Most merciful and gracious God, we would draw near unto thee through that new and living way which thou hast opened up, and we would lay on thine altar the sacrifice of thanksgiving for all the blessings of thy goodness. We bless thy name that thou hast preserved us during the past night, and raised us up in health and comfort to the light of another day. Let us never forget that it was by thy power we were created, that it is by thy providence we are sustained, that thou art the God of our lives, and the length of our days. We would look to thee as the Sovereign of the universe, and pray to be kept in subjection to the Father of our spirits. We would bear in mind that thou hast not only called us into being, but hast appointed us our place in the world; and in whatever situation we are, may we learn therewith to be content. May we not set our affections unduly on the things of this world, the fashion of which passeth away; but may we be daily laying up our treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, but where peace and happiness for ever reign. We have wickedly cast off our allegiance, and lifted against thee a rebellious arm, and had mercy not rejoiced against judgment, we must now have been associated with those apostate spirits that are reserved in chains of darkness, till the judgment of the great day. But blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. As his professed disciples, may we be enabled to forsake all and follow him. Quicken us, O Lord, by thy Spirit, that we may be alive unto thee; revive us by thy grace, that we may live a life of faith on the Son of thy love. Establish our hearts in thy fear, and guide our feet in the way of thy commandments; then shall we advance in the path of the divine life, and attain a meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light. O keep us back from presumptuous sins, cleanse us from secret faults, and make us to know, in our happy experience, the peace of those who love thy holy law. Give us that fear which is the beginning of wisdom, and that love which is the fulfilling of the law, and that charity which is the bond of perfectness, and all those graces which are the fruit of the Spirit, that we may show out of a good conversation the power of the gospel in renewing the heart, and regulating the conduct of the true believer. And when at last the time shall come, that thou wilt take down the earthly house of this our tabernacle, may we be found ready to enter into the habitation prepared for the faithful, even that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Take us under thy special protection this day. Wherever we are, and whatever we do, may we set the Lord before us, knowing that to thee we must at last give an account. We pray thee, to bless all whom we should remember at a throne of grace. Bless our friends, reward our benefactors, and forgive our enemies. And now we plead that thou wouldest hear our prayers and accept our sacrifice, through him whom thou hearest always, and in whom thou art ever well-pleased, our strength, and our Redeemer. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXIII.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN x.

REMARKS.

How delightful the character of Christ as the Shepherd of his people, the good Shepherd who giveth his life for his sheep. Think of the security of that fold into which Christ has brought his chosen. Around this, every enemy may rage, but into it satan himself shall not enter, though he were 'transformed into an angel of light.' Think of the happy condition of the household of faith, when they are superintended by him who possesses all power, and in whom dwells all fulness. He feeds his people like a flock, he leads them beside the still waters, and makes them lie down in green pastures. He strengthens the weak, comforts the sorrowful, and speaks peace to those that are troubled in spirit. He is touched with a fellow-feeling of all their infirmities, and he is ever ready to succour them that are tempted. And all this care and kindness is but preparatory to the higher gifts of his grace, when he shall bring them to the full enjoyment of that eternal life which is their promised portion. Blessed are those who can truly say, The Lord is my shepherd, and who in the exercise of a faith that has a good foundation, and in the possession of a hope that maketh not ashamed, are looking beyond this transitory scene, and seeking after the rest that remains to the people of God. He who came to give life to his followers, will feed such with heavenly bread, and make them meet for celestial blessedness.

These doctrines of our Saviour were not understood, and not believed, by the blind and bigoted Jews, and hence some said that he 'is mad,' and others that he 'hath a devil.' They are still despised and rejected by ignorant and ungodly men, but no enmity, and no opposition, can change the recorded decree, or affect the revealed truth, 'no man cometh unto the Father, but by the Son.' He is the door, and by him we must enter in, if we would be true members of that church of which he is the head, or subjects of that spiritual kingdom of which he is the ruler. This suggests a reflection of solemn import to all such as have been invested with the sacred office of the ministry, for it tests the motives from which they have sought, and the end for which they have coveted such an honour. And woe unto that man who has taken upon himself the responsibility of an ambassador, destitute of true love to his heavenly Master, and who is not willing to 'spend and be spent,' in winning souls unto Christ. What shall be the fate of such a wicked servant on that day, when the Lord shall say unto him, Give an account of thy stewardship! But it loudly calls on every professing disciple to ascertain the reality of his faith, that he may know what is the ground of his confidence, and the hope of his calling. The character of Christ's sheep, as given by himself, is this, that they follow him. They know his voice, they respect his authority, they submit to his directions. They know this to be both their duty and their safety, and they walk in the way which he points out. Such then as have a relish for divine things, and are hungering and thirsting after righteousness, have within their hearts the graces of the Spirit, and belong to that fold over which the good Shepherd watches with unwearied care and inexpressible tenderness. And O how great the peace, and how glorious the prospect of those, who have been enabled, through grace, to take up their cross and follow Christ! Trials and tribulations they may have to endure in the wilderness, but these will have an end, and when the fight of faith is over, the reward of victory will come. He who now calls them to watchfulness and steadfastness, will soon call them to join the redeemed in the land of uprightness and rest; where, with beatific visions of the divine glory, and sensible communications of divine love, they shall have fullness of joy and pleasures for evermore. The children of Zion may be joyful in their King, for he will defend them against all their enemies; he will deliver them out of all their temptations, he will purify them from all their guilt, and put them in everlasting possession of that heritage which is the portion of his people.

PRAYER.

We desire, O Lord, to draw near unto thee, believing that thou art, and that thou art the rewarder of them that diligently seek thee. We desire to worship thee as the former of our bodies, and the Father of our spirits; as the God of our lives, and the length of our days. We have nothing which we have not received, and we can hope for nothing which comes not from above. We would bless thee for the mercies of the past day. Thou hast supplied our wants. Thou hast defended us from danger. Thou art the author of every good and perfect gift. We would especially magnify thy name for the hope to which we are begotten through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. We desire to rest in his merits, and rejoice in his mediation; for he is the good Shepherd that has given his life for his sheep, and he is able and willing to save unto the uttermost all that come unto thee through him. He died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, and the gift of eternal life he will bestow on as many as believe on his name. We pray thee to unite us to him by that faith which is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen. Let not sin reign in our mortal bodies, but let Christ be formed in our hearts the hope of glory; that we may be found walking before thee, blameless and without rebuke. Enable us to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts. Of ourselves we are insufficient for any thing that is good; but we would rest in the promise of heavenly aid, and even glory in our infirmities, that the power of Christ may be made manifest in us. O let us be sanctified by thy truth, and guided by thy Spirit, and upheld by thine Almighty arm; then shall we triumph over every spiritual enemy, and be made meet for joining those who, through faith and patience, are now inheriting the promises. We bless thee for the instructions and consolations of thy holy word, and for the discoveries thou hast given us of thy character, and the promises thou hast made of thy grace in this message of love and peace. Enlighten our minds that we may understand its lessons, renew our hearts that we may walk in the way of its commandments, and prepare us for the full and final enjoyment of all those blessings which are the certain heritage of the true believer. We desire to cast on thy mercy, and commit to thy love, all whom we should remember when we approach a throne of grace. May he, of whom the whole family of heaven and earth is named, bless every family and every individual who belongs to the household of faith. And may those who are still afar off, be brought nigh through the blood of the everlasting covenant. Thou art a God of compassion, and we commend unto thee, those who are afflicted in body and wounded in spirit. And grant that those who are approaching the gates of death, may be drawing near the land of their eternal rest. We beseech thee to take us all under thy protection this night. Refresh our bodies with rest, and our spirits with the communications of heavenly love, and if it be thy blessed will that we see the light of another day, may we be prepared for its trials and its duties, by the direction and aid that cometh from above; and all that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXLIV.

SCRIPTURE—2 SAMUEL XXI.

REMARKS.

Sin has entailed on man present evil, as well as exposed him to future punishment. And we should remember that God is not only a just God, and will punish iniquity, but that he is a jealous God, and will visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children. This is his own declaration, and is not only true, but has been often verified in the dispensations of his providence. What calamities have been brought upon a nation by the unprincipled ambition, oppressive acts, and impious conduct of a wicked king! What misery and wretchedness have been entailed on a family by the profligate habits and the unchristian deportment of an ungodly parent! The history of Saul may be quoted as an example and illustration of these truths. He was anointed captain over the Lord's inheritance, but he forgot him by whom 'kings reign, and princes decree justice,' and much did his subjects suffer while he was permitted to sway the sceptre of Israel. But long after he was gathered to his fathers, and when by men his acts and iniquities were forgotten, the Lord visited their national sin with a famine, which lasted for the period of three years. Alarmed by this judgment, David inquired of the Lord the cause of this controversy with his people. 'And the Lord answered, It is for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites.' Many years had passed away since, in violation of personal honour and public faith, Saul had committed this guilty deed, against those who were living in peace and security under the protection of a national covenant. But it still remained as a debt against the house of Israel, and they must yet suffer for their sins. Seven men, of the sons of Saul, are demanded as an expiation for this offence, and they are delivered up by the king of Israel, that, atonement being made by their death, the Lord may turn from his anger, and look again with affection on his heritage. We cannot doubt that David was directed by divine wisdom in this matter, far less can we doubt 'that the word of the Lord is right, and all his works are done in truth.' The judgments of God are a great deep, and we cannot fathom the doings of him who is 'wonderful in counsel.' But he makes manifest, in all his dispensations and dealings with men, that 'the wages of sin is death.'

We sympathize with aged Rizpah, who gave such evidence of her affection and her grief for her lost sons, that making the rock her couch, and sackcloth her covering, she watched their lifeless bodies, that they might not be touched by the beasts of the field or the birds of the air. We give the tribute of pity and admiration to such an expression of maternal love; but surely it should suggest to us the higher and the holier duty of watching over the spirits of all that are dear to us, that they be not involved in the terrors of the second death. We sin heedlessly, and we forget the iniquities we have committed, but they are all noted in that book of remembrance which shall be opened on the day of reckoning, and which shall be found to contain a fearful account against those who have not washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. That day is hastening on to all, it is drawing near to some, and it is high time that we should awake to righteousness, and sin not. The fountain is still open that will cleanse us from our guilt, the assistance is still promised that will enable us to ascend the holy hill of God, and the light is still seen that guides along the 'narrow way' to the joys of the invisible city. This should quicken and encourage us in the work given us to do, and keep us from contracting the guilt of those who sin more freely because grace has abounded. It is on the Lord's strength, as well as on the Lord's mercy, that we must rely, for it is he alone that can break the bonds of our captivity, and make us stand in the liberty of Christ. And if we but desire and plead earnestly for this spiritual freedom, he will give us the necessary power for meeting every trial, and overcoming every temptation, and we shall be more than conquerors through him who has loved us.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we adore thee as the sovereign and righteous ruler of the universe. By the dispensations of thy providence, and by the declarations of thy word, thou hast taught us that it is an evil and bitter thing to forsake the Lord our God, and still our delight has been in the pleasures and service of sin. But we rejoice to know that there is forgiveness with thee that thou mayest be feared, and plentiful redemption that thou mayest be sought after. We praise thy name that thou hast opened up a fountain for sin and for uncleanness, and that thou hast invited all who will to repair thither, that they may be purified from their guilt. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, and we pray that, for his sake, thou wouldst create within us clean hearts, and renew within us right spirits. O create us after thine own image, in righteousness and true holiness. We come before thee according to thy commandment, and we wait for a Father's blessing. Grant unto us the attainment of personal holiness; bestow on us the gift of domestic peace;

and, not only united by the ties of natural affection, but by the bond of Christian love, may we have the well-founded hope of being associated together, when the ransomed of the Lord shall enter on their incorruptible inheritance, and when, in thy presence, they shall have fullness of joy. While we live in the world, may we live as members of the household of faith, as children of the family of adoption, and as heirs of the heavenly inheritance, that thus washed, and justified, and sanctified, we may be prepared for joining the spirits of the just made perfect in the land of uprightness and rest. Make us grateful for the privileges we enjoy, make us diligent in the use of the means we possess, and make us ready for the change that awaits all living, then shall we be enabled to say with thy servant, For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. We desire to make supplication for all men. Awaken the thoughtless to a sense of their danger; arrest the wicked in their guilty career; and give light and strength to those who are asking the way Zion-ward. Have compassion on the afflicted, impart consolation to the mourner, and prepare the dying for a happy immortality. Let our friends be blessed with thy favour, and our enemies experience thy forgiving mercy. And now, O Lord, we commit ourselves and all that is dear unto us to thy fatherly care. While we enter on the duties of this day, let a sense of thy presence restrain us from sin, and quicken us in every good work; and let nothing separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. And all that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXI.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XI. 1—29.

REMARKS.

In the distress of this affectionate family they send a message to Him who never heard the cry of the afflicted in vain. Yet he seemed to have forgotten and neglected them. Great was their bereavement, in the loss of one to whom they were so strongly attached, but it would add bitterness to their grief that they seemed forgotten and forsaken by that friend in whose constancy and kindness they placed the firmest reliance.

This delay was the cause of momentary sorrow to them, but it has been the cause of permanent joy and gladness to many thousands since that period. There was a purpose of love and mercy in this procedure of the Saviour, because it was to prepare the way for a manifestation of divine power, which should be the foundation of faith and hope to believers until the end of the world. He was to show his disciples that he possessed the attribute of omnipotence, and, by recalling the departed spirit, convince them that his empire had no limit, seeing that the dead heard his voice, and were quickened by his word. All doubt was removed of the actual decease of Lazarus, by the fact of his having lain four days in the grave, and there could be no disputing that the agency was divine which raised the dead from the chambers of corruption.

The mourners see that the Lord is not only from God, but that he is God, the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person. And the consolation which this enlarged and enlightened view of his character imparted, was beyond all that words can express. When they knew that the attributes of power, wisdom, love, and mercy belonged to him for whom they felt so strong an attachment, and in whom they reposed such an undoubting confidence, they sorrowed not as those that have no hope. They felt satisfied that, if he guarded his own as the apple of his eye, precious in his sight must be the death of his saints, and that their departed friend must be safe and happy in the keeping of him who is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

And such must ever be the resignation and peace of those who know the character, and can trust the love of him who came to seek and to save us. Death is accompanied with much that must ever fill the mind of man with anxiety and disquietude, for it implies the breaking of ties which cannot be dissolved without pain and grief. But unspeakable is the consolation of that voice which is heard from above, saying, I will ransom thee from the power of the grave, I will redeem thee from the bonds of death. 'O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction.' Such is the voice which every believer hears, and such the consolation which every true disciple experiences. When we can look to Jesus as the appointed Messiah, and rely on him as the resurrection and the life, we can witness the departure of our friends with hope, and we can contemplate our own dissolution without dismay. In some respects there is, in this world, one event to the righteous and the wicked, and we see that sorrow and separation are the lot of all who live. But, beyond the precincts of this passing scene, there is a land from which every cause of grief and trouble is excluded, and where the purest happiness shall be for ever enjoyed. This is the kingdom which Christ came to purchase, it is the inheritance which he ascended to prepare, and it is the portion he shall bestow on his people, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in them that believe.

PRAYER.

How excellent, O Lord, is thy name in all the earth! Thou hast set thy glory above the heavens. Thou alone art worthy to receive all blessing, and honour, and glory, and praise, for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are, and were created. We bless thee that thou hast opened up a way of access into the holiest of all, and that we have the privilege of drawing near unto thee, through him who is the way, and the truth, and the life. Great, O Lord, is thy goodness, and thy tender mercy is over all thy works. Thy loving-kindness is new unto us every morning, and thy faithfulness every evening, and what shall we render unto thee for all thy benefits? We desire to offer unto thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving for the daily gifts of thy providence, for thou hast watched over us with a tender care, and supplied our wants with a liberal hand, and it is because thou art kind and of long-suffering patience that we are still in the land of the living and the place of hope. But we would especially adore thy love and thy compassion, as manifested in the gift of thy well-beloved Son. We bless thee, that through the Lord our righteousness thou hast redeemed us from the captivity of sin, and ransomed us from the power of the grave, and raised us to the honour and the hope of those who are sons of God, and heirs together of the grace of life. May we live mindful of the shortness and uncertainty of time, knowing that here we have no continuing city, and may we be making daily and active preparation for that change which will call us away from the place we now occupy. It is appointed for all men once to die, and after death cometh the judgment; but we rejoice to know that he on whom our help has been laid, is the resurrection and the life, and that all who sleep in Jesus shall be raised up, by divine power, to the possession of a life that shall never end, and to the enjoyment of a happiness that shall never be interrupted. Let this hope soothe our sorrows, and purify our affections, and elevate our desires, and quicken our diligence, that through the means of grace we may attain that holiness necessary for the enjoyment of the heavenly kingdom. As partakers of a holy calling, and candidates for an immortal prize, may our affections not be on this world, but on those things that are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God; that thus filled with the Spirit, and animated with the hope of another and a better country, we may go on our Christian way rejoicing. Let the promise of a coming redemption inspire us with fortitude, and patience, and resignation amidst the sorrows and trials that abound in the land of our pilgrimage, knowing that the end of all such troubles are at hand, for in the paradise above there shall be fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore. It becomes us to acknowledge thy goodness to us in all that we daily enjoy; and we desire to commit ourselves to thy care during the silent watches of this night. If thou art pleased to spare us to the light of another day, O prepare us for the enjoyment of its privileges, and the performance of its duties. May we hallow thy sabbath, may we encompass thine altar, and may we know, in our happy experience, that it is a good thing for us to wait on thee in all the ordinances of thine appointment. May the word of thy grace and the services of thy temple be blessed for our spiritual improvement, that ours may be the path of the just, which, like the morning light, shineth more and more unto the perfect day. We pray for the speedy arrival of that time when the knowledge of the Lord shall fill the earth as the waters cover the sea. Give unto thy Son the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost ends of the earth for his possession, that all nations may see thy salvation, and every people call him blessed. Hear us in behalf of all for whom we should pray. Thou knowest their condition, in mercy supply their every want. We wait for thy promised blessing,—lift upon us the light of thy countenance, and give us peace, for Christ's sake. Amen.

TWENTY-FIRST WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXVII.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS LXVI. LXVII.

REMARKS.

PSALM LXVI. This psalm seems to have been written by David immediately after some signal deliverance had been effected for himself and his people. Jehovah had strengthened and comforted him in his trouble, and in due time had granted to him deliverance. The psalmist seems to have been rightly exercised under affliction; for his heart is deeply affected with a sense of the divine goodness towards him, and out of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh. He calls upon all men to honour God the Saviour, and to consider gratefully the mighty works done by him for Israel's salvation in former times.

Whilst the psalmist thus speaks of the gracious workings of Jehovah towards his people generally, the fire of gratitude for personal and precious blessings glows in his bosom, and he expresses a holy resolution to pay, in the house of God, and in the presence of all God's people, the vows which his mouth had uttered in the time of trouble. Let us, while we read these pious and grateful breathings of the sweet singer of Israel, seek that our hearts be affected as his, by the goodness of the Lord towards us. Let us remember all the way through which ne has led us, and resolve by his grace to dedicate our preserved lives and our ransomed souls to his honour and service.

PSALM LXVII. This is one of the most beautiful of those inspired songs, in which the ancient church was wont to celebrate the praises of her God and King; to profess her faith in the promises of the Messiah, and to express her earnest desire for their accomplishment. It refers almost entirely to the advent of Christ. This is the mercy promised to the fathers, so ardently implored in the commencement of the psalm.

Great benevolence characterizes this prayer of the church. She seeks this mercy and blessing, this light of God's countenance, not for herself alone, but in order that (ver. 2.) God's way of pardoning and blessing the guilty may be known over the whole earth, and 'his saving health,' that is, his free, and full, and everlasting salvation, preached to all the nations of the world; in the spirit of purest benevolence, God's own people earnestly supplicate the coming of the promised Saviour, in order that the men of every land may be glad and sing for joy, under the peaceful, just, and merciful reign of Messiah the Prince.

Zeal for Jehovah's honour and glory also characterizes this beautiful prayer of the church; she seeks that multitudes besides the inhabitants of favoured Judea, (ver. 3—7.) should be brought to acknowledge Jehovah as their God: yea, that all the people of all lands should be made to worship and praise him.

The prayer of this psalm has, in part, long since been answered. In the fulness of time, Messiah, the Hope of Israel, appeared in the world, full of grace and truth; and having finished the work given him to do as Israel's Saviour, he commissioned his servants to go and preach the gospel of salvation to every creature. Since his own time, mercy and forgiveness have been proclaimed in his name to many a Gentile land, and by means of his gospel many immortal souls, in every generation, have been quickened to bring forth fruit unto holiness. And this prayer of the ancient church is being answered still, in this remote land of the Gentiles, and in many other Gentile nations: it shall continue to be answered till all nations praise God, and all the ends of the earth fear him. Let us seek to possess and cherish the benevolent and pious spirit which this psalm exhibits; and while we pray for the extension of the knowledge of Christ, let us use all our influence, and cheerfully expend our means, in order that God's ways may be made known to the poor and ignorant at home, and his saving health revealed to the multitudes of perishing souls in heathen lands.

PRAYER.

Our Father which art in heaven, grant unto us, for the sake of thy dear Son, the gift of thy Holy Spirit, that we may worship thee who art a Spirit, in spirit and in truth. Quicken us, O Lord; our souls cleave to the dust. Cause that while we are expressing the words of devotion, our hearts may be devout. Holy Father, we are unworthy to be called thy children. We have sinned against thee, and what can we answer, O thou preserver of men? Behold, God our shield, look upon us in the face of Jesus, thine Anointed. Blessed be thy name, that thou hast sent him into the world, to obey, and suffer, and die for us, and that thou hast revealed him unto us, as the way, the truth, and the life; the only and the all-sufficient Saviour. Our eyes have seen, and our ears have heard, what prophets and wise men desired to see and hear, but were not permitted. Our ears have heard the glad tidings of a perfect salvation, provided in Christ Jesus, for the very chief of sinners, and we trust that by faith our eyes have seen Jesus as our own ever living and ever gracious friend. What can we render unto thee, O Lord, for all thy goodness to our souls? We bless thee, for all we have received of thy kindness, in the days that are past; for all the warnings, and reproofs, and consolations of thy good Spirit; for all the instructions and comforts of thy holy word; and for all the care and watchfulness of thine adorable providence. We bless thy name for the means of grace, and especially for the opportunity which this day affords of going up into thy house to worship thee, and hear thy message of peace. O send out thy light and thy truth; let them lead us, let them bring us into thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles. Then will we go unto the altar of God, unto God, our exceeding joy. Bless Zion's provision every where this day, and send forth each of thy ministering servants to his people, in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ; so that this sabbath may be a great day of the Son of man, a day on which multitudes shall be added to the church of such as shall be saved, and all thy people built up in their holy faith. O Lord, have mercy on the lands where no sabbath is enjoyed, where no Saviour is known. Cause the light of thy gospel soon to shine upon them, that all nations may fear thee, and all people praise thee. Accompany with thine effectual blessing all the efforts of thy servants in heathen lands to bring men to the Saviour, and endow us with that spirit of holy benevolence which will not be satisfied till the saving knowledge of God be circulated over the whole earth. Be present with our friends and brethren in affliction. Make known to them the joys of thy salvation. Sanctify their troubles for the good of their souls. Forgive the thoughtless and irreligious in the midst of us. Bring them to a better mind, and by thy grace lead them to receive and rejoice in the Saviour, whom hitherto they have despised.

Again we implore thy favour and friendship for ourselves. Our hope is in thee, and our confidence in thy mercy. Never leave us, never forsake us. Deal bountifully with our souls, and graciously accept of us, and of our service, for Christ's sake. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXVIII. 18.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXVIII.

REMARKS.

The preceding psalm, which we read in the morning, is an ardent prayer of God's ancient people for Messiah's advent; this is a prophecy of Messiah's conquests, and of the precious and permanent benefits resulting from his finished and accepted work. It is one of the inspired songs which were primarily intended to celebrate the removal of the ark of God to the hill of Zion; on the occasion of this removal all Israel were glad, and ascended the holy mount of God singing of Jehovah's power and goodness, and of his triumphs over his own and his people's foes. But this joyful event was typical of a better thing to come; it was typical of the ascension of Jesus the divine Mediator into the heavenly Zion—the temple of the living God; and to celebrate this glorious event was the prophetic design of the psalm before us. And surely if ancient Israel rejoiced in the removal of the ark, to the mount of which God had made choice—if they rejoiced because in this event they had the assurance of God's presence in the midst of them, to strengthen, and comfort, and defend them; much more may we rejoice that our Redeemer has returned to the world whence he came, that 'he hath ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, and receiving gifts for men, yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them.' This event is our infallible assurance that God the Holy Spirit will constantly dwell in our churches, in our families, in our hearts; for thus spake the Saviour, 'If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I depart, I will send him unto you, and he shall abide with you for ever.'

The resurrection and ascension of our blessed Lord, are the great proof of Jehovah's acceptance of his mediation. 'He humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross; wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name,' and put all power and authority under him. It is therefore, because of our Lord's ascension into heaven, that all the predictions of this psalm are, or shall be accomplished, and that all the rich and glorious blessings of his salvation, and especially the gift of his Holy Spirit, are bestowed on the church, and that all nations shall serve him. It is because Jesus has been received up into heaven as his people's glorified Mediator, that all his elect, of every generation, and of every country, shall come unto him, that all the tribes from the fountain of Israel, (ver. 26—35.)

Benjamin and Judah, Zebulun and Naphtali, now perishing in unbelief, shall embrace the Messiah, and the fulness of the Gentile nations be given unto him for his inheritance: Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands unto God, and princes shall come to him out of Egypt; all kingdoms shall sing unto God, to him that rideth on the heaven, to the God of Israel, who giveth strength and power unto his people.

What a source of perpetual joy should the ascension of our blessed Lord be to us; he who loved us and gave himself for us, is in heaven receiving the reward of his vicarious obedience and death. 'If we loved him, we would rejoice because he hath gone to his Father.' He who died for our sins, is raised for our justification. He lives to carry on and perfect the salvation of his people, to instruct them by his word and Spirit, to intercede for them with his divine Father, to lead and defend them, to make all things work together for their good. Greater is he that is for us, than all that can be against us, and nothing shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Seeing that we have a great High Priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession, being in nothing terrified by our adversaries: and having such an High Priest who is also a king upon his throne, our King and Saviour, let us come boldly to the throne of grace that we obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

PRAYER.

Most merciful Saviour! behold from heaven thy dwelling-place, us thine unworthy worshippers, and give ear to the voice of our supplications. Thou art crowned with glory and honour, adored by all the hosts of heaven; thou art King of kings, and Lord of lords, God over all, and blessed for ever. Blessed be thy great and glorious name, that we are permitted and invited to address thee as our Lord, and that thou hast bidden us ask any thing from thee, with the assurance that thou wilt bestow it upon us. O Lord, give us for thine own name's sake, of those gifts which thou hast received for rebellious men; give us, we entreat thee, that faith without which it is impossible to please God, that evangelical repentance, without which we must perish, that holiness, without which no man can see the Lord. Give us, we beseech thee, thy Holy Spirit of promise, that all these graces may be implanted and flourish in our souls, and that we may be built up in holiness and comfort through faith unto salvation. Give us, O Lord, the portion of thy redeemed family, the bread of life which thy children eat, the hopes which thy children cherish, the character which thy children exhibit, the honours with which thy children are crowned, the heaven in which thy children shall dwell for ever. Gracious Lord, we ask all these things believing; for thy mercy and truth's sake bestow them upon us. God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we bless thee that thou hast raised him up, and given him glory that our faith and hope might be in thee. We believe that thou art reconciled to us through the merits of thy Son, and we hope in thy faithfulness, and goodness, and justice, and power, in him. O let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand; upon the Son of man, whom thou madest strong for thyself, so will not we go back from thee: quicken us, and we will call upon thy name. Heavenly Father, we bless thee for thy great goodness manifested to thy church on this day of the Son of man. Thou hast given the word, and great has been the company of them that published it in our own and in other lands. Let thy Spirit descend upon it, as the rain and the dew from heaven, that by means of it thy weary heritage may be refreshed again. Do thou especially bless thy word addressed to us; enable us to receive it as the word of God, which is able to save our souls. Bless thy ministering servant who was this day the helper of our faith and joy in the Holy Ghost; strengthen his hands, and encourage his heart, and make him a great blessing to us, and all that worship with us. Gracious Lord, forgive the sin of our holy things, of unworthy hearing, of the want of suitable interest in the great things which belong to our peace. Bless the whole church of Christ upon the earth; add to her daily such as shall be saved. Bless the poor and friendless, the diseased and the dying; supply their wants and save their souls. Protect us during the night; if thou art pleased to spare us, go with us into the duties of the week. Let the love of Christ constrain us to live in all things, not unto ourselves, but unto him who died for us and who rose again. Hear, answer, and accept of us, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVII. 37.

SCRIPTURE—2 SAMUEL XXIII.

REMARKS.

The first seven verses of this chapter contain the last or dying words of David, the king of Israel; the last words of one who was called of God to occupy a very distinguished place in his church and in the world; of a man eminently characterized by talents consecrated to the service of the Most High. We are anxious to know the last words of a good man, to know what were his sentiments in the hour of death, and in the immediate prospect of eternity; to know what were his consolations, and desires, and hopes, while the world was receding from him, while his body was about to return to the dust, and his spirit to God who gave it. And what were David's dying words? He does not speak of the good he had done in the world, of the glory he had won for himself in the battles of the Lord, or of his zeal for Jehovah's honour or Jehovah's house. He speaks of himself, indeed, but it is with unfeigned humility and gratitude. He remembers his lowly origin as the son of the shepherd Jesse, and ascribes all his exaltation to the sovereign kindness of Israel's God, ver. 1, 2. He remembers that he had furnished the church with her sweetest songs of praise, but he acknowledges that all their beauty and richness of devotion were the inspiration of God's own Spirit; that he was no more than the honoured instrument whom the God of Jacob employed to speak and write for the benefit of the redeemed in all ages. His dying sentiment, regarding all he had attained and all he had done was, 'Not I, but the grace of God which was given me.'

And while David, on his dying bed, remembers the past with humility and gratitude, he anticipates the future with glowing delight. Under the illuminating influences of God's Spirit, he foresees and foretells the advent of the Messiah, (ver. 3, 4.) and his pious soul labours for images to show forth the glory and blessedness of Messiah's reign. Thus may his words be rendered: 'The governor of men shall be the Just One, ruling in the fear of the Lord.' He who is coming to rule over Israel, to rule over all nations, is holy, just, and good, and his laws and ordinances shall partake of his own character, and be promotive only of righteousness in the fear of God. How blissful the results of his appearing? 'He shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth; even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain.' Just as the light of the sun, in a cloudless morning, chases away all the shadows of the gloomy night, so does David foresee, at Messiah's coming, all spiritual, and moral, and penal darkness disappear from round about God's people, the Sun of righteousness shining over them, and the Light of the world dwelling in the midst of them; and just as the softening showers refresh and beautify the earth, which long-continued drought has withered, so does dying David foresee the moral desert affected by the coming of the Saviour. It is made to blossom as the rose, and to bring forth fruit to the praise of God's grace.

And how happy in his own soul does dying David appear! He has an interest in God's everlasting and well-ordered covenant. David knew this, and in his dying moments he exults, saying, 'What need I more: God is my portion and heaven is my home; this is all my salvation and all my desire.'

But David, in his last moments, also gives a testimony against the foes of God, and of their miserable destruction at last.

What a beautiful illustration does the death-bed of David, as exhibited in these verses, afford of his own saying in Psalm xxxvii. 'Mark thou the perfect and behold the upright, for the latter end of that man is peace.' How peaceful, how hopeful, how happy was the latter end of David! Are we interested in that covenant which was all his salvation and all his desire? Nothing else can comfort us in the near prospect of dissolution. O then, let each one of us obey the voice of God when he says to us, 'Incline your ear and come unto me: hear, and your souls shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David.'

The remaining part of the chapter (ver. 8—39.) is occupied with a list of the mighty men who figured in the court and camp of David. They are classified according to the daring and greatness of their exploits. David, we know, was an eminent type of the Messiah, and perhaps the Spirit of God has preserved the names of David's warriors, and recorded their deeds as types of the soldiers of the Lord Jesus Christ. And when we read of their valour in David's cause, and of the honours given them in the records of truth, we should seek to have our names written in heaven, as followers of the great Captain of salvation.

PRAYER.

O God, thou art our God, and we will praise thee; thou art our fathers' God, and we will exalt thee; thou art the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and we will magnify thy name together. We bless thee for all thy loving-kindness and tender mercy towards us. We are guilty, and merit nothing but thine everlasting displeasure; we are depraved, and cannot serve thee or love thee as we ought. Yet hast thou been favourable to us, and loved us freely. We bless thee for the salvation which is in Christ Jesus thy Son. We bless thee that he, in the prospect of whose coming dying David rejoiced, hath appeared, and put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Gracious Father, interest each one of us in his obedience and death, that we may have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified. Enable us to lay hold of that covenant of which he is the mediator, thine own everlasting covenant, which is ordered in all things and sure. Give us grace to submit ourselves to the authority of him who is the Just One, to make his law our delight and our study all the day, and to have it for our meat and our drink to do his holy will. We praise thee, O God, for the light of another morning, and for the rest and refreshment of the past night. We bless thee for all the instruction, and consolation, and reproof addressed to us yesterday in the house of prayer, and for all the precious blessings of the Christian sabbath. We beseech thee let not thy word return unto thee void. Cause it to prosper in the thing wherefore thou hast sent it, and to be unto us the savour of life unto life. Keep us in thy fear all the day long. Whether we are in the house or by the way, whether we are mingling with our brethren, or walking in solitude, may we cherish the sentiment, Thou God seest us, and do all things honestly as in the sight of all men. While we are diligent in business, make us fervent in spirit, serving thee. Father of all the families of the earth, bless our family and friends; lift the light of thy countenance upon them, and be gracious unto them. Grant, O Lord, that all who are our relatives may be the friends of Christ, and heirs of his everlasting kingdom. We beseech thee to visit in mercy our afflicted brethren, and to pour the balm of thy consolation into every grieved soul. Let thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. O let the people praise thee, let all the people praise thee. We beseech thee, keep our hearts in the love of God, and preserve us to thy kingdom and glory. Mercifully forgive our sins, and hear our prayers, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVI. 8.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XI. 30—57.

REMARKS.

In the morning we read the last words of David, an eminent servant of God, and we saw in them the peace and hope which an assured interest in the covenant of grace can impart to the soul in the immediate prospect of death. In this chapter we read of the death of Lazarus of Bethany, another holy man, but we are not told what were his dying words. Circumstances like this are not uncommon in the Bible. The Spirit of God has recorded the dying sayings of Jacob, of Moses, of David, and of Stephen, the first martyr for Christ, while he has given us no record of the last words of Abraham, or of Joshua, or of the apostle Paul. This difference, which at first sight seems accidental, may be designed by the Holy Spirit for the comfort of many who wait around the dying beds of Christian friends. From some of these beds we will hear the language of holy rapture, from others expressions of calm resignation and humble hope, but in other cases the lips of our departing Christian friends may, from the nature of their disease, be sealed in silence, or from the temporary hidings of God's countenance, they may express painful doubt and anxiety, or what is more distressing still, from their tongues may flow words of raving incoherence and folly. But let not Christians be amazed in such circumstances; the last words of only a few of God's saints are recorded, and these are fraught with comfort and instruction to us; of Lazarus and the rest of God's servants we know not but that they exhibited, though God was graciously present with them all in the moments of dissolution, the same silence, or the same fears, or the same disordered reason which our dying friends exhibit.

Jesus the Saviour was now (ver. 30—44.) near the grave of his friend Lazarus, and what compassion, and piety, and majesty manifested themselves in him! What compassion! He mingled his tears with those of the bereaved sisters; 'Jesus groaned in spirit and wept:' he wept in sympathy of their grief: he wept at the sight of the suffering and anguish which sin had spread even among his own people: he wept when he saw the sweetest of man's earthly affections made, by reason of sin, the source of their bitterest woes. What piety! As the servant of the Father, Jesus humbly acknowledged the sovereignty of God, and his heart sent up to heaven its breathings of gratitude for the possession of that power about to be exercised for his own glory. What majesty also appeared in the Son of God! He stood by a grave upon whose tenant the fearful process of putrefaction had begun. He stood there in the consciousness of almighty power, ready to quicken the cold clay, to summon back the departed spirit from its unseen habitation, and to cause it to enter again the tabernacle it had forsaken. He stood by the grave in which Lazarus lay a cold and putrid corpse, and, with the full assurance of being obeyed, he cried with a loud voice, 'Lazarus, come forth,' and the spirit of Lazarus, in the eternal world, heard his voice, and the cold dust in the grave obeyed it.

We are not told the effect of this miracle of love upon the minds of Martha and Mary; no doubt though lately burdened with a weight of sorrow, they were now oppressed with excess of joy. At such a moment their hearts must have been too full for utterance, and so the Spirit of God has given us no account of their feelings. But the effects of the miracle upon several classes of the spectators are mentioned, (ver. 45—50.) 'Many of them believed in Christ, when they had seen the things which he did.' It was good for them that they came to the house of mourning, for the Spirit of God, working by the miracles which Christ did, and the words which he spoke there, produced saving faith in their souls, and made them new creatures. But to others this manifestation of Christ's power and grace was only the savour of death unto death; they went from the exhibition in malignant unbelief, to expose the Son of God to the increased hatred of his enemies. O the depravity of man's heart! Miracles and signs cannot subdue it: nothing can, save the almighty working of God's own Spirit.

That compassionate and mighty Saviour who loved Martha, and Mary, and Lazarus, who honoured their house with his company, and who was their help in time of trouble, now addresses us by his Spirit in his word, saying, 'Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.' Let us say unto him, 'Come in, thou blessed of the Lord,' and he will dwell in our hearts, and be with us in all our personal and domestic afflictions to comfort and strengthen us, and he will go with us through the dark valley of the shadow of death, and he will raise us up again in glory at the last day.

PRAYER.

God of all grace and Father of consolation, we come before thee acknowledging that sin has been our ruin; that because of sin, the abominable thing which thou hatest, we suffer, and die, and are liable to thine everlasting displeasure. Have mercy upon us, O God, according to thy loving-kindness; according to the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out our transgressions. We come before thee in the name of him whom thou hearest always, the sinner's surety and the sinner's friend. We bless thee because thou hast made him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Gracious Father, unite each one of us to thy Son, by the faith which unites the soul to God, and the saints to one another. May our family be an emblem of the great family of the Redeemer in heaven, each member of which is accepted in the Beloved, and blessed in him forever. We thank thee for all the comforts of the day which has closed upon us; that thou hast led us out and brought us in, not permitting any evil to come near us. We bless thee that thou hast not made our house a house of mourning; that we are all alive and in peace before thee. O so teach us to number our swiftly passing days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. When thou art pleased to afflict or bereave us, may Jesus, the comforter of his people, be our help and protection; and when we come to die, may he who raised Lazarus from the grave strengthen us against the fear of death, saying, Fear not, I will both go down with you and I will bring you up again. Have compassion upon those to whom thou hast appointed long nights and wearisome days of trouble; let their afflictions be for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby. Spare lives that are useful to families, to the world, or to the church. Our Father which art in heaven, bless all mankind. Be especially gracious to our relatives, and neighbours, and fellow-worshippers; grace, mercy, and peace be multiplied to them all. Keep thy good hand around us during the silence of the night. Prepare us for all that is prepared for us in the world; enable us to spend all the days of our sojourning here in thy fear, and to be looking for and hastening unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Graciously forgive our sins, and accept of us, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XCI.

SCRIPTURE—2 SAMUEL XXIV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1. It is quite evident, both from the chapter before us, and from many other passages of the word of God, that nations have duties to perform in their collective capacity; and that by neglecting these, or by becoming generally corrupted and depraved, they may bring on themselves national judgments. Ver. 10. Confession of sin is essential to its forgiveness at the hand of God: not because it is at all necessary on his part, or has any merit in his sight; but because it is requisite as a means for bringing the sinner's mind into a fit state for receiving the blessing of pardon. Forgiveness is one of the many blessings contained in the gospel, the bestowment of which may be said to depend generally on the circumstance, that they are asked, according to the following most interesting passages in our Lord's sermon on the mount: 'Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; and knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened.' Mat. vii. 7, 8. Ver. 14. The glory of God is, and ought to be, the chief end of all our thoughts, and words, and actions: so that, even in our punishments, if we have any control over them, we should choose that mode whereby the infinite and uncreated excellencies of the divine character will be manifested to the greatest extent in the view of his moral and intelligent creatures. Ver. 1. and 15. When the Almighty visits any large portion of the children of men with some mortal disease, it must be owing to sin, which is the cause of all suffering; for had our race never sinned, they never would have suffered either in this world, or in that which is to come. Ver. 24. As often as we are called, in the course of divine providence, to serve the Lord with our substance, we should avoid doing it with the property of our neighbour; for, if the sacrifice costs us nothing, we furnish no proof of our desire to devote ourselves to him, who is the author of our being, and the source of all our blessings.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

We should be constantly on our guard against sin, lest, by the displeasure of the Almighty, we be allowed to fall into any of those temptations which Satan has ever ready to present to us. If we discover that we have sinned against the Lord on any occasion, we should betake ourselves to 'the blood of sprinkling, which speaketh better things than the blood of Abel.' Having acknowledged our transgression, and implored Jehovah to grant us the pardon of it, there can be no question that he will be faithful to his promises, and 'forgive the iniquity of our sin.' Though our sins be numerous and highly aggravated, we are assured, on the highest of all authority, that Jesus Christ is both able and willing 'to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.' As often as we are exposed to 'the noisome pestilence,' and perceive that the arrows of death are flying thick around us, we should betake ourselves to him who is 'our rock and our fortress,' and he will deliver us from 'the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and from the destruction that wasteth at noonday.' While we 'abide under the shadow of the Almighty,' so completely will he be 'our shield and buckler,' that 'a thousand will fall at our side, and ten thousand at our right hand; but it will not come nigh us.' Continuing to put our trust in 'the Lord Jehovah, in whom is everlasting strength,' he will fulfil to us the rich and precious promise, which he has fulfilled to his well-beloved Son, and which is described in the following terms: 'Because thou hast made the Lord which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation; there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, we adore thee as the Supreme Disposer of all events. Thou hast arranged, and art directing, all things for the manifestation of thine own glory, and for the advancement of the best interests of all thy people. Though thou be seated upon a throne high and lifted up, yet we know that thou lookest down from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory, and beholdest the things that are done upon earth. We draw nigh unto thee, O God, at this time, earnestly beseeching thee, for the sake of Him whom thou hearest always, to lift upon us the light of thy countenance, and to visit us with thy great salvation. Bring us to a true sight and sense of our natural state of sin and misery. Show us the evil nature and infinite demerit of sin. Enable us, as perishing sinners, to lay hold on eternal life. May we be justified freely by thy grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. May we be adopted into thy family, and constituted the sons and the daughters of the Lord Almighty. May we be sanctified in soul, body, and spirit, by the operation and influence of thy Holy Spirit, and made fit in due time, for dwelling in the regions of everlasting purity and felicity. O God of our salvation, we learn from melancholy experience, that we are living in a world of sin, of suffering, and of sorrow. The king of terrors, in manifold ways, continues to commit ravages all around us. He is directing his shafts with unerring aim, and multitudes are daily and hourly cut off from the land of the living. Shield us, O Father of mercies, from the attacks of the destroyer, till we be prepared for quitting this mortal and changing scene, and for entering into a state of endless glory and felicity. May we be enabled to say with thy servant of old, O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. And when we have fulfilled the high purposes of the moral government of God in this world, may we have an entrance ministered to us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Heavenly Father, we thank thee for watching over us during the past night. Watch over us, we entreat thee, during this day. Command thy richest blessings to descend on us, who are now worshipping before thee, and on all who are connected with us by whatever tie. Be our God and our guide continually, and our portion through all eternity. Bless abundantly the whole human race with the blessings of the gospel. and hasten that happy time, when thy will shall be done on earth, as it is done in heaven. These our humble supplications are now before thee. May they be heard and answered, and may we be accepted and blessed, for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM CXVIII.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XII. 1—22.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 2. Hospitality is a duty which is incumbent on all the people of God. 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers,' says an inspired writer, 'for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.' In the instance recorded in the passage before us, the good family at Bethany entertained one who is infinitely greater than any created angel, being 'the Angel of the covenant,' the 'Lord of glory,' the second person of the glorious and ever blessed Trinity. Ver. 3—6. The great Head of the church is well pleased with his people, when they are led to make costly sacrifices of their substance for the advancement of his cause in the world,—sacrifices far greater than what are considered to be expedient by unrenowned men, who have only a form of godliness. When our blessed Lord was sitting at supper, 'Mary took a pound of ointment of spikenard,' which, if Judas was correct in the estimation of its value, must have cost nearly ten pounds sterling, and 'she anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair.' To this Judas objected as an useless expenditure of a very precious article, which, according to his opinion, might have been converted into money, and 'given to the poor:' and, in this respect, many persons agree with him in thinking that the temporal wants of the poor should be supplied, while nothing is to be done for promoting the well-being of their precious and immortal souls. Ver. 9—11. The performance of the greatest miracle is not sufficient to produce true and saving faith in the soul. It must have been well-known to the great body of the Jewish nation, that our blessed Lord had raised Lazarus from the dead, for many flocked to see him. The chief priests, instead of receiving and acknowledging Jesus Christ to be the Messiah, in consequence of the wonderful work which he had performed, 'consulted how they might put Lazarus to death,' and thus deprive him of this proof of his divine mission. Ver. 12, 13. The acclamations of the multitude are often very short lived, for we find that many of the Jews 'took branches of palm-trees, and went forth to meet Jesus Christ,' when on his way to Jerusalem, and 'cried, Hosanna: blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord.' And by way of contrast with this, we are informed that, a few days after, the common people, instigated by their rulers, cried out, 'crucify him, crucify him.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

We should, in all circumstances, endeavour, by divine grace, to imitate the example which our Lord and Saviour has set before us, in being careful to wait on God in all the ordinances of his appointment. Thus we find him, on the present occasion, travelling from beyond Jordan to the city of Jerusalem, that he might engage in the celebration of the pass-over, and might have an opportunity of instituting the holy ordinance of the supper; though he well knew that the Jews sought to take his life, and that he was to be subjected to the cursed and shameful death of the cross. So earnestly desirous was he to eat the passover, at this time, with his disciples, that he came to Bethany six days before the period when it was to be observed, thereby showing us that we are not to grudge the time which we spend in the service of God; because he is able to compensate us for the sacrifice by conferring on us blessings 'which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man.' We should be very careful to supply the wants of the poor and the needy, more especially those of them whom we believe to be heirs of grace and of glory; for we are informed that this is peculiarly acceptable to our divine Redeemer, and that he will most abundantly reward all such acts of benevolence, either in this world or in the world to come. But while we are attentive to promote the comfort of the destitute around us, by bestowing on them temporal blessings, we should seek above all things to secure their well-being in the eternal world, by providing them with the means of grace and salvation: and we should be prepared to give largely of our wealth for the accomplishment of this glorious object, because the soul of one sinner is far more valuable than a whole world of inanimate matter.

PRAYER.

Almighty God, and most merciful Father, we worship and adore thee as the first and the last, the greatest and the best of all beings. Thou art exalted inconceivably far above all blessing and all praise; for thou art the infinite, the eternal, and the unchangeable Jehovah, dwelling in light which is inaccessible and full of glory. Thy happiness and thy glory are independent of all the works which thou hast made: and thou standest in no need of the services even of the highest and holiest of those spirits that dwell with thee. Thou art the source of being and of blessedness to thy moral and intelligent creatures,—the giver of every good and every perfect gift. We desire at this time, most gracious God, to bless and to magnify thy holy name, for all thy goodness and loving-kindness unto us,—for all the bounties of thy providence, and for all the riches of thy grace. Bestow on us, we beseech thee, the good things of this present life in that measure which thou seest to be best for us, and most conducive to the manifestation of thy glory. And whilst thou art filling our hearts with food and gladness, O do thou make us partakers of all those great and glorious blessings, which our divine Redeemer came down from the mansions of glory to purchase and to bestow. May we be washed in the atoning blood, and clothed in the perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ, and be permitted at last to join the blessed company of the redeemed in heaven, that we may celebrate the praises of the God of our salvation, in songs of gratitude and love, which shall have no end. O Lord, we thank thee for the various means of grace, and of spiritual improvement, which thou hast provided for us, and commanded us to employ. Enable us, we implore thee, to give diligence to make our calling and election sure, that we may make suitable and sufficient preparation for eternity. Holy Father, we would now express our gratitude to thee for that watchful care which thou hast exercised over us during this day. Continue, we beseech thee, to watch over us, in the silent watches of the night, with more than a parent's care. Permit us to see the light and the comforts of another day. And lead us to consider that every day which passes over our heads is bringing us a stage nearer to death and the grave. Lord, bless the whole of our family circle. Bless all our friends, and relations, and acquaintances; and forgive our enemies. Bless all the tribes and nations which are on the face of the earth. And all that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXII.

SCRIPTURE—I KINGS VI.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Solomon's temple was a very remarkable type, and it may be said to have had a variety of antitypes. It was typical of Jesus Christ, and of his people, and of the heavenly world: and we shall now notice some of the chief emblematical circumstances. The temple, in general, or as a whole, was typical of the human nature of Jesus Christ; for when Jehovah made the temple his habitation, this was intended to point out the wonderful fact which is recorded of the Son of God, when it is said, that 'in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.' The temple was also typical of every true believer; for as the first person in the Godhead dwelt in the temple under the Old Testament dispensation, so the third person dwells in each of the heirs of grace, under the New Testament dispensation. We find the apostle Paul, in allusion to this fact, making the following appeal to the members of the church which was at Corinth, 'know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.' The temple was also typical of Jesus Christ and his people in a relative point of view; for he is the foundation, and they are the superstructure which is built upon it. In accordance with this statement, the great apostle of the Gentiles, addressing the saints which were at Ephesus, tells them that they were built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone: in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth into an holy temple in the Lord, in whom ye also are built together for an habitation of God through the Spirit. Moreover, the temple was typical of the heavenly world. Jehovah dwelt in the shechinah, or bright cloud, which was the symbol of his presence, and which was in the holy of holies in Solomon's temple; and this was designed to convey to us the idea that he 'dwells in light' which is inaccessible and full of glory, in the celestial world which he has fitted up with amazing splendour. The two cherubims, which were over the mercy-seat, represented the innumerable company of angelic spirits which surround God's throne, and minister in his presence, and execute his commands in every part of the universe. And the multitude of chambers which were in the temple were meant to point out those 'many mansions,' which the Redeemer tells his disciples were in his 'Father's house,' and which he has gone before to prepare for their reception.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

There are few ideas, we apprehend, which are calculated to make a deeper impression on our minds, and to exert a greater influence in keeping us from the practice of sin, and in encouraging us to walk in the paths of holiness, than when we are represented as 'temples of the Holy Ghost.' It is a circumstance which is fitted to exert a considerable degree of moral influence on our conduct and character, when we reflect that God is all-seeing and heart-searching,—that he is now our witness, and that he will ere long be our final and impartial judge. But when we have the distinct understanding that God is actually dwelling within us,—that he has constituted us living temples for his especial habitation,—and that he cannot look on sin but with abhorrence,— we feel as if we were brought as near to the Almighty as we possibly can be, and that we ought to keep the strictest watch over all our thoughts, and words, and actions. This, too, is absolutely necessary, that we may obtain all the benefits which the inhabitation of the divine Spirit is fitted and intended to impart; for, if we grieve him by our misconduct, and constrain him to depart from us, it is impossible that we can be fitted for moving in a sphere of glory and felicity in the heavenly world, so very exalted as we might otherwise be. As the stones which were employed in the building of Solomon's temple were all prepared in the mountains before they were brought to Jerusalem, so we should be diligently using the means of being prepared, as living stones, for filling that place intended for us in the great spiritual temple, which is now being erected in the heavenly world, for celebrating the high praises of Jehovah through all eternity.

PRAYER.

O thou that dwellest between the cherubim, we praise thee as the high and the holy One that inhabitest eternity, and the praises of Zion, whose name is Holy. Thou art a God of spotless purity and holiness, of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. The heavens themselves are not clean in thy sight, and thine angels thou chargest with folly. How much more then man that is of the dust! How much more the sinful and perishing children of men! We rejoice to believe, O Lord our God, that, notwithstanding the sinfulness of our race, thou didst condescend to dwell with thine ancient people,—that thou didst take up thy residence in the temple which was erected for thy worship and glory,—and that thou didst say of Zion, This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it. We bless thee that, while the temple is no more at Jerusalem, thou art erecting for thyself many spiritual temples. May all of us be living temples, in which thou wilt be pleased to dwell, and by which thy glory will be unfolded more and more in the sight of thy creatures through all eternity. Father of mercies, and God of all grace and consolation in Christ Jesus, we would make our grateful acknowledgments unto thee for the abundant provision which thou hast made for us in time and in eternity. Thou hast in store for us an inexhaustible treasury of the very richest blessings,—blessings great as our nature can sustain, and lasting as eternity itself. All these blessings we know thou art now offering to us without money and without price, if we will but come and ask thee. May we ask, then, that we may receive; may we seek, that we may find; may we knock at mercy's door, that it may be opened to us. While we ask the fulfilment of all thy great and precious promises for ourselves and for all who are near and dear unto us, we would not be unmindful of the rest of our brethren of mankind. O may the dark places of the earth, which are still the habitations of horrid cruelty, soon be converted into happy lands, in which righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost shall universally prevail. May thy church be purified from its corruptions, and may it be extended till it shall fill the whole earth. We thank thee for permitting us to enjoy the light and the comforts of a new day. Keep thy good hand around us this day, to protect us from all the dangers and the temptations to which we may be exposed. May these our humble prayers ascend with acceptance before thy throne, through the merit of our exalted Redeemer, to whom with thee the Father and the Holy Spirit, be ascribed all praise and glory, both now and ever. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XII. 23—50.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 23, 24. The vegetable world furnishes innumerable illustrations of the death of Christ, as a means of production; for every seed which is committed to the ground, by the decay of its external covering, supplies food to the germ, which produces the future plant that bears the fruit. Thus, a corn of wheat, which has not been sown, is unproductive; whereas, when it is deposited in the earth, it becomes fruitful: and, in like manner, had the Son of God not died, he could not have been the Saviour of sinners; while, by his death, he brings salvation to an innumerable multitude of the children of men, and thus manifests his glory in the view of his intelligent creatures. Ver. 25, 26. When a professing Christian is placed in such circumstances, that he is called, in the course of divine providence, to give up his life for the sake of Jesus Christ, if he refuses to do so, this will be an eternal loss to him, because he will perish for ever: and, on the contrary, when an individual yields up his life to the command of his Lord and Master, and, in the emphatical language of the holy scriptures, is said to hate it, he will enjoy everlasting glory and felicity in the divine presence. Ver. 28. God is glorified by all his works, but chiefly by the great work of redemption; for Jesus Christ, by his obedience unto death, has given such a satisfaction to the demands of divine justice, as never could have been given by the united sufferings of all created beings: and he has magnified the holy law of God, and made it honourable, by a righteousness which is unparalleled among the most exalted of the celestial intelligences. Ver. 42, 43. Though the Jewish nation witnessed the performance of many splendid and glorious miracles, they did not believe in Christ, which shows that a divine influence is necessary to turn sinners from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

If we consider ourselves to be the servants of Jesus Christ, it is absolutely necessary that we follow him,—that we believe the pure and sublime doctrines which he has revealed to us, and that we endeavour, by the divine assistance, to practise the holy and excellent precepts which he has enjoined on us. Only those, who act in this manner, can have a well-grounded hope that they will be finally admitted into the heavenly world, and receive honour from him who is God over all and blessed for evermore. Living in a land which has been visited with the healing beams of ‘the Sun of righteousness,’ we should avail ourselves of the divine light which is afforded to us, that we may be safely guided to mansions of everlasting rest and felicity in the heavenly world. All of us who have made a profession of religion, should openly show our love and attachment to the Saviour, and bear a testimony for him before a ‘world that lieth in wickedness.’ True wisdom will lead us diligently to ‘search the scriptures,’ for they are to constitute the great standard by which our whole conduct is to be tried at the judgment seat of Christ.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we acknowledge thee to be our creator, our preserver, and our bountiful benefactor. Thou didst create us after thine own image, in knowledge, in righteousness, and in holiness; but we have fallen from a state of innocence and happiness into a state of sin and misery. Notwithstanding our unworthiness, thou hast continued to preserve us in existence, and thou art constantly supplying our manifold wants with the good things of this present life. But, above all, thou hast made most astonishing arrangements, whereby we may be saved from the tremendous consequences of sin, and raised to the enjoyment of inconceivably great and glorious blessings during the whole course of an endless life. When we reflect on the number and the magnitude of the blessings which thou art conferring on us, we are lost in astonishment, for we are conscious that we are not worthy of the least of all thy mercies. Bless the Lord, O our souls: and all that is within us, bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O our souls, and forget not all his benefits: who forgiveth all our iniquities; who healeth all our diseases; who redeemeth our lives from destruction; who crowneth us with loving-kindness and tender mercies. We bless thee, O God, that when there was no eye to pity us, and no hand to help us among created beings, thine own eye pitied us and thine own arm brought us salvation. Thou didst lay our help on one mighty to save, even on thine only-begotten Son, who is equal to thyself in power and in glory. And we rejoice to believe, that he did not hesitate to descend from his throne of glory in the heavens, and to veil the uncreated excellencies of his Godhead with the robe of our humanity, that he might be in circumstances to suffer and die in our room and stead. O may we be enabled to confide in him as all our salvation, and all our desire, that we may be permitted, in due time, to join the general assembly and church of the first-born in heaven. May we be enabled to believe in him as the light of the world, that we may be conducted by him to the regions of everlasting light and felicity. Thou hast been pleased, O God, to bring us to the termination of another day. We thank thee, for all the goodness, and mercy, and grace, which thou art continually making to pass before us. Thou art causing the outgoings of the evening and the morning to rejoice over us. Thou art daily loading us with thy benefits. We commit ourselves to thy fatherly protection during the night, and when we awake in the morning, may we be reminded of the morning of the resurrection, when we shall rise to be openly acknowledged and acquitted in the view of assembled worlds. O God of our salvation, grant that the time may soon come, when the glad tidings of eternal life shall be published in every language, and in every land: when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea; and when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and when he shall reign for ever and ever. Hear, O God, in heaven, these our humble prayers, and send us an answer in peace, for our divine Redeemer’s sake. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVIII. 5.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS VIII.

REMARKS.

The sacred service of placing the ark in its fixed residence being completed, and Jehovah having visibly manifested his favour to the joy and gratitude of his servant, Solomon now stood before the altar, expecting success to his petitions in virtue of that great sacrifice, which, in the fulness of time, was to be offered up, and which was typified by the sacrifices presented at that altar, and poured out his soul in the presence of his assembled people, in that prayer, which for fervency, sublimity, and pathos, has been the admiration of the devout in every succeeding generation,—supplicating that God would in all ages, and in all cases, hear the prayers of Israel, and of strangers, when they called upon him, towards this his holy temple. Having again blessed Israel, exhorting them to obedience, and praised Jehovah for his mercy and faithfulness, Solomon offers a splendid sacrifice of peace-offerings, keeps the feast fourteen days, and then dismisses the people, who bless the king, filled with admiration at his wisdom and piety, and go into their tents, joyful and glad of heart for all the goodness that the Lord had done for David his servant, and for Israel his people.

1st, Amidst all the glories of Solomon's reign, never did he appear more truly glorious than when thus having respect unto the ark of God, and lifting up his soul to Jehovah in humble and fervent prayer before his assembled people. 2d, From the holy zeal that was displayed at this time by all Israel gathered together by the decree of Solomon, let us learn how much good the influence of those in authority or in exalted stations may do when that influence is enlisted on the side of piety. 3d, As the ark of the covenant, the symbol of God's gracious presence, was the glory of Israel of old, so the favour of God resting upon any land, is its highest blessedness and sacred defence in all generations. 4th, The temple of Solomon in the symmetry of its proportions, the beauty of its architecture, and the costliness of its materials, was, among other things that it shadowed forth, an eminent type of the church in New Testament times. The ark, again, containing the tables of the law, and covered with the mercy-seat, was a no less illustrious type of Christ, who had his Father's law in his heart; that law which he magnified and made honourable; who is also the true mercy-seat, in whom only God is propitious, and who now dwells, not by any visible symbol, but by the gifts of his grace and the influence of his Spirit, in the church at large, and in every individual believer in particular. As the temple of Solomon, therefore, without the ark, was but as a body without a soul, a house without an inhabitant, so the visible church, without the gracious presence of Christ, or the gracious presence of God in him, and the communication of spiritual gifts and graces out of his fulness, is nothing more than a well-proportioned lifeless carcase. 5th, Did Solomon adore the condescension of Jehovah, in dwelling typically with his people of old? Let us rejoice that in Christ Jesus, God in very deed did dwell on the earth, and now that our true ark hath entered into the holy place not made with hands, and hath said of New Testament Zion, his spiritual temple, 'This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell, for I have desired it;' let us look to the mercy-seat that has thus been established as all our confidence towards God, and let us cherish communion with him, as a reconciled Father, through the person and work of the Redeemer, and by the influences of his sanctifying and comforting Spirit. This is the life and soul of true godliness, infusing efficacy into every truth, and imparting the blessing to every ordinance.

PRAYER.

O God, the supreme, independent, and ever blessed Jehovah, we would this morning lift up our souls unto thee, filled with wonder and grateful adoration at the riches of thy grace and condescension towards us, the creatures of thy power, the objects of thy bounty, the sinful and undeserving monuments of thy long-sparing goodness. We bless thee that thou who didst manifest thy gracious presence in the midst of thy people of old, by types and shadows, hast, in these last days, dwelt with man upon the earth, through him who, being the brightness of thy glory, and the express image of thy person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, hath by himself purged our sins, and sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high; and now that Jesus our true ark and mercy-seat hath entered into the holy place not made with hands, we would look by faith unto him as all our hope and confidence before thee. For his sake, O do thou who dwellest between the cherubim shine forth; have mercy upon us, according to thy loving kindness, and according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out our transgressions; send down upon us thy Holy Spirit, in all his enlightening, and sanctifying, and comforting influences; shed abroad thy love in our hearts, and give to us an interest in all the blessings of that everlasting, and well-ordered, and sure covenant, which the blood of Christ has ratified. O grant unto us that we may be members in truth of Christ's mystical body, even of that church which is built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth into an holy temple in the Lord, and in whom all thy people are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit. And we pray thee, that thou wouldst graciously accept and answer the supplications of thy people throughout the whole earth, ministering to all their necessities, hearing them in the day of their trouble, sending them help from the sanctuary, and strengthening them out of Zion. Do thou raise up, also, human instruments, zealously disposed to seek the good of thy house, and especially may kings be nursing fathers and their queens nursing mothers to the church, that through the influence of their authority and example, accompanied with thine own blessing, all the people and the kingdoms of the earth may be gathered together to serve the Lord. Look down thyself favourably upon thine heritage, granting times of refreshing from thy presence, and let the time, even the set time, to favour Zion, speedily arrive. We thank thee for thy preserving goodness through the past night, and implore thy protection and guidance throughout this day. May we be assisted in duty, may we be shielded in the midst of temptation, may we be encompassed with thy favour, and may we be kept in the fear of the Lord, and in the comforts of the Holy Ghost. Now unto him who is able to do exceeding abundantly, above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CIII. 8.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1. The objects of Christ's love are styled 'his own,' as those who had been given him from eternity by the Father, those whom he had called by his Spirit, and those who were now about to be bought by his precious blood. Ver. 2—5. The clause 'supper being ended,' may be rendered 'supper being come.' Satan's first instigation of Judas to betray his Lord, here referred to, and his agreement with the chief priests, having taken place shortly before the passover supper (Mat. xxvi. 14—16; Luke xxii. 3—6), and the subsequent washing of the disciples' feet, not after supper, but, as is generally supposed, just at the time when the feast of unleavened bread began, and before the paschal lamb was eaten. Whilst the transaction of washing the disciples' feet was intended, according to our Lord's own example, and after-explanation, to teach brotherly love and humility among Christians, it was emblematical, also, of that washing from sin by the atoning blood and sanctifying Spirit of Christ: and when it is said by the Saviour, 'He that is washed needeth not, save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit,' he intends that the believer, in the first act of receiving him, has all his sins forgiven, and the principle of sanctification infused into all the faculties and dispositions of his soul, and needeth not again to be brought into a justified and sanctified state, but is graciously considered as already cleansed, and requireth only, by reason of remaining infirmities and temptations, and his consequent liability to contract new guilt and defilement in his daily walk, to have fresh recourse to a throne of grace, through the blood of sprinkling. Ver. 18—30. The Saviour had said (ver. 10), with obvious reference to Judas, 'ye are clean, but not all;' and here he tells the disciples that he was fully aware of those amongst them whom he had chosen to faith, holiness, and salvation; and referring to the language of prophecy, 'he that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me,' (Psal. xli. 9.), he manifests his omniscience, by not only revealing that one of them should betray him, but expressly pointing out the traitor to his beloved disciple John, solicited by Peter to ask, 'who it should be of whom he spake.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

How tender and abiding the love, and how amazing the condescension of Christ towards them who are 'his own.' Though in the form of God, and thinking it not robbery to be equal with God, 'for their sakes he took upon him the form of a servant;'—and he who in the days of his flesh, and in the immediate prospect of returning to his Father, and sitting on his throne of glory, washed his disciples' feet, is still ready to perform, towards the meanest of his people, every office of kindness which their spiritual circumstances require. We, however, can have no vital union with him, so as to be regarded as his, unless we are washed by his blood from the guilt, and by his Spirit from the power of sin; and unless walking in humility of heart and brotherly love before him, we imitate his example and comply with his gracious commands. Blessed is the thought, that if once we have been washed through him, we can never again come into condemnation, but 'are clean every whit,' and need only those supplies of mercy and grace which our daily short-comings, and temptations, and difficulties require, and which he out of his fulness is ever ready to dispense. Let us be sensible of our necessity, and daily repair to 'the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness,' that our spiritual peace may be preserved, and our progress in holiness secured.

Let us beware of assuming the mere outward mask of discipleship, for that same Jesus who discovered all the wickedness that was in the heart of Judas, ever trieth the hearts and reins, and whilst he knoweth our most secret dispositions, he is grieved at the dishonour of being wounded in the house of his professed friends, and shall assuredly assign to hypocrites their portion in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone. More especially is hypocrisy detestable when found amongst those who sustain high offices in his church, and deep is the guilt of all who, in any situation, betray the cause of the Redeemer for filthy lucre's sake.

How different would be the aspect of the visible church, were the professed people of Christ more mindful of the new commandment which he gave to his disciples, 'endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,' and loving one another with a pure heart fervently. Let us seek, then, to remember the gracious words of our now glorified Redeemer, 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.'

Did our Saviour, amidst the self-confidence of Peter, foretell his melancholy fall? Let us then not be high-minded, but fear, and with a godly jealousy over ourselves, let us patiently wait for the salvation of our God, cherishing the hope of afterwards following our risen Lord to that blessed abode whither he hath gone before us.

PRAYER.

Most merciful and ever-blessed God, we would draw near unto thee this evening with the spirit of grace and supplication richly poured out upon us, and having our fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, may we experience the blessedness of the man whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee. O do thou give unto us increasingly to see our need of that precious Saviour whom thou hast provided, and may we be found in him, washed in his blood, justified through his righteousness, and sanctified through his Spirit. We confess that we are daily sinning against thee, and that we have therefore daily need of recourse to that blood of sprinkling which speaketh better things than the blood of Abel. Do thou pardon whatsoever thou hast seen amiss in us this day, whether in thought, in word, or in deed, and do thou sanctify us wholly, in spirit, in soul, and in body, that we may henceforth depart from iniquity in one and all of its forms, that we may hate it as that abominable thing which the Lord our God hateth, and that we may walk in all the commandments and in all the ordinances of the Lord blameless. Do thou bless unto us that portion of thy word which we have now been reading, and enable us to have the witness within ourselves that we are the objects of that everlasting love which Jesus bears to his own people. May the same mind be in us which was also in him, and in lowliness of mind, esteeming each other as better than ourselves, may we walk in love even as Christ also hath loved us, and given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour. May the sacred principle of love unite us with a pure heart fervently to the whole household of faith; may no office of kindness to thy people appear too low for us, and to do good, and to communicate, may we forget not, seeing that with such sacrifices the Lord is well pleased. And we pray, O heavenly Father, that thou wouldst heal the divisions of thy church, and whilst thy people earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints, may they endeavour also to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Forbid, O Lord, that we should either deny the Lord who bought us, or betray his cause; and do thou preserve us from all self-confidence, that relying upon that grace by which alone we can stand, and animated with the hope of living and reigning with Christ hereafter, we may be steadfast and unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord. We acknowledge with grateful hearts thy bounty and loving-kindness vouchsafed to us this day, and we commit ourselves and all who are dear to us to thy care and keeping throughout the silence of the night. Hear us and accept of us, for all that we ask is for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII. 11.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS IX.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—9. A favourable answer to Solomon's prayer, at the dedication of the temple, had already been visibly signified to him, by fire coming down from heaven and consuming the sacrifices on the altar before which he stood, (2 Chron. vii. 1.) and in addition to this very customary token of the divine acceptance, in Old Testament times, we here find Jehovah, after all the solemnities of the dedication were over, condescending to appear to his servant in vision, as he had previously done at Gibeon, in the beginning of his reign, and for his more abundant comfort, giving him an answer more express and distinct. He assures him that having heard his prayer and supplication, he had 'hallowed,' or consecrated, 'the house he had built, to put his name there for ever,' that is, he had set it apart as holy, for the residence of his ark, the centre of his worship, and the visible pledge of his gracious presence with Israel. In token, too, of the peculiar favour with which he would regard the temple, and the holy complacency he would have in its worshippers, he adds, 'and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually.' In all this, how gracious and condescending appears the Lord our God! How much must the heart of Solomon have been gladdened and refreshed, and how well might he say, with his father David, (Psal. lvi. 19, 20.) 'Verily God hath heard me; he hath attended to the voice of my prayer. Blessed be God who hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me.' The same covenant-keeping God in Christ Jesus, is the hearer of the prayers of his people in all generations. Let us adore and magnify him as such, and pour out our hearts in believing supplication before him; and though we cannot now expect supernatural visions to testify directly that our prayers are accepted, yet the Lord shall assuredly, in his own time and way, manifest himself graciously unto us, and cause us experimentally to know that 'he hath not said unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye my face in vain.'

The answer of Jehovah to Solomon, however, whilst it was encouraging, was also monitory. He assured him, indeed, that he had been graciously accepted, but reminded him also that the continuance of the divine favour towards him and his posterity, and the stability of his kingdom, depended on their own steadfastness in the covenant, and specially 'in walking before the Lord, as David his father walked, in integrity of heart, and in uprightness.' The same condition had been laid down to David himself, (Psal. cxxxii. 11, 12.) and indeed pervades, from the beginning, all God's covenant dealings with his people. The denunciations contained in ver. 6—9. have obviously a particular reference to national idolatry, sanctioned by the example and encouraged by the influence and authority of the prince; and whilst they were fulfilled in part during the Babylonish captivity, they have met with their highest accomplishment in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the state of the Jewish nation to the present day. Let us not imagine, from what is thus recorded in regard to Solomon, his posterity, and his kingdom, that the continuance of God's favour to his people depends on the merit of their own after obedience. The covenant is, in its origin and in all its provisions, a covenant of sovereign and free grace. Let us learn, however, that under grace the obligations of God's holy law are not made void, that Jehovah may visit the transgressions of his own people with a rod, and their iniquity with stripes, and specially, that no favour or spiritual advantages, vouchsafed to any family or kingdom, can be a security for their continued enjoyment, where there is a departure, on the part of posterity, from the faith in which their fathers walked, or a national casting off of the true religion or the outward means by which, through the blessing of God, it might be perpetuated. 'Cabul' signifies displeasing, and Hiram's being accustomed to commerce, and the wealth and magnificence of a mercantile community, seems to have been the cause of his dissatisfaction with the cities which Solomon gave him, and his reason for giving them the above name. They were probably small and ruinous, and placed in an obscure and thinly peopled part of the country. He afterwards returned them to Solomon, who rebuilt them, (2 Chron. viii. 2.) and no doubt Solomon, in taking them back, gave an equivalent with which Hiram was satisfied. It is good when rulers take counsel together, and give their wealth and influence not against but for the Lord; and it is our duty, according to our ability, to equal or exceed the kindness we experience from others in the prosecution of any enterprise in which we engage.

PRAYER.

O Lord, on this, the morning of another day, we desire with humble boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, in the new and living way which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil of his flesh. May we draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed as with pure water. We would contemplate thee in the united glory of thy character as a just God and also a Saviour, and conscious of our own unworthiness in thy presence, would bless thee for all the confidence which, through the Son of thy love, we are permitted to cherish towards thee as the hearer of prayer, the God in whom compassions flow, and the covenant God and Father of all who believe. Look not on us as we are in ourselves, guilty, and polluted, and exposed to thy righteous displeasure, but behold, O God, our Shield, and look on the face of thine Anointed. For his sake take away all our iniquity and receive us graciously; heal our backslidings and love us freely; remember us with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people; O visit us with thy salvation, that we may see the good of thy chosen, that we may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that we may glory with thine inheritance. May we taste and see that the Lord is gracious; and in the experience of thy mercy, may we increasingly feel the obligations under which we are placed to live devoted to thy service. Forbid that at any time we should sin that grace may abound, and presumptuously expect the gladdening influence of the light of thy countenance lifted up upon us, whilst we forsake thy law, and walk not in thy ways; and may thy Holy Spirit so work in us, both to will and to do of thy good pleasure, that in integrity of heart and in uprightness, we may do according to all that thou hast commanded us, keeping thy statutes and thy judgments continually. We pray, O Lord, that thy church may everywhere be built up. May the number of them who love and fear thy blessed name be increased, and through their exertions and prayers may the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom be speedily established throughout the whole earth. We thank thee for the mercies of the past night, and entreat that thy gracious presence may be with us throughout this day. May we and all who are dear to us experience thy Fatherly care, and enjoy not only the gifts of thy providence, but the saving blessings of thy grace. Come over the mountains of our provocations, and send an answer in peace to the voice of our supplication, for all that we ask is for the sake of Jesus Christ, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLIII.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XIV.

REMARKS.

This beautiful chapter is a continuation of our Saviour's discourse to his disciples after Judas had gone out from the midst of them, for the accomplishment of his traitorous design, as recorded towards the conclusion of the chapter preceding.

Ver. 1. The Saviour perceiving the sorrow that had filled the disciples, on account of what he had been saying, specially in reference to his own speedy departure, exhorts them not to allow so much trouble to possess and discompose their hearts; and the foundation of comfort to which he directs them, is faith in God the Father, and in himself as the promised Messiah. This is the sure and abiding ground of consolation to the people of God, amidst all the trials of their earthly pilgrimage, for why, under any tribulation, should they be overwhelmed who believe in God as the sovereign ruler and infinitely wise disposer of all events, and in Jesus Christ, through whom, as the propitiation for their ins, they are restored to the divine favour, and ever live under a special providence for good? Rom. viii. 28.

Ver. 2, 3. The disciples were still to a certain extent under the influence of carnal views regarding Christ's kingdom, and our Lord, knowing that their grief arose in part from their expectations of worldly preferment and honour being frustrated, here elevates their hopes to glorious mansions in his Father's house above, which he was gone to prepare for them; and assures them, that he would come again and receive them to himself, that they might be with him for ever. In the divine purpose, these mansions had been prepared 'from the foundation of the world,' (Matt. xxv. 34.) yet it behoved the Saviour now to offer himself a sacrifice for their sins, and then to enter into heaven as their forerunner and representative, that by his atoning blood he might procure for them a right of admission, and himself take possession of these mansions in their name.

Ver. 4—12. How interesting the declarations made by our Lord in these verses, in condescension to the remaining spiritual blindness and unbelief of Thomas and Philip. Jesus is 'the way, and the truth, and the life.' He is 'the way,' to pardon, to holiness, to God, and to heaven. He is 'the truth,' in distinction from legal types and shadows, and as himself 'the faithful witness' in character, doctrine, and precept. And he is 'the life' as himself the living one, and the author of spiritual and eternal life to all who believe; neither can any man 'come unto the Father but by him.' We must be quickened by him as our life, guided by him as the truth, and come by him as the way. How great too is the dignity of this same Jesus, upon whom we have to depend! Such was the essential union and mutual in-dwelling between him and the Father, and so truly did all the fulness of the Godhead dwell in his human nature, that he could say to Philip, 'he that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' Could any mere creature have made such a declaration?

Ver. 13, 14. The blessed assurance here given, that Christ will do what is asked in his name, is not to be confined to the apostles, and the gifts vouchsafed to them, for the success of the gospel through their ministry. It is recorded for the comfort of his people in all ages, in so far as what they ask, shall be subservient to their own good, consistent with his will, and conducive to his glory. Mark the omnipotence of Christ, 'I will do it.' The blessings that come to us through believing prayer, not only flow through his merits, but are bestowed by his own power and authority.

Ver. 15—24. The keeping of Christ's commandments is an indispensable requisite as an evidence of our love to him, and let us rejoice that though he is no longer upon earth, yet through his intercession, the Father hath sent another Comforter, even the Spirit of truth, who now dwelleth in every believer.

Ver. 25—31. Jesus had spoken these things to his disciples concerning himself and the promised Comforter, 'being yet with them,' and when now about to leave them, he tells them that this blessed Comforter would teach them all things needful for them to know, and bring his discourse fully to their remembrance. He bequeaths to them also 'his peace.' It is his peace, as he is at once the purchaser and the bestower of it. The disciples could not rejoice at their Lord's departure considered in itself, but should have rejoiced because he went unto the Father, this being the token of the Father's acceptance of his work—the triumphant assertion of his own rights as Mediator—the earnest of the outpouring of the Spirit, and the pledge of their own future exaltation. 'My Father is greater than I. This language is every way compatible with the Saviour's essential divinity, being not spoken with reference to it, but to his human nature, and his mediatorial character, in which he acted as the Father's servant, Isa. xlii. 1.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art over all, and art rich in mercy unto all that call upon thee. Do thou enable us this evening to offer unto thee the sacrifices of righteousness, and to put our trust under the shadow of thy wings. We adore thee as the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and in him the God of salvation, to all who have fled for refuge, to lay hold on the hope set before them in the gospel. We thank thee for all that Jesus did, and taught, and suffered; for the holy example which he set before us, for the doctrine of eternal life which proceeded out of his mouth, and for that perfect obedience which he rendered unto thee, even unto the death of the cross, whereby he finished transgression, and made an end of sin, and made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in an everlasting righteousness. We especially bless thee at this time for those gracious words of comfort which he spake in the immediate prospect of the hour and power of darkness, and which we have just been reading from thy holy word. Do thou work in our souls a principle of living faith in him, that amidst all the sorrows of this mortal life we may be enabled to place our confidence in thee as a reconciled Father, and in Jesus as the rock of our salvation. Do thou eleate our thoughts and affections to those many mansions in his Father's house, which our exalted Saviour has gone to prepare for his believing people, and walking as strangers and pilgrims upon earth, leaning upon Jesus as the beloved of our souls, may he at length receive us to himself, that where he is there we may be also. May we ever look to him, and trust in him, as the way, and the truth, and the life, through whom only there is access to the Father; and quickened by his Spirit, guided by his word, and confiding on his righteousness, may we be accepted in thy sight, and rejoice in him as all our salvation and all our desire. We thank thee, that whilst Jesus has ascended up on high, thou hast sent through him the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, to abide with thy church and people for ever. May we, through this blessed Spirit of all grace, have true fellowship with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ, and the God of hope fill us with all peace and joy in believing, that we may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost. We rejoice in the mediatorial honour with which the Saviour is now invested at the Father's right hand, and would look to his exaltation as the pledge of future glory and blessedness to all his people. May he preserve us by his mighty power, through faith, unto salvation. We thank thee for thy protecting care throughout the past day, and now commit our bodies and spirits to thy keeping during the silence of the night. Ever watch over us and ours, and graciously forgive our sins, and hear our prayers, for all that we ask is for Christ's sake, to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, be glory for ever. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVII. 22.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS X.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In eastern countries it has been customary, in all ages, to put enigmatical, or puzzling questions to those who had the reputation of being learned, in order to prove, not only the extent of their knowledge, but their sagacity in unravelling that which is perplexing. With such 'hard questions' the queen of Sheba came from the land of the south, to try the king of Israel; and after communing with him of all that was in her heart, and getting a solution of all her difficulties, was filled with amazement at his wisdom. She then speaks in glowing terms of the happiness of those who had such a master and king to regulate their affairs, and with a devotional spirit, which it would have been well for Solomon to have imitated, ascribes the honour and the praise to Jehovah alone.

The remaining part of the chapter contains an account of Solomon's riches and revenue. His father's victories having extended his dominion from sea to sea, his own wisdom enabled him to take advantage of the favourable position that he occupied, and to make Judea the great emporium of trade. His navy, that sailed in company with the Syrians, brought to him the produce of Europe and the west; the ships that sailed from Ezion-geber, a city that he built on the shores of the Red sea, imported the riches of the south and east; so that the commerce, which in ancient times enriched the Syrians and Alexandrians, and more recently has swelled the store of the Venetians and British, centred in Judea, and made it the market-place of the world. In consequence of this extensive traffic, we are told, that the gold received year by year, as the profit of his merchandise alone, amounted to six hundred and sixty-six talents, a sum equal to about four millions of our money. We are farther informed, that every kind of precious stone and spicery, every variety of beautiful wood, the finest horses and mules, and the most valuable products of the Egyptian loom, were found with him in the greatest abundance.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

In the conduct of the queen of Sheba, we find much that deserves to be imitated and admired. The desire for knowledge, and the determination to see and judge for herself, that brought her to hear the wisdom of Solomon, are in themselves commendable; but appear much more so, when we are led, by the expressions in the eighth verse, to conclude that she sought this knowledge in order that she might be the better able to promote the happiness of those over whom the Lord had appointed her queen. Her humility, evinced by the praise she so readily and freely bestowed upon Solomon, and more especially the devotional spirit which led her to magnify the Lord, as the original author of his wisdom and power, should be carefully imitated by every believer.

In the king of Israel we see a rare example of highly cultivated talent, and consummate political skill. Many maxims of national economy, and principles of trade, that have been vaunted of as the discoveries of modern times, seem to have been known and acted upon by him; and unparalleled success attended his schemes. He asked for an understanding heart to govern the people, and the Lord granted his request to the full. But while we are told of his praying for skill to govern his subjects, we do not read of him asking for grace, to subdue the corrupt desires that war against the soul, and we find that his wisdom was stained with the most egregious folly, for he forsook the living God, and bowed his knee to the idols of the heathen. The Lord gave unto him all that the heart of man naturally desires, to show us how easily he could make his people learned, rich, and famous. He left him to write with respect to it, 'vanity of vanities, all is vanity,' to show us the nothingness of earthly things. And he allowed him to become the dupe of his female slaves, to show that the highest talent, and greatest learning, are but weakness and folly, when restraining grace is withheld.

PRAYER.

We approach unto thee, O Lord, as the self-existent and eternal source of life, for by thee have all things been created. We adore thee as the great preserver of the universe, for in thee all creatures live, and move, and have their being. Thou art infinite in wisdom and in power, rich in mercy, and unbounded in love, and all thy works show forth the glorious perfections of the living God. We desire especially to bless and magnify thy name, because of all thy goodness manifested towards us the children of men. Though we are utterly unworthy of thy

PRAISE—PSALM LXXX. 17.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

regard, thou hast never ceased to care for us ; though we have provoked thy wrath and fiery indignation, by our manifold transgressions, thou hast sent thine only-begotten Son to die in our stead, and, by enduring the inconceivable agony of the cross, to make a propitiation for our offences. Make us to feel deeply our obligations unto thee, enable us to perceive our need of a Saviour, and in thine abundant love, grant unto us faith to rest on him, as all our hope and our desire. We thank thee, that thou hast given unto us minds capable of understanding the wisdom and goodness shown forth in thy works. O may thy Spirit descend upon us, and direct our thoughts to the understanding of thy perfections as manifested in the great work of our redemption. Teach us to know thee, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent ; and grant thy blessing, that a deep sense of the mercy shown us may constrain us to depart from all iniquity. Preserve us from the pursuit of sin and folly, and make us ever to remember that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and that the knowledge of thy holy word is the only means by which we can be guided unto life everlasting. Forbid, O Lord, that the queen of the south should rise up in the judgment against us, because she sought to hear the wisdom of Solomon, while we neglect the counsels of thine own Son from heaven. Teach us to prize our privileges, and enable us to profit by them. Wean our souls from the love of earthly things, and enable us to fix them upon things eternal. Give us an interest in Christ, that, filled with the hope of a glorious immortality, we may look on all the pleasures of time as fleeting and uncertain, and, rising above the snares and temptations of the world, may have our treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thief breaks through to steal. Whether thou sendest prosperity or adversity, keep us from forsaking thee, for thou art the only sure and abiding portion. Thou only canst comfort in life, support at death, and bless through eternity. Pardon the sins of the days that are past, and give us grace for the time to come, that in the hour of temptation we may stand unmoved, and in the season of duty, may neither faint nor be weary in well-doing. Hear our prayers, O Lord, and grant an answer for Jesus' sake. Amen.

