor branch left, when there is an utter destruction both of parents and children, Isa. v. 24. Mal. i. 4. To be rooted and grounded in Christ, is to be firmly united to him, and well established in the faith and experience of his truth. Col. ii. 7. The root of the matter is in one, when he has a real habit or principle of grace, and a firm belief of the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, from which the fruit of good works proceeds. Job xix. 21. To take root, spread out the roots, or to have the root by great waters, is to become seemingly fixed in great prosperity. 2 Kings xix. 30. Job xxix. 19. Ezek. xxxi. 7. The roots of hypocrites are wrapped about the heap, and he seeth the place of stones; his condition is seemingly established, and though he has no proper root of grace, he expects a high raised happiness. Job viii. 17. The royal family of Judah had their roots under the king of Egypt, and towards the king of Babylon; by submission to Pharaoh-necho, Jehoiakim obtained the kingdom, and by solemn engagement of subjection, Zedekiah got the crown from Nebuchadnezzar. Ezek. xvii. 6, 7. To be rooted out, plucked up by the roots, or to have the roots dried, or killed with famine, is to meet with fearful destruction, that ruins the principal men, and overturns the constitution of the state. Deut. xxix. 28. Hos. ix. 6. Isa. xiv. 30.

ROPES, on the head, were expressive of great distress, and earnest begging of compassion. 1 Kings xx. 31, 32.

ROSE; the name of a well-known flower, and the tree that bears it. Rose-bushes thrive best in a rich, moist, open soil; for, when the soil is dry, and the situation shadowed, the flowers are less beautiful. Tournefort mentions fifty-three kinds of roses, of which the damask rose, and the rose of Sharon, are among the finest. The essence of damask roses is an excellent perfume. Roses in general are delightful to view, agreeable in their smell, and useful in medicine, for curing consumptive disorders, &c. Jesus Christ is called the Rose of Sharon; how unbounded his comeliness, delightfulness, and efficacy, for the healing of our souls! Sol. Song ii. 1. The wilderness blossoms as the rose; through the preaching of the gospel, the gentile world shall be converted to Christ, and flourish with saints and graces. Isa. xxxv. 1.

ROAST. The slothful man roasteth not what he took in hunting; he does not live, nor get pleasure in, what he acquires by his diligence; but what is ill gotten, is unhappily spent. Prov. xii. 27.

ROT. The name of the wicked rots; is forgotten, and becomes infamous. Prov. x. 7. God was as rotteness to the house of Judah, gradually wasting their numbers, glory, and strength, and rendering them contemptible. Hos. v. 12. A bad wife is rotteness to her husband: she gradually wastes his reputation, usefulness, and wealth, and is a means of hastening his death. Prov. xii. 4. Envy is the rotteness of the bones; as it weakens the faculties of the soul, wastes the natural constitution, and increases spiritual, and hastens a natural death. Prov. xiv. 30.

ROVERS; plundering robbers, or wandering ravagers; so the Amalekites who burnt Ziklag, are called by our translators. 1 Chron. xii. 21.

ROUGH places are such as are uneven, uncultivated, abounding with briars and thorns. Dent. xxi. 4. By John Baptist's ministry, rough places were made plain, and rough ways smooth; people, even the very worst, were prepared to regard the person, miracles, and doctrine of Christ. Isa. xl. 4. Luke iii. 5. A rough wind, is one strong and boisterous, and is an emblem of heavy and irresistible calamities. Isa. xxvii. 8. Rough caterpillars, goats, garments, are such as are hairy and shaggy. Jer. li. 27. Dan. viii. 21. Zech. xiii. 4.

ROUSE; to stir up from sleep or rest. Gen. xlix. 9.

ROW; to push forward a ship with oars. Mark vi. 48. Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters; thy rulers have, by their pride and folly plunged thee into great difficulties, and thine enemies have driven thee to the very point of utter destruction; as the Tyrians were by the Chaldean siege, when obliged to desert their city, and build another in the adjacent island. Ezek. xxvii. 26.

ROYAL; kingly. The royal city, is that where the king dwells. Josh. x. 2. Royal dainties, are provision fit for the table of a king. Gen. xlix. 20. The law of God is called royal, because it is the authoritative will of the King of kings. Jam. ii. 8. And the saints are a royal priesthood; are at once kings and priests unto God. 1 Pet. ii. 9.

RUBY; a precious stone, of a red colour, mixed with purple. In its most perfect state, it is a jewel of great value, and in hardness is second only to the diamond. Its usual size is of the bigness of the head of a large pin, but is found from that size to forty carats. The price of Jesus Christ and his grace, is infinitely superior in value to rubies. Job xxviii. 18. But the original word PERINIM, is thought by some to signify pearls.

RUDDER; a piece of timber hung on the stern posts of a ship by four or five hinges, to bridle her motion, and turn her to what side the steersman pleases, by means of the position of it in the water. That piece of timber in the inside of the ship to which the rudder is fastened, is called the helm, or tiller, and sometimes the rudder. The ancient rudders had four parts: the clavus or helm, whereby the whole was directed; the pole, the wings, and the handle; and oftentimes they had two, and sometimes three or four rudders to one ship; and they, at least sometimes, fastened their rudders to the ship with cords. Acts xxvii. 40.

RUDDY, or REDDISH. See WHITE.

RUDE. It is hardly probable that Paul had any thing awkward in his manner of speech; but he hints that he was indifferent suppose the Corinthians reckoned him thus defective. 2 Cor. xi. 6.

RUDIMENTS. See ELEMENTS.

RUE; a plant that bears a rosy flower, and which when dried, is much used in medicinal infusions, being esteemed an excellent expeller of poison or pestilential influence in fevers, and cephalic cure for disorders of the head. Luke xi. 42.

RUIN; destruction, or the means of it. Isa. xxv. 3. 2 Chron. xxviii. 23. Let this ruin be under thine hand; take thou care of this disordered and perishing state. Isa. iii. 6.

RULE, (1.) Government; dominion. 1 Kings xxii. 31. (2.) A standard for directing actions by: thus the word of God is our rule, to direct us how to glorify God, and enjoy him. Gal. vi. 16. (3.) A boundary or measure which one cannot rightly go beyond. 2 Cor. x. 13.

RULE, GOVERN, to direct and order by the authority. Dan. iv. 26. 1 Kings xxi. 7. God governs the nations, by managing them, and causing them to act, prosper, or suffer at his pleasure. Psal. lxxv. 4. Christ is a governor, and has the government on his shoulder; he is the great ruler of his church, who appoints her laws and ordinances, and sets up offices and officers, and dispenses favours or corrections as he sees meet. Isa. ix. 6, 7. Jer. xxx. 21. Satan and his agents are rulers of the darkness of this world; reign over, and direct wicked and ignorant men in their wicked works of darkness. Eph. vi. 12. Judah ruled with God, when Hezekiah and his princes zealously promoted the reformation of the kingdom. Hos. xi. 12. Men rule their own spirit, when they restrain their passions and lusts, and direct the motions of their souls by the rule of God's law. Prov. xvi. 32.

As the Jews had their rulers civil and sacred, so under the New Testament there is still a civil and ecclesiastical government; the former of which is of God, as to the general plan; but the particular form, whether of kingdom or commonwealth, or mixed of both, as in Britain, is left to the discretion of men; and so is called an ordinance, or creature of man. 1 Pet. ii. 13. The duty of civil magistrates to their subjects, is to establish good laws, and see to the execution thereof, Zech. viii. 16. 2 Chron. ix; to govern them wisely and justly, 2 Chron. i. 10; to punish evil doers, and encourage them that do well, Rom. xiii. 3; to protect them from enemies, and preserve to them their various rights and privileges. 1 Tim. ii. 2. Prov. xxviii. 16. As the true religion tends at once to the honour of God and the welfare of nations, they are by their laws and example to exert themselves to the utmost to promote the same. By the exercise of the civil power in favour of the church, they are to prevent or abolish persecution, profaneness, idolatry, superstition, or heresy, and remove all occasions thereof; and to maintain for her, the whole of her spiritual privileges granted her by Christ; and to promote the public administration of, and attendance to every ordinance of Christ; and to punish every gross violation of the divine law, unto death, banishment, imprisonment, and confiscation of goods, &c. Isa. xlix. 23. and lx. 10, 16. Rom. xiii. 3, 4. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. Exod. xxxii. Josh. xxiv. 2 Chron. xv. and xvii. and xix. 23. and xxix. —xxxv. Ezra x. Neh. v. xiii. Ezra vii. 26, &c.

Some have pretended that magistrates have no concern with religion at all, and especially with revealed religion, in the execution of their office, but ought to leave every man to profess, teach, or worship what and in what manner he pleases, provided he does not disturb the commonwealth by any civil crimes, and ought to protect them in their full liberty to propagate their blasphemous tenets or idolatrous worship. Some have even pretended that civil establishments of the true religion are calculated to render men irreligious, or at best hypocritical dissemblers. But when we consider that all things ought to be done to the glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31. 1 Pet. iv. 11. Prov. xvi. 4; that magistracy is an ordinance of God, and magistrates, ministers, or deputies of God, for good to men, appointed to be a terror to evil doers, and a praise of them that do well, Rom. xiii. 1—5. 1 Pet. ii. 14. with Gal. v. 19—21. Phil. iii. 2. Tit. i. 10, 11; that every head of family has power to exclude superstition and idolatry from it, and to establish in it the true worship of God, and refuse lodging to heretical seducers, Gen. xviii. 19. Josh. xxiv. 15; that magistrates ought to exercise their power as is most conducive to make all their subjects live quietly in all godliness, as well as honesty, 1 Tim. ii. 1—3; that magistrates are often expressly commanded to punish obstinate idolaters, false prophets, blasphemers, profaners of the Sabbath, &c. as well as thieves, robbers, murderers, Deut. xiii. 5—7. and xvii. 2—5. Lev. xxiv. 15, 16. Exod. xxii. 18, 20. Numb. xv. 35; that magistrates, not only Jewish, but heathen, have, with God's approbation, required their subjects to worship the true God, and have suppressed and punished obstinate idolaters, or blasphemers, Gen. xviii. 19. and xxxv. 2—4. Exod. xxxii. 20, 27. Josh. xxiv. 14. 2 Chron. xiv. 2—5. and xv. 13. xviii—xx. xxix—xxxi. and xxxiii. 15, 16. and xxxiv. 31—33. 2 Kings x. 30. Ezra vii. 13—26. and vi. 1—14. Dan. iii. 29. and vi. 27; that the fourth commandment, of which the obligation is perpetual and universal, binds magistrates to provide that the Sabbath be sanctified in all their gates, which cannot be done by the teaching of blasphemy, or practising idolatrous worship, that the exercise of the magistrates' power in favour of the true religion, and opposition to false religion, is promised as a blessing to the New Testament church; Isa. xlix. 23. and lx. 10, 16. Psal. lxxii. 10. and li. 12. Zech. xiii. 2. Rev. xvii. 14, 16; that magistrates have power to appoint Christians to observe public fasts or thanksgivings, when the state of the nation requires it. 1 Sam. vii. 5, 6. 2 Chron. xx. 3. Ezra viii. 21. Neh. ix. 1. Jer. xxxvi. 9. John iii. 7; and that the very law of nature requires that magistrates chiefly care for the honour of God, who is the sovereign head of civil societies, as King over all the earth, and the source and bestower of all their happiness and that men should be governed, as having immortal souls, not as mere animals; that as righteousness exalts nations, sin, even idolatry and blasphemy, is the reproach and ruin of any people; that sins are especially hurtful to nations, as they tend to debauch men's manners, and provoke God to wrath against the nation; that if God grant men the benefit of any duly attested revelation, it should be readily received as the rule of our conduct, be our station what it will. It is plain that magistrates can never lawfully exercise their power which they, as his deputies received from God, for his honour and the true welfare of mankind, in giving equal establishment and protection to the religion of the devil, as they may to the religion of Jesus Christ, by whom kings reign, and princes decree justice. Prov. viii. 15, 16.

The whole of the objections against what we have just asserted, are rather specious declamation, than solid reasoning. To pretend that civil laws can bind but in so far as dependent on, and regulated by the authority and law of God; to pretend that magistrates ought, or may punish crimes only as injurious to men, without any way regarding their offensiveness or injuriousness to God;—to pretend that conscience, which derives all its authority from God, can warrant men either to do or establish what is sinful, or protect them in it;—to pretend that men's civil liberty, which is all derived to them from God, as his free gift, can protect them in blasphemy or idolatry any more than in theft or murder, proceeds plainly upon atheistical principles; to pretend that such as enjoy the benefit of revelation, should not make use of it for regulating the laws of their nation, or the administration of civil offices, is plainly a contempt of revelation, and obstinate drawing back to heathenism. To pretend that the Jewish church and state were not distinct is false, and has been repeatedly refuted by Leusden, Gillespy, Apoloni, and others. To pretend that the Jewish magistrates being typical, renders the laws enjoined them, or their example useless to us, is absurd, and infers that we ought to account almost all the Old Testament useless to us as a rule, because it primarily respected persons who were typical. Upon accurate comparison, it will be found that after the Jews' rejection of the theocracy under Samuel, 1 Sam. viii. their magistrates were in almost all things similar to our own. No difficulties that I know of, attend magistrates' civil power about religious matters, but the like, if not greater, attend church rulers' ecclesiastic power about them.

Both magistrates and church rulers ought carefully to observe the difference between their respective powers, and to act precisely within the limits and according to the nature of their own department. Neglect of this has been a fertile source of almost all the blended establishments and manifold disorders in both church and state: The civil and ecclesiastic powers are indeed co-ORDINATE, which may beautifully subsist together, the one independent of the other, and yet each exercised for the advantage of the other; but they are not COLLATERAL, dependent upon one another, and which cannot rightly subsist if separated the one from the other. These two powers differ in their foundation, their formal object, their form, their proper end, their proper effects, their proper subjects, the formal consideration of the persons on whom they are exercised, and their divided execution. Magistracy is founded in God's universal dominion over all nations, Psal. xlvii. 2, 7. Jer. x. 7; and hence the law of nature, common to all men, is the immediate rule of it, and all its administrations; and revelation is introduced as a rule by the law of nature, requiring us to receive whatever God is pleased to reveal; or by the possessors of the magistratical power being religious professors of revealed truth: But ecclesiastic power is founded in the economical headship of Christ as Mediator over his church, and so revelation must be the immediate regulator or standard thereof, and the law of nature be admitted as a rule, by virtue of the general rules of the scripture. 1 Cor. xiv. 26, 40. Phil. iv. 8.

In their OBJECT, the power of magistrates relates immediately to the outward man, and the external concerns of mankind. Even in sacred things, it has what is external for its proper and immediate object. Thus the magistrate provides the church with external accommodations, and removes external impediments of spiritual exercises. If he convocate synods, he calls them together, not properly as courts or ministers of Christ, but as meetings of and subjects, whose deliberations are like to promote the honour of God, his superior, and the happiness of the nation. He commands persons to appear before church courts as panels or witnesses, not as they are spiritual members of the mystical body of Christ, but as his own subjects, to take trial or bear witness, before proper judges of the cause, that through the good order and purity of the church, the honour of God, and the peace and order of the commonwealth, may be promoted: his ratification of church deeds, is an adopting of them into civil laws, the observance of which he declares necessary for the welfare of the state. —But ecclesiastical power is exercised about things as spiritual. It deals with men as members of Christ's spiritual and mystical body, and deals only with their outward ears, or the like, to come at their conscience and heart.—In their form, magistrates, though ministers of God, are lords as well as fathers of their subjects, and may compel the disobedient, by enforcing their civil laws with penalties of confiscation, imprisonment, or death; and they punish transgressions as crimes, which insult the honour of God as King of nations, and tend to the hurt of the state. The power of church rulers is altogether ministerial, to give out directions or censures precisely according to Christ's prescriptions; and they consider transgressions, even the maladministrations of professing magistrates, as scandals, wounding to the honour of Jesus Christ, and of God as in him, and to the souls of men.—In their proper ends, magistrates exercise their office in order to promote the glory of God in the welfare of their commonwealth, and they aim at promoting the welfare of the church, either as they are church members, or as it is an excellent means of promoting the welfare of the state. But the end of all ecclesiastical power is the spiritual edification of men's souls to the honour of God, as he is in Christ, reconciling the world to himself,—and that all his chosen may be converted to him, and walk in him, and with one another, as becometh the gospel.—Hence the proper effect of civil power is the good of the commonwealth, and the enjoyment of civil privileges in a way honourable to God as King of all the earth, and the preventing of scandals, or promoting of the peace and purity of the church, by magistrates impartially encouraging such as do well, and terrifying and punishing such as do evil, and encouraging a regard to, or spread of sound doctrine, is but an attendant or accessory effect thereof. But the proper effect of church power is spiritual, reaching to men's conscience, in a manner answerable to the spiritual nature of the kingdom of Christ; and the advantage that the commonwealth reaps from it, by the piety, peacefulness, and fervent prayers of the subjects, is but an accessory effect of it.—In the subject, in which it is invested, and by whom it may be exercised, church power, under the New Testament, cannot go by succession, nor, in jurisdiction, can it be exercised by one person, as the civil power may be. Nor can it reside in a child or woman, or be exercised by a deputy.—The power of magistrates extends to all their subjects, whatever be their characters, and extends to them precisely as members or subjects in the commonwealth. But church power extends only to such as are professed members of Christ's mystical body, and precisely under that consideration.—Finally, the exercise of these powers is perfectly separable or divided. The one power ought to be exercised, where the exercise of the other is neglected. The end of ecclesiastical power being to gain sinners to repentance and salvation, all that appear duly penitent ought to be absolved from censure; but the end of civil punishment being the satisfaction of the law, and the deterring of others from crimes, the most penitent may be punished by fining, banishment, imprisonment, scourging, or death. The church too may retain under censure the impenitent, suppose they should have been absolved by the civil law, or have satisfied its demands of punishment. Nay, the church may censure professing magistrates for their unjust wars, tyranny, or oppression, notwithstanding their having a colour of civil law on their side. When magistrates prosecute the same faults as crimes against the state, and the church rulers prosecute them as scandals against the church, the processes ought to be entirely distinct. Only, to prevent unnecessary swearing, perhaps an extract of the proof in the one court, may be sometimes sustained for evidence in the other. That Jesus Christ has left a particular form of government in his gospel-church, is plainly enough laid down in the oracles of Christ. Nor is it less evident, that this power of the spiritual office is not allowed to magistrates, diocesan bishops, or to the community of the faithful, but to church-officers of his own appointment. The officers appointed by him are either extraordinary and temporary, as apostles, evangelists, prophets; or ordinary and standing, as pastors or teachers, ruling elders and deacons, Eph. iv. 11, 12. 1 Cor. xii. 28. Rom. xii. 5—8. 1 Tim. iii. and v. 17. Acts vi. All these ordinary officers ought to be chosen by the people which they are to officiate among; and ought to be men of knowledge, prudence, sanctity, and a good report; and are to be solemnly ordained by other church-officers unto their office. Acts vi. and xiii. 2. and xiv. 23. To the pastor's peculiar character, it is proper to preach the gospel, and dispense the sacraments. To him, and the ruling elder, it equally pertains to admit members into communion, watch over their morals, censure the unruly and the erroneous, and absolve the penitent, and to visit the sick; and to both, equally with deacons, it pertains to take care of the poor, and of what provision is made for them; see epistles to Timothy and Titus. 1 Pet. v. Rev. ii. and iii. Acts vi. For the effectual execution of their office, Christ has appointed in his word several courts, the lesser subordinate to the greater, as a congregational session, presbytery, and synod. Matt. xviii. 15—20. Acts xiii. 2. and xiv. 23. 1 Tim. iv. 14. Acts xv. and xvi. 4. The business of these courts is to regulate the administration of Christ's ordinances as to the proper circumstances thereof, to admit members, to censure the unruly and the erroneous, and to absolve the penitent; or to ordain other church-officers. By this form of government, lordly ambition is more effectually checked, the spiritual liberty of the people preserved, offenders properly censured, error purged, and schism prevented, than by any other.

RUMP; that of rams offered in sacrifice, was burnt on the altar, because it consisted chiefly of fat. Exod. xxix. 22.

RUN; (1.) To move with a swift pace. 1 Sam. viii. 11. (2.) To flow as water in a river, or when poured from a vessel. Psal. civ. 10. and cxix. 136. (3.) To pursue eagerly, as runners in a race do to obtain the honour and reward of outrunning their fellows, 1 Pet. iv. 4: thus the saints' eager following of God, and obedience to his law, and ministers' laborious preaching of the gospel, in view of the eternal reward, is likened to the running of a race. Heb. xii. 1. 1 Cor. ix. 24. Gal. ii. 2. Phil. ii. 16. The Galatians did run well, while they were earnest and active in receiving and practising the doctrines. Gal. v. 7. God's word runs swiftly, when his commands and purposes are speedily fulfilled. Psal. cxlvii. 15. To run with footmen and be in the land of peace, is to have to struggle with lesser difficulties and troubles. To contend with horses, and be in the swellings of Jordan, is to be exposed to great trouble and perplexity. Jer. xii. 5. The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong: undertakings do not always succeed with men according to their qualifications, diligence, or advantages, but according to the will and providential interposal of God. Eccl. ix. 11.

RUSH. As rushes cannot grow without mire, or flags without water, and when cut down, soon lose their greenness; so hypocrites will not follow religion except compelled by some carnal motive and advantage; nor is their religious profession constant or durable. Job viii. 11—20. The common people of a land are compared to rushes, to denote their vast number, and their weakness, even in their prosperity. Isa. ix. 14, 15.

RUSH; to press forward with haste and fury. Acts xix. 29.

RUST; corrupting dross which breeds on iron, especially if damp; also the smut among corn. Matt. vi. 19.

SA-BACTHA-NI, or HHAAZABANI, Thou hast forsaken me. Mark xv. 35.

SA-BA'OTH, or TZABAOTH; armies. Rom. ix. 29. Jam. v. 4.

SABBATH, or REST. The Greeks sometimes give this name to the whole week, because the principal day of it was the Sabbath; thus the Pharisee boasted that he fasted twice on the Sabbath, or week. Luke xviii. 12. But the Sabbath, properly so called, is that day of holy rest in the week. God having finished his word of creation in six days, ceased or rested therefrom on the seventh, and set it apart for the solemn worship of himself by men, and as an emblem and pledge of their eternal blessedness. Gen. ii. 1, 2. No doubt the ancient patriarchs observed the Sabbath, though in their short history we have no express account of it, any more than of their family-worship; but great brevity is observable in the history from Moses to the end of David's reign, which was nearly four hundred and forty years, during which time the Sabbath was regarded by all as the express appointment of God. The end of days, when Cain and Abel offered their oblations; the day when the sons of God met together, or the days of Job, were, most probably, the Sabbath day. Gen. iv. Job i. 6. and ii. 1. In Homer, Hesiod, and Herodotus, and others of the most ancient writers among the heathen, we have hints of a seventh day Sabbath, the observance of which they had derived from their progenitors. When the manna began to be given to the Hebrews, Moses mentions the Sabbath as not unknown to them; and informs them that a double portion of manna would fall on the preceding day, and ought to be gathered, as none would fall on the Sabbath. Exod. xvi. 28. To mark the perpetual and universal obligation of the observance of the Sabbath, God proclaimed the law of it from Sinai, wrote it on a table of stone, with the rest, which are allowed to be moral; and he enforced it by manifold reasons, absolutely moral and universal. Exod. xx. 8—11. Injunctions to keep it, and threatening the breach of it, are every where found in the law and the prophets. For gathering sticks on it, God appointed a man to be stoned to death. Numb. xv. 32—36. For neglecting to observe it, the Jewish nation was almost destroyed, and their land lay seventy years desolate. Lev. xxvi. 34, 35. Neh. xiii. 16—18. Jer. xvii. 27. Ezek. xx. In honour of his own resurrection, Jesus, the Lord of the Sabbath, changed the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week. To mark the divine authority of this change, he, on that day, made repeated visits to his disciples, John xx. 19, 26; and on it bestowed the miraculous gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost. Acts ii. 1. It is called the Lord's day; and thereon the primitive Christians met for public worship, and made their collections for the poor. Rev. i. 10. Acts xx. 7. 1 Cor. xvi. It must not be forgotten, that till the Romans destroyed Jerusalem, the Jewish Christians shewed a respect to the ancient Sabbath; and the apostles very often took the opportunity of preaching on it to the Jews, as they then assembled in their synagogues. Acts xiii. 42. xvi. 13. and xviii. 4. The first day was observed by Christians, as their Sabbath, for almost 1600 years, without having their practice so much as questioned. Nor have any arguments against its observance been since adduced, which are worthy of notice. As the command plainly prohibits all manner of civil business, travelling, carnal talk, &c. Exod. xx. 8—11. Isa. lviii. 13. it were to be wished, that multitudes of this generation would consider, how they will reconcile their journeys on worldly business, cleaning of houses, idle recreation, unnecessary sleeping, idle chat, or clubbing in the tavern, on this holy day, or how they will answer for these at the judgment seat of Christ.

God, indeed, prohibited the Jews from kindling fire on the Sabbath, for the work of erecting the tabernacle, or dressing of their manna, or to travel through their tents, Exod. xxxv. 2, 3. and xvi. 29; but in our Saviour's time, they in some things carried their strictness to an excess: they found fault with his hungry disciples, for plucking a few ears of corn as they walked through a field; and quarrelled with himself, for healing diseases on the Sabbath. Matt. xii. 1—12. Mark ii. 23—28. and iii. 1—6. Luke xiii. 11—16. and xiv. 1—6. John v.

The modern Jews still observe the seventh day Sabbath, and boast of it as their spouse, exclusively given to them. They commence it on Friday evening, when they repair to the synagogue, and rehearse certain prayers, and, after returning home, the fathers bless their children, and masters their scholars. On Saturday morning they rise later than usual; when they come to the synagogue, they rehearse several psalms and prayers.

A section of the law is read, and a corresponding one from the prophets. After which the last of the seven readers lifts up the book, and blesses the people. They have also a kind of sermon, some time of the day. Their other rites are too trifling to be noticed. On account of the rest of this day, the Jewish festivals, the year of release, &c. are called Sabbaths. Lev. xix. 3, 30. What is meant by the second Sabbath after the first, whether the second Sabbath of the sacred year; or the second, or the last day of unleavened bread; or the day of Pentecost, or rather the second of the seven Sabbaths between the Passover and Pentecost, the learned are not fully agreed. Luke vi. 1.

SA-BE'ANS. See SHEBA.

SAB'TAH and SAB-TE' CHA, the third and fifth sons of Cush. It is probable that both may have settled in Arabia the Happy; but Bochart will have the latter to have settled in Kerman, on the east of the Persian gulf, where he finds ancient vestiges of his name. Gen. x. 7.

SACBUT; an ancient musical instrument used in Nebuchadnezzar's concert. Dan. iii. It is supposed to have had four strings, and to have produced a shrill sound. Athenæus thinks it was similar to the psaltery: but Isidore will have it to have been a kind of flute, or hautboy.

SACKCLOTH was generally worn in times of mourning. It was worn by Job, Ahab, and the Syrians who came to implore mercy for Benhadad, and by Mordecai, when the Jewish nation was in danger of ruin. Job xvi. 15. 1 Kings xxi. 27. and xx. 31. Esth. iv. 1, 2. The prophets also wore it, or similar coarse apparel; and the false prophets, to be like them, wore rough or coarse garments. Isa. xx. 2. Zech. xiii. 4. In allusion to which, Christ's witnesses against Antichrist, are said to prophesy in sackcloth, to denote their distress, and their mourning for the corruptions and low state of the church. Rev. xi. 3. The sun became black as sackcloth of hair, when the glory, and principal idols of the Roman empire, were overthrown by Constantine the Great. Rev. vi. 12.

SACRIFICE. See OFFERING.

SACRILEGE; the stealing of things set apart to holy uses. Rom. ii. 23.

SADNESS (of the countenance) sometimes imports mourning and grief. Matt. vi. 16. Sometimes it is put for real mourning, and the cause of it, by means of which the heart is made better; weaned from worldly things, and brought to a concern about eternal things. Eccl. vii. 3.

SAD'DU-CEES. See SECT.

SAFETY. (1.) Freedom from danger, temporal or spiritual. Psal. xii. 5. (2.) Outward freedom from fear; prosperity. Job xxiv. 23. I was not in safety, nor had I rest or quiet, yet trouble came; I was not self-confident, and fearless of danger and affliction, nay, had been sorely afflicted; yet this uncommon calamity came upon me. Job iii. 26. To be in safeguard, is to be well defended. 1 Sam. xxii. 23.

SAFFRON; an odoriferous herb, which being planted in September, is in full flower in February; after which its leaves spring forth, and continue till May. Its flower is of a bluish colour, with yellow threads, and is of a very agreeable smell. It is an excellent cordial, and of great use in curing many diseases. Tournefort mentions forty-six kinds of it. Saints and their graces are like saffron; they are comely, delightful, and useful for the healing of the church. Sol. Song iv. 14.

SAINTS; holy ones; (1.) Persons holy by profession, covenant-dedication, gracious dispositions, and religious conversation. Psal. xvi. 8. Heb. vi. 10. (2.) The souls of holy men, who in heaven are freed from all sinful infirmities. Rev. xviii. 24. (3.) Holy angels. Deut. xxxiii. 2. Jude 14. See SANCTIFY.

SALA-MIS. There was an island of this name south of Athens, where the Persian fleet received a signal defeat from the Athenians; but the Salamis spoken of in scripture, was a city of Cyprus. Here Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel. About A. D. 118, the Jews destroyed it. It was however rebuilt, and was the seat of the principal bishop of the isle; but the Saracens razed it to the ground, when they seized on the island. It is probable that Famagusta, which suffered so much when the Ottoman Turks took the island, arose out of its ruins.

SA'LEM, or SA'LIM, where John baptized, was probably a place near Shechem, where Jacob stopped as he returned from Mesopotamia; but some commentators translate the word Shalem, safe and sound, or in peace. John iii. 23. Gen. xxxiii. 18. It was probably here that Melchizedek was king, and came to meet Abraham in his return southward from smiting Chedorlaomer and his allies. It is certain, Jerusalem, which was afterward by contraction called SALEM, Psal. lxxvi. 2, was then called Jebus, and was far off the way between Damascus and Sodom; whereas this was directly on it, when one came south by the west side of Jordan. Gen. xiv.

SAL'MON. See RA'HAB; ZAL'MON.

SAL-MO'NE, SAL-MO'NI-ON, or SAM-MO'NI-UM; a city and sea-port on the east end of the isle of Crete, where Cape Salomone now is. Acts xxvii. 7.

SA-LOME; the wife of Zebedee, and mother of James and John. She was one of those holy women who generally accompanied the Lord Jesus, and ministered to him for his subsistence. She foolishly begged that her two sons might have principal posts in his temporal kingdom. She witnessed his crucifixion; brought perfumes for his dead body; and visited his grave the morning he rose from the dead. Matt. xxvii. 56. xx. 20—23. and xxviii. 10. Mark xvi. 1, 2.

Salt, is either dug out of mines, for there are whole mountains consisting of rocks of salt, and there are salt mines in Upper Hungary, one hundred and eighty fathoms deep; or it is formed by the heat of the sun exhaling the water from it on seashores; or it is formed by boiling sea, or salt spring water: it may also be extracted from other substances; as from earth moistened with excrements, &c. The salt mingled with the water of the sea preserves it from putrefaction, and renders it stronger to bear heavy bodies; the perpetual motion of the ocean prevents the salt particles from falling to the bottom. There is scarcely any substance without a mixture of salt. It seasons food, preserves from corruption, kills worms, heals wounds, and rectifies the humours of animal bodies. New-born infants were anciently rubbed over with it, to close the pores, harden the skin, and preserve from any corruption which might otherwise result from the cutting the navel string. Eeek. xvi. 4. In a way contrary to nature, Elisha cured the brackish water of Jericho, by casting salt into the spring. 2 Kings ii. 21. The sowing of salt on a place; or making it salt, or salt pits, imports perpetual barrenness, and desolation. Judg. ix. 45. Deut. xxix. 23. Zeph. ii. 9. Halifax states that there is a valley covered with salt, reaching from Tadmor to the east border of Idumea; but whether David smote the Edomites in the north, and Amaziah smote them in the south part of this valley cannot be determined. It appears that the Greeks of Syria had salt pits on the west of the Dead sea, and north border of Edom, and where possibly the valley of salt was. 2 Sam. xviii. 13. 2 Kings xiv. 7. There was salt made out of the Dead sea, which was a bitter caustic, and digested meat better than other salt. Salt was a covenant of friendship and fidelity due from guests, friends, or servants, to their entertainers, or masters: so the Samaritans pretended, they were salted with the salt of the Persian palace; they were under the deepest obligation, and had firmly resolved to show their fidelity to the Persian king their master. Ezra iv. 14.

All the ceremonial offerings were to be seasoned with salt. Did not this mark the purity, prudence, grace, faithfulness, and love to God, with which Jesus Christ, amidst great grief and trouble, offered himself to God for us, and with which we should devote our persons and services to him? Lev. ii. 13. Ministers are the salt of the earth, like mark, or other saltish substances, that fatten and fructify the earth, they tend to render nations and persons fruitful in works of righteousness; and they are the means of preserving them from sinful rottenness and corruption; but how useless and base, if they act not in character! Matt. v. 13. True grace, and edifying converse, are also compared to salt; how delightful they render the spiritual food of divine truth; and what blessed means of healing souls, and preserving them from infectious corruption. Mark ix. 50. Col. iv. 6. Every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice salted with salt: every person must either be purified with trouble, and in the way of sorrow for sin, and mortification thereof; or, he shall be for ever salted with the tormenting, but preserving torments of hell. Mark ix. 49. A covenant of salt, is one of friendship, firm and durable. Numb. xviii. 19. 2 Chron. xiii. 5.

SALVATION. See SAVE.

SALUTE; to pay friendly compliments, whether by words, kisses, or letters. Matt. x. 12. Rom. xvi. 16. 1 Cor. xvi. 20.

SA-MARI-A; (1.) A city of the Ephraimites; and the capital city of the ten tribes of Israel for some ages. When Omri was king of Israel, he about A. M. 3080, bought a hill from Shemer, for a sum equal to £684 7s. 6d. of our money, and built on it a city, which from the name of the late owner, he called Shomron, or Samaria. It stood about forty-two miles north from Jerusalem, and twelve south of Dothaim. Its situation was very agreeable, and it had plenty of fine water. Leaving Shechem and Tirzah, where the former kings had resided, Omri fixed his residence at Samaria; Ahab his son there built a fine palace, the principal chambers of which were lined with ivory. 1 Kings xxii. 39. Though he, as well as his father, did what they could to fortify Samaria, it appears that Benhadad king of Syria obliged them to allow him to build streets, or places of trade, for his use in it. In Ahab's time, it sustained a siege from Benhadad, and his thirty-two tributary kings, but was relieved by the defeat of the Syrians. 1 Kings xx. In Jehoram his son's reign, it sustained another siege from the Syrians, till women ate their own infants for hunger, but was miraculously relieved, and supplied. 2 Kings vi. and vii. Not long after, the elders of it beheaded seventy of Ahab's descendants, and sent their heads in baskets to Jehu. 2 Kings x. In the time of Jeroboam II. it was extremely populous, and the inhabitants were luxurious, effeminate, oppressors of the poor, and idolatrous, to an uncommon degree. Amos iii. 15. and iv. 1, 2. Hos. vii. 1. and viii. 5, 6. In A. M. 3233, Shalmaneser, after a siege of three years, took it, and reduced it to ruins. 2 Kings xvii. 1—6. Mic. i. 1, 6. Isa. viii. 4. Hos. xiii. 16. It was afterwards gradually repaired. Alexander planted a colony of Macedonians in it. Hyrcanus, the Jewish king, demolished it, and caused water to run over its foundations. About A. M. 3947, Gabinius the Roman governor of Syria, rebuilt it in part, and called it Gabiniانا. Herod the Great restored it to its ancient lustre, and called it Sebaste, in honour of Augustus, or Sebastos, the Roman Emperor. Whatever it might suffer in the Jewish wars, it was a place of some consideration about A. D. 400. (2.) The country of the Ephraimites, or of the ten tribes. 1 Kings xiii. 32. In the New Testament, Samaria always signifies the territory between Judea and Galilee; and where the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Issachar had dwelt. Here our Saviour converted many. John iv. Here Simon Magus deceived the people; and here many were converted by the ministry of Philip the deacon, and of Peter and John. John iv. Acts viii.

SA-MAR-I-TANS; the inhabitants of the country of Samaria. When Shalmaneser carried the ten tribes out of their own land, he transplanted others from Babylon, and parts adjacent, into it. There they continued their former idolatry: the Babylonians worshipped Succoth-benoth; the Cushites, Nergal; the Hamathites, Ashima; the Avites, Nibhaz and Tartak; and the Sepharvites, burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech, and Ananmelech; nor, if we believe the Jews, were these their only idols. God punished their idolatry in his land, with the destruction of many of them by lions. Suspecting the cause, they begged king Esarhaddon, who, it seems, transplanted other tribes thither, that he would take proper methods to instruct them in the worship of the God of their new country. He sent them a Hebrew priest, who instructed them in the Jewish religion, and gave them a copy of the law of Moses. Copies of this still remain, with a version thereof in the Samaritan dialect, both in the Samaritan character, but much corrupted, especially with respect to numbers, and where the transcribers mistook one Hebrew letter for another; and with some follies in favour of Mount Gerizzim. Thus instructed, the Samaritans blended the Jewish religion with their own idolatries. 2 Kings xvii. When Nebuchadnezzar ravaged the countries of Moab and Ammon, part of the inhabitants took refuge among the Samaritans, who were spared, as being of Chaldean origin.

When the Jews returned from Babylon, the Samaritans did all that lay in their power to oppose their rebuilding of the temple, and bribed some of the councillors of Cyrus to do what they could to stop it. Ahazernus, or Cambyzes, had no sooner ascended the throne than they wrote him a petition to that effect, accusing the Jews of disloyal designs. In the short reign of Artaxerxes, Magus, Bishlam, Mithredath, and Tabeel, with their companions, wrote to him to put a stop to the work. Much about the same time, Rehum the chancellor, Shimshai the scribe, and their companions, the Dinaites, Apharsathchites, Tarpelites, Apharsites, Archevites, Snsanchites, Dehavites, Elamites, Babylonians, and others, wrote him a letter, in which they represented the Jews as a very rebellious people, who, if permitted to rebuild their cities and temple, would seize on all the king's territories on the west of the Euphrates; and they begged the king would make inquiry into the histories to which he had access, and he would find they had been always a rebellious nation. The Magi returned for answer, that a search into the records had been made, and it had been found that powerful kings had ruled among the Jews; and he desired them to stop the work by force, which they immediately did. Soon after, Tatnai the governor, and Shethar-boznai, with their companions, the Apharsachites, sent a letter to Darius Hystaspes, informing him that they had done what they could to stop the building of the Jewish temple, and that the Jews had pretended an edict of Cyrus, appointing them to build it. Upon search, the edict was found, and Darius ratified it, and ordered the Samaritans to give the Jews no further trouble. Ezra iv. 6.

When Nehemiah began to promote the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, Sanballat the Horonite, Tobiah the Ammonite, and Greshem the Arabian, did all that lay in their power, by threatening and subtilty, to cut off Nehemiah, or put a stop to the work; but their purposes were frustrated. Manasseh the son of Joiada, the Jewish high priest, married the daughter of Sanballat, on which account Nehemiah banished him from Jerusalem. Sanballat applied to Darins Nothus, for leave to build a temple for his son-in-law, on Mount Gerizzim. He represented that this would effectually divide the Jewish nation, and render them incapable of accomplishing any noted enterprize. He obtained his desire and the temple was built. Before this, it seems, the Samaritans had no temple. Observing that Alexander heaped favours upon the Jewish nation, they pretended to be a part of them. When he left the country, and marched into Egypt, they revolted, and burnt Andromachus his governor. He quickly revenged the affront, and put numbers of them to the sword. He placed a colony of Macedonians in the city of Samaria, and gave the neighbouring territory to the Jews. This heightened the animosity between them and the Jews. Whenever a Jew violated any important point of the divine law, to escape punishment, he took refuge with the Samaritans, and embraced their method of worship. When Antiochus Epiphanes persecuted the Jews, the Samaritans disowned connection with them, and pretended to be originally Phœnicians, or descended from Joseph by Manasseh. Hyrcanus king of Judea desolated their country, and rased Samaria and Shechem, their capital cities, to the very ground. When Herod re-established Samaria, a vast number of heathens settled in the country; but a part still clave to the same Jewish religion, and professed to expect the Messiah; but the contention between them and the Jews was extremely sharp; they refused even common dealings with each other. John iv. 9. The Samaritans refused to receive our Saviour to lodge, because he seemed to be journeying to Jerusalem. Luke ix. 52, 53. The Jews imagined the Samaritans to be the worst of men, and possessed by the devil. John viii. 48. In one of our Saviour's journeys from Jerusalem to Samaria, he converted a Samaritan woman, and many others, at Shechem. John iv. 4-22. When he afterwards sent forth his apostles, he prohibited them to enter the cities of the Samaritans. Matt. x. 5. Much about this time Simon the sorcerer greatly deluded them, and was regarded by them as some wonderful person, if not the Messiah. When the gospel was preached in this country by Philip, many of them believed, and the Holy Ghost was conferred on them, by the laying on of the hands of Peter and John; but it is said, that by means of Simon, many who once professed Christianity, in that place apostatized to the heresy and licentiousness of the Gnostics. Acts viii.

Some time after, the Samaritans, to insult the Jews, and interrupt their devotion, scattered dead men's bones in the court of the temple, at the feast of the passover. On other occasions, they murdered some Jews, as they came from Galilee to the solemn feasts. This occasioned a war between the two nations. When the Jews revolted, the Samaritans continued in subjection to the Romans; notwithstanding of which, they partly shared in the calamities of their neighbours. Since these times, they have always submitted to the powers that ruled the country.

At present, the Samaritans are few in number; but pretend to great strictness in their observation of the law of Moses, and account the Jews intolerably lax. From the letter of their high priest to Joseph Scaliger, above a hundred and ninety years ago, and which has been preserved, it appears that they profess to believe in God; and in the mission of his servant Moses; in the holy law; the Mount Gerizzim, the house of God; and that they look for the day of vengeance and peace. They keep the Sabbath so strictly that they will not move out of their place, except to their synagogue. They always circumcise their children on the eighth day after their birth. They do not marry their own nieces, nor allow a plurality of wives, as the Jews do. Their high priest still resides at Shechem; where he still offers sacrifices at the temple on Mount Gerizzim; and declares the time of the feasts to the Samaritans, who are scattered, some at Damascus, some at Gaza, nay, some at Grand Cairo in Egypt.

SAME. To be the same, when applied to God or Christ, denotes immutability. Heb. i. 12. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; under the law, under the gospel, and in the eternal state, he is still the same in person and office; and in every different period, or case, he is still the same in relation and love to his people. Heb. xiii. 8.

SAMOS; an island situate in the east of the Mediterranean sea, about nine miles from the coast of Lesser Asia. It is about eighty miles in compass; but the soil is so fertile, that it would employ 100,000 hands. It was famous among the heathen for the birth of the goddess Juno, and of Pythagoras and Melissus; and here the famed Lycurgus and Pherecydes died. For many ages it was a state of no small note, and was a commonwealth; but Syloson, Polycrates, Meandrus, and others, ruled them for a considerable time most oppressively. The Persians, Greeks, the kings of Pergamos, the Romans, Saracens, and Turks, have more than 2000 years been masters of the place in their turns. Though Paul touched here as he sailed to Jerusalem, (Acts xx. 15.) yet we have no account of Christianity here, till about the end of the second century, since which it has never been utterly extirpated. At present, the place is in a poor condition. Samo or Sussan, its capital, is on the south-east coast, and has a tolerable harbour; but is but little frequented, because of the pirates that infest the neighbouring seas. The island is inhabited by a few Turks, and about 12,000 Christians, who have an archbishop, whose dues, after deducting his tribute to the Sultan and to the Patriarch of Constantinople, can scarcely furnish him with sufficient to support life. Under him are about two hundred priests, and a greater number of monks, extremely ignorant, but nevertheless judges, in the absence of the Turkish Cadi.

SA-MO-THRA-CIA, now SA-MAN-DRA-CHEI, is a small island about twenty miles in circumference, on the coast of Thrace, having several good harbours, and originally peopled by the Pelasgi and Atuncians, and afterward by the Samlians. It was anciently famous for the worship of the Cabiri, or great gods of the heathen. Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Mercury, whose names, in the Samothracian language, as well as other evidences, lead to the conclusion that the ancient inhabitants came from Phœnicia. Here also, they worshipped Castor, Pollux, Neptune, and the other sea deities. Foreigners of the highest character counted it a great honour to be initiated into the sacred mysteries of the Samothracian idolatry. Paul passed by this island as he sailed to Macedonia, Acts xvi. 1; but when Christianity was first introduced is doubtful.

SAM'SON, the son of Manoah, a Danite. After his mother had been long barren, the angel JEHOVAH appeared to her, and informed her that she should have a son, who should begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, who then had begun to oppress them. He ordered her to drink no wine or strong drink during her pregnancy, nor to eat of any thing unclean; but to consecrate the child to God, and bring him up as a Nazarite from his infancy; but refused to tell her who he was. She went and informed her husband Manoah of what had happened. He prayed to the Lord that the man of God who had spoken to his wife, would again appear, and give further directions concerning the education of the child. The Angel again appeared to the woman, and she went and informed her husband, who hastened with her to the Angel, who repeated to them his former directions. Manoah and his wife begged he would tarry a little, till they prepared a kid for his entertainment. He told them, he would eat none of their meat even if it were ready, and bade them offer their burnt-offering to the Lord. They asked his name, that after the fulfilment of his predictions, they might know whom to honour as their informer. He refused, and told them his name was Secret, or Wonderful. Meanwhile, Manoah offered his kid and a meat-offering on the rock beside them, and the Angel ascended up to heaven in the flame. Manoah and his wife, who, till now, had thought him a man, were seized with terror, and fell on their faces towards the ground. Manoah concluded, that since they had seen an angel, they must die; but his wife more justly inferred, that if the Lord had intended to kill them, he would not have accepted their offering, nor given them such information concerning their son.

Next year, which was about A. M. 2348 or 2372, Samson was born. By endowing his mind with uncommon bravery, and his body with supernatural strength, the Holy Ghost early marked him out for important enterprises. He dwelt at Mahane-dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol. Going one day to Timnath, then in the possession of the Philistines, he saw a young woman who engaged his affections. He requested his parents to procure her for him to wife. They represented, that it would be more proper that he should marry a wife of his own people. As he still urged his request, they supposed it might be a suggestion from God to bring about the deliverance of their nation, and they at last went with him to Timnath to further his wishes. On the way, Samson turned a little aside, and a young lion came roaring to devour him. Without even a staff in his hand, he caught the furious lion, and rent him to pieces, as if he had been a kid. He then hastened after his parents; but told them nothing of his killing the lion. Some time after, as they again went to Timnath to celebrate his nuptials, Samson turned aside to see the carcase of the lion. To his surprise, he found a swarm of bees had hived in it. He ate a part of the honey, and carried another to his parents; but he still kept secret his conflict with the lion.

When the marriage was celebrated at Timnath, thirty young men of the place attended him. As they began to entertain one another with riddles to be solved, Samson proposed a riddle, which if they explained during the seven days of the feast, they should have thirty linen shirts, and as many suits of apparel; but if not, they should give him a similar supply. On their agreement to the proposal, he told them his riddle, which was, Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. After they had long, to no purpose, endeavoured to guess at its meaning, they urged his wife by entreaties, and even by threatenings to burn her and her father's family if she did not procure them information, and extract the secret from her husband. By her continued entreaties and weeping, she obtained it, and immediately informed her countrymen. On the seventh day, just before sunset, they asked Samson, What was sweeter than honey? or what was stronger than a lion? Samson replied, that if they had not plowed with his heifer, (i. e. dealt with his unfaithful wife,) they would never have solved it. Animated by the Spirit of God, he went directly to Askalon, and killing thirty Philistines, he gave their clothes to his thirty companions. Offended with his wife's treachery, he left her with her father, and went home with his parents. Her father imagining he had quite forsaken her, married her to one of the thirty young men who attended the wedding. When Samson's anger subsided, he went back to visit her, and presented her with a kid. As she had been given to another, her father denied him access to her chamber, and desired him to marry her younger sister, who was more beautiful. Bent on revenge, Samson, and those he employed, caught three hundred foxes, (for these animals were very numerous in that country) and tied them tail to tail, with a fire-brand between them; he then turned them into the Philistines' fields of standing corn. The ripe corn took flame, and was quickly consumed; the vines and olive-trees were also scorched or burnt. Knowing that the injury he had received from his father-in-law was the cause of his conduct, the Philistines burnt his treacherous wife and her father to death. Samson assured them, that he would be further avenged on them, before he ceased. After cutting off great numbers of them, he retired to the rock Etam, about eight miles south-west from Jerusalem. Informed of his retreat, the Philistines invaded the territories of Judah, and demanded that Samson their destroyer should be given up to them. Three thousand Jews went up to the top of the rock, and told him they were come to bind and deliver him into the hand of the Philistines. Upon their giving him their oath, that they would not kill him themselves, he allowed them to bind him. Great was the joy of the Philistines, as they received him bound; but suddenly he snapped asunder the cords with which he was bound, and taking the jaw-bone of an ass that lay at his feet, he with it slew 1000 of the Philistines. To check his proud boasting of his victory, he suddenly became faint from thirst. On his humble request, the Lord opened a well in a hollow place of the rock, (perhaps under the jaw-bone, which he had flung from him,) out of which he drank, and allayed his thirst. To commemorate the event, the place was called Lehi, the jaw-bone; or Ramoth Lehi, the lifting up of the jaw-bone; and the fountain, Enhakkore, the well of him that cried.

Some time after, Samson forming a sinful attachment to a harlot of Gaza, lodged in her house. Informed of this, the Philistines set a watch at the gates, to kill him as he went out in the morning. Having notice of their designs, he rose about midnight, and carried away with him the posts and doors of their gate, to the top of the hill before Hebron, which was not less than twenty or thirty miles. Not long after, he fell in love with one Delilah of the valley of Sorek; but whether he made her his wife, or only his harlot, is not very evident. The five lords or princes of the Philistines each promised her 1100 shekels of silver, (about £700 sterling,) if she could find out, and deprive him of his strength. She did what she could to obtain the bribe. Suspecting her treachery, he, for a while, imposed on her. First he affirmed, that the binding of him with green withs, or twisted branches of trees, would render him weak as another man; next, that the binding him with new ropes; and again, that the weaving of his hair into tresses in the loom, would do it. Finding that he broke the withs and ropes as easily as if a thread, and went off with the web, beam, and all, on his head, as soon as the Philistines, who watched in an adjacent room, were ready to apprehend him; she teased him so with her flatteries and importunities, that he foolishly discovered the secret, and told her that if his head were shorn, he should be weak as another man; as that would violate his Nazariteship, and so deprive him of the invigorating influence of the Holy Ghost. She lulled him asleep on her lap, and cut off his hair. When she, as formerly, awoke him with an alarm of the Philistines being ready to apprehend him, he thought to shake and bestir himself as before; but could not, as the Lord had departed from him. The Philistines, who waited in the next room, rushed in, apprehended him, and put out his eyes; they then carried him to Gaza, put him in prison, and made him grind at their corn-mill, as a contemptible slave. When he had continued here about a year, his strength returned with the growth of his hair. While the Philistines observed a solemn thanksgiving to Dagon their god, for delivering Samson their destroyer into their hand, the lords appointed him to be brought to their temple, to make them diversion. The apartment was capacious, but was thronged, and many from the roof, or galleries, beheld the sport. As the roof was supported by two pillars, Samson, after being greatly insulted, desired the boy who led him to guide him to the pillars, that he might lean on them. Having laid hold of them, and being divinely warranted to lay down his life for the service of his nation, and the destruction of their enemies, he after a short prayer, pulled down the pillars and the temple upon them, by which several thousands were killed, even more than all he had slain in his life. Thus fell Samson, after he had judged Israel twenty years, and lived about thirty eight. His friends bearing of his death, came and carried off his body, and buried it in the sepulchre of his ancestors. Judg. xiii—xvi. That, with all his faults, he was a real believer, is testified by the Holy Ghost; but some imagine that passage only implies that he had the faith whereby he was qualified for uncommon exploits. Heb. xi. 32, 33.

Did this Jewish hero typify our Almighty Redeemer? How express the prediction, and supernatural the manner of his birth! How solemn his separation to the service of God! how wonderfully invigorating the spiritual influences he was possessed of! how early and marvellous his exploits! how he, by obedience and death, satisfied the broken law, conquered the world, sin, death, and the devil! how sweet the provision he hereby made for himself and his friends! nay, what rest for numerous multitudes of sinful men, is prepared by his victory over sin, Satan, and death! how important his parables, and known only to such as have fellowship with himself! How basely Judas and his countrymen betrayed him, and delivered him to the gentiles, that he might be crucified! His enemies rejoiced to seal him up, and watched him in his grave; but he broke the bands, and carried off the gates and bars of death, and ascending up on high, led captivity captive. Alone he performed his grand exploits. By a voluntary death in his despised manhood, according to his Father's will, he destroyed thousands of principalities and powers. By the despised preaching of the gospel, he conquers thousands of souls, and slays ten thousands of lusts. How dreadful his vengeance! By the Romans, like Samson's fire-branded foxes, he spread ruin among his Jewish opposers, and burned up their cities. By outraging and ravaging the Goths, Saracens, Tartars, Turks, &c. he resented the injuries done to his cause. And, in fine, how shall his fiery vengeance for ever prey on the damned!

SAMU-EL, or SHEM'U-EL, the son of Elkanah by HANNAH, and the sixteenth in descent from Korah the seditious Levite. He was born about the same time with Samson; and as his mother after long barrenness, obtained him by earnest prayer, she devoted him to the service of God as a Nazarite from his infancy; and after he was weaned, he was committed to the care of Eli the high priest, to bring him up in the service of the tabernacle. When Eli, by reason of age, could hardly officiate, and was sinfully indulgent towards his sons, who profaned the service of God, the Lord one morning, before the lamps of the tabernacle were extinguished, called Samuel by his name, as he lay in a bed very near to that of Eli. Samuel supposed it had been Eli, and ran hastily to ask him what he wanted with him. Eli bade him lie down again, for he had not called him. The call was repeated a second and a third time, and Eli then suspected that God had spoken to Samuel, and bade him go lie down again, and if he was called any more, to reply, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. Samuel did so. The Lord again called him, and told him what shocking calamities would quickly come upon the Hebrews, and upon the family of Eli, because he had not restrained the wickedness of his sons. At Eli's request, Samuel, not without reluctance, related all this to him. From this time forth, Samuel was taken notice of as a prophet of the Lord.

When Eli died, Samuel, now about forty years of age, succeeded him as judge of Israel. Having assembled the people, probably on occasion of their removal of the ark from Bethshemesh to Kirjath-jearim, he warned them to put away their idols, and to return to the Lord, who would grant them deliverance. He dismissed them for the present, and ordered them to meet him in a body at Mizpeh, a place about sixteen or eighteen miles north-west of Jerusalem, or perhaps more easterly. They there assembled at the appointed time; and, as many of them had long, perhaps about twenty years, bewailed the case of their country, and cried to the Lord for deliverance, they now, at a solemn fast appointed by Samuel, confessed and mourned over their sins, and instead of drink-offerings of wine, poured out water before the Lord. Meanwhile the Philistines dreading their intentions, marched to attack them. The Hebrews urged Samuel to pray for them; he did so, and offered a lamb for a burnt-offering. God terrified the Philistines, and struck dead many of them. They fled in the utmost consternation: the Hebrews pursued them as far as Bethcar, and recovered from them the cities which they had taken from them, nor did the Philistines ravage the Hebrew territories any more during the government of Samuel. To commemorate this noted deliverance, he set up a stone or pillar, calling it EBENEZER, the stone of help, because there God had helped them.

For the more regular administration of justice, Samuel every year made a tour from Ramah to Bethel, thence to Gilgal, and thence to Mizpeh, (perhaps that situated in Gilead) and then returned home to Ramah, where he built an altar for his own devotion, and that of those Hebrews, who flocked to him from the country about, to ask his direction, or to have their causes decided. 1 Sam. i.—iii. and vii. 1 Chron. vi. 22, 28.

He had two sons, Joel or Vashni, the father of Heman the singer, and Abiah, whom, in his old age, he appointed judges of the people. Unlike their father, they perverted justice, and received bribes. The elders of Israel used this as a reason for asking a king, that they might be like the nations around. Samuel disliking the motion, consulted the Lord. Provoked with the sinful proposal, the Lord bade him grant the people their desire, since they were weary of divine government; but first to warn them, what manner of tyrants, that would oblige their children to serve in his wars, and drudge in his house or field, and would oppress them with heavy taxes and otherwise, they might expect, according to their own proposal. They persisted in their request. About A. M. 2000, he was appointed by God to anoint SAUL to be their king; and afterwards he confirmed the kingdom to him at Gilgal. On that occasion, after their peace-offerings were finished, Samuel solemnly challenged the assembly to accuse him, if they could, of the least injustice in his administration. They solemnly declared they could not accuse him of any. After rehearsing the various appearances of God in their favour, while the theocracy lasted, he warned them to take heed to serve the Lord, and thus entail on themselves signal blessings. He told them, although it was now wheat-harvest, when thunder or rain seldom happened, yet a storm should happen that very day, to testify God's displeasure at their request of a king. At Samuel's desire, the Lord sent the storm. The thunder terrified the people, and they begged for forgiveness of their offence. After he had solemnly warned them against apostasy from the service of the true God, and had engaged to continue his prayers for them, he dismissed them, and returned to his house, and never afterwards appears to have acted as a judge. 1 Sam. viii.—xii. Two years after, he sharply reprovved king Saul for offering sacrifice, and warned him of losing his kingdom. Almost twenty years after, he, by the direction of God, ordered Saul to go and destroy the Amalekites, and what belonged to them. At his return, he sharply rebuked him for rebellion against God's commandment, in sparing the best of the sheep, and Agag the king; the last of which Samuel hewed in pieces before the Lord. He told Saul, that, for his rebellion, the Lord had rejected him, and would give the kingdom to one of his neighbours. Upon Saul's earnest desire, he honoured him so far before the people, as to join in public worship with him; and then leaving him, never visited him more, but continued to lament his fate. 1 Sam. xiii. and xv.—To comfort Samuel in his grief, the Lord ordered him to anoint one of the sons of Jesse the Bethlemiter to be king after Saul. To conceal the matter, and prevent Saul's murderous rage against him, he was appointed to take a heifer with him and offer it for a peace-offering. The elders of the place were afraid at his coming; but he removed their fears, and told them he came with peaceful designs, and called them to prepare themselves for the sacrifice which he intended to offer. He himself sanctified Jesse and his sons for that occasion. After the sacrifice, he had a secret interview with Jesse and his sons. When Eliab the eldest appeared before him, his stately appearance made him conclude that he was the person appointed for king. The Lord told him that he was not; and that the Lord did not.

as men do, look on the outward appearance, but on the heart. The seven of Jesse's sons that were present, passed before him in their turns; but the Lord suggested to him, and he told Jesse, that none of these was the person appointed for king. Understanding that David the youngest was with the sheep, he sent for him directly, and was directed by God to anoint him. It is probable, that none but Jesse, David, and Samuel knew of this unction. After performing it, Samuel returned to Ramah, where he presided over a body of young men, who had devoted themselves to the peculiar service of God. About sixteen or seventeen years after, he died, greatly lamented, about A. M. 2947. 1 Sam. xvi. 1—13. and xix. 18—24. and xxv. 1. Samuel was a noted prophet, and the first in the continued succession of prophets that ended in Malachi. He wrote rules for the management of the kingdom, pointing out to the king and people their proper rights; but it is said, some of the Hebrew kings afterward destroyed it, that they might rule as they pleased. He wrote part of the history of David, and is supposed to have written the books of Judges and Ruth. He dedicated considerable spoils to the service of God, and began to regulate the order of the priests and Levites in their sacred service. 1 Sam. x. 25. 1 Chron. xxix. 29. and xxvi. 28. and ix. 10. Though his extraordinary character, and the broken state of the church, occasioned his occasional offering of sacrifice, yet there is no reason to reckon him a priest, more than Gideon, or Elijah, or Manoah.

Of the two books of Samuel, called by the Vulgate version, the books of Kings; the first of which, perhaps the first twenty four chapters were written by Samuel, contains the history of about a hundred and twenty years, or perhaps less; the second contains the history of David's reign, extending to forty years. The style of these books is extremely plain and easy for a learner.

Did this Hebrew judge and prophet typify the blessed Jesus? How ardently desired, and supernatural his birth! How early was he devoted to, fitted for, and employed in the service of God! how extensive his office! at once the illuminated Prophet, the extraordinary Priest, and the sovereign Judge of Israel! how effectually atoning is his sacrifice, and prevalent his intercession, to preserve friendship with Heaven, and obtain spiritual and other victories on earth! how marvellous his conquests of our enemies, and restoration of the treacherously abandoned worship of his Father! how gracious his instructions, sharp his reproofs, and certain his predictions; how by him kings reign, and princes decree justice! How candid, generous, and just, his whole management! yet how wickedly and dangerously were he and his Father rejected by his brethren the Jews, who desired a temporal deliverer! and still are by carnal professors! but how broken and distressed is their case, till they seek the Lord, and David their king!

SAN-BALLAT, the native, we think of Horonaim, in the country of Moab, how he with his friends, Tobiah and Geshem, were vexed at Nehemiah's coming from Persia, and rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem; what methods they used by fraud to destroy him; and how Sanballat got a temple built for Manasseh his son-in-law, may be seen in NEHEMIAH and SAMARITANS. Neh. ii. iv. and vi.

SANCTIFY; (1.) To prepare or set apart persons or things to a holy use. Exod. xix. 23. God sanctified Christ, when he set him apart to his mediatory office, and furnished him with gifts and graces for the discharge of it. John x. 36. Christ sanctified himself: by his solemn prayer, he surrendered himself to, and prepared himself for suffering work, and by his suffering, he prepared himself to be our effectual Saviour. John xvii. 19. He was sanctified by his own blood; by the shedding of it, he was set apart, and fitted to be an everlasting and glorious Intercessor and Saviour. Heb. x. 29. The Hebrews in general were sanctified, when separated from the rest of the world, brought into peculiar covenant-relation to God, and ceremonially purified by atonements, washings, &c. Exod. xxix. 13. God sanctifies the Sabbath, by setting it apart for a holy and religious use. Gen. ii. 3. The Jewish tabernacle, temple, vessels, and priests and Levites, were sanctified, when set apart to the service of God, and ceremonially prepared for it, by sprinkling of blood or oil, or by washing with water. Exod. xxx. 29. and xxviii. 41. Lev. viii. 12. The Medes and Persians are represented as God's sanctified ones; he set them apart, and prepared them as priests, to make a bloody sacrifice of the Assyrians and Chaldeans to his just vengeance. Zeph. i. 7. Isa. xlii. 3. Compare Jer. xxii. 7. The Hebrew word which we render to sanctify, signifies also to prepare. Jer. vi. 4. and xii. 3. and li. 27, 28. Men sanctify themselves, when they set themselves apart to God's service, and prepare to appear before him in a proper condition and holy frame, and study to be qualified to partake of holy things. Exod. xix. 10, 11. Numb. xi. 18. Josh. iii. 5. Meat is sanctified by the word of God, and by prayer, when freed from the curse and its effects, and set apart to be used in the service of God. 1 Tim. iv. 5. (2.) To use in religious exercises, or in a holy manner; so men sanctify the Sabbath. Deut. v. 12. They sanctify a fast, when they set it apart, to use it in holy exercises. Joel i. 14. (3.) To show or manifest that to be holy which is so. Lev. x. 3. Isa. xxix. 13. Ezek. xxxvi. 23. God sanctifies himself or his name, when, by his providential works, he manifests his holiness and equity, and orders all things to his own glory. Ezek. xxxviii. 23. Men sanctify God, or his name, when they regard and revere every thing whereby he maketh himself known; when they confess his holiness and justice, and by their obedience to his will, shew their regard thereto. Isa. viii. 13. Numb. xx. 12. (4.) To make holy, what was before defiled and sinful; so the saints are sanctified, when by the blood of Jesus sprinkled on their consciences, to remove the curse, as the source of the strength of sin, and to purge their hearts from dead works,—and by the Holy Ghost entering into them, and gradually removing their corruption, and bestowing on them his grace, they are set apart to God's service, and conformed to his image. Heb. x. 14. They are sanctified by God the Father; he, in election, separates them to his service; he gives his Son, and sends his Spirit to render them holy. Jude 1. They are sanctified in Christ Jesus, and he is made of God unto them sanctification. In a state of union to his person, and by his shedding of his blood for them, and applying it to their consciences, and by his communicating his grace to them, is their holiness begun, preserved, revived, and increased to everlasting perfection. 1 Cor. i. 2, 30. They are sanctified by the Holy Ghost, as he, by means of God's word and ordinances, applies Jesus' blood to their consciences, and is the planter and increaser of their holy dispositions, and the director, exciter, and enabler of them to perform their good works. Rom. v. 16. John xvii. 17.

SANCTIFICATION of men, as a privilege, is purchased for, given to, and wrought in us, by a gracious God. As a duty it is studied by us; and in order to attain it, we must receive it out of Christ's fulness by faith in his person and promises. Sanctification is either of nature, whereby we are gradually renewed after the image of God, in spiritual knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness, Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 10: or of practice, whereby we more and more die unto sin, have its power weakened in us, and cease the love and practice of it, hate it as abominable, and live unto righteousness, loving, studying, and practising good works. Tit. ii. 11, 12. Sanctification comprehends all the graces of knowledge, faith, repentance, love, humility, zeal, patience, &c. and the exercise thereof in our dealings with God or man. Gal. v. 22-24. 1 Pet. i. 15, 16. Matt. v-vii. As in this world, sanctification, though perfect in part, the whole man being sanctified, and the whole law regarded, Psal. cxix. 6. is still imperfect in degree, and remains of sin still continue in the whole man, 1 Kings viii. 46. Eccl. vii. 20. 1 John i. 8. Jam. iii. 2. Rom. vii. 14-25: the saints, while here, are in a state of spiritual warfare with Satan and his temptations, with sin and its motions, and with the world and its pattern and influence. 2 Cor. ii. 11. Gal. v. 17, 24. Rom. vii. 23. 1 John ii. 15, 16. That the holiness of our nature and practice is of unspeakable moment, appears from its being the end of all the offices of Christ, Matt. i. 21. Tit. ii. 11, 12, 14. Heb. ii. 10, 11, and ix. 14. and x. 19-22. and xiii. 12. Psal. cx; the end of his debasement, and his exaltation, Tit. ii. 14. 1 Pet. i. 19. and ii. 21. Eph. v. 1, 4, 25-27; the end of the Holy Ghost, in his whole work on Christ, and his church, Tit. iii. 5, 6. Ezek. xxxvi. 27; the end of all the precepts, promises, and providences of God, Matt. xxii. 37, 38. 2 Cor. vii. 1. 1 John iii. 3. Rom. ii. 4. Isa. xxvii. 9; and the end of our election, redemption, effectual calling, justification, adoption, and spiritual comfort, Eph. i. 4, 5. 1 Cor. xvi. 19, 20. 2 Tim. i. 9. Rom. vi. 14. 2 Cor. vi. 18. 1 John iii. 1-3. Rom. v. 21. and vi. 1, 2. Good works, or holiness in practice, are neither necessary to change God's purpose relative to us, Mal. iii. 6.

Jam. i. 17; nor to qualify us for receiving Jesus Christ as a Saviour, Isa. lv. 1. Rev. xxii. 17; nor to found our title to Christ's righteousness, or what is purchased by it, whether grace or glory, 1 Tim. i. 1. Tit. iii. 5. Gal. ii. 20. 1 Pet. iii. 16. Col. ii. 6. Phil. iii. 9; but they are necessary as the fruits of salvation, Matt. i. 21. Rom. xi. 26; necessary as correspondent with the nature of these divine persons, in fellowship with whom our happiness lies, Lev. xi. 44, 45. 1 John iv. 8, 16, 19. Heb. xii. 28, 29: necessary as corresponding to what Father, Son, and Holy Ghost do for us, in our election, redemption, effectual calling, justification, adoption, comfort, and glorification, Eph. i. 4. Tit. ii. 14. John xvii. 15, 17. Ezek. xxxvi. 25-31. Acts xxvi. 18; necessary as an obedience to the will of God, our Sovereign and God, Exod. xx. 2-18; necessary as expressions of our gratitude to God for his kindness, Luke i. 74, 75. Rom. vi. 1, 2, 15. Psal. c. 2-4. and cxvi. 16; necessary as fruits and evidences of our union to Christ, faith in him, and justification by his imputed righteousness, Col. ii. 6. Jam. ii. 17-24; necessary to adorn our profession, and so to gain others to Christ, and to a useful and comfortable method of living in the world, Tit. ii. 10. 1 Pet. ii. 9. and iij. 1, 2. 1 Cor. vi. 20. and vii. 16. Matt. v. 16; necessary as means of our present happiness and comfort. 2 Cor. i. 12. 1 John i. 6. Psal. cxix. 6, 165. Prov. iii. 17; and, in fine, necessary as a proper preparation for the heavenly blessedness. 1 John iii. 2, 3. Rom. ii. 7. and viii. 9. Heb. xii. 14. Gal. v. 22-25. Sanctification is founded upon, and mightily influenced by our free justification through the imputed righteousness of Christ. (1.) Justification frees from the curse of the law, which binds one under the ruling power of sin. 1 Cor. xv. 56. Gal. iii. 13. Rom. vi. 14. and vii. 4. (2.) Herein the wisdom, love, power, justice, mercy, and truth of God, are legally engaged to bestow sanctification on the persons justified, as the earnest and meetness of that eternal life to which they are adjudged in justification. Rom. v. 21. 2 Tim. iv. 8. (3.) The blood of Jesus Christ applied to our consciences, doth in a real, but inconceivable manner, purge it from dead works, to serve the living God. 1 Tim. i. 5. Heb. ix. 14. and x. 22. (4.) The believing persuasion of our justification through Jesus' righteousness, by our therein perceiving the constraining love of Christ, the goodness, greatness, and holiness of God, the purity, goodness, and high and indispensable obligation of the law as a rule, and the amazing vileness and dreadful desert of sin, and the beauty of holiness, and the certainty of strength for, and reward of it, effectually excites us to holiness in all manner of conversation. 2 Cor. v. 14. Gal. iii. 14. Matt. iii. 15. and v. 17, 18. Zech. xii. 10. and x. 12. Isa. xlv. 24.

SANCTUARY; a holy or sanctified place, as, (1.) The Holy of holies, where the ark and its appurtenances, and the cloud representing the divine glory, stood, Lev. iv. 6; or the furniture of this holy place. Numb. x. 21. (2.) The apartment where the golden candlestick, table of shew-bread, altar of incense, &c. stood.

2 Chron. xxvi. 18. (3.) The whole tabernacle or temple. Josh. xiv. 26. 2 Chron. xx. 8. It was called the sanctuary of strength, because it was a strong place, and easily fortified, and it belonged to God the strength of Israel, Dan. xi. 31; a wordly sanctuary, as it was of a carnal and typical nature. Heb. xi. 1. Nay, the sacred courts are sometimes included, and called the sanctuary. Lev. xii. 4. (4.) Any place appointed for the public worship of God. Psal. lxxiii. 17. (5.) Canaan, which was a holy land, where God's people dwelt, where his tabernacle and temple were fixed, and where his favours and his peculiar presence were enjoyed. Exod. xv. 17. (6.) Heaven, where God and his holy angels and saints for ever dwell. Psal. cii. 19. Heb. viii. 2. (7.) The temples of idols are called sanctuaries. Isa. xvi. 12. Amos vii. 9. (8.) In allusion to the Jewish sanctuary, whose brazen altar protected petty criminals, a place of refuge and shelter is called a sanctuary. Isa. viii. 14. Ezek. xi. 16.

SAND. As its particles are innumerable, great multitudes are likened to the sand of the sea. Gen. xxii. 17. and xxxii. 12. Sand is heavy, but Job's grief is said to be heavier, Job vi. 3; a fool's wrath is heavier than the sand and gravel, it is more insupportable, being without cause, measure, or end. Prov. xxvii. 3. As sand is a sinking and slippery foundation, false foundations of religion, or ill-grounded hopes of future happiness, are likened to it. Matt. vii. 26. Though sand is easily washed away, yet God has made it the boundary of the raging sea. Jer. v. 22.

SANDALS, at first, were only soles fastened on the feet with strings or thongs; afterwards they were covered; and finally, shoes were called by this name. Mark vi. 9. Acts xii. 8.

SANHE-DRIM, or SENATE; the chief council of the Jewish nation. Acts v. 21. It is said to have consisted of seventy or seventy-two judges, and to have taken its rise from the instalment of the seventy elders assistant to Moses, Numb. xi.; to have continued till the birth of Christ, and a long time after; and to have sat in the form of a half moon, at the tabernacle or temple. But, as we find no vestiges of this court in the Old Testament, we can hardly believe it to have existed till some time after the captivity, perhaps in the days of the Maccabees. Whatever power Herod took from them, to punish their intended condemnation of him, it is certain this court afterward existed, and Christ and his apostles, and Stephen the deacon, were brought before them, and the former condemned. John xi. 47. Matt. xxvii. 1. Acts iv—vi; but at that time they had no power of condemning to death. John xviii. 31. Multitudes of things concerning this court are told us by some writers, but as they are warranted by no good authority, we dismiss them as unworthy our regard. See JUDGES.

A variety of ancient states had also their senates or chief councils, as the Athenians, Carthaginians, and Romans: but they could not make laws, or elect magistrates, without the concurrence of the people. The Roman senate had none directly under them to execute their orders, and so were obliged to direct their decrees to the consuls with an air of submission, and often the tribunes of the people stopped the execution of their mandates. The modern states of Venice, Genoa, Lucca, Lubeck, Holland, &c. have their senates: nor is our parliament much different.

SAPPHIRE, a transparent jewel, which, in its finest state, is extremely beautiful and valuable, and in lustre, hardness, and worth, second only to the diamond. It is of a pure blue colour, and the finest are of a deep azure. In the less fine, it varies into paleness, but of a lustre much superior to the crystal. The best sapphires come from Pegu in the East Indies; nor are those of Bohemia and Silesia contemptible. The ancient sapphire was but a more beautiful kind of the Lazuli, or a half transparent stone of a deep blue, tinged with white, and spotted with stars of a golden colour. It was the second stone in the high priest's breast-plate, and might represent the saints as pure and heavenly minded. Exod. xxviii. 18. It was the second foundation of the New Jerusalem, and might represent Christ as the untainted Lord from heaven, and his pure and heavenly truths. Rev. xxi. 19. Isa. liv. 11. God's throne of appearance to the Hebrews, was like unto sapphire, that is, was a sky of a bright azure colour. Exod. xxiv. 10. The Jewish Nazarites were polished as sapphires; they looked fresh, clean, and comely. Lam. iv. 7. The king of Tyre had his crown and clothes set or hung thick with sapphires, emeralds, and other precious stones. Ezek. xxviii. 13.

SARAH, SARAI, the wife of ABRAHAM, was probably the same as Israh the daughter of Haron, Abraham's brother, and the granddaughter of Terah, but not by Abraham's mother. Gen. xx. 12. and xi. 29. She perhaps was first called Sarai, my mistress, when she became the head of a family, and was called Sarah, the lady, after her being the mother of a multitude was divinely secured. Gen. xvii. Her beauty endangered her chastity in Egypt. She advised Abraham to go in to Hagar, that she might have the promised seed by her means, and was punished with Hagar's contempt. This excited her angry expostulation with Abraham, and hard usage of Hagar. Just before the destruction of Sodom, Sarah overhearing the angel's promise of a son to her, laughed in a way of unbelieving contempt, as if she were too old for child-bearing, and was sharply rebuked by the angel. She added to her guilt the denial of it. She had scarcely conceived, when her beauty, and her falsely affirming herself to be Abraham's sister, endangered her chastity at the court of Abimelech king of Gerar. When she was above ninety years old, she bore Isaac, and suckled him for three years. On his being weaned, she was provoked with Ishmael's ill usage of Isaac, and never rested till Hagar and he were quite expelled from the family. Not long after the intended sacrifice of Isaac, (which she seems to have known nothing of till it was over) Sarah died at Hebron, aged one hundred and twenty-three years, and was buried in the cave of Mach-pelah. Gen. xii. xvi. xviii. xx. xxi. and xxiii. The Holy Ghost represents her as a noted believer, an eminent pattern of honouring her husband, and an emblem of the covenant of grace, and the gospel dispensation. Heb. xi. 11. 1 Pet. iii. 6. Gal. iv. 22—31. (2.) Sarah, or Sherah, the daughter of Asher. Numb. xxvi. 46.

SARAPH and JO'ASH, who had dominion, perhaps as David's deputies, in the country of Moab, were not, as some assert, Mahlon and Chilion the sons of Naomi, as they were poor and distressed, not rulers. 1 Chron. iv. 21.

SAR'DIS; an ancient city of Lesser Asia, at the foot of Mount Timolus. It is said to have been built soon after the destruction of Troy, about A. M. 8100. In the time of Cyrus, it was the capital of Lydia, or LUD, and was extremely rich and glorious. It was taken by Cyrus, and plundered; but it continued a place of no small consequence. After it had greatly suffered from war, it was entirely ruined by an earthquake, in the time of our Saviour. By Tiberius the Roman emperor's orders, it was rebuilt, but never recovered its ancient splendor. A Christian church was early planted here; but the vigour of inward piety quickly decayed. The glorified Jesus, sent them, by John, a corrective epistle, pointing out their spiritual languor and hypocrisy, and charging them quickly to endeavour their removal, as they might otherwise expect a sudden punishment. There still remain some vestiges of Christianity here, with a bishop; but since the place fell into the hands of the Saracens and Turks, it has gradually dwindled, and nothing now remains but a tolerable inn, some cottages for shepherds, and heaps of old ruins. Rev. iii. 1—6.

SARDINE, or SAR-DI'US; a precious stone of a red colour. The best come from about Babylon. It was the sixth foundation of the New Jerusalem, and the first jewel in the high priest's breast-plate. It might represent Jesus and his saints in their sufferings. Rev. xxi. 20. Exod. xxviii. 17. God is likened to a sardine stone, to signify his majesty, and his terrible wrath and vengeance on his enemies. Rev. iv. 3.

SATAN; a name of the devil, importing him to be an implacable enemy to the honour of God, and the true interests of men. He tempted our first parents in paradise; deceived Job of his substance and health, and tempted his friends to reproach him; tempted David to defile Bathsheba, and to number the Hebrews; he caused Ahab's prophets to seduce him to war against Ramoth-gilead. Gen. iii. Job i. ii. &c. 2 Sam. xii. 1 Chron. xxi. 1 Kings xxii. He even tempted our Saviour to distrust, to self-murder, and to worship himself; tempted Judas to betray his Lord, and Peter to deny him; and induced Ananias and his wife to dissemble with the apostles concerning the price of their field. Matt. iv. 1—11. and xvi. 23. John xiii. 17. Luke xxii. 23. Acts v. 5. His power was long established in the world; and by the erection of the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and especially the Roman empires, he attempted to fortify it against all attacks of the expected Messiah; but God made them all contribute to the furtherance and spread of the gospel. By the preaching of the gospel, and working of miracles by Christ and his apostles, and by the overturning of heathenism, his kingdom was overthrown. Matt. xii. 26. Luke x. 17, 18. John xii. 31. and xvi. 11. Rev. ii. 9. See ANGEL, DEVIL.

Peter is called Satan, because, in reproving Christ's intention to suffer, he performed Satan's work, and by his direction. Matt. xvi. 23.

SATIATE; to fill plentifully. Jer. xxxi. 14, 25. The sword is satiated with blood, when there is a great slaughter made. Jer. xvi. 10.

SATISFY; to give till there be sufficient. A man's appetite is satisfied, when he receives a full meal. Prov. vi. 30. The mind is satisfied, when it receives all the comforts, delights, and blessings wished for. Psal. xci. 16. and cxlv. 16. A good man is satisfied from himself; Christ and his Spirit and grace lodged in his heart, and not external things, as wealth or honour, are the source of his comfort. Prov. xiv. 14. and xii. 14. What wicked men gain by their works satisfies not, i. e. is not true and substantial happiness. Isa. lv. 2. Men are satisfied with the breasts of their wife, and ravished with her love, when so delighted with their own wife, as to desire, or put no other in her stead. Prov. v. 19. An angry foe is satisfied, when he takes full revenge. Exod. xv. 9. The ground is satisfied, when it receives plenty of rain. Job xxxviii. 27.

SATYR; a fabulous being, represented by the ancients by half a man and half a goat. It was perhaps the horned owl, or a kind of ape, plenty of which haunted the ruins of Babylon. Isa. xiii. 21. It may be that devils often appeared in this shape to some of the heathen.

SAVE; (1.) To protect or deliver from temporal danger and distress. Matt. xiv. 30. So Othniel and others, whom God used as instruments in delivering the Hebrews from their oppression and misery, are called saviours. Judg. iii. 9. Nea. ix. 27. Judas Maccabeus, and his brethren and successors, who delivered the Jews from the slavery and idolatrous impositions of the Syro-grecians, and subdued the Edomites, were the saviours on Mount Zion, who judged the mount of Esau. Obad. 21. (2.) To deliver from the guilt and power of sin; render men holy and happy. Matt. i. 21. especially in the heavenly state of perfect blessedness. Matt. x. 22. God saves men, by delivering them from distress, temporal, spiritual, and eternal. John xii. 27. 1 Tim. i. 9. He was the Saviour of Israel in the desert, delivering them from unnumbered perils and troubles. Isa. lxiii. 8. He is the Saviour of all men, delivering them from dangers and trouble, and giving them multitudes of favours; but especially of them that believe; whom, through the Son and Spirit, he rescues from sin and misery, to everlasting holiness and happiness. 1 Tim. iv. 10. He saves men by his name, and judges them by his strength, when, to the honour of his power and other perfections, he delivers them from distress, temporal or spiritual. Psal. liv. 4. Jesus Christ is the only and all-sufficient Saviour:

as a Surety, he undertook and paid all our debt of obedience and satisfaction to the broken covenant of works: as a Mediator and Redeemer, he, by his blood and Spirit, made and maintains peace between God and us sinful offenders; and by price and power, he rescues us from the slavery of the broken law, and of sin, Satan, the world, and death: as a Priest, he gave himself a sacrifice of infinite value to atone for the guilty, and he makes perpetual intercession with God in our behalf: as a Prophet, he delivers from ignorance, and gives the true knowledge of every essential truth: as a king, he fully rescues us from sin and Satan, and brings us to himself; he rules, directs, and draws us by his word and Spirit; he defends us from, restrains, and conquers our enemies, and, in due time, transports us to mansions of bliss. 1 Tim. i. 15. Heb. vii. 25. Isa. xlii. 11. 2 Pet. i. 1, 11. He is the Saviour of the world; is equally suited to the case of sinful men on earth, and is in the gospel-promise given and exhibited to them, whether they be Jews or Gentiles. 1 John iv. 14. John iv. 42. and iii. 15, 16.

We are saved by the grace of God, as it is the original cause of our salvation, and all the means by which it is effected. Eph. ii. 8. We are saved by God's word, as it exhibits and offers salvation to us; and by it the Holy Ghost applies salvation to the soul. Jam. i. 21. Saved by faith, as it discerns and receives Christ and his salvation. Luke vii. 50. Saved by baptism, as by it salvation is sealed and applied to such as believe. 1 Pet. iii. 21. Saved by ministers and Christians, as they publish the doctrines and offers of salvation, and warn, beseech, and excite men to receive it. Rom. xi. 14. 1 Cor. vii. 16. Jude 23. 1 Tim. iv. 16. Men are saved as by fire, when they are delivered from the greatest danger of ruin, and when almost all their works are rejected. 1 Cor. iii. 15. The righteous are scarcely saved; with great difficulty the Jewish Christians escaped ruin from the Roman armies, along with their country; and it is not without fear and hazard that the righteous escape the vengeance of hell. 1 Pet. iv. 18. Women are saved in child-bearing amidst great danger they are ordinarily preserved in the birth of children; and though their sex introduced sin, many of them are saved eternally, through the incarnation and obedience of Christ. 1 Tim. ii. 15.

SALVATION is, (1.) A deliverance from temporal dangers and enemies. Exod. iv. 13. 1 Sam. xiv. 45. (2.) Deliverance from a state of sin and misery, into a state of union with Christ, in which we are justified by his blood, adopted into his family, sanctified by his Spirit, and comforted by his presence;—a deliverance from spiritual danger and distress, to a comfortable and quiet condition. Rom. i. 16. (3.) Eternal happiness, in which men shall be freed from sin and sorrow, and shall enjoy the most perfect and lasting fellowship with God. 1 Pet. i. 9. Heb. i. 14.

God is called Salvation, and the God of salvation; he delivers from distress, and bestows comfort, temporal, spiritual, or eternal. Psal. xxvii. 1. and lxviii. 20. Christ is called Salvation, as he is the purchaser and bestower of our everlasting freedom from evil, and enjoyment of happiness. Luke ii. 30. Isa.

xliv. 6. Salvation is ascribed to God and Christ, as they contrived, purchased, prepared, and bestowed it. Rev. vii. 10. and xix. 1.

The Gospel is called salvation, and the word, gospel, or bringer of salvation: as by it salvation is published, offered, and applied to us. Heb. ii. 3. Acts xiii. 26. Eph. i. 13. Tit. ii. 11.

Salvation is of the Jews; Christ the Saviour sprung of them; the gospel proceeded from them to the gentiles. John iv. 22. The long-suffering of God to the Jews and others, is salvation; is calculated to promote the everlasting happiness of some. 2 Pet. iii. 15. Salvation and strength came to the church, when by means of Constantine, she was delivered from heathen persecution, and her constitution established by the civil law. Rev. xii. 10. That turns to our salvation, which tends to promote our spiritual and eternal happiness. Phil. i. 19. Men work out their own salvation, when they receive Jesus the Saviour, and walking in him prepare for the future blessedness of the heavenly state. Phil. ii. 12. Confession and repentance are to salvation, as they are means of our preparation for further grace and glory. Rom. x. 10. 2 Cor. vii. 10.

SAUL, the son of Kish, a Benjaminite. About the time when the Hebrews so loudly insisted for a king, to render them like the nations around, the asses of Kish strayed, and Saul and a servant were sent to seek them. After they had searched a considerable time without any success, the servant proposed to Saul, that they should consult Samuel the seer, or prophet, who lived at no great distance, by whom it was possible information might be obtained respecting them. Some maidens of the place directed them to him. Samuel, who had that very day called the chief persons of the district to a sacrifice which he intended to offer, being directed by God, welcomed Saul, told him the asses were found, and intimated to him that there was a design on foot to make him the king of Israel.

As Saul belonged to one of the smallest families of the least tribe of the Hebrew nation, he was greatly surprised at the news. At the feast on the flesh of the sacrifice, Saul was placed at the head of the table, and had a whole shoulder served up to him, to mark his distinguished honour, and his need of strength and authority. As Saul lodged with Samuel that night, they had a secret conference on the top of the house. On the morrow, as Samuel accompanied Saul out of the place, he bade the servant pass on before them; and then, with a vial of oil, anointed Saul in the name of the Lord, to be king over Israel; and to assure him of the validity of his appointment, gave him a threefold token, viz. that near Rachel's grave, he should meet two men who would inform him that the asses were found: that in the plain of Tabor, a little distant, three men on their journey to worship the Lord at Bethel, where it seems there was then a high place, should make him a present of two of their loaves: and that at the hill of God, (i. e. where the ark then stood at Kirjath-jearim, or at Gibeon where the tabernacle was,) he should light on a company of prophets praising God, and being influenced by the same spirit, should join in that exercise. These events happened accordingly, and the last occasioned the proverb, Is Saul the son of Kish among the prophets? Almost immediately after, A. M. 3009, or 3939, Samuel assembled the Hebrews at Mizpeh, to receive their new king. The Lord's choice was manifested by the casting of lots. The lot fell on the tribe of Benjamin, and then on the family of Matri, then on the house of Kish, and eventually upon Saul, who had hid himself among the baggage of the congregation. By the direction of God, he was found; and being presented before the people, he was found to be taller by the head than any of them. The people shouted, and congratulated him on his honours. Samuel then declared to the assembly the laws of their kingdom, and wrote them in a book. God endowed Saul with qualifications for government. The body of the people went home; but a band of men, divinely instigated, clave to him as his honorary guard. Meanwhile, some contemned him as incapable of his office; but he overlooked the affront, and returned to his wonted labour. 1 Sam. ix. and x.

About a month after, the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead being terribly distressed by a siege from Nahash the Ammonite, besought their brethren to relieve them before the seven days of their truce were ended. When the news of their case came by their messengers to Gibeah, the people wept and cried. Saul, as he returned from ploughing, being informed of the cause, hewed a yoke of his oxen to pieces, and sent them by messengers into all the parts of the Hebrew territories, charging the people to attend him and Samuel at Bezek without delay, otherwise their oxen should in like manner be hewn to pieces. The people, moved thereto by God, assembled so quickly, that in five days, or perhaps less, he had an army of 30,000 men of Judah, and 300,000 of the other tribes. Crossing the river Jordan, and marching all night, they, about the break of the seventh day, divided into three bodies, attacked the Ammonites suddenly, and cut them to pieces before the walls of Jabesh-gilead. This victory gained Saul the universal regard of his nation; and they were for killing such as had formerly contemned him. Saul wisely interposed to prevent this; and soon after had his royal authority confirmed to him by Samuel at Gilgal.

When Saul had reigned about two years, he levied a standing army of 3000 men; 2000 he kept with himself, and the rest were headed by Jonathan his eldest son. With these they attempted to wrest from the Philistines the strong holds they had retained from the birth of Samson, or perhaps had lately seized at Michmash, Bethel, and Gibeah, in the very heart of the country. On the news of Jonathan's defeat of the garrison at Michmash, the Hebrews took heart, and in great numbers assembled at Gilgal, to drive out the enemy; but they wanted arms, as the Philistines had carried off most of the armour, and all the smiths out of the country. Informed of their meeting, the Philistines, (perhaps assisted by the Phœnician or Arabian shepherds, now expelled from Egypt,) marched a prodigious army against them. The terrified Hebrews dispersed, and hid themselves in dens and caves, no more than six hundred remaining with Saul. In his panic, Saul, instead of waiting full seven days for Samuel, as he ought,—on the seventh offered sacrifice to the Lord himself. He had scarcely offered his oblation, when Samuel came and rebuked him for his invasion of the priestly office: he told him, that for this the Lord should transfer the royalty to another, who would act more agreeably to his mind. Samuel, Saul, and Jonathan, with the six hundred men who remained, marched from Gilgal to Gibeah. Jonathan and his armour-bearer having climbed up a rock, and routed an advanced garrison of the Philistines, Saul's sentinels observed it; and he finding that Jonathan and his armour-bearer were absent, called Ahiah the high priest, to consult the Lord whether he should attack the enemy. But before the priest had time to do so, Saul hearing a great noise, and finding that the army of the Philistines were employed in killing one another, he pursued them, and the Hebrews coming out of their caves, assisted him; they pursued the enemy, slaying all along as far as Ajalon on the west, and Bethel on the east. The rout had been still more complete, had not Saul, by a rash course, condemned to death the person who should stop the pursuit, by taking the least refreshment till night. As Jonathan, who knew nothing of the prohibition, followed the enemy through a wood, he dipped his staff in some honey that dropped from a tree, and tasted a little of it. In the evening Saul consulted the Lord whether he should attack the camp of the Philistines by night. To punish him for commencing the pursuit, without waiting the divine allowance, and for his rash adjuration, the Lord gave him no answer. Suspecting the wickedness of some other than himself to be the cause, he rashly devoted the criminal to death. Lots were cast to find him out, and at the second throw, Jonathan was taken. Though his excuse was good, his father told him he must die: but the people would not allow that he who had been so instrumental in their deliverance, should be slain for no crime. After this, Saul kept a standing army commanded by Abner his cousin, and forced into it such valiant men as he pleased. With considerable success he made war on the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Philistines. 1 Sam. xii.—xiv.

About A. M. 3931, or 3941, Saul was ordered by the Lord to cut off the whole nation of the Amalekites, with the whole of their cattle. Assembling his army at Telaim, on the south of Canaan, he found that it consisted of 10,000 men of Judah, and 200,000 of the rest of the tribes. With these he ravaged the country of Amalek, from Shur on the west, to Havilah on the east, slew multitudes of the people, and their cattle, but saved AGAG the king, and the best of the cattle and spoil. On his return, he erected a monument of his success at South Carmel. When Samuel came to the army at Gilgal, Saul told him he had fully executed the divine orders. What, then, (said Samuel,) means this bleating of the sheep? Saul told him that the people had brought the best of the herds and flocks to be a sacrifice to the Lord, and that he had spared Agag the king. Samuel told him it was most wicked for him, who was only the viceregent of heaven, to rebel against the Lord, and spare what he thought fit. As Saul still blamed the people for preserving the cattle for a sacrifice, Samuel told him that God regarded obedience more than sacrifice, and that their disobedience was as bad as witchcraft and idolatry, which sin, Saul was very zealous against; and that since he had rejected the divine commandment, God had determined to dethrone him and his family. At last Saul confessed his sin, and entreated Samuel to supplicate of God forgiveness of it. As Samuel refused, and was going away, Saul held his garment till it rent. Thus, (said Samuel,) shall God rend the kingdom from you, and give it to one better. Saul then begged that Samuel would at least honour him before the people, that they might not contemn him, and rebel. Samuel complied so far as to join with him in public worship; and after hewing Agag in pieces before the altar, went off, and never again visited Saul. It was perhaps about this time that Saul murdered the Gibeonites, imagining this indiscreet zeal would atone for his neglecting to destroy the Amalekites. 1 Sam. xv.

About A.M. 2935, or 2941, Samuel anointed David to be king of Israel, and the spirit of government departed from Saul, and an evil spirit of melancholy troubled him. To allay his melancholy, he was advised to obtain a skillful musician to divert him, David was selected for this purpose, and his music soothed Saul's mind, while his good behaviour gained him his affection, and he became his armour-bearer. Saul recovering, David returned to feed his flock. Some years after, when the Philistines invaded the Hebrew territories, and pitched in Ephes-dammim, while Saul and his army encamped in the valley of Elah, Goliath having defied and terrified the Hebrews, Saul promised his eldest daughter to the man who should attack and kill him. David coming from his flock, accepted the challenge, slew him, and gained the prize; but the women in their songs at the army's return attributing the victory chiefly to David, Saul was highly displeased, and sought a proper opportunity to murder him. One day, as David was playing on the harp to divert his melancholy, Saul threw a javelin to kill him; but David avoided the stroke. With no good intention, he gave David the command of 1000 of his troops; and with no intention to bestow her, but to prompt David to rush upon danger, he promised him in marriage Merab his eldest daughter; but he gave her to Adriel the Meholathite, to whom it seems she bare five sons, who were brought up by Michal, and hanged by the Gibeonites, with the permission of David. Hearing that Michal his younger daughter was in love with David, he caused some of his courtiers to inform him that he might have her for one hundred foreskins of the Philistines. By these terms he intended to render David odious to the Philistines, and to endanger his life. David's reputation daily increasing, Saul resolved to have him murdered at any rate. For some time Jonathan diverted it; but Saul, in his melancholy, again attempted it. David however escaped to his house: there Saul sent a body of his troops to besiege him; but Michal, who was now married to David, let him down from a window, and deceived her father's messengers with a pretence that he was sick, till he was out of their reach, and then by falsehood excused herself to her father. Hearing that David had escaped to Samuel at Najoth of Ramah, he repeatedly sent messengers to apprehend him; but a prophetic influence seized them as soon as they came near the place. He then went thither himself; but a similar influence caused him to prophesy, and detained him till David had time to escape. He was highly disappointed with David's absence at the feast of the new moon, as he then intended to murder him; and because Jonathan excused him, he was outrageously reproached, and a javelin thrown to kill him. 1 Sam. xvii-xx.

Not long after, as Saul heavily complained to his servants that none of them was so faithful as to discover David's accomplices, Doeg his chief herdsman, an Edomite, reported, that while he attended at the tabernacle for some purification, he saw Ahimelech the high priest give David and his attendants a supply of the sacred provision; that he inquired of the Lord in his favour; and also gave him the sword of Goliath. The innocent high priest was sent for, and accused and condemned; and he, and eighty-four of his fellow-priests, with all the persons of Nob, and even the cattle, were by Saul's orders murdered by Doeg. It seems he intended to have murdered the family of Jesse; but David conveyed his parents into the country of Moab. Hearing that David was in Keilah, a fortified city, he thought to apprehend him there. Soon after, on the information of the Ziphites, who invited him, he pursued him with an army in the wilderness of Maon; but when he had nearly overtaken him, an invasion of the Philistines obliged him to return. Soon after, he pursued David in the wilderness of Engedi, and had his skirt cut off by David, in a cave. He was so moved by David's generosity in saving his life, when it was in his power to take it, that he wept, and acknowledged his wickedness in seeking to murder a person so innocent. Upon a second invitation of the Ziphites, Saul again sought for David in the wilderness of Maon. A second instance of David's generous forbearance, in sparing his life, when he penetrated into his camp in the night, and carried off his spear and his drinking cup, made Saul again acknowledge his innocence. Soon after, hearing that David had taken shelter among the Philistines, he gave over all thoughts of getting him murdered. 1 Sam. xxii-xxiv. xxvi. and xxvii.

About A.M. 3949, the Philistines invaded his kingdom, and encamped in the very heart of it, at Shunem near Jezreel. In his distress Saul asked counsel of God, but received no answer. According to the commandment of God, he had formerly cut off the witches: but now, when rejected of God, he, in disguise, applied to a witch at Endor, to bring him up Samuel from the dead, to show him what he should do. After several spells of enchantments, she with terror cried out, that he had deceived her, for he was Saul. Being assured that she had nothing to fear, she told him, she saw gods ascending out of the earth, an old man covered with a mantle. Perceiving it to be Samuel, Saul bowed himself, and told the spectre, that he had taken this course to consult him, as he was greatly distressed by the Philistines, and God refused to give him any direction. The spectre told him, that he need expect no success, as God was departed from him, and that his kingdom should be quickly taken from him, and given to David; that the Hebrews should be routed, and himself and his sons slain, and be with him on the morrow. Some think that Satan, by means of this woman, was permitted to deceive Saul, by assuming the appearance of Samuel: others suppose that God, to punish Saul's sinful curiosity, might (not by means of, but at the time of the enchantments,) cause Samuel to appear, and denounce Saul's ruin to him. As we have no certainty that Saul saw any apparition, some think there might be no appearance at all, but merely a voice, and that the form was only a pretence of the witch. We cannot believe there was any thing here, but the devil in the likeness of Samuel. This likeness, and a pretence to be Samuel, was the reason of his being so called. Samuel had not to ascend out of the earth, as this spectre did, but to come down from heaven. It is absurd to imagine that God would raise one from the dead to answer Saul, when he refused to answer him by more common methods; absurd to suppose a glorified saint subject to infernal enchantments; or that God would do any thing tending to honour diabolical arts. Nothing in the history evinces the spectre to be a prophet. That God would take Saul's kingdom from him, and give it to David, was publicly known from the posture of affairs, it was natural to infer, that the Hebrews should be routed, and Saul and his family slain: and besides, who knows not, that God may, for holy ends, give devils knowledge of some future events? Nay, the very speech of this spectre tends to prove him a devil. He never intimates the sinfulness of dealing with wizards, though for this very sin Saul was cut off. 1 Chron. x. 12, 13. He pretends, that Samuel in his glorified state had been disquieted by Saul. He pretends, that Saul, and his sons, in general, should on the morrow be with him, whereas two of his sons, Armoni and Mephibosheth, lived long after, and were hanged by the Gibeonites, and Ishbosheth lived several years. Nor can we believe, that wicked Saul and godly Jonathan could be ever together with this spectre, either in heaven or hell. And, in fine, when we consider how long Saul tarried with the witch, and had to return to his army; and that meanwhile David was dismissed from the camp of the Philistines, and went as far as the south border of Canaan, and routed the Philistines, who had burnt Ziklag, it can scarcely be believed that Saul and his sons could be slain on the morrow after. It is certain, that Saul fainted with terror at the spectre's speech, and was hardly prevailed on to take refreshment. He then travelled all night to his troops. When the battle was fought, the Hebrews were routed; but they maintained a running fight till they came to Gilboa: there, taking advantage of the ground, they attempted to rally, but were overpowered by the enemy. Jonathan, Abinadab, and Melchishua, Saul's sons, were slain.

After Saul had fought to the utmost, and was hard pressed by the arrows of the enemy, he begged his armour-bearer would run his sword through him, and prevent his falling into the hand of the uncircumcised foes. The armour-bearer refusing, Saul fell upon his own sword. The armour-bearer did the like. An Amalekite, who was near, perhaps hastened Saul's death by a thrust of his sword, and brought his crown and bracelets to David. Instead of his expected reward, David ordered him to be slain, as the acknowledged murderer of the king. Next day, the Philistines finding Saul and his three sons among the slain, stripped off their armour, and sent it to the temple of their idol Ashtoreth, cut off their heads, and fixed them in the temple of Dagon; and hung up their bodies on the wall of Bethshan, which then belonged to the Canaanites. Thence the valiant men of Jabesh-gilead took them, and buried them in a grove near to their city, and mourned for their death seven days. David afterward removed them to the sepulchre of Kish at Zelah. Meanwhile, it seems, Abner, Saul's general, and Ishbosheth his son, had fled with the small remains of the army to Mahanaim, eastward of Jordan, and there Ishbosheth was made king, and reigned unhappily a few years. Multitudes too of the Hebrews left their homes and retired beyond Jordan, that they might be as far from the Philistines as possible.

A considerable time after, Mephibosheth and Armoni, the two sons of Saul by Rizpah his concubine, together with five of his grandchildren by Merab, were by David's order given to the Gibeonites, that they might hang them up before the Lord as an atonement for the murder of most of that people by Saul, their father. It seems they hung six months on the gibbet, from March to September, when the Lord by showers of rain shewed that Saul's murder was in this manner expiated. All this time, the affectionate Rizpah watched in sackcloth at the foot of the gibbet, and drove away the birds which attempted to devour them. 1 Sam. xxviii—xxxi. 1 Chron. x. 2 Sam. i. and xxi. SAVOUR; (1.) Scent, or smell. Dead flies cause the apothecary's ointment to send forth a stinking savour, or smell. Eccl. x. 1. (2.) Agreeableness to the taste: hence we read of savoury meat. Gen. xxvii. 4. (3.) That sharp quality in salt, by which it renders other bodies agreeable to the taste. Matt. v. 13. (4.) Character; reputation: thus men's savour becomes abhorred, when their name becomes hateful and detested. Exod. v. 21. Through the scent of water, i. e. by partaking of the influence of the rain or moisture of the earth. Job. xiv. 9. The scent of the church is as the wine of Lebanon, when she delightfully abounds with saints and good works. Hos. xiv. 7. The ancient sacrifices were of a sweet savour, or savour of rest unto God: he accepted of, and delighted in them, as typical of the obedience and suffering of Christ, which sufficiently honour all his perfections, and more than balance our offences. Gen. viii. 21. Exod. xxix. 18. Eph. v. 2. The savour of the knowledge and good ointments of Christ, is the refreshing and pleasant nature of his truth, when known, and of the grace and virtue that proceed from him as our Mediator. 2 Cor. ii. 14. Sol. Song i. 3. Psal. xlv. 8. Faithful ministers are to God a sweet savour of Christ, in their hearers: the faithful discharge of their duty is acceptable to God, whether men be saved by it or not; and are a savour of death unto death to some, and a savour of life unto life to others; they are the occasion of double destruction to unbelievers, and the means of eternal life here and hereafter to others. 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16. To savour the things of men, and not the things of God, is to contrive, choose, and delight in things agreeable to carnal ease, or sinful lusts, and not what is commanded of God, and tends to his honour. Matt. xvi. 23.

SAW, an instrument for cutting wood, stones, &c. The Assyrians are likened to a saw, as by them God punished, tortured, and cut asunder the nations. Isa. x. 15.

SAY. See SPEAK.

SCABBARD. See SHEATH.

SCALES; (1.) The hard covering of fish, which defends the flesh. Lev. xi. 9, 10. (2.) A skin or film on the eye hindering sight. Acts ix. 18. (3.) Balances for weighing commodities. Isa. xl. 12. To scale a place or wall, is to climb up by ladders. To scale the city of the mighty, is to accomplish the most difficult enterprize. Prov. xxi. 22.

SCALL; a dry whitish scab, somewhat like the leprosy. Lev. xiii. 30.

SCANDAL. See OFFEND.

SCANT; too little. Mic. vi. 10.

SCARCE, SCARCELY; with no small difficulty. 1 Pet. iv. 18.

SCARE; to affright. Job vii. 14.

SCARLET; a deep, bright, and shining red colour. Our translators have not every where rightly used this word. TOLAH ought indeed to be rendered scarlet, but SHANI, or double dye, as well as CARMIL, ought to be rendered crimson; but as these colours are near of kin to one another, there is the less importance in mistaking the one for the other. Scarlet was much worn by great men. 2 Sam. i. 24. The scarlet, or crimson, used in the hangings of the tabernacle and the robes of the priests, might denote the royal dignity of Christ, and the blood shedding of him and his church. Exod. xxv. 4. and xxvi. 1. The church's lips are like a thread of scarlet; her ordinances, and the speech of her saints, are deeply connected with the Saviour's righteousness and royal authority, and this proves a soundness of constitution and heart. Sol. Song iv. 3. The scarlet colour of the horse and robes of Antichrist, may typify his royal power, the red hats of his cardinals, and his bloody persecution of the saints. Rev. xvii. 3, 4. Sin is likened to scarlet and crimson, to mark its horrible nature and aggravated heinousness. Isa. i. 18.

SCATTER; (1.) To spread abroad here and there. Psal. cxlvii. 15. (2.) To dispel, dissolve. Job xxxvii. 11. (3.) To drive into different places. Psal. lxxviii. 30. (4.) To overthrow, conquer, confound, destroy. Psal. lxxviii. 14. Luke i. 51. (5.) To deal liberally with the poor. Psal. cxlii. 8. Prov. xi. 24. To scatter the way to strangers under every green tree, is to worship a variety of idols, in a variety of places. Jer. iii. 13. To have the bones scattered, is to be reduced to a deathful and ruinous condition. Psal. liii. 5. and cxli. 7.

SCENT. See SAVOUR.

SCEPTRE. See ROD.

SCÉVA, is said to have been the chief of one of the classes of the Jewish priests; he had seven sons, who, in a vagabond manner, travelled abroad, pretending to exorcise or cast devils out of men. At Ephesus they attempted to cast out one, and adjured him by Jesus whom Paul preached to leave the possessed person. The devil told them that he knew both Jesus and Paul, but paid no regard to them: he immediately attacked them so roughly, by means of the possessed person as his instrument, that he obliged them to flee out of the house naked and sorely wounded. Acts xix. 14—16.

SCHISM. See DIVISION.

SCHOOL. No doubt the most ancient patriarch's instructed their children in the knowledge of God and other important subjects; but for many ages, we find no mention of schools for public instruction. In Samuel's time we find a school at Najoth; and not long after, others at Bethel and Jericho; and to these schools devout persons repaired for instruction, on the Sabbath, and at new-moon festivals. 1 Sam. xix. 18—24. 2 Kings ii. 3, 6. and iv. 23. It appears, by Ezekiel's conferences with the elders, that the Jews instituted schools in Babylon. Ezek. xiv. 1, 2. and xx. 1—3. They were still used in our Saviour's time, and after his death, we find famous schools at Jabneh, at Tiberias, and Babylon. In the Jewish schools the Rabbins had high seats, and the students sat at their feet according to their proficiency. Acts xliii. 3. It seems every body that pleased had liberty to ask questions in their schools. Luke ii. 46. The Egyptians, Chaldeans, Greeks, and Romans, had also their public schools; and now in almost every civilized nation there are schools, colleges, or academies, for every branch of science.

SCHOOLMASTER. See LAW.

SCIENCE; knowledge of human learning. Dan. i. 4. Science falsely so called, is vain philosophy and sinful arts. 1 Tim. vi. 20.

SCOFF; to mock in a proud and reviling manner. The Chaldeans scoffed at kings and princes, when they made such as they had conquered the objects of their cruel mockings. Hab. i. 10. The scoffers of the last day, may be our modern deists, who ridicule divine revelation, and scoff at the method of creation, providence, and redemption, described in the Bible; and discrediting a future judgment, or eternal state, give themselves up to the fulfilment of their lusts. 2 Pet. iii. 3-6.

SCORCH; to burn up with great heat. Rev. xvi. 8, 9.

SCORN; to mock, laugh at. Job xvi. 20. A scorn, is an object of mockery and disdainful reproach. Psal. xlv. 18. A scorner is one who is given to jeer at persons and things of importance; who mocks at sin, and the judgments of God on account of it; scoffs at religion, and the professors and teachers of it; and who derides and hates wholesome reproof and advice. Psal. i. 1. Prov. ix. 8. and xiii. 1. While he pretends to possess and seek after wisdom, he finds it not; but in his haughty and arrogant manner, stirs up contention, and exposes himself and others to the distinguished judgments of God. Prov. xiv. 6. and xxi. 10. xxix. 8. ix. 14. and xix. 20. God scorns the scorners, when he contemns and punishes them, rendering them ridiculous to all around. Prov. iii. 34. If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it; i. e. shalt be punished for thy sin. Prov. ix. 12.

SCORPION; a small animal, whose bladder is full of dangerous poison. It is of a black colour. Its head is very close to its breast. It has two eyes in the middle of its head, and two at the extremity, between which come out two arms, each of which is divided into other two, like the claws of a lobster: nay, it is said, some have six or eight eyes. Its body is shaped like an egg. It has eight feet proceeding from its breast, each of which is divided into six hairy branches, with a claw at the end. The belly is divided into seven rings. The tail proceeds from the last, and is like a string of seven beads; out of the largest, which is at the end, proceed one or two hollow stings, with which it ejects its venom into the part wounded. It is very crafty, and is always striking with its tail, that it may lose no opportunity of doing mischief. It is said to be more mischievous to women, and especially to girls, than to men. It waddles as it goes, and with its feet and snout fixes so fast on a person that it cannot be plucked off but with difficulty; but the best cure for their bite or wound, is to squeeze the creature on it. It is said the dam brings forth eleven young ones, like worms, at a time; and that after they are hatched, they kill their dam. There were hosts of the akrabim, or scorpions, in the Arabian desert. Deut. viii. 15. Numb. xxxiv. 4. Wicked men, the Jews, the Antichristian priests, and the Saracens, are likened to scorpions, to mark their malicious and crafty disposition, and their being given to wound, torment, and murder good men, and such as have least power to withstand them. Ezek. ii. 6. Rev. ix. 3. Whips knotted, or armed with pricks, like a scorpion's tail, are called scorpions. 2 Kings xii. 11, 14.

SCOURGE; a kind of whip of cords, leather thongs, or wands. The Jews were prohibited to give above forty stripes at once; but if the crime was great, the lashes were the more severe. Deut. xxv. 1-3. 2 Cor. xi. 24. The Rabbins pretend, that all crimes whose punishment is not specified, incurred scourging, and that it was not reckoned disgraceful; but Philo the Jew represents it as no less insupportable to a free man than death. The person scourged, being stripped to his middle, was tied by the hand, to a low pillar, and then received the lashes on his bended back. Suspected criminals were sometimes scourged, in order to oblige them to confess their crimes. Acts xxii. 24. Pilate scourged Jesus, in order that he might please the Jews, and so gain their consent to forbear his crucifixion. John xix. 1, 4, 6. Painful slanders and reproaches are called the scourge of the tongue. Job v. 21. God's chastisement of his people, and punishment of his enemies, are called a scourge. Heb. xii. 6. Job ix. 23. Isa. x. 26.

SCRIBE; (1.) A writer who registered the affairs of a king. In the early ages, as few could write, this office was very honourable, being much the same as our secretary of state. Shemaiah, Seraiah, and Sheva, or Shavsha, were scribes to King David. 2 Sam. viii. 17. and xx. 25. Elihoreph and Ahia were scribes to Solomon. 1 Kings iv. 4. Shebna to Hezekiah, and Shaphan to Josiah. 2 Kings xix. 2. and xxii. 8. (2.) The commissary, or muster-master, of an army, who enrolls, calls over their names, and reviews them. 2 Chron. xxvi. 11. 2 Kings xxv. 19. (3.) One who is both a writer and doctor of the law. It seems that they transcribed the books of the scripture, and so became well versed in it. Such scribes seem to have existed as early as the days of Deborah. Judg. v. 14. It seems many of them were of the tribe of Levi. 2 Chron. xxiii. 4. xxiv. 6. and xxiv. 13. Jonathan, Baruch, and Ezra, were scribes: probably they had their education in the schools of the prophets, as we find no other schools in these times. In the time of our Saviour, the scribes were a most wicked class, who perverted the scripture, and extolled the traditions of the elders above it. Matt. xxii. 35. Mark xii. 28. Matt. xxiii.

SCRIP; a bag or pouch. 1 Sam. xvii. 40.

SCRIPTURE; the inspired word of God. See BIBLE.

SCUM; unclean froth on the top of a boiling pot. The wicked Jews of Jerusalem are likened thereto, to signify their villainess and naughtiness. Ezek. xlv. 6, 11, 12.

SCURVY; a disease very frequent in northern countries, especially in moist places exposed to the north. Chariton will have it to arise from saline particles taken into the body by breathing, eating salt provisions, or living in filthy places. Quincy asserts that it arises from the unequal fluidity of the blood; the fibrous part being too thick, and the serous part too thin. It is the cause of many other diseases; and as it arises from very contrary causes at once, it is often extremely difficult of cure. Its most ordinary symptoms are, bleedings, coughing, difficult breathing, stinking breath frequent looseness, sweatings, weariness, faintings, pains of hands and legs; and when the corrupt matter is thrown outward, the skin becomes rough and dry. It frequently degenerates into the dropsy, apoplexy, convulsions, and falling sickness. Gentle purgatives are good remedies; sweet mercury is excellent: nay, perhaps nothing but salivation by mercury will avail in high degrees of the scurvy, and yet that is far from being without danger. Scurvy-grass, water-trefoil, horse-radish, sorrel, sow-thistle, butterbur, elecampane, juniper-berries, mustard-seed, water-cresses, &c. are very useful remedies against this disease; but perhaps a well-regulated diet may be of as much use as them all.

SCYTHIANS; a savage people that dwelt about the east and north of the Euxine and Caspian seas. See Goo.

SEA; a large collection of waters. The Jews, Arabs, and others, call large lakes Seas; thus the lake of Gennesareth, which is but thirteen miles in length, and five in breadth, is called the sea of Tiberias, or the sea of Galilee. It is formed by the Jordan, and abounds with fish. Matt. iv. 18. John vi. 1. The sea of Jazer, which is but a large lake near the head of the river Arnon, is still less. Jer. xlviii. 32. The Salt Sea, Dead Sea, or Sea of Sodom, is the lake Asphar, or Asphaltites, at the south end of Jordan, and south-east border of Canaan. Josephus makes it about seventy-two miles in length, and almost nineteen in breadth; but our modern travellers make it about twenty-four miles in length, and six or seven in breadth. It is said to have been anciently the place of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, and after the burning, to have been sunk by an earthquake; it is pretended by some, that the ruins of these cities are still seen under the water when it is low; but Reland brings many strong arguments, though not perhaps absolutely conclusive, to the contrary. It is certain the valley of Siddim, which was near Sodom, makes part of this sea, Gen. xiv. 3; that this lake receives the river Jordan, the river Arnon, and the brook Kidron, besides other rivulets, and has no visible communication with the sea; and that the great quantity of bitumen, slime, or mineral pitch therein, renders it improper for fish to live in, or for men to drink of it; and the sulphureous steam makes even the fruit on the shore not good in some places.

The gentile world is likened to this Dead Sea, to mark it is cursed of God, disagreeable and useless; and what a miracle of his grace it is, to render it replenished with saints. Ezek. xlvii. 9, 10. The Great Sea is the Mediterranean sea, which runs between Africa, Asia, and Europe, was the western border of Canaan, and is about 3000 miles in length. It is called the Hinder Sea, while the Dead Sea is called the Former Sea; and by these is represented the eastern and western part of the world, where the waters of the gospel and its influences come. Zech. xiv. 8. The Euphrates and the Nile are also called seas. Isa. xxi. 1. Jer. li. 36. Ezek. xxxii. 2. The Red Sea is that arm of the Indian ocean which flows by the straits of Babel-mandel, and runs along the south-west side of Arabia, and the east of Ethiopia and Egypt, to the length of near twelve hundred miles. The Hebrews called it Yam-suph, or the Weedy Sea, because many weeds grew in or on the brink of it. But as the Edomites had long the property and use of it for their shipping, it came to be called the Sea of Edom, which the Greeks translated into the Red Sea, Edom signifying red. Hence some came vainly to imagine, that the water, or its bottom, was reddish. There appears to have been some lake on the east of Jordan, which was also called the Yam-suph, or Red Sea. Numb. xxi. 14. Deut. i. 1. The other more considerable seas in the world, are the Caspian; and, westward from that, the Euxine or Black Sea, both on the south of the Russian empire; and the Baltic, between Germany and Sweden, and on the west of Russia. The largest seas are called Oceans; and that on the west of Africa and Europe, and on the east of America, is called the Atlantic Ocean; that between America and Asia is called the Pacific Ocean, and is about 12,000 miles in length, or breadth, from Asia to America; that on the south of Asia, and south-east of Africa, is the Indian Ocean.

Multitudes of people are likened to the sea, because of their noise, and their overwhelming force. Jer. li. 4. Wicked men are like the troubled sea, that cannot rest, and whose waters cast forth mire and dirt; their condition and minds are quite unsettled; they make a great noise for a while; and daily pour forth the filthiness of wickedness that is in them. Isa. lvii. 21. The abundance of the seas, is converted to the church, when multitudes in Lesser Asia, Europe, and the isles, are turned to the Lord by the gospel, and consecrate their trade and wealth to him. Isa. lx. 5. Am I a sea or a whale, that thou settest a mark over me? Am I like the sea or a whale, quite ungovernable? or, am I able to endure one storm after another, as the sea? Job vii. 12. See LAVER; GLASS; DEEP.

SEAL, (1.) To render or keep a thing secret. Dan. xii. 4. Isa. viii. 16. Rev. x. 4. and xxii. 10. (2.) To mark as a man's peculiar property, and to secure from danger. Sol. Song iv. 12. (3.) To fulfil; make complete. Dan. ix. 24. Ezek. xxviii. 12. Rom. xv. 28. Before the Trojan war, it seems SEALS, or SIGNETS, for marking the wax with which letters were closed, or for marking deeds for ratification, were very rare. The ancient Hebrews wore their seals, or signets, in their rings or bracelets. God's Spirit is called a seal, because by the gracious inhabitation and influence of it, men are marked out for God's property, are distinguished from the world, and are secured against final apostasy and ruin. Eph. i. 13. and iv. 30. God's sealing of Christ, imports his giving him a special commission as Mediator; his furnishing him for his work, and rendering his ministry effectual on the saints. John vi. 27. Rom. vii. 2. God's sealing of his people, denotes his marking them with his Spirit and grace; his causing them to avow his truth: and his preservation of them amidst the general abounding of error and persecution. Rev. vii. 2—8. and ix. 4. The foundation of God having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his, imports that the church, the fundamental truths of the gospel, the gracious state and principal dispositions of his people, are, by God's infallible fore-knowledge and immutable decree, rendered stable, firm, and lasting. 2 Tim. ii. 19. The sealing of God's book of purposes with seven seals, imports the deep obscurity and secrecy of its contents, till discovered by Christ, and gradually opened, in the course of his providence, to the church. The first six relate to the state of the church, and the Romish empire between the beginning of Christ's ministry and A. D. 323, when heathenism was overturned; the seventh reaches from thence to the end of the world. Rev. v. vi. and viii. 1. God seals instruction, when he deeply impruits it on the mind. Job xxxiii. 16. He seals up transgressions as in a bag, when he appears firmly determined to punish them, and every one of them. Job xiv. 7. He seals up the hand, when he deprives men of power and opportunity for labour. Job xxxvii. 7. He seals up the stars, when he hides them with clouds. Job ix. 7. The saints set to their seal that God is true, when they believe his promises, and receive his offered gifts. John iii. 33. They are set as a seal on Christ's heart and arm; great is his love to, and care of them; constant is his remembrance and tender support of them, and intimate their fellowship with him. Sol. Song. viii. 6. Circumcision was a seal of the righteousness of faith; it and other sacraments confirm the saints' interest in Christ and strengthen their faith to believe on, receive, and improve him. Rom. iv. 11. The Corinthian converts were the seal of Paul's apostleship in the Lord; the exertion of the power of God, in the change of their state and nature, by means of his ministrations of the gospel, clearly evinced that he had a true mission from God. 1 Cor. ix. 2. Satan is sealed up during the millennium; he is, by the providence of God, restrained from tempting and ruling over men as he did before. Rev. xx. 30.

SEARCH; (1.) To examine carefully, and seek fully to understand. Lev. xxvii. 33. John v. 39. (2.) To view with great care, in order to know the nature of a thing. Numb. xiii. 2. (3.) To seek, to find, or apprehend. 1 Sam. xxiii. 23. God searching for a thing denotes his perfect knowledge of it, and his discovery of it to others. Zech. i. 12. Rev. ii. 23. 1 Cor. ii. 10. His searching for persons, imports his care to deliver them, or his zeal to punish them effectually. Ezek. xxxiv. 11. Amos ix. 3. God did not find out the idolatry and wickedness of the Jews by diligent search, for it was so open and manifest as not to need to be sought for. Jer. ii. 34. The search of the fathers, is a diligent inquiry into their sentiments, and the events that befel them. Job viii. 8.

SEARED; burnt off, or burnt hard, as flesh is with a hot iron. Men have their conscience seared, when it is so stupefied with the load of unpardoned guilt, and power of inward corruption, that it hesitates at nothing, however horrid and abominable, and so is as bad as no conscience at all. 1 Tim. iv. 2.

SEASON. To season a thing with salt, or spice, &c. that it may keep fresh, or taste well. Lev. ii. 13. Speech is seasoned with the salt of grace, when it proceeds from holy wisdom and love, and tends to honour God, and profit our neighbour. Col. iv. 6. See TIME.

SAT. See SIT.

SEBA. See SHE'BA.

SE'BAT, or SHÉ'BER the fifth month of the Jewish civil, and eleventh of their sacred year: it consisted of thirty days, and the beginning of it answered to part of our January. Zech. i. 7. On the tenth of it, the Jews fast for the death of the elders that outlived Joshua. On the twenty third, they fast in commemoration of the resolution taken to punish the inhabitants of Gibeah. Judg. xx.

SECRET; hidden, or known only to a few. Mark iv. 22. In secret, is in such a place or manner as that few know it, or where one cannot be hurt. Job xl. 13. Psal. xxvii. 5. The secret of God, is, (1.) His purpose concerning persons and nations, and the reasons of his dispensing his mercy and judgment in such a manner and time. Deut. xxix. 29. Amos iii. 7. (2.) His secret favour and blessing, his instructing men in the mysteries of his word and providence, and his directing, succeeding, and protecting them in their station and work. Psal. xxv. 14. The secrets of men are, (1.) That which few do or ought to know; such secret tale-bearers reveal. Prov. xx. 19. (2.) The meaning of a dream or vision which is hard to be known. Dan. iv. 9. (3.) Their inward purposes, dispositions, aims, and acts, which are known only to God and one's self. 1 Cor. xiv. 25. Eccl. xii. 14. Rom. ii. 16. (4.) Those parts of the human body which modesty requires to be covered. Deut. xxv. 11. The secrets of wisdom, are the unknown mysteries contained in the knowledge and practice of true religion, particularly those relating to the divine excellence. Job xi. 6. God's secret place, is where his peculiar presence is, but is unseen, as amidst the flames of Sinai, Psal. lxxxi. 7; and in the temple, chiefly its most holy place. Ezek. vii. 22; or Christ, and intimate fellowship through him, by which one has unseen instruction, and great happiness and safety. Psal. xci. 1. and xxvii. 5.

SECT; a party distinguished by some particular tenets. Among the Jews, in the time of our Saviour, we find the Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, and Herodians. It is hard to say what was the particular rise of the PHARISEES, whether they sprang from the famed Hillel, a doctor of the law, about a hundred and fifty years before Christ. They called themselves Pharisees, or Separatists, because they distinguished themselves from others in their pretences to strictness. They were very numerous and powerful, and sometimes formidable to the kings of their nation, particularly to Hyrcanus and Jannæus; with the last of whom their contentions rendered the nation very miserable. They believed the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body and future rewards for the righteous, whom they reckoned to be only the Jews; and that though the souls of the wicked went directly to hell at their death, yet their bodies never rose again. They believed, that all things, except the fear of God, were subject to fate. They, and all the other sects, looked only for a Messiah to be a temporal prince and mighty deliverer. But that which, as much as any thing, marked them, was their supererogatory attachment to the ceremonial law, their frequent washings, fastings, and prayings, their public alms-deeds, their huntings after proselytes, their scrupulous tithings, their affected gravity of dress, gesture, and mortified looks, their building tombs for the prophets, to mark themselves more righteous than their fathers who murdered them; their over-scrupulous observance of the sabbath, to the exclusion of works of charity and mercy. Meanwhile they neglected mercy, charity, justice, humility, and the like indispensable virtues. The very best of them indulged themselves in every thought and sinful indulgence that came short of the finishing act of sin; while others, under a cloak of religion, indulged themselves in cruelty, dishonesty, and oppression, even of widows. They were excessively zealous for the pretended oral law, and the superstitious traditions of the elders, and preferred them to the oracles of God. They heartily hated and opposed our Saviour, and did all they could to entrap him, and were severely rebuked by him. Matt. xv. and xxiii. and v. 20. and ix. 14, 34. and xvi. 6. Luke v. 30. and vi. 7. and vii. 30. and xi. 39. and xvi. 14. and xv. 2. and xviii. 11, 12. John i. 24. and vii. 32, 48. and xi. 47, 57. At present, most of the Jews are a kind of Pharisees. (2.) The SADDUCEES had their name from one Zadok or Saddoc, who lived about two hundred and eighty years before Christ. His master Antigonus taught, that our service of God should be wholly disinterested, proceeding from pure love, without any regard to future rewards or punishments. Zadok, from this, took occasion to teach, that there were no rewards or punishments, nor even life, in a future state. The Sadducees believed that God was the only immaterial being, and that there was no created angel or spirit; that there was no resurrection of the dead. They reckoned a man absolutely master of all his actions, and that he needed no assistance to do good, or to forbear evil, and so were very severe judges. They rejected all traditions, and stuck to the text of the sacred books; but, like the rest of the Jews, preferred the five books of Moses to the rest. Some have imagined, that they rejected all the sacred books but those of Moses, because our Lord chose to confute them from these; but this reasoning is inconclusive. Had they done so, is it not probable that Josephus, their zealous enemy, would have passed it in silence; nor could they have been admitted to the offices of high priests and judges, as it is certain they were. The Sadducees were generally men of the greatest opulence, and chose to live at their pleasure, without apprehensions of any future account. Hyrcanus the royal high priest of the Jews, it is said, threatened his subjects with death if they would not become Sadducees. His sons, Aristobolus and Jannæus, were not much less zealous; and during the reign of the latter, the whole Sanhedrim, except one Simon, are said to have been Sadducees. Caiaphas, and Ananias the murderer of JAMES the Less, were Sadducees. The Sadducees were zealous opposers of Christ and his apostles. Matt. xxii. 23-32. Acts v. 17. and iv. 1. At the destruction of Jerusalem, the Sadducees were much reduced; they however made some figure in the beginning of the third century. In the sixth, Justinian the emperor condemned them to banishment, and other severe penalties, as persons impious and atheistical. In the eighth, Nachmanides, and in the twelfth, Arpharag, famous rabbins, were strenuous defenders of this sect. Still there are some Sadducees, especially in Africa; but they seldom declare their opinions. To our Deists it is not improper to observe, that we never hear of one Sadducee converted to the Christian faith.

The ESSENES, or Asdanim, appear to have been little else than a party of rigid Pharisees, that lived somewhat in the manner of the Romish monks, and had their rise about two hundred years before Christ. As they lived in solitary places, and came seldom to the temple or public assemblies, they are never mentioned in the New Testament. They believed the immortality of the soul, and the existence of angels, and a state of future rewards and punishments; but scarcely, that there would be any resurrection of the dead. They believed every thing to be ordered by an eternal fatality, or chain of causes. They disallowed of oaths, and their word they reckoned every whit as binding. They observed the Sabbath so strictly as not to move a vessel, and scarce to ease nature. Some of them quite disallowed of marriage, and the rest made but little use of the marriage-bed. They fasted much, lived on very little and simple provision. They despised riches and finery of apparel, and wore out their clothes before they changed them. They lived quietly; and some devoted themselves entirely to contemplation, while others cultivated the field for their support. They were kind to strangers, but admitted none into their society till they had given proof of their temperance and chastity. They expelled criminals from it, but not in the presence of fewer than a hundred. When ten of them sat together, none spoke but with the leave of the other nine. They chose rather to suffer torture than to speak evil of their legislators, Moses, &c. and punished with death such as did. They inquired much into the cures of diseases, and by means of their temperance many of them lived to a great age.

That the HERODIANS had a set of principles, a leave of their own, and tempted our Saviour concerning the lawfulness of paying tribute to heathen governors, is plain, Mark viii. 15. and xii. 13; but what were their distinguishing tenets, is not agreed. Calmet and others will have them to have been much the same with the Pharisees; only that they held it unlawful to give tribute to the Roman emperor, which would make them the same with the Galileans or Zealots. But why should persons of this stamp be denominated from any of the Herods who are known to have been pliant cringers to the Romans? Others will have them to have been flatterers of Herod the Great, as if he had been the Messiah; and they say, he burnt all the genealogical memoirs of the family of David, that there might be no proof against his being a branch of it. We rather, with Prideaux, suppose, that they, along with the Herods, plead the lawfulness of the Romish government over the Jews; and that, in consequence hereof, it was lawful to comply with many of the customs of the heathenish Romans; and if so, they were the reverse of the Zealots, or Galileans.

Whether the Karaites, or adherents to scripture were formed into a sect before the birth of our Saviour, and about the time of king Jannæus, or rather more lately, we know not. They look on the canonical books of the Old Testament, to be the only rule of their faith: they expound scripture by scripture, and count the traditions of the elders of no more than human authority, and reckon the affair of the oral law a mere fable; they read the scriptures in their synagogues in the originals, as every translation is imperfect: they likewise pray in Hebrew, with great fervency, and with their face toward Jerusalem: they believe the perfections and providence of God, and allow a portion of his grace to be necessary to determine men's will to good: they expect a temporal Messiah, and attribute the delay of his coming to the slowness of Saturn's motion, or to the sin of their nation: they condemn phylacteries, and all kinds of pictures or statues used in religion: their practice is much the same as that of the Essenes, but less austere and rigid; and they have a profound respect for their teachers, who, for the most part, give their instructions gratis. There are but a few thousands of this sect about Poland, Germany, &c. and they are hated by the Traditionalist Jews, as if almost infernals.

The Christians were called the sect of the Nazarenes, and were every where spoken against. Acts xxiv. 5. and xxviii. 22.

SECURE; (1.) Not exposed to apparent danger. Job xii. 6. (2.) Without fear of danger. Judg. viii. 11. Mic. ii. 8. And to secure on, is to keep him free from danger, and the fear of it. Matt. xxviii. 14. To take security of one, is to get bail for his good behaviour, or his appearance at court. Acts xvii. 9. Men's secure fearlessness of danger, is either sinful, when not afraid of their bad state or condition, and of the just judgments of God; or holy, when one by a firm faith, commits himself and all his concerns to God in Christ, as his own God. Job xii. 6. and xi. 18.

SEDITION; a rebellions uproar in a city or country, contrary to the command and authority of the civil magistrate. Gal. v. 20.

SEDUCE; to decoy, or draw away one from his proper principles or practice. 1 Tim. iv. 1. The way of the wicked seduceth them; leads them on to further impiety, and keeps their consciences quiet, while they hasten to eternal woe. Prov. xii. 26. God's people are seduced, when taught, advised, or commanded to forsake what is truth, and lawful, and to follow what is sinful. 2 Kings xxi. 9. Ezek. xiii. 10. The Egyptians were seduced by their rulers, when led to worship idols, work wickedness, and follow schemes ruinous to the nation. Isa. ix. 13. Seducers or jugglers wax worse and worse, when God justly leaves them to proceed from one error or wicked way to another still worse, and to become more bold in their seducing work. 2 Tim. iii. 13.

SEE; (1.) To behold or perceive with the eyes. Exod. xxiii. 5. (2.) To hear. Exod. xx. 18. Rev. i. 12. (3.) To feel. Psal. xc. 15. Nay, seeing is put for all the senses, as it is one of the most excellent means of knowledge. (4.) To look upon things with careful observation. Matt. xxii. 11. (5.) To know; learn, by natural observation, Gen. xxxvii. 14; by experience, Exod. v. 19. Rom. vii. 23; by divine revelation, Isa. ii. 1; or by believing of God's word, and resting on him, John xiv. 9. Heb. xi. 27; or by enjoying the immediate discoveries of his glory in heaven, Job xii. 26. (6.) To have enough of knowledge, so as to find no need of instruction. John ix. 41. (7.) To enjoy; possess. John iii. 3, 6, (8.) To pay a visit. 1 Sam. xv. 35. (9.) To bear with. Ezra iv. 14. (10.) To beware. Rev. xix. 10. God's seeing of persons or things, imports his perfect knowledge of them as marked in a way of approbation, pity, or care, in a way of dislike, and of preparation to punish. Gen. i. 4. 2 Kings xix. 16. Gen. vi. 5. Christ's being seen of angels, imports not only their steadfast beholding of him in his debased estate, but their whole work of ministration to him and his people, as in, and subjected to him. 1 Tim. iii. 16. In seeing, men see not, when they have rational discoveries of God without any saving belief of him. Matt. xiii. 14. Isa. vi. 9. Men will not see, will not understand God's word or work, and act agreeably; but they shall see, shall feel the fearful accomplishment of his word, and the execution of his wrath. Isa. xxvi. 11. The Jews saw many things, many miracles performed by Christ, did not observe or consider them; and opened the ear to hear his doctrines, but did not hear and receive them with their heart. Isa. xlii. 20. To be seen of men, is to be gazed at as those are who act on a stage in a theatre. Matt. vi. 1. To see one's face, imports sometimes not only clear discovery of him, but great intimacy with him; and in Persia, few but the privy counsellors saw the king's face. Rev. xxii. 4. Esth. i. 14. At Sinai, indeed, the Hebrew elders saw the tokens of God's presence, or the Son of God in the resemblance of a man; but when the law was given, they saw no similitude at all. Exod. xxiv. 10. Deut. iv. 15. To see God as he is, and know him even as we are known, is to have a clear and immediate view of his excellencies, without the least mistake. 1 John iii. 2. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

SIGHT; is either, (1.) The power or act of seeing, which is either natural, with the bodily eye. Matt. xi. 5. or rational, with the mind. Heb. iv. 13. or gracious, which perceives Christ, and God in him through the glass of the scripture, and ordinances of the gospel, Luke iv. 18. 2 Cor. iii. 18; or the immediate view of God in heaven, in respect of which our present knowledge is as blindness. 2 Cor. v. 7. (2.) The object seen, chiefly if wonderful and striking. Luke xxi. 11. and xxiii. 48. Exod. iii. 8. In sight; in view, in appearance. Josh. xiii. 5. Lev. xiii. 3, 20. In one's sight, is exposed to the view of his natural eyes, Deut. xxvii. 19; in his presence, Eccl. viii. 3. 1 Tim. vi. 18; or in his knowledge or reckoning, Heb. vi. 13. Ezek. xxxvi. 31. Eccl. ii. 26. What may be seen with the bodily eye, is called VISIBLE; and what may not, is called INVISIBLE. Col. i. 15, 16. And the discoveries of God, or the things of another world, or the emblematic discoveries of future things, and even declarations to the ear, are called VISIONS or sights. Isa. i. 1. and xxi. 2. In this manner Christ often appeared under the Old Testament, and revealed his will; and to Stephen, Paul, and John, under the New. Acts vii. 60. Rev. i. and iv. &c.; but it seems the Father never discovered himself in any visible similitude, John i. 18. Angels also appeared in visions. Matt. xxviii. 1 Kings xix. And because the prophets saw visions, and knew more than others, they were anciently called SEERS. 1 Sam. ix. 9.

SEEK; to endeavour to obtain, whether by searching for, Gen. xxxvii. 16; asking by prayer, Ezra viii. 21; or by the use of any other means that tends to procure the enjoyment of a thing. Gen. xliii. 18. God seeks men, when he fixes his love on them, and by his Son's righteousness and intercession, and by the ministry of his word, and the efficacy of his Spirit, he recovers them from their miserable state or condition. Ezek. xxxiv. 16. Psal. cxix. 176. Luke xv. 4—9. and xix. 10. To seek God, or his name, or face, is to ask his direction, pray for his favours, and depend on him as our helper and portion. Psal. lxxiii. 1. and lxxiii. 16. Hypocrites seek him, when they pretend to be sensible of their wants, and to pray for and desire the enjoyment of himself and favours. Prov. i. 28. The Jews sought Christ after his ascension, but found him not; they had, to no purpose, an eager desire to enjoy the appearance of their Messiah. John viii. 21. To seek to an altar or temple, is to frequent it religiously. 2 Chron. i. 5. Deut. xii. 5. Amos v. 5. To seek God's works, is to endeavour to understand them. Psal. cxi. 2. To seek God's precepts, is to endeavour to know and obey them. Psal. cxix. 115, 155. To seek judgment, or mischief, is to employ one's self in practising justice or doing mischief. Isa. i. 17. Prov. xi. 27. and xvii. 11, 19. To seek peace, is to endeavour to promote it. Psal. xxxiv. 14. Jer. xxix. 7. To seek one's soul or life, is to desire and use all possible means for murdering and ruining him. Psal. xxxv. 4. and xxxviii. 12.

SEEM; to look like. Gen. xxvii. 12. SEEMLY; fit, comely. Prov. xix. 10. and xvi. 11.

SEIR; (1.) The father of the ancient Horites. Gen. xxxvi. 20. (2.) A noted mountain on the south and south-west of the Dead sea, in the land of Edom: but whether it had its name from Seir the Horite, who peopled that country, or if it was called Beir, or hairy, because it was covered with shaggy bushes, even as another mountain was called Halak because without bushes, we know not. (3.) A small hill near Kirjath-jearim. Josh. xv. 10.

SERATH, where Ehud stopped after the slaughter of Eglon, was probably near Gilgal or Bethel. Judg. iii. 26.

SELA; the capital of the Edomites, called also Joktheel. It was no doubt so called from its rocky situation; and if it was the Petra of the Arabs, it was situated in a plain surrounded with terrible rocks. Amaziah took it, and cruelly murdered a great part of the people found in it. 2 Kings xiv. 7. Whether it was then possessed by the Moabites, or another place of the same name in the country of Moab, that the king of Moab is directed to send tribute from to the Hebrews, and sacrifices to their God, is uncertain. Isa. xvi. 1. The rock whence Saul was called off from pursuing David, to withstand the Philistines, was called Sela-hamalekoth, the rock of separations. 1 Sam. xxiii. 28.

SE-LA'H; a word used in the Song of Habakkuk, and often in the Psalms of David. Whether it be a name of God, and imports an address to him; or whether it signifies the same thing as amen, or denotes a lifting up of the voice, or change of the time, or a great pause in the music, as at a point worthy of the deepest attention, is not agreed. It is plain the omission of it no way interrupts the sense. Hab. iii. 3, 9, 18.

SE-LEUCIA. There were many cities of this name in Asia; but the scripture mentions only that of Syria, near the river Orontes, which was built by Seleucus Nicator the first Syro-grecian monarch. Here Paul and Barnabas embarked for Cyprus. Acts xiv. 4.

SELF, not only denotes one's own person, but whatever is dear to us. Matt. xxii. 39. and xvi. 24. See DENV. SELF-WILL, is a disposition to follow our own fancy and inclination, in opposition to every thing else. Gen. xlix. 6. Tit. i. 7.

SELL. Among the Hebrews, parents had power to sell their children for slaves. Creditors too sold insolvent debtors and their children, till they got payment; and sometimes a man sold himself: but it was a capital crime to steal a man and sell him. Exod. xxi. 7—16. 1 Tim. i. 10. See SERVANT. God's selling of his grace and favours, imports his wise, but free bestowal thereof on such as need, and willingly receive the same. Matt. xxv. 9. He sells his professed people, when, to punish their sin, he gives them up to the harassment and slavery of their enemies. Deut. xxxii. 20. Judg. ii. 14. Men sell all that they have, to buy the pearl of great price, when they prefer Christ and his fulness to every thing beside, and are content to part with sinful lusts, and every thing worldly, to enjoy the same, and to live to his honour. Matt. xiii. 40. Men sell the truth, when they condemn, renounce, or forsake the inspired truths of God in their profession or practice, for the sake of some carnal ease, pleasure, profit, or gain. Prov. xxiii. 23. Men sell themselves to work wickedness, when they wilfully give up themselves, soul and body, to be the slaves of their own sinful inclinations, and of Satan and his agents, spending their wisdom, strength, and time, in his service. 1 Kings xxi. 20. 2 Kings xvii. 17. The saints are sold under sin, when, overpowered by their indwelling corruptions, they are forced to think and act in a manner very similar to that of the slaves of sin. Rom. vii. 14. Eaan's selling of his birthright was very sinful, as it implied a contempt of the promised Messiah and his church, and of the privileges of spiritual adoption and eternal life. Heb. xii. 16.

SELVEDGE; the edge of a web of cloth. Exod. xxvi. 4.

SEN-A'AH, or HAS'SEN-AH; a city or person, whose inhabitants or posterity, to the number of 3630, returned from Babylon, and were very active in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem. Ezra ii. 35. Neh. iii. 3.

SENATE. See SANHEDRIM.

SEND; (1.) To appoint to go. Deut. i. 22. (2.) To cause to come. Deut. xxviii. 20, 48. (3.) To convey. Acts xi. 30. God's sending of Christ, imports his appointing him to assume our nature, and in this world fulfil the broken law in our stead, and to save us from our sin and misery. Gal. iv. 4. Christ and his Father's sending of the Holy Ghost, imports an effectual willing him to mark his power and presence, in working miracles, and in convincing, converting, sanctifying, and comforting influences, for the erection and establishment of the church, and the salvation of men. John xiv. 26. and xvi. 7. God's sending prophets, apostles, and ministers, imports his authorising and enabling them to execute such an office, in the place and manner he appoints. Rom. x. 15.

SEN-NA'CHERIB, king of Assyria, began to reign about A. M. 3390, and reigned about four years, attempting to extend his empire. Informed of Hezekiah's revolt, he invaded his kingdom of Judah. Almost all the fenced cities of Judah were obliged to surrender to him. To stop his taking the rest, Hezekiah agreed to return to his former subjection, and paid him three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold. Contrary to agreement, Sennacherib continued the war. While he besieged Lachish, he sent his generals Tartan, Rabсарis, and Rabshakeh, with a considerable army to summon Hezekiah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to a surrender: they halted in the Fuller's field, and thither Hezekiah sent Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah, to confer with them. In the Hebrew tongue, and with the haughtiest airs, Rabshakeh told these ambassadors, that it was vain for them to expect help from Pharaoh king of Egypt, or from God, whose altars Hezekiah, he said, had broken down, and who had ordered the Assyrians to invade the country. Eliakim and his brethren desired him to speak to them in the Syrian language, and not in the Hebrew, lest the people assembled on the wall should know their conference. Rabshakeh then lifted up his voice the more, and told the people, that unless they surrendered themselves to his master, he would quickly, by a furious siege, oblige them to eat their own dung, and drink their urine, for want of other provision; and if they surrendered, they should be allowed to dwell peaceably in the land, till they were transported to another as good. Meanwhile, Sennacherib raised the siege of Lachish, and invested Libnah. Receiving no return to his message by his generals, who returned to him at Libnah, he wrote Hezekiah a most blasphemous letter, boasting that he would as easily subdue Jerusalem and her God, as he had done other nations and their idols; and sent his messengers to rail against the God of Israel, and terrify the people into a surrender. Leaving Libnah, he gave battle to Tirhakah king of Cush or Ethiopia, and, it seems routed him, if not also ravaged part of Egypt. Returning, he marched also up to the walls of Jerusalem, and encamped in the valley of Tophet, on the east, but some think the north-west of the city. There an angel of the Lord, probably by a kind of fiery pestilence, killed 185,000 of his principal forces, and we suppose Rabshakeh among them, though it seems Tartan survived the catastrophe, and afterward took Ashdod. Isa. xx. 1. Sennacherib hastened home with the poor remains of his army; and had not been long there, when Adrammelech and Shazzer, two of his sons, whom perhaps he intended to sacrifice, killed him as he worshipped Nisroch his idol. Herodotus's bungling narrative of the ruin of Sennacherib's army near Pelusiam, on the north-east of Egypt, as if, by the god Vulcan's influence, swarms of rats had eaten all their bow-strings in the night, and so disqualified them for war, is unworthy of this work: but what better could we expect him to receive from the Egyptian priests? Isa. xxx. 27-33. and xxxiii. xxxvi. and xxxvii.

SENSE; (1.) Our various means of perception, by seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, feeling, are our bodily senses; in allusion to which, the powers of our soul, whereby we discern good and evil, are called senses. Heb. v. 14. (2.) Sense signifies the meaning of a sentence or discourse. Neh. viii. 8. The papists attribute a five-fold sense to the scripture, (1.) A grammatical, which is what is naturally exhibited by the express words; but it is plain, this must not be always rested in, otherwise we must believe God to be corporeal, having eyes, ears, feet, and yet to be a Spirit. (2.) Literal or historical, wherein a narrative is taken according to the express terms of the text, as that Abraham had a son called Ishmael by Hagar. (3.) The allegorical, whereby the terms and events of a history are taken to signify something spiritual, as Hagar to signify the Jewish church, Sarah the Christian, and Ishmael legalists, and Isaac true believers. (4.) The analogical, whereby we understand terms and things relating to this world, as relating also to the world to come; as the Sabbath to the heavenly rest, Canaan to heaven. (5.) Tropological, whereby we understand a text as hinting some instruction of moral duty; as the not muzzling the mouth of the ox, to import, that ministers should have due subsistence from their hearers. Thus the word Jerusalem, according to them, grammatically signifies the vision of peace; historically, the chief city of Judah; allegorically the church-militant; analogically, the church triumphant; and tropologically, a faithful soul. But to attempt finding all these senses in every passage of scripture, is to suppose the oracles of God a perplexed chaos. It is true, the same text may be improved to manifold uses; for every word of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; but the simplicity of divine truth, and the necessary intelligibility of scripture, require the real sense of every passage to be, not manifold, but one, and which we may call literal; not indeed as if the terms used to express it, if distorted from their connection with other passages, could bear no other; but that it is that which was in such and such words intended by the Holy Ghost. Nay, in as far as the analogy of faith and the context will admit, we must adhere to the natural signification of the very words of scripture. The sense however is often complex; the same phrase relating to more objects than one. Nothing typical is rightly understood, except we consider it as both descriptive of the type, and of the antitype, by means thereof. In metaphorical passages, the material images are not at all the sense, but are to be understood merely as a means of pointing to the true objects intended. Prophecies, as has been hinted, have various steps of fulfilment, which are not different senses, but different steps of the same complex sense.

SENTENCE; (1.) A speech or saying. (2.) Opinion or judgment concerning a controverted point. Acts xv. 19. (3.) The determination of a judge, in deciding a cause or plea. Deut. xvii. 9—11. Eccl. viii. 11. (4.) The vindication of one's innocence. Psal. xvii. 2. Hard or dark sentences, are sayings not easily explained. Dan. viii. 23. and v. 12. A divine sentence, is a decision becoming the dignity and honour of God. Prov. xvi. 10. To have the sentence of death in ourselves, is to lay our account with sufferings or death as at hand. 2 Cor. i. 9.

SEPARATE; SEVER; (1.) To part asunder. Gen. xxx. 40. Lev. xx. 26. (2.) To scatter into different quarters of the world. Deut. xxxii. 1. (3.) To set aside from among others to a particular office, use, or end. Paul and Barnabas, the Jewish priests, Levites, and Nazarites, were separated, i. e. set aside to the special service of God. Acts xiii. 2. Lev. xxii. 3. Numb. viii. 14. and vi. 2. The Hebrews were separated; set aside from the rest of the world to be the distinguished people of God, enjoying his favours, and employed in his service. 1 Kings. viii. 53. The cities of refuge were separated; set apart for protecting involuntary man-slayers. Deut. xix. 2. Men are separated to evil, when appointed, and, as it were, set aside to be made miserable. Deut. xxix. 11. (4.) To forsake, or be cast out from the communion of the church. Jude xix. Luke vi. 22. (5.) To be disregarded and forsaken. So the poor is separated from his neighbour, having none obliged or ready to help him. Prov. xix. 4. The Lord severed between the cattle of the Hebrews and of the Egyptians, in saving the one, and destroying the other. Exod. viii. 22. and ix. 4.

SEPHAR; a mount in the east of Arabia, or perhaps the south-west parts of Chaldaea. Gen. x. 30.

SE-PHAR'VA-IM, or SE-PHAR'VITES; a tribe of the Samaritans. Calmet thinks them the Sapires on the north of Media: Gill will have them the inhabitants of Sippohræ, a city of Syro-phœnicia. The names of their gods, viz. Adrammelech and Anammelech, and the nations with whom they are jointly mentioned, incline to the opinion that they had their original residence about Siphora or Sippara on the Euphrates, where the language was the Chaldaic mixed with Arabic. They had anciently kings of their own and they burnt their children in sacrifice to their idols. They were partly destroyed by the Assyrians; and the rest were transplanted to the country of the ten tribes. 2 Kings xix. 13. and xvii. 24, 31.

SEPULCHRE. See GRATE.

SERAI'AH; (1.) A high priest of the Jews, son of Azariah, and father of Joazak the father of Joshua. He was taken prisoner at Jerusalem, and was murdered at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar, with seventy others of the principal men of Judah. Jer. lii. 24—27. (2.) The son of Neriah, and brother of Baruch. He is called Sher-menuchah. Whether this name means, that he was a prince quiet in his temper and carriage, or that he was prince of a place called Menuchah, or was prince of the bed-chamber, or was the king's almoner, or was the chief director of the presents which he carried from Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar, about seven years before the destruction of the city, must be left to conjecture. Jeremiah sent by him a copy of the prediction of Babylon, and charged him to bind a stone to it when he came to Babylon, and cast it into the Euphrates, saying, Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise again from the evil that the Lord will bring upon her. Jer. li. 59—62.

SER'A-PHIM, or fiery ones. In his vision, Isaiah saw seraphim standing above, or near to the Lord's throne: each had six wings; with twain they covered their face, with twain their feet, and with twain they did fly: they cried, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory, till the house shook with the sound. When the prophet bewailed his guilt, one of them took a live coal from the altar, and laid it on his mouth, and told him that his iniquity was purged. Did these seraphim signify angels, who are near to God; active and humble in his praise, but not able to behold the brightness of his glory, and who contribute to the purifying and comfort of the saints? Or do they represent ministers, humble and active in the work of the gospel, for the glory of God, and the holiness and comfort of men? Isa. vi. 1—7.

SERGEANTS; officers who carried a bundle of rods before magistrates, for whipping malefactors. Acts xvi. 35, 36.

SER'GI-US. See BAR-JE'SUS.

SERPENT, a general name for amphibious animals of several species, that live in the sea and on the earth. According to Ray, serpents have a long body covered with a kind of scales; breathe by lungs, and have only one ventricle in the heart; their vital warmth is small, they inhale as much air at once as can serve them for breath a considerable time. During the winter season, they lie torpid and half dead, needing no food, and perhaps no air; but they revive in the spring. Most serpents are poisonous; their bite leaving a fiery liquor in the wound, which quickly mixes with the blood; but their whole bodies may be eaten, and even the mischievous liquor tasted, without hurt. Such serpents as are poisonous, have long teeth, with a poisonous liquor at their root. All serpents seem to be oviparous, (i. e. produced from eggs;) but some lay their eggs in dunghills, and the like places, to be hatched by the external heat; others retain them in their bodies till they be hatched. As the heart of serpents is very near their head, they are most easily killed by a stroke on it. They are famed for subtilty; are said to wrap up their head in the rest of their body, that their heart may be safest; and to vomit their poison before they drink, that it may not be mixed with the water, and hurt them. It is also said, that they renew their sight by looking on fennel; that they cast their skin every year; shun the breath of deer; and that some of them shut their ears against enchantments, laying the one ear close to the ground, and stopping with their tail the other; but most of these are doubtless fables. The serpents we find mentioned in scripture, are the Ephehh, Achshub, Pethen, Tzeboah, Tzeplahh, Tziphoni, Saraph, which we translate, viper, asp, adder, cockatrice, and fiery flying serpent. Prodigious numbers of flying speckled serpents abound in Arabia and Lybia, and have wings like bats. It is said the young ones kill their dam; but it is more certain, that if the bird Ibis did not watch their entrance into Egypt, at the proper season, they would ruin that country. The rattlesnake, and some other serpents, are very artful in decoying birds and other animals into their power; but we cannot explain the manner how they attack them. The babalous serpent is sometimes about twenty-five feet long, and has been known to swallow a woman with child; nay, a wild ox; these and some other serpents, break the bones of their prey, and slaver it over with spittle before they swallow it. It is said, that Abisarus, an Indian prince, had two serpents, the one a hundred and forty cubits long, and the other eighty. The serpent which Regulus the Roman killed with machines near Bagrada in Africa, is said to have been a hundred and twenty feet long. In the German Ephemerides, we read of a serpent that swallowed a woman big with child, and of another that swallowed a buffalo, or large wild ox.

Not many years ago, Mr. Edwin the English resident in the East Indies, saw a serpent in the Isle of Ceylon, that measured in length thirty-three feet four inches. It was covered with scales, ridged in the middle. Its head was green, with large black spots in the middle, yellow streaks around the jaws, a yellow circle, like a golden collar, around his neck, and behind that was another black spot. Its head was flattish and broad; its eyes monstrously large, and very bright and terrible. Its sides were of a dusky olive colour. Its back was very beautiful, a broad streak of black, curled and waved at the sides, running along it; along the edges of this, ran a narrow streak of a fleshy colour; on the outside of which, was a broad streak of a bright yellow, waved and curled, and spotted at small distances, with roundish and long blotches of a blood-colour. When it moved in the sun, it appeared exquisitely beautiful. It had perched itself on a large palm-tree. As a kind of fox passed by, it darted down upon him, and in a few minutes sucked him into its belly. Next morning a monstrous tyger, about the height of a heifer, passing by, it darted down, seized him by the back with its teeth, and twined itself three or four times around his body. It then loosed its teeth from his back, and grasped his head, tearing, and grinding, and choking him at once, while the furious tyger resisted to the utmost. Finding him hard to be conquered, and his bones not easily broken, by winding its tail around his neck, it dragged him to the tree, and then setting him against it, twined itself about both him and the tree, and crushed him against it, till his ribs, and the bones of his legs, and at last his skull, were broken and bruised. After it had killed him with this inexpressible torture of about a day's continuance, it coated over his body with slaver, till it became like a lump of red flesh, and at last, with a labour of some hours' continuance, sucked up the whole carcase into its belly. While it was gorged berewith, and no doubt fatigued with the late toil, Mr. Edwin, and his Ceylonese companions, killed it with clubs. Its flesh was whiter than veal, and had a fine taste. And indeed, in Brazil, and many other places, serpents' flesh is eaten for food.

Leviathan is called a crooked and piercing serpent. Job xxvi. 13. In the form of a serpent, perhaps a beautiful one of great subtilty, Satan seduced our first parents, and for that, as well as his craft, malice, and ruinous influence, is called the old serpent. Gen. iii. Rev. xx. 2. It is probable, that a more painful motion, and an enmity with mankind, has judiciously marked at least that kind of serpent in which Satan seduced our first parents, Gen. iii. 14; and to commemorate his conquest, Satan has seduced multitudes to worship him under the form or by means of serpents. When, to punish the Hebrews for their contempt of the manna, they were bitten by fiery flying serpents, (probably the hydra, whose bite is mortal, if the part be not immediately cut out.) God, by the form of a brazen serpent, lifted up on a pole, miraculously healed such as looked on it. Did not this prefigure Jesus assuming the likeness of sinful flesh, and being lifted up on the cross, and in the gospel, that we, stung by sin, looking to him by faith, may become whole? Numb. xxi. John iii. 14-16. The brazen serpent was destroyed by Hezekiah about 800 years after, because it was idolatrously worshipped. 2 Kings xviii. 4.

Saints are charged to be wise as serpents; they are to put off their old man, and vain conversation; are to be daily renewed in the spirit of their minds; are to regard the honour of Christ their head, and the safety of faith and charity, their capital graces; are to avoid hurtful company and influence, and carefully shun every seductive allurement. Matt. x. 16.

The Chaldeans, and other wicked men, are represented as serpents, because of their craft, malice, and ruinous influence, Jer. viii. 17. Matt. xxiii. 33; and so they are represented as biting, as having poison under their tongues, &c. Serpents and scorpions, are put for things extremely dangerous. Luke x. 19. King Uzziah and Hezekiah are likened to serpents, because they terribly harrassed and destroyed the Philistines. Isa. xiv. 29. See BITE; DRAGON; LEVIATHAN.

SERVANT. The Hebrews had several kinds of servants; (1.) Some were mere slaves for life, and were sold or disposed of by their masters as they thought fit. Such were the strangers bought or taken in war. Lev. xxv. 44, &c. Such are also called bodies, because their master's rigour reaches only to their body. Rev. xviii. 13. (2.) Hebrew slaves, or bond-servants, who could only at the first be bound six years, when they were to be dismissed with presents from their master: but their children born during their servitude, continued to be their master's property. If they declined to go free, their master, with an awl bored their ear to the door-post, as a token that they could not thereafter have their freedom, at least till the year of jubilee. If a master struck a bond servant till he died, he was only punished, not condemned to death. If an ox gored to death a bond-servant, the owner paid thirty shekels of silver as his price, and the ox was stoned. If a master struck out the eye of a slave, he was to give him his liberty as a compensation. Maids had no title to a release at the seventh year; but if a master had defiled, or he or his son had betrothed a female slave, and not kept her as a wife, she was to have her liberty, as a compensation for the injury done her. Exod. xxi. 1—11, 20, 24, 26, 27. Dent. xv. 1—18. (3.) Hired servants, or hirelings, whose term of service, it seems, was ordinarily three full years: and so a servant of six years was worth a double hired servant. Job vii. 1. Isa. xvi. 14. Dent. xv. 11. As hirelings from among the heathen did not eat of the passover, so Hebrews of other families, hired into the family of the priests, were not allowed to eat of the holy food; but all servants were to have their wages as soon as due. Lev. xix. 13. Did these represent carnal and selfish pretenders to the service of Christ, who have no true title to the seals of the new covenant, or fellowship with God; and who have their portion in this present life. Exod. xii. 45. Lev. xxii. 10. (4.) Voluntary servants; so Joshua was the servant of Moses; Elisha, of Elijah; and the apostles of Christ. (5.) Subjects of a prince, especially if reduced to a kind of slavery and bondage, are servants. 2 Sam. viii. 6.

God's servants are, (1.) Christ, who, in obedience to his will, assumed our nature, fulfilled the law in our stead, and administers the blessings of the covenant to us. Isa. xlii. 1. and xlix. 3. (2.) Such as are employed in a particular calling in church or state; so Moses, Paul, and others, were his servants. Deut. xxiv. 5. Rom. i. 1. (3.) Distinguished instruments of his mercy or wrath; so Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus were his servants. Jer. xxv. 9. Isa. xlv. 1. (4.) The saints, who are servants of obedience unto righteousness, as being delivered from the slavery of sin and Satan, they obey, serve, and worship God in holiness and righteousness. Rom. vi. 16, 18, 19, 22.

The servants of men, in an emphatic sense, are such as submit to their lusts. 1 Cor. vii. 23. A servant of servants, is one debased to the lowest slavery. Gen. ix. 25. Paul became servant to all; to the Jews, as a Jew; to them who were under the ceremonial law, as under the law; and to them that were not under it, as without law; i. e. he denied himself his liberty, and complied with every innocent custom and infirmity among his hearers, that he might gain them to Christ. 1 Cor. ix. 19—21. Servants also signify persons of a base temper, unfit for government. Eccl. x. 7. To mark the different degrees of freedom under the old and new dispensations of the covenant of grace, Jewish professors are represented as servants, whose service is carnal and burdensome; and Christians, as children, whose labour is free, honourable, and easy. Gal. iv. 3, 7, 22, 31. Wicked men are servants of sin, as they are under its ruling power, and fulfil its lusts. John viii. 32.

SERVICE, is serving or obeying of a superior, or being useful as means to answer an end. Service is fourfold; (1.) Civil, as of a servant fulfilling a task of duty laid upon him by his master. Gen. xxix. 29. (2.) Sinful; thus we serve inward lusts, by yielding to, and acting according to them. Tit. iii. 3. Eph. ii. 3. (3.) Religious, when addicted to God's law as our binding rule, we study to act according to it in our office and station, and worship him as our supreme Lord and portion. Josh. xxii. 5. and xxiv. 15. This service is to be performed in the spirit, Rom. i. 9; without servile, but with filial fear of him, Luke i. 74. Psal. ii. 11; with gladness, Psal. c. 2; and in newness of life. Rom. vii. 6. (4.) Idolatrous, when one has his heart addicted to creatures, or gives them outward worship. Matt. vi. 24. Rom. i. 25.

Eye-service, is that which servants take care to perform when their master is present, while they neglect his work when he is absent. Eph. vi. 6. The old men advised Rehoboam to serve the Hebrews, i. e. to yield a little to their wishes, in speaking and acting mildly towards them. 1 Kings xii. 6.

SERVILE work, is what is ordinarily done on labouring days, as ploughing, reaping, &c.

SERVITUDE; hard service, slavery. Lam. i. 3.

SERVITOR, a servant. 2 Kings iv. 43. SERUG, or SA'RUCH, the son of Reu, or Ragau, and father of Nahor, the grandfather of Abraham. Gen. xi. 20—22. It is said, that he first, after the flood set on foot the idolatrous worship of creatures, and maintained, that the images of such men as had been remarkably useful, might be adored. This introduced the worship of dead men, and by consequence all kinds of idolatry and polytheism.

SET; (1.) To fix in a place. Gen. i. 17. (2.) To mark out; rear up. Exod. xix. 12. (3.) To appoint. Gen. xli. 33, 41. (4.) To be earnestly bent or inclined to. Exod. xxxii. 12. (5.) To extend. Exod. xxiii. 31. (6.) To march. Numb. ii. 9. To set the Lord before us, is to regard his authority, live as in his presence, follow his example, trust in him as our assistant and protector, and endeavour to enjoy him as our portion. Psal. xvi. 8. To set a thing before one, is to explain it, to exhibit it, especially that one may take his choice. Exod. xx. 1. Deut. xi. 26. To et forth, is to manifest, Rom. iii. 25; or preach up. Acts xvii. 18. To set one's heart to a thing, is diligently to consider it. Exod. vii. 23. Men are set on fire, when filled with outrageous malice and envy. Psal. lvii. 4. Men's tongue sets on fire the course of nature, and is set on fire of hell; with its angry, and otherwise mischievous words, it does great hurt, and stirs up mischief all around. Jam. iii. 8. Jeremiah was set over the nations, to root out, pull down, and to build and plant them, i. e. to foretell their ruin or deliverance. Jer. i. 10.

SETH, or SHETH; the son of Adam, born A. M. 131, and father of Enoch; he lived nine hundred and twelve years. For a long time his posterity followed the true worship and service of God; but at last mingling with the wicked posterity of Cain, they brought the flood upon themselves. Gen. iv. 25, 26. v. 3—8. and vi. 1—4. (2.) A noted person or place in the land of Moab. Numb. xxiv. 17.

SETTLE; (1.) To make stedfast on a proper foundation. 1 Pet. v. 10. (2.) To mark out; appoint. Psal. lxxv. 10. The settle of the altar, was the projection or jutting out of it. Ezek. xliii. 14—20.

SEVEN. As from the beginning this was the number of days in the week, it has always had a kind of emphasis annexed to it, and is by some called a number of perfection. God added seven days to his promised patience towards the old world: clean beasts were taken into the ark by sevens: the years of plenty and famine in Egypt, and their emblems, were marked by sevens. Gen. vii. and xli. With the Jews, not only was there a seventh-day Sabbath, but every seventh year was a Sabbath of rest, and every seven times seventh year was a jubilee. Their great feasts of unleavened bread, and of tabernacles, were observed for seven days; the number of animals in many of their oblations, were limited to seven. The golden candlestick had seven branches: seven priests, with seven trumpets, surrounded the wall of Jericho seven days, and seven times seven on the seventh. In John's New Testament Revelations, we find seven churches, seven candlesticks, seven spirits, seven stars, seven seals, seven trumpets, seven thunders, seven vials, seven plagues, and seven angels to pour them out on the seven-headed monster, Antichrist. Seven often signifies a great many, a complete number. Matt. xii. 45. Prov. xxvi. 16, 25. Isa. iv. 1. 1 Sam. ii. 5. Jer. xv. 7. Job v. 19. Sevenfold; is frequently, completely, Lev. xxvi. 24. Psal. lxxix. 12. Gen. iv. 15, 24. Psal. xii. 6; and seventy times seven, or seventy times seven times, import very often. Matt. xviii. 21, 22. Thus Christ's seven horns, may denote his great and perfect power; his seven eyes, his perfect knowledge, Rev. v. 6; his seven lamps and seven pipes, his fulness of revelation, and gracious influence, Zech. iv. 2; his seven pillars, the fulness of fundamental truths and promises. Prov. ix. 1. The Holy Ghost is called seven spirits, seven lamps of fire, to denote his perfect knowledge, and diversified gifts and operations. Rev. i. 4. and iv. 5. So seven eyes of Christ, denote many, Zech. iii. 9; seven thunders, many troubles; and seven stars, many ministers. Rev. x. 3. and i. 16.

SEVERAL; one by itself. 2 Chron. xi. 12. and xxvi. 11. Severally; to one by one. 1 Cor. xii. 11.

SEVERITY; punishing of evil doers, according to the rigour of the law. Rom. xi. 22.

SEWED; to fix upon. Job xvi. 15. Gen. iii. 7.

SHA-AL'BON, or SEL'BON; a place on the east of Jordan, which gave name to the canton Selbonitis. Here Eliabba, one of David's mighties, was born. 2 Sam. xxiii. 32.

SHA'DRACH, MES'HACH, and A-BED'NEGO, were originally princes of Judah, and when very young, were carried captive to Babylon, and there educated for the king's service in all the wisdom of the Chaldeans. Having by prayer assisted Daniel in the discovery and interpretation of the king's dream, they were made governors in the province of Babylon. Some time after, for refusing to worship king Nebuchadnezzar's image which he set up, they were cast into a fiery furnace; but being miraculously delivered, were further advanced in the government of the province of Babylon. Dan. i—iii. See DANIEL, and NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

SHADOW; the representation which any solid body interposing between the sun, or light, and another body, makes of itself. In allusion to this, the ancient ceremonies are called a shadow of good things to come; they were rude draughts, and unsubstantial resemblances of the future incarnation, obedience, death, resurrection, and glory, and blessings of Jesus Christ, and of the form and state of his church. Heb. x. 1. As a shadow follows the sun or interposing body, and is perpetually varying, till at last, perhaps suddenly it vanishes, we, and our days, are likened to a shadow, to intimate how unsubstantial our mortal appearances are, how transient our life and sudden our death. 1 Chron. xxix. 15. Job. xiv. 3. and xvii. 7. As darkness and gloominess attend shadows, so terrible darkness, trouble, or death, are called a shadow of death. Job iii. 5. xvi. 16. and xxiv. 17. Psal. xxiii. 4. As in warm countries it is very agreeable to be screened from the scorching heat of the sun, so governmental protection, and refreshing influence, are called a shadow. Lam. iv. 20. Ezek. xxxi. 6. Sol. Song ii. 3. Psal. xci. 1. and lxxiii. 7. Christ and his Father are a shadow, because they govern, protect, and refresh persons and churches. Isa. iv. 6. xxv. 4. and xxxii. 2. Make your shadow as the night, in the midst of noon; in the Jews' troubles, protect and conceal them, ye Moabites, to the utmost of your power. Isa. xvi. 3. The evening, or time when shadows abound, is called the shadow. Job vii. 2. The signs of approaching desolation and ruin, are called shadows of the evening. Jer. vi. 4. The shadows flee away, when Old Testament ceremonies are abolished; and at last all corruptions, troubles, and even instituted ordinances, give place to the day of everlasting glory. Sol. Song ii. 17. Shadow also is put for any small appearance of a thing. Jam. i. 17.

SHADY, or shadowing, what casts a shadow over, Job xl. 21; a covering. Heb. ix. 5.

SHAFT; (1.) That part of the golden candlestick from whence the seven branches proceeded; and which might represent the person of Christ, from whom all diversified illuminations in every church proceed. Exod. xxv. 31. (2.) An arrow. Christ is a polished shaft; fully qualified to execute every divine purpose of grace. Isa. xlix. 2.

SHA-A-RA'IM; a descendant of Benjamin, who, either sojourned in, or governed the country of Moab. By his wives Hushim and Hodesh he had a very numerous posterity, who distinguished themselves in the building or peopling of Lod or Lydda, Ono, and Aijalon; from the last of which they drove the Philistines of Gath, and after the captivity dwelt partly at Jerusalem. 1 Chron. viii. 9—28.

SHALEM, SHALIN; See SALEM; not Jerusalem. Gen. xxxiii. 18. 1 Sam. ix. 4.

SHAKE; so leaves of a tree are shaken with the wind. The shaking of the heavens and the earth, or of the foundations of the earth, or of the nations or isles, denotes great revolutions and distress. Heb. xii. 26. Isa. xxiii. 13. Hag. ii. 6, 21. and xiv. 18. Matt. xxiv. 29. Rev. vi. 13. Ezek. xxxviii. 19. A nation is as the shaking of the olive-tree, when the inhabitants are diminished by repeated calamities till few be left. Isa. xxxiv. 13. The shaking of dry bones, in order to come one to another, may import the tremulous activity of the captive Jews to prepare for a return to their own land from Babylon, and the trembling exercise of sinners when first brought under the operations of God's Spirit. Ezek. xxxvii. 7. The things shaken were removed, that the things which cannot be shaken might remain; i. e. the Jewish state and ceremonies were overturned, that the unchangeable person, office, and mediation of Christ might appear. Heb. xii. 27. To shake one's self, is to begin to be active, particularly in attempting to obtain deliverance. Isa. lii. 2. Shaking of hands, imports threatening ruin, or the easy accomplishment of it. Isa. x. 32. Zech. ii. 9. To shake the hand from holding of bribes, is to be free from receiving them, and to refuse and detest them. Isa. xxxiii. 15. See DUST; HEAD.

SHALUM, or SHIL'LEM; (1.) A son of Naphtali, and father of the Shilemites. 1 Chron. vii. 18. Numb. xxvi. 49. (2.) The son of Jabesh, a king of Israel, who murdered king Zachariah, and almost all the family of Jehu; and, after a month, was murdered by Menahem. 2 Kings xv. 10—12. See JE-HO-A-HAZ.

SHAL'MAN, or SHAL-MAN-E'SER, king of Assyria, and probably the same as Ene-messar, who is supposed to have been the son as well as the successor of Tiglath-pileser. He began his reign about A. M. 3276, and reigned twelve or forty years.

He subdued the kingdom of Israel, and obliged Hoshea their king to pay tribute. Informed, about three years after, that Hoshea had concerted measures with the king of Egypt to render himself free, he marched a powerful army into the land of Israel, took and ravaged the fenced cities, murdering the inhabitants in the most inhuman manner. After three years' siege, he took Samaria the capital, and Hoshea, and transported most of the people to Media, and other eastern parts of his empire; but if credit can be given to the history of Tobit, he was not unfavourable to the captives. 2 Kings xvii. 1—10. Hos. x. 14. Invited by the men of Gath, he commenced a war against the Tyrians, and after besieging their capital five years, died without taking it, and was succeeded by Sennacherib.

SHAMBLE; the flesh-market. 1 Cor. x. 25.

SHAME; (1.) That mental sensation which proceeds from consciousness of guilt, dishonesty, or filthiness. In the state of innocence there was no shame, nor any occasion for it. Gen. ii. 25. (2.) Trouble and perplexity of mind, on account of guilt and disappointment. Ezra ix. 6. Rom. vi. 21. and v. 5. (3.) Derision, contempt, anxiety. Ezek. xxxvi. 6. (4.) Whatever is shameful; as an idol, whose worship was abominable, and tends to bring those who practise it to shame. Hos. iv. 10. (5.) Those parts of the body which modesty requires to be covered. Isa. xx. 4; or scandalous corruptions, of which men ought to be ashamed. Jude 12; or disgrace, dishonour. Prov. ix. 7; or a base and disgraceful condition. Isa. xlvii. 3. The shame of sinners' nakedness, is their abominable guilt and corruption. Rev. iii. 18. When pride cometh then cometh shame of others, and at last shame to the proud person. Prov. xi. 2. To shame, or put to shame, is to render one's condition disgraceful, and to fill him with shame. Psal. xiv. 7. 2 Sam. xix. 5. (2.) To make transgressors blush at their conduct, by chastising and reproving them for it. Judg. xviii. 7. (3.) To mock at. Psal. xiv. 6. (4.) To disappoint. Prov. xiii. 6.

SHAMEFACEDNESS, an agreeable modesty, whereby one behaves in a grave and decent manner, ready to blush at the smallest approach to any thing obscene. 1 Tim. ii. 9.

SHAM'GAR, the son of Anath, and third judge of Israel. The Philistines having invaded his country, he slew six hundred of them with an ox-goad. Judg. iii. 31.

SHAMMAH, the son of Agee the Hararite, the third of David's mighty men. With Eleazar the son of Dodo, he routed the Philistines in a field of lentils, and killed great numbers of them. These, breaking through the host of the Philistines, together with Jashobeam, brought David water from the well of Bethlehem. 2 Sam. xxiii. 11—17. Two others of David's worthies were called Shammah, the one a Harodite, the other a Hararite. 2 Sam. xxiii. 25, 38.

SHAPHAN. See JO-SI'AH.

SHARON, SA'RON; the name of several delightful spots in Canaan; the first lay between Cesarea and Joppa, on the west of the promised land. Acts ix. 35. A second lay between Tabor and the sea of Tiberias; this was perhaps but a continuation of the other. A third lay on the east of Jordan. 1 Chron. v. 16. Sharon was noted for its excellent roses, and pasture for flocks. Sol. Song ii. 1. It is made an emblem of a fruitful country. Isa. xxxiii. 9. and of the church of Christ, fruitful in the beauties of holiness, and abounding with Jesus' spiritual flocks. Isa. xxxv. 2. and lxxv. 10.

SHARP; (1.) Fit, easily to cut or penetrate into matter. Isa. v. 24. Psal. lii. 2. (2.) What is very powerful and piercing. Isa. xlix. 2. Psal. xlv. 5. (3.) Vehement and eager. Acts xv. 39. (4.) Very pernicious and hurtful. Psal. lvii. 5. Prov. v. 4.

SHARPEN; to make sharp. Men sharpen their tongues like serpents, when they slander in a malicious and outrageous manner. Psal. cxl. 3. They sharpen their eye upon one, when they look at him in a malicious and contemptuous manner. Job xvi. 9. We sharpen a friend, when we stir him up, and render him more qualified for action. Prov. xxvii. 17.

SHARPLY; (1.) Angrily, vehemently. Judg. viii. 1. (2.) In a cutting and convincing manner. Tit. i. 13.

SHARPNESS, very cutting admonitions and censures. 2 Cor. xiii. 10.

SHAVE. See BEARD; HAIR.

SHA'VEH, denotes a valley or dale, such as that belonging to the kings of Salem, and that of Kirjathaim. Gen. xiv. 5, 17.

SHAV'SHAH, or SE-RA'-AH, one of David's scribes. 1 Chron. xviii. 16. 2 Sam. viii. 17.

SHEAF; a bundle of corn. To take the sheaf from the hungry, is to deprive the poor of their just and necessary provision. Job xxiv. 10. To bring home sheaves, is to enjoy the happy fruit of one's labour. Psal. cxxvi. 6. See FEAST of unleavened bread.

SHEARD; (1.) A piece of a broken potter's vessel. Exod. xixiii. 34. (2.) A small remnant. Isa. xxx. 14.

SHEAR; (1.) To cut off hair. 1 Cor. xi. 6; but particularly to take off the wool of sheep. In China they shear their sheep thrice a year. The Jews used to shear them in June or July, and had houses for that purpose, and a feast on occasion thereof. 2 Kings x. 12. 1 Sam. xxv. 4—11. and xiii. 23, 24.

SHEATH, or scabbard, the case or covering of a sword. 1 Sam. xvii. 51.

SHEBA, or SE'BA, the son of CUSH, who also gave name to a country in Arabia, or Abyssinia. Gen. x. 7. Psal. lxxii. 10. Isa. xliii. 3. (2.) Sheba the son of Raamah, and grandson of Cush. Gen. x. 7. (3.) The son of Joktan. Gen. x. 28. (4.) The son of Jokshan, and grandson of Abraham. Gen. xxv. 3. All these seem to have taken up their residence in Arabia, and perhaps most of them in the south part of it. One or more of these Shebas gave name to a country, the queen of which came to visit Solomon, and brought him large presents of gold, spices, and precious stones; but where this Sheba was situated, whether in Arabia the Happy, or in Abyssinia, is not agreed. It is certain that both of them lie southward of Canaan; and as Arabia was bounded with the ocean, and Abyssinia was then the southmost known country, both may be called the uttermoost ends of the earth. Spices, gold, and precious stones, were produced, or might easily be had in both. In Abyssinia, their language, and their ancient, nay, their present religion, are not a little similar to the Jewish; and they pretend to give us an account of a queen of theirs, who visited Solomon, and had by him a son, whose posterity continued on the throne 1930 years. 1 Kings x. Matt. xii. 43. Luke xi. 31. The inhabitants of Sheba traded with the Tyrians, in spices, precious stones, and gold. Ezek. xxvii. 22. There was one or more Shebas in Arabia, and another in Abyssinia; but it is more certain that the men of Sheba and Seba were in the primitive ages of Christianity, and shall, in the millennium, be turned to the Lord. Psal. lxxii. 10, 15. Isa. lx. 6. No doubt the SABBAVS were the offspring of some of the above-mentioned Shebas or Seba. We find one tribe of them in Arabia the Desert, near the land of Uz, who carried off Job's cattle, Job i. 15; and to whom the Jews sold the Tyrian slaves which they bought from Alexander's troops. Joel iii. 8. They were conquered by Cyrus. Isa. xlv. 14.

SHE'BA, the son of Bichri, who decoyed eleven of the Hebrew tribes into a revolt from king David, immediately after the death of Absalom; but Joab closely following him with an army, his partisans were soon scattered, and the inhabitants of Abel-beth-maachah, to which place he fled, cut off his head, and delivered it to Joab, who thereon raised his siege of the place. 2 Sam. xx.

SHE'BA, the name of a well or city, is the same as Beersheba. Gen. xxvi. 23. and Josh xix. 2. where the text should be read Beersheba, or Sheba, and then we have thirteen cities, as is said, verse 6.

SHEBAM. See SIN'NAM.

SHE'BA-RIM, a place near Ai. Josh. vii. 5.

SHEB'NAH; treasurer and secretary to king Hezekiah. He was one of those who were sent with Eliakim, to bear Sennacherib's proposals. He was extremely proud, affecting the most sumptuous buildings. He had prepared himself a magnificent sepulchre; but being carried into captivity, either by Sennacherib, or by Esarhaddon, he died in a miserable exile. 2 Kings xviii. 18. Isa. xxii. 15—20.

SHECHEM, SYCHEM, or SY'CHEM, son of Hamor the Canaanite, and prince of Shechem, Sychem, or Sychar, who, by defiling Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and in order to obtain her in marriage, consented that he and all the males of his city should be circumcised; and thus occasioned the death of himself, his father, and all the inhabitants of the city. Gen. xlv. See JACOB. The city called by his name stood on mount Ephraim, about ten miles from Shiloh, and thirty, or rather, according to Reland, thirty-five north of Jerusalem. Near to this place, Jacob bought a piece of ground, and had afterwards to recover it by force from the Canaanites. This he bequeathed to Joseph, who was afterwards buried in it. Gen. xxxiii. 19. and xlix. 22. Acts vii. 16. Josh. xxiv. 22. It fell to the tribe of Ephraim; was given to the Levites; and was a city of refuge. Here Joseph, just before his death, convened the Hebrews to give them a solemn charge. Josh. xx. 7. and xxiv. The inhabitants, with the family of Millo, set up ABIMELECH the bastard son of Gideon as king; but in about three years after, he rewarded them with the murder of the inhabitants, and the total ruin of their city. Judg. ix. It was, however, rebuilt; and here Rehoboam was rejected, and Jeroboam was made king of the ten tribes. He further repaired it, and it seems, made it his capital for a time. 1 Kings xii. 1-25. Long after, the Samaritans made it their capital, and on account of their drunkenness it was called Sychar. About A. M. 3870, Hircanus king of the Jews took, and pillaged, and rased it. It was rebuilt by Vespasian about forty years after Christ's death, and called Flavia and Neapolis, or the new city. At present it is called Naplouse, and is the capital of a small government under the Turks; and here the remaining Samaritans chiefly reside. Near to this place was Jacob's well, where our Saviour converted the woman, and over which superstition erected a church, that was standing about nine hundred years ago. John iv.

SHEP. See POUR.

SHEEP; a cleanly, patient, harmless, and useful, animal. Anciently the great wealth, even of kings and princes, lay in sheep, goats, &c. 2 Kings iii. 4. In some countries, the tails of the sheep are very large, and covered with fat. In Madagascar, they sometimes weigh sixteen pounds. In Arabia and Syria, some of them are three cubits long, and weigh about twenty-five or thirty pounds; they place little boards below them, lest, by trailing along the ground, they should become ulcerated. Kinson says, there are some in Tartary, whose tails weigh eighty pounds; but this is highly incredible. Rams are the uncastrated he-sheep, and are strong and violent fighters.

In Mesopotamia, Italy, &c. the ewes bring forth their LAMBS twice a year. All the sheep offered in the ancient sacrifices, represented Christ. He and his people are likened to sheep and lambs, to represent their innocence, patience, harmlessness, usefulness, and exposure to troubles and enemies. Isa. liii. 7. John x. 1-26. and xxi. 15-17. Christ is God's Lamb, whom he provided, and the sacrifice of whom fully satisfied his offended justice. John i. 29. Men in general are compared to sheep and lambs, to denote their stupidity, their weakness, exposure to danger, and need of government. 1 Kings xxii. 17. Hos. iv. 16. Isa. lx. 7. Or for their innocence and harmlessness as to a particular sin. 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. Sinners are likened to sheep, to mark their thoughtfulness, their proneness to wander, their exposure to ruin, their inability to defend or recover themselves, and their need to be saved, led, and nourished by Jesus the great Shepherd. Psal. xlix. 14. Isa. liii. 6. 1 Pet. ii. 25. Luke xv. 4-6. The rams, goats, and lambs, denote the various classes of people in a country; great and powerful, or poor and weak, and less or more innocent. Isa. xxxiv. 6, 7. and lx. 7. Ezek. xxxiv. 17. and xxxix. 18.

Darius and his two kingdoms of Persia and Media, are likened to a two-horned ram, pushing its conquests northward, westward, and southward, but destroyed by the Greeks. Dan. viii. 3-7. Wives are likened to lambs, because pleasant, comely, and tractable. 2 Sam. xii. 3, 4. Antichrist is likened to a lamb, with two horns; he usurps the place of Christ, our great sacrifice; he pretends to great humility, holiness, and usefulness, and claims a two-fold power, civil and ecclesiastical. Rev. xiii. 7.

Battering rams; instruments of war, anciently used for making breaches in walls. They are huge beams like the masts of ships, capped with an iron-head resembling a ram's head. Being hung by ropes to another cross beam supported on poles, and equally balanced, a number of men thrust it backward and forward, and so beat the wall with its iron-head till they made a breach in it. The workers of the ram were meanwhile covered with a kind of pent-house, to screen them from the arrows of the besieged, or the stones thrown by them. They afterward had battering rams that ran on wheels. Some assert that these battering rams were invented by Epæus the Greek at the siege of Troy, and others that they were first used by the Carthaginians at the siege of Cadix. It is certain that no author before Ezekiel mentions them. Ezek. iv. 2. and xxi. 22.

SHEET. Probably the Jews used linen-sheets in the same manner as some country people do plaid and mantles. Judg. xiv. 12, 13. Mark xiv. 15. The sheet full of all kinds of beasts, thrice let down from heaven, and then taken up, which Peter saw in his vision, might represent the Christian church as constituted of all nations, Jews and gentiles, thrice eminently enlarged in the apostolic age, in Constantine's time, and then in the millennium, and at length received up into heaven. Acts x. 11-16.

SHEKEL; a coin among the Hebrews, but its precise weight is not agreed on; and so some make its value in silver to be half a crown, others three shillings. Dr. Arbuthnot reckons it in weight nine penny-weights and twenty four grains Troy; and its value in silver, two shillings and three-pence and one and a half farthing; and in gold, £1. 16s. 6d.

SHEM, or SEM, the second son of Noah, born A. M. 1558. To reward his filial duty in assisting his brother Japheth in the covering of his father's nakedness he had his father's special blessing, which imported, that in his posterity the church of God should long remain, and that Canaan should be his servant; but at last, the posterity of Japheth should dwell in his tents. By his sons, ELAM, ASHAM, ARHAXAD, LUD, and ARAM, he peopled most of the south part of Asia, and the isles adjacent. In Shem's posterity, especially the Hebrew nation, the church almost wholly continued for about 2000 years before Christ; since which, multitudes of the posterity of Japheth have been brought into it. See CANAAN and JAPHETH. Perhaps Shem was the Pluto or Typhon of the heathen; and from him the city Zama, near the head of the Tigris, seems to have had its name.

SHE-MA'AH. See REHOBOAM, JEREMIAH, NEHEMIAH. There are about eighteen persons of this name mentioned in scripture.

SHEMI-NITH, a musical instrument of eight strings; but others think it was a certain musical air. Psal. vi. and xii. title. 1 Chron. xxv. 21.

SHE'PHAM, a city on the south of Syria, is perhaps the same as Apamea. Numb. xxiv. 10, 11.

SHEPHERD. See PASTOR.

SHERIFF. We cannot say that the TIP-TAYE had the same kind of power in the Chaldean kingdom that our sheriffs have. Dan. iii. 2.

SHE'SHACH; a name given to Babylon. It was probably derived from one of their idols, which might be the same as the moon, and to which they devoted their Sacæan feasts, much in the manner of the Roman Saturnalia, in revelling, drunkenness, and all manner of debauchery. Jer. xxv. 26. and li. 41.

SHESH-BAZZAR. See ZERUBBABEL.

SHETHAR-BOZNAI. See SAMARITANS.

SHEW; (1.) To make known; to set a thing as before one's eyes. Exod. ix. 16. (2.) To bestow, effect towards. Psal. cxii. 5. A show is an appearance. Psal. xxxix. 6. Christ made a show of principalities and powers, openly on his cross: he openly triumphed over evil spirits as conquered by him, even as conquerors did over those they had conquered, leading them along by their chariot. Col. ii. 15. To make a fair show in the flesh, is to make a specious appearance in opposing the truth, and, in conformity to the Jews, in order to avoid persecution. Gal. vi. 12.

SHIB'BO-LETH. See EPHRAIM.

SHIELD. See BUCKLER.

SHIG'GAI-ON, or SIGIONOTH, either denotes a musical instrument, or a tune whose notes were exceedingly diversified, and perhaps also that these songs varied in their matter from one opposite to another, as from deep sorrow to exultation and triumph. Psal. vii. title. Hab. iii. 1.

SHIHON, or SE'ON; a city of the tribe of Issachar near the foot of mount Tabor, and which was of some note about A.D. 330.

SHI'LO-AH, or SI-LO'AM, is said to have been the same as the Gihon, and to have had its rise on the west of the city. It is said to have had two pools; the pool of Siloam near the south-east of the temple, and the pool of Shelah, or Siloah somewhere to the westward. Neh. iii. 15. Sometimes the stream of Shiloah is said to be on the south of the city, and yet in the Talmud mention is made of Shiloah, in the midst of the city. Perhaps the water that came from fountains near the same place for ordinary uses, ran partly through the city eastward, and partly along the south side of it, and met near the pool of Siloam, where our Saviour healed the blind man. John ix. The family of David in their weak condition, and Jesus in his humiliation, and his Spirit and grace, are likened to the soft-flowing waters of Shiloah. Isa. viii. 6. Psal. xlv. 4.

SHILOH; (1.) A name of the Messiah. Some, by a mistake of the last letter, render it sent. Some render it his son; others, he to whom it, (viz. the kingdom,) belongs. Le Clerc fancifully renders it the end; and makes the passage run thus: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah—till the end of it come;" i. e. it shall not depart till it depart. Gouset explains it of the Messiah, as a wearied sufferer. But as the word comes from SHALAH; which signifies quietness, Job iii. 26. and prosperity, Psal. cxvii. 6, 7; it is most properly rendered, The prosperous Author of salvation and rest; and the whole text might run thus: The power of government shall not depart from Judah, nor a judge from among his descendants, till the prosperous Saviour come, and to him shall be the gathering and obedience of the gentiles. Gen. xlix. 10. The accomplishment of this prediction is evident. Nothing is more plain than that the offspring of Judah preserved their distinct existence as a tribe, together with a power of government, and judging of causes, till Jesus came in the flesh. The tribe of Judah were most numerous when they came out of Egypt; they led the van in the wilderness; they were divinely ordered to make the first attack on the remaining Canaanites, Judg. i. 1, 2; and against the Benjamites at Gibeon, Judg. xx. 18. Othniel, the first of the judges, was of this tribe. Judg. iii. 9. The family of David, who belonged to this tribe, long had the royal power. Even under the Chaldeans and Persians, Jehoiaquin, Zerubbabel, and Nehemiah, all of this tribe, held a superiority. 2 Kings xxv. Ezra i—vi. Neh. i—xiii. For about a hundred and sixty years before Christ, the Maccabæe priests, and the family of Herod, ruled over the Jews, both of which were in a manner incorporated with the tribe of Judah; and besides, the sanhedrim of Jewish elders had much power in their hand.—Not long after our Saviour's incarnation, Judea was reduced to a Roman province. Nor had the gentiles long begun to gather to, and obey him, when the Jewish church and state were quite overturned, and the distinction of tribes for ever finished, the genealogies being lost. It is true, they pretend since to have had heads of their captivity; but where is their evidence? or where is the nation in which they have authority from their tyrannic masters, to judge and determine in any important point? If they cannot produce proofs of political power for 1700 years past, the Messiah must certainly be come, and Jesus of Nazareth be the person.

(2.) SHILOH; a famous city of the tribe of Ephraim, about ten miles south of Shechem, and twenty-five north of Jerusalem. Here Joshua divided the Western Canaan to the nine tribes and a half: here he fixed the tabernacle of God; and here it continued about three hundred and ten years, it not three hundred and fifty. After the Philistines had carried off the ark, it was never returned to Shiloh, and the place gradually dwindled away, till its ruinous condition became a proverb, and a pattern of desolation. Josh. xviii. Psal. lxxviii. 69. Jer. vi. 12, 14. and xxxi. 6, 9. The inhabitants of it are perhaps called Shilonites, 1 Chron. ix. 5; at least Ahijah the prophet was one

1 Kings xiv. 2. Two hundred of their daughters, as they danced in their vineyards, were seized by the remaining two hundred men of the Benjamites. Judg. xxi.

SHIMEI, the son of Gera, a Benjamite, and a kinsman of Saul. When David, in a most mournful condition, fled from Jerusalem for fear of Absalom, Shimei met him at Bahurim, and bitterly cursed him as a murderer and wicked monster, and threw stones at him. David would not suffer him to be slain for his insolence. After Absalom's death, Shimei, with 1000 men of his tribe, came with the first, particularly of the three tribes of the camp of Ephraim, to welcome David home to his capital. He confessed his crime, and begged forgiveness. Notwithstanding Abishai's pleading against him, David gave Shimei his oath, that he would spare his life, and never put him to death. 2 Sam. xvi. 5-11. and xix. 16-23. But as it was dangerous to let such an affront of royal majesty go unpunished, David, on his death-bed, charged Solomon to resent it as he thought proper. In full consistency with his father's oath, Solomon ordered Shimei, under pain of death, not to go without the limits of Jerusalem. Shimei was content with the restriction. About three years after, some of his slaves fled, and took shelter with Achish king of Gath. Informed of their retreat, Shimei went after them, and brought them back to Jerusalem. Solomon having heard of it, called Shimei before him, and after convicting him of his wickedness, ordered Benaiah to dispatch him with his sword. 1 Kings ii. 36-46.

SHINAR; the province of Babylon, where the famous tower was built. It was probably so called, because thence the Lord shook out, or dispersed the nations. Gen. xi. 2. Dan. i. 2. In this country we find the mountains Zagrei, or Singares, and the city and river of Singara. Shinar may not only mean Babylonia, but the whole countries to which the Jews have been for many ages dispersed, and from whence they shall be brought back at last. Zech. v. 11. Isa. xi. 11.

SHINE; to appear bright as the sun in a clear day. Job xxxi. 26. God shines forth, when he manifests his glorious excellencies, and confers his favours. Psal. i. 2. lxxx. 1. and cxix. 135. His gospel or truths shine, when they are clearly published, and powerfully applied. Isa. ix. 2. 2 Pet. i. 19. Men shine, when they appear clearly to be sound in doctrine, holy in practice, and abound in outward honour and power. Matt. v. 15, 16. Job xi. 17. Dan. xii. 3. The light or candle of prosperity shines on men, when they enjoy much of it. Job xxii. 28. and xxix. 3.

SHIPWRECK and PU'AH, were two noted midwives in the land of Goshen; but whether they were Hebrews, or Egyptians, we know not. To prevent the increase of the Israelites, Pharaoh sent for the midwives, and charged them to stifle in the birth all the Hebrew male children. They neglected to obey his orders. He sent for them again, and expostulated with them. They told him, that the Hebrew women were not like the Egyptians, but could, and often did, bring forth their infants without the help of midwives. Possibly there might be a great deal of truth in this. But whatever falsehood was in their speech, God did not reward it: but he rewarded their fear of him, and their love to the Hebrews, and he built them houses; that is, he rewarded them with numerous and prosperous families. Calmet thinks, it was not the houses of the midwives, but of the Hebrews, that God built up. Exod. i. 15-19.

SHIPS. Probably Noah's ark gave the first origin to shipping. The tribes of Zebulun and Dan appeared to have early begun a sea-trade. Gen. xlix. 13. Judg. v. 17. Solomon, and after him Jehoshaphat, set on foot a considerable trade by shipping. 1 Kings x. and xxii. The Trojans were early powerful at sea: but the Tyrians and Sidonians for many ages were much more so. Nor was their colony at Carthage inferior in shipping. The Greeks, both in Asia and Europe, were also in their turn famous by sea; particularly those of Miletus, Rhodes, Athens, Sicily; and the Alexandrians in Egypt. After the Saracens had ruined the Grecian sea-trade, the Venetians, Pisans, and Genoese in Italy, became famous for their naval strength. About two hundred and eighty years ago, the Spaniards and Portuguese, by pushing their African, Indian, and American discoveries, engrossed much of the sea-trade: but at present the English and Americans possess the greatest number of ships. Some of the ancient ships were enormously large. Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, had one of stupendous magnitude presented to him by Hiero king of Syracuse. Ptolemy Philopater had one of two hundred and eighty cubits long, thirty-eight broad, and forty-eight high, and capable to stow 3800 men. Ships of Tarshish, are put for the merchants and mariners concerned in them. Isa. xxiii. 14: and for the glory and strength of God's enemies. Isa. ii. 16. Psal. xlviii. 7. The Chaldeans cried in the ships, when busied in their trade in the river Euphrates; and when hastening to flee away from Cyrus, as he took the city; and the water of the river was diverted. Isa. xliii. 13. The church is likened to a tossed ship, to denote her troubled and unsettled condition in this world. Isa. liv. 11. The Assyrian kingdom is likened to a ship, of which the king was the mast, the princes and rulers the tacklings, and the common people and army the sails. Isa. xxiii. 23, 24. The third part of the ships destroyed under the second trumpet, may denote the ships, islands, and maritime cities destroyed by the Goths and Huns, about the end of the fourth, and beginning of the fifth Christian centuries; and the corruptions of multitudes of useful ministers in the church, troubled by the Arians, and other heretics. Rev. viii. 6. Man's life is likened to swift ships, or ships of pleasure; how quickly it hastens to an end! Job ix. 26.

SHIPWRECK, is the loss of a ship and its lading, by storms, rocks, or the like. Men make shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience, when, to the wounding of their consciences, they apostatize from the love, profession, or practice of divine truth, which they once believed. 1 Tim. i. 19.

SHISHAK, king of Egypt, and, we suppose, brother-in-law to king Solomon. Sir

Isaac Newton, with great probability, supposes him the same as Sesostrius, Bacchus, Osiris, and the Egyptian Hercules, and perhaps the Belus of the Chaldeans, and Mars, or Mavors, of the Thracians. Offended with Solomon, perhaps for dishonouring his sister by taking other wives, he protected Jeroboam when a fugitive in Egypt. After enlarging his kingdom to the west, perhaps to the ocean, he turned his arms against Asia, with 1200 chariots of war, 60,000 horsemen, and an innumerable company of Egyptians, Lubims, Lukims, and Cushims; he invaded the kingdom of Judah, took Jerusalem, and carried off the riches of the palace and temple: but he does not appear to have distressed the kingdom of Israel, because perhaps Jeroboam was his ally. After ravaging Asia from the north of India to the Black sea, he crossed over into Greece, and was there routed by Perseus; or perhaps rather obliged to hasten home to chastise his brother Danaus, who being left governor of Egypt, had assumed the crown. On his return, Danaus was forced to flee, and sailed to Greece, and was there celebrated by the names of Neptune, Python, Typhon, if not also Japetus. In the height of his arrogance, Shishak is said to have caused the captive kings to draw his chariot, till one day he observed one of them to keep his eye steadily fixed on the wheel; and being asked the reason, said, that he took the turning of the wheel to suggest how quickly those in high stations would be brought low, and those in low stations be exalted. This speech affected Shishak, and indeed was verified in his case; for not long after his death, his empire fell to pieces, and the Ethiopians, or Cushims, became masters of Egypt. 2 Chron. xii. 1 Kings xiv.

SHITTIM-WOOD; a kind of timber very valuable, and much used by Moses in the tabernacle, and its furniture. Jerome represents it as similar to the white thorn. It is most likely to have been the black Acacia, which is said to be the only tree that grows in the Arabian desert. Its wood is smooth, beautiful, tough, hard, and almost incorruptible. Being used in the tabernacle, it might denote the excellence and durability of Christ's manhood, and the strength and beauty of his true saints. It was, probably, from the plenty of this wood growing there, that a place on the east of Jordan was called SHITTIM, where the Hebrews encamped a considerable time. Numb. xxv. 1. Mic. vi. 5. Josh. ii. 1. In Joel iii. 18. it may represent the dry, barren gentile world, watered by the word and Spirit of Christ.

SHIVERS. To be broken to SHIVERS, or very small pieces, is to be utterly ruined. Rev. ii. 27.

SHOPACH, or SHOPACH. See HADADEZER.

SHOBI. See NAHASH.

SHOCK; sheaves of corn set up in the field for winnowing. One comes to his grave as a shock of corn in his season, when being well prepared for death, he dies in a good old age. Job v. 26.

SHOE. Among the Hebrews, slaves went bare-footed; others generally had their feet and legs covered when they went abroad; and their women of quality had these parts covered with materials very rich and beautiful. Sol. Song vii. 1. Ezek. xvi. 10. It seems their shoes were ordinarily of no great value, and so a pair of shoes denotes a very inconsiderable bribe. Amos ii. 6. Probably their soldiers often wore shoes of iron and brass; and to this day, many of the eastern people wear iron plates on the heels and the fore-sole of their shoes: but Asher's shoes being of iron and brass, may denote the abundance of these metals in his territory, and his strength to conquer and crush his enemies. Deut. xxxiii. 25. The Hebrews eating the first passover with their shoes on, loins girded, and staff in their hand, imported that they were immediately after to begin their journey. Exod. xii. 11. Putting of shoes, imported reverence of the presence of God. Exod. iii. 5. Josh. v. 5. Want of shoes, imported mourning, debasement, and slavery. 2 Sam. xv. 30. Ezek. xxiv. 17. Isa. xx. 2, 4. The plucking off a shoe, and giving it to another, imported resignation of right to him. Ruth iv. 7. But a widow's loosing the shoe from the foot of the man who refused to marry her, and raise up seed to his deceased brother, imported that he deserved to be treated as a slave and base person. Deut. xxv. 9. To bear or unloose one's shoes, imports doing him the meanest offices. Matt. iii. 11. Luke iii. 16. David cast his shoe over Edom, when he took possession of the country, and used the people as slaves. Psal. lx. 8. and cviii. 9. The saints have their feet beautiful with shoes, have shoes of badgers' skins, and are shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, when by the truths of the gospel, their souls are made free, are enabled and disposed to, and are ready in all holy obedience. Sol. Song vii. 1. Ezek. xvi. 10. Eph. vi. 15.

SHOOT; (1.) To move quickly. Exod. xxxvi. 38. (2.) To send arrows from a bow. 2 Kings xiii. 17. (3.) To sprout, grow up as corn. Job viii. 16. Isa. xxvii. 8. God shoots at men, when he suddenly destroys them. Psal. cxliv. 6. and lxiv. 7. Men shoot at the saints, when they oppress and persecute them. Psal. xi. 2. and lxiv. 3, 4.

SHOPHAN, or ZAPHON, a city of the Gadites, a little eastward of the sea of Tiberias. Numb. xxxii. 35. Josh. xiii. 27.

SHORE; the bank of land at the side of a sea or river. Matt. xiii. 2.

SHORT; (1.) Of small length and duration. Job xx. 5. Job's light or prosperity seemed short, because of the darkness, and sore trouble that followed it. Job xvii. 12. (2.) Of small power and ability. Numb. xi. 23. Shortness of spirit, imports grief, vexation. Exod. vi. 9. To come short, is not to obtain. Rom. iii. 28. To cut short, is to destroy, consume. 2 Kings x. 32. For the preservation of the elect among and in the loins of the Jews, the days or time of the Roman ravages were shortened. Matt. xxiv. 28. The seventh head of the Roman government continued but for a short space. The Christian emperors there continued but about a hundred and sixty years, till A. D. 476. The kingdom of the Ostrogoths, continued about sixty years, till 553; the exarchs of Ravenna continued till about a hundred and sixty years, till 727, when the city fell under the power of the pope. Rev. xvii. 10.

SHOULDER; (1.) A part of the animal body fit for bearing of burdens. Hence burdens on the shoulder, import labour, servitude, oppression. Gen. xlix. 15. Isa. ix. 4. and x. 27. Psal. lxxxix. 6. To serve with one shoulder, is to do it with one consent. Zeph. iii. 9. To pull away the shoulder, is rebelliously to refuse subjection to God's law, as an unruly beast refuses to draw in a yoke. Neh. ix. 27. Zech. vii. 11. To be carried on the shoulder, is to be carried honourably, as royal persons. Isa. xlix. 22. (2.) Ability to execute an office. The government is on Christ's shoulder; the whole care and rule of the church is committed to his power, and wisdom, and love. Isa. ix. 6. As badges of honour and rule were worn on the shoulders, keys on the shoulder denote the power of government. Job xxxi. 26. Isa. xxii. 22. (3.) The border of a country; as God dwelt between Benjamin's shoulders. Isa. xi. 14; i. e. as his temple stood on Moriah, in their border. Deut. xxxiii. 12.

SHOUT; a great noise of alarm, 1 Thess. iv. 16; or of joy and triumph, Exod. xxxii. 18. Psal. xlvii; or of lamentation and earnest prayer, Lam. iii. 8; of encouragement and excitement, 1 Sam. xvii. 20; of terror given to affright an enemy, Jer. l. 15. and li. 14; or of applause. 1 Sam. x. 24. Acts xii. 12.

SHOWER. See RAIN.

SHRED; to cut in pieces, and cast into a pot. 1 Kings iv. 30.

SHRINES; either small forms of the temple of Ephesus, with Diana's image in them; or medals with the figure of the temple impressed thereon. Acts xix. 24.

SHROUD; a covering; top; a grove. Ezek. xxxi. 8.

SHRUB; a small grown tree.

SHU'LAM-ITE; a name given to the church, to denote that she pertained to Jerusalem; or rather was reconciled to God, peaceable in disposition, and made perfect through the Saviour's comeliness put upon her. Sol. Song. vi. 13.

SHUMATHITES; so called, from one Shumath their chief, or from Shema a city of Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 53.

SHU'NEM; a city of Issachar, about five miles south of Tabor. Josh. xix. 18. Here, in a great plain, the Philistine army encamped, while Saul's lay at Gilboa. 1 Sam. xxviii. 4. Abishag, David's concubine, was a native of it. 1 Kings i. 3. Here Elisha was kindly entertained, and obtained in answer to prayer a child to his kind hostess, and afterwards restored him to life. 2 Kings iv. See ELISHA; JEHOHAM.

SHUR, or SUR; a city of Arabia, on the north-east side of the Red sea, and which gave name to the adjacent part of the desert; it consisted of about the fourth part of the wilderness of Etham. Gen. xvi. 7. Exod. xv. 22. It appears to have been the west border of the Amalekites. 1 Sam. xv. 7; and xxvii. 8. Here the Surrattee of Ptolemy stood.

SHU'SHAN, or Su'sa, on the bank of the river Ulai, and the capital of Susiana, or Shusistan, in Persia: and seems to have had its name from the abundance of lilies growing about it. It is said to have been built by Memnon, a little before the Trojan war. It was the winter residence of the Persian kings, from the time of Cyrus, as a high ridge of mountains sheltered it from the north-east wind; but the sun so scorched it in the summer, that the inhabitants were obliged to cover their houses with earth, to about the depth of a yard; and if a lizard or serpent crept out it was likely to be burnt to death. Here Daniel had his vision of the ram and he-goat. Dan. viii. Darius Hystaspes, or Ahasuerus, greatly adorned this place. From hence he issued his decree for finishing the rebuilding of the temple, in gratitude for which the Jews called the eastern gate of their temple, the gate of Shushan, and had a resemblance of that city carved thereon. Here also he kept his splendid feast. Esth. i. 6. When Alexander seized this city, he found in it, 50,000 talents of gold, besides jewels, and golden and silver vessels, to an immense value. For above 1100 years it has lain in ruins, and is called Valdak. Tavernier thinks, that the present Shustera is built near to the scite of Shushan.

SHUT; to close up, bar. Judg. ix. 5. To shut out, is to put out to another place, to refuse to regard. Numb. xii. 14. Lam. iii. 8. To shut up, or shut in, implies imprisonment, restraint. John xii. 14. Rev. xx. 8. To shut the eyes, imports a disregard of instruction, Prov. xvii. 30; or an abhorrence. Isa. xxxiii. 15. To shut the lips, is to speak sparingly. Prov. xvii. 28. To shut the hand, is to withhold alms, and refuse assistance. Deut. xv. 7. To be shut of a hand, is to be lame of it. Judg. iii. 15. To shut up mercies and bowels, is to show no pity, or sympathy. Psal. lxxvii. 9. 1 John iii. 7. To shut up a vision, or word, is to conceal it, or the meaning of it from the multitude. Dan. viii. 26, and xii. 4. Heaven is shut up, when rain, natural or spiritual, is denied. 1 Kings viii. 35. Rev. xi. 6. Men shut up the kingdom of heaven, when they misrepresent the true mode of access to everlasting happiness, and hinder and discourage others from the use of the proper means of salvation. Matt. xxiii. 13. Men are shut up in unbelief, when God, for the punishment of former sins, justly gives them up to Satan, and their own corrupt lusts, till they be further fixed in their disregard of Christ and his father. Rom. xi. 32. Men are shut up to the faith, when God's providences, ordinances, and influences, concur to promote their believing in Jesus as the only Saviour. Gal. iii. 23. The doors are shut in the streets, when the aged man's teeth are gone, or he can scarcely open his lips; or when betwixt his death and interment, business in the house is stopped. Eccl. xii. 4.

SHUTTLE; an instrument used by weavers, for intermingling their woof with the warp. As it moves very quickly from one side of the web to the other, our days are represented as swifter than a weaver's shuttle, to denote the shortness of life, and quick motion of time. Job vii. 6.

SIBMAH, SHEBMAH, or SHE'BAM; a city about half a mile from Heahbon. The best vines grew near it. Isa. xvi. 8. It was originally the property of the Moabites; but Sibon having taken it from them, it fell to the Reubenites after his overthrow. Numb. xxxii. 38. Josh. xiii. 19. During the decline of the kingdom of Israel, the Moabites seized on it. It was destroyed or pillaged by the Assyrians, Isa. xvi. 8; and afterwards by the Chaldeans. Jer. xlviii. 32.

SIB-RA'IM; a city on the north-east of Canaan, between Hamath and Damascus. Ezek. xlvii. 16.

SICHEM, SY'CHAR. See SHECHEM.

SICK. A human being, or animal, is sick, when diseased. Gen. xlviii. 1. A kingdom or nation is sick, when corrupted with sin, and oppressed, perplexed, and almost ruined. Isa. i. 15. Mic. vi. 13. Hos. v. 13. The soul is sick, when distressed with trouble, or with the want of things hoped for, Prov. xiii. 12; when guilty, and corrupted with sin, Matt. ix. 12; when pained with ardent love to, and desire after fellowship with Christ, Sol. Song v. 8; and when overpowered and ravished with the sweet enjoyment of Christ and his fulness. Sol. Song ii. 5.

SICKLE; an instrument for cutting down corn. Deut. xvi. 9. God's judgments, with which he destroys Antichrist and other nations, are compared to it. Rev. xiv. 14—17. Joel iii. 13.

SIDE; (1.) A division of a thing. Josh. viii. 33. (2.) Party. Exod. xxxii. 26. (3.) The frontiers of a country, or gates of its cities. Ezek. xxv. 9. To know the signification of the phrases, on this side, on that side, or on the other side, we must know where the speaker or writer was at the time; Moses being on the east of Jordan, calls the east side of it, on this side. Numb. xxxiii. 19. and xxxv. 14. In Joshua, Judges, Sammel, Isaiah, Chronicles, on this side of Jordan, denotes the west side. Josh. ix. 10, &c. As the books Ezra and Nehemiah were written on the west of the Euphrates, in them, on this side of the river, denotes the west of the Euphrates. Ezra v. 8. Neh. iii. 7.

SIDON, ZIDON. See PHœNICIA.

SIEGE; the surrounding of a city or castle with an army, in order to starve or force the inhabitants to a surrender. The scriptures mention the sieges of Samaria, Nineveh, Babylon, Jerusalem, and Tyre, as most noted. The other famed sieges of antiquity, are those of Troy, Ashdod, Tyre, Alexandria, and Numantium. The more noted sieges of modern times are those of Constantinople, Ostend, and Graves; but especially that of Candia in CRETE. The surrounding judgments of God, reducing men to great hardships, are called a siege. Isa. xxix. 3.