In the first part of the chapter, our Lord compares himself to a vine, and his disciples to the branches; and, by this simple and pleasing similitude, shows the advantages that result from a close and abiding union with him. As the branch must derive its sap and nourishment from the root, so we must draw spiritual nourishment and growth in grace from the Redeemer alone. As the branch, though full of leaf, and rich in blossom, will wither and decay, when severed from the stem, so the Christian, however great his attainments, and however rich his experience, will immediately fall into folly and sin, if the all-sustaining power of the Holy Spirit be withdrawn. He that abideth not in Christ, like a dead and withered branch cast into the fire, will be consumed in the furnace of divine vengeance; while he that continueth in him, like a fruitful bough, will bring forth abundantly the works of righteousness, and be the honoured instrument of promoting the glory of the Father. Having thus briefly described the blessedness of those that continue in him, our Lord points out its origin and source. 'As the Father,' saith he, 'hath loved me, so have I loved you.' Jesus regards his disciples with that love which is peculiar to the deity. The affections of every created being are necessarily limited in their extent. In God alone do we find goodness without measure or bound, carrying its sympathies to the farthest verge of the universe, and continuing its energies from everlasting to everlasting. In the creature, moreover, every feeling is more or less mingled with selfish emotion; in the Creator, benevolence is absolutely pure. The tenderness of man to man, nay, even of seraph to seraph, has in it some mixture of selfishness. We do good to others, not only because it benefits them, but because the conferring of pleasure increases our own enjoyment. But the great Jehovah is unwearied in his acts of love, though he be infinitely blessed in himself, and though his joy cannot be increased, either by receiving the services, or by witnessing the happiness of his creatures. When our Lord therefore says, 'as the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you,' he, in other words, declares that his affection for his people is eternal and unbounded, and that his grace is sovereign and pure. While thus assuring them of his regard, he urges upon them the duty of loving one another, as he loved them. He calls this his 'commandment;' he sets forth its performance by his people, as the great object which he had in view, and whether he speaks of the fulness of his affection, or of the sacrifice that it led him to offer, he concludes with the counsel, 'love one another.' This precept, so strongly enforced, is in every way worthy of its author. To love as Jesus loved, implies the exercise of affection free from selfish alloy, unwearied in its efforts, and unbounded in its object. We are, in short, enjoined to 'have the same mind in us, that was in Christ,'

'to be perfect, as our Father in heaven is perfect,' and through his grace, to seek to 'be partakers of the divine nature,' of which the essence is described when it is said, that 'God is love.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Who can read this chapter without admiring the wisdom and the grace of Jesus? How simple and beautiful is the compassion with which it begins, and how naturally does our Saviour's counsel flow from it! And, again, how rich are the promises that he makes, and how admirably are they brought to bear upon the precept that he gives! But it is not merely the style and manner that draw our attention, we are especially called upon to mark the character in which the Saviour appears, and to which his language corresponds. He here addresses his disciples as the great Immanuel, who combined in his person the nature of God with that of man. He speaks with authority, as the Lord of glory, and bids them ask what they will, and assures them that their request will be given. He refers to his sufferings, as the man of sorrows, and foretells his cruel and shameful death. His promises and his threatenings bespeak a consciousness of sovereign power, yet his counsels are mild and gentle as those of a brother. We recognise the voice of him who bade the earth appear, and who will hereafter command the dead to arise, though it be whispering peace, and in the most soothing accents breathing comfort. He retains, as it were, all the loveliness of the Godhead, but has veiled its dazzling splendour. He has laid aside his terrors, lest they should make us afraid; he exhibits his mercy, that we may with boldness approach, and put our confidence in him. If this be indeed the case, let the trembling penitent rejoice; he who for our sakes became poor, he who left the throne of heaven, to die on a cross for men, will not reject the returning prodigal, nor despise the prayer of the broken in heart.

PRAYER.

Gracious God, and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ, we desire to thank and praise thee for thine unspeakable love in sending thy Son to make our peace with thee. Make us ever to keep in mind, that without him we are dead in trespasses and sins, that by nature we are children of wrath and heirs of damnation. Cause us to feel deeply our own unworthiness, and to mourn after a godly sort on account of our transgressions. Set our sins in array before us, that seeing their number and manifold aggravations, we may be led to hate them and turn from them. Teach us the extent of our guilt and vileness in thy sight, that we may know the need we have of a Redeemer, and that we may, in some measure, be enabled to comprehend the length, and breadth, and height, and depth, of thy love to us in Christ; though fully to know it passeth all understanding. Send thy Spirit into our hearts, that we may be filled with love and gratitude to thee, and enable us to show forth the sincerity of our devotion, by loving our neighbour as thou hast commanded. Unite us to Christ and make us partakers of the spiritual nourishment that flows from him, that though dead and barren by nature, we may bring forth abundantly the fruits of righteousness to the honour and glory of thee, the Father. Pardon, we pray thee, the sins we have done. Our iniquities are more than the hairs of our head, and fearfully great have their aggravations been. We have sinned against thee, the great Creator, by whom we at first were formed; we have been unmindful of all thy mercies, though thou hast continually preserved us; yea, we have often followed the paths of folly and of sin, though the glad tidings of the gospel have sounded in our ears. Blessed be thy name, thou art merciful and gracious, long-suffering and slow to wrath, and in thee there is redemption even for the chief of sinners. For Jesus' sake blot out our iniquities, and let them not rise up in judgment against us. Give us this night a peaceful slumber, and grant that we may arise in the morning, refreshed, and strengthened, and fitted for the duties of a sabbath-day. Be with thy ministering servants, whom thou hast appointed to distribute unto thy people the bread of life. Guide their thoughts to such subjects as may prove most beneficial to the people under their care, and grant that teachers and taught may be all taught of thee. Hear our prayers, and accept of our thanksgivings, for the sake of Jesus Christ, our great Redeemer, to whom, with thee the Father, and the Holy Spirit, be glory for ever. Amen.

TWENTY-SECOND WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM LXIX. 32.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXIX.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The specific causes that led to the composition of this psalm are not known, but it is obvious, from the whole tenor of it, that they were of an afflictive kind. Ver. 1—21. In these verses the psalmist gives vent to his feelings, in descriptions of his troubles and in earnest prayers for deliverance. Two things especially seem to press heavily on his heart. 1. His own sinfulness, ver. 5; and, 2. The bitter persecutions of the ungodly, ver. 4., &c. For deliverance from both, he betakes himself to God in many earnest supplications. And herein appeared the psalmist's clear views of God's covenant mercy, and his steadfast trust in it, for whereas, generally, sinners are inclined to recoil from the presence and throne of God when they are visited with convicions of sin or providential adversities, he hastes to God's mercy and love as his support and consolation under them. Ver. 22—28. These verses may be viewed in a two-fold light, 1. As divinely inspired imprecations of the psalmist against his wicked persecutors. For the psalm being written by the inspiration of the Spirit, these imprecatory prayers may be viewed as divine threatenings against impenitent sinners, similar to that one, 'Curse ye Meroz,' &c. Or, 2. They may be rendered as simple predictions of divine judgments against them; for the imperative mood, in the Hebrew, admits of a translation in the future tense. Ver. 29—36. These concluding verses express the psalmist's joy in God, and his confidence of eventual triumph over all his enemies. This joy enlarges his heart, and he invokes universal nature to join him in his song of praise.

But although this psalm is primarily applicable to David, yet there is evidence that its principal application is to Christ and his Jewish enemies. Thus ver. 4, 9, 21. are applied to Christ in John xv. 25; ii. 17; xix. 29, 30; and ver. 22, 23. are applied by Paul, in Rom. xi. 8—10. to the Jews who were guilty of his crucifixion, and who were consequently abandoned by God to final unbelief and impenitence. With these keys to its chief signification, we remark that the psalm delineates the humiliation and sufferings of Christ; his eventual deliverance and triumphs, and the judgments (ver. 22—29) which overwhelmed his Jewish persecutors and murderers.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Whether we view the subject and sufferer of this psalm as David or Christ, there are some lessons which it is well fitted to teach us. 1. If we be followers of Christ, we must expect reproach and persecution for his sake. If worldly men can allege our personal infirmities or inconsistencies as the ground of their reproach, they will do it; but, when they cannot, they will not hesitate to avow the real ground of their hatred of us, viz. our faith in Christ and our holy conversation. 2. Ridicule and afflictions for the sake of Christ, should not weaken our attachment to him, but should rather increase it. The more David was afflicted, the more he trusted in God and cried to him in prayer. The more also that Christ, David's antitype, was persecuted, the more strikingly did his faith in his heavenly Father's love display its steadfastness. The faith of God's people needs to be proved and perfected, and for this purpose he sometimes tries it with sore adversities, and permits it to be assailed by temptations and persecutions. And, 3. in all their afflictions and persecutions, believers should constantly cherish the confidence of an ultimate triumph over them. See how David, or rather Christ, exults in the conclusion of this psalm. Paul and Silas also praised God when they were in the dungeons of a prison. For, if it should please God not to grant us any deliverance from our afflictions on earth, death at all events will terminate them, and the everlasting joys and triumphs of heaven will succeed; in the sure prospect of which every suffering believer may exclaim, 'I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgivings,' &c.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Jehovah, as the God of salvation. Thou hast been the dwelling-place of thy people in all generations. We approach thy throne of grace with feelings of reverence and humility, for thou art glorious in holiness, but we are full of darkness and sin. Let not our iniquities cause thee to hide thy face, or to turn away our prayer from thee; but as thou hast revealed thyself in Christ as a sin-forgiving God, so do thou, for his sake, blot out our iniquities, and shine upon us with the light of thy fatherly countenance. O Lord, renew and sanctify us as well as forgive our sins. As our hearts are by nature dead unto thee and alive unto sin, void of all good and of all power to good, but full of all unrighteous lusts and passions, so we cannot glorify thee, nor ever enjoy happiness if thou dost not change our hearts, and enrich us with the divine and holy affections of thy Spirit. Lord, out of thy abundant grace in Christ, give us full measure of enlightening, renewing, and sanctifying grace. And may thy grace and Spirit in us be ever active and influential, so that we may not only be saved ourselves, but may also be instruments of thy glory in the world. Give us, O Lord, fortitude to confess Christ, and even, if need be, to suffer for him in the world. May the zeal of thine house so eat us up that we will be ever willing to extend its glory, although we should suffer reproach and persecution for thy sake. O forbid that inconstancy or apostacy should at any time distinguish our profession of religion before men. Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for our sakes; let not those that seek thee be confounded for our sakes, O God of Israel. Gracious God, do thou support and console us in all our trials and temptations; draw nigh unto our souls and redeem them; deliver us because of our enemies. Grant that by thy grace we may truly believe in Christ, and be maintained in our faith till thou call us hence, in spite of all adversities and spiritual enemies. And now, O Lord, we give thee thanks for all thy past loving-kindness to us, and especially for our religious privileges, and for permitting us to see the light of this day of the Son of man. Prepare our hearts for the services of the sanctuary. May thy ministering servant be fraught with the riches of the gospel of Christ. May the people wait on thee with hearts prepared of the Lord, and may the Holy Spirit crown all the services of this day with his presence and blessing. Lord, enlighten the ignorant; subdue the hardened; comfort the distressed: and confirm and restore the weak and backsliding. We pray for the success of a preached gospel this day throughout the world. Destroy the dominion and existence of false doctrine in thy church, and of superstition in the world. Hasten the glory of the latter day, when the church of Christ shall be universal, and when her people shall be all righteous. Hear these our prayers, and accept of us, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXI. 14.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS LXX. LXXI.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

PSALM LXX. Like those of the preceding psalm, the particular causes that led David to the composition of this one are not known. The title of it, taken in connection with the contents, would seem to teach that it was written in commemoration of some heavy affliction, and of the Lord's deliverance from it. Ver. 1—3. In these verses he addresses a prayer to God for deliverance from his enemies, and for the defeat of their wicked devices against him. In ver. 4. he prays that the people of God may have cause, on his account, to rejoice and be glad in the Lord; and ver. 5. concludes with a repetition of his prayer in his own behalf, on the urgent ground that he was poor and needy, and that in God only he had hope of help and deliverance.

PSALM LXXI. This psalm has neither the author's name, nor any title prefixed to it, but it is supposed by many to have been written by David during his son Absalom's rebellion. Ver. 1—14. These contain many petitions for protection and deliverance from his troubles, in the course of which he encourages and sustains himself by recollections of the Lord's loving-kindness and preservation of him from the time that he was 'taken out of his mother's bowels' until that moment. In ver. 14—21. he expresses his firm resolution to persevere in the paths of holiness, and to show forth the salvation of God to that generation, notwithstanding the power and fury of his enemies; he reiterates his petitions for deliverance from their hand, and indulges in the hope of its speedy approach. Ver. 22—24. conclude the psalm with exclamations of his gratitude to God for his manifold mercies, and his purpose to spend his days praising and glorifying God for them all.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Many of the lessons arising out of these two psalms correspond, in a great measure, with those taught in the psalm on which we commented in the morning; we may, however, state a few other practical remarks which they suggest. 1. When adversities overtake us, we should flee to the refuge of God's covenant mercy and love. David did this, and if he did not obtain deliverance from his distresses, he was inspired with strength to endure them. This recourse to God lessens the bitterness of afflictions, if it does not alleviate their burdensomeness. 2. In all our trials we should, for the confirmation of our faith and hope, remember the Lord's goodness to us in former days and distresses. David encouraged himself, in his afflictions, by remembering how God had been his trust from his youth, and how he had been holden up by him from his mother's womb. Asaph, also, in Psalm xxvii. buoyed up his faith, in his overwhelming distresses, by remembering the years of the right hand of the Most High. The recollection of former instances of God's kind and gracious interposition in behalf of his people, strengthens faith in the perpetuity of his love, even when present trials may not be removed. And, 3. These psalms teach believers that praise is their becoming employment, even when adversities and temptations encompass their path. David is remarkable for praising God with his songs in the darkest night of his tribulations. There are cogent reasons why gratitude should then overflow the hearts of the saints, and praise should burst from their lips: God does not afflict them 'for his pleasure but for their profit, that they may be made partakers of his holiness;' trials are a part of the discipline which the everlasting covenant prescribes for training them to glory, and they are well fitted to separate their affections from idols and entanglements, and to give a heavenliness to their direction. It is in seasons of affliction that the blessed and rejoicing presence of God is most frequently manifested and enjoyed; and it is trials, especially spiritual trials, which most fully conform them to the image of Christ, in which conformity consists their highest honour and happiness. For such reasons as these believers should rejoice in the midst of their tribulations, and say, 'but I will hope continually, and yet praise thee more and more. My mouth shall show forth thy righteousness and thy salvation all the day.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, we desire to approach thee this evening, and to adore thee as the Creator of all things, but especially as the God and Father of all who believe in Christ. We praise thee unfeignedly for thy redeeming mercy revealed through thy Son. We adore the sovereignty of it; we glory in the eternity, the riches, and the unchangeableness of it. O grant that since this everlasting covenant with Christ was devised by thee for the display of thy free grace in the salvation of the chief of sinners, we may be made partakers of its promises and hopes, its graces and its consolations. May all our comforts be covenant blessings, all our afflictions covenant corrections; may we see, in all the events and circumstances of our life, the fruits of Christ's death and the tokens of thy loving-kindness. O may we be thine in Christ; may our sins be forgiven, may our hearts be united to Christ, and may we be made the heirs of heaven, and then we are sure that all things will work together for thy glory and our eternal good. We pray that thou wouldst bless to us the various dispensations of thy providence and the ordinances of thy grace. Do thou, in a special manner, sanctify our trials and afflictions, our bodily infirmities and diseases, our domestic difficulties and anxieties, our worldly losses and privations, and our reproach and persecution for the sake of Christ. May we have grace in all such trials to imitate thy servant David, of whom we have been reading, who made thee his refuge in his distresses, and who sang of thy mercies as well as of thy judgments. Do thou also bless to us the ordinances of salvation, and the numerous religious privileges we enjoy. May the services in which we have been engaged this day increase our knowledge of Christ, confirm our faith in him, and enlarge our love and devotedness to him. Pardon the languor or the distraction, the impatience or the unbelief, which may have polluted our feeble attempts to serve thee, and let our duties be accepted through the merits of Christ. We desire to feel deeply sensible of our precious privileges and means of improvement in every grace, and may we abound in the use of them more and more. We pray also that thou wouldst extend them to those individuals and nations that are destitute of them. Give efficacy to the gospel wherever it has been preached this day, and open for it a great and effectual door into hearts and regions from which it is still excluded. O clothe thy church in her robes of beauty, and fill her with the Spirit of Christ, and may she spread on the right hand and on the left, until her salvation go forth, like a lamp that burneth, to the remotest and the darkest habitations of heathenism and cruelty. We now thank thee for all the refreshment our souls have received this day in the closet, at the family altar, and in thy sanctuary, and to thee we would commend ourselves this night. Avert from our dwelling the steps of the evil doer, and the calamities to which we are exposed by fire, and by tempest, and by flood. Grant to us all refreshing sleep, and freedom from evil thoughts and dreams upon our beds, and may we awake in the morning in the enjoyment of health, with thankful hearts, and with strength and willingness for the duties of this week. But if thou hast ordained for any of us a sudden and unexpected summons into thy presence this night, O may our souls be prepared, by thy Spirit, for entering upon the services and joys of heaven. Hear these our prayers, as all that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 30—37.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XII.

REMARKS.

Ver. 15. 'For the cause was from the Lord,' that is, it was his purpose,—and not only his secret and eternal purpose, but it had been declared by his prophet Ahijah. Though, however, the cause was from God, yet the sin and error of the judgment are alone chargeable on Rehoboam and his foolish advisers. The counsel of God shall stand; yet in that the responsibility of every decision rests with man. Ver. 28. Jeroboam's sin was a flagrant violation of the second commandment. He did not profess to introduce new gods, but he made graven images, and worshipped them. God hates and forbids the worship of himself by images. He is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit.

What a contrast between the wisdom of Solomon and the folly of his son! How strikingly exhibited in their two judgments, which are particularly recorded. From the case before us let us learn the importance of choosing counsellors of experience, especially those who have had great opportunities of learning wisdom, as was true of these old men, for 'they stood before Solomon.'

It may seem strange that the kingdom established under David, and still farther confirmed under Solomon, should so soon be rent in twain, and only a small share be left to David's line; and it may seem still more strange how this could be from God, when its immediate effects were a fearful schism and heresy in the church. But all was according to the counsel of the Wisest; the folly and wrath of man shall alike praise him. How does it lighten what is dark, and inspire hope amidst the greatest gloom and sadness, when we can say, in regard to anything, 'This thing is from God!' This stills rising doubt and fear, and calms all into submission.

The conduct of Rehoboam and Jeroboam, after the separation, may occasion no little surprise. As the former is represented in the early part of the chapter only as haughty, misguided, and rash, we are scarcely prepared for that instant and entire obedience he yields to God's message by the prophet. Though insolent and tyrannical to his subjects, he yet showed obedience and submission to the will of the Lord, and that even in the heat of his irritation, and with a hundred and eighty thousand men to support him.

How ungrateful and wicked the conduct of Jeroboam! Though the Lord, whom he had already found to be faithful, had promised, that if he would walk in his ways and keep his statutes and commandments, he would build him a sure house, and give Israel unto him; yet through sinful mistrust in God, and presumptuous confidence in his own policy, he dissuaded the people from going up to Jerusalem to worship, and erected calves for them at Beth-el and Dan. How often do we show a similar spirit, and by our short-sighted and misdirected efforts seek to hasten or mend God's designs. Let the example of Jeroboam teach us that God has not only his ends, but his ways, and that any attempt of ours to alter or improve them tends only to evil. We must be ready always to follow when God leads, and are honoured even at times to be fellow-workers; but we must never go before, far less go against them.

The people seem to have been easily drawn over to the idolatry and will-worship of the new king. This greatly enhanced his guilt, as is manifest from its being so often repeated by the sacred historian, that 'he sinned, and made Israel to sin,' seducing them to the worship of idols. And if the power of Jeroboam was so great for evil, what might it have been, by the blessing of God, for good? How much may it thus be in the power of a king to promote the glory of God and his pure worship. The character of Jeroboam may thus in this case be completely reversed, and it may be said of him that he not only serves God himself, but leads others to serve him.

PRAYER.

Almighty God, thou art the King of kings and the Lord of lords. Thou rulest supreme over all, directing every thing for thy glory and the accomplishment of thy gracious designs. It is thou that raisest up and bringest low; thou woundest and thou healest; thou killest and thou makest alive. May we ever recognize and cheerfully submit to thy sovereignty, and even where we do not understand, teach us, O Lord, submissively to bow. O Lord, who alone art to be feared, we confess that we have not honoured thee as thou oughtest to be honoured. We have been proud and selfish, consulting our own pleasure, rather than thy glory, and leaning to our own understanding rather than seeking and waiting for the wisdom which is profitable to direct. O do thou forgive us this sin, and all our sins. Enter not into judgment with us, else we could not stand before thee. It is written in thy word, that if we confess our sins thou art faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness; O Lord, we make a free and a full confession of all, we have no excuse and no apology to offer; for we have sinned against the clearest light and greatest grace, but for Christ's sake we pray and hope for mercy. We would put thee in remembrance of his sufferings and his death for us. Accept of this in the room of ours; through his stripes may we be healed, through his death may we live. O Lord, the fountain of all wisdom, direct us in all our decisions and endeavours. May we ever avoid the company and the counsels of the ungodly and the unwise, and choose as our associates and advisers those in whom is the fear of God, and who are partakers of heavenly wisdom. Teach us, gracious Father, ever to distrust ourselves, but to put our whole trust and dependence on thee alone. Lord, not our will, but thine, be done. And even at those times when trials and dangers await us, and when our anxiety and fear are greatest, then most of all would we renounce our own wisdom, which at best is folly, and rather say with our Redeemer, when in his great agony, Father, glorify thy name. Keep us from presumptuous sins; from prying into the secret things which belong unto God, or interfering with thy works or ways. Lord, bless our native land. May our sovereign ever be preserved from false and foolish counsellors, and be led always to do what will be for thy glory and the good of the people. And O may our religious privileges be maintained in purity, and transmitted unimpaired to the latest posterity. Preserve us ever from idolatry, superstition, and will-worship. Almighty God, our constant preserver, we thank thee that we are alive and well this morning. Help us to remember the solemn exercises of yesterday. May we carry much of the solemnity and sacredness of the Lord's day into all the duties and exercises of the week. We need thy protection not only in the darkness of the night, but even in the bright sunshine of the day. Stretch over us the wings of thy Providence. We commend our friends to thy friendship, and our relations to an intimate relationship with thee. Sympathize with the sick and the afflicted. Bless all. Add this day to the number of those that shall be saved. Christ, strengthen thine own people. O Lord, hear, and answer, and accept of us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLIII.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XVI.

REMARKS.

The followers of Christ must not count it a strange thing when persecution or trial comes upon them. It is only what their Master foretold, only what prophets and holy men in every age have experienced. Blessed, then, are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake; they experience a new proof of Christ's foresight and faithfulness; they have a new evidence of their following in the footsteps of those who are now inheriting the promises, for so persecuted they the prophets that were before them. When injured by others, we should pray for rather than be angry with them; we should regret more that God's law is broken, and Christ's cause hated, than that we personally suffer. Besides, as the evil treatment of such proceeds from their ignorance, because, while they think they are doing God service, they 'know not the Father nor the Son,' we should be ready to pardon, and say, as did the dying Saviour of his persecutors, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.'

The disciples sorrowed for the absence of Christ, without caring whither he was to go: they indulged only the natural feeling, forgetful of what might have enlarged their knowledge, confirmed their faith, and animated their hope. How true a description this of many when bereaved. Sorrow so fills their heart that there seems no room for any other feeling; whereas, this is the very time when the unseen and the future should be realized as visible and present; when he who is the resurrection and the life should be especially dear, and the promise, 'he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live again,' especially precious.

How strange that Christ should say to his sorrowing disciples, 'it is expedient for you that I go away.' What friend like Christ, yet the Holy Spirit was to supply his place, and abide with them for ever. What teacher like him 'who spake as never man spake,' yet the Spirit would guide them unto all truth, and bring all things to their remembrance. What success could they expect in their contest with the world, when their Master was gone? Yet his absence would make it greater. He, when glorified, was to send his Spirit, who would convince the world of sin, and righteousness, and judgment. When he was poured out, there would be a more penitent and wide-spread confession of sins,—a clearer view, and more extensive putting on of Christ's righteousness, and his power and authority would be more conspicuously displayed in the condemnation and overthrow of the great adversary. But does not the coming and power of the Spirit detract from the glory of Christ? By no means. 'He shall glorify me;' and just as the copiousness of the stream proves only the fulness of the fountain, so the effects of the Spirit's coming only glorify him who sends him. The disciples were very dull at comprehending, and very slow of heart to believe Christ's approaching sufferings, death, and resurrection. But the event explained all; they now saw everything clearly, and rejoiced.

Christ is not only our advocate with the Father, but his righteousness is our only plea. And it is sufficient; we need no more; for 'whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name, he will give it you.' Well, then, may we come with boldness, that we may obtain mercy to pardon, and grace to help us. It is by asking much that our joy shall be full, and the more we ask, we put the greater honour on Christ, and show our stronger faith in the Father's love. Believers are not told that they shall have no trials, but that they shall be supported under them, and delivered out of them. Though often tossed on a stormy sea, they have always a haven near, to which they can repair. 'In me ye shall have peace.' This word is true. Sooner shall heaven and earth pass away than it prove false. Why art thou then cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? In the world ye shall have tribulation, but in Christ ye shall have peace.

PRAYER.

Most gracious God, the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and who hast promised, that for his sake thou wilt hear us always, we beseech thee at this time to behold us in mercy. Look upon us, not as we are in ourselves, guilty and polluted, but behold us in Christ, righteous and accepted. We approach thee as our Father, through Jesus our surety and intercessor; we have no merit and no claims of our own, but we have a strong plea in the name of Christ. Of this would we make mention, and on this would we entirely rely. In ourselves we are vile, and deserve thy wrath and curse. O Lord, we deserve thy fiercest wrath, thy heaviest stroke; the lowest pit of hell might well be our portion. But we believe, and are sure, that Christ died for sinners, even the chief, and that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but have everlasting life. O that we could realize Christ more as our Saviour; as having suffered and died for us, that we might be righteous; as ready to impart to us all the benefits of his death, all the riches of his grace. We believe that the Lord Jesus is now exalted at thy right hand, and he, whose word is true, promised that he would send the Spirit unto his people. We plead that promise; we entreat its fulfilment. O may the Holy Ghost be poured out from on high. May he be given to us, that we may be convinced of sin, of our need of a Saviour, and that Christ is the very Saviour we need, having a righteousness sufficient to justify us, and power to subdue us unto himself, and to restrain and conquer all his and our enemies. May we, being full of the Spirit, hate sin and glorify Christ. May that Spirit show us every day more of the loveliness, excellency, and glory of our great Redeemer, that we may extol him more, and give our whole hearts unreservedly to him. May we be both sanctified and comforted by the Holy Ghost, and grow in holiness and comfort through faith unto salvation. Sanctify to us all our trials and bereavements. O thou who of old didst enable the followers of Christ to glory even in the death of their Master, and to rejoice that he was taken from them, do thou enable us to rejoice in all our tribulations; to feel, when suffering under thy rod, that it is in very faithfulness thou dost afflict us, and to say, when the very desire of our eyes is taken away with a stroke, The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord. O Lord, who art slow to wrath, and ready to forgive, we beseech thee to pardon the sins and short-comings of this day. In everything we offend and come short, but with thee there is forgiveness, that thou mayst be feared, and plenteous redemption, that thou mayst be sought unto. O Lord, we could not lie down this night in peace, we could not rest in our beds, if we thought thou wert angry with us. We beseech thee, then, to be reconciled to us through Christ. May we know, that though once thou wert angry with us, yet now thine anger is turned away. We commend ourselves, and all dear to us, to thy preserving and protecting care during the night. May no evil come near our persons or dwelling, but may we be spared to see the light of another day, and when we awake may we find thee still with us. Hear, good Lord, we beseech thee, these our prayers, and grant us all we need, and far more than we can ask, for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XIX. 12.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XIII.

REMARKS.

The death of the prophet is plainly penal, the consequence of his sin, because he turned back and ate and drank. But where is the justice of this? It ought to be a sufficient proof of its justice that God did it. However much we may pity the prophet who returned, and though the lie of the other was clearly the occasion of bringing him back, yet that does not justify his conduct. God is true, and changeth not. The intimation of his will was in this case express, and never recalled. This, then, was his sin, that he did not believe and rest on the truth and faithfulness of God, and for this he died. It was no vindication of Eve's disobedience that the devil said, 'thou shalt not surely die;' so neither in the case before us.

How great the blindness and sin of those who, in spite of the many express prophecies of scripture, and their clear fulfilment, deny its divine inspiration. Who but are taught of God could have known, three hundred and fifty years before it happened, that one Josiah by name was to rule in Judah, and act as is here foretold? How watchful God's care of his servants, especially when executing his commissions. The Lord bore all Jeroboam's contempt of himself and perversion of his worship; and yet when he stretched out his hand against his servant, it withered in a moment. How bold and fearless, then, may his servants be in denouncing God's wrath against the ungodly and profane, for then, especially, may they expect him to be their defence and their safety.

It may be, that the man of God from Judah, when sitting under the oak, was secretly approving himself for having so faithfully executed God's commission, and resisted every solicitation. He was thus, when lifted up in his own eyes, prepared to fall, and that by listening to the suggestions of the old prophet.

Having already done as God directed, he perhaps thought that now he might follow his own inclination, and go back, and eat and drink. How needful to beware, lest the successful resisting of temptation be not itself a snare, and a former victory, through Satan's artifices, become the occasion of subsequent and irrecoverable defeat. Let us be on our guard, also, against those pretending to make known to us the will of God. 'Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they be of God.' 'Many false prophets are gone out into the world.' 'To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them.'

How ready are we to seek the Lord in distress, and beseech him to remove his hand from off us, and yet when our prayer is heard, deliverance experienced, and prosperity returns, God is not in all our thoughts. What a dreadful account of our hearts, that the very event which should endear the Lord more to us, and make us trust in him at all times, should make us indifferent about him, and cease regarding him! Such was Jeroboam's case. In spite of the deliverance he experienced, and God's judgments on the prophet who was led astray, he returned not from his evil way. We need not only judgments and chastisements, but grace to improve them. These cannot renew the heart; there must be the putting forth of God's own Spirit, else no good will follow.

PRAYER.

Most gracious God, our preserver from day to day, we approach thy footstool at this time with grateful hearts, to thank thee for thy watchful care during the night, and for all the blessings of this morning. We count it a great privilege that we are permitted and enabled to worship thee in the family; and as thou dost not now require the sacrifice of bulls or goats, we would desire to give thee the sacrifice of meek and contrite hearts. We come to thee, O Lord, through the blood of Christ, that full and perfect sacrifice that was once offered, and we earnestly beseech thee that through him we may find access to thy throne of grace. May our prayers ascend before thee, perfumed with the much incense of a Saviour's merits. We pray, Lord, for a meek and submissive spirit. May we never, like Jeroboam, murmur at thy threatenings or despise thy warnings; but may the terrors of the Lord persuade us, that we may repent before it be too late, and seek for mercy while it is to be found. We thank thee that the miseries and danger of a life of sin are so clearly pointed out in thy word, and that salvation and happiness are to be found in Christ Jesus. O God, who art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, we have to confess with shame before thee our great transgressions. What a holy law we have broken! what a gracious Father we have disobeyed! we have sinned against the clearest light. Thy great goodness herein served to call forth our heinous ingratitude and rebellion. How often have we sought thee in our adversity, in want, anxiety, or distress; and yet when relief was given, and health and prosperity returned, the Lord has not been in all our thoughts. How often have thy very answers to prayer, and deliverances vouchsafed, instead of endearing thee the more to us, and filling our hearts with new joy in thee, been the very occasion of estranging our affections from thee, and making us follow after vanity. O Lord, who art rich in mercy and slow to wrath, forgive our deep transgressions, and give us grace in time to come to improve by all thy dispensations; to see thy hand in all, and bless thee for all. Help us, O Lord, to consider and lay to heart what we have now been reading of thy strictness to mark iniquity, and of thy great jealousy over thy word. Teach us how dangerous it is to leave any thing undone which thou hast commanded, or to act in any thing contrary to thy revealed will. May we be watchful and faithful. Give us a love to thy law: a delight in thy commandments. May we regard whatsoever thou hast required as not only the law of thy authority, but the law of thy grace; given because thou lovest us, and seekest our good always. Preserve us, O Lord, from lying prophets and false teachers, professing a charge from thee while they have received none. Bring down Antichrist, and all speaking lies in hypocrisy; but do thou own and honour thine own servants. Increase the number of faithful ministers, and increase greatly their success. Give them many seals of their ministry. Bless our own pastor; may he be a blessing to all committed to his charge. May we learn the law at his mouth, and find him an ambassador of Christ to us; every day enlarging our knowledge and confirming us in the faith. Bless the neighbourhood where we dwell. May pure and undefiled religion prevail amongst us. May this place be as a field which the Lord hath blessed. Be with us this day, in our going out and coming in; do thou go before us and watch over us. Keep us from all evil, but especially from sin, the greatest of all. Hear these our prayers, and grant us more than we can either ask or think, for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 18.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XVII.

REMARKS.

This chapter contains the prayer of Christ before his departure. In it he prays for himself that he may be glorified, and for his people that they may be kept, sanctified, united here, and finally glorified hereafter. This prayer was offered with the greatest solemnity of manner, and the deepest fervour and unction of spirit. 'The hour is come,' refers evidently to the hour of his approaching sufferings and decease. Jesus knew well the work he had undertaken, with the severity and the hour of his great agony, so that he was at no time taken by surprise, but went forward unmoved to meet his arrayed and fiercest foes. 'Glorify thy Son.' The hour of Christ's sufferings was also the hour of his glory; his death was his triumph; even on the cross such evidence was given to his greatness, as to induce the soldiers standing by to say, 'truly this was the Son of God.' The death of Christ is what believers glory in here; it is what the redeemed in bliss shall celebrate to all eternity. O that we could so look at the cross of Christ, as to see there reflected, as in a bright mirror, all the attributes of God; his holiness, justice, truth, and love, all mutually illustrating each other, each heightening the other's glory, while its own lustre remains undiminished. Well then might Christ pray in the prospect of this, and all the blessed consequences that would result from his death, 'glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee.' See chap. xii. 23, 24. and xiii. 31.

Our Lord having spoken of what he had done for his own, and the reception they gave him, offers up, in the 9th and following verses, his petitions on their behalf. Here we have a specimen of that constant intercession which our great High Priest, now that he has ascended into the heavens, is, without ceasing, offering up for his people. This is a special prayer for his own. Whatever may be his sympathies for the world at large, however much he may pity them that perish, and devise that all should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth, yet here we have a special prayer for his own church; first, for his immediate disciples, and then for all that should believe in him through their word. In ver. 11. our Saviour speaks as if he desired that after his removal his heavenly Father would look on his disciples as coming in his place, to share the same affection, and enjoy the same favour which he himself had enjoyed. And as he had kept them while in the world, so now he desires to surrender them up to the Father, who by his Spirit supplies Christ's absence, and leads and guides them that believe.

That Christ's will respecting us should be accomplished, it is not necessary that we should be taken out of the world, either literally by death immediately after conversion, or otherwise by entering into a separate place, away from all intercourse with the world, and from all the opportunities of usefulness which our station supplies. Christians are not to be of the world, though in the world. It is enough that the Lord keeps us from the evil for which Christ prays, and which by the Spirit is done. Ver. 21—26. Jesus prays especially that the church may be one, and that all its members may be joined together in love and intimate communion. How opposed then to the will of Christ, and how offensive in his sight all divisions and distractions in the church, especially when these are attended with unkind, unbrotherly, and angry feelings. It is Christ in his people that will heal their divisions, and make them perfect in one. O what need of watchfulness, that while steadfast for the truth, and true to Christ, we may yet cherish the kindest feelings to all, especially those that are of the household of faith. But our Lord prays not only first for the purity, and then for the unity of his people here, but also that they may be with him for ever. Their desire is to be with Christ, which is far better. His will is that they may be with him where he is. Thus will his joy be full, and they also will enter into the joy of their Lord.

PRAYER.

O Lord, our heavenly Father, we draw near to thee this evening, as children to a father, able and ready to help us. We rejoice that Jesus died for us. May we honour his death, and glory in his cross. May we count this a pledge of love unspeakable, and love him who first and so loved us. We rejoice that he who died for our sins was raised again for our justification, and is now at thy right hand pleading for his people. O may we, who are the chief of sinners, through the merits and mediation of Christ be justified, accepted, and saved. Lord, make us monuments of thy redeeming love, trophies of Christ's power. May we be saved, that Christ may see of the travail of his soul in us, and that we through all eternity may be monuments to the glory of his grace. Father, save us, that we may glorify thee; give us thy Spirit, that we may be quickened to serve thee. Sanctify us, create in us clean hearts, and renew in us right spirits, that we may be altogether such as thou wouldst have us to be; that from our renewed hearts thy image may be fully reflected; that all our motives and devices may be for thy glory. O may those members and faculties of ours which have hitherto been too much instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, become henceforth all of them the instruments of righteousness unto God. May thy good Spirit sanctify us wholly through thy truth, and may thy glory and praise be the end of all. O Lord, thou who hast a peculiar people of thine own, separate them more and more unto thyself; preserve them from the evil that is in the world, make them bold and decided in thy cause; and knowing what thou hast promised, and what Christ has asked, and is ever asking, may they be strong in thee, and hold fast the beginning of their confidence firm unto the end. Heal, we beseech thee, the breaches of Zion. May Ephraim no longer envy Judah, nor Judah vex Ephraim; but may all rejoice together. Lord, grant that all true Christians may press nearer to Christ, their common Head, that thus they may be more closely united to each other. May a spirit of mutual forbearance and mutual love be poured out, and may our great striving be how best to promote the glory of our common Lord. O thou who hast no pleasure in the death of the wicked, and wouldst rather that all should come to the knowledge of the truth, add daily to the number of those who shall be saved. May thy kingdom come, both at home and abroad, in our hearts, and throughout the world. O speedily give to Christ the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. Give much of thy Spirit to all ministers and missionaries of the truth; the more their difficulties and obstacles, the more help do thou give them from on high. We thank thee, gracious Father, for thy kind preservation of us during the day. Pardon the sins of this day, we beseech thee. Watch over us during the night. May our last and our first thoughts be ever of thee. Guide us by thy counsel here, and afterwards receive us up into glory. Bless all our relations and friends. Reward our benefactors, forgive our enemies, and teach us to forgive them. Hear, we beseech thee, these our petitions, and answer us, not according to the error or feebleness of our desires, but according to thy perfect knowledge of our wants, and thine own great mercies, for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CXIX. 57.

SCRIPTURE—I KINGS XV.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—8. The most flourishing prosperity, to which the religious state of any nation may be advanced, is no guarantee that such prosperity shall be perpetuated. Genuine piety and love to God, are heirlooms entailed upon no family of earth. Not even the wisdom of Solomon could keep him from declining from the steps of his father David. Rehoboam saw without regret, and permitted without restraint, the vilest abominations of idolatry, to supersede the pure worship of the holy Jehovah; he interposed not, when his wife, the daughter of Abshalom, set up her idol grove. Abijam copied his impiety and indifference, and thus provoked the Lord to cut short his reign. But though God was angry with the family of David, to have removed it out of his sight, he yet was gracious for David's sake. 'He had once sworn in his holiness, that he would not lie unto David,' therefore did he give Abijam a son to succeed him on the throne. He would not put out in utter darkness the lamp he had ordained for his anointed. But while the covenant remained sure, and he would not pass from it, he branded David's sin with the mark of his abiding hate. Even when recording his own faithfulness, to the promises of the well-ordered covenant, which so gladdened the heart of his servant, and shed such a brilliant glory on his departing hours, the matter of Uriah the Hittite shall not be forgotten; for thus shall it be manifest to latest generations that grace does its work, purely because it is grace. Ver. 9—15. But if piety and love to God are not possessions which a father can entail upon his son; blessed be his name, neither are ungodliness and graceless habits. The wicked Abijam is the father of pious Asa, and the short-lived reign of the one is followed by the long and prosperous reign of the other. It is cheering to dwell upon Asa's character. He was a man of God; 'his heart was perfect with the Lord.' Earthly relationships were dear to him; earthly rank had doubtless all due respect at his hands; but such relationship and rank were utter trifles to him, when put in competition with the claims of his God; and even his grandmother, and she a queen, was not spared in the day of reformation; she must as much yield to his zeal for the purity of God's worship, her idol grove must as utterly perish, as the upholders of the sin of Sodom perished under his vengeful sword. The perfect heart, being God's workmanship, has no respect of persons. Ver. 16—22. The zeal of Asa's perfect heart for the purity and perfection of God's worship, prompted in him due regard for the privileges and unrestrained liberty of his worshippers. And therefore, lest Baasha, by fortifying Ramah, which lay in the tribe of Benjamin, upon the north border, between Judah and Israel, should prevent pious Israelites from coming to worship at Jerusalem, Asa struggled hard to put a stop to his design. How ought we to regret that the perfect heart of Asa did not here display itself in reliance upon the arm of the Lord, instead of permitting his worldly policy to rob the royal treasury and the house of God, in order to bribe an arm of flesh! Ver. 23—34. The Lord visits the sins of the fathers upon the children. Nadab came to the throne, only to undergo the doom pronounced upon Jeroboam his father, who made Israel to sin. The eyes of the Lord can search out every one, against whom his word goeth forth—none shall escape his hand. How fearful the fruits of one man's sin! Son and nephew—grand-children, kindred, all are swept away. The Lord could endure the sight neither of that man's seed, nor his kindred who had laid the first step of the impiety, which, in the end, removed his beloved Israel from the land of their fathers. And even as Jeroboam was raised up from the dust to fill the throne, a man, as mean as himself, is raised up to rend it from his family. A man from the most obscure tribe in Israel, from a quarter where no opposition was expected, rose and smote

Nadab, amid his captains and his mighty men: and the house of Jeroboam, which, in the day of its strength, could win one kingdom for itself, and bid defiance to another, in the day of retribution miserably fell before the might of a private individual. The strongest has no strength, and the weakest has all might, in the day when he who has all hands and all hearts in his hand, is pleased to command it so.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, we approach unto thee this morning, through Jesus Christ our great High Priest and intercessor, beseeching thee to lift on us the light of thy reconciled countenance. We bless thee that thou givest mercy, not because we are worthy, but because thou art gracious, and in covenant with thy Son, to bestow mercy upon thy chosen. May we be of their number. Impress upon our heart and conscience, the great lessons taught us by the portion of thy word we have now read, and meditated upon. Out of the treasury of thy grace may the love of God, and thy quickening Spirit, be poured out upon us, to deepen in our hearts the memory of thy great goodness, and our present unworthiness and past guilt. O gracious Father, make our heart perfect to follow thee fully. Help us to search out thy whole counsel, and incline us to walk by it. Let not the love of earthly ties, let not the claims of earthly rank, lead us from the path of duty; but help us ever to fear and love thee, and, relying upon thy strength, may we have courage to break loose from the fear of man, which bringeth a snare. Give us growing zeal for thy glory, that we may both glorify thee ourselves, and lead others to fear thy name. Spare us, we entreat thee; pour not on us the vengeance we deserve; let not our portion be with the Jeroboams of this world, who make Israel to sin. May it be ours in the might of thy Spirit, and the energy of thy grace, to redeem the time, and so to lift up a testimony for thee, that the sinners around us may be won to thy service, when they behold our holy conversation, coupled with fear. We would deplore the evil of sin, and confess thy spotless justice in visiting it with the rod of thy vengeance. We would deplore the desolations it has wrought in our own hearts and in the world; and lament the ruin it has wrought to thine own Israel. And we would pray, that whilst thou givest full triumph to thy word in our hearts, so that they be renewed in thy sight; while thou crownest with success the efforts of Christian ministers and missionaries, so that from the rising to the going down of the sun thy name may be praised; we would pray, that whilst thou graciously doest all this, thou wouldst have mercy speedily on Israel, and mercy on Judah, that, as one nation, they may be restored to their own land, and the privileges of the covenant. May the good Lord hasten this in his time. We bless thee for the mercies of the night; keep us in thy fear throughout the day. Keep our going out and our coming in, and spare us, that we may, at the close of the day, again surround thy throne of grace with songs of rejoicing, and say, Blessed be the Lord God, who hath not turned away our prayer from him, nor his mercy from us. Hear us graciously, and answer us according to the abundance of thy love, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM XXII. 23.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XVIII. 1—24.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—6. While the endearing loveliness of our Lord's character manifested itself the more fully in the midst of his disciples, the nearer the period of separation from them drew on, so also did the noble majesty of that character shine more conspicuously, as the hour approached when he must resist unto blood, striving against sin. How earthly are our hearts, and sluggish our souls, that do not manifest livelier impressions from meditation on these wonderful truths! Jesus knew that all things written concerning him in the scriptures must now be accomplished. The traitor was already gathering a mob, and arming the ruffian band, which was to deliver him to the Jewish council. But Gethsemane had already witnessed the first sad scene of the sufferings of a soul sorrowful even to death. Already had Jesus been upheld to drink with resignation of the bitter cup; already had this foretaste of his woe, brought with it, in angel visits, a foretaste of his final triumph, and strong in the might of omnipotence, he went forth to meet his foes. Let us go with him, not to die with him, but to behold and admire the dignity of the Son of God, before the band of rebels that sought his life. Undaunted he asks, 'Whom seek ye?' unmoved he hears the reply, 'Jesus of Nazareth.' Let us behold also his sovereign might, and tremble before it. The answer of the great I AM, felled his enemies to the ground. In a moment Judas and his band were wallowing on the earth. Truly never man spake like this man. And he wrought this miracle, to show that he laid down his life of his own free will; no man took it from him. How gracious was Jesus, to raise his prostrate foes; how condescending to yield to them!

Ver. 6—11. Yet he interposed again, but on behalf of those he loved, not on his own. He had given proof of his ability to rescue himself; but now his hour was come, and he would not. He pled only for the safety of his disciples. 'If ye seek me, let these go away.' O the compassion of a suffering Saviour, though he knew they would all forsake him in his hour of need! There is no spot in the character or conduct of the Son of God. Does he act in his own behalf? It is in majesty, sublime, omnipotent. Does he plead for his disciples? It is unutterable tenderness. All is becoming his dignity as God, his sympathy as man. But alas! for his disciples, sinful men; Judas fingers the price of his blood, and betrays him with a kiss. Peter, rash, thoughtless, head-strong, provokes the fury of enemies, even after Jesus has secured his freedom from injury and attack. Peter would still have had his Lord turn from devoting his life a ransom for souls. But Jesus had pledged himself to drink the cup of vengeance, and 'he was not a man that he should lie, or the son of man that he should repent.'

Ver. 12—24. And now let us turn and behold the Lord of glory bound, and in the hands of sinful men. He who with the might of ten thousand Samsons, might have burst his fetters as easily as bands of burned thread, was now 'led as a lamb to the slaughter.' Peter also followed, but afar off. (Luke xxii. 54.) Already was his hot-headed courage cooled, and when he gained the midst of his Master's enemies, it had entirely vanished. The challenge of the high priest's maid-servant was sufficient to daunt him, and he denied his Lord. Alas! his fire of love had gone out. It was smothered under the ashes of fallen and mortified pride. Let us condemn this cowardice, but remember how often we have acted Peter's part. If we wonder at his pusillanimity, let us look to ourselves. The sight of our own heart will quell every rising of our tongues to upbraid the fallen apostle, or glory over him. May the Lord ever preserve us from such a fall as his; and enable us, in the hour of trial, to show that we know the Saviour in the power of his resurrection, as well as in the fellowship of his sufferings.

PRAYER.

Almighty and most gracious God, we draw near to thy throne of grace through the blood and intercession of thine own dear Son, to glorify thee for the mercies of the past day, and to cast ourselves upon thy kindness and care for the coming night. Ever blessed be thy holy name, that the Lord Jesus condescended, in the fulness of his zeal for thy glory, and his compassion for us, to undertake and accomplish the work of our redemption. We would be humbled to the dust because of our sins, when we reflect upon the sufferings that Jesus endured on our account. O help us to see and to acknowledge that it was not Jewish malice and Gentile cruelty that bound and scourged him, crowned him with thorns, and nailed him to the cross; but our sins that exposed him to the hidings of thy countenance, and the fierceness of thy wrath. O grant that the Holy Spirit, whose office it is alone to take of the things of Christ and show them to thy people, may so manifest to us the sufferings of the Saviour, as to impress our hearts with just views of the evil of sin, and thereby incline us to hate it with a perfect heart. May that Spirit fill our hearts with the love of Christ, that we may love him who first loved us, who gave himself for us, and now intercedes on our behalf, at thine own right hand. And grant, O Lord, while we contemplate with wonder the firmness and courage of the Lord Jesus in his day of trial, while we glorify thee, that he shrunk not from the dreadest sufferings, that we may, in the apostacy of Judas, and the fall of Peter, discern our own weakness, and our utter inability to stand of ourselves in the hour of temptation. Grant, we entreat thee, that the contemplation of our Saviour's sufferings, and his disciples' weakness, may fill us with humbling views of what we ourselves are; and constrain us to leave ourselves in the hands of him who alone has grace sufficient for us. May we be able daily to carry about with us in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our mortal flesh. May Christ live in us. May we live for him, and to his glory. Let the knowledge of his redemption spread in the world. Give success to all missionary efforts, and the labours of thy ministering servants, and may the time speedily come when all ends of the earth shall turn unto the Lord, and all nations do him homage. Bless us with grace throughout the coming night. As the sun has not smitten us by day, so neither let the moon by night. Refresh us with the rest of thy beloved, and raise us up to the health and strength of a new day. And under the constant guidance of thy supporting and sanctifying grace, may we be prepared to lie down in the grave in peace, and wake on the resurrection morn to the glories and blessedness of eternal life. All we ask is in and through the name of Jesus Christ, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVI. 1—7.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XVI.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—7. Let us behold here the majesty of him who is King of kings and Lord of lords. Let us listen to his voice. By him kings reign. By him are their thrones established or overturned. Baasha was raised up from the lowest origin to execute righteous vengeance on the house of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin. He ought therefore to have taken warning from the doom of that monarch. But he walked in the same steps, and exposed himself and his family to the same vengeance. Nay, his slaughter of Jeroboam was sin. Though he executed the predetermined counsel of Jehovah, and swept away the object of his curse, yet not only was his personal following the sin of Jeroboam an element in his condemnation, but retributive vengeance visited on his head the murder of his sovereign. Ver. 8—14. Low indeed must the royal house of Israel have now been sunk, when its monarch so far forgot his dignity as to perpetrate a drunken debauch in the house of his steward. To what fearful hazard does a drunkard expose himself! Elah died indeed as a fool dieth. Intoxication had bound his hands and fettered his feet. He could neither resist nor flee. Fear doubtless prompted Zimri, irrespective of the prophet's doom, to cut off the family, friends, and kinsfolk of Baasha, that he might secure the throne which his covetous ambition had instigated him to attempt. But thereby God fulfilled his word. He can accomplish his will by the passions and the pride of men, as well as by their well-directed wisdom and energy. Ver. 15—20. How short lived was the reign of Zimri! only seven days, one short week, but long enough for the purpose of trying him, and proving that he too would walk in the ways of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin. Vengeance slumbered not, and on the day of retribution, neither the walls of Tirzah, nor the splendour of the royal palace, stood him in stead. Tremble, O our souls, at the doings of the Lord. Ver. 20—34. It is sad for a people to be torn between the contentions of usurpers of the throne. Israel had sinned grievously in revolting from the house of David; more grievously still in so readily falling in with Jeroboam's revolt from the pure worship of God. They were made to drink deep of the cup they had thus mingled for themselves. Scarcely had the tumult and confusion of one sedition, and the murder of their monarch, subsided, ere a similar scene occurred; and they, who would have idolatry, had it at length to the full. Omri was more vile and wicked than his predecessors; and, as if it had been a light thing for him and them to turn more than ever from the will of God, his son Ahab sold himself, in company with Jezebel, his idolatrous wife, to work wickedness greedily. The sin of Jeroboam would not satisfy them. The way of sin is precipitate. Take but one step of corruption in the worship of the true God, and the next is an utter forsaking of Jehovah for Baal. Alas, for poor Israel, the cup was rapidly filling; the blood of murdered sovereigns, the calves of Dan and Beth-el, the groves and high places, and the images of Baal, were sad symptoms of wide-spread depravity. Yet did the long-suffering of God wait in these days as well as in the days of Noah.

How sure is the word of Jehovah! No distance of place, no length of time, can alter it, or blot out the memory of it. The curse, uttered centuries before by the lips of Joshua, as surely came to pass as the prophecy of Jehu, the son of Hanani, which was only of eight years' standing. It was but a miserable consolation that the builder of Jericho had in contemplating his finished work. Amid all the strength of its walls and the splendour of its edifices, he sat down childless. His eldest, smitten at the foundations of the city, lay long mouldered to dust; and the gates, so lately set up, were first opened to give a passage to the mournful procession that carried the youngest to the tomb. The sinner, bent on accomplishing his own will, makes light of every warning, till his loss is irreparable. O let us not condemn Hiel the Bethelite, without remembering how often we too have pursued our iniquities, and flattered ourselves in the indulgence of them till we have found them hateful. Truly the end of these things is death.

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever-blessed Jehovah, thou art a great King above all gods, even the King of kings and Lord of lords. We draw near to thy throne in the name and through the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. We rejoice that thy throne is a throne of mercy, that it is not as the thrones of men, a throne of wickedness, but that justice and judgment are the habitations thereof, and that mercy and truth go continually before thee. We would acknowledge thy hand in the affairs of men and of nations. Thou doest with the monarchs of the earth and the governments of the world what it pleaseth thee. O who shall stand if once thou art angry? Thou hatest all the workers of iniquity. Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross; and in the day of thy vengeful wrath, nothing can save them from thy hand. Blessed for ever be thy name that thy throne is a throne of grace, from which thou dispensest, to the poor and the miserable, blessings of grace and salvation, without money and without price, and that we are invited to come and ask that we may receive. O most holy God, we are vile and polluted transgressors. Put us not away in thine anger, chasten us not in thy hot displeasure; but, for Jesus' sake, visit us with thy salvation, and teach us to call thee Father, that we may hate our sins with all our heart, and turn from them to serve thee. When we see thy vengeance poured out on them that depart from thee, when we see how their sorrows are multiplied who hasten after other gods, O make us willing to bow in lowly submission before thee, as the true, the only God; yea, to take thee, as revealed in the Lord Jesus, to be our reconciled God and Father, to avouch thee to be our God even now and for ever. O Lord, we acknowledge the perverseness of our will, and lament the ungodliness of our natural heart. We deplore before thee that we should be so blind to the evil of sin, as that abominable thing which thou hatest, and so hard to be persuaded that it is ruinous to ourselves. O gracious God, leave us not to be hardened to our ruin. May thy Spirit, who is of might and power to show us our transgressions, impress our hearts with true convictions of sin, and lead us to hate it with a perfect hatred. May he fill our hearts with holy desires and heavenly affections. May he wash us with the washing of regeneration, and visit us with his renewing influence, so shall we be thine indeed. Redeemed with the blood of Jesus from the power of sin and satan, justified freely by thy grace, adopted into thy family, and sanctified to bear his image, who is the first-born among many brethren, we shall then be able to live blameless and harmless, the children of God, without rebuke in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom we shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life. We bless thee for the mercies of the bypast night and this morning. Carry us out this day in thy fear, and under the guidance of thy Holy Spirit. May we walk this day as seeing thee who art invisible. Hear our united supplication, that the gospel of the Lord Jesus may this day have free course and be glorified. May our Saviour's kingdom make daily accessions, and may these include all who are near and dear to us by the ties of earthly relationship, and all our absent friends. Perfect that which concerneth us, and accept of us graciously, and answer all our supplications exceeding abundantly, above all which we can ask or think, for Jesus Christ's sake, to whom, with thee and the Holy Spirit, be everlasting glory, world without end. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXIX. 6. (middle.)

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XVIII. 25—40.

REMARKS.

Ver. 25—27. We have no strength to resist temptation when God withdraws his supporting grace. Sin will drag us down yet more and more, if not repented of and blotted out through the blood of Jesus. Poor Peter was entangled in its nets and could not escape. Again did temptation master him. Let us look to the warning, and keep near to Jesus. Ver. 28—32. Now, indeed, were the words of David fulfilled, 'Many bulls compassed the Saviour, strong bulls of Bashan beset him round; gaping upon him with their mouths, as a ravening and roaring lion.' Psalm xxii. 12, 13. Whether he be in the hands of him who betrayed him with a kiss, or in those of the ruffian mob, or at the tribunal of Annas, or Caiaphas, or Pilate, the same cry is heard; 'Blood, blood.' This was the voice of a violated law beholding the atoning victim; this was the cry of sin when finished. The soul that sinneth it shall die; and Jesus, as a spotless victim, stood as our surety. How vile is the human heart, that can put on an air of sanctity when perpetrating the most horrid sin. The Jews entered not the judgment-hall for fear of defilement, yet was their very throat an open sepulchre. Spotless, however, was the Son of God, by the very confession of his enemies. Neither Annas, nor Caiaphas, nor Herod, nor Pilate, no, nor his blood-thirsty foes, the Jewish mob, could find aught in him worthy of death. How wondrously were all these restrained and directed, even when clamorous for their own will, to fulfil what the counsel and foreknowledge of God had predetermined to be done. Jesus must die on the cross, and therefore, eager for his death as were the Jews, they would not stone him. They delivered him up to the Gentiles, and consented to his death. Ver. 33—38. It was a groundless suspicion to imagine that our Lord's kingdom of righteousness and peace would interfere with the political arrangements of the Roman empire. These, indeed, it might modify and mould to the better, but it came not to overturn the throne of the Cesars, which at last fell, not because Christianity overturned it, but by its monstrous load of guilt. The servants of the Lord Jesus obtain the victory by the sword of truth, not by weapons of steel. But Pilate, carnal and bewildered, would not wait to hear the proclamation of the truth from the lips of the King of the Jews. An expedient at the moment presented itself; and when, in answer to his own question, 'what is truth?' he might have heard from our Lord the words of life eternal, he hurried out of the judgment-hall once more to those whose favour he courted; and, though solemnly convinced of the innocence of Jesus, determined to suspend his life on the decision of his enemies. Now was seen the world's estimate of truth and holiness. The impious Pilate dared to set up the Lord of glory side by side with a murderer, fellow-candidates for the world's choice. And it was registered in the imperishable records of eternity, that they who had gone astray from God, preferred at once the murderer, with all his guilt and all his crimes, to the Lord of glory, who was holy, harmless, and undefiled. O let us be humbled to the dust, when we think that this also is our spirit till we are renewed.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we are poor, guilty transgressors, who have no way of access to thy throne of grace but the way of thine own appointment, through the Lord Jesus Christ. We bless and glorify thee for him, thine unspeakable gift. O may we be humbled in remembering the manifold sins of the past day, and our constant liability to fall under the power of temptation. Help us, we pray thee, to examine ourselves, lest in condemning others we overlook our own guilt. Let thy Holy Spirit lead us constantly to look to our own hearts. We would be low at the sight of them, and while humbled under a sense of our vileness, would glorify thee that the Lord Jesus became surety for poor sinners who had no atonement, and that he offered himself, without spot, in our room and stead. O Lord, we are verily guilty in that we do not feel more heartily, and deplore more sincerely, all the indignities which were cast on thy dear Son, when he stood in the breach to turn away thy wrath from us. May the Lord Jesus establish his throne in our hearts, and look on us with that eye of compassion which melted the heart of Peter, hardened as it was by his manifold denials. Then shall we indeed be contrite, and hate our sins with a perfect hatred. O forbid that we should, with Pilate, refuse to hear the truth, or with the Jews, prefer Barabbas to our Lord. Help us to choose Jesus, and cleave to him, fearless of the reproach and scorn of a godless world. Follow with thy blessing the efforts of thy servants this day to spread thy truth. Establish in our hearts, and in our household, and in our land, and throughout the world, the holy kingdom of the Lord Jesus. O hasten its complete triumph, and bring the day speedily when the seed of Abraham shall look on him whom they despised for a murderer, and turn and weep bitterly for their sin. Watch over us this night, raise us up in the morning of a new day for thy service, and hear us graciously, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXIII.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XVII.

REMARKS.

This is the first notice we have of this renowned prophet. His name and designation indicate that he was destined to be the reformer of Israel. At this time, in the reign of Ahab and Jezebel, Israel was in a deplorable state of degeneracy, and Elijah seemed as one left alone to testify for God, and for his cause. He is introduced to us here as denouncing upon Ahab and his guilty land, the judgments of heaven. Given over, as Ahab and his people had been, to idols, they had incurred Jehovah's wrath, and they were brought to know that, by the very elements of nature, he could speak to them in anger, and punish them. Elijah, warned of God to avoid the rage of Ahab, retired to a solitary, unfrequented spot, and was thrown into such circumstances as to be dependent entirely upon the immediate care and bounty of divine providence. But, trusting in God, he found himself not forsaken or destitute. He who had appointed the bounds of his habitation, made the creatures of his hand to minister to his necessities. A notable lesson this to the people of the Lord, to put their hope and confidence in him who hath promised to provide; and never to despair of God's helping hand, even when in circumstances the most adverse. They are thus, too, admonished, that their help may come, and often does come, from the most unlikely and unexpected quarters. When the means, which God, in the first instance, provided for Elijah had failed, he raised up one to help him in his time of need, in the person of a poor widow woman. She had nothing of her own to spare; by reason of the famine which prevailed, she was reduced to the last extremity. Yet she was made to be the servant of the Lord, the almoner of heaven's bounty. And we are thus instructed, that God can bless and multiply the most humble means, when they are by faith received, and with thankfulness enjoyed, and with a cheerful heart shared with others. A crust of bread and a cup of cold water, the portion dealt out by providence to the poor believer, may be as much the means of happiness to him, and as much the subject of gratitude, on his part, to the Giver of all good, as are the ample riches of those in higher estate. And be it noticed, that there may be exemplified as true a liberality, and as kind a heart, in the sharing of his pittance with others, as in the splendid charities of those who have thousands of gold and silver at their disposal.

But while this poor woman exhibited such faith, and in her faith was so blessed and rewarded of God, she had sorrow and trouble mingled in the cup of her blessings. Sickness came upon her child, and death cut down the desire of her eyes. Showing us how that, when in the path of duty, and in the service of God, we may expect trial and affliction; visited upon us, not so much as the token of his displeasure as the trial of our confidence in him, and of our submission to him. But how comforting to our hearts is it to know, that if we do resign ourselves to his will, we shall either be supported under our trouble or delivered out of it. We may not have miracles wrought for our relief; but the Lord will let us know that he reigns, and will so interpose as to assure us that he has not forgotten to be gracious. May ours be the faith and the obedience of this woman, and may God be with us as the shield of our help, and our deliverer in the time of need.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art God, and besides thee there is none else. Thou createdest, thou sustainest, thou directest all things. None can control thy power, or question thy wisdom. Thou dost according to thine own will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. None can stay thy hand from working, or say unto thee, What doest thou? We rejoice to know that thou who art revealed to us as the greatest and wisest of beings, art at the same time made known to us, and experienced by us, as the kindest and the best. For which of us now before thee hast thou not loaded with thy benefits; giving us so many enjoyments and comforts which appertain unto this life; and giving us so many cheering hopes and promises of the life which is to come? Which of us has not been the peculiar object of thy fatherly kindness and care? Sleeping and waking, in prosperity and in adversity, in health and in sickness, thine eye has been upon us. Thou hast been our refuge and our strength, a very present help in every time of need. Thy ways of dealing towards us are, indeed, in many instances, complicated and incomprehensible. We know not the mysterious operations of thy hand.—for here we see thee giving, there taking away,—here bowing down, there raising up,—here bringing down to the grave, there restoring back to life. But though we cannot fathom the deep purposes of thy will, we desire, with all humbleness of mind, to submit to the dispensations of thy adorable providence; assured that all things are wisely and well ordered, and that thou art making all things to work together for the good of them who love thee. O Lord, while we would desire to praise thee for thy temporal mercies, and to acquiesce in all the arrangements of thy providence, we would wish, if possible, a deeper gratitude to praise thee for the rich provision thou hast made for our spiritual wants. And we would humbly and heartily repose our confidence in the purposes and plans of thy grace for our salvation. We would look to him whom thou hast set forth in the gospel as the propitiation for sin. We would believe that there is no other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved. We would receive him in all his holy offices, to instruct, and to save, and to sanctify; and we would rest in the freeness, the fullness, the all-sufficiency of his redemption. We pray thee to bestow upon us more and more of this confiding spirit; to fill us with the knowledge of thy will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; to enable us day by day to live by the faith, and hope, and obedience of the gospel, and to keep us by thy almighty power through faith unto salvation. We give thee thanks for the rest and repose of the night. We laid ourselves down and slept, and we have awaked, for thou hast sustained us. We would commend ourselves to thy guardian care through the day. Wherever we are, or in whatever engaged, may we have respect unto thee. Help us to discharge our duties faithfully and conscientiously. Save us from the temptations which are every where around us. Save us from the deceitfulness of our own sinful hearts. Guide us ever by thy counsel. Hold up our goings in thy paths, and let thy mercy ever be upon us, according as we hope in thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXII. 11—17.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XIX. 1—19.

REMARKS.

In these verses we notice, 1st, The base conduct of an unprincipled judge. This was an emergency well fitted to try the character of a man like Pilate, —a man without courage—without honesty of purpose. We see an individual brought before him, accused of crimes, inferring the punishment of death. He patiently examines into the case,—finds no charge substantiated,—declares him innocent, and recommends his release. And yet, in the face of his own acknowledged convictions, he gives up the prisoner to be scourged, mocked, and crucified!—all to please a barbarous mob, headed by a party who had leagued themselves to compass his destruction. There could be nothing more infamous than such conduct. It was in vain that Pilate washed his hands before the multitude, and declared himself innocent of the blood of this just person. In vain did he attempt to transfer the guilt from himself to the clamorous crowd. Had his principles been worth anything, he would have stood, at all hazards, between the innocent and his accusers, and saved himself and them from the guilt of the most brutal murder. It can never excuse crime to say, that we have been forced into the commission of it by the instigation of others. In such a case, what becomes of conscience and of duty? Such a plea would do away with moral responsibility.

2. We notice the determined hatred of Christ's enemies, and their anxiety to have him condemned, by their varying, from time to time, the ground of their accusations against him. They had at first accused him of aspiring to be king of the Jews, and consequently of treason against the reigning sovereign. But failing to establish their charge on this point, they next demanded his condemnation on the score of blasphemy, because of his pretending, as they said, to be the Son of God, and quoted their law on the subject (Deut. xviii. 20.) In regard to this charge, too, they failed to satisfy Pilate of his guilt. Indeed the preferring that accusation injured their cause, for it led him to suspect that he who stood before him was a person of no ordinary quality. The Jews, therefore, bent upon the one object of his ruin, reiterated their charge of his aiming at sovereign power, and coupled it, in this instance, with a threat as to Pilate's own safety with Cesar. How unscrupulous are the wicked, as to the means employed, when their heart is set in them for evil! Provided Jesus was given up to their fury, the Jews cared not upon what pretext.

3. We notice the circumstances of contumely and cruelty connected with Christ's crucifixion. In ordinary cases, when a malefactor is in the hands of justice, and is about to suffer for his crimes, there is a feeling of compassion for him on the part of the assembled crowd, and a desire to lessen rather than to increase his sufferings. But how different here! All parties seem to have tasked their ingenuity to add insult and cruelty to the sufferings of the meek and innocent Jesus. Pilate, who could find no fault in him, and was willing to let him go, basely gave his back to the smiters. The soldiers, hearing his pretensions to be a king, invest him with the mock ensign of royalty, and insolently and rudely offer him their sham obeisance. The chief priests and officers, seeing him led forth so arrayed, the object of insult and scorn, as if ashamed of having such a king, uttered their execrations against him, and raise their fiercer cry, 'Crucify him, crucify him!' The multitude, excited to fury, hurry him to the judgment-seat, that there, from the mouth of their imbecile judge, they might receive the legal sanction of putting him to death. No time is lost: he is taken away, bearing his cross, to Golgotha, where he is nailed to the accursed tree,—made a spectacle to men and angels; and to add, if possible, to his ignominy, is hanged between two thieves, as if the most criminal of the three.

The review of such atrocious wickedness is fitted to arouse our generous indignation. We are constrained to ask, why one so holy, so harmless, and so approved of by heaven, should have been exposed to such cruel treatment. We should be ready to call in question the justice of an over-ruling providence, which permitted such things to take place, were we not assuredly made to know, that it behoved him thus to have suffered. Deeply criminal as were his murderers, (and nothing can ever extenuate their guilt,) they were yet fulfilling the mysterious plans of heaven. He who was so suffering under their hands, was suffering, the just for the unjust,—was paying the ransom price of our redemption,—was bearing our sins in his own body on the tree. It is the knowledge of this that not only reconciles us to the sufferings and the death of Christ, but fills us with admiration, love and praise. We see the great love wherewith God hath loved us, in not sparing his own Son, but in delivering him up for us all.

PRAYER.

Our Father, which art in heaven, we come this evening to thy throne of grace. We would bow down before thee, and give to thee the homage which is due from creatures to their Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer. We are conscious that our praises and our prayers are altogether unworthy of thy regard. But we would worship thee through the one Mediator betwixt thee and us, and for Christ's sake we would plead for favour and acceptance. Adored be thy name, O God, for thine unspeakable gift, Jesus Christ, and for all the riches of thy grace bestowed upon us through him. We ascribe it to thy great and undeserved love to us sinners, that when we had ruined ourselves, when we were under thy curse, and were unable to deliver our own souls, thou didst interpose on our behalf. Thou didst say, Save from going down to the pit, for I have found a ransom. We rejoice to know that the ransom paid was all-sufficient, that the sacrifice offered was all-efficacious for us and for our salvation. Lord, help us ever to bear in mind the marvellous price which our redemption cost, in the humiliation, and sufferings, and death of thy Son from heaven. When we read, as we have this night been reading, how he bore our griefs and carried our sorrows, how he endured the cross and despised the shame, O may we feel our souls constrained by a sense of his love. May we feel what a debt of gratitude we owe to him for his great grace to us. To this once crucified, but now exalted Redeemer, we desire to look by faith. O that, believing on him, we may have life through his name, and out of his fullness receive the wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption, of which we all stand in need. Stablish, strengthen, settle us in his faith. Help us to trust in him as our Saviour, to learn of him as our teacher, to follow him as our guide, to copy after him as our example, to rejoice in him as our all in all. We have to thank thee for thy goodness to us throughout this day. Thou hast brought us in health and safety to its close. Take us under thy good care during the night. Shepherd of Israel! watch over us. Suffer no plague to come near our dwelling. If it please thee to spare us to see the morning light, may we still be with thee, the partakers of thy goodness and mercy, and strengthened and prepared for doing and bearing thy will. All we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVI. 1—6.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XVIII.

REMARKS.

During Elijah's concealment at Cherith and Zarephath, God's judgments had been experienced in all their severity throughout that guilty land. The famine at Samaria (the capital of the ten tribes) must have been very great, when the king himself found it necessary to go in quest of pasturage for his cattle. Obadiah, whom he associated with him in this search, was at the head of his household, a faithful and tried servant, and to whose praise it is mentioned here that, though in the midst of idolatry and wickedness, he had maintained his integrity, and was a pious, God-fearing man. It is no uncommon thing for the servants of the Lord to be placed in such circumstances of peril and temptation, and this, no doubt, both for the trial of their principles and for the maintaining and promoting his cause. This was the case here. When it seemed to be the queen's purpose to extirpate the worship of the true God, by putting to death his prophets, and by encouraging and supporting the prophets of the false gods, Obadiah found the means of keeping alive a hundred of these persecuted men, and so saved a seed to show forth God's praise to the adulterous generation around.

Yet, while Obadiah was devoted to the Lord's cause, he was not without the fear of man, which bringeth a snare. It was not acting up to the principles he had hitherto maintained, to let the dread of Ahab's wrath frighten him from doing his duty. He had, in this instance, forgotten that in serving God we need not fear what man can do. Ver. 17—21. Ahab had not been humbled by the judgments of heaven. The foolish man was more inclined to see human than divine agency in his calamities. He would rather consider Elijah as the troubler of Israel, than acknowledge the scourge as sent from God, who alone could prolong it or withdraw it. The prophet sought to set him right in this matter. The true cause of his troubles was his having incurred the wrath of the Most High, which all will sooner or later experience who desert his service, and give their hearts and their homage away to idols. And yet Baalim could not help him. These gods had no right to such honours as he had been giving them. They were false gods, and their pretensions might be easily exposed. Ver. 21—25. We need never be afraid to stand up for God and for his cause. He has never left himself without a witness. He has made the evidence of his being and perfections, and the necessity of his worship so palpable, that we may rest assured that the truth, so far from being injured, will be confirmed by every trial. Seeing that this is the case, it must be the duty of all to acquaint themselves with the truth, to examine and search for themselves, and then to act with decision in the maintenance of it. We shall find that the Lord is God, and none else but he. Then let us make him our hope and our portion; and abiding by our conviction, let us not be giving ourselves up to gods many and to lords many. Let us admire and endeavour to imitate the conduct of the intrepid prophet who, though opposed by thousands, and standing single and alone, was yet resolute in his defence of God and of his truth. Ver. 26—29. How humbling the fooleries of idolatry! How thankful ought we to be that our eyes have been turned away from such lying vanities, and that we have had revealed to us the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent. Ver. 30—39. The inglorious silence of the idol-god, when so long and fervently appealed to, is a striking contrast to the prompt, decisive response of Jehovah, Israel's God. We are warranted from this to believe that he who so honoured Elijah, when pleading his cause, will not desert his people when they are at any time witnessing for him in the midst of the infidel and profane. They may be deserted by the world, but he will interfere for them and vindicate them. He will attend to their cry. 'He will not turn away their prayer, nor his mercy from them.' Ver. 40. The punishment of these presumptuous prophets, according to the divine law, (Deut. xiii. 1—5.) shows that God will not away with those who alienate his honours. He is a jealous God: vengeance is his, and he will repay. Sooner or later will the wicked and ungodly assuredly find that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. They will be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power.

PRAYER.

We desire, O Lord, with all humility to draw near unto thee, and to worship thee who art the King eternal, immortal, and invisible, the only living and true God. The gods of the heathen are dumb idols, the work of men's hands; utterly unworthy are they of the regard of thy rational creatures, to whom thou hast never left thyself without a witness; seeing that thy eternal power and Godhead are manifested in the works and operations of thy hands. We bless thee for the clearer revelation thou hast given us of thyself in thy Son from heaven, declared to be the brightness of thy glory, the express image of thy person. Now indeed we know whom we worship and serve, the great God of heaven and of earth, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, a heavenly Father reconciled to us through him. But, Lord, though we know thee, who thou art, and what thou hast done and art doing for us, we confess that we have not walked as the children of light and of privilege. How must we confess that in the enjoyment of thy gifts we have forgotten thee the giver; that we have been more disposed to take the credit of it all to ourselves, or to refer it to creature help and creature power, rather than give the glory and the praise to thee, by whose permission alone we live, by whose grace it is we are what we are. And not only, O God, have we proved ungrateful to thee; we have rejected thy authority, we have resisted thy will, we have violated thy laws, we have not walked in thy statutes, nor kept thy judgments. We have done despite to the Spirit of thy grace. When in thy mercy thou hast called we have not obeyed. When thou hast warned us we have not heeded thee. When thou hast remonstrated and threatened we have been unmoved. O deal not with us according to our deservings. Remember us in mercy. Look not upon us as we are in ourselves. Look upon us in the face of thine Anointed. Extend to us, through him, the pardon of all our sins; and give us, through his justifying righteousness, admittance into thy presence and the enjoyment of thy favour. Grant us grace, O God, to hate and to crucify our sins, which we now confess, and for which we implore thy forgiveness. Too long have we followed the devices of our own sinful hearts; we desire henceforth to run in the way of thy commandments. We would devote ourselves unreservedly to thy service. We would make thy will our will, and seek to regulate our thoughts, and our words, and our actions, by the principles of thy pure and holy word. Lord, help us; deny us not thy grace; withhold not from us thy

Holy Spirit; and lead thou us in the way everlasting. We are, by thy merciful providence, brought to the light of another day. We give thee thanks for the continued health, and peace, and comforts we are permitted to enjoy. We would go forward to the business and the trials of life, trusting in thee. Help us to be redeeming the time, and to be walking before thee in circumspection and holy fear, and to be living mindful of death, and judgment, and eternity. Hear, O Lord, these our humble prayers, and when thou hearest forgive, accept, and bless us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLIV. 3—6.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XIX. 20—42.

REMARKS.

Ver. 19—23. It was customary in those times to fix an inscription over the criminal, bearing his name and the cause for which he suffered. This was not forgotten amid the other indignities of Christ's crucifixion. But to make his exposure, if possible, more notorious, Pilate caused it to be written in the three languages which were then most generally understood, that so the strangers who were attending the passover from distant parts, might, in their own tongue, read of Christ, the despised, rejected, crucified king of the Jews. This inscription, which was likely intended to be in mockery both of him and them, gave offence to the Jews. It bore that he was their king, and implied as much as if they had crucified their Messiah. They would have him to change it, but sufficiently annoyed by them already, in having been forced to condemn an innocent person, he refused; and thus unconsciously bore a striking testimony to a most important truth, 'that the very man whom he had crucified as a malefactor did not merely say, that he was the king of the Jews, the true Messiah, but that he really was so.' Ver. 23—25. The clothes of the criminal were the perquisite of those who performed the part of executioners in this horrid business. The four soldiers, therefore, who had completed the work of crucifixion, proceeded to claim their recompense, and to part among them the raiment of Christ. They were little aware that in agreeing to cast lots for his garments, which it would have spoiled to have divided, they were just fulfilling one of the many prophecies respecting him, (Psal. xxii. 18.) The garment was curious and valuable—the work, it is believed, of either his mother or of the pious women who ministered with him.

Ver. 25—27. What an hour must this have been for his mother, who was standing by, to see the son of her love and of her hope, and it might be of her pride, now suffering the cruel agonies of the cross. We cannot think but that even then she had not relinquished the belief that he was the Messiah, the king of Israel. There was with her no frantic grief. She and her friends seemed to have been waiting resignedly and calmly the fulfilment of Heaven's purposes in regard to him. And how beautifully is Christ's character, as an affectionate son, brought out on this occasion. Can we receive a more striking lesson of filial duty than is here addressed to us from the cross? Let them who neglect and honour not their parents, look to Christ's example and learn of him. Ver. 27—31. In connection with every part of our Saviour's history, there were many prophecies which had been one and all fulfilled. There was yet one to be accomplished ere he died, and we may see that in this, as in every other, there was no forced fulfilment. The fatigue he had undergone, and the agony now of the cross, induced, doubtless, the most excruciating thirst; and the fact was now the fulfilment of the prophecy, 'In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.' This done, he said, 'It is finished.' He knew that what the prophets foretold of him was accomplished in his person; in his life, and sufferings, and death; that the justice of God was now satisfied; that the great work of redemption for which he had come into the world was completed; that his own sufferings were over; that the rage and cruelty of his enemies could do no more. Knowing all this, he bowed his head, in token of submission to his Father's will, and gave up the ghost.

Ver. 31—38. It was a strange preparation for the passover this crucifixion of Christ. And yet though the Jews had no compunction on that score, they would not allow the solemnities that were before them to be interfered with by any care they might have of the bodies that were crucified. It was contrary to their law, (Deut. xxi. 23.) Ye hypocrites! Ye scrupled not to put to torture and to death the innocent Jesus; ye set at nought the claims of justice and of truth, and yet ye pretend to make a conscience of the outward matters of the law! In their anxiety, however, to have the bodies disposed of, they were instrumental at once in proving the veritable death of Christ, which might have been disputed, by the soldiers piercing his side, and there coming forth blood and water, the most decisive sign of actual death; and in accomplishing certain prophecies in regard to Christ at this time, that a bone of him should not be broken, and that they should look on him whom they had pierced.

PRAYER.

O God, let thy blessing follow the reading of thy holy word. Give us to know, and to appreciate more and more, the love wherewith Christ has loved us sinners. We see it to have been a love stronger than death, a love which many waters could not quench. We see that not all the enmity of men and devils, not all the agonies of crucifixion, not all the hidings of thy face, could divert him from his purpose of finishing the work for which he had come into the world. Thanks be to thee, O holy Jesus! who despisedst nor abhorredst our misery; who didst put thyself in our room and stead, to be wounded for our transgressions, to be bruised for our iniquities, and that we through thy stripes might be healed. We praise thee that thou didst finish transgression, and make an end of sin; that thou didst make reconciliation for iniquity, and bring in an everlasting righteousness. We look to thee dying on the cross of Calvary, and we see a sacrifice made there, worthy of heaven to accept. We look to thy grave, and seeing thee lying there, we mourn over the doom and the curse of sin. We look to thy resurrection, and we rejoice in the conquest of death, and in the hopes of glory, honour, and immortality, in the everlasting habitations. We look up to the heavens, where thou art an exalted Prince and Saviour, and we stay ourselves on thee, our unwearied advocate and friend. God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ! make all grace abound to us through him. O let not Christ have come and suffered and died in vain for us; let him see in us of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. Give us to be washed, and justified, and sanctified, in his name, and by the Spirit of thee our God. May we be his now, and his for ever; numbered now among his people, and sealed to the day of final redemption. Extend the limits of the Redeemer's kingdom. Let the joyful sound of his gospel be heard in every land, and by many a heart may it be felt to be the wisdom of God, and the power of God unto salvation. Especially in this, our native country, in every neighbourhood, and in every family, may the pure and undefiled religion of Christ prosper and prevail. Everywhere may the wickedness of the wicked come to an end, and may truth and righteousness be established amongst us. Prosper the labours of those who minister among us in holy things; may they not spend their strength for nought, and may we be a willing people in the day of thy power. We commend to thee our kindred and friends; encompass them with thy favour, as with a shield, and bless them with the joys of thy salvation. Look in mercy on the sick, the sorrowful, and the dying; accommodate the supplies of thy providence, and grace, and Spirit, to their varied necessities. May they know thee and rest in thee as their God and portion. Thou hast brought us in safety to the close of another day, and of another week, and much cause have we to praise thee for thy continuing goodness. Solemnize our minds in the prospect of the approaching sabbath. If it please thee to spare us to see it, may we enjoy it as a day of rest, and of spiritual refreshment. May we be enabled to engage in its duties in a spiritual frame of mind, and to serve thee aright, with acceptableness and holy fear. All we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

TWENTY-THIRD WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXII.

REMARKS.

Solomon had just been invested with the regal dignity, the joyful tribes of Israel shouting on every side, 'God save the king.' While the scene was highly interesting to all, there was one whose feelings were peculiarly moved on the occasion. David was yet alive, and at his express command Solomon had been anointed, and enthroned, and associated with himself in the government. It was not to be thought that the solemnity could have passed without exciting the affection of the parent, and the holy zeal of the man of God. In the psalm before us we have David's blessing on his youthful successor. The first verse is in the language of prayer. He entreats grace for Solomon, (who is spoken of both as the king, and as the king's son)—that he may rule according to the divine law, and be a just and virtuous monarch. As he prays, the prophetic fire descends upon him, the visions of God rise before his eyes, he beholds in Solomon a typical Messiah, and in his prosperous career, his far-reaching empire, and his long and illustrious reign, the figures of the greatness and glory of him who hath many crowns on his head, and on whose vesture and thigh is inscribed the name of King of kings, and Lord of lords!

Let us attend to the prophetic description of that kingdom which rises to the psalmist's view. The great Prince, with whom Solomon is here, according to prophetic usage, identified, shall reign in righteousness; when the government is laid upon his shoulders, justice and judgment shall be the habitation of his throne. He will walk by the precepts of law, he will vindicate and maintain every principle of equity. The sentences of his tribunals, whether they be sentences of acquittal or of condemnation, shall proceed on proper and irrefragable grounds. No claim of law, no interest of holiness, will he ever disregard. He shall, moreover, be the friend and deliverer of the poor. He will see to it, that none shall trample on their rights. He will look upon him whom there is none to help, and his own arm shall bring salvation. The souls of the needy he will redeem. He will secure the best of benefits for the objects of his compassion. He will consult for the welfare of their souls. On the enemies and oppressors of their souls he will take vengeance, and he will establish them in spiritual security. His government shall be signalised by the promptitude, and the vigour, and the success, of its operations. The uniform issue of his conflicts with antagonist powers shall be, that 'his enemies shall lick the dust.' And his sway over his subjects shall be most beneficent in its nature. 'He shall come down like the rain upon the mown grass; as showers that water the earth.' The spirit of grace shall be shed upon the people abundantly. And the people shall be refreshed, and gladdened, and strengthened thereby. They shall be made to run in the way of the divine commandments.

His administration will lead to the happiest result. Because he is the king of righteousness, he shall be the king of peace. There can be no solid peace that is not founded on righteousness. Here there shall be abundance of peace. The subjects of his kingdom shall have peace with God, peace in their own consciences, peace among themselves.

The prosperity and blessedness that shall attend his rule, and the universality of his glorious dominion, are declared. May God hasten the complete fulfilment!

PRAYER.

Lord, let thy kingdom come! Take unto thee thy power, O God of Zion! Reign over us. Make us willing and glad to abide under thy benignant sway. Let the wondrous discoveries of thy gospel—its revelations of thy everlasting love, of the riches of redeeming grace, and of the efficacy of the blood of the cross, subdue our souls, and dispose us to yield a grateful obedience to thy law. We acknowledge that other lords besides thee have had dominion over us. We owed thee an affection and an obedience which we did not pay. Thou didst speak, thou didst command, thou didst threaten, thou didst invite, thou didst entreat; but we would not hearken unto thy voice. All the day long didst thou stretch out thy hands to us; but we were a gainsaying and a rebellious people. We wonder, O Lord, at the goodness which surrounds us, and at the long-suffering of which we are the monuments. But thy ways are not as our ways; neither are thy thoughts like our thoughts. Wherefore, we beseech thee, to pardon our iniquity, and to blot out our sin. And grant thou that we may not rebel any more. Take away our hearts of unbelief and pride, and give us hearts that are broken and contrite. Send thy Spirit to convince us of our past disaffection, and to make us ashamed on account of it. May he shed abroad within us the love of thy service, and teach us to prize the blessings of thy government, and the privileges of the children of thy kingdom. And, in repairing this day to thy sanctuary, may He, the Comforter, excite us to an alacrity, and fill us with a joy, arising from true and loyal dispositions to thee, as our King and our God. May it this day be our happiness to receive of the bounty, to partake of the royal munificence of the church's glorious Head. O let us taste and see that the Lord is gracious.

Speedily let thy kingdom everywhere come. We pray that thou wouldst render effectual for its advancement, the proclamation of the gospel tidings by thy servants on this thy day. Bless the labours of those who seek to build the walls of Zion, and to enlarge the Christian territory. Come down upon the scene of Christian toil in this lower world, as rain upon the mown grass, and as showers that water the earth. We rejoice, O God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the foretold felicities that are to flow from the reign of thy Son. Blessed be thy name that already they are begun to be experienced, and that thy children are no strangers to peace, even to the peace of reconciliation with thee, by the righteousness of our Lord. We thank thee, that it has been given to any, to feel the converting, and sanctifying, and consoling influences of the Holy Ghost, and that the first drops are falling of that heavenly shower which thou hast promised shall descend in a plenteous rain even from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. We give thee praise, that the oppressor of souls has already felt the superior might of the Captain of our salvation, and that the sure prospect is before us of the utter and final overthrow of the kingdom of satan. Enable us more and more to rest on thy promises, and to realize the excellence of spiritual blessings. May we be among the number of those who are looking for and hasting unto the day of God, and longing after the new heavens, and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Hear our prayer, O God, for the sake of Jesus thy Son. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXIII. 23.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXIII.

REMARKS.

Whether we survey the course of God's general providence, or his wonderful works in the kingdom of grace, we may say with the psalmist, 'truly he is good to Israel!' In the former case, however, his special favour for his people is not at first sight so apparent. Sometimes the believer is thrown into considerable perplexity, and his heart begins to fail him, at the prosperous state of the ungodly, and the manifold troubles of the generation of the righteous. The testimony of sense, if it does not go so far as to favour the idea that the spirit of evil has been left to the uncontrolled government of the world, and permitted to determine the circumstances of its inhabitants at his pleasure, does, at all events, occasionally seem to convey the alarming intimation that the moral Governor is regardless of moral distinctions, and that the praiseworthy sacrifices and labours of a life of piety are unnoticed by him on the one hand, and the pride and profligacy of a godless career on the other. And then the question occurs,—Is our accustomed belief a vain one, that felicity is the attendant of holiness, and misery of vice? Do we err in supposing that it shall be well with us if we serve God, and ill with us if we walk contrary to his ways? Are there no compensating advantages for that self-denial which a godly life demands? and may Mammon be worshipped, fleshly lusts gratified, and all unrighteousness practised, without displeasing him whose law is thereby trodden under foot, and whose glory is turned into shame?

If we forget God's word, if we shut the book of revelation, we shall speedily lose ourselves in the labyrinth of providence. For a moment the psalmist did not avail himself of the assistance of that indispensable guide, and therefore it happened that 'his steps had well nigh slipped, and his feet were almost gone.' From what he saw in the world around him, he began to wonder if it was really a matter of no consequence whether he mortified the deeds of the body or not. The distribution of earthly good, perplexed and confounded him. So far as his observation extended, the most worthy were the least favoured. Sorrow and trouble seemed the special portion of the righteous; while the sun of prosperity was shining on the habitations of wickedness. Musing on what he observed, he was much discouraged. Unassisted reason was completely at fault. He knew not how to vindicate the character of God. He began to feel as though the distinction between good and evil were disappearing, and heaven were withdrawing its encouragements to a life of devotedness to God. Thus his feet 'were almost gone.' Just in time he betook himself to the light of revealed truth. He entered God's sanctuary, consulted its records, and learned the future history of the ungodly. On the theatre of sense he had seen them 'great in power,' spreading 'like a green bay tree;' and now on the theatre of faith, he saw them 'consumed with terrors,' and brought in a moment to desolation! Here the curtain was withdrawn from the realms of eternity, and he beheld on high the abodes of the righteous in Immanuel's land; and the receptacles of the impenitent, with the deathless worm, and the unquenchable fire, beneath! Then understood he their end.

It remains therefore an unshaken truth, that 'God is good to Israel.' He is good to Israel, at the very time when he is afflicting him.

The enlightened soul therefore holds fast the beginning of its confidence steadfast unto the end.

PRAYER.

O Lord, truly thou art good to Israel. Lord! thou art the God that doeth wonders. Thou hast built up thy mercy for ever! Thou sentest not thy Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. Thy commission did not bid him execute vengeance, but appointed him to accomplish salvation. Thou didst subject him for our sakes to poverty, sorrow, and shame. It pleased thee to bruise him, and to put him to grief. On him thou didst lay the iniquity of us all. It was thy will, that the just, should die for us, the unjust, in order to bring us unto God. We thank thee for the promise of the out-pouring of the Spirit. We rejoice in the fulfilment of that promise. Blessed be thy name that souls are quickened; that captives of satan are made to know the joyful sound, and that some of those who sit in darkness, are made to see the great light of the gospel. We adore, O Lord, that wonderful work of thy Spirit, whereby they who were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise, are made fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and they who were not a people, are become the people of God. O make us partakers in the privileges of thy true Israel! We are dark: do thou enlighten us. We are powerless: do thou strengthen us with might by thy Spirit in the inner man. We are foolish: make us wise unto salvation. We are prone to unbelief: O make the vital grace of faith to abound in us. We are carnal, proud, unholy: make us spiritual, humble, contrite—haters of sin, lovers of righteousness, and followers of that holiness without which none shall see the Lord. We pray, O Lord, that we may be enabled to glorify thee in every circumstance of our life, and under every dispensation of thy providence. When affliction comes, may we be prepared to meet it. Let no troubles that ever befall us, create in our minds a doubt of thy goodness. May we be of that privileged number, to whom all things work together for good; and whom neither tribulation, nor distress, nor persecution, nor famine, nor nakedness, nor peril, nor sword; neither death, nor life, things present, nor things to come; neither height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord! Forgive, O our God, the imperfection and sin with which our religious services this day are chargeable. Follow, with an effectual blessing, the solemn exercises in which we have been engaged. Let it not be in vain that thy servants have this day confronted and assailed the adversary with the sword of the Spirit. Deep and deadly may the injury prove that has this day been inflicted on the kingdom of satan! Hasten the downfall of Babylon, the destruction of Antichrist! Let the eastern deceiver, deceive men no more! May the worship of idols, and of gods that are no gods, speedily every where cease! O send help from above, out of thy sanctuary, to the soldiers of the cross. May the Captain of the Lord's host go forth before them, conquering and to conquer! We pray for our country. Turn the hearts of the people, old and young, high and low, rich and poor, to thyself. May our public sins be forgiven by thee, and forsaken by us; and may our nation be exalted in righteousness. Bless our queen. Give her to reign long and prosperously over us. Endow her with thy saving grace; and may she adorn her eminent station, by exhibiting in it all the excellencies of the Christian character. We now commit ourselves to thee, O thou that keepest Israel! Be gracious unto us. Let our slumbers this night be peaceful and refreshing! and in the morning may we awake to celebrate thy praises, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXLV. 17.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XVIII.

REMARKS.

The land of Israel was groaning under the terrible effects of a drought, which had lasted for years. The prayer of Elijah, prompted by the spirit of inspiration, had brought that judgment upon a Baal-worshipping people, and now the time had come when it was the will of him, who 'keeps not his anger for ever,' that the judgment should be removed.

Ver. 1—16. There may be noticed—1. Elijah's obedience to the divine command. No man was so obnoxious to Ahab as he. On him Ahab laid the blame of his own and his subjects' sufferings. And Ahab was a person who had neither religious principles nor honourable feeling, to restrain him from the most despotic and violent proceedings. Yet Elijah obeyed. We do not find that he hesitated. We do find that he gave instant compliance, and straightway sought the perilous interview. His obedience illustrates his faith. He relied upon God. He believed in him who never forsakes his servants. He was strong in the Lord. 2. Obadiah's piety. It is a remarkable thing when piety is found in a dissolute court. It does not often occur. God had a design in it, viz., to aid and protect his prophets. 3. The wicked man's involuntary homage to godliness. The very toleration that Obadiah enjoyed in such a place as the house of Ahab is an example of this. 4. The worldly man's care. The manifest tokens of divine displeasure gave Ahab no concern. These never moved him; but the prospect of 'losing all the beasts' did. That awoke him from his dream of pleasure, and roused him to unwonted personal efforts.

Ver. 17—20. In these verses two points claim attention. 1. Ministerial faithfulness. 2. Ministerial authority.

Ver. 21—40. Among a variety of lessons which may be drawn from this remarkable narrative, we select three. 1. The importance of being decided in matters of religion. 2. The necessity of being on the right side. Sincerity is no substitute for orthodoxy. 3. How credulous and irrational unconverted men are in matters of a spiritual nature! The absurd and preposterous character of the religion of Baal, is very strikingly exhibited in the scene here described; but it is evident that its doctrines and rites were not too extravagant to be generally submitted to, or to be regarded with favour by many of the enlightened men of Israel. In like manner, our own time, and our own land, show, that high intellectual powers, great intelligence, and knowledge of scripture, are not sufficient to secure their possessor against the adoption of the monstrous dogmas of the Roman Antichrist. Even in countries highly educated and civilized, the grace of God is the only sure specific against the prevalence of the grossest forms of error. The lights of science, or of unsanctified religious acquirement, will never in any degree lessen the gloom of that darkness which arises from the want of the illumination of the Spirit. Only but give an unconverted man a motive sufficiently strong, and which shall be congenial to his corrupt nature, and there is no absurdity of a religious kind that will not go down with him.

Ver. 41—46. The lessons here are two. 1. The power of prayer. 2. The qualities of effectual prayer. First, It is the prayer of faith. Secondly, It is fervent prayer. Elijah cast himself upon the earth, and put his face between his knees. Thirdly, It is persevering prayer. Six times the servant of the prophet reported that his master's supplications were unattended by any visible effect. But Elijah, like Jacob, desisted not till God heard and answered him.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art God alone. Thou art the Creator of all, the preserver of all, the Lord of all. From all other gods we will turn away, because they are no gods. We will worship the Lord our God, and him only will we serve. O let us have grace to keep thy commandments! Thou hast commanded us to believe on thy Son. Enable us to obey: may we joyfully surrender to him our hearts, and humbly and gratefully rely on his righteousness. Thou hast commanded us to desist from the vain attempts to serve two masters. Give us, therefore, fortitude to choose; and give us wisdom to choose aright. Thou hast commanded us to yield our bodies as living sacrifices, holy and acceptable unto thee, which is our reasonable service. May we, therefore, yield our members as the instruments of righteousness unto God. Thou hast said, Be ye holy, for I am holy. O then, furnish us with the principles and motives from which holiness shall flow: give us thy sanctifying grace. We remember it is written, that without Christ we can do nothing. Therefore, O Lord, we cry unto thee to enable us to abide in Christ; so that, we being in him, he may be in us, and our fruit may abound to thy praise. From the person and the character, the life and the death, of Jesus, may we have faith to draw such strength and nourishment, that our fruit shall abound more and more. Send down upon us the dews of thy divine influences; and give us the Holy Ghost. We pray for a speedy end to idol-worship every where. How long, O Lord, shall darkness so extensively prevail, and vast multitudes of the children of men remain in the region of the shadow of death! When wilt thou cause the reign of superstition to cease, and for ever ruin the credit of all false gods! Have mercy, we beseech thee, upon the millions that are perishing in our own and other lands. We ask thee not for miracles, such as thou wroughtest of old by thy servant Elijah; but we ask thee for things still more highly to be prized,—even, O our God, the effectual influences of thy grace. Grant that of these there may be a far more copious dispensation than has hitherto been enjoyed. Where already the gospel is preached, let quickening power continually accompany it. May Christians in name, become Christians indeed. And instead of temporary impressions on the understanding, may the truth, as it is in Jesus, make saving impressions on the heart. Where, as yet, the joyful sound has not been heard, O soon let thy heralds make their appearance, and proclaim the glad tidings to all. And go thou with them, O Lord. When they speak to the deaf, do thou cause the deaf to hear. When they cry amid the valley of the dead, do thou cause the dead men to live. Let not thy word and thy Spirit be separated. Where the word is preached there may the Spirit operate. Let the word be borne over all the earth; over all the earth let the Spirit pursue his renewing and sanctifying processes, and perform his enlightening, and comforting, and saving work. Take thou possession of every land, and of every heart, for thyself; that no land and no heart may remain to be possessed by idols. We seek thy protection and aid, O our Father, in all that is before us. Let not our intercourse with the world make us forgetful of thee. In attending to our secular affairs, may our conduct be guided by the directions of thy law, and may we have an eye to thy glory. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; and establish thou the work of our hands upon us: yea, the work of our hands, establish thou it. And now, O Lord, forgive us our sins, and hear honour our morning supplications, for Christ's sake. Amen.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LXI.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XX.

REMARKS.

The leading doctrine of this chapter is the resurrection of Christ. To the great truth that our Lord rose from the dead, we cannot attach too much importance. What hope of deliverance from death could the members have ventured to entertain, if the Head had sunk beneath that tyrant's power? It was necessary, indeed, that our Lord should go down to the grave; but it was necessary, also, that he should not remain there. No victory over the grave could there ever have been to his people, unless he himself had been victorious over it. By his resurrection it was shown that he had the keys of death,—a most welcome discovery to them who, through fear of death, were subject to bondage. When our Lord died, much was done for the accomplishment of his people's salvation. But all was not done. Sin was atoned for; but the consequent intercession was not made. The blood of the sacrifice had not been carried within the vail. Moreover, the redemption that had been bought required to be applied. There were spiritual gifts to be bestowed. When our Lord exclaimed on the cross, 'It is finished,' he announced a great triumph over Satan his adversary: but it was necessary that he should follow up his advantage, and take measures to ensure that the blow which had been struck should prove fatal to the power of the devil. Hence the importance of the doctrine of the resurrection. Evidence, too, was thereby afforded that, in his conflict with the serpent, the seed of the woman had suffered no other injury than the bruising of his heel.

The death of Christ was, at the time, a most disheartening event to his followers. It was the smiting of the Shepherd, and had been succeeded by the scattering of the sheep. The resurrection of Christ was, on the other hand, a most joyful event; it was the Shepherd uprising mighty as ever, and was succeeded by the gathering of the flock. The chapter before us gives a narrative of part of the Shepherd's proceedings in re-assembling his scattered sheep.

In the cases of many of the apostles we see the good Shepherd's tender care of his sheep. The case of Thomas is especially remarkable. In him we have a painful example of the scattering of the sheep. Thomas was not present at the first visit of Jesus. He was the only absentee. Perhaps he had formed, and had already begun to execute, the resolution of dismissing his crucified Master entirely from his thoughts, and it may be, that he intended by degrees to withdraw himself from his brethren in the apostleship. Israel's Shepherd observed him, and determined to recall him to his duty, and to re-establish him in the faith. Thomas was most obstinate and unreasonable in his unbelief.

Satan had manifestly prevailed against him. Jesus had said of the members of his flock, 'they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand.' He proved it now. A love less strong than his would have abandoned an unbeliever like Thomas. An arm less powerful would not have been able to save him out of the mouth of the lion. But he was every way more than equal to this trying occasion. He revisited the disciples when Thomas was present, and granted, with unparalleled forbearance and grace, his daring demand. 'Reach hither thy finger,' said he, 'and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing.' A power before which no unbelief could stand, accompanied these words. Thomas, casting from him all doubt, recognised the power that was upon him as superhuman and divine, and exclaimed with fervour and assurance, 'My Lord and my God!'

We are strikingly taught in this chapter the importance of lively spiritual affections. Mary Magdalene had the advantage of all the apostles, in respect of privilege and favour at the time of the resurrection. Whence came the distinction she received? It was certainly not to be attributed to any superiority on her part in spiritual knowledge, or in more intellectual attainment of a religious nature. No. But it obviously arose from the warmth of her heart—from the eminent intensity of her love. Therein her excellence lay. Where there is much love to the Saviour, there will be peculiar manifestations of him. 'He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father; and I will love him, and will manifest myself unto him.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou hast done marvellous things: thy right hand and thy holy arm have gotten thee the victory. Thou didst not, O our Father, leave the soul of thy Messiah in hell, neither didst thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Vain was all the power of death,—impotent all the rage of Satan; they could not keep our Lord a prisoner in the tomb. We thank thee for that gospel which calls upon us to believe and trust in a Saviour who once was dead,—dead for sin; and who, therefore, expiated its guilt, satisfied the law, and magnified thy justice at the cost of his inestimable blood. And we also thank thee that the Saviour whom the gospel presents to us is not dead now; that, though he was truly dead, he is now as truly alive; that he lives a Priest to intercede for us, a Prophet to teach us, a King to sway the sceptre of a benign and happy reign over us. Obtaining reconciliation to thee by the death of thy Son, O grant that we may be completely and finally saved by his life. We remember that he said unto his disciples, Because I live, ye shall live also. We covet for ourselves the fulfilment of this gracious promise. May we be the living people of a living Saviour. O that our souls may live before thee. Grant, O Lord, that through the power of Christ's Spirit, we may not be among the number of them whom spiritual death retains in the grave of trespasses and sins. Quicken and revive us, we beseech thee. May we have life by reason of Christ living in us. Let us be vitally united to Christ, and so we shall be planted together in the likeness of his death, and also in the likeness of his resurrection; and, as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also shall be made to walk in newness of life. Realizing by faith our union with Christ, may we be enabled to yield ourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and our members as instruments of righteousness unto God. Make us willing and faithful in thy service; and let us have grace to pay an unconstrained obedience to thy law. Let thy people every where become more sensible of the Redeemer's excellence and attractions. And O may the eyes of a blinded world be opened, that men may see what perfections they are despising, on what winning majesty and adorable goodness they are turning their backs, when they reject the approaches of Jesus. We implore a blessing, O Lord, upon our beloved native land. Deal not with us as we have sinned, neither reward us according to our iniquities. Be gracious to our sovereign. Bless the Reformed churches. May the work of their reformation continue to go forward. Bless thou the church to which we belong—her courts, her pastors, her flocks. May her efforts to promulgate the gospel, and to convey the saving knowledge of Jesus to the perishing multitudes, both at home and abroad, be crowned with signal success. And now, O our God, what wait we for? As thou hast mercifully kept us this day, so do thou guard us in the watches of the night. And remember not against us any of our innumerable transgressions, but receive us graciously, and love us freely; for the sake of Jesus our Saviour. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXII. 4.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XIX.

REMARKS.

The servants and people of God need not be surprised to find that their zeal in the cause of truth and holiness has excited against them the resentment and violence of ungodly men. But the rage of their enemies, like the impotent threatenings of Jezebel, cannot, without the divine permission, hurt their persons, far less can it hinder their work. It is surprising that Elijah, after having set Ahab at defiance, should now run away for fear of his wife. The path of duty lay open before him. God had given him a public triumph over the prophets of Baal, and he ought to have followed up his victory, by abolishing every vestige of idolatry in the land. There was nothing in his present circumstances to extenuate, whilst there was every thing in his past experience to aggravate the sinfulness of his conduct in attempting to avoid danger by retirement, and in wishing to be released from it by death. It would have been a righteous thing in God to take the impatient and desponding prophet at his word. But Elijah had not yet finished his work, and the gracious Master whom he served seasonably provided for his support and encouragement. Mount Horeb, where the Most High had conversed with Moses, the giver of the law, was, with obvious propriety, chosen to be the scene of an interview with Elijah, the restorer of the law. But how different were the circumstances and the subject of the manifestation! The mountain, indeed, now as formerly exhibited very awful and alarming appearances; but God was not in the wind, nor in the earthquake, nor in the fire. It was a dispensation of pure and condescending mercy, adapted to the peculiar state of the prophet's mind, and altogether calculated to revive his drooping courage, and dissipate his groundless fears. Elijah lived in a degenerate age, but he received the comforting assurance that the friends of religion were much more numerous than he had supposed. The same voice which relieved his despondency and silenced his murmuring complaints, called him forth to active exertion. Means were required to carry on the work of national reformation which he had begun. Israel stood in need of chastisement, and a rod of correction had been provided in the person of Hazael, whom the prophet was now commanded to anoint to be king over Syria. The family of Ahab must be cut off, and for this special purpose Jehu was to be invested with the government of Israel. Elijah himself was about to be removed, but he obtained all that his heart could desire in being employed to consecrate a successor who should inherit his spirit, and imitate his example, and supply his place. God is never at a loss for instruments to fulfil his purposes and promote his cause. He not only appoints the work which they have to do, but gives them both the qualification for it and success in it. It is the duty of his servants humbly and stedfastly to follow his direction, to hold themselves at his disposal, and confide in his promises for all that they need. Let them patiently wait his time, and carefully attend to his word, and labour with a single eye to his glory, instant in prayer, not weary in well-doing, hoping unto the end for the glory that shall be revealed at the day of the Lord Jesus, when they shall know that their labour has not been in vain in the Lord.

PRAYER.

O Lord, let thy mercy be on us, as we do hope and trust in thee. We have nothing of our own recommend us to thy favour, but we come to thee in the name of him whom thou hearest always, and for whose righteousness' sake thou art well pleased with all them that truly desire thee and seek and serve thee. We know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is no God besides thee, and that there is no salvation in any other. Teach us thy way, and lead us in it. Deliver us from the ignorance, the impenitence, the enmity, and the obduracy of an unbelieving heart. Convince us of our demerit and danger as sinners, and determine us to count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, that we may win Christ, and be found in him. Open the eyes of our understanding that we may see the wonders of thy law, and enlarge our hearts that we may run in the way of thy commandments. May Christ be formed in us, that we may abide in him, and bring forth much fruit. Let us never be ashamed of the gospel of Christ, nor indifferent to his cause. Make us willing both to spend and be spent in his service and for his sake. Fortify us against the fear of man, which bringeth a snare, and enable us to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. Keep us back from all presumptuous sin, and permit us neither to despise thy chastening, nor to faint under thy rebuke. May we know Christ in the fellowship of his sufferings, and choose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. We thank thee, O Lord, for the light, and liberty, and grace of the gospel dispensation. Blessed are our eyes for they see, and our ears for they hear. May the still small voice of mercy which speaks to us, speedily convey its glad tidings of great joy to all people. Be mindful of thy covenant of promise, and give to thy Son the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession. Thou hast never left thyself without a witness, and we rejoice to believe that even in this present time of darkness and degeneracy there is still a remnant according to the election of grace. Pour out thy Spirit upon all flesh, and add to thy church daily many such as shall be saved. We offer unto thee our sacrifice of praise for the mercies of the past night, and for the comforts and prospects of another morning. Keep us in thy fear all the day long. Preserve on our minds a constant and commanding sense of thy presence, so that we may both act and endure as seeing him who is invisible. May we walk humbly with God, and circumspectly before men, in all things adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour, by a conversation such as becometh the gospel. Prepare us for every duty and trial. Feed us with food convenient, and make thy grace sufficient for us. Perfect that which concerns us, and grant that the meditations of our heart, and the words of our mouth may find acceptance in thy sight, through Christ, our strength and Redeemer. Amen.

SCRIPTURE—JOHN XXI.

REMARKS.

Our Lord paid his third visit to the disciples when they were engaged in their ordinary occupation of fishermen. He came to them unsought and unexpected. But the meeting was not the less useful on that account, and it was for that very reason the more acceptable and the more delightful. No situation can exclude the presence of Christ from his people; and as it is their privilege to have access to him at all times and in all places, so it is their duty constantly to realize his presence, and to hold communion with him in their secular employments as well as in their devotional exercises.

This interview was calculated to serve many important purposes. The disciples were weak in faith, and Jesus intended, by his appearance and intercourse, to satisfy their minds with regard to the fact of his resurrection, and thus to prepare them for bearing testimony to this truth in the execution of their apostolic commission. At the same time he set before them such an exhibition of his peculiar character, of his infinite condescension, and power, and compassion, and wisdom, and love as would not fail to engage their hearts in his service, and animate them to the work of labour and suffering on which they were about to enter.

It was not to obtain information that our Lord addressed to Peter the searching question, 'Lovest thou me?' He 'needed not that any should testify of man, for he knoweth what is in man.' But he wished to give his lately apostate and now penitent disciple an opportunity of honouring, by a declaration of his continued and undiminished affection, the Master whom he had treacherously deserted and denied. And this expression of his repentance was made in some degree to correspond with his offence; for as Peter had denied Christ three times, so now he as often professed an ardent attachment to his person and cause. Peter had learned from experience to be cautious and reserved in speaking of himself. His answers were sufficiently decided, but they discovered a modesty and diffidence altogether the reverse of what he formerly exhibited, and which are necessary in forming a judgment of our own character, and especially in expressing it to him who 'knoweth all things,' and who requireth truth in the inward parts.

The believer's love to Christ is the best proof of Christ's love to him. But Peter obtained another and a most gracious and encouraging token of the Saviour's acceptance. He had been sowing in tears, and he now reaped in joy. Jesus not only owned him as a follower, and assured him of forgiveness and favour, but conferred upon him a distinguishing mark of his confidence, by committing to him the pastoral care of his flock. 'He knoweth our frame, and remembereth that we are dust.' 'A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory.'

But the Saviour is no less wise than gracious in the exercise of his love. Peter stood in need of correction as well as of comfort. His own duty and destiny had been clearly pointed out to him, and with this he should have been contented and thankful. But he wished to know more than his divine Master thought fit to reveal; and his inquiry was prompted by vain curiosity and not by a regard to his own interests. Our Lord answered his request not by a useless compliance, but by a pointed and profitable rebuke. Secret things belong to the Lord, but things that are revealed belong to us and to our children. Instead of seeking to be wise above what is written, our duty is, by the diligent and patient, and prayerful searching of the scriptures, to cultivate the attainment of that knowledge which has been graciously placed within our reach. The chief subject of our inquiry should be, not what God intends to do with us or with others, but what he requires us to do for him. Let us carefully improve the light we have, and walk by faith, relying on the promise that what we know not now we shall know hereafter.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the former of our bodies, and the Father of our spirits; the fountain of our mercies and the foundation of our hopes. Early were we cast on thy care, and thou hast cared for us. Thou didst open thine hand and we were filled with good. In danger thou hast been our defence; in trouble thou hast been our support and consolation; thou hast delivered our eyes from tears, our feet from falling, and our souls from death. Bless the Lord, then, O our souls, and all that is within us be stirred up to bless and magnify his holy name. O Lord, we had destroyed ourselves, but in thee is our help. When no other eye pitied, and no other hand could help, thine eye pitied us, and thine almighty arm wrought out salvation for us. He that is mighty hath done great things for us. Blessed be he who came in the name of the Lord to save us. We rejoice that he who was delivered for our offences was raised again for our justification, and that by many infallible proofs he showed himself alive to his disciples, the chosen witnesses of his resurrection. We believe in the testimony which thou didst give by them concerning Christ, that he not only died for our sins, according to the scriptures, but rose again the first fruits of them that sleep. May we be planted together in the likeness of his death, that we may be also in the likeness of his resurrection. May it appear that we have been quickened together with Christ, by our seeking those things which are above, where he sitteth at the right hand of God, and by our striving if by any means we may attain unto the resurrection of the dead. We desire, O Lord, that Christ may dwell in our hearts, and that he may be precious to us as he is to them that believe. May the love of Christ be not only in us, but may it constrain us so to feel and act that, appealing to the Searcher of hearts, we may be enabled to say, Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee. Animated by the love of Christ, may we find his service to be perfect freedom, and know from experience that his yoke is easy and his burden light. Rooted and grounded in love, may we hold fast the profession of our faith and the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end, and never be moved away from the hope of the gospel, nor be of them who draw back unto perdition, but of them who believe to the saving of their souls. O Lord, teach us thy statutes, and give us a competent share of that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation. Suffer us not to employ, on the characters and concerns of others, that attention which is due to our own; nor let us ever forget that one thing is needful, and that it will profit us nothing to have gained the whole world if we lose our own souls. We offer our tribute of thanksgiving for the mercies of the day that has now come to a close. Pardon the sin we may have contracted, and grant us that repentance which is unto salvation. We commit ourselves to thy care and keeping during this night, and pray that we may obtain quiet and refreshing rest. Prepare us for what remains of our day and duty, and for the night of death in which no man can work. Bless our friends with thy favour, and our enemies with thy forgiveness. May thy grace be on all that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and may thy way be soon known on the earth, and thy saving health among all nations. Graciously hear the voice of our petitions, and unto thy name, through Christ, be glory now and for ever Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXLVI.

SCRIPTURE—1 KINGS XXI.

REMARKS.

The terms which Ahab proposed for the purchase of Naboth's vineyard, were fair and reasonable; but the desire he felt was both questionable in its object, and immoderate in its exercise. It was not from disrespect to the king, but in obedience to God, that Naboth refused to comply with Ahab's request; yet the reason assigned by him, instead of satisfying Ahab, served only to mortify and distress him. Such is the vanity of earthly things, that not all the resources of his kingdom, not even the possessions of a world could have made Ahab contented and happy, so long as he had not the vineyard of Naboth for a garden of herbs. And such is the depravity of the human heart, that a failure in the pursuit of one trifling object, is sufficient to embitter the joy of success in the attainment of every other. Ahab sinned not only in coveting the property of another, but in setting his affections upon it, and in allowing himself to become miserable through the want of it. This conduct was peculiarly criminal in the king, whose duty it was to protect his subjects from injustice and oppression.

The indulgence of one sin, often requires another to complete or conceal it. Ahab could not bear a refusal, and yet he was not prepared to proceed to extremities, in order to force a compliance with his request. But in Jezebel he found an instrument exactly suited to his purpose. She well knew what sort of comfort Ahab wanted, and she could count on his approval of any measures to which she might have recourse in his name. In seeking to fulfil his wishes, she at the same time, probably gratified her own personal enmity to Naboth, who seems to have been a religious man, and one of the few who had not bowed the knee to Baal. The scheme which she adopted, was distinguished no less by its unprincipled ingenuity, than its atrocious wickedness. Naboth might have been cut off by private assassination. But it was necessary that his death should be the result of an accusation, which involved the forfeiture of his inheritance. The means which Jezebel employed to give to the murder of Naboth an appearance of justice, only tended to aggravate its criminality. No sins are more dishonouring to God, or more injurious to men, than those which they commit under the cloak of a pretended regard for the interests of religion. Ahab made the guilt of Jezebel his own, by giving his sanction to all that she had done, and by consenting to reap the fruit of her iniquity. But the triumph of the wicked is short. Ahab, indeed, attained to the object of his ambition, but the wrath which he had provoked, came upon him in the very act of taking possession. He now, for the first time, trembled at the word of the Lord. But his humility was the effect of selfish fear, not of godly sorrow; yet, it was graciously owned as the reason for a mitigation of the punishment which had been threatened against him. If God has a respect to mere outward abasement, by making it the occasion of averting temporal calamity from the sinner, how much more will he accept of true repentance, by conferring upon it the privilege of a deliverance from those evils which are spiritual and eternal? Let us seek from him that repentance which we all need, and which he alone can give; and whilst we exercise it in dependence on his grace, and endeavour to express it in the obedience of his commandments, let us gratefully ascribe the praise of its efficacy, both in procuring forgiveness, and in promoting holiness, to the work of Christ, who redeemed us to God by his blood, that he might present us 'faultless and blameless, before the presence of his Father's glory, with exceeding joy.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou madest all things by thy power and for thy glory. The earth is thine, with the fulness thereof: thine are all the creatures that live upon it, they all wait on thee. Lord, thou preservest man and beast. How precious is thy grace! Thine is the air we breathe, the food we eat, and the raiment we put on. Make us to feel our dependence on thy care, and our obligations to thy bounty. May the gifts of thy providence, of which we partake every moment, raise our thoughts to thee, from whom all blessings flow; and may our preserved lives be cheerfully spent in thy service, and zealously consecrated to thy praise. Teach us contentment, that we may know how to be abased and how to abound. Convince us that we deserve nothing at thy hand but indignation and wrath, as the punishment of our sin, and that we are not worthy even of the least of all thy mercies. Dispose us to receive with gratitude, to enjoy with moderation, and to improve with diligence, our allotted share of worldly good. Let us not seek great things for ourselves, but may we seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, in the belief that all other things necessary will then be added unto us. Suffer us not to murmur under our own trials and disappointments, nor to envy the prosperity, or covet the possessions of others. Enable us to cast all our cares upon him who careth for us, and in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, to make our requests known unto God. We come to thee as the God of all grace, who hast promised to give the Holy Spirit to them that ask it. O satisfy us early with thy mercy. Take away the stony heart out of our flesh, and renew within us a right spirit. May he who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shine into our hearts, to give us the knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ; and may the light which is in us, be made to shine forth before men, so that others, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father which is in heaven. We bless thee, O Lord, for the care with which thou hast watched over and preserved us during the past night, and for the privilege which thou hast afforded us of entering on the duties and enjoyments of another day. Prepare us for our work and our warfare: keep us from the evil that is in the world. May we act up to our principles, and hold fast our profession, and walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called. Guide us by thy counsel, sustain us by thy providence, strengthen with might by thy Spirit in the inner man, and bless us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, in Christ Jesus, so that we may serve thee acceptably, and our generation usefully, according to thy will; and be made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, through Christ our strength and Redeemer. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXII. 11—15.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS I.

REMARKS.

The purposes for which Jesus had come into the world were now fully accomplished, and the time had arrived when he should leave the world, and return to his Father. It was expedient that he should go away, and the disciples had been taught to expect his removal. Yet the event took them by surprise. The hope which they fondly cherished of a deliverance to their country, from the Roman yoke, under the reign of Messiah, had not been fulfilled; and they could not refrain from expressing the anxiety which they felt on this subject by proposing the question, 'Lord, wilt thou, at this time, restore the kingdom to Israel?' But they spoke in ignorance, and from a spirit of worldly-mindedness, and under a gross misapprehension of the character of Christ, and the nature of his redemption. Our Lord gently reproved their presumption, and effectually corrected their error by turning their minds away from the vain thought of a temporal kingdom, to the promised blessings of that spiritual kingdom in the erection of which they were to act an important part.

Jesus did not leave his disciples comfortless. He sent his angels to them with a message of consolation, assuring them of his return. Those heavens, which then received him, shall retain him until the time of the restitution of all things; but he will come again in the same human body which he then took with him to heaven, without sin unto salvation, and they that look for him shall be caught up to meet him in the air, and shall appear and be ever with him in glory. But the disciples had the prospect of another Comforter, even the Spirit of truth, whom Christ promised to send, both in his supernatural and sanctifying influence, to fit them for the work they had to do, and for the conflicts they had to sustain, and the trials they had to undergo, in his service and for his sake. And the Spirit was to abide with the disciples throughout all their successive generations; not indeed in his miraculous gifts, which were required only in the infancy of the church, but in his saving influences, which are dispensed in our day, and which will continue to be enjoyed to the end of time.

Having promised the effectual agency to ensure the success of his work, Christ also provided the necessary instrumentality to carry it forward. For this purpose he chose the twelve apostles, whom he called to labour in his vineyard. But one vacancy had been occasioned by the death of Judas the traitor: and it became the duty of the eleven who survived to supply his place. The election was conducted with great prudence and perfect impartiality. They acted up to the best of their judgment in selecting the two fittest individuals as candidates for the sacred office, and then left it to the Head of the church to make his own choice. The use of the lot was simply an appeal to him: and it was preceded by a still more direct appeal to him in solemn prayer. The decision that followed was altogether the result of his influence, and it commanded the grateful acquiescence of the other apostles, who regarded it as a manifest token of divine favour, and welcomed it as an additional instrument of the divine glory. These holy men have set us a valuable example, particularly in their attention to prayer. Like them, we should connect prayer with every thing that we do or suffer; asking counsel, and direction, and succour, and strength, for our guidance and support, especially in circumstances of painful or perplexing difficulty; humbly looking and preparing for the glories of that blessed kingdom, in which prayer shall be succeeded by praise, and the fight of faith, by the song of eternal victory.

PRAYER.

O God, thou art exalted far above all blessing and praise. Thou dwellest in the high and holy place. Yet thou humblest thyself to behold the things that are under the sun; thou dwellest with him that is of an humble and contrite heart, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite one. In thy sight, O Lord, we are less than nothing and vanity. In us dwelleth no good thing. Our own hearts condemn us, and thou art greater than our hearts, and knowest all things. What are we, O Lord, and what is our father's house, that thou hast brought us hitherto? We admire and extol the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he who was rich for our sakes became poor, that we, through his poverty, might become rich. We thank thee, that having finished his work on earth, he took possession of his reward in heaven: and that he now sits on the right hand of the Majesty on high, and ever liveth to plead the cause, and present the prayers of his people, and to dispense all needful supplies of grace, to help them in every time of need. Enable us, O Lord, to follow Christ, whither he has ascended by setting our affections on things above, and by having our conversation in heaven, whence we look for the Saviour. As strangers and pilgrims on the earth, may we spend the time of our sojourning here in fear; using the world, as not abusing it, and looking for the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God our Saviour, who shall change these vile bodies, and fashion them like unto his own glorious body. Having this hope in him, may we purify ourselves even as he is pure. May we give all diligence to make our calling and election sure, by adding to our faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly-kindness, and charity; may these things not only be in us, but abound in us, so that we may be neither barren nor unfruitful in the work of the Lord. O Lord, remember thy covenant of promise, and bring in thine ancient people the Jews, with the fulness of the Gentiles. May the Sun of righteousness soon arise, and shine on all the kingdoms of this world, causing them to become the kingdoms of our God, and of his Christ. Let wickedness come to a speedy and final end. May righteousness every where flow down the streets as a stream, and judgment as a mighty river. We offer our humble ascriptions of gratitude for thy mercy and goodness during the past day. Guard us from danger during the silent watches of the night, and give us the sleep of thy beloved. Put us, and keep us in a state of readiness for the duties of life, for the event of death, and for the joys of immortality. Fill us with the Spirit of thy grace, and grant us acceptance in our persons and services, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM V. 1—4.

SCRIPTURE—I KINGS XXII.

REMARKS.

How instructive the circumstances attending the death of Ahab. We behold here a striking instance of the desperate wickedness and folly of an unrepented heart, and of the holiness, truth, and sovereignty of Jehovah. Ahab's wounded pride and restless ambition incite him to go up against Ramoth-Gilead. Jehoshaphat, unwarrantably persuaded to aid him, proposed first to take counsel of the Lord, but the idolatrous Ahab had no wish to consult the God by whom kings reign, and with whom is the issue of battles.

Baal's prophets, who at this time assured him of success, were his chosen advisers, and in these lying oracles he still put his trust, notwithstanding all God had done to show him the sin of his idolatry. To satisfy the pious Jehoshaphat, who resented this appeal, Micaiah a prophet of the true God, was called. We find he at first answers in the very words of the false prophets, an incident which may appear inconsistent with the character he bore, and his address to the messengers sent to summon him, but admitting an explanation that may put to silence the scoffer, and teach us the prophet's wisdom. Micaiah knew Ahab hated him and his counsel, and favoured and trusted the prophets of Baal, and assuming, as we may justly suppose, a tone and manner expressing a becoming resentment of this guilty preference, replied in the words of these deceivers. As much as say, Why ask my counsel? you hate me and will not believe my word. You have your own prophets. They have made their revelation, you are resolved to follow it. Obey their voice since you wish it, and then you will believe you will prosper. Ahab saw, and keenly felt the irony of this answer. He was not an instant deceived by it, and hence abjured Micaiah to tell the truth. When Micaiah, in reply, utters the sad presage of Ahab's ruin, the reckless monarch is enraged by the warning, and the expression of his impious anger draws from the prophet a more distinct revelation of the divine decrees concerning him.

The vision in which these are detailed, is not to be viewed as a real scene in the celestial world, but having an allusion to the two kings, sitting as mentioned, on thrones, with their prophets before them, and designed to represent to them, and to all men, the sovereign majesty and dominion of the God whose throne is in heaven, the omnipotence and universality of his providence, and that he makes the powers of darkness, the passions of men, and all things, work together, to accomplish his righteous counsels.

Satan freed from restraint, becomes a lying spirit in the mouths of Ahab's prophets, and as God may in one sense be said to do, what he permits to be done, Ahab is told that his delusion is from the Lord, who had spoken evil concerning him.

It is necessary, however, in order to explain and vindicate the divine procedure in this, and in like cases, to keep in mind, that while God tempteth no man to evil, in the sense that he wills him to commit sin, it is still in an important sense true, that he tempts, tries, and proves men. And although he wills none to sin, in order that they may be miserable, it is nevertheless his decree, that all who wilfully abuse or resist the light, means, and calls to salvation he hath given them, and obstinately persist in sin, shall utterly perish. And the temptations of Satan and the world are truly ordained by God, to try, bring out, and prove the inward dispositions, and real characters of men, with a view to the awards of his righteous judgments.

PRAYER.

Most holy and merciful God, we lift our hearts to thee this morning in the name of our blessed

Mediator; and we pray that thou wouldst enable us, by thy Spirit, ever to worship thee with deep reverence of soul, and a humble confidence in thy love. Thou alone art God, the fountain of all good, and beside thee there is no Saviour. We praise thee as the Maker, and the Sovereign, and disposer of all things. Thy throne is in the heavens, and judgment and righteousness are ever its habitation; and thy face is set against all who do evil, to cut off their remembrance from the earth. But we rejoice, O Lord, to know that thou art compassionate, as well as holy, and while there is no safety to sinners under thy righteous providence, that all thy ways are mercy and peace to such as keep thy covenant, and thy testimonies, to do them. We are utterly unworthy, O Lord, to approach thee, or take thy name into our lips, for we were born in sin, and are the natural heirs of wrath; we cannot reckon the multitude of our actual transgressions, for in all things we come short of thy glory. Our hopes of acceptance are entirely in thy mercy, and we adore thee for the blessed gospel of thy well-beloved Son, in which we are assured that through the merits of his sacrifice, thou canst be both just and merciful in thy dealings with us sinners who believe in his name. O may the blood of his perfect and accepted atonement, ever speak peace to our consciences, and dispel from our hearts all apprehensions of thy wrath, and may we ever be able to joy in thee through Jesus Christ, who has reconciled and bought us. Grant, we beseech thee, that we may ever feel the obligations and constraining influences of thine infinite love and grace, and ever live in obedience to them. O Lord, we have every thing to ask from thee, that we may serve thee aright, or ever hope to fulfil thy holy and good commandments. We beseech thee to grant us thy Holy Spirit, to enable us to repent truly of all our sins, and to serve thee without fear, in holiness and righteousness all our days. We would ever bear in mind that we live in a world lying in wickedness. May we have grace to watch and pray that we never enter into temptation, and may be strengthened to shun every scene and every alliance that would lead us into sin. O Lord, we are only safe when under thy protection. Do thou preserve us from evil, and make thy grace sufficient for us, that we may be faithful in every duty, and patient under every trial. May our faith in thy love and promises, and presence, never fail us amid all the trials that may encompass us. May we cleave to thee, and over all the evils that may surround us may we be more than conquerors through him that loved us. O Lord, we bless thee for having preserved us over another night, and for thy goodness this morning; give us this day our daily bread; fit us for all our duties, and in all we think or do may we have an aim to thy approbation and glory. We pray, O Lord, for all the families of mankind. Have mercy on the unenlightened heathen, and give success to the means using to instruct and convert them. May Jesus be given for salvation to the ends of the earth. May all our friends and benefactors be partakers of thy grace. Hear and save all in trouble. Let us not forget that the day of life is short, and that the best preparation for its trials and close is to spend the hours of health and season of activity in thy service. Hear, O Lord, and accept of us and our worship, for the sake of Jesus, and to thy name be all praise, now and for ever. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LX. 1—4.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS II.

REMARKS.

The particulars of this chapter are among the most remarkable in the inspired records of the church of Christ. Whether we view the events of Pentecost in themselves as miracles, or as the completion of important predictions and promises, or in their immediate and remote effects in the history of the church, or in the encouragement and direction they afford to all believers, they are in every aspect of vital and precious interest, and may well excite our devout, and grateful, and admiring meditation.

The multitudes who witnessed the effusion of the Spirit and works of the apostles, are to all ages pledges of their reality. In them the divine Spirit that spake by Isaiah and Joel, in the promises of the Father and of Jesus, sets to his seal the divinity of the apostles' commission and doctrine. The works in themselves attest the same facts. And while the truth of Christianity, generally, is thus signally proved, the resurrection of Jesus, his exaltation to the right hand of God, and investiture as our Mediator, with all power in heaven and earth, are fully demonstrated.

These are momentous facts and truths, in reference to the faith, and peace, and virtue, the comfort and hopes of our immortal souls. Let us here also adore the wisdom of God in the gift of tongues, both as a necessary and fit means to diffuse the gospel throughout the world, and as opening a way for the successful use of all the other apostolic endowments. These gifts farther remind us what the will of the Saviour is, as to the extent of the propagation of his gospel, and what in this respect is the duty of every Christian. They bid us cease not in our endeavours and prayers, till Jesus be given for salvation to the ends of the earth. And more than this, they may encourage us in our Christian duties and warfare, as they may assure us of all the necessary influences by which we are built up in holiness and comfort, and sealed to the day of redemption. Hath the promise of the Spirit been thus wonderfully realized, and hath he who is the fountain of all grace promised the Holy Spirit to all who ask him, how firmly may every believing suppliant rely on his all-sufficient aids and consolations in every hour of need.

We here learn that the best gifts may be abused, the greatest blessings maligned by evil and ignorant men. The mockery and calumny of some Jews, who probably knew no language but Hebrew, gave occasion to Peter to show, that what caused the derision of some, and the astonishment of the multitude, was just what Joel foretold would happen in Messiah's day. And farther, that the crucified Jesus, to whose divine origin his miracles bore witness, was the Messiah promised. The wonderful humiliation of Jesus had indeed given them offence, and has been a stumbling-block to proud reason in all times, but this, as the apostle shows, having been ordained and explicitly predicted by God, instead of being viewed as a disparagement of his claims, was a manifest evidence of their truth. That Messiah was to die and rise again, and ascend to supreme power in heaven, David foretold. And as Jesus predicted all this of himself, at the same time promising after he ascended, to pour the Holy Spirit on his disciples, and enable them to work great miracles, the visible fulfilment of this promise was an unanswerable proof in addition to the testimony of the apostles, that Jesus who was crucified had risen from the dead, ascended, was seated on the throne of Zion, and was both Lord and Christ.

Peter's discourse had great force of truth and reason. Arguments may convince, however, but without grace will never convert a soul. On the present occasion the saving influence was not withheld. The day of Pentecost was distinguished not less by a rich effusion of the Spirit's converting influences, than his preternatural gifts, by which multitudes of such as should be saved believed.

PRAYER.

Father of mercies, from whom cometh every good and perfect gift, we beseech thee to pour on us thy Holy Spirit, that we may know thee savingly, and glorify thee in soul and body, which are thine. We lament our inability to serve thee, as thou hast a right to require of us, and thy daily benefits oblige us to do. We confess and would deplore that we are naturally alienated from thee in heart and mind, and dead in sin. We neither see thee in thy works nor own thee in thy providence as we ought, and while thou speakest to us by thy Son, we are too oft deaf to the voice that calls us to our God, and to virtue and happiness. Have compassion on us, most gracious God; see Jesus our shield, look on us in the face of thine Anointed, and for his sake forgive all our iniquities; restore our souls, and love us freely. Convince us, we beseech thee, of the evil of our manifold sins, and our native weakness and corruption, and may we be in the daily exercise of a sincere repentance and lively faith on the God of our salvation. We would stir up all that is within us to bless thy name for what thou hast done to save us. We adore thee for the sure grounds on which thou callest us to rest our faith, and for the pledges thou hast given that thou wilt fulfil to all who believe the great and precious promises of thy holy word. We rejoice to know that thou hast exalted to thy right hand, a prince and Saviour, who is God in our nature, who knows our infirmities and temptations, and is ever ready to succour us in need, and save to the uttermost all who come to thee in his name. May we joyfully receive and ever rest on him for our salvation, and may he be formed in our hearts the hope of glory. Forbid, O Lord, we should be satisfied with a faith that doth not sanctify our hearts. May our faith destroy all pride, and selfishness, and worldliness in our souls, and work in us love, and humility, and mercy, and virtue, and heavenly-mindedness, and peace. May we study to be living epistles of the gospel, read of all men. May we strive to abound in the fruits of thy Spirit. Forbid that by unbelief or sin we should ever grieve him, or quench his holy influences. May we ever cherish and obey his teachings, and may we have his witness that we are thy children, and the heirs of immortality. We adore thee for thy care over us, and the many mercies we have this day enjoyed. Blot out the sins we have committed against thee, and all our short-comings; enable us in our after life, if thou art pleased to spare us, to live more to thy glory. May thy word have free course and be glorified. Hasten the time when the reign of truth, and love, and righteousness shall be universal on earth. Have mercy on the poor and afflicted, and on the bereaved and the dying. Keep us ever in mind that our days and nights are numbered; prepare us for their end. We commit ourselves to thy protection through the night, and whether it be thy will to call us hence ere another morning dawns, or raise us to see its light, may we be prepared for all the ordinations of thy merciful and righteous providence. Accept of our services, and answer our prayers, for the sake of Jesus, and to thy name be all glory, now and ever. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVII. 37—40.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS I.

REMARKS.

Ahaziah did not profit by the lesson read to him and Israel, in the history and fate of Ahab. Like his father, he served Baal, and did evil in the sight of the Lord. But he soon learned that God is ever jealous of his honour, and set against all workers of iniquity, to cut off their remembrance from the earth. The first token of divine displeasure shown him, was the revolt and loss of Moab. The next, what many might think a mere accident, a fall which endangered his life, was an event in providence, designed to teach his dependence on God, and his sin in forsaking him. Had these events been rightly improved, they might have led Ahaziah to repentance and faith, to seek the mercy of his offended Maker. But he had no pleasure in thinking of the God in whose hands are the lives of all men, who killeth and maketh alive, who woundeth and healeth. An idolater in heart and practice, he sends to the city of the Philistines to consult an idol—the God of Ekron, whether he would recover. His conduct in this act, and other particulars noticed in this chapter, was marked by heinous and aggravated guilt. Idolatry was a sin, of all others, most offensive to Jehovah. He had already taught Israel, in Ahab's time, by a signal miracle, and the destruction of Baal's prophets, that Baal was no God, and his prophets deceivers. But this memorable lesson was soon forgotten, and so flagrant and early a neglect of it, as that shown by Ahaziah, accounts for and justifies that severe and awful manifestation of divine wrath recorded in this chapter. Here was a king of Israel, whose station and authority made his example powerful for good or evil, virtually proclaiming to all Israel and heathen nations, that he had no respect for, nor faith in, the God of Israel, and preferred to him a heathen idol.

When we think of this, we can have no cause to wonder at the fatal message Elijah sent back the king's servants to deliver to him. Had Ahaziah humbled himself before God, the mortal sentence might have been revoked. But instead of this, it kindled his rage against the prophet of the Lord, and made him instantly determine on Elijah's destruction.

The command to his captains and soldiers to go and seize the prophet, and the order to a third detachment, after two had been miraculously consumed by fire, were fearful aggravations of his sin. He hardens his heart in the face of miraculous judgments, refuses to repent and be reconciled, and, as it were, openly defies and contends against the God of heaven and earth. How desperately wicked the human heart! What infatuation is there in sin!

Let us not suppose that Elijah's prayer for the judgment here detailed, proceeded either from fear or resentment. He was directed in his conduct by the Spirit of God. And his prayer for the consuming fire, was the means God appointed to vindicate the authority of his prophet; to teach Ahaziah, and Israel, and all nations, that the God of Israel was able both to save life, and destroy it; while the signal destruction of the soldiers, and the death of Ahaziah, were designed to proclaim to the Israelites and all people, that the God of Elijah would not suffer his glory to be given to an idol, and that all who went after, countenanced, or defended the worship of false gods, would expose themselves to as certain ruin as that which overwhelmed the captains and soldiers of the king of Israel.

Let us ever beware of the sin that merits and lays open to such consequences. Let us be faithful to our God and Saviour, and neither death, nor life, nor any creature, shall ever separate us from his love which is in Christ Jesus.

PRAYER.

O thou who art the unseen, but omnipotent Creator, and disposer of all things, hear our prayers this morning, and bless us, we beseech thee, for the sake of thy beloved Son, our Lord and Saviour. Thou art our God, and we will ever seek and praise thee. There is no God but thee. The objects worshipped by blinded heathens are the works of their own hands, or the creatures of delusion, but thou art the true and living God, thou art an everlasting king. Who, O Lord, would not fear thy great name? Thou art glorious in holiness, ever doing wonders. We rejoice, O Lord, to know, that although thine arm be mighty to destroy, it is also mighty to save. Blessed are all they who love and trust thee. Thy favour is life. Thou art as a wall of fire around thy servants in times of trouble; a thousand shall fall at their sides, and ten thousand at their right hand; but it shall not come nigh unto them, for they have the Lord for their defence, and the Most High for their habitation. Most gracious God, we confess and lament that we have never been affected as we ought, by thy majesty and holiness, or thy goodness and mercy. We have never sought nor trusted, nor loved and served thee, as thou hast a right to expect we always should have done. We have too much loved and gone after idols. When in health, we have sought our happiness in the broken and empty cisterns of this world; and when in sickness or trouble, we have sought deliverance, and placed our dependence more on means, and creature helps and comforters, than on thee, the giver and restorer of life, the source of all consolation. We have forgotten the hand that has fed us, and lightly esteemed the rock of our salvation. We confess, O Lord, that it is because of thine infinite forbearance and compassion we have not been consumed by the fire of thy righteous judgments; and we bless thee for thy long-suffering and mercy. Humble us, we beseech thee, under a deep sense of our ungodliness and ingratitude; and may thy patience lead us to repentance. And we adore thee for that proof of thine infinite love thou hast given us, in the gift of thine eternal Son, to die for us and save us from all our iniquities. May we feel our absolute need of his salvation; and by a true and living faith, be made partakers of it. Grant that an experience of thy redeeming mercy, may ever constrain us to love and serve thee. Be thou ever our covenant God, and may we be unto thee a faithful and devoted people. O Lord, we beseech thee to renew our hearts more and more. May thy Holy Spirit keep our ever-erring affections from departing from thee, and lead us ever to seek our happiness in doing thy will, and promoting thy glory. Do thou be our strength in the hour of temptation, and our refuge in times of trouble. Never leave us, we entreat thee, and keep us by thy power and grace to the day of salvation. May the goodness that has blessed us during the night watches, follow us through this day. Supply our wants, teach us our duties, and preserve us from all evil. Bless our kindred and friends, look in pity on all under trial, and comfort all who mourn. Hasten the time when the reign of idolatry and wickedness in heathen lands, and the prevalence of error and corruption in parts where thy gospel has been preached, shall be brought to an end. May the kingdom of grace be advanced, and the kingdom of glory hastened. And grant, O Lord, that we may so live, that at last we may be partakers of its eternal joys. And unto thy name be all power, and honour, and glory for ever. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVI. 1—5.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS III.

REMARKS.

The sabbath and temple were duly honoured by our Lord and his disciples. Peter and John went up together at the hour of prayer. There are much true happiness and benefit in the communion of Christian friends when led by the same spirit to the house of God. They find in the exercises of the sanctuary a source of mutual endearment, improvement, and joy. Let us delight to go with them who love to keep holy the days and the seasons of prayer.

When in the path of duty, God discovers how we shall exercise our gifts so as best to promote his glory, our own and our brethren's well-being. He led the apostles to the temple at a time when they might show, by a great miracle, that the crucified

Redeemer, whose name they bore and gospel they preached, was both Lord and Christ. For nearly forty years the helpless cripple was an object of public sympathy and charity. His lameness and indigence all Jerusalem knew; and the instant and perfect cure performed in the miracle-working name of Jesus, the bitterest foes of the apostles and their gospel could neither deny nor conceal. Well might all Jerusalem, and we too, say of Peter and John, they could not have done such a work unless God was with them.

The desire of the lame man was only for a temporal benefit, and a temporal blessing. And a temporal blessing, which neither earth's gold nor man's power could confer, he did obtain; but the apostles had other and better gifts to enrich him with than his natural appetites or bodily infirmities craved. They were the chosen dispensers of that sovereign grace which heals all the soul's diseases, enables the spiritually dead and lame to walk in God's statutes and rejoice in his love, and satisfies the longings of our immortal nature with the unsearchable riches of the Saviour's mercy. And not less impotent to every thing good are our souls, than was the cripple in all respects. Our nature desires only carnal benefits. We cannot come to God nor walk with him, unless he restores our souls and gives them ability. And how happy to know, from the miracle before us, that the salvation we need and the apostles preached, is a salvation from God; a salvation in Jesus his only-begotten Son; a salvation free, suitable, and perfect. And O what power is there in the name of Jesus. There is no physician that can heal like him: no other name under heaven among men by which we can be saved. And what a blessed voice is that by which Jesus speaks in this miracle to poor, helpless, perishing sinners in all times! 'Look unto me and be ye saved.' Cast the burden of your weary heavy laden souls upon me, and ye shall find rest. And let the conduct of the restored cripple remind us of the effects a sense of the divine mercy will ever produce in all who experience it. He followed the apostles, leaped for joy, went to the temple and praised the God of his salvation. And in a similar way will we act, if we have tasted and found that the Lord is gracious. We shall follow the great Physician who has healed us, be glad in his salvation, delight to praise him in the congregation of his people, and tell, by the holiness of our walk, how truly he has saved us: how sincerely we feel and express our infinite obligations to his love.

From whatever motive it was the lame man laid hold of the apostles, whether it proceeded from grateful affection, or from a fear his infirmity might return if they left him, we may learn from the circumstance the necessity of abiding in that doctrine which has healed our diseases. Our grateful hearts will cling by faith to our divine Redeemer as altogether precious. Believing, that as a branch cannot bring forth fruit unless it abide in the vine, no more shall we unless we abide in Jesus; we shall hold and live by faith in him as the only source of wisdom, righteousness, peace, and redemption to our souls.

When satan cannot effect his purposes by keeping sinner infidels, he seeks and often attains the same object by leading them into fatal errors. The wondering Jews seem to ascribe the miracle to some inherent virtue or power in the apostles, and not to God. And we may witness here a root of some of antichrist's worst delusions, the power, the merits, the intercession of the church and the saints. How averse are sinners to believe that they can have no power to do good or obtain it but from God! How repugnant to their thoughts the gospel truth, that a crucified Saviour is the only source of saving power and grace!

PRAYER.

Great and manifold are thy works, Lord God Almighty, in wisdom and goodness thou hast made them all. We rejoice, O Lord, to know that although all creation is thine, and eternity and its praises thy dwelling-place, thou humblest thyself to care for us thy sinful children, and to provide for our happiness. Thou didst make us at first upright, but we feel that we are transgressors, and that thy holy image has been defaced from our souls. Our understandings are blind to what is good, our wills averse to it, and our whole hearts prone to what is evil. We are unable, O Lord, of ourselves to do anything that is not sinful. Justly, O Lord, mightest thou have cast us off, and shut thine ears against our prayers, and made us everlasting monuments of thy righteous judgments. But for ever blessed be thy name that thou didst pity us, in our poor, and helpless, and lost condition, and didst so love us as to give thy beloved Son, that we might not perish but have everlasting life. O the height and depth, the breadth and length of thy love to us in Christ Jesus: it passeth knowledge. Forbid, most merciful God, that Jesus should be sent to us in vain, and that his gospel should be to us the savour of death. Let us not be guilty of neglecting this great salvation. May the miracles of power and mercy by which he proved he came from thee, confirm our faith and establish our hearts in his blessed word. And grant, O Lord, that we may be able, from our experience of its efficacy, to testify that the gospel is worthy of all acceptance. May we be made, by thy Holy Spirit, to feel more and more its power in quickening and renewing our souls, and filling us with peace and joy. Let us never forget the Lord who has redeemed us. May we ever glory in his name and in his cross, and testify our love, and gratitude, and salvation, by honouring and obeying all his commandments. Teach us, O Lord, that he who begins the good work in us, can alone carry it to perfection: and may we ever wait on Jesus, and live by faith in his wisdom, and righteousness, and grace. O Lord, we would never forget that all means owe their efficacy to thee, nor thy promises of spiritual benefits to all who seek thy mercy. Do thou come down on our souls, O Lord, by the influences of thy heavenly grace, and refresh, and bless, and save us. Enable us, in a patient continuance in well-doing, to go on our way rejoicing, looking for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ. We bless thee for having brought us in safety to the close of another day. Make us grateful for all the mercies we have this day enjoyed, and let not the sins which, in thought, or word, or deed we have been guilty of, be remembered against us. May thy kingdom come, when all nations shall be blessed in Jesus, and thy glory shall fill the earth. Bless all whom we ought to have on our hearts at thy throne of grace. And do thou, who never sleepest, watch over us during the night season, and if it be thy will, raise us to the enjoyment of thy favour on another morning. All we ask, O Lord, is in the name of Jesus, to whom, with thee and thy blessed Spirit, we ascribe all glory and praise, now and ever. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM LXVIII. 17.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS II.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Elijah was one of the greatest prophets of Old Testament times. It is not a little remarkable that under each of the early dispensations, an individual was translated to heaven without tasting death; for 'Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him,' Gen. v. 24. Perhaps the design of such a departure from the great law of mortality was to afford a vivid confirmation of the existence of a future state, not only for the purpose of warning the ungodly, but also of encouraging the righteous. Elijah seems to have been aware of his approaching translation, for he went to various of the schools of the prophets, to give them his parting advice, and to confirm them in the faith. In these schools young men of piety were trained up for the service of God, and fitted ultimately, by the spirit of prophecy, for their arduous work. When they had crossed Jordan, and arrived at the place whence Elijah was to be taken up, the man of God demanded of his disciple what he would have. Elisha requested as his legacy, a double portion of his spirit, that is, that he might possess the gifts and graces of his master in a double degree. It is a blessed consideration that we cannot ask too much of God, and we are commanded to covet earnestly the best gifts, 1 Cor. xii. 31. Many curious questions might be asked about the mode of Elijah's translation, but we must just take scripture as it is, and not attempt to be wise above what is revealed. Fire seems an apt emblem of Elijah's zeal, which burned brightly for the honour of his God, 1 Kings xviii. 17, &c., and xix. 10. Elisha having been a witness of his master's ascent, received his mantle in token of obtaining a double portion of his spirit, as he had desired, and of his being appointed to succeed him as the messenger of God to the people of Israel. The search which was instituted by the college of the prophets, affords an unequivocal proof of the reality of his translation to heaven. Bethel contained another school of the prophets. As Elisha went up thither a number of young men (for so the word rendered 'children' signifies) attempted to turn the translation of Elijah into ridicule, and to pour contempt upon his disciple and successor. Elisha's curse was dictated by the divine Spirit which animated him, and did not proceed from private resentment; and the awful judgment that followed was intended as a punishment not merely for the act of disrespect to the prophet, but for the grievous insult given to the power and majesty of God: 'our God is a consuming fire.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The circumstances here related concerning Elijah remind us of the ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ. Having finished his work on earth, he ascended up to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God. Our forerunner, Christ, has now entered into the holy place, there to intercede in behalf of his people. Are we resting by faith on the living and exalted Saviour? We are farther reminded of the exemption of Christ's people from the power of the second death. We are not to expect to fare as did Enoch and Elijah, for the 'wages of sin is death;' but let us remember that, if we are Christ's people, to die is gain, for over such the second death hath no power.

The circumstances connected with Elisha teach us that God will continue a race of faithful men to carry on his work. Elijah's mantle fell upon Elisha. The spirit of the master rested upon the disciple. So shall there be a seed to serve God while the 'sun and moon endure.' Lastly, we are taught that God will not allow serious subjects to be mocked or trifled with. Young people must beware of a practice which is too common, of insulting over the infirmities of the helpless and the unfortunate, and above all, they must specially avoid every thing approaching to profanity, for God will not hold him guiltless that profaneth or abuseth 'any thing whereby he maketh himself known.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, we adore thee for the wondrous plan of redeeming love which was executed by the mission, the sufferings and death of the Lord Jesus Christ. We thank thee that Christ died, and rose, and revived, and that he has now ascended up to the right hand of the majesty on high, to intercede in behalf of those whom he has purchased with his blood. We bless thee that he is preparing mansions for his people, and that when ages close he will come again to receive them to himself, that where he is there they may be also. We delight to think that Christ has triumphed over the grave, and that he has given a glorious earnest that over his redeemed people the second death shall have no power. May we be among the number of Christ's people; washed in his blood, and sanctified by his Spirit. Give us a closer walk with thee. May we be not conformed to the world, but transformed by the renewing of our minds, by the power of the Holy Spirit, and may it be our daily concern to die unto sin and to live unto holiness. Do thou deliver us from the power, and the practice, and the guilt of sin, and make us partakers of the divine nature, that when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we also may appear with him in glory. We bless thee that thou hast always had a church upon the earth; that in the darkest period of the ancient dispensation there were seven thousand who did not bow the knee to Baal, and that there have been some in every age who have not defiled their garments, but have been witnesses for religion and for God. Lord, we entreat of thee to raise up instruments to carry on thy work on the earth. Let a double portion of thy good Spirit rest upon those who minister in holy things at home or abroad, and may the mantle of the holy and good who have departed to be with Christ, rest upon their successors. Lord, we commend unto thee especially this family. Bless every member of it with all needful blessings. We thank thee that thou hast spared us to meet around the family altar; and we would bless thee for the mercies of the past night and of this morning. Go forward with us to the active duties of the day. Keep our bodies from danger and our souls from sin. May we be in thy fear all the day long. Guide us by thy counsel, and afterwards receive us into glory, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM II. 1.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS IV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In this first persecution against the Christian church was Christ's prediction fulfilled, Mark xiii. 9; Luke xxi. 12. A suffering cause is generally a growing one, and multitudes, undaunted at the persecuting spirit of their rulers, embraced the truth, ver. 4. The defence of Peter before the sanhedrim, must be regarded as a glorious proof of the fulfilment of his Master's promise to give his servants 'a mouth and wisdom,' Matt. x. 19, 20; Luke xxi. 14, 15. The boldness and honesty with which the apostle spoke, and the faithfulness with which he charged his judges with the murder of the Son of God, cannot be sufficiently admired, and afford a fine proof of the divinity of his commission. He saw that the glory of his Master was at stake; and strong in the divine promise, he 'witnessed a good confession.' Every word was an arrow, sharply piercing the hearts of the enemies of the King, Psal. xlv. 5. The prisoner became the accuser, and the judges the self-condemned criminals. The rulers acknowledge the reality of the miracle wrought by Peter and John; judicial blindness and prejudice alone prevented them from embracing the inference that their doctrine must be from God. The reply of the apostles to the requirement of the council, no longer to speak in the name of Jesus, contains a noble vindication of the supreme authority of God, and of the rights of conscience. Alas, how often have these been lost sight of! What oceans of blood, the blood of those of whom the world was not worthy, have been shed in violation of the plain principle that God's authority is paramount, and that he alone is Lord of the conscience? The beautiful and impressive act of devotion and praise in which the followers of Jesus united, on the release of their two brethren, is founded on Psal. ii. 1, 2, and the quotation of this passage furnishes an example of the use and accommodation of scripture language in prayer. This prayer received an attestation from the Head of the church, probably in a way akin to that in which their prayers were answered on the day of Pentecost. Being thus baptized by the Spirit, their characters underwent a complete and holy change, and they consecrated themselves, their energies, talents, and property to the service and glory of their crucified and exalted Redeemer.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The conduct of the opposing parties brought under our notice in this chapter, furnishes us with some warnings and lessons.

In the Jewish rulers we see an example of conviction without conversion. In this respect they bear a remarkable resemblance to many among us who are convinced that the gospel is true, but whom the power of pride, of prejudice, or of sin prevents from following out their convictions. It is an awful thing to be convinced without being converted; to have an enlightened mind without a changed heart.

In the treatment of the two apostles we see that God often exposes his people to trial, even when they are in the path of duty. By such trials their faith, and love, and steadfastness are displayed. Christ's people must expect trials. It is part of the discipline through which they must pass on their way to glory. But in such cases they are not left comfortless. Christ's grace is sufficient for them; his strength is made perfect in his people's weakness.

In the character of the primitive believer, we see what genuine Christians ought to be. They should be people of prayer; 'in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, making their requests known unto God.' Assured that he will send an answer in peace, they should be united among each other, endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and they should cultivate the most expansive benevolence to all their brethren of mankind. If Christians sufficiently realized their obligations to Christ, they would strive, and labour, and pray more to spread his cause in a benighted world.

PRAYER.

O Lord, our Father and our God, we would desire, at the close of another day, to prostrate ourselves before the footstool of thy throne, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, our once crucified but now exalted Redeemer. Do thou assist us by thy Holy Spirit, and enable us to worship thee in a right and acceptable manner. We desire to bless thee that, by the good hand of our God upon us, we have been brought to the close of another week; and looking back upon the days that are past, we would be humbled on account of our manifold sinfulness, and we would plead for mercy's sake that thou wouldst extend to us pardon, and peace, and eternal life, through the blood of thy Son Jesus Christ. We would remember the mercies of this week, and, in the view of our temporal comforts and our spiritual privileges, we would desire to raise our Ebenezer to thee, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us! O thou that hast kept our souls from death, keep, we beseech thee, our eyes from tears and our feet from falling. Guide our footsteps into the way of peace, place us upon the rock that is higher than we, and enable us to find peace, and rest, and comfort, and joy, where thy justice found satisfaction. Lord, may we rest on nothing short of Christ and his finished work. May we ever bear in mind that Christ is the only foundation of a sinner's hope, and that there is none other name given under heaven among men whereby we must be saved. O may we rest on nothing short of a change of character and of life. May thy Holy Spirit descend to enlighten our understandings, to renew our wills, and to warm our naturally cold hearts with the love of Christ. May that love constrain us to live not to ourselves but to Christ, who died for us and rose again. May we have union to Christ by faith, and union among each other by love. May we keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and may we ever be desirous that grace, and mercy, and peace may rest upon all the Israel of God. Lord, may we be under thy protecting care this night. Do thou, the holy One of Israel, who never slumberest, protect and bless us during the silent watches. Fit us, O God, for the solemn and interesting duties of a coming sabbath, if thou seest meet to spare us. Let this world speedily become one universal temple to Jehovah, and where the sons of men shall learn the anthems of the blessed above. The Lord hasten it in his own time, and let the whole earth be speedily filled with his glory. All we ask is for the Lord Jesus' sake. Amen.

TWENTY-FOURTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXIV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXIV.

REMARKS.

The church of God has come through many changes: its history, as recorded in the Bible, is an eventful one. At one time we see it composed of a single family, floating upon the bosom of a deluged and ruined world; at another time we see it in captivity, in a land of heathenism, and sending forth a cry for deliverance to its Almighty Head. At one time we see it basking in the sunshine of God's favour; at another time mourning the deprivation of the light of his countenance, and enduring the rod of his displeasure. It was in this low condition that the church appears to have been, when the psalm before us was penned. It is the afflicted church pleading with its God for deliverance and protection; and it is equally applicable to the desponding afflicted believer, praying for light, for comfort, and for hope. How great the mercy, that however dark the clouds be that overhang the prospect of the church and people of God, they cannot shut out from the believer's view a throne of grace,—that in the darkest night of sorrow there is free access to the footstool of the eternal throne, and God's people are invited to fill their mouths with arguments, and not only to pray, but to plead with him who is their only refuge and hope. This psalm presents us with some of those arguments adapted to the circumstances of the Old Testament church; and surely if the plea of deliverance from Egyptian bondage could be urged by God's chosen people in former times, how much more powerful is the plea that can now be urged, of redemption from the bondage of sin by the Lord Jesus Christ.

At ver. 4, and subsequent verses, there is a primary reference to the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans (2 Chron. xxxvi. 17, &c.); but the statements there made may be applied to any period in which the enemies of truth and righteousness assail the church of the living God, and attempt to injure the cause of religion. As in the case of the Jews of old, such enemies may be permitted to meet with partial success—days of darkness and nights of sorrow may be in store for the church—religion may be brought low—faithful ministers may be silenced,—and the cause of God and of his church may be ready to expire—but still Zion will be remembered; there will be a remnant left according to the election of grace—there will be a chosen few, as in the days of Elijah, who will not bow the knee to Baal, and on whom happier times and brighter days shall dawn. God will not desert his chosen. He will—when his time comes—pluck his hand out of his bosom, make bare his holy arm, and cause his church and people to be more than conquerors, through Christ our living Head.

In times of affliction the church is called upon to bear in mind God's dealings in the old time. God's church and people, in the darkest season of affliction and dullness, may confidently look for deliverance. Sorrow may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

The psalm concludes with a fervent prayer, that the blessings which God's covenanted people enjoy may be extended to the dark places of the earth, which are full of the habitations of cruelty. O let us join in that prayer! How many, alas, are yet sitting in the region and shadow of death! On how many does no Sabbath dawn! To how many is no call given, 'Go ye up to the house of the Lord.' Let, then, our supplications arise in fervour and in faith, that these dark places may be enlightened by the Sun of righteousness,—that God may arise and plead his own cause, and that the time to favour Zion—the set time—may come. We live in interesting times. Let us be forward in aiding those schemes of benevolence that have been formed for the purpose of giving gospel light to those that sit in darkness, whether at home or abroad; and let us embrace, with eagerness, the high and holy privilege of co-operating with God in the glorious work of making the church co-extensive with the world.

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever-blessed God! Thou hast been the dwelling-place of thy church and people in every generation. We come before thy throne this morning of thy holy day, in the name of Christ, the living Head of his people, beseeching thee to pardon, to sanctify, and to bless us. We thank thee for the rest of the past night, and that we have been brought together this morning to surround the family altar, in so comfortable circumstances. Lord, we bless thee for the unspeakable privilege of hearing thy holy word read; and our prayer is, that we may be profited by it, and that we may search it more and more, seeing that it can make us wise unto salvation, through faith that is in Christ Jesus. Lord, go forward with us this day to thy house of prayer. May we love the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth. May we joy when it is said unto us, Go ye up to the house of the Lord. May we be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and be permitted to drink of the river of thy pleasures. O to see thy power and thy glory, as thou hast manifested them in old time in thy sanctuary! And at the close of all the services of this day, may we be enabled to say, It was good for us to wait upon the Lord—this has been to us none other than the house of God, or the gate of heaven. Lord, hasten the time when the blessings of the Sabbath shall be extended to every land, and when sacrifice and a pure offering shall be presented unto thee from the rising even unto the setting of the sun. We would remember before thee the dark places of the earth, which are full of the habitations of cruelty; and we pray that on them the Sun of righteousness may arise, with healing under his wings. Make bare thy holy arm, O God. Bless their inheritance; feed them also, and lift them up for ever. Wherever thy church is suffering affliction, Lord, do thou interpose for its relief. Wherever thy people are in sorrow and distress, Lord, do thou be near to communicate all needful comfort, and strength, and grace. We put up our prayers, O God, for thy cause, in the midst of the congregation to which we belong. Do thou strengthen and support thy servant our pastor, and enable him to come forth in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ, and to speak a word in season to perishing and weary souls. Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years. May we enjoy an outpouring of thy Holy Spirit. May many be inquiring the way to Zion, with their faces thitherward. May backsliders be reclaimed, and let thine own people be cheered, and animated, and comforted, and enabled to go on their way rejoicing. Lord, have mercy upon careless sinners. Turn them from the error of their ways, and bring them to the knowledge and love of the truth. May the Spirit be universally poured out from on high, that the wilderness may become a fruitful field, and that the fruitful field may be counted for a forest. These are our prayers, our Father; do thou hear us, and pardon us, and answer us, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXVI. 7.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS LXXV. LXXVI.

REMARKS.

Praise is an important part of divine worship. It is the language of heaven, and therefore ought to be learned here. Many of the Psalms are entirely occupied with praise; while, in almost all of them, there are passages in which thanksgiving is offered to the Most High. In the lxxv. Psalm, God is praised on the ground that he is near his people, and has manifested his power, and love, and glory in their experience. He takes them out of the fearful pit, and out of the miry clay: he delivers them from their spiritual foes, and the arms of his faithfulness and love are round about them. Every converted soul is thus a monument of God's power and faithfulness; every such soul displays God's wondrous work of redemption. But God is to be praised not merely for his care over his own people, but on the more general ground that he is the Governor among the nations. All rule and authority are his. 'The Lord reigneth.'

But while the government of God is a subject of praise and consolation to the righteous, it wears a fearful aspect to the impenitent and unbelieving. 'Our God is a consuming fire.' 'For in the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out the same; but the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them.' Believers may have to drink the cup of affliction, but the impenitent shall drink the cup of wrath. O how important, then, to flee to Christ, who drank the bitter cup for sinners, that we may drink of the new wine of happiness and joy in the kingdom above.

The lxxvi. Psalm appears to have been composed, with reference to some glorious victory obtained by God's ancient people over their enemies; and most commentators point to the destruction of Sennacherib's army as the occasion referred to. (See Isaiah xxxvi. 36.) The writer commences by alluding to the privileges which the Jewish nation at that time enjoyed. These privileges are now transferred to others; and we, who live in this distant isle of the Gentiles, possess advantages more glorious still than those conferred upon Judea. How vast the responsibility that rests upon Britain! Let us remember that privileges misimproved lead to their removal, and that if we forsake our first love, our gospel candlestick will be removed.

Many, we are reminded in the psalm before us, have been the enemies, both temporal and spiritual, which have assailed the Zion of the living God; but as it has been in past times, so it will be in time to come. When the powers of the world make war with him whose throne is on mount Zion, 'the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords and King of kings; and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful,' Rev. xvii. 14.

There is deduced from hence the duty of all who are impenitent. They must fear God—not servilely, but reverentially. How dreadful is his power who, in the twinkling of an eye, transformed an hundred and eighty-five thousand living beings into dead corpses! How awful to bear the fury of his wrath, as every impenitent sinner does! 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.' There is a duty mentioned incumbent upon all who fear God. It is to confide in him—to pay their vows to him—to take the Lord Jesus Christ to reign over them, without a rival, and to 'present their bodies, and souls, and spirits, living sacrifices, holy, acceptable to God, which is their reasonable service.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art great and greatly to be feared, —thou art good, and greatly to be loved, and to be had in reverence of all that would approach unto thee. Thou art the blessed and the only potentate, the King of kings and the Lord of lords. Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne; mercy and truth continually go before thy face. Thou rulest in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. Thou causest the very wrath of man to praise thee, and the remainder of that wrath thou dost restrain. Lord, may we have just and worthy conceptions of thy character and thy glory; and may we have grace given us to sanctify thee, the Lord God, in our hearts, and to make thee our fear and our dread. Give us thy Spirit at this time, that we may worship thee in spirit and in truth. We thank thee, O God, for our exceeding great and glorious privileges. We thank thee that thou art known in the midst of us and that we enjoy gospel privileges and gospel ordinances. We bless thee that our candlestick is not removed out of its place, but that our eyes still see our teachers, and that we live in these times of light and love, in which many kings, and prophets, and righteous men of old desired to live, but were not so highly favoured. Lord, may we prize our privileges; may we improve them aright, and may they be to us the savour of life unto life. We thank thee for the opportunity which we had this day of waiting upon thee in thy public courts, and O let the preaching of the everlasting gospel be accompanied with divine efficacy and saving power. Let the Spirit of God apply the truth to every heart. God forbid that thy ministering servants should have to take up the lamentation of the prophet of old, Who hath believed our report! and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed! But O make bare thy holy arm, and visit us with that mercy and love which thou bearest to thine own people. May we pay our vows to the Most High. May we devote ourselves to thy service, and may we offer up our bodies living sacrifices, holy and acceptable to thee, which is our reasonable service. Prepare us, O Lord, for all that lies before us in time, prepare us for death, judgment and eternity, and may we be received at length unto thy everlasting kingdom and glory. Send forth thy light and thy truth among the nations, and let them acknowledge that thou art he whose name alone is Jehovah, the Most High over all the earth. Bring in thine ancient people the Jews, with all the fullness of the Gentile church. Bless our country, our queen, and all placed in authority over us; and enable us to lead quiet and peaceable lives, in all godliness and honesty. Be the God of this family. Let every member of it be a member of the spiritual body of Jesus Christ; interested in the eternal covenant, washed in the blood of sprinkling, and sanctified by the Holy Spirit of promise. Take us under thy divine care this night. Let no evil come near us, nor plague come nigh our dwelling. Fit us, O God, for the active duties of the week on which we have entered; support us under its trials and difficulties, and with every temptation graciously make a way of escape. We commend ourselves to thee, and to the power of thy grace, who art able to build us up, and to give us an inheritance among all those that are sanctified. Hear us in heaven, thy dwelling-place, and when thou hearest, forgive. O grant us an answer in peace, for all that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 57—60.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS III.

REMARKS.

‘All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness;’ and though, at first sight, the chapter which we have been reading may seem to suggest little in the way of practical remark or instruction, a slight degree of attention will show that it is not without its salutary lessons. The character of Jehoram, to whom it chiefly relates, has many imitators still. He ‘put away the image of Baal that his father had made,’ in all probability, in order to conciliate Jehoshaphat, and obtain his aid against the rebellious king of Moab, while he still was idolatrous in heart, ‘cleaving to the sins of Jeroboam.’ And so, many are to be found in the present day, who, for the sake of gaining some worldly end, or securing the friendship of some individual whose influence may help to advance their worldly schemes, will, for a time, give up their sinful habits, and put on the aspect of reformed characters. In their straits and difficulties, they are ready too, like Jehoram, to take counsel of those whom in their season of peace and prosperity they affected to despise. If affliction, or temporal calamity, come upon them, the man of God, or the minister of the gospel, whose instructions they were wont to slight or sneer at, is then sought for; and impressed with the idea, for the moment at least, that the ‘prayer of a righteous man availeth much,’ while his admonitions and even reproofs for past follies are not resented, his supplications at a throne of grace are desired and entreated. But alas! all these interested movements are speedily discovered to be fitful and passing. When the worldly end is secured, when the affliction has been soothed by time, when the worldly calamity has been alleviated by some better fortune, the work of reformation ceases; the idols that were laid aside are again set up, the prayers that were apparently welcomed, are disrelished, and the counsels and reproofs of the spiritual watchman are felt to be repulsive and distasteful. O! men may serve some temporal benefit by their partial relinquishment of sin, even as Jehoram did, but nothing better than this can ever result from it; and unless, through the grace of God, such a change be wrought upon their hearts, as will make them willing to part with every idol, not merely to lay aside one sin, but every sin; and to submit wholly and cordially to divine teaching, however successful they may be in the prosecution of their worldly schemes, they cannot have any rational ground on which to look for a happier destiny hereafter than that which awaits the idolator; they 'shall not enter into the kingdom of God.'

PRAYER.

O God, the creator, preserver, and redeemer of the world, thou art entitled to the worship of all thine intelligent creatures. It is thy righteous and inalienable prerogative, to demand and to receive the homage of their adoration and praise. With all our heart, and with all our mind, and with all our strength we are bound to love and serve thee. As the God that made us, thou mayest well call for the devotion of all our faculties to thy service. As the God that hast led us and fed us all our life long, thou mayest well claim the continued gratitude of our existence. As the God who didst provide a ransom for us in the sacrifice of thy dear Son, when we had sold ourselves to sin and satan, and when no man could redeem his brother from destruction, thou mayest well say to us, Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your bodies and spirits, which are his. We acknowledge, O Lord, that these claims have not been met as they ought to have been; that instead of honouring thee by a ready submission of our minds to thine authority, and a free and full opening of our hearts to the influences of thy love, we have disobeyed that authority, and slighted that love; we have served idols instead of the living God; we have taken counsel of our own hearts, instead of listening to the voice of heavenly truth. Forbid it, O Father of mercies, that we should continue thus to dishonour thee, and degrade ourselves. Convinced that thy glory and our own happiness, demand the separation of our hearts from every idol, may we be enabled, by thy gracious Spirit, to yield ourselves as living sacrifices to thee. Our past idolatries and sins remember not against us, for Jesus' sake, and impart to us strength to serve thee aright for the time to come. When thou sayest unto each of us, My son, my daughter, give me thine heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways, may we be enabled cordially and fully to meet these demands.

May we never think of offering thee a divided heart, which is faulty in thy sight, but sincerely, cheerfully, and wholly may we give ourselves unto the Lord. This day, in entering anew upon the active duties of the world, may we be guided by thy counsel, upheld by thy power, and enriched by thy blessing. May the rest and the refreshment afforded to our bodies and our spirits on thy sabbath, make us strong to do thy will through the week. In all things, in the discharge of every secular as well as of every sacred duty, may we be able to acquit ourselves as the true servants of Jehovah; and may no earthly consideration ever move us away from that path of holy obedience which has been plainly set before us. May we be faithful unto death, that we may obtain the crown of life. We bless thee for all the sacred and civil privileges which we possess. Let not our unworthiness provoke thee to take them away. In thy mercy, do thou purify and sustain them for our benefit, and the benefit of the generations that are to come after. Our country, our sovereign, our church, do thou greatly prosper, so that glory in our land may have its habitation. Keep us, with all near and dear to us, from evil this day; and in whatever duties we are engaged, or to whatever trials we may be subjected, may we receive from thee guidance, fortitude, and comfort; for all we ask is for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 29—31.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS V.