SIEVE; an instrument for separating the finer parts of powder, &c. from the coarser; or for cleansing corn from sand, chaff, or light grain. God sifts his people in a sieve, when by his judgments he scatters and tosses them till the refuse be separated from them. Amos ix. 9. He sifted the Assyrians with a sieve of vanity, that passes every thing, when he almost cut off their whole army. Isa. xxx. 28. Satan sifts men as wheat, when he tempts and harrasnes them, striving to shake the grace of God out of their hearts, till they are in apparent danger of losing all. Luke xxii. 31.

SIGH; to shew grief for sin or misery by a kind of groaning. Isa. xxiv. 7. To sigh with the breaking of loins, is to be in extreme grief. Ezek. xxi. 6. All the sighing thereof, I have made to cease. Babylon's destruction shall come so suddenly, that they shall have scarcely time to sigh; and then shall the Jews and other captives cease from their sorrow, and be glad. Isa. xxi. 2.

SIGHT. See SEE.

SIGN. See MARK.

SIGNET. See RING.

SIGNIFY; (1.) To mean, point out. Acts xxv. 27. 1 Pet. i. 11. (2.) To foretell. Acts i. 28. Rev. i. 1.

SI'ON, king of the Amorites, on the east of Jordan. About A. M. 2540, he invaded the kingdom of Moab, and seized a considerable part of it about A. M. 2552. He refused a passage to the Hebrews through his country. Moses therefore attacked him in war, took his country from him, and gave it to the tribe of Reuben. Numb. xxi. and xxxii. Deut. ii. 26—37. Josh. xiii. Psal. cxxxvi. 19, 21.

SIHOR, SHIHOR. See NILE.

SIHOR, or SHIHOR-LIBNATH; a place not far from North Carmel, and in the west border of the Asherites. Josh. xix. 26. Whether it was a city, or the river of crocodiles, or the white promontory between Ecdippa and Tyre, is not agreed.

SILAS, SYLVANUS, or TERTIUS. It is thought that he and Carpus were John's two messengers to Jesus. Matt. xi. 2, 3. He was a chief man among the primitive preachers, and an attendant upon Paul. He was sent with him from Antioch to the synod at Jerusalem; and he and Judas were sent by the synod with Paul and Barnabas, to bear their decrees to the churches. Acts xv. 22. He went with Paul to Lycania, Phrygia, Galatia, Macedonia, and at Philippi was his fellow prisoner. Acts xv. and xvi. He and Timothy remained at Berea, instructing the disciples, after Paul was obliged to flee. Nor does it appear they came up to him, till he came to Corinth; and there Silas fervently preached the gospel. Acts xvii. 15. and xviii. 5. 2 Cor. i. 19. It is probable that Silas is the brother whose praise was in all the churches; and was chosen with him to bear the charitable contributions to Jerusalem; and who, along with Titus, conveyed Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians. 2 Cor. viii. 18, 19. Being with Paul, he sends his salutation to the Thessalonians, in both the epistles directed to them. He wrote the copy sent to the Romans, and sends his salutation. Rom. xvi. 22. By him, Peter sent his first epistle to the dispersed Jews. 1 Pet. v. 12. He is said to have died in Macedonia; but whether by martyrdom, is not known.

SILENCE; (1.) Without speech or noise. Job xxix. 21. Jer. viii. 14. (2.) Quietness, submission, abstinence from murmuring. Zech. ii. 12. (3.) Inactivity, stillness. Prov. xxvi. 20. Isa. xxiii. 2. Death, and the utter ruin of cities, are called silence, as noise has ceased; and in the grave, and in the ruined city, there is a dreary silence. Psal. xciv.

17. Jer. viii. 14. Isa. xv. 1. Silence in heaven for the space of half an hour, denotes the calm in the Christian church, between A. D. 323 and 338. Rev. viii. 1. God keeps silence, when he delays to grant his people's requests, Psal. xxviii. 1; or to punish the wicked for their sins. Psal. xxxv. 22. and i. 21. Men are put to silence, when they are so baffled by the force of arguments, or holy conversation, that they have nothing to say. Matt. xxii. 34. 1 Pet. ii. 15.

SILK. Perhaps the ancient Hebrews knew nothing of silk; for their shesh and mesni, which is so rendered, may signify cotton, or fine linen. Gen. xli. 42. Prov. xxxi. 22. Ezek. xvi. 10, 13. Silk is a commodity much traded in by the people of the East. It is now well known that a species of worm spins the silk out of its bowels; and it is only twisted and woven by us. There are some very curious mills for winding and twisting it. The Seres, perhaps the same as the Chinese, were the first improvers of it. From thence the art was introduced into Persia. Nor till after the conquests of Alexander, was silk known in Europe; and even then, it was valued at its weight in gold. Tiberius the emperor prohibited his male subjects from wearing any of it; and about two hundred years after, Aurelian obstinately refused his empress a gown of it, as too costly and luxurious even for her. Till about A. D. 556 the art of manufacturing it, was kept a close secret in the east. At last, Justinian the emperor had some of the worms brought to Constantinople. They succeeded so well, that very soon silk manufactories were established there, and at Athens, Thebes, and Corinth. At present, silk is so common, both in Asia and Europe, and pride of apparel so extravagant, that even the lower classes of society obtain it for clothing.

SIL'LA; a place near the house of Millo in Jerusalem. Some think it was a part or suburb of the city; but it was most likely a terrace, or raised way, between the two hills on which the city was built. 2 Kings vii. 30.

SI-LO'AM. See SHILOAH.

SIL-VANUS. See SILAS.

SILVER. We read nothing of silver before the flood; but in Abraham's time traffic was carried on with it, though it was not coined till long after. See MONEY. Its ore requires to be carefully purified to render it fine. Psal. xli. 7. It is found mingled with lead, tin, &c. The fine silver of the ancients was found in the mines of Tarsish. Jer. x. 9. Great quantities of it were used in the building of the Jewish temple by Solomon. 1 Chron. xxix. 4. It is put for all temporal wealth. Hos. ix. 6. As an emblem, it denotes what is useful, precious, pure, and glorious. Rulers of church and state are likened to silver, to indicate how precious and useful they ought to be. Isa. i. 23, 26. Saints are tried silver; to mark their true excellency; and they are tried in the fire of manifold tribulations. Isa. lxvi. 10. Zech. xiii. 9. Wisdom, and her revenue, or merchandize, (i. e. Christ and his graces) are more pure, precious, comely, and useful than silver. Job xxviii. 15. Prov. xvi. 16. viii. 10, 19. and iii. 14. The Jews were reprobate silver, not able to abide the trial; they had the appearance of goodness; but when tried by the law, or providence of God, their naughtiness and cross became evident. Jer. vi. 30. The tongue of the just is as choice silver; their speech is pure, useful, and edifying. Prov. x. 20. To seek a thing as silver, and to dig for it as for hid treasures, is to seek it earnestly, and by all proper methods. Prov. ii. 4. They that bear silver, are the wealthy, the merchants, the exchangers. Zeph. i. 11. A SILVERLING, or piece of silver, is the same as a SHEKEL. God's people are represented as a lost piece of silver, sought out by him in the day of his power. Luke xv. 8.

SIMILITUDE. See LIKENESS.

SIME-ON, the second son of Jacob, was born about A. M. 2247. When he was eighteen years of age, he and Levi his younger brother, contrary to solemn treaty, murdered the people of Shechem, while they were unable to defend themselves, from the pain of recent circumcision. Gen. xxxiv. After Joseph had kept all his brethren in prison for three days, he liberated the rest, but retained Simeon, perhaps because he was of a most violent temper, or because he had been most inhuman to him. Gen. xlii. 17-24. On his death-bed, Jacob cursed not the persons, but the rage and murder of Simeon and Levi, in the case of the Shechemites; and prophesied, that their combination in sin should issue in their perpetual dispersion among the rest of the Hebrew tribes. Gen. xlix. 5, 6. The sons of Simeon were Jemuel or Nemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zoar or Zerab, and Shaul. Ohad seems to have died childless; but by the rest he had a numerous issue. When this tribe came out of Egypt, they amounted to 59,300 men capable of war, under the command of Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai, and marched the fifth in order of the tribes. Shaphat the son of Hori, was their spy to view the promised land, and Shemuel the son of Ammihud was their agent to divide it. Gen. xlvii. 10. Exod. vi. 15. Numb. xxvi. 12-14. ii. 12, 13. xiii. 5, and xxiv. 20. It seems they had been signally guilty in the affair of Peor, as well as Zimri their chief prince; and that the 24,000 cut off in that affair, were mostly of this tribe; for, at the reckoning immediately after, it was decreased to 22,200. Numb. xxv. and xxvi. 14, 15. This recent wickedness of theirs was perhaps the reason Moses did not expressly bless them along with the other tribes. Deut. xxxiii. They got their portion out of the inheritance of Judah; and they, and the tribe of Judah, assisted each other in clearing of their lot of Canaan. Josh. xix. 1-8. Judg. i. 1-20. The Simconites never made any distinguished figure. We scarcely find a noted person among them: but it is said, that the narrow limits of their inheritance obliged many of them to become scribes, and to disperse themselves among the other tribes. At David's coronation to be king of Israel, 7,100 of them were present. 1 Chron. xii. 25. They revolted to Jeroboam with the other nine tribes; but many of them afterwards submitted to Aa king of Judah. 2 Chron. xi. and xv. 9. When Canaan was ravaged by the Assyrians, it seems a body of the Simeonites retired southward, and seized on the country of the Amalekites, about the west end of mount Seir. 1 Chron. iv. 39—43. Josiah purged their country from idols. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 6.

(2.) SIMEON; an aged saint at Jerusalem who earnestly waited for the incarnation of the Messiah. God, by his Spirit, assured him that he should not die till he had seen him. Moved by a supernatural impulse, he came to the temple, just as Mary and Joseph presented the holy child Jesus. He clasped him in his arms, and blessed God for his coming: he declared his desire of immediate death, as he had seen the divine Saviour, the light to lighten the gentiles, and the glory of Israel. He blessed Joseph and Mary, and told them that their child was set up as an occasion of the ruin, and as the author of the salvation of many Israelites, and as a sign to be every where spoken against: he assured Mary, that her heart should be pierced with grief at the sight of the maltreatment and death of her Son, and that strange discoveries should by the gospel be made of men's hearts. Luke ii. 25—35. It has been said, that this Simeon was the son of the famed Hillel, and teacher of Gamaliel.

SIMON, the Cyrenian, and father of Alexander and Rufus, who it seems, were afterwards noted Christians. He is thought by some to be the same as Niger, the teacher at Antioch. Acts xiii. 1. Whether he was a Jew or a gentile is not known; but it is certain that the Jews who led Jesus to be crucified, finding him ready to sink under the cross, and meeting with Simon as he came in from the country, compelled him to assist in carrying it. Matt. xxvii. 32. It is said, that he was afterwards bishop of Bostra or Bezer and died a martyr for the faith.

SIMON ZELOTES, or the Canaanite; one of Christ's apostles. Why he was called ZeLOTES, is not hard to guess. It seems he had been one of those Galileans, or furious bigots, who obstinately refused to pay tribute to the Romans. Perhaps his name Canaanite signifies no more than that he was such a zealot, or that he was of Cana in Galilee. Luke vi. 15. Matt. x. 4. It is said that he preached the gospel in Egypt, Cyrenicia, Lybia, and Mauritania, if not also in Britain. Others are of opinion that he suffered martyrdom at Lunir in Persia, with Jude.

SIMON, the brother or cousin of our Saviour, and the son of Cleophas. He is said to have been bishop of Jerusalem, after the death of his brother James the Less; and that when Trajan made strict search for all those of the family of David, he was for some days terribly tortured, and then crucified, A. D. 107, after he had for about forty years governed the church at Jerusalem; but as most of that time that city lay in ruins, it is not likely to have had a bishop there.

SIMON the Pharisee, who having invited our Saviour to an entertainment, though he scarcely showed him civility when he came, took offence at his allowing Mary Magdalene to wash and anoint his feet:

but Jesus, by the parable of the two debtors convinced him of his error. Luke vii. 36—50. It has been conjectured that it was he whom Jesus healed of a leprosy, and at whose house in Bethany Jesus supped a few days before his death, and had his head anointed by Mary the sister of Lazarus. Mark xxvi. 6. John xii. 2—5.

SIMON MAGUS, (or the sorcerer.) By his enchantments he acquired great fame in the country of Samaria. He was so affected with the doctrine and miracles of the apostle Peter and John, that he professed himself a Christian, and was baptized. Observing how they conferred the miraculous influence of the Holy Ghost, by the laying on of hands, he offered them money for a share of their powers. Peter bade his money perish with him, because he had thought to purchase the free gift of God with money: and told him, he had need to ask the forgiveness of such wicked thoughts, as they fully marked him to be still in an unregenerate state. Struck with terror at this reply, Simon begged they would intercede with God for him, that the evils threatened him might be averted. Acts viii. 5—24. It seems, that afterwards he did what he could to oppose the gospel, and the preachers of it. He seems to have abandoned himself to the vilest whoredoms, and is said to have founded the sect of the Gnostics, who believed men would be saved by their knowledge, be their lives as vicious as they might; and held a vast number of Eons, or inferior gods. It is said that he asserted himself to be a divine person, and that he was a Messiah sent to the Samaritans, as Jesus of Nazareth was to the Jews; that Helena his concubine was the Holy Ghost, and the Pagan Minerva, Helena, &c. His followers pretended to be a sort of Christians, and yet worshipped him and her under the notion of Jupiter, and Minerva. Nay, Justin Martyr says, that about A. D. 150, almost all the Samaritans worshipped him as their god. The senseless fable of his conflict with, and overthrow by, the apostle Peter at Rome, is unworthy of mention.

SIMPLE; (1.) Harmless, free from deceit: and to be simple concerning evil, is to have little knowledge of the art of committing it, and to be ready to shun the least appearance of it. Rom. xvi. 19. The simplicity that is in Christ, is either the plain self-consistent truths of the gospel, which centre in Christ; or an unfeigned faith in, and obedience to these truths. 2 Cor. xi. 3. Men live in godly simplicity, when, with a single view to the glory of God, they live in a fair, open, and candid profession and practice of gospel truth. 2 Cor. i. 12. (2.) Ignorant, credulous, and easily cheated by wicked men, by Satan, and by their lusts. Prov. xiv. 15. ii. 23. and ix. 4: Simplicity is therefore a silly readiness to be deceived. 2 Sam. xv. 11. Prov. i. 22.

SIN, or that conduct by which we miss the mark of God's law, and our own happiness, is called INQUIRY, or UNRIGHTOUSNESS, as it is a withholding of what is due to God or men. It is called WICKEDNESS and UN-GODLINESS, as it is an obstinate opposition to the being, worship, and service of God.

It is called TRESPASS and TRANSGRESSION, as it is a contrariety to the precepts of the divine law. Sin, iniquity, or wickedness, denotes, (1.) what in general is contrary to the law of God. 1 John iii. 6. Matt. vii. 28. Ezek. iii. 19. (2.) Original sin, by which our whole nature is defiled, and rendered contrary to the nature and law of God, Psal. li. 5; and hence our inward part is said to be very wickedness; the heart being filled with enmity against God, and malice against men. Psal. v. 9. This corruption of nature is the sin that dwells in us, Rom. vii. 17, 20; and works in us all manner of concupiscence, Rom. vii. 8; wars in us, Rom. vii. 23; reigns in and over us, Rom. vi. 11, 12, 14; and deceives and slays us. Rom. vii. 11. It is called lust, Jam. i. 15; the flesh, Rom. vii. 1; the body of sin, Rom. vi. 6; the body of death, Rom. vii. 24; the law of the members, Rom. vii. 25; the law of sin and death. Rom. vii. 2. (3.) Actual sin, or a particular kind of it. Jam. i. 15. Psal. vii. 3. Actual sin is that which, proceeding from our inward corruption, is daily committed in our thoughts, words, and deeds; and is formed according to the particular lusts that reign, or are in our heart, whether of the flesh or mind. Tit. iii. 3. Eph. ii. 3. It is called the iniquity of the heels, or conversation. Psal. xlix. 5. Actual sins are either secret, or open and scandalous. Psal. xix. 13. 1 Tim. v. 22. They are either of infirmity, done through ignorance, inattention, and hurry of temptation; or presumptuous, done boldly, and against light and conviction. Psal. xix. 13. Unbelief, or the rejection of Christ and his truths when revealed and offered, is the worst of actual sins, and in comparison of which other sins are, as it were, no sins, John ix. 41. and xv. 22; and this carried on to the highest degree of presumption and malice, is called blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, as it rejects and tramples on all his evidence and convictions; and is called the sin unto death, because, being never pardoned, it inevitably ruins men. 1 John v. 16. (4.) Wicked men, who commit sin. Job v. 16. Hence the Jews seem to be called wickedness, Zech. v. 1; and evil angels are called spiritual wickedness in high places, as with great power and vigour they work wickedness. Eph. vi. 11. (5.) The punishment of iniquity. Gen. iv. 7. and xix. 15. Lev. v. 1. Thus, God lays up men's iniquities for their children, when he delays the temporal punishment of them till it be executed on their children. Job xxi. 19.—In allusion to this, sin is taken for the offering which makes atonement for sin; and what we render sin-offering, is often the same in the Hebrew as the word we render sin, Lev. iv. 3, 25, 29; and the priests are said to eat sin, i.e. with pleasure feast on sin-offerings. Hos. iv. 8. God for sin, (i.e. by the sin-offering of his Son,) condemned sin in the flesh. Rom. viii. 3. Christ is said to be made sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him; i.e. he had our sins charged to his account, was condemned by the curse of the law, and bore the punishment due for them, to the satisfaction of his Father's justice, in order that we, having his finished righteousness placed to our account, might, in a state of union with him, be legally sustained as perfectly righteous before God. 2 Cor. v. 21. Psal. xl. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 25. Isa. liii. 6. He died unto sin, i.e. to make full satisfaction for it. Rom. vi. 10; and all saints are dead to it, freed from the reign and curse of it. Rom. vi. 11. (6.) Idols, idolatrous altars, and high places, and the like, are called sin, because they are the instruments of committing it. Amos viii. 13. Hos. x. 8. and viii. 11. Jer. xvii. 3.—Whatever sin a man is peculiarly addicted to, is emphatically called his own. Psal. xviii. 21, 23. Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin; whatever a man does while he doubts of the lawfulness of it, is sinful to him; whatever proceeds not from true faith in Christ, is sinful, in its source, motive, manner, and end. Rom. xiv. 23. The ploughing of the wicked is sin, and their prayer and sacrifice an abomination, as it is not done in faith, and from a principle of love to God, and regard to his authority, nor with a supreme aim to his glory. Prov. xxi. 4. and xv. 8. The prayer of the wicked becomes sin, when God rejects it, and punishes them for the wickedness included in it. Psal. cix. 7. To cast iniquity on men, is to charge them successfully with crimes. Psal. lv. 8. Iniquity is found hateful, when its facts and abominable nature are clearly discovered, when men are permitted to run on in gross acts of it; and when severe punishment is inflicted on account of it. Psal. xxvi. 2. To be servants of iniquity unto iniquity, is to commit the worst crimes with the worst ends, or to proceed from one sin to others still worse. Rom. vi. 19. God sets men's sins in the light of his countenance, when they are fully known, and openly punished. Psal. xc. 8.

To sin, or do iniquity, or wickedly, is often taken for disobedience to God's law in general. Eccl. vii. 20. But sometimes in an emphatic sense, it signifies to live in a course of sin with constant pleasure and delight. In this sense, he that committeeth sin is of the devil, and is the servant of sin; but the children of God do not, and cannot sin. John viii. 32. 1 John iii. 6, 9. and v. 18. Thou shalt visit thine habitation, and not sin, i.e. shalt not live in a wicked manner at home, nor be disappointed of thy good hopes. Job v. 24.

SINNERS and wicked persons, are such as are guilty of sin, and under the power of it, 1 Tim. i. 15. Psal. ix. 17; especially such as are notorious malefactors before men, in a signal degree. Luke vii. 37, 39. Numb. xvi. 33. and ix. 10. Luke vi. 33, 35. Gen. xviii. 23. Isa. liii. 12. Satan is called the wicked one, because he, in the most malicious manner, exerts himself to the utmost against God and his law. 1 John ii. 13, 14. and iii. 12. and v. 18. By one man's disobedience, many were made sinners; by the disobedience of Adam, our covenant-head, imputed to us, we are in law constituted guilty persons; and in consequence thereof, our whole man is brought under the reigning power of sin. Rom. v. 19. 1 Cor. xv. 56.

SIN, or S'NIM; (1.) A strong city in the land of Egypt, perhaps the same with Pelusian, now called Damietta, near the north east border. It was ravaged by the Chal-deans, and has been since often pillaged. Ezek. xxx. 15. From hence some Jews returned to Canaan, and many of the inhabitants embraced the Christian faith. Isa. xlix. 12. Whether the SINITES, who were descended from Canaan, dwelt near Lebanon, where Strabo mentions a castle called Sinna; or whether they dwelt at Tripoli in Phœnicia, or whether they lived about Sin, in the north-east of Egypt, cannot now be determined. Gen. x. 17. (2.) The wilderness of SIN, on the east side of the western gulf of the Red sea, and to the north-west of Sinai. Exod. xvi. 1.

SINA-I, SI'NA, or HO'REB, a famous mountain of Arabia the Rocky, stands on the southern corner of the bosom of the Red sea, between the gulf of Colzum on the west, and the Elanitic gulf on the east. It stands about two hundred and sixty miles eastward of Cairo in Egypt. The desert on the south and west of it, is a pretty high ground for about twelve miles, and is distinguished by a variety of lesser hills. This mountain is of a small extent, but very high, with two tops, the western of which is called Horeb; and the eastern, which is a third higher, is properly called Sinai. It is said there are some springs and fruit-trees on Horeb; but nothing but rain-water on the top of Sinai. The ascent to both is very steep, and is by steps, which the empress Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, caused to be cut out in the marble rock. At the top of Sinai there is an uneven and rugged place, which will contain sixty persons. Here stands a chapel sacred to St. Catharine; and near to it, on the brow of the barren rock, is a fountain of fresh water. The laborious monks that dwell here, have, with ashes and sweepings, made a garden. From the top of this mount God proclaimed his law to the Hebrews, from amidst terrible flames of fire: and here Moses had long an almost immediate fellowship with God; and hence the place was called the Mount of God; and here he also conversed with Elijah. 1 Kings xix. 8. At present, the Arabs call it Moses' Hill. Exod. xix. xx. and xxiv. It was a mount that might be touched; (though the Hebrews were forbidden to touch it) i. e. it was of a material, and not of a spiritual nature, as the Mount Zion of the church. Heb. xii. 18. It is made an emblem of the broken covenant of works, which terrifies awakened transgressors, and gendereth to bondage, affecting all that are under it with a spirit of bondage. Gal. iv. 24.

SINCERE; (1.) Pure, and unmixed with error, deceit, or dross. 1 Pet. ii. 2. (2.) Single, candid, and upright, the heart, speech, and actions, all harmoniously agreeing together. Phil. i. 10.

SINCERITY, or SINGLENESS of heart, is pure uprightness and candour, without any sinful bias. Josh. xxiv. 14. 2 Cor. i. 12. Acts ii. 46. Eph. vi. 5.

SINEWS, are the cords by which the body of animals is bound together, and which are the great means of feeling. They shrink when they become short or benumbed. Gen. xxxii. 33. Sinews may be taken for power, strength. Ezek. xxxvi. 6, 8. Men's neck is as an iron sinew, when they are obdurate in their sinful courses. Isa. xlviii. 4.

SING. See SONG.

SIRT-ON. See HERMON.

SIRNAME; a name added to a man's principal one, denoting his family, &c. Men sirname themselves by the name of Israel, when, being gentiles and sinners, they join themselves to Jesus and his church. Isa. xlii. 5.

SI'SE-RA, general of the Canaanites, under king Jabin the Second. After his army was totally routed by Deborah and Barak, and multitudes of his men drowned in the river Kishon, Sisera, to avoid discovery, fled away on foot towards Harosheth. As he passed the tent of Heber the Kenite, who was then at peace with his master, Jael, his wife invited him into her house to hide himself. After she had given him some milk to refresh him, he laid himself down to sleep, and desired her to watch in the door, and to deny him if any body asked for him. He had scarcely fallen into a deep sleep, through his excessive fatigue, when Jael, instigated of God to destroy this murderous idolater, and devoted Canaanite, drove a nail through his temples, and fastened his head to the ground, that he died. Barak pursuing him, had him shewed to him in this condition. For a while, his mother and her ladies, though wearied for his return, comforted themselves with the idea that he would be taken up in dividing the spoil, chiefly the fine robes, and in receiving his share of the captured. Judg. iv. and v.

SISTER. See BROTHER.

SIT; a well known posture of the body, used in taking rest, Gen. xviii. 11; in taking meat, Gen. xxxvii. 25; in giving judgment, Ruth iv. 1. 1 Kings ii. 12; in grief, Ezra ix. 1, 4; in teaching and hearing, Matt. xxiii. 2. Luke x. 39; in prayer and fasting, 2 Sam. vii. 18. Judg. xx. 26; in receiving the Lord's supper. Matt. xxvi. 20.

SITTING denotes fixed continuance, Mic. iv. 4. 2 Kings v. 3. Acts viii. 28. To sit with one, imports intimate fellowship with him. Psal. xxvi. 5. To sit in dust or darkness, imports great poverty, contempt, ignorance, and trouble. Isa. xlvii. 1. Luke i. 79. Mic. vii. 8. To sit on thrones, imports confirmed glory, and authority. Matt. xix. 21. Sitting, ascribed to God, or Christ as Mediator, imports their undisturbed rest and authority, Psal. xlvii. 8. and xxix. 10. or their judging and punishing of men. Dan. vii. 9, 26. Joel iii. 12. Matt. xxvi. 64. Christ's sitting at God's right hand, imports his fixed and peaceful possession of the most intimate fellowship with God, and his continued power of governing the church and her concerns. Psal. cx. 1. Eph. i. 20. The saints sit together in heavenly places; in Christ their head, they are already possessors of the celestial glories, and shall quickly enjoy them in their own person. Eph. ii. 6. Antichrist's sitting in the temple of God, imports his residence in the church, and his pretence to rule the consciences of her members. 2 Thess. ii. 4.

Seat; a place for sitting in, for rest, or for judgment, 1 Sam. iv. 18. Job xxix. 7. A magnificent seat for a king to sit upon, in receiving the homage of his subjects, or in giving audience to ambassadors, and in dispensing justice, is called a THRONE. Solomon had one very grand; it was made of ivory, and overlaid with gold; it had six steps, at the twelve ends of which were carved lions; the top was round behind; and it had two arms, supported by two carved lions; 1 Kings x. 18, 19. Seat, also denotes a station of authority, Esth. iii. 1; and a throne, the royal authority of kings, Gen. xli. 40. Angels are called thrones and dominions, because of their great power and authority, Col. i. 16. The ceremonial mercy-seat, that covered the ark with cherubim on each side, signified the Redeemer's atonement, as the rest and throne of grace for a reconciled God, ready to declare his love, and bestow his blessings on sinful men. 2 Kings xix. 15. Heb. iv. 16. God's seat or throne, is also either the Jewish temple, where the symbols of his presence resided, Jer. xvii. 12. Psal. lxxviii. 69; or heaven, where his glory and authority are chiefly manifested, Isa. lxvi. 1; or a symbol of his glorious presence, Rev. iv. 9: or his sovereign power and authority to execute judgment, or bestow favours, Job xxiii. 3. Psal. lxxxix. 14. Heb. iv. 16; or the high degree of his authority and happiness, Ezek. xxviii. 2. And the Jewish royalty, and the state of emperor of the Christian world, is called God's throne, as he bestows it. 2 Sam. xiv. 9. Rev. xii. 5. Christ's sitting on his Father's throne, at the right hand of it, or in the midst of it, imports his exaltation to the highest dignity, authority, and happiness. Rev. iii. 21. and v. 6. Heb. xii. 2. The saints sit on thrones, or seats before the throne, and with Christ on his throne; they have an honourable station in their new-covenant union with Christ; they have honourable offices or stations in the militant church: chiefly in heaven, they have as much holiness, rest, honour, nearness to God, vision and fruition of him, and joy in him, as they can desire. Rev. iv. 6. and xi. 16. Luke xxii. 30. Rev. iii. 21. Moses' seat is the station of civil power and authority among the Jews, and of judging according to Moses' law. Matt. xxiii. 1. Satan's seat is the place where he has great power and authority. Rev. ii. 15. The seat of the dragon, or of heathenish power, and of Antichrist, is Rome, where his authority was established. Rev. xiii. 2. and xvi. 10. The seat of violence comes nigh, when men hold courts, or exercise their authority, to commit injustice and oppression. Amos vi. 3. To sit in the seat of scorn, is to have a habitual and fixed intimacy with them, and to act after their manner with pleasure. Psal. i. 1. Eliakim and Christ, are a glorious throne to their Father's house; their administration is highly honourable to him that employed them. Isa. xxii. 22.

SITUATE; placed. The situation of the temple, was very beautiful, as it stood on a mountain, whence it was seen all around. Psal. xlviii. 8.

SIVAN; the third month of the Jewish sacred year, and ninth of their civil, answering to part of our May and June, and consisting of thirty days. On the sixth day, was the feast of Pentecost. On the 15th and 16th, is a feast to commemorate the victory of the Maccabees over the heathens of Bethshan. On the 23d, a fast, to bewail Jeroboam's preventing the first fruits from being brought to Jerusalem. There are in it some other superstitious festivals of small note. Esth. viii. 7.

SKILL; knowledge; especially what is gained by study and experience. Dan. i. 17. and v. 18. Psal. lxxviii. 72.

SKIN; (1.) The covering of an animal's flesh. Lev. vii. 8. The human skin is covered with scales so fine that the naked eye cannot perceive them, and each square foot contains about a hundred and forty-four millions of pores. Men's first clothing was of the skins of beasts. Gen. iii. 21. Prophets, persecuted saints, and barbarous nations, have used coats of skin. Heb. xi. 37. (2.) The outward colour of the skin. Jer. xiii. 23. To flay off the skin, pluck off skin, or flesh, imports, to oppress men till nothing but their mere life is left. Mic. iii. 2, 3. To escape with the skin of one's teeth, is to escape with nothing but life, having, as it were, the very teeth dashed out, and scarcely a month left to complain. Job xix. 20. Skin for skin was an ancient proverb, importing, that a man will gladly save his own life at the expence of the death of relations, or any other outward loss. Job ii. 4.

SKIP. See LEAP.

SKIRT; that part of upper garments which is below the waist. A man's spreading his skirt over a woman, imported his taking her under his care and protection, and to be his wife. Ruth iii. 9. God's spreading his skirt over the Hebrews, imported his taking them into a special church-relation to himself, and giving them his gracious and honourable protection: his spreading his skirt over his elect, imports his uniting them to Christ, clothing them with his righteousness, and granting them his spiritual protection and comfort. Ezek. xvi. 8. Jerusalem had filthiness and blood in her skirts; her shameless sinning was marked in her disgraceful afflictions. Lam. i. 9. Jer. ii. 24. The Lord discovered the Jews' skirts on their faces, when he removed every covering of their sin, and reduced them for it to a most debased and shameful condition. Jer. xiii. 26. A man's uncovering of his father's skirt, imported carnal intimacy with his step-mother. Deut. xxii. 30.

SKY; the visible appearance of the heavens: it is compared to a molten looking-glass, because of its transparent colour. This bluish azure colour, Sir Isaac Newton thinks, is owing to the thin vapours in the upper part of the atmosphere, reflecting only the most reflexible rays of light, which are those of a violet colour: but Leonarda and La Hire suppose it is owing to our viewing a dark space beyond the atmosphere, through a white and lucid medium. Stars, clouds, and thunders, are represented as in the sky. Heb. xi. 12. 2 Sam. xxii. 12. Psal. lxxvii. 17. God's riding on the skies, imports his thundering, his raising storms at pleasure, and the quick and majestic work of his providence. Deut. xxxiii. 26. Righteousness poured down from the skies, or heaven, imports God's abundant bestowal of his gracious influences, and the fruits of his Son's righteousness on men. Isa. xlv. 9. Judgments are lifted up to the skies, when they are very terrible and conspicuous. Jer. li. 9.

SLACK; inactive, given to delays. Josh. xviii. 3. God is not slack concerning his promises, or judgments, but fulfils the one, and executes the other, with proper speed, and in due time. 2 Pet. iii. 9. Deut. vii. 16. Let not thy hands, O Zion, be slack, but be active in rebuilding the temple, and settling the affairs of religion and government. Zeph. iii. 16. He becomes poor that deals with a slack hand; i. e. is lazy and lingering in his business. Prov. x. 4.

SLANDER; to charge a man falsely with faults; or rehearsing his real faults from a bad motive, and without a legal requisition. It is most ordinarily done when the persons charged are absent, and proceeds from hatred of their person, or envy of their excellencies. The name slanderer is the same in Greek as that of a devil. (1 Tim. iii. 11. Gr.) Yet what multitudes of men seem ambitious of the character! Meals, and civil fellowship, are seasoned with slander; as if men had received the gift of speech for no other end but to speak evil of their neighbours. In respect of this sin, the Scriptures state that the tongue is full of deadly poison; has underneath it the poison of asps; is a world of iniquity, set on fire of hell, and setting on fire the course of nature; is a deceitful razor; is like a sword and spear, a bow of lies shooting bitter words. Jam. iii. 6, 8. Psal. cxl. 3. lii. 2. lv. 21. lvii. 4. cli. 3. and lxiv. 3, 4. Prov. xli. 18. Jer. ix. 3.

SLAVE. See SERVANT.

SLAY. See KILL.

SLEEP, or SLUMBER, is fourfold; (1.) Natural, when the life of the animal body continues, but its sensations in a great measure cease, in order to the refreshing and invigorating of the whole frame. Gen. xxviii. 11. (2.) Spiritual, consisting in ignorance, indolence, stupidity, and unconcern, in a sinful state or course. Eph. v. 14. (3.) Civil, when men are inactive in their work, or careless about it. Isa. v. 27. Nah. iii. 18. (4.) The sleep of death, in which the soul being separated from the body, the body becomes quite insensible. Jer. li. 39. Dan. xii. 2. John xi. 11. 1 Cor. xv. 51. God's sleeping, imports his seeming unconcern and inactivity to deliver his people, or punish their enemies. Psal. xlv. 23. and lxxviii. 65. I sleep, but my heart waketh; my soul is under the prevalence of great dulness; yet there is a secret working of my conscience, desire, and affection towards Christ. Sol. Song v. 2.

SLEIGHT; crafty and juggling tricks. Eph. iv. 14.

SLIDE; (1.) To forsake God and his truths, and our duty, and to fall into sin. Jer. viii. 5. Hos. iv. 16. (2.) To lose happiness and comfort, and fall into misery and dreadful calamities. Deut. xxxii. 35. Both significations are joined in the word. Psal. xxxvi. 1. and xxxviii. 31.

SLIGHTLY. The false prophets healed the hurt of the Jews slightly, when they insinuated that their sins were but small, and that their calamities would be light, and soon over. Jer. vi. 14. and viii. 11.

SLIME, or BITUMEN, a kind of clayey pitch, dug out of the earth. The river is carried down great quantities of it in ancient times, and mingling with the Euphrates, conveyed it to the very walls of Babylon. The tower of Babel was built with it, instead of mortar; and Diodorus tells us, that the people thereabouts not only built their walls of it, but dried and burnt it instead of coals. There was and is a great deal of the finest of it, very heavy, of a shining purple colour, and strong smell, about the Dead sea; and, it seems, they had a vast number of pits out of which they dug it, before the valley of Siddim was turned into a lake. Gen. xiv. 16. Jophebed pitched her ark with this slime; and perhaps Noah did so too. Exod. ii. 3. The bitumen, or asphaltus, sold in our shops under the name of Jewish, is not really of this kind of slime, but is a composition of oil, brimstone, and pitch.

SLING; an instrument of cords for throwing stones with great violence. The invention of it is ascribed to the Phenicians, or their colonies in Majorca and Minorca, anciently called the Balears, or masters of the sling. It is certain, that not long after the death of Joshua, the Hebrews, particularly some of the Benjamites, were such expert slingers, that they could hit their mark almost to a hair-breadth. Jdg. xx. 16; and some of them, in the time of David, could sling with both hands. 1 Chron. xii. 2. Uzziah had slings on the walls of Jerusalem, for throwing of great stones. 2 Chron. xxvi. 14. The Lord slings out men, when he suddenly destroys them, and drives them from their country. 1 Sam. xxv. 29. Jer. x. 18.

SLIP; (1.) To fall off. Deut. xix. 5, 12. (2.) To fall inadvertently, or suddenly, into sin, and trouble. Job xii. 5. Psal. xvii. 6. We let the things which we have heard slip out of our mind, when we inadvertently forget them. Heb. ii. 1. See TWIG.

SLIPPERY; unstable; ready to make one fall at every turn. Psal. xxxv. 6. lxxiii. 18.

SLOTHFUL; SLUGGARD; lazy and inactive with respect to the concerns of time or eternity. Jdg. xviii. 19. Slothful persons desire, but are at no pains to obtain. Prov. xxi. 25. Every thing affrights them, as if it were a thorn-hedge or lion in their way. Prov. xx. 4. xv. 19. and xxii. They retain not what they got by hunting or labour. Prov. xii. 27, 13. They hide their hand in their bosom, and will hardly take pains to use what they have, Prov. xix. 24; and yet are extremely wise in their own conceit, Prov. xxvi. 16: hence no wonder their houses go to ruin, and their vineyard or business, be mismanaged, Eccl. x. 18. Prov. xxiv. 30; and they be under tribute, deprived of their liberty, Prov. xii. 24; and their soul suffer hunger, and they come to deep poverty, Prov. xviii. 19. and xxiii. 21: and be cast into a deep sleep, rendered more and more inactive and stupid. Prov. xix. 15.

SLOW. To be slow of speech, or tongue, is to speak in a stammering and lingering manner. Exod. iv. 10. To be slow to anger, is to be very patient, bearing many injuries without revenging them. Neh. ix. 17. Slowness to wrath, is a proof of wisdom and piety. Prov. xiv. 29. Men are slow of heart to believe, when averse to do it, without uncommon, or even improper evidence. Luke xxiv. 25.

SLUICE; an outlet for water. Isa. xix. 10.

SLUMBER. See SLEEP.

SMALL. See LITTLE.

SMELL. See SAVOUR.

SMITE; (1.) To give a stroke to a person or thing. Exod. xxi. 26. and xvii. 6. (2.) To distress; afflict. Deut. xxviii. 22, 26. Prov. xix. 26. (3.) To kill. Deut. xiii. 15. To smite an army, is to rout it. Deut. xxix. 7. To smite with the tongue, is to reproach. Jer. xviii. 18. To smite the hands, imports to raise an alarm; to mourn, or to rejoice. Ezek. xxi. 14. To smite on the thigh, or breast, is expressive of repentance, grief. Jer. xxxi. 18. Luke xviii. 13. To smite another on the cheek, imports insolent contempt. Mic. v. 1. A man's heart smites him, when a consciousness of guilt affects him with remorse and grief. 1 Sam. xxiv. 6. Smiting by the righteous, is faithful and friendly reproof. Psal. cxli. 5. To smite men on the cheek-bone, is to confound and destroy them. Psal. iii. 7.

SMITH; (1.) A worker in metal, gold, silver, iron, &c. Acts xix. 24. (2.) An executioner of God's judgments. Isa. liv. 16.

SMOKE. The glorious display of God's excellencies is likened to smoke: it is mysterious and incomprehensible. Isa. vi. 4. His providential protection of his people is likened to smoke; it is terrible to their enemies, and conceals them from hurt. Isa. lv. 5. It being usual for angry persons to breathe hard, and emit from their mouth a kind of smoke, God's wrath is likened to smoke; it is very awful, destructive, and confounding. Psal. xviii. 8. Terrible calamities are like smoke; they proceed from the fire of God's wrath, and bring on fearful perplexity, darkness, and desolation. Isa. xiv. 31. The smoke in the temple at Antichrist's downfall, is either God's protection of his church, keeping his enemies from hurting her, or the terrible calamities that shall deter people from praying for the Papists; and till the cessation of which, men shall be afraid to join themselves to the true church. Rev. xv. 8. Saints, and their prayers and praises, are likened to the smoke ascending from the sacred incense, of old: how heaven-tending, and how acceptable to God! Sol. Song iii. 6. Rev. viii. 4. See FLAX.

The Jewish Pharisees, and other hypocrites, are a smoke and burning fire in God's nose; are very offensive and disagreeable to him. Isa. lxxv. 5. Men and their devices are likened to smoke, to denote how unsubstantial, short-lived, easily destroyed, and full of perplexity and darkness they are. Psal. xxxvii. 20. and lxxviii. 2. and cii. 3. Isa. ix. 18. Ignorance and delusion are a smoke arising from hell, and stupefying men, that they know not what they do, or where they are, or what is doing around them. Rev. ix. 2, 17. In allusion to the case of Sodom, and its neighbouring cities, the smoke of a land is said to ascend up into heaven, when the judgments inflicted thereon are very visible and terrible. Isa. xxxiv. 10. Rev. xviii. 9, 10.

SMOOTH stones are such as are not rough, 1 Sam. xvii. 40; of such idols were made; or men worshipped them, as they saw them by the sides of brooks or rivers. Isa. lvii. 6. A smooth skin is one not overgrown with hair. Gen. xxvii. 7, 16. Smooth ways are such as are plain, without any thing to make one stumble. Luke iii. 5. Smooth words, or mouth, denotes flattering speech, that has no tendency to convince or alarm. Isa. xxx. 10. Jer. xxiii. 31. Psal. lv. 21. Prov. v. 8.

SMYRNA; a city of Lesser Asia, on the east shore of the Mediterranean sea, and about forty-six miles north of Ephesus. It was built by the Æolians, and destroyed by the Ionians; but quickly after rebuilt, and was a famous city as early as the time of Homer. About A. M. 3400, the Lydians destroyed it; but Antigonus, one of Alexander's successors, rebuilt it, near three hundred years after. About the time of our Saviour's birth, it was one of the most wealthy and populous cities in Lesser Asia: nor, except Ephesus, was any more honoured and favoured by the Romans; nor did the inhabitants of any other show equal regard to Rome. Besides a variety of sieges, Smyrna has suffered from six dreadful earthquakes, which destroyed the most part of it: but its delightful situation, and convenience for sea-trade, occasioned it to be always rebuilt. A Christian church was planted here very early; and whatever persecutions they suffered from Jews or gentiles, they maintained the Christian faith with such exactness, that in the divine epistle sent them by John, there is not a sentence of reproof, but of praise and direction, Rev. ii. 8-10; and ever since, Christianity has continued in this place. About A. D. 1076, this city was repaired by Achmet the Turkish vizier. At present, it is one of the most flourishing places in all the Levant, or east side of the Mediterranean sea, and is resorted to by the traders in Asia, Africa, and Europe. It contains about 28,000 souls, of which above 10,000 are Christians of the Greek church, and the rest are Turks and Jews.

SNAILS are well known animals, easily killed by an exposure to the sun, or by the application of salt. They are very injurious to corn and vegetables. They have their eyes in their horns; and, it is said, that each, (at least of the snails that live in shells, formed of the moisture of their own bodies,) has in itself the qualities of both male and female. The Romans and others used them as food; but they were forbidden to the ancient Jews. They were, probably, used to represent men self-righteous, sensual and inactive. Men pass away as a snail, when quickly, easily, and even by their own means, they are destroyed. Psal. lviii. 8.

SNARE, TRAP, GIN; a device for catching fishes, fowls, &c. Job xl. 24. Amos iii. 5. Prov. vii. 23; and in metaphorical language signifies whatever tends to entangle one to his hurt. Jesus Christ is a gin, a snare, a stumbling-block, and rock of offence to men, when, on account of his humble appearance, so opposite to men's carnal hopes, he is rejected, and so their guilt and ruin increased. Isa. viii. 14. God rains snures on men, when, by his providence, he involves them in such perplexing straits, that they cannot extricate themselves; and their own efforts plunge them deeper and deeper into misery. Psal. xi. 6. Ezek. xii. 13. The Jewish priests and rulers were a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor; they, in the most open manner, by their example and enticements, tempted the people to idolatry and other wickedness. Hos. v. 1. The Canaanites whom they sinfully left in their land, were snarers and traps to the Hebrews, and scourges in their sides, and thorns in their eyes, and their idols and idolatries were snarers to them; they were means of decoying them into sin, and instruments by which God punished them. Josh. xxiii. 13. Exod. xxiii. 33. Psal. cvi. 36. The Jewish table, or ceremonies, were a snare and trap to the Jews, as leaning on these, they encouraged themselves to despise the promised Messiah. Psal. lxi. 23. Rom. xi. 9. The temptations of Satan, the lips, or speech of a fool, breach of vows by sacrilege, bad example, slavish fear of men, and the flattering tongue of a harlot, are snarers and traps. Prov. xviii. 7. xx. 25. and xxix. 6, 25. Eccl. vii. 26. Men are snared, when, by the devices or traps laid for their hurt, they are decoyed into sin, and exposed to punishment. Dent. vii. 25. Psal. ix. 16. Eccl. ix. 12. Scornful men bring a city into a snare, by their bad example and enticement, or by provoking their superiors or neighbours against them. Prov. xxix. 8.

SNATCH; to catch at; rend off a piece to eat it. They shall snatch on the right hand, and be hungry, and eat on the left, and not be satisfied; they shall greedily seize on whatever comes in their way, but find no comfort from it. Isa. ix. 30.

SNORT; to make a noise through the nostrils, as a mettlesome horse. To express the terror of the Chaldean invasion of Judah, it is said that the snorting of their horses was heard from Dan, a place about a hundred and fifty miles distant. Jer. viii. 16.

SNOW is formed of vapour frozen in the air. It is soft, and sometimes broad, like locks of wool. Psal. cxviii. 16. Snow and rain are very unseasonable in summer or harvest. Prov. xxvi. 1. It is most pure and white; and its whiteness and purity are emblematical of freedom from guilt and corruption. Isa. i. 18. 1st Psal. li. 7; and of glory and excellency. Lam. iv. 7. God's scattering of the Canaanitish kings, and their armies, was white as snow in Salmon; the providence was very just and glorious; and the carcasses lay deep on the surface of the ground. Psal. lxxviii. 15. Sometimes God has made snow an instrument of his judgments, burying towns and armies amidst it. Job xxxviii. 22, 23. Snow-water is reckoned excellent for washing, Job ix. 30; and for refreshing the earth, and rendering it fruitful, Isa. lv. 10: at least that of the snow of Lebanon was esteemed an excellent and refreshing drink. God is compared to the snow of Lebanon, and the cold flowing waters that proceed from it, so useful to refresh men in those hot countries. How delightful, how refreshing, his goodness, and grace! and how foolish to forsake him for other enjoyments! Or the words might be translated, Will a man leave pure waters, springing from a rock, for the melted snow of Lebanon, all mixed with mud? Will they ever dig up the dirty waters of an inundation, rather than waters flowing from a fountain? i. e. Will men ever forsake the true God, for mere filth and vanity? Jer. xviii. 14, 15.

SNUFF; To draw up the air into the nose. Jer. ii. 24. and xiv. 6. (2.) To express contempt by a sneer. Mal. i. 13.

SNUFFERS; a description of tongs for snuffing of burning lamps, and thus making them to burn brighter; and the snuff-dishes were small dishes for holding what was snuffed off, that it might not pollute the floor of the sanctuary. Both were made by the direction of God, and were formed of gold. Did they figure out to us the divinely-instituted ordinances of church-discipline, by which the purity of the church is preserved, and the truths of God, and practice of his people, made to shine clear and bright. Exod. xxxvii. 23. and xxv. 28.

SO; a king of Egypt, who engaged to assist Hoshia against Shalmaneser king of Assyria, but it seems did it not, at least not effectually. 2 Kings xvii. 4. Probably this So is the same as Sabachon the Ethiopian, who burnt to death Bocchoris the former king of Egypt; and after retaining the government of the country for fifty years, was succeeded by Sevechus or Sethon, who it seems was priest of Vulcan, and whose prayers the Egyptians pretended to Herodotus brought ruin on the Assyrian host.

SOBER; considerate, thoughtful, humble, grave, and temperate. Rom. xii. 3. Tit. ii. 4, 12.

SOBERNESS; soundness of mind. Acts xxvi. 25.

SOBRIETY; prudence, gravity, humility, and temperance. 1 Tim. ii. 9, 15. To live soberly, righteously, and godly, is rightly to conduct ourselves, doing justice to our neighbours, and duly honouring, worshipping, and serving God. Tit. ii. 12.

SO'CHOH, or שוֹכּוֹחַ; the name of two cities belonging to the tribe of Judah; one in the valley, and another in the hill-country, west of Jerusalem. Josh. xv. 35, 48. Near to one of them, David slew Goliath, and occasioned the total rout of the Philistines' army. 1 Sam. xvii. 1. Shocoh was one of the fifteen cities which Rehoboam repaired and fortified. 2 Chron. xi. 7.

SOCKET; a kind of foot in which pillars are fixed by hollow mortises. A vast number of sockets were made for the erection of the tabernacle; of which a hundred were of silver, a talent to each. Exod. xxxviii. 27. The five sockets of the entrance of the sanctuary, and the sixty which supported the pillars around the court, were of brass. Exod. xxvi. 37. and xxvii; the weight of these sockets tended to make the pillars stand firm. They might represent the glorious, fixed, and lasting purposes of God, on which Christ's mediatory office and church are founded and established. Sol. Song v. 15.

SOLDER: to fasten different pieces of metal firmly together. Isa. xli. 7.

SOD'OM, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, were five of the ancient cities of the Canaanites, which stood to the south-east of the mouth of the brook Kidron, or thereabouts. In the days of Abraham, they had each a king, viz. Berah of Sodom, Birsha of Gomorrah, Shinab of Admah, Shemebir of Zeboim, and one whose name is not mentioned of Bela or Zoar. Chedorlaomer reduced them all to be his tributaries.

After twelve years' servitude, they rebelled; but in the fourteenth, were attacked, and had been ruined, had not Abraham pursued and defeated the conquerors. As they proceeded in their wickedness, particularly in abusing themselves with mankind, God, about sixteen years after, told Abraham and Lot, who now dwelt in Sodom, of his intention to destroy the city. Lot and his two daughters were preserved, and the city of Bela, or Zoar, (i. e. the little one), was at his request preserved for shelter to him; but the other four were destroyed with fire and brimstone from heaven. As Sodom stood near to Zoar, it seems to have been situated near the south point of the Dead sea. Strabo talks of the ruins of Sodom, as seven miles and a half in compass. The ecclesiastical historian, Notitia, mentions a bishop of Sodom, in the primitive ages of Christianity; but, Reland, and other judicious and learned writers, are of opinion that Sodom was never rebuilt, or any city of that name built near to the spot. Most writers believe, that the place where these cities stood, was swallowed up by an earthquake; and that now the Dead sea flows over it: and some, without probable reason, assert that the ruins of them are still to be seen at low water. But as the scripture represents the country as suffering the vengeance of continual fire; as neither plowed nor sown; as a dry desert inhabited by owls and wild beasts; as a dry place for breeding of nettles, and as heaps of salt, Jude 7. Dent. xxix. 22. Jer. xlix. 18. and l. 38. Zeph. ii. 9. Reland thinks their former situation is not covered with the Dead sea, but is at the side thereof. Whenever the sacred prophets would express some fearful and lasting destruction, they compare it to that of these four cities; as in Hos. xi. 8. Amos iv. 11. Isa. i. 9. Zeph. ii. 9. Jer. xlix. 18. Isa. xliii. 19. Jer. i. 38-40. Nay, the terrible ruin of these cities is used as an emblem of the torments of hell. Jude 7. Rev. xx. 12-16. Those who in after times abused males for the gratification of their unnatural lust, were called Sodomites. They were not only common among the heathen, Rom. i. 26, 27; but numbers of them even among the Jews. Asa and Jehoshaphat cut off multitudes of them, and Josiah demolished the houses where they practised that horrible sin. 1 Kings xiv. 34. and xxii. 46. 2 Kings xxiii. 7. The Jewish rulers and people are likened to those of Sodom and Gomorrah, on account of their great wickedness. Isa. i. 10. Jer. xxiii. 14. Rome, or the Antichristian state, is called Sodom, because of the sodomy, and all other wickedness, particularly of the sensual kind, that abounds in it. Rev. xi. 8.

SOFT. Soft clothing, is what is fine and gorgeous. Matt. xi. 8. A soft heart, is a heart tender and broken with grief. Job xxiii. 16. Soft words, are either such as are mild and gentle, Prov. xv. 1. and xxv. 15; or such as are flattering and deceitful. Psal. lv. 21.

SOFTLY, (1.) Slowly. Gen. xxxiii. 14. (2.) Mildly, gently, without any noise. Acts xxvii. 13. (3.) In a debased and humble manner. Isa. xxxviii. 15. 1 Kings xxi. 17.

SOJOURN; to dwell in a land without any fixed abode or possession, as the Hebrew patriarchs did in Canaan, Egypt, &c. Gen. xx. 1. Psal. cv. 23. Saints are sojourners on earth; they have no portion in it, and only tarry here till they are ready for their proper country in heaven. Psal. xxxix. 12. 1 Pet. i. 17.

SOLACE, to comfort, delight. Prov. vii. 18.

SOLDIERS; stated warriors for protecting or preserving the peace of a country, and fighting with the enemy. We find no stated warriors among the Hebrews till the time of Saul. Ministers and saints are soldiers, enlisted under, armed and directed by Jesus, the captain of our salvation; they fight for him and his cause, in a spiritual manner, against sin, Satan, and the world. 2 Tim. ii. 3. See ARMY.

SOLEMN; fixed to a particular occasion; done with awe and reverence. Numb. x. 10. Psal. xcii. 8.

SOLEMNITY; the time of an appointed feast, and the meeting of the people thereat, as at the feast of Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles, &c. Isa. xxx. 29. Deut. xxxi. 10.

SOLEMNLY; in a grave, bold, and earnest manner. 1 Sam. viii. 9.

SOLITARY. See DESOLATE.

SOLOMON, the son of king David by Bathsheba, born about A. M. 2971. He was called Solomon, to signify his peaceful temper and reign, and Jedidiah, to point him out as the darling of the Lord. 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25. His father, knowing that he was to build the temple, made great preparations for it, and trained him up with great care. As his brother Adonijah thought to usurp the throne, David, by the instigation of Bathsheba and Nathan, caused Solomon to be anointed king, while he himself yet lived, which was done with great solemnity. After his father had directed him concerning the temple, concerning Joab and Shimei, and solemnly charged him to walk in the ways of the Lord, and blessed him, he died. Prov. iv. 1 Kings i. and ii. 1 Chron. xxii. xxviii. and xxix. Solomon, who, about two years before had married Naamah the Ammonitess, and had Rehoboam by her, was now about eighteen years of age when he entered on the sole government of the kingdom. Having put Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei to death, and confined Abiathar the high priest, for their respective crimes, he married the daughter of Pharaoh king of Egypt, who seems to have become a Jewish proselyte; for there is no mention of Solomon having fallen into the idolatry of her country. To procure divine assistance and success in his government, he and his nobles offered 1000 burnt-offerings at Gibeon, where the tabernacle then was. That night the Lord appeared to him, and offered to grant whatever request he should ask. He requested wisdom, to qualify him for the government of so great a people. His request pleased the Lord; and he granted him such wisdom, honour, and wealth, as none before or after him ever possessed. Rising from his sleep he came to Jerusalem, and offered a great number of sacrifices before the ark, and then made a feast for his family. Soon after he had an opportunity of trying his wisdom. Two harlots lived together in one house, and were delivered of male children about the same time. One of them having killed her own child by over-laying it, laid it in her neighbour's bosom, and took the living child into hers. Her neighbour, on viewing the dead infant, knew it was not hers, and claimed the living one. The other no less vehemently denied the dead babe to be hers, and claimed the living one. They appealed to Solomon; and as parties on both sides were equally firm, and the matter admitted of no formal proof, Solomon conceiving that the real mother would show a distinguished regard for the life of her child, called for a sword, that he might cut the living infant in two, and give each of the claimants a half. The pretended mother was content it should be so; but the other begged that the life of the babe might be preserved, and given to her competitor. By this evidence of affection, Solomon knew her to be the real mother, and ordered the child to be given to her. 1 Kings ii. and iii.

Solomon's kingdom, which extended from the north-east border of Egypt to the Euphrates, if not a little beyond, was altogether peaceful and affluent. He divided it into cantons, under the direction of proper governors, who, each in his month, provided for the subsistence of the royal family, which might amount to 80,000 or 40,000, nay the Jews say 60,000 persons. His horses and chariots, which were many, were properly disposed of. He himself exceeded all men in wisdom and knowledge. He collected or framed 3000 proverbs, and 1005 songs. He most scientifically explained the nature of vegetables and animals, of every kind, then known. His fame made all the kings around who were generally either his tributaries or allies, send to inquire of his wisdom. By his trade with Egypt, he introduced a breed of fine horses, and a manufacture of linen; and by his trade with Ophir and other places, he rendered gold and silver as common in Jerusalem as the stones in the street, and cedar trees as plentiful as sycamores. The fleet which he sent from Elath, on the Red sea, and managed by Tyrian mariners, once in three years, brought him from Ophir near £2,000,000 sterling. 1 Kings iv. ix. 28. and x. 14, 26—28. 2 Chron. i. and ix. 27.

When Hiram king of Tyre heard that Solomon succeeded his father, he sent him a solemn embassy, to congratulate his accession to the throne. Solomon returned him another, requesting his assistance to build a magnificent temple for the Lord, as his people were more skilful in cutting timber and stone. Hiram returned him word, that he would cause his subjects to cut cedars in Lebanon, and bring them to Joppa in floats. To reward which, Solomon gave Hiram, for the maintenance of his family and workmen, 20,000 measures of wheat, and as much of barley, and 20,000 baths of oil, which last are also called twenty measures; or there were twenty measures added to them for some other use. In the fourth year of his reign, A. M. 3006, the temple began to be built, and was finished in seven years. Besides the servants of Hiram, there were 153,600 Canaanites employed in this work;

70,000 of which were bearers of burdens, and 80,000 diggers and cutters of stone; and 3300 were overseers; and 300 more were a reserve, to supply the places of such officers as fell sick. All the materials were prepared at a distance, that there was nothing to do on the spot but to join them together. Hiram, an excellent artist from Tyre, had the charge of the foundery. In the seventh month, A. M. 3001, it was finished and dedicated with great solemnity, Solomon, and the elders of Israel, and almost all the people, being present. After carrying in the ark, and some presents which David had left for it, and fixing its various utensils and ornaments in their proper places, the temple was filled with the cloud of the divine glory, which obliged the priests for a while to discontinue their ministrations. After prostrating himself, Solomon stood on a high scaffold, where his throne was placed, and turning his face to the temple, in the most solemn manner, prayed that God would accept and bless the house for his service, and hear the various prayers which the Jews should make towards it in their various afflictions, and that he would fulfil the promises made to David and his seed. He then turned himself to the people, and blessed them. As a token of acceptance, a fire from heaven consumed the sacrifices on the altar, and the glory of the Lord again filled the temple. Awed with this display of the divine majesty, the people fell upon their faces, and worshipped God. At this time, Solomon sacrificed 22,000 oxen, and 120,000 sheep, for peace-offerings; and as the altar of burnt-offerings was too small for the fat of all these, the middle of the court was consecrated to be an occasional altar. Soon after, perhaps the night following, God appeared to Solomon, and assured him that he had accepted his prayers, and would grant his requests; but would bring ruin on David's family, and on Israel, and on the temple, if they rebelled against his commandments. After fourteen days spent in this dedication, and in the feast of tabernacles that followed it, Solomon gave the people a solemn dismissal; and they returned home rejoicing, and praying for blessings on their king. 1 Kings vi.—viii. and ix. 2 Chron. iii—v. vii. and viii.

After Solomon had finished the temple, he built a magnificent palace for himself, another for his Egyptian queen, and a third called the forest of Lebanon, where he sometimes, if not chiefly resided. These were all finished in about twenty-two years. To reward Hiram for his kind assistance, Solomon made him a present of twenty cities in the land of Galilee, which it seems, he or his father took from the Canaanites; but as the cities and soil did not please Hiram, it seems he restored them to Solomon, who repaired them, and gave them to the Hebrews; and no doubt repaid Hiram his one hundred and twenty talents of gold and his friendly assistance some other way. He also seized on Hamoth-sobah, and built Tadmor, and other cities in those parts. He also repaired the two Beth-horons, and Baalath, and Gezer. In carrying on these structures, Solomon allowed none of the Hebrews to work as slaves; but caused the remains of the Canaanites to be his drudges. It seems, however that his taxes on the Hebrews, raised in order to carry on these works, provoked them against him. It appears, that his annual revenue was about six hundred and sixty six talents of gold, besides what he had in presents from his allies and tributary kings, and what he had from merchants.—It is said, that Hiram king of Tyre and Solomon maintained a correspondence, puzzling one another with hard questions. It is more certain that the queen of SHEBA, hearing of his fame, came from the utmost parts of the South, to see and hear his wisdom; and having heard his answers to her puzzling questions, having seen the beauty and worship of the temple, and the magnificence and order of his court, table, and attendants, she fainted with surprise, and confessed that it far exceeded all she had heard. Loaded with presents, she returned to her country. 1 Kings x. Hitherto every thing in Solomon's character appears grand and admirable; but his abominable conduct in the after part of his life, has marked him with lasting disgrace. He had seven hundred wives, and three hundred concubines, mostly heathenish idolaters. In compliance with these, he forsook the Lord, and worshipped, and built temples to their idols, Asheroth, Moloch, Chemos, and others. The Lord appeared to him, and told him, that as he had wickedly broken his covenant, he would rend off ten of the Hebrew tribes from their subjection to his seed. Alarmed herewith, Solomon repented of his sin, and it is like, about this time wrote his ECCLESIASTAS in which he declares all things to be vanity and vexation of spirit, and that he had found whorish women more bitter than death; and it is a part of his PROVERBS, probable that in which he so earnestly warns his son against whorish women. His temporal punishment was not turned away. Before he died, Hadad the Edomite, Rezin the Syrian, and Jeroboam the son of Nebat, began to give him uneasiness. After a reign of forty years he died, and was succeeded by Rehoboam. The history of his reign was written by Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo. If he wrote any more besides his Song of Songs, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, it was uninspired, and is now lost. 1 Kings xi. Jesus Christ is called Solomon, and was typified by that prince. What a darling of heaven is he! how infinitely wise and peaceful! Notwithstanding all oppositions, how solemnly installed in his throne by the Father! and how extensive his kingdom! How justly he punishes the guilty! how wisely he judges! and how plentifully he enriches his people! What multitudes come to, and admire his wisdom and glory! How firmly he builds the temple of his church, and consecrates her to the Lord, by his unmatched sacrifice and all-prevalent intercession! Sol. Song iii. 6, 11. and viii. 10.

SOME; a part, either smaller or greater; few or many. Matt. xxviii. 17. Rom. iii. 2.

SOMETHING, or SOMEWHAT, denotes both what is of small, and what is of much value, 2 Chron. x. 4, 6. Gal. ii. 6. and vi. 2; and what is good; as alms. Acts iii. 5; and what is distressing, as affliction. 1 Sam. xx. 26.

SON. See CHILD.

SONG, or HYMN; (1.) A metrical composition or poem, to be sung either in joy or thanksgiving; as that of Moses at the Red Sea; of Deborah, Hannah, David, Hezekiah, Habakkuk, Mary, Zacharias, Simeon, &c. Exod. xv. Judg. v. 1 Sam. ii. 2 Sam. xxii. Isa. xxxviii. Hab. iii. Luke i. and ii; or of lamentation, as David's over the death of Saul and Jonathan, and of Abner, 2 Sam. i. and iii. 33; and of Jeremiah, on the death of Josiah, and the destruction of Jerusalem, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. Lam. i—v; or of predictory warning, as that of Moses before his death. Deut. xxxii. (2.) The subject matter on which a song is composed. Thus God is the song of his people; his excellencies and favours are the subject matter of it. Exod. xv. 2. Job and David were the song of their enemies; i.e. were the object of their mockery and derision. Job xxx. 9. Psal. lxi. 12. New songs, are such as are newly made, or for new mercies, and are ever sweet and delightful. Psal. xxxiii. 3. and xl. 3. Spiritual songs, are those whose subject-matter is spiritual and divine, in opposition to empty, false, fulsome, and impure songs, called the song of fools. Eph. v. 19. Col. iii. 16. Eccl. vii. 5. They are called the Lord's song, or the song of the Lamb, because God and his Christ form the subject-matter of them, and to his honour they are sung. Psal. xlii. 8. and cxxxvii. 3. Rev. xv. 3. The Jews had songs sung almost the whole night of their more solemn feasts, especially on the first night of the passover. Isa. xxx. 29. Solomon's Song of Songs could not be a nuptial hymn, composed on occasion of his marriage with any of his wives. It was not penned till the tower of Lebanon was built, chap. vii. 4; and so not till about twenty years after his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter. Many of the emblems in it, if applied to a lady, as when she is called a keeper of the vineyard, said to have a head like Carmel, a nose like the tower of Lebanon; eyes like a fish-pool; teeth like a flock of sheep; and to be terrible as an army with banners, &c. are absurd to the last degree, but if understood of the marriage and fellowship between Christ and his people, it will appear most exalted, instructive, and heart-warming. In vain Whiston, and others, upon scarcely the shadow of a ground, have denied its authenticity. Though the name of God is not found in it, any more than in Esther, as indeed the allegory of this book scarce admits it; yet its majestic style, its power on men's consciences to promote holiness and purity, the harmony of its language with that of Christ's parables, and of the book of Revelation; the sincerity of the bride in acknowledging her faults; and, in fine, its general reception by the Jewish and Christian church, sufficiently prove it inspired of God. To such as read it with a carnal, and especially a wanton mind, it is the savour of death unto death, as the mind and conscience of such are defiled; but to such as have experienced much fellowship with Christ, and read it with a heavenly and spiritual temper of mind, it will be the savour of life unto life. The speakers in it are Christ, Believers, and the Daughters of Jerusalem. As the following attempt at a spiritual paraphrase explains a book of continued allegories, and exemplifies how the detached explications of scripture in this work may be connected, it is hoped it will not be altogether unapproved by the devout reader, who in the perusal is desired to compare verse by verse with his Bible.

BELIEVERS.

Verse 2. Let HIM, whose name is wonderful, inexpressible, and unmatched; HIM, who loved me, and gave himself for me; HIM, who is the only darling of my heart, the great object of my thoughts, the substance and source of all my joys; let HIM, who is my Saviour, my husband, my God, my ALL IN ALL, kindly, but powerfully, apply his precious truths to my soul; and thereby give me ONE, give me MANIFOLD, large, and ravishing discoveries of his person, his righteousness, and fullness; give me sweet intimations, feelings, and tokens of his distinguished, everlasting love:—give me full assurance of my peace and reconciliation with him; pleasant incentives and inflammations of my love towards him. For thrice amiable Jesus, thy unmatched, thy free, thy ancient and unchangeable, thy almighty and efficacious love, in undertaking, in obeying, and dying for ME;—in rising from the dead, in ascending to glory, and interceding for ME;—and in bestowing thy all-ravishing and marvellous Self, with all the fullness of God, on guilty, polluted, and wretched ME;—how many thousand-fold more precious, more easily obtained, more sweet and refreshing to my heart, than wine! than any created enjoyment!—never is it sour, or tasteless, never is my soul surfeited therewith, or hurt thereby; it quickens me under deadness; it supports and strengthens me under burdens; it comforts me against grief; it fills me with joy unspeakable and full of glory; it begets and inflames my love to a reconciled God, conforms me to his image, and nourishes me up to everlasting felicity.

Verse 3. Such, thrice blessed Redeemer, is the divine sweetness and savour, the heart-softening, healing, and beautifying virtue of thy personal excellencies as God-man, and of the fullness of grace and glory lodged in thee: such the delightful, the heart-captivating influence of the gospel-exhibition of thee as our almighty, our compassionate and everlasting Mediator, Prophet, Priest, King, Physician, Friend, Brother, Parent, and Husband; that every soul inwardly renewed, every soul endowed with gospel-purity, humility, heavenly affection, and holy conversation, does, and must, with superlative and universal, with unfeigned, ceaseless, and ardent love, esteem, desire, delight, glory in, and extol thee.

Verse 4. O all-gracious Redeemer, whom my soul loveth, consider my deserted, my tempted, my distressed case; reach forth thine arm that is full of power; apply the promises to my distant, my weak, my dead, my obstinately rebellious and headward-drawn heart; let the powerful arguments, the almighty influence of thy grace, melt my inward rock, quicken and inflame my soul with love to thee. O work in me, to will and to do; bring me into the nearest, the most ravishing intimacy with thy self;—THEN, in the exercise of grace, and practice of virtue, shall every inward power of mind, bend, run, and fly towards thee; and others by me excited, shall, with speed, alacrity, and vigour, seek for, cleave to, and follow after thee.—Astonishing!—what sudden change I feel! how excellent and rich! how sovereign and free! how powerful and seasonably interposing is the grace, the love of my divine King of angels and men, chiefly of his body the church! While I yet spake, he hath heard! while I called, he hath said to my soul! HERE I AM; he hath brought me near to himself, and granted me the most distinct, sensible, and transporting fellowship with him, in the promises and ordinances of his grace: here, in his presence-chamber, what wonders of redeeming kindness he discovers to my view!—my sins, which are many, blotted out!—my eternal peace and felicity secured! and the perfections, purposes and promises of God, shining in the face of Jesus, and my full and everlasting interest therein!—Oh! what unutterable views of God, and of glory, I now see! what inexpressibly pleasant and captivating influence of everlasting love shed abroad in my heart, I feel, how all my inward powers are melted, quickened, strengthened, and set on fire with love! Oh! what incontestible evidence of the truth of religion, I perceive the power of! what defence from temptation! what freedom from the rage of corruption! what fixed arrestment of heart on God, I enjoy! What-Lord, shall I render unto thee for thy benefits!—Mounting my soul above every created enjoyment, I will delight in, praise, and boast of thy infinite and all lovely Self, as my God, and my exceeding joy; and with others, by me excited, will think of, desire, receive, and extol thy redeeming grace, mercy, and goodness, more than wine; more than any created delights;—for truly, every one who is possessed of real candour and integrity in a religious profession or practice, does, and must, with the whole heart, esteem, desire, and delight in thee!

Verse 5. Ah! how quickly defilement and distress succeed to my ravishing frame! but, O nominal professors, or you babes in Christ, stumble not at religion, because of what I appear in myself, or in the view of a carnal world; for, though in resemblance to the coarse, sun-burned tents of Arabia, I be stained with remaining guilt, pollution, and weakness, be oppressed with countless temptations and troubles; be mingled with hypocrites; be despised and persecuted of men; yet in Jesus my head, and in his righteousness imputed, and in his gracious esteem, and wearing his graces imparted, and exercising patience and resignation under my sufferings, I am more comely and glorious than the curtains of Solomon's palace.

Verse 6. Look not therefore upon my sinful imperfections, my various afflictions, my grievous temptations, as if these were my ALL; ridicule, despise, and detest me not, on their account; nor, either with pleasure or astonishment, stumble at the ways of God, for my sake. Ah! scorching disasters weaken my strength, and wither my blossoming glory and honour!—my outrageous corruptions, conceived with me in my mother's womb, war against my soul; captivate me to the law of sin and death; embarrass me with carnal care, and sinful intermeddling with the concerns of others; and so divert me from my proper duty, from the things which belong to my eternal peace!—Hypocritical professors too, children of my mother the church, but never begotten of the will of God, my heavenly Father, conceiving a relentless hatred, have exposed me to pain and disgrace; have hindered my attendance on the ordinances of God; have violently imposed on me for doctrines, the commandments of men; have entangled me in secular business; have sinfully diverted me from watching over my heart and practice; and obstructed my proper improvement of the office, the gifts, and grace, committed to my trust.

Verse 7. But O all-compassionate SHEPHERD of the sheep, whom my soul at least wishes to love with all her powers and with all her might, and in comparison of whom I undervalue and abhor the highest excellencies of creation, tell me plainly, O tell me in what ordinances thou now directest, watchest over, protectest, quickenest, strengthenest, and comfortest thy people, and feedest them with thy flesh which is meat indeed, and thy blood which is drink indeed;—with the promises of thy word, the discoveries of thy love, and the communications of thy grace: O tell me where thou makest thy little, but beautiful flock of slaughter, whose eternal redemption is committed to thy care, to enjoy spiritual comfort and rest, amidst the withering and tormenting noon of distress, temptation, persecution, and rage of indwelling lust; for why, my GREAT ALL, why should I, who am redeemed by thy blood; I, to whose soul sin is a very hell, be exposed to the danger of a whorish apostacy from thee; the danger of an impious conjunction with false teachers, or inward idols, who, under colour of friendship, are thine enemies, thy rivals, on earth!

CHRIST.

Verse 8. O thou my fair, lovely, beloved one, whom I have decked with my righteousness, and rendered spotless and comely before JEHOVAH, the Judge of all; and whom my implanted grace hath made all glorious within, and beautiful in good works; since, notwithstanding of former instructions, ignorance of duty is thy continued, thy mournful complaint, be kindly admonished to follow the most eminent patterns of ancient believers,—bring thy rising children, thy weak professors, and thy languishing graces, to the moveable and oft despised ordinances of my gospel, dispensed by those faithful pastors, who watch over, direct, and nourish my church.

Verse 9. O my love, whom, from eternity, I chose, esteemed, desired, and delighted in, indulge not fainting, on account of continued corruption and trouble: for however despicable thou art in thine own eyes, or in the view of the wicked around: yet being purchased with my blood, decked with my righteousness, adorned with my grace, and nourished with my fulness, I have made thee like a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots:—how distinguished thy spiritual comeliness! thy strength, vigour, and boldness, in running the race of gospel-holiness! in fighting the Christian warfare! in jointly bearing with others, the yoke of my law! and being the means of my honourable triumphs over sin, Satan, the world, and death!

Verse 10. With a holy, humble, and well ordered conversation of public and private duties, how adorned are thy cheeks, thine outward appearance! and thy faith, which unites thy person to me as a head; and which, from my fulness, conveys nourishment to thy heart, how encompassed! how richly ornamented with the precious and golden promises which it embraces! with the numerous and lasting blessings and gifts which it receives! with the connected and valuable graces and endowments which it excites. And, has not the church, whose member thou art, her professors, decked with my ordinances and truths? and her ministers, furnished with a chain-like connexion of gifts and graces, to render them fit for their service?

Verse 11. And much, much shall thy glory and comeliness increase: our instituted ordinances, will I and my Father, and blessed Spirit, brighten and polish; and therein give thee more abundant and powerful discoveries of gospel truth. More and more will we apply to thy soul my righteousness, that border of gold; more and more we will increase the permanent, the precious and shining graces and gifts of thine heart; and the beauties of holiness in thy conversation, till freed from sin, and from sorrow, thou become perfect, as thy Father which is in heaven is perfect.

Verse 12. O Jesus, how my soul panteth for this promised fellowship with thee! for, while thou, my blessed KING of kings, to whom all my powers are in subjection, grantest me calm, fixed, and familiar intimacy with, and feasting on thy all-glorious Self; in the institutions of thy grace, in the displays of thy love, how transcendently pleasant and refreshing to my heart, are thy promises and truths; and THOU in them! Nay! how lively, how active, how pleasant to thee, and agreeable to myself, are my inwardly perfuming graces of faith, love, repentance, humility, patience, and new obedience!

Verse 13. But, in my best estate, what am I but VANITY, in comparison of him my well-beloved husband and friend! Thrice blessed bundle of myrrh! whatever bitter sufferings he underwent for my sake; whatever bitter cross attend my following of him; yet how, oh! how transcendently precious, pleasant, and savoury, is this gift of heaven to my soul! how restoring and refreshing, how purifying and preserving, how perfuming and medicinal, is the applied virtue of his person, his names, relations, love, righteousness, intercession, words, and ordinances! Shall not then HE, who, during the night of time, resides amidst the two nourishing testaments of his word, and amidst the public and private institutions of the gospel, reside in my heart! and, during the night of an afflicted and mortal life, shall not my faith and love think of, esteem, desire, embrace, entertain, delight in, and rejoice over him?

Verse 14. Oh! what a matchlessly delightful and precious system of excellencies, fountain of graces, source of blessings, repository of promises, treasure of pardoning, healing, comforting, nourishing, quickening, and refreshing influence, is this amiable, this infinitely amiable Jesus, to my soul!

CHRIST.

Verse 15. Blessed object of my uncased and unbounded, of my distinguished and dying love, behold, amidst unsearchable defilement and unsightliness, THOU, as clothed with my finished righteousness, and as adorned in heart and conversation with my grace, and in my gracious and kind esteem, art fair, beautiful, and comely; yea, let thy fainting, thy doubting soul, be assured; behold thou art truly, extensively, eminently fair: how adorned is thy heart with spiritual understanding, to pry into the mysteries of God; with singleness, and with chastity of affection to me: with readiness to bewail thy sinfulness, and the hidings of my face; and with a candid sincerity, in dependence on, and following after me;—and as endowed with my ordinances, and reformed by my word and Spirit, how comely is my church! how beautified with intelligent, and sincere, with peaceful, peace-proclaiming, and faithful pastors, to search into and espy gospel-truth: and to watch over, direct, and go before her private members!

BELIEVER.

Verse 16. Blessed Jesus! O darling of my heart! if amidst this unmatched pollution and deformity, I am in any respect comely, how fair! how infinitely fair! how glorious and amiable! how ravishingly sweet and pleasant, must thou, divine source of every thing lovely, be, in thy person, thy offices, relations, excellencies, and works! O brightness of the Father's glory! how my soul prizeth thy person! how she adores thy beauty! and with transporting pleasure, delights in thee, as my great, my gracious, my amiable ALL IN ALL! How refreshing and reviving! how delightful and ever-flourishing, are the word, the covenant, the promises, the ordinances, and frames, wherein thou shewest forth thy glory, and conferrest the captivating, the fructifying influence of thy love, to my soul! And how comely and refreshing is thy church, wherein saints and their graces are begotten and born to God!

Verse 17. How high-towering, heavenly, upright, and durable! how deep-rooted in, and a good savour of THEE, are these ministers and saints, fixed, as decorating and supporting pillars and beams, in thy church, which thou hast built and furnished, and in which thou dwellest with us for our good! How delightful and lasting are these ordinances, which, as rafters, support the fabric of thy church; and in which, as galleries, we walk with thee; and in which, as watering-troughs, thy people quench their spiritual thirst!

CHAPTER II.

CHRIST.

Verse 1. Inexpressible indeed, is my excellency, glory, and usefulness! Like the rose of Sharon, I grew as a root out of dry ground; in my humanity and bloody suffering; but how sweet perfume, to heaven and earth, is the savour of my name! how sovereign my virtue, to allay the burning fever of enmity and lust, and to restore from spiritual consumption! Like the lily of the valley, I am white, divine, holy, harmless, undefiled; and though once exposed and debased, am higher than the heavens; filled with all the fruits of righteousness; productive of saints unnumbered; am fitted for, and offered to, the most wretched and debased sinners; and with the lowly in heart I dwell, and take my delight.

Verse 2. And, through my comeliness put upon thee, art thou, redeemed object of my love, as a lily, holy, humble, heavenly-minded, fruitful, fragrant, and useful, amidst the hurtful thorns of wicked men, and of reproaches, troubles, and corruptions.

Verse 3. In respect of greatness, and of fruitfulness in righteousness, in grace and glory; and in respect of heart-refreshing, love-producing, prayer-exciting, soul-healing, and sin-killing influence, surely, O my adored Jesus, thou infinitely transcendest angels and men! How often have I, with ravishing pleasure, safety, and rest, applied thy obedience and death, as my protection from the curse of a broken law, and from the vengeance of heaven, and the challenges of a guilty conscience! How often have I trusted thy almighty power and love, to defend me from sin, Satan, and an evil world!—How often have I, dreadless of danger from heaven, earth, and hell, by faith viewed, admired, and fed upon thy person, offices, and relations; and on the pardon, acceptance, adoption, sanctification, comfort, and endless glory, that flow therefrom!

Verse 4. While I speak of HIM, how my soul is captivated! how transported!—My thrice blessed Bridegroom hath brought me into the bond, and manifested to me the secrets of his covenant; he hath made me penetrate into the very spirit and marrow of his word, his promise; hath given me the most pleasant and transporting intimacy with himself; hath made me drink plentifully of the new wine of his redeeming, his bleeding love; and, by displays thereof, hath directed, encouraged, and determined me vigorously to fight with, and resist Satan, and to war against and mortify my sinful corruptions, and to trample on the smiles and frowns of a present world

Verse 5. But oh!—for still more enlarged—for unspeakably more enlarged enjoyment of HIM, and his unsearchable fulness, to enable me to bear, and improve, what I behold and feel!—For now is my soul overwhelmed with joy; deep fixed in wonder; quite transported with the enrapturing sight and sweet sensation of his dying, for giving love; and with the view of the perfections, purposes, words, and works of God as shining in him! How lost in sweet amaze, I languish, all inflamed with love!

Verse 6. Thrice pleasant frame! thrice happy case! while I enjoy the safe, the delightful, the near, the tender embraces of an incarnate God! while I have the secrets of his love imparted to my soul! and am, by his promise, his power, and grace, inwardly upheld, delighted and strengthened!

Verse 7. While I enjoy this rapturous fellowship with Jesus, disturb me not, ye nominal professors, or ye fellow saints: by all that is delightful, I charge you to beware of giving him, or cause me to give him any provocation to withdraw his sensible visit of love, till he do it of his sovereign pleasure.

Verse 8. Ah! how quickly, how sinfully, I have lost the rapturous frame! but blessed be my glorious visitant, that in a little wrath he hides but for a moment.—WHAT is this which already warms my cold, and cheers my fainting heart!—It is the majestic, the almighty, the attractive, the refreshful voice, word, and promise of Jesus, the darling of my soul.—Behold thrice surprising! he returns with loving kindness and tender mercies!—Behold with infinite pleasure and speed, he overleaped the mountain of distance between his adored and my debased nature!—for HE he overleaped the flaming mountain of the broken law, and of the incensed vengeance of an angry God!—overleaped the dark mountains of death and the grave!—And with what power, joy, triumph, and speed, he now comes skipping on the hills of instituted ordinances, and over the mountains of guilt, and of desertion, temptation, rebellion, and spiritual plagues, to save, restore, and comfort my soul!

Verse 9. As a roe, or a young hart, how infinitely beautiful and lovely is HE, in his person, office, and work!—how pleasant, gracious, and kind in his disposition!—How alert, ready, and nimble, are his motions of grace towards his people! How noted his hatred of, and his suffering from, and triumphant victory over, Satan the old serpent, and his works! How extensive his duration and the continuance of his saving work! His flesh and blood how pure! and how divinely allowed provision for my soul! Behold, under the Old Testament, how he stood behind, and was represented by the partition-wall of Hebrew rites! Behold, when we are walled in by a frail body, and by sins, temptations, desertion, and distress, he is not far off, but ever ready through the lattices, the ordinances of his grace, to afford us partial displays of his glory, and transient tastes of his all endearing love!

Verse 10. In answer to my cordial wish, now is come HE whom my soul loveth: in melting strains, he invites me to his presence, his embrace; 'Arise, dear object of my everlasting love, beautified with my righteousness and grace, awake, shake off thy spiritual sloth, thy slavish fear, and carnal care; let every grace be stirred up to a lively exercise. Come away, be directed and drawn by me, into the most familiar, delightful, useful, and enriching fellowship of God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

Verse 11. 'Now being exhausted on me, the winter-storm, the deluging rain of boundless wrath is over and gone; being finished in thy espousals to me, the stormy winter of thy natural state is over; the deluging curse that once hovered on thy head, is past: in my present return to thy soul, thy late winter of guilt, corruption, temptation, desertion, and distress, passes over, and vanisheth.

Verse 12. 'And now is come a spring-tide of evangelical, of refreshful discoveries and influence; now, fragrant, comely and cheerful saints are fashioned and flourish; with beauteous form, and delightful virtue, their graces spring forth:—with liveliness, wisdom, and success, ministers publish the glad tidings of peace and felicity; saints have their luxuriancies pruned, and publish the Saviour's praise: now, men spiritually know the joyful sound of the gospel; and the blessed Spirit, that heavenly, that harmless, pure, meek, and beauteous TURTLE, speaks life and joy to their inmost heart.

Verse 13. Now, with pleasure and profit, do the professors of my name, rooted and grounded in me, and who, sensible of their weakness and guilt, depend on me, and through my influence, and manifold rods, become fruitful, thrive under the means of grace, and abound in the precious, though imperfect fruits of knowledge, of faith, of love, repentance, humility; of patience, zeal, and new obedience:—numbers of young converts are produced in the particular worshipping assemblies of my church. Arise, therefore, my love, my fair one, (ver. 10.) quit thy perverse unwillingness; away with delays; and, with vigour, boldness, and speed, come, even to my seat.

Verse 14. O beloved soul, poor, weak, timorous, and exposed; pure in thy nature and food; comely and harmless; sociable with saints; chaste towards me, and by my grace fruitful in holiness;—and whose exercise is mourning for sin, and flying to the Saviour;—and whose name was, from everlasting, hid in my secret purpose and choice;—whose person is hid in my person and blood;—whose duty it is to hide thyself under the shade of my power and love, and to cultivate a secret intimacy with me and my Father; and who often hidest thyself amidst sinful despondency, sullen grief, and slavish dread; approach me now with holy boldness, and full assurance of faith, and with fervency of prayer; for delightful to me is thy crying out of the depths of guilt, corruption, temptation, and trouble; thy confessing and praising my name; and most amiable is thy looking to, and bold acting of faith upon my promise, person, character, and work.

Verse 15. 'And to further my people's intimacy with, and likeness to myself, in holiness and comfort, I charge you, rulers of my church, and every member in his station, to watch the conduct, and to promote the censure of false teachers, crafty, covetous, deceitful, wicked, and abominable; who spoil her vines; root out and overturn her true doctrine; corrupt her worship; disturb her order, peace, and unity; pervert her discipline and government; and check men's Christian practice:—for some true members are but weak in knowledge and prudence, in gifts and grace.—And I charge every professor to observe, to watch against and mortify his fox-like inward corruptions, crafty, lurking, wandering, unconstant, desperately wicked, and destructive: and every first motion thereof; and to resist the manifold temptations of Satan, which with subtle secrecy, hurt their inward grace, especially if weak, or budding forth new fruits of holy endeavours.'

Verse 16. Beloved Jesus! arising, at thy call, I come with boldness, even to thy seat: in the full assurance of faith, I believe, and accept thee as mine; I love, and am satisfied with thee as my Saviour, my husband, my wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption; as mine, by divine gift, by spiritual marriage, and by cordial embracement; my portion, my God, my ALL IN ALL:—and howsoever unworthy I am in my person, my grace, my gifts, my cares, and concerns, I acknowledge and surrender to thee, as thine; thine by thy ancient choice, by thy Father's gift, by thy bloody purchase, by thy gracious espousal, and by my cordial vows.—Oh! with what delightful pleasure thou and thy people enjoy one another, whilst in thy ordinances, thou discoverest thy glory to their view, and conveyest thy all-nourishing fulness to their heart!

Verse 17. Not only till the gospel day break, when the Sun of righteousness displays his glory, performs great things in his church, makes the wind of his divine influence to blow, renders his people active in their labour of love, and causeth the shadows of ceremonial rites, and of many gross corruptions, to flee away; but till the more clear and glorious day of endless light break and dawn, wherein we shall see God as he is, shall serve him without ceasing, and bask in the transporting rays of his redeeming love; and when every shadow of weakness, pollution, sorrow, desertion, temptation, and trial, nay of outward enjoyment, and instituted ordinances, shall flee away, shall be quickly and finally removed; turn thee, my beloved Saviour:—in the appointed means of thy worship, often surprise me with thy kind visits; discover thyself to my soul, as infinitely gracious, lovely, and pure; as an enemy of, and triumph over Satan and his works;—as through the gift of God, and thine own sufferings, our choice, spiritual, and everlasting provision:—and according to the riches of thy grace, tread down and overleap every interrupting mountain of guilt or corruption, and distance, which impedes thy delightful and easy access to my heart.

CHAPTER III.

BELIEVER.

Verse 1. When the much desired Jesus, whom my soul in sincerity loveth, and whom

I would gladly love with ten thousand-fold more ardency, withdrew his sensible presence, I, on my bed of trouble, darkness, confusion, and sloth, at first sought him, begging the return of his wonted smiles, and the favourable communication of his love; but, for answer, had continued silence, desertion, darkness, frowns, terrors, and even flashes of wrath darted into my conscience.

Verse 2. Amidst deep perplexity and grief, I then bestirred myself to an earnest attendance on his public ordinances; these streets and broad ways of his beloved city the church; calling on, and seeking for the sensible presence of this unmatched darling of my soul: but, to try my grace, to punish my sloth, and my sinful dependence on ordinances, I was still answered with silent desertion, heavy challenges, or angry frowns.

Verse 3. Ministers, divinely placed in the populous, the pleasant and privileged, in the fortified and well-ordered city of the church; and appointed to espy her danger, to preserve her safety and peace, to assist and direct her pure and peaceable members, and to check the unruly; often touching my case in their discourses, as if they had been privy thereto, I esteemed them the intimate secretaries of Heaven, and laid before them my condition: and amidst distress and confusion, begged them to inform me, how I might regain the wonted favour and smiles of my darling, Christ.

Verse 4. Still pained with continued desertion and frowns, and fearing that I had rested on means, I, as one betwixt hope and despair, attended his ordinances, earnestly looking through and beyond them, to his person, office, free grace, all-cleansing blood, and saving power; and with inward agonies, and strong cries and tears, and groanings that could not be uttered, I justified him in all he had done to afflict me, and suppose he should cast me into the lowest hell: meanwhile, I remonstrated to him, my incapacity of bearing the thoughts of endless separation from him, or of being condemned to everlasting rebellion, rage, and blasphemy against him, a God and Saviour of unbounded love;—and that my life on earth was to me a hell, while, like Cain, I was driven from his presence.—With heart-breaking longings I plead the promises, chiefly those which I once thought had pierced to the centre of my soul: out of the deeps I cried, that for his name's sake, he would make uncommon stretches of mercy to save, and smile on a monster of folly, ingratitude, and backsliding. Quickly I found the darling of my soul: In his word I discerned his glory: I smelt the ravishing savour of his name; I felt his powerful presence returning with loving kindness and tender mercies; I heard his voice saying, Fear not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God. I, cern I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions, for my name's sake, &c. &c. Immediately every inward band was loosed; every mountain of ignorance, unbelief, atheism, enmity, hardness, pride, legality, melted before the Lord God of Israel; every languishing grace was enabled and emboldened to fight with, and tread under foot corruptions and temptations; every former manifestation of his love was cleared and confirmed; and with ravishing sweetness, unnumbered views of glory, and of my new-covenant interest therein, came crowding into my heart.

Having thus found my Redeemer; I, by the exercise of faith and love, excited, and strengthened by, and fixed on him, and through his infinite condescension to me-ward, held him, when he seemed ready to depart, and would not let him go; satiating my soul with his kindness, I pleaded his promise to do me good; I filled my mouth with arguments: I ordered my cause before him. And importunately I wrestled for his gracious return to his church, and the ordinances of his grace, wherein I and others are converted from iniquity, and born to him; nor ceased, till by promise, or by fulfilment, he assured me of his making all the places round about his hill a blessing.

Verse 5. Re-admitted into near and sensible fellowship with Jesus, the quintessence, the unbounded fulness of everlasting LOVE, I solemnly charge you, fellow saints and professors; and adjure you, by every thing interesting, lovely, or dreadful, to beware of whatever may provoke him, or disturb my soul. Chap. ii. 7.

COMPANIONS, or Daughters of Jerusalem.

Verse 6. What amazing person is this, who, turning her back on the desert, the thorny, the stony, the famished, the dangerous, the troublesome, the pathless, the barren, the bemisting wilderness of a present world, and of a natural state, and of her late spiritual distress,—and who, mortified to every carnal enjoyment, and triumphing over every impediment,—and who, having her heart divinely inflamed with love, so mysteriously, uprightly, and so regularly, steadily, and delightfully, mounts up towards God, towards Christ, and things above, in holy desire, cordial prayer, and affectionate praise: and in self-dedication, and a well-ordered practice!—and who, in her person and work, is perfumed, is rendered acceptable by the meritorious obedience and death, and the prevalent intercession and manifold grace of Jesus Christ, our skilful apothecary, and heavenly merchant, who counsels to buy of him without money and without price.

BELIEVER.

Verses 7, 8. Gaze not upon, nor admire me, a polluted sinner, who, by the grace of God, am what I am, in comeliness and virtue; but behold his BED; behold the CHURCH erected by HIM, who, in wisdom, power, authority, renown; and in the extent, peace, and wealth of his kingdom; and in building a spiritual temple for God, and in his pointed and prevalent intercession, far transcends King Solomon;—the church wherein multitudes are spiritually begotten and born to him. Behold, the restful, the quickening, and everlasting COVENANT of grace, made with, fulfilled, and administrated by him! behold his refreshful, comforting, restoring, and life-giving word! behold the precious, enlivening, the beautifying, invigorating, and enriching blessing of FELLOWSHIP with him; and which is purchased, conferred, and maintained by him!—Behold the perfect safety, honour, and happiness of those who are true members of his church, are in the bond of his covenant, and through his word enjoy intimacy with him:—What regulated troops of vigilant, active, and courageous ministers, armed with the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; and armed with authority to exercise discipline and government in the church! what hosts of mighty angels, armed with power and commission from God!—and what hosts of divine perfections, constantly watch over, and defend them from the fears, the doubts, the troubles, and temptations, so incident during the nights of this present life, and of distresses unnumbered!

Verses 9, 10. For his personal residence and motions, hath Jesus, my King of kings, and all-glorious Prince of peace, assumed a real HUMAN NATURE, more precious, durable; more fragrant, deep-rooted, strong, and comely, than the cedars of Lebanon: as with pillars, this chariot is established with the precious, firm, and shining graces of the blessed Spirit; it is bottomed and founded on his infinitely excellent, his everlasting and unchangeable Godhead: its covering is of purple; therein, he had our sins charged and punished on him, and conquered all his enemies, and now appears in his royal majesty; in it, he bears the kindest love, exercises the inmost sympathy toward his people; and, in his intercession, presents them before his Father, as written on his heart.—And for transporting his elect from a state of sin and misery, to endless felicity, he, to the praise of the glory of his grace, hath entered into a precious, firm, fragrant, well-ordered, and everlasting COVENANT; of which the promises are more strong, shining and valuable, than pillars of silver: Its Mediator, and bottom of divine perfections and purposes, are more precious, substantial, and glorious, than gold; its condition for covering, and protection of sinful men, is more splendid than purple, blood and righteousness of an incarnate God; and its midst, its centre and substance, are God's infinite, amazing love and condescension.—And to render this covenant effectual, he hath, for his own honour and use, framed and published a glorious, delightful, a deep-rooted, firm, and everlasting GOSPEL of peace, whose pillars of truth are more pure, precious, more comely and strong, than silver seven times purified; whose bottom, Christ the power and wisdom of God, is more firm, solid, shining, valuable, useful, and enriching, than gold; whose doctrines of complete remission through his blood, and of the cross his people must bear for his sake, are more illustrious, grand, and useful, than coverings of purple; whose midst and centre is JEHOVAH's redeeming love, undeserved, ancient, almighty, and unchangeable.—And, for publishing this inestimable gospel, he, for his own praise, and his people's advantage, hath erected a beautiful and firm, a well-grounded, delightful, and durable CHURCH; the supporting, adorning, and silver-like pillars of which, are faithful pastors, and precious saints; its golden bottom is the everlasting person, truth, power, and promise of Christ: its purple covering is not chiefly the sufferings of her true members for Jesus' sake, but his bleeding obedience and death, which protect from the fury of God, the rage of devils, and the ruinous malice of men; and its ordinances, its assemblies, are furnished and filled with declarations and displays of divine love to sinful men; and its true members have the love of God shed abroad in their heart.—And for displaying his glory, and vouchsafing his grace, to the highest, hath formed the invaluable and fragrant, the firm and ever-enduring marriage-bed of the heavenly state, whose silver pillars are just men made perfect; whose golden bottom and foundation is Jesus the pearl of great price; whose purple covering is his royal majesty, and everlasting righteousness; and the centre and substance of whose happiness, and the sum and burden of whose songs, are God's redeeming love to men.

Verse 11. Go forth, then, ye nominal professors, from your natural state, your self-righteousness, your carnal care, your filthy lusts: go forth, ye weak believers, from your legal, your carnal, your dead and sluggish frames, and from the unnumbered remains of corruption; go forth to Jesus' word and ordinances; steadily contemplate, believe on, desire, and delight in him, my all-glorious Prince of peace. Chap. i. 4. and iii. 7. Behold HIM wearing the crown of divine, and of mediatorial glory, power, and authority, which his church, and every true member thereof, united to him, and having him formed in their heart, do solemnly ascribe to him, in their esteem and acceptance of him; and in their submission to, and praising of him on the noted day of their spiritual espousals with him, at conversion, at death, or in the judgment to come; and whereon, with delightful pleasure in, and joy over them, as the children of his love, as the seed produced by the travail of his soul, and as the birth of his Father's promise, he welcomes, apprehends, and unites them to himself, and accepts and perfects them.

CHAPTER IV

CHRIST.

Verse 1. Beloved soul, to encourage thy faith, behold, notwithstanding of remaining defilement and trouble, my righteousness and grace render thee fair and beautiful before God, angels, and men. Chap. i. 8, 15. Thy spiritual knowledge, faith, and affection, are sincere, single, humble, comely, and seasonably discovered: thy thoughts and actions, insignificant indeed in themselves, but sprung from my influence, are regular, comely, conspicuous, and ornamental; they all concentrate in living by faith on me, and under a sense of self-unworthiness, giving up thyself to my service.—Behold, too, the church, whose member thou art, is by ordinances, officers, and saints, rendered beautiful and glorious: her eye-like ministers, though imperfect, are modest, humble, holy; walking in all godly simplicity and harmony; not indulging themselves in pride, contention, or carnal policy;—her hair-like young converts, weak and sinful in themselves, but rooted and grounded in me, her head, grow up in holiness; and as goats, browse on the rich pasture of my word, and are acceptable sacrifices to God.

Verse 2. How sweetly do the pure and well-connected acts of thy faith and meditation apply thy spiritual provision, nourish thy soul; and with much labour and profit, bring forth fruits of righteousness!—and thy zeal is pure, regular, moderate; and active in holiness.—The able and zealous ministers of the church, who prepare the spiritual nourishment for their people, are pure and sound in their doctrine; holy and harmless in their lives; equal in their power and commission; harmonious and meek in their purpose and behaviour; and do, with diligence and success, travail as in birth, to win souls to me their Lord.

Verse 3. Thy humble, constant, cordial, and fervent prayer, praise, and spiritual conference, turning chiefly on the mystery of a bleeding Redeemer, are very profitable, pleasant, and distinct; marking thy heart sound, thy soul inflamed, and thy conscience purged, with my dying love; and that through my bloody suffering, thy service is presented to, and accepted of God:—and in my esteem, thy self-abasement and modesty, thy shame and rejection of thy best services before me, render thee notably beautiful and comely:—In the church, my bleeding obedience and death, and redemption thereby, as the great theme of her pastors, render them and their ministrations, lively, pleasant, and comely:—and with modesty, singleness, prudence, and order, do her rulers govern, direct, and edify her members.

Verse 4. Thy faith, which unites to, and exalts me thine head, and which receives out of my fulness, and grace for grace, and is upright in itself, and adorned with many sister graces and good works, is as a lofty, strong, impregnable tower. What safety it procures to thy soul! what deadly blows are thence aimed at thy spiritual foes! From thy well stored magazine, whence saints, the most valiant, have in every age been supplied, what divine armour it furnishes thee with, to resist every temptation, slay every lust, repel every doubt, endure every trouble, and conquer the world!—In the church, ministers, who are above others in station, are notably adorned with gifts and grace; are closely connected with me their head; bear my name before, and are the instruments of uniting others to me, and of conveying from me spiritual nourishment to them,—as towers are high raised, upright, steady, and strong; and watch over and improve the whole armour of God, for the defence and honour of his church.—The inspired oracles too, so gloriously adorned with various forms of truth; so useful to bring sinners to, and unite them with my person as their head, and to convey my fulness to their soul, are a high, impregnable storehouse of spiritual armour, sufficient to repel every enticement to sin, mortify every deed of the body, defend every truth, and thoroughly furnish for every good word and work.

Verse 5. In my sight, the lively exercise of thy faith and love, and thy tender care to edify others;—things harmonious, pleasant, and amiable, useful to saints, but ruinous to Satan,—exceedingly add to thy comeliness.

—Nor, in the church are pastors and teachers, or the Old and New Testament, or the gospel-institutions solemn and ordinary, or the two sacraments, from all which as breasts, my children suck the sincere milk of my word, unornamental; they are harmonious, comely, pleasant, profitable to saints; but hated of Satan, and ruinous to his interests.

Verse 6. Until the day of the gospel dispensation dawn, and ceremonial shadows flee away; nay, till the bright morning of glory dawn, and every shadow of corruption, weakness, and doubting; every shadow of desertion, temptation, and trouble, and of unsubstantial enjoyments, and instituted ordinances, flee away, never to return, will I, according to thy request (chap. xvii.) with pleasure dwell in, and continue to discover my glory, in the lofty, the protecting, and immovable, in the wholesome, the fruitful, and devoted mount of my church, and the ordinances therein dispensed; and which, by the graces therein exercised, and service performed, but chiefly by the influence of my righteousness and intercession, is rendered delightful and fragrant, as with myrrh and frankincense.

Verse 7. In respect of thy complete justification, in respect of the extent of thy sanctification, and in thy disallowment of remaining defilement, and thy labour to perfect holiness in the fear of God, art thou, dear object of my love, all fair, beautiful, and comely; there is no spot of legal guilt on thy person, no reigning sin or allowed gulf in thy heart, no hated stain, that shall not be quickly purged out.—And is not the church altogether fair and comely, in her doctrine, her worship, and order? is not the shining conversation of her members, glorious and beautiful?

Verse 8. Beloved soul, chosen from eternity, wooed by the gospel, and espoused to me in the day of my power, in promising, thou shalt, I solemnly invite thee to come with me, with me, thy great, thy gracious, and unmatched father, brother, and husband; with me, thy God, and thine ALL; come, without delay come, live the safe, delightful, and profitable life of faith on me; the life of intimate fellowship with me, and of holy obedience to me;—earnestly study a holy deadness to, and distance from the lofty, the alluring heights of outward honour, pleasure, and profit; where corrupt, brutish, cruel, and violent men rest and satisfy themselves: and by means whereof, sinful lusts and temptations often ruin their precious and immortal souls.

Verse 9. Dear saint, begotten and adopted by my Father; sanctified, though with inferior glory, by my own Spirit; and betrothed to me in loving kindness and tender mercies; how, even with the weakest act of thy faith, and with the exercise of that chain of graces which attend it, hast thou claimed, attracted, and encouraged my heart! how coupled mine affection to, and drawn forth my warmest love towards thee!

Verse 10. Beloved relation and bride, how excellent, glorious, and comely, is thy love to me, and to my members! how much more delightful and acceptable, than ceremonial offerings, or outward enjoyments!—

and thy beautifying, softening, medicinal ointment of grace, how far preferable to Mosaic incense, or ravishing outward delights!

Verse 11. How thy private prayer, thy praise, thy confession of my name, and thy spiritual converse for the instruction, comfort, or reproof of others; and thy prudent, sincere, and edifying conversation, mark the reality of thy grace! How freely, gradually, constantly, and readily, from thy own faith and experience, dost thou communicate to others, the sweet, the enlightening, the nourishing, and medicinal truths of the gospel!—how infinitely fragrant are thy garments of imputed righteousness!—nor doth thy holy and benevolent practice fail to spread a savour of Christ all around, to attract and gain others to him.

Verse 12—14. My church is a garden inclosed, separated from the world, digged by gospel ministrations, watered with divine truths and influences; distinguished into various stations, and worshipping assemblies; protected and hedged by the care of my providence, and by the rules of order contained in my word:—in her alone do run the pure, the medicinal, and cleansing waters of gospel truth, which are hid from the rest of the world, and in their spiritual glory, and refreshful virtue, shut up from, and sealed to every one, who is not a true member.—How, when purged of wicked and scandalous men, her converts to God, planted in Jesus, do flourish, more fragrant, delightful, precious, and useful, more numerous and inferent in circumstance, than all the fruit-bearing trees, fruits, and spices of an orchard!—And thou, particular saint, my sister, my spouse, (ver. 6, 9.) as a garden inwardly digged by my Spirit, sown with my word, hedged by my power and law, guarded by thy gracious vigilance, watered by the heavenly dew, and flourishing with various graces, and fruitful in good works, art reserved for, and walked in, by me alone:—in purity, freshness, safety, and separation from polluted persons, doctrines, or acts, how, as a spring shut up and fountain sealed, thou art unknown to the world, shut up from Satan, kept chaste, and pure, for conjugal fellowship with me alone!—And, in value, variety, beauty, and usefulness, how thy budding knowledge, faith, repentance, and love, thy humility, brotherly kindness, temperance, meekness, zeal, and similar graces, resemble the precious pomegranates, fruits, and spices of a choice orchard!

BELIEVER.

Verse 15. Blessed Jesus! uncreated FOUNTAIN! whose it is to run in, and water all the churches, and every true member thereof, and to supply them with every necessary promise and influence; Oh! what a deep, a large, a full and overflowing source of ever-running, of life-producing, life-maintaining, life-restoring, and life-perfecting virtue art thou! how freely, how abundantly, and delightfully, how variously, constantly, and powerfully dost thou communicate thy precious truths, and thy gracious influences, to men!—To thee, Lord, I owe my whole fruitfulness; O run more plentifully into my soul, that by the exercise of thy grace, I may be rendered useful to water and refresh others around!