REMARKS.

We have here, in the history of Ananias and Sapphira, not only a new illustration of what men will do, even under the guise of religion, to obtain a sinful gratification, but a most striking and awful testimony of God's indignation at such hypocrisy and deceit. Actuated by a desire to share in that high reputation in which those persons were held, who, in apostolic times, voluntarily and cheerfully sold their property, and cast the price into a treasury for the common benefit of the Christian disciples, 'Ananias and Sapphira his wife,' we are told, 'sold a possession.' But while they obviously wished it to be understood that they had, like others, devoted the whole price of it to Christian objects, and sought the gratification of credit and a name for such a sacrifice, they still reserved a part for themselves, regardless of truth, and setting at nought the idea of detection. Thus, though for the sake of a little paltry fame they were willing to render a considerable offering, yet their avarice being as strong as their love of praise, they secretly kept back what they wished it to be believed they had given, and so were guilty of an attempt to impose upon the apostles; guilty of hypocrisy, aggravated by the circumstance, that those on whom they attempted to practise it, acted under the guidance of God's holy Spirit, and thus it is, that their crime is called 'lying unto the Holy Ghost,' inasmuch as they endeavoured to deceive persons who were known by them, to be under his special influence. Swiftly did the vengeance of heaven overtake them. God saw, with an indignant eye, their wickedness, and as a testimony that he will not be mocked with impunity, he smote them, the one after the other, so that they 'gave up the ghost.' What a lesson have we here against hypocrisy and deceit, especially in matters of a sacred character! Let us remember that we cannot impose on God; that no veil we can cast over our thoughts or actions, can screen them from his eye; and that however we may escape the detection and censure of our fellow-men, we never can escape God's righteous judgment. Let us strive, therefore, to be 'sincere and without rebuke,' in our religious profession, being always on the alert against the influence of dispositions that lead to hypocrisy, especially those that operated so fatally on Ananias and Sapphira; viz. the love of praise, and the love of money.

While God, by a miraculous power, interposed to punish a daring attempt to impose upon the apostles, by a similar power he afforded them protection and success amid the open insults and hostility of their enemies. The persecuting violence manifested in the imprisonment of the apostles, God over-ruled for the advancement of the gospel, miraculously opening the prison doors and setting them free; thereby not only imparting to them new courage to face all dangers, but begetting a feeling among the people in their behalf; and from one unlooked for quarter, even from Gamaliel, a pharisee, actuated by mere worldly policy, extorting an argument for their toleration, so that they were 'daily in the temple, and in every house, ceasing not to teach and preach Jesus Christ.' Let the encouraging fact be ever before us, that the same presiding agency, though not disclosed exactly in the same way, is still controlling the passions of men for the furtherance of the cause of truth. Yes, 'the Lord's arm is not shortened;' and neither to the church as a body, nor to its individual members, shall the enmity of men be permitted to extend, farther than to his wisdom seems proper. The wrath of man he maketh to praise him. 'the remainder of his wrath he restraineth.' The gospel must triumph. It is the counsel of God, and cannot 'come to nought.' If its enemies will not be won into its obedience; if they will continue to 'fight against God,' they must 'be broken as with a rod of iron. O that they would 'kiss the Son lest he be angry, and they perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art a holy and a heart-searching God. All things are naked and open to thine eye, the most secret thoughts and emotions of our souls being as thoroughly before it as any of the actions of our outward man. Thou seest not only our outgoing, and our incoming, our down-sitting, and our uprising, but also the plans and purposes which we meditate. Our thoughts thou understandest afar off; our secret sins are in the light of thy countenance. And when we think, that not a day, not an hour, of our lives passes away, without something occurring in our thoughts, our affections, or our conduct, that has upon it the stain of sin, something that is opposed to the purity of thy nature, and liable, therefore, to thy wrath; something observed by thee, if not by ourselves, insulting to thy holiness, and fitted to provoke thine indignation against us; O what reason have we to thank thee, that we have not, long ere now, been cut off from the land of the living, and the place of hope; how grateful ought we to be, that we are not left to the misery and despair, in which a sense of our guilt, without a knowledge of the way of salvation, would involve us; and how anxious ought we to be to use the means, and improve the opportunities of deliverance from the punishment we deserve. Grant then, O gracious God, that while we are convinced of our guilt and danger, while our shortcomings, and our backslidings reprove us, we may cast ourselves upon that Saviour who welcomes every weary and heavy-laden sinner; and finding in him rest from every fear, deliverance from every perplexity, comfort in every sorrow, victory over every enemy, may we cleave to him continually, may we abide in him for ever. May we be made complete in him, growing up to the stature of perfect individuals, being washed, sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. May we be duly affected by the solemn facts which we have heard this evening from thy holy word; may we never forget, that it is impossible to conceal from thee the state of our hearts or our conduct, and that hypocrisy, both in sacred and in common things, must always be displeasing in thy sight. Through thy grace may we be kept from deceiving ourselves, and from deceiving others; being made pure in heart, and free from all appearance of evil. Like thy servants of old, may we manifest the reality of our Christian profession, by a steadfast adherence to the prescribed path of duty; and though, like them, we may be reviled and evil-entreated for the gospel's sake, may we be faithful to our heavenly Master, and ready to make any sacrifice, rather than shrink from the service he requires of us; yea, may we rejoice if we are counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. Hasten, O Lord, the time when the religion of the cross shall overcome every obstruction; when every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain shall be brought low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places smooth, and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together. Prosper every institution having for its object the advancement of the kingdom of Christ. Bless the church planted in our own land. May she be as a well-watered garden, replenished with trees of righteousness, that thou mayest be glorified. Make all her ministers faithful, her elders exemplary and active in their labours of love; and the whole body of her members true witnesses for Christ. Bless the young; turn their hearts from vanity and sin, to the love of thyself. Dwell in this family, and impart to all belonging to it wisdom and holiness, and the fear of the Lord. Visit in mercy the habitations of trouble and affliction. O give the needful consolation, and let not sorrow work death, but sanctification, and eternal life. Hear the cry of the needy, the orphan, the widow, and the stranger. Prepare the dying for death; and as we feel our days and years to pass swiftly away, may we feel more and more the importance of preparing to meet our God. O when the hour of meeting shall arrive, may we be ready to render our account with joy, and not with grief. Our bodies, our souls, and all that concerns us, we would now commit to thy keeping for this night and for ever; looking for thy mercy through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom, with thee and the Holy Spirit, one eternal God, we would ascribe honour and glory, dominion and praise, now, and for evermore. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PARAPHRASE XXXIII. 1, 3, 4.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS IV.

REMARKS.

This chapter is full of useful instruction, suggesting many lessons applicable to the circumstances in which believers are often situated. The first incident which it records is a very interesting one. The widow of one of the 'sons of the prophets,' is left in worldly destitution, and a man to whom she is indebted, threatens to sell her sons as slaves, in order to obtain payment of the debt. Here is a case of great distress, which no good man, and far less a prophet, could behold unmoved. We wonder not, therefore, that Elisha should say to the widow, 'what shall I do for thee?' nor, when we consider, that the honour of religion demanded satisfaction to the creditor of a deceased prophet, need we deem it an extraordinary thing that Elisha should be miraculously instructed how to provide, at once for cancelling the debt, and sustaining the family. Miracles are not now, however, to be expected under similar circumstances. Christian sympathy and kindness must supply their place. And while it is the duty of every believer to live within his means; to 'owe no man any thing;' that the gospel be not dishonoured by his carelessness or providence, yet, when a man that 'fears the Lord,' is, through circumstances which he could not control, brought into difficulties, or his family left in poverty, there is, in such a case, a just claim for the interposition of Christian benevolence; and we shall be disregarding the evangelical command to bear one another's burdens, if we refuse to attend to that claim.

The history of the woman of Shunam reads to us two important lessons; viz. a lesson on contentment, and a lesson on resignation. When the prophet Elisha, out of gratitude for the kindness and hospitality shown him, as often as he came to the Shunammite's house, proposed to use his influence with those in power to procure for her some benefit, saying, 'What is to be done for thee? wouldest thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?' she answered, 'I dwell among mine own people;' as if she had said, 'I am satisfied with my present lot;' I desire not any greater worldly enjoyment than that which I possess, in the interchange of friendship and affection with my own people. What a noble instance of indifference to temporal honour and advancement have we here! What wisdom and fortitude in cleaving to her present comfortable condition, when the offer of exaltation was before her! How strikingly does her example inculcate the wisdom of refusing to risk the loss of present tranquillity and happiness, by giving way to any tempting call to worldly advancement that may present itself. Let us be guided by that wisdom which speaks to us in the language of Jeremiah to Baruch, 'Seekest thou great things unto thyself? seek them not.' But the Shunammite exhibited also a striking instance of resignation to the divine will, under a most trying event. She had unexpectedly received a son, on whom, after having grown up to youth, the hand of death was suddenly fixed. A sore bereavement surely this; few more distressing can be conceived. A son, an only son, a darling son cut off, while the bud of hope was just beginning to expand; 'a child of promise,' a child 'of prayer, and given in love, yet taken away.' But still no repining word escaped from her lips; no murmuring thought she breathed. 'It shall be well,' 'it is well,' was her submissive language; the dictate of a mind disciplined to bear in patience heaven's sternest decree. And her resignation and confidence in God did not go unrewarded. She was one of those who 'by faith received their dead raised to life again;' and who, 'believing' in the wisdom, power, and love of God, were, through temporary suffering, permitted to 'see his glory,' and made to know that 'tribulation worketh patience, experience, and hope.' Let us never judge hastily the divine procedure towards us. Let us patiently submit to it as wise and good, however severe it may seem; and let us pray and labour, that all our trials may have an improving influence upon our character here, and so prepare us for 'an exceeding weight of glory' hereafter. The interposition of Elisha in behalf of the sons of the prophets, whereby he not only miraculously healed their poisoned food, but multiplied the provision brought by the man of Baalshalisha, is calculated to speak comfort to the believer; to repress that anxiety which is ready to arise in his mind under temporal difficulty, and to encourage him to 'cast his care upon God.' 'The Lord will provide.' 'The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working. Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true are all thy ways, thou King of saints. Thou hast done great things for us, of which we have reason to be glad. Thou hast been doing us good continually. Notwithstanding all our rebellion, and faithlessness, and ingratitude, thou hast never left thyself without a witness concerning us, for thou hast been filling our hearts with food and gladness; affording us provision and comfort, when we deserved destitution and misery. O may we be enabled by thy gracious Spirit, to look at all temporal blessing as among the things that are made sure to believers in Christ. May the thought that they come, and are continued to us by him, who, as Mediator, has control over all things, sweeten them to our taste, enhance them in our esteem, and make us satisfied with the portion of them assigned us. May we rejoice to believe that he will give us as much as is for our good, and that he will withhold what would prove injurious. Thus may we be instructed, both to be full, and to be hungry; both to abound, and to suffer need. In whatever state we are, therewith may we be content. We pray, heavenly Father, not only for a contented mind under the temporal provision afforded us, but for a spirit of holy submission under the various allotments of thy providence. May we be able, under every event, however trying, to stand in awe and not sin. We know that infallible wisdom and perfect rectitude, mark all thy determinations, and all government, and all thy ways. We know, that often after those very dispensations which we are ready to consider adverse, are fraught with the greatest blessings thou canst bestow; and that all thy dealings towards thy people, shall conduce to their eternal welfare. May we then, under the afflictions that befall us, instead of saying with Jacob, All these things are against me; be able to say, with the Shunammite, It is well, it shall be well. And though trouble and affliction in their most trying forms should anoint us, may none of these things move us. May we be strong in faith, giving glory to God, from the greatest depths of sorrow. May we still retain an unwavering confidence in him who has said, I will never leave you, I will never forsake you. May we be enabled to lift our Ebenezer, and say, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us, and he will help us still; who remembered us in our low estate, for his mercy endureth for ever; and hath redeemed us from our enemies, for his mercy endureth for ever; who giveth food to all flesh, for his mercy endureth for ever. O give thanks unto the God of heaven, for his mercy endureth for ever. Bless us, and all for whom we ought to pray; high and low, rich and poor, young and old. Bless Zion; may she prosper. May her ministers be faithful, and successful. May the whole body of her members be pure, so that her very enemies may be constrained to say, The Lord is here. May true religion flourish in this house, and in this parish; and may thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven; for all we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXIII.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS VI.

REMARKS.

1. How soon did a spirit of jealousy and discontent, arising from the management of its secular concerns, appear in the Christian church! It was scarcely formed, when complaints were heard about a partial and unfair distribution of the common fund. Need we wonder, then, that murmurings and discontents should still be found in the church? If, even under the superintendence of the apostles, one party alleged that they were treated with neglect, to the advantage of another, can we expect that now there should be no similar complaints—no similar charges of partiality and mismanagement? We cannot. Human nature is essentially so selfish, that in every thing that concerns their worldly interests, embers of jealousy will be found smouldering in the hearts of one party of Christians towards another; and thus it is, that we oftener hear murmurings in reference to the temporal concerns of the church, than to its spiritual concerns. Whenever there is good reason for such murmurings, whenever there are abuses or mismanagement that justify complaint, it would be well if the course adopted by the apostles, as recorded in the chapter just read, were followed; it would be well if such concessions and remedies were prayerfully employed, as to give hopeful security against a recurrence of similar causes of discontent. If this were the case, we might expect to see as the result, the removal of many prejudices, the destruction of schisms, and envyings, and strifes, and an increase of the number of faithful adherents of the truth.

2. How necessary is it for men who take up the cause of religion, to guard against confounding impure passion with holy zeal! The Jews, who, when they 'were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which Stephen spake, suborned men' to bring false charges against him, and 'stirred up the people against him,' no doubt imagined that they were actuated by a proper zeal, and were doing God service, though, it is obvious, they were instigated by a 'zeal without knowledge;' a dark and malignant passion, utterly inconsistent with the cause of God, in which they professed to be engaged. And how ready are men still to support what they consider to be a good cause by unworthy means; to fight their opponents, not with the polished weapons of truth, but with arrows dipt in the gall of human prejudice, and human passion, to supply their lack of argument by personal reviling and abuse; and then to conclude, that they have all the while been guided by a hallowed anxiety for the cause of God! Let us not mistake; a holy zeal for God will despise such methods of contending. It will strive with all energy, nay, with vehemence; but it will reject from its alliance all deceit, all malice. It will not wrangle, but persuade; it will not persecute, but entreat; it will not curse, but bless. Benevolence, not selfishness, directs it. The Spirit of God, and not the spirit of evil, urges it on; and, therefore, it will ever be characterized by charity, by honesty, and by long-suffering. Let us guard against imagining that our zeal is holy, if it be destitute of such properties as these.

PRAYER.

Ever-blessed and most merciful God, who, in former times, didst show thyself mighty to bring good out of evil, order out of confusion, and light out of darkness; over-ruling contention within, as well as opposition without, the church, and ordering events so as to secure her welfare, and thine own glory, we would be encouraged by thy past procedure, to ask thee to interpose in these days, and by thy counsel, and thy power, imparted to those who are appointed watchmen over the spiritual interests of thy people, enable them to remove all errors in government, doctrine, and discipline, and so to purify thy church, as that all just cause for complaining shall be taken away, and the professed members of Christ, her living Head, shall be joined together in love, and keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. In us, as belonging to the number, do thou destroy all the elements of strife, and imbue our minds with that spirit of Christian charity which will lead us to beware giving needless offence to any, to be deeply concerned for the welfare of immortal souls, and to do good to all as we have opportunity. Putting away from us all bitterness, and wrath, and envy, and clamour, and evil-speaking, may we be kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us; and while we are called upon earnestly to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, to be valiant for the truth upon the earth; may our zeal ever be guided by knowledge, animated by love, and free from all unholy passion. May we never dishonour thy cause, or our own profession, by the exhibition of violence or deceit; but in all things approve ourselves as the servants of God, by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, and by the power of God. In the spirit of love and zeal, we pray that thou wouldst visit the habitations of cruelty and sin with thy mercy. Let the light of the gospel, and the peace thereof, speedily spread over all lands. At home and abroad, let the people, yea, all the people praise thee. Let Jew and Gentile, barbarian and Scythian, bond and free, be brought together within the fold of thy church, and one universal acclaim of gratitude ascend to thee from every people and every clime. This house do thou fill with thy blessing. This parish do thou water with the dews of thy grace. This land, do thou make a land of righteousness and peace. O hear these humble supplications, and while we cast our care upon thee, cast thou over us thy protection and thy grace, for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XIX. 12.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS V.

REMARKS.

Man at his best estate is altogether vanity. Naaman, captain of the Syrian host, high in the favour of his prince, honoured as, under God, the deliverer of his country, was yet covered with a loathsome disease. Amidst all the distinctions of rank and wealth, man is born unto trouble: he is of few days and full of sorrow. In the means taken for Naaman's recovery we see how wonderfully events are ordered by God in his providence, so as to lead us by a way which we know not. A band went forth from Syria intent only on plundering the land of Israel,—a little maid was carried captive from her parents and home,—her simple report of Elisha's miraculous gifts reached the ears of her master, and brought him, the bearer of a royal letter, to stand as a suppliant at the prophet's gate. Thus does God, who is wonderful in counsel, carry out his purposes of mercy in behalf of sinners. These things will he do unto them, and not forsake them.

The simple message of Elisha, 'Go, wash and be clean,'—Naaman's haughty reply, 'Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?'—his subsequent humility and thankful acceptance of what he had previously rejected as foolishness,—all vividly represent the sinner's spiritual wants, the movements of an unhumiliated heart, and the blessed effects of that repentance unto life which needeth not to be repented of. The disease of leprosy, which prevailed in the east, and producing the most painful effects on its miserable victims, was a striking emblem of our spiritual malady; while, in the cleansing efficacy communicated to the waters of Jordan, we are reminded of that fountain opened in the house of David for sin and for uncleanness. By nature we are suffering under a deep spiritual disease; the whole head is sick and the whole heart is faint; but let us rejoice that there is balm in Gilead, and a Physician there. Let it be our prayer, with David, 'wash us thoroughly from our transgression, and cleanse us from our sin,' and let us come to the blood of Jesus, that our consciences may be purified from dead works, to serve the living God.

Naaman's disease was not only healed; he was led openly to turn from his idols. 'Behold,' he said, 'now I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel.' This good confession, before many witnesses, was followed by his requesting two mule's burden of earth, and permission to bow in the house of Rimmon. The former of these might proceed from a desire to retain some outward memorial of that land where he had experienced so signal a deliverance; the second shows how hardly they that have riches can enter into the kingdom of God. There is an obvious desire to serve God and mammon. Conscience, however, was roused, and the prophet, who evidently leaves the principles already implanted to work their own way, knew, that he who had begun the good work, would carry it on even unto the end. It becomes the followers of Christ openly to avow themselves on the Lord's side; to acknowledge him before men, being not ashamed of the gospel, which is the power of God, and the wisdom of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth.

How solemn is the lesson taught by the punishment of Gehazi. Its severity is but a foretaste of that righteous vengeance which shall consign to outer darkness whatsoever loveth or maketh a lie. This deceiver had enjoyed the instructions and example of Elisha, but amidst all these privileges his covetous heart remained unregenerated. How important, therefore, must be the effectual working of God's mighty power, by which alone we can be renewed in the spirit of our minds? On his grace let us place all our dependence, that he may work in us both to will and do of his good pleasure, and that, being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, we might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness, all the days of our life.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art our God, early would we seek thee. Enable us this morning humbly to approach thy footstool, and give unto thee the glory which is due unto thy name. We adore thee as Lord of heaven and earth, the Fountain of all excellence and blessedness; glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, ever doing wonders. Whom have we in heaven but thee? there is none on earth whom our souls would desire besides thee. With shame and confusion of face we would confess our sins in thy presence. O thou who art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, enter not into judgment with us, for in thy sight shall no flesh living be justified. Reveal to us, we beseech thee, the exceeding sinfulness of our sins, the guilt and danger of that spiritual disease which has prevailed within us. May we see the corruption of our hearts, and mourn with godly sorrow over the transgressions of our lives. We have sinned, and what shall we answer thee, O thou preserver of men. Like the leper of old, it becomes us to cry out, Unclean, unclean. The whole head is sick and the whole heart is faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in us. Our hearts are deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. But we desire to take encouragement from the assurance that there is a balm in Gilead, and a Physician there. Blessed be thou, O God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who didst look with pity on our low and lost estate, and didst, in the exercise of sovereign mercy, set forth thy Son to be a propitiation for sin, through faith in his blood. O apply to our souls this blood of sprinkling. Wash us in the fountain thus opened in the house of David for sin and for uncleanness. Blot out our iniquities as a cloud, our transgressions as a thick cloud. Have mercy on us for thy great name's sake. Heal our backslidings, and love us freely. Wash us and we shall be clean, purge us with hyssop and we shall be whiter than the snow. And, O Lord, we beseech thee for the gift of thy Holy Spirit. May his quickening and sanctifying influences be shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ, to awake a deeper sense of sin's exceeding sinfulness, to fill us with enlarged apprehensions of redeeming love, and enable us to adorn our profession by a life and conversation becoming the gospel. Forbid that our affections should cleave to the dust, or that we should even offer thee the homage of a divided heart, seeing that we are not our own, but bought with a price. May we live no more unto ourselves, but unto him who died for us. Being made free from sin, may we be indeed the servants of God, having our fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. To thy grace would we this day commend ourselves and all whom we ought to remember before thee. Look in mercy on a world lying in wickedness. Excite every where a growing zeal in the cause of Christ, and hasten the happy time when all men shall know thee, and call thee blessed. Bless those united to us in the ties of relationship or friendship. May grace and mercy and peace be multiplied upon them. Be with us through the day, to strengthen us for its various duties. Whatsoever our hand findeth to do, may we do it with all our might. Order our footsteps in thy word, and suffer no iniquity to have the dominion over us. Hear these our prayers, and accept of us, for Christ sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVIII. 4.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS VII. 1—29.

REMARKS.

As false witnesses rose up against our Lord, so were they now sought against his disciples. Stephen stood accused before the Jewish synagogue of speaking blasphemous things against the holy place and the law. His object in reply was not merely to show the falsehood of such a charge, but to warn his judges against superstitiously cleaving to forms, while they rejected the Messiah, and convict them of concealing, under the semblance of religious zeal, a wrathful, ungodly, persecuting spirit. The narrative, accordingly, on which he enters was fitted to arrest their attention, and disarm their prejudice. Instead of hatred to Jewish institutions or the events of Jewish history, this convert to Christianity was heard recounting, with deep interest, the long train of God's dealings with his ancient people. The calling of Abraham, the covenant of circumcision, the history of the patriarchs, the oppression of Egypt, the birth of Moses, his education and learning, his rejection by the Israelites, and finally his flight into Midian, are all vividly placed before us; nor could the most bigoted of his adversaries have avowed a firmer belief, or evinced a deeper interest in these wonderful events. Every statement also contributed, step by step, to gain the purpose which Stephen had in view. When he spake of Abraham, as distinguished by the marks of God's favour previous to the covenant of circumcision, the inference was obvious, that such external rites could not be in all circumstances essential. When he exhibited the father of the faithful without home or kindred, a stranger amidst the land of promise, his hearers might have been prepared to believe, that amidst all its outward persecutions, the church of Christ might still be the depository of sacred truth. Above all, in the present circumstances of the synagogue there was a solemn warning drawn from the history of Moses. That prophet, whose name they professed to revere, had been disowned by their fathers,—his efforts for their deliverance rejected,—and he himself driven to seek refuge in flight. Thus had their nation, in times past, dishonoured the bearers of a divine commission. It was no new thing for them to fight against God.

In these statements Stephen has left an example to believers in every future age. As he, being full of the Holy Ghost, appealed to the authority of scripture, so are we to seek the Spirit's promised aid, and to rest all our confidence on the word of God. When called to assign a reason for the hope that is in us, let us strive to imitate the calmness and boldness, the faithfulness and spiritual wisdom of this address. Looking to Jesus as the Captain of our salvation, let us rely on his gracious assurance, 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' Amidst all the difficulties of the Christian course, let us keep the faith once delivered to the saints. More is he who is for us, than all who can be against us. Commit thy way unto the Lord, and he shall bring it to pass; he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noon-day.

The events of Old Testament history can never lose their interest, or be divested of their importance in the view of the Christian. Who can follow the long train of God's dealings as there unfolded, without feeling that he has indeed been the dwelling-place of his people in all generations? From the calling of Abraham down to the sending forth of Moses, we see many proofs of undeserved mercy, long-suffering patience, unchanging faithfulness. Now these things happened unto them for ensamples, and are written for our admonition, on whom the ends of the world are come. The God with whom we have to do is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever. He who blessed faithful Abraham has many precious promises in store for Abraham's spiritual seed. He who was the Shepherd of Israel, who led Joseph as a flock, leadeth his people beside the still waters, and maketh them to lie down in the green pastures. Let us seek, therefore, the heritage of those that fear his name, that we may see the good of his chosen, and may glory with his inheritance. Let it be our prayer, with the Psalmist, 'remember me, O Lord, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people; O visit me with thy salvation.'

PRAYER.

O thou who dwellest in the high and holy place, we bless thee that thine ear is open to the cry of the humble; that though thou inhabitest eternity and its praises, yet to this man wilt thou look, who is poor and of a contrite heart, and who trembleth at thy word. Enable us, gracious God, in humble reliance on the merits of our Redeemer, to approach thee as children coming to a Father, and fulfil in our experience thine own blessed promise, that wherever two or three are met together in thy name, thou wilt be present with them, to bless them and to do them good. We thank thee, O Lord, for all that we are taught of thy dealings with thine ancient people. As we have heard with our ears what things thou didst in their days, in the times of old, O may these manifestations of thy purposes and character produce a deep and saving impression on our souls. Thou who art the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to whom can we go but unto thee? Throughout all generations thy name and memorial has been, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin. Enable us, we entreat thee, to rely on thine unfailing mercy and unchanging faithfulness. God of our fathers! who keepest covenant and mercy with them that love thee, O be thou our refuge and our dwelling-place. Enable us from the heart to say, This God is our God for ever and ever, he will be our guide even unto death. Deepen, we entreat thee, on our minds a sense of our exceeding sinfulness, and while our iniquities are felt as a heavy burden, may we look to him who died upon the cross to bear our griefs and carry our sorrows. We bless thee that the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men; and while we rely on thy mercy in Christ Jesus, we pray to be kept faithful to our Redeemer and our Lord. In all circumstances of difficulty and trial may we be enabled to avow our attachment to his cause, and by the growing holiness of our lives, may men have reason to take knowledge respecting us that we have been with Jesus. May his words, which are spirit and life, dwell in us richly in all wisdom, and may the love of God be shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, given to us abundantly. Thou knowest, O Lord, our weaknesses and wants, but we entreat thee to supply all our need out of the fulness which is in Christ. Restrain our corruptions, strengthen our desires after holiness, and teach us effectually to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts. Fill us with the fruits of the Spirit, which are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, that these things being in us, and abounding, we may neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. Thou, O Lord, art our refuge and our strength. Never leave us and never forsake us. May we be led for ever in the paths of righteousness, and kept by thy mighty power through faith unto salvation. Remember, we entreat thee, in mercy our brethren of mankind. Look with compassion on the guilty and the perishing. Where sin hath abounded, may grace much more abound; and let all the ends of the earth see the salvation of our God. Be very gracious to all who are near and dear to us. Lord, bless them and keep them; may they walk in the light of thy countenance, and dwell in safety under the shadow of thy wings. Accept, gracious God, of our humble thanks for thy goodness through the day. We bless thee for that care which has again made the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice; and we pray for a deeper sense of our ever-increasing obligations to thee, the God of our lives. To thy care we commit ourselves during the night. Thou who keepest Israel, who slumberest not nor sleepest, be thou at our right hand, and we shall not be greatly moved. Encompass us with thy favour as with a shield, and be our portion for ever. And all that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXVII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS VI.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—7. The sons of the prophets had, doubtless, profited by the godly converse of Elisha, and knew the value of his company. They were convinced that his presence among them, even in the humble work of enlarging their dwelling, would be for their comfort, and speed on their business. It never hinders our work that we have committed it to God, or have men of God in our company. It was a small matter of loss when the axe head fell from the helve, but a cause of great distress to the poor borrower, who appears to have been unable to repay its value to the lender. The Lord, by condescending to work a miracle in this case, not only put honour on his servant, but has taught us to remember, that he regards our distresses however trifling, and is ready to help us.

Ver. 8—23. The blindness of the unbelieving heart is truly astonishing. If the king of Syria believed that Elisha could repeat to the king of Israel words uttered in secret at a distance, and so enable him to avoid the best concealed plots of the enemy, surely he might have been convinced that this wondrous prophet could with equal ease discover every plot against himself, and defeat it. If the prophet's servant had considered how marvellous were the communications of God to his master, he would not have fainted at the sight of the Syrians. And who can tell what armies of angels guard us unseen? Doubtless but for such a means, the devil would often prevail against us. But God must open our blind eyes before we can rejoice in the truth 'that his angel encamps around them that fear him, and delivereth them.' They had need to have good weapons and great wisdom, who fight against the servants of God. At the moment they fancy themselves sure of their prey, they may be treading on the borders of destruction. Blessed is it for them, that in the hour of their danger, they have God's Elishas to plead for them. Some throughout eternity will praise the Lord that they were interested in such an intercession.

Ver. 24—33. Sin will reduce a flourishing city to desolation, and the abuse of abundance will bring famine as a chastisement. They who riot in delicacies and think not of God, nor thank him for them, may come at last to fight for the meanest and most revolting food. Sin extinguishes maternal affection, nay, roots up maternal love from the breast. How true the word of God by Moses, that if Israel forsook the way of the law, the tender and delicate woman should be driven to feed on the infant she bore. Affliction unsanctified makes men mad. And Jehoram, under this influence, would have hurried on to murder like his father. He is desperate, but Elisha is calm and unalarmed. The king sees nothing but an empty barn floor and a dry wine vat; the prophet sees plenty at the doors. God's servants eat and are satisfied, while the servants of sin fast and are hungry. In his impiety, the king laid all the blame of Samaria's ruin on Elisha, nay, at the door of God himself. And judging that from God who sent the evil, nothing but evil would come, he, in the desperation of his impiety, determined to wait for God no longer. So do sinners mar the mercy of chastisement, and turn away from God. But blessed is the soul that waiteth for him, even in the way of his judgments.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we give thee thanks, through Jesus Christ, that we can come to thee as our gracious Father, reconciled to us by thy own dear Son, in whom thou art ever well pleased. We bless thee that we are permitted to cast all our care upon thee, for thou carest for us; and we would be encouraged, in our every distress, to apply to thee for help. When our dwelling is enlarged, and our family prospereth, we would most humbly acknowledge thee as the author of the mercy. In all our family, as well as our individual arrangements, help us to look to thee, that thou mayest direct our steps. O most gracious God, we would bow before thee in humility, and acknowledge thy kindness, in thus dealing so mercifully with poor rebels, such as we, who are continually liable to unbelief, and suspicions of thy love. Bring this root of sin to our conscience, and lead us to deplore it. Blot out its guilt in the blood of Jesus. Fulfil in us all the good pleasure of thy goodness, and a work of faith with power, that we may, as heirs of the righteousness of faith, triumph over our every sinful doubt, and joy in the comforting assurance that thou wilt never leave us, never forsake us. Blessed be thy name for the intercession of the Lord Jesus Christ. We confess that we owe our spared life and our every mercy to it. Blessed Lord, help us to wait on thee for enlarged mercies, through this intercession. And let not the abundance of our mercies lead us to forget thee. We would deplore the earthliness of our desires, and the carnality of our hearts, which lead us so often to rest in thy gifts, while we forget thee, the giver; and in as much as we, as a people, have so often in time past refused to acknowledge thy hand in our plenty, we confess that thou mightest most justly remove our plenty, and smite us with famine, yea, send enemies upon us, and besiege us in all our gates. But we pray that we may be forgiven, and that thou wouldest revive thy work in the midst of us. O destroy sin from our hearts; satisfy us with thy early mercy, and then shall we be glad, and trust in thee. Let thy name be glorified throughout the world. Let a rich blessing of the Spirit be with the preached gospel, till all the earth be filled with the knowledge of Jesus. Be with us throughout this day. Watch and guide us, and gather us around our family altar in the evening, to praise thee through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS VII. 30—60.

REMARKS.

Ver. 30—36. The Lord delays the deliverance of his people no longer than the set time. But their unbelief often protracts that delay. Forty years sooner might Israel have been set at liberty, but for unbelief. That sin had driven Moses away from his work, but he was chosen of God, and none could do the work but he. God marvellously brought him back to it, and just because he had entered into all the affliction of his people, sent a Redeemer whose word, and whose arm were irresistible. But he re-proved their proud unbelief, by sending the very deliverer they had rejected.

Ver. 37—43. All the prophets bore witness to Jesus. Moses by word, by rites and ceremonies, and by faith pointed to him. As a notable type of the Mediator, he revealed the will of God, and organized the Jewish worship. And the people of Israel by rejecting his word, and turning to their idol calf, as well as Balaam, were but too remarkable types of the daring and impious Jews, who rejected Jesus, and took to their own vain imaginations. Had the beasts offered in sacrifice, while Israel sojourned in the wilderness, and dwelt in Canaan, been any thing more than mere dead carcasses, that is, had faith looked through these victims to Jesus, then they had never turned to Moloch and Remphan. But unbelief, while it abuses the ordinances of worship, leads to corruption of them.

Ver. 44—50. The tabernacle was only a tabernacle of witness, because all its services testified of Jesus, the coming Mediator, and shadowed forth the blessings of his grace; and this tabernacle being eventually removed, showed that Stephen had not blasphemed in declaring that God would remove and destroy the temple, nay, that he had declared God's truth. For as God needeth not a temple, seeing he filleth heaven and earth, and was at first worshipped without one, it was not strange that he should utterly abolish what was useless and unnecessary. These truths the intrepid martyr would have gone on to establish and illustrate. But he was approaching the point on which they alleged he held blasphemous doctrines, and their rising wrath, only gave him opportunity to administer a sharp rebuke.

Ver. 51—60. We may here discern the boldness of faith. Undaunted by his foes, unmoved by their rage, Stephen denounced them as obstinate unbelievers, who, utterly unwarned by the fearful punishment of their fathers, were irreclaimably wedded to the same sin of unbelief. They had crucified the Lord of glory, because they had shut their ears to the voice of the law, and the testimony of the prophets. And what now could be expected of these murderers, but deeds of blood? Long had the Holy Ghost striven with them, and borne patiently with their provoking unbelief. But as their fathers had resisted till wrath came beyond remedy, so would their children. Amid the gnashing of teeth, and the towering rage of gathering enemies, the eye of the martyr was lifted up to God. And not in vain. The heaven was opened to him, and a sight of its unutterable glory revealed. Thus was God gracious in supporting the faith of his servant. It was an assurance that his soul would soon be rejoicing with his Lord. He saw and believed. To him indeed the bitterness of death was passed. The visions of glory had burst on his astonished sight, and the songs of immortal happiness were already filling his enraptured ear. And awful though it was to be broken and crushed to death, yet, when once he had commended his soul to Jesus, and like his Lord, prayed for his murderers, he quietly submitted to the stroke, and fell asleep. The saint dies not. He falls asleep in Jesus. The grave is sweet to him. It is a bed of rest; and on the morning of the resurrection, Stephen will rise from it, not crushed and broken as he lay down, but radiant in all the beauty of holiness, and vigorous in immortal strength. They only die who die in unbelief. And they die indeed; without Christ, without God, without hope; the grave to them is but the passage to everlasting death. How wondrously does God hang one event of his providence upon another! The death of Stephen opens the way for the conversion of Saul. Rejoicing in his murder, this persecutor pounced on the flock, as a young lion whose lips have first tasted blood. But the dying voice of Stephen was ringing in his ears; the martyr's last prayer sunk deep into his heart; and that voice, and that prayer, doubtless clung to his memory, till the Lord turned him to take up the noble testimony of this first of martyrs, whose indefatigable zeal, and holy eloquence, might, if spared, have equalled in their precious fruits even the work of Paul, the apostle.

PRAYER.

Almighty and most blessed Jehovah, be pleased to grant us access into thy presence, through Jesus Christ the only Mediator. We adore thee as the Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer of thy people. Thou hast formed them for thyself; they shall show forth thy praise. The foe shall not exact upon them, nor the son of mischief wrong them longer than it pleaseth thee. Grant that we being enrolled among their number may have a right to their privileges. Visit us with the pardon of all our sins. Sprinkle clean water on us and we shall be clean. Cleanse us from all our idols and vain imaginations, and make us willing to follow the Lord Jesus as our example in all things. Bring our soul out of bondage that we may praise thy name. Thou art a Spirit, and art to be worshipped in spirit and in truth. Grant us the aid of thy Holy Spirit in drawing near unto thee. May we constantly enjoy his grace, as a Spirit of supplications. And may all-directing power uphold us from mingling any impurity of our own, with thy holy worship. May the Spirit ever help us to remember, that thou art a jealous God, and canst condescend to hold communion with us sinners, only in the way of thine own appointment. And being emboldened by his might, let us bear a true testimony for thee. Let no rage of enemies, no fear of death, deter us from confessing Christ. Fill us with his spirit of devotedness to thee, and compassion to our enemies. Teach us so to live that we may at length fall asleep in Jesus. Blessed be thy name that he has made the grave a bed of rest to all his followers, and that he hath spoiled death of his sting. O may we find the grave a passage to glory, and rise at length with thy people to life everlasting. Help us to live to thee. Let our all be consecrated to thy service, and ready at thy call. Let Jesus be glorified in the spread of his truth. Revive and quicken us, O Lord, even for thy mercies' sake. Send forth thy light and thy truth in the midst of us. Turn, O speedily turn the multitudes of the careless to seek reconciliation and life from Jesus, our Lord; that our land being revived by life from on high, may send the knowledge of the Saviour to every corner of the earth. Let the kingdoms of this world speedily be one the kingdoms of the Lord, and his Christ. O have mercy on the perishing sinners of the heathen, and extend thy compassion to blinded Israel. Our country and kindred, our friends in Jesus, and all our acquaintance, we commend to thy care. Watch us through the night. Refresh us with rest, and raise us invigorated for the duties of a new day, that we may ever live to thy glory. And glory shall be thine through everlasting ages, by Jesus Christ. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM xxxiii. 18—22.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS vii.

REMARKS.

In the close of the preceding chapter we read that Samaria had, on account of its sins, been visited with a famine of peculiar severity, and that its king instead of having been truly awakened to repentance, had plotted the death of Elisha, and afterwards, relenting of his bloody purpose, had, with extreme impiety, murmured against the Lord as the author of the evil, and asserted the absurdity of hoping for any favour at his hands. It was not improbably in Elisha's presence, and in answer to Elisha's expostulation urging him to wait on Jehovah for deliverance, that he said, 'why should I wait for the Lord any longer?' And it is impossible not to observe how seasonably the riches of God's distrusted mercy were illustrated in the declaration which the prophet was commissioned instantly to give; the distinct promise of a speedy and most abundant supply, 'To-morrow about this time, shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel,' &c. It may not be unwarrantable to infer, from the circumstance of the king's not being said to have now uttered anything in reply, that he was speechless with astonishment at the unexpected rebuke which was administered to his despair, and that the reason why the attendant courtier, 'on whose hand the king leaned,' i. e. who was the highest in favour with his sovereign, (comp. 2 Kin. v. 18.) expressed himself in terms so contemptuous of the prophet's message, was his having reached a greater hardihood in unbelief and impiety than even the king himself. It is accordingly to him, as exhibiting the more daring specimen of unbelief, that our attention is now turned. For the interview between the king and the prophet, is ended by the latter's adding, to an assertion of Jehovah's promise, a denunciation of the nobleman's doom. Ver. 2. and the remainder of the chapter is occupied in relating the manner in which God's promise was fulfilled, and the nobleman's unbelief was punished.

According to human calculation, it would unquestionably seem that the nobleman was right, that into the thickly encompassed city no provisions could enter unless God should send them miraculously from above. But what things are impossible with men are possible with him who hath all the hearts of man and all the elements of nature under his control.

There were four lepers, who, by virtue of a particular statute (Lev. xiii. 46.) of the Mosaic law, (which the apostate and idolatrous Israelites were, for their own convenience, careful still to enforce), had their dwelling without the range of the other habitations, at the outside of one of the city's gates, suffering severely, perhaps because of their separated situation, more severely than the rest of the citizens, they resolved to cast themselves upon the mercy of the Syrians, thinking that they might be better and could not be worse. Ver. 4. 'If they save us alive, we shall live; and if they kill us, we die.' When, however, they with such singular designs reached the Syrian camp, they found it utterly deserted, and the enemy fled; the cause was no less extraordinary than the discovery of the Syrians' disappearance. Ver. 6, 7. Just about the very time (comp. 5. and 7.) that the lepers were preparing to leave the city's gate, had there spread throughout the Syrian host an impression that they heard the noise as of a vast army rapidly approaching; concluding that this was some of Israel's powerful confederates brought to surprise them by a combined attack, they lost all confidence and fled without a moment's delay, so that when the lepers arrived at the outskirts of the camp, they had left it far behind. These after regaling themselves out of the profusion that was found in the hastily deserted tents, returned to the gate of the city, and by means of the only officers to whom they had access, communicated the tidings to the king. Ver. 10, 11. From his mind a timidity and suspicion of Syrian stratagem, which faith in Elisha's prediction might have prevented, had first to be removed by actual and skilful survey. Ver. 12—15. And the spoil of the hostile camp was brought into the city, and found a sufficient supply for the people's wants. Thus by the inscrutable providence of Jehovah directing the fears and feelings of the human heart, was the promise fulfilled. A glorious example to us that we never distrust his power; a glorious encouragement, that we may have confidence and assure our hearts, that notwithstanding all apparent difficulties, he will supply all his people's wants according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus.

The prophet's threatening was no less signally executed on the unbelieving nobleman. Ver. 17—20. While discharging the duty to which, on account of the high station he had been appointed, viz. 'to keep charge of the gate, i. e. to suppress any disorder that might arise from the impetuosity of the people, he was overwhelmed and killed by the pressure of the eager and inconsiderate crowd. Thus 'it fell out unto him,' as the prophet had foretold; 'he saw it with his eyes, but did not eat thereof.' A true and melancholy type of the final destruction of every unbeliever. For 'every eye shall see' the Saviour coming in his glory, (Rev. i. 7.) but how many without tasting of the blessedness which they did not believe that he could bestow, or that they refused to accept at his hands. How fearfully correct a verification of the denunciation, 'Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. We bless thee for having revealed thyself as reconciling the world unto thyself in Christ Jesus, and for having invited and encouraged us to draw near to thee as our Father and our God. We have sinned and done iniquity in thy sight; we have sinned against the mercies of thy providence, the invitations and privileges of thy grace, the light and liberty and glory of the gospel day. What manner of love then, O Lord, is this, that thou shouldest still be willing to pardon; that thou shouldest even now permit us to approach unto thy presence, and encourage us to pour out our souls in supplication, by the assurance that we have an advocate at thy right hand, and that whatsoever we ask in his name thou wilt not refuse to bestow. And what monstrous iniquity is this, that we should be distrustful of thy promises and of thy love, and hesitate to place our confidence and to seek our enjoyment in thee, the God of our salvation. Take then away from us the evil heart of unbelief. Remove the doubts and fears and all the enmity of our deceitful hearts. Enable us to behold thy glory in the face of Jesus, and then to discern the steadfastness of thy love and the fullness of thy promises. May we walk by faith on the Son of God, and thus be strengthened and purified to yield ourselves obedient to thy holy will, yea, even to yield our bodies a living sacrifice to thee, holy and acceptable, through Jesus Christ. Through this day to the light of which thou hast in thy mercy brought us, do thou guide and strengthen us by thy grace, that all which we do we may do to thy glory, that in all the duties and intercourse of life we may adorn the doctrine of our Lord and Saviour. Suffer not thy fear to depart from our hearts, and take not thy Holy Spirit away from us. Make us strong to resist all temptation, watchful and prayerful, that we do not enter into it. Sanctify us wholly, and keep us in soul, body, and spirit, unto the glorious appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ. And all that we ask is for his sake. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LX. 1—4.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS VIII. 1—25.

REMARKS.

After Stephen's lifeless body had been left lying without the city, on the very spot where he had expired, some 'devout men,' i. e. foreign Jews, who, like the martyr, had believed in Christ, came and carried him away to burial, amidst severe lamentation and mourning. To this act, impressive testimony though it was against his murderers, the Jews seem to have made no opposition, because, perhaps, they did not feel themselves altogether secure against the interference of the Romans, who did not allow them to put any man to death, and because, at all events, (ver. 1.) there was at this time 'a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem,' and they found full occupation for their eager hands in searching out and harassing the surviving disciples. This was the first general persecution against the Christian church. Saul, the future apostle of the Gentiles, was at this time in Jerusalem, and with both great talents and great zeal directed to the interests of the pharisees, was not improbably one of the Cilicians who had disputed with Stephen, (chap. vi. 9.) as he certainly was one of the most cordial in afterwards pronouncing his death, and now one of the most conspicuous in carrying on the persecution. The immediate effect of the persecution was the dispersion of the believers, 'except,' as so expressly stated, 'except the apostles,' who, obedient to the Saviour's command, and confident in his protection, abode in Jerusalem. But the consequence of this dispersion was the more extensive propagation of the gospel; so that the persecution that sought the destruction of the church, contributed effectually to its increase and extension. Thus in the first, as in many subsequent persecutions, 'the Lord made the wrath of man to praise him.'

Of the many disciples who were scattered abroad preaching the gospel, the sacred writer particularizes one, whose ministry was abundantly successful, and was, besides, signalized by some extraordinary occurrences. This was Philip, one of the seven deacons, (see chap. vi.) he went to the city Samaria, which had probably, by reason of the strong antipathy still existing between its inhabitants and the Jews, (see John iv. 9.) been heretofore separated more than any town in Judea from the knowledge of the apostles' preaching; and by his doctrine, which they readily received, and by his miracles, to which they eagerly resorted, he diffused great joy through that city. There was at this time in Samaria, one Simon (commonly called Simon Magus), a sorcerer, who had obtained an immense influence over the people, and had come to be universally regarded among them as invested with divine power. But when Simon saw that the gospel made progress, that, notwithstanding the ascendancy which he had hitherto had, the people now gave heed to Philip, he adopted what seemed the most likely cause for the maintaining of his influence, joined the general movement, professed himself too to be a believer in Christ, and submitted to receive the ordinance of baptism. In the meantime the apostles heard that 'Samaria had received the word of God,' and as the power of conferring on others miraculous gifts was confined to them, they sent two of their number, viz. Peter and John, to confirm the Samaritan converts, and to impart to them the same gifts with which the Jewish believers had been endued. This was the occasion of Simon's displaying the hidden baseness of his soul, and helping to prove that baptism, even when administered by the hands of truly apostolic men, was not inseparably connected, far less identified, with the inward grace of which it is the sign. For 'when he saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands, the Holy Ghost was given,' so that miraculous gifts were conferred—for saving grace had been previously received by the Samaritan believers, and besides it is never said to have been communicated by the laying on of hands—'he offered them money' if they would impart to him the same power which themselves had, the power of enabling others to work miracles. Had the apostles been guided by common worldly policy, they would have overlooked the impiety of this proposal, and upon any terms sought to secure his influence on their side. But animated by the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom, and directed by the Spirit of truth, they rather faced all the danger that could arise from the opposition of one who was regarded as 'the great power of God.' Peter accordingly, in terms that might express the guiltiness of such a proposal, and the awful danger of an unconverted soul, reproved the sorcerer's hypocrisy, predicted his perdition, (ver. 20.) and exhorted him to repentance and prayer, as the only means by which his own doom might be averted, and his sins forgiven.

PRAYER.

Holy and ever blessed Father, we present ourselves before thee, in our Saviour's name, to bless thee for the mercies and the love with which thou hast crowned us this day, and to confess and mourn the many sins of which, in heart, and speech, and behaviour, we have been guilty. Our own hearts condemn us. How much more must we be condemned by thee, who art greater than our hearts, and knowest all things, knowest our most secret sins, and seest them to be more vile and abominable than we can fancy. Blessed be thy name, that there is hope concerning this, that there is forgiveness with thee, and plenteous redemption. O then that thou wouldst regard all our sins as borne by our Saviour in his own body on the tree, that thou wouldst regard us as separated for ever from their guilt, and as clothed with the robe of the Redeemer's righteousness, and with the garments of his salvation. And to us, as united to the person of thy well-beloved Son, do thou show thy favour, and largely impart thy Spirit. Give us grace that we may perfect holiness in thy fear, and walk in that glorious liberty of thy children to which all thy people are advanced. To us, and to thy whole church and people, do thou overrule, as in times past, the dealings of thy providence for good, for the establishment of thy saints in faith and holiness, and for the enlargement and increase of thy kingdom. Remove all the darkness that rests upon the church's prospects, and all the unfaithfulness, and hypocrisy, and slothfulness that are to be found within her pale. Enable thy people to possess their hearts in confidence, that over all the distress and perplexity of nations, thou wilt bring in the glory of the latter days, and establish the kingdom that shall be given to the saints of the Most High. Bless our native land. Give all grace and true wisdom to our sovereign, to our rulers, and senators, that by thy favour we may be preserved from those sins that shall ruin, and those judgments that shall overtake so many kingdoms of the earth. Bless abundantly the ministers of the everlasting gospel, especially those who have been sent forth to heathen lands; endow them with all strength and wisdom, and make them instrumental in hastening on the time when the dark places of the earth shall smile as the garden of the Lord. And now, O Lord, ourselves, and our friends, all our interests and cares, we would in faith and love commit to thee. Let thy hand be on us for good during this night, and let thy presence be with us during our whole lives, and let all our prayers be answered, according to thy riches in glory, by Christ Jesus. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXII. 25—28.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS VIII.

REMARKS.

In this chapter we have various narratives:

1. The Shunammite who, in a former part of Elisha's history, (see chap. iv.) had occupied a very honourable place, is again exhibited as the object of the especial love and careful providence of God. (vi. 6.) For, while a famine of unprecedented duration was about to be sent upon the still impenitent Israelites, she was forewarned by the prophet of the approaching calamity, and directed to seek a place of temporary sojourn beyond the limits within which it was to prevail, beyond the once smiling land of Israel. And when the seven years of its continuance were fulfilled, and she went in to the king to entreat the restoration of her possessions, that during her absence seem to have been usurped by others, providence had so ordered that the king was listening with somewhat changed disposition to Gehazi's recital of Elisha's miracles, and of that one miracle, in particular, of which she and her son were eminently the subjects. Her appearance at the very moment when the king's feelings were interested in her history, determined the success of her appeal; and thus it illustrates to all succeeding ages the minute care with which God watches the steps and directs the fortunes of his people. Nor let it be forgotten that the first mention which scripture makes of this highly favoured among women regards her kindness to the prophet, and that to this are referable all the blessing and the honour wherewith she was subsequently enriched. 'He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward.'

2. From ver. 7—15. we read of the manner in which Hazael, according to a former announcement, ascended the throne of Syria, the inveterate enemy of Israel. Upon the occasion of Elisha's journeying to Damascus, Ben-hadad, who was at that time sick, sent to him, evidently through a superstitious awe of his mysterious power, inquiring, 'Shall I recover of this disease?' The prophet plainly foretold the king's death, and also Hazael's exaltation to the throne, and his enormous wickedness against the children of Israel, ver. 12. Hazael, who knew but little of his own heart, expressed his detestation of the very idea of his doing 'this great thing,' and then, with a treachery and cruelty that have too often marked the friendships that are formed upon worldly interests, and cemented by worldly principles, went home, and after deceiving his royal master with a false account of the prophet's answer, coolly and basely murdered him—hastened his predicted death, and reigned in his stead.

3. We have an account of Jehoram's wicked reign over Judah, ver. 16—24. His wickedness is expressly ascribed to the connection that he formed with the house of Ahab, ver. 18. The influence of his father's godly example and pious counsel was utterly extinguished by the ill-chosen companionships of his youth. His sins, though they did not shake God's immutable promise, nor countervail his regard for 'David his servant,' (ver. 19.) were followed, if not with the destruction, at least with the diminution of his kingdom, and thus involved not himself only but his subjects also in this punishment, a memorable lesson to 'pray for kings and all that are in authority, that we under them may lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and true honesty.'

4. He was succeeded by Ahaziah, his son, by whom the evil example of his father was too truly copied, and the baleful spirit of Ahab's house too truly imbibed, ver. 25—29. As he sinned, so he perished by reason of his connection and confederacy with that apostate and wicked family. For after uniting with them in unsuccessful war against Hazael, the king of Syria, he went down to visit his guilty friend and ally, who had been wounded in the battle, and was, along with him, smitten and slain by Jehu, (see next chapter.) 'Those who partake with sinners in their sins, must expect to partake with them also in their plagues.'—Henry.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, impress deeply upon our minds all the lessons of thy blessed word, that they may be profitable to us for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, that our lives may be guided by thy law, and our hearts moulded by thy truth. Open thou our eyes that we may see the wonders of thy law, and that we may see the vileness of our own hearts. Turn away our eyes from viewing vanity, and keep us from listening to the counsel, and from joining in the company of the ungodly. May we set thee continually before us, and may thy fear ever abide in our hearts. Establish in us thy kingdom, which is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; and enable us to be as living epistles of Christ Jesus, known and read of all men. O that we may walk worthy of our high calling as sons of God, and that we may have thy Holy Spirit abiding within us, the living witness of thy love, the mighty agent of thy grace to our souls. We desire to remember before thee all our friends and relatives; all the children of affliction, both those that are thy children, and those that know not where true comfort is to be obtained. In thy love and mercy, O Lord, do thou pity and bless them with thy grace. Preserve the young from the snares of error and of sin. Enable their parents to keep in mind their solemn engagements to train up their offspring as the heirs of the promises, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Put into the hearts of all masters, and teachers, and governors, to watch for the souls of those who are committed to their charge, that they may approve themselves unto thee the Lord. Let judgment run down as a stream, and righteousness as a mighty river. May the voice of rejoicing and salvation be in every tabernacle. O Lord, incline thine ear and hear. O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for thine own sake, O our God; for all our hope and confidence are in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 43—48.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS VIII. 26—40.

REMARKS.

Philip had formerly been led by the dealings of divine providence into Samaria, where his ministry was so marvellously blessed; and now, by a special message from God, communicated through the instrumentality of an angel, is he directed to what proved a scene of still more peculiar interest. Mark the firmness of Philip's faith, the readiness of his obedience. Though left ignorant of the reason of the command, and of the object for which he was sent, and only told of the place to which he was to go, viz. 'to the way that goeth down from Jerusalem to Gaza, which' way 'is desert,' i. e. is through the wilderness of Judah, he hesitated not to 'arise and go,' and therein set before us an example that though we see not the propriety of a particular command, yet it is ours stedfastly to obey, assured that God will in due time vindicate his own wisdom, and reward our diligence in his service. For behold the speedy reward with which Philip's obedience is crowned.

It was provided in the Mosaic law that proselytes, or those of other nations who should join themselves to the Israelites, as the only worshippers of the true God, might have access to the temple services, and might acceptably observe the ordinances of Jehovah. Of these, one is here mentioned as having been at Jerusalem, (perhaps upon occasion of one of the great annual festivals,) and as now returning to his own country by the very road which Philip had been directed to take. Instructed anew by a revelation of the Holy Ghost, Philip drew near to address himself to the unknown traveller, and found one whom, though by birth a stranger to the family of Israel, even the lips into which 'grace was poured' might have pronounced 'an Israelite indeed.' For zeal for the worship of God, which neither the distance of his country from the holy hill, nor the greatness of his worldly rank, nor the cares of his official station (ver. 27.) could countervail, was not the only grace by which his character was beautified. By the kindred, the no less essential feature, delight in the word of God, the existence of the divine life in his soul is unequivocally manifested; for while he travels homewards in his chariot, his vacant time (which, alas, in the case of many professing Christians, any thing rather than the Bible is allowed to occupy, because then any thing rather than an irksome task is fit to be resorted to) is spent in reading 'the book of the prophet Esaias.' And when Philip, after having come near and heard him reading, (for even at the present day, people in the east, though reading to themselves, speak aloud, so that they can be easily heard by persons at a distance,) asked him, 'Understandest thou what thou readest?' his humility was attractively portrayed. He confessed his ignorance, his inability to unravel the dark passages of scripture. He asked Philip to sit beside him, and submitted himself to his instructions. When, therefore, Philip preached Christ to him, and therein set the seal of inspiration to the Christian interpretation of the prophecy that he expounded, (viz. Isaiah liii.) the word was sown in a good, and honest, and well-prepared heart; and there is no wonder that the abundant fruit should have instantly appeared, that, proficient all at once in the knowledge of Christ and of his institutions, he should have desired to be baptized into his name. Nor need we wonder that Philip did not hesitate to administer to him the sacred ordinance, beyond requiring as an indispensable preliminary, a declaration of his believing the truths that he had heard. Accordingly, availing themselves of the neighbouring water, the sight of which seems to have suggested to the Ethiopian his request, they alighted from the chariot, 'went down both to the water,' (for be it carefully observed the words 'into' and 'out of,' (ver 38, 39.) which have often been alleged as implying baptism by immersion, would with equal correctness be rendered here, as they are often rendered elsewhere, 'to' and 'from,') and there, in the observance of the holy sacrament, consummated and closed their Christian fellowship on earth. For now, the object of Philip's having been brought hither being accomplished, the Spirit, by miracle, 'caught him away,' and carried him to other scenes and other duties, (ver. 40.) so that 'the eunuch saw him no more.' Thus ended their most singular and profitable interview. Scripture does not inform us with what feelings the Ethiopian, bearing the new name of Christian, was welcomed back again amongst his friends, nor how, with his more enlightened views, he carried himself in his courtly station, and amongst his idolatrous countrymen; but it beautifully follows up the description of his character that it had already given, by showing that, in addition to the humility and godliness of his previous history, he now enjoyed the 'glorious liberty' of the gospel day; that as heretofore his life and conversation had been worthy of God's revealed word, so now they were worthy of the Saviour in whom he had believed, ver. 39. For though his kind and heaven-sent instructor had been suddenly and mysteriously taken from his side, he neither murmured nor mourned, but 'went on his way,' as a confirmed disciple of Christ, 'whom indeed he had not seen, but in whom believing he rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory.'

PRAYER.

Most holy Father, enable us, in drawing nigh to thee at the close of another week, to humble ourselves because of all the sins that throughout its course we have committed, and all the unthankfulness and unworthiness wherewith we are chargeable. In the multitude of our thoughts within us, how seldom have we cherished thoughts of thee! and in the midst of all our enjoyments, how little have we sought to enjoy thy favour, and thy fellowship, and thy presence! Our iniquities we cannot reckon up before thee; they have gone up over our heads; they reach even to the heavens; and were it not that thy mercy endureth for ever, we must long ere now have been consumed. Look now upon us, we entreat thee, in the face of thine Anointed. And, as thou givest us the near prospect of another day of Christian privilege and holy rest, preserve us unto it, and prepare us for it. Let thy Holy Spirit come with power into our hearts, to restrain our worldly thoughts, to crucify our sinful affections, to awaken new delights in thy word, and new desires towards thy courts. To us and to all our friends grant that thy day that draweth on, may be a day of the power and glory of the Saviour. Bless all thy ministering servants throughout the church, that they may be directed to seasonable words, and that they may be enabled to preach them affectionately, and purely, and successfully. Feed thy church every where, that it languish not. Refresh thy heritage, and that right early. Hasten the time when, throughout the whole world, thy sabbaths shall be hallowed, and in every tongue, and by every family of men, thy worship shall be acceptably celebrated. Hasten the time when thine ancient people shall be built up into the one spiritual temple of the Holy Ghost, and shall enter into the enjoyment of Christian privileges and saving grace. May we ever be found rejoicing in the hope of that blessed time when the knowledge of thee shall cover the earth, and of that glorious day when the number of the elect shall be completed, and the marriage of the Lamb shall have come. Unto which do thou give us to look and haste, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

TWENTY-FIFTH WEEK.SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVII. 7, &c.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXVII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1. In trouble, and more especially in spiritual trouble, prayer is the only effectual resource, and it is one which, if we rightly betake ourselves to it, never fails. Ver. 2. In order to success in prayer, importunity and perseverance are requisite: a refusing to be comforted by any thing short of an answer in peace. Ver. 3, 4. So long as God sees meet to withhold his countenance, spiritual trouble is increased by the remembrance of him. Ver. 5—7. A day of adversity ought to be a day of calm consideration, of serious reflection upon the ways of God in ancient times, upon former seasons of spiritual rejoicing, and also a time of careful self-examination. Ver. 7—9. Even the people of God are sometimes, in a day of distress, and under apprehensions of spiritual desertion, tempted to indulge hard thoughts of him and of his ways. Ver. 10. But, by persevering in prayer, they are brought to acknowledge that such thoughts originate in their own weakness: for that all changes in providence are in accordance with the unchangeable nature and perfections of him who is the Most High. Ver. 11, 12. That the distrustful influence of this infirmity may be most effectually averted by meditating upon the ways of him who, even in seasons of deepest depression, hath in all generations shown himself to be the dwelling-place of his people. Ver. 13. That the dealings of God are all in holiness, and can be traced only by those unfeignedly desirous to acquiesce in his will. Ver. 14. While, at the same time, they are all regulated by a power that is irresistible. Ver. 15—18. The redemption wrought out for the children of Israel, when groaning under severe and relentless bondage, the various impressive circumstances in which the hand of the Almighty was manifested in that redemption, proved that he was both able and willing to deliver them from enemies more and mightier than they. Ver. 19, 20. Though darkness may for a time seem to compass his ways, when the appointed season of deliverance arrives he can raise up instruments for accomplishing his gracious purposes.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Let the people of God, in all their trials and afflictions, approach a throne of grace, by the new and living way opened up for them into the holiest of all. Let them not cease to stretch out their hands, and to pour out their hearts, until they are warranted to conclude that God hath given ear to their voice. When thoughts of God cause trouble, when by continued complaining the spirit is overwhelmed, sleep banished from the eyes, and the tongue unable to express its griefs, let us review his ways in former times. Let us remember that it has not been always thus with us; that though we may think we have cause for complaint now, we have formerly had cause of rejoicing. In communing with our own hearts, let us inquire how we have improved seasons of communion with God, and diligently search out in ourselves, where alone they can be found, the causes of their interruption. Let us ascribe to our own weakness, to our partial and limited views, any disposition to question the mercy and the faithfulness of our gracious God. Assured that he is the same yesterday and to-day and for ever, let us look back, let us examine the records of his providence and of his grace, and there we shall perceive abundant illustrations of the truth, that although the time of deliverance may seem protracted, he is assuredly a present help in time of trouble. And if the mind of a pious Israelite was soothed in the depths of spiritual distress, and enabled to overcome his despairing fears and unbelieving doubts, by dwelling upon the redemption of his fathers from the land of Egypt, let us, in similar circumstances, look to that redemption announced in the gospel; a redemption from an evil far more extensive and lasting than that under which Israel groaned, and effected by means unspeakably more astonishing. And meditating upon this doing of the Lord, so marvellous in our eyes, let us, in all our adversities, rest in the assurance that he who spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, will, with him, also freely give us all things.

PRAYER.

Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion, and unto thee shall the vow be paid. O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come. We, the monuments of thy sparing mercy, would, on the morning of this thy holy day, desire to bow at the footstool of thy throne. We bless thee, that by the return of the Christian sabbath, the instituted memorial of our Redeemer's triumph over death and the grave, we are reminded that thou, the Sovereign of the universe, art seated upon a throne of mercy and grace—that, well pleased with thy beloved Son, thou beholdest with a pleasant countenance all who come unto thee by him, as the propitiation for sin through faith in his blood,—that thou art reconciling the world unto thyself, not imputing unto men their trespasses. On him we would place all our dependence for pardon, for reconciliation, and life. See, O God, our shield, look on the face of thine Anointed. For his sake take away all our iniquity, heal our backslidings, love us freely, receive us graciously. May thy Spirit take of the things that are Christ's, and show them to us in all their suitableness to the wants and weaknesses of our immortal souls, so as that we may esteem him as all our salvation, and as all our desire. Impart unto us more full and realizing views of thy glory in the face of Christ. In him and in his cross may we see mercy and truth meeting together, righteousness and peace embracing each other. When temptations assail us, when fears depress us, when led to question thy promises and grace, may we be enabled to meditate upon thy doings, and may thy Spirit so guide our meditations, that we may be victorious over every spiritual foe; that we may be prepared to acquiesce in thy will in all things, both in doing and in suffering. May thy ways and thy words be the subject of our attention on this thy holy day, and may our meditation of thee be sweet. We would, in a more especial manner, entreat thee to be with us when we go to thy house of prayer, and to make us joyful in thy presence. Do thou, who appointedst leaders for thine ancient people, and didst qualify them for their work, be with thy ministering servant who is on this day to guide our devotions. May he come forth in the fullness of the power of the gospel of Christ; and while the treasure is only in earthen vessels, may the power and the excellency be of thee. Accompany with thy blessing the preaching of the gospel throughout this and all lands. Accept of our thanksgiving for the goodness thou hast hitherto made to pass before us. We bless thee for the mercies of the past night and this morning, and for the comfortable circumstances in which we now appear before thee. Pardon all our sins and vouchsafe to us an answer in peace, for the sake of Christ Jesus our Lord and only Redeemer. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVIII. 14.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXVIII. 1—24.

REMARKS.

In order to our profiting by any communication, it is necessary that we diligently attend to it, and upon such diligent attention, the communications made to us regarding the ways and works of God, have peculiarly strong claims. The appointment of God is, that one generation shall praise his works to another; the command is, that they to whom his will is revealed should teach it diligently to their children; that, while praising God, they unfold to them the ground of their praises; instruct them in the meaning of the services they render; that the revelation originally made might be transmitted in all its fullness and purity to succeeding generations. It is incumbent upon all to whom the word of God is preached, to receive it in faith, that they may profit thereby. And when instructed in these truths ourselves, and when experiencing their quickening, their sanctifying, and their peace-giving influences, let us in the spirit in which the apostle said, 'would to God that all men were as I am,' be ready to embrace every opportunity of imparting these truths to such as are ignorant of them. Heads of families ought in a peculiar manner to regard it as their duty thus to act; to view the divine command to Israel of old as still addressed to themselves, Deut. vi. 6—9. In unfolding these truths they ought to endeavour to set them in such a light as to present, to their offspring, the strong encouragement they have to set their hope in him who is the Rock of ages, and to impress upon them the necessity of remembering his works, and keeping his commandments, if they would preserve and cherish that hope. The perversity and backslidings of God's ancient people, ought to be proposed as beacons, warning all of the danger of such a conduct; that, by avoiding it, they may not expose themselves to a like punishment. Many and impressive were the manifestations of the divine power and compassion shown in behalf of Israel of old, in delivering them from enemies more and mightier than they, and in making a continued provision for their support during their journey to the land of promise. Yet of all these they often lost sight; often warned, and often punished, they heeded not the warnings, they forgot the punishments, and turned again after folly. We, more highly favoured than they, were delivered by means far more wonderful, from a bondage more oppressive and during. Furnished with all we need as travellers, not to an earthly heritage, but to a city which hath foundations, of which God is the maker and the builder, let us beware of contracting a still more aggravated guilt by the abuse of such mercies. Esteeming him who is that bread which cometh down from heaven, as all our salvation, and all our desire, let our daily prayer be, 'Lord, evermore give us this bread,' and our daily endeavour to live as nourished thereby. Relying upon that rock, which is Christ, let us drink of the water he gives, that we may never thirst, but that the water which he gives may be in us a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

PRAYER.

Unto thee, O Lord, we, on the evening of this thy holy day, would desire to lift up our souls. We bless thee that thou hast established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel; that we have thy word as a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path. We bless thee that therein thou hast revealed thyself as in Christ Jesus reconciling the world to thyself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; as having provided, for those who were perishing, a remedy, wonderful in its nature, and complete in its efficacy, and in its extent, as having laid our help upon One who is mighty. May that Spirit, who teacheth all things, yea, even the deep things of God, open our eyes to behold wondrous things out of thy law. May we be brought to feel that it is indeed quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and that it is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. By that Spirit may we be enabled to apply it faithfully to our consciences, to our hearts and lives. Examine us, O God, and try us, and see if there be in us any evil way; that, convinced of sin, feeling that it is not in ourselves to direct our own steps, and that if tried by that law we could not appear in hope at the tribunal of a holy and heart-searching judge, we may resort to the Rock that is higher than we; that regarding thy name, thy perfections so wondrously manifested in the gospel of thy grace, as a strong tower, we may be enabled so to betake ourselves thither, as to share in spiritual and everlasting safety. For these ends follow with thy rich and effectual blessing the exercises in which we have on this day been engaged. May the truths we have read or heard from thy word be deeply impressed upon our hearts. May we hide them there that we may not sin against thee. May it be our daily endeavour to direct the attention of those with whom thou hast blessed us, and of all to whom our influence extends, to these important truths, that they may not forget thee, but may ever keep thy commandments, that there may be a seed to do service to thee when we shall be gathered to our fathers. Pardon, O Lord, the sins of our holy things, whatever thou hast on this day seen amiss in any part of our conduct. Enable us more habitually to realize thy holy presence, and ever to worship and serve thee, who art a spirit, in spirit and in truth. Follow with thy blessing the preaching of the gospel throughout the church, and hasten the time when the privileges we have this day enjoyed, and the hopes we are permitted to cherish, shall be extended to those who are still in darkness, and in the region and shadow of death. May all our friends be interested in thy favour, which is life, and in thy loving kindness, which is better than life. Visit in mercy all the sons and daughters of affliction, all who are in distress, in mind, in body, or in outward estate. Sanctify the be-reaving dispensations of thy providence to such as are visited by them. Accept of our thanksgivings for the mercies of this day of the Son of Man. Watch over us throughout the coming night; and if it be thy will that we should awake to the light of a new day, enable us to carry out with us into the world, in all their practical influence, the principles and the feelings by which we have this day professed to be actuated. Pardon our sins, and hear and answer us in mercy, for the sake of Christ Jesus, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVII. 34, &c.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS IX.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The powers that be are ordained of God, and when they abuse the authority with which they are invested, he casteth down one and raiseth another up. The commissioned servants of God are not to be deterred from executing their commission, by the dangers to which they may be exposed, nor by the reproaches thrown out against them, while at the same time they may use all means consistent with their duty, for ensuring their safety. Ver. 23—26. God hath declared that he will visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children; in his providence, the visitation often visibly corresponds to the sin; whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. The covetous heart of Ahab had prompted him to obtain possession of Naboth's vineyard by injustice and murder, and in that vineyard the slain body of his son was cast, according to the word of the Lord by Elijah. Ver. 27—29. They who are associated with the wicked in their evil courses may expect to be involved in their fate. Ver. 30, 31. At the approach of danger the wicked are sometimes wont to rest delusive hopes upon former dispensations of providence, in no way applicable to their own case. Thus did Jezebel conclude that Jehu, commissioned by God, would be cut off as the traitorous Zimri had been. Ver. 32, 33. When such rulers as abuse their power are overtaken by reverses, those who, in the day of prosperity, had been their most submissive flatterers, are ready to turn their hands against them, and to aid in their destruction. Ver. 34, &c. The purpose of him whose counsel shall stand, cannot be affected by any of the actings of man. The direction of Jehu, to pay to the lifeless body of Jezebel those honours to which her rank entitled her, was at variance with what the Lord had spoken by Elijah, of Ahab and his family, (1 Kings xxi. 23—24.) In a very short time after her death this threatening was executed, and in its execution Jehu acknowledged the word of the Lord.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

'I have seen,' says the Psalmist, 'the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree. Yet he passed away; and, lo, he was not. Yea, I sought him, but he could not be found.' A striking illustration of these words is presented to us in this chapter. Two wicked kings, and a queen, who surpassed them in wickedness, had long been the scourge of a guilty land, were removed by an agent, raised up by God, and specially authorised to that work. From the recorded judgments of God let us learn righteousness. By his terrors denounced against the wicked, and executed at the appointed time, let all be persuaded to turn to the Lord, to serve him in righteousness, to join trembling with their mirth. He is the Lord, he changeth not; unchangeable in holiness and infinite in power now, to hate and to punish all iniquity, as in the case of Israel of old. And as he is no respecter of persons, what he hates and punishes in those in exalted stations, exposes to a similar hatred and punishment those in the lowest condition. Their sins are ever exposing to his wrath all who disregard his law and its sanctions, and those with whom they are connected. Their sins shall assuredly find them out. Let us all then stand in awe and guard against sin. Let us search and try ourselves, and see if there be in us any evil way. Let us rely upon the promised aid of the Spirit of God, in this self-examination. Let us, in particular, beware of braving the judgments of God, of seeking peace in the paths of sin, or in the society of the wicked. Let us, by these, be constrained to humble ourselves under the mighty hand of him who promises to exalt in due time all who do so.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we adore thee as not only holy in hating, but as also just in punishing sin; as a consuming fire to all workers of iniquity; who hast declared that there is no peace to the wicked. Ever bearing in mind, that what was written aforetime was written for our learning, may these views of thy nature and perfections, set before us in the portion of thy word we have now been permitted to read, be deeply impressed upon our hearts. Write, O God, we beseech thee, that perfect law of thine upon our hearts. Aid us by thy Spirit in all our endeavours to avail ourselves of it as a lamp unto our feet, and a light unto our path. Give us grace to cherish those principles by which we have so lately, on thy day, and in the services of thy sanctuary, professed to be actuated. May we carry them along with us to the business of life; by these may we be influenced in all the duties to which, in the course of thy providence, we may be called, and in all the trials and temptations to which we may be exposed; that thus letting our light shine before men, they may take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus, and may thus be led to glorify thee, our Father in heaven. May we ever live as disciples of Jesus, in whose teachings we have so clear illustrations of the purity and extent of thy holy law, and in whose sufferings we see mercy and truth meeting together, righteousness and peace embracing each other, the impressive punishment of sin, and at the same time, a way into the holiest of all opened up for us who had sinned. We would come to thee by this way, we would esteem an interest in a once crucified, but now glorified Redeemer, as all our salvation, and as all our desire. We would call upon our souls, and all that is within us, to bless and magnify thy holy name, who hast visited us in our low and lost estate, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us. We would adore the condescension and the grace of him who, although he was rich, became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich. And O may thy Spirit take of the things that are Christ's and show them unto us, that, exercising a believing dependence upon him, we may ever feel the constraining influence of his unparalleled love; leading us thus to judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them. May we ever live by his law, and uniformly walk in his footsteps. Beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, may we be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord. May we follow him through good report and through bad report, that as he was raised from the dead by the glory of thee, the Father, we also may walk before thee in newness of life. May we have grace so to live by faith in him now, that when he shall appear we may have confidence, and may not be ashamed before him at his coming. We bless thee, O Lord, for the mercies of the past night, and of this morning. Give us grace to walk in thy fear all the day long. Prosper us in all our lawful pursuits; may we be diligent in business, acknowledging thee in all our ways, and looking up to thee for direction in all our paths, relying upon thy grace amidst all the temptations that may assail us. Pardon our sins, and hear us in mercy, for the sake of thy Son, our only Lord and Redeemer. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XL. 1.

SCRIPTURE—Acts ix. 1—22.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1, 2. The determined hostility of this youthful persecutor to the cause of Christ, and the activity of his pharasaical zeal, to extirpate by the most severe measures, all who believed in Jesus, are here emphatically described by the inspired historian. Ver. 3, 4. In such a conduct were the words of the Saviour verified, John xvi. 2. The Redeemer is sometimes found of such as seek him not, and when all ordinary means fail, can cause his voice to be heard, and his authority to be acknowledged, by such as are vessels of mercy. Ver. 5. The injuries done to his people, he reckons as done to himself; 'why persecutest thou me?' Opposition to the cause of Christ, while it must prove unavailing, since the gates of hell cannot prevail against his church, must always aggravate both the guilt and the misery of those by whom it is offered. Ver. 6. When the heart of the awakened penitent is truly impressed, he will resort for direction to him who is the only way, and the truth, and the life. The progress of the work which extraordinary means have begun, will be left to those which are ordinary to advance and to perfect. Ver. 9. Serious meditation, in abstraction from the world and its indulgences, is the most suitable exercise for those whose eyes have been opened to a sense of their sinfulness, and of their need of a Saviour. Ver. 10—12. He who in his power and grace begins a good work in any, makes provision for carrying it on. Ver. 13, 14. The people of Christ, while called to be faithful unto the death, are not unnecessarily to expose themselves to danger. Ver. 15, 16. While that in which they apprehend danger, is often, when all the circumstances are known, a work in which they will experience comfort and joy. Ver. 17. Prompt obedience to the commands of the Saviour, is the duty of all his people. They whose hearts have been enlarged, will run in the way of the divine commandments; and with peculiar alacrity ought they to run, who are honoured as bearers of a message of mercy to their fellow-men. Ver. 18. Having, in the gift of the Holy Ghost, received the thing signified, the sign thereof was administered. Ver. 19. Intercourse with the people of Christ, in which we may benefit by their experience, is a fit preparation for the work to which any of his people may be called. Personal experience of the sufficiency of Christ as a Saviour, is the most essential qualification in all who would speak in his name; and where this is, the word spoken from the heart, may, through the divine blessing, be expected to prove effectual in the conviction and conversion of the hearers.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Seeing, in the conduct of the persecuting Saul, a striking illustration of the deceitfulness of sin, that he, although zealous for the law and the prophets, resisted all evidence of the divine mission of him to whom they bear witness; that, while glorying in his descent from Abraham, he breathed out threatenings and slaughter against all who believed in him whose day Abraham rejoiced to see afar off; let us keep a strict watch over our own hearts, and diligently avail ourselves of all the means whereby our consciences may be thoroughly enlightened. Having, in the conversion of Saul, such a striking instance of the sovereignty and efficacy of divine grace, we ought to pray, that we ourselves, and others also, may be brought more completely under its influence; that we may willingly bow to the sceptre of the Redeemer's righteousness. And as the surest evidence of our having done so, we ought, habitually, to apply to him for direction what he would have us to do, and carefully follow the direction he gives, obeying his commands, observing his ordinances, and desiring the salvation of others. Would to God that all men were as I am, was thenceforth the prayer of him to whom Jesus appeared on the way to Damascus; and such will still be the prayer of all who love the Lord Jesus, and in the spirit of that prayer they will ever be ready to act.

PRAYER.

On the evening of this day, we, O Lord, would desire to bow before thee, as the hearer and the answerer of prayer. Thou, Lord, hast done great things for us in love, and thy mercy is upon them that fear thee, from generation unto generation. We bless thee, that Jesus was declared to be thy Son with power, and by the resurrection from the dead; and that, exalted to thy right hand as the advocate of his people, he is able and willing to save unto the uttermost all who come unto thee by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. We bless thee for the recorded illustration of the efficacy of his saving power and grace, to which our attention hath now been directed; and assured that he is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever, we would desire to cast ourselves upon the riches of that grace. May we be a willing people in the day of the Saviour's power. May every thought and every imagination in us, that would exalt itself against the knowledge of thee our God, be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. And while rejoicing that there is no condemnation to them who are in him, may we ever bear in mind, that all such walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit; that when he gave himself for us, it was that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. May his law ever be our guide, his statutes our counsellors, and his judgments our song in the house of our pilgrimage. May we be careful to walk as he also walked. Like him, may we count it our meat to do the will of thee, our Father in heaven; and like him, may we ever be ready to do good to all; to do what in us lies to promote the temporal and the spiritual welfare of our brethren of mankind, and, in all our endeavours, to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling; do thou, Lord, work in us to will and to do of thy good pleasure. Fulfil in us all the good pleasure of thy goodness, and the work of faith with power. Ever impart unto us grace, whereby we may serve thee acceptably with reverence and godly fear. Enable us to live by faith in Christ, that when he who is our life shall appear, we may also appear with him in glory. May thy kingdom come, may thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. May the time soon come, when the knowledge of thee, the Lord, shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. Bless the church established in our native land. Bless this corner of thy vineyard, and strengthen the hands and encourage the heart of thy servant who labours among us in holy things. Command an abundant blessing upon his labours. Bless our native land, and all ranks and degrees of persons in it, from the queen upon the throne, to the meanest of her subjects. Comfort all who mourn, heal the sick, bind up the broken-hearted. Prepare the dying for death, and may the living lay it to heart that they too must die. Be the friend of our friends, reward our benefactors, forgive our enemies. We would desire to acknowledge, with grateful hearts, all the goodness thou hast ever made to pass before us. We bless thee for what of thy goodness and grace we have experienced throughout the day come to a close, and for the comfortable circumstances in which we have now been permitted to worship thee. Pardon the sins of which we have been guilty. Enable us now to lie down in thy fear, that we may awake in thy favour. And all that we ask is in a dependence upon the merits of Jesus Christ, our only Redeemer. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVIII. 1—8.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS X.

REMARKS.

In preceding chapters we are informed of the sins of which Ahab had been guilty, and the judgments which, in consequence thereof, God had pronounced against him, his family, and kindred. From this chapter we learn how these threatenings were executed upon his seventy sons, and his relatives, 'the brethren of Ahaziah, as they were going down to salute the children of the king;' and from the consideration of these events, we should be taught how unchangeable are the declarations of Jehovah, and how certainly they will all be fulfilled.

When we reflect on the birth, the rank, and the expectations of the persons who were thus cut off, and that so many of them were destroyed by their father's friends, and 'the bringers up of his children,' to whom they might have looked for gratitude and protection, we should be taught the folly, as well as sinfulness, of seeking for our families the objects of the world, and the friendship and favour of our fellow-men. Rather let us 'first seek for them the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, and all other things shall be added unto them.'

From what is here recorded of Jehu, we may draw another valuable lesson. We see a man zealous in the cause of religion, pursuing the enemies of God, and made the instrument of fulfilling upon them his righteous purposes. But how manifest in all his doings is the influence of a self-seeking, an ostentatious, and a worldly spirit, and how great reason is there for believing that, whilst accomplishing the designs of God, he himself would yet be a castaway!

Many men think lightly of false religion, and especially in the present times there is a tendency to regard all systems as the same, and to denounce as the mere effusion of bigotry the actings of thoroughly decided Christian principle. The dreadful judgments passed upon the idolaters of Baal, should tell us in what a light the opponents of his truth are held by God, and if they are not now visited by the immediate tokens of his displeasure, assuredly a day is coming when they shall both be seen and felt; the day when we shall 'discern between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not.'

On the perusal of the record of such destructions as are here related in this, and so many other parts of the Old Testament, some have objected that they present God in too terrible an aspect, and that it is difficult to believe in the actual occurrence of such scenes. But these men are ignorant of the true nature and consequences of sin, and are as neglectful of the book of providence, wherein they are displayed, as they are of the word of God. For is not the whole 'creation groaning and travailling in pain until now,' because of sin? Whence but from sin come all the sufferings and desolations under which the whole world is at this moment labouring? And what from all this should we learn, but that God punished idolaters of old only in the same way, though more immediately and directly, as that in which he testifies against sinners now? Above all, we should learn from such things, that whilst long-suffering and gracious, God will 'by no means clear the guilty,' and that they will not escape who neglect so great salvation.

PRAYER.

Everlasting God, we approach thee in Christ Jesus, by whom alone we can have access to thee. Pardon our sins, and enable us to draw near to thee, not in the spirit of bondage, but as children to a reconciled Father. We thank thee for bringing us to the light of another day, and we implore that, while graciously continuing to us our temporal being, thou wouldst make us look to our immortal destiny, and improve all other blessings for the glory and the salvation of our souls. We again desire therefore to renew our covenant with thee. May the Holy Spirit reveal to us our awful state by nature. May he convince us more and more of our sin and misery and utter helplessness. May he take of the things of Christ, and show them unto us. May the Spirit show unto us Christ's glorious nature, his wondrous humiliation, his perfect work, the full and free provision secured by it. May he make us to hunger and thirst more after righteousness; to understand, to appropriate, to feed upon the promises, so that the life we live in the flesh may be by the faith of the Son of God, who loved us, and who gave himself for us. Bless to us the instructions of thy holy word. Lead us to consider how sure are the threatenings that come from the mouth of the Lord, and that they shall all be fulfilled. But O! suffer us not to take refuge from thy coming judgments in any false system. May we ever feel that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved, but the name of Jesus only. May we ourselves be interested in that name, and do thou hearken to us when we pray for all idolaters, whether in heathen or in Christian lands, and that thou wouldst bring them, and the followers of every other error, to the acknowledgment and obedience of the truth. Impress us, heavenly Father, by a deeper sense of the evils which sin has brought upon the world. May the record of the calamities and miseries which it has entailed be made the means of enabling us to see still more the need of a Mediator, to receive him the more joyfully, to rely upon him the more faithfully, and prove him, as the rock smitten in this wilderness, to be drawing more abundantly the waters of life, till the Lamb who is in the midst of the throne shall feed us and lead us to living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes. Lord have mercy on us, and bless through Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM XLVI. 1—3.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS IX. 23—43.

REMARKS.

Paul, though now changed by divine grace, had long continued an enemy to Christ and his cause. In the suspicion even of his friends, and in the redoubled enmity of his foes, he is made to experience one amongst the many evil consequences that arise from a sudden or a late conversion to the Lord. But believers should not be too suspicious nor distant in their intercourse with such converts, but whilst exercising all prudence, should mix it with tenderness, and encourage, and instruct, and pray for them.

The church need not expect frequent or lengthened seasons of rest in such a world as this, a world where, like the ark in the deluge, exposed to winds and waves, she has to encounter the enmity of men and devils. But whilst God is pledged for her eventual safety, he does sometimes afford her rest, and if the troubles through which she is made to pass, have been sent in mercy and been sanctified, her rest will be like that here described, not an inactive, a degrading and destroying rest, but a rest during which she shall be edified, be made to grow more in the knowledge and love of Christ, and conformity to his image, to walk in the fear of the Lord under a constant and prevailing impression of his presence and desire for his glory, to be instant in prayer for the promised blessings of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, and to experience them in a purifying and peaceful and joyful communion with their heavenly Father; and thus the church will prosper in her rest.

How earnest and indefatigable were the apostles in the service of their Lord. Their example should greatly humble the ministers of Christ, because of their unbelief and unprofitableness, and should urge them to pray for grace to be more faithful, devoted, and persevering, and to be more entirely dependent on his blessing to crown their labours with success. If they did so, Christ would hear and answer, and abundantly bless them.

In the interesting record of Dorcas, the disciple, we observe the practical effects of a living faith in Christ. Let none, whatever be their sex or station, say that they have not the opportunity of glorifying his blessed name. Let them look to this woman, and if their hearts be born again in the faith of the Redeemer, they will be at no loss for objects on which to exercise their Christian sympathies. They will find them at home and abroad, in the souls and bodies of men. Would that we had more such characters as Dorcas—humble, devoted, self-denying, fruitful!

PRAYER.

Thou art the high and holy One that inhabitest eternity, but humblest thyself to behold what is done upon the earth. Look in mercy upon us who now bow ourselves before thee, and grant unto us the Spirit of grace, and of supplication. We thank thee for thy blessed word, but would remember that thou only canst enable us to understand and to profit by it. We pray for those who resist all the evidences by which thou testifiest the truth of thy word. Persuade them that if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them who are lost, in whom the god of this world blinds their minds, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine into them. Bestow upon them an humble, teachable, prayerful disposition, the honest and the good heart, that they may see and receive the truth. Do thou who commandest the light to shine out of darkness, shine into their minds to give them the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. May we ourselves feel that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy. May we all be the objects of thy mercy. May we, like Paul, thy servant, be truly converted to Christ by the Holy Spirit. And, O God, may we have daily increasing evidences of the reality of our union to him, in the purification of our hearts, and in the devotedness of our lives to his glory, and the spiritual and temporal welfare of our fellow-creatures. May thy ministering servants be enabled to behold Christ as ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, and procuring gifts for men. May they feel that he is Head over all things to his church, that he is the same to-day, yesterday, and for ever, and that he will preserve and prosper it till all his elect are gathered and prepared for heaven. May they discharge every duty in the faith of thy promises, and in a spirit of prayerful dependence on thy power. And do thou, O Lord, look down upon them as in the days of old, and give efficacy to the word of thy grace. Direct and preserve thy church amidst all her tribulations; and when a rest is vouchsafed to her, may she not sink into spiritual sloth, but be edified, and walking in the fear of God, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, be multiplied. We would remember, O God, before thee the sins of which we have this day been guilty. Make us to feel that they are sufficient of themselves to condemn us. Blessed be thy name for Christ, the propitiation. Sprinkle his blood upon our hearts, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. Preserve us through the ensuing night, O thou who never slumberest, and in thine infinite mercy regard us in all things necessary for soul and body, for time and eternity, through Jesus Christ, the Son, to whom with the Father and the Holy Spirit, one God, be everlasting praise. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CVIII. 1—6.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XI.

REMARKS.

Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, was the wife of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat. Instigated partly by revengeful, and partly by ambitious passion, she sought the destruction of the remainder of the seed royal, and succeeded in the slaughter of them all, with the exception of Joash, her infant grandchild, who was mercifully delivered by means of Jehosheba, the sister of Ahaziah, who was married to Jehoiada, the high priest. In this way the royal line was preserved, and the prophecies concerning the descent of the Messiah from it, were fulfilled.

We should learn from the deeds of Athaliah to what a height of madness and of cruelty the human mind can rise when under the influence of unhalloved passion, and that nothing but the restraining grace of God prevents any man from being guilty of actions which, when committed, he can loathe and reprobate.

In the destruction of so many of the posterity of Jehoshaphat in consequence of the unholy alliance with the family of Ahab, we are reminded of the fatal results to all parties of marriages contracted without a regard to the will and the blessing of God. Such connections have in every age been injurious to personal religion, domestic peace, and to the spiritual interests of the children.

In the preservation of Joash, as a brand from the burning, we should recognize the providence which God continually exercises over his church, and be persuaded that even in the most disastrous seasons he will so overrule all events as that the kingdom of Christ shall be secured, and all his purposes concerning it be accomplished.

The conduct of Jehoiada shows us what the ministers of religion are warranted to do on an emergency, and the result of it proves what important services they may then be the instruments of rendering to the cause of God. Especially like him should they desire that the king and the people should stand in a covenant relation to God, and be guided as a nation, as well as individuals, by a supreme regard for his will and the advancement of his glory, and by giving every discouragement to the principles and practices of irreligious men.

PRAYER.

O thou great and glorious, and, in Christ Jesus, most gracious God, behold us in mercy, for we are sinners before thee, sinners by nature, and by unnumbered actual transgressions; we deserve nothing but condemnation, we can plead for nothing but mercy. Lord, be merciful to us miserable sinners. Blot out all our iniquities by the cleansing blood of Christ. Speak peace unto our souls. Shine into our hearts by the Holy Spirit. May we be enabled to see, to love, to cleave unto thee this day, as our Father in Christ. May we be emptied of ourselves. May we be delivered from all self-righteous feelings, from all trust in our own wisdom and strength, from all mere worldly desires. May Christ dwell within us. May we behold his glory, the glory of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. May we see that thou, the eternal and omnipotent God, hast made thyself over to us in him,—I will be a Father to you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. O! that thou wouldst enable us this day to appropriate to ourselves the privileges of this blessed relation; wherever we are, and in whatever duties we are engaged, may we realize a sense of thy fatherly presence. Whilst others say, Who will show us any good? our heart's desire is, that thou, O God, wouldst lift up the light of thy countenance upon us. Do thou lead us to love thee with all our heart and soul, to walk as if seeing thee who art invisible; to be constrained to every duty by the remembrance of thine unspeakable goodness and mercy, and to resist every temptation, saying, Shall we do this great evil and sin against God. Bless unto us the instructions of thy holy word; may it be as a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path. Do thou bring up to our remembrance the lessons which it teaches; do thou cause us to follow them in our own daily walk and conversation. We pray especially for our native land. May it be in covenant with thee. May thy word be received by it as the word of the living God, and be followed as the supreme, the only rule of duty. May we seek thy favour in Christ Jesus above all things, keeping thy commandments, and statutes and judgments, and so may we know that the Lord our God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments, to a thousand generations. Hear us, O Lord, for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXIII. 4—6.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS x. 1—24.

REMARKS.

Among the means which were employed for preserving the knowledge of the true God, was the distinction respecting animals clean and unclean, Lev. xx. 24—26. (referred to in this chapter), the former of which might be used for food and sacrifices, whilst the latter were to be rejected, a distinction which was designed to apply to the Jewish and Gentile nations, the one possessing the knowledge of the true God, the other sunk in ignorance and idolatry, and which, although carried by the Jews to unauthorized lengths, was yet most important as a means for keeping them separate from the Gentiles, and for preserving the truths and promises of revelation. When the Saviour was manifested there was no longer a necessity for this separation between them. Both were guilty before God; both stood in need of an interest in Christ; to both of them Christ must be preached, and therefore the distinction which was before necessary and useful, was now to be done away. We here learn the way in which it was to be abolished. Cornelius was a Gentile, but living in the country of the Jews, he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with divine revelation, and the purposes of God announced therein. Of that opportunity he was enabled, by divine grace, to avail himself; he believed in the true God, and in the promises of the Messiah, and showed the influence of religious principle in the holiness and benevolence of his life. In consequence of this, he was held in much esteem even by the Jews themselves, who would thus be better prepared for the mighty change in God's dispensation which was about to be introduced through him. We are here told in what way the divine favour was announced towards him.

In the mean time, we may learn from this interesting history, that when God has a purpose of grace for any man, he does not allow such a one to stop at partial or imperfect views of religious truth. He first awakens him by his Spirit, then leads him to take advantage of all the means of knowledge within his reach, and brings him at last to the full discovery and reception of the blessed Saviour, in whom he has rest and peace. This is the course and consummation of divine grace in the soul of one of the elect, from which we should learn that whatever may be our convictions of the truth of the bible, and of the existence and character of God, we are not to be satisfied with these, but pray that we may be led farther on, as Cornelius was, till we obtain safety, and peace, and life, in union to Christ.

We may here also see that as all need Christ, so there is no employment which will prevent any man from finding him. Cornelius was a soldier by profession, of all others thought to be the most unfavourable to religion, and yet we observe what progress he made in the spiritual life, and what a character is given of him. And why should it not be so generally amongst our soldiers? The scriptures are in their possession, and the Holy Spirit is promised them. Alas! it is their sin alone that is the cause why there are not more Corneliuses in our armies; and this Roman soldier, with his fewer advantages, will be adduced to aggravate their condemnation. But blessed be God, that the number of truly Christian soldiers is increasing, and may he be pleased to multiply his grace amongst them more and more.

This history also teaches us that it is the will of God to employ man in communicating the knowledge of salvation to their fellow-creatures. An angel is sent to Cornelius, but only for the purpose of directing him to Peter, for 'he,' it is said, 'shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do.' And however despised the preaching of the gospel may be by the natural man, let us hence learn that the salvation of souls is effected by that instrumentality; that though to them who perish, it be foolishness, to us who are called it is the power of God.

Let us rejoice that there is no respect of persons with God, that his people are gathered from all nations under heaven, and that he commands his gospel to be preached to every creature; that thus to make it known is the great design of the Christian church, and that for which he has promised to be with it always, even to the end of the world. We should be humbled under a deep sense of our great and long continued neglect of this duty, and seek the more earnestly to employ men, who, like Peter, shall proclaim, whether to Jews or Gentiles, 'that whosoever believeth in Christ shall receive remission of sins.'

PRAYER.

Almighty and most gracious God, we acknowledge that in ourselves we are full of darkness and of enmity, and that it is altogether of thy grace and by the Holy Spirit that any of the children of men are awakened from their natural condition, and led to take heed unto the things which belong to their eternal peace. We pray that thou wouldst be pleased to stir up to a sense of sin and danger, those who are unconcerned about their everlasting destiny, that thou wouldst lead them to inquire for thy truth, and that thou wouldst not cease to enlighten and to guide them, till thou hast brought forth judgment unto victory. And do thou make us all to feel that even when we are brought to Christ by the Spirit, we have need to be constantly upheld by thy grace; and do thou, O blessed God, cause us to cleave to him, and keep us by thy mighty power through faith unto salvation. We implore that thou wouldst cause us all to feel for the spiritual darkness, and degradation, and misery of heathen lands, and to act in regard to them as those who are persuaded that Christ is the only Saviour; that there is no present peace, no future happiness, but through an interest in his blood. Blessed God, enlarge our hearts towards those who are in the region and shadow of death; multiply the number of those who may declare to them the unsearchable riches of Christ. May they go forth as called by thee; may they labour in the faith of thy promises, and in dependence on thy grace; and do thou, O Holy Spirit, one with the Father and the Son, come down upon them and bless their labours, so that great multitudes may believe and be turned unto the Lord. We pray this evening for the forgiveness of all our trespasses. Whilst day after day is passing on, and hurrying us so much nearer to death, and judgment, and eternity, we beseech thee to make us feel more strongly how short our time is, and give us grace to redeem it. Make us more humble, more full of faith and love in Christ; beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, may we be changed into the same image, from glory unto glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord. We throw ourselves upon thy mercy this night. Do thou receive us, heavenly Father, and grant that whether we live, we may live unto the Lord; whether we die, we may die unto the Lord; whether living or dying we may be his. In Christ's name we present our supplications, and through him would we implore a gracious answer. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CII. 13.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In ver. 2. it appears that Jehoash did what 'was right in the sight of the Lord,' all the days of Jehoiaada the priest. But in referring to 2 Chron. xxiv. 17, 18. we learn that, after his decease, he fell into a state of idolatry, and had a share in putting Zechariah, the son of Jehoiaada, to death, because he testified against his iniquity. It is a fair inference from this, that his early zeal in the cause of God, and in repairing the temple, is to be traced, in a considerable degree, to the counsels of Jehoiaada. The temple, as is evident from several verses in the beginning of this chapter, was in a very dilapidated condition. Partially they may have resulted from the effects of time, but we find, in turning to 2 Chron. xxiv. 7. that the sons of the wicked Athaliah had wilfully 'broken up the house of God.' Jehoash set about repairing the breaches, and the means taken are related.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

It is of great importance to have pious men for our guides and advisers, especially in early life. Had Jehoiaada been more decided for God, it would have been better both on his own account, and on that of the king. For if the high places had all been taken away, and a thorough reformation effected, the latter end of the reign of Jehoash might have been very different from what it was. And hence it appears to be at once our duty and our wisdom, not to tolerate any known abuse in the service of God, on account of the prejudices or passions of men. The king's zeal in the repair of the temple is most commendable. Breaches, even in the walls of God's house, are unbecoming; that place where Jehovah is worshipped, and his salvation made known. Blessed are all they who, influenced by right motives, lend a helping-hand in 'enlarging the place of the tent, and in strengthening the stakes of Zion.' And blessed, thrice blessed are they, who labour in faith and prayer to repair and build up that glorious spiritual temple, which is 'built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone;' such individuals should always endeavour to secure the character which was given of the workmen in repairing the temple; 'they dealt faithfully.' The end of the reign of Jehoash, was as wicked and calamitous, as its commencement was bright and promising. So long as he continued in the service of God, he prospered. But when he established idolatry throughout his kingdom, and put Zechariah to death, he found that it was a vain thing to strive against the Lord. Our only security, either as nations or individuals, is to abide in the fear of God, and in the faith of his Son, whom to serve is life eternal.

PRAYER.

O living God, thou art not confined to temples made with hands: heaven is thy throne, and earth is thy footstool. Thou art every where present to hear the cry and to answer the prayer of those who call upon thee in spirit and in truth. But we bless and adore thee, that though thou inhabitest the praises of eternity, and fillest the universe with thy presence, thou hast chosen Zion for thy dwelling-place, to make known thy mercy, and display thy glory there. And we thank thee, O Lord, for that rich river of gospel ordinances which makes glad thy holy city, and revives the hopes of thy waiting people. Praise and glory be unto thy blessed name, that thou art building up, in this ruined and guilty world, a glorious spiritual temple, of which the ancient temple was only a type. May thy gracious spirit descend into our hearts, to draw us near unto thyself, and to make us living stones in that glorious edifice, which is built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. And may the Holy Spirit purify the inner temple of our souls, and make them a fit habitation for the living God. We have cause, O Lord, to mourn and lament that sin has so frequently defiled the temple of our hearts. We have cause to lament the evil suggestions of satan, the sad power of the world, and of our own unholy desires. O blessed Spirit of the Saviour, come and revisit thy temple. Quicken us from the death of sin, purify our hearts from its polluting influence, and exalt the Saviour to the throne of our affections. In our future lives, by thy grace, may our thoughts and our desires be fixed in heaven, where Christ now sitteth at the right hand of God. And may we be enabled, by a holy and consistent conduct, to evidence the inward presence of the spirit of holiness. Guide us, O Lord, during this day, by thy heavenly counsel, and lead us into the company of those, who will encourage us to continue in the service of Christ. May we be enabled to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our God and Saviour; and in the midst of prevailing unbelief and indifference, to be decided in our Christian principles and in our Christian profession. Lord, help us to walk in thy strength, that we may not only give an early promise of believing obedience, but also may be enabled to continue steadfast and unmovable, always abounding in thy blessed work, for as much as we know that our labour is not in vain in the Lord. Gracious Father, to thee we commit all our dear friends. May they also be spiritual stones in the living temple, and members of that family of which Christ is the glorious Head. Remember, we beseech thee, that church which Jesus purchased with his own blood. Raise up holy men to stand in the breaches of Zion, and to repair the wastes of many generations. O Lord, thou wilt yet appear in thy glory, when thou buildest up thy Zion. Thou wilt regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer. Herein have we still cause to rejoice, that thou art the same, and that thy years shall have no end. The children of thy servants also shall continue, and their seed shall be established before thee. Graciously hear our prayers, and answer us in mercy, for our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXV. 12.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS x. 25—48.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 26. The worship of any created being, however exalted his condition, and however important the benefits which he confers, in the sight of God is gross idolatry. The Lord is a jealous God, and will not divide his worship and glory with another. The language of scripture is, 'him only shalt thou serve.' In the 31st verse, we meet with a beautiful illustration of that scripture doctrine, 'for he that hath, to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath.' Light and advantages, when improved, will most certainly be accompanied with increasing light and comfort, till the eyes are fully opened to discern the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. From the 36th verse, onward to the 43d, we have a cluster of the great doctrines of our most holy faith. The sacred writer starts with Christ the chief corner-stone. He states his supreme power and dominion, 'he is Lord of all;' his capacity for the work which was given him to perform, 'he was anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power;' his unwearied benevolence, 'he went about doing good and healing diseases.' He states also his death and the manner of it, then his resurrection from the grave, and finally his glorious second advent, as the Judge of all the earth. What a rich and blessed summary of gospel truth! Baptism is not regeneration. A man may be baptized with water, and still want the inward and saving baptism of the Holy Ghost. But every one who has been baptized with the Spirit, has a right to the outward sign and seal of the covenant of grace, ver. 47. We are not now to look for any miraculous evidences of the Spirit's power, such as the early believers received, but for the peaceable fruits of righteousness, which are to the praise and glory of God.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

There is one blessed and comfortable truth clearly brought before us in this passage of sacred scripture, that God is no respecter of persons. It is not necessary that we should possess wealth, or titles, or honours, before we can draw near unto God, and make our wants and sorrows known. Rich and poor are equally encouraged to approach his throne, and to partake of the blessings of his salvation. We also learn this other truth from the case of Cornelius, that if we make a due improvement of our privileges, we shall be visited with increasing light and peace, 'till the day dawn, and the day-star arise in our hearts.' The conduct of this centurion, and the conduct of his friends, when Peter appeared among them, are deserving of our serious consideration. They were waiting for the salvation of God: 'therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.' This is the spirit which we must cherish, if we would profit by the preaching of the gospel. We must receive it with faith and love, lay it up in our hearts, and practise it in our lives. To minds in this state of preparation, the great doctrines of the gospel will prove most acceptable. They will rejoice in the glorious divinity of the Son of God, as Lord of all: in the perfection of his human nature, being anointed with the Holy Ghost to finish the work which the Father had given him to perform. Such minds will also delight to follow the Saviour through all his life of mercy to the scene of his death. It is there we see the prediction fulfilled, 'He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed.' It is also a cause of comfort to his people that Jesus rose from the grave, as the first fruits of them that fall asleep in him, and that he went forward to prepare for his believing followers a 'house eternal in the heavens.' We should always remember that the Holy Spirit alone can make these doctrines effectual. And as we have received the outward sign of baptism, so we should be most careful to ascertain if we have received the inward and sanctifying grace.

PRAYER.

O Lord God Almighty, who art the Father of mercies, and the God of consolation, we desire to approach thee this evening with reverence, humility and faith. We bless thee for that new and living way by which sinners can draw near unto God, with acceptance and with comfort. We rejoice that there is a Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who is able and willing to save unto the uttermost all those who come unto God through him. It is our blessed privilege, O Lord, to live in the last days of the Son of man, and to see and hear those things which many prophets and righteous men of old desired to see and hear, but were not so highly favoured. We give thee thanks that the middle wall of partition has been broken down, and that we enjoy free access into the holiest of all through the blood of Jesus. Grant us, O Lord, thine all-sufficient grace, to help us to make a due improvement of our blessed privileges. May it not be our condemnation, that light has come into the world, and that we loved the darkness rather than the light, because our deeds were evil. Enable us to listen to thy holy word with the docility of little children, to lay it up in our hearts, and practise it in our lives. May we feel, in sanctified experience, that the law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; that the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple; and that the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart. May thy blessed Spirit open our eyes, to discern the glory and the grace of Jesus Christ. May we be enabled to receive him as Lord of all, the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person. Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift. Thanks be unto thee, O Lord, for the pure and spotless example of our divine Master; for his cruel sufferings and death, and his glorious resurrection as the first fruits of them that sleep. May we be brought to feel that he was wounded for our transgressions, that he was bruised for our iniquities, and that the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and that by his stripes alone we can be healed. May we know him in the power of his resurrection, in the fellowship of his sufferings, and be made conformable to his death. Help us frequently to meditate on his second advent as the Judge of all, and to say, in humble faith, Even so, come quickly, Lord Jesus. O God of sovereign grace, pour out of thy Spirit upon our souls, that he may quicken us from the death of sin to the life of God. Baptize us with the heavenly baptism, and receive us into the number of thine adopted children. Pour out of thy Spirit upon all flesh, that the nations may be converted unto thee, and that thy scattered people may again be brought home. Bless this family and all who are dear to us by the ties of friendship or of blood. Preserve them and us from all evil, and especially from sin. Support us under every trial, and bring us to thy holy kingdom, for the sake of that Saviour whom thou hearest always. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM xxxiii. 11.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS xiii. xiv. 1—16.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In this passage we have the history of two kings of Israel, Jehoahaz and Joash, and of Amaziah king of Judah. The reign of the first of these kings was like those of his predecessors, and excited the anger of the Lord, xiii. 3. Hazael, accordingly, was sent to punish Israel, which he did severely. But God, who delights in mercy, raised up a Saviour for his people in the person of Joash, son and successor to Jehoahaz, ver. 5. In his reign the prophet Elisha died. During his last illness, Joash went to consult him, apparently in a state of great anxiety. Elisha ordered him to take a bow and arrow, and shoot in a direction eastward, probably toward the cities which had been taken by the king of Syria. It appears from a variety of passages in ancient authors, that shooting an arrow into the country of the enemy, was regarded as a declaration of war. In this case it was an emblematical act, and its repetition was the measure of his success, ver. 15—17. Elisha's miracles did not cease with his death. The Israelites had been burying a man, when they were suddenly interrupted by an invasion of the Moabites. In the confusion which ensued, they cast the dead body into Elisha's grave, and the man, when he touched the prophet's bones, revived and stood upon his feet, ver. 20, 21. It is very clear from this circumstance, that no inherent power resided in Elisha to perform miracles; and that God, who used him as an instrument in life, could also employ his instrumentality when he was dead. Amaziah began his reign well, xiv. 3. After he was sometime established on the throne, he put to death his father's murderers, but not their children, in accordance with the law of Moses, ver. 6. The parable in verse 9, which the king of Israel made use of in reply to a message from Amaziah, is severe and insolent; but the event proved its truth. God had forsaken Amaziah on account of his idolatry: hence he was defeated and the temple pillaged.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The lives of these three kings are full of important instruction. In the wicked reign of Jehoahaz, we see at once the danger and the folly of forgetting God. National sins bring down national judgments, while humiliation and prayer will, as certainly, be accompanied with divine forgiveness and favour. In the reign of his son and successor Joash, we may perceive the evil effects of the bad example of his father. In the tenth year of his administration, the prophet Elisha fell sick and died. The removal of such men, especially in seasons of public calamity, is a great public loss. To themselves death is gain, not only in their being removed from future evil, but in their being put into the possession of infinite and eternal good. Their death-bed is full of instruction and consolation to the godly. Long had the prophet's house been set in order, and in the near prospect of death he is perfectly calm, and able to give directions and comfort to the king of Israel. Who would not exclaim, when contemplating such a scene, 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.' After Elisha's death, the Israelites appear to have been severely oppressed. But still God has respect unto them, because of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. It is pleasing to think, that amid all changes, amid the desolation of death, the backslidings of the godly, and the impiety of wicked men, God's covenant with Abraham and his spiritual seed continues unchanged. How grateful should we be to him for the sure mercies of David, the everlasting covenant of his love which cannot pass away. Let it be ours constantly, to see that we are interested in that covenant which has been ratified with the blood of Christ. The life of Amaziah king of Judah, affords us some important instruction. He did well in not punishing the children, for the crime of their parents. But his message to the king of Israel savours of the pride and weakness of our fallen nature. We have much need of prayer and watchfulness, lest we should be rendered vain and presumptuous by worldly success. A near and humble walk with God, is the best security we can have for our happiness, amid the trials and difficulties of the present life, and a sweet source of consolation in the prospect of an eternal life to come.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art the hearer and the answerer of prayer; unto thee shall all flesh come. We must confess that iniquities have prevailed against us: but as for our transgressions, thou wilt purge them away. Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord, and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance. Thou hast been pleased, O Lord, to distinguish us in this distant island of the Gentiles, and to confer upon us many national as well as individual mercies. We thank thee for our many temporal comforts; for the blessings of peace, and the means of national prosperity. And to thee we desire to look up as the source of that spiritual light, in which our fathers have rejoiced, and which we, their children, continue to enjoy. Pardon, O God, the sad misimprovement we have made of thy peculiar favours. Deal not with us as we have dealt with thee. Help us, as a nation, to return to thy service, and to become that people whom thou, the Lord, wilt be pleased to bless. We must confess before thee, the searcher of hearts, that our individual sins have greatly increased the national guilt. We have sinned against the clearest light and the tenderest love. We have sinned against our own convictions, and against the warnings of thy word and providence. In us, that is, in our flesh, there dwelleth nothing good. We are constrained to cry out, O wretched men that we are, who shall deliver us from the body of this death? We are unworthy to approach thy sacred presence, and to take thy thrice holy name into our sinful and polluted lips. But to whom can we go, O living God, but unto thee, thou alone hast the words of eternal life. We rejoice that thou hast established a covenant with Abraham, and his spiritual seed. We adore thy great and holy name, for the wondrous manner in which this covenant was ratified; not with the blood of bulls and of goats, but with the precious blood of thine only begotten Son, was our redemption secured. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins. Most merciful Father, we earnestly beseech thee, to give us a true and living interest in thy covenanted mercy, and help us, by thy blessed Spirit, to experience the present blessedness of thy people. Grant us, O Lord, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and perseverance therein unto the end. May it be our comfort to know that thy covenant can never fail. Neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, can separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Enable us at all times, to have a conversation and a conduct becoming the gospel, and to live in the exercise of Christian charity and mutual forgiveness. Help us to live in much watchfulness and prayer, to repress every vain and presumptuous desire, and to walk humbly with thee our God. Shield us this day, and all who are dear to us, from every danger. May we pass the time of our sojourning here, in thy fear, and at last meet together in thy heavenly kingdom. Bless, abundantly bless, thy cause, O Lord. May the nations which sit in darkness hear thy voice, and return unto thee and live. May the mountain of the Lord's house be established upon the tops of the mountains, and may all nations flow into it. And may the time at length arrive when they shall join with us in ascribing unto Father, Son, and Spirit, all glory, and dominion, and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXVIII. 3.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XI.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The great truth announced to us in the first part of this chapter is, that God is no respecter of persons. To prove that Jews and Gentiles were equally objects of his love in the covenant of grace, to Peter, and those who were with him, the Holy Ghost fell on Cornelius and his house, ver. 15. His greatest gift, bestowed equally on Jew and Gentile in the new covenant, exhibits to us the stainless impartiality of the divine character. We learn, also, from the conduct of the persecuted disciples, what was the great theme of their ministry. They preached the Lord Jesus, ver. 20; which, in scripture language, means, justification through the perfect righteousness of the Son of God. This is the great doctrine which the church of Christ has exhibited in every age, and by this doctrine that church will stand or fall. It appears from the account given of the character of Barnabas, ver. 24, that the Holy Spirit lives in and animates believers. The first efforts of the soul, and all its after progress, depend upon the continued influence and the near presence of the heavenly Comforter.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

As it is evident from the account which Peter gives of his introduction to the society of Gentiles, that God is no respecter of persons, we should endeavour to imitate this blessed example. We ought to act with Christian kindness toward all, whatever their condition and circumstances in the world may be. The manner, too, in which Peter endeavoured to satisfy the scruples of the disciples, merits our attention. He makes a plain and faithful statement of facts, which appears to have produced the best effect. A calm and dispassionate statement of the truth, will, generally, remove groundless prejudices, and is due, at once to our own characters, and the opinions of those who differ from us, especially if they think, on conscientious grounds, that we have done wrong. It has frequently been said that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. This is strikingly illustrated in verses 19—21. The very engine which the enemies of Christ's cause employed to destroy it, was overruled by God for its advancement, and the good of his people. Persecution was the means of scattering the seed of life, and of adding to the church those who should be saved. It is a very proper thing to encourage the work of the Lord. The church at Jerusalem, in this respect, set an excellent example, in sending Barnabas to Antioch. Let us imitate their example, and encourage, by our countenance and prayers, those who are but entering the Christian life, and administer to them consolation in their early struggles with sin. At Antioch the disciples were first called Christians. How sadly has this name been misapplied in after times! And what multitudes are there who have only the name! They have none of the living principles of action, of the new motives of obedience, and of the lively graces of the Spirit, which alone entitle any one to be called by the name of Christ. In the concluding verses, we are presented with a beautiful instance of the genuine faith of the Christians at Antioch. A prophet of the Lord had informed them that there would be a great and general dearth. Immediately they set about doing something for the poor saints in Judea. Let us endeavour to walk according to their example, and to do good as we have opportunity, especially to those who are of the household of faith. Such is the spirit which the religion of Christ should inspire. And to a greater or less extent it must animate the hearts of all who have experimentally felt, that he who was rich, for their sakes became poor, that they, through his poverty, might be made rich.

PRAYER.

Most gracious Father, we desire, this evening, to bow down with reverence at the footstool of thy throne. We are encouraged to draw near unto thee, because thou art no respecter of persons. In every nation, him that feareth thee, thou wilt hear, and him that cometh unto thee, thou wilt in no wise cast out. O Lord, do thou baptize us with the Holy Ghost, that we may be enabled to see our true condition in thy sight. May he discover to us our guilt and misery, and help us to feel that we are poor, and dying, and polluted sinners before the living God. Grant us, we beseech thee, repentance toward thee our God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. May our sorrow for sin be a true godly sorrow, and our repentance such as shall not need to be repented of. May our faith in the Saviour be real, influential, and permanent, purifying the heart and overcoming the world. We bless thee, O God of consolation, that thou hast provided a Saviour for our souls, in whom we can place our trust. When there was no eye to pity, nor arm to save, thine eye did pity, and thine arm wrought out our salvation. Thou didst so love the world, as to give thine only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. May we gladly receive the message which thou hast sent concerning thy Son, and rest upon him alone, as the Lord our righteousness. Help us, O Lord, to remember that he came to save his people from their sins, and to purify them unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. Give us grace daily to set our affections on the things above, and to acquire the spirit of pilgrims and strangers on earth. May we constantly live in the prospect of his second coming, as the Judge of the quick and of the dead, and be enabled, with humility, to say, We know that our Redeemer liveth, and that he will stand at the latter day upon the earth. We have been called by the sacred name of Jesus, but have too often walked in a manner unworthy of his disciples. We have deeply to lament the coldness of our love to him, who loved us unto death. We have deeply to deplore our many backslidings, and our conformity to the practices of this present evil world. Woe is unto us, that we should have disgraced our Christian name, and grieved our heavenly Master. Revive and quicken us, O God, thou God of our salvation. Enable us, henceforth, to adorn the doctrine of our Saviour in all things, by a life and conversation becoming it. May we add unto our faith, virtue; to virtue, knowledge; to knowledge, temperance; to temperance, patience; to patience, brotherly-kindness; and to brotherly-kindness, charity. We pray this night for all our dear friends, that thou wouldst bless them; for our enemies, that thou wouldst forgive them, and for our benefactors, that thou wouldst reward them. O Lord, remember Zion; defeat the counsels of all her enemies, and make her the joy of the whole earth. Satisfy her poor with bread, and clothe her priests with salvation, that thy saints may shout aloud for joy; give thy Son the heathen for an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession. Merciful Father, to thy protecting care we commend ourselves through the darkness of the night. May the everlasting arms be around and underneath us, and may thy statutes be our songs by night as well as by day. Spare us to the light of another morning; and fit us for every duty and every change. These are our prayers, O Lord. In mercy hear and answer us, for the sake of our only and all-sufficient Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XLVII. 7.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XIV. 17—29; xv.

REMARKS.

2 KINGS XIV. ver. 17—22. The highest of this world's honours are enjoyed but for a moment, while they who are raised to their possession, oft-times find themselves only raised to a multiplicity of cares and sorrows. He who has been exalted to a throne, may soon be driven from it; a foul conspiracy may cut him off in the very midst of his days, or death at least, coming in the ordinary course of nature, will lay all his glory in the dust. Not so shall it be with the glory that is to be revealed to the believer in Jesus. The kingdom that is to be given to him is a kingdom that cannot be moved; the crown that is to be put on his head no foe shall be ever able to pluck from his brow; while the joys connected with its inheritance will be as enriching and satisfying as they will be lasting. Let us, then, be found earnestly striving to be made heirs of this inheritance.

Ver. 23—29. What a solemn lesson should we learn from the history of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, of whom it is here again with such awful emphasis repeated, that 'he made Israel to sin,' and in whose wicked footsteps Jeroboam II. but too faithfully trod! It was the aim of his whole policy, for the sake of securing himself in the kingdom, to alienate the ten tribes from the pure and spiritual worship of the living and true God; and but too successful he was in effecting his impious purpose. The influence of his counsels and efforts opened a floodgate of iniquity, which continued to overrun the land long after he himself had been mingling in the dust, and brought miseries innumerable, and at last utter ruin, upon the people whom he had seduced. Are we then, any of us, either as parents, or masters, or magistrates, placed in stations of responsibility? How careful should we be to use our influence and authority for checking sin, and not encouraging it, and to do what in us lies, by our counsels, our example, and our prayers, to win others to the love and obedience of the gospel! Let us take heed, whatever our station or relation may be, that we incur not, in any measure, the fearful guilt of having the blood of souls required at our hand.

2 KINGS xv. ver. 1—8; 32—38. Amid the iniquity that so much abounded in the kingdom of Israel, it is refreshing even yet to look back to the different conduct exhibited by many of the kings of Judah, and to see, as in the case of Azariah, called also Uzziah, and Jotham his son, 'that there was some good thing in their hearts towards the Lord.'

Instances of this kind are like so many green spots, on which the eye may delightedly rest, in the midst of all the moral bleakness which the page of sacred history would only otherwise present. The cause of Azariah's leprosy we have fully stated in 2 Chron. xxvi. 16—20. How noble to be found thus standing out from a world lying in wickedness, as witnesses for God and his truth! 'Them that thus honour him he will honour, while they that despise him shall be lightly esteemed.' Are we then, by such a conduct, striving to give glory unto the Lord?

Ver. 8—31. Into what a scene of misery, cruelty, and bloodshed would this world be turned, if the evil passions of the human heart were only allowed of God to have an unrestrained license! Of the six kings of Israel, mentioned in this chapter, we read that four of them were conspired against and murdered; while Menahem, another of them, is recorded to have perpetrated atrocious cruelties, from the very recital of which the heart is made to recoil. How ought we then to prize that gospel which is so emphatically the gospel of peace, and whose holy lessons, brought home and applied by the divine Spirit unto the heart, lead to the mortification of every sinful passion, and teach us 'to be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love, in honour preferring one another.' O that its pure and peaceful spirit may be more and more infused into each one of us, that we may learn to live together, and love one another as brethren!

PRAYER.

O almighty and most merciful Father, spared as we have been to see the return of a new day, we would now come and present those bodies which thou hast preserved in health, and refreshed with sleep, as living sacrifices before thee. Quicken our hearts at this time by the gracious influences of thy Spirit, that the flame of heavenly gratitude may be enkindled within us, and that we may be enabled to realize more deeply the magnitude of our obligations to thy unceasing kindness. Lord, how unworthy are we in ourselves of the least token of thy favour? We would remember that all our mercies, temporal as well as spiritual, flow to us from thy rich and sovereign grace, and through him who is thine only begotten and well-beloved Son. In his name, then, would we at this time present our humble but heartfelt tribute of thanksgiving. May it be accepted in thy sight. And while, O righteous Father, we would render thee praise for thy mercies, we would also, with all earnestness, supplicate thy grace. How multiplied are our needs in this respect? We naturally inherit, each one of us, a heart that is deceitful and desperately wicked, alienated from thy love, full of the seeds of every evil passion, and continually prone to betray us into iniquity. We beseech thee, then, to create in us clean hearts, and to renew within us right spirits. O may thy Holy Spirit be vouchsafed to effect that great moral change in our souls, without which thou hast assured us that we can never enter into thy kingdom. Make us therefore new creatures in Christ Jesus. May we not only be justified by his righteousness, but transformed into his likeness. Clothe us with that spirit of humility, and meekness, and holiness, and love, which, in the days of his flesh, he so pre-eminently exemplified, and may we be enabled, through thy grace, to become crucified unto the world, and to live more and more with our desires and affections in heaven. Be pleased to take us under thy guidance and guardianship this day. Be aiding to us in the fulfilment of all its duties. Help us to resist its temptations, and let not the enemy of our souls be able to prevail against us. We would desire to recognise thee in all our ways, and to feel that we are continually in thy presence. O Lord, our strength and our refuge, do thou thyself uphold our goings, that we may be made to rejoice always before thee. Dwell in this our family, and be the covenant God of every member of it. Dwell in the families of our friends; yea, become the God of all the families of the earth, bringing them nigh unto thyself through the blood of atonement, and making them heirs of the unsearchable riches of Christ. Comfort all who are in trouble, and may those whose days are about to be numbered, be prepared for death, and judgment, and eternity. Hear our prayers, forgive our sins, and accept of us in the Son of thy love, to whom, with thyself and the eternal Spirit, be glory everlasting. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIV. 3—8.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XII.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—3; 20—25. The Herod here spoken of was the grandson of Herod the Great, who, at the birth of our Lord, commanded all the children of Bethlehem to be put to death, in the hope of slaying also the holy child Jesus. He appears to have inherited the cruel spirit as well as the name of his wicked ancestor. Having first killed James, the brother of John, and seeing that it pleased the Jews, he cast Peter into prison too, doubtless with the view of speedily subjecting him to the like sad doom. But his murderous purpose was most miraculously frustrated, and all his attempts to hinder the gospel brought to nought; while he himself was soon overtaken by the singular vengeance of heaven, and perished like his grandfather, a monument of the divine displeasure. Awfully indeed was it verified in his case, that 'pride goeth before a fall.' He was literally 'eaten of worms!' How fearful a thing is it to fall into the hands of that God who is a consuming fire to the workers of iniquity! Let us learn then to stand in awe, and not sin.

Ver. 4—19. The history of Peter, in this chapter, is fraught with lessons of a most instructive, as well as encouraging character, to the heart of the true believer. We may learn from it, 1. That they who would serve the Lord faithfully must expect tribulation. 'If ye were of the world,' says Christ to his disciples, 'the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.' Affliction, however, in whatever shape it may come to the people of God, is only the parental rod with which he chastens them for their profit. 2. We see how easy it is for God to give deliverance to his people, and how that deliverance may often be at hand when least they anticipate it. Are we then of the household of faith? Let us rejoice that whatever our tribulations may be for a season, the time of our complete redemption is fast drawing nigh. And more enraptured still than even Peter was, when he felt his chains at once broken off, and himself free as the air which he breathed, will every believing soul be, with its first tastings of that heavenly felicity into which it shall be ushered, when, having quitted its tenement of clay, and burst asunder every band of corruption, it shall be wafted on angels' wings into Abraham's bosom. 3. Here too we learn how true it is, as taught in scripture, that 'angels are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation.' How pleasing thus to know that these holy beings feel a most lively interest in every thing connected with the good of God's people, and are commissioned to exercise a special guardianship over them. 'The angels of the Lord encompass round about them that fear him, and delivereth them.' And our Lord's own declaration is, 'Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones, for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father, who is in heaven.' And, 4. The efficacy of prayer is here most impressively taught to us. While Peter was kept in prison, 'prayer,' we are told, 'was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him.' And it was while the disciples were engaged in this very exercise that its answer was vouchsafed, and Peter came and knocked at the door of the place where they were assembled. Let this then encourage us to pray always, and not to faint, assured that, sooner or later, our prayers shall be answered, and that whatsoever we ask, agreeable to the Father's will, and in the name of Christ, believing, it shall be given unto us. May the Spirit himself help us at all times to offer the prayer of faith, and make intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered.

PRAYER.

O thou who art the God of our lives, and the length of our days, and the giver of every good and perfect gift that we receive, we would, this evening, bow ourselves with the deepest reverence before thee, and call upon our souls, and all that is within us, to bless and to magnify thy holy name. Another week is now about to close upon us, and we come to render unto thee our unfeigned thanks for all its undeserved mercies. Thou hast watched over us in all our goings; thou hast supplied all our wants; thou hast kept our eyes from tears and our feet from falling; and it is because thy gracious hand has every moment sustained us that we are the living still before thee. And blessed be thy name for the daily access which we have had to the counsels and comforts of thy word; for the privilege of communing with thee in prayer and supplication, and for all the glorious and cheering hopes of the gospel of thy Son, by which our hearts have been made glad. Pardon, merciful Father, wherein we have in any respect rendered an unbecoming return for these thy mercies towards us. Alas, how ready have we been to forget the hand from which they have flowed! How prone to sin against thee every hour! Wert thou to set our iniquities and sins in full array against us, we could not answer unto thee for one of a thousand; even our own hearts condemn us, and thou art greater than our hearts, and knowest all things. Have mercy upon us, therefore, O our God, and remember not our transgressions against us. May we be washed, and justified, and sanctified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the power of the divine Spirit. And give us grace, we beseech thee, to live more and more as becometh thy redeemed. May we never be ashamed to confess Christ before men; may we be found to glory only in his cross; may we be ready, if need be, to bear reproach and persecution for his sake; may his love be so abundantly shed abroad in our hearts, that we may not even count our lives dear unto us, if so be that we may be enabled to finish our course with joy. We would rejoice that if called to endure tribulation, thou hast promised to be with us, and to make our very afflictions to work for our good. Thou givest thine angels charge concerning thy people to keep them, and to deliver them, and to lead them at last into glory. Why, then, should our hearts be troubled? We will wait upon the Lord and be of good courage; we will be strong in him, and in the power of his might; we will not fear what man can do unto us; we will believe that over satan himself we shall be made more than conquerors. Take us under thy care, heavenly Father, this night, and if it please thee to spare us to a coming Sabbath, may we be enabled to rejoice in it; may its rest be refreshing, and its services precious unto our souls; and may we meet with thee, and be blessed of thee in the ordinances of thine own appointment. Be gracious to all our friends; forgive our enemies; comfort the afflicted; be near unto the dying. And make Christ's cause to prosper every where. Hear these our imperfect prayers, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

TWENTY-SIXTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVIII. 5.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXVIII. 25—48.

REMARKS.

How solemnly instructive is the history of God's ancient Israel, an interesting portion of which, during their wanderings in the wilderness, is here, by the psalmist, presented to our notice! We are often ready, perhaps, to conceive of this people, when we read the record of God's gracious dealings towards them on the one hand, and their multiplied rebellions and backslidings on the other, as if they had been a people sinners above all others, and to whose guilt we should in vain search for a parallel. But, alas, humbling though the truth may indeed be, we ought to bear in mind that their history in this respect is but an apt emblem of our own; that naturally we inherit hearts as corrupt, and carnal, and wicked as theirs, and that the enmity that is in us, if not rooted out or restrained by the grace of God, will be ever ready to lead us into the like sinful rebellions against him.

In the brief rehearsal which the psalmist here gives to us of what was done for the generation that came out of Egypt, he reminds us, ver. 25—33. that though the Lord fed them miraculously with manna from heaven, so that they might thus be said to eat, as it were, 'angel's food,' they were nevertheless dissatisfied; that when they wickedly lusted after flesh, and God gave them the gratification of that lust, he made it at the same time the very instrument of their punishment; and that failing to be reclaimed by one judgment, they were visited with others, so that it might be most emphatically declared of them, 'their days did he consume in vanity, and their years in trouble.' Let us beware then of being chargeable, in like manner, with the foul sin of ingratitude to God, especially in regard to that spiritual manna which he has sent down to feed our immortal souls; let us ask nothing of him that we may consume it upon our lusts; and when he lifts the rod of his afflictions or judgments over us, O let us at once hear its voice, lest a worse evil come upon us.

Ver. 34—39. The psalmist farther shows us how insincere and heartless were those professions of repentance, which were again and again made on the part of the men of Israel. They flowed not from any right views or feelings of the evil of sin. They were the mere effect of those convictions wrought in them by the terrors of God's power. And hence he who could at once look into the inmost chambers of the heart, saw that, amid the outward expressions of humiliation and penitence, however seemingly sincere, there was still too often nought but flattery and falsehood within. 'Their heart was not right with God, neither were they stedfast in his covenant.' How wonderful his long-suffering and mercy, then, that still he should have borne with them, and been ready to forgive them, and not come forth in his wrath to consume them utterly! Who is a God like unto him? But are there not many in those days who are found liable to have fixed upon them the very charge of guilt here referred to? Convictions of sin, then, felt merely in times of severe affliction, are no satisfactory evidence that the heart has been made right with God.

Ver. 40—48. The Israelites, we see, were yet farther guilty in questioning, as it were, the very power of Jehovah to bring them into the promised rest. How dishonouring and impious thus to 'limit the holy One of Israel, more especially after having so recently witnessed all the signal miracles which he had wrought for them in Egypt, and the chief of which are here recapitulated! What need have we all of us, then, to guard against such an evil heart of unbelief, and to pray earnestly that we may be delivered from it! It is this which lies at the foundation of all sin, and fearful will be its consequences unto those who live and die under its influence. 'He that believeth hath everlasting life, but he that believeth not shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth upon him.'

PRAYER.

Adored be thy name, O our God, that another sabbath has been made to dawn upon us, and that again we have been permitted to come and meditate upon the holy lessons of thy word. We would now entreat thee to impress these lessons upon our hearts, and to make them truly profiting unto us. Help us to come before thee at this time, deeply conscious of our own unworthiness; may we feel, while we confess, that we are indeed of unclean lips, and dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips. How multiplied have been our sins against thee! Like thy backsliding and rebellious people of old, we have been prone, under the influence of our natural corruption and unbelief, to turn aside from thee, to prove unthankful for thy mercies, to seek the gratification of our own carnal lusts, to murmur under the righteous dispensations of thy providence, and to flatter thee with our lips, while our hearts have been still estranged from thee. At this time, then, do we bow ourselves before thee, O thou fountain of all grace, not only to acknowledge that we have thus sinned against thee, and that in us, that is, in our flesh, there dwelleth no good thing; but to implore that renovating power of thy Spirit by which we may have the corruption that is in us rooted out, and be enabled to mortify the flesh, with all its affections and lusts. Adored be thy name for the promise of the Spirit to begin and carry on a work of sanctification in our souls, and to perfect that which concerns us. Give us, in our blessed experience, to know the fulfilment of this promise. May he enlighten our understandings, purify our hearts, renew our wills, and bring every thought, and affection, and desire into the obedience of the gospel of thy Son. And may we thus be kept stedfast in the covenant of our God, and enabled to let our light shine before men, that they, seeing our good works, may also be led to glorify thee, our Father in heaven. On this holy sabbath, set apart to commemorate the glorious resurrection of our once crucified, but now exalted Saviour, may we have grace given to us to engage in a suitable spirit, in all its sacred and solemn services, whether in the sanctuary, or in the family, or in the closet. May we this day have our fellowship with thee, and with thy Son, Christ Jesus. May our souls be greatly refreshed and comforted in waiting upon thee. O make thyself known to us, even as thou dost unto thine own, and enrich our souls abundantly with the blessings of thy grace. We would entreat thee also in behalf of our brethren. May this be a day whereon multitudes shall be born again unto the Lord, and of whom it shall be said, that salvation has come unto them. And may the hearts of thy saints be more and more established in the faith. For this purpose, bear testimony to the preaching of the word, and the dispensation of ordinances every where, giving unto thy servants, the ministers of the everlasting gospel, to declare with all faithfulness the words of eternal life. Lord, we now look up unto thee for all needed wisdom, and grace, and strength. O send us not away empty from thy presence. Bless us, and all the objects of our affections; yea, do thou bless us very abundantly. And we ask all in the name of Jesus thy Son, and our Saviour. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXVIII. 68.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXVIII. 49—72.

REMARKS.

The psalmist here continues the history of the chosen people, glancing at some of its more remarkable events, down to the period at which the psalm was written. Ver. 49—58. When the Lord had multiplied his plagues on Egypt, (see Exod. vii—xii.) and at last sent forth his destroying angel to slay all the first-born, the children of Israel were allowed to go forth from a land where they had felt so long and so fearfully the iron hand of oppression. And though to that generation it was never given, because of their sinful murmurings and rebellions, to enter into the rest of Canaan, yet even over them God exercised, for many a long year in the wilderness, the most tender and watchful care, following and feeding them like a shepherd, and bringing their children to the full possession of the inheritance which he had promised. But no sooner were they thus quietly established in the land, from which the heathen had been driven out, than, like their sinning fathers, they began to 'tempt and provoke God' to anger; they kept not his testimonies; they bowed themselves before the idols which heathen nations worshipped; they were 'like a deceitful bow,' which the marksman can never for a moment trust. Are we ready then to condemn such criminal conduct on the part of God's people of old? O let us take heed that the guilt in no measure lie at our door—that our hearts be not found, in like manner, going after idols.

Ver. 59—66. When Israel rebelled against God, of which their history furnishes so many humiliating instances, they were made to feel that sin is an evil and bitter thing indeed; judgments failed not to follow upon their transgressions; their enemies were allowed to triumph over them; and the very ark, called 'the strength and glory of God,' and the symbol of his presence amongst them, was taken (1 Sam. iv. 11.) by the Philistines, as if to give awful intimation, that for a season his favour had been altogether withdrawn from them. But judgment is God's strange work, and that in which he has no pleasure. He punished his people, but he did not cast them off. 'He awaked as one out of sleep,' and hastened to their help, when their enemies, the instruments of his wrath, would have ground them with oppression to the very dust. And if God spared not then the chosen seed of old, when they sinned against him, neither, let it be remembered, will he spare us, if we are found to walk in their ungodly steps. 'His face is still set against them that do evil, to cut off the very remembrance of them from the earth.' Let his judgments, then, executed on sinners, in all generations, speak a solemn voice of warning unto every one of us, and be looked to as beacons, in mercy set up, to persuade us to flee from the wrath that is to come. But while God will thus assuredly punish with everlasting destruction, the impenitent, the unbelieving, the ungodly; he will bring his own chosen and redeemed out of all trouble; he will hear them when, humbled and contrite, they cry unto him from the depths of their afflictions; he will deliver them from the hand of every enemy, and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads.

Ver. 67—72. True believers may thus rejoice, that the Lord will assuredly never leave nor forsake them. For they are of the flock of him who is the 'good Shepherd,' and of whom David, with all his integrity, and tenderness, and skill, first as 'following the ewes,' and then as king of Israel, was but a faint and imperfect type. Let us only ever hear, then, the voice of this Shepherd, and we shall have nothing to fear. His counsel will guide us, his bounty will provide for us, his power will sustain us, his love will comfort us; and at last we shall be taken into that heavenly fold, into which foe can never come, and where 'the Lamb, who is in the midst of the throne, shall feed us, and lead us unto living fountains of water; and God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes.' Behold then our encouragements to abide in Christ, and to be faithful unto him, even unto death. May the Lord himself enable us so to do.

PRAYER.

O most mighty and merciful God, by whose inspiration all scripture has been given, and whose teaching alone is saving and unto profit, be pleased to give us a right understanding, and to help us to make self-application of the solemn truths which we have now been hearing from a portion of thy word. May we see, in the continual proneness of thy people of old to backslide from thee, and to forget all thy mercies, what need we have to watch always, that we sin not in like manner. We would remember that we have hearts in us alike evil and deceitful, that naturally we are no better than they, and that, if unrenewed by the quickening influences of thy grace, we will be equally ready to be led captive of satan at his will, and to be hurried on in the downward path of sin. O fill our hearts at this time with godly sorrow for all our sins; give us to see sin in its true characters of vileness and guilt; and may we be ready to lay our hands on our mouths, and our mouths in the very dust, and to confess before thee, that we are unclean, and ready to perish. But adored be thy name, that though we have sinned, still there is mercy for us; that though we have all like sheep gone astray, thou hast sent thine own Son, as the good Shepherd, to invite us back to thy fold, and to the full and everlasting possession of that favour which we had forfeited. Eternal praise for this interposition of divine mercy in our behalf! thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift! We will now, believing, look unto the cross of Jesus. We will rejoice that the very guiltiest of us may find grace through him. And we will seek to be found in him, not having our own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith. And that we may be enabled to live as thy redeemed in Christ, we would entreat thee, O our God, to give us grace according to our need, and to bless unto us all the solemn services in which, in this thy holy day, we have been engaged. May these leave a hallowing influence on each one of our hearts, and on the hearts of those who have worshipped with us. Bless the preaching of thy word throughout the church universal. Wherever the name of Christ has been this day named, may men learn to depart from iniquity. Prosper thy Son's cause in this corner of thy vineyard, and throughout the whole world. Let thy Spirit be poured out both on pastors and people, and let thy work be greatly revived. Accept of our thanksgivings for all the mercies of another Sabbath. Forgive our sins and shortcomings in duty. Be gracious to us as a family, and make each one of us members of the household of faith. Sanctify thy dealings to the afflicted. Prepare the aged and dying for a coming eternity. Train up a young and rising generation in thy fear, and may they be early led to seek Jesus. May all who are placed in stations of authority, from the throne downwards, seek to glorify thee in them. And let thy will be done upon the earth, even as it is done in heaven. And now unto the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, one God, be glory, dominion, and praise everlasting. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM IV. 1 or 6.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XVI.

REMARKS.

In this chapter we have detailed the history of Ahaz, which presents no exception from the sad apostacy manifested by the kings of Judah and Israel. And when we read the sad memorial attached to almost every name, 'and he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord,' we have the truth strongly impressed on our minds, that the possession of earthly honours is very dangerous to the best interests of the soul—amid the seductions of pleasure, amid the gaities and splendours that are gathered about a throne. O! how difficult must it be to maintain a Christian character, or to keep up spiritual communion with God! and how much is the danger to the soul increased when the possessor of the throne is in youth, and therefore less inclined to resist the follies and the vanities that encompass the path? Ahaz early in life became king, but he found, as all will find, that the occupier of a throne cannot be exempted from his share of the vicissitudes of life; yea, even that as the highest tree of the forest, rearing its head above the rest in lofty magnificence, is most exposed to the wintry storm, so also do those who are elevated above their fellow-men, experience that they are most assailed by the storm of adversity and trial. King Ahaz was visited by the invasion of the confederate kings of Syria and Israel, and although they were unable to overcome him, yet he had been sore pressed by them, and bought the help of the king of Assyria. But we often purchase help at a large price; subjection, cowardly and cringing conduct, and the sacrifice of principle, are often the price paid for the assistance of ungodly men; and O what base arts do men resort unto to preserve themselves from worldly calamities. Ahaz despoiled the house of the Lord, in order to furnish him with money sufficient to purchase the friendship of the Assyrian monarch. And thus are men ready to barter away what is holy, and spiritual, and eternal, to give what belongeth to the Lord for the sake of obtaining some present paltry worldly advantage. The favour of man is too often bought at a dear cost, even at nothing less than the loss of God's favour and love, and to procure some present enjoyment, or to keep off some threatened evil, do we not oftentimes put in jeopardy our eternal welfare? we rob God that we may secure some present peace to our souls. Such are the doings of sinners and of unthinking Christians. They intermeddle with what is not their own, but God's. They give away their time, and their talents, and their Christian privileges, and their spiritual possessions, and their dearest principles, to procure, perhaps, the good opinion and the good will of their fellow-men; they will ally themselves even to the wicked of the earth, in order to promote their worldly interests.

But the genuine believer will not seek to purchase any man's favour, or any secular advantage, by risking the loss of God's favour, which is better than life; neither will he take of God's property to purchase the help or the friendship of any wicked man.

PRAYER.

O thou God of all grace, be pleased to listen to our prayers, and to permit our humble cry to find acceptance with thee. It is through the Mediator of the new covenant that we desire now, and at all times, to come, because we are assured by thy word that he is the alone way. We know that our services cannot be accepted, neither will our petitions obtain entrance into heaven, unless Jesus be regarded in all that we do and say. And we bless thy name, O Lord, that this is thine own wise arrangement. For in Christ we have one that can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities; one that can sympathize in all the sorrows and tribulations of his people; and one that has all preva- lency of intercession in heaven, and all power on earth, to keep his own in their sojournings here below. We earnestly pray, O living God, that the Spirit may give unto each of us a saving interest in the Lord Jesus Christ, making us partakers of his redemption, children of God by adoption, and heirs of the everlasting inheritance. O let us never covet the riches or the dignities of this world, but be satisfied and contented with whatever station thou hast assigned us in the army of the faithful. Forbid, Lord, that we should barter away our privileges, our hopes, our eternal interests, for any advantage whatever that this world can give us; and O give us grace, we pray thee, to form a right Christian estimate of the overwhelming importance of the things of eternity, compared with the things of time, so that whether we be the possessors of a throne or the occupants of a humble dwelling, we may consult the best interests of our undying souls. O thou King of kings, direct all that are seated on earthly thrones, and let not the possession of an earthly crown in any way prevent them from seeking after that crown of glory that fadeth not away. Give thy Spirit and thy grace unto all men. Give the heathen to thy Son for his inheritance. Supply the wants of the poor, the afflicted, and the dying. Reclaim the wandering; satisfy the doubting; enlighten the inquiring soul. We give thee thanks that thou hast opened our eyes to the light of another day. Guide us during the hours of business, of duty, and of trial, this day, and forsake us never, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXVI.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XIII. 1—25.

REMARKS.

Here we have the selection by the Holy Ghost, and the setting apart by the church, of Barnabas and Paul for the work of the ministry. Their mission was to the Gentile world, where there lay stretched out before them a wide and barren field, but being accompanied by the help of the Holy Spirit, and by the prayers of the church, they had nothing to fear, they went forth to their labour cheerfully. At Paphos they met with what every faithful Christian minister will meet, viz. opposition and encouragement. Sergius Paulus, the deputy of that country, being desirous to hear the word of God, sent for the apostles, but Elymas, a Jew and a sorcerer, sought to hinder him, and 'to turn him away from the faith.' How great is the sin, and how fearful will be the punishment of those who will not receive Christ themselves, and who seek also to keep others away. Is it not enough that impenitent sinners have to answer for themselves on the judgment-day; must they have the blood of others also upon their heads; must they have their consciences burdened and tortured throughout eternity, with the reproaches and condemnation of those whom they have kept away from Jesus? Let believers also take heed, lest in any way such guilt be theirs. Elymas was sternly rebuked by Paul, for sinners must be told what they are, without any hesitation on the part of God's ministering servants. It is kindness and compassion to their souls to do so.

The sorcerer was struck blind. The punishment almost instantaneously followed the commission of the sin; such flagrant wickedness demanded signal and immediate judgment. Let us tremble lest God visit us also in this way; lest he not only chastise us, but hurry us away to an eternal world, in the very perpetration of some heinous iniquity. The conversion of Sergius Paulus almost immediately followed. He saw God's hand revealed against sin, and he 'believed.' God employs a variety of means for the conversion of sinners. Some are drawn to Christ by the 'cords of love,' and some by the judgments and 'terrors of the Lord.' He alone that made the human soul knows the best means of access to it.

At Antioch, Paul preached his first sermon, which is full of interest. He addressed himself specially to the Jews, and after briefly narrating the leading points of their eventful history, he spoke to them of 'the Saviour Jesus.' He knew on what subject his audience required to be enlightened, and therefore he 'preached Christ.' This was the burden of his discourse, the centre to which all his remarks converged, the sum and substance of all that he taught. And herein Paul is an example to every one that proclaims the gospel. Christ must be preached if we would be found faithful, and Christ must be received if we would be saved. He must be exhibited in all his mediatorial character, and offered fully and freely to every sinner. If this be not done, all preaching is lifeless, profitless, and vain, and the hearers will perish for lack of 'the bread of life.' May the Lord help every ministering servant to be faithful in this great work!

PRAYER.

Almighty Father, we thank thee that thou didst, in the times of old, send forth labourers into the Gentile vineyard, and in great mercy didst condescend to proclaim the tidings of salvation to those who were afar off. We bless thee this night, that the message of peace and of pardon, through the Lord Jesus Christ, hath reached this distant isle of the Gentiles, and hath gladdened the heart of many a sinner; and we give thee thanks on behalf of every one converted unto Jesus; of every one whose soul has been cheered by the promises and consolations of the gospel; of every one who has fought, or may be yet fighting, the good fight of faith. O Lord, do thou lead each one of us, now before thee, to Jesus. Give us all to drink copiously from the fountain which himself hath filled, for the refreshment and salvation of his people. May we thenceforth obtain cleansing, and pardon, and peace. May the Spirit daily enlighten us progressively in the things of Christ, and may each day, as it passes over our heads, find us better prepared for our eternal home. O Lord, forgive wherein we have this day forgotten thee. Every day, and in every thing, we offend, and therefore we need thy pardoning mercy, and thy sanctifying grace. Justly, O Lord, mightest thou punish us, even in the very act of committing sin, but we are monuments of thy sparing love. We thank thee, O God, that thou hast appointed in this land thy ministering servants, to proclaim to us the glad tidings of salvation. O let them all be faithful to thee, and to the souls of men. Give them courage, prudence, faith, and love. May Christ be preached by all, and may the gospel have free course, and be glorified. Gather in, O Lord, the dispersed of Israel, and with them the fullness of the Gentile world. Be with all who have gone forth in mission to the lands of idolatry. May they be successful, by the help of the Spirit, in turning sinners from darkness to light. Bless the preached gospel in our own land; let all ranks, from the Queen on the throne, to the meanest subject, be living under the influence of the religion of Jesus. Bless all, O Lord, for whom we ought to pray. And now take us under thy charge during the silence of the night, watch over our dwelling, forsake us never, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CV. 4.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XVII.

REMARKS.

In this chapter we have the history of Hoshea, king of Israel, and cotemporary with Ahaz. In his character there is a mitigating circumstance, viz. 'that he did not evil as the kings of Israel that were before him.' But the kings and people of Israel had now filled up the measure of their iniquity. The cup of God's wrath was full, and the time of their banishment into a foreign land was now come. They must again go into captivity, because of their sins. As a nation, they must now be banished, for nations can only be punished in this world. Let us ever bear in mind, that national sins will always be followed by national punishments, in the present state of existence. And looking at our own land in this view, we have reason to fear that the anger of Jehovah is settling down upon us, because, as a nation, we have undervalued our Christian privileges, and forsaken our covenant God.

We find in the punitive judgments of God, that the remedy is always suited to the disease. Captivity alone was fitted to be an adequate punishment and remedy for the heaven-daring sins of backsliding Israel. Removal from their beloved land, with all its holy ordinances and endeared associations, could alone cure their apostacy. In the same way, virtually, may God deal with us, if we profit not by our spiritual advantages. He may, indeed, leave us in our land; but in punishment of our sins, he may deprive us of our holy ordinances—our means of grace—our sabbaths—our bibles—our sanctuaries; and leaving us barren and desolate, he may give all these things to some other nation that will ‘bring forth the fruit thereof.’ Let us pray God to avert this calamity while yet there is space given.

Although God is not obliged to give any account of his matters to us, yet, in condescension, he has frequently done so, that men might be assured of the wisdom and righteousness of his dealings. It is an act of great kindness, if he make known to us here below, the reason of his dispensations, but if he hide it, we must not murmur, being satisfied that ‘what we know not now we shall know hereafter.’ In this chapter, he distinctly tells his ancient people, that idolatry was their crying sin, and the cause of their captivity in Babylon. In like manner, he frequently tells the afflicted soul what sins have brought distress upon it, and wherefore it is that God is contending with it. Let us be glad and rejoice, even while suffering under God’s chastening hand, if he condescend to tell us the reason of his chastisement, and if he bring to our remembrance and make us tremble under those sins which have brought affliction upon our souls; for God does not thus act towards the unawakened sinner, but allows him to sleep on in spiritual death.

As every one of those nations with which the king of Assyria peopled the cities of Samaria, and who were plagued by God, had their own peculiar idols, so do we find that each one of us has some special object of idolatry, something that comes between us and our God, something that is dishonouring to him, and ruinous to our souls’ interests, something, in a word, that prevents us from enjoying in our souls the full benefits of the gospel dispensation. Let us search and try our ways, and seek to cast out from our hearts, by the help of the Spirit of Christ, those abominations which God hateth.

PRAYER.

O living God, behold us, as a family, bending down in humble submission at thine own footstool; unto thee, seated on the throne of the universe, would we seek to yield all praise, and glory, and thanksgiving. And at the same time, would we feel our utter unworthiness even to speak to thee in prayer. Have mercy on us, O Lord, for, as a nation, and as individuals, we have all forsaken thee; and there are written in thy book of remembrance our manifold provocations against thee; and we feel the number and the aggravations of our sins to be so great, as to be a thick cloud between thee and us. But yet, Lord, thy mercy is great, thy love to a world of perishing sinners has been wondrously manifested, in giving thine own beloved Son to die for the sins, and to rise again for the justification, of his people. On his all-perfect atonement we rest every hope of acceptance with thee, and of eternal life. And we pray that thou wouldst give each of us an enlarging acquaintance with Christ, a believing, realizing, saving view of the sufficiency, the fullness, the freeness of his salvation. May the Spirit enable us to know more and more of the love of Christ, of his willingness to receive and to save every returning sinner; of the purity, the spirituality, and the extent of his law, and of the necessity of cleaving unto him with an unfaltering obedience. And, O Lord, let thy chastening hand upon us, or upon ours, whensoever thou sendest it, bring us always nearer unto thee. Spare our land, good Lord, we pray thee, from underlying thine anger, because of our national sins. Remember us in mercy. We have sinned, O Lord, we have sinned, and deserve to have our candlestick removed out of its place. But we would plead with thee, to avert thy merited judgments. Turn not away in anger from us. We commend unto thee all whom we ought to bear on our hearts at a throne of grace. Grant to our friends thine abiding friendship, to our enemies thy forgiveness, to the mourners in Zion thy consolation, to the dying the hopes of a blessed eternity. Put an end to idolatry in every heart, and in every land. Let the influence of divine truth prevail. Hear us, O God, and guide us this day, for Jesus’ sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII. 17.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XIII. 26—52.

REMARKS.

In this portion of scripture, Paul continues his discourse to the Jews and people of Antioch. He had just spoken of Jesus, the Saviour, and while the minds of his audience were in contemplation of this glorious object, he fervently declares to them the personality of the gospel message; ‘to you is the word of this salvation sent.’ To every sinner that hears that word it is sent, just if he were the only sinner on the earth’s surface that needed salvation. How great, therefore, is the responsibility of every one that lives in this Christian land!

Paul goes on fearlessly to detail the unjust condemnation of Christ, by the rulers at Jerusalem. Although they found no fault in him, yet did they crucify him upon the accursed tree; and the Jews experience, even till this day, the anger of God, because they condemned the Lord of glory. The apostle goes on to speak of the burial and resurrection of Christ, and proves from two passages in the Psalms, that he could see no corruption. Of the certainty of his resurrection, there could be no doubt, for ‘he was seen many days,’ by many competent witnesses, and there is no fact more clearly established on unquestionable testimony, than that Christ was raised from the dead. All the attempts of unbelievers to disprove it have most signally failed, and it stands forth prominently the crowning evidence of the truth of the religion of Jesus, and of the approbation and acceptance of his finished work by God the Father. Christians ought to study much and make themselves well acquainted with the doctrine of Christ's resurrection, for it is intimately connected with their own, as Paul clearly proves, 1 Cor. xv.

In the conclusion of his discourse, the apostle preaches the forgiveness of sins, and full justification through Christ, and he most earnestly cautions sinners against despising the work of the Saviour. Knowing the value of the soul, and the freeness of salvation, he was anxious to win over his audience, and to conclude a bargain between their souls and Christ. At the same time, he boldly charged home upon them their great unbelief; he denounced them as despisers of the mercy of God, and as they stood despising and wondering, he told them that they would perish in their sins. How distressing the thought, that many are placed within sight of the cross, and within hearing of the gospel salvation, and yet do obstinately rush upon destruction. Let us take heed, lest such condemnation be ours.

The effect of Paul's preaching was various. 'The Gentiles, and many Jews, and religious proselytes, followed Paul and Barnabas,' being apparently won over by the mighty power of God, manifested in the apostle; for God will always in some degree bless the faithful preaching of the everlasting gospel. But the unbelieving Jews, when they witnessed in the increasing multitudes the success of the apostles' doctrine, when 'almost the whole city had assembled to hear the word of God, were filled with envy, contradicting and blaspheming those things which were spoken by Paul.' Notice here that it is an evidence of the success of the gospel, when ungodly men are stirred up in madness against it, for then the enemy of souls finds that his empire is invaded, and he sets his agents a-working, to counteract the purposes of God's grace. But all is unavailing, and the preachers of the gospel, like Paul and Barnabas, relying upon the assured promises of God, should only wax bolder and bolder, as the waves of opposition come rolling in; and although expelled from one city, let them go unto another, publishing the word of the Lord.

PRAYER.

Holy Lord God Almighty, we rejoice with joy exceedingly that thou hast revealed Christ as the salvation of sinners, and that although with wicked hands he was crucified and slain, yet thou didst raise him up again from the dead on the third day. Let our souls now rejoice that thou hast accepted his finished work, and that all power is now given to him in heaven and on earth. O may we all find that we have willingly taken Christ to reign over us, and that now he is made unto us wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Give us, O give us, blessed God, to believe on him to the saving of our souls; to feel that we are crucified with Christ, and that the life we now live in the flesh, is a life of faith on the Son of God. May we have through his blood the forgiveness of our sins, and a title secured to us to the everlasting inheritance. O may the Spirit seal our souls unto the day of eternal redemption, and may it be our happy experience to feel that we have passed from death to life, and are now fairly set out on the road that leadeth to heaven's blessedness. Keep us, O Lord, from the sin of despising Christ, or of neglecting his great salvation; and may we ever bear in mind, that reckoning must be made at the great day. Clothe us with the Redeemer's righteousness, that on the solemn day of judgment we may stand forth before an assembled universe, acquitted, accepted, and saved with an everlasting salvation. O Lord, we would not this night pray for ourselves only, but would entreat thee to visit all men with thy benign salvation. Let every sinner that is yet out of Christ, become the subject of thy saving grace. Establish thine own people. Bless thine own heritage, and build them for ever. We commit unto thee, O Lord, those connected with us by the ties of grace or of blood. Suit the influences of thy Spirit to them all. Preserve from dangers, spiritual and temporal. And when thou hast guided each of us through this pilgrimage, O may we be conducted by thy rod and staff, through the dark valley, and admitted, through the merits of our risen Saviour, to all the blessedness of Emmanuel's land. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXX. 4—7.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XVIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1—3. When the Lord has goodness in store for a people, he will raise up and prepare his instruments in any circumstances, and bring them into power at the fittest seasons: and they who are taught of him will be as David, nor fail to do what is pleasing in his sight. Ver. 4—8. Nothing tends so much to corrupt and destroy a nation, as a neglect of true religion, or the prevalence of idolatry and wickedness. Wherever these evils prevail, a thorough and speedy reformation is urgently called for. In such reformation, every cause and occasion of sin must be exposed in its true character, and dealt with accordingly. And the ruler, or minister, who has authority to act in such matters, putting his trust in God, and acting clearly, openly, and decidedly, according to his revealed will, needs fear no opposition, but shall surely prosper. Ver. 9—12. But corrupt nations and churches that obey not God, that make void his law by their customs, and refuse to amend, will, sooner or later, be destroyed. Ver. 13—16. Even the true worshippers of God, whom he accepts in mercy, are often sorely oppressed by the wicked; their faith is found weak, and perhaps their courage fails them in trial; improper concessions are therefore made; most objectionable means are had recourse to for relief: and when this is done, so far from gaining safety, or any long exemption from sorrow, it only encourages the enemy to repeat his assaults, and worse trials may be expected. This is particularly the case when aught is taken, or withheld, from the service of God to conciliate the ungodly. Ver. 17—35. Wherefore great are the trials in which even good people are, at times, involved. God, in his righteousness, permits the wicked to seek their ruin—to reproach their faith—to use the utmost subtlety and skill for their annoyance—to address the most false, unreasonable, and even blasphemous representations to the passions of the multitude; and zealously to employ every means, the most likely for their destruction. Ver. 36, 37. But true believers, thus pressed to an extreme, and grieved for the dishonour done to the Lord their God, accepting now the chastisement of their sins at his hand, and being guided by true wisdom and discretion, will not attempt to grapple with the adversary on his own chosen ground; but, looking up to the Most High, will cleave to the path of duty, and wait for the end of the Lord, knowing that the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

We may, at all times, safely trust in God. Our first desire should ever be to serve him truly, in the right use of those means which he has himself appointed. We should, therefore, guard against all idolatry and will-worship, more especially against a carnal and superstitious abuse of things otherwise good or indifferent; and be always ready, with our prayers, our influence, and most hearty co-operation, to aid the efforts of those who faithfully contend for purity of worship, and for truth and righteousness in all things. And, knowing well how weak we are, and what slavery and wretchedness would result from error and unbelief, we should carefully watch, and shut our ears against, the crafty insinuations and arguments of those emissaries of satan, who would shake our confidence in God, and in the things we have received according to the truth of our Lord Jesus Christ. Let us even hold our peace in the presence of men who would draw us into strife and debate; and if our minds are uneasy and perplexed, and we know not what to think, let us rather have recourse to those who have the rule over us, who have spoken to us the word of God, and whose faith it is our privilege to follow.

PRAYER.

Holy and merciful God! who rulest supreme in the heavens, and doest according to thine own will amongst the children of men, thou art infinitely great and good, and of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. Whom have we in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that we desire besides thee. Thou hast the words of eternal life. We worship and adore thee as the only Lord God. We bless thee for the greatness of thy condescension and love, in raising up for us an horn of salvation in the house of thy servant David; in giving us, poor, sinful, and unworthy creatures, access to thyself through Jesus Christ; and in showing us, so clearly, the true way, that we may walk in it, and find acceptance and favour. O grant us, we beseech thee, thy Spirit: and in purity and holiness, and with increasing zeal, may we constantly persevere in thy service. Bless the nation and the church to which we belong. Cleanse them thoroughly from all idolatry, superstition, and wickedness. Let no enemy, and no unrighteousness, prevail over them to their ruin: neither let thy wrath be kindled against them for any secret offences. And may the rulers of thy people be just, and holy, and ever zealous for the truth as it is in Jesus; and let them enjoy much of thy favour and blessing in the faithful discharge of their important duties. We humble ourselves before thee, under a sense of our great unworthiness and guilt. Our very nature is corrupt. We are ever prone to that which is evil; we often abuse even the tokens and memorials of thy tenderest mercy; and are continually adding to the number of our offences. But, O God, do thou pardon the iniquity of our sin. Heal our backslidings; sanctify our hearts by thy special grace; and let no sin have dominion over us. Enable us, more and more clearly, to apprehend thy mercy in Christ Jesus; and the necessity of being conformed to thy will. Let us not expect to prosper, or be in peace, whilst we venture to transgress in any respect, and are not walking with thee in truth; and O do thou work in us both to will and to do thy good pleasure. Strengthen us also, O Lord, we beseech thee, to resist all our spiritual enemies. May no suggestions of satan; no crafty or malicious insinuations of ungodly men; and no inward workings of unbelief, have power to shake our confidence in thy word. Thou art our rock and our refuge; let us never be ashamed of our hope: but, with a firm and unwavering faith, and a growing ardour of love, may we stedfastly abide with thee, and be humble, and patient, and persevering in the performance of every duty, which, in the course of thy good providence, in our various relations of life, thou hast given us to do. We thank thee for all thy gracious goodness towards us, and for all thy kindness and care, in the exercise of which thou hast kept and brought us hitherto. In safety thou hast kept us during the night. Surround us still with thy favour as with a shield. Be with us through the day. Bless our kindred and friends. Pardon all our offences. And hear us, O Lord, we beseech thee, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIII. 18.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XIV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1—7. There are times when the word of God is preached with uncommon power, and multitudes of every sort are convinced, and become obedient to the faith. At such times, the enmity of unbelievers is usually much exasperated, and often breaks out into violent opposition. But this only awakens a greater zeal and boldness in the true servants of Christ; occasions a clearer manifestation of the truth and power of godliness, and serves to scatter the seeds of divine truth into divers places. Ver. 8—10. The Lord, who, in the beginning of the gospel, wrought signs and wonders by the hands of the apostles, in confirmation of the truth, is still present by his Spirit, to save those who, having faith to be healed, look stedfastly towards him. These, being healed and strengthened, are seen to walk, with cheerfulness and activity, in the way of his commandments. Ver. 9—18. Human nature, since the fall, is ever prone to idolatry. Hence men are always ready to bestow on the mere instruments, or means, which God employs, that honour which they will not give to himself. But the faithful servants of the Lord will never tolerate so gross an abuse, even though they themselves should be the objects of it. They will fearlessly proclaim its inexcusable folly and wickedness, and restrain it by all means in their power. Ver. 19, 20. Indeed the favour and applause of an unthinking multitude are things of no value. They will idolize and exalt a man beyond measure to-day; and yet subject him to the most cruel, unjust, and contemptuous treatment to-morrow. But happy and safe are they who trust in God, and are accepted of him; for his favour is life, and his loving-kindness is better than life. Ver. 21—28. Many, nevertheless, are the trials that afflict the just. Believers, therefore, need to be confirmed, edified, comforted, and preserved in the faith. For these ends, as well as for teaching and converting sinners, God has appointed pastors and teachers to be ordained in every church. These are upheld and blessed in their labours by the Holy Spirit, through faith and prayer. They are also subject to one another in the Lord: and gladly give an account of their stewardship, rehearsing all that God is pleased to do with them.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The saving efficacy of the word of God, whether read or preached, depends entirely upon himself; who gives, or withholds, the Holy Spirit, in perfect righteousness, as seemeth good in his sight. We should earnestly pray for this special grace; without which both our conduct and our portion will assuredly be with unbelievers. How common, and yet how gross, is the sin of ascribing to others, or assuming to ourselves, the glory which is due to God alone! We should guard against this evil propensity. And let no man think it strange, if, living godly in Christ Jesus, he should suffer persecution. It is through much tribulation that we must enter into the kingdom of God. But, trusting in the Lord our Saviour, and doing what he commands, we shall be carried safe through every trial. How thankful should we be for this assurance! and for the unspeakable help and comfort we derive from the standing ministry, and all the means of grace which God has provided for us in his house! We should also, with personal abasement and self-denial, pray for one another, and seek an interest in the prayers of the church; knowing that the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much. And let us openly and honestly acknowledge before men, all that God has done for us, or enabled us to do in his service.

PRAYER.

O thou great and glorious God! whose creatures we are, and in whom we live, and move, and have our being, we draw near unto thee, under a deep sense of our own personal unworthiness and guilt; and bless thee for the grace thou hast been pleased to bestow, and for all the benefits of this great salvation. Justly, O Lord, mightest thou have left us to perish. Instead of sending thine own Son to visit and redeem us—to enlighten our darkness, to remove our guilt, and be our leader and commander in the way everlasting, well mightest thou have left us to be filled with the fruits of our own doings, to live in fear and wretchedness on the earth, and at length to die without hope. We rejoice, and are filled with gratitude, when we think of thy great mercy; and most highly would we value and esteem thy word, and all the means of grace, which, by the toils and sufferings of thy faithful servants, thou hast, of old, established in these, as in other, lands. O do thou give us thy Spirit, and lead us in thy truth. Teach us to know thee, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent: manifest thou thyself unto us, as thou dost not unto the world. And, being delivered from spiritual darkness and unbelief, and from all idolatry and wickedness, may we truly and reverently fear thy name, and serve thee in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life. O how corrupt is our nature! and how strong and bitter are the prejudices of the unbelieving heart against thee and thy ways! Men love darkness rather than the light, because their deeds are evil. They hate and persecute thy people, O Lord, and are utterly unwilling that thou shouldst reign over them. Save us, we beseech thee, from this great sin. Create in us a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within us. Let us not, in any circumstances, be carried away with the error of the wicked. Let us not be deterred by any fear of reproach or suffering, from openly acknowledging thee as our God, or from observing all thy statutes and ordinances to do them. May all the difficulties we experience be overruled for our good, and for the furtherance of the gospel, that thy glory may be promoted. And let us not be weary in well-doing; but be followers of them, who, through faith and patience, inherit the promises. We thank thee for all thy goodness, and especially for the suitable help which thou hast given us in the church. May the teachers and rulers, ordained according to thy word, be upheld, protected, and blessed by thy special favour. And whilst we enjoy, with gratitude, the means of grace, and the bounties of thy good providence, wherewith thou sustainest us from day to day, may the work of our preparation for death and for eternity be continually advancing. May the close of every day, as it finds us nearer unto death, find us also more ready and prepared to die. And do thou, O Lord, have mercy upon us. Hide thy face from our sins: blot out all our iniquities. Take us under thy special protection during the night; and let no evil come near our dwelling. Bless our relations and friends, and all that are dear to us in the flesh or in the spirit. When we sleep, may we peacefully repose under the shadow of thy wings; and when we awake, may we still be with thee. Hear these our humble prayers: hear us for the Lord Jesus' sake. And to thee, O Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, be all glory, and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XLVIII. 10.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XIX.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1—7. Nations and churches, as well as families and individuals, have their times of trouble and distress—times, when the church of God, and the ordinary means of its support, are in danger, and the very name of Jehovah is blasphemed and dishonoured, and the faith of his servants is laughed to scorn. The sure and only effectual remedy in such cases, is prayer to God: and when the princes, the rulers and people seek earnestly unto him, through the great Prophet and Intercessor, for relief, he will not deny them their request, nor leave them in doubt as to the success of their supplications. Even though a crisis may have come, when there is no strength left to carry any defensive or remedial plan into effect, yet the Hearer of prayer will take the matter into his own hand, and comfort the hearts of his people with an assured hope of success. Ver. 8—28, 35. The enemy, indeed, within the bounds of his restraint, may still continue to practise and prosper; may repeat his hard and ungodly speeches, and write the most bitter things against the Lord and his Anointed; aye, and boasting of those fearful acts, which, in righteous judgment, the great God may have wrought by his instrumentality, he may gather his hosts together, and threaten with the utmost confidence to destroy. But the high and holy One has seen his iniquity; he knows the proud boastings of his heart. He has also seen the affliction of his people, and heard their prayer. He will therefore interpose in the time of need; and, being mindful of his promise, will consume the wicked with his blast, and cause him, at length, to perish from the way. Even whilst his servants are spreading out the case before him, and are earnestly beseeching him to do for his own name's sake, his arm will be stretched out, and the victory secure. Ver. 29—37. Wherefore they who are stout-hearted in the way of sin, and especially they who tread the path of oppressors, are sure, when the cup of their iniquity is full, to be broken and put to shame: whereas, in Zion and in Jerusalem, even at the last extremity, there is deliverance; for the remnant of God's people shall not be cut off; they shall still be fed and preserved on the earth, and be the seed of a glorious church, to serve him, in the time to come, according to his word.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Over and above the continual use of prayer to God, whereby we express our unceasing dependence upon him, and obtain his special blessing on all that concerns us from day to day, we should, in every particular emergency—in every case of trouble and distress, apply to him in deep humiliation, and trust in him above all, and even when the help of man is of no avail. Nor need we ever despair of the nation, or of the church, however great, and apparently irresistible, the danger, in any existing circumstances, may be, whilst those in power are disposed to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and, with the help of God's faithful ministers, do sincerely spread out the matter before him, and seek deliverance by fasting and prayer. The Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither is his ear heavy, that it cannot hear. But wo be to them that are proud, and who trust in themselves—who trust in vanity and speak lies—whose thoughts are thoughts of iniquity; whilst wasting and destruction are in their paths! The Lord, for his own name's sake, will, sooner or later, be the destruction of such. Let us seek to be sanctified by the blood of sprinkling, that the destroying angel may pass by us, when he comes forth from the Lord to destroy the wicked. And when we think of the angels that excel in strength, and are swift to do the will of God, let us rejoice to know that they are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God! who art glorious in holiness, and fearful in praises, we humbly and thankfully approach thy throne. We worship and adore thee in Christ Jesus our Lord, for whose sake thou art kind and merciful unto us. Thy mercies, indeed, are new unto us every morning, and great is thy faithfulness. Salvation belongeth to thee, and thou only, O Lord, makest us to dwell in safety. In ourselves, we are ever weak and defenceless: both within and round about us, there are many causes of destruction to be feared; but thou surroundest us with thy favour as with a shield; and, owing to thy great mercies, we are not consumed. O what reason we have to bless thee for the care of thy good providence—for the ever-watchful care with which thou protectest us during the hours of darkness and of sleep; and for all the blessings, both temporal and spiritual, which thou givest to be the daily portion of our cup. May we ever remember and deeply feel the debt of obligation under which we are. May we also live to thy glory. And do thou make plain to us the path of duty; and work in us both to will and to do, according to thy good pleasure; that, in just and holy living, we may have great peace, and may obtain a growing evidence of our acceptance with thee. We are strangers and pilgrims on the earth, as all our fathers were. We are often grieved by the wickedness which is every where abroad. We feel deeply the reproaches which are cast on thy people. Our souls are wounded by the neglect and contempt of thy truth, which so greatly prevail, and by all the dishonour which is done to thy holy name. Arise, O Lord, we beseech thee, and plead the cause which is thine own. When the enemy cometh in like a flood, O lift thou the standard against him. Stay thou the floods of iniquity and ungodliness. Let ignorance, and error, and idolatry be put away. Let profaneness, and lewdness, intemperance and extravagance have an end. Let the proud boaster have no success against the godly: but may the righteous flourish, and Jerusalem be the joy and praise of the whole earth. We are thy servants, O Lord. Remember us, we beseech thee, with that love which thou bearest to thy people. May we be firmly established in the faith; rooted and grounded in love; and ever found amongst the number that worship thee in the spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. As a family, may we be more and more at one in every thing that pertains to life and godliness. May we dwell together in unity: may we study carefully to avoid every cause of offence; and, in the constant and affectionate discharge of all our relative duties, may we seek to promote each other's welfare, and be at peace among ourselves. And O do thou preserve us in thy fear all the day long. In all the business and intercourse of life, may we do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thee. Let nothing tempt us to forsake the way of integrity and truth: and do thou grant us that measure of prosperity which thou seest meet to bestow. But above all things, may our souls prosper, and be in health. Bless our friends and relations, and the whole household of faith. Be merciful to our unrighteousness: blot out all our transgressions; and hear us graciously, O thou hearer of prayer, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVI. 1—5.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS xv.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1, 5, 10. Fatal heresies, arising from human ignorance and depravity, are ever ready to corrupt the truth, to destroy the peace and purity of the church, and to mislead unstable souls from the only way in which salvation and happiness are to be found. Of this kind are all things imposed by human authority, or otherwise adopted, as necessary to be observed in order to gain acceptance with God; thus marring the simplicity of faith in Christ, and proving a yoke of bondage incompatible with the promise of salvation by grace through faith. Ver. 2, 7. It is, at all times, the duty of ministers and elders, and all true disciples of Christ, to oppose, by the pure light of the glorious gospel, all errors and heresies whatsoever; and, in every place, to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. Ver. 2, 6—31. But, when serious difficulties arise—when great differences of opinion respecting matters of faith, worship, discipline, or government, are likely to engender strife and division,—in short, where any root of bitterness has sprung up, which the teachers and rulers of a particular church are unable, by their own efforts, to correct, it is good to refer the matter to a more general council, or synod, by which, with greater confidence and impartiality, the case may be decided. And when the members of such councils do sincerely and humbly deliberate in the fear of God, in the pure light of his revealed will, and under the influence of his Holy Spirit, their decisions will have great weight, and the happiest effects will be produced. Ver. 3, 4, 32—41. It is always a matter of joy to sincere Christians, to hear of the extension and prosperity of Messiah's kingdom. For this, as well as for the comfort and edification of believers, will the faithful ministers of Christ, with holy intrepidity and zeal, continually labour, wherever an opening can be found: and the very disputes and differences which, through weakness and corruption, may, at times, arise among them in so good a work, though sinful in themselves, and much to be regretted, God will overrule and turn to his own glory in the end.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

How thankful should we be for the pure light of the gospel, whereby we are taught to believe, that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved! Let us seek to know the power of this saving truth; abstaining from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit, and abounding more and more in the fruits of righteousness, to the praise of the glory of the grace of God. For this cause, let us guard against all unscriptural views and observances, and all such legal and superstitious abuses of forms and ordinances in the hands of men, as are inconsistent with the gospel method of justification by faith alone; that, having escaped from the yoke of bondage, and from all confidence in the flesh, we may truly abide in the love of God, and stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. Let us also encourage and support those faithful servants of God, who are zealous for the truth as it is in Jesus, and who, in the spirit of self-denial, boldly defend and maintain it against all error. When they meet together in council, let us pray that no strife, or vain glory, may vex their deliberations, but that, in meekness, they may be guided in judgment, and led, in the truth and by the Spirit of God, to such decisions as will greatly promote the peace, the edification and comfort of the church. And whilst we rejoice in the success of their labours, let us not stumble at the faults they may commit, but pray that, notwithstanding all their infirmities, the gospel may have free course and be glorified.