Verse 16. And, Lord, since I am thy garden, thine by thy ancient choice, by thy Father's gift, and by thy costly purchase, thy gracious cultivation, and special use, let every freezing and destructive blast of trouble, temptation, or fear, be restrained from blowing on and hurting my soul; and may the blessed Spirit, in his sovereign and mysterious, his invisible and powerful manner, convince me of, reprove me for, and embitter my sin; cool, pierce, and purify my conscience; quiet, comfort, warm, and melt my heart; revive, cherish, strengthen, and cause to flourish in good works, my languishing grace!—and do thou, Jesus, my dear husband, master, and friend, come, dwell in, and more gloriously discover thyself to thy church, and to my soul,—rejoice over me, to do me good; grant me the nearest, and most delightful intimacy with thee; accept of, and take pleasure in these my various gracious and amiable habits and acts, whose author, proprietor, and object, thou art.

CHAPTER V.

CHRIST.

Verse 1. At thy request, dear soul, who art spiritually begotten by my Father's will, and united to my glorious person, I am speedily come, to bestow my distinguished and powerful presence on my church; to delight myself in the lively preaching, and gracious application of my sweet, fresh, nourishing, restorative, medicinal, and emboldening gospel-truth:—in respect of sensible presence, I am come to thy soul; and with pleasure to cultivate, and accept of thy spiritual graces, weak or strong:—and solemnly I charge, and earnestly invite you, O highly favoured objects of my everlasting love and distinguished care, to receive abundantly from me, and to rejoice in the unsearchable fulness of grace and glory lodged in me, and to take the comfort of your inward grace as evidential of your election and everlasting felicity.

BELIEVER.

Verse 2. How often does Jesus, my glorious bridegroom, find churches almost wholly asleep, when he cometh to bless them; and when by his gospel institutions, and diversified providences, he knocks for admission!—And when, at my earnest cry, he graciously offered me his sensible presence, such was my spiritual deadness, my dulness, confusion, and sloth, my carnality and deep unconcern, that contrary to conviction of guilt, contrary to thoughts about, and stirrings of affection towards him; and while I could not but hear and feel his mighty, his charming voice, make a powerful and repeated impression on my heart, tenderly entreating me, by the endearing characters of his SISTER, his LOVE, his DOVE, his UNDEFILED, (chap. iv. 9. i. 9. ii. 10, 14. and iv. 7.) and earnestly beseeching me to open it to him, by a lively acting of faith upon him, a vigorous exercise of ardent love towards him, and a solemn and familiar pouring out of my requests and desires before him;—and obtesting me, by his infinite love, in cheerfully undertaking for, and, in my room, bearing the numerous, dreadful, destructive drops of his Father's wrath; and in patiently enduring so manifold affronts and injuries, while he waited to be gracious to my soul.

Verse 3. Alas! I refused HIM admission; I shifted him off, with the most absurd excuse, importing, that I now possessed not my wonted liveliness of frame; had lost my wonted skill and care to improve him as my righteousness, and to perform any part of my duty; and that I had decreased in my knowledge and sense of gospel-principles, these spiritual shoes; and was weary of, and averse to every gracious exercise, and could not presently persuade or stir up myself thereto.

Verse 4. While I practically returned this wretched reply to his heart-charming, his astonishingly gracious and condescending entreaty; he, secretly, but powerfully quickened my faith, touched my heart, awakened my affection, and filled me with inward agony, grief, and shame, for my sinful refusal, and with a hungry and earnest desire after renewed and sensible fellowship with him.

Verse 5. Hereupon I shook off my deadness and sloth, and bitterly repented of my slighting HIM. Receiving influence from him, my faith, my love, and every grace, in the most easy, agreeable, and fragrant manner, exerted themselves to remove ignorance, pride, unconcern, and such other evils as had obstructed his ready access to my heart.

Verse 6. Eagerly I acted faith upon his promise; I panted with desire towards him; I lifted up my cry for sensible fellowship with him; but to punish and embitter my formal refusal; to humble my soul; to endear his presence; to try and exercise my grace; to inflame my love, he had justly, had quickly and fearfully withdrawn, and refused to grant me the smiles, or the powerful influence of his distinguished visit. At the remembrance of his kind invitation, and my worse than mad rejection thereof, my soul was thrown into a dreadful damp of confusion and fear, of grief and shame, and with supplication, strong cries, and tears, I sought him, but found no appearance of his sensible favours: with my whole heart and soul I begged his gracious return, but he gave me no comfortable answer. (Chap. iii. 1, 2.)

Verse 7. When ministers, whose office it is to oversee, guard, guide, and comfort the church; to observe and watch against spiritual enemies, and warn men of their approach; touched my case in their public ministrations, they but rased my hopes and increased my anguish; when I privately informed them of my case, they upbraided me with my sinful miscarriage; they misconstrued my desire of a meeting with Christ, and discouraged my expectation thereof; or, they robbed me of the comfort of my justifying veil of righteousness, and put me upon legal and unsuccessful methods to regain my beloved: some imposed on my conscience the superstitious commanding of men: while others reproached me as a hypocrite, and ridiculed me as one whimsical and deprived of reason.

Verse 8. Thus abused by pastors ignorant and unfaithful, I turn to you, my fellow, though younger professors; earnestly I beseech, and solemnly I charge and adjure you, that, if the blessed Jesus whom my soul loveth, grant you any view of his glory, any taste of his goodness, you will spread my case before him, and with eagerness remonstrate to him, not that men, that ministers have injured me; but that I languish and pine with pain, with vexation and grief, for want of, and with earnest longing, and burning desire to enjoy his sensible presence;—and that my soul must quickly perish if he return not in love.

COMPANION.

Verse 9. Distressed, but precious and lovely saint, how thy charge excites and animates our heart, to wish further knowledge of Jesus, thy so prized husband! What! oh! what transcendent excellency is in this beloved of thy soul, above what can be found in the lusts and pleasures of sin! in the profits, the honours, delights, and applause of this world! or in near and beloved relations! or at least in our own life, and inward endowments! What, oh! what peculiar loveliness, glory, and fulness is in HIM, that thou dost so charge and intreat us concerning him!

BELIEVER.

Verse 10. Mention nothing as comparable to my infinitely endearing Husband and Saviour: Oh! his boundless and all comprehending excellency! He is white and ruddy: white in his glorious divinity, ruddy in his suffering humanity; white in the holiness of his human nature, and obedience of his life; ruddy in his bloody passion and death; white in his glorious exaltation, but ruddy in his humbled debasement; white in his mercy and love towards his people, ruddy in his wrath and vengeance against his enemies; and in every respect the miracle of beauty, the wonder of angels, the ravishment of saints, the delight of JEHOSHAPHAT.—How infinitely more kind, rich, pleasant, glorious, excellent, and comely, than all the ten thousands of created beings in heaven or earth!—and is he not the standard-bearer, who subdues the nations to the obedience of himself, and whom thousands and myriads of angels and saints follow and fight under!

Verse 11. His Godhead, his authority and government of his church, and his being the head of influence to his people, how much more excellent, precious, pure, substantial, and glorious! how much more useful, enriching, unchangeable and lasting, than gold the most solid and shining!—his numerous, his well-connected purposes and providences, how comely, mysterious, majestic, and awful!—his whole glory, and even the well-joined multitudes of saints rooted and grounded in him as their head, how ever comely, fresh, and unfading!

Verse 12. His all-seeing knowledge, his tender pity and care, how pure, penetrating, pleasant, and beautiful! how attentively he waits to show mercy! With what deep compassion his lovely eyes run to and fro through the whole earth, to show himself strong in behalf of them that fear him! how fixed were his heart and eyes on the fulness of time for his incarnation! constantly they attend to the fulness of virtue in himself, to communicate the same to the fulness of his body the church!

Verse 13. The manifestations of his courage, of his glory and grace, and of his condescension and love, exhibited in word and ordinances, how delightful, attracting, reviving, and refreshing!—His glorious words, how pure, mild, glorious, fragrant, and fruitful!—Attended by the influence of his Spirit, how gently, how gradually, how seasonably and incessantly they drop into our heart, spiritual virtue, refreshing, quickening, purifying, and pleasant!

Verse 14. His munificent liberality, his unbounded power, his mighty works, especially of our redemption, how astonishingly large, or numerous! and how perfect, resolute, and glorious! and how encouraging, medicinal, and marvellous their virtue!—His secret purposes of love, his tender bowels of compassion, his sympathizing intercession, how precious, pure, sincere, firm, and durable! how strengthening and attractive the virtue!

Verse 15. His strength to uphold all things, to bear the weight of the new covenant, and of all our persons, our sins, our punishment, our salvation, our burdens, our cares; and of all the government and glory of his Father's house, how firm, lasting, and divine! his paths in undertaking for us; in assuming our nature, and fulfilling our righteousness; in walking in the churches; in converting, correcting, and helping his people, and in trampling down his enemies, how mysterious, skillfully contrived, and founded on Godhead!—His whole personage, office, relation, and every manifestation thereof, how elevated, amiable, fragrant, refreshing, fruitful, and last! g!

Verse 16. His voice, his word, the sensible communications of his love, the breathings of his Spirit, the power of his intercession, how transcendently sweet and delightful! In fine, HE, the unmatched Jesus; HE, my inexhaustible subject, in his person, natures, names and offices, and in his relations, qualities, and works; and in his undertaking, birth, life, death; in his resurrection, ascension; and in his appearance in the presence of God for us, his dealing in the gospel with us, and at last coming in the clouds to judge devils and men, is altogether lovely, desirable, and glorious. Every lovely excellency in heaven and earth he contains to the highest; infinitely he deserves, and by all that know him, will be be earnestly coveted, as the best, as the sum of all things excellent and valuable. THIS, my fellow-professors, THIS, THIS amazing Lord, is the beloved of my soul, and my kind, liberal, condescending, and everlasting friend, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

CHAPTER VI.

COMPANION.

Verse 1. Thrice amiable and happy saint, now we believe and are persuaded of the transcendent excellency of thy darling Redeemer: now our hearts are attracted with the thoughts of his glory.—Whither, O whither is THY—(oh could we say OUR)—unmatched Jesus gone? Inform us in what ordinance, in what manner is he to be found, that, with ardent longing, we may cry after, wait for, and seek him with thee.

BELIEVER.

Verse 2. My lovely and dear Bridegroom hath indeed deserted my soul; but I certainly know, that, in infinite condescension, he employs himself in his church, (chap. v. 1.) chiefly in those worshipping assemblies and hearts where his people's graces are most vigorous and active; that he may convert, discover his glory to, give his Spirit, and confer more abundant grace and comfort on, rejoice over, and delight in his chosen lilies, and at last transport them to the celestial race.

Verse 3. Notwithstanding his hiding and frowns, I cannot but highly value his person, offices, relations, and way; cannot but boldly and humbly attempt to maintain and assert my special interest in him: in the firm faith that he is MINE, divinely made over to me in his new-covenant promise and grant, I solemnly surrender my person and my all to him; my soul and body to be saved; my sins to be forgiven and destroyed; my burdens and cares to be borne; and my gifts, graces, and outward enjoyments, to be managed by him to his honour.—Nor, desert me as he will, shall I allow myself to discredit his feeding himself among his people, delighting in, and rejoicing over them, to do them good. Chap. ii. 16.

CHRIST.

Verse 4. Beloved soul, betrothed to me in the day of my power, now, after much pleased beholding of thy carriage in my absence, I return to vouchsafe thee my sensible presence: nor, in my sight, art thou less precious and honourable than ever.—My church is more delightfully situated, more beautiful in form than Tirzah, the residence of Hebrew monarchs: and in compactness, safety, beauty, freedom, and enjoyment of the presence and worship of God, more comely than Jerusalem; and, with spiritual armour and majestic air, more terrible than an army with banners; and, in my view, how far, blessed soul, thou excellest in comeliness, these beautiful cities! With what joy and pleasure have I beheld thy faith and love boldly defend thy heart for me, against every attempt of corruption, every attempt of devils or men! With what transporting delights have I suffered myself to be overcome with thy fervent prayers!

Verse 5—7. How divinely transported, how sweetly delighted, with the eager actings of thy faith and love towards me, amidst hiding and absence!—Now, returned, I solemnly assure thee, thy holy thoughts, and gracious exercise, thy unfeigned and operative faith, thy spiritual meditation thy regular and active zeal, thy humility and self-abasement, together with every thing belonging to my church, are of me esteemed as comely and precious as ever. (Chap. iv. 9, 1—3.)

Verse 8, 9. My true church alone, how choice and valuable! how preferable to all the nations, the gay assemblies, and the different sects upon earth! and how much approved by their inmost conscience!—In her, are saints habitually honoured with my distinguished fellowship; others more legal in temper, and rarely admitted to my sensible presence; others indeed justified, washed, sincere, holy and humble, but merely commencing a religious course.—In me they are all ONE; are the only true and choice members and children of my church, each born from above: saints of every size, wish well to, pray for, affectionately love, truly esteem, and highly commend them.—And thou, ransomed soul, in mine eyes, how much more comely, amiable and delightful, than every beauty of palaces, or of blooming youth! how graciously chosen, choice, chaste, spotless, and meek! nor can any acquainted with thy comeliness, fail to bless, commend, and extol thee.

Verse 10. With admiring applause, to which I assent, and which I confirm, they cried out, 'What marvellous church is this! which, in the patriarchal age, shone forth as the rising morn! which, in the Messianic, shewed fair with a moon-like brightness of ceremonies, all illuminated of Jesus her Sun! which, in the Christian æra, chiefly in the happy millennium, shines clear as the sun, ascending his zenith! and which strikes solemn dread upon persecutors, and others around!—And what marvellous persons are these, who, turned from darkness to light, do, in their gracious state, and exercise, as the morning light, shine pleasant and fresh, going on to perfection! and who, in borrowed and imperfect holiness, show fair as the changing moon! and who, in their imputed righteousness, shine clear as the meridian sun! and armed with the whole armour of God, wisely and bravely war with sin, Satan, and the world! and by the awe of their holy life, and their regular reproofs, are terrible as an army with banners.'

Verse 11. Even while my sensible visits were withdrawn, I promoted thy joy and welfare: eagerly I employed myself working salvation, for the divinely planted, the heaven pruned, watered, and weeded, and fruitful garden of my church; where grow, and are ripened for bliss, my poor, hidden, well-protected and covered, my oft bruised and broken, but inwardly rich and glorious saint: there I observed the holy fruits of lowly, debased, and oppressed souls, observed if my cone-like people increased in numbers, in gifts, graces, and good works; and if, as lofty, upright, fruitful pomegranates, planted in a rich soil, they, with much humility and self-denial, blossomed, and brought forth abundantly, the fruits of righteousness, precious, fragrant, savoury, and useful:—and secretly I observed an esteem of, a love to, and desire after me, growing in thy afflicted and sorrowful heart.

Verse 12. Often all of a sudden, I bring salvation to my chosen people, who, in the day of my power, are made willing to forego sin, self-righteousness, worldly enjoyments, and wicked men, and to serve me, and take up my cross: and who, endowed with a princely disposition, are qualified to sit and reign with me on my throne:—all of a sudden, divinely delighted with thy exercise of faith, love, repentance, and prayer, during my absence; my warmest affection, my yearning bowels of compassion, effectually determined me triumphantly, quickly, and royally, to come, support, save, and comfort thee; granting thee the end of thy faith and hope, and the return of thy prayer.

Verse 13. True daughter of the church; perfect in thy head, in his righteousness imputed, and in the extent of thy sanctification; possessed of peace with God and thy conscience; endowed with a peaceful disposition, and entitled to unceasing quiet, in the regions of light, am I returned to thy soul? Return then, return, in more spirited acts of faith and love, of earnest desire and penitential grief, of humble blushing and holy boldness, that I, my Father, and blessed Spirit, with holy angels, and regenerated men, may look upon, and be delighted with observing thy glories, graces, and labours.—Ask not what thing valuable or pleasant is to be seen in thyself, or the church: for, how ravishing and delightful to behold Jews and gentiles gathered into one body of saints! to behold divine persons, perfections, and holy angels, surround and protect thee! to behold thy heavenly graces and holy duties stand mustered in battle-array, valiantly fighting with spiritual foes, and thrashing down these accursed mountains, and treading them under thy feet!

CHAPTER VII.

CHRIST.

Verse 1. In respects unnumbered, how glorious the sight! My princely and heaven-born church, how adorned with ministers fully furnished with the preparation of the gospel of peace, and intrepid and prompt to spread the messages of sovereign love!—how adorned with young converts, anew formed by the manifold power and wisdom of God!—And thou, blessed soul, begotten of God, and heiress of heaven, how beautifully are thy acts of faith, thy gracious affections, and holy conversation, founded on, and instigated by the free, the honourable, the preserving, and emboldening doctrines and motives of the glorious gospel!—how delightful is thy ready and cheerful willingness and progress in evangelic holiness! and every principle and first motion of thy new nature, how exquisitely curious, framed by the Spirit of wisdom and knowledge!

Verse 2. In my church, how complete! how curiously formed, capacious of gospel-truth, and furnished with pure and purifying influence, are her pastors and ordinances, which, in the midst thereof, possess an exalted station, and contribute much to her vigour and health! and how glorious, numerous, substantial, and fruitful, as a heap of wheat set about with lilies, her converts quickly become!—And, blessed soul, how large, extensive, and richly supplied with heavenly influence, are thy gracious exercises, and ardent desires, which, in thy present state, convey in thy spiritual nourishment! By spiritual digestion of my word, how is thy inner man nourished, and rendered fruitful in good works; pure, solid, and comely, and rendered an honourable instrument to promote the heavenly birth and gracious edification of others!

Verse 3. The church's breasts of divine testaments, ordinances, sacraments, and ministers, singularly add to her beauty and use:—thy faith in and love to me and my people, and thy well ordered endeavours to quicken, comfort, nourish, and refresh others with the sincere milk of the word, how much more comely and delightful than twin-roses, which feed among lilies!

Verse 4. My church, how ornamented with the precious and impregnable fort of the scripture; and by her officers, who, like a tower of ivory, are pure in the faith, strong in the grace, confirmed in the truth, and set for the defence of the gospel:—and who, as fish-pools, have clear views of the mysteries of Christ, are full of his blessing, constant in adherence to truth, and quiet in conversation, and are a blessing to others unnumbered—and who, like a rose and tower of Lebanon, looking towards Damascus, sagaciously discern, watch against, and briskly oppose, chiefly, her principal enemies!—And, believer, how adorned art thou with the glorious, the impregnable, and all-defending grace of faith, which unites thy soul to myself! how adorned with clear, distinct, pure, self-searching, and repentance-producing spiritual knowledge! how adorned with a gracious sagacity to discern good from evil, and with prudent zeal, bold courage, and exact vigilance against every spiritual danger and foe, chiefly predominant lusts, sins, and temptations, which often and easily beset thee!

Verse 5. In the church, my being thy suffering surety, thy king, husband, and glorious fruitful head of influence; and my making every soul and grace rooted and growing up in me, partakers of my bleeding atonement and royal greatness; how much it adds to thy comeliness!—And thy crowning grace of hope, supported by faith as a neck; how embued with my blood! how high, towering, heavenly, and fruitful! thy prospect of divine and eternal things, how wide and delightful! Thy numerous hair-like thoughts, and even most inconceivable acts of life, springing therefrom, how actuated by my bleeding kindness! and how royal! majestic!—With thy extensive comeliness, thy lively faith in, ardent love to, and raised esteem of my person and fullness, thy godly sorrow for past offences, thy ardent desire, and humble prayer for, and holy fear of losing, my sensible visits, and I the King eternal, immortal, invisible, so divinely delighted and enamoured,—and by my infinite love, and by my unblemished faithfulness to God, and thy soul, so powerfully determined, that with pleasure and joy, I must abide, walk and feast with thee and thy fellow saints, in the magnificent, delightful, lofty, and lightsome, galleries, and ordinances of my grace.

Verse 6. Dear object of my distinguished, my redeeming love, and ardent lover of my person,—in my sight, how inexpressibly pure, agreeable, amiable, and comely, art thou! and with what transporting pleasure I rejoice over, and delight to do thee good!

Verse 7. Thy whole frame and stature of grace, rooted in me, and under my warming rays, and amid the heaviest pressures of trouble, how high grown, upright, precious, and comely! how incorruptible, ever living, peace-speaking, victorious! how flourishing and fruitful in a most sweet and nonrishing product! thy life and fructifying virtue, how mysteriously derived from thy head!—from the breast of ministers, scriptures, ordinances, and sacraments, how plentifully thy soul extracts my heavenly influence, fresh, exhilarating, and strengthening!—thy endeavours to retain me amid the embraces of thy faith and love, and to edify others around, with gracious speech, and holy conversation, how delightful, nonrishing, and useful!

Verse 8. In my ancient counsel, I pur-posed, in my faithful word I promised, to abide with, and to display my glory, and communicate my grace to, and in arms of everlasting love to embrace thee, and every true member of my church.—And now that I signally do so, now ought, and shall, ministers, scriptures, ordinances, sacraments, heavenly influence, and thy private endeavours to edify others, be eminently nourishing, strengthening, and effectual to the welfare of souls: now ought, and shall, thy faith and love, thy spiritual desire and delight be efficacious, refreshing, and pleasant to my heart: now shall the faithful preaching of the gospel, the agreeable character of church members, and their spiritual sagacity to discern good from evil, with their fervent prayers, these tokens of soundness in a church's constitution, or of newness of nature, and liveliness in religion, be more savoury and pleasant than mellowed apples.

Verse 9. Not only shalt thou breathe after, and relish the best spiritual nourishment, but thy speech, thy prayers, praises, and holy conference, and the ministrations, of the gospel with thee, shall turn upon me as thy subject and end:—how my soul acquiesces in their tendency to honour, and delight thee, beloved Saviour!—and how rousing, quickening, restoring, strengthening and refreshing to the dead, drowsy, and insensible, to the weak, slothful, and inactive members of my church.

BELIEVER.

Verse 10. What, blessed Jesus, am I, a worthless and vile monster in myself, to be thus commended, exalted, and favoured by thee!—Before God, angels, and men, I profess, that by thy grace alone, I am what I am, in comeliness, value, or use: I call heaven and earth to record, that I gratefully surrender my whole self, and all I have, to thee as my Saviour, my covenant-head, my everlasting husband, my master, my God, and my ALL IN ALL:—and that I believe, admire, delight in, and am satisfied with,
and boast of thine early, ardent, almighty, everlasting, thy free, costly, marvellous, and often-manifested, redeeming love to my soul.

Verse 11. O thrice worthy darling of my soul, come, fulfil my desires in the powerful spread of the gospel in every country, the basest and most idolatrous on earth not excepted; let me have intimate fellowship with thee, in the word and ordinances of thy grace; draw my heart entirely aside from this vain distracting world; rest it wholly on thyself; grant me retired, abiding, refreshful, and ravishing enjoyment of thee,
as my God, my exceeding joy.

Verse 12. Come to my soul, seasonably, quickly, and powerfully! and with me review the state and condition of thy church; enable me to pour forth and graciously answer my earnest requests, for the saints weak or strong. (Chap. ii. 13. and vi. 11.)
—Assist me to examine the condition of my various, self-denied, fragrant, fruitful, and useful graces, and to pour out my requests in relation thereto; and, by thine almighty influence, cause them to flourish, blossom, and bring forth good works. (chap. iv. 13, 14.) Then all inflamed with thy kindness, and burning with love to thee, shall my inward powers desire, delight in, and boast of thee; shall surrender myself to thy service, and more and more bring forth the flowers and fruits of holiness to the praise of thy glory.

Verse 13. Lord Jesus, defer not the special manifestations of thy grace! Nay, surely thou hast begun to vouchsafe them;
for thy meek, amiable, fragrant, and savoury, thy pacific, love-exciting, and fruit-bearing (though sometimes sleepy and slothful) saints begin to flourish, and spread their heavenly influence:—the medicinal, heart-cooling, love-producing, fructifying, and delightful (though alas! sometimes occasionally sleeping) doctrines of thy gospel, become, to many, a savour of life unto life: the various and lovely flowers or fruits of grace in our soul, blossom, flourish, ripen for glory, and spread abroad a sweet savour of thee;— and for thy service and honour, thrice beloved Jesus, are many promises, doctrines, and blessings of the gospel of peace, laid up in our heart; and various, and much diversified exercises of grace and acts of holiness, are plainly and openly brought forth in our conduct.

CHAPTER VIII.

BELIEVER.

Verse 1. Oh! when shall God mercifully vouchsafe that blessed period, when thou, adored Saviour, descending from thy Father's bosom and throne, shalt assume our debased nature, become a member of our visible church, and walk among us in the likeness of sinful flesh!—Oh! for that happy day when I shall enjoy thy most familiar intercourse, in the ordinances of thy grace!
how boldly then, chiefly to estranged sinners of the gentiles, should I spread and publish thy fame!—how publicly should I profess my love, my reverence, my obedience and subjection to thy glorious Self! None should have reason to condemn my choice of a husband, or upbraid my barrenness in good works; nor should I regard contempt or reproach for thy sake: as, in the issue, God, angels, and men, should esteem me truly honoured, and wise unto salvation.

Verse 2. By the effectual fervent prayer of faith, should I obtain thy powerful presence in the ordinances bestowed on my mother the church: eagerly should I spread thy renown, and bear thy fame through the world; eagerly should thy ministers, and chiefly thyself, teach me my duty; and mightily shouldst thou be delighted with the spirited exercises of my grace, and with my abounding in holiness.

Verse 3. Ardently my soul pants for the nearest fellowship with Christ: and surely, had I obtained it, I should be at once supported and ravished therewith.—Already, how have the thoughts of his coming in the flesh, of his coming in the Spirit, and at last coming in the clouds to save me, and the views of his excellency, the intimations and embraces of his love, enraptured all my powers!—By the promises, displays, and influences thereof, how sweetly refreshed, how mightily upheld is my inner man! (chap. ii. 6.)

Verse 4. Having once more regained this delightful intimacy, this ravishing fellowship with Jesus, solemnly I re-adjure, and re-charge you, his professed friends, and children of the true church, that you give it no interruption: for, why, oh! why, should you in the least provoke HIM, the quintessence of kindness, this all-lovely Redeemer, to withdraw his sensible presence from my soul? Chap. ii. 7. and iii. 5.

COMPANION.

Verse 5. What distinguished, what happy soul, is this? who, from the barren, destitute, and entangling, the comfortless, dangerous and pathless desert of an unregenerate state, of a present evil world, and of remaining ignorance, unbelief, tribulation, temptation, and carnal care, gradually and deliberately mounts heavenward, in fervent desire, spiritual mindedness, and holy employs; all along directed by, depending on, drawing virtue from, and delightfully solacing herself in Jesus her beloved!

BELIEVER.

Let no created person or thing disturb me; let no commendation of me, an insignificant, a sinful worm, tickle my pride. Thou, Jesus, hast ingrossed all my thought, all my attention. Protected and refreshed by thy shadow, O blessed apple-tree! revived and invigorated with the sweet fruits of thy unnumbered benefits, and all actuated by thee, with what fervent prayers, lively faith, and flaming desire have I stirred thee up graciously to relieve, refresh, and enrapture my soul:—In this manner the Old Testament saints travailed as in birth, for thine incarnation.—In this manner, faithful pastors, and zealous believers, travail as in birth, till thou art formed in men's heart, and till thou return in the clouds.—In this manner, every person in whose heart thou art formed by faith, mourns for thine absence, and travails as in birth, for thy sensible visits.

Verse 6. Oh! what inexpressible nearness to Jesus! what entrancing discoveries of redeeming love! what countless numbers, and unbounded measures of spiritual blessings, saving mercies—my enlarged soul pants for!—Oh! to be an unmatched debtor to, object and wonder of, endless and almighty love:—Oh! to be incessantly remembered in thy all-prevalent intercession, and to have thy whole power and providence shine forth, distinguished, unbounded, and eternal kindness to my soul!—Oh! to lie for ever in thy bosom, having all my powers melted in thy love to me, and burning with mine towards thee!—So vehement, so irresistible is my self-conquering, my all-conquering affection; so strong, ardent, and extensive is my desire, that nothing but the full, the everlasting fruition of thy infinite and all-lovely Self can satisfy it! If this be withheld,—I must dissolve and die of love! Not long can my mortal frame support these sweetly ponderous loads of bliss! these sweetly violent shocks of panting for my God!—My flaming ardour to enjoy thee, my holy jealousy, my impatience of thy delay, and my fear of disappointment, how they engross, and, as the grave, swallow up every thought! how likely to unninge my constitution, and waste my soul!—With what inexpressible pleasure and force do the flames of my love, as of a fire kindled on JEHOVAH's altar, and as of a fire kindled by JEHOVAH's, by Jesus' infinite kindness, warm and melt all my inward powers!—consume and burn up my corruptions, my carnal cares!

Verse 7. Adored Immanuel! if the many waters of my insignificance, my distance, and unworthiness: the overwhelming floods of my surprising guilt, pollution, rebellion; or of unmix'd divine wrath, Satanic temptation, and sufferings innumerable, to be endured in my stead, could not quench thy flaming love to me!—why then should the many waters of affliction, or divine withdrawal, quench my love to thee? How can the roaring, the outrageous floods of ungodly men, of violent persecution, of horrid temptation, of heart-breaking hardship and reproach, or of legal terror, or raging lust, drown and destroy it? Were all the gold, the wealth, the enjoyments of creation offered as a bribe, a price, for my utmost love, how should my soul contemn, startle at, and abhor the infernal proposal!

Verse 8. But, blessed Jesus! while I enjoy thy favour, and possess thy grace, how many of thy chosen ones, of the same mystical body with us, are among the unhappy gentiles, destitute of the gospel-breasts of scriptures, ordinances, sacraments, and ministers! how many, whether Jews or gentiles, are unconverted, destitute of the breasts of faith, love, holy desire, or edifying influence, and altogether unripe for a spiritual marriage with thee! how, Lord, should I promote their effectual calling! and what wilt thou do for them, in the time appointed for their spiritual espousals to thee, and gracious reconciliation to God!

CHRIST.

Verse 9. Since their salvation is firmly, is unchangeably fixed in my decree; since, in due time, their persons shall be united to me as their sure foundation, and rendered impregnable against every effort of hell and earth, I, my Father, and blessed Spirit, will build them into a glorious and unfailling church! will build them up in holiness; endow them with manifold gifts and graces, pure, precious, shining, and useful, and render them a firm tower, and beautiful temple, and palace for God.—And when the door of faith shall be opened to them, and their hearts opened to receive me and my fulness, we, notwithstanding of their insignificance, weakness, troubles, and temptations, will thoroughly beautify, strengthen, and protect them.

BELIEVER.

Verse 10. Blessed Redeemer! the fulfilment of thy promise is sufficiently pledged. Thy church is a wall composed of lively stones, built on thee, their sure foundation; she is firmly compacted and established in the faith; is safely protected by thy power and providence: is adorned with breasts and towers of well furnished scriptures, ordinances, sacraments, and ministers; and is highly favoured of thee, with precious blessings unnumbered.—And I, being by faith rooted and grounded in thee, firmly built up in thy truths, preserved by thy power, and established in thy way, refreshed and nourished by the breasts of the church, and fashioned with the towering breasts of well-grown faith, love, holy desire, and useful influence;—how highly have I been regarded of thee! and by thy favour and fellowship, how made to increase in every good principle and action!

Verse 11. Jesus, my wealthy, wise, and glorious Prince of peace, has chosen, has asked, and received of his Father; has purchased with his blood, has planted and purified by his grace; has sown with his word; and protects and manages by his providence, the vineyard of his church; and by convincing, enlightening, sanctifying, and comforting influence, renders her noted in the number of saints, and the multitude of graces and good works.—This vineyard he has committed to the care and management of gospel-ministers; every one of whom is obliged diligently to watch over, carefully to water with gospel-doctrine, and faithfully to weed and prune her, by reproofs, warnings, and censures;—and is obliged to support and strengthen the weak, protect the members from spiritual danger, and essay to make her fruitful in saints, and in works of righteousness, to the praise and glory of him to whom they must quickly give an account.

Verse 12. Under his eye and care is the whole vineyard of his church, and of every particular soul therein; and with joy and pleasure he inspects his ordinances, and saints.—And have not I, and every saint, in charge, the vineyard of our heart, to watch over, keep, and defend from temptation; to weed and purge from corruption; and so render fruitful in gracious habits and holy employments?—Thou, great Prince of peace, must have the chief honour and fruit thereof; and thy ministers and ordinances must have their subordinate share of my love and regard; and with the honour of winning souls, and of endless crowns, wilt thou reward thy servants, who are faithful to their trust.

CHRIST.

Verse 13. Blessed soul! who, to my honour, and to thy endless advantage, art a member of the worshipping assemblies of my militant church, and who dost, and shalt abide therein, and, with diligence and pleasure, labour in the work of thy station, and make an open profession of my name; how oft have thy fellow professors, sharers with thee in the same Saviour and covenant, and in the same graces, privileges, and sufferings, familiarly, and with delightful satisfaction, attended to thy voice, and been thereby instructed, edified, and refreshed!—Oh! till the day-spring of glory arise in its brightness, and every interposing shadow flee away, be frequent in addressing my throne with thy prayers and praises; and to our mutual delight, let a close correspondence and intimate fellowship be carried on betwixt us: be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication, let thy requests be made known to God.

BELIEVER.

Verse 14. Thrice lovely Immanuel, divine darling of my heart, requir'st, encourage'st thou, my frequent and familiar intercourse with Thyself? My whole soul complies.—Not only did Jewish believers ardently long and plead for thy coming in the flesh;—not only do I eagerly pant for thy coming in the power of thy Spirit, and the spread of the gospel among the nations around: but, oh! with proper speed, hasten every providence appointed for me, or for thy people on earth! hasten that ravishing period, when we shall be admitted to the royal mansions above! shall see thee as thou art, and know thee even as we are known; shall fully enjoy thee in all thy loveliness, in all the manifestations of thy redeeming love, and in thy marvellous victories over sin, Satan, and the world! and shall, with transporting and full satisfaction, feed upon thy person, righteousness, and fulness, in the glorious, fragrant, refreshing, and everlasting hills and heights of eternal felicity; where the odoriferous scent of thy nature, office, and work, shall for ever perfume the region, impart rapturous joy to every heart, angelic and human, and fill every mouth with triumphant hallelujahs of the highest praise.

SOOTHSAYER. See DIVINATION.

SOPE; a composition made of ashes and tallow, or of these and lime, and used for washing and whitening of cloth, and sometimes in medicine. Perhaps the Jewish BORITH was only the herb sopewort, or alum. Jesus Christ is likened to tailors' sope; as by his word, his Spirit, and blood, he purifies the world, and cleanses the souls of men. Mal. iii. 2. Men's endeavours to hide or dissemble their vices, or even their own attempts to forsake them, are called much sope. Jer. li. 22.

SORCERY; SORCERER. See DIVINATION.

SORE; (1.) Painful. 1 Kings xviii. 17. (2.) Very much; with much pain and grief

Isa. xxxviii. 3. Psal. lv. 4. A SORE is, (1.) A boil. Lev. xiii. 42. (2.) Any disease. Dent. xxviii. 59. (3.) A great calamity. Rev. xvi. 21. Men are sore, when pained with a wound. Gen. xxxiv. 25; or distressed with some calamity. Job v. 18. Putrefying sores are sins, and the punishments thereof, which tend to waste and ruin persons and nations. Isa. i. 6. Men know their own sore and grief, when they have a deep consciousness of their sins and miseries. 2 Chr. vi. 29.

SOREK; a brook that ran westward through the country of the Danites and Philistines. Judg. xvi. 4. Probably it had its name from the choice vines or yellow grapes which grew on the banks of it. Compare Gen. xlix. 11. Isa. v. 12. and Jer. ii. 21.

SORROW. See GRIEF.

SORT; (1.) Manner. 2 Cor. vii. 11. (2.) Kind. Psal. lxxviii. 45. (3.) Materials. Dent. xxii. 11.

SO-SI-PATER; a kinsman of Paul, and who sent his salutation to the Roman church. Rom. xvi. 21. Possibly he is the same as Sopater of Berea, who attended Paul part of the way from Corinth to Jerusalem. Acts xx. 4.

SOSTHENES, the chief ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth. When Gallio refused to hear the Jews' accusation against Paul, the Heathen Greeks severely beat Sosthenes before the tribunal. Acts xix. 12-19. Whether this Sosthenes was afterwards converted, and is the same who is called a brother by Paul, cannot be ascertained. 1 Cor. i. 1.

SOTTISH; quite ignorant, stupid, and foolish. Jer. lv. 22.

SOUL; signifies, (1.) That spiritual, rational, and immortal subsistence in men, which distinguishes them from beasts, and is the source of our thoughts and reasonings. Matt. x. 28; and so men's glory may be their soul. Psal. lvi. 8. Gen. xlix. 6. (2.) The whole human person, of which the soul is the principal part. Gen. xiv. 21. and xii. 5. (3.) Human life, which is begun by the infusion of the soul, and ceases by the departure of it. Psal. xxxiii. 19. and vii. 5. 1 Thess. ii. 8. (4.) Affection; desire: so Jonathan's soul was knit to the soul of David. 1 Sam. xviii. 1. When soul and spirit are joined, soul may denote the will and affections, and spirit may denote the understanding and conscience. 1 Thess. v. 23. Heb. iv. 12. (5.) Appetite; stomach. Prov. xxvii. 7. Job xxxiii. 20. Isa. xlix. 8. (6.) The Jews called dead bodies souls, because they were once the residence of the soul. Numb. ix. 16. and vi. 6. God's soul is himself, his nature, will, or delight. Jer. vi. 8. and v. 9. Isa. i. 14. Heb. x. 38. Christ's soul, which sets him on, or makes him like the chariots of Amminadab, is his ardent love to his people, which inclines him to regard their graces and prayers, and hasten to their relief. Sol. Song vi. 12. Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; thou wilt not detain my soul amid insupportable troubles, nor my body in the grave. Psal. xvi. 10. Antichrist trades in bodies and souls of men; in relics of dead bodies, and in pardons, indulgences, deliverances from purgatory, &c. for the souls of men. Rev. xviii. 13. The officers, especially the general, form the soul of an army, and the common soldiers are the body of it. Isa. x. 18. To love, or do any thing with the soul, is to do it with the utmost ardency and affection. Sol. Song i. 7. Luke i. 46 Psal. lxi. 10. and xxv. 1.

SOUND; (1.) Whole; healthy. Luke xv. 27. (2.) True and substantial. Prov. ii. 7 and iii. 21. (3.) Free from error. 2 Tim. i. 7. Tit. i. 9. (4.) Well instructed, and sincere. Psal. cxix. 8. From the sole of the foot, even to the crown of the head, there is no soundness;—but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores: that have not been closed, nor bound up, nor mollified with ointment. In the whole state, governors and governed, small and great, country and city, there is nothing but sin unrepented of, and miseries undressed; and in their whole nature and life, there is nothing but corruptions, vices, and troubles. Isa. i. 6.

SOUND; (1.) To make a noise with a trumpet, or otherwise. Neh. iv. 18. (2.) To examine the depth of a sea or pond. Acts xxvii. 28. (3.) To search out one's intentions and designs. 1 Sam. xx. 12. The sounding of God's bowels is the discovery of his compassion, mercy, and love. Isa. lxiii. 15. The gospel is called a joyful sound, in allusion to the proclamations at the Jewish feasts, or of the year of release or jubilee, by the sound of trumpets. It is preached far and wide, reaches men's hearts, and brings them the good tidings of peace, salvation, and happiness. Rom. x. 18. Psal. lxxxix. 15. Christ's voice is like the sound of many waters: his gracious word and influences are powerful to awaken and quicken men's souls, and his providence to terrify and overwhelm his enemies with ruin. Rev. i. 15. The sound of the cherubims' wings, like the voice of the Almighty, denotes the terrible and alarming nature of providences executed by the angels, or ministers of God's designs. Ezek. x. 5. The day of trouble is near, and not the sounding again of the mountains; not mere echoes, or empty alarms, fit only to startle children; not shoutings of the vintage, in the mountains; nor the sound of joyful festivals observed to idols in high places. Ezek. vii. 7.

SOUTH; a place or country lying southward from some other place. Thus Sheba, Egypt, and Arabia, were the south in respect of Canaan. Matt. xii. 42. Dan. viii. 9. and xl. 5. &c. Numb. xiii. 29. Obad. 19. The south part of Judea, or Canaan, is called the south. Ezek. xx. 46. Gen. xiii. 1, 3. The south country, into which Zechariah's grizzled horses went, may be Africa, Lesser Asia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, &c. which lie south of Italy. Zech. vi. 6. Though in most part of Dan. xi. the kings of the south and north are the Syroegrecian kings of Egypt and Syria; yet in verse 40. the kings of the south and north pushing at Antichrist, may be the Saracens and Sultans of Egypt, and the northern Turks; or, that the northern Ottomans having become masters of Egypt, and other southern countries, shall harass the papists. But the church is represented as on the south side of a mountain, to denote her quiet, comfortable, and flourishing state. Ezek. xl. 2.

SOW; to scatter seed in the earth that it may grow up, and yield increase. Gen. xxvi. 12. God sows people when he scatters them abroad, or makes them to dwell and increase in a place. Zech. x. 9. Christ sows seed, when he publishes the truths of his word, and bestows the influences of his grace, in order that churches may be formed, and men may bring forth good works unto eternal life. Matt. xiii. 18, 19. The preaching of the gospel, which is good seed, that grows up in an increase of saints and good works, is called a sowing; and preachers are distinguished into such as sow, and such as reap. The prophets, and John Baptist sowed the principles of divine truth: but by the ministry of the apostles, men were more eminently cut off from their natural state, and gathered to Christ. Matt. xiii. 37. Men's charitable distributions are compared to sowing of seed; they are scattered to the needy, and tend to their comfort; and through the blessing of God, to the advantage of the giver. 2 Cor. ix. 6. Eccl. xi. 1, 4, 6. Men's conduct is called a sowing, as they shall quickly receive the reward or punishment thereof. Gal. vi. 7. A good course of life is to sow to the Spirit, as therein by the influence of the Holy Ghost, and in the exercise of inward grace, the man lays out himself, and what he has, to the honour of God, and to promote his own spiritual holiness and comfort. Gal. vi. 8. It is to sow in righteousness, by receiving Jesus' imputed righteousness and in performing good works. Prov. xi. 18. Hos. x. 12. It is sown in peace, in embracing reconciliation with God, and promoting peace with all men, as far as may consist with holiness. Jam. iii. 18. It is a sowing beside all waters, when one improves every opportunity of getting or doing good. Isa. xxxii. 20. Men go forth weeping, bearing precious seed with them, and sow in tears, when, amid trouble and sorrow for sin, they serve God; and they reap in joy, and bring their sheaves with them, when they are gloriously rewarded. Psal. cxvi. 5, 6. A wicked life is a sowing to the flesh, as in it one is influenced by sinful principles, motives, and acts, to gratify sinful and corrupt lusts. Gal. vi. 8. It is a sowing of wickedness, or iniquity, when men scatter abroad their sinful thoughts, words, and deeds, to be the seed of eternal woe. Job iv. 8. Prov. xxii. 8. It is a sowing among thorns, a practice that will not turn out to any good account. Jer. iv. 3. To sow discord or strife, is to be instrumental in stirring it up. Prov. vi. 14, 19, and xvi. 28. The Jews' trusting to idols, or the assistance of Egypt, is called the sowing of wind; it was altogether foolish and ineffectual. Hos. viii. 7. The death or burial of men is called a sowing; the laying of them in the grave, issues in resurrection to life and immortality. 1 Cor. xv. 36, 37.

Seed is, (1.) grain, which being sown, produces corn, &c. Gen. xlvii. 19. The Jews were not to sow their fields with mingled seed, to teach us that God's truth and men's inventions, and that works and grace should not be mingled together. Lev. xix. 19. (2.) The fluid substance in animals from which their young is produced. Gen. xxxviii. 9. (3.) Children or posterity. Rom. i. 3. Psal.

cxli. 1. Gen. iv. 25, and vi. 8. Abraham had a threefold seed. (1.) A natural seed, comprehending all his natural descendants. Rom. ix. 7. (2.) A spiritual seed, comprehending all, both Jews and gentiles, which possess like precious faith in Christ. Rom. iv. 16. (3.) A supernatural seed, viz. Christ, descended from him according to the flesh. Gal. iii. 16.

Christ is the seed of the woman; he is the most noted of the posterity of Eve, and was born of a virgin. Gen. iii. 15. The saints are a seed; they are but a small part of mankind; but by the grace of God, and the care of his providence, are made exceedingly useful to bring forth glory to God, and blessings to the world. Rom. ix. 29. They are the seed of the church, begotten to God in her, Rev. xii. 17; are a holy seed, sanctified and set apart to the service of God. Isa. vi. 13; are good seed, fixed in a good state, endowed with good qualities, and productive of good works, Matt. xiii. 28; a godly seed, are truly in covenant with God, conformed to his image, and worship and serve him. Mal. ii. 15.

The seed of men, are the Goths and other barbarians, that were mingled with the Romans a little before the fall of their empire. Dan. ii. 43. A seed of evil doers, or increase of sinful men, is a generation descended from wicked parents, and given to wicked works. Isa. i. 4.

The word of God is likened to seed; as applied to our heart, it produces excellent graces and good works. Luke vii. 11. The principle of grace in the saints' heart is called seed, and said to preserve from sin; constantly residing in every power of the soul, and bringing forth holy thoughts, desires, and acts, it prevents from following sin with pleasure and delight. 1 John iii. 9. 1 Pet. i. 23.

SOUR. Their drink is sour; they offered sour wine to the Lord in their drink-offerings; or their idolatrous offerings and practice were abominable. Hos. iv. 18.

SPACE; (1.) A distance or interval of place. Gen. xxxii. 16. (2.) A certain length of time. Gen. xxix. 14.

SPAIN; a large country in the west of Europe. It anciently comprehended both Spain and Portugal, and is surrounded by the sea on every side, except towards the east, where it borders on Gaul or France. Perhaps it was the noted Tarshish of the ancients. The Spaniards suppose Tubal the son of Japheth to have come hither about one hundred and forty-three years after the flood, and to have brought the true religion of the patriarchs along with him. But we suppose it was peopled by the Celtic descendants of Gomer, who, 1000 years after the flood, settled here. The country was afterwards invaded by the Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, who no doubt brought along many of their customs. With very great difficulty, the Romans wrested it from the valiant natives, and the Carthaginians stripped it of its immense wealth, ruined its gold mines, and kept it in bondage almost seven hundred years. About A. D. 468, the Goths and other Barbarians, after a war of about seventy years, seized on the country, and reigned in it till about A. D.

710; when Count Julian, to revenge an affront done to his daughter, called in the Saracens and Moors from Africa. After a battle of eight days' continuance, and in about eight months, they seized on most of the kingdom. After struggling about nine hundred years they were at last driven out. About two hundred and fifty years ago, their internal strength, and the conquest of America, had rendered this nation very famous, but since their horrid cruelties in America, and persecution of the Protestants in the Netherlands, it has, on the main, dwindled into weakness and poverty, and few of their monarchs appear fit for government. The banishment of about 1,400,000 Jews and Moors also mightily weakened the kingdom. A Christian church was early planted here; but by whom, is not known. For some ages, the Christian church in this kingdom continued in greater purity than some of her neighbours; but since the inquisition was established here, a stupid subjection to the Pope, and his delusions, is almost all the religion they possess. Rom. xv. 24, 28.

SPAN; a measure of three hands-breadth, or near eleven inches. Exod. xxviii. 16. God's spanning or measuring out the heavens, imports how easily he knows and governs the heavens, and all their contents. Isa. xl. 12. and xlviii. 13.

SPARE; (1.) In pity to refrain from due severity. 2 Pet. ii. 4. (2.) To hold back. Prov. xvii. 27. God spared not his Son; he did not withhold him from being our Mediator; nor, in punishing him, did he, out of pity, abate the least degree of what was due for our crimes. Rom. viii. 32.

SPARK. The excessively hot breath of the leviathan is compared thereto. Job xli. 19. Idolaters, and other wicked men, are like a spark, easily blown away, and ruined in an instant. Isa. i. 30. Men's vain imagination of their wisdom or religion, and their ill-grounded hopes of happiness, are compared to sparks of fire, which are of little use, and of short continuance. Isa. i. 11.

SPARROW; a well-known bird. It seems they were common food among the Jews, and were sold two for a farthing, or five for two farthings. Matt. x. 29. Luke xii. 6. The Hebrew tzippor, signifies any clean bird. To mark his afflicted and sorrowful condition, David compares himself to a sparrow alone upon the house top. Psal. lxxxiv. 3.

SPEAK, SAY; (1.) To tell; to relate. Gen. xxxvii. 20. (2.) To pronounce. Judg. xii. 6. (3.) To will and command with authority. Gen. i. 3, 6, 9. (4.) To promise. Luke xxiii. 43. (5.) To ask. Mark xi. 31. (6.) To answer. Exod. iii. 13, 14. (7.) To teach, affirm. Matt. xvii. 10. (8.) To expound. Heb. v. 11. (9.) To warn. Col. iv. 17. (10.) To confess; acknowledge. Luke xvii. 10. (11.) To bear witness. Acts xxvii. 20. (12.) To reason; argue. Jam. ii. 18. Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost, speak not of themselves. Christ said nothing but what the Father authorized them to do, and what had been materially said by God in the law and the prophets; and the Holy Ghost taught men concerning Christ, as ver-by Christ and his Father. John xiv. 10. and xvi. 13. Christ speaketh from heaven; he does now though ascended thither; and in a way more glorious and efficacious than Moses. Heb. xii. 26. Evil speaking, signifies slander, reproach. 1 Pet. iv. 4. To be speechless, is to be dumb. Luke i. 22. To be confounded, having nothing to say for one's self. Matt. xxiii. 12.

SPEAR, or HALBERD, seems to have been anciently a common weapon of war; and hence their soldiers were called spear-men. Acts xxiii. 23. Kings and generals used them instead of colours. 1 Sam. xxvi. 7. Josh. viii. 26. Sometimes spear is put for all kinds of offensive weapons. Nah. iii. 3. God's spear is his destructive judgments, or his flaming thunderbolts. Hab. iii. 21. Company of spear-men, (or wild beasts of the reed,) are savage and wicked people. Psal. lxxviii. 30. See TEETH.

SPECIAL; (1.) Chosen from among others. Dent. vii. 6. (2.) Extraordinary. Acts xix. 11.

SPECKLED; spotted with divers colours. Gen. xxx. 32.

SPECTACLE; a sight to be gazed at, as when persons for a show, were condemned to fight with wild beasts. 1 Cor. iv. 10.

SPEED; (1.) Haste. Acts xvii. 15. (2.) Success. Gen. xxiv. 12. To wish one God speed, is to wish that God would succeed him in his work. 2 John 10.

SPEND; (1.) To make use of. Gen. xlvii. 18. (2.) To waste in a prodigal manner. Prov. xxi. 20. and xxix. 8. (3.) To labour till one's strength and life be wasted. 2 Cor. xii. 15.

SPICE; SPICERY; any aromatic drug possessed of hot and pungent qualities, as ginger, pepper, nutmeg, cinnamon, cloves, cassia, frankincense, calamus, myrrh, &c. With spices the ancients seasoned their flesh, Ezek. xxiv. 10; gave their wine what flavour they pleased, Sol. Song viii. 2; perfumed their women, and their beds and clothes, Eath. ii. 12. Prov. vii. 17. Psal. xlv. 8; and seasoned and embalmed their dead bodies. Mark xvi. 1. 2 Chron. xvi. 14. Jer. xxxiv. 5. It seems they also burnt heaps of spices, to honour the burial of their kings. The Arabians traded in carrying spices to Egypt. Gen. xxxvii. 25. The saints, and their graces, are compared to spices; they season, preserve, and purify nations and churches. Sol. Song iv. 13-14.

SPIDER; a well-known insect, of which there are about twenty-four kinds. Some are covered with hair; others are smooth; and it is said, a kind in America, are fifty times as big as ours. Many of the spiders are extremely venomous, and their bite, though very small, is dangerous, and sometimes speedily mortal. The tarantula of Italy, &c. has eight eyes, and a most dangerous bite. There is no curing it, but by suiting music to the maddened patients, and making them dance till they sweat out the poison. The bite is not poisonous, but when the weather is hot. Spiders lay a vast number of eggs, sometimes five or six hundred. To entrap the flies, they weave webs, formed of a glue extracted from their own bowels; and in spinning which they can dart themselves a great distance. When a fly is caught in this web, the spider, who was before hid, darts itself upon it, fixes its claws therein, and sucks out the juice of the poor creature, leaving the rest. After all, spiders are by some naturalists, famed for their prudence, fortitude, equity, temperance, and cleanliness. Men's carnal confidence, and their carnal attempts to save themselves, are likened to a spider's web; after one has wearied himself in producing them, how unsubstantial and insufficient for every good purpose! Job viii. 14. Isa. lix. 5.

SPIKENARD; a plant of very fragrant smell, and strong taste. It grows on the surface of the ground, or even below it. The spica or ear, is about the length and thickness of one's finger, and is very light, covered over with long reddish hairs; and is of a strong smell, and bitterish taste. The plant is of a heart-warming, and poison-expelling quality, and, as such, is used in the treacle of Venice. The ointment made of it is very precious. Mark xiv. 3. The best spikenard comes from the East Indies; that which is found in the Pyrenean and Tyrol mountains, has much the same virtue as the Valerian. Christ and his gospel, and his people and their graces, are likened to spikenard: how condescending, precious, heart-warming, delightful, and restorative, are Jesus and his truths applied to the soul!—how self-denying are saints; and how useful and acceptable are they and their graces. Sol. Song i. 12. and iv. 13, 14.

SPINDLE; an instrument for spinning with; and which is still used by some of our women. Anciently, the wives and daughters of great men diligently applied themselves to spinning. Exod. xxxv. 25. Prov. xxxi. 9.

SPIRIT; a name given to such substances as are not gross, as to wind. John iii. 8. Or to the most subtle, and volatile parts of a body, whereby its functions, if alive, are performed. Animal bodies have a twofold spirit; a vital in the blood, and an animal in the nerves. Such spirits have beasts which go down to the earth with them at death. Eccl. iii. 21.

Among divines, SPIRIT, or GHOST, ordinarily signifies an immaterial, immortal, and thinking substance: hence God is called a Spirit. John iv. 24. Christ's divine nature is called a Spirit, Spirit of holiness, and Eternal Spirit, 1 Pet. iii. 18. Rom. i. 4. and Heb. xi. 14; and Christ is called a quickening Spirit, as he quickens his people, and gives them spiritual life. 1 Cor. xv. 45.

The third person in the Godhead is particularly called the Holy Spirit, or Holy Ghost, to express the mode of his relation to the Father and Son; and because he, by spiritual methods, works spiritual qualities and affections in us. 1 Pet. i. 2. He is called the seven Spirits, because of his perfect and diversified fulness of gifts, graces, and operations. Rev. i. 4. He is called the Spirit of God; his nature is divine, and he is sent by God to perform his saving operations. 2 Chron. xv. 1. He is the Spirit of Christ, as he proceeds from him as the Son of God, qualifies him, and rests on him as Mediator; and is sent by him to apply redemption to our souls. Rom. viii. 9. He is the Spirit of promise, because promised to men, and he applies the promises of the new covenant to our hearts. Eph. i. 13. He is the Spirit of truth: he is the true God, and teaches nothing but truth. John xiv. 17. He is a holy, good, and free Spirit; being holy and good in himself, he works holiness and goodness in us, of his own sovereign will, and renders us of a noble and benevolent temper. Psal. li. 10, 11. and cxliii. 10. He is a Spirit of judgment, counsel, wisdom, and understanding: being infinite in knowledge and wisdom himself, he furnished Christ's manhood, and supplies his people with wisdom and understanding. Isa. xxviii. 16. and xi. 2. Eph. i. 17. He is a Spirit of bondage and fear, when by the application of the broken law to men's conscience, he fills their mind with great pressure and fear. Rom. viii. 15. He is the Spirit of adoption, that brings us into the family of God, dwells in every one of God's children, and renders them conformable to his image. Rom. viii. 15. He is the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, as by uniting men to Christ, he bestows life on them; and by maintaining their fellowship with Christ, he restores, increases, and perfects their spiritual life. Rom. viii. 2. He is the Spirit of power, and of faith, and of love, and of a sound mind, and the Spirit of supplication: by his almighty power, he works faith, love, and sound wisdom in the heart; and he directs and enables to pray, and to wait for the answers to prayer. 2 Tim. i. 7. 2 Cor. iv. 13. Zech. xii. 10. Rom. viii. 27. The love of the Spirit, is love of him, or gracious love produced by him. Rom. xv. 30. He is the Spirit of grace, and of glory; as from the fulness of Christ, he conveys to the saints gracious endowments, and glorious happiness. Heb. x. 29. 1 Pet. iv. 14. He is the Spirit of the living creatures, which is in the wheels, as he actuates angels and ministers, and the church, and the world managed by them. Ezek. i. 30. He is said to be sent, because authorized by the Father and Son, John xvi. 7; to be given, because freely bestowed in his person, and gifts and graces, John vii. 39; to be poured out, because carefully and plentifully bestowed, Prov. i. 23; to come upon, and fall upon men, in respect of his beginning to act on them, Acts i. 8. and xi. 25; and to strive with them, in opposition to their corrupt inclinations, Gen. vi. 3: and men, in their resistance of his operations, are said to grieve, rebel against, resist, quench, do despite to, and blaspheme him. Eph. iv. 30. Isa. lxiii. 10. Acts vi. 51. 1 Thess. v. 19. Heb. x. 29. Matt. xii. 31.

Angels and human souls are called spirits, because immaterial and thinking substances. Heb. i. 14. Acts vii. 59. Men are said to rise up the ghost, when the soul is separated from the body. Gen. xxv. 17. Fallen angels are called foul or unclean spirits. Mark i. 27. The spirit going out of a man, and travelling through dry places, finding no rest, and at last returning to his old residence, with seven other spirits worse than himself, may denote the devil as returning to the Jewish nation, to render them monstrously wicked, after he had been cast out of many, and could find no rest among the gentiles, through the spread of the gospel. Matt. xii.

43—45. Familiar spirits, are such devils as converse with wizards. 2 Kings xxi. 6.—Many things, on account of their source, their nature, their subjects, or influence, are called spirit; as,

(1.) The inspiring influences or uncommon gifts bestowed by the Holy Ghost, are called by his name. Matt. xxii. 43. Rev. i. 10. and iv. 2. Heb. vi. 4. John vii. 39. Acts viii. 15—17. Gal. iii. 2. 1 Cor. xiv. 15. (2.) The renewed nature of the saints which is produced by, and conforms men to the Holy Ghost. Gal. v. 17. Matt. xxvi. 41. John iii. 6. In many texts, Spirit denotes both the new nature of believers, and the Spirit of God dwelling in, and actuating it. Rom. viii. 1, 4. Gal. v. 21. (3.) A temper or disposition of soul; hence we read of a right spirit, a humble spirit, a spirit of meekness. Psal. li. 10. Prov. xvi. 19. 1 Cor. iv. 21. Timothy was an example of the believers in spirit, i. e. in the spirituality and right temper of his soul. 1 Tim. iv. 12. Paul, though at Rome, was present with the Colossians in spirit, in care and affection. Col. ii. 5: and his spirit, (i. e. his care, judgment, and authority,) was with the Corinthians in their censuring of the incestuous person. 1 Cor. v. 4. (4.) The gospel and word of Christ, by which, applied by the Holy Ghost, men's natures are changed, and spiritual life produced, maintained, and perfected. 2 Cor. iii. 6, 8. (5.) Persons inspired by the Holy Ghost, or pretending to be so. 1 John iv. 1. False teachers are called spirits of devils, and said to have the spirit of error, and of Antichrist: they have Satan in them, and exciting and directing them in their erroneous judgment and corrupt inclinations, leading them to oppose the Lord Jesus Christ. Rev. xvi. 14. 1 Tim. iv. 1. 1 John iv. 3, 6.

The new spirit put within men, is the Holy Ghost entering to dwell in them, and a gracious nature and temper newly produced by him. Ezek. xi. 19. and xxxvi. 26. The four spirits, or winds of the heavens, are angels directed by God to execute his providential work in every part of the world; or, the Chaldean, Persian, Greoian, and Roman monarchies, raised up by God in different quarters, to accomplish his purposes; or, the New Testament preachers, under God's influence, spreading the gospel into the various parts of the world. Zech. vi. 5. To live, walk, worship, or serve God in spirit, is to act in our worship, and other work, as influenced, directed, and drawn by the Holy Ghost; and in the exercise of inward grace, and with all the powers of our soul, vigorously concurring in it. Gal. v. 25. Rom. viii. 1. John iv. 24. Phil. iii. 3. They that are joined to the Lord are one spirit; Christ and they have the same Holy Ghost dwelling in them; and they are conformed to him in the gracious tempers of their soul. 1 Cor. vi. 17. The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy; faithfully witnessing for his truth, is equally honourable, as to have the inspiring spirit of prophecy. Rev. xix. 10. The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets; the opinions and tempers of prophets must be subject to the trial of others. 1 Cor. xiv. 26. To have the spirit of slumber, is to have one's mind rendered stupid and senseless by Satan and indwelling corruptions. Rom. xi. 8.

SPIRITUAL; that which belongs to spirits. The church is a spiritual house; her members are renewed in the spirit of their minds; Jesus is her foundation; and his word, Spirit, and grace, connect them with him, and with one another. 1 Pet. ii. 5. Prophets and other church-officers, are spiritual men; their office lies in spiritual exercises. Hos. ix. 7. Christians are spiritual; they have the Spirit of God, and are chiefly concerned about spiritual and eternal things. Gal. vi. 1. Such as are much under the influence of God's Spirit, and of their own new nature, are spiritual. 1 Cor. iii. 1. God's law is spiritual; it is a transcript of the divine nature; it is given by the Holy Ghost, and extends its authority to every power and act of the soul; and chiefly requires duties of a spiritual nature. Rom. vii. 14. The gospel, the influence it conveys, the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, the blessings of justification, adoption, sanctification, gracious comfort, and eternal happiness, are spiritual, they proceed from the Holy Ghost, are of an immaterial nature, and suit the nature and desires of our souls. Rom. xv. 27. and i. 11. 1 Cor. xii. 1. Eph. i. 3. The manna and water on which the Hebrews lived in the wilderness, were spiritual food, as they typified Jesus, his person, righteousness, Spirit, and blessings, which are the food of our souls. 1 Cor. x. 3, 4. The saints' prayers, praises, self-dedication, and the like, are spiritual sacrifices, not material and fleshly as those of the Mosaic law. 1 Pet. ii. 5. Such songs as are upon spiritual things, and are sung with a gracious temper of soul, are spiritual. Eph. v. 19. Satan, who is a spirit, and pride, unbelief, and such like lusts of our mind as are enthroned in our hearts, are spiritual wickedness in high places. Eph. ii. 12. To be spiritually minded, is, under the influence of the Holy Ghost, to have all the powers of our soul concurring in spiritual thoughts, desires, and delights, in divine and eternal things. Rom. viii. 6. The things of the Spirit of God, (i. e. things relative to Christ, and the method of our redemption,) are spiritually discerned, are known, not by carnal reason, but by the peculiar assistance of the Holy Ghost. 1 Cor. ii. 14. Rome is spiritually, (i. e. in the language of the Holy Ghost,) called Sodom and Egypt, because like these places in wickedness. Rev. xi. 8.

SPLIT. To split upon one, or in his face, expresses the highest contempt. Numb. xii. 14. Job xxx. 10. Matt. xxvi. 67.

SPIRE. See DESPIRE.

SPOIL. See BOOTY. (1.) To spoil, is to take away the substance of a person or nation. Gen. xxxiv. 27. (2.) To waste; to render useless. Sol. Song ii. 15. Christ spoiled principalities and powers, when by his death, he removed the guilt of sin, and the curse of the law; and so deprived Satan and his agents of power to hurt his people. Col. ii. 15. Church-members are spoiled, when deprived of their spiritual principles, tempers, or exercises, and are, as it were, led bound and captive into some vain or sinful sentiment or practice. Col. ii. 8. A spoiler, is a plundering ravager, such as the Philistines,

1 Sam. xiii. 7; the Chaldeans, Jer. xii. 12; or the Medes and Persians, Jer. li. 48.

SPOONS. The use of the golden spoons, was to lift the frankincense to put it on the altar to be burnt. Exod. xxv. 29.

SPORT; jest, diversion. He that loves it too much, shall be poor, as it will hinder him from prosecuting his business. Prov. xxi. 17. Men sport with their own deceivings, when they make their jest or boast of the sinful and erroneous courses they bring themselves and others into. 2 Pet. ii. 18. Prov. xxvi. 19.

SPOT; (1.) A small mark different in colour from the garment, or other article, on which it appears; so leopards have multitudes of beautiful spots. Jer. xiii. 23. (2.) A stain or outward blemish. Numb. xix. 2. and xxviii. 3. Sin is called a spot, as it renders our nature, or the garments of our conversation unsightly before God and good men. 1 Tim. vi. 14. Jude xxiii. Such sins as are inconsistent with a state of grace, are not the spot of God's children. Deut. xxxii. 5. Christ was without spot and blemish: was free from all sinful pollution of nature or practice. 1 Pet. i. 19. The saints have no spot in this life; have no sin uncovered with Jesus' justifying righteousness, and they give not themselves allowance in any known sin. Sol. Song iv. 7. In the future state, they shall be without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing: freed from all remains of sin and misery. Eph. v. 27. 2 Pet. iii. 14. Scandalous professors are spots; are a disgrace to the church, and a means of infecting others. Jude 12.

SPOUSE. See BRIDE; MARRIAGE.

SPRING; (1.) To issue forth, as water out of a fountain. Numb. xxi. 17. (2.) To shoot up and flourish; as corn and trees from their seed. Psal. xcii. 7. (3.) To proceed from, as a child from his parents. Heb. vii. 14. (4.) To move forward with great haste. Acts xvi. 29. SPRING, (1.) A FOUNTAIN. (2.) The beginning of a thing, as of the day. 1 Sam. ix. 26.

SPRINKLING of the blood, oil, and water of separation, under the law, shadowed forth God's cleansing of sinners from their sin, by the sprinkling or application of Jesus' word, blood, and Spirit, to their souls. Lev. xiv. 7, 16. Heb. ix. 13. Isa. lii. 15. Ezek. xxxvi. 25. 1 Pet. i. 2. Heb. x. 22. and xii. 24. The sprinkling of blood, water, or oil, on the tip of the right ear, thumb, and toe, in the consecration of priests, or cleansing of lepers, imported a preparation to hear holy words, touch holy things, and walk in holy places; and signified a purification of the whole man, soul, and body, by the blood, Spirit, and grace of Christ, and a consecration thereof to the service of God. Exod. xxix. 20. Lev. viii. 23. and xiv. 14, 17.

SPUE; vomit. God spues a church out of his mouth, when, with abhorrence of her sin, he gives her up to be a synagogue of Satan. Rev. iii. 16. Men vomit up riches, when to their grief and shame, they part with them to others. Job xx. 15. Prov. xxv. 16. Men drink, spue, and fall, when God's judgments render them stupid, disgraced, and miserable. Jer. xxv. 27. Hab.

ii. 16. Men return to their vomit, or what they had cast forth, when they return to sinful practices, which they had once left off, and been sorry for. Prov. xxvi. 4. 2 Pet. ii. 22. They wallowed in their vomit, when exposed to the most disgraceful distress. Jer. xlviii. 26. A land spues out its inhabitants when they are wrathfully driven out of it by slaughter and captivity. Lev. xviii. 28.

SPUNGE. Whether sponge, a sea production, found adhering to rocks, shells, &c. be a vegetable, a mineral, or an animal, has been much disputed; but it is now generally allowed to be a plant. It is distinguished for drawing up a great deal of moisture, and is of considerable use for fomenting wounds, for yielding volatile salt, and for choking noxious animals. Matt. xxvii. 48.

SPY; ESPY; to take a view of. God espied a land for Israel: he determined to give them a choice one. Ezek. xx. 6. SPIES are such as come from an enemy, to observe the nature and circumstances of a place or country, in order to seize upon it. Joseph pretended that his ten brethren were spies come to observe the nakedness of Egypt; how easily it might be taken, and what was the most proper method of doing it. Gen. xlii. 9, 14, 16. By the permission of God Moses sent twelve spies, one for each tribe, to view the land of Canaan; they went through it to the very north borders, and after forty days, returned to Moses at Kadesh-barnea. Ten of them brought up a bad report of it, that it was unwholesome, and impossible to be conquered. These, for their false report, and their occasioning a mutiny in the congregation, were immediately struck dead by the Lord; but the other two, Caleb and Joshua, who maintained that the land was exceedingly good, and who brought a large cluster of grapes away with them as a specimen of the fruitfulness of the country; and maintained, that by the assistance of God, they could easily conquer it; were preserved, and thirty eight years after, entered into Canaan. Numb. xiii. and xiv. When Joshua intended to pass the river Jordan, he sent two spies to view Jericho, by taking of which he intended to begin his conquests. They, after being preserved by Rahab, and lurking some days about the adjacent hills, returned safe to the camp, and informed him that the Canaanites were in a terrible panic for fear of him. Josh. ii.

SQUARE; a figure of four equal sides. The square-form in the tabernacle, temple, or in Ezekiel's visionary structures and portions, and in John's vision of the New Jerusalem, denoted the stability and consistency of all things in Christ and his church. Ezek. xlv. 1-8. Rev. xxi. 16.

STABLE; (1.) A lodging place for horses, camels, and the like. Ezek. xxv. 5. (2.) Firm, fixed, and sure, 1 Chron. xvi. 26; and to STABLISH, is to make firm and sure. [See ESTABLISH.] Wisdom and knowledge are the STABILITY of thy times, and strength of salvation; the exercise of wisdom and knowledge tends to strengthen and establish churches and nations; and by their exercise the Jewish state by Hezekiah and his godly subjects, was then preserved and delivered from ruin by the Assyrians. Isa. xxxiii. 6.

STACTE; the gum distilled from the myrrh-tree. But perhaps the Hebrew NETEPH might be a kind of liquid that was extracted by bruising the myrrh. Some take it also to signify balm. It is certain that stacte was very valuable and fragrant, and that it was an ingredient in the Jews' sacred perfume. Exod. xxx. 33.

STAFF. See ROD.

STAGGER. See REEL.

STAIN; to mark with disgrace. Job iii. 5. Isa. xxiii. 9. But Christ's staining all his raiment with the blood of his foes, imports that all his appearances and works should be marked with tokens of his victory over sin, Satan, and the world. Isa. liiii. 5.

STAIRS. Those of Ezekiel's visionary temple may denote our gradual entrance into the church and fellowship of God. Ezek. xliii. 17. The stairs in the secret places of which the church as a dove resides, may denote God's purposes, and peculiar protection of his people; or Christ as their way to the Father; or their unbelieving fears and despondencies, wherein they as it were hide themselves from Christ. Sol. Song ii. 14.

STAKE; rods or boards for erecting tents, &c. Not one of the stakes of the church or state is removed; when notwithstanding all that enemies can do, they enjoy peace and quietness. Isa. xxx. 20. The strengthening of the church's stakes, and lengthening of her cords, imports her confirmation and enlargement. Isa. liv. 2.

STALK. See STEM.

STALL; a place for a horse or an ox to stand or lie in. Solomon had 40,000 stalls, in 4000 stables. 1 Kings iv. 26. 2 Chron. ix. 25.

STALLED; long kept in the stall for fattening. Prov. xv. 17.

STAMMERING; hesitancy in speech. The tongue of the stammerer speaks plainly, when such as before spoke in a dark, doubtful, and unintelligible manner of divine things, are enabled to do it with great clearness, energy, and delight. Isa. xxxii. 4. The Assyrians were the stammering lips, and people of stammering lips, by whom God spoke out his wrath and indignation against the Jews. Isa. xxviii. 11. and xxxiii. 19.

STAMP; (1.) To tread with violence upon the ground. 2 Sam. xxii. 43. (2.) To tread or beat to pieces. Deut. xi. 21. 2 Kings xxiii. 6, 15. Stamping imports, (1.) Complete and destructive victory over enemies. Dan. vii. 7. and viii. 7, 10. (2.) Insulting over the misery of the afflicted. Ezek. xxv. 6. (3.) Grief for, and fear of approaching calamities. Ezek. vi. 11.

STAUNCHED; stopped from running. Luke viii. 44.

STAND, denotes, (1.) Diligent service. Psal. cxxv. 2. lxxxiv. 1. 1 Kings xvii. 1. (2.) Fixedness, continuance. 1 Pet. v. 12. (3.) To be fulfilled, to prosper. Isa. xl. 8. Dan. ii. 44. (4.) To abide trial and judgment. Psal. i. 5. (5.) To maintain ground, resist, conquer. Eph. vi. 13-14. God standing in the congregation of the mighty, denotes his authority over rulers and their courts, and his calling them to an account. Psal. lxxxii. 1. Christ's standing on the throne, or at the right hand of the poor, and at the door of our heart, imports his activity and readiness to help and save us, and his patient and continued earnestness to have admission into our heart. Acts vii. 55. Psal. cix. 31. Rev. iii. 20. To stand before God, is with reverence to minister to, and be ready to execute his will. Rev. xi. 4. and viii. 2. 1 Kings xviii. 15; or to intercede with him in the most earnest manner. Jer. xv. 1. To stand up before a man, imports reverence of him, and readiness to serve him. Job xxix. 9. The dragon's standing before the woman, imports the readiness and activity of the heathen to destroy Constantine the Great, and the Christians of that age. Rev. xii. 4. Christ's witnesses, standing on their feet, imports their having courage and ability to defend themselves against the Antichristians, who had just before reduced them to the lowest plunge of distress. Rev. xi. 11. Four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, imports their power and readiness to execute God's will, in any part of the world. Rev. vii. 1. The angel standing with one foot on the sea, and another on the earth, is Christ, whose power is over all things, whether fixed or troubled. Rev. x. 2. The angel's standing in the sun, and inviting the beasts to feed on the flesh of the Antichristians, imports that their ruin should be most publicly known, and its good effects felt all over the world. Rev. xix. 17.

STARS; those sparkling bodies in the heavens that give light to our earth by night: they were formed on the fourth day of the creation, and had their motions and use assigned them. Gen. i. 14. Their number is unknown. Riccioli supposes there may be 400,000,000, but most of them are invisible to the naked eye, which cannot perhaps perceive above 1000. Flamsteed, with his powerful telescopes, could discover only about 3000. Of these stars, some are PLANETS, and some are fixed stars. The ancients regarded the Sun, Moon, Mercury, Mars, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn, for planets, (i. e. wandering luminaries;) and as our fathers worshipped these, they dedicated the several days of the week to them, which names they still bear.

According to the present system of astronomy, the solar system consists of seven primary planets, Mercury, Venus, the Earth, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and Herschel; ten secondary planets, of which the Earth has one, viz. the Moon; Jupiter has four, Saturn five, and Herschel six. All these planets move round the sun, from west by south to east, as well as round their own axes: and the secondary planets move round their principal ones. They all receive their light by the reflection of the rays of the sun. Mercury's diameter is 2600 or 3000 miles, and its distance from the sun is 32,000,000 or 36,500,000 miles, and goes round it in eighty-seven days twenty-three hours. Venus's diameter is 7900 or 9800 miles; its distance from the sun 59,000,000 or 68,000,000; and it goes round the sun in 221 days seventeen hours. Mars' diameter is 4444 or 5400 miles; its distance from the sun 123,000,000 or 145,000,000; and it goes round him in 686 days and twenty-three hours. Jupiter's diameter is 81,000, or 94,000 miles; his distance from the sun 424,000,000 or 495,000,000; and he goes round him in 4332 days twelve hours. Saturn's diameter is 67,000 or 78,000 miles; his distance from the sun 777,000,000 or 908,000,000; and he goes round him in 10,759 days seven hours. The distance of Herschel from the sun is, 1,800,000,000 of miles; diameter 35,109 miles; and takes 30,445 days eighteen hours, to perform its revolution round the sun. See MOON, EARTH.

The comets are also a kind of wandering stars, but make such prodigious excursions through the vast tracts of sky, that for many years their appearance is lost to us. The fixed stars are such as do not wander from one point of the ecliptic circle to another, and whose distance from the sun renders it impossible for them to be illuminated by the reflection of his rays.

From their nearness to us, and their apparent measure of light, the visible fixed stars are distinguished into several magnitudes, 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th. From their relation of place to one another they have been divided into fifty-nine constellations. Perhaps the fixed stars are all as large as our sun, and only appear small by reason of their distance. Nay, as new stars have become visible in latter times, perhaps there are fixed stars, whose light, since the creation, has not yet arrived on our earth, though it travels about ten millions of miles in a minute. Oh! how immense then must the Almighty be, whom the heavens and heaven of heavens cannot contain—God numbers the stars, and knows them all by their name: we have a few of their names in scripture, as Chiun, Mazzaroth, Arcturus, Orion, Pleiades. What influence the stars may have on our earth, besides the illuminating it, or the way in which they fought against Jabin's army, whether merely by giving the Hebrews light to pursue and slay them, or by emitting some destructive influence, we dare not pretend to determine. Judg. v. 20.

An extraordinary star appeared at the time of our Saviour's birth, and conducted the wise men to him; but this we suppose was merely a fiery meteor, which moved in the middle region of the air, somewhat in the manner of the cloudy pillar before the Hebrews in the wilderness. Matt. ii.

Perhaps, in a lower sense, David is the star that came out of Jacob, and smote the corners of Moab, and destroyed the children of Sheth; but in the highest sense, it refers to Jesus, the Bright and Morning Star, whose glory is bright, and ushers in an eternal day to his people; and so is their joy, and the terror of the wicked who love the works of darkness. Compare Numb. xxiv. 17. with Rev. ii. 28. and xxii. 16.

Ministers are called stars in Christ's right hand; upheld by him, and directed in their course, they, in their high stations, convey light, knowledge, and comfort to men. Rev.

i. 20. When they apostatize from the truth and fall into error and wickedness, and lead others into it, they are represented as wandering, smitten, and fallen stars. Jude 13. Rev. viii. 10—12. and xii. 3. Dan. viii. 10. In the last text, stars may denote the Macabees captains. The twelve stars which form the church's crown, are the twelve apostles in their inspired doctrines. Rev. xii. 1.

Saints are called stars, to denote their glory and usefulness, and their diversity of appearance. Dan. xii. 3: and the day-star which rises in their heart, is either the more clear discoveries of divine things now under the gospel, or the full vision of God in heaven. 2 Pet. i. 19.

Magistrates are compared to stars, because of the direction or comfort they do or should give to others. The king of Babylon is called Lucifer, or the morning-star; because his glory and power far surpassed those of his fellow-sovereigns. Isa. xiv. 12. The star called wormwood, may be understood of Pelagius in the church, who exceedingly corrupted the doctrines thereof; and of Genseric in the state, who with 300,000 Vandals from Africa, invaded Italy, and committed the most horrible ravages there. Rev. viii. 10, 11. When stars in a state are joined with sun and moon, they may denote inferior magistrates. Rev. viii. 12.

STARE; to gaze upon one as a spectacle. Psal. xxii. 17.

STATE; (1.) Condition. Gen. xliii. 7. (2.) Pomp and greatness. Esth. i. 7.

STATELY, honourable, grand, and comely. Ezek. xlii. 41.

STATION; fixed office or place. Isa. xxii. 19.

STATURE; (1.) The height of a person or thing. Luke xix. 3. (2.) The measure of knowledge and grace, attained by the church and her true members. Sol. Song vii. 7. Eph. iv. 13. (3.) Degree of power, authority, and wealth. Ezek. xvii. 6. and xxxi. 3. (4.) Persons in different ages and conditions. Ezek. xiii. 18.

STATUTE. See LAW.

STAY; (1.) To abide, remain. Gen. xix. 17. (2.) To delay, wait. Josh. x. 19. Ruth i. 13. (3.) To leave off. 2 Sam. xxiv. 16. (4.) To stop, hinder. Job xxxviii. 27. Prov. xxviii. 17. (5.) To uphold, comfort. Exod. xvii. 12. Sol. Song ii. 5. (6.) To trust to one for support and comfort. Isa. x. 20. and xxx. 12. A stay, is a stop, ceasing, Lev. xiii. 5; or a supporter. 1 Kings x. 19. God is the stay of his people: he preserves and upholds them amidst distress, and comforts them when under grief. Psal. xviii. 18. Magistrates and great men are the stay of a nation, which preserve them in order, and from ruin. Isa. xix. 13. The means by which men's life is preserved, and nations supported, is called a stay and staff. Isa. iii. 1.

STEAD, place, room. Gen. iv. 25. Deut. ii. 12.

STEADY, firm, and settled:—beld up, in a firm persuasion of God's power and promise. Exod. xvii. 12.

STEAL; (1.) To commit theft, to take away what belongs to one without his consent. Exod. xx. 15. (2.) To go off, or carry off privily; as with stolen goods, Gen. xxxi.

20. Job xxvii. 20. and so by steals is in a secret manner, as if ashamed to be seen. 2 Sam. xix. 3. Absalom stole the hearts of the Hebrews, when he decoyed their affections from his father to himself as their king. 2 Sam. xv. 6. The Hebrews were allowed to kill thieves breaking their house in the night. Exod. xxii. 1. If a thief was apprehended with the stolen article in his possession, he was not to be put to death, but was to restore four times the worth of a sheep, and five times the worth of an ox, and, it seems, seven-fold for what was taken in breaking a house; and if his substance did not amount to the prescribed restitution, he was sold for a slave to procure it. If a thief stole a man, at least a Hebrew, and made or sold him for a slave, he was punished with death. Prov. vi. 30. Exod. xxii. 2, 3. and xxi. 16. Deut. xxiv. 7. Perhaps the thieves crucified along with our Saviour, had been guilty of both theft and murder.

False prophets stole God's word from their neighbour; what hints they could get of what had been revealed to true prophets, they published as their own; and they agreed to say all one thing, for the more effectual deceiving of the people. Jer. xxiii. 30.

THIEVES are, (1.) Such as privately, or by violence, take away what belongs to another without his consent. Job xxx. 5. (2.) Such as practise dishonest dealing, and hunt after unlawful gain. Matt. xxi. 13. Christ comes as a thief in the night, when he comes to execute judgments, or to judge the world, in a sudden, unexpected, and to many, an undesired and dangerous manner. Rev. xvi. 15. 1 Thess. v. 2. Seducers are called thieves; by false doctrines, and other fraudulent courses, they craftily bereave the church of divine truth, and of proper unfolding of scripture; they rob God of his glory, and men of their true and everlasting happiness. Such as came before Christ, without his mission, were such thieves and robbers. John x. 8, 10.

STEDFAST; (1.) Fixed, sure, and lasting. Dan. vi. 26. (2.) Fixed in upright dispositions and practice. Psal. lxxviii. 8, 37.

STEEL, iron hardened by a mixture of salt and sulphur, and by heating it to a proper degree, and then plunging it into cold water. It requires great care and skill to render it hard, without rendering it brittle. The Germans, who are most skillful in this way, pretend to keep their art a deep secret. The bows of the ancients were made of steel and brass. Job xv. 24. 2 Sam. xxii. 35.

STEEP; hard to be climbed: so towers and walls are steep places. Ezek. xxxviii. 20.

STEM, or STALK; that part of a plant which rising out of the ground, supports the leaves, flowers, and fruit. The stem of Jesse, is the royal family of David his son. Isa. xi. 1. The Hebrew idolatry and dependance on the Egyptians and other heathens, had no stalk; the bud yielded no meal; or if it did, strangers swallowed it up; they turned to no good account; and whatever appearances there were of temporary advantage, the Assyrians destroyed all in the end. Hos. viii. 7.

STEP; (1.) A measure of about two feet. To have but a step between one and death, is to be in great and imminent danger. 1 Sam. xv. 3. (2.) The steps of a stair, to which we move one foot after another. 1 Kings x. 10. No steps of this kind were allowed in the ascent to God's altar, lest the nakedness of the priests should have been discovered to any below. Exod. xx. 26. (3.) A foot. Job xxix. 6. (4.) A motion, a course of action. Prov. v. 5. God's steps are the practice commanded in his law, and exemplified in his conduct. Job xxiii. 11. Christ's steps are his holy actions, imitable by us. 1 Pet. ii. 22. Men's steps are their motion on a journey, John v. 4, 5; or their counsels, endeavours, and acts. Psal. lxxiii. 2. and cxix. 133. The steps of men's strength are straitened, when their best planned devices, and their most vigorous and skilful endeavours, are hardly successful. Job xviii. 7. The Ethiopians are at the steps of the Turks, when easily oppressed by them. Dan. xi. 43.

STE-PHA'NAS, or STEPHEN; (1.) One of the first converts to Christianity at Corinth. He and his family were baptized by Paul. 1 Cor. i. 16. He, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, came to Paul at Ephesus, probably with a letter, in answer to which Paul wrote his first epistle, and sent it by these persons. 1 Cor. xvi. 17. (2.) STEPHEN the deacon. That he was one of our Saviour's seventy disciples, or that he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, is without proof. He appears to have been a principal person among the Hellenist Jews. After he was made a deacon, being filled with the Holy Ghost, he wrought many miracles. Some of the Libertine, Cyrenian, and Alexandrian Jews, fell into a dispute with him; but not being able to withstand his convincing reasonings, they suborned witnesses falsely to swear that he had blasphemed Moses and God. They hurried him before the sanhedrim, and charged him with reproaching the temple and the law; and with affirming, that Jesus would destroy the temple, and abolish the observances of Moses' laws. Instead of being depressed, Stephen, with a countenance bold and shining as an angel, rehearsed what God had done for the Jewish nation in former times, and how they had rebelled against him; and he rebuked them for their murder of Jesus and his prophets. Filled with rage, those present gnashed their teeth at him, as if they would have torn him to pieces. Lifting up his eyes to heaven, he told them, he saw Jesus sitting on the right hand of God. As if shocked with blasphemy, they stopped their ears, and with terrible cries dragged him out of the city and stoned him to death. Stephen expired, praying for forgiveness of God to his murderers; and with great demonstration of grief, was buried by his Christian friends. Acts vi. vii. and viii. 2.

STERN; the hinder part of a ship. Acts xxvii. 29.

STEWARD; an officer in great families, who has the management of the affairs of the family, and of the other servants. Gen. xv. 2. and xliii. 19. Ministers are stewards of the mysteries of God: they are appointed to preach the truths of God, and to dispense the seals of the new covenant, together with the government and discipline of the church, as is for the glory of God, and the edification of their people. 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2. Saints are stewards; God hath entrusted to them gifts, grace, and manifold opportunities of doing good, which they ought to manage to his honour and their own advantage. Luke xvi. 1—12. 1 Pet. iv. 10.

STICK; to cleave closely and firmly. The Egyptians stuck to the scales of Pharaoh-hophrah their king; some of them adhered closely to him, at the expence of losing every thing dear to them by the rebels and Chaldeans; and the rebels under Amasis stuck fast to him, purining and fighting against him till they had got him utterly destroyed. Ezek. xxix. 4. See ROD.

STIFF. See NECK, HEART.

STILL. See REST.

STING; that part of some animals which they use as an offensive weapon, and by it wound and distil venom into the flesh of their enemies. Some of these stings are bearded, and their wound is the more painful; and if the insect that stings be too quickly taken off, the sting is left in the wound. Sin is the sting of death; as it renders death troublesome and dangerous to men: but to such as are in Christ, this sting is taken away by his death for sin: and they depart in peace to be with the Lord. 1 Cor. xv. 55, 56. The stings of the tails of the locusts may denote the hurtful and ruinous delusions spread by the Papists and Saracens, or the hurtful ravages of the common troops of the latter. Rev. ix. 10.

STINK. Men stink, when they become abhorred of others. Gen. xxxiv. 30. 1 Sam. xiii. 4.

STIR; a noisy tumult. Isa. xxii. 1. Acts xix. 23. God stirs up himself, or stirs up his jealousy, when, in a vigorous manner, he beards and delivers his people, and destroys his enemies. Psal. xxxv. 23. Isa. xliii. 13. Christ is stirred up, when he is provoked to withdraw his sensible presence from his people. Sol. Song ii. 7. and iii. 5. Men stir up themselves to take hold of God, when they use meditation and prayer to excite, trust in, and to intercede with him. Isa. lxiv. 7. Men stir up the gift of God in them, when they use every endeavour in their power to improve their gifts and graces in serving God. 2 Tim. i. 6.

STOCK; (1.) That part of a tree which bears the branches. Job xiv. 8. (2.) Kindred that grow from one root. Lev. xxv. 47. Acts xiii. 26. (3.) An idol so called, because framed of the stock of a tree; or because upright, and as stupid and lifeless as one. Jer. ii. 27. and x. 8. Hos. iv. 12. The stocks were a machine for torturing malefactors; in which they sat in the most uneasy manner, hanging as it were by the legs. Acts xvi. 24. Jer. xx. 2. To them terrible and tormenting distress is prepared. Job xiii. 27. Prov. vii. 22.

STOICS, were a sect of heathen philosophers, who took their rise from one Zeno a Cyprian, who being shipwrecked near Tyre, commenced philosopher. It is said he borrowed many of his opinions from the Jewish scriptures: but it is certain that Socrates and Plato had taught much of them before. From his teaching his scholars in the porches of Athens, they were called Stoics, or porchers. They generally taught that God, as a kind of soul, fills all things; that men have naturally the seeds of knowledge; that it is wisdom alone that renders men happy; that pain, poverty, &c. are but fancied evils; and that a wise man ought not to be affected with either joy or grief. In their practice, they affected much stiffness, patience, austerity, and insensibility. Diversities of opinion on various other points prevailed among them. The Stoics were for many ages in high repute, especially at Athens, where some of them argued with Paul. Acts xvii. 18.

STOMACHER. Whether the Hebrew PETHIGIL signifies a stomach, or an upper garment, or a girdle of twisted silk, or a silken swathing band, cannot now be determined with exactness. Isa. iii. 24.

STONES are either common, as free-stone, rag-stone, slate, flint. Others are of higher value, as marble, alabaster, jasper, loadstone, asbestos, and metal ore; others are precious; some of which are colourless, as the diamond; others red, as the ruby, carbuncle, granite, sardius, cornelian; others pale, as the onyx; others yellow, as the chrysolite and topaz; others green, as the emerald, smaragdine, and beryl; others bluish, as the sapphire and turquois; others purple-coloured, as the amethyst. Such gems are called stones of fire; they are very bright and shining. Ezek. xxviii. 14. Some think the Hebrews had knives of stone; but perhaps tzur may in these places signify the edge. Exod. iv. 25. Josh. v. 2. It is certain, they set up large stones to commemorate famous exploits, or to mark the graves of noted persons: hence we read of the stone of Bohan a Reubenite, the stone of Ezel, and the stone of Gibeon, the stone of Zobelet, &c. or heaps of stones; such a heap Jacob reared to perpetuate the memory of his covenant with Laban. Gen. xxxi. 46. To commemorate Israel's safe passage through Jordan Joshua erected twelve stones in the bed of the river, and set up other twelve, which he carried out of the middle bed of the river, on its banks. Josh. iv. 5—9. To be a memorial of their being part of the people of the God of Israel, the Reubenites, Gadites, and eastern Manassites, built an altar of stones, called Ed, on the bank of Jordan. But to shew that no human inventions are acceptable in God's worship, no altar was to be built of hewn stones. Deut. xxvii. 5. Stones of darkness, are those hid deep in the bowels of the earth. Job xxviii. 2. Christ is called a stone, to shew his firmness and duration: he is the foundation-stone which supports the whole church, and the work of our redemption. Isa. xxviii. 16; he is the chief-corner stone, which connects and establishes the church, and all her concerns; and by which Jews and gentiles, and angels and men, are as it were joined into one. Matt. xxi. 42. Eph. ii. 15, 20. He is a most precious stone; infinite in glory, excellency, and usefulness; he is a tried stone, proved by his Father, and by his people, and by fiery sufferings, and yet no fault or deficiency found in him: he is a chosen or elect stone, chosen by the Father to be our Mediator, valuable in himself, and chosen by the saints in the day of his power: he is a living stone; has all life in himself, and gives to his people the beginning, continuance, and perfection of their life. Rev. xxi. 11. Isa. xxviii. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 4. He is to many a stumbling stone, and rock of offence, as they, taking offence at his mean appearances, or at his doctrine and ways, stumble into everlasting ruin, and on whomsoever he falls in the execution of his wrath, they are miserably destroyed. Isa. viii. 14, 15. 1 Pet. ii. 8. Matt. xxi. 44. He and his church are a little stone cut out of the mountain without hands, and increasing into a mountain that filled the whole earth: he was born of a virgin, and appeared in a low condition; but his glory gradually increases, till it fill the whole earth; his Christian church, small at first, and formed without carnal means, gradually increases till it extend over the whole earth. Dan. ii. 44. The saints are living stones; they are hardy and durable, and are united to Christ as their foundation, quickened by his Spirit, and active in his service. Amos ix. 9. 1 Pet. ii. 5. The precious stones, foundations of the New Jerusalem, denote Jesus Christ preached by the twelve apostles, and as the foundation of his church and people, in his various and unnumbered excellencies. Rev. xxi. 19, 20. The precious stones on the shoulder of the high-priest, and those fixed in his breast-plate, denoted the saints of Jews and gentiles, precious and honourable by the grace of God, and diversified in their condition; but all unchangeably fixed in their new covenant state, and by Jesus daily supported and presented to God. Exod. xxviii. 11, 17—21.

Daughters of a family are likened to polished corner stones, to mark their beauty and their usefulness for connecting and building up families. Psal. cxliv. 12. Hearts stupid and obdurate, not easily impressed by the word or providence of God, are compared to stones. Ezek. xi. 19. and xxxvi. 26. 1 Sam. xxi. 27. Mark iv. 5, 16. The stone crying out of the wall, and the beam answering it, denote the horrid wickedness of building with what is unjustly procured. Hab. ii. 11. One stone not left upon another, and stones of emptiness, and scattered stones spread over a place, denote utter desolation, and the turning of Idumea into a barren rock. Matt. xxiv. 2. Isa. xxxiv. 11. Psal. cxli. 6. In allusion to the Greek custom of marking their acquittal by white stones, a white stone given by Christ, denotes a full pardon, and a glorious reward; or it may denote Jesus himself. Rev. ii. 17. A gift is like a precious stone; it is highly valued, and tends to procure for us what we wish. Prov. xvii. 8. As he that bindeth a stone in a sling, rendereth it unfit for being thrown; so, to give honour to a fool, is quite unprofitable; or it is as useless work as to cast a precious stone into a heap of stones; or it is as ill-placed as a coarse stone, when bound up in a piece of fine purple cloth. Prov. xxvi. 8.

STOOLS; a seat for women in child-birth, to promote their delivery. Exod. i. 16. The same word is translated wheels; or a frame for a potter. Jer. xviii. 8.

STOP; (1.) To close up. 2 Tim. iii. 19. (2.) To hinder; to cause to cease. 2 Cor. xi. 10. To stop breaches, is to repair and build up. Neh. iv. 7. See MOUTH, EAR.

STOOP; (1.) To bow down. John viii. 6. (2.) To fall into a low condition; to come to ruin. Isa. xlv. 1. (3.) To act secretly. Gen. xlix. 9.

STORE; (1.) Provision laid up. Gen. xli. 36. (2.) Abundance; plenty. Gen. xxvi. 14. God lays up his judgments in store, and seals them among his treasures, when he decrees them, and prepares to execute them. Deut. xxxii. 34. Men store up violence and robbery, when they increase in it more and more, and treasure up what they procure by means of it. Amos iii. 10. To lay up in store for the poor, is to set aside and collect money for them. 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Store-cities, are cities in which food, clothing, armour, or other necessary things, are laid up. 2 Chron. viii. 4. and xvii. 12. Store-houses, or granaries, are houses for laying up corn, and other provision, in store. 1 Chron. xxvii. 25. God lays up the sea in store-houses; in its proper bed, that it may remain there till he draw it forth for rain, hail, or snow, as he pleaseth. Psal. xxxiii. 7. The gospel-church and heaven, are Christ's GARNER or BARN, into which he brings his chosen people, and lays them up for his own use. Matt. iii. 12. and xiii. 30. See TREASURE.

STORK; a FOWL. Its beak and legs are long and red. Its plumage or feathers are white, except that the tip of its wings, and some parts of its head and thighs are black. A stork is about the size of a goose; but when they stand erect, they are about three or four feet high. They feed on frogs, serpents, and insects; they are extremely careful of, and kind to their parents. They build their nests in fir-trees in Canaan, as there the houses were flat. Psal. civ. 17. But in Europe, they build their nests on towers and tops of houses. They are birds of passage, which in August leave the cold climates, and return to them in the spring. Jer. viii. 7. The Jewish law declared them unclean, Lev. xi. 19; but they are now reckoned a delicate dish. Besides the common stork, there is a black species in Egypt, called the ibis, famed for devouring serpents. There is also a grey kind in Brazil, called magauri. Some storks are extremely intent on revenging injuries, even long after they are committed against them.

STORM; a tempest of wind or rain, or of both mixed. Acts xxvii. 18, 20. God's judgments are likened to a storm or tempest; as they terrify, distress, and destroy men, and ruin the wicked. Job xxvii. 21. Psal. lxxxiii. 15. and xi. 6. Isa. xxx. 30. and liv. 11. Destroying armies are compared to a storm; they, with great noise, suddenly attack, ruin, and destroy nations and places. Ezek. xiii. 11. and xxxviii. 9. It shall be very tempestuous, or stormy, round about him.—God's deliverance of his people from the Assyrians and Chaldeans, was ushered in with terrible calamities on the nations. Christ's coming in the flesh, was preceded by terrible wars, by and among the Romans; and his death and ascension were followed by the terrible overthrow of the Jewish nation; his deliverance of his church from the heathen emperors, was attended with fearful commotions and bloodshed, and so shall his coming to destroy Antichrist:—and what tremendous appearances will usher in his last coming, we cannot conceive. Psal. l. 3.

STORY; (1.) A history, an account of events. 2 Chron. xlii. 22. (2.) A floor of a building, where there are rooms one above another. Noah's ark; and Ezekiel's visionary side chambers, had three stories, one above another. Gen. vi. 16. Ezek. xlv. 16. The heavens being, as it were, erected one above another, are called God's stories, i. e. of his palace. Amos ix. 6.

STOUT; strong, full of courage, and terrible. Job iv. 11. Dan. vii. 20. Stoutness of heart and words imports obstinate haughtiness and pride. Isa. xlv. 12. Mal. iii. 13.

STRAIGHT; (1.) Even; without crookedness. Luke xlii. 13. Acts ix. 11. (2.) Plain; without risings and hollows, or impediments. (3.) Directly forward, without turning to either side. Josh. vi. 5. None can make straight what God has made crooked; i. e. nobody can alter the purposes or providences of God, or free their own lot of those afflictions that God has appointed to it. Eccl. vii. 13. and i. 15.

STRAIGHTWAY; in a little while; immediately. 1 Sam. ix. 13.

STRAIN. See GNAT.

STRAIT; (1.) Narrow, and with little room. 2 Kings vi. 1. (2.) A distressful difficulty, in which one knows not what to do. 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. Job xxxvi. 16. See GATE.

STRAITEN. To straiten persons, is to disable them, Mic. ii. 7; or to trouble them. Job xviii. 7. Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels; your trouble and sorrow concerning the incontinent person, is owing to yourselves, not to me; and your not having more comfort and pleasure in us, is owing to yourselves. 2 Cor. iv. 12.

STRAITNESS; want of liberty; trouble; perplexity. Job xxxvi. 16. Deut. xxviii. 53. Jer. xix. 9.

STRANGE; (1.) Of another nation, family, or religion. 1 Kings xi. 1. (2.) Uncommon. Job xxxi. 3. Isa. xxviii. 21. (3.) Unacquainted with; unknown. Gen. xlii. 7. Job xix. 3. Ezek. iii. 6. (4.) Not allowed of God; not proper to be used in such a manner; so common fire is called strange fire, as not proper to be used in burning incense. Lev. x. 1. Jude 7. Prov. xx. 16. Heb. xiii. 9.

STRANGER; (1.) One who is in a foreign land, at a distance from the place of his nativity. Gen. xxiii. 4. (2.) One who is not a Jew. Exod. xx. 10. Isa. xiv. 1. (3.) One not of Aaron's family. Numb. iii. 10. and xvi. 40. (4.) One that is not of the royal stock and family. Matt. xvii. 25, 26. (5.) Unknown; disregarded. Psal. lxxix. 8. (6.) Not our own property; thus whorish women are called strangers, and strange women. Prov. v. 10, 20. (7.) Captive; persecuted. Obad. 12. Heb. xiii. 2. (8.) The saints are strangers on earth; they are born from above; have their possession and conversation in heaven, and do but travel through this world to their home; and are disliked, and often ill-used by the men of it. Psal. xxxix. 12. Heb. xi. 13. (9.) Heathen, and profane and wicked persons, are called strangers; they are strangers to themselves, to God, to Christ, and to the new covenant, and to fellowship with God; and they hate and abhor the people of God. Eph. ii. 12. Joel. iii. 17. Psal. liv. 3. (10.) False teachers are called strangers, as they have no right to the office they assume; nor do Christ, or his people, as directed of him, own them, or cultivate intimacy with them. John x. 5. The strangers that devoured the strength of Ephraim, were the Syrians and Assyrians. Hos. vii. 9. The Ziphites were strangers; were wicked men, were unfriendly to David, even though they knew not of any offence he had given. Psal. liv. 1.

Anciently hospitality and kindness to strangers were much practised. As there were but few inns, it was common for well-disposed people to invite such strangers as they observed, to lodging and entertainment in their houses, Gen. xviii. and xix. Judg. xix; nor is it to our honour that this custom has become obsolete. Heb. xiii. 2. God required the Hebrews to use great kindness to strangers, who were not of the accursed nations; and in gleanings the fields or vineyards, and in several other instances, they were to be used as the fatherless and the widow; they also had access to the ordinances of God, and shared the benefits of the cities of refuge. Did not this intimate that, by the tender mercy of God, the gentiles, once long alienated from him, should be brought into a church-state, and enjoy the distinguished blessings of heaven? Exod. xxii. 1. Lev. xix. 10. Numb. xv. 14. xix. 10. and xxxv. 19.

STRANGLE; to kill by hanging, or tearing asunder, or it may be put for killing in general. Job vii. 5. The Assyrian king strangled for his lions; their kings murdered and spoiled other nations, that they might enrich their ladies and the state with the prey. Nah. ii. 13. Animals strangled had not the blood properly separated from the flesh, and were not eaten by the primitive Christians, to prevent offence to the Jewish converts. Acts xv. 20.

STRAW, to scatter; spread along. Exod. xxxii. 20. Matt. xxi. 8. To esteem iron as straw, and darts as stubble, is to fear no hurt from darts and other weapons made of it. Job xli. 27, 29. The lion shall eat straw as the ox; the most furious persecutors shall be rendered meek and laborious saints, feeding upon the simple and wholesome truths of the gospel. Isa. xi. 7.

STREAM. See WATER.

STREET; (1.) The broad ways in cities and towns. Gen. xix. 2. Prov. vii. 12. (2.) The houses that face these broad ways. Dan. ix. 25. Public ordinances, to which all men great and small, good and bad, have access, are called streets and broad ways. Prov. i. 20. Sol. Song iii. 2. The golden streets of the New Jerusalem, may either denote the pure and precious ordinances of the church in her millennial state; or Jesus, as the foundation of the saints' holy walk in heaven, as well as on earth. Rev. xxi. 23. Ministers are to go out into the streets, lanes, highways, and hedges, to call men to Christ;—they are in the most open, and diligent manner, to search out, and call sinners of every station, and in every place where Providence gives them an opportunity, to come to the Saviour. Luke xiv. 21, 23.

STRENGTH; (1.) Ability, natural, or spiritual. Job xxxix. 19. Psal. xx. 6. Rev. iii. 8. (2.) The cause of strength and ability. Neh. viii. 10; so God and Christ are called the strength of the saints. Exod. xv. 2. Psal. xcix. 4. Phil. iv. 8. God is the strength of Christ; he assists and supports him in his mediatory work. Psal. xxviii. 8. Christ is God's strength, as, in his work of mediation, God's strength is displayed, and his powerful influences conveyed to our heart. 1 Chron. xvi. 4. Isa. xxvii. 5. The ark is called God's strength; it was the symbol or badge of the presence of God with Israel, as their supporter, defender, and the cause of their strength. Psal. lxxviii. 61. compared with Psal. cxxxii. 8. The inhabitants of Jerusalem are their rulers' strength in the Lord; i. e. through his assistance, they support and defend them, and procure victory. Zech. xii. 5. (3.) That which possesses great power and ability: thus a numerous and valiant army are called strength. Judg. v. 21. The first-born are considered as the strength, or chief support of families. Gen. xlix. 8. Dent. xxi. 17. Psal. lxxviii. 51. and cv. 36. (4.) Youth, or mid-time of life, when one is at his full degree of strength. Job xxi. 23; and to give one's strength unto women, is to waste his youthful and strong constitution in whoredom. Prov. xxxi. 8. (5.) Effects of strength: so the high praises of Christ by the babes of Jerusalem, are called strength; they praised with all their might, and therein the power of God was manifested. Psal. viii. 2. A great deliverance wrought for the church, is called strength. Rev. xii. 10. The earth yields its strength, when it produces such a plentiful crop, as its natural quality, manure, and season, are capable of. Gen. i. 12.

STRENGTHEN; (1.) To make strong. 2 Chron. xii. 1. (2.) To encourage, in order to render bold and vigorous. Dent. iii. 28. Psal. lii. 7. (3.) To repair what is weak and decayed. Rev. iii. 2. God strengthens what he wrought for his people, when he secures to them the mercies he has already bestowed, and works for them still greater favours. Psal. lxxviii. 28. He strengthened the fountains of the great deep, when he fixed their channels of conveyance, and gave them their powers to cast forth their water. Prov. viii. 28.

STRONG; (1.) That which has much strength, or discovers much of it. Exod. vi. 1. (2.) Firm and sure. Psal. xxx. 7. (3.) Vehement and vigorous. Sol. Song viii. 6. Job xxxiii. 19. (4.) Courageous. Hag. ii. 4. Ezek. lii. 3. (5.) Large; abundant; and very invigorating. Heb. vi. 18. (6.) Loud. Lev. xviii. 2. Satan is called the strong man, and Christ the stronger: with much power and activity Satan keeps possession of, and exercises dominion over our heart; but with superior power, skill, and vigour, Jesus wrests it from him, and drives him out. Matt. xii. 29. Luke xi. 22.

STRETCH; (1.) To extend; spread out. Isa. xlii. 13. Psal. civ. God's stretching out his hand, imports his noted display of his power, Acts iv. 30; or his earnest invitation of sinners to the fellowship of his Son. Prov. i. 24. Men stretching their hands to God, or idols, imports worship of them as with hands lifted up, and expectation of good from them. Psal. lxxviii. 31. lxxxviii. 9. and xlii. 30. To stretch out the hand against one, is to rebel; to seek to destroy him. Job xv. 25. Luke xxii. 53. To stretch or reach the hand to the poor, imports desire and readiness to supply their wants. Prov. xxxi. 20. Stretching out of the neck, imports immodesty, haughtiness, and pride. Isa. iii. 16. Stretching on beds of ivory, and eating fatted lambs and calves, imports living in security, ease, and luxury. Amos vi. 4.

STRIKE; (1.) To give blows. Mark xiv. 66. (2.) To cut. Dent. xxi. 4. (3.) To pierce. Prov. vii. 23. Job vii. 23. (4.) To afflict; to punish. Isa. i. 5. and liii. 4, 8. (5.) To stroke gently. 2 Kings v. 11. (6.) To sprinkle with force. Exod. xi. 7, 22. To be stricken in years or age, is to be old. Luke i. 7. A striker, is one ready to come to blows with his neighbour, on the least provocation. Tit. i. 7.

STROKE (1.) A blow. Dent. xix. 5. (2.) Distress; calamity. Job xxxiii. 2. (3.) Sudden death. Job xxxvi. 28. Ezek. xxiv. 16. A fool's mouth calleth for strokes: his foolish language provokes God to afflict him, and men to chastise him. Prov. xviii. 6.

STRING for a bow. Psal. xxi. 12; or for a musical instrument. Psal. xxxii. 2.

STRIP; (1.) To take off clothes. Numb. xx. 26. (2.) To bereave men of wealth, honour, liberty, and other desirable things. Hos. ii. 8. Ezek. xvi. 39.

STRIPE; a lash with a whip or scourge. Dent. xxv. 3. (2.) A wound made by such a lash. Acts xvi. 23. (3.) Afflictions and punishments. Isa. liii. 5. 2 Sam. vii. 14. Luke xii. 47.

STRIPLING; a young man. 1 Sam. xvii. 56.

STRIVE; (1.) To contend in desires, in words, or with hands. Gen. xxvi. 20. (2.) To endeavour earnestly. Rom. xv. 20. (3.) To be given to strife and debate. 2 Tim. ii. 24. God strives with men, when, by the revelation of his will, the convictions of his Spirit, and the dispensations of his providence, he checks their progress in sin. Gen. vi. 3. God strive with the Levites at Kadesh, when he reproved and chastised Moses and Aaron their chiefs, for not sanctifying him before the people. Dent. xxxiii. 8. Men strive with God, when they resist the motions of his Spirit, condemn the offers of his grace, rebel against his laws, and oppose his providence by going on in their wickedness. Isa. xlv. 9. Job xxxiii. 13. They strive together in prayer, when, with the utmost earnestness, they jointly ask and plead for the bestowal of good things on ministers and others. Rom. xv. 30. They strive to enter in at the strait gate, when, in the careful and earnest use of God's ordinances, they study to receive Christ, and he created a new in him. Luke xiii. 24. They strive for the faith, and against sin, when they do or suffer to the uttermost, to maintain and promote the honour of gospel-truth, and to shun and oppose sin, in themselves and others. Phil. i. 27. Heb. xii. 4. STRIVING or STRIKE, imports all kind of contention, 1 Tim. vi. 4. Tit. iii. 9; or war. Judg. xii. 2. Psal. xxii. 44. The strife of tongues is abusive language; reproach. Psal. xxxi. 20. The Hebrews were made a strife to their neighbours, when the nations around strove with them and sought their ruin; or when they contended who should have the largest share of the captives and spoil. Psal. lxxx. 6.

STRONG. See STRENGTH.

STRUGGLE; to strive earnestly in close conflict. Gen. xxv. 22.

STUBBLE, is of little or no value; of no strength or force; is easily scattered with the wind, and easily burnt. Job xlii. 25. and xxi. 18. Joel ii. 3. Wicked men are as stubble, of small strength or worth, are easily scattered by the blasts of God's judgments, and burnt in the fire of his wrath. Psal. lxxxiii. 14. Isa. xl. 24. Mal. iv. 1. False doctrines are as STUBBLE, of no worth, of no force to convince or comfort men's consciences, and cannot abide the trial of God's word. 1 Cor. iii. 12. The Assyrian projects against the Jews were as stubble; their own breath as fire devoured them, and they were as the burning of lime; their purposes were quite fruitless, and their mad rage against the people of God brought ruin on themselves. Isa. xxxiii. 11, 12.

STUBBORN; obstinately bent upon an evil way, contrary to the will of God, or of human superiors. Deut. ix. 27. Prov. vii. 11. The Jewish law allowed parents to prosecute their stubborn children to death. Deut. xxi. 18, 21.

STUD; a button, or ornament. The ordinances of the church, and the gifts and graces of her members, are called studs of silver, as they mightily adorn her. Sol. Song i. 11.

STUDY; (1.) To meditate; think of. Prov. xv. 28. (2.) To devise, to plot. Prov. xxiv. 2. (3.) To endeavour earnestly. 1 Thess. iv. 11. The chief study of the Hebrews, commanded of God, was the knowledge and observation of his law: this they were to have deeply fixed in their heart, and on every proper occasion to discontinue thereon to their children. Exod. xiii. 9. Deut. vi. 7. They searched into the meaning of the predictions, and no doubt also of the types. Dan. ix. 2. 1 Pet. i. 11. They studied the histories and genealogies with great care; and, it is said, their children could have exactly rehearsed all those in the book of Chronicles. After the time of Alexander, they began to study heathen learning. In our Saviour's time, their great care was to invent carnal explications of the types and predictions of the scripture; but the traditions of the elders were their principal study; nor are they to this day cured of their folly.

STUFF; (1.) Household furniture. Gen. xxxi. 27. (2.) Corn, provision. 1 Sam. x. 23.

STUMBLE; (1.) To trip or slide with the foot, till one is in danger of falling. 1 Chron. xiii. 9. (2.) To fall into mistakes, dangers, or distress. Isa. lix. 10. and viii. 15. (3.) To take OFFENCE at any thing; and so to fall into sin and danger. Men stumble at Christ and his law, as their stumbling-block or stone, when, from wicked and carnal dispositions they disrelish his appearance, reject his person, and mistake the meaning of his law, and rebel against it. Rom. ix. 33. and xi. 11. 1 Cor. i. 23. 1 Pet. ii. 8. Mal. ii. 8. A stumbling-block, is any thing which, lying in one's way, which occasions his fall. Lev. xix. 14; or whatever occasions men to fall into sin and danger. Men's idols, and their wealth, are the stumbling-block of their iniquity; as they are the temptations to, and object or occasion of their sin, and the means of their ruin. Ezek. xiv. 12. and vii. 19. Zeph. i. 3. God lays a stumbling-block before men, when he visits them with such smiling and afflictive providences as they improve for their sinning and ruin. Ezek. iii. 20. Jer. vi. 21. By the imprudent use of Christian liberty in things indifferent, men lay a stumbling-block before others, as it occasions their losing their integrity and comfort. Rom. xiv. 13. 1 Cor. viii. 9. By advising Midianitish women to go into the Hebrew camp, and seduce them to whoredom and idolatry, Balaam laid a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, by means of which they were enticed to sin, and punished with death. Rev. ii. 14. Numb. xxv.

STUMP; (1.) The thickest part of a tree. Dan. iv. 15. It denoted Nebuchadnezzar's manhood, and his title to the kingdom. (2.) The body of the idol, between the legs and neck. 1 Sam. v. 4.

SUBDUCE. See CONQUER.

SUBJECT; (1.) Under law, obedient. Eph. v. 24. Col. ii. 20. Tit. iii. 1. And to SUBJECT, is to bring into a state of obedience. SUBJECTION, is a state of obedience, or bondage. Heb. ii. 5, 8. Psal. cvi. 42; or performance of obedience. 1 Tim. ii. 11. and iii. 4. The creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who subjected the same in hope. The lower creation, in its various parts, did not of its own accord fall into its present empty, disagreeable, and perishing state; but God, to punish man's sin, so reduced it, but intending to recover it to its former liberty and glory. Rom. viii. 20.

SUBMIT; to yield one's self to the will of another. 1 Chron. xxix. 24. To submit to the righteousness of God, is to prefer the obedience and suffering of Jesus Christ to our own righteousness, and accept it as the sole righteousness, that can justify us before God. Rom. x. 3.

SUBORN; to excite, hire, and direct one to bear false witness. Acta. vi. 11.

SUBSCRIBE; to confirm a writ of petition, bargain, or donation, by writing our name under it. To subscribe with the hand to the Lord, imports a solemn surrender of ourselves to Jesus Christ, as an all-sufficient Saviour, and honourable Master, whether in thought, word, or writing. Isa. xlii. 5.

SUBSTANCE; (1.) That which a person or thing consists of. Psal. cxxxix. 15. (2.) A creature. Gen. vii. 4. (3.) The nature, natural strength of a tree. Isa. vi. 13. (4.) The wealth that belongs to one. Deut. xi. 6. Josh. xiv. 4. (5.) A solid and lasting happiness of grace and glory. Prov. viii. 21. Heb. x. 34. The saints are the substance of a land; they are the most valuable persons in it, and are the means of averting judgments, and procuring blessings to it. Isa. vi. 13. Faith is the substance of things hoped for; it is a hearty, sure, substantial, and hope-supporting persuasion of the fulfilment of God's promises, which renders us as truly certain of the future blessedness, as if we already possessed it. Heb. xi. 11. If a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would be utterly contemned. Love to Jesus Christ cannot be purchased with worldly wealth; nor could all the wealth of creation bribe a lover of him, into a hater of him. Sol. Song viii. 7.

SUBTLE, crafty, capable and ready to beguile. Gen. iii. 1. Prov. vii. 10. SUBTLETY, with mischievous craft and deceit. 1 Sam. xxiii. 22. Acts vii. 19. SUBTLETY. (1.) Extensive skill and prudence. Prov. i. 4. and viii. 12. (2.) Deceitful craftiness. Acts xiii. 16.

SUBVERT; to turn away from truth and equity. Tit. i. 11. Lam. iii. 26. One is subverted, when quite turned aside from divine truth, and fixed in error. Tit. iii. 11.

SUBURBS, of a city include not only the buildings without the walls of their cities, but also the pasture grounds about it. The Levites had the ground without the walls of their cities, to the extent of 3000 cubits, or 5472 feet on every side. Numb. xxxv. 2, 7.

SUCCEED; to come into the place of others, after they are gone, thus a son; succeeds his father, by possessing what he had; and so the Hebrews succeeded the Canaanites in possessing their land. Deut. xxv. 6. and xii. 24. It also signifies to prosper in a work: and so success, is a happy issue. Josh. i. 8.

SUCCOTH; (1.) A place in Egypt, where the Hebrews first set up their tents, or Succoth. Exod. xii. 37. (1.) A city on the east of Jordan, and south of the sea of Galilee, built where Jacob set up his tents, or Succoth, as he came from Padan-aram. Gen. xxxiii. 17. It belonged to the Gadites. Josh. xiii. 27. The elders of this city were torn to pieces with thorns by Gideon, because they refused refreshment to his wearied troops. Judg. viii. It seems there was a valley near it, where perhaps Hiram cast the large utensils for the temple. Psal. lx. 6. 1 Kings vii. 46. Whether Succoth-Benoth be the Assyrian Venus or Mylitta, the obscene goddess, in honour of whom the Chaldean young women were bound once in their lives to prostitute themselves, by presenting themselves in, or before her temple: and each, being invited by a stranger's throwing a piece of money into their lap, retired with him for sinful intercourse, is only conjectured: but if so, it is plain, the Babylonian Samaritans introduced this abominable custom into Canaan. 2 Kings xvii. 30.

SUCCOUR; to help and relieve. 2 Sam. xviii. 2.

SUCK. To suck honey out of the rock, is to enjoy great plenty of outward happiness. Dent. xxxii. 13. To suck the abundance of the seas, is to enjoy profitable fisheries and sea-trade. Dent. xxxiii. 19. To suck the milk of the gentiles, and the breast of kings, is to be highly favoured by Cyrus, Antiochus the Great, and other gentile kings, and their subjects: or rather to have a multitude of gentiles and some of their chief rulers converted to the true church, and receive from them favour, assistance, wealth. Isa. lx. lxvi. 11, 12. and xlix. 23. To suck the poison of asps, and the cup of God's wrath, is to experience his astonishing and destructive judgments. Job xx. 16. Ezek. xxiii. 24.

SUCKLING, an infant that sucks its mother's breasts. Lam. ii. 11.

SUDDEN, hasty, unexpected. 1 Thess. v. 3.

SUDDENLY, (1.) In a very short time. Job v. 3. (2.) Unexpectedly. Acts ii. 2. Mark xiii. 26. (3.) Quickly, with much speed and diligence. 2 Chron. xxix. 36.

SUFFER; (1.) To permit, give leave to. Gen. xx. 6. Luke ix. 59. (2.) To bear affliction and death. 1 Thess. ii. 2. Heb. ii. 18. Christ's sufferings, are either what he himself suffered, Heb. ii. 10; or what his people suffer for his sake, 2 Cor. i. 5. Col. i. 24. To suffer with Christ, and as a Christian, and according to the will of God, is, in a state of union to Christ, cleaving to him, and dependence on him, to suffer persecution for his sake, in a holy, humble, patient, and self denying manner. Rom. viii. 18. 1 Pet. iv. 16, 19.

SUFFICE; (1.) To fill the belly. Numb. xi. 22. (2.) To be enough for. 1 Kings xx. 10. (3.) To give content to. Deut. iii. 26. John xiv. 8.

SUFFICIENT; (1.) What is needful. Exod. xxxvi. 7. (2.) Fit, able. 2 Cor. ii. 16. Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof: every day has enough troubles of its own, though we do not add thereto, by anxious thoughts about future times, we may never see. Matt. vi. 34.

SUIT. (1.) A suit of apparel. Judg. xvii. 10. Isa. iii. 22. (2.) A suit or controversy to be decided by a judge. 2 Sam. xv. 4. (3.) A petition or request. Job xi. 19.

SUM; (1.) A certain quantity or tale of money. Exod. xxi. 30. (2.) The whole number. Numb. i. 2. Psal. cxxxix. 17. (3.) An abridgement containing the principal substance of many particulars said or to be said. Heb. viii. 1.

SUMMER; the warm season of the year, wherein all things appear delightful and flourishing. Gen. viii. 22. In countries north of the equinoctial line, it begins about the 11th of June, and ends about the 11th of September: on the south of the equinoctial, it begins about the eleventh of December, and ends about the eleventh of March. For when the sun is nearest to us, he is furthest from them. In another reckoning, May, June, July, are our summer months; and November, December, and January, are theirs. Seasons of prosperity, and of opportunities of salvation, are called summer, as they are most useful and agreeable. Prov. x. 5. Zech. xiv. 8. Summer fruits, are such as are ripe, and must be eaten in summer. 2 Sam. xvi. 1. The fowls shall summer, i. e. feed a whole summer, and the beasts of the earth winter, i. e. feed a whole winter on their carcasses. Isa. xlviii. 6.

SUMPTUOUSLY; to live merrily on great plenty of delicate provision. Luke xvi. 19.

SUN; the well-known luminary, which by his presence forms our day, and by his absence our night. He is the great source of light and heat to our world, and his influences have a considerable share in the cause of vegetative growth. Perhaps the sun and the fixed stars, are immense bodies of fire, whose heat is preserved by their magnitude, and the mutual action and reaction between them and the rays they emit. The diameter of the sun is reckoned about 764,320 English miles; but Derham reckons it at 822,148, and Fergusson at 895,000. His mean distance from our earth is reckoned 76,80, or 81 millions of miles English: and so light comes from him to us in about eight minutes; but a cannon-ball shot thence, and moving 480 miles every hour, would take about nineteen years and three months to reach our earth. Perhaps its distance from our earth is 95,000,000 miles. It is now pretty generally agreed among philosophers, that the sun moves round his own axis, without much alteration of his place; and that the earth and other planets, move around him, as well as around their own axis, in their respective times. The most of their arguments are too abstracted for this work. They shew, that if the sun was to move around the earth, his motion, when in the equator, must be at the rate of about 380,000 miles in a minute; and the motion of Saturn, in the same time to be about 3,124,000 miles; and the motion of the fixed stars, to be incalculably more swift. They observe, that bodies falling from a great height, do not fall perpendicularly: the supposition that the earth is fixed, renders the motions of the planets quite inexplicable, and destroys the order and connection of the universe: they shew, that the rising and setting of the sun mentioned in scripture, only note its appearance and disappearance with respect to our horizon; that his running only signifies the alteration of his aspect with respect to our earth, and his standing still, the continuance for a time of the same aspect. His standing still at the prayer of Joshua, his going backward, as a sign to Hezekiah, and his preternatural eclipse, at the full moon, when our Saviour died, are the most noted circumstances that have happened to this luminary. Multitudes have taken occasion from the brightness and great usefulness of the sun, to worship him, and his representative idols, as one of their principal gods, under the names of Baal, Chemosh, Moloch, Phœbus, &c. Even with the Jews the worship of the sun was practised, and Josiah took away the horses, and burned the chariots consecrated in the temple to the sun. 2 Kings xxiii. 11. After his death, we find the Jews worshipping the sun, as he rose in the east, with their backs to the temple. Ezek. viii. 16.—From the rising to the setting of the sun, imports the whole world. Psal. cxlii. 3. Before the sun, or in the face of the sun, is in the most daring, public, and open manner. Jer. xviii. 2. Numb. xxv. 4. To continue while sun and moon endure, is to last very long, or for ever. Psal. lxxiii. 5, 17.

Almost every thing very glorious, lovely, and useful, is likened to the sun. To mark their infinite glory, excellency, gradual discovery to men, and their being the fountain of all true light and comfort, God is called a Sun. Psal. lxxviii. 11; and Christ a Sun of righteousness, that rises with healing under his wings, or rays. Mal. iv. 2. With this Sun of righteousness, as her head, and her righteousness, and sanctification, is the church clothed. Rev. xii. 1. To mark their amazing and unchanged glory, especially in the heavenly state, the saints are likened to the sun. Sol. Song vi. 10. Matt. xiii. 46. When a state is likened to the visible heaven, the kings and chief magistrates are likened to the sun, and the inferior magistrates, councils, officers, &c. are likened to the moon and stars; and bloody colour, or darkness coming on these, denote terrible disorder and ruin. Matt. xxiv. 29. Esak. xxxii. 7. Rev. vi. 12. and viii. 12. Acts ii. 20. When the church is likened to the visible heavens, the sun may denote the scripture, the moon instituted ordinances, and the stars ministers and their ministrations; their being darkened, imports the spread of ignorance, delusion, and error. Rev. viii. 12. and ix. 2. To mark prosperity and happiness, spiritual or temporal, it is likened to the sun and moon; and the darkening, or going down thereof, imports adversity. Rev. xxi. 23. Isa. lx. 20. Job xxx. 26. Amos viii. 9. Jer. xv. 9. The moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion, and before his ancients gloriously. Idols, even the chief ones, shall be abhorred; kings and great men shall be astonished; when the Lord saves his people from the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and when he re-establishes them in the millennial state; then shall there be greater degrees of holiness and obedience to Christ, than had been either under the Old or New Testament periods before. Isa. xxiv. 23. The sun must not go down upon our wrath; angry passions must be quickly checked, that the prince of darkness may not during the night more and more inflame them: Eph. iv. 26.

SUP; to take food, especially at night. Luke xvii. 8. Christ's supping with his people, denotes their delightful fellowship with him, and receiving out of his fulness, to the spiritual comfort and strengthening of their souls. Rev. iii. 20. To sup up, is to waste, destroy. Isa. xlii. 14. Their faces shall sup up as an east wind: the Chaldeans from the east shall as easily consume the Jews and their wealth, as the east wind blasts the fruits of the ground. Hab. i. 9.

SUPPER, the evening meal. The second sacrament of the gospel-church is called the LORD'S SUPPER, because first observed in the evening of the day; and as his body and blood, or person and righteousness, and blessings, under the symbols of bread and wine, are therein represented, sealed, and applied to his people, in the evening, or last ages of the world, till he return to judgment. 1 Cor. xi. 20. The gospel-dispensation is called a great supper; it is bestowed by the great God, in the last ages of the world; and by the large communication of blessing therein, multitudes are fitted to enter the eternal state; and with it shall the mystery of God's providence be finished. Luke xiv. 16-24. The happiness of the millennium is called a marriage-supper; then multitudes shall be converted to Christ, and delightfully share of his blessings. Rev. xix. 9. The terrible carnage and spoil of the papists before the millennium, is called the supper of the great God, with which he feasts the beasts and the Protestants. Rev. xix. 17.

SUPERFLUITY of naughtiness, the indulgence of wicked and corrupt affections. Jam. i. 21.

SUPERFLUOUS; (1.) Not necessary. 2 Cor. ix. 1 (2.) More than enough. Lev. xxi. 18.

SUPERScription; (1.) The inscription on coined money, shewing by whose order it was coined. Matt. xxii. 20. (2.) A writing on Christ's cross, stating that he was a King of the Jews. When the Romans condemned a man to be publicly executed, the crime for which he suffered was written in large letters on a tablet, and carried before him; and if he was crucified, it was, at least frequently, fixed to the top of his cross, that all might read, and avoid the like crime. To manifest our Saviour's innocence, his cross was marked with no crime, but with an express assertion of his true Messiahship. Mark xv. 26.

SUPERSTITION, or WILL-WORSHIP, in religion, is performing things not required by God, or abstaining from what he has not forbidden. Col. ii. 13. Festus the Roman reckoned the Jewish religion superstition. Acts xxv. 19. The Athenians were very superstitious. Acts xvii. 22.

SUPPLANT; to trip up one's heels, and by deceit get into the possession of what belongs to him. Gen. xxvii. 26. Jer. ix. 4.

SUPPLIANTS; such as in the humblest manner request favours: such Jewish and gentile converts are to God under the gospel. Zeph. iii. 10.

SUPPLICATION; a begging by humble prayer. 1 Sam. xiii. 12. Phil. iv. 6.

SUPPLY; to furnish what is wanting, whether in temporals or spirituals. Paul's Christian brethren supplied him with outward necessities. 2 Cor. xi. 9. Epaphroditus supplied the Corinthians with gospel-instructions. Phil. ii. 30. And God supplies all the need of his people, whether grace or glory, out of, and according to his riches of mercy, treasured up in Christ Jesus. Phil. iv. 19.

SUPPORT; to uphold; to relieve and supply as necessary. Acts xx. 35. 1 Thess. v. 11.

SUPPOSE; (1.) To think, to take for granted. 2 Sam. xiii. 22. (2.) To intend. Phil. i. 16. Our Saviour was supposed or thought to be the son of Joseph. Luke iii. 13. Peter supposed the dispersed Jews would reckon Silvanus a faithful and friendly brother, and would reckon his letter but short. 1 Pet. v. 12.

SUPREME; highest, the chief magistrate. 1 Pet. ii. 12.

SUR; the east gate of the Jewish temple, called the gate of the foundation, 2 Chron. xxiii. 5; and the higher gate, because of its beauty and height, 2 Kings xv. 23; and the new gate as it was rebuilt by king Jotham, Jer. xxxvi. 10. 2 Chron. xxvii. 3: and afterwards called beautiful. Acts iii. 2.

SURE; (1.) Firm and lasting. 1 Sam. ii. 35. (2.) Certain, and of which we may be fully persuaded. Exod. iii. 19. Numb. xxii. 23. (3.) Very heedful. Deut. xii. 28. Men make their calling and election sure, not by having any part in fixing God's purpose of election; but by rendering the evidence of it sure, by a course of good works. 2 Pet. i. 10. Where our translation has a more sure word of prophecy; it is by the Dutch, French, and other translations rendered most sure word of prophecy; and it is evident our own translators in Matt. xi. 11. and xxii. 13. 1 Cor. xiii. 13. and xv. 19. render a Greek comparative by a superlative. However, it may be said, the Old Testament prophecies, which were inspired by God, uttered and spoken by prophets, and already fulfilled, were more sure than the human testimony of Peter, James, and John, as to what they had heard in the mount of transfiguration; at least were accounted more sure by the Jews; not more sure than the Father's declaration, but than the report of Peter, James, and John, respecting it, or the prophecies did more clearly and firmly ascertain Christ's second coming, than his transfiguration in the mount did. 2 Pet. i. 19.

SURELY, is, without the least doubt or failure. Exod. iii. 7. and xxii. 6. Where surely occurs in our Old Testament version, the Hebrews have very often a redoubled verb, which at once enhances the sense, and adds solemnity to the affirmation. Thou shalt surely die: Heb. In dying thou shalt die; i. e. thou shalt certainly die every kind of death in a most shameful and terrible manner. Gen. ii. 17. I surely will have mercy on him: Heb. In having tender mercy, I will have tender mercy on him: i. e. without fail I will exercise my tenderest mercy towards him, in every form suited to his case, and in every degree, above what he can ask or think. Jer. xxxi. 20. Of a surety, is certainly, without fail. Gen. xv. 13. Acts xii. 11.

SURETY; one who undertakes to pay a debt or to perform a service for another, or to procure his safety. Judah became surety to Jacob for the safety of Benjamin in his journey to Egypt. Gen. xliii. 9. and xlv. 82. Paul became surety to Philemon, to pay him whatever debt Onesimus owed him. Philem. 18, 19. Sureties used to strike hands with the creditor, to mark their obligation to see the debt paid, or the service performed. Prov. vi. 1, 2. The scripture forbids suretyship, or engagement for the payment of other people's debt, as it tends to ruin one's own family and estate; multitudes being careless of paying their debt, if once a neighbour has become surety for them. Prov. xxii. 26. and xi. 15. It is especially dangerous to be surety for the debt, or the good behaviour of strangers and whores. Prov. xx. 16. and xxvii. 18. Job begs that God would lay down his pledge, and give him his surety, that he would secure his having his cause fairly heard and tried, as his friends had, through ignorance and prejudice, quite misjudged it. Job xvii. 3, 4. David prays that God would be his surety for good, i. e. would infallibly, and through Christ, secure his safety and happiness; as a surety protects the debtor from the hands of unmerciful creditors. Psal. cxix. 122. Jesus Christ is the surety of the better testament, or covenant; he, not with sinful transgressors, but taking the whole upon himself, engaged in the new covenant to bear the punishment due to his people's sin, and to fulfil the whole precepts of the law in their stead. Heb. vii. 22. Luke xxix. 26. Matt. iii. 15. As God owes no debt, and his promises cannot be rendered more sure in themselves, Christ is not a surety for God to us, though as a witness he attests the promises, and though the depositing of all their fulness in his hand encourages our faith to believe them. Nor is Christ surety for our faith, repentance, and new obedience, as these are in no sense proper and meritorious conditions of the new covenant, but are blessings secured to us by the Father as the reward of Christ's finished righteousness. Psal. xxii. 26—31. Isa. liii. 10—12.

SURFEITING; an overcharge of the stomach by too much meat. Luke xxi. 34.

SURMISINGS; suspicious thoughts and hints, to the injury of our neighbour's reputation. 1 Tim. vi. 4.

SURPRISE; to seize suddenly. Isa. xxxiii. 14. Jer. xlviii. 41.

SUSTAIN; (1.) To uphold in danger and under the pressure of adversity. Psal. iii. 5. (2.) To secure provision to support life. Gen. xxvii. 37. 1 Kings xvii. 9.

SUSTENANCE, necessary provision for the support of life. Judg. vi. 4.

SWADDLE; to roll up young infants in bands, to keep their joints in a proper state till they become fixed. Lam. ii. 22. Darkness is represented as a swaddling band to the ocean, as it dwells on the south and north parts of it for a considerable time. Job xxxviii. 7.

SWALLOW; a bird of a black colour, with some spots of a dirty black under its belly. Its voice is twittering. Isa. xxxviii. 14. Its sight quick, and its flight very unequal. It builds its nest of clay, and ordinarily in chimneys or desolate houses; and, it is said, from year to year in the same place. Swallows are birds of passage. Jer. viii. 7. Prov. xxvi. 2. In spring and summer they tarry in cold countries, and retire to warmer climes in the harvest and winter, and are said to breed in both: but numbers of them continue in cold countries during the winter, in a torpid state, when they hang clustered in holes of walls, banks of rivers, or even under water in marshes and lakes. As it is very unlikely that swallows or sparrows could build their nest in the altar, on which the sacrifices were daily burnt, (Psal. lxxxiv. 8.) the text must either only mean that they had their nests near to the altar; or perhaps the words might be translated, to signify that the Psalmist's soul as affectionately longed for God's altars, or public ordinances, as birds do to return to their nests and young. Perhaps the word DEROR means the ring-dove or wild pigeon. Prov. xxvi. 2. Psal. lxxxiv. 3.

SWALLOW; (1.) To take down by the throat into the stomach. Exod. vii. 12. Numb. xvi. 30. (2.) To seize upon, oppress, retain, or destroy irrecoverably. Job xx. 18. Ezek. xxxvi. 3. Job's words were swallowed up, when quite insufficient to express his inward grief. Job vi. 3.

Death is swallowed up in victory, and mortality of life, when suffering and death for ever give place to everlasting life and happiness. 1 Cor. xv. 54. 2 Cor. v. 4. The earth swallowed up the flood which the dragon vomited forth against the church. The Romans, the barbarous Goths, &c. by their mutual wars, prevented each other from persecuting the church; and carnal covetousness, for their selfish ends, confuted the heresies that sprung up in the church. Rev. xii. 16.

SWAN; a large water fowl; the body is perfectly white, but its feet are black. It is very gentle; frequents rivers, but seldom dives into them, or flies much. The flesh of swans is blackish, and hard of digestion. They are said to sing, when aged and near death. They were unclean by the Jewish law, and might figure out wicked men, beautiful in gifts and outward endowments, but unseemly and earthly in their behaviour. Lev. xi. 18. Bochart supposes this TINSUMETH to mean the night-owl.

SWARM; a great multitude of insects. Judg. xiv. 8.

SWEAR. See OATH.

SWEAT; (1.) The moisture that exudes from the pores of animals' bodies, when heated with labour; and also such hard labour as causes sweat. Gen. iii. 19. Sometimes terror has caused persons to sweat blood. Our Saviour, oppressed with the weight of his Father's wrath, sweat great drops of blood, when lying on the ground, in a cold night. Luke xxii. 44. Gospel ministers not being clothed with what causes sweat, imports their not being under the power of sloth, to render their business toilsome to them; or bent on self-righteousness and superstition, in working out which, men do but toilsomely sweat for their own corruption. Ezek. xliv. 18.

SWEEP; to carry off wholly, and with great ease. Judg. v. 21. Christ sweeps the house to find his lost piece of silver, when he carries off the wealth, and cuts off the life of multitudes; when he removes their vain confidence, reforms the corruptions of a country, and raises a commotion in men's consciences, in order to promote their coming to himself. Luke xv. 8. God's judgments sweep nations, when they cut them off, and destroy their wealth. Isa. xiv. 23. and xxviii. 17. So oppressors of the poor, like a sweeping rain, that carries off every thing before it, seize on every thing that comes in their way. Prov. xxviii. 3. Satan's house was swept and garnished: the Jewish nation, after their rejection of the gospel, were, and all apostates are, fully prepared for his return unto them. Matt. xii. 44.

SWEET; delightful; pleasant. Prov. ix. 17. The wine of gospel-truth goeth down sweetly, when it is received into men's hearts with readiness, delight, and pleasure; or it goeth down straightly, has a direct tendency to bring souls to Christ; or it goeth down to uprightness, leads men to embrace Jesus' imputed righteousness, and to practise gospel-holiness;—or goeth down to the upright, tends to their profit and advantage. Sol. Song vii. 9. The sweetness of the lips, is useful and kind conversation. Prov. xvi.

21. The sweetness of a friend, is his delightful company. Prov. xxvii. 9.

SWELL; (1.) To rise in boils, or as leavened dough. Deut. viii. 4. (2.) To rise higher than ordinary: so the Jordan swelled, when the snow on Lebanon melted, and overflowed its banks and so dislodged the lions from its thickets. 1 Chron. xii. 15. In this manner the Chaldeans invaded the countries around; and the Medes invaded Chaldea, and destroyed or drove out the inhabitants. Jer. xlix. 19. and l. 44. The swellings of Jordan denote extreme trouble, through which there is scarcely any passing; as when the Jews were led captive to Babylon. Jer. xii. 5. Swellings: proud, envions indignation at others. 2 Cor. xii. 20. Swelling words, are heretics' proud boasting of their distinguished sense; or their vain language, without sentiment; or their horrid blasphemies against God, and his cause and people; or the high titles they take to themselves, and give to their favourites. 1 Pet. ii. 28. Jude 16.

SWIFT; (1.) Quick in motion. Eccl. ix. 11. (2.) That which will come in a very little time. 1 Pet. ii. 1. Mal. iii. 5. (3.) Much inclined and ready to a thing, as to hear, &c. Jam. i. 19. To intimate how quickly our life passeth away, it is compared to a swift shuttle, post, ship, shadow, and wind. Job vii. 6. and ix. 25, 26, &c.

SWIM; to move in the water. David's causing his bed to swim with tears, imported great grief and sorrow. Psal. vi. 7. God is like a swimmer, spreading out his hands to swim, when he extends his judgments far and wide. Isa. xxv. 11. Pharaoh-hophra was like a swimming fish, when he almost constantly prospered, and rioted in ease and luxury. Ezek. xxxii. 6.

SWINE; well-known ravenous animals; they feed on carrion, husks, and other vile provision: nay, some of them eat their own young. They look towards, and dig in the earth, wallow in mires; and by excessive wallowing, or dancing, or carrying of straw to their styes, they presage bad weather; they are lazy and sleepy, and very mischievous to gardens and fields. The Scythians, Arabs, and Egyptians, had an aversion to swine. The Jewish law stated them to be unclean animals; and the Jews so abhorred swine, that they would not name them. They are emblems of sinners delighting in their wickedness, sleeping in their sins, contemning Christ, the pearl of great price, returning to their old sins, persecuting the saints, and living to no spiritual use in the world. Lev. xi. 7. Matt. vi. 6. 2 Pet. ii. 22. Though under Antiochus Epiphanes, many of the Jews suffered death rather than eat swine's flesh, yet in our Saviour's time we find them brought up in Galilee, and 2000 of them possessed and drowned by devils. Matt. viii. 30—34. To mark his contempt of their religion, Adrian, the Roman emperor, set up a swine's image in the gate of the city, which he built on mount Calvary, about sixty years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

SWOON; to faint away from want of food. Lam. ii. 11, 12.

SWORD; (1.) A warlike instrument for defence against, or for attacking an enemy.

(2.) War and its attendant calamities. Lev. xxvi. 25. Jer. xlii. 16. Esau and his posterity the Edomites, lived by the sword; by rapine and war. Gen. xvii. 40. The sword is said to return into his sheath, or scabbard, and to be quiet, when the calamities of war cease. Jer. xlvii. 6. Ezek. xxi. 30. (3.) Judgments sent for the punishment of transgressors, Deut. xxxii. 41, 42; particularly, the persecution, contention, and other evils occasioned by men's opposition to the gospel. Matt. x. 34. God is the sword of his people's excellency, as by him they are protected, and obtain victory and triumph over their enemies. Dent. xxxiii. 29. The scriptures are a sword, a sharp two-edged sword, and the sword of the Spirit: they are used by Jesus Christ and his Spirit, and by ministers and saints, they wound the conscience, defend the soul, and are useful in the spiritual warfare, for resisting and overcoming sin, Satan, and the world of profane, hypocritical and heretical men: they are Christ's sword proceeding out of his mouth, from his authority and will; and are girt on his thigh, ready to be the means of conquering and converting sinners to himself. Eph. vi. 17. Sol. Song iii. 8. Rev. i. 16. and xix. 15. Psal. xlv. 8. Perhaps Christ himself, for his searching, convincing, and conquering influence, is likened to a sharp two-edged sword. Heb. iv. 11, 12. The magistrates' power of defending the innocent and punishing the guilty, is called a sword. Rom. xiii. 4. Psal. cxlix. 6. All that take the sword, shall perish by the sword: self-avengers, and usurpers of magistracy, generally perish in their attempts. Matt. xxvi. 52. A wicked tongue, malicious and reproachful language, are like swords and spears; it produces ruin, wounds men's character and spirit, and tends to hurt their persons or wealth. Psal. lvii. 4. and lxiv. 3. To turn back the edge of the sword, is to disable for self-defence, and to reduce the man to trouble and misery. Psal. lxxxix. 48. To beat swords into plough-shares, and spears into pruning-hooks, imports the ceasing from war, and enjoyment of great peace and liberty, spiritual or temporal, attended with much activity and diligence in improving one's fields, gifts, or graces. Isa. ii. iv. Mic. iv. 3. To beat ploughshares into swords, and pruning-hooks into spears, imports such terrible war that will require all hands, and occasion the fields to lie uncultivated. Joel iii. 10. What if the sword condemn the rod? it shall be no more: What if the enraged Chaldeans, contemning the king and governors of Judah, exceed the bounds of a trial, and make an utter destruction?—it shall not so happen. Ezek. xxi. 18.

SYCAMINE; SYCAMORE; or the Egyptian fig-tree, partook of the nature of the fig and mulberry-trees, as its name imports. Its leaves resembled those of the mulberry, and its fruit that of the fig-tree; the fruit grows to the trunk of the tree, which is sometimes so large that three men can hardly grasp it. It is always green, and bears fruit at several seasons of the year. To render it fruitful, incisions are made in the bark, at which a whitish liquor flows out. It is said, the fruits are not ripe, or sweet, except it be scratched by the nail, or rubbed with an iron comb. Sycamore figs are yellowish, and very luscious, and at best, coarse provision. Sycamores were common in Egypt, Judea, and other places; and the wood was used in Egypt for coffins; in the mummy pits, it has been found fresh, when 3000 years old; and in Judea, it was used for building of common houses, 1 Kings x. 27; so, to change sycamores into cedars, is to render the buildings of cities, and the state of the nation, much more glorious than before. Isa. ix. 10.

SY-E'NE; an ancient city of Egypt, near the north border of Ethiopia, on the east of the Nile, and whose ruins are still seen near the present Assuan. Our version represents the tower of Syene at the greatest distance from Cush, or Ethiopia: but either Cush signifies Cushan in Arabia, or Syene is the same as SIN; or rather the words may be read, From Migdol to Syene, even to the border of Ethiopia, i. e. over the whole country of Egypt. Ezek. xxix. 10.

SYNAGOGUE; places where the Jews met for public worship on ordinary occasions, as we do in churches. The period when synagogues, properly so called, had their rise, is uncertain. It is pretty plain, that before the captivity, the law was not read in them every Sabbath, as it was afterwards: hence Jehoshaphat's itinerant teachers had to carry a copy of it along with them, 2 Chron. xvii. 9; and its contents were much unknown in the time of Josiah. 2 Kings xxii. 11. As most of the Jews, from the beginning of their settlement, attended the tabernacle or temple only at the three solemn feasts, it is probable they had a kind of synagogues, (schools, or proseuchæ, or places for prayer,) in one of which our Saviour prayed all night. Luke vi. 12. These differed from synagogues, as in them every one prayed by himself; they were in retired places, as by the river side, Acts xvi. 13, 16; and were uncovered, like groves; whereas, synagogues were in elevated places, were covered with a roof, and one prayed as the mouth of the rest. Perhaps it was the proseuchæ that were the μοναχæ (synagogues) or meeting-places burnt up by the Chaldeans. Psal. lxxiv. 8. Soon after the captivity, the Jews had a great number of synagogues, which increased till there were about four hundred and eighty of them in Jerusalem. Every trading fraternity had their synagogues; and companies of strangers, as Alexandrians, Cyrenians, and others, had theirs, for public prayer, and for reading of the scriptures. The scattered Jews too had synagogues about Babylon; and almost every where in the eastern part of the Roman empire: and in the synagogues we find our Saviour and his apostles often teaching the multitudes, till they were shent out. On the synagogue days, the people assembled thrice, at the time of the morning and evening sacrifice, and in the dusk of the evening; and thither the devout persons often retired for secret prayer; and the Pharisees stood, that they might be heard the better. Matt. vi. 5.

Wherever there are ten Bethaim, (i. e. ten free men,) who can attend the service of the synagogue, the Jews erect one. In each they have an ark or chest of the size of the Mosaic ark, for holding the five books of Moses, and which is placed in that part of the synagogue that looks towards the place of the ancient temple. On that side are the chief seats for the elders, who sit with their backs to the ark. The rest of the men sit on other seats with their faces to the ark: the women sit by themselves in a gallery, so inclosed with lattice-work, that they hear and see, but are not seen by the men. Ministers are the stated readers and singers in the synagogues; but the rulers might desire any man present to read or speak. Hence our Saviour read and expounded at Nazareth, Luke iv. 16; and Paul and Barnabas exhorted at Antioch of Pisidia. Acts xiii. The Sheliach-zibbor, or angel of the congregation, reads the liturgy. The Chazan either read, or looked over such as read, that he might correct their mistakes; but his chief business was to expound the lesson of the day, or appoint another to do it for him; or to preach a sermon on some proper subject. These two, with the other rulers of the meeting, composed a council, whose president was called the chief ruler. They order the affairs of the synagogue, censure the scandalous, and provide for the poor. To procure a fund for the poor, they keep two chests at the door of the house, one for the relief of their own poor, and the other to collect for strangers; into these the people put what they please, as they go in or out. On extraordinary occasions, a collector asks each what he intends to give, and the money is gathered at their houses when the Sabbath is over.

SYR'A-CUSE, was a famous city on the south east of Sicily, about twenty-two miles in circumference, which had a fine prospect both by sea and land, and was once the largest and richest city of the Greeks. It was built about A. M. 3260, and in a manner consisted of four cities united into one. For about two hundred and fifty years, it made little noise in the world; but in the next two hundred and eighty, it cut a surprising figure in war, in sea-trade, and in wealth, under its kings Gelon, Dionysius elder and younger, Dion, Agathocles, and Hiero. Here the famed mathematician Archimedes, with astonishing inventions, defended the place from the Romans; but about A. M. 3800, it was taken, and he was slain. The Saracens seized on it A. D. 675; but in 1090, it was taken from them, by Roger duke of Apulia. Here Paul tarried three days as he went prisoner to Rome; and here Christianity was early planted, and still, at least in name, continues; but the city has lost its ancient splendor. Acts xviii. 12.

SYR'I-A, or A'RAM. The Syrians or Armenians, descended from Aram, possessed Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and part of Armenia, and of them Abraham and his friends were a part. But Syria, properly so called, had the Mediterranean sea on the west and north, Cilicia on the north, and Phœnicia, Canaan, and part of Arabia the Desert, on the south. Its excellent soil and agreeable rivers, the Euphrates, Orontes, Cassimire, Adonis, Barrady, &c. rendered it a most delightful country. It was anciently divided into a variety of cantons, as Aram-naharain, Aram-Zobah, Aram-maschah, Aram-rehob, and Aram of Damascus.—Zobah, Damascus, Hamath, Geshur, &c. were its most noted states about the time of DAVID, who conquered it. 2 Sam. viii. and x. About sixty years after, Rezin, who had fled from HADADZER his master, erected a kingdom at Damascus. He, and his successors, Benhadad and Hazael, did much mischief to the Hebrews, 1 Kings xv. xx. and xxii. 2 Kings vi. viii. and x; but Joash and Jeroboam, kings of Israel, sufficiently resented these injuries, and brought the Syrian kingdom to the point of ruin. 2 Kings xiii. and xiv. The Syrians recovered themselves, and under Rezin made a considerable figure; they terribly harassed Ahaz and his subjects, and even took Elath on the Red sea. But Tiglath-pileser, instigated by Ahaz, ravaged their country, demolished their cities, and carried the inhabitants to Media. During the decline of the Assyrian empire, the Syrians returned, and recovered themselves; but Nebuchadnezzar again reduced them. 2 Kings xvi. Syria next fell under the Persians. After Alexander's death it became one of the four GRÆK kingdoms formed out of his empire. After it had subsisted about two hundred and fifty-seven years in this state, it was reduced to a Roman province, about A. M. 3980. About six hundred and ninety-six years after, the Saracens seized on it. In the end of the eleventh century, the Seljukian Turks seized on it, and erected one of their four sultanies at Aleppo, and another at Damascus. Soon after, the European crusaders took the most of it, and after terrible struggling, were, about a hundred years after, driven out of it by Saladin sultan of Egypt, and his successors. In the beginning of the 16th century, it was seized by the Ottoman Turks, who retain it to this day. It now contains no place of note, except Aleppo and Damascus. Its principal attractions are the ruins of noted buildings, especially those of Tadmor and Baalbek. A Christian church was early planted here, and was famous at Antioch and other places of the country; there is still a shadow of Christianity. Acts xv. 23, 41. Amos i. 3—5. and iii. 12. Isa. vii. 4. viii. 4. ix. 11, 12, and xvii. 1—3. Jer. xlix. 26—27. Zech. ix. 1, 2. Isa. xi. 11.

SY-RO-PHœNICIA; either that part of Phœnicia bordering on Syria, or perhaps the whole of Phœnicia, which by conquest had been united to Syria. The people were originally Canaanites. Mk. vii. 26. Matt. xv. 22—28.

TA-A'NAH-SH'LOH; a place about ten miles east of Shechem, and near which was a village called Thenath so lately as A. D. 400.

TABERNACLE; TENT; (1.) A moveable lodging formed of cloth or skins spread over poles. Jabal, a son of Lamech the Cainite, was the inventor of such tents, as he might remove them where he pleased to feed his cattle. Gen. iv. 20. In such lodgings Noah, Abraham, and other patriarchs, and the Rechabites, dwelt; and to this day the wild Arabs, Tartars, and others live in a kind of tents. (2.) A house or dwelling. 2 Chron. xxv. 22. Job xi. 14. The tents of Shem, are the countries or church state of his descendants. Gen. ix. 27. Tents of wickedness, are places where wicked men live. Psal. lxxxiv. 10. (3.) The dwellers in tents, Psal. lxxxiii. 6; and the tents of Judah, are such Jews as dwelt in unfortified cities. Zech. xii. 7. The church's tents were enlarged, and her curtains stretched out, her cords lengthened, and her stakes strengthened, when the gentiles were converted to Christ, and her gospel-state established. Isa. liv. 2. (4.) That tent erected for the worship of God, called the tabernacle of testimony, because it testified God's relation to, and presence with the Hebrews, and in it the laws of God were deposited, Numb. ix. 15; or the covering of it. Exod. xl. 19. God's tabernacle is with men on earth, when they enjoy his eminent fellowship and favour. Rev. xxi. 3. The church and her true members are like the tents of Kedar; their outward appearance is mean and despicable, and their condition in this world very unsettled. Sol. Song i. 5. Our bodies are a tabernacle, easily demolished, and removed to and fro; and yet, with respect to saints, are the curious dwelling of the Holy Ghost. 2 Cor. v. 1.

At Sinai Moses set up a tent, and called it the tabernacle of the congregation, because thither the Hebrews repaired to worship God, after their idolatry of the golden calf. Exod. xxiii. 7—10. Soon after, a more complete TABERNACLE was framed by Bezaleel and Aholiab. Its form was in this manner: first, there was a court of one hundred cubits, or sixty one yards long, and fifty cubits broad, inclosed and hung round to the height of five cubits, or nine feet and a little more, with curtains of fine twined linen, suspended by silver hooks, on fifty six pillars of brass, or of Shittim-wood overlaid with brass, and filleted with silver, and set in large sockets of brass. The only entrance of this court, was from the east, by a hanging veil of blue, purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen of needle-work, twenty cubits in length, and suspended on four pillars. Here, under the open sky, stood the altar of burnt-offering and the brazen laver; and hither every clean Hebrew or proselyte of the covenant might come with his offerings. At the west end of this court stood the tabernacle, properly so called, which was a close tent, in the form of our houses. It was thirty cubits, or about eighteen yards eight inches long, and six yards and almost three inches broad, and as much in height. It was reared with forty eight boards of Shittim-wood, each a cubit and a half broad, overlaid with gold, and set upright in ninety six large sockets of silver, and all supported behind with five cross-bars of Shittim-wood overlaid with gold and fastened to the boards by rings of gold

On this frame was suspended a four-fold covering; the inmost consisted of ten curtains of fine twined linen, with blue, purple, and scarlet, embroidered with figures of cherubim of cunning work, each curtain twenty eight cubits long, and four cubits broad, and all coupled together by loops of blue, and taches of gold. Next there was a covering of eleven curtains of goats' hair, coupled together with taches of brass. It had next a covering of rams' skins dyed red; and in fine, a fourth of strong leather, or badgers' skins. The whole east end, just before which the brazen altar and laver stood, was allotted for an entrance. It was hung over with a veil of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen, curiously embroidered, and suspended by golden hooks, on five pillars of Shittim-wood overlaid with gold, and set in large sockets of brass. The whole of the gold about the tabernacle, amounted to about £148,719, the silver to £3772 sterling. This tabernacle or sanctuary was divided into two apartments. The first apartment was twenty cubits long, and was called the holy place, and into it only the priests durst enter or look. At its inner end stood the golden candlestick, and the altar of incense, and table of shew-bread; and here the silver trumpets, and standards of weight and measure, seem to have been kept. Beyond this there was another apartment of ten cubits square, which was separated by a veil of blue, purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, embroidered with cherubim of cunning work, and suspended by golden taches on four pillars of Shittim-wood overlaid with gold, and set in sockets of silver. Here, amidst thick darkness, were deposited the ark of the covenant, overshadowed by the cherubim, between which hovered the Shechinah or symbolical cloud of the divine presence; and here were the golden pot of manna, Aaron's budding rod, and a copy of the law of Moses: into this apartment, only the high priest entered one day of the year. The tabernacle being reared on the first day of the second year of the Hebrews' departure from Egypt, was, with all its utensils, consecrated by the sprinkling of blood, and anointing of oil; and every year it was sprinkled with blood on the day of expiation. After its erection, the twelve Hebrew princes solemnized the dedication of it, by presents and sacrifices, each in his day. The whole offering was twenty chargers, and twelve bowls of silver, and twelve spoons of gold, amounting in all to 2520 shekels in weight, or £4596 sterling in value, together with a large quantity of incense, and thirty-six bullocks, seventy two rams, as many lambs, and as many kids. Exod. xxv.—xxvii. and xxxvi.—xxxviii. and xl. Numb. vii. In the wilderness, the tabernacle stood in the midst of the Hebrew camp: the priests alone unrequited it; but the Levites bore it and its furniture on their wagons and shoulders. The ark, the altar of incense, table of shew-bread, golden candlestick, nay even the brazen altar, were carried under a cover, and it was death for the Levites to look at them. Numb. iv. After it had been carried about with the Hebrew camp for forty-six years it was fixed at Shiloh; and on a particular occasion, before Joshua's death, seems to have been brought to Shechem. Josh. xviii. and xiv. 26. Some time after the death of Eli, the tabernacle was fixed for a while at Nob; and thence it was carried to Gibeon. At last, the ark, and other principal holy things thereof, were placed in Solomon's temple, and the rest disregarded. 1 Sam. xxi. 2 Chron. i. 18. and v. 4, 5.

Did this tabernacle represent our Redeemer, particularly in his manhood? It is devised of God, and reared up with infinite skill, and consecrated by the oil of the divine Spirit, and his own sufferings. In it dwells the fulness of Godhead; and after much privation and change on earth, it, dropping every infirmity, was solemnly introduced to the heavenly rest. Nay, is not his person, as God-man, the astonishing effect of the wisdom of God? He is the medium of all our fellowship with God, and the receptacle of all that atonement, purification, light, food, and acceptance, necessary for our souls. Heb. ix. 21. and viii. 2. Did it not represent the gospel-church, the tabernacle of our mystical David? By the wisdom of God, it was planned: by his order it was erected by the inspired ministers of Christ. In her the glory of God resides; here he is worshipped; and here a fulness of atonement, purification, spiritual light, provision, acceptable prayers, praises, and good works, is to be found. Here is the word of God; the true standard of our faith and practice; and here are the unsearchable riches and gospel of Christ. After a temporary exposure to storms, and various removals from place to place, it will enter into the heavenly temple. Nay, did not this sacred tent prefigure heaven, where JEHOVAH, Jesus, and the whole church, are to be found? See FEAST.

TABITHA, or DORCAS, a Christian widow at Joppa, who much abounded in alms-deeds, and other good works. Having died, she was washed, and laid on a table in order to be prepared for burial. Peter was sent for, and the attendant widows were all in tears, and shewed him the clothes which she had made for them, and reported to him her other generous deeds. Peter putting out the people and praying over her, bade her arise. She immediately opened her eyes, and, he taking her by the hand, stood up. He then called in the Christian neighbours, and presented her to them alive and well. Acts ix. 36—42.

TABLE; (1.) A broad piece of stone, brass, &c. Hab. ii. 2. Luke i. 64. The ancients used to write upon such, as they had no paper; and they wished what they wrote to continue recorded to many generations. Twice God wrote his law on tables of stone. The Romans wrote their ancient laws on twelve tables of brass. In allusion to this, men's heart is represented as a writing table, and a fleshy table, ready to receive and to be affected with divine truth. Prov. iii. 3. and vii. 3. 2 Cor. iii. 3. (2.) A frame or seat, from which to eat meat. 1 Sam. xx. 19. It seems the Hebrews used the sacred perfume of incense, and oil, at their common tables. Ezek. xlii. 41. The altar of burnt-offering is called God's table, because the sacrifices therein offered were acceptable to him, and were food to the hungry. Mal. i. 7, 12. The ordinances of the church are likened to a table, as they exhibit to us the fulness of God for the nourishment of our soul. Psal. lxi. 22. Sol. Song i. 13. Luke xxii. 30. (3.) The provision set upon a table to be eaten or drunk, may all kind of provision, spiritual and temporal: and God furnishes a table, when he gives men prosperity, spiritual or temporal. Psal. xxiii. 5. Jesus sits at his table, when in heaven, before his incarnation; when he, in our nature, sits on his Father's throne; and when he is present in the ordinances of the gospel, by the efficacy of his power. Sol. Song i. 12. Men cannot be partakers of the table of the Lord, and of the table of devils; cannot consistently eat of the things sacrificed to idols as such, and partake of the Lord's supper. 1 Cor. x. 21. The office of the church-deacons is to provide necessities for the table of the poor, to provide a maintenance for pastors, and to officiate in distributing the elements at the Lord's table. Acts vi. 2. The preparing of a table when Babylon was taken, imports, either the Medes and Persians providing victuals for their army, or the Chaldeans' luxurious feasting and drunkenness. Isa. xxi. 2. The eight tables of hewn stone in Ezekiel's visionary temple; may denote the frequently administered supper of the Lord, firmly established in the church, and accessible to Christians in every corner. Ezek. xl. 41, 42. The table of shew-bread was of Shittim-wood, overlaid with gold, two cubits in length, one in breadth, and one and a half in height. At the top, it was surrounded with a double cornice, which prevented the loaves from falling off. It was portable by staves of Shittim-wood overlaid with gold. It was consecrated by sprinkling of blood, and anointing with oil. It stood on the north-west corner of the holy place, just before the inner vail, and on it were set the twelve loaves of shew-bread. Solomon made ten tables of shew-bread. Did this table represent Jesus' person, as in his intercession, presenting all his chosen tribes before God; or the gospel, as presenting Christ and his fulness for our spiritual provision? Exod. xxv. 23—30. and xxx. 27. 2 Chron. iv. 8, 19.

TABLET; an ornament, or perhaps a box for perfume to refresh fainting spirits. Exod. xxxv. 22.

TABOR; (1.) A mountain in the form of a sugar-loaf, near Kadesch in Galilee, where the territories of Issachar and Naphtali nearly met together. Josh. xix. 12, 22. It stood almost due west of Hermon, but on the other side of Jordan, and in the great plain of Jezreel. Josephus says it is about four miles high, and on the top is a beautiful plain about three miles and a half in circumference, and inclosed with trees, except towards the south; but according to Maundrel, Thevenot, and Pocock, one may safely ride to the top of it, and it is little more than one mile and a half of ascent. On the top it is but half a mile long, and a quarter broad. Perhaps an earthquake may have partly sunk it, and altered its form since the time of Josephus. The top, from whence is one of the most delightful prospects in the world, was once surrounded with a wall and trench, and perhaps there were houses on it. On this mount Barak assembled his army, and, at the foot of it defeated the host of Jabiu. Judg. iv. 6, 8. On the top of it, it was long thought our Saviour was transfigured; but as it is so far distant from Cesarea Philippi, where he was before and after, that is now doubted by most people of judgment. (2.) TABOR was also the name of a city given to the Zebulunites to the Levites of Merari's family, 1 Chron. vi. 77; and of a place near Bethel. 1 Sam. x. 3.

TABRET; a kind of musical drum much used at feasts and dancing, and in religious worship. Exod. xv. 20, 29. To be as a tabret, is to be greatly loved and delighted in. Job xvii. 6. To be adorned with tabrets, is to be filled with gladness on account of prosperity and happiness. Jer. xxxi. 4. To tabor on the breasts, is to beat them, as if a drum, for vexation and grief. Nah. ii. 7.

TACHES, hooks, clasps, or latches of gold and brass, for fastening together the curtains of the tabernacle. Exod. xxvi. 6. and 11.

TACKLING, the roping of a ship.

TAD'MOR, now PAL-MY'RA, was built by Solomon, about sixty miles east of Damascus, and about twenty west of the Euphrates, in a most delightful spot, surrounded with a wide sandy desert, and with mountains on the east, north, and west sides. Here lived the famed critic Longinus; and here Odenatus, and Zenobia his queen, formed a small kingdom, and performed wondrous exploits; but the Romans seized on it by force about A. D. 273. At present about thirty wretched families live here, and plenty of magnificent ruins, sufficient to astonish every beholder. 1 Kings ix. 18.

TAH'PE-NES, TE-HAPH'E-NES, or HA'NES, a city of Egypt, and probably the Daphnæ Pelusiace, about sixteen miles south of Pelusium, and on the east of the Nile. Hither the rebellious Jews, under Johanan the son of Kareah, retired; and not long after, Nebuchadnezzar took it, and placed his throne at the entry of it, as Jeremiah had pointed out by the hiding of stones. Jer. xliii. 7—11. Ezek. xxx. 18.

TAIL, the hinder part of a beast, Judg. xv. 4; in allusion to which, whatever is low and contemptible is called the tail. Dent. xxviii. 13. Isa. ix. 14, 15. and xix. 15. Because scorpions and serpents do much hurt with their tails, the power, policy, and flattery with which the Papists and Mahometans spread their delusions, to the ruin of multitudes, are called their tails; or the tails may signify subordinate officers and agents ecclesiastic, civil, or military. Rev. ix. 10, 19. and xii. 4. Rezin and Pekah were two tails of smoking fire brands, able to perform little of what they boasted, and near to utter destruction. Isa. vii. 4.

TAKE; (1.) To receive. 2 Kings xv. 15. (2.) To choose. Dent. i. 13. (3.) To seize on. 1 Kings xviii. 40. Heb. v. 4. (4.) To bear away. John ii. 16. (5.) To improve, exert. Eph. v. 13. Rev. xi. 17. To take away, often signifies the entire destruction of a thing, and its causes and effects. Heb. x. 4, 9. Christ takes away sin; his righteousness removes the guilt; his Spirit its power and stain; and his benefits conferred, the penalty thereof. John i. 29. Troubles take away sin; they cause men to give up their idols and idolatries, and to abhor and watch against sinful practices. Isa. xxvii. 9. To take the foxes in the church, is to detect, and censure, and remove false teachers, and to search out and mortify inward corruptions. Sol. Song ii. 15. A man is taken and held fast by his sins, when he is ensnared and ruined by them. Prov. v. 22.

TALE; (1.) Sum, number. Exod. v. 8. (2.) Story. Luke xxiv. 11. Our life is like a tale that is told; very short and unsubstantial. Psal. cx. 9. Tale-bearers are such as carry tales to raise strife and contention, or who slander and backbite. Lev. xix. 16. Ezek. xxii. 9.

TALENT; a weight among the Jews containing 3000 shekels; which, if a shekel of silver be reckoned at three shillings, a talent of it will amount to £450 sterling, and one of gold to sixteen times as much, viz. £7200. But we, supposing a shekel of silver to be considerably less, viz. 2s. 3½d. compute the talent of silver at £342 3s. 9d. and a talent of gold at £5495 sterling. Exod. xxxviii. 24, 27. The weight of a Jewish talent for weighing silver was 113 pounds 10 ounces 1 penny-weight and 10½ grains; but their talent used in weighing other things, was perhaps a fifth part heavier. The Egyptian talent was 86 pounds and almost nine ounces. They had a talent at Antioch, that weighed 390 pounds, and about 3½ ounces. Whatever gifts or opportunities God gives to men for their usefulness, are called pounds and talents; and to some he gives these in greater, and to others in lesser proportion, but all ought to improve what they receive, and must give account of their use thereof. Matt. xxv. 15—29. Luke xix. To mark the infinite disproportion between the injuries done by us to God, and those done by men to us; the former are called 10,000 talents, and the latter 100 pence. Matt. xviii. 24, 28. God's heavy judgments on the Jews and Antichristians are represented as of the weight of a talent. Zech. v. 7. Rev. xvi. 21.

TALK; speech to another. Job xi. 2. Talkers, are such as are exceedingly given to talk. Ezek. xxxvi. 3. Talk sometimes signifies meditation, as we should never speak but after due thought. Psal. lxxi. 24.

TALITHA-KUMI; a Syriac expression, which signifies, Maid, arise. Mark v. 41.

TALM-AI. See GESHUR.

TAMAR. See JUDAH, ABSALOM, AMNON. Tamar, a city is probably the same as ENGEDI.

TAMMUZ, or THAMMUZ, the fourth month of the Jews' sacred year, and tenth of their civil. It consists of twenty-nine days, and answers to part of our June and July. On the 17th day of it, the Jews fast for the sin and punishment of making the golden calf. During the captivity of Babylon, they in this month observed a fast, to bewail the destruction of Jerusalem. Jer. xxxix. 2. Zech. viii. 19. (2.) TAMMUZ, an idol, called also Adonis, Osiris, Adonosiris, and perhaps Chemosh, and Baal-peor. It is said, he was Thamus an ancient king of Upper Egypt. The mythological history of him is, that he was Adonis the son of Cyniras, an Assyrian, who founded the city of Paphos in Cyprus, by his own daughter Myrrha. To conceal his birth, he was brought up among the shepherds. Venus fell in love with him for his beauty, on account of which Mars her husband killed him. Venus lamented his death in the most inconsolable manner; and in imitation of her the eastern nations of Syria, Phœnicia, &c. had a stated solemnity, to bewail his ruin. When the rain or melting snow made the river Adonis appear reddish in colour, the women began their lamentations, so loud and tender, as if for the death of an only child. After they had severely chastised themselves with whips, they proceeded to the sacrifices of the dead. Psal. cvi. 28. Next day, pretending that he was revived and ascended to heaven, they rejoiced and shaved their heads; and such as did not, at least at Byblus, were obliged to prostitute themselves a whole day to strangers, and consecrate their gain to Venus. On this day the Phœnician priests caused a letter to come into their harbour, in a boat of paper-reeds, as if from Egypt, importing, that the priests there had found Adonis alive. When this boat entered the harbour of Byblus, the women shouted and danced as persons mad for joy. In the time of Ezekiel, the Jewish women celebrated this solemnity, with all its obscene rites. Ezek. viii. 14. To this day some vestiges of this mad festival remain at Aleppo.

TANACH, or TANACH; a city of the Manassites, near Endor and Megiddo. It was given to the Kohathites; but the Canaanites long retained it in their hands. Josh. xvii. 11. and xxi. 25. Judg. i. 27.

TAPESTRY; cloth beautifully figured in the loom, or with the needle. It was used in the East, as early as the age of Solomon. The crusaders seem to have introduced the art of making it into Europe, about 500 or 600 years ago. The English and Flemish first distinguished themselves in making it, but the French knew little of it till within 150 years backward. It is used to cover beds, and to hang fine rooms. Its figures are frequently formed with threads of gold. Prov. vii. 16.

TAPPU-AH, or the apple city belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and is probably the same as Entappuah, which was fortified by Bacchides, the Syro-grecian general. Josh. xvii. 7, 8. Another situated in the low country, belonged to Judah, and was different from Bethappuah in the hill country. Josh. xv. 34, 53.

TARES. We have a kind of peas called tares; but what the scripture mentions under that name, appears to be a weed very hurtful to corn. Its stem is smaller than that of wheat; and from the top springs forth a long ear, with small husks surrounding three or four grains. The meal of tares is unwholesome, loads the stomach, and intoxicates, creating drowsiness, heaviness, and head-aches. Wicked men are likened to tares; they grow up among the saints, are somewhat similar, and very hurtful, but cannot be fully separated till the last day, when they shall be cast into everlasting fire.

TARGET. See SHIELD. Goliath's children probably signifies a gorget, corselet, or neck-piece. 1 Sam. xvii. 6.

TARRY; (1.) To abide, continue. Gen. xxvii. 44. (2.) To stay behind. Exod. xii. 36. (3.) To defer, delay. Gen. xlv. 9. (4.) To wait, stay for. Exod. xxiv. 14. God and his salvation tarry, when, notwithstanding his people's distress and prayers, he for a time defers to deliver them. Psal. xl. 17. Isa. xlv. 13.

TARSHISH, TAR'SUS; the son of Javan, and who probably founded Tarshish, or Tarsus in Cilicia, and gave his name to the country. He was perhaps the father of the Etrusci in Italy. Perhaps different places are called TARSHISH.

TAR'SUS in Cilicia, was the nearest to Canaan. It was the capital city of the country, and built on the river Cyndus, about six miles from the sea; and which Strabo says, was built by Sardanapalus the king of Assyria. It is said once to have equalled Athens and Alexandria in polite learning. Julius Cæsar bestowed on it the same privileges as Rome had; and hence Paul, from being born here was free-born. To shew their gratitude, the inhabitants changed the name of the city into Juliopolis, or the city of Julius. During the wars of the Greek emperors with the Persians and Saracens, this city suffered much, and it is at present of no importance. Christianity was planted here by Paul, and has never since been wholly extinct. Perhaps this is the Tarshish for which Jonah set out. Jonah i. 3. Sometimes Tarshish seems to denote the sea in general, so called from its greenish colour; as Isa. lx. 9. Psal. xlviii. 7. Sometimes it seems to mean Carthage in Africa, or Tartessus in Spain. Isa. xxlii. 6: for in vain would the Tyrians have fled from Nebuchadnezzar, or Alexander, to Tarsus in Cilicia. Hiller will have Tarshish to signify the country of the Celts in Gaul, Spain, &c. Psal. lxxii. 10. But there must still be another Tarshish, to which Solomon traded from the Red Sea, and for which Jehoshaphat fitted out his fleet. This could not be in North Africa, or in Spain, as the passage to these places by sea was 6000 or 7000 miles nearer from Joppa than from the Red Sea. We must therefore suppose a Tarshish on the east of Africa, or in the Indies, and perhaps near to the most distant OPHIR. 1 Kings x. 22. 2 Chron. xx. 36. Jer. x. 9.

TARTAK, the idol of the Avites. The Jewish writers think he had the figure of an ass; but Juriën will have this idol to be the chariot of the sun, or the sun in his chariot. 2 Kings xvii. 31.

TARTAN. See ESARNADDON, SEN-MACHERIS.

TASK; the quantity of work required of one.

TASK-MASTERS, such overseers as make the tasked persons perform their work. Exod. v. 11.

TASTE; (1.) To try the relish of a thing by the tongue or palate. Job xxv. 3. (2.) To eat or drink a little, as if trying the relish of the food. 1 Sam. xiv. 29. Dan. v. 2. (3.) To have an experimental knowledge of: thus men taste death, when they feel it. Matt. xvi. 28; they taste that the Lord is gracious and good, when they spiritually discern and feel his grace and goodness working for and in them. 1 Pet. ii. 2. Psal. xxxiv.

8. Hypocrites taste the good word of God, and heavenly gift, when they have such transient experience of the power of the Holy Ghost, in and by the word, as fills them with a kind of comfort and joy. Heb. vi. 4, 5.

TASTE, (1.) Relish. Exod. xvi. 31. Job vi. 6. (2.) The roof of the mouth, which discerns the relish of meats. Prov. xxiv. 13. (3.) Our judgment and affections, which discern the propriety and agreeableness of things to the soul. Psal. cxix. 169. Sol. Song ii. 3. Moab's taste remained in him, and his scent was not changed. The power and idolatry, pride, presumption, luxury, and other wickedness of the Moabites, continued the same from age to age, as wine standing on its lees retains its strength, colour, and relish. Jer. xlviii. 11.

TATTLERS; such as foolishly and rashly speak of things without knowing or being concerned about them. 1 Tim. v. 13.

TATNAI. See SAMARITANS.

THREE-TAVERNS; a place about thirty-three miles south of Rome, where it seems there were three taverns or drinking-houses. Acts xxviii. 15.

TAUNT; a common by-word; a laughing-stock. Jer. xxiv. 9. Ezek. v. 15.

TAX, TOLL, TRIBUTE; a sum of money, or goods, paid to rulers, in token of submission to them, and in order to reward their labour in government. 2 Chron. xvii. 11. 2 Kings xxiii. 25. As the Hebrews acknowledged God for their proper king, they paid their tribute to him in tithes, offerings, and soul-money. Exod. xxx. 15. Lev. i—vii. &c. Wherever they prevailed over the Canaanites, they laid them under tribute. Josh. xvi. 10. Judg. i. 30—35. Towards the end of his reign, Solomon imposed a tribute on the Hebrews, which issued in the revolt of ten tribes from his son. 1 Kings xii. The Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, in their turn, imposed tribute on them, and other conquered nations. Seleucus the son of Antiochus the Great, was a raiser of taxes in the glory of his kingdom; i. e. famed for nothing but raising of taxes, to pay his father's debts to the Romans. Dan. xi. 20. Cæsar Augustus ordered that an enrolment, taxing, or census, should be made of all his subjects, families and substance, in order to lay on the tribute in proportion to their ability: this was begun three or four years before the birth of our Saviour; but Providence so ordered it, that it proceeded no farther than Bethlehem, till the time of his birth. Luke ii. 2. This tribute was not levied till about ten or eleven years after; the publicans who gathered it, were detested. Judas of Galilee formed a party of zealots, who seditiously opposed the raising of it. As Jesus miraculously procured money from a fish to pay it for himself and Peter, he thus directed the Jews to pay it, as by their using of the Roman coin, they acknowledged their subjection. Matt. xxii. 16—18.

TRIBUTARY; one under tribute. Judg. i.

TEACH; INSTRUCT; (1.) To make to know. Psal. cxix. 26. (2.) To admonish, to direct. Mark viii. 31. God teaches men by his word, informing their judgment; by his Spirit, opening their understandings to discern divine things; and by his providence, pointing out what we have done, or ought to do, and what we may expect at his hand. Rom. ii. 18. Neh. ix. 20. Jer. vi. 8. Prov. xxiv. 32. Psal. xlv. 8, 9. Christ's right hand teaches him terrible things, when he performs marvellous works for the salvation of his people, and the destruction of their enemies. Psal. xlv. 4. To teach by the hand of God, is to do so by his assistance. Job xxviii. 11. To teach with the fingers, is by gestures to excite others to what is too shameful to be expressed in words. Prov. vi. 13.

TEACHER; (1.) A master, an instructor. 1 Chron. xxv. 8. (2.) A minister of the gospel, who, by his doctrine and practice, leads men to understand the truths of God. Eph. iv. 11. (3.) One who by private instruction or example, makes others to know spiritual things. Tit. ii. 3.

TEAR. See REND.

TEARS; (1.) Drops of water which fall from the eyes in weeping. Psal. vi. 6. (2.) Affliction and sorrow. Psal. cxlvi. 5. Isa. xxv. 8.

TEATS; (1.) Paps, dugs. The Jews had their teats of virginity bruised, when they were seduced into the idolatry of the heathens around. Ezek. xxxiii. 3. (2.) Prosperity, plentiful crops; for want of such, the Jewish women lamented. Isa. xxxiii. 12.

TEDIOUS; wearisome.

TE'BETH, or THE'BET, the tenth month of the Jewish sacred year, and fourth of their civil. It consisted of twenty nine days. On the eighth, they observe a fast for the translation of their law into Greek: on the tenth, a fast for the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. 2 Kings xxv. 1. On the 28th, a feast of joy for the ejection of the Sadducees from the sanhedrim, where, under Janneus, they had almost the whole power.

TEIL-TREE; some think it an ELM; others suppose it to be an OAK; others a CHESNUT TREE; others a turpentine, which resembles the ash-tree in its leaves, only they are more thick and glutinous; its fruit grows in clusters, and is hard and resinous; a kind of gum called turpentine-pitch distils from its root. Others will have it to be the tilia or lime-tree, which has broad leaves, and which propagates fast by layers. The Jews were like an elm, oak, chesnut, turpentine, or lime-tree, whose substance was in it-elf, or its stump was in or at the side of the Shallecheth or raised entry to the temple from the palace: though their leaves withered in their distress by the Assyrians, and in their Chaldean and other captivity, yet they quickly sprung up into a prodigious multitude. Isa. vi. 13.

TE-KOAH; a pleasant city about twelve miles south of Jerusalem, built by one Asher, or Ashur. 1 Chron. ii. 24. and iv. 5. and which had a wilderness adjacent to it, that reached almost to the Dead Sea. A widow of this city persuaded David to recall Absalom. 2 Sam. xiv. Rehoboam repaired and fortified it. 2 Chron. xi. 6. Near to it Johashaphat's enemies slew one another 2 Chron. xx. 20-23. Amos the prophet was a herdman of it. Amos i. 1. Hither Jonathan the Maccabee retired from Bacchides, the Syrian general, as the city had but one entrance. Perhaps there was another Tekoah, north of Jerusalem. Jer. vi. 1.

TE-LASSAR. See EDEN.

TEL-ABIB; a place of Chaldea between the rivers Chebar and Sacoras. Ezek. iii. 15.

TELEM, or TELA'IM; a city on the south frontiers of Judea, where Saul mustered his forces to march against the Amalekites. Josh. xv. 24. 1 Sam. xv. 4.

TEL-MELA, TEL'HAR-SHA; CHE'RUR, ADDAN, and IMMER, were perhaps all cities of Chaldea. Ezra ii. 59.

TELL; (1.) To count, to number. Gen. xv. 5. (2.) To make known to. Gen. xii. 18. 2 Sam. i. 20. (3.) To explain, interpret. Ezek. xxiv. 19. Dan. ii. 26.

TE'MA; a son of Ishmael, who probably founded the city Thema, or Thamma, near the west of Chaldea, and was the parent of the troops of Tema. Gen. xxv. 5. Job ix. 10.

TEMAN, or TIM'NAH; the grandson of Esau by his son Eliphaz, and parent of the Temanites, of whom Eliphaz, Job's friend, was one, and Hushan, an ancient king of Edom, another. Gen. xxxvi. 34. He probably built a city called Teman, about five miles from Petra. Most, if not the whole of the land of Edom, is sometimes called Teman. Jer. xlix. 20. Amos i. 12. The symbols of the Divine Presence seemed to move from above the land of Teman and Paran, to Sinai, which lay south-west from thence. Hab. iii. 3.

TEMPEST. See STORM.

TEMPLE. The Jews sometimes called the tabernacle by this name. 1 Sam. i. 9. and iii. 3. The houses built for the worship of idols were also so called; but the building erected at Jerusalem, for the worship of the true God, is so called by way of eminence. We have different descriptions of this magnificent structure. Villalpandus, a learned Jesuit, and famed architect, has published a splendid work respecting it, in three folio volumes; but it is chiefly founded on Ezekiel's visionary descriptions, and his own fancy and rules of architecture, and not on the plain statements of scripture. Lightfoot and Prideaux have also given us laboured descriptions; but as these are founded on Josephus's account of Herod's form of it, and on the Talmud, whose authors lived long after it was in ruins, we cannot depend on them as descriptions of Solomon's temple. The following account is taken from the history of the Bible, which alone should be followed in this matter.

The preparations for this temple were immense. David and his princes set apart for it 108,000 talents of gold, 1,017,000 talents of silver, amounting together to about £242,719,750 or £339,290,687 sterling, and in weight to about 46,000 ton of gold and silver. About 183,600 men, Hebrews and Canaanites, were employed in building it. Every thing was made ready before it came to the spot, where nothing remained to be done but to join the materials; yet it was seven years in building. It was erected on mount Moriah. The top of this hill was inclosed by a wall. Into this there was an entrance on every side; besides one towards the south-west for the royal family, the members of which, by a raised way, called the gate of Shallecheith, came to their place in the covert of the Sabbath. The east gate was called Sur: the south gate was called Asuppin, because it seems there the Levites convened to receive their directions; the gate Parbar was at the north-west of the temple. At the side of every gate, and at every corner of the court, houses were erected. Into this outer court, every clean Hebrew, or proselyte of the covenant, might enter. In our Saviour's time, there was a court of the gentiles without this. In the middle of the outer court, but nearer to the west end, there was a court for the priests and Levites, stretching in an oblong direction from west to east, surrounded by a low wall of about four feet high, that the people might, over the top of it, see what was doing by the priests. This court had two entrances; one on the north side, and another on the south. In this court, just before the east end of the temple, stood the brazen altar, twenty cubits long, as many broad, and ten high; and the brazen sea and lavers; which brass-work was cast in the clay ground near Succoth and Zaretan. The temple, properly so called, stood from west to east, near the west end of the court of the priests, and had its sole entrance on the east end. First, you came to a porch twenty cubits from north to south, and ten from east to west, and a hundred and twenty in height. This served as a steeple to adorn it, and was a place of shelter and of prayer to the serving priests. On each side of its entrance, was a pillar about eighteen cubits high, and twelve cubits in circumference, adorned with chapters, and about two hundred figures of pomegranates. The one was called Jachin, stability; and the other Boaz, strength.—Passing through this porch, you entered the sanctuary or holy place, which was forty cubits in length, twenty in breadth, and thirty in height; at the west end of which stood ten golden candlesticks on the south side, and on the north ten tables, with twelve loaves of shew bread on each; and in the middle between them, stood the golden altar of incense. In this apartment too, were lodged the silver trumpets, the standards of weight and measure, and the sacred treasures. Passing through the sanctuary, lengthwise, but separated by a fine veil, and a two-leaved door of olive-tree, was the Oracle, or most holy place, into which only the high priest might enter, and that only upon the day of atonement. It was a square of twenty cubits every way. Here stood the ark with its furniture; and Solomon made two new cherubim of olive-tree, which overshadowed the two golden ones, and stretched their wings the whole breadth of the house. The wall of the house was reared with alternate rows of fine cedar-wood and hewn-stone, probably polished marble; the inside was carved with figures of cherubim and palm-trees; and the whole inside, floor, walls, and roof, was overlaid with gold. The oracle had no windows, but was perpetually dark; the sanctuary had narrow windows placed opposite to each other. If the ninety priests' chambers of three stories, thirty in each, were built on the wall of the temple, the windows of the sanctuary were placed very high; but if, as some suppose, the priests' chambers were built on the top of the temple, the windows might be low. About eleven months after the building was finished, and just before the feast of tabernacles, this temple was furnished with the ark and other sacred utensils, and the Shechinah, or cloud of divine glory entered it, to take up its rest over the ark, between the cherubim. It was dedicated with solemn prayer by Solomon, by seven days of sacred feasting, and by a peace-offering of 20,000 oxen, and 120,000 sheep, to consume which, the holy fire came down anew from heaven. The temple service consisted of sacrifices, songs, prayers, &c. 1 Chron. xxii. xxvi. xxix. 1–9. 1 Kings vi–viii. 2 Chron. iii–vi.

Did this temple typify Christ's manhood, as the wonderfully prepared, the curious, pure, and glorious residence of his Godhead, and through which we have access to worship God? John ii. 19. Did it represent his person, freely set up to be our Mediator, as the glorious, fixed, and lasting means of our fellowship with God, and of receiving all blessings from him? Col. i. 19. and ii. 9. Did it typify the gospel-church, capacious, glorious, and firmly founded, reared up with lively stones, and cedars of God, with chosen men, and connected together by the oracles, ordinances, blood, Spirit, and grace of Christ; and fitted to be the residence of God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost? Eph. ii. 20–22. Might it not also prefigure heaven, the glorious and fixed residence of the Most High, where he is served by multitudes of angels and men, and honoured with endless anthems of praise? Psal. xi. 4. Rev. vii. 15.

The saints are temples; their souls, and even their bodies, are, by the blood, Spirit, and grace of Christ, fitted and set apart to the service, and to be the residence of God. 1 Cor. iii. 19. and vi. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 16. John saw no temple in heaven, for the Lord God and the Lamb are the temple thereof. In the millennial period, outward pomp and ceremony shall be undervalued, and real fellowship with God alone prized; and in heaven, instituted ordinances shall cease, and the full enjoyment of God be all and in all. Rev. xxi. 22.

The Jewish temple remained but about thirty-four years in its glory, when Shishak carried off its treasures. 1 Kings xiv. 25. Under Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Athaliah, it was much decayed; but Jehoiada and Joash repaired it about A. M. 3150. Soon after, Joash robbed it of its treasures, to give them to Hazael king of Syria. 2 Kings xii. 2 Chron. xxiv. To procure the assistance of Tiglath-pileser the Assyrian, Ahaz presented him with the treasures of the temple. He removed the brazen altar, and put an idolatrous one in its place. He removed the brazen sea from off the oxen, and the brazen lavers from off their pedestals or supporters, and placed them on the ground.

He also broke many of the sacred vessels, and shut up the temple. 2 Chron. xxviii. 2 Kings xvi. Hezekiah repaired it, and made such vessels for it as were wanted; but in the fourteenth year of his reign he was obliged to rob it of much of its wealth to give it to Sennacherib. 2 Chron. xxix. 2 Kings xviii. Manasseh reared altars to the host of heaven in the sacred courts, but afterwards restored the true worship of God. Josiah his grandson, further purged the temple, and replaced the ark of God in it. 2 Kings xxi. and xxii. 2 Chron. xxxiii. and xxxv. About A. M. 3398, Nebuchadnezzar carried away part of the sacred vessels to Babylon, and about seven years after he took away others; at last, in 3416, he entirely burnt and demolished the temple. Ezek. vii. 20, 22, and xxiv. 21. Jer. lii. 13.

About A. M. 3469, amidst the joy of some, and mourning of others, it, by Cyrus's order, began to be rebuilt, and notwithstanding much hindrance, was finished in about twenty years, and solemnly dedicated to the service of God. The Persian king's decree seems to order its height to be sixty cubits, and its breadth to be sixty: perhaps the porch might be only allowed to be sixty cubits high, which was but half of the height of that erected by Solomon. Or what we render breadth, may signify the length, as it is scarcely probable that Cyrus would order the height and breadth, and not the length. Or perhaps, though Solomon's temple was but twenty cubits from side to side within, yet the breadth of the walls and priests' chambers added thereto, might make it sixty cubits. This second temple, built under the direction of Zerubabel, and Joshua the high priest, wanted, as the Jews say, five things which were the chief glory of the former; viz. the ark and its furniture, the Shechinah or cloud of the divine presence, the holy fire, the Urim and Thummim, and the Spirit of prophecy: but the want of these could hardly be the reason of the old men's mourning when they saw the foundation of it laid; but the true reason seems to be, the improbability, that it, when founded by a few poor tributaries, would ever attain to the glory of the former, reared by the wisest and richest of kings. Ezra i. iii. and vi.

About A. M. 3837, Antiochus profaned it, stopped the daily sacrifice, and erected the image of Jupiter his chief idol on the altar of burnt-offering: but, about three years after, Judas Maccabeus purified and repaired it, and restored the true worship of God. To gain the affection of the Jews, and humour his own pride, Herod the Great, about A. M. 3987, began to build it anew. In about nine years he finished the principal parts of it; but forty-six years after, when our Saviour had begun his public ministry, it was not quite finished: nay, till the beginning of their ruinous wars, they still added to its buildings. Josephus describes this temple as follows. It was built on a very hard rock, in which the foundations were laid with incredible expence. The temple itself was sixty cubits high, and as many broad. But in the front Herod added two wings or shoulders, each of which projecting twenty cubits, made the whole length of the front a hundred cubits, and the breadth as many; and the gate was seventy cubits high, and twenty broad, but without any doors. The stones were white marble, twenty-five cubits in length, twelve in height, and nine in breadth, all polished, and unspeakably beautiful. Instead of doors, the gate was closed with vails flowered with gold, silver, purple, and every thing rich and curious. At each side of the gate were two stately pillars, from whence hung golden festoons, and vines with leaves and clusters of grapes, curiously wrought. The whole inclosure was about a furlong square, surrounded with a high wall of large stones, some of them above forty cubits long, and all fastened to one another with lead or iron. Where the wall was raised from the bottom of the adjacent valley, its height was above three or four hundred cubits. On the inside of this high wall, round about, were erected three fine galleries; the narrowest about thirty feet wide, and fifty in height; but the largest, which was between the other two, was forty-five feet wide, and one hundred feet high. These galleries were supported by one hundred and sixty-two pillars of marble, each about twenty-seven feet in circumference. The wall of this inclosure had four gates towards the west, and one towards each of the other three quarters. Solomon's porch was at the east gate of the temple called Beautiful. Acts iii. 2, 11. The piazzas and court were paved with marble. Within this inclosure and near to the galleries, was a second, surrounded with a flight of beautiful marble rails, and with stately columns at proper distances inscribed with mottoes, prohibiting the gentiles and unclean Jews to proceed any further. This inclosure had one gate on the east side, three on the south, and as many on the north placed at equal distances. Within this, a third inclosure surrounded the temple and altar of burnt offering. Its wall had a flight of fourteen steps on the outside, which hid a considerable part of it; and on the top, quite round it, had a terrace of twelve feet broad. This inclosure had one gate on the east, four on the south, and as many on the north, at equal distances. At the inside of each gate, were two large square chambers, thirty cubits wide, and forty high, supported by pillars of twelve cubits in circumference. On the inside, except on the west side, there was a double flight of galleries, supported by a double row of pillars. The gates were thirty cubits high, and fifteen broad. The women, it seems, had their separate court, and entered by the east gate, which was overlaid with Corinthian brass. Within this third inclosure, the court of the priests was separated from that of the people, by a low wall. Here stood the altar of burnt-offering, which was of hewn stone, forty cubits broad, and fifteen in height; and the laver and the temple properly so called. The wall of the temple and its roof being covered with gold on the outside, made a glorious appearance when the sun shone on it. Herod solemnly dedicated his new temple. It had not stood much above seventy years, when the Jews made a fort of it during the siege by Titus. After it had been polluted with murder, and every other wickedness, it was, to the extreme grief of Titus the Roman general, burnt to the ground. To confute our Saviour, who had said, one stone of it should not be left above another, Julian the Roman Emperor in concurrence with the Jews, twice attempted to rebuild it, about A. D. 390. Earthquakes and flames of fire dispersed their materials, and killed numbers of the workmen. At present there is a mock temple on the south-east of Jerusalem whose court is five hundred and seventy paces long, and three hundred and seventy broad. In the middle, where it is supposed the Holy of Holies stood, there is a Mahometan mosque. To this the Mahometans pay great veneration; but no Jew nor Christian dares enter this court, under pain of death, or of redeeming his life by becoming a Mahometan.

The heathens had temples for their idols. That of Belus at Babylon, of Diana at Ephesus, of Jupiter in the Capitol at Rome, and that of Serapis at Alexandria, were the most famous. The ancient Persians, &c. would build none; asserting that as God is omnipresent, the universe is his temple.

TEMPORAL; belonging to time. 2 Cor. iv. 18.

TEMPT: (1.) To try; so God tempts men, when he enjoins the performance of hard duties, to discover their grace, their faith, love, and obedience. Gen. xxii. 1. Men tempt God, when they unseasonably and irreverently require proofs of his presence, power, and goodness; when they expose themselves to danger, from which they cannot escape without the miraculous interposition of his providence; and when they sin with such boldness as if they would try whether God could or would know and punish sin. Exod. xvii. 2. Matt. iv. 7. Mal. iii. 15. Acts v. 9. The Jews tempted Christ, by endeavouring to provoke or ensnare him. Matt. xvi. 1. and xxii. 16. (2.) To entice to sin: so Satan and his agents tempt men, and on that account Satan is called the tempter, 1 Cor. vii. 5. 1 Thes. iii. 5; God thus tempts no man, nor is he successfully tempted of any. Jam. i. 13. The Hebrew martyrs were tempted, were tortured or burnt. Heb. xi. 37.

TEMPTATION; (1.) The enticement of a person to sin, and the means thereof; this men are to watch and pray against. Matt. xxvi. 41. God leads men into temptation, when he withholds his grace and providential restraints; when he gives them up to Satan and their own lusts, or to their wicked neighbours, to be enticed to sin; or when he lays before them such occasions as they will improve to encourage and perpetrate their wickedness. Matt. vi. 12. (2.) Trials; sore afflictions; persecutions. Jam. i. 2, 12. Luke viii. 13. and xxii. 28. God's miracles of mercy and judgment, by which he tried the Hebrews' and Egyptians' obedience to his will, are called temptations. Dent. iv. 34. and vii. 19.

TEN, is a number of perfection, and ten times, is often. Gen. xxi. 7. Numb. xiv. 13. Job xix. 13. Ten pounds, or talents, denote many gifts and opportunities. Luke xix. 13. Matt. xxv. 28. Ten days of tribu- lation, denote a short space; or perhaps is an allusion to the ten years' persecution of Dioclesian. Rev. ii. 10. [See HORNS, CROWNS, TORNS, TITHES.] A tenth part, may signify one kingdom, or a considerable part of the Popish territory. Rev. xi. 13. In Isa. vi. 13. a tenth, or tenth part, may denote a few persons consecrated to the service of God.

TEND; to work towards. Prov. x. 16.

TENDER; (1.) Weak and feeble. Gen. xxxiii. 13. (2.) Nice and delicate. Dent. xxviii. 56. (3.) Young and carefully educated. Prov. iv. 3. (4.) Of a compassionate, kind, and forgiving temper. Eph. iv. 32. God's mercy is said to be tender, to import that it is infinitely kind and affectionate. Psal. xxv. 6. A tender heart, is one which is easily affected with God's law or providence, and cannot endure what is sinful. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 27. Young and weak believers, and the first motions of good works, are called tender grapes. Sol. Song ii. 12, 15.

TENT. See TABERNACLE.

TERAH, the son of Nahor, and father of Haran, Nahor and Abraham, was born A. M. 1878; and at the hundred and thirtieth year of his life, had Abraham born to him. He and his family were idolaters; but we hope God's call of Abraham, was blessed to the conversion of many of its members. It is certain that Terah went with Abraham to Haran, and died there. Gen. xi. 24—32. Josh. xxiv. 2, 14.

TERAPHIM; a description of images used by the ancients. Some think they were talismans, or figures of metal, formed under particular aspects of the planets; and to which they ascribed the preservation of the family from evil. To such the eastern nations have for many ages been exceedingly addicted; and the Persians call them terephim, which is much the same as teraphim. Rabbi Eliezer the Jew says, that teraphims were thus formed:—they killed a first-born child, cleaved his head, and sprinkled it with salt and oil; they wrote down the name of some devil in a golden plate, which they put under the child's tongue; they then placed the head in some niche of the house-wall, and lighted lamps to it, and asked it questions. Others think the terephim were little images of deceased friends, similar to the household gods of the Romans, or the ancestors of the Chinese. It is certain they were consulted for oracles. Zech. x. 2. To transfer her father's protector to herself and family, or in order to worship it, Rachel stole her father's terephim. He carefully searched to recover it, but could not. Jacob caused her soon after to deliver it, and he buried it under an oak. Gen. xxxi. 10—35. and xxxv. 4. Micah the Ephraimite, formed a terephim; but the Danites took it, and placed it in their city DAN. Judg. xvii. and xviii. Michal laid a terephim in the bed, instead of David her husband, and deceived her father's messengers. 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16. Dealers with familiar spirits consulted the terephim. 2 Kings xxiii. 24. Nebuchadnezzar consulted his terephim, whether he should first besiege Rabbah or Jerusalem. Ezek. xxi. 21. The Jews, in their present dispersion, are without images and terephim, as they profess great detestation of idolatry. Hos. iii. 4.

TERM; to name. Isa. lxii. 4.

TERRESTRIAL; belonging to the earth.

1 Cor. xv. 40. John iii. 12.

TERRIBLE; whatever by horrible aspect, or by cruelty, power, or greatness, affrights men. Deut. i. 19. Isa. viii. 11. God is called terrible, to point out his awful greatness, his infinite strength, strict justice, and fearful judgments. Jer. xx. 11. Zeph. ii. 11. The Chaldeans and Romans are called terrible; what fear and dread their power, conquests and cruelty, spread among the nations around! Hab. i. 7. Dan. ii. 31. and vii. 7.

TERRIFY; to fill with fear and dread. Deut. xx. 3.

TERROR, (1.) Great fear and dread. Gen. xxxv. 5. (2.) Fearful and unexpected calamities, which cause fear and dread. Psal. lxxiii. 19. (3.) A terrible example or incident, which strikes others with dread and awe, Ezek. xxvii. 36; thus the invasion and devastation of Judea were a terror to the Egyptians. Isa. xix. 17. The terror of God, is either his awful appearances, judgments, and views of him, Job vi. 4; or the fearful and majestic appearance of Christ to judge the world. 2 Cor. v. 11. The terror of the wicked, is their threatenings, by which they attempt to terrify the saints from their duty. 1 Pet. iii. 14.

TERRISE, or TERRACE; a stair; a raised way. 2 Chron. ix. 11.

TERTI-US; the Latin name of SILAS.

TER-TULLUS; a famous orator among the Jews, who, by flattering of Felix the wicked judge, and with abundance of falsehood, accused Paul at Cesarea. Acts xxiv. 1—10.

TESTAMENT; the written will of a dying man, by which he determines how his property shall be disposed of after his death. Gal. iii. 15.

TESTATOR, a deceased person who has left a will. Jesus Christ is called a Testator, because in his word he has freely bequeathed to sinful men all his unsearchable riches of grace and glory, Heb. ix. 16, 17: and the covenant of grace, as ratified by his death, is called a testament. Rev. xi. 19. The former dispensation of that covenant in the inspired writings of Moses and the prophets, is called the Old or First Testament: it was published before our Saviour's incarnation: it was ratified by his typical death in sacrifices, and was less excellent; and now, in its ceremonial observances is quite abolished. Heb. ix. 15. 2 Cor. iii. 15. The dispensation of the covenant of grace, in the writings of the apostles and evangelists, is called the New Testament: it is last in order, and is ratified by the actual death of our Saviour; and never till the end of time shall it be abolished. Though it be the same in substance with the Old it is more clear, spiritual, efficacious, easy, and extensive than the former. Heb. ix. 15. The wine in the Lord's Supper is called the new testament in Christ's blood, as it represents and seals all the promises of the new covenant, which are ratified and confirmed by his death, and applies the benefits of them, which are purchased by it. Luke xxii. 20. Matt. xxviii. 28.

TESTIFY; TESTIMONY. See WITNESS.

THAD-DE'US. See JUDE.

THANK; to acknowledge a benefit as freely received. 1 Cor. xvi. 4. What thank have ye? What grateful acknowledgment or reward can ye expect God will give you for your selfish conduct? Luke vi. 32—34. Thankworthy; worthy of thanks and praise. 1 Pet. ii. 19. Giving of thanks, is a hearty and cheerful acknowledgment of favours, spiritual, temporal, or eternal, bestowed on ourselves, or on others. Phil. iv. 6. 1 Tim. ii. 1. Thank-offerings, and psalms of praise, are called thanksgiving. Lev. vii. 12, 15. and xxii. 29. Neh. xi. 17. All thanksgiving is to be offered in Christ's name, and is to be always continued in, as in every condition there is a great mixture of God's mercy. Eph. v. 20. 2 Cor. ii. 14. Asking a blessing on food is called thanksgiving, as in it we acknowledge God's kindness in providing such provision. Luke xxiv. 30. and xxii. 17, 19. Matt. xv. 36. and xiv. 19.

THEATRE; a place where people assemble to behold plays and shows. It was often a place half, or almost wholly surrounded with seats of stone or wood, gradually ascending, in the manner of galleries in churches, or of those in play-houses. Acts xix. 24, 31.

THEBEZ, or THEBES; a city of the Ephraimites, about thirteen miles west from Bethshan, and about half a mile from Shechem. The inhabitants revolted from Abimelech the son of Gideon, and assisted the Shechemites. When he assailed it, they fled to their tower; and thence a woman broke his scull with a piece of a mill-stone. It was a village about 400 years after Christ. Judg. ix. 50—54.

THE-O-PHI'LUS; a Christian of note to whom Luke directed his Gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles. It seems he was a person celebrated for his gifts and graces, if not also for his high station. Some think that the name denotes any lover of God. Luke i. 3. Acts i. 1.

THES-SA-LO-NI'CA; the capital city of Macedonia, and situated on the north-east of the Thermaic or Saloniki Bay, and on the south-west frontier of Thracia. It was anciently called Halis and Thermæ; but Philip the father of Alexander the Great named it Thessalonica, to commemorate his victory over the Thessalians. About A. M. 3837, the Romans seized it. About A. D. 685, the Saracens took it; but Simeon, one of the Greek emperor's secretaries, redeemed it with a large sum of money. About A. D. 1180, William of Sicily took it from the Greek emperor; but he retained it but a short time. In 1313, it was sold to the Venetians. About 1430, Amurath the sultan or emperor of the Ottoman Turks, seized on it, and they still retain it. About A. D. 32, Paul, Silas, and Timothy, planted a church here. A persecution, stirred up by the Jews, obliged Paul and Silas to leave the place after they had preached here about three or four Sabbaths. They continued to persecute the Christians. To comfort them under their tribulations, Paul sent them an epistle not from Athens, as the postscript states, for there Silas or Silvanus was not with him; but from Corinth, where Silas and Timothy were both with him. 1 Thess. i. 1. He expresses his deep concern for them, his desire to visit them in their affliction; warns them of the last judgment, and inculcates such duties as tended to prepare them for it. As some had taken occasion from this epistle, to terrify them as if the last judgment were just at hand, he wrote them a second epistle, informing them of the gracious tendency of the last judgment towards them, and that it would not happen till after the rise and fall of Antichrist. He recommends a constant adherence to divine truth, a regularity and purity in church-fellowship, and a diligent activity in temporal affairs. But it is not to the honour of the Thessalonians that Paul there needed a supply of necessaries from Philippi. Phil. iv. 16. At present Thessalonica, or Saloniki is a considerable place for extent and trade. There are about forty-eight Mahometan mosques or temples, about forty Jewish synagogues, and about thirty churches belonging to the Christians of the Greek church. There are also here magnificent ruins of antiquity.

THEUDAS, some time before our Saviour's death, set up as some noted person, and was joined by about five hundred men; but he being killed, they dispersed. Perhaps he is the same Judas who revolted on the occasion of Herod's death; or Josephus is wrong in his chronology, and places the Theudas he mentions, as the head of a sedition, too late by some years. Acts v. 36.

THEFT, THIEF. See STEAL.

THICK; (1.) Great in depth or breadth. 2 Chron. iv. 5. Psal. lxxiv. 5. (2.) Crowded together. Luke xi. 29. Ezek. xix. 11.

THICKET; a thick plot of bushes or trees crowded together. Gen. xxiii. 13. Multitudes of lions lodged in the thickets of Jordan. Sometimes people hid themselves in thickets, to shun the rage of a cruel enemy. 1 Sam. xviii. 6. Jer. iv. 29. Vast multitudes of people are called a thicket. Isa. ix. 18. and x. 34.

THIGH; the upper part of the legs of an animal. To smile on it denotes great grief and sorrow. Ezek. xxi. 12. To have a name written on the thigh, imports that the person's fame and victory are publicly known, and shall be marked in his spiritual seed. Rev. xix. 16. The rulers and great men of Judah, in which the strength of the nation consisted, are the thigh and shoulder of flesh put into Jerusalem, the boiling pot of God's judgments, to be destroyed. Ezek. xxiv. 4. The two brazen thighs of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary image, denote the two powerful kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, into which the belly-like empire of Alexander was divided after his death. Dan. ii. 32.

THIN; the reverse of thick. Exod. xxxix. 3. The glory of Jacob was made thin, or emptied, when the Jews of power, wealth, wisdom, or piety, were generally cut off, or when the people were destroyed till they were few in number, and their wealth and prosperity had ceased. Isa. xvii. 4.

THING; (1.) A real substance or quality. Lev. xii. 5. Prov. iv. 7. (2.) A matter, an affair. Isa. vii. 13. (3.) A doctrine, or opinion. Ezek. xiv. 9. (4.) Persons, or qualities. Rev. xxi. 27. All things in heaven and earth are reconciled by Christ; Jews and gentiles are brought into one visible church; saints in heaven, and saints on earth, are united under one head; angels and redeemed men are joined in one family; and all things in heaven and earth are made to promote the same ends, of glory to God, and good to his people. Col. i. 20.

THINK; (1.) To form thoughts. Psal. xlviii. 9. (2.) To esteem, reckon. John xvi. 2. (3.) To remember, care for. Gen. xl. 14. (4.) To devise, resolve. Neh. vi. 6. God thinks on men, when he kindly takes notice of them and their good works, and vouchsafes to them his favours and benefits. Neh. v. 19. What think ye of Christ? What do ye know, believe, meditate of, esteem, or desire, about the person, office, and mediation of Christ? Matt. xxii. 42. THOUGHT, is, (1.) The exercise of thinking. (2.) Inward reasonings of conscience; so men's thoughts accense or excuse their works. Rom. ii. 15. Luke ix. 46, 47. (3.) Anxious and immoderate care, Matt. vi. 31, 34. and x. 19; and these texts ought to be rendered, Exercise no anxious care. (4.) Opinion. Job xii. 5. (5.) Purposes, resolutions. Psal. xliii. 11. Prov. xii. 4. Psal. lvi. 5. God's thoughts are either his sentiments and purposes concerning us, or our thoughts and meditations concerning his nature, excellencies, and works. Psal. xl. 5. and cxxxix. 17.

THIRD. The Jews observe a great many noted third days; as the third day of the loosing of the patriarchs, Gen. xlii. 18; the third day of the return of the Hebrew spies, Josh. iii. 16; the third day of the giving of the law; the third day of the Hebrews' revival, &c. But the third day of Isaac's escape from death, Gen. xxii. 4; the third day of Jonah's deliverance from the whale's belly, Jonah i. 17; the third day of Hezekiah's relief from his mortal distemper, 2 Kings xx. 5; and the third day of Jesus' resurrection from the dead, typified by these do more nearly concern us. 1 Cor. xv. 4. A third part denotes a very large one: so the dragon, with his tail, drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and cast them to the ground. By the heathen persecution of the Christians, especially under Dioclesian, vast numbers of ministers were killed, or compelled to desist from their work, and employ themselves in civil business; and not a few were forced into compliance with heathen idolatry. Rev. xii. 4. A third part of trees burnt up under the first trumpet, denotes a multitude of great men destroyed by the Goths, between A.D. 395 and 408; or, a multitude of ministers and noted Christians seduced by the Arian heresy, after A.D. 338, to that time. A third part of the sea becoming blood, and a third part of the creatures dying in it, and a third part of the ships destroyed under the second trumpet, denote vast multitudes of the subjects of the tumultuous Roman empire, and their cities, and wealth, being destroyed by the Goths, Alans, Vandals, Suevi, and Burgundians, from A.D. 408 to 455; or vast numbers of souls ruined by the tumultuous and bloody contentions in the church. The third part of the waters, upon which the star called Wormwood fell, under the third trumpet, is a great part of the provinces, and populous cities of the empire, ruined by Attila and his Huns; or the many doctrines of the gospel perverted by Pelagius and his followers. The third part of the sun, moon, and stars, being darkened, under the fourth trumpet, imports the obscurity and diminution of the power and glory of the emperor, and of the senate and great men in the empire, when the empire was ruled by Odoacer and his Heruli, and other barbarians, A. D. 476; or the obscuring of the scripture and of ordinances, and the decay of gifts and holiness in ministers, that followed the spread of the Pelagian errors. Rev. viii. 7—12. When two thirds that is, a great number of the Jews, were cut off by the Romans and others; a third part, (a considerable number,) passed through the fire, enduring much persecution, but were saved by the grace of God. Zech. xiii. 8, 9, and xiv. 2.

THIRST; (1.) Vehement desire for water. Psal. civ. 11. (2.) An eager desire after any thing satisfying; as after Christ and his righteousness, Matt. v. 6; or after happiness and pleasure in general, Isa. lv. 1. Rev. xxiii. 17; or, after the fulfilment of some filthy lust, as to commit whoredom, idolatry, &c. Dent. xxix. 19. Jer. ii. 26. (3.) That which causeth thirst, as the want of water, or sore afflictions, which beget an eager desire of deliverance. Dent. xxviii. 48. Isa. lxxv. 18. Amos viii. 3. Those are thirsty, who greatly need refreshing liquor, Judg. iv. 19; or the influences of God's Spirit, Isa. xlv. 3; or who are in great misery. Isa. lxxv. 18. A thirsty ground, or land, is either a field scorched and withered, and so in great need of dew and rain, Psal. lxxiii. 1: or an unprosperous and disagreeable condition, Ezek. xix. 13; or the gentiles, or others, in great need of spiritual blessings. Isa. xxxv. 7. Blood-thirsty, are such as delight in murdering others. Prov. xxix. 10.