PRAYER.

Almighty and most merciful God! we come before thee this evening to give thanks for the abundant riches of thy grace, in the exercise of which thou hast abounded toward us through Jesus Christ our Lord. Blessed be thy holy name, that, whilst so many others are yet in darkness and error, labouring under the yoke of bondage, and going about to establish a righteousness of their own, thou hast given us the glad tidings of a free salvation. O enable us to see clearly, and firmly to embrace, the truth as it is in Jesus. Instructed by thy word, may we look away from every thing else, unto him who perfectly obeyed the law in our stead, and by whose righteousness alone we are justified. Accept us into favour, O Lord, we beseech thee, for his sake. Grant that by grace through faith we may indeed be saved—saved from the love and practice, as well as from the punishment, of sin. May the grace that bringeth salvation teach us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world. And O may it be our great and unspeakable happiness to be received into glory hereafter. Have mercy on those that are yet in darkness, and know not the truth. May the gospel of the blessed God, and the means of grace, be speedily brought within their reach. May their hearts also be inclined to obey. And let the true church in all the earth be enlightened and cleansed yet more and more; protected from the inroads of error, from all superstition, and from every yoke of bondage, which men of ignorant and corrupt minds would impose upon it. Bless that portion of the church to which we belong. Be thou as a wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst thereof. Let salvation be for walls and bulwarks: and may those whom thou hast appointed to teach and rule, be fitted with thy Holy Spirit. Guide them by thy wisdom, and help them in thy grace: and when they come together to consult and decide in matters that deeply concern the souls of men, let no disturbance arise from the world, the devil, or the flesh; but, in meekness of wisdom, and by the unction of the holy One, may they be led into all truth, and armed with power to prevail. Bless the sovereign, and all who have just authority over us. May we, as one of the families of thy people, have our sure portion in Israel, and rejoice for the consolation and grace which are brought to us by the gospel. Thou art our God and Saviour, under whose care it is our blessed privilege to abide. By thy good providence, thou hast kept us in being, and helped us thus far in our journey through life. Into thy hands would we still commit the keeping of our souls, and bodies, and all that we have. Watch over us, O thou that slumberest not, nor sleepest! and let the blessing of thy Holy Spirit keep our hearts and minds. Be kind and merciful to those whom we bear on our hearts before thee. Visit the sick and the afflicted. Prepare the dying for death; and us for all the trials through which we have to pass. In mercy, hear us in these our humble supplications; and when thou hearest, forgive and accept; for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 33—37.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XX.

REMARKS.

Hezekiah's sickness, recovery, and death.—Man is born to trouble. The good king Hezekiah is seized with a distemper which threatens a fatal termination. The prophet directs him to settle his temporal affairs, with a view to prepare for death. The warning is addressed to us 'in all time of our tribulation,' and even 'in all time of our health.'

'Is any among you afflicted, let him pray.' Hezekiah says, 'O Lord, remember now how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight.' He does not mean that he was free from sin. By 'perfect' we are to understand, upright and sincere. Nor does he trust in his good life. Some have said that it is only such a life which can support us on a bed of death. But a good life while a ground of comfort, is no ground of confidence. If 'our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience,' our confidence is, 'I know in whom I have believed!' But Hezekiah weeps! nay, 'with a great weeping.' And why? 'Nothing,' says Scott, 'appears to have distressed him . . . with regard to the state of his own soul.' He desired to live; yet not for his own sake, but only 'for the interests of true religion.' And we may pray, in submission, for health. 'In everything . . . make known your requests unto God.'

Hezekiah is restored in answer to his prayers. He obtains a respite of fifteen years. Even if restored, we should seek to be 'always ready,' because unlike him, 'we know not the day or the hour' of our death. Jehovah is pleased to work by means. He could have restored him without any. But the prophet takes a 'lump of figs,' and that though he knew the king was to recover. 'Ask, and ye shall receive.' Hezekiah asks a sign, only to confirm his faith. It is given. Isaiah says, 'the sun went back,' but it was probably, as the historian says, only the shadow. The rays of the sun would appear to have been refracted in an extraordinary manner. Alas! the best are imperfect. Behold Hezekiah's fall. 'In the business of the ambassadors,' (as we read 2 Chron. xxxii. 31.) 'God left him, to try him.' For the pride and vanity he discovered, he is doomed to hear the astounding prediction of the Babylonish captivity. What a trial to the patriot king! Pious as patriotic, he submits to his sentence, while he feels for Judah! He repents, yet suffers irretrievably. Spared for the sake of his people, he is, for his folly, obliged to be thankful that 'peace and truth should be in his days.' What 'painful sensations' must the prospect of the future 'have occasioned him!'

Let us learn to improve affliction, and walk humbly with our God. Even Hezekiah died at last. His fifteen years' respite expires without renewal. We know not what a day may bring forth. Let us live as if every day were our last; let us not put off the work of life—the concerns of eternity, till a dying hour; but even in health and strength prepare for sickness and death, Let us take in time the warning, 'Thou shalt die;' and when, like Hezekiah, we go down to the grave, we shall sleep in Jesus, and our epitaph will be, 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord!'

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the King eternal, immortal, and invisible, the holy One who inhabiteth eternity. We are of yesterday. Our foundation is in the dust. We are insignificant and mortal as creatures; we are ill-deserving, hell-deserving as sinners. Nay, blessed God, we confess that death is the wages of sin. It is as sinners we are mortal. By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin. We know that thou wilt bring us to death. So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. O that we were wise, that we understood this, that we would consider our latter end! In all time of our affliction, in all time of our health, may we hear thee saying to us, as thou saidst to Hezekiah, Set thine house in order for thou must die, and not live! Even now in the time of health and strength may we prepare for sickness and death. O spare us, that we may receive strength before we go hence and be no more. Preserve our lives, if it be thy blessed will; but especially save our souls. Sinful and mortal in ourselves, may we be united to Christ for life and salvation. Of thee may we be in Christ Jesus, as made of thee unto one and all of us, wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Preserved by thy goodness, may our lives by grace be directed to thy glory. O thou who didst try Hezekiah, to know all that was in his heart, suffer us not to fall into temptation. Leave us not to ourselves. Take not thy Holy Spirit from us. Keep us from being tempted, and support and deliver us when we are. Teach us, O Lord, the way of thy statutes, and we shall keep it unto the end. Give us understanding, and we shall keep thy law; yea, we shall observe it with our whole heart. Make us to join the path of thy commandments; therein may we delight. Incline our heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness. Turn away our eyes from beholding vanity, and quicken us in thy way. May there be peace and truth in our days. In the days of our sovereign, in these the days of our Saviour, may there be abundance of peace. May all become Christians, and may all Christians speak the truth in love, and keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Bless the afflicted; the dying; all near and dear to us; all whom we ought to remember before thee;

all who need thy mercy. We thank thee for refreshing sleep. O when we awake from the sleep of death, may we rise to the life immortal, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, our blessed Lord and Saviour. Our Father which art, &c.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 57—60.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XXI.

REMARKS.

Reign of Manasseh.—First, His character.—Beginning at the early age of twelve, he reigned fifty-five years, the longest reign of the kings of Judah. His was a wicked reign. He was the wicked son of a pious father. Too early placed on the throne, and deprived of his father, he is guilty of idolatry, witchcraft, and even murder. Ver. 3. 'He made a grove,' (comp. ver. 7.) or Ashtaroth, (Astarte) even a 'graven image' of that idol, and that in the house of God! And while he 'seduced Israel,' and used enchantments, he 'shed innocent blood very much,' as Isaiah is thought to have been sawn asunder by him.

Secondly, His fate.—Sin always brings ruin in its train. The wickedness of Manasseh (added to all the wickedness of Judah, as the last drop which made the cup of their iniquity overflow), brought on the Babylonish captivity. Ver. 17. 'The rest of his acts, his sin that he sinned; ay, and blessed be God, his repentance that he repented, that is 'written' too, (see 2 Chron. xxxiii. 12.) 'Bound with fetters and carried to Babylon,' like the prodigal, 'when he was in affliction, he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers, and prayed unto him, and he was entreated of him, and heard his supplication, and brought him again to Jerusalem into his kingdom. Then Manasseh knew that the Lord he was God.' And he brought forth fruits meet for repentance, taking away the strange gods, &c.

Reign of Amon.—Short and inglorious. He began at twenty-two, and reigned but two years! He walked in the steps of his father. No! there was one way in which he did not follow him; as we read in Chronicles. Unlike his father, 'he humbled not himself before the Lord, as Manasseh his father had done before him.' For the rest of his acts, alas there is no repentance; this Amon multiplied trespass, as none is wicked at once. Perhaps he had intended to repent, but 'dies the same.'

His end was tragical. His servants, who should have been his protectors, were his murderers. His house, which should have been his castle of safety, was his place of execution. He had profaned the house of God with his idols, and now his own is polluted with his blood. The wicked Amon is driven away in his wickedness, in the providence of God, which brings good out of evil, to make room for good Josiah, under whom Judah was to enjoy a momentary gleam of expiring prosperity.

Improvement.—As Hezekiah was the good son of a wicked father, he was the good father of a wicked son. Still there is a direct connection between personal and family religion. 'Thou shalt be saved and thy house.' 'The promise is to you, and to your children!' 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.' What an encouragement to 'suffer little children, and not forbid them to come unto Jesus!' True, as our children may be good though we are wicked, they may be wicked though we are good; but these are the exceptions, which confirm the rule. The faith and prayer of Hezekiah were at last instrumental to his son's conversion; and if Manasseh was wicked at first, it was because so early deprived of his parent's example and instructions. How important then in life to sow the seed which may afterwards spring up, and at death to leave the young to those who will bring them to Jesus.

Duty of repentance.—The cases of Manasseh and Amon prove the necessity and efficacy of the duty. Both are sinners, as we are all, without exception. But Manasseh repents and is saved. Amon sins on and perishes! There is the ray of hope; here is the beacon of danger. With Mary Magdalene, and the thief on the cross, Manasseh is saved. While Amon, and all the impenitent, are lost. As none should despair, so none must presume. All mercy to the chief of sinners, no mercy to the least of sins. Let the penitent rejoice, for 'there is forgiveness with God.' Let the impenitent tremble, for 'except we repent, we shall all likewise perish.'

PRAYER.

Gracious God! we desire this evening, in our family circle, to worship thee, our Father and our Friend, and to give thee thanks for all the blessings of the day. Thou art the one living and true God. Blessed be thy name for allowing us to meet at the family altar, to supplicate and obtain thy blessing. We bless thee for entering into covenant with Abraham, and saying, I will be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. Whilst we bless thee for Jesus Christ, and pray that in him all the nations of the earth may be blessed, and whilst we beseech thee to grant us individually an interest in the Redeemer, we humbly intreat that thou wouldst bless us as a family. O may there be no wicked Manasseh, no impenitent Amon, amongst us, or those with whom we are connected. May there be no wicked parents of good children, no wicked children of righteous parents. May the root and branches alike be holy. And to this end may we all be in Christ, as living branches of the true and living vine. May the promise be to us and to our children. Believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, may we be saved, with our house. O satisfy us truly with thy mercy, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days. Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. Even though not idolators, we are sinners, like Manasseh. But we bless thee that he repented. O may we repent with him. Have mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us. Enable us to say with thy servant of old, Thou art our portion, O Lord: I have said that I would keep thy words. I entreated thy favour with my whole heart; be merciful unto me, according to thy word. I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies. I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments. For the sake of Him who died that we might live, forgive us all our iniquity, especially the sins we may this day have committed in thought and in deed. We would humble ourselves before thee. O when we pray, do thou be entreated of us and hear our supplication. Save us, we beseech thee. May we know that the Lord he is God. O grant us repentance towards God, and faith towards the Lord Jesus Christ. Sorrowing for sin, may we yet trust in the Saviour. Esteeming it as a faithful saying, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom we are chief, may we bring forth fruits meet for repentance. Forbid that, like Amon, we should continue impenitent, to perish in our sins. May we be washed, and sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. Being made free from sin, and become servants of God, may we have our fruit unto holiness, and our end everlasting life. Bless all whom we ought to remember before thee; all who have none to help them; all the ends of the earth. Take us under the shelter of thy wings this night. Grant us the sleep of thy beloved; and when we sleep with our fathers, may we sleep in Jesus. Hear us for his blessed sake. Our Father, &c.

SATURDAY MORNING.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XVI. 1—25.

REMARKS.

Paul (with Silas) is now in Lycaonia (in Asia Minor); his route will be traced by reference to the map. At either Derbe or Lystra—neighbouring towns—he falls in with Timothy, his young son in the faith. If, (ver. 3.) he agreed in his case to do what he had refused in that of Titus, he is chargeable with no inconsistency, clearly acting on the scriptural principle, that we ought alike to make concessions in matters of indifference, and maintain with uncompromising strictness the essentials of religion. Ver. 9. Why did the Spirit debar them from proconsular Asia and from Bithynia? Behold the reason here. He had work for them elsewhere; blessed be God, in our quarter of the globe, if not in this distant island of the Gentiles itself. We have here the introduction of the gospel into Europe. Luke now introduces himself: 'we endeavoured to go into Macedonia.' And now they have safely landed at (the Roman colony of) Philippi. How wonderful the way of providence! Here, led by the Spirit who had brought them hither, they went on the sabbath out of the city by the river—Strymar—a small stream which runs by Philippi. Here (as was usual in such places) 'was a proseucha,' a house of prayer; for so the expression (ver. 13.) may read. (Note. The Jews had frequently synagogues or proseuchæ in the provinces, the latter generally on the banks of rivers.) Here they sat down, it being the custom of Jewish doctors to sit, their disciples standing; as we read of our Saviour on the mount. They then 'spoke unto the women,' the sexes having probably different hours of assembling, as the place was likely too small for both. Behold now the happy result and divine object of their visit—the conversion of Lydia! This female, chosen by grace, was a worshipper of God; no Christian indeed, yet no idolator. 'She heard'—us being supplied. Luke's humility, even though he had spoken, would not have allowed him to mention the fact. And not in vain. 'The Lord opened her heart.' Whitby says, 'to open the ear is to make willing,' Psal. xl. 6. By pride, prejudice, and passion, our minds are as if hermetically sealed against the gospel of Christ. Our understandings must be opened to his light, our wills to his law, our hearts to his love. In all these ways was Lydia influenced, though yet her heart and affections were chiefly engaged. As 'she heard' the external call of the gospel, she was 'called effectually' by the 'Lord the Spirit.' 'Convinced of sin and misery, enlightened in the knowledge of the Saviour, renewed in will, she was persuaded and enabled to put her faith and trust in Jesus.' Devout and amiable, she was a stranger to true religion, till the Lord was pleased to open her heart. Our hearts are naturally closed against the gospel. We neither know nor love it. Nay, we are averse to God and goodness; we love the darkness. Hence it is, that 'except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' Our darkened understandings must be enlightened, our perverted wills must be renewed, our corrupted hearts and affections must be sanctified. Now it is God alone who can effect the change. Behold the effect. Lydia had 'heard' before; now she 'attends to' the word; to outward attendance, adding spiritual 'attention;' some say, applying it to herself, or rather, applying herself to it, with prayer, humility, faith, and love. Accordingly she was baptized, and her household; as adult converts, being believers, and the children of believing parents, are alike to be baptized. As still farther evidence of conversion, she constrained the apostles to accept her hospitality. The sequel is less pleasing, and is an affecting contrast to the history of Lydia; yet shows the power of God, in enabling his servants to cast out the evil spirit out of the damsel that was possessed, though it provoked the hostility of her masters, and excited against them a violent persecution.

Improvement.—I. The case of Lydia teaches us the use of means. 1. They are most important. Ask, and ye shall receive. The man at Bethesda was cured after thirty-eight years. Lydia heard, 'and the Lord opened her heart.' 2. Still they are but means. It is only sovereign grace which can make them effectual. The work of Lydia's conversion was that of God alone. II. Again, the history of the apostles' persecution shows that he that is after the flesh persecuteth him that is after the Spirit; and this may prove it is only through much tribulation we can enter into the kingdom of heaven.

PRAYER.

Heavenly Father! we bless thee this morning for the privilege of prayer. And in its exercise may we obtain the blessing. May the means of grace inspire us with the hope of glory. We bless thee for the resistless yet persuasive efficacy of thy Holy Spirit. O thou who wast pleased to open the heart of Lydia, that she attended to the things which were spoken of Paul, be pleased, we beseech thee, to open our eyes to see the wonders of thy law. May we receive thy Holy Spirit, to know the things that are freely given to us of thee. May the Spirit take of the things of Christ, and show them unto us. As we are called externally in the gospel, may we obtain the effectual calling of thy Holy Spirit. Convince us, we pray thee, of our sin and misery, enlighten our minds in the knowledge of Christ, renew our wills, persuade and enable us to receive Jesus Christ, as he is freely offered to us in the gospel. Worshipping thee in spirit and in truth, and receiving thy word of truth, with prayer, and faith, and love, converted unto thee, may we be edified in holiness and comfort, through faith unto salvation. As we have all been baptized with water, may we be born of the Spirit. May we be faithful to the Lord. May we put all our faith and trust in Jesus. May we trust in him for both pardon and purity. We bless thee for showing us the way of salvation. Look thou upon us and be merciful unto us, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name. Order our steps in thy word; and let not any iniquity have dominion over us. May we rely on Jesus, as our prophet, priest, and king, for wisdom, righteousness, and sanctification. Whilst we look to him for mercy to pardon, may we look on high too for might to subdue our sin, and strive in a better strength than our own, even the imparted aid of an almighty arm, to wage with it a constant warfare, till victory declare for grace in the glory of heaven. Deliver us from the evil one. Put thy fear in our hearts, that we may not depart from thee. May we have the Spirit of Christ, and thus being the sons of God, and the brethren of Christ, if we are destined to pass through tribulation, may we be admitted to serve thee day and night in thy temple. We thank thee for the light of another day. Keep us from sin and danger this day. Lift on us the light of thy countenance. Direct, control, suggest, all we think, or say, or do. May all our powers unite in thy glory. May we acknowledge thee in all our ways, and do thou direct our paths. Bless us and all men, more than we can ask, for the Redeemer's sake. Our Father, &c.

SATURDAY EVENING.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XVI. 25—40.

REMARKS.

And now the apostles might naturally be expected to give way to feelings of despondency, if not vexation and revenge; but O! the power of grace. Their midnight occupation was prayer and praise. Praying, they praised God. 'Prayer all their business, all their pleasure praise!' It was said by a heathen writer of the early Christians, they sung a hymn, or praise, to Christ as God. Is any among you afflicted? let him pray; is any merry? (and they gloried even in their tribulation) let him sing psalms. Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving. Praise and prayer are alike constituent parts of devotion. Even when the importance of prayer is admitted, as none will deny it but in practice, the equal importance of praise is sometimes overlooked. Paul and Silas sung in the midnight gloom of a dungeon. Nor did they sing faintly: 'the prisoners heard them.' Ay, and God heard them; he sent an answer of peace. Yet, it was not the still small voice. He who speaks in the whirlwind, sent a great earthquake; his voice, his answer to their prayer. Roused from his sleep, and supposing his prisoners to have escaped, the jailor was about to attempt self-destruction. The apostle discovers his fatal intention, either from his exclamations, or from a divine monition. The kind address of his prisoners, still his prisoners, in connection with the obvious interposition of Jehovah, overwhelms him with mingled feelings of anxiety, of hope and despair; and evidently relenting, he brings them out, comes trembling, and asks respectfully, yet earnestly, 'Sirs, what must I do to be saved?' Observe his question. Mark the feelings it expresses. It is the language of terror. He came trembling. He is afraid of instantly sinking into hell. It is the language of anxiety. He feels the importance of salvation. He prefers the soul to the body, eternity

to time, heaven to hell, and Christ to Belial. It is the language of conviction. He feels he is a sinner; a violator of God's holy law, that transcript of his moral perfections. He feels that he has not only endangered himself, but especially offended God, that he has incurred his wrath and curse, and can do nothing to avert them, much less to regain his favour. But it is the language, lastly, of hope. Though he does all, yet he does not altogether despair. While he feels most imminent danger, he yet conceives some faint, at least, some distant hope of safety; he hopes he may be saved—'what must I do to be saved? Observe the import of the question. He wants salvation, not the world, but heaven, deliverance from sin, and that in respect of both its guilt and power together. 'What shall I do?' he says; religion is a personal concern. He feels with the prodigal, 'I have sinned;' with the publican, 'me, me a sinner!' Do; what can we do? Did the jailor think, with the young ruler, that he could 'do some good thing?' No, he felt his need of salvation, his need of a Saviour, and he resigned himself to him, he submitted to the gospel; 'what must I do?' He was willing to do any thing. O brethren, have we proposed this question to ourselves? If so, have we proposed it in spirit and in truth? We must propose it in a spirit of sincerity. Even the ruler went as far as that. Sincerity is the first step to religion. Unless we are in earnest, we know nothing of the matter. But sincerity is not enough. We must propose the question in a spirit of conviction. We must come as sinners to the only Saviour. Such is the question. The answer follows: 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ.' 'Believe, and be saved!'

But, 'thou shalt be saved and thy house.' Not that the faith of the jailor, strictly to speak, directly involved the salvation of his family. But indirectly, at least it did; as it introduced them to the means of grace, and thus the hope of glory. But may we not warrantably conclude, that there is even a direct and immediate connection between the faith of a parent, and the salvation of his children? 'I will be a God to thee and to thy seed after thee!' 'The promise is to you, and to your children.'

PRAYER.

O Lord our God! we would desire, at the end of another day and week, to approach thy throne. Grant us the spirit of Paul and Silas. And O when we think of the power of religion to support in every situation, forbid that when they were content to sing in a dungeon, we should ever be reluctant to praise thee in our family. But lo! O Lord, another voice than theirs. That voice is thine. Thou speakest in the earthquake, as in the whirlwind. Thy voice divides the flames of fire. Thy voice is full of majesty. O we would think of the methods of thy grace, converting, now in the earthquake, now with the still small voice. However it may be, O Lord, may we be converted. To this end, O Lord, may we be convinced of our sin. May we be in earnest regarding the salvation of our souls. And may we see that we cannot save ourselves. O whilst we say, in anxious and earnest desire for salvation, yet not in the self-justifying spirit of the ruler, What good thing must we do, to have eternal life? may we say, in all the conviction of guilt and impotence, if not with all the alarm of the jailor, What must we do to be saved? We have sinned, and committed iniquity, and done wickedly, and rebelled. O give us a heartfelt sense of sin, in both its guilt and power. Feeling that we are great sinners, may we know and rejoice that Christ is a great and mighty Saviour. May we believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, that we may be saved. With repentance toward thee, may we have faith towards Jesus. May we put all our trust and confidence in him for salvation. Trusting in Christ, yet seeking to be holy, may we say in faith, We have longed for thy salvation, and thy law is our delight. Let our souls live, and they will praise thee; and let thy judgments help us. We have gone astray like lost sheep; seek thy servants, that we may never forget thy commandments. Grant us an interest in that twofold redemption from condemnation and corruption which he purchased by his blood, and lives to perfect by his Spirit, and dispose us ever, by thy heavenly grace, to the assiduous pursuit of that holiness which they are equally intended to produce. And, O Lord, with the jailor, may we obtain thy blessing as a family. Believing on Jesus, may thy servant be saved with his house. As we have all been baptized, O may we be born again; the children of God—a family in heaven. Enable us to rejoice, believing in God, and believing in Christ. Bless our country, our sovereign, and the church; the young, the aged, the afflicted, and the dying; our friends, our enemies, and all the ends of the earth. Watch over us this night. May we fear the grave no more than our bed. Raise us in the morning, if it be thy blessed will, and with the light of thy day may the light of thy countenance shine on us. Conduct us by thy counsel while we live. Receive us to thy glory when we die, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ. Our Father, &c.

TWENTY-SEVENTH WEEK.SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXVIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXIX.

REMARKS.

Jeremiah has been supposed to have written this song of Zion, as the sixth and seventh verses correspond with Jer. x. 25. 'Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the families that call not on thy name: for they have eaten up Jacob and devoured him, and consumed him and made his habitation desolate.' But whoever was the author of this psalm, it appears to have been composed after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The inheritance of Jacob was then invaded by the army of the Chaldees. The holy temple was polluted by the presence of ungodly men, who plundered it, and reduced it to ashes. The city of God was laid waste. Many of its inhabitants were mercilessly slain. And, with the exception of a small remnant, they whose lives were spared, were conducted as captives to Babylon, where they had 'threats of cruel mockings,' 2 Kings xxv. 2 Chron. xxxvi. During the long period of their captivity, when they sat down by the rivers of Babylon, and wept when they remembered Zion, these Jewish exiles, no doubt, often prayed that the anger of the Lord might be withdrawn from them, and that he would bring them back to the land of their 'fathers' sepulchres.' Affliction has often a salutary effect on the hearts and consciences of those who have forsaken God in the days of their prosperity. It subdues pride. It gives rise to serious thoughts. It brings the commission of sin to remembrance, and through the grace of God, leads to unfeigned repentance. In their low and degraded state therefore, the people of God are represented in this psalm as praying, not only that they might be delivered from the oppression of their enemies, but that they might experience the blessedness of those whose transgressions are forgiven, and whose sin is covered. It is well when they whom God corrects are thus led to consider their ways. 'Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted.' Nor was their sad case forgotten by the psalmist, who, like Zedekiah, were 'bound in affliction and iron.' But are we not commanded to love our enemies, to bless them that curse us, and to pray for them that despitefully use and persecute us? How then does the psalmist pray that God would pour out his 'wrath upon the heathen,' and render 'seven-fold into their bosom their reproach?' These supplications are evidently prompted by his zeal for the divine glory. They are not the unhallowed ebullitions of a vindictive spirit. The desire of the psalmist is that by the punishment of the enemies of his nation, God may 'be known among the heathen,' and that they may be visited with the 'reproach wherewith they have reproached' him. It is to be observed too, that he does not pray for their spiritual destruction. He does no more, therefore, than pious Christians do when engaged in the prosecution of a war which they consider to be unavoidable or lawful. They consider it to be their duty to pray, that the designs of the enemies of their country may be defeated, and that the Lord of hosts may fight for them in the day of battle. As he spake by inspiration, it is in truth not the words of man, but of the Spirit of God. At the close of the psalm, anticipating that God will be gracious and merciful, the psalmist expresses his own pious resolution, and that of his countrymen, to offer to God continually the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. But who is there that has not cause to praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works done to the children of men? In these latter days, he has sent his Son into the world, to deliver us from the bondage of satan, and to save us from spiritual death. Let us, therefore, bless the Lord at all times. Let his praise be continually in our mouths. Let us present ourselves before him as living sacrifices, holy and acceptable to him, which is our reasonable service.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we humble ourselves before thee, as the King of kings, and the Lord of lords. Thou dost according to thy pleasure in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. Thou woundest and thou healest. Thou castest down and thou raisest up. Thou killest and thou makest alive. Have mercy upon us, O God, for thy mercies' sake, for we are brought very low. Return, O Lord, and let it repent thee concerning thy servants, and restore to us the joy of thy salvation. In wrath remember mercy. Thou didst make man but a little lower than the angels, and didst crown him with glory and with honour. But our glory has departed. Our sins have provoked thy displeasure. We have been justly driven from thy presence, and have been led captive by the god of this world, and by our own evil desires and inclinations. Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned. Heal us, and we shall be healed. Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name, and deliver us and purge away our sins for thy name's sake. We thank thee for this day of rest unto the body. May it be a day of rest unto our souls. May we be filled with that peace which the world cannot give nor take away. Though we are in the body, may our conversation be with thee in heaven. We rejoice to know that he who was delivered for our offences, and rose again for our justification, now sitteth at thy right hand making intercession for us. Confirm our faith in him, O God, and grant that our faith may work by love; purify our hearts, and enable us to overcome the world. Deliver us, we beseech thee, from that fear of death, through which many are, all their lifetime, subject to bondage. And when we shall have finished our course, grant that we may enter into that rest which remaineth for the people of God. Do thou prepare the hearts of thy worshippers everywhere for the service of thy house. O send forth thy light and thy truth, let them lead them and bring them into thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacle. Let their praises come up before thee as incense, and let the lifting up of their hands be as the morning sacrifice. And vouchsafe to give the tongue of the learned to them to whom thou hast committed the word of reconciliation, that they may know how to speak a word in season to them that are weary. Draw nigh, O God, to them who share not the joy of those who rejoice because it is said unto them, Let us go up unto the house of God. Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee: according to the greatness of thy power, preserve thou them that are appointed to die. May thy kingdom come. May thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Let these, the words of our mouth, O Lord, and the meditations of our heart, find acceptance with thee through Christ, our strength and Redeemer. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXX. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXX.

REMARKS.

The symbolical forms which were placed over the mercy-seat or cover of the ark, in the holy of holies, were called the cherubim. God is therefore said to dwell 'between the cherubims,' because it was there that the miraculous light was seen which was emblematical of the divine presence. When the Israelites were marching through the wilderness, 'Ephraim, and Benjamin, and Manasseh,' were the three tribes that immediately followed the ark and the cherubim. It would seem to be on this account that God is intreated to 'shine forth before' them in particular, and to 'come and save' his people. God brought the seed of Israel out of Egypt, he planted them in the promised land. He built for them fenced cities. He watered them with the dew of heaven. Their nation increased. They spread over the neighbouring kingdoms. But when God 'looked that his vineyard should bring forth grapes, it brought forth wild grapes.' To punish his people for their idolatry, God allowed their adversaries to ravage their land, to which he had been a strong tower, and a wall of defence. The psalmist accordingly complains that the 'hedges' of the vineyard of the Lord of hosts had been 'broken down,' that 'the boar out of the wood' had wasted it, that 'the wild beast of the field' had devoured it, and that it had been 'burnt with fire.'

He also beseeches God to lift upon them again the light of his countenance, and vows that they will not again return to folly. Whether this psalm was written or not, as some have imagined, after the invasion of the land of Judah by Sennacherib king of Assyria, and whether or not he is the person whom the psalmist describes as 'the boar out of the wood,' there can be no doubt of this at least, that the name is descriptive of Nebuchadnezzar. We may readily believe, therefore, that the Jews whom Nebuchadnezzar led away into captivity, must have considered the other parts of the psalm to be equally applicable to the desolate state of the country in these days, and to their own wretched condition. If again, as some suppose it was to an earthly king, that, in the first instance, the psalmist referred when he said, 'let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the Son of man whom thou madest strong for thyself,' there are, nevertheless, few who will not discover in these words a reference, either typical or direct to 'Messiah, the Prince' of peace, who was at once, and in a sense peculiar to himself, 'the Son of man,' and the Son of God. But like the Jewish church, the Christian church has, in various parts of the world, and during different periods of its history, been despoiled and trodden down. Some goodly branches have been cut off by the sword of the persecutor. The very form of Christianity has been rooted out from some parts of the earth, where formerly it flourished, and produced much fruit as 'a plant of renown.' We know not what may be the future condition of our own church, and our own country. The hand of the persecutor may again be red with the blood of the saints. Let us beware lest by our sins we should provoke God to say, 'And now go to, I will tell you what I will do to my vineyard. I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up, and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down. And I will lay it waste: it shall not be pruned nor digged; but there shall come up briers and thorns: I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it,' Isa. v. 5, 6. When God brought Christianity to this island, he 'cast out the heathen, and planted it.' It has since 'sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches' to the ends of the earth, and we have sat under our own vine, and under our own fig-tree, none making us afraid. Surely it becomes us to be grateful to him who is the Lord of the vineyard, for his goodness to us, and to bring forth fruit meet for repentance. 'Herein,' said Christ, 'is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit,' John xv. 8.

PRAYER.

Give ear, O God, to our humble prayers. Thou that dwellest between the cherubims, lift upon us the light of thy countenance. Thou ledest thy people like a flock by the hands of Moses and Aaron; our fathers trusted in thee. They cried unto thee and were delivered. They trusted in thee and were not confounded. Thou didst plant man a noble vine wholly a right seed, but he turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine. We are the corrupt offspring of a corrupt parent. We thank thee, O God, that thou hast not rooted us out as trees which cumber the ground. Thou hast spared us, that we might bring forth fruit meet for repentance. We thank thee for the privileges thou hast bestowed upon us. Thou hast caused those good tidings to be proclaimed in our hearing, which the Son of man came into the world to publish. We thank thee for our sabbaths, and for bringing us to thy holy mountain, and making us joyful in thy house of prayer. How unworthy have we proved ourselves to be of the least of thy mercies. It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. Turn us again, O God of hosts, and cause thy face to shine upon us and we shall be saved. Enter not into judgment with thy servants, for in thy sight shall no flesh living be justified. O grant that we may experience the blessedness of those whose transgressions are forgiven, and whose sin is covered. May we be washed, and sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. Destroy in us every root of bitterness, and every seed of corruption, and produce in us all the fruits of the Spirit. Forgive, O God, what thou hast seen amiss in the performance of the duties of this holy day. In many things we all offend, and in all we come short of thy glory. Seal, we beseech thee, upon our hearts the instructions we have this day received, and grant that we may grow daily in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Watch over us during the week. Fit us for the discharge of the duties we may be called upon to perform, and prepare us for the trials which may be awaiting us. In thy great mercy, O God, deprive us not of any of our spiritual privileges. Enable us to value them and to improve them more than we have hitherto done. Quicken us, and we will call upon thy name. And being made free from sin, may we have our fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. Protect, O God, the church which thou hast planted among us, from the assaults of its enemies. Do thou cause it to take deep root, and to fill the land, that we may sit under its shadow with great delight, and that its fruit may be pleasant to our taste. We pray that thou wouldst communicate to other nations the spiritual advantages we have so long enjoyed. May the time soon come, when ignorance, idolatry, and unbelief shall be rooted out from the earth, and when the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. Bow down thine ear, O God, and hear and answer us for the sake of him whom thou hearest always, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 9.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XXII.

REMARKS.

In this chapter there is an account of the reign of one of the most excellent of the Jewish kings. Josiah ascended the throne at a very early age. But, notwithstanding his youth, and the wicked example which had been set before him by his father, he resisted the allurements of a court, and was proof against the temptations of sovereign power. The instructions of a pious mother are of inestimable value. Let a father neglect to train up a child in the way he should go; nevertheless, if a mother perform her duty, we may expect that, through the divine blessing, her judicious and affectionate labours will be attended with the happiest results. It is probable that Jedediah was such a mother, and that it was from her Josiah received his first serious impressions, and imbibed those good principles that guided his public and private conduct through life. The case of Josiah may show that, even while their offspring are yet in their childhood, parents may do much to form their characters and habits, and communicate to them that knowledge which makes wise unto salvation. 'Whom shall he teach knowledge,' asks the prophet Isaiah, (chap. xxviii. 9.) 'and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? Them that are weaned from the milk and drawn from the breasts.' Let parents therefore teach diligently their children, when they sit with them in their house, and walk with them by the way, and when they lie down, and when they rise up, Deut. vi. 7. The seed that is thus sown may lie dormant for a time, but being quickened by the Holy Spirit it may afterwards spring up, even when the sower has gone the way of all the earth, and bring forth fruit unto eternal life. It is not to be supposed that Josiah was unacquainted with the writings of Moses till the eighteenth year of his reign. The part he acted previous to this is inconsistent with such a supposition. 'The book of the law' which Hilkiah the high priest found in the temple, and which Shaphan the scribe showed to the king, was, there can be little doubt, that authentic copy of the law, which, by the command of God, Moses laid up in the most holy place, Deut. xxxi. 24. And the part of the book which Shaphan read in the presence of the king, appears to have been the twenty-ninth chapter of Deuteronomy, in which it is declared that calamities of various kinds would befall those who should not keep the commandments and statutes of the Lord. When the attention of Josiah was thus solemnly directed to the words of the book of the law, 'he was overwhelmed with fear and grief, being convinced that God might justly visit his apostate people with the judgments he had threatened.' 'By the law, says the apostle, 'is the knowledge of sin,' Rom. iii. 20. 'The word of God,' he also says, 'is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart,' Heb. iv. 12. 'The word of God points out to us the path of duty, and it makes known to us the consequences of disobedience. It also brings our sins before us. Let us therefore 'search the scriptures.' We may thus be led to humble ourselves, like Josiah, before God, and to present to him the sacrifice of broken and contrite hearts. And if we read, like Shaphan, the word of God to others, we may be the means of convincing them of their guilt and danger, and of leading them to inquire what they must do to be saved. 'Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?' Jer. xliii. 29.

PRAYER.

Almighty and everlasting Father, we come before thee this morning, to present to thee the tribute of thanksgiving and praise. It well becomes us, O Lord, to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night. Every day will we bless thee, and praise thy name for ever and ever. We bless thee, O Lord, for the place which thou hast assigned to us among the creatures thou hast made. Thou hast given to us more knowledge than the beasts of the earth, and made us wiser than the fowls of heaven. We bless thee for that book in which thou hast revealed to us thy will, and pointed out to us the way of salvation. We pray, O Lord, that our understandings may be opened, so that we may understand the scriptures. May they be profitable to us for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness. May we be deeply humbled under the conviction that we are by nature the children of wrath, even as others. Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou us from secret faults. We disclaim all confidence in our own wisdom, our own righteousness, and our own strength. Our sufficiency is in thee alone. Our hope is in our Saviour, in whom it pleased thee, the Father, all fullness should dwell. O grant that out of his fullness we may receive, and grace for grace. May we obtain redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, and being justified by faith, may we have peace with thee, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and rejoice in hope of the glory that is yet to be revealed. And grant that the hope which maketh not ashamed may support us under the various trials of life, and constrain us to purify ourselves even as thou art pure. Enable us, O God, to walk in all thy ordinances and commandments blameless. Guard us from the influence of evil communications. Though iniquity abounds, may our love not wax cold. Deliver us from the evil of our own hearts and from the devices of our spiritual enemies. Give unto us the wisdom which cometh from above, which is pure and peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, without partiality and without hypocrisy, full of mery and good fruits. Bless, O God, the labours of those faithful men who are employed in building up the walls of Zion. May thy house be a house of prayer for all people. Impress the minds of Christian parents with a sense of the solemn obligations thou hast laid upon them, to bring up their children in thy nurture and admonition. And teach the young to remember thee, their Creator, in the days of their youth, before the evil days come, or the years draw nigh when they shall say, We have no pleasure in them. We commend to thee, Father of mercies, all those who have eaten the bread of tears. Teach them to cast their care upon thee, and enable them to possess their souls in patience. Appoint unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and a garment of praise for a spirit of heaviness. Let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end, and establish thou the outgoings of the righteous. Hear, O God, in heaven thy dwelling-place, these our humble prayers, and send us an answer of peace, through Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—Acts xvii. 1—21.

REMARKS.

Before Christ came into the world, many of the sayings of the prophets respecting him were very imperfectly understood. The reference of others to him was not even known. Hence the Jews did not expect that the Messiah, promised to their fathers, was to be treated by men as an outcast, and crucified as a malefactor. 'Christ crucified,' was to them 'a stumbling-block.' It was for this reason the uniform practice of the apostle Paul, as we are informed in this chapter, to reason with the Jews 'out of the scriptures, opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead.' As the arguments of the apostle, however, did not always produce conviction on the minds of the prejudiced hearers, but called forth opposition and subjected him to persecution, ministers ought not to be discouraged, though, like him, they may often be unsuccessful, and have charges brought against them of a false and malignant character. When Paul came to Berea, he found that the Jews there possessed much more candour, and a more earnest desire to know the truth, than their countrymen in Thessalonica. They were not disposed, however, to believe what was stated to them without inquiry. They examined the scriptures for themselves, and after comparing what Paul preached with that which they saw written in the word of God, 'many of them believed; also of honourable women, which were Greeks, and of men not a few.' We may be reminded by this, that we ought to call no man upon earth master, and that the doctrines preached by those who profess to be ministers of Christ, ought always to be subjected to the test of scripture. 'To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them,' Isa. viii. 20. 'I speak as to wise men, judge ye what I say,' 1 Cor. x. 15. The conduct of the Jews in Berea may likewise show us that it is a duty to search the scriptures daily. When this is done, we are reminded daily of our sinfulness, and thereby kept humble; we are reminded of our constant exposure to temptation, and thereby rendered circumspect and watchful, while our faith and hope and love are cherished and strengthened. After Paul left Berea, he proceeded to Athens. This city was famed in those days for the eloquence of its orators, the skill and ingenuity of its artists, the valour of its generals, and the wisdom of its philosophers. It might have been supposed, therefore, that the minds of its inhabitants would have been less under the influence of degrading superstition than the minds of some of their less refined neighbours. But professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator. Proud of their supposed intellectual superiority, some philosophers of the Epicurean and Stoic schools contemptuously styled Paul a 'babbler.' But they unquestionably might more appropriately have been called babblers, whose science was 'falsely so called,' and whose wisdom was 'foolishness with God.' Their own writers declare that the Athenians were the most superstitious people in all Greece, and that altars and statues of gods were to be seen there which were to be found no where else.

PRAYER.

Who, O Lord, is a God like unto thee? The heavens declare thy glory. The firmament showeth forth thy handy-work. The things that are made reveal thine eternal power and Godhead. Nor hast thou ever left thyself without a witness of thy goodness, in that thou hast given to us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. We thank thee, O God, that when the foolish heart of man was darkened, and when the world by wisdom knew thee not, it pleased thee to send thy Son into the world, to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel. O God, grant that our darkened minds may be enlightened by him in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Give unto us the humility of little children, that we may not lean to our own understanding, but receive with meekness the ingrafted word, that we may grow thereby. O Lord, we acknowledge in thy presence our manifold transgressions. Thou art our Father, and where has been thine honour? Thou art our Master, and where has been thy fear? Thou hast caused the Day-spring from on high to visit us, but our progress in knowledge and righteousness has not corresponded with our means of spiritual improvement. Forgive, O God, the misuse of our time and our talents. May we be washed from our sins in that fountain which is opened up for sin and for uncleanness. And we pray that henceforward we may be strengthened with all might by thy Spirit in the inner man, that Christ may dwell in our hearts by faith, and that we may be enabled to walk as the children of the light and the children of the day, redeeming the time, because the days are few and evil. Subdue, O God, we beseech thee, our rebellious wills. Purify our sinful desires and affections. Lead us humbly and patiently to acquiesce in all the appointments of thy inscrutable providence, and to say, Good is the will of the Lord. Forbid that we should ever render evil for evil. May the same mind be in us which was in Christ Jesus. And grant that we ever may esteem the riches of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. Prepare us, we beseech thee, for the hour of death. Believing in him who is the resurrection and the life, may we fear no evil. May our latter end be peace. Show mercy, O Lord, to our friends and kindred. May we and they be fellow-workers together with thee, and heirs together of the grace of life. Clothe thy priests with salvation. Let thy saints shout aloud for joy. May that righteousness extend more and more among us which alone exalteth a nation. And do thou hasten the time when we shall no longer need to teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; but when all shall know thee, from the least even to the greatest. Hear us, O God, and accept of our persons and services, for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVII. 37—40.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XXIII.

REMARKS.

Josiah having had a respite granted to him, resolved, as we see from this chapter, to make the most of the time that might be given him for the reformation of his subjects and the glory of God. His conduct was just such as will be pursued by every one whose heart has been touched by godly sorrow for sin. The genuine penitent will immediately show his repentance practically in regard to himself, and by zealous efforts for the good of others. Josiah, accordingly, lost no time in calling the people together, and, after reading the threatenings of the law to them, bound them in covenant along with himself, henceforth to worship and serve the Lord. What a beautiful spectacle was that of the young king reading the book of God to his assembled subjects, young and old, acting as ‘a preacher of righteousness,’ and ‘persuading’ them, ‘by the terror of the Lord,’ to repent of their sins. O that all who are in stations of authority and influence would follow his example! And there is almost no man, however humble in rank, who has not a something in his power in this way for which he must render an account unto God. Every person, in his own family and neighbourhood, and circle of acquaintance, may and ought to check and reprove irreligion and vice, to warn and admonish offenders, and to use whatever authority and influence he may possess in leading the young and ignorant, and in constraining the indifferent and unwilling to worship and fear God, and keep his commandments.

Josiah’s whole reign appears to have been spent in putting down idolatry, in clearing the land of the abominations by which it was defiled, and in bringing his subjects back to the worship and service of the living God. What a revolting picture do the details of his reforms give us of the corruption and wickedness of God’s chosen people, fully as hideous as that presented to us by any profane historian of the religion and morals of ancient times! But in case our faith should be disturbed by this circumstance, let us consider, and we will see, that, in place of discrediting, it tends much to confirm the truth of the sacred records, that they give a plain and unhesitating statement of all this contradiction and unseemliness. While they hold up the Jews as the peculiar people of God, to whom his oracles were committed, and through whom the world was to be blessed, they make no attempt to conceal their faults, and lose no opportunity of indicating how inherently undeserving they were of the divine preference, and that the distinction which they enjoyed flowed entirely from the sovereign choice and free grace of God.

The zealous efforts of the king for the reformation of his subjects, were, for the time, outwardly and partially at least, successful; and after a certain period, he felt himself authorized to command, with due and solemn preparation, befitting such an ordinance, the observance of the passover. But it is beyond the power of any person to make his dearest friend religious and devout—to bring his father or his mother, his brother or his sister, his wife or his children, to genuine repentance, and the love and fear of God. We can only do our duty by using the means, and must leave the rest to God, with a prayer for his blessing. Josiah did this, and he could do no more. And though the people yielded external obedience to kingly authority, their hearts were not, in general, turned towards God; and amidst all their time-serving compliance, the cup of their guilt was swelling to the brim, and the judgments of heaven were lowering over them. But Josiah being slain in battle with the king of Egypt at Megiddo, beyond the boundaries of his own kingdom, and in what may be called a foreign war, was ‘taken away from the evil to come.’

‘Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for,’ however prematurely, and by whatever stroke he may die, ‘the end of that man is peace.’ ‘Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them.’

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the God who didst choose thy people the Jews to be the depositaries of thy knowledge, worship, and will. We rejoice that, besides those indications of thy presence, power, and goodness, which abound all around us, thou didst reveal thyself to thy servant Moses, and spakest to the fathers by the prophets. We thank thee for that record which thou hast given us, of thy dealings with thine ancient people. Bless the portion of it now read for our growth in knowledge, in understanding, and the fear of the Lord. Make us to see, from the idolatry and sinfulness of the Jews, that they were chosen and favoured by thee in the simple exercise of thy sovereign mercy and free grace. May we perceive and feel, from what we have now read, that, whilst thou art very pitiful and of tender mercy, thou art a God of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and wilt by no means clear the guilty. Give us grace to avoid the sins of thy people of old, that we may avoid their punishment. We are, in many respects, guilty as they were, and are, from day to day, the living monuments of thy mercy. While thy judgments are continually suspended over our heads, O teach and impel us to flee from the wrath to come, unto him who is an hiding-place from the tempest, and a covert from the storm—to him who has borne the sins of his people in his own body on the tree, and through whom there is hope even for the chief of sinners. Touch our hearts, as in the case of Josiah of old, with a godly sorrow for sin; and enable us, like him, to bring forth fruits which are meet for repentance. May we, in imitation of his example, be zealous for thy glory, and the spiritual good of our fellow men. And O vouchsafe unto us the promise made to him, and its fulfilment, that thou wouldst not take us from the world till thou hast fitted us for leaving it, and till we are ready, let death come when, and in what form it may, resignedly to leave a scene of trouble and sorrow, and to enter into the rest and peace of the Lord. We thank thee for thy preservation of us through the past night, and for the light and the comforts of a new day. Thou art continually bearing with our sins, guarding us from danger, and saving us from death, and giving us time to repent, because thou art not willing that we should perish. O enable us to live under a sense of thy forbearance, and to improve aright the season of our merciful visitation. Take us into thy keeping through this day; fit us for its duties, and its temptations and trials; preserve us from danger and from sin; suit the communications of thy grace to our several states and circumstances; and may the day not pass without each of us making some progress in the Christian life. O send forth thy light and thy truth to enlighten, and to bless, and to redeem mankind. May those in whom we are more especially interested have an interest in thy Son, and in the riches of thy grace. For ourselves we ask the light of thy countenance, and thy favour and friendship, which are better than life. We commend ourselves, soul and body, to thy keeping. Never leave us nor forsake us, and take not thy Spirit from us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LIV.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XVII. 22—34.

REMARKS.

St Paul's preaching at Athens was a remarkable incident in his life. The Athenians were the most enlightened and polished community of ancient times. But the nations of antiquity—and the fact is conclusive as to the necessity of a divine revelation—in proportion as they advanced in other respects in the career of improvement, fell back, in so far as religion was concerned, into a deeper corruption and gloom. The Athenians were 'wholly given to idolatry,' were 'in all things too superstitious;' or, as most likely the apostle meant to say, were religious to an absurd excess, so much so, that, in case any object of worship known to others might have no place in their well-filled catalogue, they had raised an altar 'to the unknown God.' Whether these words had any reference to the invisible I AM, the God of the Jews, or to his Son Jesus Christ, as yet indistinctly heard of by the Athenians, cannot be satisfactorily ascertained. But, at least, the apostle was perfectly warranted in filling up the blank which had been left; and with a view to procure a ready and patient hearing, he assumes, with admirable ingenuity, that the words which he had read referred to the God whom Jews and Christians worshipped, and whom he preached, the one true and living God, now manifested in the flesh in the person of his Son Jesus Christ. 'Whom,' says he, 'ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you:' and then he proceeds to describe the character and government of that God whom he had now 'declared,' in a manner very different from that in which their own ignorant and conceited philosophers were accustomed to speak.

Let us not think, that, because we are professedly Christian, we are free from the sins of the Athenians of old, and require not to be preached to as they were. Ah, we are all of us like them, too much given to the worship of a multiplicity of inferior deities, setting up altars in the heart to every object of worldly and human desire. Do not too many of us, even with a scrupulous observance of decent forms, worship an 'unknown God,' a God with whose character, and word, and grace, we are but little acquainted, and which, to our shame, we have little wish, and make no effort to know any better? Are not God, and Christ, and the doctrines of grace, to the bulk of those who call themselves disciples of Jesus, mere names without a meaning; and what better are such persons than the Athenians of old, who worshipped 'an unknown God?' God will not now, as in times past, 'wink at this ignorance.' 'He now commands all men everywhere to repent,' and to know and believe in his Son, 'whom to know aright is life eternal.' If we would have any thing more than a mere 'name to live with,' and not be contented 'to perish in ignorance,' be it our prayer unto God, that he himself would enlighten our minds, and touch our hearts, and make us 'wise unto salvation.'

But for this purpose we must not only pray, but use the other appointed means of grace which we enjoy in rich abundance. O let us be thankful for the advantages which we possess above those who were preached to by the apostles of old, and call to mind our responsibility, and diligently use the means, praying all the while to God that he would fulfil his promise, by giving his 'excellent power,' and his 'blessing and increase.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! Whom have we in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth whom our spirits should desire besides thee. We are thy people, and the sheep of thy pasture; and thou art continually blessing us, and doing us good. We thank thee for what of thy providential care and kindness we have this day experienced. Forgive the sins of which we have been guilty, in thought, word, or deed, during this portion of time, and hide not thy face from us because of our unworthiness. We are undeserving of the smallest of thy loving-kindnesses. We thank thee, O Lord, for having provided not only for our bodies, but for our souls; not only for our temporal, but for our spiritual wants. Thou hast sent thy Son into the world to save us; and his body has been broken, and his blood shed, for the remission of our sins. O apply unto our souls, by thy Spirit, the benefits that flow from his sacrifice and finished work. Help our unbelief; and grant that we, being justified by faith, may have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. O Lord, we bless thee for the light of the gospel, and for the means of grace with which we are so richly favoured. While so many of our fellow beings are yet sitting in heathen darkness, or worshipping thee under superstitious forms, we have been taught wherewithal to approach the Lord, and how to bow ourselves down before the most high God. Bless the Lord, O our souls, and forget not all his benefits. And though not now favoured with inspired apostles, we thank thee for the record which thou hast given us of the lives and lessons of those formerly sent—for the holy scriptures, with the liberty and power of perusing them—and for a living ministry of the word, so beautifully suited to our imperfections and our wants, and to which the promise of thy Spirit is annexed. O enable us duly to estimate, and suitably to improve, the means of grace; and let thy blessing rest upon them for the enlightening, and sanctifying, and saving of our souls. Forbid it, we humbly beseech thee, that thy light should shine into our darkness, while our darkness comprehends it not—that amidst means, and professions, and forms, we should be worshipping a God and a Saviour, whom, savingly and practically, we know nothing of. Do thou thyself enlighten our darkness. Make us to know thy Son by the sense of his indwelling presence. Teach us to understand aright the glorious doctrines which he has revealed, and sanctify us by thy truth. Enable us to comply aright with the precepts of his word; and, in the discharge of duty, may his Spirit be a light unto our feet, and a lamp unto our path. Make our path to be that of the just, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. And O may we derive a holier zeal, and a more determined perseverance, from perusing, as we have now been doing, the record of the lives and labours of thy servants the apostles of old, who, filled with thy Spirit, so nobly contended for, and obtained, the crown of victory. Give us grace to walk in the footsteps of those who, through faith and patience, now inherit the promises. Supply us with the whole armour of God, and make us conquerors, and more than conquerors, through him that loved us. During the darkness of night, and the insensibility of sleep, we commit ourselves to thy care, for thou carest for us, and thou, the God who keepest Israel, never slumberest nor sleepest. May we awaken to the light of a new day, refreshed by rest, for the cares and toils of this our land of pilgrimage, and invigorated for the better performance of the duties of the Christian life. In darkness and in light, and by night and day, we desire to put our trust and confidence under the shadow of thy wings. Be thou the rock of our salvation, through Jesus Christ, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXX. 1—4.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XXIV.

REMARKS.

We are informed in the preceding chapter, that the good king Josiah was taken away from sharing in or beholding the judgments that were impending over his country. Previous, however, to the fall and final infliction of God's threatenings, by the destruction of Jerusalem and the Babylonish captivity, there were four short, degrading, and disastrous reigns, each of them in itself a severe and heavy punishment to the Jewish nation. Josiah had four sons, three of whom, as we learn from the close of the preceding chapter, combined with the narrative in this, filled the throne after his death, there being also a short reign immediately before the last, by his grandson Jehoiachin. The brief notices which we have of these princes present a melancholy picture of a falling monarchy, and of a people given up to their own hearts' lusts, and deserted and doomed by God. These kings, though sprung from a worthy sire, were all of them idolatrous, unprincipled, and crouching to their enemies. With regard to all of them in succession, we have the unvarying statement that they 'did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that their fathers had done.'

The books of Kings and Chronicles are merely abridgements, made, it is generally supposed, by Ezra, under the direction of the Spirit of God, of pre-existent and more copious records. And in case any person should think it a task without interest, and of little profit, to review the brief notices set before us in this passage of the lives and reigns of a line of wicked kings, be it remembered that nothing directed to be recorded by the Spirit of God ought to be reckoned dry or uninteresting, and that 'all scripture given by inspiration of God,' is meant and fitted to be 'profitable unto us for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness.' Can it be uninteresting to us to examine the history of that singular people whom God chose for his own, with regard to whom so many prophecies and special dealings are recorded, and from whom has sprung, according to the flesh, the Saviour of the world, 'the light of the Gentiles, and the glory of Israel?' In every page of Jewish history we are listening to the voice of God, or marking the recorded display of his attributes, of his truth and power, of his wisdom and goodness. Let us read every portion of his word reverently, and with a view to profit. Do we not see, from the history of the Jewish kings, that the Almighty ruleth not only in heaven above, but on the earth beneath—that he never speaketh but in truth—and that his arm now can stay? Do we not see, that, while he is 'glorious in holiness,' and 'will by no means clear the guilty,' he is, at the same time, most pitiful, forbearing, and indulgent? Are we not impelled by the record of God's promises and threatenings, of his judgments and mercies, to love, fear, and obey him,—to render ourselves in willing homage to, and to put our trust and confidence in one, who, though his way may be sometimes dark and mysterious to us, always 'doeth that which is right?'

The prominent sin of the Jewish people, and that which more especially brought down the judgments of heaven upon them, was idolatry. Let us not think, that we are free from their guilt in this respect, and have therefore no interest in the threatenings addressed to them, and in the punishment inflicted on them. Ah, there may be idolatry in a thousand vile and debasing shapes, without the formal worshipping of 'stocks and stones.' The Almighty not only requires of us to 'have no other God before him,' but to 'love him with all the heart, and soul, and strength, and mind;' to worship and serve him in sincerity and truth. He is not more displeased, of course, with those who pay homage to outward idols, than with those who obey their own lusts in preference of him; and who draw nigh unto him with the mouth, and honour him with the lips alone, while the heart is far from him.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the King of kings and as the Lord of lords, who doest according to thy will in heaven above, and on the earth beneath. Thou art the supreme disposer of events; and though thy way be sometimes in the cloud, in the tempest, and in the great deep, we rejoice in the consoling assurance and persuasion, that thou, the Judge of all the earth, wilt do that which is right. Thou hast in every age vindicated the majesty of thy character and the purity of thy laws, by the bared arm of thy vengeance. Thou hast made mankind to feel when they have refused to own, that thou rulest in the armies of heaven, and amidst the habitations of men. Thou art a jealous God, who wilt not share thy glory and praise with another. Because thine ancient people provoked thee to anger by their high places, and moved thee to jealousy by their graven images, thou didst deliver their strength unto captivity, and their glory into the enemy's hand. O enable us to love and serve thee, the one true and living God.

through the Saviour and Mediator whom thou hast given us. We confess with shame and confusion of face, that, professing ourselves to be thy worshippers, we have not given ourselves to know, to understand, or to seek after thee. Calling ourselves by the name of Christ, we have not devoted ourselves to his service. We follow the thoughts of the imaginations of our own hearts; allowing the world to have the dominion over us, and being lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. We worship and serve the creature more than the Creator, who is over all, God blessed for ever. O punish us not in thy wrath, but draw us unto thyself with the cords of love and the bands of affection. Turn us, and we shall be turned; draw us, and we will run after thee. Make us willing and obedient in the day of thy power. We rejoice that we have a Surety and Intercessor, with whom thou art ever well pleased and whom thou hearest always. May we be joined to him as our covenant Head, by a true and living faith. May he be formed in our souls the hope of glory, and do thou assimilate us to his holy image. Look upon us in mercy in the face of thine Anointed, and give us the adoption and privileges of thy children. We would know none other save Christ, and him crucified. While others are saying, Who will show us any good? may the language of our souls at all times be, Lord, lift upon us the light of thy countenance. Enable us to count all things as loss, as less than nothing and vanity, in comparison with the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord. We bless thee, O Lord, that on this the morning of another day we are in the land of the living, and the place of hope; that we are again privileged to read thy word, and to address thee in prayer. To whom can we go but unto thee, whose goodness is new to us every morning, and with whom alone are the words of eternal life? Give unto us, from day to day, our daily bread; but more especially nourish and refresh our souls by the communication of thy grace. Whilst thou art giving unto us the light of the natural sun, vouchsafe unto us the healing beams of the Sun of righteousness. Shine into our hearts and make us wise unto salvation. O cause thy kingdom to come and thy will to be done on earth. Forgive our enemies and befriend our friends, and fill the world with the fruits of the Spirit, which are love, and joy, and peace. Enable us throughout this day to live in thy fear, and to thy glory and praise; and keep our feet from falling, and our eyes from tears, for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LIX.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XVIII.

REMARKS.

Let us attend for a little to two or three of the more prominent incidents recorded in this chapter.

1. St Paul, while living with Aquila at Corinth, wrought with his hands for his support. This is not meant to afford a general rule and example for the ministers of the gospel. The care of souls is too important to be interfered with by other cares and toils of a merely temporal and worldly kind. It is the rule of the gospel that the spiritual labourer is to receive an extrinsic support, a support from others who have the benefit of his ministrations. 'The labourer,' said our Lord to the seventy, 'is worthy of his hire;' and St Paul himself (1 Cor. ix. 14) lays it down as a rule, 'that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel.' The apostle's case at Corinth was a special one. He had come to that city a stranger; for some time, it would appear, he was not especially engaged in the work of the ministry, beyond what he could accomplish by his attendance at the synagogue on sabbath days; there was no Christian church as yet in Corinth, whose support he might claim or receive; he was living as a private Christian in the house of Aquila, waiting God's time; and, that he might not be burdensome to a poor and hospitable family, who had given him a kind reception, he wrought with them at their trade of tent-making, which, in conformity with Jewish custom, he had learned in his youth. Let all devout servants of God, when similarly circumstanced, do as he did. It is at once a part of the punishment of the fall, to which we must submit, and a rule of God's providence enforced by precept, with which we are bound to comply, that we are to earn our bread by the sweat of our brow, or by the more fatiguing labours of the mind, by the anxieties and toils of public station and professional life,—that in some shape or other we are to be useful in our day and generation in the world. Let no one be ashamed of honest industry in any of its forms: for there is nothing shameful but idleness or sin. The one of these always leads to, or is produced by, the other.

2. At Corinth, St Paul, when depressed in spirit, had a vision for his encouragement. Besides his more ordinary communications with men, by means of his Spirit, in various modes and with greater or less vividness of excitement and conscious feeling, the Almighty has from time to time made himself more familiarly known to his chosen agents by impressing their senses. St Paul had 'a vision in the night,' that is, he had a visible token of the divine presence, and heard the voice of the Lord, even of that Lord who had spoken to him so strikingly before, and which he could not mistake, saying to him, 'Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace: for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee; for I have much people in this city.' The command here given to the apostle, to persevere in his ministry, is backed by two considerations,—first, an assurance that his Master would co-operate with him and protect him from danger, a promise without which no servant of Christ durst attempt the discharge of his duty; and, secondly, the fact, that though unknown to him, there were many heirs of glory in Corinth, who were to be called to faith and to salvation by his means. 'In that city God had much people,'—his by eternal decree, though still heathen in life and profession, and requiring to be called to the gospel by the preaching of the word: for 'whom he doth predestinate them he also calls.' Let the ministers of Christ take to themselves the exhortation and the encouragements addressed to Paul. They never can know 'the people who are God's' among their audience and flock till they try perseveringly, and are not to estimate the ultimate result of their labours by their vexation and disappointment at any given time. Let them 'not be afraid, but speak, and hold not their peace;' and though they are not to expect any 'vision' for their encouragement, 'the vision' vouchsafed to Paul is recorded for their sakes, and the promise made to him, extends through the Spirit, to them likewise, wherever God 'has people' to be called—that is, wherever there are perishing sinners, who, for any thing that man can know, may be the subjects of divine grace and redeeming love.

3. We see from the case of Apollos, (verses 24—28,) that if we turn what means we enjoy to the right account, more grace shall be given us. Because he had improved aright the ministry and baptism of John, his mind was opened to the enjoyment of gospel light; he was filled with the Spirit, and appointed a fellow-labourer with the apostles. 'He who is faithful over a few things, shall be made ruler over many things.'

PRAYER.

We rejoice in thee, O Lord, as the hearer and answerer of prayer. We would in all things, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, make our requests known unto thee. Teach us to ask of thee aright, and fit us for receiving the blessings which we implore. Give unto us such a portion of temporal and worldly good as thou knowest to be suitable and convenient for us. But above all, give us the pardon of our sins and the salvation of our souls, and a right to the inheritance of the saints in light. Make us to hunger and to thirst for righteousness, that our souls may be filled out of the abundance of thy grace. Dwell in us richly in all wisdom, and furnish us with the gifts of thy Spirit. As the God of providence, thou hast covered the face of nature with thy benefits; thou preservest man and beast, and bountifully suppliest the wants of every living thing. But do thou teach us, thy rational children, to live under the deep impression of the curse pronounced at the fall, that we are to earn our bread by the sweat of our brow. Enable us to comply with the command of thy word, and to use the means presented to us, in the course of thy providence, for procuring our temporal subsistence. Contemplating the example of our Redeemer and his apostles, may we be diligent in our ordinary callings, while we are fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. O enable us to labour not only for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endureth unto everlasting life. Give us grace to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, that all other things may be added unto us. Lord, though we expect not to be favoured, like thy servant the apostle, with any visible sign of thy presence, or with the sound of thy voice, do thou at all times vouchsafe unto us the light of thy reconciled countenance, and the joy of thy directing and consoling Spirit. Yea, cause thy Spirit to witness with ours that we are thy children. Lord, we are living in a world of many difficulties and temptations. O prevent the world from having the dominion over us. May we not, like Gallio, be indifferent, either in regard to ourselves or others, to the things that are unseen and eternal. Fill our souls with that wisdom which is the principal thing, and make us to care chiefly for the one thing needful to the soul. Enable us when we vow and promise to thee, to do so in sincerity and truth, and in dependence on thy strength. Make us, like St Paul, scrupulous in fulfilling our engagements, and let the praise and glory be all thine own. O Lord, we are dependent on the breath of thy mouth. Thou speakest the word and we die, and are converted into our kindred dust. In all our wishes, and intentions, and plans, may we feel our short-sightedness and our weakness. May our language at all times be that of thine inspired servant, If God will. Give us grace to copy the example of Apollos, and to improve the means that we enjoy, in the hope that a larger measure of light and grace shall be given us. Instruct us perfectly in thy way. Fit us for thy service in this present world, and for the enjoyment of thy presence in bliss and glory, for our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XXX.

SCRIPTURE—2 KINGS XXV.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—7. Zedekiah having rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, to whom he had sworn submission, (Ezek. xvii. 13—15.) the latter lays siege to Jerusalem. The Egyptians having come to Zedekiah's aid, the Chaldeans are obliged to raise the siege. After a time, however, the king of Babylon returns with his army, the city is taken, and Zedekiah, his sons being slain, and his eyes put out, is taken to Babylon. For an account of the siege and famine, see Jer. chap. xxxvii, xxxviii, xxxix. Jeremiah (xxxiv. 3.) foretold that Zedekiah's eyes should behold the eyes of the king of Babylon. Ezekiel (xii. 13.) foretold that his eyes should not behold Babylon itself, though he should die there. A singular coincidence, without the least apparent concert.

Ver. 8—21. After a short period the king of Babylon sends his captain, Nebuzar-adan, to complete the destruction of Jerusalem. The temple and all the principal houses are burnt; the walls are broken down; the people are carried into captivity, with the exception of a few of 'the poor of the land.' What remained of the furniture of the temple, after the former pillaging by Nebuchadnezzar, is taken away, together with the chief priest and some other persons of note, who are slain at Riblah.

Ver. 22—26. The people who remained in the land still manifested the same distrust of God, and the same tendency to trust in Egypt for help. For Ishmael having slain the governor whom Nebuchadnezzar set over them, they being afraid of the Chaldees, fled into Egypt, utterly heedless of the assurances of Jeremiah, that they were quite safe, and that there all the evils they feared would certainly reach them, as Jehovah had decreed to deliver Egypt into the hands of the king of Babylon. See Jer. xl—xli.

Ver. 27—30. This Jehoiachin, called elsewhere, Jeremiah, or Coniah, preceded Zedekiah. He reluctantly surrendered himself to Nebuchadnezzar in the eighth year of his reign, when the temple was first sacked, and the principal people were made captives. He was a very wicked prince, and the divine denunciations were particularly pointed at him, Jer. xxii. 24—30. This lightening of his captivity was creditable to the character of Evil-merodach. It may perhaps also be regarded as a proof that, as to Manasseh, his affliction had been sanctified to him. It was certainly a sign that God had not forgotten his people, but that he would, at the expiry of the seventy years of captivity, lift up his people from bondage, and bring them to their own land. The whole record of God's dealings with his ancient people, especially that portion of it now under consideration, is full of painful interest, and salutary instruction, 1 Cor. x. 11. We see in it a proof of his hatred against sin, since he could not pass it by unpunished even in them, Amos iii. 2. We see in it a proof of his faithfulness in fulfilling his threatenings to the very letter, Deut. xxviii. We see in it a proof of his long-suffering, in sending prophet after prophet to warn them, and in bringing their punishment on them gradually, and affording space for repentance, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14, 15. We see in it a proof that there is a close connection between the character of rulers and the character and destiny of a people. Hezekiah and Josiah retarded the growing degeneracy and ruin of Judah. Under Jehoiachin and Zedekiah the cup was filled to the brim, (2 Kings xxiv. 15—20.) We see in it a proof that national sins bring national judgments; that 'the Lord is governor among the nations,' and will vindicate his authority as such, Jer. v. 9. We see in it, in fine, a proof of God's unchanging love to his people; for though he punished them severely, he did not altogether cast them off. As he raised up a Nebuchadnezzar to carry them captive, he raised up a Cyrus to deliver them in due time, Isa. xxvii. 7—9.

PRAYER.

Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of nations. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name, for thou only art holy; for all nations shall come and worship before thee, for thy judgments are made manifest. When we see thy fierce indignation towards individuals and communities, we are taught to stand in awe of thee and sin not. We do homage to thy holiness, thy faithfulness, thy justice, thy power. We tremble for ourselves as a church and as a nation, remembering in how many points we resemble in character thine ancient people. We have, like them, great privileges; we are, like them, great transgressors. O may we not resemble them in doom. We deprecate thy justly deserved wrath. O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee. To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him. Truly we are a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil-doers. We would sigh and cry for the abominations in the midst of us; profane swearing, sabbath profanation, intemperance, impurity, error and vice of all kinds. The enemy cometh in like a flood; O Spirit of the Lord, lift up a standard against him. Revive, purify, and enlarge thy church. Revive personal and family religion. Excite a spirit of prayer, a spirit of inquiry, a spirit of love, and ardour, and devotedness. Raise greatly the love of piety among thy people. Give us more elevation and warmth of feeling; more clearness and enlargement of view; more energy and fervour of action. And for this end, pour forth in larger measure the Spirit of all grace. Is not Jesus glorified; is not the Spirit promised; is not the world dead in sin; is not thy church itself languishing? Thus may we escape the doom which, as a people, we deserve. Thus may each one, from the sovereign downwards, through all the degrees of society, study to promote thy glory. Thus may piety, and peace, and prosperity bless our land. And thus, too, may we set an example to all nations of obedience to Christ, the King, who sits on the holy hill of Zion. For all our past mercies, for health and plenty, and the rest of many a quiet night, we bless thee. For the new duties, and trials, and temptations of each successive day, we beseech thee to prepare us. And our duties, and trials, and temptations being at last finished, may we set up our everlasting rest in thy house above, through the merits and mediation of our blessed Saviour and Lord, whom, with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, we equally acknowledge and adore. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PARAPHRASE XXXIX.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XIX. 1—20.

REMARKS.

1. The true baptism, Ver. 1—7. It is not easy to decide upon the precise character of these persons. Though they professed to be of John's baptism, some think they could not have been instructed and baptized by the Baptist himself, else they would not have been ignorant of the Holy Ghost; for, said he, 'I indeed have baptized you with water, but he (Christ) shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.' But perhaps their ignorance was rather of those extraordinary influences of the Spirit, bestowed in those days, on believers in Christ, after his resurrection, (John vii. 39.) and to which reference is made in the 6th verse. On this subject, the person and work of the Holy Ghost, even at the present day, much ignorance and positive error exist. Some deny the doctrine altogether, ridiculing and blaspheming; others, who will not go this length, regard the whole subject with much suspicion; others are extremely general and indefinite in their views. And others, the most numerous class, while they do know speculatively that there is a Holy Ghost, are altogether experimentally unacquainted with him, not only with his extraordinary influences—for these are now ceased—but with his ordinary and saving influences. They have, indeed, heard that there is a Holy Ghost; they have heard of conviction of sin, and of regeneration, and of peace of conscience, and of the inward witness; they have heard of such things, but that is all. They have never felt them. These things are not personal to them; for any effort in their own souls, there might as well be no Holy Ghost at all. And into what baptism, then, we may well ask, have they been baptized? Unto John's baptism? No truly, but in the name of him of whom his forerunner said, 'He shall baptize with the Holy Ghost.' But they are satisfied with the sign, and seek not the thing signified. Let us bring them back to first principles; let us put them in mind of their baptism. The doctrine of spiritual influence is the doctrine specially testified to in the ordinance of baptism. And by our baptism we are to be continually reminded of our need of the indwelling and operation of the Holy Ghost. This is the true baptism; this the true washing, of which we must be partakers, 1 Pet. iii. 21; Rom. vi. 4. Yes, there is indeed a Holy Ghost; a real, distinct, divine person constituting, together with the Father and the Son, the true God, and dwelling in the hearts of all believers. It is a most sublime and elevating truth. To know it experimentally is religion. Reader, hast thou received the Holy Ghost?

2. Paul disputing at Ephesus, Ver. 8—12. The apostle was not afraid of the freest and fullest investigation. He knew Christianity would bear it, and therefore he sought it. He challenged it, he urged the subject in the notice of all in the most public way. He was the aggressor; he began the controversy here and everywhere else. And thus we are taught not to leave the enemies of the truth in the undisturbed possession of any one field, but to meet them face to face, and argument to argument. An aversion to disputation arises more frequently from timidity and indifference than from true piety. Controversy has in all ages been one useful and necessary means of spreading the truth. We have the example of apostles in its favour. While boldness led the apostle to enter into the synagogue and dispute three months, prudence led him to retire, and choose another sphere of labour, where he thought he would labour with greater probability of success. No scene of duty, however unpromising, is to be hastily abandoned. But when ungodly men not only refuse the truth themselves, but throw impediments in the way of others who might receive it, they must be left to themselves, and success sought among others.

3. Satan forced to cast out Satan, or an evil spirit's testimony to Jesus, Ver. 13—17. It was a bold attempt of these exorcists to use the name and power of Jesus to overthrow his religion; and it was a noble triumph that was obtained over them, when their attacks were not only foiled, but made to recoil upon themselves. What a satisfactory proof that Jesus has complete control over the spirits of darkness, and can direct at will all their craft and power, and make that an encouraging assurance that the gates of hell shall never prevail against the truth, when we see hell itself, at his command, doing homage to it.

4. The triumphs of the truth, Ver. 18—20. See how one pillar after another of Satan's kingdom gives way. See how error flies before the truth, as the shades of night before the rising sun. It was no small sacrifice these persons made of their influence, and of their gain. When the mind is really brought under the influences of religious truth, it conceives a total disrelish for much of the world's literature, as vain, frivolous, and impious. A sacrifice is at once, and cheerfully, made of many of the fine arts, and of the productions of genius and intellect, which have a tendency to draw away the heart from God.

PRAYER.

We would acknowledge and worship thee, O Jehovah, in all that fullness of character in which thou art revealed in thy word. We adore thee as the tri-une God. Thou art, O Father, together with the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the only living and true God, and we would have thee to be our God. We desire to choose thee,

O Father, as our Father; thee, O Son, as our Saviour; thee, O Spirit, as our Sanctifier. We desire to know thee with that special, saving, sanctifying knowledge which thy people, illuminated by thy Spirit, have of thee. We would acquaint ourselves with God, and be at peace with him. Give us to know experimentally the love of God the Father, and the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the communion of the Holy Ghost. Give us, we are especially led to pray at this time, to know experimentally that there is indeed a Holy Ghost. While in words we recognise him, in his person as divine, in his work as the applier of redemption to the soul, let us not be strangers to him in our hearts. May we know him by his dwelling in us, and working in us, showing us the evil of sin, and producing that godly sorrow for sin which worketh repentance unto salvation; revealing Christ to us as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world; witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God, sanctifying us wholly, and sealing us to the day of Jesus Christ. Descend, O Spirit of life, and light, and peace, and holiness, and abundantly baptize these souls of ours. We would cherish thy motions; we would lay our minds open to them; we would cease to indulge in those frames by which thou art grieved. We cannot live without thee. Too little have we valued thee, and sought thine aid, and therefore are we so low and dull. Wilt thou not enlarge, and quicken, and refresh, and strengthen us. Return and revive thy drooping church. Raise up many faithful men, at home and abroad, boldly to dispute and persuade the things concerning the kingdom of God; and grant that the gospel being preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, signs and wonders may be done in the name of thy holy child Jesus. May we witness the triumphs of the gospel everywhere. May the word of God mightily grow and prevail. May every system of error fall before the claims of truth; and genius, and power, and wealth, unite all their exhibitions, and lay them on the altar of Christianity Lord Jesus! give us such impressions of thy love, that we shall be constrained to sacrifice every thing for thy sake, at thy command. We are thine, and all that we have is thine, and all is too little to recompense thy love. Accept of us and ours, and through thine all-prevailing mediation, may our prayers and all our services be accepted, our sins forgiven, and our souls sanctified. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXII. 10—14.

SCRIPTURE—I CHRON. XXIX.

REMARKS.

‘Lord, teach me to know the end and the measure of my days, what it is, that I may know how frail I am,’ was a prayer which David had put up some time before; (see Psalm xxxix. 4.) It is a prayer which we have all need to utter, as we are very apt to deceive ourselves; to think that to-morrow will be as this day, and to promise ourselves a long and healthy life. It is pleasant to observe that David had received an answer to his prayer; that he is conscious of his infirmities, and speaks of himself as a stranger and pilgrim, and that he is making calm preparations for his approaching decease. We discover in his old age the ruling principle of his life (the love of God, and a desire to promote his glory) now strengthened and increased. The greatest warrior of his nation is employing the peaceful evening of his old age in completing what had occupied so many of his thoughts—his preparations for building the temple. What a noble example did he set to his people, and that son who was soon to mount his throne! While all the people seem to have offered willingly, he particularly called upon the chiefs and rulers to countenance, by their gifts, the service of the true God. As this service partook of none of the peculiarities of the Levitical law, we may safely reckon it as an example to all who are in places of authority in Christian times. It is worthy of notice, that while David and his people gave so liberally, they were not vain of their generosity, nor did they look upon their good deeds as having any justifying merit. They reckoned it a privilege to be permitted to give; and were conscious, that being mere stewards of the bounties of God’s providence, they were only giving to the Lord a small part of what they had received from him. We may repeat the question, ‘Who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord?’ The circumstances of God’s church are altered, and his people are required, not as in the time of legal ceremonies, to build a magnificent temple of stone, but to aid in building that holy and spiritual temple of which Christ is the foundation, and his saints the lively stones. There are waste places in our land to be built up—our brethren in foreign lands are crying, Come over and help us—the command is still binding, ‘Go and teach all nations’—and David’s own people, now without a nation and a temple, must be brought to acknowledge the Son of David as their King—and even as they destroyed the temple of his body, they must be made to take part in rearing that other temple, which is the church, according to the language of the apostle, that their conversion shall be as life from the dead. The sum contributed by David could not have been less in value than fifteen millions of our money in gold, and that contributed by the people was not less than twenty-five millions, besides the other metals, and this from a small country of about one hundred and fifty miles in length, and seventy in breadth. Let us not stop short our missionary exertions till we obtain an offering like this to the cause of Christ. What would our nation have been without the blessings of the gospel? a rude and barbarous region, without arts, or commerce, or wealth. Let us devote some of that wealth which Christianity has procured to the promotion of Christianity.

What a varied and chequered life was that of David! Reared in the simple profession of a shepherd, he had become a favourite of his prince, a leader of armies, and finally he had risen to the throne of Israel. Yet his life was far from presenting a course of uninterrupted prosperity. We read of him now obliged to flee for his life from the presence of a capricious king, and again from before a son to whom he was deeply attached. It is pleasant to observe that his death is peaceful. ‘Mark thou the perfect, and behold the upright, for surely the latter end of that man is peace,’ had been his own language. He had fallen into many and grievous sins; but he still held firm his faith, and grace was given to repent. Now, with the sanctified use of all his trials, which were made, like the showers of summer, to promote the growth of the fruit, he is, like a ripe shock of corn, in full maturity of age, ready to be taken into the garner of God. While we sing his psalms on earth, he, the ‘sweet psalmist,’ is singing a sweeter strain than ever he did in this world, in the mansions above, to the praise of his Redeemer. There have been disputes among the learned as to what is meant by the books mentioned in this passage; they were probably public national records now lost; but this we know, that his name was written in the book of life, and his deeds are recorded in the bible for our instruction.

PRAYER.

O Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, enable us to worship thee with that which is thine own, even with thy grace within us. We know not what we should pray for as we ought. Let the Spirit itself help our infirmities, and make intercession within us with groanings which cannot be uttered. We thank thee for the many national, and family, and personal blessings which we enjoy. We bless thee for having cast our lines in pleasant places, in a land where we have thy sanctuary, and have heard the glad tidings of salvation proclaimed. We rejoice to think that thou art not confined to temples made with hands, and that thou art present wherever there are true worshippers to worship the Father in spirit and in truth. We pray of thee to bless this household, as of old thou blessedst the house of Obededom, when the ark of the covenant was there. We are, O Lord, no longer our own; we are bought with a price, even the precious blood of our Redeemer. We desire to dedicate unto thee our bodies and our souls, all that is ours, and all that is dependent on us. We have received all our blessings from thee; we desire to consecrate them to thy service. We lament before thee that we have been living unworthy of the holy vocation wherewith we have been called. There is a law in our members warring against the law of our minds. Do thou of thy free mercy in Christ forgive our trespasses, and enable us to grow in grace as we grow in years. In thy hands are the hearts of all men, and thou turnest them as thou turnest the channels of water: do thou turn us, and we shall be turned; change us, and we shall be changed. Dispose us to use the world as not abusing it; and prepare our hearts to devote what wealth thou hast given us to the glory of the great Giver, and of our Redeemer. While in the enjoyment of rich and precious privileges ourselves, we should think of those who are sitting under the shadow of death, and dwelling in the abodes of cruelty. Send forth labourers to the harvest, and builders to raise thy spiritual temple. Add daily to the church of such as shall be saved, till incense and a pure offering rise as from one temple from all nations of the earth. We pray for our queen, and all in places of authority. Make all our kings and queens nursing fathers and nursing mothers of the Israel of God. We pray for the sick, the dying, and the aged, that their names may be found written in the Lamb's book of life. We are all here pilgrims and strangers, as were all our fathers. Enable us to set our affections on things above, and live in the hope of a glorious immortality. We thank thee for the footsteps of the flock, the elders who have obtained a good report, and who, being dead, yet speak unto us. Enable us to follow them as they followed Christ. To us to live may it be Christ, and to die great gain. All that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LIX. 1—4.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XIX. 21—41.

REMARKS.

Our attention is called in this passage to several noble features in the character of the apostle. Though he had already traversed many nations, and undergone innumerable trials, he is not satisfied that he has done enough. In obedience to his own maxim, 'forgetting the things that are behind,' he presses on to those that are before, and he will not stop till he has given one other warning voice to his countrymen at Jerusalem, and attacked paganism in its very stronghold in the capital of the Roman empire. He undertakes all this with experimental evidence, that wherever he goes he will be subjected to perils by the heathen, and perils by his own countrymen, and that he will have to face the dangers of the great deep, and the tumults of the people. Let us observe, also, that his zeal is tempered by wisdom; and that while 'in the spirit,' he purposes to undertake so much, he resolves in providence to send individuals before him to make preparations for the more effectual exercise of his ministry, and he yields to the suggestions of his friends, when his own undaunted courage would have exposed him unnecessarily to danger.

It is very interesting to notice, through his instrumentality and that of others, the rapid progress of the gospel; and our information on this subject, is all the more satisfactory, from the circumstance that it is not given in a boasting spirit by the historian, but comes out incidentally from the mouth of an enemy. It was yet only fifteen or sixteen years from the resurrection of Christ, and by this time we learn from the testimony of Demetrius, that much people had turned from the worship of 'gods made with hands' throughout the whole of Asia Minor; embracing, among others, the provinces of Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Phrygia, Troas, and Lydia, which provinces contained several of the wealthiest and most populous cities in the world. The gospel made such extraordinary progress in the face of the most formidable opposition. The degraded worship of the Greeks and Romans addressed itself alike to the weakness of the superstitious, and the licentious passions of the dissolute; and had closely connected itself with national institutions and family customs, and with the vested rights of various trades. The temple of Diana at Ephesus was distinguished for its splendour. It had been 200 years in building, and all the provinces of Asia had given contributions. It was 425 feet in length, 220 in breadth, and its pillars, 60 feet high, were 127 in number, and had been presented by as many kings. The city of Ephesus was guardian of this temple, and managers of its revenues and offices, which was the source both of honour and emolument. Besides the criminals who fled to its courts for an asylum, there were the priests and the priestesses, and the workers in silver, who made representations on medals, or models in cast work, of the portico and temple of Diana,—all having an interest in opposing the pure religion of Jesus. We have here a very humiliating view of the effects of paganism. The people blindly worshipping a dumb idol, and the upper classes, like the town clerk, feigning a belief in these superstitions, and flattering the people in order to delude them. When we consider what opposition the gospel had to meet, we have in its early triumphs, a satisfactory evidence of its divine power and inherent strength. The truth has still similar obstacles to contend against; it is only by the accompanying grace of God that it can obtain admission to a single breast, or be propagated throughout a nation. It has difficulties arising from the natural enmity of the heart towards God—from the offence of the cross—from the selfishness of man—from the love of money, the root of all evil—from sectarian pride, and professional and party zeal. Let us examine ourselves, in order to see if we are not placing obstacles in the way of the promulgation of the truth, in our own hearts, or in the world. Let us especially be on our guard against those sins to which our trades or professions may be more particularly exposed; and, in the consciousness of weakness, let us pray God to help us to examine ourselves, and let us say, 'Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou us from secret faults.'

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever blessed God, before committing ourselves to the helplessness of sleep, we desire to commit our bodies and never-dying souls to the care of the great Shepherd of Israel, who neither slumbers nor sleeps. Do thou give refreshing sleep to our bodies, the influence of thy spirit to our souls. If it should be thy will to spare us to a new morning, may our first and best thoughts be of thee. Early will we seek thee, that we may rejoice in thy love all the day. We thank thee for sparing us during the past day amidst the sins we have committed, our ingratitude, folly, and provocations. We lament before thee over the natural enmity of our heart towards God, and our indifference to the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom. We have too often, by our sins, been bringing reproach upon the cause of Christ, and causing the enemy to blaspheme. O Lord, our hearts are deceitful above all things, do thou teach us to know ourselves, and the iniquities that prevail against us, and the sins that do more easily beset us. Give us to see ourselves as thou seest us, and to know ourselves as we are known by thee, the Searcher of hearts. Cast down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God. We rejoice to think, that we have, in the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, all we stand in need of,—a balm for every wound, a comfort for every sorrow, a hope for every despondency, and a very present help in time of need. Trusting in thy promises, we will come and prove thee, and see if thou wilt not open the windows of heaven and pour down a blessing, so that there will not be room to receive it. Supply all our deficiencies out of the fullness that is in Christ. Wherein we are weak, do thou make us strong; wherein we are in darkness, lead us unto marvellous light; what time we are in perplexity, lead us to the rock that is higher than we are. We desire to admire the wisdom and goodness of God in his dealings towards his church and people. We bless thee because thou hast given some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ. We bless thee for having brought the glad tidings of salvation to us, even to the distant isles in which we live. We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work thou didst in their days, in the days of old. Awake, awake, put on strength. O arm of the Lord, awake as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. We pray for those who set themselves against the extension and purification of the church. Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. Arrest the wicked and the gainsayer by that grace which changed the persecutor into an apostle. Let thy kingdom come, let thy will be done; let it be done over all the earth, and let it be done in our hearts. All that we ask is for our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXII. 26.

SCRIPTURE—EZRA I. III.

REMARKS.

The proclamation itself, in the beginning of the first chapter, both grants permission to the Jews to return, and encourages, if it does not positively command, the supply of the poor with the means of achieving the journey, and of contributing to the expense of rebuilding the house of the Lord,—a practical and monitory lesson to modern governments, whose aim it ought to be, while they stand by the great and important principle of toleration, at the same time to promote the influence of a religion celestial and divine! Ver. 7—11. informs us how the proclamation was obeyed: (1.) Many of the people, accepting of the king's permission, proceeded to Jerusalem, on the sacred errand of building the house of the Lord. (2.) Their neighbours supported and encouraged them by their contributions to the cause. (3.) Cyrus himself restored the vessels of the Jewish temple which Nebuchadnezzar had brought to Babylon. In accordance with these three facts, let us all, in our several spheres, contribute to the maintenance and promotion of the cause of God, and let kings and governments reckon it alike their duty and their privilege, by their contributions and their countenance, to aid in building the temple of the Lord.

In the third chapter we have a beautiful picture both of natural and of religious feeling. A considerable number of the exiled Hebrews had now returned to their father-land, and settled in their respective cities. But there was one spot, which, in other days, had often attracted to itself the scattered inhabitants of Judea, and that spot had peculiar attraction still. Thither, as of old, 'the tribes went up, the tribes of the Lord, to give thanks unto his name.' What a striking representation is given of the cordiality and unanimity which characterized this most interesting visit to the sacred city, when, in the first verse of the chapter, it is said: 'the people gathered themselves together as one man to Jerusalem!'

Equally striking and impressive is the record contained in the six succeeding verses of the services in which they there engaged. Thus, when we receive some signal favour from Almighty God, to him let us willingly and thankfully devote our substance and ourselves. But is he not daily showering ten thousand blessings on our heads? and are we not every hour dependent on his care? Duly, then, as evening summons us to look backwards on a day of blessings, and morning calls us from the rest which our heavenly Guardian gives us to the duties and enjoyments of a day, which bears in its bosom new and multiplying tokens of his grace, let us present a willing offering to the Lord—an offering, like that of the returning exiles sanctioned, prompted, guided by the authoritative law of Israel's God. Nor let our 'set feasts'—our special festivals of sabbatic rest and sacramental fellowship—be unobserved. These let us celebrate with serious and solemn, yet grateful and rejoicing hearts. And by our efforts, our contributions, and our prayers, let us seek, not only that we ourselves may enjoy in greater plenitude the privileges of Christian worship, but that these privileges may be extended to those by whom, at present, they are either not at all, or very imperfectly possessed. The remainder of the chapter relates, with great beauty, the founding of the house of the Lord, and the gratitude and rejoicing of the people on the occasion. How meet that a public blessing should be received with public gratitude! Nevertheless, on the part of 'the ancient men, who had seen the first house,' tears were mingled with the shout of joy. These natural tears we should not, perhaps, severely blame. And O! how faithful a representation does the mingled shout of weeping and rejoicing give of the general aspect of the world, and of that natural law of the human mind, by which even scenes of gladness may prompt the feeling of agony or gloom!

PRAYER.

Father of mercies, we would now call on thy name with thanksgiving; and met together as we now are before thee on the morning of another day, we give thee thanks for all thy great and long-continued care and kindness towards us. We thank thee for the protection and refreshment which thou hast afforded us through the past night. We thank thee for health, and understanding, and friendship, and freedom, and peace, and all the other blessings of our temporal condition. And O! we thank thee that thou gavest thine only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but should have everlasting life; that thy holy word has brought the message of salvation to our ears, and that whosoever will, may take of the water of life freely. God of salvation, grant that the privileges for which we praise thee, we may rightly use, and that, by the merits of thine atoning Son, we may enjoy the glorious blessings which he has purchased and procured for men. Being justified by faith, may we have peace with God. May we walk, day by day, in the light of thy countenance, and in thy favour may our horn be exalted. In our case, as in the case of all true believers, may the faith which justifies, prove a faith which sanctifies. May it induce us to resist the temptations to which we are exposed, to avoid the sins to which we are prone, and to seek, in a patient continuance in well-doing, glory, honour, and immortality. And in connection with Christian faith and Christian holiness, may our hearts be comforted and refreshed with Christian peace. Grant us even now the foretaste and earnest of the glory yet to be revealed. And receive us, at the last, to that inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and which fadeth not away. Meanwhile, bless to our use the dispensations of thy providence, the ordinances of thy worship, and the instructions of thy word. May that portion of scripture which we have now heard, be impressed by the Holy Spirit on our minds. Excite our hearts, by means of it, to greater ardour in thy cause. And while we yield thee the unworthy offerings of our contributions, our efforts, and our prayers, establish thou upon us the work of our hands; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it. Assist us in the duties of this day, guide us amidst its difficulties, defend us from its dangers, and render its experience useful to our souls. Bless all others whom we are bound to commit to thy care and mercy, and grant that, in the intercourse of life, we may do good, as we have opportunity, to all men. Hear us, Almighty God, in these our prayers, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, our Lord; to whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be ascribed blessing, and honour, and glory, and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXIII.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XX.

REMARKS.

In the first six verses of this chapter, we have a striking illustration of Christian brotherhood. The 'one faith, the one Lord, the one baptism, the one God and Father of all,' constitute a principle which unites Christ's followers together. And it must surely have refreshed the apostle's heart, 'when the Jews laid wait for him,' to feel that, if he had enemies, he had also friends, and that if the one were fierce, the other were faithful. In connection with the narrative contained in ver. 7—12, it may be remarked: (1.) That, how unreasonable soever it may be, in the case of a common occasion and a promiscuous audience, to protract for many hours the public services of religion, yet at extraordinary times, and in the presence of worshippers who are all 'of one heart and of one soul,' it may be useful and commendable to carry out those services to an unusual length. (2.) That, while it is recorded, somewhat to the discredit of Eutychus, that during the service 'he had fallen into a deep sleep,' instances frequently occur of persons sleeping in the house of God, that have not even such circumstances to palliate them as the youth of the individual, the lateness of the hour, and the protraction of the service. (3.) That whereas Eutychus is represented as meeting, in consequence of his conduct, with a severe and even fatal fall, such as, by like acts of irreverence and inattention show that they have neither Christian faith nor spiritual taste, expose themselves to a far more dreadful evil than bodily sickness or temporal death: and, (4.) That St Paul, on this occasion, by the restoration of the youth to life, gave a fresh proof of his supernatural authority. In ver. 13—16. the sacred writer details certain of the apostle's subsequent proceedings; and from this part of the record, ministers and others may draw this practical and useful hint; that, in their operations, they should act by system, and should take care that neither the false lights of secular pleasure, nor even the attractions of affectionate and devoted friendship, seduce them from the fulfilment of a great and wisely-concerted plan of public usefulness. Ver. 17—35. record a remarkable discourse addressed by the apostle to the elders of the Ephesian church. In this discourse he does four things: (1.) He describes the manner in which, while resident in Asia Minor, he fulfilled the duties of his ministerial charge; specifying his humility, tears, and temptations; the union, in his ministry, of public and private instruction; the comprehensive, evangelical, practical, and monitory character of his discourse; and his freedom from covetousness, selfishness, and oppression, in his intercourse with the people. (2.) He announces the afflictions which he was now about to endure, and finely manifests the heroic dignity of his devoted soul by the memorable words, 'but none of these things move me,' &c. (3.) He charges the Ephesian elders to give diligent heed to the trust committed to their hands, as having not only their own souls, but the souls of others, to superintend with special care. (4.) He 'commends them to God and to his gracious word,' as adopted to the high and holy end of assisting them in the duties of time, and securing them an inheritance in heaven. In ver. 36—38. we have a record of the parting interview between the apostle and the elders; an interview saddened with tears, but, at the same time, sweetened by friendship, and sanctified by prayer.

PRAYER.

King eternal, immortal, and invisible, at the close of another day we bow before thine uplifted throne; and while we make mention of thy greatness, we would also celebrate the riches of thy grace. We thank thee that, although we have so often forgotten thee, thou hast constantly remembered us, and that, notwithstanding our great unworthiness and sin, thou hast brought us in health, and peace, and safety, to the present hour. And we thank thee, also, that to the common bounties of thy providence, thou hast added so many great religious privileges, by the diligent and faithful use of which we may obtain those spiritual blessings which make provision for the immortal soul, and are as immortal as the soul itself. That Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, that the gospel has reached our dwelling, that all scripture is given by thine own inspiration, and that prophets, apostles, and pious ministers, have shown us the way to heaven, we owe to thy great and undeserved goodness; and for these and all thy benefits we magnify thy name. O may we believe in Christ to the saving of our souls. May we receive the gospel, by faith, in all its consolatory and sanctifying principles. May thine inspired word prove profitable to us for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness. And may thy ministers see the fruit of their labours in the spiritual improvement of our souls. Dispose us to humility, and to confess, when we have done all, that we are unprofitable servants. May we serve the Lord with all humility of mind, and seek for the pardon of the great and many sins which degrade and defile even our best performances in the riches of thy saving mercy, and the atonement of thine incarnate Son. Forgive the transgressions which we have committed against thee this day. Protect us this night from evil, and raise us up, if such be thy holy will, to the light, and duties, and enjoyments of another day. Regard in mercy our relatives and friends. According to their ages, their characters, their circumstances, and their wants, let the communication of thy mercy be. Be gracious to the sick and the sorrowful. Lead them to thyself as the God of all comfort, and grant that the winds and storms of this troubled life, may make them cling the closer to the Saviour's breast. Bless the whole family of living men. Let thy way be known on the earth, thy saving health among all nations. Answer us, we pray thee, Father of mercies, in these our unworthy petitions, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

TWENTY-EIGHTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXXI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXXI.

REMARKS.

This psalm appears, from ver. 3, to have been intended for the feast of trumpets, that divinely appointed festival, in regard to which it is said, (Deut. xxix. 1,) 'In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work; it is a day of blowing the trumpets unto you.' But besides teaching us, as an example, the propriety of adapting our devotional services to the peculiarity of the occasion on which they may be performed, and furnishing us with a model of appropriate correspondence between the season and the psalmody, it explicitly unfolds most important and monitory truth. Although, in the simplicity of our Christian worship, the timbrel, psaltery, and harp may not pour their tide of mingling music on our ear, and although no feast of trumpets summon us to celebrate, with their majestic voice, the praises of our God, yet the three first verses of the psalm may serve as themselves a trumpet-call to gratitude and song. We have 'our solemn feast-day,'—the day so peaceful and so precious, which, every week, breaks in on the cold monotony of life,—that sabbath of sabbaths, most of all, when believers meet around the emblems of the sacrifice. Let the day of sacramental fellowship—let every sabbath as it comes—be indeed a day of hearty Eucharist. For every sabbath brings along with it the lesson—and why should it not be learned even on life's common days?—that Jehovah is 'our strength,' and of believing souls the fortress and the shield. In ver. 4, 5, the call contained in the previous portion of the psalm is enforced by a consideration which, by a truly religious mind, will, of course, be felt as paramount—the institution and command of God. Even so, communion, sabbath, psalmody, let us regard as each 'a statute,' 'a law,' 'a testimony,' and in the authority by which they are ordained, and the purpose for which they are prescribed, let us find the motives for observing them which bear most closely on our conscience and our hearts. Ver. 5—7, contain a brief record of the circumstances in which the feast of trumpets was ordained; circumstances which it was probably one great object of the feast to celebrate. And O what a mass of moral argument—what a majestic plea for holiness, adapted not to Israel only but to man—is imbedded in these few and simple words, 'I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt; open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it.' The address contained in these three verses may be regarded as a summary of the laws and promises of the Sinaitic covenant, and as forming part of the historical sketch, commencing at the fourth verse. The abruptness with which, according to this view, it is introduced, may be accounted for by the freedom allowed in this respect to poetry, and by the fact that the statements of ver. 7, may be regarded as virtually identifying the time at which it was delivered, and introducing the address itself. That it is introduced historically is indicated by the two verses which immediately succeed: 'But my people would not hearken to my voice,' &c But it is not merely as casting light on the context that these awful words are important. What a manifestation do they give of human sin—representing, as they do, a nation eminently favoured with the revelation of God's character and the experience of his goodness, utterly rejecting both his doctrine and himself! And what a manifestation do they also give of divine judgment,—representing the Almighty, as they do, giving up his chosen 'to their own hearts' lusts;' leaving them to walk in the foolish and fatal counsels of their own erring and alienated minds. In ver. 13—16, with which the psalm concludes, God expresses regret, as it were, at the failure of Israel to hearken to his voice, and vividly describes the blessings which would otherwise have been heaped upon their heads. Let us be well assured that not more truly were Israel losers by rejecting God, than we shall be by rejecting him whose mediation has provided for the soul 'the finest of the wheat,' and who, in terms remarkably similar to those applied in ver. 13, by God to Israel, exclaimed, in reference to doomed Jerusalem, 'If thou hadst known, at least in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace!'

PRAYER.

Almighty and most merciful Lord God, give us grace to approach thee now and at all times with holy reverence, and yet with filial confidence and love. We acknowledge thee as our strength, and thank thee that while, by reason of our numerous and aggravated sins, thou mightest have employed thy resistless power to destroy us, thou hast preserved us in the midst of all the dangers to which we have been exposed, and brought us in peace and safety to the beginning of another week. For all thy long-continued kindness towards us, make us sincerely and devoutly thankful; and O convince us that we have especial cause to praise thee for the blessings of the Christian salvation. Dispose us this day, both in thy public courts, and in our private dwelling, to celebrate the riches of thy saving grace. And grant, O God, that we may not only praise thee for the spiritual and eternal blessings of the gospel, but also lay hold of them for our own souls. Convince us of their value, by giving us the personal experience of their suitability to our own condition. Remove our shoulder from the burden which sin and satan have imposed. Raise us from the degradation and defilement of our natural estate. Dispose us to bear the yoke of Jesus, and grant that we may find it easy. May we rejoice to serve thee, and in keeping thy precepts may we find a great reward. May we delight to hear thy voice and to do thy will, whether thou speakest to us from the secret place of thunder, or from the peaceful heights of Zion. May we yield our minds to the doctrines of thy holy gospel, and be stirred to gratitude by the faith of its blessed truths. May we diligently keep thy holy commandments. Enable us to engage this day with holy ardour in the public and private duties of the sabbath. Assist thy ministers, and help us, and our fellow worshippers, to serve thee acceptably, with reverence and godly fear. Feed us with the finest of the wheat and with honey from the rock. Bless thy church, whether at home or abroad. May the sabbath be a joyful day in all her dwellings, and may those to whom as yet it brings no tidings of God, and Christ, and heaven, be visited with thine enlightening and regenerating grace. To these our imperfect prayers, grant, O Father of mercies, a favourable answer, through the merits of thy Son, Jesus Christ. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXXV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS LXXXII. LXXXIII.

REMARKS.

The former of these psalms relates to the duties and dangers of magistrates and rulers. In the first verse the solemn fact is stated that God is present in their assemblies, and both witnesses and judges their procedure. What a practical and powerful consideration for persons in authority and power! It should, and when properly believed and realized, it will both consecrate the counsels and determine the decisions of the magistrate and judge. O then, although in respect of their delegated superiority and power, 'gods,' in figurative speech, be given them for their name, and although they are entitled to require the expressions of respect which their offices, if not their persons, claim, yet let them know that, as from God the offices proceed, so the officers themselves are under the inspection of his penetrating eye, and that, in common with the people whom they superintend, they must render an account. In accordance with this solemn principle, well might Jehovah ask, as he does in the second verse, 'How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked?' For O how utterly discordant was such a perversion of justice, and patronage of crime, both with the authoritative law and with the moral character of God; and how entirely repugnant to the first principles of social government, and the very object for which the judicial and magisterial functions were ordained! In ver. 3, 4, unerring wisdom directs the official men described to a better course; inculcating, in that spirit of tenderness towards the poor, the fatherless, and the afflicted, by which even the Mosaic law is characterized, the exercise of justice, clemency, and kindness, towards these three classes of the people.

Not, however, to magistrates alone, but to others also, whether rich and prosperous, or, like the very objects of their compassion, desolate and poor, do such persons, by their circumstances, tenderly appeal for kindly sympathy and benevolent assistance. Piously and judiciously to 'deliver the poor that cry, the fatherless also, and him that hath no helper,' is a fine and Christian-like employment; and 'pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep ourself unspotted from the world.' But the official persons here described, are represented in ver. 5, as at once ignorant, foolish, and obstinately wrong, in regard to the duties of their office, insomuch that 'all the foundations of the land were out of course,' that is, the whole social fabric tottered—the national economy was altogether disjointed and confused. With what power, for evil or for good, are judges, magistrates, and governments invested! How noble, how useful to go right! how base, how fatal to go wrong! And O how much do they need a mightier strength, and a purer wisdom, than their own! In ver. 5, 7, Jehovah declares that, although he had said of these rulers they were 'gods,' referring, probably, to the first verse, and also to Exodus xxii. 25, where it is said, in reference to magistrates, 'thou shalt not curse the gods,'—they nevertheless should 'die like men,' that is, like persons possessed of no such rank and dignity, 'and fall like one of the princes,' that is, like one of the heathen chiefs; a statement which may be regarded either specifically, as a threatening of speedy and terrible destruction, as a punishment for their disobedience and crimes, or generally as an intimation of the familiar, but neglected fact, that death consigns to a common resting place the rulers and the ruled. The psalm concludes, in ver. 8, with these remarkable expressions: 'Arise, O God, judge the earth, for thou shalt inherit all nations;' a prayer and prediction admirably appropriated to the circumstances so vividly described in the previous portion of the psalm, and fitted both to confirm the anticipations, and to animate the efforts, of Christ's holy church, in reference to the predicted time when 'the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ,' when Messiah shall 'inherit all nations.'

The eighty-third Psalm, the last of those characterized as Psalms of Asaph, was probably written on occasion of the invasion of Judah by the Ammonites and Moabites, in the time of Jehoshaphat, as recorded 2 Chron. xxi. In the first verse an appeal is made to the Almighty for assistance and defence; and in the five following verses, the circumstances are recorded which called for the special interposition of his hand. More especially the psalmist states in regard to this attempt against the people: 1. That there was a confederation of sins, comprehending, hatred of God, hostility to his chosen, pride, cruelty, and craft; and, 2. That there was a confederation of sinners, comprehending a great variety of tribes, and including more than one of whom better things might have been expected. This vivid picture of the confederate enemies of Judah is very similar to that which the New Testament and uninspired, though authentic history, presents of the combination of Jews and Gentiles, of monarchs, judges, magistrates, philosophers, and people, against the faith and followers of Christ. They virtually said of Christians, 'Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that their name may be no more in remembrance.' But thanks be to the Friend of truth, the almighty Champion of our faith! their aim has been defeated, their interprise has failed. And as in ver. 9—18, the result of the efforts of Judah's enemies is vividly portrayed, so the annals of the past and the divine predictions of the future, testify that the Saviour's enemies must either 'seek God's name,' ver. 16, 'or be confounded and troubled for ever,' ver. 17. Alas, alas! that any of us by unbelief and sin should subject ourselves to the awful condition of being 'wheels' hurrying on to hell, (ver. 13,) of being fuel for the scorching and desolating 'flame,' ver. 14.

PRAYER.

Father of mercies, and God of all comfort, on the evening of thy holy sabbath, we give thee thanks for the great and many blessings which, in the course of it, we have received from thee. Even for the common bounties of thy providence we praise thee, acknowledging that we are less than the least of all thy mercies, and that it is because thy compassions fail not that we are not consumed. But more especially we praise thee for the provision which thou hast made by Jesus Christ, for the spiritual and everlasting welfare of our souls. Blessed be thy name that we have this day had an opportunity of enlarging and deepening our acquaintance with the method of salvation, and of participating in the glorious benefits which it reveals. O follow with thy blessing the sacred services in which we have been engaged. From this time forward may we live more like the children of God and the disciples of Jesus Christ. May we walk by the faith of the Son of God. May we live in the practice of all the virtues of the Christian character, and may the peace of God keep our hearts and minds by Christ Jesus. In the various relations of life in which we may stand, may we adorn thy doctrine. And at the last, in thine own time and in thine own way, may we exchange a course of usefulness on earth for a glorious immortality in heaven. Bless the services of this day, not to ourselves only, but to others also. O may many who rose this morning impenitent and unbelieving, retire to rest this night in favour with thee and in peace with all; and may those who have this day heard thy holy word, be enabled to carry its lessons into practical application to their future lives. Bless our sovereign and our father-land. May thy servant, exalted to so high and responsible a charge, be guided by thy counsel, and protected by thy power. May piety and wisdom regulate the deliberations and decisions of the privy council and the parliament. May our magistrates and judges habitually act as under thine omniscient eye. May our rich men be liberal, and our poor contented. Train the young to useful knowledge—train them to Christian faith—train them to everlasting life. And grant that all classes of the community may fear God, believe in Jesus Christ, and be subject to principalities and powers, not only for wrath but also for conscience' sake. Visit the afflicted with thy sanctifying and consoling mercy, and dispose us to regard their case with Christian sympathy. Send thy gospel forth throughout the world, and stir up thy church to contribute more liberally, to pray more fervently, and to labour more zealously, for the extension of thy kingdom and the triumph of thy cause. Arise, O God: inherit all nations. Defend us this night from danger; pardon our sins; and hear us in these our unworthy prayers, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord, who has taught us thus to address thee: Our Father, &c. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CII. 13. (2d Version.)

SCRIPTURE—EZRA V.—HAGGAI I.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Haggai and Zechariah were the first prophets sent to the Jews, after their return from Babylon to their own land. They were commissioned to exhort and encourage their brethren to proceed with the building of the temple, which had then been interrupted fourteen years. In the second year of his reign, Cyrus revoked the edict which he had issued, empowering the Jews to rebuild their city and temple on their return to their own land. To this measure he appears to have been instigated by the influence of the enemies of the Jews who resided at Samaria. The prohibition was continued by Cambyes, who was the next king. After his death, however, Darius, the son of Hystaspes, succeeding, he permitted the building of the temple to proceed. The messages of the prophets mentioned are directed to Zerubbabel the civil governor, and to Joshua the ecclesiastical governor, both of whom exercised their authority by the permission of the Persian monarch. Our attention is here particularly directed to the prophecy of Haggai. The Jews, it appears, satisfied themselves with having built an altar on which to offer the customary sacrifices prescribed by their law. The prophet thus remonstrates with them, and inquires how they could suppose it to be consistent with their duty to God, to employ their time in building comfortable houses to themselves, and yet allow his temple to remain in an unfinished state. He warns them that, should they not provide for the worshipping of God according to his commandment, he would not bless them in the labour of their hands. He urges them to commence anew those operations which were required for the advancement of the building. In the second year of their return they had indeed made some progress in the work, by procuring materials and workmen, but their labours had been so long suspended as to be nearly lost. It appears that at this period the land was visited with a famine. A great drought prevailed, and men and cattle were suffering much from scarcity. The prophet intimates that these calamities had come upon them because of their neglect of God, and that to escape from them they were required to return to their duty in building the temple. The remonstrances and exhortations thus addressed, produced the desired effect. The rulers, with the people, were stirred up to engage vigorously in the work. But while thus proceeding, an attempt, as narrated, was again made to interrupt them. The matter is referred to Darius for decision.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

In the return of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon to Jerusalem, with authority to rebuild their temple, we have a striking instance of the truth and faithfulness of God. He thus testifies, that though he would punish his chosen people on account of their disobedience, he would not utterly forsake them, and that though he gave them over to the power of their enemies for a time, he would not leave them in their hands. When the time which he had set for their deliverance arrives, he is at no loss for instruments to carry his purposes of mercy into effect. He turns the hearts of their enemies, so as to render them ready for the work. The people of God, while they continue in this world, must lay their account to meet with opposition from his enemies. The more diligent they are to serve him according to his appointment, the more will wicked men be stirred up to frustrate their designs. With these also the corruption remaining in the heart of the believer is in accordance, so that the commands of God are apt to be neglected from a desire to promote self-indulgence. How merciful is it in God not to leave his professing people in this situation, but to bring the threatenings of his word and the chastisements of his providence to bear upon them, so as to rouse them to a sense of their sin and danger! He can easily overrule the designs of their enemies to subserve his wise and merciful purposes. It is thus said of him, that he maketh the wrath of man to praise him, and the remainder he restrains.' The believer, in his progress through this world, may frequently be surrounded with difficulties and dangers; he may walk in darkness, and see no light; the dispensations of divine providence may seem to be against him; still, however, it is his duty to hold on his way according to the teaching of God's word. This is to be his guide and directory; and if not in the progress of his journey through this world, yet assuredly in the end, he will have reason to be satisfied that God has ordered every thing in his lot wisely and well. The believer is not afraid to challenge investigation into the correctness of his conduct. For the purity of his motives he can appeal to a heart-searching God for the strictest scrutiny.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we bless thee for another opportunity of coming into thy presence, that we may pour out our hearts before thee. We thank thee for thy kindness in bringing us through the past night, and for permitting us to see the light of a new day. We acknowledge that it is of thy mercies that we are in the land of the living and in the place of salvation. Thou mightest justly have cut us off as cumberers of the ground. We acknowledge our great unworthiness. Our iniquities have been many and great, and thou mightest have made us monuments of thine everlasting displeasure at sin. But ever blessed be thy name, that when we deserved wrath thou didst remember and visit us in mercy. Thou hast spoken unto us by thy Son from heaven, with a voice of love. We rejoice that his message of peace and reconciliation has been addressed even unto us. Forbid, O God, that we should ever despise the riches of thy grace. Thou hast testified in thy dealings with thine ancient people how sin subjects to thy displeasure; how it causes thee to stretch forth thine arm in punishment; that though for their disobedience to thee thou wast pleased to carry them captives from their own land, yet thine anger did not continue against them for ever. When the time which thou hadst set in thy purposes of mercy, and which thou hadst declared by thy prophets, was come, thou wast graciously pleased to bring them back to their own land, that they might again rear thy temple which had been destroyed, and serve thee in the ordinances which thou hadst appointed for their observance. Heavenly Father, enable us to receive instruction from their example. Help us diligently to improve the means of grace and the ordinances of religion with which thou hast so abundantly favoured us—to read thy holy word, to sanctify our Sabbaths, and to wait upon thee in thy house of prayer. O forbid, that, by our abuse of the means of grace, we should ever provoke thee to withdraw our candlestick out of its place. But may we be ever careful to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ; so that hereafter we may have an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom. Confirm, O Lord, we beseech thee, every good and holy impression which may yesterday have been made on our hearts; whether in waiting upon thee in secret, or in private, or in public. Graciously be with us this day. Enable us habitually to realize thy presence, and to walk as seeing thee who art invisible. In every difficulty do thou guide us by thine unerring wisdom;

under every temptation, do thou uphold and strengthen us by thine almighty power. Mercifully be with all whom we ought more especially to remember before thee. Bless our fellow-men every where, with all temporal, but especially with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. Extend, we beseech thee, the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour until it fill the whole earth, so that all nations may see the salvation of our God. Hear our prayers, and accept of us graciously, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PARAPHRASE LVI.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XXI.

REMARKS.

It is delightful to witness the expression of the same principles in Christians, however differently situated. The love of Christ shed abroad in their hearts leads them to participate in each other's joys and sorrows. Their bond of union to Christ binds them to each other. The more abundantly they receive of the riches of Christ, the more desirous they are of promoting each other's welfare. Instead of being selfishly inclined, their breasts glow with social kindness to their fellow-creatures, but especially to their brethren in Christ. In this manner they obey his command and imitate his example. The path in which the Christian is led by the principles of his faith, is often surrounded with difficulties; and were he to be guided by considerations of personal safety, or by the advice of affectionate friends, he would not enter on the field of danger. No servant of Christ, however, is at liberty to consult his own ease when his Master requires his service. Whosoever, says Christ, loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me. His love to his people leads them to suffer all things for his sake. It is to them a source of great encouragement, that whatever trials befall them, they are never separated from their Redeemer. They rely on his promise to be present with them, even when the furnace of affliction is hottest; that he will make his grace to be sufficient for them. The most eminent believers have, in this world, given evidence of their remaining weakness and imperfection. While here, indeed, they are never free from the corrupting influence of sin, and have still occasion to watch over themselves with godly jealousy, lest other principles than those which are implanted by the Spirit of God, should influence their conduct. Truly may it be said, that the fear of man bringeth a snare! In all circumstances, even in those of the greatest emergency, it becomes Christians, honestly and unflinchingly, to maintain the principles of the gospel, and never to seek for any temporary advantage, by making a sacrifice of these. By following a different line of conduct, how frequently have they fallen into those very troubles which it was their object to avoid. But though good men may have fallen, they are not to despair. They are encouraged to hope in God, that he will yet raise them again. Those who act according to his word, have no reason to be afraid of their fellow-men, however great their rage or power. For greater is he that is for them than all who can be against them.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we desire to come into thy presence with reverence and humility. Thou art infinitely exalted above our highest conceptions. Heaven is thy throne, and the earth is thy footstool. Thou art present every where throughout the universe, beholding the evil and the good. But we rejoice that, though thou be highly exalted, thou hast graciously condescended to look down upon us, the fallen children of men, with an eye of compassion. Thou hast revealed thyself to us as a God of love. We rejoice in the assurance, that thou hast so loved the world, that thou hast given thine only Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. Herein, indeed, is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. Enable us, heavenly Father, now to approach thee through him, as our Mediator, and do thou love us freely and accept of us graciously. Lift on us, we beseech thee, the light of thy countenance, reconciled and gracious in him. May the love of Christ constrain us to live not unto ourselves. Enable us to carry it about with us, and habitually to manifest its operation in our lives. May our light so shine, that others, seeing our good works, may glorify thee our Father who art in heaven. O forbid, that we should at any time so forget or violate our obligations to our Redeemer, that the world should have any room to doubt or disbelieve our Christian character. But through good report or evil report, may we be the followers of Christ, accounting it but a small matter to be judged by men. We acknowledge, O Lord, that sin and imperfection cleaves to our best services, and that, wert thou to mark our iniquities against us, we could not answer thee for one of the many thousand transgressions with which we are chargeable. We come, beseeching thee, that wherever we have done iniquity, thou wouldst enable us by thy grace to do so no more. Let us never be satisfied with any present attainment, but may we be pressing forward to the mark set before us in the gospel, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who, for the joy of our salvation, endured the cross, despised the shame, and is now set down at the right hand of God. Being led by his Spirit, animated by his promises, and rejoicing in the prospects of blessedness, which he has set before us, may we be enabled to hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering. We thank thee, O Lord, for thy kindness to us through this day. Though we have often been unmindful of thee, thou hast never been unmindful of us, to bless us and to do us good. Thou hast watched over us amidst many dangers. Thou hast upheld us amidst much weakness. We beseech thee to be mercifully with us through this night. Keep us in thy fear. Surround us with thy favour as with a shield, so that no evil may come nigh unto us. When we awake may we be still with thee. Be graciously present with our fellow-men everywhere, but especially with those in affliction. Be unto them a God of grace and consolation. Spare lives that are useful, and prepare the dying for death, for judgment, and for eternity. May the Sun of righteousness arise and shine yet more and more, so that his light may cover the whole earth, and all nations see the salvation of our God. Hear, Father in heaven, these our humble supplications, and do unto us beyond what we are able to ask, for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXVI.

SCRIPTURE—HAGGAI II.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The prophecy delivered by Haggai had been eminently successful in stirring up the rulers with the people to proceed with the building of the temple. From the period when it had been destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, about sixty-eight years had elapsed, and some of the Jews were still alive who had seen it standing, previous to their captivity in Babylon. These, it appeared, had observed that the temple, now in building, was greatly inferior, in external grandeur, to that which had been destroyed, and the remarks which they made had a most discouraging effect on the persons engaged on the work. To prevent this, Haggai is sent to them with special messages for their working and encouragement. In particular Zerubbabel is informed that the Lord would cause great revolutions in the state of the church and of the world; that he would overturn and destroy existing monarchies and nations: but himself, the Lord declares, he would keep safe as his signet; him he would continue to rule over his people; to preserve them in peace and safety; that he had made choice of him for this very purpose. This we are to consider as a gracious intimation, that amidst all the convulsions and destruction of the neighbouring states, the Lord would preserve the people of Judah, with their rulers. It may be also considered as referring to him of whom Zerubbabel was a type, and predicting the establishment and continuance of the kingdom of Christ. By a union with him his people are stamped with his image, and distinguished from all others as the people of God. God thus testifies that he would be mindful of the covenant which he had made with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, that in their seed all nations of the earth would be blessed.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

It is a token for good, in the case of any when the warnings and remonstrances of God's servants have had their desired effect; when, instead of exciting resentment, they give rise to a disposition to perform the duties enjoined. It is unwarrantable to throw discouragements in the way of any, when proceeding according to the divine word, though not making so specious an appearance as many others. Let us remember that it is to this man God will look with favour, who is of an humble and contrite spirit, and who trembles at his word. We often, indeed, judge very erroneously in matters of religion. The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. Instruments which have been long despised and neglected by men, have often been signally honoured and crowned with success by God. Whatever may be the opinion of our fellow-men, if we are satisfied that we are proceeding according to the will of God, it becomes us to proceed in the exercise of faith and hope, not doubting but all our labours shall meet with an abundant blessing. However much nations, with their kings and rulers, may be set in opposition to the Lord, it is our happiness to know that his power is omnipotent. He has the hearts of all men in his hands, and can turn them to fulfil his purposes, whether of mercy or of judgment, as the rivers of water. He can fill every soul with desires to him who was long promised as a light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of his people Israel. All the treasures of the earth are his, and he can appropriate them to such measures as he will bless for extending the kingdom of Christ, until it fill the whole earth. It becomes us frequently to reflect on the happiness of having our lot cast under the gospel dispensation, when the Desire of all nations is come, in whom the fullness of the Godhead dwelleth. He is the corner-stone on whom believers are built up as living stones, and are temples of the Holy Ghost. In this manner, they are fitted for the spiritual service of God on earth, and for his glory in heaven. We ought diligently to guard against supposing that we are serving God with acceptance, while we are living in the neglect of commanded duty, and are following our own inclinations. God requires that we keep his commandments with our whole hearts, and that we study to yield him not a partial, but a universal, obedience. Those who thus truly and faithfully study to serve God, may look undismayed on all the convulsions and changes of the world, being assured that the gracious purposes of God to his people stand unchanged, and that he is arranging every circumstance to the bringing in of that happy period when he will give to his Son the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession; when the Jews shall believe on him whom they have long rejected; when both shall acknowledge Jesus as their Shepherd, and equally experience his omnipotent protection and unbounded love. The Lord will abundantly bless his own people. He has chosen them to manifest his glory, and to enjoy him for ever.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the blessed and only potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hast immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, whom no man hath seen nor can see. Thou art surrounded with myriads of angels and glorified spirits, who cease not, day nor night, to celebrate thy glory. Unto him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb that was slain, they ascribe glory, and honour, and dominion, and power, for ever and ever. We rejoice, O Lord, that unto us, the sinful children of men, upon the footstool of this earth, thou permittest to unite with them in celebrating thy glory. We rejoice to know that Jesus is seated at thy right hand, as a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, and that we are encouraged and invited to draw near unto thy throne in full assurance of faith in his blood. Help us, O God, now to approach thee through him, as our Mediator, with hope and confidence in thy favour, as children to a father. When we draw near unto thee, do thou enlarge the desires of our hearts. Do thou impress us more and more deeply with the sense of our wants and necessities, and of the fullness and blessings which thou hast treasured up in Christ, and which thou hast promised to communicate abundantly to the heirs of salvation. Forbid, O Lord, that we should be straitened in ourselves, when we are not straitened in thee. Enable us to come hungry and thirsty into thy presence, and do thou supply us abundantly with the bread and water of life. We rejoice that thou hast never at any time left thyself without a witness to thy church, and thou art a God who keepest covenant and delightest in mercy. Though thine ancient people departed from thy commandments, thou wast not willing that they should remain at a distance from thee, and perish in their sins. Thou wast mindful of thy covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that in their seed all nations of the earth should be blessed. When their posterity had sinned, and thou hadst brought them to a sense of their sin, thou wast graciously pleased to return unto them and speak unto them in kindness and mercy. We rejoice in all the gracious promises which thou hast made to thy people in former ages, that though thou didst predict the revolution of nations and kingdoms, yet thou didst promise that the Desire of all nations should come, who would make the glory of thy latter house to be greater than of the former, notwithstanding all its external magnificence. And we rejoice to know that the promise which thou didst make has been fulfilled, in the coming of Jesus Christ, thy beloved Son, into our world in the likeness of sinful flesh. We desire now to rejoice before thee in all that he has done and suffered, or is now doing, at thy right hand as our Mediator. May we have redemption through his blood. May our hearts be purified by faith in him. May his Spirit dwell richly within us, and enable us to bring forth in our lives the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto life eternal. Go with us to the duties of this day. May thy love be in our hearts, and do thou strengthen us inwardly with thy might. O help us, heavenly Father, to spend this day as not knowing but it may be our last in this world. Accept of our united thanksgivings, for all thy kindness to us hitherto, and enable us ever to live as the children of thy mercies; and all that we ask is for our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LIV.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XXII.

REMARKS.

The conversion of Paul, as here narrated by himself, is one of the most remarkable on record. No man could be more under the influence of Jewish prejudice than he was. His antipathy to the Christian religion carried him to the greatest extremities. No sufferings he considered to be too great for those who had embraced it. In subjecting them to scourging, imprisonment, and death, he considered that he was doing God service, and in this line of conduct he proceeded with fiery zeal. But how mysterious are often the ways of divine providence in dealing with his chosen people. In the sovereignty of his grace, Jesus arrests the persecuting pharisee in his mad career, and gives him a new heart, subdues all his enmity to him, and commissions him to preach his gospel. Paul is henceforth to be a powerful instrument in the building up of the Christian church, which formerly he had exerted himself to destroy. The facts narrated by Paul were well known to many who did not believe in Jesus, and could not be disputed. Motives of a worldly nature could not have actuated him in embracing the Christian faith. For the associates whom he had left had all worldly preferments in their power, and those to whom he had joined himself, had nothing to bestow. In joining with them, indeed, he could anticipate nothing but a life of suffering. In the communications which he states to have been made to him by Jesus, he could not have been mistaken. They are repeated again and again, and in different places, in the company of others, as well as by himself. They are contrary to all his former prepossessions. The service to which Jesus commissions him, was no doubt arduous, but he endows him with those qualifications which fitted him for its performance. Paul receives those directions and supports which the necessities of his case required. The course on which he had entered was not his own choice. He had been specially appointed to it by his Lord; and to the same authority it becomes every believer to feel himself at all times subject. The example of Paul, here set before us, teaches that we may lawfully plead our civil privileges to screen ourselves from oppressive and cruel treatment; and that from men, destitute of the knowledge of true religion, we may receive a more equitable treatment than from those whose views of divine truth are perverted.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we worship thee as a being possessed of every possible excellence. Thine existence is eternal, and thine essence is immense. Thy holiness is unspotted, and thy justice is inflexible. Thy mercy is infinite, and we rejoice in the assurance, that thou delightest in its exercise to the fallen children of men. We would therefore now take encouragement to approach thee. We acknowledge that, in ourselves, we have no claim to thy friendship, for we have sinned against thee times and ways without number. Which of thy commandments have we not broken? Which of thy laws have we not violated in the imaginations of our hearts, in our words, and in our actions? Thou mightest justly have left us to suffer the punishments threatened against the transgressors of thy law. But we rejoice that thou hast revealed thyself unto us in Christ Jesus, reconciling a guilty world unto thyself, and not imputing unto sinners their trespasses. We desire, O Lord, now to draw near unto thee through faith in his blood. We come not in our own name, and we plead not our own righteousness for acceptance. But we come in the name of thy beloved Son, and we plead his righteousness, and his only. We come beseeching thee to be merciful for what he has done and suffered, and what he is now doing at thy right hand. For his sake, we beseech thee, to blot all our iniquities out of the book of thy remembrance, and love us freely and accept of us graciously. Lift on us the light of thy countenance, and visit us abundantly with the blessings of thy salvation. We would now take encouragement to approach thee on account of the many manifestations of grace which thou hast made to thy church in former ages. We would especially give thee thanks for thy gracious dealings to thy servant who was commissioned to preach thy gospel to the Gentiles. We rejoice in the testimony which thou didst enable him to give to the sovereignty of thy love, in bringing him from darkness to light, and in changing him from being an instrument of cruelty to thy people, to be a chosen vessel for delivering many from Jewish unbelief and heathenish superstition, and enabling them to believe in Jesus Christ as their only Saviour. In the conversion of thy servant may we be led to reflect with admiring gratitude on the unbounded mercy of the Redeemer, who extends salvation even to the chief of sinners. May we thus be encouraged more and more to commit our souls unto him, being assured, that however numerous and heinous our transgressions, the love of our Redeemer is infinite, and that his blood cleanses from all sin. Enable us now to commit our souls afresh into his hands, as unto a faithful Creator, being assured that he will keep that which we have committed unto him against that day when he will present us faultless in the presence of his Father, with unspeakable joy. We thank thee, O Lord, for thy merciful preservation through this day. By thy good hand we have been supported amidst all our unprofitableness and unworthiness. We beseech thee to be merciful with us through this night. Be our guide even unto death, and when thou art pleased to remove us from this earth, may we be exalted to reign with our Redeemer in his kingdom above. These blessings which we ask for ourselves, we beseech thee to bestow on all our brethren of mankind. May our friends enjoy thy friendship; our enemies, if we have any, do thou forgive; our benefactors, do thou reward. Bless our native land in all its privileges, temporal and spiritual. Bless thy church which thou hast planted in it. Build up the walls of our Zion, and may they prosper who love her. May she yet be a joy and a praise in the whole earth. Dwell graciously in this corner of thy vineyard; may it be a well watered garden, in which thou delightest, and bringest forth abundantly the fruits of righteousness. Hear, O Lord, we beseech thee, these our humble supplications, and do unto us beyond what we are able to ask or think, for our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—EZRA VI.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1, 2. The decree of Cyrus for the re-building of the temple, is found, as had been stated by the Jews, in Achmetha, or Ecbatana, the chief city of Media, search for it having been made by order of Darius, first in Babylon, without success. Ver. 3—5. The provisions of the decree are indeed most ample, referring to the strength of the foundations of the temple, its magnitude, (though, in this respect, it would seem it was at last built like the former,) the nature of the structure, the funds, furnished from the royal purse, and the restoration of those vessels that were yet wonderfully spared (2 Kings xxiv. 13.), so precious in the eyes of this patriotic people. Ver. 6—12. No obstruction is now permitted to the rebuilding of the temple; or, rather, orders are given for carrying into operation the provisions of the decree in all respects. A regard to the memory of Cyrus would have some influence in determining the mind of Darius thus to fulfil his intentions; but also, it would appear, from expressions in the proclamation respecting prayers for the royal family, ver. 10, and the divine vengeance on future nations who might hereafter injure or destroy the work now to proceed again, ver. 12, that he had been made acquainted with the nature and value of the true religion, though the conviction was neither deep nor permanent. Ver. 13—15. Thus protected and supported by the king, and encouraged, also, to the undertaking by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah,—as see their writings at large,—the Jews completed the temple about two years after the publication of the decree of Darius, honourable mention being made of the name of Artaxerxes in connection with the event, as well as that of Cyrus and Darius, who, at least, greatly improved and adorned it on coming to the throne. Ver. 16—22. Suitable rejoicings are held after an event of such overwhelming interest. The twelve tribes had been broken up into fragments during their exile, and could only occasionally and imperfectly observe their ritual as prescribed generally by Moses. It is now revived, however, in so far as it could be, after the manner of their fathers, in honour of the re-appearance among them of a structure around which so many fond associations were concentrated. Darius, the immediate instrument under providence of the successful issue, is alluded to as king of Assyria, because he reigned over that country, though, along with Babylon, it was now merged in the Persian monarchy.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The path of duty is to be taken by us, in every situation of life, at all times and under all circumstances. Often, in offices of trust, temptations exist to divert us from it; but, like Darius in the matter of the decree of Cyrus, who simply gave orders to seek for it, and waited the issue, we are to dismiss them, and act with perfect impartiality. God wonderfully overrules the thoughts of men's hearts, and the events of the world, for the promotion of his glory. A decree is made for the rebuilding of his temple by a heathen prince, and discovered at the moment its authority was so much needed. If, however, the temples we are required to rear, the objects to further, be agreeable to our conscientious convictions, how much more forward should we be in lending our influence, time, money, exertions, in the different stations of life in which we are placed! Works which are brought to a successful issue, are usually attended with difficulty at the outset. Our way would be more direct and easier; but God's is circuitous and thorny, that we may value the result more. Mark his hand, and experience the richer blessing of improvement in character—the preparation for one of another kind. At the proper time relief appears, the winter of the soul departs, and the face of all things is changed. Though seriousness become us usually, in a condition like this, there are occasions on which the whole depths of the spirit should be stirred in exuberance of joy. Sadness is dishonouring to God if out of its proper place. It is meet, too, times, that we should make merry, if in a Christian spirit, and within proper limits; and truly gladness to the full is demanded from us on the revival or recovery of religious advantages.

PRAYER.

O Lord God, we are ever prone to go astray. We are sinful creatures, having no plea to utter before thy throne but thy mercy; and wert thou not to direct and strengthen us, we should fall a pray to temptation, and depart from thy will. O do thou, therefore, at all times, be at our right hand, that we may walk before thee as thy obedient children. Help us, we beseech thee, according to our means and opportunities, to be serviceable in promoting the interests of thy Zion. Let these be revived in our day; and let a blessing descend on all, both at home and abroad, who have them at heart, and are engaged in advancing them. The residue of the Spirit is with thee, Almighty and most merciful God; and though discouragements attend us on every hand, we do not despair. In thine own time and way the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and we, thy servants, will praise thee for the greatness of thy power. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy comes in the morning. We offer up to thee our thanksgivings that thou art still sparing and blessing us. We deserve not thy mercies. The recurrence of them, in the midst of our ingratitude, humbles us deeply. Deal not with thy servants in judgment, we entreat thee. As we separate for our duties this morning, may thy presence go with us, and let us be returned here in security from temptation and danger. Hear our prayers for those with whom we are united by the ties of relationship, or friendship, or gratitude, as we beseech thee to hear their prayers for us. Thou knowest our several necessities better than we do ourselves. Suit thy grace to all these. May thy peace reign in this dwelling. May it take up its abode in every heart. And may we, who are wont to meet here from day to day on earth, meet before thy throne in heaven, washed and sanctified by the blood of thy Son. Our prayers are before thee, O Lord God. Hear them for the sake of Him whom thou hearest always. And to thee the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, be all praise ascribed for ever. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM CXXIV.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XXIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1. It was natural for Paul to examine, with some attention, who were the present members of the sanhedrim, having acted under them, while unconverted, in persecuting the Christians. Ver. 2—5. A protestation of his conscientiousness in adopting and persevering in the Christian faith, was also natural in the circumstances. But Ananias, the high priest, could not brook it, as it reflected on his own conduct and that of the members of the council; he descends, therefore, to a most unwarranted abuse of his office as a judge. Paul resents the unjust assault with some warmth, for which, with great magnanimity, he, on being appealed to, expresses contrition, forgetting personal insult in his respect for the power ordained by God, he, under the influence of excited feeling, not having adverted to the situation of Ananias. Ver. 6—9. A common object had, for the moment, mingled two opposite sects, the pharisees and sadducees, in array against him. While he compromises no truth, therefore, he weakens the party, by proving that the great doctrine for preaching which he had been called in question, was the very one on which the members of the council were at issue among themselves. The wisdom of such a line of procedure at once appears. The contending sects are thrown into dispute with each other, while the scribes espouse the cause of Paul, and declare him innocent; and allowing the possibility of an angel, or spirit of some deceased person, having spoken to him, avow opposition to the infidel sadducees. Ver. 10. The heathen Lysias discovers a stronger sense of justice than the Jew Ananias. Lest Paul should be sacrificed, amid the strife in self-protection he had wakened up, and thus, without a fair hearing, orders are given for him to be removed to a place of safety. Ver. 11. But a higher protector was with his servant than he who was but his instrument. The Lord makes consolation to abound as affliction abounded, and upholds him in his present extremity by assuring him, that he should be spared to testify the gospel of his grace at Rome, as he had done at Jerusalem. Ver. 12—35. Lysias' fidelity again contrasts favourably with the enemies of Paul. Some forty of them lay a base plot for his life; but the counsel of the Lord is stronger than that of men. Through a nephew of Paul, to whom it transpired, the intelligence of it is conveyed to himself, who again, sends it to the chief captain, who at once determines on transporting him to Cesarea, about seventy miles from Jerusalem. The whole matter is arranged in a manner highly creditable to him. The escort was a sufficient protection; but that he might escape the rage of the Jews before morning, he departs about three hours after sunset. As he was unaccustomed to the fatigue of marching on foot, like the soldiers, relays of horses, or mules, are provided. A letter accompanies him to the governor, Felix, expressive of his reasons for sending him to Cesarea, and couched in terms honourable at once to his taste and his feelings. On arriving half way, or to Antipatris, and thus being fairly out of the reach of the Jews, the foot soldiers are sent back. Felix acts in the manner for which Lysias had prepared the way. The examination of his case is left over until a fair trial could be had; in the meantime he is deposited in a part of a palace built by Herod the Great, and not in the place in which prisoners in general were confined.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Christians, under the most favourable circumstances, are conscious of their deficiencies in the life they should spend, feel deeply humbled on account of them, and ascribe any attainments they make solely to the grace of God. Yet such a lowly opinion of themselves is perfectly compatible with a conviction of their integrity in their endeavours to act consistently with their obligations, and, if unjustly accused, they may appeal to their conduct in evidence, that with simplicity and godly sincerity they have had their conversation in the world. There is an anger of righteous indignation which is not sinful; if, however, in expressing this, we exceed the limits, as we are prone to do, we should evince our repentance. The office of those who rule over us demands respect, whatever be their personal qualities. God's ordinance gives value to it in our eyes. Men, in becoming Christians, do not lay aside ordinary prudence. All means of self-protection are open to them which sagacity may devise, provided no injury be done to truth. The servants of Christ experience most of his support when most sorely tried. The Lord is with them when others abandon them, as he was with Joseph and Paul. The under current of divine providence is continually working the stream of human affairs in the direction that benefits them, and glorifies God. Who is he that will harm them, if they be followers of that which is good? The best prepared schemes are defeated if other ends than those they contemplate are in the mind of the Almighty. The morality of unbelievers, found on the shore of this world like so many pieces of wreck, to indicate the fair fabric man once was, often puts to shame that of the professed followers of Christ. Virtue is to be admired in any form, although it grow in purity and perfection only from the root of faith. Society cannot afford to lose even the semblance of it.

PRAYER.

Ever blessed be thy name, Almighty Father, that we are permitted and encouraged, at all times, to draw nigh unto thee. Thou art glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, ever doing wonders; but thou art, nevertheless, our God and our friend, through thy Son. He is now at thy right hand, having opened a way for us to thy throne, taking our petitions from us to present them to thee, and commending them with the interest of a personal experience of our wants. We are sinners, O thou Searcher of hearts. It is natural for us to sin; and every day that passes by but discloses to us how grievously and constantly we sin. We repair anew, therefore, to the fountain opened for uncleanness and guilt, which, we bless thee, is ever flowing. Wash thou us, and we shall be pure. Let our repose this evening be that of thy beloved, at peace with thee, with themselves, and with the world. Thy mercies, O Lord God, are new to us every morning and every evening, meeting us in a variety of forms, vouchsafed to us notwithstanding our ingratitude. O may a sense of them be deeply impressed on us. It is of thy grace, most compassionate Father, that any of us are made to differ from others; and we give thee the praise, if, in any measure, we live as thy servants. But inconsistency is continually discovered by us, and we need, therefore, habitually to look to thee for light to guide, and strength to uphold us. We desire to thank thee, that in the path of duty we may reckon upon thy watchful care; but may we never turn aside from it, and, in all respects, may we adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, giving honour to whom honour is due, and cultivating whatsoever things are honest, and lovely, and of good report. May magistrates and rulers rule in thy fear. May we obey them for conscience sake. Prepare us, we beseech thee, for whatever thou hast prepared for us; and whether we awake in time or eternity, may we still be with thee. O Lord, hear, O Lord, forgive, hearken and do. Defer not, for thy name's sake, and answer these our prayers, not according to our imperfect desires, but according to the exceeding riches of thy glory, for the sake of thy Son our Saviour. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXVI.

SCRIPTURE—EZRA IX. X. 1—17.

REMARKS.

Yesterday morning we left the Jews exulting with joy, as became them, that they had again among them their temple, impeded though the work had been by the Samaritans and others. But we have occasion, at all times, to mingle trembling with our joy, for adversity is soon forgotten by us, and prosperity is often abused to carelessness and self-indulgence. Ezra, who had received a royal warrant to rectify the church and state of the Jews from the king of Persia, found them, on his arrival, already participating largely in a vice strongly forbidden them, the prelude to idolatry, and under the consequences of which they and their fathers had grievously suffered, viz. marriage with heathen wives, the country being yet infected to a great degree by idolaters. Not only were the people guilty, but also the priests, whose regulations on this point were so particular, and the princes, who ought to have been forward to enforce subjection to the law. Evil communications, of any kind, corrupt good manners, especially of those whom we tenderly love, and into whose intercourse we are habitually thrown. In regard to the Jews, a marked line of distinction was necessary to be preserved between them and the heathens, separated, as they were, in principles and practice, by so wide a gulf. Though, however, all among us make a profession of religion, and the same care is not required, Christians should marry only in the Lord, watchful how they enter on a union where there is a difference of sentiment on a vital question, in the vain hope of being the instruments of conversion. The foundation of happiness in the married life lies, not merely in similarity of tastes, but, especially, in agreement on religion, and a common regard to its ordinances and its duties. Ezra, in the capacity of representative of the people, humbles himself before God, exhibiting the ordinary signs of sorrow and consternation customary among his people. And, as might have been expected, the spectacle of the exceeding depression of this man of God, awakened many who were personally guilty to a sense of their sins, so that others were speedily associated with him in deprecating the wrath of heaven, going up together for this purpose to the house of God, at the time the evening-sacrifice was offered. The prayer is touching in the extreme. Present iniquities are not viewed apart from those which had preceded them, that full conviction might be expressed. They were but additions swelling the mighty flood that had already been accumulating for a long period, or, according to another figure, putting another story on the proud Babel that defied the Almighty, as it towered up to the skies. But immediate mercies are not overlooked, that the crimson-colour of the defection, mourned over, may be completely revealed. God's kindness in influencing the hearts of the kings of Persia to release them from their bondage, and that they might rebuild their temple, and thus have 'a nail in the holy place' is made mention of. And warnings, too, are referred to, that the exceeding sinfulness of the people may appear. Even with respect to the Jews, language of this character may seem to some exaggerated, but it will be because they have not seen sin in the light which God views it. One of its effects is to blind us to its nature, and those will be most ready to join in it, not, it may be, who compared with others, are greater transgressors; but who, compared with the law of God and their obligations, are struck down with a sense of their defilement and their ingratitude. The prayer, in spirit, commends itself to every one who knows himself. But, it is not only by our prayers, but by our pains, that we approve ourselves acceptable servants. As evil had been committed and mourned over, so the best convictive is to be applied. At the instance originally of Hezekiah, whose relatives, at least, were involved in the sin, the heathen wives are put away, as though the marriage was null, and the children, even, are separated who adhered to idolatry. Time was petitioned for, as it was required, that due distinction might be made between those wives who remained idolaters, or who might have been proselyted either after or before marriage. The particular crisis demanded a severe measure of this kind in the spirit, rather than according to the letter, of the law. Marriages with unbelievers are sinful, but are not now to be dissolved where contracted. And, in a country whose glory it is that the Christian religion is the basis of its laws, divorces are regulated by these. The general truth, however, is not to be overlooked, that we are to evince the sincerity of our condition, and our prayers, by repairing, in so far as we are able, the evils we have committed. How powerful the argument for early piety and purity, that from sin ceaselessly propagating itself, all that those who are converted, late in life, can do, is to mourn over the sins of youth, it being impossible for them at all to make amends for the injuries they have done by these sins.

PRAYER.

O our God, we are ashamed, and blush to lift up our faces to thee, O God; for our iniquities are increased over our heads, and our trespasses are grown up to the heavens. Since the days of our fathers, have we been in great trespasses unto this day, and for our iniquities hast thou been pleased to chastise us from time to time, as nations, and families, and individuals. And now, for a little space, art thou sparing us, remembering mercy in the midst of deserved wrath. And now, O our God, what shall we say after this? for we have forsaken thy commandments which thou hast commanded us, requiring of us perfect obedience to thy laws, separation from the principles and practices of an evil world, a regard to thy glory in all we do, even the minutest actions of life. And after all that is come upon us, for our evil deeds, and for our great trespasses, seeing that thou, our God, hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve, and hast visited us with so much compassion, should we again break thy commandments, wouldest not thou be angry with us, that there should be no escaping? O Lord God of Israel, thou art righteous, for we remain yet escaped, as it is this day; behold we are before thee in our trespasses. Pardon us, good Lord, we beseech thee, and impart to us thy Holy Spirit, that we may see clearly the path of duty, that we may be kept from falling, and live to thee. We have laid ourselves down, we have slept and awakened, for thou the Lord hast sustained us. Known unto thee are the duties we have this day to perform, the trials we may be called to endure, the dangers and temptations to which we may be exposed. But we place ourselves in thy holy and safe keeping. The Lord is our light and our salvation, whom shall we fear? the Lord is the strength of our lives, who shall make us dismayed? Be with us in our going out and coming in. Let no evil come nigh our dwelling. Give to us a deeper insight into the deceitfulness of our hearts. Quicken us in the way of life. May Christ be increasingly precious to us, and may each day find us advancing in our course; that going on from strength to strength, every one of us may at length appear before the Lord in Zion. Bless all who are near and dear to us. Reward our benefactors. Have pity on our enemies, if we have any, and help us to forgive them. Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee. Succour the tempted. Comfort the afflicted. Pour into their wounded spirits the balm that is administered by a Saviour's hands, which, reaching the springs of sorrow, alone effectually removes it. Let thy way be known upon the earth, thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise thee, O God, let all the people praise thee. Receive our thanksgivings, hear our prayers, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVI. 8.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XXIV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1—9. The trial of Paul, before the party to whom appeal is now made, is not long delayed. His accusers, from Jerusalem, are too eager to vent their indignation against him, especially for having been taken violently from them, to allow it to stand over for any time. They are speedily on the spot, and bring with them a famous orator, Tertullus, whom they had retained as counsel, the better to advance their cause in the eyes of Felix. His speech is distinguished both by flattery and falsehood, opening with an encomium on the government of Felix, notoriously untrue, and enlarging on the conduct of Paul in a manner which surprises us, that even his accusers, initiated as they were, could allow, much less confirm. Ver. 10—21. If the artifice of Tertullus were difficult of exposure, it would be found in the defence of Paul, made immediately on permission being given by Felix, and transparent with the qualities of becoming respect, truth, faithfulness, and conviction of innocence. One feature of it eminently arrests our notice,—the tenacity with which Paul holds by the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, his preaching which had been his cardinal crime. As it struck at the root of infidelity, and by the justification it afforded of the claims of Christ, constituted the seal of heaven, confirming all the views that had been given of the design of his death, while it was at once a pledge of our own resurrection, and the introduction to the office he is now sustaining for the church, it might well be allowed to, as if it were the only doctrine of the Christian faith, obtain a sublime pre-eminence in the instructions of the apostle, and be stood by with the most unfaltering courage. Ver. 22, 23. Felix was evidently impressed by the appeal of Paul, supported as it was by information he possessed from other sources; and defers, therefore, giving judgment until Lysias should arrive, while he allows him greater liberty. Ver. 24—27. Under mixed motives of a regard to avarice and truth, he sends for Paul frequently in private. He expected the Christians, as they were distinguished for their generosity, would purchase his liberty, though in this he was disappointed, and so, on his successor arriving, as an effort to please the people he left him bound. On one occasion his mind was greatly shaken by an interview with Paul, nor are we surprised it should be, as the apostle's discourse was directed to points which had a special application to Felix, and the profligate Drusilla. The agitation, however, never went to the heart, and itself found relief in the well known words, the spirit of which has charmed many souls to perdition, 'Go thy way this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The zeal of enemies in a bad cause, may well put to shame the zeal of friends in a good one. The children of this world lose no time, and spare no pains, to promote their objects. Truth, however, is a beautiful thing, and, though it have often to make its way through passion and prejudice, there is an echo found to it in every breast, though it be frequently faint, and faint as it is, is not admitted to exist. Clothed in the panoply of truth also, we are safe, for the course of divine providence runs in favour of the righteous. What a concentration of blessings is found in the doctrine of Christ's resurrection! It spreads as we meditate on it, and sends comfort in on the spirit, as from a variety of channels. It meets us at every turn in apostolical preaching. It should be the theme of the Christian, nor will its wonders ever be exhausted. Careful distinction should be made by us, between the effect of the manifestation of the truth to the conscience, under the influence of which many good resolutions are made, and deeds performed, and its effect on the heart, where it purifies and remains. It is surprising how very near people may be to the kingdom of God and never enter it. If in the constant use of the means of grace, or indeed, as the most superficial observers of events, affecting us and our families, we cannot fail often to have serious thoughts of judgment and eternity. And many esteem these as favourable symptoms, and, on the strength of them, are speeding their way, without alarm, to another world. But conversion is one thing, and conviction another. The latter is accompanied with tormenting fear, plays on the surface of the spirit, would put off and depart. The convenient season never arrives, until too late, nor should we expect it to arrive, as the natural effect of delay is to weaken impression. In the meantime, it were well the convinced, though not converted, turned their attention to their real condition, morally speaking; for being convinced, they admit the necessity of a thorough change of character; but being unconverted, they are wilfully ruining their souls. They are guilty of self-murder in a sense unspeakably more affecting than that in which the phrase is ordinarily used.

PRAYER.

God of the families of all the earth, we are again, this evening, through thy providential kindness, assembled around our family altar. Another day has passed by, bringing us so much nearer to death and eternity, and do thou forbid that any of us before thee should be putting off the concerns of our souls. Deepen and strengthen our convictions, we beseech thee. May we resolve, by thy grace, to follow up these, and, in this the day of our visitation, to seek reconciliation with thee. May we have always a conscience void of offence, both towards God and towards man. May we do no things, and go to no places, in which we would not like death to find us. Thus, as we repose for the night, may we anticipate that hour at which we shall sleep the sleep of death. We bless thee, O Lord God, that Christ hath risen indeed. May we rise with him to newness of life, and thus possess the pledge that, on laying aside the garments of mortality, this corruptible shall put on incorruption, this mortal, immortality. We would make confession of our sins in thy presence, holy Lord God. Sins against light, and warning, and mercies; sins that are numerous as the sands on the sea-shore. But though we are humbled, we are not discouraged on account of these. We have an Advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous. His name we plead. On his sufferings and death we depend. May we be found of him, not having our own righteousness. Create in us clean hearts, O God. Renew right spirits within us. Make us altogether such as thou wouldest have us to be. We bless thee for the unspeakable gift of thy Son. We bless thee for food, and raiment, and protection. We bless thee for the reading of thy word. Impress its truths on our hearts. Grant that it may be circulated in all languages, and its privileges known among all nations. Revive thy work in the midst of us, O God. Let thy statutes be our song in this the house of our pilgrimage. Hear us when we call upon thee, for the sake of thy Son, who, in condescension to our infirmities, hath taught us thus to pray, Our Father, &c.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CII. 13.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH I.

REMARKS.

The book of Nehemiah contains an interesting account of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, (which had been destroyed at the time of the Babylonish captivity,) and of a reformation, also, which Nehemiah accomplished amongst his countrymen. Attempts to rebuild the walls had been previously made by Ezra and others, but the people around the city contrived to hinder the work, and the honourable privilege was reserved for Nehemiah, of again making Jerusalem 'a praise in the earth.' This event was foretold in the remarkable prophecy of Daniel (ix. 25); where it is said—'Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, unto Messiah the prince, shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks. The streets shall be built again, and the wall in troublous times. And after threescore and two weeks the Messiah shall be cut off.' Now these seven weeks first mentioned, each day meaning a year, are found in the time that elapsed between Ezra's commission from Cyrus to repair Jerusalem, and the death of Nehemiah. This time was just forty-nine years, and then 'the streets had been built again, and the wall in troublous times.'

The month Chisleu, answers to part of our November and December, and consists of thirty days. The twentieth year spoken of in the first verse, is the year of the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, in whose service Nehemiah was retained. 'Shushan the palace,' was the winter residence of the Persian sovereigns, from the time of Cyrus to that of Alexander the Great. Daniel lived, prophesied, and is supposed to have been buried there. The supposed site of Shushan, or Susa, presents now only a heap of ruins.

The Jews, in their long captivity, had always some signal proofs of God's care over them. Daniel, Nehemiah, and others, were exalted to posts of honour and confidence under the conquerors of their country. But they never forgot their desolate land, and the forsaken house of God, amidst all the splendour by which they were surrounded, and would have rather been door-keepers in the house of God, 'than dwell in tents of sin.' When Nehemiah heard of the miserable condition of Jerusalem he sat down and wept and mourned; but he did not despair while he remembered the promises of God, and knew that the throne of grace was accessible. Confessing the sins of himself and his people, he sought the King of kings before he had recourse to the earthly monarch whom he served; and it is a most important example which we have thus presented to us. In all our undertakings, let us ever first seek help and counsel from God. 'Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord.' Yet how many are there who never ask his blessing, or pray for his guidance through the schemes in which they are daily employed! How often are even Christians chargeable with engaging in new undertakings, of business or pleasure, without referring all to God by prayer and supplication! How frequently do we 'make known our wants' to him, in some things only, and retain unlawful wants, among the 'all things' which we desire! And how often is human advice, and assistance, and influence, sought after as hidden treasure, while the wisdom which is from above is left unthought of!

Great is the privilege of 'offering up our desires to God,' through the mediation of our Saviour. Christ died that we might pray with hope. Christ rose that we might pray with confidence. Prayer is the channel through which the treasures of divine grace flow upon the soul. Great as is the privilege, great is our responsibility. Let us never lightly esteem the blessings of which we can so readily avail ourselves. Let us act in this matter in the spirit of the patriarch Jacob, when he said, 'I will not let thee go until thou bless me.' Let us act in the spirit of Joshua, when he said, 'whatsoever others do, as for me and my house we will serve the Lord.' All the holy men of old were men of prayer. It is the life of duty. 'He that honoureth me, saith the Lord, I will honour, and he that despiseth me, shall be lightly esteemed!' The time is rapidly approaching when the throne of grace shall be the last and only refuge of our souls in the hour of death. Let it be our resort now, that we may find mercy to pardon, and grace to help in time of need.

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever blessed God, on the morning of another day enable us to draw near to thee with reverence and devout affection. Day unto day uttereth speech of thee. Night unto night showeth knowledge of thee. We close our eyes under thy protection; we open them to behold thy goodness. O let us never forget from whom it is that all our blessings flow; but may we recognize thy mercy and thy loving-kindness, in the food we eat, the air we breathe, and the raiment which clothes us; in the preservation of our faculties, and the continuance of our comforts; in the recurrence of every season, in the restored light of every morning; but above all, in the long-suffering mercy and grace to us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. We acknowledge our unworthiness of the least of thy mercies. O Lord God of heaven, the great and terrible God, that keepeth covenant, and mercy for them that love him, and observe his commandments,—we, too, have dealt very corruptly against thee, and have not kept the commandments, nor the statutes, nor the judgments, which thou commandedst thy servant Moses. We are offenders in thought, word, and deed. We are transgressors by the omission of duty, and by the commission of sin. And there is no help in us. But we rejoice to know, that where sin is bounded, grace much more abounds. We lead thine own promise, Whoso cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out! Lord, we come—we would return to thee. Pardon our sins. Cast us not away, for thy mercy's sake in Christ, in which we have trusted. Lord, we believe. Help thou our unbelief. We bless thee that thou hast never left thyself without a witness in the works of thy power, and the bounties of thy providence; but we bless thee with a deeper gratitude, that while, in times past, thou spakest unto our fathers by the prophets, thou hast in these latter days spoken unto us by thy Son from heaven. Enable us to grow daily in knowledge of thee, the only true God, and of Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent. May we esteem no knowledge equal to that of Christ crucified, to whomsoever it may be foolishness, and a stumbling-block. And may the wisdom which thy word teaches, produce fruit in our inward thoughts, and our outward actions; in the piety of our hearts, and the holiness of our lives, abundantly to thy praise and glory. And more especially be thou our guide and guardian through this new day, to which thou hast awakened us. Strengthen us for trial, if trial is before us. Deliver us from temptation, if temptation is on our way; direct us in difficulty, or shield us in danger; and if this day is to be crowned with thy mercies, O God, in our continued health, and hope, and peace, fill our hearts with gratitude; enable us to love thee more, and to serve thee better than we have ever done; and thus conducting us, from day to day, by thy counsel, receive all at last, we pray thee, to thy glory; and all we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 41.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XXV.

REMARKS.

The period in the life of Paul to which this chapter refers was a most momentous one. The time had now arrived when he was 'to bear the name of the true God before kings,' as had been foretold through Ananias of Damascus, after Saul's conversion. And nobly was this part of the great apostle's work begun. He had already caused the rapacious and licentious Felix to tremble before the word of God, and the terrors of a bad conscience. He was now to set the truth, as it is in Jesus, before Festus; a more upright governor, but one too much engrossed, apparently, with his worldly affairs, to consider the things which belonged to his peace. He was to stagger the prejudices of the king of Judea; and in Caesarea, the very city in which Agrippa's father, Herod, was eaten up of worms, he was to tell him of that great God's mercy, whose wrath his father had provoked; and finally, he was to be sent to Rome, the reeking furnace at that time of men's hottest passions, to proclaim the glorious gospel of salvation to sinful men.

This was the appointment of God with respect to his servant Paul, in order that the Gentiles might come to the knowledge of the truth, and men withstood it in vain. Jews bound themselves by a vow to kill him. The high priest and the chief of the Jews besought Festus to send for him to Jerusalem, that they might slay him by the way. Festus himself eventually seems to have partly yielded to their wishes. But the wisdom of the inspired apostle defeated their plans, and God watched over the safety of his messenger.

How striking is the contrast, in this chapter, between the honour which men receive of one another and that honour which cometh from God only. We find Paul here, a friendless prisoner, with no man to care or plead for him. We find Festus and Agrippa 'drest in their little brief authority,' and lording it in all the pride of rank and wealth. Yet Paul was a king and a priest unto God, the Lord of all, while they were 'scorned' by him who 'sits in the heaven.' Nay, it is just because there was such a friendless prisoner brought before them that their very names have attracted any attention from posterity. Let us not be guided only by external distinctions in our estimate of others. While we pay the becoming respect which is due to superiors, let us not forget, that the greatest saint may be found in the humblest rank; that God hath often chosen the weak things of this world to confound the things that are mighty, and that the greatest distinction man can rise to, is that of being a 'Son of God,' a joint 'heir with Christ!'

The conduct of Festus towards Paul appears to have been better, however, than that of Felix. When the Jews desired judgment against Paul, without evidence, he refused to deliver him to death, before his accusers were confronted with him. This equity may remind us, that in all our intercourse with others we never should prejudice the conduct of our neighbours, nor decide against them, but on clear grounds. A rash, uncharitable, and censorious spirit is too frequently indulged, often, indeed, by professing Christians; and even from the example of a heathen we may take a salutary lesson.

Yet it is a melancholy reflection, that Festus, Agrippa, and Berenice, were so near to the means of grace, without profiting by them. They were in influential stations, with the gospel of Christ in the hand of an apostle before them; but all that they saw was a singular case, and a singular man, in whose personal safety alone they felt some interest. Were his words ever blessed to their souls? God only knows. Such a result did not occur at the time. Let us always attend to the lessons which God, in his providence, teaches. Let us ever be watchful to derive instruction from every quarter, however lowly or unpromising; and let us use the means of grace, in public or in private ordinances,—not as they who are curious, and ever asking after ‘some new thing,’ but as they who desire, with all saints, to comprehend the length, and breadth, and height, and depth, and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge.

PRAYER.

Thou art great, O God, and greatly to be praised. Who shall declare thy praises, or tell of all thy mighty works? Yet blessed be thy name, that though thou art so far removed from us, in holiness and majesty, thou art willing, as thou art able, to make all grace abound toward us. Thou hast preserved our lives throughout another day. Thou hast protected us, O God, amidst innumerable snares and dangers. Thou hast brought us together again in peace and security to the evening sacrifice of praise and prayer; and still the means of grace and the hopes of glory are vouchsafed us; still we are privileged to plead the merits and mediation of Christ, and to look forward to his second coming with humble joy in his salvation. But while we bless thee for undeserved mercies, we have also to acknowledge many sins. It is to thy restraining grace, O God, that we owe our preservation from fatal apostacy. The heart is deceitful above all things; who can know it? We desire to try ourselves, not by any standard of our own, but by thy most holy and heart-searching law. In many things we offend. In all things we fail and come short. If thou, O Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, O Lord, who shall stand. Even in our best services, thy pure eye seeth the sin that worketh in us. But there is forgiveness with thee that thou mayest be feared! Still, therefore, O God, do we hope in thee; still, therefore, do we rejoice that with thee there is mercy and plenteous redemption. And how shall we praise thee for him through whom redemption has been revealed to us; for him who died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God; for him who now, we trust, stands between our souls and our sins, as our advocate and mediator? O fill our heart with that love by which faith in Christ worketh. Make it more and more our delight to have recourse to that fountain of his peace-speaking blood, which thou hast opened for sin and for uncleanness. And while we daily adhere more closely to him as our Saviour, may we be also daily more and more conformed to his image. By holiness, by peacefulness, by charity, by every good work, may we declare, in the sight of men, that we would do thy will on earth, even as it is done in heaven. Bless the ministers of thy glorious gospel. May they be animated by the Holy Spirit, even as thy saints of old. Bless especially those labourers, who, like Paul, are called to carry the message of grace to the nations who are in darkness. Remove obstacles from their way. Soften the heart of enemies. Make the truth strong for thine own name's sake, that the whole world may see the glory of our God. And while peace is in our own beloved Zion, and prosperity within her bulwarks, let us not forget that our responsibility is increased with our advantages. Let us not be high-minded, but fear, and use whatever talents thou hast committed to our keeping as those who must give account. Lord, watch over us this night. Grant us sound and refreshing sleep, and to see the light of a new day, if it pleaseth thee. Bless also our friends. Reward our benefactors. Forgive our enemies. Comfort all who mourn. Relieve all who suffer. Lord, hear; Lord, answer. Forgive and accept us through Jesus Christ, our Redeemer. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CII. 16.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH II.

REMARKS.

The month Nisan, mentioned in the beginning of this chapter, is the first month in the sacred year of the Jews, and three months after Chisleu, so that it corresponds to part of our February and March. Artaxerxes the king of Persia, is supposed by many to have been the Ahasuerus who married Esther, and that she is the queen referred to in the 6th verse of this chapter. But it is more probable that Ahasuerus was the great Xerxes, much noticed in profane history; and that this was another prince, known by the name of Artaxerxes Longimanus, whose character was more humane and consistent than that of Ahasuerus, and whose reign answers better to the dates of scripture. Sanballat the Horonite, Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian, were foreigners who had intruded themselves among the Jews, and endeavoured to gain the rule of the city of Jerusalem. Sanballat afterwards built the temple on mount Gerizzim, where the Samaritans worshipped.

Infidels have alleged that there are two virtues omitted in the system of Christian morality; viz., friendship and patriotism. The most violent objections, however, are often advanced by those who have least acquaintance with the subject. It is a remarkable circumstance, that these very virtues are most beautifully and frequently exemplified and approved in the scriptures. The friendship of David and Jonathan, is only one striking instance out of many.

When or where was there such friendship as that of Christ for his apostles, particularly John?—And as to the love of our country; why the history of the Jews in the scriptures shows this sentiment run to excess; while in the conduct of Nehemiah, we have a noble example of a religious patriot.

But Christian patriotism was never so touchingly or powerfully manifested, as when the Lord Jesus wept over that city wherein he was to suffer death, and uttered the imploring words, 'Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, but ye would not!'

Let us here observe also the importance of combining habits of prayer with habits of diligence in the use of means. You see that Nehemiah did not content himself with praying, however fervently, in the difficult and disheartening circumstances in which he was placed. He shows us a striking instance of the truth, that it is not only a possible thing, but a most consistent thing, to exercise the most humble and entire dependence upon God, along with zeal, and activity, and prudence, in the use of means. He waited for a favourable opportunity of bringing the case of Jerusalem before the king of Persia. He made the necessary arrangements for his absence; procured letters of safe conveyance, and of assistance in his object; and proceeded with the utmost caution and circumspection, that all unnecessary difficulties might be avoided. Let us in every good work do so likewise. Let us depend on God, and seek his blessing, but also labour in the accomplishment which we desire. Many seem to think that success depends on prayer alone. Many, that it depends upon our exertions alone. But it depends upon neither. It depends upon the will of God, who hath told us both to 'ask,' that we may receive, and to 'work' while it is called to-day.

Never let us be withheld from our duty by the opposition or the ridicule of bad men. It must needs be that offences come in this world. Nehemiah was withstood by enemies who laughed at his undertaking. Strong in the sense of God being on his side, he disregarded their sarcasms. Too often 'when persecution ariseth, straightway professors are offended.' They would be religious only when religion is in favour with men. They love not a cause, however excellent in itself, which exposes them to trouble. Such are not of those who 'overcome the world.' Such are not of those who 'have come out of tribulation,' as 'conquerors through him that loved them!' Let us estimate all our difficulties in the Christian course at their proper value. If God be for us, who can be against us? Let us ever remember, too, the end of a Christian's pilgrimage. The earthly Jerusalem again lieth waste and forsaken. But the heavenly Jerusalem shall never be destroyed. We seek a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. Let us so walk that we may obtain, and pray for grace to enable us so to walk.

PRAYER.

Most gracious God! help us, whenever we approach thee, or thy word, to do so in simplicity of mind, and sincerity of heart. May thy holy scriptures be profitable to us, at all times, for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness, and may what we have now read be blest to us. Lord, thou hast been very favourable unto us. Our lot has been cast amidst light and liberty, and we can worship thee, in public, or in private, no man making us afraid. Bless our country. Bless yet more abundantly these united kingdoms with the grace of thy Holy Spirit. Bless our sovereign, our rulers, and the whole body of the people. Blot out our national sins. And may the knowledge of thee, and of Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent, make all governments, throughout the world, more and more conducive to the best interests of mankind. But we know, O God, that this world passeth away; and we bless thee that thou hast made known to our faith and our hope another and a better. Thou hast not indeed dealt with us according to our iniquities. Even when men were sinners against thee, Christ died that they might be saved. We are sinners, O God, against mercy as well as against truth. But O look on us in the face of thine Anointed. Put a new song of praise into our mouth, that for us mercy rejoiceth against judgment. Write thy law in our hearts. Renew right spirits within us. And while thou enablest us to put off all unrighteousness, whether of the body or of the spirit, give us assurance of thy love, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, and perseverance therein until the end. But whether thou grantest, or withholdest from us, in thy wisdom, the higher privileges of thy reconciled children, may our souls prosper and be in health. Lord, enable us, by thy Holy Spirit, to discharge aright, and for the promotion of thy glory, all the duties to which thou callest us. May we be honoured instruments in thy hand, of advancing thy kingdom upon earth, however humble may be the sphere we occupy. Whether as rulers or subjects, teachers or taught, masters or servants, parents or children, may we ever act as seeing him who is invisible; may we walk as before the Lord, while we are in the land of the living, not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but esteeming it a small thing to be judged of man's judgment; knowing that he who judgeth us, is the Lord. For all the mercies of the past night and this morning, O heavenly Father, accept our imperfect thanks. We are pilgrims and sojourners upon earth. Lord, hide not thy face from us. We know not what a day or an hour may bring forth. But do thou according to thy mercy with us, O God. Be still the light of our life, the strength of our hearts, our portion for ever, and answer our prayers with grace, mercy, and peace, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 44.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XXVI.

REMARKS.