THISTLE; a prickly weed that grows among corn, and in fields. Tournefort mentions eighty kinds of thistles. Wicked men are likened to them, to denote how useless, how barren of good, and hurtful to saints, and to churches and nations, they are. Luke vi. 44. 2 Chron. xxv. 18.

THOMAS, or DIDY-MUS, one of our Saviour's apostles. Matt. x. 3. When Thomas heard that Lazarus was dead, he proposed they should all testify their affection, by going to the spot, and dying along with him, or die with Christ, who endangered his life by returning to Judea. John xi. 16. Jesus, after his last supper talking of the mansions in his Father's house, which he was going to prepare for them, Thomas very ignorantly asked, whither he was going? and which way he would take? Jesus replied, that he himself was the way, the truth, and the life. John xiv. 5, 6. Thomas, being absent when the other ten, after his resurrection, saw their risen Lord; but afterwards hearing of it, he told them, that unless he saw in Jesus' hands the print of the nails, and put his fingers into them, and thrust his hand into the wound made by the spear in his side, he would never believe he was risen from the dead. When Jesus appeared to them the next Lord's day evening, he offered Thomas the proof of his resurrection he had required. Thomas overcome by such condescension, and it seems, without making the trial, cried out My Lord, and my God. Jesus told him, that it had been more to his honour, if he had believed without any sensible proof. John xx. 20—29. A few days after, Thomas saw his Master again at the sea of Galilee. John xxi. After he had staid several years at Jerusalem, he went, it is said, to preach among the Parthians, Medes, Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, and at last suffered martyrdom in Meliapor in the East Indies, near to which the Portuguese, about three hundred years ago, found Christians of St. Thomas; nay, some think he preached in China.

THONG; a leathern whip. Acts xiii. 25.

THORNS; a general name for prickly trees, or shrubs, the lesser kind are called BRIERS; both of them are useless as wood, except for fuel: both mar the increase of the ground, but are very useful for bedding. The great abundance of thorns is a continued memorial of Adam's fall. Gen. iii. 18. With thorns Gideon tore the flesh of the elders of Succoth. Judg. viii. 7, 18. To torture our Saviour, and to express contempt of his royalty, his enemies crowned him with a crown of platted thorns. John xix. 2. Thorns make a speedy and violent fire, but it is soon quenched. Psal. lviii. 9. and cxviii. 12. Thorns and briars covering a place, imports its being reduced to desolation. Hos. ix. 6. and x. 8. Mischievous and wicked men, who molest their neighbours, entangle them by their devices, hinder the usefulness of saints and faithful ministers, and ripen themselves for eternal fire, but who are sometimes used to protect the godly, are likened to thorns and briars. Ezek. ii. 6. Mic. vii. 4. Sol. Song ii. 2. 2 Sam. xxiii. 6. The Assyrians, and other enemies of the people of God, are like thorns and briars; how harrassing for a time; but how quickly consumed in the terrible fire of God's judgments! Isa. x. 17. and xxxiii. 12. Nah. i. 10. Psal. cxviii. 12. The Canaanites were to the Israelites like thorns or scourges in their sides, pricks in their eyes, snarcs and traps to them: they were means of seducing them into sin, and were instruments of God's vengeance against them. Numb. xxxiii. 55. Josh. xxiii. 13. The Sidonians were a grievous thorn and pricking brier to the house of Israel: they did much mischief to them. Ezek. xxviii. 24. Wicked lusts, carnal cares, and sinful practices, are called briars and thorns: they proceed from a stony heart, hinder true peace and quiet, choke the good seed of God's word, and are the means of eternal torments to such as indulge themselves therein. Heb. vi. 8. Jer. iv. 8. Matt. xiii. 7.

Thorns are put for great difficulties and hindrances, which stop men's progress, as a thorn-hedge: so thorns are in the way of the slothful, Prov. xv. 20; and thorns are in the way of the froward; great calamities and opposition await him. Prov. xxii. 25. To take the harvest out of the thorns, is to take the fruit of the field from one, notwithstanding every hindrance. Job v. 5. Troubles are called thorns; they prick, harass, and confine men; so God hedges up men's way with thorns, restrains them by sore trials and afflictions. Hos. ii. 6. Paul had a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan sent to buffet him; was distressed with some sore trouble or temptation. 2 Cor. xii. 7. As a thorn goeth up into the hand of a drunkard, so is a parable in the mouth of fools; it, however good in itself, doth rather hurt than good. Prov. xxvi. 9. The Assyrians rested on all thorns and hedges, like grass-hoppers and locusts, when they spread ruin and havoc every where through the cities and country of Judea. Isa. vii. 9.

THOUGHT. See THINK.

THOUSAND, ten hundred; but often thousands and ten thousands, are put for great numbers in general. Rev. v. 11. Eccl. vi. 6. and vii. 28. Isa. xxx. 17. The city that went out by a thousand shall leave a hundred, and that which went out by a hundred shall leave ten to the house of Israel; i. e. scarcely the tenth part of the inhabitants shall be preserved. Amos v. 3. Christ has a thousand from his vineyard of the church, when he has the chief glory ascribed to him; and his ministers or keepers have two hundred, when they have their due share of love, regard, and rewards, but far subordinate to his. Sol. Song viii. 11, 12.

THREAD. To break any thing as a thread of tow, is to do it very easily. Judg. xvi. 9, 12. Not to take from a thread, to a shoe-latchet, is not to receive the very least thing. Gen. xiv. 23.

THREATEN; to denounce evil against one. Acts iv. 17.

THREESCORE; denotes a considerable number. Sol. Song iii. 7. and vi. 8.

THREE, or THRICE, denotes frequently, or with frequency and earnestness. 2 Cor. xii. 8.

THRESH, to beat out corn from the ear or pod. Isa. xxviii. 28. The threshing reached unto the vintage, or treading of grapes, unto the sowing-time; when the one was not got finished when the other began, and so marked great plenty; so the ploughman overtook the reaper; and the sower of seed him that treadeth grapes. The harvest of Canaan was in our Spring, the vintage in our August, and the sowing-time about the end of October, or the beginning of November. Lev. xxvi. 5. Amos ix. 13. (2.) To harass, destroy. Hab. iii. 12. Amos i. 3. Babylon is represented as a threshing, or as the corn of the floor, to denote the sudden and terrible nature of God's judgments upon her. Isa. xxi. 10. Jer. li. 33. The church is represented as threshing mountains and hills, and fanning them to the wind; i. e. through Jesus, overcoming whatever opposers and opposition stands in the way of her happiness and duty. Mic. iv. 15. Isa. xli. 15.

THRESHOLD; the groundsel of a door or gate. Jud. xix. 27. The Jews set up their threshold by God's threshold, and their posts by his posts, and defiled the wall between him and them, when they made their own legal descent and common morality the ground of their church-membership, instead of Christ, believed on, and submitted to; and when they substituted their own inventions in the room and station of the ordinances of God. Ezek. xliii. 8.

THROAT; (1.) That passage from the mouth to the inward parts, and by which we are assisted in speaking. Psal. cxv. 7. (2.) Speech itself. Psal. v. 10. Rom. iii. 12.

THRONE. See SIT.

THRONG; to crowd and press thick about one. Mark iii. 9.

THROUGH; (1.) From the one side to the other. Numb. xxv. 8. (2.) Up and down. Psal. viii. 5. (3.) By means of; we are justified through Christ, by his fulfilment of the law as our surety, and the imputation of his righteousness to our persons. Rom. v. 1. and iii. 24. We are saved through faith; thereby we receive Christ and his salvation offered to us in the gospel. Eph. ii. 8. God is through all, taking care of, and displaying his perfections in all things; and is in all the saints, by his gracious presence. Eph. iv. 6. All things are through God, are preserved and governed by him; and are to him, are to his glory as their last end. Rom. xi. 36.

THROUGHLY, is, (1.) Exactly, fully. Job vi. 1. Matt. iii. 12. (2.) Sincerely. Jer. vii. 5.

THROW; to cast with force. Numb. xxxv. 17. To throw down, is to cast on the ground with violence, Luke ix. 42; to destroy, demolish, overturn. Ezek. xvi. 30.

THRUST; (1.) To press forcibly. 2 Kings iv. 22. (2.) To drive. Deut. xxxiii. 27. God thrusts down men, when he successively lays heavy afflictions upon them. Job xxxiii. 13. To thrust through, is to pierce, kill. Jer. li. 4.

THUNDER, is formed in the clouds, by the kindling of the sulphureous matter exhaled from the earth or sea by the heat of the sun, &c. This being kindled, makes a loud explosion; and runs along, where it finds sulphureous particles, in the same manner. The flash of lightning, and the noise, are really contemporary; but the lightning making a quicker motion towards the eye, than the noise can do towards the ear, is seen before the noise is heard, especially if the thunder be at any considerable distance. We call the flash of fire, a thunderbolt; as it often breaks, bruises, and rends whatever hard bodies are in its way: the sulphur contributing to the suffocation of animals; but when the flame is weak, or the resisting body is soft, it only singes or scorches it. Great stones, however, have sometimes fallen from heaven in the time of thunder. Exod. ix. 23. The unsearchable majesty and almighty influence of God's perfections, are called the thunder of his power, or prevailing excellency. Job xxvi. 14. The preaching of the gospel is like thunder; it makes men's hearts to tremble, and subdues their stubbornness. Mark iii. 17. Rev. xiv. 2. Terrible and destructive calamities are likened to thunder. Isa. xxix. 6. The noise of an army is called the thunder of the captains. Job xxxix. 25. The war-horse's neck is clothed with thunder, his neighing for the battle and the shaking of his mane, make a noise: but the word might be rendered, clothed with a cheerful tremor or triumphant shaking. Job xxxix. 19. The lightnings and thunders proceeding from God's throne, denote the majesty of his appearance, the enlightening and heart-affecting publication of his will, and the awful judgments which he, as our great Sovereign, sends upon the earth. Rev. iv. 5. The voices, thunders, lightnings, earthquakes, and hail, following on Christ's casting the fire of his vengeance on the earth, during the seven trumpets, and that which attends the sounding of the seventh trumpet, are terrible calamities of many different kinds. Rev. viii. 5. and xi. 19. The seven thunders, that uttered their voice when Christ spake under the sixth trumpet, may denote the infliction of manifold calamities, particularly of the seven vials on Antichrist, or the violent rending of the seven states of England, Scotland, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, some principalities of Germany, and part of Switzerland and France, from their subjection to the Pope. Rev. x. 3, 4.

THY-A-TIRA, a very considerable city of Lesser Asia, about twenty-six miles north of Sardis, and fifty-six north-east of Smyrna. Anciently it was called Pelopia, but Selenus the Syro-grecian king having repaired it, called it Thygateira. A Christian church was very early planted here; but they sinfully permitted a woman called, or like to, Jezebel, to seduce their members to commit fornication, and eat things sacrificed to idols; to reform them from which, John sent them an inspired epistle, but what success it had, we know not. The fate of this city is so wrapt in obscurity, that the very place where it stood is not agreed upon. We follow Rycart, in assuming it to be the same as Akhissar, where there now dwell about 4000 or 5000 Turks, in a wretched condition. Rev. ii. 18-29.

THYNE-WOOD is very durable, and may denote all durable and odoriferous wood, as cypress, cedar, and alnum trees, &c. which the papists use for rafters to their churches, or in forming their images. Rev. xviii. 12.

TI-BERI-AS, was a famed city of Western Galilee, built by Herod Agrippa in honour of the emperor Tiberius. It stood on the south-west shore of the sea of Galilee, about eighty miles north of Jerusalem, and twelve eastward of Nazareth. In the time of the Jewish wars, this city was the capital of Galilee, and was bravely defended by Josephus the historian: but being taken by Vespasian, the father of Titus, and afterward emperor, it was greatly demolished. It was, however, a place of considerable note many ages after. Here was both a Christian church, and a famed Jewish academy. John vi. 1, 23.

TIBERI-US. Cæsar Augustus, having married Livia his mother, adopted him to be his heir in the empire. In the beginning of his reign, Tiberius behaved himself decently; but afterwards became capricious, cruel, and oppressive. About the sixth year of his reign, the senate ordered all the Jews to depart from Rome, or become slaves. About the thirteenth year, he made Pilate governor of Judea. In the fifteenth year John Baptist began to preach. Luke iii. 1. Soon after, he took from the Jews the power of putting criminals to death. It is said, that hearing of the miracles of our Saviour, he was desirous to have him inrolled among the Roman deities, but was hindered by the senate. He so favoured the Christians, as to threaten death to such as molested them on account of their religion.

TIB'NI. See OMRI.

TID'AL, the ally of Chedorlaomer, was called king of Gojim, or nations, either because Gojim was the place of his abode, or that several tribes had united under his government. Gen. xiv. 1.

TIDINGS, news, report. The gospel is called good or glad tidings. It publishes and offers pardon to the guilty, righteousness to the naked and unholy, spiritual liberty to the captives of sin and Satan, salvation to the lost, and eternal riches of grace and glory to the poor and wretched. Isa. xl. 9. and li. 7. Luke i. 19. and ii. 10.

TIG'LATH-PI-LE'SER, or TIG'LATH-PIL-NE'SER, king of Assyria. Receiving the kingdom in a prosperous state after the death of his father Pul, he endeavoured to extend his dominions. Instigated by Ahaz king of Judah, he invaded Syria, slew Rezin their king, plundered Damascus and other places, and carried the people captive to Kir in Media. He ravaged the Hebrew territories eastward of Jordan, and carried the people captive to Halah, Habor, and Hara, on the river Gozan. He also ravaged Western Galilee, and took Ijon, Abel-beth-maachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, &c. and carried the people captives into Assyria. Not content, it seems, with the presents of Ahaz, and his complimentary visit to him at Damascus, he appears to have ravaged part of Judea. 2 Chron. xxviii. 20. 1 Chron. v. 26. 2 Kings xv. 29. After a reign of about nineteen years, he left his throne to Shalmaneser.

TILES were used to cover houses, and hence a roof is called the TILING: but as the Jewish roofs were flat, their tiles might be like our flag stones, or broad bricks. Perhaps the tile on which Ezekiel portrayed the city of Jerusalem, might be a tablet of free stone. Ezek. iv. 1.

TILL, to turn over the ground to render it fit for receiving seed. Cain was the first tiller or plowman. Gen. iv. 2. Tillage is husbandry, manuring of the fields. 1 Chron. xxvii. 26.

TIME, SEASON; (1.) The measure of motion, or the duration of things. Psal. lxxxix. 47. (2.) The particular appointed season or opportunity of doing a thing. Eccl. iii. 1. Gen. xviii. 10. Psal. lxxxi. 1. In season and out of season; i. e. when there is more or less opportunity. 2 Tim. iv. 2. The different times of Spring, Summer, Harvest, and Winter, are called the seasons. Gen. i. 14. The saints' ten years' suffering under Dioclesian, and of the devil's raging at the end of the millennium, is called a little season. Rev. vi. 11. and xx. 3. The appointed season of God's vengeance on men, is called his times, or days, as he displays his power and perfections therein; and their time, or the time of the heathen, as they then receive the due reward of their deeds. Job xxiv. 1. Jer. l. 27. 31. Ezek. iii. 3. Christ's time is either the time of his going up to the feast of tabernacles, or the time of his death, John vii. 6, 8; or the time of his appearance to judgment, 1 Tim. vi. 15; which will be a time of refreshing and restitution of all things; as then he will display his glory to the highest, fully comfort his saints, and restore the system of irrational nature to its original purity and honour. Acts iii. 20, 21. Rom. viii. 21. That season in which God calls sinners to him, and quickens and unites their souls to Christ, is called his time of love, Ezek. xvi. 8; and it is an acceptable time and day of salvation, when God bestows his special favours on men. Psal. lxi. 13. 2 Cor. vi. 2. According to the time of life, is after going nine months with child. Gen. xviii. 10, 14. The last times, or days, denote either the whole latter part of the duration of the world, or the whole of the gospel-period; particularly that in which the Jewish ceremonies were about to be abolished, 1 Pet. i. 20. Isa. ii. 2. Mic. iv. 1. 1 John ii. 18; or the latter part of the Christian period; which is represented as perilous times, abounding with scoffers and wicked professors. 1 Tim. iv. 1. 2 Tim. iii. 1—5. 2 Pet. iii. 3. To know the times, is to know the history of former times, and to observe the present times in their various circumstances, and what is proper to be done therein; thus discerning time and judgment. Esth. i. 13. 1 Chron. xii. 32. Eccl. viii. 5. But the knowledge of future times, in their events, is not for men to know, further than God is pleased to reveal. Acts i. 7. The Chaldean wise men sought to gain the time, i. e. to put it off till the king should call to mind his dream, or be diverted to some other business. Dan. ii. 8.

Time, in the prophetic style, signifies a natural year, so seven times passed over Nebuchadnezzar in his madness; he was seven years in it, Dan. iv. 16; or a prophetic year; so a time is 360 years, and time, times, and the half, or dividing of time, are three prophetic years and a half, or 1260 natural years. Compare Dan. vii. 25. and xii. 7. Rev. xii. 14. with Rev. xi. 2, 3. xii. 6. and xiii. 5. Dan. xii. 11, 12. To every thing there is a time and season; providence permits every event in its season: but that does not infer that God's law allows to spend time in each of the pursuits there mentioned; for it is plain, though God permits us to hate such as we once loved, yet he never allows us to hate whom we once lawfully loved. Eccl. iii. 1—8. Paul was born out of due time, was too late in coming to Christ, and not called to the apostleship till after our Saviour's ascension. 2 Cor. xv. 8.

TIM'NAH, TIM'NATH, TIM-NA'THAH, a city which stood in the western part of the lot of Judah, and was given to the Danites. It is said to have been six miles from Adullam, where Judah lived, and twelve from Eshtaol where Samson lived. Near to this place, Judah committed lewdness with Tamar; and from hence Samson married his wife. Gen. xxxviii. 12. Judg. xiv. 1. It was a village about 400 years after Christ.

TIM'NATH-SERAH, or TIM-NATH-HE-RES, a city of the Ephraimites where Joshua lived and was buried. Josh. xix. 50. and xxiv. 30. Judg. ii. 9.

TIM'O-THY, or TI-MOTHE-US, a noted evangelist. He was a native of Lystra in Lesser Asia. His father was a Greek, but his grandmother Lois, and his mother Eunice, being pious Jewish women, trained him up from a child in the knowledge of the scriptures, and Paul circumcised him, to render him the more acceptable to the Jews. His bodily constitution was very weak, but his gifts and graces were eminent. Acts xvi. 1. 2 Tim. i. 5, 15. and iii. 15. 1 Tim. v. 23. 1 Cor. iv. 17. After he had been ordained a minister by Paul and the Presbytery of Lystra, he became very dear to Paul, for his faithfulness and piety; and so he calls him his dear son in the faith, his faithful fellow-worker, &c. 2 Tim. i. 6. 1 Tim. iv. 14. and i. 2. 1 Cor. iv. 17. He accompanied Paul to Macedonia, and was with him at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea. At Paul's desire, he followed him from Berea to Athens; but was quickly sent back to confirm the Christians of Thessalonica, under their persecution. Acts xvii. 1 Thess. iii. 2, 3. Thence he and Silas came to Paul at Corinth, Acts xviii. 5; and, together with him, send their salutation to the Christians of Thessalonica. 1 Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1. 'Some years after, Paul sent him and Erastus from Ephesus to Macedonia and Corinth, to confirm the Christians there. Acts xix. 21, 22. 1 Cor. iv. 17. and xvi. 10. Having returned to Ephesus before Paul left the place, he was left there to settle the affairs of that infant church, 1 Tim. i. 3; and there he received his first epistle, about A. D. 56. After ordering matters at Ephesus, he followed Paul to Macedonia, from whence he united with Paul, in sending a salutation to the Corinthians. 2 Cor. i. 1. Soon after, he attended Paul to Corinth, and thence, with him, sends his salutation to the Romans. Rom. xvi. 21. Returning through Macedonia, he went with Paul to Asia. Acts xx. 4. Thither he was called, some years after, by Paul to Rome, in his second epistle to him. 2 Tim. iv. 9, 13. He was with Paul at Rome when he wrote his epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. Phil. i. 1. Col. i. 1. He was for a while a prisoner at Rome, but was afterwards set at liberty. Heb. xiii. 23. After which, we know not what became of him. The two epistles directed to him, encouraged and directed him in his feeding and government of the church, and warned him of the impending troubles.

TIN; a well-known metal, harder than lead, and of the same kind, with a mixture of silver, which formed part of the Tyrian trade with Tarshish. Ezek. xxvii. 12. Perhaps tin-mines renew their store in process of time. Trees are found in them at the depth of fifty fathoms. Sinners, and their corruptions, that are ready for the fire of God's wrath, are likened to lead, tin, brass, iron, and dross. Ezek. xxii. 18, 20. Isa. i. 25.

TINGLING of the ears, imports trembling and horror, because of fearful calamities. 1 Sam. iii. 11.

TIP, utmost point.

TIPH'SAH; (1.) A city of the tribe of Ephraim, at no great distance from Tirzah, and about six miles from Samaria. It seems this city refused to submit to MENAHEM; and being taken, the inhabitants were put to the sword. 2 Kings xv. 16. (2.) TIPH'SAH, or Thapsacus, on the Euphrates, on the east of Syria, and about six hundred miles north-west of Babylon. Some geographers place it on the east, and others on the west side of the river; but as there was a famous bridge here, possibly part of the city stood on the one side, and part on the other. This city was the north-east border of Solomon's territories. 1 Kings iv. 24.

TIRAS, or THIRAS; the seventh son of Japheth. He is supposed to have been the father of the Thracians, in whose country was the river Atyrus; and they worshipped the god of war, under the name of Odrusus and Thuras, probably the same as Tiras: there was here a nation called the Thrausi. The Thracians were long a very ignorant barbarous, and idolatrous people. They were divided into a great many nations or tribes, till the Greeks conquered them. Gen. x. 2.

TIRE, a dress for the head. Ezek. xxiv. 12, 23. Round tires like the moon, may denote the golden necklaces, somewhat like those worn by the kings of Midian, and their camels. Isa. iii. 18.

TIR-HA'KAH, or THE-ARCH'ON, as Strabo calls him, was King of CUSH; but whether that in Arabia, or in Abyssinia, is not agreed. We suppose him to have been the sovereign of Abyssinia and Egypt, and that he was defeated by Sennacherib, against whom he marched for the relief of king Hezekiah; and that at this time, to the terror of the Jews, the Ethiopians and Egyptians were taken prisoners. 2 Kings xix. 19. Isa. xx. 4-6.

TIR-SHATHA; a name given to Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. Some think it denotes the cup-bearer, but more properly it denotes a governor, or a commissary appointed by the Persian king, to carry his orders to a province, and see them put in execution. Ezra ii. 63. Neh. x. 1.

TIR'ZAH, a city of the Ephraimites. It was a most beautiful place. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, Nadab, Baasha, Ela, Zimri, Omri, kings of Israel, resided here; but after Samaria was built, the court mostly abandoned Tirzah. 1 Kings xiv. 17. and xv. 21. It appears to have shared in the fate of western TIPH'SAH. 2 Kings xv. 16. To mark the beauty of the church, in respect of her ordinances, influences, and graces, she is compared to Tirzah. Sol. Song vi. 4.

TISH'BEH; a city of Gilead, and the native place of Elijah. It seems to have still remained about four hundred years after Christ, but was in the hand of the Arabians. 1 Kings xvii. 1.

TISRI, or TIZRI. See ETHANIM.

TITHES, or TENTH PARTS. We suppose, God suggested to the ancient patriarchs his claim to the tenth part of their gain or product. When Abraham returned from his victory over Chedorlaomer and his allies, he gave to Melchizedek, the Lord's priest, the tenth part of his spoils. Gen. xiv. 20. Jacob dedicated to God by a vow the tenth part of his gain in Mesopotamia. Gen. xxviii. 22. Nay, many of the Greeks, Romans, and other heathens, devoted the tenth part of their incomes to the service of their gods. To commemorate the Hebrews living in the wilderness on omers or tenth-deals of manna, God not only regulated their meat-offerings by tenth-deals of fine flour, but he further regulated their tithes, in the following manner: After the first fruits, and their attendant offerings, were deducted, the tenth part of their remaining product of corn, cattle, &c. were assigned to the Levites. Of this the priests had the tenth part for their share. Of what remained to the proprietor, another tithe was levied, and in value or kind, sent to the service of the tabernacle, or temple, and its ministers, at the solemn feasts. On every third year a third tithe was levied from the proprietor, for the use of the Levites, the fatherless, widows, and strangers, if this was not the same as the second tithe, and only in the third year applied to this use, and eaten at home in their cities. It does not appear that the tithe of their herbs was demanded. The Pharisees, however, tithed their mint, anise, cummin, and rue; nor does our Lord condemn them for it, but for neglecting weightier things, as mercy, judgment, and faith, while they were so extremely exact in smaller matters. Deut. xiv. 22-29. and xii. 17. Numb. xviii. 20-32. At present, the Jews regard the law of tithe very little; nor is there any warrant for demanding them to the clergy under the Christian dispensation. As the patriarchs before Moses devoted their tithes to the Lord, it is still proper, if possible, to assign the tenth part of our income to the Lord, for the relief of the poor, and other pious uses; nor would there be much difficulty with most in so doing, if luxuries in food and dress were laid aside. Were these tithes emblems of the fulness of Jesus, collected from every promise and providence, for the sustenance of his people? Or, were they emblems of the saints, and their services, devoted to the honour of Christ, as the endless satisfaction of his soul, and as useful to those around them?

TITUS, a noted Evangelist. Being originally a gentile, he was never circumcised. He attended Paul, (by whose ministry he had been converted), from Syria, to the synod at Jerusalem. Gal. ii. 1-3. Some years after, Paul sent him to Corinth, where his piety, and his disinterested and zealous preaching of the gospel, procured him a kind reception. Coming from thence to Paul in Macedonia, he gave him an account of the state of the Corinthian church, and was returned to them, bearing a second epistle from Paul. 2 Cor. xii. 18. and vii. 6. 15. and viii. 6, 16, 17. The exact time when Paul left him in Crete, to settle the affairs of that church, and ordain elders in it, is uncertain; but in the epistle sent thither to him, he desires him to come to him at Nicopolis, and bring Zenas the lawyer and Apollos with him, as soon as Tychicus and Artemas should arrive to supply his place. Tit. iii. 12, 13. After this Paul sent him into Dalmatia, 2 Tim. iv. 10; but it is said, he returned to Crete, and thence propagated the gospel in the neighbouring islands. The epistle sent to Titus, directs him to ordain officers; to warn and censure the unruly; and to teach all ranks to act agreeably to their Christian character.

TITLE; (1.) Name, character. Job

xxxii. 21, 22. (2.) A motto, or inscription, on a grave-stone, 2 Kings xxiii. 17; or on a cross. John xix. 19, 20.

TITLE; the least part, the least sentence. Matt. v. 18.

TO, sometimes expresses the end of an act, or course, Rom. ix. 22. 1 Thess. v. 9; or the place or person towards which one moves. Job xxiii. 3.

TOES; the ten toes of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary image, denoted the ten kingdoms formed out of the Roman empire. See HORNS. Dan. ii. 41, 42.

TOB, or ISH'TOB; a small principality on the south-east of Syria, where Jephthah retired when driven from his native country by his brethren. Judg. xi. 3, 5. In the time of the Maccabees, the people here were called the Tubieni.

TO-BIAH. See NEHEMIAH.

TO-BIJAH. See ZACHARIAH.

TO-GARMAH, the third son of Gomer, and grandson of Japheth. Gen. x. 3. Josephus makes him the father of the Phrygians; Bochart, of the Cappadocians, of whom there was a tribe called Trogmi, Trocmi, or Trogmades. Others make him the father of the Turcomanians in Tartary. The Armenians too pretend to be his descendants. It is certain that his posterity traded with the Tyrians, in horsemen, horses and mules, Ezek. xxvii. 14; and that they will assist Gog and Magog against the Hebrews, at the beginning of the millennium. Ezek. xxxviii. 6.

TOGETHER; (1.) United in one place, condition, inclination, or design. Job iii. 18. Acts v. 9. (2.) Wholly; every whit. Job x. 8. (3.) By ourselves, alone. Ezra iv. 3.

TO'I, or TOU. See DAVID, HAMATH.

TOKEN. See MARK.

TOLA; (1.) The eldest son of Issachar, and father of the Tolaites. Numb. xxvi. 23. (2.) Tolah the tenth Judge of Israel. He was the son of Puah, and grandson of Dodo, of the tribe of Issachar. He succeeded Abimelech, and judged Israel twenty-three years, and was buried at Shamir in mount Ephraim, A. M. 2794. Jud. x. 1.

TOLERABLE; what may be borne, or endured. It will be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon, Sodom, and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment, than for such as enjoyed Christ's miracles and gospel, but believed not; as the eternal torments of the former will be less grievous than those of the latter. Matt. x. 15. and xi. 22.

TOMB. See GRAVE.

TONGUE. See MOUTH.

TOOTH. The teeth of animals are those bony substances that grow in their jaws, and with which they hold or chew their food. Some have fore-teeth in both jaws; some only in one; and some have more than one row of teeth in the same jaw. Some animals have tusks higher than the rest, for the holding and tearing of their prey. Confidence in an unfaithful friend, is like a broken tooth, that may pain, but cannot chew; or a foot out of joint, painful, but not useful; it hurts those that have it. Prov. xxv. 19. Men being likened to wild beasts, their pernicious and reproachful speeches, and their power and ability to do mischief, are called teeth like spears, swords, and knives, Psalm. lvii. 4. Prov. xxx. 14. Job iv. 10; and God breaks these teeth, when he disables men for hurting others. Psalm. lviii. 6. But he breaks the teeth of his people with gravel stones, when he involves them in a train of distressful providences. Lam. iii. 16. Iron teeth, import great power and disposition to destroy others. Dan. vii. 7. To have the teeth set on edge, imports, to be painfully afflicted. Jer. xxxi. 29, 30. To take one's own flesh in his teeth, imports being maddened with pain and despair. Job xiii. 14. To gnash the teeth, imports great torment and rage. Matt. viii. 12. Acts vii. 54. The church's teeth, like an evenly shorn, and newly washed flock of sheep, are her holy, harmonious, and useful ministers, who break the bread of life to their people; or the comely, holy, and harmonious exercises of faith and meditation, by which the saints render God's truths the nourishing food of their soul. Sol. Song iv. 2. and vi. 6.

TOP; (1.) The upper end of a thing. Eath. v. 2. Lam. ii. 19. (2.) The highest part of any thing. Gen. vii. 5. and xxviii. 18. (3.) The height of power and wealth, and the pride that attends it. Ezek. xxxi. 3, 10, 14. On or above the tops of mountains, hills, and houses, imports a most public and visible state or manner. Isa. ii. 2. Matt. x. 27. Ezek. xxiv. 7; but the Jews being on house-tops, when the Romans invaded their country, imported their hiding themselves in secret places, Matt. xxiv. 17. Luke xvii. 13; or men's posting themselves where they can best discern the approach of the enemy. Isa. xxi. 1. and xv. 3.

TOPAZ; a precious and transparent jewel. The finest topazes are brought from the East Indies, and are often found about the size of a pin's head, and scarcely any exceed the sixth part of an inch in diameter. The best are of a golden colour; but Pliny says the best are of a green colour. The most valuable topaz, is supposed to be in the possession of the Great Mogul. It weighs about a hundred and thirty seven carats, and cost £200,300 sterling. The Topaz was anciently found in an island of the Red sea, called Topazion, and hence it is called the Topaz of Cush. Job xxviii. 19. If the Pitdath signifies a topaz, it was second in the high-priest's breast-plate, and it was the ninth foundation of the New Jerusalem. Exod. xxviii. 17. Rev. xxi. 20. At present, the topazes of East India are the best; those of Abyssinia the next; those of Peru in America, are much softer; and those of Bohemia in Germany, are still softer, and a little cloudy. By proper firing, crystal is formed into a kind of topaz.

TOPHET; a place on the east of Jerusalem: so called from the beating of drums to drown the cries of the children burnt in the fire to Molech. It was also called The Valley of Hinnom, either from some proprietor of it, or it may be rendered the valley of shrieking. Reland places the valley of Hinnom on the west of Jerusalem. It is said to have been a very delightful spot, watered by the streams of Shiloah, and shaded with a number of gardens. But it is more certain, that here the Jews burnt their children to Molech. Jer. vii. 30. Here, according to the purpose of God, a great part of the Assyrian host were cut off, as in a fire, by a burning pestilence. Isa. xxx. 33. To stop the idolatries here practised, Josiah rendered it as filthy as he could, probably making it a burying place, or a place of burning dead carcases to which burial was not allowed. 2 Kings xxiii. 10, 11. It seems that multitudes of the Jews slain by the Chaldeans at the taking of Jerusalem, were buried here. Jer. vii. 32. and xix. 11—13. Afterwards it seems to have become the common receptacle of carcases, garbage, and filth, and a fire was kept burning to consume it. The word Gehenna, used for hell, is the same as Gehinnom, The Valley of Hinnom, or of shrieking.

TORCH. See LAMP.

TORMENT. See PAIN.

TORTOISE. There are two kinds of tortoises, viz. sea and land ones; and twelve particular kinds. It is the land tortoise that is mentioned in scripture; the shell that covers it, renders it in shape like a covered wagon. Some call it the land crocodile. It feeds on flowers; and in Syria, and places adjacent, is reckoned a fine dish. In the East Indies the land tortoises are seldom above three inches long; but in the isle of Madagascar, it is said, there are some about a foot long; and covered with a shell mixed of white, yellow, and other colours. There is a most ugly kind of tortoise that haunts old walls, and will live several days after its head is severed from its body. This was possibly the tzab of the Hebrews, if that animal be not rather what Dr. Shaw calls the sharp-scaled tailed lizard.

TOSS; violently to drive hither and thither. Men are tossed to and fro in their condition, when they have no rest from troubles, arising from different quarters. Psal. cix. 28. Isa. liv. 11. Tossings denote trouble and disquiet of mind. Job vii. 5. Professors are tossed to and fro in their religion, when they are unsettled in their opinions and practice. Eph. iv. 14.

TOTTERING; shaking hither and thither. Psal. lxi. 3.

TOUCH; (1.) Lightly to feel a thing. Luke viii. 44. (2.) To distress, afflict. Gen. xxvi. 11, 29. John xix. 21. (3.) To prevail against, destroy. 1 John v. 18. Heb. xi. 28. (4.) To approach, come close to. Exod. xix. 16. Acts xxvii. 3. (5.) To meddle with. Numb. xvi. 26. God toucheth men's hearts, when he inclines and persuades them to a thing. 1 Sam. x. 26. He toucheth the earth till it melts, when he executes his fearful judgments on the inhabitants. Amos ix. 5. He toucheth the mountains, and they smoke, when he readily removes hindrances in his way, and debases the proud and great. Psal. cxliv. 5. Christ is *touch*ed with the feeling of our infirmities; he readily and kindly sympathizes with us under our troubles. Heb. iv. 15. Alexander and his army did not touch the ground in their march against the Persians; i. e. they marched with astonishing speed, as if flying, and meeting with no effectual resistance. Dan. viii. 5. Blood toucheth blood, when murder and other heinous sins are committed every where, and closely after one another. Hos. iv. 2. Carnal dealing with a woman is called touch- ing of her. Gen. xi. 6. Prov. vi. 29. 1 Cor. vii. 1. TOUCHING; with respect to. 2 Thess. ii. 4.

TOW. Wicked men are likened to tow, to mark their ripeness for the destructive judgments of God, and their easy and quick ruin by means of them, and their inability to withstand them. Isa. i. 31. and xliii. 17.

TOWARDS; (1.) Inclining to. Numb. xiv. 1. (2.) On the way to. Gen. xii. 9. (3.) With respect to. Dent. xxvii. 54, 56. Repentance is towards God; because it is sorrow for sin as against his honour and law, and in repentance we turn from it to him as our portion, master, and Saviour: faith is towards Jesus Christ, as by it we look to, and depend on him for every thing necessary to our salvation. Acts x. 21. The heart is towards one, when we are greatly pleased with him, and his work. Judg. v. 9. Men's eyes are towards the Lord, when they seek and expect their help and salvation only from him. Psal. xxv. 15. Isa. xvi. 7.

TOWER; a strong and high building, for protecting against enemies, and for annoying them; or for prospect. 2 Chron. xiv. 7. In scripture, we read of the towers of Babylon, Jerusalem, Penuel, Shechem, Thebez, Eder, &c. The tower of the watchmen, may be one erected for watching the invasion of enemies; and from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city, is in all places more or less populous. 2 Kings xvii. 9. The tower of the flock, may denote Bethlehem, near to which was the tower of Eder, or of the flock; or Jerusalem, where the tribes of God assembled as a flock; or Jesus as God himself, who is the protecting Saviour of his people. Mic. iv. 8. 2 Sam. xxii. 3. Prov. xviii. 10. Jerusalem, the temple, and the ordinances of God, were a tower in God's vineyard; were most visible, and useful for protecting men. Isa. v. 2. Matt. xxi. 33. Sol. Song viii. 10. The church's neck is like a tower, or tower of ivory; upright, pure, and heavenly minded. By the scriptures and ministers is the church protected from temptations, errors, and corruptions; by faith is every believing soul furnished with the whole armour and protection of God. Sol. Song iv. 4. and vii. 4. Her nose is as the tower of Lebanon; which looketh towards Damascus, where the Syrian foes of Israel dwell: Her watchful ministers watchfully guard her against her most dangerous seducers; and, by spiritual prudence and discretion, the saints watch and keep themselves in readiness to resist their most dangerous temptations and foes. Sol. Song vii. 4. Jeremiah was like a tower and fortress, to spy out and reprove the Jews for their sins, and they could not prevail to silence or destroy him. Jer. vi. 27.

TOWN; (1.) A city. 1 Sam. xxiii. 7. (2.) A village. Esth ix. 19.

TRA-CHON'TIS; a small canton on the south of Damascus, which properly pertained to Arabia, not to Canaan. It had Ituria on the south, and Bashan on the west. It abounded with rocks. Here the robbers that gave Herod the Great so much trouble, sheltered themselves. Philip his son was tetrarch here. Luke iii. 1.

TRADE; to deal in any lawful business, as buying, selling, &c. Gen. xvi. 32, 34. To trade with the talents, or pounds, which God gives, is to exercise our gifts and graces, and improve our opportunities, to the honour of God, and the good of ourselves and our neighbours. Matt. xxv. 16.

TRADITIONS; things handed down from age to age, without being committed to writing. The Jews pretend, that besides the laws of Moses written in the Pentateuch, God gave him many more, of which he informed Aaron and his sons; who handed them down to the elders; and these, in their turn, informed the prophets: who, from one generation to another, conveyed them to posterity. This oral law, conveyed without writing, they reckon the soul of the written law, which, as it were, gives life and sense to it. These traditions, however, were but the inventions of presumptuous men. Moses expressly requires us to regard only what God has revealed to us in his written word. Deut. xxxii. 20. After the time of Malachi, these traditions were exceedingly multiplied; but some of them were trifling; as instructions for washing of hands, pots, and tables; and some whimsical; as those relative to the phylacteries; some of them were absolutely wicked; as the notion that a man's consecrating property to God, freed him from the duty of supporting his aged parents; their allowance to swear by creatures; pretending that an oath was more binding if sworn by the gift on the altar, than by the altar itself; their pretending it was lawful to hate enemies, &c. Our Saviour inveighs against them, as making void the commandments of God, and rendering their devotion useless by their traditions. Matt. xv. and xxiii. Soon after, their religion consisted almost wholly in observance of these traditions. Rabbi Judah, about A. D. 190, collected what traditions he could, and called his work the Mishna, or second law. This not being sufficiently clear on many heads, Rabbi Jochanan, about a hundred years after, wrote a commentary on it. This he called the Gemara, or the Perfection. These two joined together, are called the Talmud, or directory of Jerusalem, because composed chiefly for the use of the Jews in Canaan. But as this Gemara was written in an obscure style, and multitudes of traditions known in the east not mentioned in it, Rabbi Ase, and his disciples, composed another, and which, being joined to the Mishna, formed the Babylonian Talmud. It consists of six parts, sixty-three treatises, and five hundred and twenty-four chapters; and rehearses the various decisions of the rabbins concerning seeds, plants, and fruits, festivals, women, injuries, sacrifices and other things sacred, and purifications. Though these Talmuds are full of trifles and nonsense, yet they, especially the Babylonian, (for the Jerusalem Talmud is little regarded) are what we may call the body of the civil and canon law of the modern Jews, if not their creed, which they reckon incomparably preferable to the Old Testament, and for rejecting of which, they abhor their brethren the Karaites, who regard only the Bible. As the Talmud is so large that few of their doctors could render themselves master of it, Moses Maimonides, a Spanish rabbin, about A. D. 1180, composed an abridgement of it, which is published in four volumes folio; and to him they are obliged for curtailing, at least for abridging a great deal of nonsense. After all, a reader endowed with a sufficient stock of patience, may find a variety of things in the Talmud tending to illustrate several passages of the oracles of God.

Under the New Testament dispensation, the Papists have pretended to hold a multitude of traditions, said to be conveyed from the apostles. These are, for the most part, not a whit better than the Talmuds. Nor does the word of God allow us to regard any such, in the matter of religion. The Thessalonians were required to hold the traditions, i. e. what had been delivered to them in the epistles sent them, and in the preaching of Paul and his brethren, according to the scriptures. But now the canon is finished, with a terrible curse denounced against the person who adds to or takes from what is written in the Bible. 2 Thess. iii. 15. Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

TRAFFIC; merchandize. Ezek. xvii. 4.

TRAFFICERS; merchants. Isa. xxiii.

TRAIN, a company of attendants. 1 Kings x. 2. Christ's train filling the temple, may denote either a multitude of angels; or that the perfections of the Deity dwell in, and a rich variety of graces furnish his manhood; and that the fruits of his mediatorial office fill the church with oracles, ordinances, and ministers, and with saints, gifts, and graces. Isa. vi. 1.

TRAITOR; one who betrays his king, master, or friend. Luke vi. 16. John vi. 71.

TRAMPLE; to TREAD under foot, Psal. xci. 13.

TRANCE; the state of a person's mind, in which by wonder or otherwise, his outward senses are bound up, and supernatural things are revealed to him. When Ezekiel, and John the apostle had their visions, they were often cast into a trance. Ezek. i. &c. Rev. i. and iv. &c. And so was Peter when admonished to go and preach to the gentiles, Acts x. 10. and xi. 5. Balaam stated, that he, falling into a trance, saw the glory of the Lord. Numb. xxiv. 4.

TRANQUILLITY; quietness and prosperity. Dan. iv. 27.

TRANSFER; to apply to one that which respects another: thus Paul, in a figure, transferred, or applied to himself and Apollos, the comparison of planters, waterers, and stewards. 1 Cor. iv. 6.

TRANSFIGURE, TRANSFORM, to turn into another shape. To give our Saviour a foretaste of his future glory, and to fortify some of his disciples against the offence of his after sufferings, he, as he prayed, was gloriously transfigured on the mount. Matt. xvii. 1—5. Men are transformed, by the renewing of their minds, when their nature is changed from its likeness to Satan into the image of God, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness, and their practice is rendered conformable to his law. Rom. xii. 2. Satan is transformed into an angel of light, when he tempts to things under the appearance of knowledge, holiness, spiritual li berly, eminent fellowship with God; and his ministers are transformed into apostles of Christ, when they pretend a commission from Christ, and have great appearances of seriousness, zeal, and devotion. 2 Cor. xi. 13—15.

TRANSGRESS; to disobey a law, going over the limits which it prescribes for action or forbearance. Eath. iii. 3. Sin is a transgression; by it we treacherously pass the boundary which God hath fixed for our duty in his law, and do what he forbids, or omit what he requires. 1 John iii. 4. A TRANSGRESSOR is a sinner, particularly a noted one. Isa. xlviii. 8. Gal. ii. 18. Isa. liii. 12.

TRANSLATE; to remove from one person, place, or state, to another: so Abner, intended to translate the kingdom of Israel, taking it from Ishbosheth, and giving it to David. 2 Sam. iii. 10. Enoch was translated; when he was removed, soul and body at once, from earth to heaven. Heb. xi. 5. The elect at their conversion are translated; are brought out of the kingdom of Satan, and a state of sin and misery, to a state of union with, and subjection to Christ. Col. i. 13.

TRANSPARENT; what may be seen through; as glass, &c. Rev. xxi. 21.

TRAP. See SNARE.

TRAVAIL; women's painful labour in child-bearing. Gen. xxxv. 16. Exquisite, painful, and sudden calamities and distress, are likened to it. Isa. xlii. 8. Hos. xlii. 13. Jer. xxx. 6, 7. 1 Thess. v. 3. God is like to a travailing woman, when, after long patience, he, by the vigorous exertion of his power, brings forth deliverance to his people, and ruin to their enemies. Isa. xlii. 14. The travail of Christ's soul, is the painful suffering he endured, for bringing forth glory to God, and redemption to us; and the saints, who, by means thereof, are begotten again, and brought forth into their new covenant state. Isa. liii. 11. The church travileth, when, by prayers and vigorous endeavours, and by enduring sore persecutions and troubles, she brings forth reformation and children to Christ. Mic. v. 8. Rev. xii. 2. Gal. iv. 19. Zion brought forth children before she travailed; her deliverance came very speedily and unexpectedly; or before the ruin of the Jewish church, the gospel church was founded. Isa. lvi. 7. Men travail with iniquity, when, even to the distressing of themselves, they labour to commit it. Psal. vii. 13. Not to travail, is expressive of barrenness, and of want of inhabitants, or of good ones in a land. Isa. xxiii. 4. and iv. 1.

TRAVEL; (1.) Journeying from one place to another. Acts xix. 29. (2.) Hard labour and toil. Eccl. iii. 10. (3.) Trouble; distress. Numb. xx. 14. God is like a traveller, or way-faring man, when his visits to his people are seldom and short, and he seems to take little notice of them. Jer. xiv. 8. Christ is likened to a traveller: he came into our world; he left it, and retired into heaven; but still in his spiritual power and influence, he travels through his churches, to help and protect them. Matt. xxv. 14. Isa. lxlii. 1. Saints are PILGRIMS, or way-faring men; travellers from one place to another; their condition here is unsettled; but united to, and assisted by Jesus, they, through much danger and opposition, proceed from one degree of grace to another, till they at last arrive at their everlasting home. 1 Pet. ii. 11. Heb. xi. 11. Isa. xxxv.

8. Satan is a traveller, who goes about seeking entertainment in men's hearts, 2 Sam. xii. 4: and, being disturbed by the success of the gospel, in the dry places of the heathen world, he returned to the Jews, and made them more hardened against Christ, and more wicked than before. Luke xi. 24—26. Matt. xii. 43—45. Poverty and want come on sluggards as a traveller, and as an armed man; gradually, but unexpectedly and irresistibly, and render them miserable. Prov. vi. 11. and xxiv. 34.

TRAVERSE; to go hither and thither. The Jews traversed their ways, by sometimes following the Lord, and immediately after following their idols; by changing from one idol to another. Jer. ii. 23.

TREACHERY, or TREASON, is perfidiously acting contrary to covenant-obligations, as when a subject, contrary to his oath and duty of allegiance, rebels against, and murders his sovereign. 2 Kings ix. 23. and xi. 14. The Jews were treacherous; guilty of deceit and covenant-breaking with God and men. Jer. iii. 7, 11. The Assyrians dealt treacherously, when, contrary to treaty, they ravaged Judea; and they were dealt treacherously with, when Sennacherib's sons murdered him, and when the Medes and Chaldeans destroyed their kingdom. Isa. xxxiii. 1. The Medes and Persians dealt very treacherously, when, casting off their allegiance, they destroyed Babylon. Isa. xxi. 2.

TREAD; (1.) To walk upon. Deut. xi. 24. Men tread God's courts, when there is no more of spiritual service in their worship than if they were beasts. Isa. i. 12. (2.) To pasture; to feed. Isa. vii. 25. (3.) To squeeze; press out the juice of grapes, Job xxiv. 11; and hence Christ treads the wine-press, when he destroys his enemies, and tramples them, as if under his feet. Isa. lxiii. 3. Rev. xix. 15. Treading, or treading down, imports great affliction and debasement; full conquest and ruin. Isa. xxii. 5. Psal. xlv. 5. and vii. 5. and lx. 12. Christ's ministers and people tread on adders, lions, serpents, and all the power of the enemy, when they prevail over Satan and his agents, to the spread of the gospel, and growing in grace. Luke x. 19. Psal. xci. 13. Antichrist treads under foot the holy city; oppresses and murders the saints, and debases the ordinances and form of the church. Rev. xi. 2. To tread the poor, is to oppress and afflict them. Amos v. 11. To be trodden down as straw for the dung-hill, is to be reduced to great misery and contempt. Isa. xxv. 10.

TREASURE; (1.) A store or collection of valuable things, as of corn, wine, oil, gold, silver, brass. Jer. xli. 8. Ezek. xxviii. 4. Dan. xi. 43. (2.) A TREASURY, or that which contains a valuable collection, as a bundle, packet, cabinet, place; and that part of the tabernacle or temple where the sacred gifts were gathered or laid up, was called the TREASURY. Matt. ii. 11. Josh. vi. 19. Mark xii. 41. God's treasures are collected quantitles of snow, hail, rain, waters, wind. Job. xxxviii. 22. Jer. li. 6. Psal. cxxxv. 7. The clouds which water and fructify the earth, are called his good treasure. Deut. xxviii. 12. The wealth hid in the bowels of the earth, is called his hidden treasure. Psal. xvii. 14. His people are his treasure, collected from among men, and carefully kept, and highly valued by him as his jewels. Exod. xix. 5. Mal. iii. 17. Christ is represented as a treasure; in him dwells all the fulness of God, and in him are laid up, hid, and safely preserved, all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and all that is proper to be communicated to sinful men. Col. ii. 3, 9. and i. 19. He and his gospel are a treasure hid in the field; he, in all his precious, diversified, and enriching fulness of grace and glory, and the gospel in all its precious promises and blessings, are laid up in the scriptures, and are invisible to most men. Matt. xiii. 44. This treasure is in earthen vessels, as it is committed to poor weak men to preach and exhibit. 2 Cor. iv. 7. Men have within them a good treasure of holy dispositions, gifts, graces, and thoughts, Matt. xii. 35; or an evil treasure of wicked inclinations and erroneous opinions. Luke vi. 45. Wealth obtained by fraud, oppression, and the like, is called treasures of wickedness. Prov. x. 2. The fear of the Lord is his treasure; it is delightful to God, and very profitable to the saints. Isa. xxxiii. 6. Men's treasure, laid up for them, is either eternal glory, prepared in heaven for the saints, and which is laid up by receiving Christ and walking in him, Matt. vi. 19, 20; or a treasure of wrath, laid up for the everlasting punishment of the wicked. Jam. v. 3. Rom. ii. 5.

TREATISE; a book; the gospel of Luke. Acts i. 1.

TREES; the largest description of plants, some of which are useful for wood, others for fruit, and some for both purposes. The scripture mentions shittah, cedar, chesnut, cypress, almuq or algum, oak, teil, ash, elm, box, fir, oil, olive, apple, pomegranate, fig, sycamore, mulberry, &c. trees. Every pleasant and fruitful tree grew in the garden of Eden; but the tree of knowledge of good and evil, so called because thereby God tried man's perseverance in good, or fall into evil; and by eating of its fruit, man experienced what it was to fall from good into evil, and the fruit of which, if eaten, sealed up man under misery and woe; and the tree of life, so called, perhaps, because it was a natural means of preserving man's animal vigour, but chiefly as it confirmed to him eternal life, upon condition of his unceasing obedience during his time of trial. Gen. ii. 9, 17. Of what kind these two trees were, it is impossible for us to determine. Jesus Christ is called the tree of life, in the midst of the street, and on either side of the river of life, or between the street and river; and which yields its fruit every month, and the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations. He has all life in himself; and through union to him, and fellowship with him, in his blessings and fruits, are sinful men quickened, justified, adopted, sanctified, and healed, and partake of eternal life. Rev. xxii. 2. and ii. 7. The saints are trees of righteousness, planted by the river of Christ's blood and spiritual influences, and whose fruit is for food, and leaves for medicine. Rooted and grounded in Christ, and partaking of his influences, they grow heavenward, and bring forth the fruits of righteousness, to the praise and glory of God, and the edification of those around; nor do they ever wither and fade, but persevere in grace to the end. Rev. ix. 4. Psal. i. 3. Ezek. xlvii. 7, 12. Isa. lxi. 3. Jer. xvii. 7, 8.

Kings and great or proud men, are likened to trees; their honour, power, and wealth, or pride, are conspicuous and superior to others, and they are means of protecting or overshadowing others. Ezek. xxxi. 5, 9. Dan. iv. 10, 23. Rev. viii. 7. Creatures in general, are called trees of the wood, all are contemptible, unlovely, and unfruitful, in comparison of Christ. Sol. Song ii. 3. Wisdom, or real religion, and the fruits of righteousness, are a tree of life: they render the man lively and active in holiness, and issue in the eternal life of himself and others. Prov. iii. 18. and xi. 30. A man's hope is removed like an old tree cut down, when it cannot be recovered. Job xix. 10.

TREMBLE; (1.) To shake. Job x. 6. and xxvi. 11. Eccl. xii. 3. (2.) To fear exceedingly, till one shake with dread, Deut. ii. 25; and that either as impressed with awful greatness or alarming judgments, Amos viii. 8. Jam. ii. 19; or under a holy awe of the purity and goodness of God, and the authority and holiness of his word. Jer. xxxiii. 9. Isa. lxxv. 5. and lxxvi. 2. When Ephraim spoke trembling, he exalted himself; but when he offended in Baal, he died. As long as the ten tribes behaved humbly, they prospered; but their proud introduction of the worship of Baal proved their ruin. Hos. xii. 1.

TRENCH, a ditch digged about a camp, for its protection; or about a city, to protect it, or to prevent the escape of the inhabitants, 1 Sam. xvii. 20. Luke xix. 43; or a ditch about an altar. 1 Kings xviii. 32.

TRESPASS, a failing of duty towards God or men, or an offence and injury committed against them. Matt. vi. 15. The Hebrew PASHAH, signifies an injury done in a seditious and rebellious manner. Gen. xxxi. 36. Trespass money; money given by people who lived at a distance from the temple, to purchase animals for trespass-offerings. 2 Kings xii. 16.

TRIAL. See TRY.

TRIBE, a class of people sprung as branches from one root; and so the twelve families of Jacob's twelve sons, are called tribes. The gentiles succeeding into the church-state, when the Jews were cast out, are called the twelve tribes of Israel. Ezek. xlv. 8. Matt. xix. 28. Rev. vii. 4. and xxi. 12.

TRIBULATION, sore trouble, in which men are pressed, and as it were thrashed as corn on a floor. Rom. v. 4. In Rom. ii. 9, and in Rev. ii. 22, it may denote the torments of hell.

TRIBUTE. See TAX.

TRICKLE, to run down in drops. Trickling of the eye, imports great weeping and sorrow. Lam. iii. 49.

TRIM, to remove every thing improper, and render the place or person neat. 2 Sam. xix. 24. The trimming of lamps, by snuffing them, and causing them to burn more brightly, denotes men's stirring up themselves to activity in the duties of holiness, in order to obtain a happy meeting with Christ. Matt. xxv. 7. The Jews trimmed their way to seek love, and taught the wicked ones their ways; they set out their own power and wealth to gain the esteem and friendship of their neighbours, and offered sacrifices to procure God's favour, while they went on in sin, and they even instructed the very heathen in idolatry and wickedness. Jer. ii. 33.

TRIUMPH, shouting and joy on account of victory over an enemy. God triumphs over his enemies, when he has an easy and glorious victory over them. Exod. xv. 1, 21.

Christ triumphed over principalities and powers on the cross: he joyfully finished transgression, made satisfaction for sin, and thus undermined the power of Satan, and laid an effectual foundation for the overthrow of his kingdom in the world, and in the hearts of the elect. Col. ii. 15. The saints triumph always in Christ, and in God's work and praise; amidst weakness, sinfulness, and trouble, they rejoice in Christ's person, offices, righteousness, power and love, and with joy think of, delight in, and extol the work of redemption, and the whole providence of God connected with it. 2 Cor. ii. 14. Psal. xcii. 4. and cvi. 47. Philistia's triumphing because of David, may either be an irony signifying their mourning and howling at his conquest of them; or it may denote their having reason to rejoice, as they had got a better master than their tyrannical lords; or the phrase may signify his triumphing over them. Psal. lx. 8. and cviii. 9.

TROAS, or TROY, a city of Phrygia or Mysia, a little to the south-west of the mouth of the Hellespont, and on the shore of the Mediterranean sea. To the north of this, in the earliest ages, stood the famed city of Troy. After it had been for some generations the head of a noted kingdom, it was, after a siege of ten years, taken by the Greeks of Europe. This occasioned the dispersion of the Trojans into a variety of places, and many nations affected to be reckoned their offspring. It seems, too, that storms dispersed the returning Greeks into many of the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean sea. It is generally believed, that this Troy was destroyed about 1184 years before Christ's birth; but Sir Isaac Newton supposes it to have happened about two hundred and eighty years later, in the time of Jehoshaphat, which will agree with Aeneas being contemporary with Dido the founder, or rather the adorer of Carthage, and will correspond with the flight of Cadmus for fear of David's arms, and with the widely spread ravages of Shishak. Another Troy was soon after built, about four miles nearer the shore, and but one from the sea. This, in the time of Alexander was dwindled into a poor village, with nothing remarkable but an old temple of Minerva. By his order, Lysimachus his general repaired it, and surrounded it with a wall five miles in cir-conference. The Romans afterwards entering Asia, found it in a poor condition, and believing themselves the offspring of the ancient Trojans, spared no cost or pains to repair and embellish it. Augustus sent a colony of Romans to inhabit it. Here Paul often preached, and planted a church; and with one Carpus he here left his cloak and some parchments. A church long remained in this place; but at present we know of nothing in it but some magnificent ruins. Acts xvi. 8. and xx. 6, 12. 2 Tim. iv. 13.

TRO-GYL-LI-UM, TRO-GIL-LI-AS, or TRO-GIL-LI-A, was a promontory, or head of land, of Mycale, about five miles from Samos. Acts xxi. 15.

TROOP, a band of men, especially of warriors or robbers. Job vi. 19. Hos. vi. 9. Perhaps the GAD and MENI, rendered troop and number, may be the sun and moon, or those with the stars; or it may mean, that the Jews, in their wars with the Chaldeans, depended entirely on their good fortune and the valour of their troops. Isa. lxxv. 11. The Chaldeans, multitudes of concurrent afflictions, and the various creatures on earth, and especially the saints are called God's troops, as he appoints their forms, motions, and influence, and they accomplish his designs. Hab. iii. 16. Job xix. 12. Amos ix. 6.

TROUBLE. See DISTRESS.

TROW; an old word for think. Luke xvii. 9.

TRUCE; agreement; particularly such as opposing armies make for at least delaying the prosecution of the war for a time. Truce-breakers, are such as break through their engagements, and who, being once offended, can scarcely ever be reconciled. 2 Tim. iii. 3.

TRUE; (1.) Real: so God is the only true God: he alone is possessed of infinite perfection. (2.) Not false; faithful; candid. God is true and every man a liar: God cannot be guilty of any deceit or falsehood, and every one that contradicts him will be found a liar. Rom. iii. 4. Joseph's brethren were true men, who did not seek to deceive. Gen. xlii. 11. A true heart, is one which has real grace, and is upright and candid. Heb. x. 22. (3.) Most excellent; so Christ is true bread, John vi. 32; the true vine, John xv. 1; the true light, John i. 9. God's word is TRUE, and the truth; it is quite consistent with the things of which it speaks, and one part of it with another; nor shall any promise, threatening, or prediction of it be left unaccomplished. Psal. cxix. His judgments are true, as in them he fulfils his word, shews his candour, and manifests his faithfulness. Rev. xvi. 7.

TRULY, of a truth, or in truth, is, (1.) Really and sincerely; without deceit. Luke xx. 21. (2.) Verily; without fail. Matt. xvi. 11. Jer. iii. 23.

TRUTH, or VERITY, is, (1.) opposed to falsehood and error: in this sense, the law and gospel of God are the truth. Psal. cxix. 151. Gal. iii. 1. (2.) Real and substantial, opposed to what is shadowy and typical: thus, TRUTH comes by Jesus Christ; i. e. the glorious realities shadowed forth by the types, are fulfilled in his incarnate nation, righteousness, intercession, and government.

John i. 17. (3.) Sincerity in opposition to dissimulation. John iv. 24. (4.) Faithfulness, or veracity, in fulfilling what one is bound to, by word, engagement, or relation. Psal. xxxi. 5. God's truth is his candour and faithfulness, Psal. lxxi. 22; or his revealed will, in which, in a way of obedience to it, his people walk. Psal. xxvi. 3. His works are verity and judgment; are precisely a fulfilment of his word, and of his relations to men, and are all performed in infinite wisdom. Psal. cxi. 7. He cuts off men in his truth, when he does it in fulfilling his predictions, and his promises or threatenings. Psal. ltv. 5. Jesus Christ is the TRUTH; he comprehends in himself all real excellencies; he is full of unfailling candour and faithfulness to God and men; he is the substance of all the ancient types; he is the substance or centre of every thing important in sacred history, law, or gospel. John xiv. 6. The truth is in Jesus; it centers in him, and is really, and without any false gloss, represented in his person, office, and work. Eph. iv. 21. To do truth, is with inward candour and sincerity, to profess and practise what God's word directs. John iii. 21. To hold the truth in unrighteousness, is, through the prevalent power of sinful lusts, to act contrary to the truth of God's word, manifested to, and in some degree impressed on the conscience. Rom. i. 18.

TRUMP, or TRUMPET, a hollow instrument of silver, brass, horn, or the like, for sounding with the breath, in order to convene assemblies, and encourage to war. Jer. iv. 5. By the direction of God, Moses made two silver trumpets, with which the priests were to call together the Hebrews to their solemn assemblies, and to direct their marches or encourage them to war. When the whole congregation was required to assemble, the sound was to be simple and uniform: when only the princes were required to meet with Moses, the sound was shrill. A long and quivering sound directed those on the east side of the tabernacle to decamp and march: a second sound of the same air directed those on the south side to do the same; at a third sound, those on the west side marched; and at a fourth, those on the north. The priests blew with these trumpets over the burning sacrifices, especially at the solemn festivals; and on the FEAST of trumpets, they blew from morning till night. Numb. x. Lev. xxv. 9, 10. It seems Solomon made a hundred and twenty silver trumpets instead of these two. 2 Chron. v. 12. With trumpets of rams' horns the priests sounded around Jericho, till its walls fell down, and with such, it seems, the jubilee was proclaimed. Josh. vi. 4.

Did not these trumpets prefigure the gospel, which, published by ministers, calls men to Jesus Christ and his ordinances, and encourages them in their heavenly journey and spiritual warfare.

Whatever tends to alarm or assemble men, is called a trumpet, as the noisy thunders that called and alarmed the Hebrews to hear God's law at Sinai, Exod. xx. 18; or the majestic and awful voice by which God will raise the dead, and call mankind to his tribunal at the last day, 1 Cor. xv. 52.

1 Thess. iv. 16; or the alarming declarations of God's prophets and ministers, warning their hearers of the judgments of God, and to flee from their sins. Hos. viii. 1. Isa. lviii. 1. Ezek. xxxiii. 3, 6. The great trumpet that convened the outcasts of Egypt and Assyria, to worship the Lord at Jerusalem, is either the edict of Cyrus that proclaimed to the Jews their permission to return home, and rebuild the temple of their God; or the gospel, by the publishing of which, multitudes are converted to the Christian faith. Isa. xxvii. 13. The gospel-church, being settled under the apocalyptic SEALS, or scenes of providence, the alarming judgments which afterwards befel her, are represented by the sounding of seven trumpets, the first six of which reach from A. D. 338, to about 1660, or 2016, Rev. viii. and ix; and the seventh to the end of the world.

TRUST; (1.) To be persuaded, to hope well. Heb. xiii. 18. Luke xxiv. 21. (2.) To depend on without fear. Isa. xxvi. 3. To trust in the Lord, is firmly to expect that he will do for us in time and eternity whatever he has promised in his word, his perfections, and relations, and so in quietness to wait for the event. Psal. lxiii. 8. To trust in men lawfully, is firmly to expect that they, assisted of God, will do to and for us according to their promises and relations towards us. Prov. xxxi. 11. To trust in men sinfully, is to depend upon their friendship and help, instead of God's. Jer. xvii. 5. Isa. xxx. 3. TRUSTY persons are such as we may depend on for sure information, good advice, and exact fulfilment of engagements. Job xli. 20.

TRY, to examine, prove; to search carefully into the nature, quality, and sufficiency of persons or things. The allusion is to the trial of metal, whether it be good or not. Psal. xii. 6. God tries and examines men, not by making new discoveries for himself, for he knows them fully; but by his word or providence making discoveries of them to themselves or others. Psal. xi. 5. and xxvi. 2. Prov. xvii. 3. The afflictions of his people are called trials, as they tend to exercise, polish, and discover their graces, not to destroy them, Heb. xi. 36. Job ix. 23; they are called fiery, because terrible, piercing, and purifying, 1 Pet. iv. 12; they tend to exercise and increase their patience. Jam. i. 3. Rom. v. 4. Jesus Christ is tried; neither the knowledge of his Father, nor his manifold sufferings, nor all the diversified experiments of the saints, nor the scrutiny of his enemies can find any thing faulty or defective in him. Rev. iiii. 18. Isa. xxviii. 16. The word of the Lord is tried; it exactly conforms to the nature of God; neither friends nor foes can find real faults in it; every promise being believed by the saints, they obtain the happy accomplishment of it; every threatening contemned by sinners, is to their experience executed upon them at last. Psal. lviii. 30. and cxix. 140. Rulers try or examine, by a judicial search, whether persons be guilty of alleged crimes or not; and sometimes civil rulers have tortured or scourged accused persons, in order to make them confess what they were supposed to have done. Rev. ii. 2. Acts xxii. 24.

TRY-PHE'NA and TRY'PHO-SA were two noted Christian women at Rome, who, by their private instructions and generosity, mightily contributed to the success of the gospel there. Rom. xvi. 12.

TU'BAL; (1.) The fifth son of Japheth. Gen. x. Josephus makes him the father of the Iberians on the east of the Black sea. Bochart makes him the father of the Tibarenes on the north of Armenia the Leas; and there is nothing impossible in supposing him to be the parent of both these tribes, as their situation is not very distant. Others, without ground, make him the father of the Italians or Spaniards. (2.) TU'BAL-CAIN, a son of Lamech, and the inventor of smith-work, and foundery; he is believed to be the Vulcan, or god of smiths, of the heathen. Gen. iv. 22.

TUMULT, UPROAR; (1.) A disorderly, seditious, and noisy rising of the mob. Hos. x. 14. Matt. xxvii. 24. Acts xvii. 5. (2.) Any terrible and confused hubbub. Zech. xiv. 13. Tumultuous persons are such as are set upon uproars and seditious mobbings. Jer. xlviii. 45. A tumultuous city is one filled with noise, confusion, and mobs. Isa. xxii. 2. A tumultuous noise, is that which is like the roaring of an enraged mob. Isa. xiii. 4.

TURN; (1.) To change place or conduct; and so TURNING, denotes inconstancy, change from good to bad, or from bad to good. Jam. i. 17. Ezek. xxxiii. 11. The corner of the wall is called its turning. 2 Chron. xxvi. 9. To turn to the Lord, is to leave off a sinful state or course, in coming to him as our Saviour, portion, and governor, and walking in his ways. 1 Thess. i. 9. To turn aside, is to quit a holy profession and course of duty. 1 Tim. i. 6. Exod. xxxii. 8. To turn away, is to forsake, refuse to hear, or keep company with. Jer. xxxii. 40. Heb. xii. 25. To turn back, is to apostatize from the service of God, Psal. xlv. 18; also to flee from a conquering enemy. Psal. ix. 3. (2.) To cause others to change their conduct. Acts xiii. 8. God turns men, when, by his word and Spirit working on their souls, he causes them to turn from their evil ways to himself. Jer. xxxi. 18. Ministers turn many to righteousness, when they are the means of their embracing Jesus' righteousness, and justification through it. Dan. xi. 3. To turn things upside down, is to throw all into disorder and confusion. 2 Kings xxi. 13.

TUTOR; one who takes care of a child, and his estate, while he is under age. The ceremonial law was a tutor and governor, it ruled over the church in her infant state. Gal. iv. 3.

TWELVE. In allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, twelve loaves of shew-bread were on the table of the sanctuary: Christ chose twelve apostles, whose doctrines are called twelve stars on the head of the gospel-church; twelve thousand are said to be sealed of every tribe; the new Jerusalem has twelve gates, and twelve foundations; and the tree of life bears twelve manner of fruits. Matt. x. Rev. xii. 1. vii. xxi. and xxii. 2.

TWICE, sometimes denotes frequently. Psal. lxii. 11. Job xxxiii. 14.

TWIG, SLIP; (1.) A small branch of a tree. (2.) Men, chiefly when young and flourishing; as Daniel and his companions were, when carried to Babylon, and are therefore called twigs. Ezek. xvii. 4.

TWILIGHT; a mixture of light and darkness, as in the morning after day-break, and at even when the sun is set. 1 Sam. xxx. 17. Prov. vii. 9.

TWINKLING of an eye, a small moment. 1 Cor. xv. 23.

TWINS; two brought forth at a birth. Bearing of twins, denotes great fruitfulness in the conversion of men to Christ, or in good works. Sol. Song iv. 2.

TYCHI-CUS; a noted evangelist who attended Paul with the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem. Acts xx. 4. Paul afterwards sent him to Ephesus and Colosse, with his epistles to those churches. Eph. vi. 21, 22. 2 Tim. iv. 13. Col. iv. 7, 8. He appears to have been the successor of Titus, in regulating the affairs of the church of Crete. Tit. iii. 12.

TYPE, properly signifies a person or thing, that, by the appointment of God, pre-figured something relative to Jesus Christ, and his church. These were many, as none of them could fully set forth its antitype; and they were a kind of real predictions of things to come, as the declarations uttered by the prophets were verbal. There were typical persons; as, Adam, Abel, Enoch, Noah, Melchizedek, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job, Moses, Aaron, Bezaleel, Aholiab, Phinehas, Joshua, Gideon, Samson, Boaz, Samuel, David, Solomon, Elijah, Elisha, Jonah, Eliakim, Daniel, Zerubbabel, Joshua the high priest, and John Baptist. Typical classes of persons; as, Israelites; their first-born males; unmarried brothers of him that left his widow childless; kinsmen-redeemers; voluntary bond servants; hanged malefactors; sojourning strangers; Nazarites, Nehinims, Levites, priests, high priests, holy prophets, and kings of David's family. Occasional typical things; as, Noah's ark, Jacob's ladder, Moses' burning bush, the cloudy pillar, the purified water of Marah, the MANNA, the water-yielding rock, the well of Beer, the cluster of grapes from Eschol, Aaron's budding rod, the brazen serpent, the healing pool of Bethesda, the waters of Shiloah, the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egypt, their passage through the Red sea, their travels in the wilderness, their entrance into Canaan, their wars with the heathens, and their return from Babylon. The miscellaneous typical institutions were, Circumcision, sanctification of fruit-trees, offering no base things to God, scourging of bond-women for whoredom, protection of fugitive servants, exclusion from the congregation of the Lord, wearing proper apparel, blue fringe, not cutting of flesh for the dead, abstinence from blood and fat, and things torn or dying of themselves, reaping of fields, avoiding of mixed garments, sowing of mixed seed, of plowing with oxen and asses, or of gendering between cattle of different kinds, tenderness to beasts, not muzzling the treading ox, covering of filth, freedom from the service of war. The typical places were, Canaan, the cities of refuge, Jerusalem, Zion, the tabernacle, and the temple. The typical utensils were, The ark of the covenant, the pot of manna, the table of shew bread with its loaves, the golden altar with its incense, the golden candlestick with its oil, the silver trumpets, the brazen lavers and sea, the brazen altar, the altars of stone or earth, and the altar of Ebal. The typical offerings were, The burnt-offering, the sin-offering, the trespass-offering, the peace-offering, the meat-offering, the drink-offering, the holy anointing oil, the soul ransom-money, the tithes, the first fruits, the things voluntarily devoted, Abraham's oblation of birds and cattle, his offering of the ram caught in the thicket, and Moses' oblation for ratifying the covenant between God and Israel. The typical seasons were, The time of the daily sacrifices, the weekly sabbath in its ceremonial use, the feast of new-moons, the passover and feast of unleavened bread, Pentecost, the feast of trumpets, the feast of general expiation, the feast of tabernacles, the year of release, and the jubilee. The typical purifications were, Purgation from the defilement of holy things, and from the defilement of touching or eating of beasts, purgation from the defilement of child-birth, of leprosy, of running issues, and of infection by dead corpses, the trial of suspected adultery, and the expiation of uncertain murder.—To him that discerns the evangelical signification of these various types, the narratives of the Old Testament are not a dry history, but appear replenished with the most useful instructions concerning our Saviour, and his body the church.

TYRE. See PHœNICIA.

V. U.

VAGABOND; one who has no settled abode. Gen. iv. 12. It ordinarily signifies one who is also worthless and wicked. Acts x. 13.

VAIL; a covering. To shew their modesty, and their subjection to their husbands, women, especially in the east, wear veils on their faces. Gen. xxiv. 65. Isa. iii. 23. Possibly it was with such that Paul admonishes the Corinthian women to be covered in their public worshipping assemblies. 1 Cor. xi. 3—10. Moses covered his face with a vail, that the Hebrews might not be affrighted, or their eyes dazzled, with the brightness of his countenance, after he came down last from Sinai. Exod. xxxiv. 33. It signified the obscurity of his ceremonial laws. A vail was spread over the face of persons condemned to death. Eath. vii. 8. In the tabernacle and temple, a fine and strong hanging, or vail, separated between the holy and the most holy apartments. The rending of this vail at the death of our Saviour, imported the abolition of the ceremonial law, which separated the Jews from the gentiles; the opening of a free passage into the heavenly state; and the finishing of Jesus' debased appearances, which for a time concealed his glory from men. Matt. xxvii. 51. Eph. ii. 14. Heb. vi. 19. and x. 20. The vail of the ceremonial law is done away in Christ; as in him are fulfilled the whole rites of that dispensation. 2 Cor. iii. 13, 14. But this vail still remains on the Jewish nation; as they cleave to it, and thus blind and harden themselves against Christ: but when that nation, and their blinded hearts, are turned to the Lord, they shall abandon these abolished ceremonies, and embrace the gospel. 2 Cor. iii. 15, 16. The church's vail taken from her by the watchmen, is the doctrine of her justifying righteousness, and her amiable character. Sol. Song v. 7. The vail and face of covering spread over the nations, which Jesus destroys, is their ignorance, unbelief, error, and marks of divine condemnation. Isa. xxv. 7.

VAIN; (1.) Empty, worthless, unprofitable. Psal. lx. 11. (2.) Wicked. 2 Sam. vi. 20. (3.) Groundless, false. Psal. ii. 1, 4.

(4.) Proud, foolish, light, and inconstant. Job xi. 11, 12. Psal. xxvi. 4. The Jews imagined a vain thing concerning the Messiah; that he would be a temporal potentate and deliverer; and that the debasement of Jesus of Nazareth, and his professing to be the Son of God, were evidences of his not being the Messiah, but an impostor. Psal. ii. 1. In vain, without due truth, without due reason, without proper tendency. Exod. xx. 7. Rom. xiii. 4. VANITY, is, (1.) Empty and unprofitable. Eccl. i. 2. (2.) Changeableness, corruption. Rom. viii. 20. (3.) Wickedness, falsehood. Psal. cxix. 37. and iv. 2. and xii. 2. (4.) Pride, lightness, and inconstancy. Eph. iv. 17. (5.) Fruitless toil, trouble, wretchedness. Psal. lxxviii. 33. Job vii. 3, 16. Idols are vanity, and lying vanities; they have no real existence; the service of them can do no real good, as is pretended. Jer. ii. 5. and x. 14, 15. Acts xiv. 15. Jon. ii. 8. Treasures got by lying, are a vanity tossed to and fro, of them that seek death; they are very uncertain and unstable, and tend to the ruin of their possessors. Prov. xxi. 6.

VALE; VALLEY; a hollow ground between hills, whether along the banks of rivers or not. The scripture mentions a great number of valleys; as the valley of Siddim, in or near to which Sodom and Gomorrah stood, Gen. xiv. 3; of Berachah, west of the Dead sea; of Zeboim, near Jericho, 1 Sam. xiii. 18. 2 Chron. xx. 6; of Zephath, near Marchah, 2 Chron. xiv. 10; of Eschol, Numb. xxxii. 9; of Gerar, Gen. xxvi. 17; of Sorek, where Delilah dwelt, Judg. xvi. 4; of Aijalon, Josh. x. 12; of Rephaim, or the giants, Isa. xvii. 5; of Elah, where Goliath was slain, 1 Sam. xxi. 9; of Achor, Josh. vii. 24; of Gibeah, Judg. xx. 33; of Tophet, Hinnom, or slaughter, Jer. vii. 32; of the mountains about Jerusalem, Zech. xiv. 5; of Jehoshaphat, or Decision, perhaps the same as Berachah, or Tophet, Joel iii. 14; of Baca, Psal. lxxxiv. 6; of Kanah, or Reeds, Josh. xvi. 8; of Ono, Charashim, or Craftsmen, 1 Chron. iv. 14; of Keziz, Josh. xvii. 21. These were all in the south of western Canaan. Northward, we find the Fat Valleys, near Samaria, Isa. xxviii. 1; perhaps the same as the plain or valley of Israel, Josh. xi. 16: the valley of Moreh, between Ebal and Gerizim, Gen. xii. 6; of Meonenim, Judg. ix. 37; of Zaanaim, Judg. iv. 11; of Shave, near Salem, Gen. xiv. 17; of Jezreel, Josh. xix. 18; of Megiddo, 2 Chron. xxxv. 22; of Jiphtahel, Josh. xix. 14, 37; of Lebanon, Josh. xi. 17. Those beyond Jordan were, The valley of Shittim, and which may represent the barren gentile world, Joel iii. 18; of Abarim, or Passengers, on the east of the Dead sea, Ezek. xxxix. 11; of Zared, Numb. xxi. 12; of Gad, 2 Sam. xxiv. 5; of Succoth, Psal. lx. 6; of Mizpeh, Josh. xi. 8; of Salt, near Tadmor. Jerusalem, or the land of Judea, is called a valley of vision; as they had the oracles, ordinances, and prophets of God among them. Isa. xxii. 1. Obstacles to the spread and success of the gospel, are likened to valleys; and they are filled up, when rendered incapable to hinder its progress. Luke iii. 5. Of the four words which the Hebrews use to express a valley, Nachal signifies one with a brook in it; Ge, a kind of roundish hollow without a brook; Hemek, one large and wide, or a plain; and Bikkhath a narrow cliff; but perhaps this distinction will not always hold.

VALOUR; courage and strength. Judg. iii. 29.

VALUE; the worth of a thing. Matt. x. 31. To value a thing, is to set a proper price upon it. Lev. xxvii. 16.

VANISH; (1.) To cease to be seen. Luke xxiv. 31. (2.) To come to nought. Heb. viii. 13. (3.) To fly away imperceptibly, so as to be no more seen. Jam. iv. 14.

VAPOUR; a dewy mist, like the smoke of a boiling pot. Job xxxvi. 27. The confounding judgments of God, or the terrible smoke ascending from the burning of Jerusalem, is called vapour of smoke. Acts ii. 19. Our life is like a vapour; it is unsubstantial, short, and easily destroyed. Jam. iv. 14.

VARIABLENESS; inconstancy, readiness to change. Our natural sun is very changeable in his appearance; now in the east, then in the west; now so far north as to create our summer, then so far south as to occasion our winter; but with God, the sun, or father of lights, there is no variableness, or shadow of turning; but he is ever the same in his nature and purpose. Jam. i. 17.

VASHTI. See AHASUERUS.

VAUNT; to be rash; to boast. 1 Cor. xiii. 14.

VEHEMENT; strong, violent. Jon. iv. 8.

VEHEMENTLY, eagerly, fiercely, boldly. Luke xi. 53. and xxiii. 10.

VEIN; a place for silver to spread itself in the mine: or a passage to bring it thence. Job xxviii. 1.

VENGEANCE. See REVENGE.

VENOM. See POISON.

VENT; outlet. Job xxxii. 19.

VENTURE; by guess, without minding where it strikes. 1 Kings xxii. 34.

VERIFIED; proved to be true. Gen. xlii. 40. God's promise is verified, when it is fulfilled. 1 Kings viii. 26.

VERILY; without mistake or failure.

When repeated, it approaches to the nature of an oath: and denotes the great importance of what is said, and the necessity and difficulty of believing it. John iii. 3.

VERITY. See TRUE.

VERY; (1.) Real; true. Gen. xxvii. 21. (2.) Exceedingly. Numb. xii. 3.

VERMILLION; a kind of red earth used by painters for embellishing apartments, Jer. xxii. 14; or colouring images. Ezek. xxiii. 14. But perhaps the Hebrew Shashar was the cinnabar of the Arabians, which is also a red paint. Stockius, and some other good authors, render it Indica.

VESSEL; a dish, or any utensil in a house. 2 Tim. ii. 20. The vessels of the Lord's tabernacle or temple were holy; but other vessels were called common. Men are vessels, and vessels of mercy and wrath, as they are appointed to be for ever filled with the effects of God's mercy, or just wrath. Rom. ix. 22, 23. Men are, called vessels wherein there is no pleasure, i. e. vessels used for common or degrading purposes; to intimate how full they are of abominable corruptions, and how quickly they shall be emptied and ruined. Jer. xxii. 23. viii. 8. and xlviii. 38. They are also compared to broken vessels, or potters' vessels, to denote their great and irrecoverable distress, so easily inflicted by God. Psal. xxai. 13. and ii. 9. Ministers are chosen, but earthen vessels, appointed to hold the gospel, and publish it to others; but how mean and frail in themselves! and how often contemned by men! Acts ix. 15. 2 Cor. iv. 7. Women are weaker vessels; their powers of body, and mind, are ordinarily inferior to those of men. 1 Pet. iii. 7. Men's bodies are called vessels; they are curiously fashioned of God, to be the lodging of the soul and her furniture. Isa. lxvi. 20. 1 Thess. iv. 4. Jerusalem, and the country around, were made an empty vessel, when most of the inhabitants and wealth were destroyed, or carried away by the Chaldeans. Jer. li. 34. To be emptied from vessel to vessel, is to be variously distressed, driven from one place or condition to another. Jer. xlviii. 11.

VESTMENTS; robes for the idolatrous priests; and the vestry was the place where they lay, and were put off and on. 2 Kings x. 22.

VESTURE; an upper robe. Dent. xxii. 12. Christ's having his vesture dipped in blood, and inscribed with this name, King of kings, and Lord of lords, imports, that in the conquering and destroying his enemies, he gloriously shews his sovereign power and dominion. Rev. xix. 13, 16. God changes the heavens and the earth, and folds them up as a vesture, or garment; when at the end of the world, he will change their present form, and give them another. Psal. cii. 26. Heb. xi. 12.

VEX; to distress a person exceedingly, by provocation, frowns, torture, war, &c. Ezek. xxii. 7. Matt. xv. 22. Numb. xxxi. 2. Sinners vex and grieve the Spirit of God, when they rebel against his word, resist and quench his influences, and do what is detestable to him. Isa. lxiii. 10. Lot vexed his own soul with the wickedness of Sodom, when he studied to be deeply burdened with, and grieved for, the dishonour done to God, and the hurt done to their souls, by the same. 2 Pet. ii. 8.

VIAL; an ancient vessel; but of what shape, cannot be accurately known. Perhaps they were of the form of the censers. 1 Sam. x. 1. The saints' hearts are golden vials full of odours; being renewed after the image of God, they are filled with the graces of the Spirit, and pour forth acceptable prayers and praises for themselves and others. Rev. v. 8. The righteous visitations for destroying Antichrist, are called seven golden vials full of the wrath of God, given by one of the four beasts, to seven angels clothed in fine linen, clean and white, that they might, in their turn, pour them out. According to the prayers and preaching of faithful ministers, and perhaps by their investigation, shall these plagues be gradually executed, by instruments just in their conduct, and powerful, courageous, prudent, and active. Rev. xv. 6, 7. and xvi.—See ANTICHRIST.

VICTORY; (1.) Overcoming an enemy in battle. It is the Lord's, as he enables to gain it, and the praise of it ought to be ascribed to him. 1 Chron. xxix. 11. Christ's victory, is his overcoming of Satan, finishing of sin, destroying of death, and rendering the whole plan of our salvation successful. Isa. xxi. 28. Matt. xii. 20. The saints' victory, is their overcoming of the temptations of Satan, the power of sin, the snares of Antichrist, and the world; and the fear, hurt, and, in due time, the influence of death. Rev. xv. 2. 1 Cor. xv. 57. (2.) The means of victory; so faith is our victory, (i. e. the means of obtaining victory) over the world in its various lusts and snares. 1 John v. 4. See CONQUER.

VICTUALS; meat and drink for food. Gen. xiv. 11.

VIEW; to take a careful look of. Josh. ii. 7.

VIGILANT. See WATCH.

VILE; (1.) Of no value or worth. Deut. xxv. 3. Jer. xxix. 17. (2.) Base, corruptible. Phil. iii. 21. (3.) Contemned, distressed. Lam. i. 11. (4.) Coarse, unclean, nasty. Jam. ii. 2. (5.) Unholy, very wicked, and abominable. Rom. i. 26. Psal. xv. 4. and xii. 8.

VILELY; in a contemptuous and disgraceful manner. 2 Sam. i. 21.

VILLAGE; a small town without walls. Ezek. xxxviii. 11. In time of war, the inhabitants sometimes desert them, and flee into fortified places. Judg. v. 7.

VILLANY; words or works, deceitful, dishonest, or very wicked. Isa. xxxii. 6. Jer. xxix. 23.

VINE; a wide-spreading shrub, which bears the grapes of which wine is made. Vines are produced, either by layers or cuttings almost buried in the ground. There are about twenty kinds of vines, all of which thrive best in a southern, warm, and dry soil. They are easily hurt by frost, by reason of their thin juice. Much labour is necessary to cultivate vines; for their branches are so weak that they require to be propped by walls, trees, stakes, &c. Nor is their wood useful for any thing but the fire, if they are barren. Perhaps Noah was the first that cultivated the vine, and drank the juice of the grape. Gen. ix. 20. Vines were anciently very plentiful in Canaan, especially in the territory of Judah. Gen. xlix. 11; and are at present plentiful in Italy, France, Spain, Portugal, &c. some grow in England. The vines of warm climates bear very large clusters of grapes. That cluster which the Hebrew spies brought from Eshcol, was carried on a staff between two men, Numb. xiii. 23; and we read of clusters there about twenty five pounds weight. We read of a cluster in the east part of Persia, that produced about three Scotch gallons of wine; and of another, about three feet and a half long. As the Hebrews were much employed about their vines and fig-trees; their sitting under them, imported their safety and prosperity. 1 Kings iv. 25. Mic. iv. 4. Zech. iii. 10. They had among them a wild vine, which grew without cultivation by the way-side, and which produced wild grapes of a bitter flavour. Isa. v. 4. The vines of Sodom, or those that grew near to the Dead Sea, being impregnated with its nitre and sulphur, produced grapes as bitter as gall. Deut. xxxii. 32. These were perhaps the same as the wild gourds. 2 Kings iv. 39. They had their cultivated vines, which grew in inclosed gardens, or orchards, called VINEYARDS, that the vines might not be hurt by cattle; one of which, if good, procured a yearly rent of 1000 shekels of silver, Isa. vii. 23; and required two hundred more to pay the dressers. Sol. Song viii. 12. In these the keepers and vine dressers laboured; planting, pruning, and propping the vines, and gathering the grapes. This was a laborious task, and was often reckoned a base one. 2 Kings xxv. 12. Isa. lxi. 5. Sol. Song i. 6. Some of the best vineyards were at Esgedi, or perhaps at Baal-hamon, which might not be far distant. Eccl. ii. 4. Sol. Song i. 14. and viii. 11. The eating up of vineyards, imports the depriving men of the fruits of their ground. Isa. iii. 14. Samaria became a vineyard, when, being desolate, it became arable fields. Mic. i. 6. Good vineyards becoming fields of briars and thorns, denotes great desolation in the country. Isa. vii. 23. The gathering and treading of the grapes, was called the VINTAGE; and when the crop was very large, it began in June, at the end of harvest, and continued till October. Lev. xxvi. 5. They had presses without the city, for treading out the grapes, and squeezing out the wine. Rev. xiv. 20. Of the juice of the squeezed grapes WINE and VINEGAR were formed. The wines of Helbon near Damascus, and of Lebanon, where the vines had a fine sun, were reckoned most excellent. Ezek. xxvii. 18. Hos. xiv. 7. The wines of Canaan, being very stupifying, were ordinarily mixed with water for common use, and sometimes they scented them with frankincense, myrrh, calamus, and other spices. Prov. ix. 2, 5. Sol. Song viii. 2. They also either scented their wine with promegranates, or made wine of their juice, as we do of the juice of currants, gooseberries, &c. fermented with sugar.

When wine ferments excessively, and is in danger of bursting the cask, a little smoke of sulphur below it, or put into it, will stop it. Wine may be strengthened by causing it to freeze, and throwing away the icy part of it. Sour wine may be rectified, by mixing it well with a little of the tartarized spirit of wine.

No Nazarite during his vow, no priest during his service at the sanctuary, was to drink wine. Numb. vi. 3. Lev. x. 7. Wine is best when old and on the lees, the dregs having sunk to the bottom, and is very useful for refreshing, strengthening, and cheering persons, and in some dangerous diseases is useful in medicine. Wine of violence, is that which is procured by oppression and robbery. Prov. iv. 17. Wine of the condemned, is that which is taken from, or procured at the expence of persons unjustly condemned. Amos ii. 8.

The Hebrews had two kinds of VINEGAR; the one was a weak wine, which they used for their common drink in harvest-fields, &c. as the Spaniards and Italians still do, Ruth ii. 14; the other had a sharp and acid taste like ours, and hence Solomon hints, that a sluggard vexes and hurts such as employ him in business, as vinegar is disagreeable to the teeth, and smoke to the eyes. Prov. x. 26. As vinegar poured on nitre, spoils its virtue, so he that sings songs to a heavy heart, does but add to its grief. Prov. xxv. 20. Vinegar may be made of inferior beer, in which husks of grapes have been well steeped; after which the liquid part being casked, and the bung hole covered with a tile, and set in a hot sun, it, in about thirty or forty days, will be formed into a vinegar. Malaga raisins steeped in spring water in an earthen jar, and set in a hot sun three or four months, form vinegar. Any kind of wine mingled with its lees, or the stalks of grapes, and pulverized tartar, and put into a vessel formerly scented with vinegar, will ferment anew, and become vinegar. If the watery part were extracted from vinegar, it might be rendered so strong, as easily to dissolve a large mass of iron.

Christ is likened to a vine, he is called the true vine. Being planted and dressed by his Father, how he spread and produced the fruits of righteousness! and being trodden in the wine-press of his Father's wrath, that sweet, nourishing, new, ever fresh, wine of complete righteousness, gospel-promises, influences, and everlasting blessings, are produced for weak, diseased, and sorrowful men! John xv. 1. Prov. ix. 2, 5. Isa. xxv. 6. and lv. 1. Matt. xxvi. 29.

The church is a VINEYARD. God the proprietor, first planted the Jews there, as his vine, and gave them his tabernacle or temple as their wine-press, and his oracles, ordinances, and blessings. He let out this vineyard to their keepers, and sent the prophets, and at last his Son, to demand their good fruits; but these being abused and maltreated, he gave their church-state to the gentiles, and at different seasons of time and life, calls men to labour in it. Isa. v. 1-7. Matt. xxi. 28-45. Luke xiii. 6, 7. Matt. xx. 1-16. It is a vineyard of red wine, kept and watered night and day by the Lord; amid bloody persecutions and sore troubles, God, by his preserving and actuating influences, causes his people to bring forth the best of fruits, to his glory and their own good. Isa. xxvii. 2, 3. It is a vineyard planted at Baal-hamon, Lord of the multitude, and let out to keepers, and for which Christ must have a 1000 silverlings, and the dressers two hundred. How rich its soil in the redeeming love of God! What multitudes enter into it! all which ought to give Jesus the chief honour, and his ministers their subordinate share; and each one ought to have his vineyard before him, watching over his heart and life. Sol. Song viii. 11, 12. and i. 6.

The church is called a vine: planted, protected, supported, and pruned by Jesus and his Father, how her saints flourish, and bring forth the fruits of righteousness, acceptable to God, and useful to man! but how ready are Satan, indwelling lusts, and false teachers, like so many foxes, to undermine her roots, and spoil her growth! Sol. Song v. 11. and ii. 15. Her tender grapes are young converts, and the first motions of good works, which are easily hurt; and her good grapes are saints, and their good works excellent and useful. Sol. Song ii. 13, 15. and vii. 12. The saints and their graces are connected with manifold pressures and sufferings, but, as wine, they are very delightful to Christ, and refreshing and strengthening to his people. Sol. Song vii. 2. and vii. 9. The wine and milk, which Christ and his people feast on together, are the refreshing and strengthening promises and blessings of the gospel; or the saints' graces, which are acceptable to him, and delightful to themselves. Sol. Song v. 1. See BOTTLE.

The Jews are compared to a vine, or vineyard. God planted them a noble and choice vine, wholly a right seed; their ancestors being pious, and their original laws good, he protected, pruned, dressed, and caused them to spread by his kind providences; but through their apostasy and idolatry, they reckoned themselves a barren and empty vine, bringing forth no good fruit; a degenerate plant of a strange vine, like other idolatrous nations; a wild vine, a vine of Sodom, bringing forth sour grapes of gall, and which produced wine like the venom of asps, wicked courses, very offensive to God, and in the issue tending to set their teeth on edge, bringing many and painful calamities upon them. Jer. ii. 21, 22. Psal. lxxx. 5. Ezek. xv. Hos. x. 1. Isa. v. 1-7. Deut. xxxii. 33. Jer. xxxi. 29. Ezek. xviii. 2.

Antichrist is the vine of the earth: the Popish state bears some resemblance to the true church, but spreads and bears fruits of error and corruption, hurtful to the souls and bodies of men, as the fruit of wild vine is to the body; intoxicating and stupifying multitudes with the wine of her fornication, her superstition, idolatry, error, and profaneness; but at the end, in the vinegar of God's judgments against her, shall these idolaters be terribly pressed with distressing and ruinous calamities. Rev. xiv. 18-20. and xvii. 2, 4.

The destruction of a nation or army, or Christ's destroying his enemies in the wine-press of his wrath, is likened to a vinegar, in which sometimes there are gleamings left, a small remnant spared; and sometimes the poor remains are gleaned, and put into the basket; i. e. are destroyed, or carried captive. Isa. lxiii. 1-4. Rev. xiv. 18-20. Zech. xi. 2. Lam. i. 15. Isa. xxiv. 13. Jer. vi. 9. and xlix. 9. Obad. 5. Judg. viii. 2.

The Chaldeans are called grape-gatherers, as they destroyed the nations, and carried them out of their own lands. Jer. xlix. 9. The outward comforts of a land are called wine, as these refresh and strengthen the inhabitants, Jer. xlviii. 23. Hos. ii. 9: and their wine is mixed with water, when their rulers, customs, ordinances, and best people, are much corrupted and weakened. Isa. i. 22. Great calamities and sufferings appointed by God, and which disturb men's minds with anguish and horror, are called wine. Psal. lx. 3. and lxxv. 8. Isa. li. 17, 21, 22. Jer. xxv. 15. The wine with which Babylon made the nations drunk, was the judgments of God executed by the Chaldeans, or the idolatry and superstition into which they seduced them. Jer. li. 7. Rev. xvii. 2. Men shake off their unripe grapes, when they are cut off by an unexpected stroke, in the prime of their days, or amid the growth of their prosperity: or when their wealth is taken from them, as they are busy adding to it. Job xv. 33.

After death, wicked men behold not the way of the vineyards; they lose all their wealth and pleasure. Job xxiv. 18.

The fathers have eaten the sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge; the parents sinned, and their children are unjustly punished for it. Ezek. xviii. 2. God's judgments on men here, or in hell, which stupify and madden them, are called wine; and red or strong wine, wine mixed with spices; wine without mixture of water; and wine of astonishment. Jer. xxv. 15. Psal. lx. 3. and lxxv. 8. Rev. xiv. 10. His judgments are as sour grapes ripening in the flower, when their execution is very near at hand. Isa. xviii. 5.

VIOL; a musical instrument. Isa. v. 12.

VIOLATE; profanely to transgress. Ezek. xxii. 26.

VIOLENT; (1.) Earnest to obtain what is necessary. Luke xvi. 16. (2.) Given to exercise unjust force. 2 Sam. xxii. 49.

VIOLENCE, (1.) Earnest endeavour; so the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. Men must strive to enter by the strait gate, into a new covenant state, and by earnest diligence in holiness, prepare for the heavenly glory. Matt. xi. 12. (2.) Outrageous force. Acts xxi. 25. and xxvii. 41. (3.) Unjust and forcible harrassing, hurting, oppressing, and robbing of others. Hab. i. 2, 3, 9. and ii. 8. (4.) What is got by oppression and robbery. Zeph. i. 19. The violence of Lebanon, and spoil of beasts, which covered the Chaldeans, were their unjust and brutal murders, oppression, and robbery of the Jews, which brought vengeance on their heads. Hab. ii. 17.

VIPERS; a kind of serpents, which are scarcely ever above an ell long, and an inch thick; their head is flat, and they have a snout like a pig. Other serpents have two rows of teeth; vipers have but one; consisting of sixteen small ones in each jaw; and at least the male vipers have two large teeth, which being raised when they are angry, their bite ejects poison into the wound. Their body is either of an ash or yellow colour, speckled with brown spots, and the scales under their belly are of the colour of well-polished steel. Their poison is extremely dangerous; but their flesh, or broth made of it, is an excellent medicine in some dangerous maladies. The male viper is blacker than the female. The females bring forth their young about twenty at a birth, wrapt up alive in small skins which burst about the third day after. Isa. xxx. 6. The Pharisees, and other wicked men are likened to vipers; by their poisonous doctrines, bad example, and sinful excitements, they effectually ruin the souls of men; and by their angry malice, they murder such as oppose them. Matt. iii. 7. Men's wicked and carnal devices and errors are said to break out into a viper, when they issue in the tormenting ruin of their projectors, or in the reproach and persecution of such as study to oppose and crush them. Isa. lix. 5. The viper's tongue shall slay him: he shall die of a certain, sudden, and tormenting death. Job xx. 16.

VIRGIN. See MAN.

VIRTUE; (1.) Efficient for producing an effect. Mark v. 30. (2.) A wonderful work produced by distinguished power. Matt. vii. 22. (3.) Holiness of heart and practice. (4.) Christian courage and boldness. 2 Pet. i. 3, 5.

VIRTUOUS; given to true goodness in heart, speech, and behaviour. Ruth iii. 11.

VISAGE. See FACE.

VISIBLE; VISION. See SEE.

VISIT; (1.) To go to see, and meet with. Acts vii. 23. and xv. 26. (2.) To take a view of, in order to redress grievances, and do service; so magistrates and ministers ought to visit their people. Jer. xliii. 2. God visits men, either in mercy, when he manifests his presence, grants them their requests, delivers them from distress, and upholds and comforts them. Zech. x. 3. Luke vii. 16. Gen. xxi. 1. 1 Sam. ii. 21. Or in wrath, when he visits their iniquities, in chastising or punishing for them. Exod. xx. 5. Jer. vi. 6. Isa. xxvi. 14. Ezek. xxxviii. 8.

VISITATION; (1.) Powerful and comfortable fellowship from God, Job x. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 12; or, (2.) Punishment and affliction. Hos. ix. 7. Mic. vii. 4. Christ, the day-spring from on high, visited men, when he assumed our nature, and when he sends his Word and Spirit, that we may have fellowship with him, and share of his blessings. Luke i. 78. To visit the fatherless and widow, or the sick and imprisoned members of Christ, is to shew them regard and pity, and to help them according to their need and our ability. Jam. i. 27. Matt. xxv. 36, 43.

U-LA'L, or EU-LÆ'us; a river of Persia, near to the city of Shushan, and on whose bank Daniel had his vision of the ram and he-goat. Dan. viii. 2, 16. Probably it is the same with the Choaspes of the ancients, and the Caron of the moderns.

UNACCUSTOMED, not used to. Jer. xxxi. 18.—N. B. The preposition un, or in, prefixed to multitudes of words, signifies not only the absence of the quality imported by the separate or simple word, but the presence of contrary qualities.

UNADVISEDLY, rashly, without deliberation. Psal. cvi. 33.

UNAWARES; (1.) Secretly, unperceived. Jude 4. (2.) Suddenly, not expected. Psal. xxxv. 8. Luke xxi. 34. (3.) Without design and intention. Num. xxxv. 11.

UNBELIEF. Distrust of God's faithfulness pledged in his declared promises and threatenings, and particularly the discredit of his gospel-declarations, offering his Son to sinners of mankind, even the chief; and which is a most horrid and damning crime, as it makes God a liar, blasphemes all his perfections, contemns and refuses Jesus and his salvation, and leads to other sins. Nor can we conceive the sin against the Holy Ghost to be any thing else than unbelief carried to the highest extent. John xvi. 10. Heb. iii. 12. 1 John v. 10, 11. Heb. v. 26—31.

Unbelief is either negative in such as have not heard the gospel, and so heathens are called unbelievers or infidels, 1 Cor. vi. 6. 2 Cor. vi. 14; or positive, in those unbelievers, who, though they hear the gospel, and profess to regard it, yet believe not with their heart the record of God offering his Son, and salvation through him to them in particular. Luke xii. 46. Tit. i. 15. Rev. xxi. 8. Unbelief is either with respect to a particular declaration of God; as when Zacharias discredited God's promise of a son to him, Luke i. 20; or universal, with respect to the whole declarations of God.—It is either partial, importing some degrees of distrust, Mark ix. 24; or total, where there is no trust at all. 1 Tim. i. 13. The Jews who came out of Egypt could not enter into Canaan because of unbelief, on account of their distrust of God's power and kindness, and of his promise to bring them in; and for their rebellion and murmuring, it was inconsistent with the divine honour and purpose to admit them. Heb. iii. 19. Christ could not do many mighty works in his own country, because of their unbelief; their distrust and contempt of his miracles rendered them unfit subjects to have miracles wrought upon or among them. Mark vi. 5, 6. The apostles' distrust of Christ's promise of enabling them to cast out devils, rendered them incapable to cast one out, Mark xvii. 16; and Peter's distrust of his Master's power, occasioned his sinking into the water. Matt. xiv. 30, 31.

The unbelief for which the Jews were broken off from their church-state, was their rejection of Christ's Messiahship, their contempt and refusal of him, and their violent persecution of his cause and members. Rom. xi. 20. Paul was forgiven his blasphemy and persecution of the saints, as he did it ignorantly and in unbelief, before he knew the truth concerning Jesus, or felt the drawings of his Spirit. 1 Tim. i. 13.

UNBLAMEABLE; UNREBUKEABLE, UNREPROVEABLE; without scandal; without faults that deserve to be reprov'd or complained of. 1 Thess. ii. 10. 1 Tim. v. 14. Col. i. 22.

UNCERTAIN; (1.) Doubtful, that one knows not what is intended by it. 1 Cor.

xiv. 8. (2.) Changeable, that one knows not how short while a thing may endure or be possessed. 1 Tim. vi. 17.

UNCERTAINLY, without knowing the means or end, or without any security of obtaining it. 1 Cor. ix. 26.

UNCHANGEABLE, that cannot be altered in itself, or which cannot pass to another. Heb. vii. 24.

UNCIRCUMCISED. See CIRCUMCISION.

UNCLEAN. Persons or things are unclean, (1.) Naturally; so dunghills and hateful animals are unclean. Rev. xviii. 2. (2.) Ceremonially; persons who touched dead bodies, mourned for the dead, and a great number of beasts, were thus unclean. Numb. xix. Lev. xi—xvi. (3.) Federally; thus the children of heathens are unclean; are not in covenant with God, nor entitled to receive the seal of baptism. 1 Cor. vii. 14. (4.) In scrupulous opinion; so some meats were reckoned unclean by the primitive Christians. Rom. xiv. 14. (5.) Morally, being polluted with sin; so devils are unclean spirits, Matt. x. 1; and all men are as an unclean thing. Isa. lxiv. 6. Particularly, sinners against the seventh commandment, which at once pollute both soul and body, are unclean. Eph. v. 5.

UNCLEANNESS, is either natural filthiness, Matt. xxiii. 27; or ceremonial, Lev. xv. 31; or moral, i. e. all kinds of sin, Ezek. xxxvi. 29; or whorish. Col. iii. 5. 2 Pet. ii. 10.

UNCLOTHED. The soul is unclothed at death, when dislodged from the body, which is, as it were, a covering, or robe to it. 2 Cor. v. 4.

UNCOMELY; (1.) Not becomingly. 1 Cor. vii. 37. (2.) Shamefully, such parts of our body as are so, have more abundant comeliness put upon them when we carefully cover them. 1 Cor. xii. 23.

UNCONDEMNED; not examined, not convicted or found guilty. Acts xvi. 37. and xxii. 25.

UNCORRUPTEDNESS, freedom from error. Tit. ii. 7.

UNCOVER. See DISCOVER.

UNCTION. See ANOINTING.

UNDEFILED, CLEAN. Christ is undefiled; is free from sin, infinitely holy as God, and perfectly holy in his manhood. Heb. vii. 26. Saints are undefiled; are completely righteous in Christ, in his obedience and suffering imputed to them; and they aim at perfection in holiness, and are not polluted with sin in the same degree as others. Sol. Song v. 2. Psal. cxix. 1. Heaven is incorruptible and undefiled; great is the shining glory of it; and every person and act there, is perfectly pure and holy. 1 Pet. i. 4.

UNDER; (1.) Beneath, in respect of place; so things on the earth are under the sun, under the heavens. Judg. i. 7. Dent. iv. 11. (2.) Beneath in respect of condition, state, power, authority. Hence we read of being under foot. Rom. xvi. 20. Under sin, under the law, under grace, under the curse; i. e. under the impression, influence, and reign thereof. Rom. iii. 9. and vi. 14. Men are under God, when subject to his laws. Hos. iv. 12. (3.) Beneath in respect of protection: thus the saints are under the shadow, feathers, or wings of God in Christ. Sol. Song ii. 3. Matt. xxiii. 37. Psal. xc. 1-3. (4.) Beneath, in respect of effectual support; so the arms of God and Christ are under his people, to uphold them under every burden. Sol. Song viii. 3. Deut. xxxiii. 27. (5.) Ready to be brought forth: so good and bad language is under the tongue, when in the heart and ready to be uttered. Sol. Song iv. 11. Psal. cxl. 8.

UNDERGIRD. To undergird a ship, is to bind her round with ropes, that she may not be torn asunder. Acts xxvii. 17.

UNDERSETTERS. Supporters or feet at the corners of the sacred lavers, which, together with the wheels, held them up from the ground. 1 Kings vii. 30, 34.

UNDERSTAND; to know things in a natural, supernatural, or spiritual manner. 2 Sam. iii. 27. Gen. xli. 15. Dan. iv. 19. Psal. cxix. 100. 1 Cor. ii. 9-14.

UNDERSTANDING. (1.) Knowledge; wisdom. Exod. xxxi. 3. Prov. ii. 2, 3. (2.) The power or faculty of the soul, by which it perceives objects. Luke xxiv. 45. Eph. i. 18. A people of no understanding, are persons ignorant, and unwilling to learn. Isa. xxvii. 11. My understanding is unfruitful; what I say, however sensible and well understood by me, is useless to others, if I speak in an unknown tongue. 1 Cor. xiv. 14. To love God with the understanding, or mind, is to love him judiciously, from a real and spiritual knowledge of his excellency and kindness. Mark xii. 33. A fool hath no delight in understanding, but that his heart may discover itself: he is not earnest and diligent in the study of solid knowledge and wisdom; but his great study and pleasure is to vent his own foolishness, being slow to hear, and swift to speak. Prov. xviii. 2.

UNDERTAKE; (1.) To become bound. Esth. ix. 23. (2.) To secure, support, and deliver, as a surety does, who engages for another to get him out of prison. Isa. xxxviii. 14.

UNDO; to destroy; remove. Zeph. iii. 19. Isa. lviii. 6.

UNDONE. (1.) Not performed. Josh. xi. 15. (2.) Destroyed, ruined. Numb. xxi. 29. Isa. vi. 5.

UNDRESSED, or separated. The Hebrews did not dress their vines in the year of release, and so had no claim to their fruit. Lev. xxv. 5.

UNEQUAL; (1.) Contrary to what equity and reason require. Ezek. xviii. 25. (2.) Not right matched, as to religion, temper, and condition. 2 Cor. vi. 14.

UNFEIGNED; true and real; sincere, without dissimulation. 2 Cor. vi. 6. 1 Tim. i. 5.

UNFAITHFUL; not studying to fulfil vows, or to act according to relations and trust. Prov. xxv. 19. Psal. lxxviii. 57.

UNFRUITFUL; barren; not tending to any good purpose. Matt. xiii. 22. (2.) Of no good tendency, but hurtful, defiling, and damning. Eph. v. 11.

UNGODLY; unlike to, and contrary to God's will and glory. Ungodly persons are such as are without God as to their state, and unlike God in their heart and life. Rom. i. v. 5.

UNGODLINESS; wickedness in general, but it particularly comprehends all sins against the first table of the law, as ignorance, atheism, idolatry, superstition, blasphemy, neglect of the worship of God, &c. Tit. ii. 11.

UNHOLY; (1.) Common, as the blood of a beast unsanctified. Men so account of Christ's blood, when they look on him as an impostor, or plead his righteousness, to encourage them in sinful practices. Heb. x. 29. (2.) Not sanctified according to the ceremonial law. Lev. x. 10. (3.) Without saving grace, wicked. 2 Tim. iii. 2.

UNICORN. What animal the reem, which we render unicorn is; whether the wild ox, the wild goat, or deer, or a creature called the unicorn, is not agreed. Many authors contend, that there is no such creature as the unicorn; others addicted to the marvellous, describe the unicorn as a most terrible creature, with a prodigious horn in its forehead, which it can push through trees; and almost every thing else; but their descriptions are so inconsistent, that no confidence can be placed in any of them. A horn, called a unicorn's horn, is in the British Museum at London; it is about ten or twelve feet long, and exceedingly strong; but this, I suppose, must be the horn of a narval, or sea-unicorn, whose horn, I am assured, is sometimes fourteen or fifteen feet in length, and of which, it is said, there is a whole throne made in Denmark. It is certain the scripture reem was a fierce, strong, and almost untamable animal. Perhaps the urus, or wild ox, found in Arabia, Hungary, and many other places, is of that kind; or the rhinoceros, which is the strongest of all four-footed beasts; and has one, and sometimes two horns, growing on its nose, about a yard or more in length. It is certain that these animals are extremely strong, fierce, and untamable, and have large horns. Men powerful and wicked, are likened to unicorns: they are fierce, furious, and dangerous. Isa. xxxiv. 7. Psal. xxii. 21. Strength as of a unicorn, is very great strength to defend against and destroy enemies. Numb. xxiii. 23. To have horns as of the unicorn, is to have great authority, power, and honour. Psal. xcii. 10. Deut. xxxiii. 17. To be delivered from the horn of the unicorn, is to be delivered out of the very greatest, nearest, and most dreadful dangers. Psal. xxii. 21.

UNITE; to join in fellowship, &c. Gen. xlix. 6. Men's heart is united to fear God's name, when it is strongly inclined to, and all its powers join together in the fear and service of God, with ardour and delight. Psal. lxxxvi. 11.

UNITY, oneness, whether of sentiment, affection, or behaviour. Psal. cxxxiii. 1. The unity of the faith, is an equal belief of the same truths of God, and a possession of the grace of faith, in a similar form and degree. Eph. iv. 13. The unity of the Spirit, is that union between Christ and his saints, by which the same divine Spirit dwells in both, and they have the same disposition and aims; and that unity of the saints among themselves, by which being joined to the same head, and having the same Spirit dwelling in them, they have the same graces of faith, love, hope, &c. and are rooted and grounded in the same doctrine of Christ, and have a mutual affection to, and care for one another. Eph. iv. 3.

UNJUST. See URRIGHTEOUS.

UNKNOWN; (1.) Not known, what one is not acquainted with. Acts xvii. 23. (2.) Not famed or renowned. Paul and his fellow-preachers were as unknown to the world in their spiritual state and exercises, and were unapproved, unesteemed, and unknown by carnal men; but well known and approved to God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. 2 Cor. vi. 9.

UNLADE; to put out, or take off burdens or loading. Acts xxi. 3.

UNLAWFUL; (1.) Not agreeable to the moral law. 1 Pet. ii. 6. (2.) Not agreeable to the ceremonial law. Acts x. 28.

UNLEARNED; such as are but little instructed in science, Acts iv. 13; or little acquainted with the mind of God, and the teaching of his Spirit. 2 Pet. iii. 16. Unlearned questions are such as minister no true and substantial knowledge. 2 Tim. ii. 23.

UNLEAVENED. See BREAD, LEAVEN.

UNLOOSE; to unbind, to untie. Mark i. 7.

UNMERCIFUL; cruel, without pity. Rom. i. 31.

UNMINDFUL; forgetful, unthankful, regardless. Dent. xxxii. 18.

UNMOVEABLE; (1.) Firmly fixed. Acts xxvii. 41. (2.) Constant in the way of the Lord, not to be diverted or drawn aside by temptations and opposition. 1 Cor. xv. 58.

UNOCCUPIED, not used for business or trade; nor travelled in, for fear of enemies and robbers. Judg. v. 6.

UNPERFECT, wanting parts or degrees of solid substance or shape. Psal. cxxxix. 18.

UNPREPARED, not ready. 2 Cor. ix. 4.

UNPROFITABLE, useless, tending to no real advantage, but hurt. Job xv. 3. Wicked men are unprofitable, are spiritually unfruitful, and abominable to God, neither studying his glory, nor the real good of themselves or others. Psal. xiv. 3. Philom. 11. The ceremonial law was unprofitable: it could not really remove the guilt or power of sin, by the observance of all its rites. Heb. vii. 18. The grieving of ministers is unprofitable to their people, as it mars their studies, and the discharge of their office leads them to complain of the injury to God, who will not fail to punish it in this or in the world to come. Heb. xiii. 17.

UNQUENCHABLE, that can never be put out, nor made to cease from burning. Matt. iii. 12.

UNREASONABLE, without and contrary to reason and common sense. Acts xxv. 27. Unreasonable men, are such as either know not, or regard not reason, but furiously act as their lusts excite them. 2 Thess. iii. 2.

UNREBUKEABLE, UNREPROVEABLE. See UNBLAMEABLE.

UNRIGHTEOUS, UNJUST, without or contrary to justice or equity. Heb. vi. 10.

UNRIGHTEOUSNESS, what is unrighteous, either, (1.) Contrary to the law of God in general, 1 Cor. vi. 9. 1 John i. 9; or, (2.) Contrary to the duty we owe to men. Rom. i. 8. Exod. xxiii. 1. (3.) Deceitful, false, and erroneous, tending to mislead men. John vii. 11. Unjust or unrighteous persons, are, (1.) Such as wrong their neighbours; as David's enemies under Saul, or Absalom, did him. Psal. xliii. 1. (2.) Sinners in general, who wrong God of his due service and honour, and in his sight much wrong their neighbours. 1 Pet. iii. 8.

UNRULY; which cannot be brought under due order and government, but are as headstrong beasts that cannot be got yoked; it means much the same as children of Belial. Tit. i. 6, 10. 1 Thess. v. 14.

UNSATIABLE, that can never have what they reckon enough. The Jews were unsatiable in their idolatries, still following after the idols, and still eager after new gods. Ezek. xvi. 18.

UNSAVOURY, tasteless, ill-tasted, or ill-scented. It denotes, (1.) What is void of sense. Job vi. 6. (2.) What is horrid and abominable. Jer. xxiii. 13.

UNSEARCHABLE; what cannot be fully known in number, properties, or extent. So the heart or secret schemes of kings, are unsearchable, hard to be known. Prov. xxv. 3. But the riches of Christ, the judgments of God, and his greatness are much more so, and cannot be fully understood by any but God himself. Eph. iii. 8. Rom. xi. 33. Psal. cxlv. 3.

UNSEEMLY; (1.) Abominable, what is not fit to be seen, heard, or thought of. Rom. i. 27. (2.) Unmannerly, indiscreetly. 1 Cor. xiii. 8.

UNSHOD. Withhold thy foot from being washed, and thy throat from thirst. Do not wear out your shoes going to seek foreign alliances and foreign idols: do not eagerly desire that which will issue in your future misery. Jer. ii. 25.

UNSKILFUL, without knowledge and experience. Heb. v. 13.

UNSPEAKABLE, that which cannot be expressed in words proportioned to its excellence and greatness. 2 Cor. xi. 15. 1 Pet. i. 8.

UNSPOTTED; not defiled with the sinful fashions of the world, without offence towards God and towards men. James i. 27.

UNSTABLE, not fixed in affection or condition, like a man standing upon one leg, who is easily overturned; or like a rolling wave of the sea tossed to and fro. Gen. xlix. 4. Jam. i. 8. 2 Pet. ii. 14. and iii. 14.

UNSTOPPED, open. Isa. xxxv. 5.

UNTEMPERED, not duly mixed and wrought together. The flatteries of false teachers are like mortar made of sand not mixed nor wrought with lime; and hence all the wall-like schemes they build there-with shall quickly come to an end. Ezech. xiii. 10, 15. and xlii. 28.

UNTHANKFUL, having no proper sense of kindness received from God or men, disposed to, and negligent of rendering thanks for the same. Luke vi. 23.

UNTIMELY, not in the proper season. Wicked men pass away like an untimely birth, which happens too soon, and so the embryo, or child, is imperfect; their ruin comes on them suddenly before they expect it, and before they can get time to enjoy their honour, ease, or wealth. Psal. lviii. 8. The heathen persecutors are likened to untimely figs that fall off the tree before they are ripe; they were destroyed by Constantine before they expected it. Rev. vi. 13.

UNTOWARD, perverse, rebellious against the calls of the gospel, and the language of Providence; such were the Jews who contemned, opposed, and crucified our Saviour, and persecuted his followers. Acts ii. 40.

UNWALLED, without walls built around them for their defence. Ezek. xxxviii. 11.

UNWISE; (1.) Such as never learned sciences. Rom. i. 14. (2.) Foolish, without the true knowledge of God and his ways. Eph. v. 17.

UNWITTINGLY; (1.) Without intending it. Josh. xx. 3. (2.) Not knowing it. Lev. xxii. 14.

UNWORTHY, not meet, not deserving. 1 Cor. vi. 2. The Jews judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life, when they acted as if they were set upon ruining themselves. Acts xiii. 46. Men eat and drink unworthily at the Lord's table, when they do it in an unworthy state of voluntary subjection to sin and Satan, and while under the broken law, in an unworthy frame of spirit, ignorant, unbelieving, impenitent, envious, malicious, and with an unworthy end of self-applause, self-righteousness, or to qualify for a civil office; and when the elements are used as if they were common provision, not as the symbols of Jesus' person, righteousness, and blessing. 1 Cor. xi. 27, 29.

VOCATION, that effectual calling by which God brings men out of a state of sin and misery, into a state of salvation, by his word and Spirit. Eph. iv. 1.

VOICE, in general, signifies any kind of noise, whether made by animals or not. God's voice is, (1.) The thunder, which is very terrible, and loudly declares the existence and providence of God. Psal. xxix. (2.) His laws, and the offers of his grace, in which he declares his will to men. Exod. xv. 26. (3.) His alarming providences, in which he publishes his own excellencies, awakens us from our stupidity, and calls us to turn from sin to duty. Mic. vi. 9. Amos i. 2. Christ's voice is the declaration of the gospel, and the influence of his Spirit. Sol. Song ii. 8, 12. Men's voice denotes their words of command, instruction, and advice. Judg. xx. 13. and xiii. 9. 1 Sam. ii. 25. and xix. 6. One changes his voice, when, from sharp reproofs he turns to commendation and comfort. Gal. iv. 20.

The voices in the Revelation, denote, (1.) The glorious and loud proclamation of the gospel, by the authority of God. Rev. iv. 5. and xi. 19. (2.) The astonishing events of providence, that rouse and alarm the world. Rev. viii. 5, 18. and x. 3. (3.) The great joy of the saints, and their praises of God, for his deliverance of the church, and the destruction of her enemies. Rev. xi. 15. To shew that John the Baptist was not the Messiah, but the herald of his appearance, he is called a voice. Isa. xl. 6. Terrible outcries from cities, on the approach of a furious enemy towards them, are called a voice. Isa. x. 30. The ceasing of the voice, or sound of harps, mirth, millstones, and of the light of candles, &c. import that the place is reduced to desolation. Isa. xv. 1. Jer. vii. 34. and xlviii. 33. Rev. xviii. 23, 25.

VOID; (1.) Empty; without inhabitants or furniture. Gen. i. 2. (2.) Destitute of; quite wanting. Deut. xxxii. 28. (3.) Clear from. Acts xxiv. 16. (4.) Of no force or effect; hence vows are said to be made void, when they are broken. Numb. xxx. 12—15. The counsel of Judah was made void, when their projects had no good success. Jer. xix. 7. God's law is made void, when men break it, and live as if it had no obligation upon them. Rom. iii. 31. Psal. cxix. 126; and faith is made void, when it is useless; as all the promises of God, and our faith that embraces them, would be, if happiness could come by the works of the law. Rom. iv. 14.

VOLUME. See ROLL.

VOLUNTARY; not required by any law; but proceeding from one's free inclination. Ezek. xlv. 12. Col. ii. 18.

VOMIT. See SPUE.

VOW. See OATH.

UPBRAID; (1.) Seriously and sharply to reprove men for their sins; so our Saviour upbraided the people of Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Chorazin, for their faults. Matt. xi. 20. (2.) To scoff at and upbraid any one to his face. Jam. i. 5. Judg. viii. 15.

UPHAZ; a place where there was fine gold; but whether it was the same as OPHIR, or some other place called PAZ, or TOPAZ, we know not. Calmet thinks it was the river Phasis, on the east of the Black or Euxine sea. Jer. x. 9. Dan. x. 5.

UPHOLD; TO MAINTAIN and preserve; to cause things to continue in their being and station. God upholds Christ and his people: by his providence, he strengthens and bears them up against every foe, and under every trouble; and by his promises and influences, he refreshes and invigorates their spirits. Isa. xlii. 1. Psal. cxix. 16. He upholds all things; he maintains them in existence and operation, by his providential influences. Heb. i. 3. Men uphold others, when they encourage, comfort, and assist them, that their spirits sink not, nor their lives, offices, or estates, be ruined. Psal. liv. 4. Ezek. xxx. 6. Job's maintaining his ways before God, imports his defending his integrity and candour, and his continuance therein. Job xiii. 15.

UPPERMOST; (1.) Highest in place. Gen. xl. 17. (2.) Highest in dignity and honour. Matt. xxiii. 6.

UPRIGHT; (1.) Straight pointed towards heaven; standing like pillars. Jer. x. 5. (2.) Perfect, without sin, or tendency to it. Eccl. vii. 29. (3.) Honest, candid, sincere, without allowed guile. Mic. vii. 2. The Jews might be the upright ones, who attended Antiochus the Great to Egypt, and adhering to their own religion, were more to be trusted than others; or the text may import, that Antiochus did many things upright in appearance, and made agreements on terms seemingly right. Dan. xi. 17. Christ's righteousness is called his uprightness. Job xxxiii. 28.

UPROAR. See TUMULT.

UR; an ancient city of Chaldaea, or Mesopotamia, where Terah and Abraham dwelt. Some think it was the same as Orchoe in Chaldaea Proper: but I rather suppose it was Ura, which stood in Eastern Mesopotamia, between the city Nisibis and the river Tigris. About A. D. 360, as Jovinian retreated this way, after the invasion of Persia by Julian his predecessor, he built a Persian fort here. Acts vii. 2. Gen. xi. 28.

URGE; (1.) To entreat earnestly. Gen. xxiii. 12. (2.) To provoke to the utmost of one's power. Luke xi. 53.

U-RI'AH, U-RI'JAH, U-RI'AS; (1.) A Hittite, one of David's worthies, and husband of BATHSHEBA. The defiling of his wife by David; the calling him from the army, and endeavouring to fill him with drink, and cause him to sleep with his wife, in order to father the spurious child upon him; his refusal to comply with these offers; and being made the bearer of a letter, directing Joab to place him in the front of the battle, that he might be slain by the enemy; and the vengeance of God upon David and his family, on account of his conduct towards him, are related in the article David. 2 Sam. xxiii. 39. and xi. (2.) The idolatrous high priest, who by AHAZ' direction, built an altar like to an idolatrous one at Damascus, and offered sacrifices thereon, instead of on the altar of the Lord. 2 Kings xvi. 10—12. (3.) A faithful prophet, who warned the Jews of their approaching ruin, and admonished them to repent of their evil ways; but JEHOIAKIM hearing thereof, resolved to put him to death. He fled into Egypt; but Jehoiakim sent and brought him back, and having ordered him to be murdered, ordered his corpse to be dishonourably cast into the graves of the common people. Jer. xxvi. 20, 21.

URIM and THUMMIM, signify light and perfection; and are mentioned as being in the high priest's breast-plate; but what they were, cannot be determined. Some think they were two precious stones added to the other twelve, by the extraordinary lustre of which, God marked his approbation of a design, or by their dimness, his disapproval of it. Others think, these two words were written on a precious stone, or plate of gold, fixed in the breast-plate. Others suppose the name JEHOVAH to have been inscribed on a plate of gold, and therein fixed. Others think, the letters of the names of the tribes, were the Urim and Thummim; and that these letters, by standing out, or by an extraordinary illumination, marked such words as contained the answer of God to him who consulted this oracle. Le Clerc will have them to be the names of two precious stones, set in a golden collar, and coming down to his breast, as the magistrates of Egypt wore a golden chain, at the end of which hung the figures of Justice and Truth, engraven on precious stones. Weems thinks they were some ornament, formed by God himself, and given to Moses. Hottinger thinks they might mean no more but that Moses was to choose the most shining and perfect stones of the various kinds, to be put into the breast-plate. Prideaux thinks, the words chiefly denote the clearness of the oracles dictated to the high priest, though perhaps the lustre of the stones in his breast-plate might represent this clearness. When this oracle of Urim and Thummim was to be consulted, it is said, the high priest put on his golden vestments, and in ordinary cases went into the sanctuary, and stood with his face to the holy of holies, and the consulter stood as near to him as the law allotted: but how the answer was given, whether by an articulate voice from the mercy-seat, or by the projection or lustre of the letters in the breast-plate, we know not. This oracle was never consulted in matters of doctrine; as in these the Jews had the written law for their rule; nor was it consulted in matters of small moment; and it is even said, possibly without ground, that none but sovereign judges, kings, and generals, consulted it. It is certain, that David consulted the Lord in this manner, before he came to the throne. While Moses lived, there was no occasion to consult this oracle, as the Lord spake to him face to face. After his death, it was consulted till the building of the temple, and time of the prophets, the latter of which seem to have supplied its room; for we read of no instance of its being then consulted. Nor did Josiah, when terrified with the threatenings of God, consult it; but Huldah the prophetess, in order to know the mind of God. 2 Kings xxii. 14. Josephus will have the stones of the Urim and Thummim to have retained their lustre till about A. M. 3890; but it is certain, the oracle was wanting some ages before, in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah. Ezra ii. 63. Neh. vii. 65. Nor is there the least ground to believe that it existed under the second temple. The Jews pretend that the Bathkol supplied its place, whose oracles, they say, were often attended with a clap of thunder; and it seems these, with our Saviour, imagined the voice that spoke from heaven to be of this kind. John xii. 29. See ORACLE.

US. God sometimes uses this plural, to denote there being more than one person in the Godhead. Gen. i. 26. and xi. 7. Isa. vi. 8.

USE; (1.) Service, purpose. Lev. vii. 24. (2.) Custom; often repeated exercise. Heb. v. 14. And to use, is to make use of, act with, employ one's self in. Matt. vi. 7. 2 Cor. i. 17.

USURP, haughtily to claim or take possession of power and authority which does not belong to us. 1 Tim. ii. 12.

USURY; gain taken for the loan of money or goods. The law of nature forbids not the receiving of moderate interest for the loan of money, any more than the taking of rent for the occupancy of fields or houses. If another trade on my stock, reason says, I may receive part of the gain. The interest, however, ought to be moderate; and if the borrower be a very poor man, ought to be little or nothing; as reason requires us to be compassionate, and the Divine law requires us to do to others as we should wish them to do to us in like cases. If providence frown upon those persons to whom we have lent our money, it is proper we should share with them in their loss, as we should have shared with them in their profit. As the Jews had very little concern in trade, and so only borrowed in case of necessity; and as their system was calculated to establish every man's inheritance in his own family, they were allowed to lend money upon usury to strangers, Deut. xxiii. 20; but were prohibited to take usury from their brethren of Israel, at least if they were poor. Exod. xxii. 25. Lev. xxv. 35—37.

UTTER; (1.) To reveal, speak out, declare. Lev. v. 1. (2.) To make plain. Heb. v. 11. God utters judgments, when he threatens and executes them on men. Jer. i. 16.

UTTERANCE; ability, freedom, and boldness in speaking. Acts ii. 4. Eph. vi. 19.

UTTER or OUTER, (1.) Most outward. Ezek. x. 5. (2.) Complete, to the utmost extent. 1 Kings xx. 42. So UTTERLY, is altogether, wholly, Exod. xvii. 14; or very much. Ezek. xxix. 10. Psal. cxix. 8. UTTERMOST, or UTMOST, is, (1.) The most outward. Exod. xxvi. 4. (2.) Farthest distant; to the greatest extent. 2 Kings vii. 5. (3.) The very last. Matt. v. 26. Christ saves to the uttermost: he saves certainly, wholly, fully, perfectly, and perpetually: or he, by an infinite price, saves from infinite guilt, pollution, and misery, and brings to the highest degrees of happiness, and preserves therein to all eternity. Heb. vii. 25. Wrath came upon the Jews to the uttermost: their ruin was widely spread, almost universal in extent, most terrible in degree, and lasting in duration. 2 Thess. ii. 16. To know the uttermost of a matter, is to know it completely in all its points and circumstances. Acts xxiv. 22.

VULTURE; a large fowl of the eagle kind. There are six kinds of vultures. The vulture's neck is long, and almost bare of feathers; its legs are feathered to the feet, on each of which are four toes, three forward and one backward. It builds its nest in high rocks, and is said to live about a hundred years. It has a very quick sight, haunts desolate places, and delights to feed on human flesh, but feeds on nothing living. It is said to attend armies, expecting death and blood, and to smell carrion at the distance of fifty miles. Vultures are said to be great enemies to serpents, and to feed their young with their own blood, in cases of extreme hunger. Lev. xiv. 14. Deut. xiv. 13. Joh xxviii. 7. Isa. xxiv. 15.

UZ; (1.) The eldest son of Aram, and grandson of Shem. Gen. x. 23. (2.) The son of Dishon, a Horite. Gen. xxxvi. 28. (3.) A country; but where situated is not so well agreed. Some have placed it at the source of the Hiddekel, or Tigris, where Pliny and Strabo place the Uxii; and here, perhaps Uz, the son of Aram resided. The Hebrews call the country about Damascus, the land of Uz, and the Arabs call it Gout or Gauta, which is the same. We are, moreover, told, that Uz the son of Aram, built Damascus. Bochart, the authors of the Universal History, and others, placed the land of Uz a good way to the south-east of Damascus, and almost directly east from the lot of the Reubenites, and west from Chaldea in Arabia the Desert. This, they think, received its name from Huz the son of Nahor the brother of Abraham; and hereabouts Ptolemy places the Æsitæ or Ausitæ. Spanheim and others, suppose this to have been the country of Job, as it was near the Chaldeans. Job i. 1, 17. Perhaps there was another land of Uz in the territories of the Edomites, which had its name from Uz the Horite. The Arabian writers say, that the Adites, descended from Uz the son of Aram, resided here for some time before they removed into Arabia Felix. Lam. iv. 21.

UZAL, the sixth son of Joktan, whose posterity appear to have settled in the south of Arabia Felix. Here was anciently the sea-port Ocila or Ocelis, and Ausal or Ausar, in the kingdom of the Gebanites, whose myrrh was very much celebrated. Some Jewish writers call the capital city of Yaman, or Arabia Felix, by the name of Uzal. Gen. x. 27.

UZZAH and A-HIO, the sons of Abinadab, in whose house the ark of God had long resided; and who, at David's orders, conducted it, upon a new cart, from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem. When the oxen stuck in the mire, or stumbled as they passed the thrashing-floor of Nachon or Chidon, Uzzah, though no priest, and perhaps not even a Levite, presumed to touch the ark, in order to hold it on the cart. Offended that the ark was not carried on the shoulders of the Levites according to order, and also offended with Uzzah's presuming to touch it, and perhaps also for his having advised to convey it on a cart, God struck him dead on the spot, to the great grief and terror of king David. 2 Sam. vi. Whether it was in a garden which belonged to this Uzzah that king Amon was buried, cannot be ascertained.

UZZEN-SHERAH; a city of the Ephraimites, and at no great distance from Beth-horon, was built by Serah, the daughter or grand-daughter of Beriah. 1 Chron. vii. 22—24.

UZ-ZIAH, or Ozias. See AZARIAH the son of Jotham.

W.

WAFER; a thin cake of fine flour, anointed or baked with oil. Such wafers were used in the consecration-offerings of the priests, Exod. xxix. 2, 25; in meat-offerings, Lev. ii. 4; in thank-offerings, Lev. vii. 12; and in the Nazarites' offerings. Numb. vi. 15.

WAGGING of the head, or hand, was expressive of mocking and insult. Jer. xviii. 16. Zeph. ii. 15.

WAGES. See REWARD.

WAIL; to mourn, by crying, howling, wringing the hands, or beating the breast, or thighs. Ezek. xxxii. 18.

WAIT; (1.) To attend, ready to serve. Numb. viii. 24. (2.) Patiently to stay, desiring, and looking for. Gen. xlix. 18. God waits to be gracious; he patiently bears with sinners; with delight and readiness he seizes the first proper opportunity of bestowing his favours on his people, and defers them till that come. Isa. xxx. 18. Our waiting upon God, imports our attendance on him as a Master, being ready to serve him; and our patient and earnest looking to him as a Saviour for deliverance and comfort. Ps. xxv. 3. Job's neighbours waited for him; they highly esteemed him, and were ready to receive his counsel. Job xxix. 21. To lie in wait, is to lie hid in order to seize an opportunity of assaulting; and thus the words of the wicked are to lie in wait for blood; they tend to ruin men before they are aware; but the mouth or words of the upright tend to deliver men. Prov. xii. 6. Wicked men lie in wait for their own blood, as all their crafty and violent schemes tend to hasten ruin on their own head. Prov. i. 19. They are waited for of the sword; are in perpetual danger of distress and ruin. Job xv. 22.

WAKE: (1.) To watch without sleep, natural, or spiritual. Psal. cxxvii. 1. Sol. Song v. 2. (2.) To rise from sleep. Psal. cxxxix. 18. (3.) To stir up, rouse from sleep or slumber. Zech. iv. 1. (4.) To stir up to war. Joel iii. 9, 12. God wakened Christ morning by morning; by the continued influences of his Spirit, he rendered him alert and active in his work of obedience and suffering. Isa. i. 4. Whether the saints wake or sleep, i. e. whether they live or die, they live together in Christ. 1 Thess. v. 10. See AWAKE, SLEEP.

WALK; (1.) With pleasure to move from one place to another. Exod. xxi. 19. (2.) To act and behave in the tenor of conversation; and when thus metaphorically taken, WALKING denotes deliberation, pleasure, perseverance, and progress. Christ's walking in his church, or among his people, imports his gracious presence with them, his constant delight in them, his observation of them, and readiness to do them good. Lev. xvi. 12. Rev. ii. 1. God's walking on the waves of the sea, and on the wings of the wind, denotes the uncontrollable sovereignty, speed, composure, and mysterious nature of his providential conduct. Job ix. 8. Psal. xviii. 10. His walking in the circuit of heaven, imports the immensity of his presence, Job xxii. 14; but his walking contrary to men, imports his thwarting their purposes and attempts, and his executing his judgments upon them. Lev. xxvi. 24. To walk in Christ, is, being united to his person, clothed with his righteousness, and animated by his indwelling Spirit; and improving him as our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, to make daily advances in holiness, and nearness to heaven, with composure and delight. Col. ii. 6. To walk in and after the Spirit, is to have the Holy Ghost dwelling in our soul; and, being possessed of a new nature, and directed, animated, encouraged, and drawn by the Holy Ghost, to order our whole conversation according to his word and influence, and agreeably to the inclinations of the renewed heart. Gal. v. 21. Rom. viii. 1. To walk by faith, is to rely upon Christ, as freely and fully offered to us in the gospel, and firmly to credit the accomplishment of the promises; thus receiving out of Christ's fullness grace for grace, to make a continual progress in holiness, and towards eternal glory. 2 Cor. v. 7. To walk with the Lord, before God, and after the Lord, or in his name, is to hear and believe his word, depend on him, and in the study of intimate fellowship with him, and under a continued impression of his presence, to worship, obey, and please him. Gen. v. 24. and xvi. 2. Hos. x. 12. Zech. x. 12. To walk in the truth, or in God's fear, way, or commandments, is with composure to persevere in the profession, faith, and practical improvement of the gospel of Christ, and to live in a course of obedience to his law. 2 John 4. Dent. v. 33. 2 Chron. xvii. 4. To walk in the light, or in the light of God's countenance, is to enjoy the oracles and influences of Christ, and to improve them to promote a life of upright conformity to the command and example of Christ. Isa. ii. 5. 1 John vi. 7. To walk in the comforts of the Holy Ghost, is habitually to enjoy them in a very high degree. Acts ix. 31. To walk worthy of the Lord, is to behave with pleasure and composure, as persons redeemed by, called to, united with, and receiving influence from, and in subjection to the holy Jesus, who left us an example, that we should walk in his steps. Col. i. 10. 1 Thess. ii. 12. To walk worthy of our vocation, or calling out of the world into the fellowship of God's Son, is by denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. Eph. iv. 1. To walk as men, is to behave like the carnal and unregenerate part of the world. 1 Cor. iii. 3. To walk after the flesh, or after lusts, is to be directed and influenced in our practice by the lusts, appetites, and inclinations of our corrupt nature. Rom. viii. 1. 1 Pet. iv. 2. Jude 16. To walk in darkness, in falsehood, and craftiness, is to live in an unregenerate state, with a mind ignorant of divine things, and with pleasure to proceed on in lying, deceit, or other wicked courses. 1 John i. 6. 2 Cor. iv. 2. False prophets walk in the spirit of falsehood, when, pretending to have the Spirit of God, and being instigated by the devil, they prophesy falsely to the people. Mic. ii. 11. To walk in the way of the people of Judah, was to approve their forsaking the Lord, and their depending on the Assyrians and Egyptians for help. Isa. viii. 12. Men walk through fire and water, when they pass through great dangers and troubles. Isa. xliii. 1. Psal. lxxvi. 12. The king of Tyre walked in the midst of stones of fire; his very garments and palace were hung, or set thick with shining and sparkling gems. Ezek. xxviii. 14.

WALL, for defence, and for division of things. Josh. ii. 15. Numb. xxii. 24. Hence God and his salvation are a wall, and wall of fire, to the church, whereby she is protected from all danger. Zech. ii. 5. Isa. xli. 1. Ezek. xl. &c. And the government, safety, and strength of a church or nation, are represented as walls. Psal. ii. 12. Isa. v. 3. Rev. xxi. 12. Ezek. xl. &c. The church is likened to a wall, to denote her sure foundation, the firm union of her members, among themselves, and to Christ; her exposure to trouble, and her ability from Christ to bear the assaults of enemies. Sol. Song viii. 9, 10. Great men are likened to walls; they are eminently instrumental in the protection and safeguard of a nation. Isa. li. 15. David and his men were as a wall to protect Nabal's flocks from the Arabs and wild beasts. 1 Sam. xxv. 16. Jeremiah was like a fenced brazen wall; God enabled him courageously to declare the truth, and preserved him amidst all the malicious designs of his enemies. Jer. i. 18. and xv. 20. The ceremonial law was a wall of partition; it so separated between the Jews and gentiles, that few of the latter entered the church during its continuance. Eph. ii. 14. Men's sins are as a wall that interrupts their fellowship with Christ. Sol. Song ii. 9. The Chaldeans were like a wall of iron round about Jerusalem; they, in a bold and determined manner, laid siege to it till they had taken it. Ezek. iv. 3. Wicked men are like a bowing wall; their ruin proceeds from themselves and is very sudden and dreadful. Psal. lxxiii. 8. Jerusalem was inhabited without walls, when it had full peace, and its suburbs were large. Zech. ii. 4. In the day thy walls are to be built, shall the decree for repairing it be published, and the decree against it be far removed, or hindered. Mic. vii. 11. Compare Ezra i.—vi. with Neh. ii.—vi. Violence and strife go about on the walls of a city, when they are openly practised, even by those whose especial duty it is to defend and protect men. Psal. iv. 10.

WALLOW; to roll or turn from one side to another. Mark ix. 21.

WANDER; to travel hither and thither, without knowing where to go. Jer. xlix. 5. Apostasy from the worship and ways of God, and following after idols, are called scandering. Psal. cxix. 10. Jer. iv. 10. David's wanderings, are either his removals from place to place, or his diversified afflictions. Psal. lvi. 8. He that wandereth out of the way of understanding, shall remain in the congregation of the dead; he that lives in ignorance and wickedness, and shuns the means of instruction and reformation, shall continue among the unregenerate, dead in trespasses and sins; and saints, who stray from the paths of duty, shall much resemble sinners. Prov. xxi. 6. The Chaldean armies are called wanderers; they went from one country to another in their ravages and wars. Jer. xlviii. 12. Those in captivity and exile, are wanderers, driven hither and thither, and know not whither they must go. Hos. ix. 17. Esek. xxiv. 6. Isa. xvi. 2, 3.

WANT, denotes either, (1.) The entire lack of a thing, Deut. xxviii. 57; or, (2.) Penury, scarcity. Mark xii. 44. It either respects the wants of soul or body. Prodigal sinners are said to begin to be in want, when God, by distress and conviction, renders them sensible of their need of Christ, and his salvation, and pained for the want of it. Luke xv. 4.

WANTON; LASCIVIOUS, light, disposed to unchastity. Jam. v. 5. Wanton eyes, are such as by an air of lightness, tend to entice others to unchastity. Isa. iii. 16. To was wanton against Christ, is, contrary to their Christian profession, to become light, and disposed to unchastity. 1 Tim. v. 11.

WANTONNESS, or LASCIVIOUSNESS, includes every thing tending to promote or fulfil fleshly lusts; and to give over one's self to it, is to delight in, and practise it, without shame or remorse. Matt. xv. 19. Rom. xiii. 13. Gal. v. 19. Eph. iv. 19. To turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, is to use his kindness declared in the gospel, as an encouragement in impurity. Jude 4.

WAR, WARFARE. See FIGHT.

WARD; (1.) A prison. Gen. xl. 3—7. (2.) Watch, garrison. Neh. xii. 25. 1 Chron. xii. 20. (3.) A class of persons who serve together at the same time; as soldiers on a watch: so the classes of the priests and singers are called wards. Neh. xiii. 30. 1 Chron. xxv. 8. The singers and porters kept the ward of their God, and the ward of purification: the singers attended the service of the temple in their turns; and the porters took care that no unclean person should enter by the gates, to defile the court. Neh. xii. 45.

WARDROBE; a place for laying up the royal and other garments belonging to the court, or for laying up the priests' robes who were officiating in the temple. 2 Kings xxii. 14.

WARE, WARES; (1.) Merchant goods, such as precious stones, cloth, corn, &c. (2.) What the Antichristians pretend to sell for money, as masses, pardons, indulgences, &c. Rev. xviii. 12. The Jews' gathering up wares out of the land, imports their carrying their moveable effects into Jerusalem, to secure them from the Chaldeans; or that they should be quickly obliged to leave their country. Jer. x. 17.

WARM; (1.) Moderately hot. 2 Kings iv. 24. (2.) Clothed. Jam. ii. 16. Job xxxi. 20. When the Arabian rivulets wax warm, they vanish away; i. e. they are dried up in the heat of summer. Job vi. 17.

WARN, to advertise of danger, and beforehand advise and admonish how to avoid sin, or perform duty, or obtain safety. Acts xx. 31. x. 22. and Heb. xi. 6.

WASHING was much used among the eastern nations. As they often walked barefoot, or only with sandals, they used, for cleanliness and refreshment, to wash their feet when they came from a journey. Gen. xlviii. 4. xxiv. 32. and xliii. 24. Ordinarily, servants washed the feet of those of the family; only daughters often washed the feet of their parents. To wash the saints' feet, therefore, implied much humility or kindness. 1 Tim. v. 10. What love and condescension were manifested by our Saviour, in washing his disciples' feet! John xiii. 1—3. The superstitious Jews washed their hands up to the elbows before they took their meals, and even washed their beds, whereon they sat at meat, and their tables. Mark xii. 3, 4. At the marriage of Cana, the guests had pots full of water set to wash in as they entered. John ii. 6. The ceremonial washing of clothes, and flesh, imported our washing the garments of our conversation in the blood and righteousness of Christ; depending on that to cover all our spots of life, and be our only ground of acceptance before God; and our being influenced thereby to repent of our sins, and turn from them to God. Exod. xix. 10. Rev. vii. 14. All the washings of priests and sacrifices, pointed out the spotless purity of Christ, and our justification and sanctification by his blood and Spirit. Heb. ix. 10. God or Christ's washing of men, imports his removal of their moral guilt and pollution, by the application of the word, blood, and Spirit of Christ. John xii. 8. Isa. iv. 4. Psal. li. 2, 7. Baptism washes away sin, as it represents, seals, and applies the blood and Spirit of Jesus Christ, for the removal of the guilt, power, and pollution of sin, which is called the washing of regeneration. Acts xxii. 16. Tit. iii. 5. Men's washing of themselves, imports, (1.) Their setting out their own excellencies to the best advantage, Ezek. xxxiii. 40; or, (2.) Their legal endeavours to clear or purify themselves; notwithstanding all which God shall plunge them in the ditch, making their sin evident in the troubles inflicted on them. Job ix. 30. Jer. ii. 22. (3.) Their application of Christ's word, righteousness, and Spirit, and endeavouring, under their influence to mortify the deeds of the body. Isa. i. 16. Jer. iv. 14. Washing of steps in butter, and clothes in wine, imports great plenty of these things, or of like comforts. Job xxix. 6. Gen. xlix. 11. Eyes washed in milk, are such as are very clear and shining. Sol. Song v. 12. Moab was David's wash-pot;—he was reduced by him to a most base and servile condition. Psal. lx. 8. See FOOT, HAND.

WASTE; empty, desolate, ruinous, as ruined cities, a wilderness. Ezek. v. 14. and xxxiii. 24, 27. To waste, is (1.) To come to nothing, 1 Kings xvii. 14; to spend to little or bad purpose. Matt. xvi. 8. Luke xv. 13. (2.) To harass, cut off, make ruinous. Numb. xiv. 22. Gal. i. 13. 1 Chron. xx. 1. Jer. xlix. 13. The gentle word, or the sinful and ruinous condition of a church or nation, is called wastes. Isa. lxi. 4.

WASTERS; (1.) Such as lavishly spend what they have to no good purpose. Prov. xviii. 9. (2.) Armies, who ravage countries, and render them ruinous or desolate; or persecutors, who seek to destroy the members of the church, and fill her with disorder. Isa. liv. 16.

WATCH; (1.) To keep awake. Matt. xxvi. 40. (2.) To shake off carnal and sinful security, and take the utmost heed, lest sin, Satan, or the world, should deceive, overcome, or hurt us: This is called being VIGILANT or WATCHFUL. 1 Pet. v. 8. Rev. iii. 2. (3.) To wait and look for a thing coming, with eager desire, Lam. iv. 17; as servants do for their master's return. Luke xii. 37. (4.) Carefully to observe and guard a thing, that it may neither do nor receive hurt. So shepherds watch their flocks, to prevent their straying or hurting the corn, or being hurt by wild beasts. Luke ii. 8.

God's watching, imports his exact observation of men's conduct, Job xiv. 16; his patient readiness and care to relieve his people, Jer. xxxi. 28; and his patient, but certain execution of his judgments in the properest season. Jer. xlv. 27. Ministers watching for men's souls, imports their eager and active care to perceive the danger men are in, and warn them thereof, and their earnest endeavours to promote their holiness, safety, and happiness, and to check and reclaim unruly church-members. Heb. xiii. 17.

The saints' watching, denotes their shaking off carnal security; their eager expectation of Christ's gracious visits and second coming; their careful keeping of their heart; care to perceive temptations at a distance, and to prevent their being seduced by sin, Satan, or the world. Rev. xvi. 15. 1 Cor. xvi. 13. Luke xii. 37. To watch unto and in prayer, is carefully to keep our heart in a proper frame for prayer, eagerly to seize on every opportunity for it; and while praying, to guard against wandering thoughts; and after prayer, wait for and carefully observe the answer granted to it. Col. iv. 2. Eph. vi. 18.

Christ's enemies watched him, and the wicked watch the righteous, eagerly looking for any advantage against them, or opportunity to do them hurt. Luke xx. 20. Psal. xxxvii. 32. The end watched for the Jews, when their ruin was just ready to overtake them. Ezek. vii. 6. The angels are called watchers, to import their readiness to obey the will of God, and to inspect the nations, chiefly the church. Dan. iv. 16. The Chaldeans are called watchers; they waited for and seized their opportunity of destroying the nations; they proceeded with caution in their wars, and their sieges of cities were so orderly and determined that few could escape. Jer. iv. 16. A WATCH is, (1.) A guard of persons set to observe the motions of an enemy, or to keep order in a city, or to keep a trust. Jer. li. 12. Neh. iv. 9. Matt. xxviii. 11. And they who keep watch in a city, or camp, are called watchmen. 2 Kings ix. 18. Ministers, and perhaps also rulers in the state, are called watchmen; in the night of time, ministers do or ought to watch over the church and souls of men, discern spiritual dangers, and faithfully warn them of them; Magistrates are to perceive and take all proper methods to prevent them. Sol. Song iii. 3. and v. 7. Ezek. iii. 17. Isa. lii. 8. (2.) The place or station where the guard is kept, which is also called the watch-tower. Hab. ii. 1. (3.) Watchmen's discharge of their duty, doing what in them lies to espy and prevent danger or loss. 2 Kings xi. 6. Luke ii. 8. (4.) The time in which a particular set of persons keep watch at once, in a city or camp. It seems the night was once divided into the evening, the middle, and the morning watch, each containing four hours a-piece, Judg. vii. 19. Exod. xiv. 24; but afterwards the Greeks and Romans relieved their centinels every three hours, and made four watches of the night. Luke xii. 38. Mark vi. 48.

WATER, signifies not only that which is most properly so called, but almost every liquid; as tears, Jer. ix. 1; rain, Job xxii. 11; clouds, Psal. civ. 3; and every thing proper to be drunk. 1 Sam. xiv. 11. Isa. xxxiii. 16. Water is of a cleansing, refreshing, and healing nature, and is a common and free gift of God to men. Streams of water are sometimes noisy and destructive. Jesus Christ, his Spirit, and gospel-ordinances, are likened to waters, still waters, and streams, living water, or water of life. How abundant! how free! how fitted for, offered to, and bestowed on multitudes, are Jesus and his righteousness and salvation, the Holy Ghost and his influences, and the truths and promises of the everlasting gospel! and how effectually, when applied, they cleanse the consciences, hearts, and lives, of men! How they refresh our souls, and cure our spiritual maladies! How they spread, and irresistibly overpower whatever stands in their way! How they defend from danger, enrich, and render fruitful in good works! How still, deep, pleasant and abundant! and how they beget, restore, maintain, and perfect, spiritual life in our soul! how they now run into our desert gentile world! Sol. Song iv. 15. Rev. xxii. 17. Psal. xxiii. 2. Isa. xxxii. 21. and xxxv. 6. Ezek. xlvii. 1—11

Christ came by water and by blood; by holiness of nature, and obedient life, and bloody death; or with fulness of spiritual influences and bloody atonement for our justification and sanctification. 1 John v. 6. As the Jews had their markets for fish by the water-side, perhaps waters in Isa. lv. 1. may denote the ordinances of the gospel, as market-places for buying; i. e. considerably, but freely, receiving Jesus Christ and his fulness. The waters of divine truths and ordinances are made bitter when corrupted with error and superstition. Rev. viii. 11. Whatever tends to comfort, is called waters: the delight which people enjoy in the marriage state, is called waters, and running or fresh waters; more truly delightful than the pleasures of whoredom, which are stolen waters. Prov. v. 15. and ix. 17. Idols are represented as broken cisterns, that can hold no water, i. e. they can afford no true help or comfort. Jer. ii. 13. The state of captivity in Babylon, and a state of corrupt nature, is represented as a prison wherein there is no water; i. e. no true comfort. Zech. ix. 11. The abundant increase and glory of the gospel church, are likened to a flowing stream: in what multitudes, and in what pleasant and comely order, the gentiles, notwithstanding manifold opposition, came toward Jesus and his truth! Isa. lxvi. 12. Multitudes of men, as armies, and persecutors, are likened to waters. How numerous and noisy! How they spread abroad, and bear down and ruin whatever stands in their way! Rev. xvii. 15. Isa. viii. 7. and xvii. 12. Psal. xxiv. 5. Men are as water spilt on the ground; when once dead, they cannot, without a miracle, be restored to life. 2 Sam. xiv. 14. Wicked men are swift as the waters, and melt away as the waters; they are not to be depended on: and they shall quickly come to nought, be hurried into the ocean of divine wrath, and feel the fire of God's indignation. Job xxiv. 18. Psal. lviii. 7. Job's enemies came in as a wide breaking in of waters; in great numbers, and with mighty force, to harass and overwhelm, Job xxx. 14. Counsel in the heart of man is as deep waters; serious thoughts and purposes are pure and settled, and hard to come at. Prov. xx. 5. The words of a man's mouth are as deep waters, and the well-spring of wisdom as a flowing brook; good instructions are mysterious, and refreshing to men's souls. Prov. xviii. 4. Judgment runs down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream; when there is great uprightness and equity in judgment; equity, and holiness every where practised; and iniquity made ashamed to shew itself. Amos v. 25. The wrath of God, terrors, (i. e. fears and great troubles,) calamities, temptations, are likened to waters; in what a forcible and resistless manner they sometimes attack men! and how fearful, perplexing, and destructive! Isa. xxx. 26, 33. Job xxvii. 20. Psal. lxxix. 1. Sol. Song viii. 7. As waters and streams stop the way, impediments of access to the church, or to the land of Canaan, are called waters. Rev. xvi. 12. Isa. xi. 15. As waters or streams flow from fountains, men's children or posterity are called waters. Isa. xlviii. 1. Prov. v. 16.

WATER-SPRINGS, denote ground well moistened or fruitful, in Psal. cvii. 33.

WATER-COURSES; either the beds of rivers wherein they run, or the running streams. Isa. xlv. 4.

WATER-SPOUTS; falls of water from the clouds, in the manner that a river bursts over a precipice; or which are forced with a mighty noise from the sea, by an earthquake at the bottom. To these, heavy, overwhelming, and terrifying afflictions are compared. Psal. xlii. 7.—TO WATER, is, (1.) To moisten. Psal. vi. 6. Gen. ii. 6. (2.) To comfort, refresh, and render fruitful; thus God waters his church every moment with new influences of his love and Spirit, Isa. xxvii. 3; and ministers water the church, by the frequent preaching of divine truths to them, as gardeners do their beds in the time of drought. 1 Cor. iii. 6—8.

WAVE, to shake to and fro. Some will have the wave-offerings to have been waved towards the four quarters of the earth; but others think they were only turned from the one hand to the other. Lev. viii. 27. See BILLOW.

WAVER; as an unsettled wave of the sea; unfixed in faith, profession, or practice; particularly tossed between doubts and faith respecting the power and will of God, as to what we request in prayer. Heb. x. 23. Jam. i. 16.

WAX; a well-known substance with which bees form their combs. It is excellent for candles, and is easily melted; it is also much used for sealing of letters. Psal. xvii. 5. Christ's heart was melted as wax; astonishing were his inward trouble and perplexity, when lying amid the flames of his Father's wrath for our sakes. Psal. xxii. 14. The wicked melt as wax, when terrible calamities from an angry God annoy, torment, and ruin them. Psal. lxxviii. 2. Mic. i. 4.

WAY; PATH; (1.) A road to walk in. 1 Kings xviii. 6. (2.) A mode of formation or of agency. How the Spirit acts in forming us, or how the soul is united to the body, is above human comprehension. John iii. 8. Eccl. xi. 5. God's paths or ways, are his works of creation, Job xl. 19; the dispensations of his providence, in which he walks towards his creatures, Psal. xxv. 10. Isa. lv. 8, 9; the clouds, which distil his rain, Psal. lxxv. 11: his truths and precepts, in which he requires men to walk. Psal. lxxvii. 5. Christ is the way; and he, and the method of salvation, are a new and living way. He is the cause and pattern of our approach to God; and in the way of union to him, and fellowship with him, we are justified, sanctified, and prepared for heaven. This way succeeds the old-covenant way of happiness by our own works; and it is ever the same; and through it we pass from a state of sin and misery into a state of endless felicity. John xiv. 6. Heb. x. 20. The laws and doctrines of God are the way of truth, altogether true in themselves, and with an honest and true heart and practice must we walk in them; and so shall arrive at true and everlasting happiness. 2 Pet. ii. 2. Men's paths and ways, are their practice or business; good or bad, or their circumstances in life through which they pass. Prov. ii. 20. Isa. ix. 7. Lam. iii. 9. The way of the Lord is strength to the upright. Jesus affords him spiritual strength; divine providences and ordinances do him good; and his pious course tends to strengthen and comfort his soul. Prov. x. 20. The paths of the righteous are paths of judgment, of uprightness, and of life; his religious course is judiciously chosen; he is candid and upright in following it; in his present walk, he has life spiritual here, and shall attain life eternal hereafter. Isa. xl. 14. Prov. ii. 13, and v. 6. God makes a straight way or path, when he removes every thing tending to the hindrance of his glory and gospel, Isa. xlii. 16, and xl. 3, 4; and of his people's happiness. Jer. xxxi. 9. Christ's paths are made straight, when things are prepared for the public appearances on earth. Matt. iii. 3. Men make straight paths for their feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way, when they take care of adding to, or taking from the rules of God's word, and study to walk exactly according to it, lest some should stumble at religion on their account. Heb. xii. 15. Men do not find their paths, when they cannot get their purposes fulfilled. Hos. ii. 6. To go in the way of one, is to follow his example. Jude 11. The Jews went in the way of Assyria and Egypt, when they courted their alliances, and depended on them for support. Jer. ii. 18. The house of harlots is the way to hell, as most of those that associate with such, inherit everlasting damnation. Prov. vii. 27. Those in the high-ways and hedges invited to Christ, may be the gentiles, or the worst or meanest of men. Luke xiv. 13.

WAYFARING-MEN; passengers. See TRAVEL.

WAY-MARKS, are posts set up by the way-side, or at cross-ways, to direct passengers. To encourage the Jews in the hope of a return from Babylon, they are commanded to set up way-marks as they went to it, to direct their children how to find the way back. Jer. xxxi. 21.

WEAK; FEEBLE; (1.) Of little strength of body or soul. Matt. xxvi. 41. 1 Thess. v. 14. One weak in the faith, is one who has little knowledge, and a feeble faith of the doctrines of the gospel. Rom. xiv. 1. Conscience is weak, when it is ignorant, and unnecessarily scrupulous. 1 Cor. viii. 7. Men are said to have weak hands, and feeble knees, when they have small courage and vigour. Isa. xxxv. 3: and men are weak-handed, when they have neither counsel, courage, nor strength to withstand an enemy. 2 Sam. xviii. 2. One is made weak by offences; is confounded in judgment, and vexed, dispirited, and discouraged. Rom. xiv. 21. To the weak, Paul became as weak; he sympathized with, and condescended to their weakness. 1 Cor. ix. 22. (2.) Of no strength at all: thus death is called a weakness. 1 Cor. xv. 43. The law, as a covenant, is weak; through sin, it is wholly incapable to justify us, though strong enough to condemn us. Rom. viii. 3. Men's heart is weak, has no power at all to resist sin. Ezek. xvi. 10. (3.) Subject to trouble and death; and so Christ was crucified through weakness. 2 Cor. xiii. 4. (4.) Actually under reproach, distress, persecution, temptation. Psal. vi. 2, and xxxviii. 8. Thus the saints are weak in Christ, when persecuted and distressed for his sake. 2 Cor. xiii. 4, 9. When I am weak, then am I strong: when I am in the deepest distress, and most sensible of my own weakness, I feel the strength of Christ most eminently exerted to support, actuate, and encourage me. 2 Cor. xii. 10.

WEAKNESS, INFIRMITY, (1.) Disease or weakness of the body. Lev. xii. 2. 1 Tim. v. 23. (2.) Outward afflictions, reproaches, persecutions, and temptations. Heb. v. 2. 2 Cor. xii. 5, 10. (3.) Spiritual weakness, and defects in grace. Rom. vi. 19. Failings and mistakes committed through surprise, and want of spiritual courage and strength. Rom. xv. 1. The weakness of God is stronger than men; the contemned method of salvation through the death of Christ, is more effectual to render men holy and happy, than all the supposedly wise schemes of men. 1 Cor. i. 25. The weakness and infirmity of Christ, were his frail human nature, and the various reproaches, temptations, and troubles, he was compassed with. 2 Cor. xiii. 4. Heb. v. 2. The weakness of the ceremonial law, which occasioned its abolition, was its insufficiency to justify, sanctify, or save men. Heb. vii. 18. Christ took our infirmities upon him, and bare our sickness: he bare the punishment of our iniquity; he tenderly sympathizes with his people, and testified his affection, by curing the distressed. Matt. viii. 17. Heb. iv. 15. The Holy Ghost helps our infirmities; he gradually heals our spiritual diseases; and notwithstanding them, enables us to worship and serve God. Rom. viii. 26. We ought to bear with the infirmities of the weak, exercising patience and love towards the weak, notwithstanding their infirmities, and by kindly endeavouring to strengthen them. Rom. xv. 1. The saints glory and take pleasure in infirmities and troubles, not in themselves, but as they are the means of glorifying God, and the occasions of his communicating strength to them. 2 Cor. xii. 5, 10.

WEALTH. See RICHES.

WEAN. It seems the Jewish children had three weanings; one from the breasts, when they were about three years of age, or sooner in most cases; the second from their dry nurse, at seven years of age; and the third from their childish manners, at twelve. The saints are likened to wearied children, to denote their humility, docility, keeping within the bounds of their own station, and quiet contentment with the will of God, Psal. cxxxi. 2; or to denote their weakness and inability to help and defend themselves. Isa. xi. 8.

WEAPONS. See ARMS.

WEAR. To wear out the saints, is gradually to destroy. Dan. vii. 25.

WEARY; (1.) Fatigued in body. 2 Sam. xvii. 2. (2.) Desirous to be rid of a thing, as if it were a burden. Gen. xxvii. 46. (3.) Slack, careless. Gal. vi. 7. (4.) Sore afflicted, having great need of rest. Isa. xviii. 12. God is wearied with men's iniquities, and made to serve with their sins, when he has been long provoked with grievous transgressions, even turning his kindness and grace into licentiousness, then his judgments may be expected to be quickly executed. Isa. i. 14. vii. 13. and xliii. 24. Men are wearied and heavy laden, when they have fatigued themselves in carnal and wicked courses, or can find no rest in them; but are laden with the guilt and power of sin, or with a sense of it, and with fears and cares about happiness. Matt. xi. 28. David was wearied of his crying, when he had continued in prayer, till he could scarcely pray any more. Psal. lxi. 3. Jeremiah was wearied with holding in and forbearing; he could get no ease, but in a way of faithfully declaring the threatenings of God against the wicked Jews. Jer. vi. 11. and xx. 9. Men wearied themselves for very vanity, when they take great labour and toil to no good purpose. Thus the Chaldeans fatigued themselves, endeavouring to quench the fire of their city. Hab. ii. 13.

WEASELS are of two kinds, the house-weasel, and the field-weasel, or founart; they are very subtle, and though of small size, are remarkably strong. They destroy serpents, moles, rats, mice, and poultry; they will pursue hares till they have wearied them, and then they kill them: they bite worse than a dog, when they are provoked. It is said, the females carry their young ones daily from one place to another, that none may catch them. They were unclean by the ceremonial law. Lev. xi. 29.

WEATHER; the temperature of the air. Prov. xxv. 20. Fair weather cometh out of the north; with God is terrible majesty: might be rendered, the gold-like glancing lightnings come out of the north: on God is a robe of terrible majesty. Job xxxvii. 22.

WEAVERS; such as manufacture WEBS of cloth, of which the threads that run from end to end are called the WARP, and the threads that run from side to side are the WOOF. From the account we have of our Saviour's seamless coat, it appears they then understood the art of knitting cloth after the manner of our stockings; perhaps, they had looms for working garments without any seam. Hezekiah compares God's cutting off his life to the weaver's cutting his web out of the loom when it is finished. Isa. xxxviii. 12.

WEDDING; the celebration of MARRIAGE. Luke xiv. 8. Matt. xxii. 3.

WEDLOCK, the tie of marriage; to break it, is to commit adultery. Ezek. xvi. 38.

WEEDS, that grow among corn, or herbs. The weeds were wrapt about Jonah's head: he was in the deeps, where the sea-weeds grow; or, weeds swallowed by the fish might be wrapt about his head. Jon. ii. 5.

WEEK. A natural week is the space of seven days; such a week of nuptial feasting for Leah's marriage, Jacob finished, before he obtained Rachel. Gen. xxix. 27. A prophetic week is the space of seven years, a day for a year. Nor was this method of calculation difficult to the Jews, who kept their seventh year as a Sabbath, as well as the seventh day; and who, at the end of seven prophetic weeks, had their Sabbatical jubilee. That the seventy weeks mentioned by Daniel, denote weeks of years, is agreed by every sensible commentator, but not the time when these seventy weeks, or 490 years began.—It is plain, they began from an edict or warrant to build the city of Jerusalem, and not from an edict to rebuild the temple: they could not therefore begin at the edict of Cyrus, or Darius, for rebuilding the temple; but at the edict of Artaxerxes Longimanus for repairing the city, either in the seventh year of his reign, when he gave Ezra his commission for that effect, (Ezra vii. and viii.) or in the twentieth year of it, when he gave Nehemiah his. Neh. ii. The edict in the seventh year of his reign was most favourable, and was ratified by the counsellors, as well as by the king, and appears to have been just 490 years before our Saviour's death, by which he finished transgression, and made an end of sin, by his complete atonement. Of these, seven weeks, or forty-nine years, were spent in rebuilding the city and its walls, with great trouble; and these ended about the death of Nehemiah. Sixty-two more weeks, or 434 years elapsed, before the public ministry of John or Christ began; and after confirming the covenant with many Jesus, in the last half of the seventieth week, that is, at the end of it, made the sacrifice and oblation to cease in point of obligation. If, with Mercator and Petavius, we allow Artaxerxes to have reigned with his father ten years, and so the twentieth to be but the tenth after the death of his father Xerxes; then 483 years will elapse between that and the commencement of our Saviour's public ministry, and in the midst of the seventieth week, or about three years and a half after, the sacrifices were abolished by his death. If we date the commencement of these weeks from the twentieth of Artaxerxes after the death of his father, the death of our Saviour happened 478 years after, in the middle of the sixtieth week; and we must leave the seventieth for the events connected with the destruction of the Jewish nation, between A.D. 65 and 72, in which, after making covenants or leagues with a variety of the eastern princes, Vespasian and his son Titus, entirely overturned the Jewish church and state. But after all, it must be allowed, that the chronology of that period is not so absolutely fixed and clear as to justify any warm dispute about a few years; it being of no great moment, whether these 490 years be reckoned from the seventh or twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. Dan. ix. 24-26.

WEEP. See MOURN.

WEIGH; to examine the heaviness of things. A cubic foot of common water, which is nearly thirty-four quarts, weighs 1000 avoirdupoise ounces; a cubic foot of pure gold, 19,637 ounces; one of standard gold, 17,798; of quicksilver, 14,000; of lead, 11,325; of standard silver, 10,589; of copper, 9000; of plate-brass, 8000; of steel, 7852; of iron, 7645; of block-tin, 7321; of proof spirits, 928; of pure spirits, 860. All stones are, in different degrees, heavier than water: wood is generally lighter, and therefore swims. A cubic foot of common air weighs 907 grains, or one ounce, twenty-seven grains.

God's weighing the mountains, imports his exact knowledge of, and power over them. Isa. xl. 12. He weighs men, their spirits and paths, when he exactly observes and judges them, that he may punish or reward them in a proper manner. Dan. v. 27. Prov. xvi. 2. Isa. xxvi. 7. 1 Sam. ii. 8. He sets a weight for the winds, when he determines them to blow precisely with such force, from such quarters, and during such time as he pleases: or when he checks them with the pressure of a thick cloud pregnant with rain. Job xxviii. 25.

WEIGHT, whatever is heavy, and weighs much. So carnal affections and sins, lying on the conscience, and prevalent in the heart, or temptations to commit them, are a weight that oppress the saints' spirits, and disqualify them for running the Christian race. Heb. xii. 1. Eternal glory is called a weight, because of its unspeakable abundance and degree; nor could one in the body subside under its delightful pressure. 2 Cor. iv. 17. Whatever is of great force or importance is called weighty. 2 Cor. x. 10. Matt. xxiii. 23.

WEIGHTS, are standards for weighing commodities in merchandise. As neither the Jews, nor any other nation in the early ages, had coined money, they weighed it in their traffic. The shekel, the maneh, and the talent, were all originally names of weight. There is no reason to suppose the Jews had two kinds of weights, one sacred and the other common, the latter only the half of the former. The weights are denominated from the sanctuary, as, a shekel of the sanctuary, because the exact standards of weight and measure were kept in the sanctuary: even as the English term exact measure, Westminster, or Winchester measure. Divers weights and measures, forbidden by the divine law, are unjust ones; a larger to receive things with, and a lesser to retail them out. Deut. xxv. 13. Prov. xx. 10.

The Roman ounce is the English avoirdupoise ounce, which they divided into seven Denarii, as well as eight Drachms; and since they reckoned their Denarii equal to the Attic Drachm, this will make the Attic weights ½ heavier than the correspondent Roman weights.

Note, The Grecians divided their Obolus into Chalci and Lepta. Some, as Diodorus and Suidas, divided the Obolus into six Chalci, and every Chalkus into seven Lepta or Mites: others divided the Obolus into eight Chalci, and every Chalkus into eight Lepta or Minuta.

WELL. See FOUNTAIN.

WELL; (1.) Rightly, according to rule. Gen. iv. 7. (2.) Happily, Deut. xv. 16; thus happiness, or prosperity, is called welfare. Exod. xviii. 7. (3.) Fully, Acts xxv. 10: so Christ is called well beloved, because his Father and his people esteem, desire, and delight in him, above all things. Mark xii. 6. Isa. v. 1. Sol. Song i. 13. Well-pleasing, what is very acceptable and pleasant. Phil. iv. 18. God is well-pleased in Christ, and for his righteousness' sake: He has infinite delight in his person, office, and full atonement for us; he is reconciled to us in him, and for the sake of what he has done as our surety. Matt. iii. 17. and xvii. 5. Isa. xlii. 21.

WEN; a wart, a hard tumour within the skin. It unfitted an animal for sacrifice. Lev. xxii. 22.

WENCH; a young girl. 2 Sam. xvii. 17.

WHALE. See LEVIATHAN.

WHEAT; a grain well known for its durability, and delightful and nourishing substance. The Jews began their wheat harvest about Whitsunday: and their writers say, that their best wheat grew in Michmash, Mezonicah, and Ephraim; but it seems that of Minnith and Pannag was equally good. Ezek. xxvii. 17. In this country wheat is generally sown at the end of harvest, and is ten or eleven months in the field. Jesus Christ is compared to a corn of wheat; how substantial and durable, able to endure winters of trouble; and how precious, nourishing, and pleasant the fruits of righteousness and blessings which he brings forth to men, in consequence of his death and resurrection. John xii. 24. The saints are compared to wheat, to intimate their solidity, usefulness, and good fruits, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. Matt. iii. 12. The word of God is likened to wheat: how sweet, substantial, and nourishing is the fulness of Jesus included therein, and communicated to our souls. Jer. xxiii. 28. To be fed with the finest of the wheat, is to possess great happiness and comfort. Psal. lxxxi. 16. The Jews sowed wheat, and reaped thorns, when their apparently well-planned schemes of alliance with Egypt, and the nations around them, in the issue increased their vexation and misery. Jer. xii. 13.

WHEEL; (1.) A round instrument for chariots, wagons, &c. to roll upon. It ordinarily consists of felloes, forming the circumference or ring; a nave in the middle, in which the axle-tree runs; and spokes that reach between the nave and felloes. Exod. xiv. 25. (2.) A kind of punishment inflicted on offenders: or one kind put for all. Prov. xxviii. 26. (3.) The great artery, which, being joined to the left ventricle of the heart, sets the blood in motion, and keeps it in perpetual circulation. Eccl. xii. 6. The wheels in Ezekiel's vision, very high, with dreadful rings, formed as a wheel within a wheel, and actuated by the spirit of the living creatures: may either denote the awful and mysterious providence of God, executed by the ministration of angels; or the various churches of Christ, mysteriously united in one, and actuated by the same spirit as gospel ministers. Ezek. i. 10. God makes men like a wheel, when he suddenly turns their high honour, power, and prosperity, into debasement, distress, and ruin. Psal. lxxxiii. 13.

WHELP; the young of lions, bears, dogs, &c. Josiah's sons, and the courtiers or subjects of the Assyrians are so called, to denote their readiness to spoil and oppress their people. Ezek. xix. 2—5. Nah. ii. 12.

WHENCE; (1.) From what place. Gen. xvi. 8. (2.) From what cause, or by what means. Matt. xiii. 54. John i. 48.

WHERE; (1.) In what place. Exod. xx. 24. (2.) In what condition. Zech. i. 5. Where is God? where, or by what is his presence and power manifested? Psal. lxxix. 10; or, how shall I obtain relief from him? Jer. ii. 9. Job xxxv. 10.

WHET, to make sharp. God whets his sword, when he prepares events in his providence, for the execution of his judgments. Deut. xxiv. 41. Psal. vii. 12. Men whet God's laws upon their children, when they diligently teach them the knowledge of them. Deut. vi. 7. Men whet their tongues, when they actively employ them in slander and reproach. Psal. lxiv. 3.

WHIP; (1.) A lash to drive horses or other cattle. Prov. xxvi. 3. (2.) A punishment for lazy and disobedient subjects. 1 Kings xii. 11.

WHIRLWIND. See WIND.

WHISPER; (1.) To speak very softly, so as scarcely to be heard. 2 Sam. xii. 19. (2.) To hear tales; to backbite. Prov. xvi. 28. (3.) To plot secretly. Psal. xli. 7. The Jews whispered out of the dust, when they were so famished as to be scarcely able to speak; or when ready to yield to whatever terms the Assyrians pleased. Isa. xlix. 4.

WHITE, being the purest and most shining colour, is often used to represent what is pure and glorious. God having hair white as wool, and white garments, and riding on a white cloud, denotes his eternity, wisdom, holiness, and the equity of his providential conduct. Dan. vii. 9. Isa. xix. 1. Rev. xiv. 14. Christ is white; he is pure in his Godhead, holy, highly exalted, and abounding in love; and he is ruddy, and red in his apparel; he appeared in our nature, and suffered in it; and in the execution of his wrath, conquers and destroys his enemies. Sol. Song v. 10. Isa. lxiii. 1, 2. His hair white as wool, denotes his eternity, and wisdom. Rev. i. 14. The whiteness of his throne, imports the holiness, equity, and glory of his procedure in the last judgment. Rev. xx. 11. The white horses of Christ and his people, are the pure truths of the gospel, by means of which they obtain spiritual victories. Rev. vi. 2. and xix. 11. Saints are made white, when freed from guilt and pollution. Psal. li. 7; their white raiment is the righteousness of Christ imputed to them, and their sanctification; the state of heavenly glory, in which they are peaceable, noble, and triumphant kings and priests unto God. Rev. iii. 4, 5. iv. 4. xv. 16. and vii. 14. The Nazarites were whiter than milk, when they kept their vows, and looked fresh and comely. Lam. iv. 7. The fields were white to harvest, or ripe, when multitudes seemed fond of hearing the gospel, by the power of which men are cut off from their natural state, gathered to Jesus, and bound up in the bundle of life with him. John iv. 38.

WHOLE; (1.) Full, complete. Exod. xxix. 18. (2.) Not broken. Jer. xix. 11. (3.) Sound, healthy, prosperous. Josh. v. 8. Job v. 18.

WHOLLY; (1.) Altogether, completely. Lev. vi. 22. and xix. 9. (2.) Sincerely, uprightly. Josh. xiv. 8—14. (3.) In a great part or degree. Isa. xxii. 1. Job xxi. 23.

WHOLESOME, whatever proves or promotes health. A wholesome tongue, is one that speaks much to the edification of others. Prov. xv. 4. Wholesome words, are the sound truths of the gospel, which promote the health and cure of men's souls. 1 Tim. vi. 3.

WHORE, or HARLOT; (1.) One that for wantonness or gain, yields her body to unchastity. WHOREMONGER, one that holds impure converse with a harlot. Anciently the women who kept inns, were generally called HARLOTS; so hostess and harlot were of the same import. Whores soon become void of modesty and shame, and even decoy men to their lewd embraces. Jer. iii. 3. Prov. v. and vii.

WHOREDOM, UNCLEANNESS, or FORNICATION, comprehends all kinds of unchastity, whether between persons unmarried; or adultery, where one or both is married; or incest, where they are too near of kin one to another. Gen. xxxviii. 21. Gal. v. 19. 1 Cor. vi. 13. and v. 1. This sin, however lightly regarded by multitudes, is of a horrible nature: it disgraces and destroys the body. 1 Cor. vi. 18. Job xxxi. 12. Prov. v. 11. It brings an indelible stain on the character. Prov. vi. 33. It infatuates and stupifies the conscience, and so hardens the heart, that persons guilty of it rarely obtain grace to repent. Hos. vi. 11. Eccl. vii. 26. Rev. xxi. 11. Hos. xiv. 14. It is a beastly vice, and the guilty are called dogs, abominable, &c. It is called villany and abomination. 2 Sam. iii. 8. Jer. v. 8. and xxix. 23. Rev. xxi. 8. It is an inlet to all manner of impiety and wickedness. Prov. v. 12—14. It exposes persons to the vengeance of God in this life, brings the curse of God on families and nations, and consigns men to eternal fire. Prov. vii. 20, 27. and ix. 18. and ii. 19. Hos. iv. 1—3. Jer. v. 7, 9. Eph. v. 3—5. Rom. i. 24—29. Rev. xxi. 8. To avoid falling into this abominable sin, a man must be united to Jesus Christ, and be directed by his word and Spirit, 1 Cor. vi. 10, 11; live under the deep impression of God's holiness, omniscience, and of the future judgment, Gen. xxxix. 9. Heb. xiii. 4; shun light and lewd companions, and all immodest apparel, Prov. v. 8, 9; be diligent in lawful business, 2 Sam. xi. 2. Gen. xxxiv. 1; and marry, if needful and proper, and cultivate a Christian affection in the married state. 1 Cor. vii. 2, 9. Prov. v. 19, 20. (2.) Such as, contrary to covenant and profession, apostatize from the true worship and service of God. The Jews are represented as whores, harlots, and adulteresses, because, in apostacy from God, they prostituted themselves to a dependence on the Assyrians, Egyptians, Chaldeans, and others, instead of God, and copied after their idolatries. Jer. iii. Ezek. xvi. and xxiii. The Papal hierarchy is called the great whore, and mother of harlots, and abominations, because of its noted apostasy and idolatry, and decoying others into it: and such apostasy, is called fornication, whoredom, or adultery. Rev. xvii. and xix. 2. Tyre sang as a harlot, when by fair speeches, the Tyrians enticed the nations to renew their trade with them. Isa. xxiii. 15.

WHORISH. (1.) Given to fornication or adultery. Prov. vi. 26. (2.) Given to idolatry and apostasy from God. Ezek. vi. 9.

WICKED, WICKEDNESS. See SIN.

WIDE. The gate and way that leads to destruction is wide: there are innumerable forms of sinning, by which men may eternally ruin themselves. Matt. vii. 13. To open the hand wide; is to be very liberal. Deut. xv. 8. To open the mouth wide, imports either the most earnest attention to, expectation of, and desire after any thing, Job xxix. 23. Psal. lxxxix. 10; or the most outrageous mockery and reproach. Psal. xxxv. 21.

WIDOW, a woman whose husband is dead. More than two hundred years before the giving of the law, widows, whose husbands had left them childless, married their deceased husband's younger unmarried brother, to obtain seed for the deceased one: So Tamar married the two elder sons of Judah, and had the third promised to her. Gen. xxxviii. Under the Mosaic law, this was expressly enjoined, Deut. xxv. 5, 6; or the nearest kinsman might do it. Ruth iv. As children were esteemed a great honour, especially in a nation whence the Messiah was expected, widowhood, in such as were not past the age of childbearing, as well as barrenness, was reckoned a great shame and reproach. Isa. iv. 1. and liv. 4. It was presumed any young woman of character would find a husband, either in the family of her deceased husband, or some other. The widows of kings, however, continued in their widowhood, and were the property, though not always wives of the successor: and to ask any of them in marriage, was considered as indirectly claiming the kingdom. 1 Kings ii. 13, 14. As widows are too often overlooked by men, God has claimed a peculiar concern with them as their husband, supporter, and judge. Psal. lxxviii. 5. and cxlvi. 9. He charged the Hebrews to take peculiar care of them, and of fatherless children, Deut. xiv. 29. and has threatened terrible punishments against such as oppress and injure them. Psal. xciv. 6. Mal. iii. 5. Under the gospel, the church is to provide for these that are widows indeed; i. e. widows of a good character, humble, and liberal when able, and now grown old and truly destitute; but younger widows are advised to marry. 1 Tim. v. 3—10. To shew kindness to widows, is a branch of the true religion. Job xxix. 13. Jam. i. 27. To mark their desolation, and depravation of all joy, honour, and comfort, Jerusalem and Babylon are likened to widows, Lam. i. 1. Isa. xlviii. 8; and often the leaving wives widows, imports the being cut off by the sword, or by some untimely death. Lam. v. 3. Ezek.

xxii. 25. Widowhood and loss of children came upon Babylon in one day; suddenly she lost Belshazzar, and her rulers, and dignity; and had vast numbers of her inhabitants slain by Cyrus. Under Darius Hystaspes, her inhabitants slew their wivs and children, and almost all that were not able to bear arms, that the provision of their besieged city might not be wasted by useless mouths. Isa. xlviii. 9.

WIFE. See MARRIAGE, ADULTERY.

WILD; (1.) Untamed, fierce. Job xxxix. 15. (2.) Uncultivated. Thus vines, gourds, grapes, and olives, are represented as wild. 2 Kings iv. 25, 29. Isa. x. 2. Rom. xi. 17. Wild honey, is honey found in fields, rocks, or woods. Matt. iii. 4. Ishmael was a wild, or wild free man: he and his seed have generally been a savage people, robbers of all around them, but never subject to any. Gen. xvi. 12.

WILDERNESS. See DESERT.

WILES; crafty tricks; enticing temptations. Numb. xxv. 18. Eph. vi. 11.

WILL; (1.) That power of the soul by which man freely chooses or refuses objects. It however cannot choose anything spiritually good, till it be renewed by the Spirit of Christ. Rom. viii. 7, 8. The will of the flesh, is the inclinations and lusts of an unrenewed heart. Eph. ii. 3. (2.) The thing chosen by the will: thus the will of enemies, is the mischief they desire or devise. Psal. xxvii. 12. God's will denotes, (1.) His natural power to choose or reject. Rom. ix. 14. (2.) His purpose and decree, which is his rule in all his works. Eph. i. 11. (3.) His word, his laws, and gospel-declarations, by which he intimates what he is willing to give us; or, that we should do in obedience to him. Rom. xii. 2. Matt. vii. 21. (4.) His kindness and favour manifested in acts of grace. Deut. xxxiii. 16. Luke ii. 14. Our sanctification is the will of God; it is purposed, promised, and commanded by him. 1 Thess. iv. 3. God will have all men saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth; he purposes to have men of all sorts saved. The seeking after spiritual knowledge and salvation by all men, is agreeable to his command. 1 Tim. ii. 4. Christ had a twofold will; one divine, the same with that of his Father; and the other human, of which he says to his Father, Not my will, but thine be done. Matt. xxvi. 39.

WILL; (1.) To choose, desire. Phil. ii. 13. (2.) Boldly to ask. John xvii. 24. (3.) To command with authority. John xxi. 23. (4.) To permit. Jam. iv. 15. Election of men to salvation, is not of him that will-eth, nor of him that runneth; it is not obtained by their eager inclinations, or most earnest endeavours with respect to what is good, but flows from the mere sovereign grace and mercy of God. Rom. ix. 16.

WILFULLY, of set purpose and malice; contrary to light and conviction. Heb. x. 26. See SUPERSTITION.

WILLING, desirous, cheerful, ready, from choice and inclination. 1 Thess. ii. 8. Matt. xxvi. 41.

WILLOWS, well-known trees, which grow rapidly in moist places. If but an old willow stump not quite rotten, do but lie on the ground, it will sprout forth. It seems willows were very plentiful on the banks of the Euphrates, and on them the captive Hebrews hung their harps, as useless to them in their distressed and mournful condition. Psal. cxxxvii. 2. Isa. xv. 7. The Jews used branches of willows in erecting their tents at the feast of tabernacles. Lev. xxiii. 40. The saints are likened to willows by the water courses: being planted in a new-covenant state, and watered by God every moment, how quick is their spiritual growth, and how fresh they continue amid winters of trouble! Isa. xlv. 4.

WIMPLES, Isa. iii. 22. This same word is translated veil. Ruth iii. 15. In both places, MITPACHATH signifies a covering sheet, a plaid, or apron. In the Dutch language, WIMPLE signifies the large plaited linen cloth with which nuns covered their necks and breasts; as well as the streamers or flag of a ship, and sometimes the sail.

WIN; (1.) To get possession of. 2 Chron. xxxi. 1. To win Christ, is to get possession of him as an eternal portion and comfort. Phil. iii. 8. (2.) To recover. Men win souls, when they are instrumental in gaining them to Christ, that they may receive salvation through him. Prov. xi. 30.

WIND; the motion of the air, by means of which a large quantity flows from one place to another. The trade-winds are either such as blow constantly from east to west, or which blow three or six months at once from one quarter, and as long from the opposite. Where the air, by the heat of the sun, or otherwise, is most rarified, thither the denser part of the distant air bends its course; and so a very rarified air bodes a storm. The trade-winds which are met with on the vast ocean, chiefly on the Pacific, blow not directly from east to west, or from west to east, but incline towards the equator, where the air is most rarified. This rarefaction of the air under the equator, is probably the reason why so much rain happens in the torrid zone in the summer season. Winds blow almost constantly from off the sea, in places very hot. Winds from the sea are warmest in winter, and coldest in summer; and land-winds are coldest in winter, and hottest in summer. Winds blowing over hills covered with snow, or over cold countries, are thereby rendered colder. In different countries, the wind is often in different, or even opposite quarters at the same time; and the north and south wind are wet or dry. Prov. xxv. 23. A whirlwind, is a strong blast, which winds about in a somewhat circular manner. Multitudes of such blasts come from the deserts of Arabia; and out of one of them the Lord spake to Job. Isa. xxi. 1. Job xxxvii. 9. and xxxviii. 1. Whirlwinds sometimes sweep down trees, houses, and every thing in their way.

The Holy Ghost is likened to wind or winds. How incomprehensible his nature! and how self-moved, powerful, convincing, quickening, comforting, and purifying, are his influences! May not the north wind figure out his convincing, and the south wind his cherishing and comforting efficacy? John iii. 8. Sol. Song iv. 16. Ezek. xxxvii. The destructive or afflictive judgments of God are like wind, the east wind, or whirlwind. How unsearchable in their nature and number! how violently they bear down men before them, and blow them and their property to ruin! or are the Assyrians, who, from the east came and almost ruined the whole nation of the Jews, and bound them up in their wings, to carry them captive to a foreign land, this east wind? Isa. xxvii. 8. Hos. iv. 9. Jer. xxxiii. 19. and xxv. 32. and xxx. 23.

The Chaldeans are called a dry wind, and a full wind from the wilderness, not to fan or cleanse; or a whirlwind; from the side of the Arabian desert they came, and furiously marching against the Jews, they wasted their country, and destroyed their lives and wealth. Jer. xiii. 24. and iv. 12. The Turks are like to a whirlwind; how furious and destructive were their inroads! Dan. xi. 40. Temptations of any kind are called wind; they tend to toss men from one principle and practice to another, and put them to the trial whether they be rooted and grounded in Christ and his truth, or not. Matt. vii. 27.

God's lifting up Job to the wind, imports his exposure of him to terrible troubles and temptations, in order to try the truth and strength of his grace, and to purge away his corruption: men lift up thrashed corn to the wind, to separate the chaff from it, Job xxx. 22; and Satan is said to lift men. Luke xxiv. 31. Men's sins are called wind; how they unsettle men, and toss them from goodness or happiness. Isa. xlv. 6. Any thing unprofitable and substantial, is called wind. The Hebrews in the desert, and proud men in any age, are likened to wind; how unsubstantial! and how quickly driven away, and passed out of life! Psal. lxxviii. 39. Prov. xxv. 14. Men's life is likened to wind; it depends on breath, and how vain and unsettled, and how quickly passed away! Job vii. 7. False prophets become wind, when their predictions are falsified, and themselves condemned. Jer. v. 13. Words are wind, or strong wind; when destitute of sense, noisy, or passionate. Job vi. 26. and viii. 2. False doctrines are called wind; how unsettled, inconsistent, and noisy! how they carry off light and unsettled persons! but make little or no impression on such as are well rooted and grounded in the truth. Eph. iv. 14. Molten images are called wind and confusion; instead of doing men service, they contribute to their disgrace, shame, and perplexity. Isa. xli. 23. To see the wind and reap the whirlwind, is to contrive unprofitable schemes, that issue in the ruin of the contrivers. Hos. vii. 7. To inherit wind, is to possess what is unsubstantial and hurtful. Prov. xi. 29. The Israelites fed on wind, and followed after east-wind: their dependence on the Syrians, Assyrians, or Egyptians did them no real service, but much hurt, blasting and ruining their country, and so increased their lies and falsehood, and hastened the desolation of their country. Hos. xii. 1.

WIND; (1.) To go round about. Ezek. xli. 7. (2.) To warp; roll up. John xix. 40.

WINDOW; a well-k own passage for the light to enter, and illuminate houses. LATTICES, or CASEMENTS, were the windows, or the net-work of wire in them, before the invention of glass. Judg. v. 28. 2 Kings i. 2. The ordinances of God are called windows and lattices; by means of them, his church is enlightened in this world, and Christ and his people meet together, and see one another. Sol. Song ii. 9. Isa. lx. 8. and liv. 12. The narrow windows of the temple represented these ordinances, giving but small degrees of light in the ceremonial, and even in the militant state; and their being one over against another, may denote that divine ordinances, if duly used, do mutually reflect light upon one another. 1 Kings vi. 4. and vii. 4. The eyes are called windows, because by them we receive the light. Eccl. xii. 3. The clouds, especially when they plentifully pour forth their rain, are called the windows of heaven: but ARUBOTH may signify cataracts or spouts. Gen. vii. 11. and viii. 2. In allusion to these, the windows of heaven are said to be opened, when God bestows his blessings upon men in a plentiful degree, Mal. iii. 10; or when he pours forth terrible and overwhelming judgments upon them. Isa. xxiv. 18.

WINE. See VINE.

WINGS; those feathery limbs of fowls, with which they fly through the air. Job xxxix. 18. The Hebrews gave the name of a wing to any thing that resembled it; as, (1.) The skirt of a garment. Ruth iii. 9. Jer. li. 34. (2.) The outside or end of a country. Job xxxviii. 18. Isa. xxiv. 16. (3.) The battlement of a house; hence, perhaps, the part of the temple our Saviour stood upon, is called a pinnacle or wing. Matt. iv. 5. (4.) The spreading and warming rays of the sun. Mal. iv. 2. (5.) The sails of ships, or the shadows of high mountains. Isa. xlviii. 1. (6.) An army spread out like wings, Isa. viii. 8; and so the wing of abomination, may denote the Roman armies who rendered Judea a desolation. Dan. ix. 27. (7.) The motions of the wind. Psal. xviii. 10. As the wings and feathers of birds are instrumental of their flight, and of hiding, protecting, and cherishing their young, wings and feathers, when ascribed to God or Christ, import his speed to deliver his people, and the full, comfortable, and strong protection and influence they receive from his righteousness, love, power, promise, and providence. Ruth ii. 12. Psal. xvii. 8. and xci. 4. Matt. xxiii. 37. Wings ascribed to cherubim, seraphim, and living creatures, import the readiness and activity of angels and ministers in the service of God. Isa. vi. Ezek. i. and x. The saints' wings, are their faith, love, hope, holy affections, and heavenly meditation, by which they mount up towards their Saviour, and things above. Isa. xl. 31. The two wings of a great eagle, given to the true church for flying with into the wilderness, may denote God's special assistance, in bearing her up, protecting, and comforting her, and directing to proper methods of security against Antichristian corruptions. Rev. xii. 14. Wings ascribed to Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, and their kingdoms, or armies, may denote the rapidity of their conquests, the extent of their dominion, and their great power to protect their subjects and allies; but Alexander's four wings, may also denote the partition of his empire into four kingdoms, soon after his death. Ezek. xvii. 3, 7. Dan. vii. 4, 6. The noisy wings of the locusts under the fifth trumpet, may denote the wide-spread armies of the Saracens, or the wide-spread threatenings and excommunications of the Romish clergy. Rev. ix. 9.

WINKING, is expressive of mockery and derision; or of giving one a token to do his neighbour an injury. Prov. vi. 13. and x. 10. Psal. xxxv. 19. God's winking at the times of ignorance, imports his patient long-suffering towards the heathen world. Acts xvii. 30.

WINNOW, to clean corn by exposing it to the wind, that the chaff and dust may be blown away. Isa. xxx. 24. God's winnowing of men's path, and lying down, denotes his perfect knowledge thereof, and his purifying men with frequent trials. Psal. cxxxix. 3.

WINTER, the cold season when fields and trees are barren, grass withered, and storms frequent. In the middle division of the earth, called the torrid zone, which is about 3270 miles broad from south to north, they have generally two winters a-year, but both of them very warm. In countries near to the poles, they have what we might call a perpetual winter; nay even in Sweden there are nine months of severe winter, and the rest of the year is summer. In some places, the winter is so excessively cold, that it is almost impossible to escape being frozen to death. Gen. viii. 22. Even in Canaan, great men had their warmer houses for the winter-season, as well as their cooler ones for the summer. Jer. xxxvi. 22. Amos iii. 15. Seasons of temptation, persecution, and distress, are compared to winter. Summer and winter may signify the whole year, perpetually. Zech. xiv. 8. The winter is past, and the rain is over and gone; i. e. the cold, dark, and barren period of the ceremonial dispensation is past, and the storms of divine wrath are fully exhausted on Christ; the barren winter of unregeneracy, and of curses lying on the conscience, is over; the days of deadness, unfruitfulness, and persecution in the church, and of temptation, desertion, and spiritual grief or stupidity in the soul, are over. Sol. Song ii. 11. To WINTER, is to live or stay during the winter. Isa. xlviii. 6. Acts xxvii. 13.

WIPE, gently to rub off dust, damp, &c. from any thing. John xiii. 5. God wipes away his people's tears, when he removes all their cause of grief, and fills them with joy unspeakable, and full of glory. Isa. xlv. 8. Rev. vii. 17. He wipes not out men's good deeds when he accepts and rewards them. Neh. xiii. 14. God wiped Jerusalem as a dish, turning it upside down; when he grievously afflicted the Jews, and unbending the constitution of their church and state by the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Chaldeans. 2 Kings xxi. 13. The harlot's wiping her mouth, imports her impudent refusal of guilt, or her pretences to holiness and chastity. Prov. xxx. 20. An adulterer's reproach shall not be wiped away; i. e. shall scarcely ever cease. Prov. vi. 33.

WISE; (1.) Prudent in the management of things. Gen. xli. 33. (2.) Learned, knowing. Rom. i. 14. God is only wise; he alone has in and of himself an infinite knowledge of all things, and is possessed of an infinite prudence for the direction and management of all things. Rom. xvi. 27. 1 Tim. i. 17. (3.) Godly, pious, taught of God, and made wise unto salvation. Prov. xiii. 14. 2 Tim. iii. 15. (4.) Skilful artificers. Exod. xxviii. 3. (5.) Subtle, witty. 2 Sam. xiv. 2. (6.) Puffed up with a conceit of their own wisdom. 2 Cor. xi. 19. Rom. xii. 16. Wise also signifies manner, respect, rate. Num. vi. 23. Exod. xxii. 13. The wise men of Egypt, Chaldea, &c. not only comprehended their philosophers, astronomers, and other adepts of natural science, but also their diviners. See DIVINATION. Gen. xli. 8. Dan. ii. 10—14.

What the wise men, who led by the reports of the future advent of the Messiah, and by the appearance of an extraordinary star, came to visit our Saviour just after his birth, were; whether magicians, or whether of the sect of the Persian magi, who believed two subordinate principles, one of good and another of evil, who detested images and temples, and worshipped God only by the emblem of fire; or whether they were only philosophers, cannot now be determined. Nor can it be ascertained what particular country they came from; whether from Persia, Chaldea, or eastern Arabia; nor the time they took up in their journey; nor whether the extraordinary star went before them all the way till they came near to Jerusalem. But being arrived there, they inquired where was the new-born King of the Jews, whose star they had seen in the east. Informed by Herod, after his deliberation with his council, that Bethlehem was the place marked out in prophecy for the birth of the Messiah, they had scarcely departed from Jerusalem, when the star, to their great joy, appeared and directed them to the very house. As soon as they came in, they worshipped the infant Saviour, and presented him with gifts, gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Thus the gentiles began to gather to Shiloh. Herod had charged them to come back, and inform him where they found the young Messiah; but being warned by an angel in a dream, they went home another way, and no doubt spread the report of the Messiah's birth. Matt. ii.

WISDOM; (1.) Prudence and discretion to perceive what is fit or unfit to be done with respect to the time, place, manner, instruments, or end of an action. Eccl. ii. 13. (2.) Knowledge of sciences; so Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Acts ii. 22. (3.) Quickness of invention, and dexterity, in framing curious works; with such wisdom Bezaleel and Aholiab were qualified to fashion the pertinents of the tabernacle. Exod. xxxi. 3, 5. (4.) Craftiness in carrying on projects; such was the wisdom of Pharaoh in oppressing the Hebrews, Exod. i. 10: and of Jonadab, who contrived how Amnon might seduce his half-sister. 2 Sam. xiii. 5. The three last are called the wisdom of this world. 1 Cor. ii. 6. (5.) Natural instinct and sagacity: thus the ostrich is made without wisdom. Job xxxix. 17. (6.) True godliness; when one, being taught of God to know his will, seeks what is proper, shuns what is improper, and studies to perform every duty in the proper season. Psal. xc. 12. Job xxviii. 28. This wisdom is from above, is a special gift of God, is pure, making men careful to avoid error, and every thing sinful, and to cleave to truth and holiness; is peaceable, disposing men to make and keep peace with others, as far as is consistent with holiness; it is gentle, disposing men to bear with the infirmities of others, and to forgive injuries, and interpret every thing to the best sense it will bear; it is easy to be intreated, making men ready to receive the persuasions of God's word, and yield to good counsel and reason; it is full of merrcy and pity towards such as are in poverty or distress, or have offended; it is full of good fruits, benevolence, liberality, and brotherly kindness; it is without partiality, not preferring one to another for carnal reasons, and without hypocrisy, disposing a man to unfeigned holiness, and to judge himself by the law by which he judges others. Jam. i. 17. (7.) The gospel is called wisdom, and the wisdom of God in a mystery, or hidden wisdom; it is a display of the wise purposes and methods of God concerning the salvation of men, and renders them wise to salvation. No creature could discover it. Anciently, it was altogether unknown among the gentile nations, and was but darkly revealed to the Jews in mysterious types; nor is it now fully understood. 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7. (8.) Christ is called wisdom, and the wisdom of God; as God, he is infinitely wise; as God-man Mediator, all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in him; he has infinite wisdom for managing all the affairs of providence and grace, to promote our salvation: in him is given the most grand and full display of the wisdom and knowledge of God; he is made of God to us wisdom; he savingly reveals to us the nature and will of God, and renders us wise to salvation. Prov. iii. 19, viii. and ix. Wisdom is justified of her children: that Jesus Christ was no wine-bibber, or gluttonous person, but one perfectly righteous, and the true Messiah, is truly believed, professed, and evidenced by the practice of his true followers: and the gospel, and true godliness founded on it are sufficiently acknowledged to be full of wisdom, holiness, and equity; and by such as devote themselves to the study and practice of holiness, are vindicated against all the cavils of the ungodly. Matt. xi. 19. The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom; when the discourses of others are wicked or vain, his are pious and profitable, flowing from an inward knowledge of God, turning upon divine things as their subject, and tending to render men wise unto salvation. Psal. xxxvii. 30. The wisdom of God in the head of Ezra, was either the law of God, of which he studied the knowledge, or his knowledge of it. Ezra vii. 25. The wisdom that Solomon had, denoted knowledge of sciences, and sagacity and prudence for government. 1 Kings

iii. 9, 12. In the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God; God wisely ordered it, that neither by the discoveries of God in the works of creation and providence, nor by all their philosophy should the heathen attain the true and saving knowledge of God. 1 Cor. i. 21. The wisdom of this world, and of its princes which comes to nought, is their carnal policy in managing temporal or state affairs; or the maxims relative to it, which frequently rather promote ruin, than secure men against it. 1 Cor. ii. 7. Fleshly wisdom, is that craft and carnal policy which tend to promote the service of sin. 2 Cor. i. 12. No doubt ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you; i. e. you imagine yourselves the only wise persons, and that if you were dead, all knowledge of divine things would perish from the earth. Job xii. 2. Scorners seek wisdom, but find it not; their attempts towards knowledge only render them vain and self-conceited. Prov. xiv. 6. To preach the gospel with wisdom of words, or words of man's wisdom, or excellency of speech, is to do it in bombastic and affected eloquence, and pompous and swollen phrases. 1 Cor. i. 17. and ii. 1, 4.

WISH; to desire, to pray for. 3 John 2. Jon. iv. 8.

WIT; wot; to know. Gen. xxi. 26. We do you to wit, is an absolute phrase for we inform you. 2 Cor. viii. 1. To be at one's wit's end, is to be in such perplexity as not to know what to do. Psal. cvii. 27.

WITTINGLY, wisely, warily, well knowing what one does. Gen. xlviii. 14.

WITTY, dexterous, that requires great wisdom and skill. Prov. viii. 12.

WITCH, is a woman, and WIZARD is a man that has dealing with Satan, if not actually entered into formal compact with him. That such persons are among men, is abundantly plain from scripture, and that they ought to be put to death. Dent. xviii. 10. and Exod. xxii. 18. It is plain, however, that great caution is necessary in detecting and punishing the guilty, lest the innocent suffer, as many instances in New England and other places shew. To me it appears obvious, that for one to regard with any thing like fear, persons suspected of this infernal power, is nothing less than indirectly rendering homage to Satan.

WITCHCRAFT comprehends all kinds of influence produced by collusion with Satan, and excludes the user from the kingdom of God. Gal. v. 20. The witchcrafts of Nineveh, may signify the divination there practised and also their deceitful and ensnaring behaviour toward the nations around. Nah. iii. 4. See BEWITCH.

WITHAL; (1.) Also. 1 Kings xix. 1. (2.) Wholly. Psal. cxli. 10. (3.) With, by means of. Exod. xxv. 29. and xxx. 4.

WITHDRAW; (1.) To cease, leave off. 1 Sam. xiv. 19. (2.) To remove. Job xiii. 21. (3.) To draw or turn aside. Job xxxiii. 17. (4.) To entice, seduce. Dent. xiii. 13. (5.) To absent, forbear keeping company with. Prov. xxv. 17. God and Christ withdraw themselves, when they cease granting sweet intimacy to men, and instead of delivering them, give them up into the hands of their enemies, or to distress and sorrow.

Sol. Song v. 6. Hos. v. 6. God withdraws his right hand, when he apparently works nothing for their advantage, and does not support or protect them as formerly. Psal. lxxiv. 11. He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous; he never ceases his tender observation of, or care concerning them. Job xxvi. 7. To withdraw from brethren that walk disorderly, from men of corrupt minds, or Antichristians, is to forbear familiar intimacy with them, and cease from religious fellowship with them in the seals of the new covenant. 2 Thess. iii. 6. 1 Tim. vi. 5. and 2 Tim. iii. 5.

WITHER; to dry up, and decay. Jer. xii. 4. Men wither, when they lose their vigour of life or prosperity, and fall under weakness, poverty, and distress. Psal. xc. 6. Ezek. xvii. 9, 10. Psal. cii. 4; or when they relax in their profession, or activity in grace, and become apparently carnal and wicked, or inactive and slothful in holiness. Matt. xiii. 6. Jude 12. and Psal. cii. 4. The top of Carmel shall wither; the most fertile and well inhabited places shall become barren and desolate. Amos i. 2.

WITHHOLD. See RESTRAIN.

WITHIN; (1.) In the inside of a house, city, vessel, &c. Ezek. iii. 24. (2.) Ere a certain time be finished. Lev. xxv. 29. Judg. xi. 26. (3.) In the heart. Matt. xxiii. 25-27. (4.) In the church, as members of it. 1 Cor. v. 12.

WITHOUT; (1.) On the outside of a house, &c. 2 Kings x. 24. (2.) Wanting possession, worship, command, assistance, company, or happiness. Eph. ii. 12. 2 Chron. xv. 3. 2 Kings xviii. 25. 1 Pet. iii. 1. (3.) Not members of the church. 1 Cor. v. 12, 13. Col. ii. 5. (4.) Shut out from heaven; cast into hell. Rev. xxii. 15. (5.) Publicly in the ordinances of the gospel, and among the gentiles. Prov. i. 20. Sol. Song viii. 1.

WITHS; twisted boughs, willows, &c. such as those with which faggots are often bound together. Judg. xvi. 7, 8.

WITHSTAND; effectually to oppose. Dan. xi. 15. Paul withstood Peter to the face, when he sharply rebuked him, and checked his dissimulation. Gal. ii. 11.

WITNESS; one who solemnly, or upon oath, gives his declaration concerning a matter. Numb. v. 13. No person is to be condemned on the testimony of one witness; but by the concurrent evidence of at least two or three persons to the same or a similar fact. As some men, especially such as are given to swearing in their common conversation, by prejudice, or by the influence of a bribe, are ready to swear falsely, God, to deter the Hebrew witnesses from false swearing, appointed them to begin the execution of the sentence against him that was condemned to death upon the footing of their deposition by casting the first stone at him. Dent. xvii. 6, 7. If a witness was detected of false testimony, he was condemned to the same form of punishment which his false deposition tended to bring his neighbour to. Dent. xix. 16-18. When our Saviour was crucified, his adversaries suborned as many false witnesses as they could; but their testimony never agreed on any thing criminal. Mark xiv. 55, 56. False witnesses too were suborned against NABOTH and STEPHEN. 1 Kings xxi. 10, 18

Acts vi. 13. God is a witness, and swift witness, against sinners, false swearers, or others: he observes, and will speedily manifest and punish their sin. Jer. xxix. 23. Mal. iii. 5. Christ is a witness given to the people: faithfully and solemnly he declares to men the various truths of the gospel; and the constitution of his person and mediation, and his word, miracles, oath, death, and ordinances, all concur to attest the same. Rev. i. 5. and iii. 15. Isa. lv. 4. The Holy Ghost is a witness; by his powerful miracles, and by his influences on the consciences of men, he attests the truths of God's word, and the Messiahship of Christ; by causing to understand the marks of real grace laid down in scripture, by shining on, and quickening our holy dispositions, and enabling us to discern the reality of our grace, and by a mighty application of the promises, he bears witness with our spirits, that we are the children of God. Rom. viii. 16. Heb. x. 15. As the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are heavenly witnesses, attesting the mission and incarnation of Christ, and his being given to us, and eternal life in him; so the Spirit, i. e. the Holy Ghost's extraordinary and ordinary influence, and his residence in the hearts of his people, the water, the purity and holiness of Christ's life, the doctrines of the gospel, the ordinance of baptism, and the sanctification of the saints, and the blood, the expiatory sufferings of Christ, and representation of it in the supper, the justification of his people, and their sufferings for his sake, do all on earth attest the same; and he that believes, hath the witness in himself: has the truth attested and verified in his heart, and his conscience bears witness to it; and he has the six witnesses as it were dwelling in his soul. 1 John v. 7-9. Men's own consciences and spirit bear witness, by causing them to assent to the truth of the gospel. Rom. vi. 16. Prophets, apostles, and ministers, are witnesses; upon their certain knowledge, they solemnly declare the truth concerning God's perfections, will, and work, and concerning Jesus' person and offices, and states; and concerning the world, that the deeds of it are evil. Rom. iii. 22. Acts x. 43. and v. 32. The saints are God's witnesses: by their profession and practice, they solemnly attest the excellencies of a God in Christ, the truth and importance of his word, the grace and glory of his works, and the vanity of every thing in comparison of him, Isa. xliii. 10, 12. and xiv. 8: and when they bear witness unto death, they are called MARTYRS. Rev. ii. 13. The ministers and Christians who oppose the abominations of Antichrist, are Christ's two, small, but sufficient number of witnesses, who, assisted of God, continue prophesying, adhering to, and declaring divine truths, clothed in sackcloth, in a humble, distressed, and mourning condition. They stand before God, are under his special care and protection, and live as under his eye: fire goeth out of their mouth, to hurt their enemies; the gospel they preach or profess, tends to the ruin of Antichrist, and their prayers bring judgments upon him: they shut heaven by solemn censure, or by declaring God's threatenings. Nor does the rain of gospel-truth or influence fall on the popish state; and their witnessing occasions bloody wars. Antichrist at last almost ruins them: but God shall suddenly render them more powerful than ever. Rev. xi. 3-19. See CHURCH.

Whatever manifests the truth of any point, is called a witness; so the impudent show of sinners' countenance, and their boldness in sin, is a witness against them, that they deserve and are ripe for calamities. Isa. liii. 9. Job's troubles were witnesses of his guilt, and of God's great displeasure with him. Job x. 17. and xvi. 8. The moon is a faithful witness, that God keeps his covenant with day and night, to cause them to return in their season; and the rainbow is a faithful witness, a never-failing token of God's covenant to preserve the earth from a second deluge. Psal. lxxxix. 27. Rain and fruitful seasons are witnesses of God's continued patience and kindness to men. Acts xiv. 17. The settlement of the true religion in Egypt, was a witness to the Lord: a proof of his redeeming power and kindness, and of his exact accomplishment of his promises. Isa. xix. 20.

WITNESS, or TESTIMONY, signifies also the solemn declaration of a witness, or the truth attested. 1 John v. 9. Acts xiv. 5. The two tables of the moral law, are called a testimony, because they were proofs of the covenant-relation between God and Israel, and infallibly declared what he required of them. Exod. xxv. 16, 21. and xxxi. 18. The whole word of God is called his testimonies, as therein is solemnly declared what we ought to believe and practise, or expect. Psal. xix. 7. His law is a testimony, as it solemnly declares his will and our duty. 2 Kings xi. 12. The gospel is a testimony, that declares what God has done for, and is ready to give to sinners, for their eternal salvation. 1 Cor. i. 6. and ii. 1. 2 Tim. i. 8. The witness or testimony of Jesus, is the truths he declared, and of which he is the subject-matter and end, and which his people believe and profess concerning him. Rev. xx. 4. and i. 9; and it is called the saints' testimony, as they profess and adhere thereto, even unto death. Rev. xii. 11. and xi. 7. To have the testimony of Jesus Christ, is to preach his gospel, and abide firmly in the profession, faith, and maintenance of his truth. Rev. xix. 10.

WITNESS; BEAR WITNESS, or TESTIFY, is, (1.) Solemnly to declare a point before a judge. Acts xx. 24. and xxvi. 5. (2.) Boldly and solemnly to declare any point. John iii. 11. and v. 23. 1 Tim. vi. 13. (3.) Seriously and solemnly to lay a charge or a truth home to men's conscience. Psal. l. 7. Neh. xiii. 15.

WIZARD. See WITCH.

WO, is a word of mourning. Wo's worth; alas for! Ezek. xxx. 2. Wo's me; alas, how unhappy I am! Psal. cxx. 5. A wo, is a heavy calamity; the rise of Popery and Mahometanism, the three hundred and ninety six years' ravage of the Ottoman Turks, and the fearful overthrow of Popery and Mahometanism, are the three terrible woes, that under the fifth, sixth, and seventh apocalyptic trumpets, fall on the inhabitants of the earth. Rev. viii. 13. and ix. 12. and xi. 14. Wo, in cursings and threatenings, denotes the approach of some heavy calamity. Matt. xxiii. 13-20.

WOFUL, full of distress and sorrow, Jer. xvii. 26.

WOLF. Wolves are four-footed beasts of the dog kind, with their tail bending inward, and their ears pricked up. Their head is squarish, and their hair greyish. They are crafty, greedy, ravenous, fierce, and of a quick smell: they abide in forests, and are great enemies to cattle: they howl instead of barking: they can bear hunger long, but are then exceeding fierce, and will fall on either man or beast that comes in their way, or even upon one another. Hence in the evening, when they come hungry out of their holes, they are most fierce and dangerous. Jer. v. 6. Hab. i. 8. Nay, they are ordinarily timorous, except when hunger prompts them. Throwing of stones, sight of fire, sound of bells, or of singing, it is said, terrifies them. In cloudy and dark days, they attack flocks of sheep, but go contrary to the wind, that the sheep-dogs may not smell them out. It is said, the females grow more fruitful by one every year till the ninth. Many other things I omit, as I suspect them to be fabulous. Wicked rulers and others, chiefly persecutors, are likened to wolves: their god is their belly: they delight in darkness; they barrack and destroy Christ's sheep; and if mercy change them not, they shall howl for ever in hell. Ezek. xxii. 27. Matt. x. 16. The wolf dwells with the lamb, and the leopard lies down with the kid, and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child leads them; and the cow and bear feed and lie down together; and the sucking child puts his hand on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child puts his hand upon the cockatrice den; when persecutors, and the very worst of men, are converted by the gospel, and kindly coalesce with the poorest and meekest saints, into one church. Isa. xi. 6-8. and lxxv. 25. The Chaldeans, and the Jewish rulers, are likened to evening wolves, to mark their insatiable avarice, and readiness to destroy every one that comes in the way. Jer. v. 6. Hab. i. 3. Zeph. iii. 3. The tribe of Benjamin ravened as a wolf: their warriors were fierce; twice 25,000 of them put about 360,000 of the other tribes to flight near Gibeah, and the remnant of them seized the young women of Shiloh. Judg. xx. and xxi. In the beginning of his reign, Saul mightily harassed the Philistines, Moabites, and others, and destroyed most of the Amalekites. 1 Sam. xiv. and xv. By means of Mordecai and Esther, two Benjamites, Haman and about 76,000 of the Jews' enemies were slain. Esth. ix. After ceasing his persecution of the saints, how useful was Paul in ravaging the kingdom of Satan, and converting multitudes to Christ. Gen. xlix. 27.

WOMAN. See MAN.

WOMB. That part of the female body in which young are conceived and nourished until their birth. Luke i. 31. The womb of the morning, are the clouds which distil drops of dew; and may represent the church in the apostolic age, bringing forth multitudes to Christ. Psal. cx. 3.

WONDER, MARVEL, (1.) To be struck with surprise at the sight or thought of any thing strange and uncommon. Jer. iv. 9. (2.) To exercise a reverential regard to any thing, or with wonder to adore and serve it. Rev. iii. 13.

WONDERS or MARVELS, (1.) Things strange and astonishing, as the more rare appearances of nature, Psal. cvii. 27; or the miracles which God wrought in delivering Israel out of Egypt. Psal. cv. 27. (2.) A token or sign: thus Isaiah was a wonder on Egypt and Ethiopia, as his walking without his upper robe, and barefoot, was a presage of calamities to those countries. Isa. xx. 3. The saints are wonders, or men wondered at: they are objects of the wonderful kindness and care of God, and are wondered at by carnal men, as persons foolish and odd in their faith and practice. Isa. viii. 18. David was a wonder to many, was a kind of spectacle, because of his distress. Psal. lxxi. 7.

WONDERFUL, MARVELLOUS, hard to be done, not easy, or impossible to be understood. 2 Sam. xiii. 2. Job v. 9. Christ is wonderful, in his divine nature, in his eternal generation, in his office of Mediator, and the execution thereof. in the depth of his debasement, and the glory of his exaltation, in his kindness to his people, in his dwelling in their heart by faith, he is altogether amazing and incomprehensible. Isa. ix. 6. God shewed himself marvellous upon Job; he inflicted very uncommon troubles upon him. Job x. 16.

WOOD; (1.) The timber of trees. Gen. xxii. 6. They used it for fuel: and to fall under the wood, is to faint under the most slavish service, as bearing of wood. Lam. v. 13. Cedar is the wood of Lebanon. Sol. Song iii. 9. See CHARIOT.

The Assyrian army before Jerusalem were as wood or fuel, when the Lord, by some fiery plague, cut off 185,000 of them in one night. Isa. xxxiii. 33. Doctrines vain, empty, and false, which cannot abide the trial of God's word, which is likened to a fire, are called wood. 1 Cor. iii. 12. (2.) An idol made of wood. Hab. ii. 19. (3.) A forest, or multitude of trees growing together; or the place where they grow. There was a variety of forests in Canaan; as the forest of Hareth, in the south of Judah, 1 Sam. xxii. 5; of mount Ephraim, Josh. xvii. 18; of Bethel, 2 Kings ii. 14; and of Carmel. 2 Kings xix. 23. On the east of Jordan was a forest called the wood of Ephraim, because there Jephthah had routed and cut off multitudes of the Ephraimites. 2 Sam. xviii. 6. Judg. xii. 5. We read also of the forests of Arabia, Isa. xxi. 13; but that of Lebanon is the most noted, and it is called the king's forest, as the Persian kings took it under their special care. Neh. ii. 8. The Assyrian army is called a forest: how numerous and how stately was their appearance! but how soon were they consumed by the wrath of God! Isa. x. 18, 19. and xxxii. 19. Egypt and her numerous cities, of their large army, under Pharaoh-necho, is called a forest. Jer. xli. 23. Jerusalem is called the forest of the south field: it lay near the south of Canaan; the Chaldeans marched southward to it, and numerous were its houses and inhabitants. Ezek. xx. 46. A dangerous and troublesome-like condition, is likened to a wood, where serpents and wild beasts abound; and to sleep safely in wildernesses and woods, is to enjoy the most complete safety and happiness. Ezek. xxxiv. 25.

WOOL, was anciently plucked off the sheep, though alive; and so a fleece borne by a sheep at a time, was called by the Romans, Vellus, the plucking. In China, the sheep are shorn thrice every year. Anciently, the best wool was had from about Damascus, Ezek. xxvii. 18; now the Spanish is reckoned the best in Europe. In countries either too cold or too hot, the wool is coarse or short. Snow is like wool in softness and whiteness; its broad flakes are like locks of wool, and it warms the earth as a woollen garment does the body. Psal. cxlvii. 16. Crimson-like, or very aggravated transgressions, are as white wool when fully pardoned. Isa. i. 18. Superstition, carnal sloth, and self-righteousness, are like wool that caneath sweat; how defiling and fatiguing! Ezek. xlv. 17. See WHITE.

WORD; (1.) A speech expressing report, request, command, promise, &c. Gen. xxxvii. 14. and xlv. 18. Exod. viii. 13. Dan. iii. 28. 2 Sam. vii. 25. The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power. God does not erect his church by mere words, but by the almighty influences of his Spirit. 1 Cor. iv. 20. Men love not in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth, when they shew their love, not chiefly in kind speeches, but in kind works. 1 John. iii. 18. (2.) The thing about which a speech is made; so the affair of John Baptist's birth is called a word. Luke i. 65. To whom hast thou uttered words? and whose spirit came from thee? Dost thou not know that he to whom you speak knows all that you have said, and that his circumstances are not proper for such a discourse? Have you not rather repeated what Eliphaz said, than spoken under the direction of God's Spirit? and what encouragement have you ever given to my drooping spirit? Job xxvi. 4. The word of God is, (1.) Jesus Christ, who by the Chaldee paraphrast, and by the apostles and others, is called the Word. He is the express image of his Father, as words are of our thoughts. He spoke for us in the council of peace; he spoke all things into being at the creation; he spoke to the ancient patriarchs and prophets; he preached the gospel in the days of his flesh, he speaks for men in his intercession; and speaks to their hearts in the day of his power; and he is the great subject-matter of what is spoken in scripture. John i. 1, 4. Rev. xix. 13. (2.) The declared will of God in the scripture, doctrine, commands, promises, threatenings, histories, predictions. Rev. xix. 9. Rom. ix. 6: and it, chiefly the gospel, is the word of Christ, as he is the author, subject-matter, and end of it. Col. iii. 16. The word of righteousness, as it reveals to us the righteousness of Christ, is the sole price of our salvation; and it teaches us to follow righteousness, faith, and charity. Heb. v. 13. It is the word of faith, is a declaration of divine truths, to be received and credited by us as the ground of our claim to salvation. Rom.

x. 8. It is the word of salvation, as it reveals and offers to us a full salvation, and by believing and improving it, are we possessed of begun salvation, and prepared for eternal glory. Acts xiii. 26. It is the word of this life; it is now preached to men, and by it they become partakers of eternal life. Acts v. 20. The word of God's grace, and the word of life, or eternal life, is either Christ, who is freely given to be our Saviour, and by whom we have our spiritual and eternal life, or the word of God's gospel-promises, which declare and convey the free favours of God to men, for the quickening and eternal salvation of their soul. Acts xx. 32. 1 John i. 1. John vi. 68. Phil. ii. 16. The word of the oath, is God's ancient and solemn declaration, that Christ should be a priest for ever. Heb. vii. 28. The word of wisdom and of knowledge, is an eminent faculty wisely to take up and publish divine things. 1 Cor. xii. 8.

WORK, to act in making, forming, ordering, or upholding things. 1 Cor. xii. 18. Jam. i. 3. Psal. lli. 2. (3.) To prepare, make meet; so God works glory for his people, and he works them into a meetness for it. Psal. xxxi. 18. 2 Cor. v. 5. To work God's judgments, is to obey his laws, observe his ordinances, and be duly affected with his strokes. Zeph. ii. 3. All things work together for the good of the saints; their troubles work for them an exceeding and eternal weight of glory; God, by his wise disposal of them, and by his influence accompanying them, makes them concur to alarm and excite them to their duty here, and to prepare them for the future glory hereafter. Rom. viii. 28. 2 Cor. iv. 17.

WORK or DEED, (1.) Temporal labour, such as may be done on the six labouring days. Exod. xx. 9. (2.) Any kind of agency in thought, word, or act. Eccl. xii. 14. (3.) An uncommon or miraculous work. John vii. 21. (4.) The thing effected by any agency or influence: so all creatures are the work of God's hands. Job xxiv. 19. (5.) The materials for forming an effect out of, particularly for building. Prov. xxiv. 27. (6.) The wages or reward of a work. Lev. xix. 13. Job vii. 2. Rev. xiv. 13. The work of God is, (1.) That which he effects, as of creation. Gen. ii. 2; or of providence, John v. 17. Isa. v. 19. Hab. iii. 2; or of redemption. John ix. 4. These are God's marvellous works. 1 Chron. xvi. 12. Rev. x. 3. In redemption, each of the divine persons has his distinct station and work. See GOD. (2.) The works which God commands us to do. John vi. 28; and so service done to Christ is called his work. 1 Cor. xv. 58. and xvi. 10. Phil. ii. 30. Faith is the work of God, as he produces and maintains it in us, and as he commands us to practise it. John vi. 29. Men's works are either, (1.) Good, proceeding from a right principle and motive, directed by God's law, and in a right manner calculated to promote his honour and our own true happiness. Such works not being performed under the law as a covenant, cannot enter into our justification; nor, because of imperfection, are they fit to do it: but they manifest one to be justified and possessed of true faith, and justify him against the charges of men. Eph.

ii. 10. Rom. iii. 20. Gal. ii. 16. Jam. ii. 24. Or, (2.) Bad works, which are performed by men not united to Christ, not possessed of true grace, not performed from regard to the authority of God, nor with a view to promote his glory; these are works of the flesh, and deeds of the body of indwelling sin, flow from a carnal and corrupt nature, and cannot justify, but are an abomination to the Lord. Psal. lix. 6. Isa. lvii. 12. Gal. v. 19. Rom. viii. 13. They are dead works, proceed from no spiritual life, shew one's death or deadness in sin, and of themselves tend to prepare for eternal death. Heb. vi. 1. and ix. 14. Some of these are works of the law, that have some semblance of conformity to the law as a covenant; and to be of the works of the law, is to trust to our own works for eternal happiness, Gal. iii. 10; but works of the law in general, are whatever it commands. Rom. iii. 20, 28. Some are works of darkness, shameful transgressions of God's law. Rom. xiii. 12. Eph. v. 12. These are also the deeds and works of the devil, as he tempts to and exemplifies many of them. John viii. 41, 44. But his works also include the ruin of men, which he effects. 1 John iii. 8. Idols are the work of errors; error instigates men to form and worship them, and they lead men from one error to another. Jer. x. 15.

WORKMAN (1.) One that labours in some handicraft. Isa. xl. 19. A minister who labours hard in preaching the gospel. 2 Tim. ii. 15.

WORKMANSHIP, (1.) The art and labour in forming of things. Exod. xxxi. 3. (2.) The thing formed by art. 2 Kings xvi. 10. We are God's workmanship, made by him in creation, renewed by him in regeneration, being created anew in Christ Jesus, capable of and disposed to good works. Eph. ii. 10.

WORLD. The Jews distinguish the world, in respect of place, into the lower world of earth and air, the world of heavens and stars, and the highest world: or, as others, the world of earth and air, the world of angels, the world of spheres and stars, and the highest world of spirits departed, called the third heaven. In respect of duration, they distinguish it into the world before the flood, the present world before the Messiah, the world to come under the Messiah, the world of the resurrection, and the eternal world. In allusion to these divisions, Paul mentions worlds. Heb. i. 2.

WORLD denotes, (1.) The world containing, and that either the whole frame of heaven and earth together, and all things therein. John i. 10; or the heavens, and what they contain. Psal. xc. 2; or the habitable part of the earth. Psal. xxiv. 1. and xcvi. 7. (2.) The men that dwell on this earth, and that either all of them, Rom. v. 12. or an indefinite number of them, John vii. 4. Isa. xlii. 11; or many, a great part of them, Matt. xviii. 7. John iv. 42. Matt. xxiv. 14. and xxvi. 18. Rom. i. 8. and x. 18; or all or most of the subjects of the Roman empire, so called because of its extent, Luke ii. 1. Rev. xiii. 3; or the gentiles as distinguished from the Jews, 1 John ii. 2; or God's chosen people, his elect, Psal. cxlii. 27. John iii. 16. and vi. 33, 61; they may be so called, because they are the substance of the world, and because chiefly gathered from among the gentiles, and hitherto mostly out of those countries once subject to the Romans, or, the reprobate, wicked, and cursed part of the men on earth, so called because they are the greatest part of the men on earth, 1 John v. 19. John xiv. 17, 22. xv. 19. and xvii. 9. Rev. xiii. 3. (3.) The carnal corruption that prevails on earth. Gal. i. 4. Eph. ii. 2. Jam. i. 27. 1 John ii. 16. (4.) A worldly or earthly state and condition, Psal. lxxii. 12. Luke xvi. 8. John xviii. 36. 1 John iv. 5; to which may be reduced, the outward pomp, pleasure, and good things of a present life. Gal. vi. 14. 1 Cor. vii. 31. This world denotes this earth, in its present carnal and corrupt state. Tit. ii. 12. Christ's kingdom is not of it, is not of an earthly rise, form, or tendency. John xviii. 36. That world denotes the heavenly state. Luke xx. 35. The world to come, signifies the gospel-period after the resurrection of Christ, or the church in her New Testament form, Heb. ii. 5. and vi. 5; or the future and eternal state, Matt. xii. 32. The elect and saints are given out of the world, set aside from the rest of mankind, to be saved by, and subject to Christ, John xvii. 6; but they are not out of it in respect of their abode while they live on earth. John xvii. 15. Men's tongue is a world of iniquity; its words contain inconceivable wickedness; or it is an ornament of iniquity, which often sets off sin in fair colours. Jam. iii. 6.

WORLDLY, what is of a carnal and earthly nature. Tit. ii. 12. Heb. ix. 1.

WORMS, are creeping animals, almost infinite in number, and even in kinds: nay, vast numbers of insects, as bees, wasps, flies, &c. are worms in their first state of life. As worms are produced from eggs, multitudes of them breed in the human body from eggs, conveyed thither. Multitudes of diseases, as the itch, &c. are produced in the skin by a kind of worms. It seems Job's distemper was owing to a collection of worms nestling in his skin and flesh. Job vii. 5. It is certain Herod was eaten up alive by them, Acts xii. 23. and dead corpses are devoured by them. Job xxi. 26. Isa. xiv. 11. Some have even thought that all matter was composed of living vermin. To denote men's earthliness, meanness, weakness, and exposure to danger and corruption, they are called worms. Job xxv. 6. Mic. vii. 17. To mark our Saviour's debasement and bloody suffering, he calls himself a scarlet-coloured worm and so man. Psal. xxii. 6. Conscience, as for ever upbraiding and tormenting the wicked in hell, is called a worm that dieth not, but as it were for ever preys on their vitals. Isa. lxvi. 24. Mark ix. 44.

WORMWOOD; a herb, of which Tournefort says there are twenty-four kinds. It has a very bitter taste, but is useful in medicine for killing worms in the belly, and is a fine medicine for the stomach and liver, and is useful in the jaundice and dropsy: the very smell of it is odious to vermin. Idolatry, profaneness, apostasy, and other wickedness, are likened to wormwood; how disagreeable to God and his people! and in the end, how bitter to sinners themselves!

Deut. xxix. 18. Heb. xii. 15. The end of a harlot is bitter as wormwood, and sharp as a two-edged sword; what pain and ruin of character, body and soul, follows upon whoredom and uncleanness! Prov. v. 4. Affliction and oppression are like wormwood. Lam. iii. 14, 19. Amos v. 7. See STAR.

WORSHIP; to bow down with reverence; and so WORSHIP, is, (1.) Civil reverence given to one of authority or worth. Matt. ix. 18. and xviii. 26. Luke xiv. 10. (2.) Outward religious homage, given as an acknowledgment of Deity. Matt. iv. 10. Dan. iii. 5, 12, 14. (3.) Inward religious honour, whereby one thinks on, trusts to, loves and fears God, because of his infinite excellency, mercy, power, wisdom, and the like. John iv. 24. The saints are the circumcision, or really renewed persons, who worship God in the spirit, with their spiritual powers, actuated by the Holy Ghost, and in the way of viewing and dealing with God as a most pure spirit, and have no confidence in the flesh, renouncing all dependence on the world, and particularly on their own righteousness, for acceptance, or on their strength for performance of duty, but rejoice in Christ, as their husband, righteousness, strength, portion, and Lord. Phil. iii. 3. The church's enemies come and worship before her feet, when they subject themselves to her authority, and manifest a due reverence and regard to her. Rev. iii. 9. Men worship the dragon and beast, when they adore the Romish emperors and popes, and comply with their superstitious, sinful, and blasphemous laws. Rev. xiii. 4. Men worship devils, when, in compliance with their temptations, they profess their false doctrines, adore idols that represent them, and deal with them in charms and divination; or when they worship under the name of saints, persons most notoriously wicked. Rev. xix. 20. Deut. xxxii. 17.

WORST. The Chaldeans were the worst of the heathen, exceedingly given to idolatry, divination, covetousness, cruelty, &c. Ezek. vii. 24.

WORTH, is the just value of any thing. 1 Kings xxi. 2.

WORTH, or WORTHY, (1.) Valuable, deserving; thus, Jesus is worthy of all honour and glory. Rev. iv. 11. and v. 9, 12. Valiant men are called worthies; they could do great and mighty exploits, which deserved praise and reward. Nah. ii. 5; and wicked men are worthy of fearful calamities. Rev. xvi. 6; and the world is not worthy of eminent saints; it deserves not their presence or usefulness. Heb. xi. 33. (2.) Meet, answerable to; thus the saints walk worthy of the Lord, and of their vocation. Col. i. 10. 1 Thess. ii. 12. Eph. iv. 1. The saints are worthy, being accepted in Jesus' imputed righteousness, they, by sanctification, are made meet for the eternal glory. Rev. iii. 4. Luke xxi. 26.

WOULD to God; O if God would grant! I wish to God! Exod. xvi. 8.

WOUND; (1.) To make sores in the body with a sword, scourge, or the like: and a wound, is a sore made by a fall, a sword, or like instrument. 2 Kings viii. 20. (2.) To distress, Deut. xxxii. 39. Sol. Song v. 7; and so great affliction in the soul, Prov. xviii. 14. and outward on the body, character, family, or nation, is called a wound. Job xxxiv. 6. Prov. vi. 23. Jer. x. 19. and xv. 18. Reproof is called a wound, because it pains the offender, and tends to bring forth or expel the corruption of his offence, if it is kindly taken. Prov. xxvii. 6. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds; they mar or ruin the character, trade, health, and prosperity of men. Prov. xvi. 22. Both sins and afflictions are wounds. Isa. i. 6. One's wounds stink, and are corrupt, when sins prevail and lie heavy on the mind, and when afflictions exceedingly abound. Psal. xxxviii. 4. See SOUND.

WRAP; (1.) To roll up in a covering. 1 Kings xix. 13. Men wrap up sin, when they agree together in it, and take methods to conceal it. Mic. vii. 3. The sword is wrapped up for slaughter; it is kept from rust by sheathing, and is just ready to execute the judgments of God on the Jews. Ezek. xxi. 15. (2.) To fasten; take hold of: the roots of the wicked are wrapped about the heaps of good soil, when they have a promising appearance of a stable prosperity. Job viii. 17.

WRATH; (1.) A furious passion prompting one to revenge injuries, and do hurt. Gal. v. 20. (2.) The hurtful effects of such a furious passion. Prov. xxvii. 3. (3.) The just punishment of crimes. Rom. xiii. 4, 5. God's wrath denotes, (1.) His holy indignation at, and readiness to punish sin. Rom. i. 18. (2.) His manifestation of his hatred at sin, in the just punishment of it in time and eternity. Psal. xc. 12. 1 Thess. v. 9. Men pass their days in God's wrath, when they spend them under the tokens of his displeasure. Psal. xc. 9. His chastisement of his people is called a little wrath; it marks his displeasure at their sin, but is love to their person; and it is far less durable or heavy than the destruction of the Jewish nation, which is called wrath to the uttermost; or than the future punishment of the wicked, which is wrath to come, still but a beginning. Isa. liv. 8. 1 Thess. ii. 16. and i. 10. Wrath bringeth the punishments of the sword; men's wrath against the saints procures, and God's wrath against men brings on fearful calamities. Job xix. 20. Men treasure up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath, when they expose themselves to just punishments in time and through eternity. Rom. ii. 5.

WROTH; to be full of wrath: God is wroth with his people as a kind Father. Psal. lxxxix. 38: but he is not wroth with them as an angry Judge. Isa. liv. 9.

WREATHS, or WREATHEN WORK, was a kind of net-work interlaced with the form of sprigs, leaves, flowers, and fruit, and as it were twisted in the form of a rope: with such a golden wreath was the ephod fastened on the high priest's shoulders; such a wreath, with two hundred figures of pomegranates, was around the pommel of the pillars in the porch of Solomon's temple. Exod. xxviii. 14. 2 Chron. iv. 12, 13. Men's transgressions are wreathed or twisted about their neck, when they are fast entangled in the punishment of their sin. Lam. i. 14.

WREST; to turn by force to a wrong sense or purpose: so words are wrested.

2 Pet. iii. 16. Psal. lvi. 5. Judgment is wrested, when unjust sentences are given for or against men. Exod. xxiii. 2, 6.

WRESTLE; to struggle with one for victory. Jacob not only struggled with the angel by handy gripes, but chiefly by earnest and humble prayers for the blessing. Gen. xxxii. 24—26. With great wrestlings, or wrestlings of God, i. e. with violent desires, and earnest endeavours, Rachel thought she obtained children by her handmaid. Gen. xxx. 8. The saints wrestle not with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers; they watch against, they resist temptations, and cry to God for support and deliverance from sin, Satan, and the world. Eph. vi. 12.

WRETCHED, is the same as MISERABLE. Sinners are wretched, destitute of the grace and favour of God, and under the power of their lusts, and liable to the everlasting vengeance of God. Rev. iii. 17. Saints are wretched, when sore afflicted with temptations, troubles, divine hidings, and particularly with the stirring and prevalency of indwelling sin. Rom. vii. 24. To see one's own wretchedness, is to suffer great misery and disgrace. Numb. xi. 15.

WRING; to press out moisture. The wringing off the head of the sacrificed bird, imported the exquisiteness of Christ's sufferings. Lev. i. 15. and v. 8. The wicked wring out, and drink the dregs of God's cup of wrath, when, with great pain they suffer his vengeance to the very uttermost. Psal. lxxv. 8.

WRINKLE; (1.) A furrowy blemish in the face or body, occasioned by old age or distress. Job xviii. 8. (2.) Deformity of sin, or affliction. Eph. iv. 25.

WRITE; (1.) To note down any thing on a book or table. Isa. x. 1. (2.) To count the number in writing. Isa. x. 19. (3.) To declare a thing as quite certain, and mark it in a prophecy. Jer. xxii. 30. God's sealed book being written within and without, or on both sides of the paper, imported the vast quantity of matter contained in it. Rev. v. 1. God writes his law on men's hearts, when he deeply impresses it on their soul, and forms their inward qualities into a conformity with it. Job xxxi. 32. Heb. viii. 10. He wrote bitter things against Job, when he sentenced him to, and executed upon him sore afflictions. Job xiii. 26. The saints being written in heaven, in the book of life, or among the living, denotes their being divinely chosen and predestinated to eternal life and happiness. Luke x. 25. Heb. xii. 23. Rev. xxi. 27. But God's writing up the people, denotes his enrolment of them among the true members of his church. Psal. lxxxvii. 5. Men's writing God's law on the posts of their house, or the table of their heart, imports their frequent thinking and speaking of it, as an evidence of its being deeply impressed on their heart. Dent. vi. 9. Prov. iii. 3. Men are written in the earth, when they are rendered very debased and wretched, as if forgotten by God and his church. Jer. xvii. 13.

WRONG; what is unreasonable and unjust. Exod. ii. 13.

WROTH. See WRATH.

Y.

YARN. Solomon brought great quantities of linen yarn from Egypt, but some render the word מִקְוֶה, a collection, viz. of horses. 1 Kings x. 28.

YEA, denotes, (1.) Affirmation. Matt. ix. 28. (2.) Constancy and earnestness. Philen. 20. Phil. i. 18. and iii. 8. (3.) Doubting. Gen. iii. 1. The son of God preached to men, is not yea and ay, but in him, it is yea; all the promises are in him yea, and amen. The gospel doctrines concerning Jesus Christ have no inconsistencies, no inconstancy, but all harmonize in matter and tendency: every promise is infallibly confirmed by his word, and ratified by his blood. 2 Cor. i. 19, 20. There is with one yea, yea, and ay, ay, when his purposes are inconstant, and his declarations inconsistent. 2 Cor. i. 17. Let your conversation be yea, yea; ay, ay: let your speech consist of simple affirmations or denials, without the least appearance of an oath or imprecation to confirm what you say. Matt. v. 37. Let your yea be yea; and your ay, ay: let your affirmations and denials be altogether simple and candid. Jam. v. 12.

YEAR; that space of time wherein the sun finishes his course through all the signs of the Zodiac circle of the heavens; and consisting of the four seasons of Spring,

Summer, Harvest, and Winter. It consists of three hundred and sixty-five days, five hours, forty-nine minutes. The patriarchs before the flood appear to have divided their year into twelve months, each consisting of thirty days; and whether they added five days to the last, or had an intercalary month every fifth or sixth year, to exhaust the odd time of five days, five hours, and forty-nine minutes that was over in each year, we know not. Some think, the Egyptians and others once reckoned the time of one revolution of the moon their year, and that this is the source of their extravagant reckonings concerning antiquity. It is more certain that before the Hebrews' departure from Egypt, they reckoned by a year consisting of twelve months, each of which consisted of thirty days, and began their year about the beginning of our September. Possibly the Chaldean year was much the same, till Nabonasser, about the time of Hezekiah, ordered them to reckon the year by twelve months, or three hundred and sixty-five days; and, I suppose, the Egyptians soon after admitted this form. After long confusion, the Greeks reckoned the year by twelve months, of thirty days each; but seem afterwards to have reckoned by twelve moons, or three hundred and fifty-four days. They mostly began their year at the Summer solstice, when the sun is most northerly in June; but the Macedonians began theirs about the middle of our September. At first, the Roman year consisted of ten months, or three hundred and four days. King Numa extended it to twelve months, or three hundred fifty-five days; and every second year, they added twenty-two or twenty-three days by turns. Julius Cæsar, their first emperor, fixed it at three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours, which in four years make one day, which in four years make one day, which in the fourth is added to February, and occasions that year being called leap year. By this year we still reckon our time; but as it includes about eleven minutes too much, this, in one hundred and thirty years, runs the reckoning forward one day, and in our reckoning had run forward the year full eleven days, till this was rectified by the introduction of the new style among us, as it was in several countries abroad, by Pope Gregory, almost two hundred years ago. The old Persian year began about the beginning of June, and consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days, or twelve months. Most of the Mahometans reckon their year by twelve moons or three hundred and fifty-four days, eight hours, forty-eight minutes, thirty-eight seconds, and twelve thirds; and so in about thirty-five years, the beginning of their year runs backward through all the seasons. The Jewish year too was of the lunar kind, reckoning by twelve moons; their sacred year began in March, because therein they came out of Egypt at the new moon; in which the names and order of their months, were, 1 Abib or Nisan; 2 Zif or Iair; 3 Sivan; 4 Thammuz; 5 Ab; 6 Elul; 7 Ethanin or Tizri; 8 Bul or Marchesvan; 9 Chislen; 10 Thehet; 11 Shebet; 12 Adar; and on every third year, they added an intercalary month, formed out of the odd days, and called it Veadar, or second Adar. It is generally agreed, that all their odd months, as first, third, &c. consisted of thirty days, and all the even ones of twenty-nine. But Selden's old calendar gives thirty days to the even months, and twenty-nine to the odd ones. Their civil year began with Ethanin the seventh month of the sacred, as it was supposed the world was created about that time; and so Abib was the seventh month of it. Months, in the reckoning of all nations, appear to have had their rise from the revolutions of the moon. Ignorance of chronology, and pride of antiquity, made the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Chinese, Indians, and others, to run up the creation of the world, or even the rise of their own nation, to the distance of a ridiculous number of years. But the learned now generally acquiesce in, or near to, the chronology of Bishop Usher, according to which, the creation took place 4004 years before our common account from the birth of our Saviour; but it is suspected that common reckoning begins two or three years too late. But Dr. Caverhill will have our Saviour born A. D. 6. The four hundred and fifty years of the Hebrew sojourning began at Abraham's call to leave his native country. Gen. xii. 1. Exod. xii. 40, 41. The four hundred years of the sojourning of his seed began at the birth of Isaac. Gen. xv. 13. The above four hundred and fifty years mentioned, Acts xiii. 20. may reach from the birth of Isaac to the settlement in Canaan; or from that settlement, reckoning the years of bondage different from the years of the judges, to the government of Samuel. The sixty-five years, against the end of which Ephraim or the ten tribes were to be no people, i. e. have no form of government at all, and scarce may be left in Canaan, extends from the fourth year of Ahaz to the 23d of Manasseh. Isa. vii. 8. The years of a hiring, denote exact ones; and, it seems, were three on end. Isa. xxi. 16. and xvi. 14. In prophetic style, a year signifies three hundred and sixty years, and a month thirty, a day being put for a year; and so three years and a half, and times, time, and half a time, or forty-two months, or 1260 days, denote the twelve hundred and sixty years duration of Antichrist. Rev. xi. 3, 2, and xii. 6, 14. The five months ravage of the locusts, may denote the period between A. D. 606 and 706, in which Popery and Mahometanism mightily gained ground. Rev. ix. 5, 10. The year, month, day, and hour, of the Turkish ravage, is three hundred and ninety one years from 1281 to 1672, or 896 from 1282 to 1698. See ANTICHRIST, GOC.

YEAR too signifies the season or period in which a thing happens. The three years of God's patience with the barren Jews, may denote the time of the ministry of John Baptist, and Christ, and the fourth may denote the time after Christ's resurrection, before the breaking out of their ruinous war. Luke xii. 6—10. The year of visitation, is a season of remarkable calamities. Jer. xi. 23. The year of God's redeemed, is that season in which he effected the redemption of his chosen, as, the period of our Saviour's debasement, the primitive gospel-period and the period of Antichrist's ruin. Isa. lxiii. 4. In allusion to the year of release and jubilee, the period of the elect's conversion to Christ, or the gospel-period, is called the acceptable year of the Lord. Isa. lxi. 2. God's years are the unbounded duration of his existence, Heb. i. 11. or the periods of his most noted works, as of bringing Israel out of Egypt, the incarnation of Christ, &c. Psal. lxxvii. 10. So man's months are his time of life, Job xiv. 5. and he possesses months of vanity when he is long under trouble and disappointment. Job vii. 2.

Whether the millennium or THOUSAND YEARS of Satan's confinement, and the saints reigning with Christ, denote precisely so many years, or only a very long time, we dare not affirm. When this period begins, is not agreed. The beginning of it at Christ's resurrection, or at the fall of heathenism in the Roman empire, about A. D. 323, is scarce worth while to notice. Nor can we think, with others, that it began at the reformation from popery about two hundred years ago. The mournful condition of the church too plainly testifies, that Satan is not presently bound, but freely goes about seeking whom he may devour. We expect, that after thirty years of terrible bloodshed and confusion at the downfall of Antichrist, and forty-five years of the spreading of the gospel, it will be arrived at its glory, about A. D. 1941 or 2001. Rev. xi. 2, 3. Dan. vii. 25—27. and xi. 7, 11, 12; but we dare not be positive that our view of these texts is absolutely certain. Some think, that during this millennium, the wicked shall be all cut off from the earth, and the deceased saints, or at least the martyrs arise from the dead, and reign with Christ, who shall descend from heaven, and in his manhood reside among them; and that at the end of the thousand years, the wicked, being raised from their graves, shall attack the saints in war, and think to destroy them.

An opinion of this nature, with some variations, obtained not long after the age of the apostles, and has been espoused by a variety of very learned protestants: They plead, that the martyrs are said to rise from the dead, in the same sense that the rest of the dead rise at the end of the millennium; that the saints shall enjoy new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness; that God shall bring his only begotten Son into the world, and put all things under his feet; that the meek shall inherit the earth, shall sit upon thrones, and receive a hundred-fold in this life, and the irrational creatures be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, and the time of the restitution of all things happen. Rev. xx. 4—6. 2 Pet. iii. 5—13. Heb. i. 6. and ii. 5. Matt. v. 5. and xix. 27—29. Rom. viii. 19, 20. Acts iii. 20, 21. But it may be replied, That several of these texts do not in the least come up to the point, but may denote the saints' spiritual privileges here, or their eternal glory hereafter; or may relate to the last judgment, or even could quadrate with a happy state of the church on earth, without supposing the human presence of Christ, the death of all the wicked, or the resurrection of the martyrs in their bodies. This resurrection of the saints does not necessarily import the revival of the deceased, but the noted reformation, deliverance, and comfort of the church, in the successors of the martyrs. Rom. xi. 15. Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14. Psal. lxxxv. 6. Hos. vi. 2, 3. Zech. x. 9. And the death of the wicked during the millennium must in like manner signify a depression of their power and authority; and their revival, at the end, import a recovery of their power and influence. We may add, How can this doctrine of the millennium, as above hinted, accord with other passages of scripture? How can it consist with the saints setting their affections on things above, and not on things on the earth; or looking at things eternal, not at things temporal? Col. iii. 1. 2 Cor. iv. 18. How could it consist with the saints' happiness, to leave the celestial state, and return to our earth, not in bodies fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, but in bodies needing meat and drink? Phil. i. 23. and iii. 21. If their bodies are raised spiritual and incorruptible, as is said, 1 Cor. xv. 42, 49. what comfort could even these receive from the meat, drink, or clothing on earth? or what folly would it be for Satan to gather his troops to cut off incorruptible and spiritual bodies? Nay, who can imagine that the wicked, when raised up to everlasting damnation, shall have leisure to attack the saints? Moreover, the dead in Christ are represented as all rising together; and such as are alive on the earth, have their bodies changed in a moment. 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52. On these, and the like accounts, we cannot believe that the happiness of the millennium will amount to any more than a peaceable state of the church, wherein great multitudes of Jews and gentiles shall be converted to Christ, and enjoy much spiritual and delightful fellowship with him, and with one another.—One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day; in proportion to his infinite duration, the one is no longer than the other. 2 Pet. iii. 8.

YELL; to cry as a young lion. The Assyrians and Chaldeans yelled against the Jews; with terrible noise, and avaricious greed, they ravaged the country, and murdered the inhabitants. Jer. ii. 15. The Medes and Persians, and even the Chaldeans, made a terrible yelling, or outcries of joy or grief, when Babylon was taken. Jer. li. 30.

YELLOW hair, betokening the leprosy, might denote a weakness and stupidity under the reigning power of sin. Lev. xiii. 30—36.

YEARNING of bowels, imports the stirring of the most tender pity and affection. Gen. xliii. 30. 1 Kings iii. 26.

YESTERDAY; (1.) The day before. 1 Sam. xx. 27. (2.) Any time lately past. Job viii. 7. (3.) All time past. Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; he is the same under the Old Testament, and during the gospel and eternal period, Heb. xiii. 8. A thousand years are in God's sight as yesterday: he exactly knows all past things, and thousands of years bear no proportion to his infinite duration. Psal. xc. 4.

YET; (1.) At that or this time. John ii. 4. (2.) Notwithstanding. Jam. ii. 10.

YIELD; (1.) To produce. Gen. iv. 12. and xlix. 20. (2.) To surrender, submit. Prov. vii. 21. Rom. vi. 10. Men yield themselves to the Lord, when they receive his unspeakable gift, submit to his righteousness as their robe, and to his law as their rule. 2 Chron. xxx. 8.

YOKE; an instrument put on the neck of cattle, for drawing ploughs, wagons, and the like: and the cattle yoked together in one plough, are called a yoke. 1 Kings ix. 19. The law of God is a yoke, which galls the carnal man as it binds him to his duty: but as received in Christ, it is an easy yoke, receiving excitement and strength from Jesus; men with pleasure and comfort obey it; and it is much easier than the service of sin, the slavery of the broken covenant, or the bondage of the ceremonial law, which is called a yoke; or yoke of bondage, as the service required by it was carnal and burdensome. Matt. xi. 29, 30. Gal. v. 1. Bondage or slavery is called a yoke; in it men are obliged to suffer and labour in a most debased manner. Lev. xxvi. 13. Isa. ix. 4. and x. 27; and a yoke of iron, to express its hard and painful influence. 1 Kings viii. 51. Deut. xxviii. 48. Affliction, whether penal or correctory, is called a yoke; it distresses men's persons, circumstances and spirit; and it is the yoke of transgressions, because inflicted on their account. Lam. iii. 27. and i. 14. Marriage is called a yoke, as persons therein joined are bound to serve God, and assist one another; and they are unequally yoked, when they are different in their religion, and are much so in their tempers or circumstances. 2 Cor. vi. 14. Paul calls his fellow-preachers his true yoke-fellows, as they laboured in the same service of Christ as he did. Phil. iv. 3.

YOUNG; that which has lived but a short time. John xii. 14. The Jews reckoned persons young till married or marriageable. Dent. xxviii. 57. Nay, Joshua is called young at fifty six years of age, as it seems he was then in the prime of his strength. Rehoboam is called young and tender at forty one. 2 Chron. xiii. 7. Sodom is called the Jews' younger sister, because the power thereof was far inferior to that of the Jews. Ezek. xvi. 46, 61. YOUTH; (1.) Early age, or what is done in it. Eccl. xi. 9, 10. And hence the first beginnings of nations, as of Israel in the wilderness, and at their entrance into Canaan, is called their youth. Jer. ii. 2. Ezek. xvi. 22. Hos. ii. 15. (2.) Young persons. Job xxx. 12. Isa. xl. 30. Christ's youth, is either the early period of the Christian church, or his new converts. Psal. cx. 3.

Z.

WHETHER ZA-AN'AN, a city destroyed by the Assyrians, was one of the tribe of Naphtali, in the plain of Zaanaim, or Zaanaim; or if it was Zenah, a city of Judah, we know not. Mic. i. 11. Judg. iv. 11. Josh. xix. 33. and xv. 37.

Whether ZAC-CHEUS was a gentile, or rather a Jew, is not so certain as that he was a chief publican. As Jesus passed through Jericho, going to suffer at Jerusalem, Zaccheus had a great curiosity to see him; but as he was low of stature, he could not, till he climbed up on a sycamore tree. When Jesus came to the spot, he bade him come down hastily, as he intended to stop at his house. With great joy Zaccheus came down, and conducted our Saviour to his house. While the Jews murmured that Jesus was gone to be the guest of a publican, Zaccheus, convinced of his sin, told him that he intended to give the half of his goods to the poor, and, according to the Roman law, to restore fourfold to every body he might have wronged by false accusation. Jesus told him, that after all, he behaved, to expect no happiness by his own repentance and good works, but merely through the Christ, the salvation of God, now come to his house, and sent to seek and save lost sinners. Luke xix. 1-10.

ZACH'ARIAH, ZACH'-A-RIAS, ZECH'-ARIAH; (1.) The son of Jeroboam the Second, and the fourth descendant of Jehu. Perhaps his father left him an infant. It was about twenty three, or perhaps no more than eleven years after, that he mounted the throne, and having reigned six months, was murdered by Shallum the son of Jabesh. A. M. 3332. 2 Kings xv. 8-11. (2.) The son of Jehoiada the chief priest, who is perhaps also called Azariah, having reprieved king JOASH his cousin, for his idolatry and wickedness, that ungrateful wretch ordered him to be stoned to death, in the court of the temple. In his dying moments, he told them that the Lord would speedily avenge his death. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20-25. (3.) The son of Jeberchiah, or Barachiah, who had understanding in the visions of God, and encouraged Uziah in his piety, and perhaps withstood him when he attempted to offer incense. 2 Chron. xxvi. 5. He was one of the faithful witnesses that attested Isaiah's writing concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz. Isa. viii. 2. (4.) The son of Barachiah, grandson of Iddo, and eleventh of the less prophets. He returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel; and while yet young, began to prophesy in the second year of Darius Hystaspes, A. M. 3484, about two months after Haggai. These two mightily encouraged the Jews in their building of the second temple. Ezra v. 1. After Zerubbabel had exhorted the people to repentance, the Lord appeared to him as a man, on horseback, in the middle of a plot of myrtle-trees, in a low place, thereby intimating the presence of God with, and care for his people, in their distress; and hinted to them that Jerusalem should be rebuilt. By the vision of four horns spread away by four carpenters, was hinted, that God would raise up Jewish governors, that should resist and harass the Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritans, and Philistines, the enemies of Judah. Zech. i. By the visionary measuring of Jerusalem, was hinted, that it should be rebuilt; and the prophet was informed, that its inhabitants should be very numerous, and the Lord should marvellously protect them. chap. ii. By the vision of Joshua the high priest's preservation from Satan, and the change of his filthy robes for fine apparel, and he and his fellow priests being crowned with gold, was hinted, the safety and glory of the priests under the second temple. By the vision of the stone with seven eyes on it, was hinted, that the temple should, under the care of Divine Providence, be finished, and Christ come in his season. chap. iii. By the vision of a candlestick with seven branches, placed between two olive trees, that issued oil out of themselves, might be signified, the comfort of the Jews by means of Zerubbabel and Joshua, and the comfort of the church by Christ and his Spirit. chap. iv. By a large flying roll, written all over with curses, was hinted the speedy and extensive vengeance of God against false swearers and thieves. The visionary ephah, filled with a woman called Wickedness, and shut in with a heavy covering of lead, and carried by two winged women into the land of Shinar, imported the speedy and terrible vengeance taken on Babylon about four years after, by the Medes and Persians, or the terrible ruin and dispersion of the Jews about forty years after our Saviour's ascension. chap. v. By four chariots proceeding from between brazen mountains, and traversing the earth, was signified the fate of the Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires, and the fate of ministers in the various periods of the gospel church. By an order to make crowns of silver and gold for Joshua, and for Heldai, or Helem, Tobijah, Jedaiah, and Hen, was hinted the glory of the Jewish priesthood, and the glory of Christ as the builder of his church. chap. vi. After directing the Jews concerning fasting, and inculcating a variety of moral duties, he foretells their happiness, and the vast number of their proselytes and favourites. chap. vii. viii. He then foretells the destructive wars of Syria, Phœnicia, and the country of the Philistines, the preservation of the Jews under the Egypto-grecian and Syro-grecian oppressors; the birth, and injurious abuse of the Messiah; the publication and success of the gospel; the ruin of the Jewish church and state; and the conversion of the gentiles to Christ in the apostolic and millennial periods. chap. ix—xiv.

(5.) ZACHARIAS; an ordinary priest, of the course of Abia. He and his wife Elizabeth were eminently godly and blameless; but she had been long barren. About fifteen months before our Saviour's birth, as Zacharias was burning incense in the temple, the angel Gabriel appeared to him, and told him that his wife should bear him a son called John, who should be the successful harbinger of the Messiah. As the priest refused to credit the message, the angel told him that his dumbness till the event should verify the prediction. When he came out of the temple, he could not speak, but made signs to the people who were praying in the court, that he had seen a vision. When his turn of ministration was finished, he went home: his wife, after about nine months, was happily delivered of a son. Contrary to the remonstrances of their friends, Elizabeth insisted the child should be named John: Zacharias being consulted by signs, wrote that he should be so called. Hereupon he recovered the use of his speech, and uttered a hymn of praise to God, for the donation of the Messiah, whose birth was at hand; and turning himself to his babe, foretold that he should, by his instructions, prepare the nation to receive the Messiah. Luke i.

Who that ZACHARIAS, the son of Barachias, who was slain between the porch of the temple and the altar: whether he was the son of Jehoiadah, whose name has much the same signification as Barachia, i. e. a blessor of the Lord; or the son of Jeberachiah, whom perhaps Ahas murdered between the porch and the altar, for opposing his idolatrous worship; or the prophet above mentioned, who was perhaps murdered in that place, or the father of the Baptist, who might have shared the same fate, perhaps about the time when his son was a public preacher; or if it was one Zacharias the son of Baruch, whom Jesus foresaw the Jews would murder in that place, a little before the last destruction of their city, is not agreed by the learned. But be who he would, the coming of all the bloodshed from that of Abel to that of this Zacharias upon the Jewish nation, imports, that as their rejection and murder of Christ and his apostles approved the whole of it, it should be all revenged on them. Matt. xxiii. 34—36. Luke xi. 50, 51.

ZA-DOK; the son of Abitub. In his person, appointed high priest by Saul, that high office was returned to the family of Eleazar, after it had continued near a hundred and twenty years in the house of Eli, and the family of Ithamar. Both he and Abiathar were a kind of high priests under the reign of king David; but it seems David chiefly consulted Zadok, as perhaps he was a prophet. Both the two, at David's desire, tarried at Jerusalem during Abalom's rebellion, and procured him proper information. 2 Sam. xv. and xvii. They too instigated the tribe of Judah to make all the haste they could to bring David home after the rebellion was suppressed, lest the other tribes should get the start of them. 2 Sam. xix. 11, 12. As Zadok, instead of joining Adonijah, was one of those most active in the coronation of Solomon, and actually anointed him to the royalty, and came to be sole high priest after Abiathar's confinement. 1 Kings i. and ii. and was succeeded by his son, Ahimaaz, another Zadok, son of another Ahitub, was high priest long after, and Jerusha his daughter seems to have been the wife of king Uzziah, and mother of Jotham. 1 Chron. vi. 12. 2 Chron. xxvii. 1.

ZAIR; a place in the land of Edom. 2 Kings viii. 21.

ZAL-MON', or SAL-MON'; a hill near Shechem, where it seems the snow lay thick; and the Canaanitish carcases were like the snow of Salmon, when they covered the whole surface of the ground; which was a delightful sight to the Hebrews. Judg. ix. 48. Psal. lxxviii. 14.

ZAMZUM-MIMS, or ZU'ZIMS; a race of terrible giants, probably sprung from Ham, and which dwelt on the east of the Jordan, and had their country ravaged by Chedorlamer. Gen. xiv. 5. They were afterwards cut off, or driven from it by the Ammonites. Dent. ii. 20.

ZAPH'NATH. See JOSEPH.

ZA-RAH, or ZE-RAH', the son of Judah by Tamar, and twin-brother of Pharez. Of his five sons Ethan, Zimri, Heman, Calcol, and Dara, sprung the Zarhites, who were less numerous than the posterity of Pharez. Gen. xxxviii. 28, 29. 1 Chron. ii. 6. Numb. xxvi. 20.

ZA-RED', or ZE-RED'; the name of a brook that runs into the river Arnon; or of a valley. Numb. xxi. 12.

ZA'REP-THAH, or SA'REP-TA; a city of the Zidonians, on the shore of the Mediterranean sea. It seems they had a glass-work at it. Here Elijah lodged some time with a widow. 1 Kings xvii. 9, 10. Luke iv. 26. About A. D. 400, it was still of some note, and its wines were exceedingly heady.

ZAR'ETHAN, ZAR-TAN'AH, or ZER-DA-THAN'; a place on the west of Jordan, near to which the waters stood in heaps, as Joshua passed a good way below. Near to this place, in the plain of Jericho, and almost over against Succoth, were the large vessels of the temple formed of metal. Josh. iii. 16. 1 Kings iv. 12. 2 Chron. iv. 17.

ZEAL; an eagerness towards or against a thing. 2 Kings x. 14. God's zeal, is his wise, high, and holy regard to his own honour, and to the welfare of his people. 2 Kings xix. 21. Men's zeal, is either holy, which is an intelligent and prudent eagerness to have God honoured, true holiness promoted, and error and wickedness opposed and extirpated. Psal. lxi. 9. Numb. xxv. 13; or ignorant and furious, when men are zealous without knowledge of the nature of things, and prudence, and are zealous chiefly for trifles, or even for sin. Rom. x. 2. Phil. iii. 6. ZEALOUS, eagerly concerned and active about a thing. Numb. xxv. 11. Tit. ii. 14.

ZE-BAH'ZAL-MUN'NA. See MIDIAN, GIDEON.

ZEB-E-DEE'. See JAMES.

ZE-BO'IM; one of the four cities which perished together with Sodom. Gen. xiv. and xix. Perhaps it stood about the north-west corner of the Dead Sea. A valley of Zebolim, or spotted serpents, was near to Jericho. 1 Sam. xiii. 18; and hereabouts the Benjamites had a city of this name, which continued till after A.D. 400. Neh. xi. 34.

ZEBUL. See GAUL.

ZE-BU'-LON, or ZABULON, the sixth son of Jacob by Leah, born about A.M. 2256. From his three sons, Sered, Elon, and Jahleel, sprung these numerous families. When this tribe came out of Egypt, their fighting men amounted to 57,400 men, commanded by Eliab the son of Elon; they increased 3100 in the wilderness. Their spy to search Canaan, was Gaddiel the son of Sodi; and their prince to divide it, was Elizaphan the son of Parnach. Gen. xxx. 20. and xli. 11. Numb. i. 9, 31. and xxvi. 26, 27. and xiii. 10. and xxiv. 25. They had their inheritance on the south of the tribes of Asher and Naphtali, and had the sea of Galilee on the east, and the Mediterranean on the west; they enriched themselves by their fisheries, their sea trade, and their making of glass: they were very honest in their dealings, and notwithstanding of distance, were punctual attenders of the worship of God at Jerusalem. Gen. xlix. 13. Deut. xxxiii. 18, 20. They did not drive out the Canaanites from Kitron or Nahalol. Judg. i. 30. But they and the Naphtalites under Barak, were very active in routing the host of Jabin. Judg. iv. 10. and v. 14, 18. They assisted Gideon against the Midianites. Judg. iv. 35. Elon, a Zebulunite, was for ten years judge of Israel. Judg. xii. 11; and 50,000 of them attended at David's coronation to be king over Israel, and brought large quantities of provision. 1 Chron. xii. 33, 40. Psal. lxxviii. 27. They were oppressed, and many of them carried captive to the east, by Tiglath-pileser. 1 Chron. v. 26. Such as remained in their country, partly joined with Hezekiah in his reformation. 2 Chron. xxx. 11. Their country was signally blessed with the early instructions and miracles of our Saviour, and perhaps most of his disciples were of it. Isa. ix. 1. 2. Matt. iv. 13, 15. Perhaps there was also a city called Zebulun near Acccho, which is said to have been built in the form of Tyre and Sidon, and to have been taken and burnt to ashes by Cestius the Roman, about A.D. 66. Josh. xix. 27.

ZE-DE-KIAH, the son of Josiah by Hammath the daughter of Jeremiah, a prince of Libnah. When Nebuchadnezzar carried Jehoiachin prisoner to Babylon, he made Mattaniah his uncle king in his stead, after he had caused him to swear to be his tributary, and changed his name to Zedekiah. He began to reign when he was twenty-one years of age, and reigned eleven. Contrary to manifold warnings of God, by the prophet Jeremiah, he and his people hardened themselves in their idolatry, and other impieties. 2 Kings xxiv. 17. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10—16. Ezek. xvii. 13. In the first year of his reign, he sent Elash the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah the son of Hilkiah, to Babylon, probably along with his tribute: with these Jeremiah seems to have sent his letter to the captives at Babylon. Jer. xxix. About four years after, he either went himself, or at least sent Seraiah the brother of Baruch to Babylon, with whom Jeremiah sent his predictions against Babylon, to be read by him, and then cast, fixed to a stone, into the Euphrates. Jer. li. 59—64. In the ninth year of his reign, Zedekiah, contrary to solemn treaty with Nebuchadnezzar, entered into a league with Pharaoh-hophra of Egypt, and, it seems, with the other nations around, to throw off the Chaldean yoke. Nebuchadnezzar quickly marched an army into Judea, and laid siege to Jerusalem. Alarmed herewith, he and his subjects dismissed their bond-servants, whom they had retained longer than the law allowed, and begged that Jeremiah would pray for them. Meanwhile, the Egyptians marching an army into Canaan, Nebuchadnezzar raised the siege of Jerusalem to attack them. During this interval, the Jews forced back their servants, and drew new punishments on their heads. Having defeated or driven back the Egyptians, Nebuchadnezzar renewed his siege of Jerusalem. Zedekiah often consulted the prophet Jeremiah, but had not patience to hear, or resolution to follow his good counsels. Jeremiah urged him to go out and submit himself to Nebuchadnezzar's mercy, and it should be well with him. For fear of derision, he declined compliance, and it is likely Pelatiah the prince, who soon after had a miserable end, dissuaded him. Ezek. xi. 13. Zedekiah, as Jeremiah had warned him, fell into greater ignominy by his refusal to surrender. When Jerusalem was taken, he and a number of his troops fled off in the night; but the Chaldeans pursued, and overtook them near Jericho. He was carried prisoner to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah of Syria, who, after upbraiding him with his treachery, ordered his children to be murdered before his face, and then his eyes to be plucked out; after which he loaded him with chains, and sent him to Babylon, where, after some time, he died peacefully.

and was honourably interred by his friends. Jer. xxi. xxvii. and xxxii. 4-7. xxxiv. and xxxvii. xxxix. 2 Kings xxy.

ZEDEKIAH, the son of Chenaanah, and the son of Maaseiah were both false prophets. See MICAHIAH, AHAB.

ZEEB; a Midianitish prince, who gave name to a place in or near the lot of the Ephraimites, and not far from Jordan. Judg. vii. 25.

ZE-LAH, perhaps that where Saul and his family were buried, was the same as ZEIZAH, not far from Ramah, but in the south frontier of the tribe of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 28. 1 Sam. x. 2. 2 Sam. xxi. 14.

ZEL-O-PHE-HAD, the son of Hephher, of the tribe of Manasseh, died in the wilderness, not in any of the more noted provocations. Not long before Moses' death, his five daughters, Malah, Tirzah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Noah, for he had no son, applied to Moses to have an inheritance in Canaan, as heirs to their father. The Lord approved their demand; confining them to marry such as were of their own tribe: and it was divinely enacted, that to prevent the portion of one tribe going into that of another, no heiress should marry out of her own tribe; or if she did she lost her inheritance. Num. xxvi. 33. and xxxvii. and xxxvi.

ZEMA-RA-IM; a city of the Benjamites near Bethel, and near to which was a mount of the same name; at the foot whereof Jeroboam had 500,000 of his army killed by Abijah's troops. Josh. xviii. 22. 2 Chron. xiii. 4.

ZEMARITES; they were the descendants of Canaan by his tenth son. It is likely they built and peopled Simyra, a city of Phœnicia, near Orthosia. Gen. x. 18.

ZENA'S; the only pious lawyer we read of in scripture. Whether his learning respected the Jewish or the Roman law, we know not; but he was a noted Christian, whom, together with Apoll's, Paul desires Titus to bring with him to Nicopolis, and to take care they were sufficiently provided for in the journey. Tit. iii. 13.

ZEPH-A-NI-AH; (1.) A prophet, the son of Cushi, and grandson of Gedaliah: he appears to have lived in the time of king Josiah, and after his children were grown up, to wear robes of a foreign fashion. Zeph. i. 1, 8. In his first and third chapters, he inveighs against the wickedness of the Jews; foretels their calamities and captivity, and their deliverance therefrom. In the second, he exhorts the Jews to repentance, and foretels the ruin of the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Ethiopians, and Assyrians. (2.) ZEPHANIAH the second priest or sagan under Seraiah the chief priest. By him Zedekiah oftener than once consulted Jeremiah's advice, and requested his prayers in behalf of the kingdom. Jer. xxi. 1. and xxxvii. 1. To him Shemaiah directed his letter accusing Jeremiah as a madman, and he read it to Jeremiah. chap. xxix. 24, -29. When Jerusalem was taken, he and Seraiah the chief priest, were carried to Riblah, and there murdered by order of Nebuchadnezzar. 2 Kings xxv. 18. Perhaps he lived too early to be the father of Hen and Josiah, the priests. Zech. vi. 10, 14.

ZEPH-A'ATH, or ZEPHATAH. See HORMAN.

ZE-BAH'; (1.) A son of Judah. See ZARAH. (2.) A king of CUSH, who, in the time of ASA, invaded the kingdom of Judah with a million of footmen and 800 chariots; but being seized with a panic, most of them were cut off. 2 Chron. xiv. 9-15.

ZE-RE-DA-THA'. See ZARETAN.

ZERESH. See HAMAN.

ZE-RUB'BA-BEL, the son of Shealtiel or Salathiel, and of the royal family of David. As Salathiel, who is called the son of Jehoiachin, might yet be the son of Neri a descendant of Nathan the son of David, being begot by Jehoiachin on the widow of Neri, whom he had married, or he might be adopted by Neri, or might marry the only daughter of Neri, 1 Chron. iii. 17. Luke iii. 27: so Zerubbabel might at once be the immediate son of Pedaiah, and the grandson of Salathiel; or, Pedaiah a younger brother, might have married Shealtiel's widow, and Zerubbabel be the son he raised up to his brother. 1 Chron. iii. 19. Matt. i. 12. As Sheshbazzar is said to build the second temple, and was prince of the Jews, it seems he is the very same with Zerubbabel, and the one is his Jewish, and the other his Chaldean name, Ezra v. 16. and i. 8, 14. with Zech. iv. 5. Cyrus delivered into his hands the sacred vessels which had been carried to Babylon, to the number of 5400, and appointed him governor of the returning captives of Judah. After conducting 42,360 of them, together with 7337 servants, from Babylon to Judea, he laid the foundation of the second temple, and restored the worship of God by sacrifice. Notwithstanding of manifold obstructions to the work by the Samaritans, whom the Jews refused to allow to concur with them, he and Joshua the high priest, encouraged by Haggai and Zechariah the prophets, at last finished the temple, about twenty years after it was begun. Ezra i-vi. Hag. i. ii. and Zech. iv. He left behind him seven sons, Meshullam, Hananiah, Hashubab, Obel, Berechiah, Hasadiah, Jushab-hesed, and a daughter called Shelomith. Some two of these sons, otherwise named, are the Rhesa, from whom the Virgin Mary descended, and the Abud, from whom Joseph her husband sprung. 1 Chron. iii. 19. Luke iii. 27. Matt. i. 13. Did not Zerubbabel prefigure our divine Saviour, who is the signet on God's right-hand; and who has all things necessary for the welfare of the church delivered into his hand; and who brings back his people from all their wandering and captivity, and builds the temple of the church, with shoutings of grace unto it, and bears all the glory! Hag. ii. 28.

ZI-BA'. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

ZI-DON. See PHENICIA.

ZIF, or JAIR; the second month of the sacred, and eighth of the Jewish civil year. It consisted of twenty-nine days, and answered in part to our April. On the fourteenth day of it, such as had been unclean, or on a journey, that they could not observe the passover in the preceding month, observed it now; and on the first the passover-festival was kept, in the year of Hezekiah's reformation. Numb. ix.

2 Chron. xxx. 15, 26. On the tenth of it, the Jews observe a fast for the death of Eli, and another on the 28th for the death of Samuel.

ZIL-PAH'. See Jacob.

ZIM-RAN, the eldest of Abraham's six sons by Keturah. He was the father of the Zimri, or Zamarenes in Arabia Felix, where we find the city Zebam or Zimram. Gen. xxv. 2. Jer. xxv. 25.

ZIM-Ri; a general to Elah, the son of Baasha king of Israel. As his master drunk heartily at Tirzah, he murdered him, and mounted the throne. He immediately murdered the whole royal family, as had been predicted to Baasha. Hearing of this catastrophe, the royal army broke up the siege of Gibbethon, and hastened to dethrone Zimri. Finding himself incapable to defend it, he set the palace on fire, and burnt himself and family to death, after a short reign of seven days. 1 Kings xvi. 9—20. See COZBI.

ZIN; the name of a place about the south-west of Idumea: but whether it was the name of a city, or if it was the name of a part, or of the whole of the wilderness of Paran, we know not. Numb. xiii. 21. and xx. 1. Josh. xv. 3.

ZION, or SION; (1.) A top or part of mount Hermon, or an arrangement of hills near to it. Psal. cxxxiii. 3. (2.) Cellarius, Lightfoot, and others, think the other famed mount Zion was to the north of the ancient Jehus; but Reland has offered a variety of arguments to prove that it was on the south of it. We, with the authors of the Universal History, think the south part of Jerusalem stood on mount Zion, and that the king's palace stood on the north side of it, and the temple on mount Moriah, to the north-east of it, 2 Sam. v. 1. 1 Kings viii. 1. Psal. xlviii. 2: but as mount Moriah was hnt at the end of it, it was sometimes called Zion; and even the temple and its courts are so called, Psal. lxxv. 1. and lxxxiv. 7; and the worshippers at the temple, if not the whole inhabitants of Jerusalem, are called Zion. Psal. xcvi. 8. In allusion hereto, the church, whether Jewish or Christian, or heaven, is called Zion: how graciously was she chosen of God for his residence! how firm is her foundation, and how delightful her prospect! how solemn and sweet the fellowship with, and worship of God therein! Psal. cii. 13. Isa. ii. 3. Heb. xii. 22. Rev. xiv. 1. Isa. li. 11.

ZIPH; two cities of the tribe of Judah, one of which lay about eight miles eastward from Hebron, which is perhaps that beside Maon and South Carmel, and whose inhabitants though of the same tribe, were so eager to have David cut off, that they informed Saul of his hiding-places, and instigated him to come and apprehend him; and the other was somewhere about the borders of Edom. Josh. xv. 24, 55. 1 Sam. xxiii. 14—26. and xxvi. 1. Psal. liv.

ZIPPO-RAH; the daughter of Jethro or Renel. Her marriage with Moses, and bearing him two sons; her accompanying him part of his way to Egypt; her angry circumcision of her child; her return to her father's house; her coming with her father, some months after, to Moses; and Aara and Miriam's jealousy of her influence over him, has been related in the article MOSA. Exod. ii. iv. xviii. Numb. xii.

ZIZ, or ZIZA'; a hill in the south of Canaan, near the valley of Berachah. We suppose it was north of Engedi. 2 Chron. xx. 16.

ZO'AN, or TA'NIS: a very ancient city of Egypt, Numb. xiii. 7; and somewhere in the lower part of that country not very far from the Mediterranean sea. It was probably the capital for many ages. Isa. xix. 11. and xxx. 4.

ZO'AR, or BE-LA', was one of the five cities that rebelled against, and was reduced by Chedorlaomer. Gen. xiv. It seems to have been in the utmost danger of destruction along with Sodom and the other three: but Lot begged that as it was but small, it might be preserved as a residence for him. His request was granted, and thereafter the place was called Zoar, the little one. Gen. xix. 20—22. It seems to have stood somewhere about the south end of the Dead sea. Probably numbers of the Moabites fled hither from the ravages of the Assyrian and Chaldean troops. Isa. xv. 5. Jer. xlviii. 34.

ZO'BAH, was a kingdom of SYRIA, near about where Damascus stands, and had Rehob and Hadadexer for its kings. 2 Sam. viii.

ZO'HE-LETH; a noted stone near Enrogel, at which Adonijah held his usurpation-feast. Whether this stone was used by the young men to exercise themselves in rolling it, or if the fullers beat their cloth upon it, we know not. 1 Kings i. 9.

ZO-PHAR', the Naamathite, one of Jor's three uncharitable friends, and who spoke twice against him. Job ii. 11. and xi. 20; and was pardoned by means of Job's prayers. Job xlii. 7—9. Whether Naamath was the name of his ancestor, or of his city, we cannot determine; nor whether he was king of the Mineans, or of the Nomades or wandering Arabs.

ZO-RAH'; a city of the Danites, near the border of Judah. Here Samson was born. Judg. xiii. 2. Its inhabitants are called Zorites and Zorathites. 1 Chron. ii. 54. and iv. 2. Probably this was one of the cities which Rehoboam fortified for the security of his kingdom. 2 Chron. xi. 10.

ZUPH; a Levite, and one of Samuel's ancestors. As he was the chief of the Zaphites, he probably occasioned their territory to be called the land of Zaph, and their city Ramath-zophim, or Ramath of the Zaphites. 1 Chron. vi. 35. 1 Sam. ix. 5. and i. 1.

CHRONOLOGY OF FACTS

RELATIVE TO THE

HISTORY or PREDICTIONS of SCRIPTURE, &c.

N. B. (1.) We dare not affirm that some things here are fixed to the precise year. (2.) We have sometimes followed a different authority from what we followed in the body of the Dictionary, as we knew not which was the most exact.

Year of the Wid.	Before Christ
14004		THE world's creation; Adam's fall; Cain's birth. Gen. i—iv.
1203875		Cain murders Abel, and is divinely banished to Nod.
1303874		Seth is born, to the great comfort of his parents. Gen. iv. v.
9873017		Enoch, the seventh from Adam, is translated to heaven.
15862468		God commands Noah to warn the now fearfully corrupted inhabitants of the world of the approaching flood, and to call them to repent. Gen. vi.
16562348		Methuselah dies, aged 969 years.—The flood overflows the earth, and continues a whole year. Gen. v. ix.
17582246		Peleg is born.—About this time, or about 240 years after, at his death, Babe is built, languages confounded, and mankind dispersed: and Noah is said to have removed eastward, and founded the kingdom of China. Gen. xi.
17872217		Or 240 years later, Nimrod founds his kingdom at Babylon, and Ashur his in Assyria: and soon after Mizraim founds the kingdom of Egypt. Gen. x. 9, 10, 12.
19202084		The Arabian shepherds invade Egypt, and found a kingdom, which continues about 259 years.
20061998		Noah dies, aged 950 years; and two years after Abraham is born.
20791925		Chedorlaomer subdues Sodom, and the adjacent kingdoms.
20831921		Abram, called of God, leaves Ur, and begins his pilgrimage.
20921912		Chedorlaomer and his allies, waste the eastern part of Canaan, defeat the allied army of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c. and take Lot captive; but are defeated by Abram. Gen. xiv.
21071897		Sodom and its neighboring cities are destroyed. Gen. xix.
21081896		Isaac is born to Abraham; and not long after, Moab and Benammi to Lot. Gen. xix. xxi.
21431866		Isaac is intentionally offered in sacrifice; and seven years after he is married to Rebekah. Gen. xxii. xxiv.
21831821		Abraham dies, fifteen years after the birth of Jacob and Esau.
22651739		Jacob returns from Padan-aram, with a numerous family, after he had there served Laban for twenty years. About a year after, Judah marries a Canaanitess, by whom he had three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Gen. xxvii—xxxviii.
22761728		Joseph is sold into Egypt, five years after his mother's death.

Y. of Wld. or Chr.	Ref.
2752	1125	Tyre is built; the Midianites begin to oppress Israel; but after seven years are routed by Gideon. Judges iv—viii.
2807	1197
2816	1188	Jair dies; and Jephthah delivers Israel from the Ammonites. Judges x. xi.
2872	1132
2820	1184	According to most authors, Troy is taken and burnt by the Greeks, after a siege of ten years.
2848	1156	Eli begins to judge Israel. Samson is born. Judges xiii.
2888	1116	Samson pulls down the idol-temple on some thousands of the Philistines. Hereon the Hebrews attack them; but are repulsed with the loss of 4000. Soon after, they are again defeated, with the loss of 30,000: and the ark is taken. Eli's two wicked sons, who had corrupted the nation, are slain, and himself dies as he hears the tidings.— Perhaps these events happened twenty years sooner:
2909	1095	Or perhaps twenty or thirty years later Saul was made king. 1 Sam. x. xi.
2931	1073	Amasis king of Egypt drives out the second dynasty of shepherds: and they perhaps unite with the Philistines.
2941	1063	David is anointed king over Israel; and about four years after, Samuel dies, aged ninety-eight years. 1 Sam. xvi. xxv.
2949	1055	Saul is slain; and David begins to reign over Judah.
2960	1044	Multitudes of Syrians and Phœnicians, to avoid being tributaries to king David, fly into Crete, Greece, and Lesser Asia, and the north parts of Africa, under the command of Cadmus, Celix, Phenix, Thasus, &c. and carry letters and arts along with them. 2 Sam. viii—x.
2969	1015	David dies, and is succeeded by Solomon; who, in the fourth year of his reign, lays the foundation of the temple, and finishes it in the eleventh. 1 Chron. xxix. 1 Kings i—viii.
—	—	Ammon is king of Egypt; Minos of Crete; Tros of Troy; Cecrops of Athens; Hellon, the son of Deucalion, Phthiotis; Amphion and Zethus reign at Thebes of Greece, Layus the son of Cadmus being driven out; Sisyphus at Corinth. About this time, Dedalus the famous artist flourishes.
3029	975	Rehoboam and Jeroboam begin to reign over the Hebrews.
—	—	Shishak is king of Egypt. 1 Kings xii—xiv. 2 Chron. xi. xii.
—	—	Layus recovers the kingdom of Thebes. Thesus the Cretian is king, first in Lemnos, and afterwards of Cyprus. Hercules and Euristheas are born.
3049	955	Abijah king of Judah dies, and Asa succeeds him.
—	—	Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, and Omri, are in succession kings of Israel. 1 Kings xv. xvi. 2 Chron. xiv—xvi.
—	—	The Ethiopians invade Egypt, while their civil war continues, and seize on that country, and drown Orus their king in the Nile. His wife Isis dies of grief. Soon after the Ethiopians are routed by Asa.—Evander, and his mother Carmenta, carry the letters and arts of Greece into Italy.—About this time happened the Grecian expedition of the Argonauts. Hercules and Esculapius were deified. Thesus was banished from Athens, and the Heracides were chased out of Peloponnesus; and Agamemnon was king of Mycenæ. 2 Chron. xiv.
3090	914	Jehoshaphat succeeds his father Asa in the kingdom of Judah.—Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram, reign over Israel.
—	—	Amenophis the Ethiopian king of Egypt, is perhaps the Memnon of Persia; and his brother Proteus, who governed Egypt, might be his viceroy. 2 Chron. xvii—xx. 1 Kings xvi—xxii. 2 Kings i—viii.
3100	904	According to Sir Isaac Newton and us, Troy is taken and ruined; and, about twenty years after, Carthage is built, at least enlarged by Dido and her Phœnicians;—and not long after, the Greek poets, Homer and Hesiod, flourish.
3120	884	Jehu murders Jehoram king of Israel, and Ahaziah king of Judah, and reigns over Israel; he, and his descendants, Jehoahaz, Jehonah, Jeroboam and Zechariah, retain that throne 112 years. Meanwhile, Hazael and Benhadad are kings of Syria; Athaliah, Joash, Amaziah, and Uzziah, are kings of Judah; Meris, Cheops, and Cephren of Egypt. 2 Kings ix—xv. 2 Chron. xxii—xxvi.
3150	854	A colony of the Eolians remove from Greece to Lesser Asia; and, about fifty years after, another of Ionians; and the Heracides return to Peloponnesus:
3142	962	Or, perhaps fifty years later, Jonah preached to the Ninevites.
3194	810	Uzziah begins to reign over Judah: with him were successively contemporary, Jeroboam, Zechariah, Shallum, Menahem, and Pekahiah, kings of Israel: Mycerinus, Nitocris, Genefactus, Bochoris, and others, in Egypt. Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah prophecy.
3228	776	The Greek Olympiads begin; each of which contained four years.
3233	771	Pul, the founder of the Assyrian empire, invades Canaan.
3254	750	Rome is built, or at least much enlarged and walled.
3257	747	The kingdom of Babylon is founded by Nabonasser, or Baladan, probably the son of Pul the Assyrian; he gave name to the famed era of Ptolemy the historian.

Y. of Wid.	Ref. Chr.
3263	742	Jotham king of Judah dies, and is succeeded by Ahaz. Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, subdues Media, Syria, and part of the ten Hebrew tribes.—So and Sevechus are kings of Egypt. 2 Kings xv. xvi. 2 Chron. xxviii.
3282	721	Shalmaneser king of Assyria carries the ten tribes of Israel into captivity, in the sixth year of Hezekiah. 2 Kings xvii.
3294	710	Sennacherib, and his Assyrian host, are cut off before Jerusalem; and soon after he is murdered by two of his own sons, and succeeded by Esarhaddon. 2 Kings xix. Isa. xxxvii.
		The Medes revolt from the Assyrians, and erect a kingdom of their own. About this time, Tirhakah is king of Ethiopia; Merodach king of Babylon; Lycurgus lawgiver at Sparta; and the Greeks invade Sicily, and there found a multitude of cities.
3336	668	Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, after extending his empire from Media to African Ethiopia, dies; and most of the western provinces of his empire revolt. Psammaticus, after a long war, defeats the other eleven princes of Egypt, and becomes king. The Messinians of Peloponnesus, after two long and bloody wars with the Lacedæmonians, are betrayed by the Arcadians, and obliged to retire into Sicily: but Newton places this seventy years later, A. M. 3406. About this time Nahum prophesied.
3361	643	Manasseh, king of Judah dies, after a reign of fifty-five years.
3363	641	Ammon king of Judah dies, and Josiah succeeds him. 2 Kings xxi. 2 Chron. xxxiii.

3396	606	Cyaxares king of Media causes invite all the noble Scythians, who ruled his kingdom, to a feast, and murders them; drives the rest out of his territories, and seizes on Armenia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, provinces of the Assyrian empire.
3399	606	Nabopolassar, who recovered the kingdom of Babylon from the Assyrians, dies; and Nebucolassar, or Nebuchadnezzar the Great, succeeds him. 2 Kings xxiv. Dan. i—iv.
3408	601	After a furious war of six years, the Medes and Lydians make a peace; and they, together with the Babylonians, besiege and destroy Nineveh, and put an end to the Assyrian empire, after it had continued about 170 years. Nah. i—iii.
3416	588	The Jewish capital and temple are burnt to the ground by the Chaldeans, about the 27th of July. 2 Kings xxv. Jer. lii.
3430	574	Pharaoh-hopra, or Apries, receives a terrible defeat from the Cyrenians; this begins his disasters.
3432	572	After sustaining a siege of thirteen years, the Tyrians leave their city to the Chaldeans, who cast the materials of it into the sea, and leave the place like a scraped rock. Ezek. xxvi.
		While the Egyptians are in a state of rebellion against Pharaoh-hopra, Nebuchadnezzar invades and subdues the country, and makes Amasis, the chief of the rebels, his general or deputy in that kingdom. Ezek. xxix—xxxii.
3435	569	Nebuchadnezzar becomes distracted. Dan. iv. Pharaoh-hopra, having got a number of mercenary soldiers from Ionia and Caria, attempts to reduce the traitor Amasis, but is defeated; and Amasis commences king, and is a noted lawgiver, and reigns forty-four years. Ezek. xxxix.
3449	561	Nebuchadnezzar dies, and is succeeded by Evil-merodach.
		Solon the Athenian lawgiver, and Thales the philosopher, flourish. Solon died, A. M. 3445, and Thales twelve years after. Jer. lii. 2 Kings xxv.
3456	548	Cyrus and Darius the Mede, after a long war, and a variety of conquests, defeat the huge allied army of Baalshazzar king of Babylon, Cræsus king of Lydia, and Amasis king of Egypt, and the kingdom of Lydia, after it had stood 348 years, is made a province of Persia.
3466	538	Babylon is taken by Cyrus and Darius, and an end put to the kingdom of the Chaldeans, after it had stood 209 years, and their empire above seventy. Dan. v.
3468	536	Cyrus succeeds his uncle and father-in-law, in the whole Medo-persian empire. The Jews return from their captivity in Babylon. Ezra. i. Neh. vii.
		The Carthaginians, originally a colony of the Phœnicians, reduce a great part of Sicily. A plague raging at Carthage, they sacrifice their children to appease their gods. The Carthaginian army being defeated in Sardinia, are declared exiles by their own senate; but returning home, they take Carthage by force, and put the senators to death.

Y. of Wld.	Ref. Chr.
3475	529	Cyrus dies, and is succeeded by Ahasuerus or Cambyses.
3492	592	Artaxerxes the Magus being killed, Darius Hystaspes, whom we think Ahasuerus the husband of Esther, is chosen king of Persia by the neighing of his horse. Ezra vi. Esther i—x.
3499	505	Tarquin, the second king of Rome, having ravished the young lady Lactetia, her relations, in revenge, abolish the royal government of the state, and two annual consuls are appointed instead of the king.
3502	502	Aristagoras, a Persian officer, being fined for his miscarriage, stirs up the Ionian Greeks to revolt from Darius, and is assisted by the Athenians. This begins the war between the Persians and Greeks, which ended in the ruin of the Persian empire.
—	—	A terrible war rages between the Romans and Sabines, in which the latter are often defeated.
3509	485	Darius Hystaspes, king of Persia, after one fruitless invasion of Greece, dies, when just ready to begin a second, and at the same time to march against the revolted Egyptians.
3521	480	Xerxes, king of Persia, after reducing Egypt to a worse servitude than before, marches an army of near 3,000,000 of fighting men into Greece, and engages the Carthaginians to invade the Greek colonies in Sicily at the same time. The most of this army was ruined; and Xerxes forced to escape homeward in a fishing boat.
3540	464	Artaxerxes Longimanus, or long hands , succeeds Xerxes his father in the throne of Persia, and reigns forty-one years. In the seventh year of his reign, he sends Ezra; and in the 20th Nehemiah, to promote the repairs of Jerusalem. Some think him Ahasuerus the husband of Esther. Ezra vii. viii. Neh. i. ii.
3547	457
3560	444
3573	481	The Peloponnesian war, betwixt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians breaks out, and lasts fifty-two years.
3582	422	Sanballat builds a temple on mount Gerizzim, for Eleazer his son-in-law, where he and his successors officiate as high-priests of the Samaritans. Jo. iv.
3595	409	Nehemiah dies, after he had governed the Jews about thirty-six years. About this time, or twelve years later, Malachi prophesies. Neh. xiii. Mal. i—iv.
3600	401	Darius Nothus, king of Persia, dies in the nineteenth year of his reign, and is succeeded by Artaxerxes Mnemon, who reigns forty-four years. In the beginning of his reign, his brother Cyrus attempts to wrest the government from him; and Xenophon, an assistant of Cyrus, after his defeat and death, makes the famous retreat with his 10,000 Greeks.
—	—	Terrible wars rage between the Syracusans and the Carthaginians. A dreadful plague depopulating the city and territory of Carthage, their tributary Africans, and the Sardinians revolt.
3620	384	The Gauls take, and burn Rome, but are routed by Camillus.
3635	369	Epaminondas and Pelopidas, Thebans, having freed their state from the yoke of the Lacedæmonians, attempt to render it the mistress of all Greece.
3641	360	The cruel Artaxerxes Ochus, succeeds his father in the throne of Persia. He cruelly murders the Jews.
—	—	Philip king of Macedonia begins his conquests; Dion frees Syracuse from the tyranny of Dionysius the elder.
3654	350	After sixty-four years' struggling to free themselves from the Persian yoke, Egypt is terribly ravage and reduced, nor has a native ever since reigned therein.
3668	336	Alexander the Great, of Macedonia, begins his reign; in two years finishes the reduction of Greece, begun by his father. In A. M. 3671 he marches into Asia; in three years reduces the whole Persian empire; and in A. M. 3681, dies at Babylon. About the same time, or soon after, Jaddua the Jewish high-priest dies. Dan. vii. viii. xi.
—	—	After some years' contention among his captains for the chief rule, Alexander's empire is divided into four principal parts; but the two most noted and lasting were the kingdoms of Egypt and Syria. Dan. xi.
—	—	A terrible war rages between the Romans and Samnites; the Syracusans, and other Sicilians, are cruelly oppressed by the tyrant Agathocles, who makes war with the Carthaginians.
3690	314	Seleucus, after much struggling with Antigonus, another of Alexander's captains, renders himself king of Babylon, and not long after of Syria, &c.
3692	312	The era of the Seleucidæ, or kingdom of the Greeks in Syria, begins.
3712	292	Simou the Just, a famous high-priest and governor of the Jews, dies.
3719	285	Demetrius the son of Antigonus dying, Seleucus the king of Babylon seizes on all his dominions in Asia, and Syria.
3724	260	The Samnites, after many dreadful overthrows, obtain an alliance with the Romans.—About the same time the Sabines are reduced; several Greek states unite themselves in the Achæan league, and are headed by Aratus; the Gauls, invited by the king of Bithynia, to assist him against his rebellious brother, enter Asia, and settle in Galatia.
3732	278	After some years spent in a mad warfare with the Romans, Sicilians, Macedonians, and Lacedæmonians, Pyrrhus king of Epirus is slain, in an attack upon Sparta.

- Y. of B. of
Wid. Chr.
- 3754 250 Arsaces erects the potent kingdom of the Parthians.
- 3772 232 The first war of about thirty years, between the Carthaginians and Romans, wherein the former lost 700 ships of war, and the latter 500, is finished to the disadvantage of Carthage.—Sicily, soon after, is given up to the Romans.
- The disbanded mercenaries of Carthage rise in arms; and after three years of bloody war, are reduced by the Carthaginians. Meanwhile, Rome is overflowed by the Tiber, and the upper part of it is burnt to the ground.
- 3777 227 The Carthaginians under Hamilcar the father of Hannibal, invade Spain, and in nine years reduce the most of it.
- 3786 218 Upon Hannibal's taking and destroying the city of Saguntum in Spain, the Romans declare war against the Carthaginians. Hannibal marches from Spain into Italy, and there, though ill supported by his state, maintains the war against the Romans about twenty-two years; and sometimes reduces them to the very brink of ruin. His state obliged him to bring home his army to protect their country; the second Carthaginian war, soon after, ended to the advantage of the Romans. Meanwhile, the Romans had conquered the most of Spain.
- 3812 192 Antiochus the Great of Syria, was with Ptolemy Philopater of Egypt. Dan. xi. While the Romans wage war with the Gauls, and Nabis tyrannizes at Sparta, Antiochus the Great, instigated by the now fugitive Hannibal, and after various conquests of the shores and isles of the Mediterranean, enters into a league with part of the Greeks in Europe, and commences a war against the Romans; but in two years, he is obliged to sue for peace on the most shameful terms. About this time, Philopæmon lord of the Greeks of the Achæan league, carries on a war with Nabis, the tyrant of Sparta.
- 3829 175 Seleucus, king of Syria, is poisoned by Heliodorus his treasurer, and intended usurper of the throne. Antiochus Epiphanes, his brother, succeeds him; who, for about twelve years, proves a terrible scourge to the Jews and Egyptians, and at last dies miserably. Dan. viii. xi.
- 3837 167 Mattathias, a Jewish priest, finding that the high priests were monsters of wickedness, and bought their office from, and every way complied with, the wicked Antiochus, he levies an army; and he and his sons, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon Maccabeus, perform wonders of bravery against the Syro-grecians; and at last deliver their country. Dan. viii. xi.
- Peres, the king of Macedonia, and his allies, the Epirots, Achæans, and Bythinians, are reduced by the Romans, and the power of the European Greeks is abolished.
- 3855 149 The Romans send home 300 noted Achæans, after they had kept them prisoners about seventeen years. While the Carthaginians are engaged in war with Massinissa, king of Numidia, the Romans villanously declare a third war with them; which, in two or three years, issues in the total ruin of the Carthaginians, and the utter demolition of their capital, A. M. 3858.
- 3872 132 Attalus, the last king of Pergamus, dies; and the Romans pretend to be his heir. The Romans finish their conquests of Spain.—Soon after, Hircanus, the Jewish king, entirely shakes off the Syro-grecian yoke, and conquers the Samaritans, Edomites, and others.
- 3887 112 Ptolemy Physcon dying, leaves the kingdom of Cyrene to his son Apion; and empowers Cleopatra, his queen, to bestow Egypt upon his other two sons, Alexander, or Lathyrus, as she pleases.
- 3889 115 The two brothers, Cyzicenus, and Gryphus, contend in war for the kingdom of Syria.—Not long after, the Scordosci of Thracia cut off the Roman army of Portius Cato; and the Cambri, from Germany, ravage France and Switzerland.
- 3910 103 After murdering Hiempsal, his adoptive parent's eldest son, Jugurtha seizes on the whole kingdom of Numidia; but, after much bloodshed, is taken captive by the Romans; not long after, his kingdom is reduced to a province.
- 3906 106 Alexander Jannæus, the son of Hircanus, succeeds his brother Aristobulus in the government of the Jews, and raises that nation to a considerable pitch of grandeur; rendering himself master of the territories around, and compelling the people to leave their dwellings, or receive circumcision, but by wars rendered his kingdom unhappy. He so heartily hated the Pharisees who had done him some outrage, that, having defeated the rebels, he caused 800 of the principal Pharisees to be crucified in one day, while he and his concubines feasted upon an opposite scaffold; he, moreover, caused their wives and children to be butchered before their eyes. After his death, his wife by his advice, favoured the Pharisees.
- 3910 94 Tigranes, of Greater Armenia, recovers his father's throne, is chosen king of Syria, and conquers Armenia the Less, Cappadocia, &c. Mithridates, king of Pontus, begins to flourish; who, for twenty-six years, carries on a most terrible war against the Romans. Sometimes his conquests were very extensive, containing Lesser Asia, and extending to Greece.—Sylla and Lucullus, the Roman generals, obtain great advantages against him, but Pompey finally reduces him.
- 3916 88 After the Romans had reduced their revolting confederates in Italy, a civil war

		commences between Marius and Sylla, two of their chief men; which for a considerable time, renders Rome a scene of human blood. It is said, Sylla murdered about 100,000 citizens, and murdered, or proscribed ninety senators, and 2600 knights.
3033	71	The Roman slaves rise in arms against their masters: but are reduced, with the loss of 50,000. Next year, the famed Heraclea of Pontus is betrayed, plundered, and reduced to ashes by the Romans.
3986	68	Crete is reduced by the Romans.
3937	67	Pompey attacks the pirates: and in four months, takes or sinks 1300 of their ships; kills 10,000, and takes above 200,000 of their forces prisoners, and takes 120 of their towns, or strong holds.
3940	64	After the reduction of Pontus, Pompey recovers Syria: and next year, under pretence of deciding between Hircanus and Aristobulus, takes Jerusalem on a Sabbath-day; enters the sanctuary, and views the furniture thereof.
3950	54	Crassus the Roman perfidiously seizes 25,000 talents pertaining to the Jewish temple, and never after prospers.
3952	52	Cassius the Roman attacks the poor remains of the Jews that sided with Aristobulus, and carries off 30,000 prisoners.
3960	44	After Julius Cæsar had murdered multitudes of the Helvetians, Gauls, Belgians, and Britons, in his wars with these nations, and infinite numbers of Romans in his civil wars with Pompey, he becomes emperor or dictator for life; but is soon after murdered.
3960	44	Cassius, one of his murderers, imposes a tribute of 700 talents upon the Jews.
3966	38	Jerusalem is taken by Herod and Sossius the Roman.
3974	30	After two years spent in war with Brutus and Cassius, the destroyers of Julius Cæsar, and twelve more with Antony his partner, Augustus becomes sole emperor of the Romans.
3996	8	After reducing the empire to a pacific state, Augustus pretends to be willing to lay down his authority. The citizens of Rome are found to be 4,233,000. Horace and Macenas die. Cæcilius Isiodorus dies, worth 4116 slaves, 2680 oxen, and 200,000 of other cattle, and three millions sterling in cash.
4001	3	Our Saviour is born; peace reigns throughout the whole world; but Caverhill contends, that he was born A. M. 4009, or A. D. 6. Matt. i. Luke ii. Herod dies: Archelaus succeeds him as king.
4002	2	Five seditions happen in Judea, and are headed by Judas, or Thendas, and by Simon, Athronges, &c. Acts v.
4004	A. D.	1 Christ's parents return from Egypt, and settle at Nazareth.
4010	7	Judas of Galilee, and Sadducus, raise a bloody insurrection in Judea.
4017	14	Augustus dies on the 19th of August, and Tiberius, his adopted stepson, succeeds him. Luke iii.
4020	17	A most terrible earthquake overturns twelve cities in Lesser Asia, and buries most of the inhabitants in the ruins. Taccarinas, a Numidian, begins to raise commotions in Africa, which continue seven years.
4029	26	Calaphas is made high priest; Pilate governor in Judea.
4081	28	Or two years before, John Baptist begins to preach. Jesus is baptized. Matt. iii. Mark i. Luke iii.
4036	33	Christ is crucified, rises from the dead, and ascends to heaven.—The Holy Ghost descends on the apostles; and multitudes of Jews at Pentecost, and afterwards, are converted to Christ. Matt. xxvi—xxviii. Luke xxii—xxiv. Acts i—iv.
4038	35	Or five years after, Paul is converted. Acts ix. xxii. xxvi.
4040	37	Tiberius dies, and Calus Caligula, his adopted son, succeeds him: who, in the fourth year, is succeeded by Claudius, the son of Drusus, grandson of Tiberius.
4044	41	Cornelius and his family are baptized. Acts x. xi.
4047	44	James the brother of John is beheaded; Herod is eaten up of worms. Acts xii.
4051	48	Two tumults happen at Jerusalem; in one of which 10,000 Jews are killed by the Romans.—At this time, it is said, the citizens of Rome amounted to 6,900,000, which is almost the number of the whole inhabitants of England.
4055	52	The council of apostles is held at Jerusalem. Claudius, having with 30,000 men, in eleven years, drained the lake Fucinus by a great canal, exhibits a diverting show, of 19,000 criminals in 100 galleys, engaged in a sea-fight.
4056	53	Felix succeeds Cumanus in the government of Judea; and next year Nero succeeds Claudius in the empire.
4067	64	Nero, now become a monster of cruelty, causes burn Rome: and laying the blame on the Christians, commences a persecution against them.—Gessius Florus succeeds Albinus in the government of Judea. At his arrival, the Jews pelt him with stones, which occasions a dreadful series of murders, rapines, &c. Rev. vi. xii.
4070	67	100,000 Jews are massacred at Cesarea, Ptolemais, and Alexandria, besides multitudes that Florus murdered in other places. Cestius Gallus lays siege to Jerusalem, at the feast of tabernacles; but suddenly raises it without a re-son; and has 4500 of his troops cut off in their retreat. Vespasian invades Galilee with an army of 60,000; takes Gadara, Gamala, &c. Matt. xxiv. Luke xxi. Mark xlii.

4071	68	Nero, now become odious to all for his murders, &c. hearing of the revolt of the German legions, causes himself to be killed.
		After Galba, Otho, and Vitellius had each of them been emperor some months, Vespasian is chosen emperor by the armies in Judea and Egypt.
4072	69	Vespasian leaves Titus his son, to prosecute the war against the Jews.
4073	71	Jerusalem is taken and razed; and, in three years more, the war, in which about 1,350,000 Jews are cut off, is finished, and the land of Judea is sold for the emperor's use. Deut. xxviii. xix. xxxii. Matt. xxiv. Luke xix. xxi.
4084	81	After a short reign of two years, Titus dies, and is succeeded by his bloody and brutish brother Domitian.
		Apollonius Tyaneus, a heathen magician, and ape of Christ, flourishes. His life was not written till about a hundred years after, from fabulous memoirs and traditional romances.
4098	95	After barbarous murders of multitudes of Romans, Domitian raises a second persecution against the Christians; but by his wife and others, is next year assassinated, to the great joy of his subjects, and is succeeded by Nerva.
4101	98	Trajan, the adopted son of Nerva, succeeds him: his wars with the Dacians, and Parthians, Arabs, and Jews, mostly successful, distinguish his reign. He persecuted the Christians. Rev. vi. xii.
4119	116	The Jews of Syria, Egypt, &c. revolt, and are reduced with great bloodshed; but are scarce quieted, till, about twenty years after, Adrian cut off Bercocaba their leader, and 580,000 men, destroyed 985 towns, &c. Perhaps about a million of Jews were cut off, besides those which fell by the sword. Deut. xxviii. Matt. xxiv. Luke xvii. xix. xxi.
4140	137	Adrian, in the twentieth year of his reign, finished his new city of Jerusalem, which he called Elia Capitolina; and next year he died, and was succeeded by Antoninus Pius. Both of them were persecutors of the Christians. Rev. vi. xii.
4166	163	Marcus Aurelius, another persecutor, succeeds Antoninus Pius. His reign is noted for distressful wars with the Parthians in the east, and with the Germans, Marcomans, and Quadians in Europe.
4195	192	The temple of Vesta, and the temple of Peace, where the vessels of the Jewish sanctuary were deposited, are burnt to the ground.
4196	193	The Saracens defeat the Romans. After a butchering reign of twelve years, the Emperor Commodus dies, and is succeeded by Severus, who in his victorious reign of eighteen years, almost recovers the pristine grandeur of the empire.
4229	226	Or six years later, Artaxerxes, a noble Persian, having rendered himself king of his country, demands from the Romans their territories in Asia, and receives a terrible defeat.
4253	250	While Decius the emperor terribly persecutes the Christians, a plague of fifteen years' continuance begins to ravage the empire. Rev. vi. xii.
4265	262	Odenatus sets up for king of Palmyra or Tadmor; and for eleven years, he and Zenobiah his queen perform wonders of bravery against the Persians and Romans.
4316	313	After the Christians had for ten years been terribly persecuted by the heathens; and after the empire had for about 100 years been a scene of bloody struggling with the Persians, and with the Goths, of various denominations, and with a multitude of usurpers, Constantine the Great defeats Maxentius the heathen emperor, and publishes an edict in favour of the Christians. Rev. vi. xii.
4326	323	Constantine having defeated Licinius his heathenish partner, becomes sole emperor, and applies himself to abolish idolatry and superstition; and in about two years after, convenes the council of Nice to settle the affairs of the Christian church.
4332	329	Constantine begins to build Constantinople, where Byzantium had been built, about 987 years before; and soon after the imperial residence is removed to it, A. D. 334, and so more opportunity is given for the rise of Antichrist.
4340	337	Constantine the Great dies, and divides his empire among his three sons, Constantine, Constans, and Constantius. Great contention and war in the empire, and bloody persecution of the orthodox by the Arians, ensue. Rev. viii.
4364	361	Julian the apostate, and nephew of Constantine, succeeds the last of his sons, and re-establishes Paganism; but is cut off, after he had been Cæsar seven years, and emperor two.
4398	395	Theodosius the Great dies, after he had been emperor sixteen years; and with great activity he had brought the empire, and the Christian church, to much the same condition as Constantine the Great had left them in. After his death ensued terrible ravages of the Goths, Huns, Vandals, &c. till the western part of the empire was abolished. Meanwhile the church was plagued with the continued Arian, and the rising Pelagian, Nestorian, and Eutychian heresies, and the contentions and persecutions that issued therefrom. Rev. viii.

- 4448 445 The Britons, subject to the Romans, being terribly distressed by the Scots and Picts, invite the Saxons into England for their assistance. These barbarous heathens, from time to time, assisted by their countrymen from Germany, ruin the British church, and murder most of the ancient Britons, except a small handful in Wales. Soon after the Saxons become a kind of Christians.
- 4479 476 Augustulus the last emperor is deposed by the Hernali, and other barbarians, which he had disbanded from his army, headed by Odoacer, whom, though but a private soldier of the guards, they had chosen for their general or king. About this time, the empire began to consist of ten particular sovereignties.
- 4496 493 Odoacer is reduced, and treacherously murdered by Theodoric king of the Goths; who seizes his territory: about sixty years after, in A. D. 553, this kingdom of the Goths is reduced by Narses, the famed general of Justinian, the emperor of the eastern parts of the Roman empire.
- 4602 606 After the Roman bishops had long, and chiefly for the last 300 years, by force or fraud, struggled for the supremacy over the whole Christian church, Boniface the third, by flattery of the base Phocas, emperor of Constantinople, procures himself the character of universal bishop: and from this time, we date the rise of Antichrist. Rev. ix.—xi. xiii.
- Much about the same time, Mahomet, the eastern impostor, commenced his pretence to a supernatural mission and character; but it was some years after before he made his public appearance. Rev. ix. 1—11.
- 4625 622 Mahomet was expelled from Mecca; upon which he began to propagate his delusions by the sword. From this, the æra of the Mahometans, called the Hegira, or FLIGHT, viz. of Mahomet, begins.
- 4635 632 Or two years later, the Mahometan Saracens conquer, and put an end to the kingdom of Persia, after it had, for 400 years, been a terrible scourge to the Roman empire.
- 4669 666 Pope Vitalian, it is said, orders that public prayers be performed in the Latin tongue, and so marks the western churches with an implicit subjection to Rome.
- By this time, the eastern or Greek church, was much alienated from the Romish.
- 4715 712 Great contention about the worship of images, began in the church. While the eastern emperors, Leo Isauricus, Constantinus Copronymas, and Charles the Great of France and Germany, and multitudes of the clergy opposed it, the Popes and others promoted it.
- 4717 714 The Saracens enter Spain, and continue there about 900 years before they were finally driven out.
- 4755 752 Pope Zacharias begins to dispose of kingdoms, and gives away the kingdom of France from the true heir and line to Pipin, whose young master, king Childeric, is shut up in a monastery. In return for which Pipin, about four years after, assists Pope Stephen to commence a civil prince of the Duchy of Rome, and places adjacent: and Charles the Great, the son of Pipin, having by the Pope's assistance, seized the kingdom of the Lombards, confirms the Pope's civil right to his territories, and adds thereto; nay, kisses the steps of the stair as he went up to the Pope.
- 4763 760 About this time, the empire of the Saracens was in its principal grandeur.
- 4802 800 After reducing the kingdom of France, and great part of Germany, Charles the Great has the title of Emperor confirmed to him by the Pope. This is the rise of the German Empire. Afterwards, we find the German electors confirmed in their power by the Popes; and sundry of the Emperors deposed, when they displeased his holiness.
- 4823 820 Claude Bishop of Turin, with great boldness and success, propagates the truth in opposition to popery. Multitudes about Savoy and Piedmont embrace and adhere to it. Rev. xi.
- 4913 910 By this time, the Saracens were divided into a vast number of sovereignties, and their empire much weakened.
- 5053 1350 The Seljukian Turks who had, for almost 300 years before, been pouring themselves from the north-east, into Persia, Mesopotamia, Armenia, &c. erected the four sultanies, or kingdoms of Bagdad, Damascus, Aleppo, and Iconium, not far from the Euphrates. But some place the erection of Transgrolipix kingdom in Persia, A. D. 1033, or 1037, and his conquest of Bagdad in 1041. Rev. ix. 13, &c.
- 5069 1066 William, with an army of Normans, conquers England.
- 5099 1096 The European Christians begin their mad expeditions or crusades, for the recovery of Canaan from the Turks, and other Mahometans. At the expense of many millions of lives, this war is, to no purpose, carried on about 200 years. Meanwhile, the Seljukian Turks not a little harrassed the Constantinopolitan empire.
- 5163 1160 About this time, or sooner, the Waldenses in Savoy, Piedmont, and the south of France, become famous in their zealous opposition to Antichrist; and on that account, about a million of them are afterwards murdered by the Papists.
- 5206 1208 The French and Venetian crusaders in their way to Canaan, drive the usurping emperor of Constantinople from his capital, and retain it, and part of the empire, for fifty-seven years.

Y. of Wid.	Ref. Chr.
5213	1210	The Tartars, under Jenghiz-khan and his sons, over-run almost all Asia, and a part of Europe, and found the three Tartar empires of China, Persia, and Kipjak.
—63	63
5284	1281	Or about twenty years later, the Ottoman Turks found their empire, and begin their ravages on the Christians.
—	—	About the same time, the treachery of Edward, king of England, in the affair of Bruce and Baliol, occasions a ruinous and lasting war between Scotland and England. About forty or fifty years after, Edward the Third's claim to the crown of France, occasions a fatal and permanent war between France and England.
5373	1370	About this time, Wickliff and his followers in Britain become famous for their bold opposition to Popery, and their adherence to truth. Rev. xi. xiii. xiv.
—	—	About this time, John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, and their Bohemian and other German followers, commence their opposition to Popery, and are terribly persecuted and murdered. Rev. xi. xiii. xiv.
5403	1400	Tamerlane, with a great army of Tartars, ravages a great part of Asia, and gives the Ottoman Turks a most terrible defeat, and carries about their emperor Bajazet in an iron cage.
5456	1453	Constantinople is, with prodigious bloodshed, taken by the Ottoman Turks. On this occasion, multitudes of Greeks retire into the western parts of Europe, and contribute to the revival of learning in Italy, &c.
5495	1492	America is discovered by Columbus, a sailor of Genoa, supported by the king of Spain.
5220	1517	The reformation from Popery is begun by Luther, Zuinglius, &c. and for about fifty years, makes astonishing progress. That same year, about 90,000 German boors take up arms, but are crushed. Rev. xiii. xiv.
5528	1525	The war of the Anabaptists, Boors, &c. begins in Germany, in which about 600,000 perish.
5570	1567	In this and the year following, about 500,000 or 600,000, mostly Protestants, desert their habitations in the Netherlands, and flee into other countries, to avoid the terrible cruelty of the duke of Alva, deputy of the king of Spain, who boasted, that besides those slain in war, he cut off above 18,000 by the hand of the public executioner.
5601	1598	After near forty years' struggling, and the murder of perhaps near a million, the Protestants of France obtain in their favour the edict of Nantz, but which is recalled by Louis XIV. A. D. 1685.
5621	1618	The German emperor commences a war against the Protestants of Bohemia, and of the Palatinate of the Rhine, which once threatens the ruin of the Protestant interest in Germany; but after a war of thirty years, most of them, except the Bohemians, have their liberties confirmed to them by the treaty of Munster, or Westphalia, in 1648.
5644	1641	While God grants a noted revival to the churches in Britain, the Papists of Ireland massacre about 200,000 or 300,000 of the Protestants.
5691	1688	The attempts of James II. of England, and Louis XIV. of France, to ruin the Protestant interest, are checked by William, prince of Orange, and king of Britain.
5717	1714	An attempt to overthrow the Protestant religion in Britain is happily frustrated, by the seasonable death of queen Anne, and the accession of the family of Hanover.
5869	1866	About this time, we expect the downfall of Antichrist, and Mahometanism.
5944	1941	We expect the full glory of the millennium; but others, more learned and judicious, place this, and the former event, 150 years later than our calculation.