Nothing could be more admirable, more truly dignified, than the behaviour and the speech of Paul, on this trying occasion. The eloquence and classic beauty of his defence before Agrippa have always been acknowledged, but it is in still higher qualities that its excellence consists. As an example of firm faith in God and a good cause, of humility combined with proper self-respect, of sound reasoning, of graceful courtesy, in union with fervent love to the souls of men, Paul here pre-eminently displays the effects of that grace from on high which had renewed him. Though it may not be given us to emulate the intellectual talents of God's more distinguished servants, we can always endeavour to imitate their graces. Talent unsanctified is often only a snare to its possessor. And though no good gift is to be despised, yet it is not the talented mind, but the sanctified heart, by which we are made meet for heaven. Here we see how Paul had devoted all the powers of his mind to the service of Jesus; but we see more strikingly displayed, both here and elsewhere, how changed too his soul had become under the power of the truth as it is in Jesus. Formerly he breathed violence and slaughter against the innocent and defenceless, and in the fury of his fanaticism persecuted them to the utmost. Now, that fanaticism was changed into the gentleness which wished that all his persecutors were as himself, excepting in his bonds. Formerly he was 'exceedingly mad' against men whose cause was peace on earth, and good-will to all. Now when he was declared a madman while speaking the words of truth and soberness, his soul was filled with one object,—the salvation of men, to the glory of God. Great was the change which had taken place in this man. Such a change is necessary in every human being. We are all naturally alienated from God. We are all practically at enmity with God, until our nature is renewed by divine grace. And though we have no reason to expect a visible miracle to work such a change, yet the power must be from God. Has that 'turning from the service of sin to the love of God,' taken place in our hearts? Do we count all things else loss, that we may win Christ, and be found in him? Or do any of us 'think with themselves, that they may do any thing contrary to the commandment of Jesus Christ?' O let us be assured, that there is no safety, honour, or happiness, but in being sons of God; born again by his Spirit unto newness of life; living on the sincere milk of his word, and growing thereby; and trained by the discipline which he sees fit to appoint for us, to glory, honour, and immortality.

Let us learn, from the example of Paul, the importance of 'searching the scriptures.' We must be ready to 'give to every man a reason of the hope that is in us, with meekness,' and this cannot be done well without being learned in the scriptures. But let us beware lest our knowledge of the scriptures be merely speculative. Agrippa was acquainted with all the customs and questions of the Jews, yet he was not converted. He said he was 'almost persuaded to be a Christian,' but this was probably only a mere complimentary expression of his admiration at Paul's ability and eloquence. Let our knowledge actuate our conduct.

Finally let us learn, from Paul's example, to put our trust in the Lord, and fear no evil, except sin. We may never be called on to encounter similar trials to his, but every Christian's course has trials of its own. Christ promised to his apostles 'a mouth and wisdom,' when they should be brought before kings and governors for his name's sake. Amply was the promise accomplished. He has also promised to all his followers, that his grace would be sufficient for them; amply has that promise, too, been fulfilled in every age. Let us not be straitened in his fullness. Let us devote ourselves to his cause, and rest satisfied that whatever work he may give us to do, he will supply also the strength to do it.

PRAYER.

Unite our hearts, O God, to praise thy name, and enable us to appear in spirit before thee as becometh the creatures of thy power, the dependents on thy bounty, and the undeserving objects of thy long-suffering mercy. Enable us to believe, with the heart unto righteousness, that thou art, and that thou art the rewarder of all who diligently seek thee; and forbid that we should take thy holy name rashly or carelessly into our mouths. Follow with thy blessing, we entreat thee, our reading and meditation on thy word. May we ever esteem it our unspeakable privilege that we can make the word of the Lord the man of our counsel. What are we, and what is our father's house, that thou shouldst so have cared for us. Things which were hidden from the wise and prudent, thou hast revealed unto us. Lord, bless the knowledge of thy truth to our souls. Lord, perfect thine own praise, in the mouths of babes and sucklings. Feed us with that spiritual food which is convenient for us, and build us up daily, towards the stature of perfect men in Christ Jesus. Our Father which art in heaven, we desire to give thee grateful thanks for all the grace and mercy which we have experienced at thy hand, during the day, and throughout the week, which are now closing over us. Thou hast granted us life and favour, and thy visitations have preserved our spirits. We would remember that the day f life draweth rapidly to its close; that the times and the seasons are bearing us swiftly to eternity, that the night cometh in which no man can work, and that we know not how soon we may be summoned before thee. O pardon, most merciful Saviour, our innumerable transgressions. Work in us yet more and more, O Holy Spirit, to will and to do of thy good pleasure. Deliver us from all evil, Almighty God, and sanctify us wholly for thine own name's sake. While we look forward to the privileges of another Sabbath, if it be thy will that we awaken to another day on earth, we pray that thou wouldst prepare us to profit by our advantages. May we be in the spirit on the Lord's day. May our wants be supplied, our sins subdued, our faith strengthened, our love increased. O blessed be thou, our gracious God, who hast not only given us sabbaths in time, as resting-places amidst the toils of our earthly pilgrimage, but hast given us the hope of an everlasting sabbath, to succeed these toils, and satisfy our souls with more than we can ask or think. What shall we render unto thee for all thy benefits? What can we render? Nothing but ourselves! To thee and thy service, O Lord God! unworthy, polluted as the offering is, yet for his sake in whom thou art well pleased, accept us, bless us, and cause thy face to shine upon us. We pray for all our brethren of mankind, that they may be enlightened, sanctified, and saved. Send forth thy light to the dark places of the earth, which are still the habitations of cruelty. Thy kingdom come. And now, O Lord, we commit our souls to thy keeping. Mercifully hear us, and grant an answer to our prayers in peace, for Christ our Saviour's sake. Amen.

TWENTY-NINTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXXIV.

REMARKS.

This psalm describes the feelings of a believer, deprived for a time of the visible communion of the church. But though deprived, not insensible to his loss, or indifferent to the repossession of ordinances. Absence from the sanctuary has only more endeared its privileges to his heart. The place of his exile can supply no object to his affections, it yields no substitute to fill the void in his soul. With earnest and vehement desire he looks back to the tabernacles which his feet had once trod, to the courts of the Lord, where with his brethren he had kept holiday; and as if the world beside were a wilderness, and had in it no spot of beauty to be desired, he breaks forth at the recollection into the exclamation, 'how amiable, how unequalled; how surpassing for beauty are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts.' The sanctuary he had experienced to be God's meeting-place with his soul, and its ordinances to be streams from the rivers of pleasure that are at his right hand. What would he not give that the communication might again be opened between his soul, and the streams that make glad the city of God. His soul is athirst like the parched tongue of the traveller in a desert land; what would he not give for a cup of water? The true Israelite replies, 'I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than dwell in the tents of wickedness.' Riches, rank, office, every worldly consideration, he would willingly resign, and choose the least honoured of employments in the church, could he only thereby recover the blessings of ordinances. 'His soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; his heart and flesh crieth out for the living God.' Let us not be amongst those who neglect the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is. Absent and without loss we may be from the assemblies of the world; its assemblies of pleasure, or politics, or business. From these our absence may be gain. But to withhold our foot from the assembly of the church, is to denounce ourselves excommunicated from the believer's faith, is to avow that we have no song of praise at the tidings, 'the Lord is risen;' that to us Christ is no Saviour, his cross no pledge of pardon, his empty tomb no pledge of resurrection, his ascension no pledge of future glory. Ask the apostles why they assembled together in public worship on the first day of the week, and they will reply, 'the Lord is risen.' Wilfully, therefore, and habitually to absent ourselves from the assembly of the saints, is to renounce our belief in Christ's resurrection, is to abjure this doctrine, and to pronounce the joyful tidings of an empty tomb, and a risen exalted Saviour, no longer worthy of being celebrated with the household of faith. And as we repair to the 'courts of the Lord,' let us remember that the church is still Christ's meeting place. The preacher's words may be void of all eloquence, his speech ungainly, his mental capacities weak, his thoughts as a thrice told tale; yet, with joy will the believer repair to the house of God, for there has Christ promised to meet with him, to bless him, and to do him good. By the Spirit of Christ resting upon him, he will gather spiritual riches amidst the poverty of human ministrations, as the Indian gathers golden particles amidst barren sands.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou hast in thy great mercy, preserved us to behold the light, and enter upon the holy rest, of another day of the Son of man; thou hast called us again to rejoice at the tidings, The Lord is risen, and hath appeared unto many; and to magnify thy faithfulness in thy promise, that thine holy One should not see corruption. Separate and sanctify our hearts this day for thy peculiar service. Enable us to say to all worldly cares, intruding anxieties, and to the tumult of earthly thoughts and passions, Be still, and know that this is the day of the Lord. Grant unto us throughout the day a habitual recollection of thy command, Remember the sabbath to keep it holy. Pour out thy Spirit upon us, as thou didst upon thy servant John—banished to the isle of Patmos for the testimony of Jesus; and make known thy word unto us. Let thy Spirit take of the word of Christ, and show it unto our souls. Teach us sin's hatefulness, its opposition to thy most perfect and holy law, the dishonour it casts upon thy majesty, the destruction it brings upon our own souls, the agony with which it pierced the Lord of glory. Bring home to our consciences the charges of thy word, that we may be led to take refuge underneath the wings of Immanuel. Thou that openest the prison doors and settest the prisoners free, loose this day our bonds, proclaim to our souls the year of jubilee, the acceptable year of the Lord. Grant unto us a simple faith in the great propitiation and assured confidence in the word and promise of God. Give us to know, that we are known of thee; that we are the sheep of thy pasture. Say unto us, Thine iniquities are forgiven, thy sin is purged. Bless every member of this family apart; let us individually, and as a household, receive from thee the grace we need. Grant that our earthly may be a type of the heavenly home; of the peace, the love, the charity, that reign in the family above; and with prayers for our household, we would unite our supplications for the whole household of faith; beseeching thee especially to bless the pastor whom thou hast set over us in holy things, and richly to endue his soul with every needful gift and grace of thy Spirit. Purify the sons of Levi; purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering of righteousness. Cause all thy goodness and grace to pass before us, that in the assembly of thy church we shall feel with Jacob, this is none other than the house of God, this is the very gate of heaven. O Lord God of hosts, hear this our prayer; give ear, O God of Jacob. Behold, O God, our shield, look on the face of thine anointed. For his sake hear us graciously, and forgive us freely. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXVII.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXXVII.

REMARKS.

Amongst the other excellencies and glories of the church celebrated in this psalm, this stands conspicuous; that it is the birth-place of souls. Of you it shall be said, 'This and that man was born in her,' and again, 'the Lord shall count when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there.' The name given to the church, 'the birth-place of souls,' implies, that there is such a thing as conversion. For why should the church be signalized by this name, if man needed no change of character, if his soul required no conversion.

But the designation given by the psalmist to the church, not only implies the validity of conversion, but describes its nature. Some change, no man who reflects at all upon the human character, but will allow is necessary and desirable before a man passes from this life, and appears before the Judge of the quick and the dead. There is upon all hearts the conviction that it is not well to appear in the presence of God, with a soul unwashed from sin; that heaven is not the place where a polluted heart can dwell; that the royal presence where all are clothed with white robes, is not the place for him who is still clothed with a filthy garment. It is a conviction which the conscience of the natural man, notwithstanding his aversion to this scriptural change, can but ill conceal from himself, a conviction which he cannot suppress, that the earthly unrenewed heart is a tenant but ill fitted for heaven. It is not possible for him to reflect upon his own character, the habitual bent and inclination of his mind, the current of his desires, the objects of his affections, his ruling passions, and compare these with the pursuits, and employments, and affections of the company around the throne, without perceiving that ere he can mingle with that blessed throng, some essential change must take place, that will alter the character of heaven, or alter the character of his heart. To one or other of these conclusions he is inevitably shut up. Either he or heaven must be changed. Heaven must be brought down to the standard of his tastes, or his character must be elevated to the standard of its employments; heaven must be lowered in its spirituality to meet his character, or his character must be elevated to meet the spirituality of heaven; heaven must become less holy to meet and sympathize with his unholy affections, or he must be created anew, to meet and sympathize with the holiness of heaven. The psalmist has decided upon which party the change must be accomplished, and at the same time described the greatness of the change, in celebrating the church as the birth-place of souls? Reader, has the church been the birth-place of your soul. You have again heard this day of the glorious things of the city of God, of a Saviour's love, humiliation, cross, burial, ascension, intercession, advocacy. Christ has been pleading with you, the Spirit has been striving with you; both have been urging, 'receive ye the grace of God.' Shall it be written his day in heaven concerning you, 'this man was born in Zion,' or has it already been written in the records of heaven, 'Now are we the sons of God,' and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when we shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou hast not dealt with us, as with those of our brethren who still sit in the region and shadow of death. Thou hast appointed to us thy sabbaths; thou hast given to us thine ordinances; thou hast called us to the assembly of thy saints; thou hast permitted us to join in the prayers and praises of the great congregation; our eyes have again beheld our teachers, and we have received the words of life from thy lips. Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but the glory is due unto thee. Thou only makest us to differ from the poor heathen, who fashions with his tools a graven image, and saith unto it, 'Thou art my God.' Bless the Lord, O our souls, and all that is within us be stirred up to magnify his holy name, who hath not left us to grope amidst the darkness of idolatry, nor subjected us to the humiliation of being carried away by dumb idols, and receiving, as our God, the principalities and the powers of darkness. From so great a spiritual death, thou, Lord, hast saved us. Thou hast given to us our lot in a land of Christian light; our lines have fallen to us in pleasant places, thou hast given to us the goodly heritage of thy word. Let not our distinguished privileges prove to us the greater condemnation; let not that awful sentence descend upon our souls, 'If I had not come among them, and done the things which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin.' Verily, O God, we confess before thee, that henceforth we are without excuse. We beseech thee seal divine instruction upon our hearts, and often recall to our memories the glorious things which have this day been spoken to us of the city of God. Thou who lovest the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob, throw wide the gates of righteousness, that the nations of the earth may enter in. Incline the heart of thine ancient people to seek the Lord their God, and David their king; cause their captivity to return, and have mercy upon them. And more especially we pray for our beloved land, for the church of the reformation thou hast planted therein. Look, Lord, upon its desolations, and rebuild the waste places thereof. O thou who watchest over Israel, and grantest unto thy beloved sleep, watch over our family during the darkness and silence of the night. Let not our beds become our graves. Let us not sleep the sleep of death. O wash us in the purifying blood of thine own Son. Clothe us with his perfect righteousness, that when we sleep, to awake not again until the heavens be no more, we may appear before thee righteous in the Lord our righteousness, unto whom, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, be ascribed dominion and praise, now and ever. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CII. 16.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH IV.

REMARKS.

Nehemiah, we learn from the preceding chapters, whilst a captive in Babylon, was raised to the honourable post of cup-bearer to Artaxerxes the king, a post which brought him near the royal person, and gave him the privilege of the royal ear. This situation he employed as a means of advancing the cause which lay nearest his heart as a Jew,—the rebuilding and restoration of his native city. The pomp of the palace, the presence and favour of royalty, the luxuries and splendours of an eastern court, could avail nothing to withdraw his thoughts from the desolate city where lay the sepulchres of his fathers, the once favoured city of his God. Though surrounded by earthly comforts, and holding in his hand a cup full of prosperity, his countenance is sad, and his heart melancholy, when he thinks of the waste places of Jerusalem; and willingly would he forego his ease and plenty, that he might help forward the rebuilding of its ruins. Through the favour of his royal master he obtains his liberty, and is commissioned to execute the very work on which his heart was fixed. No sooner, however, has he arrived at Jerusalem, and begun to repair its wastes, than he finds an enemy, or rather a combination of enemies, ready to oppose his design, and scorn and ridicule his attempt. How does he act in this crisis? Is he disconcerted at the unexpected opposition? Is he alarmed by the strength and formidable character of the combination, into the abandonment of his undertaking? Not so irresolute and feeble in purpose is the good Nehemiah. His zeal is not to be quenched by the laughter of a fool, or his courage intimidated by the union of infidel and Samaritan. He knew that every pious work must have its opponents, and that when the friends of God arise to build, his enemies will arise to destroy or prevent the work. Confident in the goodness of his cause, confident of the integrity of his motive, though that cause seemed feeble, and less energetic spirits might have given it up in despair, his ardour suffers no abatement from the obstacles that lie in his path. Jerusalem in ruins is before his eyes; the city of his God is a waste; the sepulchres of his fathers, the ground hallowed by the tombs of patriarchs, prophets, and holy men of God, lie undistinguished amidst the wide spread ruin; these ever before him feed the fire of a zeal which many waters cannot quench. 'The God of heaven, he will prosper us.' This is the ground of his confidence, it is also his principle of action,—'therefore will we arise and build.' To confidence in the word, he adds diligence in the work of God, and to both, he adds the spirit of prayer. Whilst he believes, he works; whilst he works, he prays. He works, because he believes it is the pleasure of God to build up Zion; and he prays, to sanctify the work.

Go, christian, and do so likewise. Believe it is God's good pleasure that the wastes of Zion be repaired, that the Saviour see of the travail of his soul in the extension of the church which he has bought with his blood; fear not the enemies encamped against it, let diligence and prayer, let the spirit of action and the spirit of dependence, prove your faith. Believe, and whilst you believe, labour in the good work of the Lord; and whilst you labour, let 'prayer be made without ceasing to God.'

PRAYER.

O God, we come before thee as sinners, but thou, O Lord, hast showed to us what is good, and what the Lord requireth of us; even that we should plead the sacrifice of thine own Son, and that we should appear before thee sprinkled with his precious blood, and righteous in his righteousness. At thy footstool we renounce every other plea; in thy holy presence we know of no other righteousness; and, in the prospect of appearing at thy judgment-seat, our alone desire is to win Christ, and to be found in him, not having our own righteousness, which is of the law, but the righteousness which is of God through faith. Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift, Jesus Christ. Thanks be unto his great name for in whatever measure he has disposed and inclined our hearts, by his Holy Spirit, to obey the gospel call, and receive the offered reconciliation, for opening our eyes to behold the gulf into which sin had plunged us, and awakening in our souls a timely alarm, and prompting the inquiry, What shall we do to be saved? If it be known to thee, thou Searcher of all hearts, that any member of this family has rejected the offered salvation, and refused to be reconciled unto God, O let not thy Holy Spirit be grieved; say not of that soul, It is joined to its idols, let it alone; seal not its perdition by the withdrawal of thy Spirit. Thou who raisest the dead, and quickenest whom thou wilt, raise and quicken into newness of spiritual life every soul among us, hitherto dead in trespasses and sins. Make us partakers of the same faith, the same joyful hope, and heirs, at last, of the same blessed kingdom. Where thou hast begun a good work in our hearts, carry it on to the day of everlasting redemption. Perfect that which concerneth us. Sanctify us wholly in soul, body, and spirit. As we are about to enter upon the business and employments of our calling, after the rest of thy holy sabbath, strengthen us to maintain the testimony of Jesus in the world. Whilst we are in the world, may it yet be manifest that we are not of the world, and may our hearts be habitually kept above it. Like thy servant Nehemiah, may we both pray, and set our watch against the enemies of our souls, that encamp around us. Like him, may we deem no sacrifice great, no self-denial painful, no toil wearisome, no contest arduous, to which Christ calls us, in the maintenance of our faith, and of his glory. May it be our meat and drink to do his will, and may we run with greater alacrity in the way of his commandments, than we have ever done to serve our own lusts and pleasures. And whilst we are pursuing our necessary and lawful callings, may it still be in our hearts to give glory to God, and may we still be contriving for the advancement of his kingdom. Appear, O Lord, with glory, and build up Zion, and hasten the establishment of the kingdom of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Hasten it for thine elect's sake; hasten it for the glory of thy Son; to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, be ascribed dominion, and glory, and praise, now and ever. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVII. 23.

SCRIPTURE—ACTS XXVII.

REMARKS.

It was promised to Paul, in a vision, more than two years before the shipwreck narrated in this chapter, that he should 'see Rome.' When the promise was first given he lay a prisoner in Jerusalem, guarded by the double jealousy and hatred of rulers and people, and charged with the crimes of profanity and sedition. His escape seemed hopeless, and the fulfilment of the promise impracticable. Yet in twenty-four hours after the vision, the providence of God is at work for the fulfilment of his promise. The enemies of Paul plot to murder him, but though banded by oaths and sworn to secrecy, a bird in the air whispers the story of meditated assassination. The plot for his murder is over-ruled for his deliverance, and before the revolution of a day from the intimation of the vision, his prison doors are thrown open, he is mounted on horseback by the humanity of the Roman tribune, and with his escort is proceeding on his way to Cesarea, which is a stage in his way to Rome. But here his progress is arrested. The cupidity of Felix, who hoped to have obtained money for his release, detains him two years prisoner. But God is not slack concerning his promise. A new governor succeeds Felix, which is the occasion of bringing the apostle to a new trial; and again, by the workings of his providence, does God advance to the fulfilment of his promise. 'I appeal unto Cæsar,' said Paul in his second pleading, 'Unto Cæsar,' replied Festus, 'thou shalt go.' And now Paul is on his second stage on his way to Rome. He embarks at Adramyttium, and is fairly launched upon the Mediterranean, to prosecute his voyage. Surely no obstacle can now intervene between him and the promise 'thou shalt see Rome.' Divine providence has wrought for the accomplishment of that word of promise, against the craft and cruelty of Jewish, and the avarice and selfishness of heathen, rulers. Princes, priests, and people combined against it only to become the instruments of its fulfilment. What power can now rise to oppose it. One power yet remains. God has yet to teach his apostle that the wrath of the elements, as well as the wrath of man, shall praise him, and that opposing and angry tempests, the 'fire, the hail, and the stormy winds, fulfil his word.' Paul shall see Rome, not only though assassins plot his death, and high priests and Jewish rulers falsely accuse him, and a corrupt heathen judge wrongously hold him in prison, but in spite of a tempest-tossed ocean, and a heaven obscured with clouds and darkened with vapour, where no sun, or moon, or star is visible, and a frail vessel dashed on a barbarous shore, and scattered as a wreck on the waste of waters. What enforcement does such a narrative lend to the injunction of our Lord, 'Be not faithless, but believing.' What confirmation to the scripture, 'The word of the Lord is sure.' Accept always the word of promise; and though all outward and visible circumstances proclaim the promise a lie; though earth and hell, the wrath of man, the fury of the elements, seem to stand in the way of its fulfilment, quietly wait and thou shalt see the glory of God. Leave with him the accomplishment. He stilleth the noise of the waves, he stilleth the tumults of the people. Not one jot or tittle shall pass away till all be fulfilled.

PRAYER.

Thou, O Lord, reignest, thou art clothed with majesty; the Lord is clothed with strength wherewith he hath girded himself. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea. There is none, Lord, like unto thee; thou declarest the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure. Thine eyes are upon the ways of man, and thou seest all his goings. There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity can hide themselves. Thou knowest their works and overturnest them in the night, so that they are destroyed. The wicked plot against the just, but thou takest them in the net which their own hands have spread. Thou turnest their wisdom into folly and their counsels into confusion, and the devices they had imagined into the accomplishment of thy word. Teach us, O Lord, to mark the course of thy providence and to adore the wisdom by which thou overrulest all things for the advancement of thy church, and for the benefit of thy chosen. Many there be that rise up against thy people. Many there be that say of their souls, There is no help for them in God. But thou, O Lord, art a shield for them, thou art their glory and the lifter up of their heads. Strengthen our faith in thy word of promise; to hope even against hope; to trust God while his way is in the deep, and his path in the mighty ocean, and though his footsteps cannot be traced. When thou art pleased to try us by affliction, or by poverty, or by bereavements, when clouds and darkness are around thy throne, enable us to cast all anxious care and foreboding fears upon him, who calls us to be careful for nothing, but in every thing, by prayer and by supplication, to make our requests known unto God. May our hearts be encouraged in seasons of trial, by meditating upon thy dealings with thy saints of old. When thou settest before us Joseph in Egypt, Daniel in Babylon, Paul in shipwreck, teach us to trust thee farther than we see thee, and when all providences are against us, still to hope in thy word. By thy good and watchful providence over us we have been preserved amidst the dangers of another day. Thou hast not been unmindful of us, though we have been unmindful of thee. Enter not into judgment with us for the sins of this by-gone day. Let thy Holy Spirit lead us anew to the fountain which thou hast opened for sin and for uncleanness. Wash thou us, and we shall be clean; purify us, and we shall be whiter than the snow. Grant unto every member of this family the grace of true repentance, godly sorrow for sin, humility, penitence, habitual tenderness of conscience, and to fear sin worse than death. Grant a child-like simplicity of faith in the efficacy of the blood of the great atonement. O let that blood be sprinkled upon every member of this family. Unite us as a family of the faithful. Renew thine image upon each of our souls. Having received from thee the gift of life, bestow upon us the better gift of life for evermore, that when the few and sorrowful days of our earthly pilgrimage are ended, we may be made partakers together of life everlasting. Advance, we beseech thee, thy kingdom of grace, as the forerunner of thy kingdom of glory. Let the tidings of redeeming love be carried, by the swift messengers of the gospel, into all lands. Forget not, we pray thee, the land of our fathers. Behold and visit the vine which thou hast planted, and the branch which thou hast made strong for thyself. Let our country be as the garden of the Lord, as a field which the Lord has blessed. Revive thy cause. Pour out thy Holy Spirit upon us. When the chief Shepherd shall appear, may we as a family appear with him in glory. Through his all-sufficient sacrifice, and prevailing intercession, we present our prayers to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXVII. 3.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH V.

REMARKS.

There is a remarkable particularity in the tenth commandment, 'thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour's.' Here God, as it were, first writes out a minute inventory of all a man's possessions, and pronounces over each separate division, 'this thou shalt not covet;' and then, lest perverted ingenuity should imagine it had discovered some unnoticed department uncovered by the divine interdict, God embraces the whole under one inclusive description, 'thou shalt not covet any thing that is thy neighbour's.' The wisdom of God is peculiarly evident in the structure of this commandment; for as 'by the law is the knowledge of sin,' and as the object of that knowledge is, that 'every mouth may be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God,' so it was needful that the light of this law should reveal all the dark windings by which the human heart endeavours to evade its binding power, or to palliate or excuse the breaches of its requirement. Many are the evils of covetousness. These evils first descend upon him who indulges covetousness. It is an appetite always craving, but never satisfied; it is an effort always toiling, often disappointed; and, though successful in accumulating to the utmost limits of its desires, 'what is a man profited should he gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what would a man give in exchange for his soul?' But in addition to all these personal evils and disappointments, covetousness is a public crime. Wrapt up in impenetrable selfishness, it feels no sympathy with distress. Hateful to God and man, it fixes on the very hour of public calamity as the hour of its secret joy; and converts the public loss into sources of its private gain. Of this result of covetousness, the chapter read affords a melancholy example. The Jews were just returned from a miserable captivity. Their city was but rising from its ruins; the wall of defence was not yet builded; enemies were many, treacherous, and cruel; and, 'because of the dearth' of provisions, many of the people were compelled to part with 'land, vineyards, and houses;' yea, so pressing was the calamity that some were compelled to 'bring into bondage their very sons and their daughters, that they might eat and live.' Under these circumstances, Nehemiah was 'angry.' Now, though anger is often a sinful passion; yet, (Eph. iv. 26.) a man may be 'angry and sin not.' Our Lord (Mark iii. 5.) 'looked round on the Jews with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts,' a hardness that infidelity had produced; so Nehemiah was righteously angry with the hardness that covetousness had produced. Yet the scriptures, whilst they prohibit and detest the 'usury' of the covetous, do not thereby prohibit the reception or requirement of a just and equitable return for the use of money lent. This will be obvious from Deut. xxiii. 19, 20. and from Mat. xxv. 27. The 'usury' prohibited by the scriptures is, not an equitable share of the profit derivable from the use of money lent in ordinary terms, but what covetousness exhausts from necessity in times of private difficulty, or public calamity. In such times of distress, the heart of the Christian, like that of Nehemiah, is melted, and seeks only new plans of relief; but the heart of the covetous is hardened, and devises only new plans of gain. Woe unto the covetous, if they will not repent! Their money shall perish with them! Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed on the earth: and he will not deliver him unto the will of his enemies. So God dealt with Nehemiah, and so will he deal with all that fear his name, and long for his glorious appearing. Let us, (Luke xii. 16.) 'take heed, and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.' Let us beware, lest in the very hour when all wisest plans are perfected, and all worldly goods secured, God should say unto any of us, 'thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee.' Lord, give us grace to covet nothing but the best gifts; the unsearchable riches of Jesus.

PRAYER.

Lord God Almighty, thou art the preserver of men. Thine eye watched over us through the night, and thy power has raised us to the light of a new day. Make us duly thankful for all the mercies of the past, and mightily strengthen us for all the duties of the future. Our times are entirely in thy hands. Enable us to dedicate every moment to the advancement of thy honour and glory. Let the time past of our lives suffice to have wrought our own will, and henceforth give us grace to do thy will on earth, even as it is done in heaven. Lord, our sins have been many; they have been great in themselves, and by reason of many aggravations they have been heinous in thy sight. We have possessed thy written word, but, alas! we have not studied it with care; we have possessed a preached gospel, but, alas! we have often stopped our ears; we have been invited to communion with God, but, alas! we have loved the world. Enter not, O God, into judgment with us for these things; but lead us to the Lamb slain, whose blood cleanseth from all sin. Deeply convince us of our sin and misery; clearly enlighten us in the knowledge of Christ; entirely renew our wills; and graciously persuade and enable us to embrace the Saviour as he is proclaimed to sinners in the gospel. Show us all the love of Jesus, and let it mightily constrain us to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in a present evil world. O let the love of Jesus separate us from the love of the world. Let it teach us to deny ourselves, and take up our cross and follow him. Specially give us grace to flee from that covetousness which is idolatry, and give us godliness with contentment, the true and abiding gain. And lest we should be discontented with our lot, remind us of him who had not whereon to lay his head. Teach us, O Father, by his example, and enable us, by his Spirit, to renounce the world, to crucify the flesh, to resist the devil. Teach us by his example, and enable us by his Spirit, to have compassion on the poor, and, as God may give us the means and opportunity, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to visit the sick, to consider the stranger, and compassionate the prisoner. Infuse this spirit, good Lord, into the hearts of all ranks, but especially into the hearts of the rich and the mighty, whom thou hast appointed unto this very stewardship. Let the bright examples of the holy men of old shine upon these our times; and let there be many, like thy servant Nehemiah, tender to compassionate the poor, wise to direct relief, and firm to execute every purpose of wisdom. Hear us, O God, from heaven, thy dwelling-place. Think upon us for good, and enable us, as we have opportunity, to do good unto all men, and especially to thy household of faith. And to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, be glory for ever. Amen.

If we seek a proof of Paul's sincerity, we find it in his sufferings: if we seek a proof of his divine commission, we find it in the miracles that he wrought, and the prophecies that he uttered. If we desire to test Paul's sincerity in preaching Jesus, let us turn to the enumeration of his sufferings, (2 Cor. xi. 23.) Compared with others, he was 'in labours more abundant, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews, five times received he forty stripes, save one. Thrice was he beaten with rods, once was he stoned, thrice he suffered shipwreck, a day and a night was he in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by his own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Besides those things that were without, that which came upon him daily—the care of all the churches.' Nothing but sincerity could induce any man to exchange country, and home, and friends, and riches, and honours, and ease, for a life of such uninterrupted labour and suffering; and that too, labour and suffering without either prospect, or promise, or hope, of mitigation; but, on the contrary, with the prospect and certainty of their increase, till his course should be finished, and his warfare accomplished. And, if we desire to test Paul's divine commission, we find him (verse 8.) in the full possession and exercise of the miraculous powers promised by our Saviour to his apostles. He enters the house of a sick man, prays, and lays his hands on him, and heals him: whereupon, others also who had diseases in the island where he was shipwrecked, came and were healed. In addition to this miraculous power, we find him in possession of the prophetic spirit. 'Be it known,' saith he to the Jews, (verse 28.) 'that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it.' Now this confident assertion of the apostles, that the Gentiles would receive the gospel, as certainly as the Jews rejected it, was, at the time of its utterance, the most unlikely of all events. And yet, it has been verified in Christendom during the long period of eighteen hundred years, and is still marching onward to farther fulfilment through every continent and island. Hasten, Lord, the time when all the heathen shall be thine inheritance, and the utmost ends of the earth thy possession!

The chapter furnishes us with many instructive lessons. We find a 'barbarous people,' showing the apostle and his shipwrecked companions 'no little kindness.' How much more, then, must it be the duty of a people, when civilized, and Christianized, to show greater 'kindness,' according to their greater knowledge and greater means. We find Paul employ his time in visiting and healing the sick. And though we possess not the same miraculous power of healing, yet every Christian possesses the same access to the throne of grace, the same word of truth and comfort, and should therefore employ the talent with which God has entrusted him. From this narrative we may farther learn, how much a Christian people may support ministers under difficulties. When the brethren came out to meet Paul (verse 15.) he 'thanked God and took courage.' Whilst we depend on the providence of God for every thing, we are all the agents of providence for one another. A word of encouragement in season, a look of affection, the simplest act of kindness, may produce the most important results on a minister's own mind, and inspirit him anew for the service of God and his people. Lastly, we may learn the awful consequences of rejecting a preached gospel.

PRAYER.

Almighty, most merciful, and everlasting God, hear us, the creatures of a day. Of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment, and, as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same, and of thy years there shall be no end. Show to us, Lord, the end and measure of our days, that we may know how frail we are; and so teach us to number our few and uncertain years, that we may apply our hearts to wisdom. And, now that another day is gone, and another night arrived, may we have wisdom to consider that we are another day nearer to death, to judgment, and to eternity. O that we were indeed wise! that we understood this,—that we should consider our latter end! Lord, grant us grace to live waiting and watching for thy call. And whether it come by day, at midnight, or in the morning, may we all be found ready. And now, O Lord, so long as our years are lengthened out teach us to walk circumspectly, not as fools but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil. Give us grace to employ our time in seeking to learn more of God; in seeking more conformity to his will; in mortifying the deeds of the body, that we may live; and in bringing forth the fruit of the Spirit in all holiness, that our heavenly Father may be glorified in the world. Yet, Lord, we must confess, that we have been very unprofitable servants. We have wasted our precious time on vanities. We have been as men spending their money for that which is not bread, and their labour for that which satisfieth not. Yet blessed be thy holy name, O God, thou desirest not the death of a sinner, out rather it is thy desire, that he should turn unto thee and live. O turn us, and we shall be turned; draws us, and we shall run after thee. Raise our affections from the earth, and set them upon things above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. By the cross of Christ let us now be crucified to the world, and the world to us; and let the life that we shall henceforth live in the flesh, be by the faith of the Son of God. Let Christ be our life; and, unworthy in ourselves though we be, when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. Remember in thy mercy, O Lord, all our dear friends and kind benefactors; and if we have enemies, forgive them, O God, and teach us from the heart to forgive them likewise. Remember in thy mercy all that voyage on the seas, and protect and deliver them in the hour of danger. Remember for good, all sick and afflicted persons. Fit the living for life, and the dying for death. Bless the word of instruction and comfort when addressed to their ear. Make it better than a medicine for their sickness, or oil and wine for their wounds. Open the ears of men, O Lord, that they may every where hear and obey thy word. Take away in mercy the blindness from the eyes of Israel, and in truth and holiness uphold thy Gentile churches. Rule in the hearts of our rulers, and let righteousness exalt the nation. Let thy salvation be nigh to them that fear thee, that glory may dwell in our land. Grant to us that which is good; and the earth shall yield her increase. Take away, O Lord, thine anger from us for ever; for thou art good and ready to forgive, and plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee. Keep us through the night, and if, in thy providence, we are spared till another day, may we go forth again to serve thee in newness of life. And to the Father, the Son, and Holy Spirit, the everlasting God, be glory for ever. Amen.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH VI.

REMARKS.

Amongst the many remarkable persons and characters presented in the scriptures, Nehemiah holds a distinguished place. His first remarkable feature is piety, as appears from his prayer 'day and night' before the Lord, as recorded in the first chapter, and from his constant practice, as appears in the second chapter, fourth verse, and on every fitting occasion throughout his entire history. Even a heathen could discover and declare, that 'no man ever became truly great without a divine impulse.' May not a Christian more clearly perceive the origin

f Nehemiah's greatness of design and performance, that 'spirit of grace and supplication' which God shed abroad in his heart? A second remarkable feature in Nehemiah's character is, his affections were mightily drawn to patriotism. Like Paul, 'his brethren, his kindred according to the flesh,' and 'his heart's desire and prayer to God for them is, that they might be saved.' For their sakes he sacrificed ease and honours; for their sakes he exposed himself to oils and dangers, nor counted his life dear to himself, if so be he could benefit his people. And if this grace was shed abroad in the heart of Nehemiah under the law, how much more, under the gospel, should the heart of every Christian be filled with love to the brethren? For if we love not our brethren whom we have seen, how can we love God whom we have not seen? The third remarkable feature in the character of Nehemiah is generosity. This appears from the extensive hospitality he maintained, embracing alike the rich and the poor of his own countrymen, and extending to the strangers who were attracted from amongst the heathen. Similar are the exhortations (Heb. xiii. 2.) 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers,' and (1 Pet. iv. 9.) 'Use hospitality one towards another, without grudging.' As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.' The last feature in Nehemiah's character to which we would advert, is his unshaken courage in times of danger, so eminently exemplified in the chapter now read. All the foreign enemies of the Jews conspired to make them afraid, saying, 'Their hands shall be weakened from the work' of building the walls, 'that it be not done.' And domestic traitors, even in the garb of prophets, hired, like Balaam, by the wages of iniquity, endeavoured to deter him from the work by threats of assassination. To the foreign enemies who plotted to entrap him by a proposed meeting at a distance from the city, he answers, 'I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down; why should the work cease whilst I leave it, and come down to you?' and so he escaped this snare. Hence we learn, that the best preservative against the snares of every enemy, whether temporal or spiritual, is diligence in the great and peculiar work of Christian duty which God has commanded us to perform. To the domestic traitor he answers, by a combined reference to his rank, duty, and character—'Should such a man as I flee? And who is there, that, being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in.' He would have gone in for worship; he will not go in from fear. He feared God, which fear gives deliverance (Ps. xxxiv. 7.); and he escaped thereby the 'fear of man, which ever bringeth a snare,' Prov. xxix. 25.

In conclusion, we must observe how, in all his undertaking for Jerusalem, Nehemiah prospered. In fifty and two days of incessant labour, 'the wall was finished;' and when his enemies and the heathen heard thereof, 'they were much cast down in their own eyes, for they perceived that the work was wrought of God.' Success, indeed, is not always a proof of the blessing of God, neither is disappointment always a proof of his anger. 'Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.' Still, in the general course of events, 'godliness is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.' They that undertake great things for the glory of the Lord, shall do great things by the help of the Lord.

PRAYER.

Grant, O God, and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that we may learn by the example of other times. To-day give us grace to hear thy voice. To-day prevent us from hardening our hearts, as in the provocation, in the temptation in the wilderness, when the fathers of Israel tempted thee, and proved thee, and saw thy workings forty years. Preserve us, O Father, from their evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God. Make us, in thy mercy, partakers of Christ, and enable us to hold our confidence stedfast unto the end. Lord, let the example of Israel serve both as warning and encouragement to all thy Gentile churches. Let us be warned by thy breaking off of the natural branches, lest we also should be broken off through any self-righteousness or unbelief. Let us be encouraged, also, by their example; for they never did return and seek thy face in vain. Thou didst never leave them without a type of Jesus, the spiritual Saviour; but didst raise up Moses to deliver them from bondage; didst raise up David to deliver them from persecution; didst raise up Nehemiah to deliver them from captivity; and didst raise up prophets to deliver them from blindness. Even so, Lord, do to us of the Gentiles, whom thou hast called in thy mercy. From the bondage of sin and satan; from the persecutions of antichrist; from the captivity of the world, whether in its fear or love; and from the errors and revilings of heresy and infidelity, good Lord, deliver us. Raise up in thy churches every where men that know, and love, and are valiant for thy truth upon the earth; and bring, by thy mighty Spirit, the thoughts of all men into the captivity of Christ. Let the kings of the world be wise. Let the judges of the earth be taught. And mercifully, O Lord, teach the rulers of this long favoured land how much they owe to thee, how deeply they are accountable to thee. Loudly and effectually call to the remembrance of thy churches in these lands, all that thou didst do for their fathers in days of old; from what bondage they were delivered; with what light they were enlightened; with what privileges they were endowed; with what liberty of Christ they were made free. Humble us, their children, for our neglects and backslidings. Heal us graciously, and love us freely, so shall we render to thee sacrifices of prayer and of praise. Be our guide, O Lord, in all our temporal affairs. Thy blessing alone maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow. Let all who are engaged in the merchandise of this world remember the merchandise that is better than gold, and the gain that is better than much fine gold. Let all that are engaged in the husbandry of the field remember the danger of the way-side, and the stony ground, and the thorns, and acknowledge that the Lord of the harvest is coming, and expecting of his seed, from some thirty, and from some sixty, and from some an hundred fold. Lord, make us fruitful in every good word and work. Strengthen our hands for every duty. Encourage our hearts that we may fear no evil, and in all things make us conquerors, yea, more than conquerors, through him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood. To whom, with thee, O Father, and the eternal Spirit, be all glory, dominion, and power. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM XIV.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS I.

REMARKS.

Our Saviour's personal ministry, and that of his apostles, before his resurrection, were exclusively employed in search of 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel,' (Matt. x. 5, 6.) And if there appear an exception in the case of the Gentile centurion, (Luke vii. 1—9.) and of the woman of Canaan, (Mat. xv. 20—28.) still are these but such special exceptions as serve to confirm the general rule. But when our Lord, by his death, had 'broken down the middle wall of partition' between Jews and Gentiles, 'for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace;' then it pleased him first to extend the general commission of his apostles 'to all nations,' and afterwards miraculously to convert, and specially to appoint Paul 'a chosen vessel to bear his name before the Gentiles.' This unlimited extension of the 'covenants of promise,' prepared for the greatest moral revolution that had ever taken place since the foundation of the world. It required the destruction of the deep rooted prejudices of the Jews against the Gentiles, and of the frowning contempt with which the Gentiles regarded the Jews. It required the total abandonment of Jewish self-righteousness, and the total overturning of heathen idolatry. The work was truly great, whether we consider the difficulties to be surmounted, or the blessings to be secured. And never, in the history of providence, did God raise up any one more evidently fitted for his peculiar work than was Paul. He was a man, by education, full of prejudices against the heathens, and of zeal against the Christians. But when the Spirit of Christ had plucked those prejudices out of his own heart, he was just thereby fitted for plucking similar prejudices from the hearts of others; and when the light of the knowledge of Christ shined on his darkness, the zeal that had formerly led him to injure others, now constrained him to sacrifice himself for their sakes. But the peculiar fitness of Paul for the apostleship of the Gentiles, is to be seen when we consider him as a writer and traveller. As a writer he was qualified to meet the Jew on the floor of scripture; or the Gentile in the school of his philosophy. As a traveller, and close observer of outward manners, he had looked quite into the hearts of men. He drew his pictures of human life not from fancy, but reality; and, whilst he silenced the Jew by an appeal to the scriptures he had studied, he rendered inexcusable the Gentile, by an appeal to the world he had visited. We find him accordingly, as a Christian traveller, referring to the joyful report he had heard of the faith of the believers at Rome, circulated 'throughout the whole world,' and he earnestly expresses his desire, and offers up his prayer, that he may be enabled to visit them. Here we see the true spirit and duty of a Christian traveller, whether in our own, or in a foreign land—not merely to see and admire the stupendous works of nature, or the curiosities of art, but to 'impart, and have imparted, in return, some spiritual gift' for mutual comfort and edification. O! that all who travel for learning, for health, for business, or, as it is called, for pleasure, would, like Paul, travel with Christ in their hearts, in their lips, and in their lives! But, alas! do not men, in society, often seem ashamed to speak a word of, or for, Christ? A man may justly be ashamed of his own defects; but no true believer should ever be ashamed of the gospel. The possession of power is not the cause of shame; and the gospel is the very 'power of God to salvation.' The possession of glorious raiment is not the cause of shame; and the gospel reveals 'the righteousness of God,' 'which is by faith of Jesus Christ, (as a gift) unto all, and, (as a garment) upon all who believe.' But whilst the gospel thus attracts by grace, it reveals also 'the wrath of God against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who bridle in the truth in unrighteousness.' And here Paul's extended, yet minute, observation of the heathen, warrants him to charge them with guilt, and to warn them of the wrath to come; a warning of the future almost anticipated by the present, when God is seen to 'give men up' to their own ways, or 'give them over' to their own thoughts. God hath, undoubtedly, 'prepared everlasting punishment' for wicked men, and wicked angels; but were he never to inflict such judgment, sinners would punish themselves. Conscience, like Judas, may, for a while, be bribed by the love of gain; and vain imaginations may so darken the foolish heart, that it cannot or will not see its danger; but, there is a 'certain fearful looking for of judgment,' from which the sinner can never wholly escape, unless he flee to that 'blood of sprinkling which cleanseth from all sin.'

PRAYER.

O God and Father, how great and how precious have ever been thy promises of a Saviour; thy promises now fulfilled in Jesus Christ our Lord, who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead. Let thy mercy and thy peace come down upon us through him, and let us know that we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, according to the richness of thy grace. Let us never forget, that there is no other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we can be saved. And, blessed be thy name, O God, Jesus is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto the Father by him, seeing that he, who once died for us, dieth no more, but now ever liveth to make intercession for us. O Saviour, intercede for us, who are, by nature, miserable sinners: and, resting all our own hopes upon thy intercession for us, O! give us grace humbly and earnestly to intercede for others. Lord, look in mercy, upon thine ancient people, the Jews. O! remember the covenant which thou didst well order in all things with faithful Abraham. And, O God of all grace, who didst give thy Son Jesus a light to lighten the Gentiles, let him, as the Sun of righteousness, arise upon a darkened world with healing in his wings. The dark places of the earth are still full of the habitations of horrid cruelty: Father of lights, send forth upon them the light of thy Spirit, and stretch out over them the sceptre of the Prince of peace. Let the nations that still sit in darkness, see great light; and upon them that sit in the valley of the shadow of death, send light and life from the Lord. Arouse thoughtless sinners by the voice of thy coming judgment; draw humble believers by the power of thy tender mercies. Produce in all thy churches that hunger and thirst after righteousness, to which alone our Lord has promised the bread and the water of life. Take away, O Lord, from them all false doctrine, and heresy, and schism. Restore thy word where it has been made void by traditions of men; and let the churches that have apostatized to many mediators, return to the one Mediator between God and man. Warn, in thy mercy, all unfaithful churches; and if they will not be warned, and if they will not repent, yet lead thy people out of them, that they may not partake of their plagues. Remember these lands in mercy; and graciously bless all ranks and conditions of the people. Let them that rule, rule in thy fear; let them that are ruled inherit prosperity and peace. Give grace to those that are in health to use and not abuse their mercy: give grace to those that are in sickness to hear the voice of the rod, and him that hath appointed it. Think, in mercy, O Lord, upon all the children of poverty and sorrow: upon all who are dreading or weeping over their sad bereavements: upon all who are in any danger by sea or by land: think upon them all, and upon us, O Lord, in thy mercy, and for thy great goodness in Christ Jesus, to whom, with thee, O Father, and the Holy Spirit, be glory in the churches for ever and ever. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CXXVI.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH VIII.

REMARKS.

Several facts are recorded in this chapter, very illustrative of the work of the Spirit in a time of reformation, and they may be applied either for direction to the church at large, or for the edification of the individual believer. 1. Ver. 1, 2. The people assembled to hear the word of God, of every class, and rank, and sex, and age. The scriptures have ever been a principal instrument, in the hand of the Spirit, in both beginning and promoting reformation; and all who seek a better state of things, either in themselves or others, must diligently use them for this purpose. 2. Ver. 3. The scriptures were read from morning until mid-day, a period of six hours. They, whose hearts are engaged, do not speedily grow weary of religious exercises, and the more they hear in this frame of mind, the more they desire to hear. 3. Ver. 4—6. The reading of the scriptures was accompanied with prayer and other devotional exercises. It should never be forgotten, that hearing the word is a part of divine worship; and it is when the scriptures are read or heard in the spirit of prayer and devotion, we may hope the Spirit will enable us to understand them, opening our eyes to behold the wonders of God's law, and enabling us to derive profit from them for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness. 4. Ver. 7, 8. The scriptures were expounded. This, also, is of divine appointment, and has the promise of the divine blessing. He who expounds should speak with all plainness; and they who hear should do so with simplicity. 5. Ver. 9—12. When the word was read, the people wept, but were exhorted to rejoice. Still the word is productive of various emotions in the soul. It is well when the first is sorrow, under a discovery and sense of sin. But this is the sure way to peace. They who sow in tears shall reap in joy. Godly sorrow for sin is not incompatible with the sweet enjoyment of providential favours. 6. Ver. 13—17. What the word was found to command, the people instantly and cheerfully performed. Let us be doers of the word, and not hearers only. Thus in obeying the will, we shall enjoy the favour of God; and a sense of that favour will again quicken our obedience, for 'the joy of the Lord is our strength.'

PRAYER.

Almighty God, do thou cause thy word to dwell in us richly, in all wisdom and understanding. Enable us to say, from the experience of its power in the hand of the Spirit, The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple; the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes; the fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever; the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether; more to be desired are they than gold, yea, much fine gold; sweeter, also, than honey, and the honey comb. Grant, O Lord, that by the study and knowledge of the scriptures, we may be warned, and fear to sin against thee. May we ever find, that, by obeying their commands, we enjoy a great reward. May they lead us to understand our errors. May they cleanse us from the secret faults of which no eye takes cognizance but thine; especially may they restrain us from presumptuous sin, nor permit us to live under the dominion of any transgression. Above all, may we, by the scriptures, attain to enlarged, enlightened, believing, and sanctified views of the Lord Jesus Christ. May we apprehend the glory of his person, the grace of his office, the perfection of his work, the richness of his promises, and the beauty of his example. May the Holy Spirit thus cause us to trust in him, and conform us to him. May we be quickened into zeal for his cause. May we be honoured to bear a part in it, and see our efforts crowned with success. May the word have free course and be glorified, until the kingdoms of this world shall be the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever. To this glorious end, do thou condescend to acknowledge the various means employed by the church in our times, so far as these are agreeable to thy holy will. May the preached gospel be effectual, as of old, when many sinners were convinced and converted. Thou, who art the Lord of the harvest, do thou thrust out labourers into the harvest; and thou, who hast the hearts of all in thine hand, do thou move the people to desire, and hear, and receive thy truth. May the labours of bible societies be blessed, until thy holy word shall be found in every hand. May the various missionary societies be directed, and honoured, and blessed, by thy Spirit, so that, wherever the word is spoken, it may be accompanied with the demonstration of his presence and power. May our schools be the means of gathering the lambs of Christ's fold. May the unwearied instructions of the domestic circle receive the countenance of the God of all the families of the earth. May the secret devotion of the closet be earnest, and spiritual, and acceptable. May the sighs of the men that cry for the defection of the church, and the sins of the world, prevail, through the intercession of the great High Priest. May his arm control, and direct, and overrule the counsels of princes, and the government of nations. May our own beloved land be prospered in all its interests; and especially from it may the word of the Lord sound out into all nations. Replenish the mind of our sovereign with heavenly wisdom. May counsellors be taught of God. May the magistracy acknowledge the supremacy of Christ, and rule for him. May all say before him, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory. What we ask is for his sake; and now, by his worthiness and intercession, let the words of our mouth, and the meditations of our heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLVI.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS II.

REMARKS.

It appears to be the design of this chapter to convince the Jew of sin, and, under the character of a Jew, any formal but insincere professor of religion. With this view the principles of the divine administration are comprehensively stated. Ver. 1—16. A searching appeal is made to the conscience and life of the Jew. Ver. 17—24. And he is warned against resting in the mere ceremonies of his religion, while their real design and advantage are stated and allowed. Ver. 25—29. The principles of the divine judgment are such as to embrace all men. They may be comprehended under the following: That which is condemnatory in one man, must be so in all others; and since the Jews were guilty of the same sins as the heathen, both were alike condemned. Ver. 1. God will judge according to the real state of the character; and in his account there is no difference between the Jew and the Gentile. Ver. 2. The special favour of God toward the Jew is no reason why his judgment of him should be relaxed, but rather formed an aggravation of his sinfulness. Ver. 3—5. The works of men, and not their external relations to God, would be taken into account in the divine judgment. Ver. 6—11. The rule of judgment with each would be the light which he enjoyed; to the Jew, the written law; and to the Gentile, the same law written upon his conscience. Ver. 12—13. By these principles would all men at last be judged, and, it is plain, by them would all be condemned, unless some special provision were made by which the sinner might be pardoned, and the principles of the divine government maintained inviolate. Such a provision neither Jew nor Gentile could find, save in the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ. To impress these principles on the heart of the Jew, he is addressed pointedly and personally. Ver. 17—18. He is shown that his law, his knowledge, all his advantages, would avail him nothing if found living in those sins for which others were condemned, and uninterested in the provision of divine grace for deliverance from them. On the principles of eternal justice, neither he nor any other sinner could escape, except by the one way of the divine appointment. And in conclusion he is reminded, that the very rite which was the sign and seal of all his privileges, was in itself nothing—could not save him—was designed merely to instruct him in the way of salvation, so that he who submitted to it, but did not embrace that way of salvation, must perish; while he who embraced that salvation, although he did not observe the rite, would be accepted with God. In short, this is the law of the house of God, 'he is not a Jew which is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men, but of God.'

PRAYER.

Wherewith shall we come before thee, O Lord, or bow ourselves before the high God? We are altogether unworthy to appear in thy presence. Our own hearts condemn us; but thou art greater than our hearts, and knowest all things. God be merciful to us sinners. The high privileges with which we have been favoured, have been an aggravation of our offence. Thou hast given us light, and we have walked in darkness. Thou hast called us by thy word, and we have refused to come unto thee. Thou hast supplied us with ordinances, and we have lightly esteemed them. Thou hast blessed us with thy sabbaths, and we have accounted them a weariness. O God, we bless thee that thou hast not removed us from forfeited privileges, nor withdrawn thy tender mercies from us. Still are we favoured with the word of God and prayer. O Lord, enable us now to estimate these, and profit by them. May the Holy Spirit shine on the page of revelation, so that we shall be enabled to read the truth recorded there. May we truly be convinced of sin, and enter fully into the inspired account of our own hearts, as deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. Help us to feel and own that we are perishing sinners; but, O Lord, abandon us not to despair. May he who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shine into our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ. O may we apprehend how thou art just in justifying the ungodly. May we thus be encouraged to trust in thee. Show us, Lord, that the more we confide in thee, the more we honour thee. And O may our contemplation of thy name, as our God and Saviour, exercise a sanctifying power over our heart and life. Enable us to say, The love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again. Grant that, through the riches of the divine grace, we may be enabled to cultivate the graces of pure and undefiled religion, adding to our faith, virtue, and to virtue, knowledge, and to knowledge, temperance, and to temperance, patience, and to patience, godliness, and to godliness, brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness, charity. Lord, suffer us not to be any longer barren of good works. May we be conformed to the example of Jesus, who went about doing good. And may others enjoy the rich blessings of providence and grace with which we are favoured. Compassionate the poor, O Lord; supply their need, and sanctify their sorrows. Do thou instruct the ignorant, and fill their minds with the light of truth. Tenderly visit the sick and afflicted, and make thou their bed in their sorrow, and let their sufferings be an ordinance for their edification. O Lord, strengthen the tempted; decide the wavering; reclaim the wanderer; restore the backsliding, for thy name's sake; spare useful lives; and in mercy prepare the dying for death. With ourselves, we commend to thee thy people and cause in every place. May thy kingdom come, and be established, until thy will shall be done on earth even as it is in heaven. Sustain the hearts of those who are bearing the burthen and heat of the day, whether at home or abroad. May they see the pleasure of the Lord prospering in their hands. And O let the happy period come, when Jesus shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. All we ask is in his name; and unto the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be equal and undivided praise, now, henceforth, and for ever. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XX.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH IX.

REMARKS.

We learn from this chapter how to wait upon God, both collectively and individually. That prayer which is acceptable and prevalent through Jesus Christ, is presented to us in its accompaniments and more direct exercises. First, its accompaniments. 1. Humiliation, ver. 1. When we wait upon God, it must be as sinners, and with such outward expressions of both language and deportment, as shall manifest a deep sense of our sinfulness. 2. Purification, ver. 2. The sins which we have discovered must be put away, otherwise we expose ourselves to the charge of presumption and hypocrisy. 3. Confession, ver. 2. Our own sins, and the sins of all with whom we are connected, whether in the family, the church, or the world, must be poured out without reservation or extenuation. Second, the more direct exercises of prayer, ver. 3—5. To these we must address ourselves with earnestness, and call upon others to do the same. As a foundation for prayer, and our direction in it, we should call to mind the dealings of God towards ourselves and the church generally, taking care that we are hereby moved to suitable and corresponding exercises, ver. 6—38. Thus, if we still pray in the Spirit, we shall find our souls constrained to adore the being, perfections, and works of God, ver. 6. Especially shall we be captivated with believing views of him as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom he is gracious to his chosen, ver. 7. And O, how will our souls be stirred up to bless his name for all his gracious dealings, especially when these are contemplated in connection with the ingratitude and worthlessness of his people. He gave them exceeding great and precious promises, ver. 8; he sympathized with their sorrows, ver. 9; he overthrew their enemies, ver. 10, 11; guided them miraculously, ver. 12; taught them, ver. 13, 14; and fed them, ver. 15. Yet were they ungrateful, and hardened their hearts against him, refusing obedience, forsaking his service, and even turning unto idols, ver. 16—18. But he forsook them not, ver. 19. He strove with them by his good Spirit, ver. 20; bore with them mercifully, ver. 21; enlarged their borders, ver. 22; increased their numbers, ver. 23; and made them victorious, ver. 24, 25. When his mercies availed not to constrain them, he tried them with his judgments; and when under these, they humbled themselves, he received them graciously, ver. 26—30. Nay, when neither mercies nor judgments availed, out of his own sovereign love, and for his name's sake, he preserved them, ver. 31. Well might the review of such a history encourage his servants to wait upon him with prayer and supplication. He did encourage them, and in their extremity they called upon his name. They adored his being, pleaded his covenant, and deprecated his righteous displeasure, ver. 32. They acknowledged his justice, and confessed their sins, ver. 33—35. They declared his claims upon them, dedicated themselves to him, and bound themselves in a covenant not to be broken, ver. 36—38. Surely such a record is not in vain. It well becometh us, through faith and comfort of the scriptures, to exercise hope in God.

PRAYER.

Lord, teach us to pray. We know not what to pray for as we ought; but it is written, The Spirit helpeth our infirmities; he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God. O send forth thy light and thy truth; let them lead and guide us; then shall we go unto the altar of God, unto God our exceeding joy. Lord, what is man! a sinner from the beginning hitherto; a sinner by nature; a sinner still, though even renewed by thine own sanctifying grace. O Lord, we confess our sinfulness, that our hearts are depraved, and our lives unholy. We confess the sins of all men; and especially do we humble ourselves for the sins of thy people. O may the record of their history, mercifully preserved in the scriptures, be profitable to us. Help us to discover the beginnings of sin in them, and to avoid the same. May we be alarmed by the awful consequences to which their sins exposed themselves and others, and not therein follow their example. May we stand by faith. Never suffer us to be high-minded; but may we fear always. May our confidence in thee be cherished by believing views of the grace manifested in them, and toward them. While we behold the readiness to forgive, may we be induced to come to thee with our confessions and prayers. While we see that thy good Spirit was not withheld, notwithstanding their rebellions, may we be encouraged to seek this precious gift. And O suffer us not to rest short of the sure and certain consciousness that he abideth in us. May we not grieve him by our sins, nor quench him by our neglect. May we enjoy the communion of the Spirit. May our souls be filled with his light, quickened by his power, and comforted by his grace. By his agency may we be qualified for any duty, and made faithful and successful in it. Enable us to study our own personal godliness; and may we maintain the exercises of self-denial, and attain to the heavenly art of self-government. Do thou control every thought, suggest every word, and direct every action. In the family, may we cultivate the graces that adorn it in all kindness, and condescension, and love. May we be faithful and consistent members of the church, maintaining the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and striving together for the faith of the gospel. And in our intercourse with the world, forbid, Lord, that we should ever give occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully. May the fruit

f the Spirit abound in us and others, even love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. We are thine, O Lord. We acknowledge thy claim upon us. In Jesus we devote ourselves to thee. Hear, O Lord, and answer in peace. And do thou accept of us in our person and service, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XIV.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS III.

REMARKS.

Having answered several objections of the cavilling Jew, to the conclusion that he, equally with the Gentile, was guilty before God, ver. 1—8, the apostle here declares the sinner's disease, ver. 9—20, and the sinner's remedy, ver. 21—31. The objector having urged that, on the admission of the guilt of Israel, the case of the Jew was no better than that of the Gentile; that the favour of God toward his nation was no benefit to him, and that even the justice of God could not be cleared; the apostle asserted the high privileges of the Jew, the faithfulness of God, and his unspotted righteousness. He sweeps away every ground of cavil, and comes irresistibly to the conclusion of man's universal guilt and condemnation. This conclusion is expressed almost entirely in language taken from the Old Testament scriptures, that it might be the more readily acknowledged and forcibly felt. And O, what a conclusion! All men are guilty, and every man is altogether depraved. All are guilty; every one a violator of the law; no exception; Jew and Gentile alike before God; our mouth stopped; the whole world condemned before God; every man is altogether sinful; the understanding darkened by sin; God, in consequence, not sought after as the great end of his being; every one on some crooked path; no one serving and honouring God; none doing good to his neighbour; the throat a channel for every impure utterance; the tongue filled with lying; the lips pouring forth the poison of evil passion; the mouth full of profanity; the feet ready to mischief; their ways injurious; peace unknown; and God not honoured. Lord, what is man! And this is true of every man. This is human nature left to itself. Is there no hope of mercy? Yes, blessed be God, there is an abundant provision. The disease is thus described at length, that we may learn to estimate the remedy. O what a remedy! These are its prominent features: Without the law—purely of grace, not merit. Witnessed by the law and the prophets—the grand subject of revelation. The righteousness of God, appointed, furnished, approved by God. By faith—this is the hand that takes it. Justifies God—makes the forgiveness and acceptance of the sinner honourable to the divine justice. It humbles the sinner, glorifies the Saviour, and magnifies the law. Yea, this is its principle, 'Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord.' By sin every man is ruined; but in Christ is the hope of the believer secured.

PRAYER.

Our Father who art in heaven, we are encouraged, by thy tender mercies, to draw nigh unto thee. Justly mightest thou have cast us off for ever; but when we had destroyed ourselves, in thee was our help found. O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God; how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! Our fall, O God, has magnified the riches of thy grace; our ruin has displayed thy wisdom; and our helplessness has exalted thy power. Bless the Lord, O our souls, and forget not all his benefits; who forgiveth thine iniquities, healeth thy diseases, redeemeth thy life from destruction, crowneth them with loving-kindness and tender mercy. O Lord, do thou reveal thyself to us in Jesus Christ. May we see thy divine perfection, gloriously harmonizing in him, to accomplish the redemption of sinners. May we thus be restored to confidence in thee. May we be constrained to love thee. May we feel the force of the heavenly remonstrance, Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price; therefore, glorify God with your body and spirit, which are his. Never suffer us to doubt thy faithfulness and truth. Keep us waiting upon thee at all times, that we may receive out of thy fullness; and may we have holy boldness to plead with thee, and to say, in faith, Do as thou hast said. Fill our understanding, O God, with light. Reclaim us from every crooked way. May we be found ever in the path of righteousness. Suffer us to be no longer unprofitable servants. May we learn to go about doing good. May our lips be without guile, our mouth filled with praise, our feet ready to go on errands of mercy. May our ways be approved of thee, and be thou ever our fear and dread. Lord, we are thine, all we are, and all we have. May we be enabled to present ourselves a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, and count it a reasonable service, being constrained by the mercies of God. Suffer us not to be conformed to this world; but may we be transformed by the renewing of our minds, and in thy service may we know thy will to be good, acceptable, and perfect. We lay ourselves upon thine altar; accept the offering, O Lord, through the worthiness and intercession of Jesus Christ. Guide us by thy counsel while we live, and afterwards receive us to glory. Prepare us for all thy purposes; and grant that having served thee on earth, we may be admitted to the rest that remaineth for the people of God. Now unto him that is able to keep us from falling, to the only wise God and our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXVI. 3.

SCRIPTURE—NEHEMIAH XIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Eliashib the priest, who had oversight of the chamber of the house of the Lord, having impiously formed an alliance with Tobiah an Ammonite, and an inveterate enemy of the Jewish nation, had sacrilegiously 'prepared' for him, within the courts of the house of the Lord, a great chamber, formerly occupied as a storeroom for frankincense, meat-offerings, and vessels.

In Num. xviii. 1, we find it recorded, that God had appointed the Levites to serve in the sanctuary in place of the people, and for their maintenance and support ordained that they should receive a tenth of the wine, the corn, and the oil. These tithes appear to have been deposited in treasuries as they were brought in by the people, and to have been distributed to the officiating Levites according to their necessities, that they might minister before the Lord without distraction of mind; and in the periods of Israel's faithfulness and prosperity, the treasuries were always well filled. But such appears to have been the infidelity and selfishness of the returned captives, that although the hand of the Lord was signally manifested in their restoration to their own country and to liberty, they had wholly neglected to bring in these tenths or tithes, and the Levites were consequently compelled to flee, every man to his own field, to provide for himself (ver. 10.), and the sanctuary was consequently neglected. The sanctification of the sabbath, or seventh day of the week, was one of God's most important and distinguished ordinances in Israel. It was honoured by the example of God himself (Gen. ii. 3.); and in the days of Moses (Num. xv. 32.) an individual violation of it had been, by God's special direction, capitally punished; yet, from verses 15 and 16, it appears that the returned captives scrupled not to do all kinds of servile work, and to transact all manner of mercantile business upon that holy day.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How obvious is it that God views and judges mankind in a collective capacity as nations! The sin of the Ammonites and Moabites towards Israel was probably only the act of their rulers, and many thousands of the people may have been ignorant of it, and yet the whole nation were, on that account, excluded from entering into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation. How clearly, then, is it our duty to pray for our governors, that they may be counselled from on high, and that under their wise and godly government we may lead peaceful and happy lives!

2. What a fearful thing is it to apostatize from God, or sin against him! and how difficult is it to return to our duty and his favour! The iniquity of Israel occasioned their captivity, and all the bitterness of bondage was not sufficient to reform them. When restored to their own lands, they returned to the very sins that had occasioned their banishment from it. What reason have we to guard against the beginnings of sin, and to pray continually, 'lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil!'

3. How manifest is it, that we cannot possibly serve God with fidelity, and be in alliance with his enemies! Such is their enmity to God, that even selfish interest will not induce them to give up their opposition to his law.

4. What a dangerous thing is it to be yoked in marriage with unbelievers! The priest, from whose lips the people should learn the law, when married to the daughter of a stranger, so far forgets that law, as to profane the courts of God's house for the accommodation of a man whose nation was excluded from the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation! How careful should we be not to intermarry with the enemies of God!

PRAYER.

O Lord God Almighty, thou art the God of the universe. Thou hast made of one blood all nations of men that dwell upon the face of the whole earth. Thou didst create man for thyself, but he departed from thee. Thou didst make him upright, but he sought out many inventions. We lament before thee this morning, that in every age and country men have sinned against thee. The nations have forsaken thee. They have shown that they did not like to retain thee in their knowledge, or glorify thee as God. Professing themselves to be wise, they have become fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and beasts, and creeping things. Most merciful God, thou hast promised the heaven to Christ as an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth as a possession. O fulfil this promise, we do this morning most humbly, but earnestly, beseech thee. Pour out floods of light and knowledge upon all nations, that all men may know the truth as it is in Jesus. Cause the Ammonite, the Moabite, the Egyptian, and every tribe and people, to enter into the congregation of the Lord in the present generation. Remove from the Israelite the vail that prevents him from seeing Christ in Moses and the prophets, and enable him savingly to see Jesus whom his blinded ancestors pierced. Bring back the apostacy of Christianity, and put an end to the man of sin. Take away all refuges of lies om the human family, and place them all upon the Rock of ages. As there is but one shepherd, let there be but one sheep-fold; and may all men, of every clime and colour, by the possession of like precious faith, be blessed with faithful Abraham. We thank thee for the rest of the past night, and for the safety, health, and privileges of this morning. Lord, sanctify to us thy providential goodness. Enable us to estimate it justly, to feel it constantly, and to bless thee for it perpetually. Take us under thy most gracious care, and guide us by thy Spirit through the remainder of this day. As it is the last day of the week, may it admonish us of our latter end, and remind us, that ere long we shall arrive at the last day of our lives. O may we be prepared, at that day, to say we have fought a good fight, we have kept the faith, and we know that in Jesus there is laid up for us a crown of life. Bless, we beseech thee, O Lord, the land of our nativity. Bless the throne and sceptre with godliness, wisdom, and stability. Bless all authorities under the throne and over us. Bless all our friends in every place; may they be friends of God, and may they and we be one in Christ Jesus the Lord. Comfort, O Lord, the sick; enable them to be submissive to thy will; and may their prolonged lives be Christ Jesus the Lord, or death eternal gain. Comfort the poor under their privations; make them rich in faith; and enable them to see, that afflictions which are temporary are not worthy to be compared to the glory that awaits them. Pardon, O Lord, all our sins. Overlook the unworthiness of our appearance at this time before thee; and graciously accept of us and our feeble services, through Jesus Christ, the Lord our righteousness, and God over all, blessed now and for ever. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS IV.

REMARKS.

In the preceding chapter the apostle had proved, by quotations from the 14th Psalm and other portions of the Old Testament scriptures, that of the Jews as well as of the Gentiles, there were none righteous, 'no not one;' and that, consequently, 'by the deeds of the law, there could no flesh living be justified in God's sight.' In this chapter he proceeds to show, that Abraham, although honoured by the title of 'the friend of God,' was no exception to this rule. Abraham, he admits, was declared to be righteous; but this righteousness he did not possess by works done in the flesh, or performed personally by himself; but he acquired it by a faith, or belief, in the Spirit, and by the righteousness of another, to him graciously and freely imputed. The apostle proves this point by a quotation from the book of Genesis (chap. xv. 6.), where it is expressly stated, that Abraham 'believed in the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness.' It is important to observe, that the statement is not he believed the Lord, and it was counted, &c.; but, he believed in the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness. To believe the truth of a statement made by another, is an acknowledgment of the veracity, and consequently righteousness, of that other person; but while it may be an act of candour upon the part of the person believing, and may prove him to be ingenuous, it can by no means constitute him righteous. To believe what the Lord says, whatever be the subject of his statement, is to do honour and justice to Jehovah's character; but, except in so far as the act of believing goes, it cannot show the person believing to be just or righteous.

Had Abraham believed merely the promise given by the Lord, that his seed should be multitudinous, and should inherit the land wherein he was a stranger, it would have been an acknowledgment of God's power and faithfulness, but could not have removed Abraham's sinful imperfections, and constituted him righteous. Very different, however, is the case, when Abraham believed in the Lord. Abraham believed not merely the thing stated, but he believed in 'the seed of the woman,' the substance of the thing stated; as 'the Lord his righteousness,' and this belief, not merely in the veracity of the speaker, but in the person spoken of, was counted to him for righteousness. The law of God was to Abraham, as it is to every son of Adam, like a bond, and every violation of it became, like a debt, recorded against him in the court of heaven. When, therefore, he heard, and believed that Jehovah, his Redeemer, had undertaken to pay that debt, and cancel that bond, he felt himself in a condition satisfactorily to meet his heavenly creditor. Or in other words, his belief in the Lord his righteousness, constituted him righteous. That this is the mind of the Spirit, in the passage, is beyond all controversy, because in the Gospel according to John (viii. 56.), our Lord tells the Jews, that their father Abraham 'rejoiced to see his day, and he saw it and was glad;' and in the third chapter of the epistle to the Galatians (ver. 16.), the apostle expressly tells us, that the seed, in the coming of which Abraham believed, was Christ. Now as Abraham lived so many thousand years before the actual appearance of our Lord, the sight which he saw of his day must have been by faith; and as the apostle assures us, that 'the seed,' in whom all nations and families on earth were to be blessed, was the Christ, it is clear to a demonstration, that when Abraham believed in 'the Lord,' it was in a coming Lord; and what was counted to him for righteousness, was 'the doing' and 'dying' of that Lord in the fulfilment of love, and satisfaction of justice on his behalf. The same important truth, viz., that no man can be justified before God by the deeds of the law, the apostle further illustrates by the case of David, who, in the thirty-second Psalm, ascribes blessedness not to the man who had never committed sin, because no such man is to be found in Adam's fallen family, but to the man whose iniquities are pardoned, to whom the Lord imputeth not his sin, but to whom he imputeth righteousness without works. In the remainder of the chapter, from ver. 10, the apostle establishes two things: 1. That the circumcision of Abraham, though performed in obedience to God's commandment, was not the cause of his justification, because he had been declared righteous by 'believing in the Lord' a considerable time previous to the institution of circumcision; and, 2. That as he was by promise to be the father of many nations, the Gentiles as well as the Jews, do, by possessing 'like precious faith,' become the children of faithful Abraham, and shall be joined with him in the blessedness of those to whom God imputeth righteousness without works.

PRAYER.

Our Father who art in heaven, we desire this evening to come before thee in the name of our all-prevailing and ever-living intercessor. Through him we would desire to thank thee, O Lord, for all the mercy and the truth which thou hast bestowed upon us all the days of our lives. Early were we cast upon thy care, and blessed be thy name, thou hast cared for us. Thy mercies have been new to us every morning, and repeated to us every passing moment. We desire especially to thank thee this evening for the goodness we have received at thy hand through the past day. We bless thee for all our comforts and enjoyments, personal and social. We praise thee, O Lord, that we have been continued in life, and brought in safety to the close of another week, and the approach of another sabbath. May we be enabled to dismiss all distracting cares of the world from our minds, and to be prepared for the sacred rest and heavenly privileges of that holy day. We bless thee for the high privilege we have this evening enjoyed, in reading in thy divine word those glorious things that belong to our everlasting peace. O enable us to greatly profit thereby. Enable us to feel that we cannot be justified in whole or in part by works of righteousness which we have done; that we cannot be blessed except by the imputation of righteousness without works. Bestow upon each of us the faith that constituted thy servant Abraham righteous. Give us grace to believe in Jehovah, our righteousness, to know personally and experimentally that he fulfilled for us the law—that he magnified and made it honourable—that upon him were laid all our sins—and that he abolished and made an end of them—that we cannot, therefore, come into condemnation, but in him have passed from death unto life. Cause thy Spirit to witness with our spirits, that we are the children of God—that possessing like precious faith, we are the children of faithful Abraham, and heirs according to the promise. Bless, we this evening beseech thee, O Lord, all mankind. God of all consolation, comfort the sick; be a present help in their trouble. Greatly bless our native land, in the sovereign upon the throne, in all subordinate branches of the government, and in all subjects of every rank and condition. May the church be purified from all human inventions, and made gloriously triumphant over all her enemies. May she be enabled to put to silence all gainsayers of the truth; and may she speedily embrace within her pure communion all inhabitants of the land. Bless this night all our relatives and friends with every spiritual and soul-enriching blessing. Reward our benefactors. If we have enemies, we beseech thee to forgive them, and to enable us to forgive them also. We commit ourselves and our household this night to thy care. Refresh us with sleep as thou dost thy beloved. Forgive all our sins. Overlook our unworthiness. Receive us graciously, and bless us abundantly. And to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the adorable Jehovah of Israel, we would now and for ever, through the divine Redeemer, be found ascribing kingdom, power, and glory. Amen.

THIRTIETH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXVIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXXVIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In the title of this psalm it is called 'Maschil of Heman the Ezrahite,' or a Psalm of Heman, intended to give instruction. (See 1 Kings iv. 31.) There are several statements in this psalm that cannot be rationally or satisfactorily interpreted or understood, except of the Lord Jesus Christ. In the first place, the description of deep suffering and affliction in the verses intermediate between the second and the tenth, applies much more appropriately to 'the man of sorrows,' than to any ordinary man. In the second place, the complaint in the eighth verse is a literal description of the manner in which our Lord was abandoned by his friends in the hour of his calamity, and beautifully harmonizes with another statement of the Psalmist, which we know, upon infallible authority, was intended for the Redeemer (see Psal. xli. 9, and John xiii. 18.) And in the third place, the questions which are put in verses 10, 11, and 12, respecting the state of the dead, are totally inconsistent with faith and piety in the mouth of a mere man, but are singularly suitable to the official situation and character of the Lord Jesus Christ. An infidel or unbeliever in the soul's immortality, might appropriately put such questions; but every genuine believer knows, that death to him is real gain; that the spirit does not descend into the grave, but, in the moment of dissolution, returns to God who gave it being; and that, by the general assembly of the just and perfect, praise is constantly offered before the throne of God. The case was, however, different with the Christ. Had he remained under death's power—had it been possible that the Holy One of God should have seen corruption—had not the man, Christ Jesus, been supported and raised up from the dead by the eternal Spirit,—then all humanity must have for ever continued dead; no soul could have entered heaven; 'faith would have been vain;' nor could any of Adam's fallen family have ever offered praise to Jehovah; but all must have remained in their sins, and consequent misery. The psalm is throughout a prayer of the Christ, not personally in his own name, but officially as Mediator, and on behalf of himself and people. It is a supplication addressed to the Godhead for mediatorial support and deliverance, setting forth the sufferings of humanity, and showing, that should the mediatorial work not be carried into effect, the whole family of men would be eternally excluded from the service of praise.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How mysterious and uncontrolled are the workings of Jehovah, and how inexhaustible his resources! He maketh the private incidents of individuals and families to shadow forth the stupendous mysteries of his grace.

2. How supremely important is the work of redemption! God from eternity decreed it; angels desire to look into it; and holy men were, in every age, inspired by heaven to reveal it. How beautifully does this illustrate the saying of the apostle addressed to believers, 'All things are yours,' &c., 1 Cor. iii. 21.

3. How incalculably great are our obligations to Christ! Had he not conquered death, and despoiled the grave, no child of Adam could have ever praised God.

4. What encouragement have we to bear affliction with patience and faith! In this, as in all other things, Christ has set us a perfect example. We know that if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him. We know that through him all things work together for our good. We can go with holy boldness to God in affliction, for the Christ was before us in suffering, and he is eternally on the right hand of the throne in our name; and we can rest assured, that as He was triumphant over all enemies in his sufferings, so shall we through him. The light afflictions, which are but for a moment, are not worthy to be compared to the glory that awaits us.

PRAYER.

Most adorable Father of mercies, and God of all consolation, we desire, on this morning of thy holy sabbath, to draw near to thy throne of grace. We give thee our united and hearty thanks for the Christian sabbath. We bless thee, that upon the morning of this day, our adorable Redeemer burst the bonds of death, and took away the victory of the grave. We rejoice that although he died for sin, he arose on this morning without sin, and to our justification; that this day is a memorial of sin destroyed, and eternal life brought gloriously to light. We thank thee for the rest we have enjoyed in sleep; that no evil has come upon us, nor any plague visited our dwelling. We acknowledge the measure of health we individually experience, and all the comforts by which we are surrounded, to be gifts of thy providence. Enable us to feel thy goodness deeply, and to remember it constantly throughout the day. Look down in great mercy, we beseech thee, this morning, upon the whole world. We entreat thee, O Lord, to bless especially thy church every where. May this be a great day in her assemblies. Pour out a spirit of prayer upon all families, and cause all individuals called by thy name to rejoice when it is said, Let us go to the house of God. Draw many to thyself this morning, and enable them to hold fellowship with the Father and with the Son Jesus Christ. Hear, Lord, the prayers of thy Jacob, and graciously answer the petitions of thy Israel. Make thy people willing in a day of thy power, and enable them to feel that it is good for them to draw near unto God. Bless the preachers of thy word; may they run joyfully, knowing that thou hast sent them. Endow them largely for their appointed work; and may their ministrations, this day, be powerful by thy grace. Suit thy word, we beseech thee, to the varied conditions of thy people, and may each individual receive a word in season. Be very merciful, this morning, to all that are in affliction, either of body or mind. Give patience to the sick. Enable them to see thy hand in their sickness, and to be silent, because the dispensation is thine. Comfort the mourner, support the feeble, and raise up the bowed down. May the restored to health among the afflicted praise thee on earth, and those passing through death magnify thy name in heaven. Bless, Lord, our rulers in this our native land. Enable them to remember, that they have been appointed by thee, and to thee must give account. O may they be in the spirit on this thy day, honouring thee by whom they have been exalted to rule; and may they be all prepared to reign as kings and priests with Christ in heaven. Bless all our dear friends in every place. We rejoice that thine eye is upon them all, however much their circumstances may lie hid from us. Lord, suit thy dispensations to their eternal advantage, and prepare them all for thyself. Bountifully bless all our benefactors, and repay double to their souls their kindness to us. Enable us to forgive our enemies, as we trust that thou, for Christ's sake, wilt forgive us. Take us all under thy superintendence and direction through the day. May we be conducted by thy Spirit to the sanctuary, and feel that one day in thy courts is better than a thousand elsewhere; and may such of us as are required to remain at home, be wholly engrossed by spiritual and eternal things. We commit ourselves individually to thee, our covenant God; and all we ask or expect, is not in ourselves, but solely in Christ Jesus; to whom, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, our adorable and eternal Jehovah, be kingdom, and power, and glory. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS LXXXIX. 1—27.

REMARKS.

This psalm, like the preceding, is entitled 'Maschil,' or a psalm to give instruction. It consisteth of two parts. In the first, there is a triumphant review of God's providence and faithfulness toward his church, and the many exceedingly great and precious promises which he had made to his servant David. In the second, there is an expostulation with God on account of the present depressed condition of David's family; but, however despondent may be the tone of some parts of this expostulation, that the author looked upon it only as a severe chastisement is manifest, because he concludes the whole psalm with thanksgiving and praise to God. The former part, with a portion of which, only, we are at present concerned, is singularly beautiful and encouraging. It commences with the author's resolution, expressed in the anticipation of faith, that he would ever sing to the praise of God's mercies. Jehovah's adorable perfections are celebrated by the different orders, and displayed in the different conditions, of his creatures. Sinless angels praise him for his holiness; unnumbered worlds show forth his power, wisdom, and goodness; the fallen angels are, in the abodes of punishment, manifestations of vindictive justice; but it is the high privilege of the redeemed children of Zion to begin, on earth in time, and continue in heaven through eternity, the song of the triumph of mercy. Although, however, mercy droppeth freely upon the children of redemption like the rain and dew of heaven, yet it is founded upon the basis of, or rather, issueth from the fountain of an everlasting covenant. Mercy in Jehovah is not the capricious result of sudden compassionate emotion, but the development of fixed and eternal purpose. The Psalmist, accordingly, connects mercy closely with God's faithfulness; and while, in the second verse, he expresses an assurance, that mercy shall 'be built up for ever,' he adds, as a reason, that God's faithfulness shall be established in the heavens. The third and fourth verses are the commencement of a recital, or enumeration, of God's most gracious promises to David and his family; but as these promises, and the fulfilment of them, are illustrious manifestations of God's perfections, the author interrupts the enumeration by fourteen verses, in which he takes amplified notice of some of these perfections. In these verses (beginning with the fifth), he first speaks prophetically of the praise that in heaven, and among the saints, shall be offered up to God for the wonders of redeeming love, and for his faithfulness. He next shows, that God's love and faithfulness towards men is no encouragement for rash familiarity or presumption in their approaches to him. There is none in heaven to be compared to Jehovah, and, therefore, great fear, in meetings of his saints, is due unto his name. Verse eighth declares God's mightiness, manifested in the fulfilment of all his plans and purposes. This mightiness is then illustrated by his government of the sea, in putting it into motion, and stilling its waves at his pleasure. Probably there is here a reference to the Red sea, which, in so striking a manner, obeyed Jehovah's will in receding for the safety of the Israelites, and returning for the destruction of the Egyptians. This is the more likely, because the next verse speaks of Egypt under the name of Rahab. Verse eleventh, and the first clause of verse twelfth, illustrates God's greatness, by the creation and possession of the heavens and earth, the north and the south. Tabor and Hermon, spoken of in the latter clause of verse twelfth, were two mountains, the one on the west, and the other on the east, of the river Jordan; or the one within, and the other without, the land of Canaan. The one appears, accordingly, to signify the Jews, and the other the Gentiles; and the amount of all is, that the whole spiritual land of promise shall rejoice in God's name. The 'mighty arm,' in the thirteenth verse, is obviously God's arm in the gospel; and in the fourteenth verse, the character of this arm, or the nature of the gospel salvation, is beautifully described. Justice and judgment are said to be the habitation of God's throne, beyond the precincts of which it cannot exist. The law must be fulfilled, and justice must be satisfied, before mercy can be exercised; but when God's throne dwells in justice and judgment, through the mediation of Messiah, then mercy, accompanied by truth, goes before his face. The condition, character, privileges, and stability of those who are personally acquainted with the gospel salvation, are, with surpassing beauty, described, from verse fifteenth to the nineteenth; and then the enumeration of God's promises to David, broken of at verse fifth, is resumed. The substance, or chief of the promises, recited here, are historically recorded in 2 Sam. vii. 12, &c.; but although they apply to David in a subordinate sense, and as a type of Christ, they are literally true and appropriate, in all their parts, only in reference to Messiah.

PRAYER.

Almighty, all-glorious, and most merciful Je-

Jehovah, enable us, on this evening of thy holy Sabbath, to come, with all holy reverence and confidence, into thy most gracious presence. Enable us, this evening, to feel that we have come to thee in thine own appointed way, and that we are accepted in the Beloved; that we are not seen ourselves, in our native impurity and imperfections; but in the face of God our shield, the Lord our righteousness, and Captain of our salvation. Give us grace to rest in assured confidence, that we are justified freely by thy grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus; that thou hast set our feet upon the Rock of ages, and established here our goings. We unite, O Lord, in thanking and praising thee for all the privileges of the last day. We bless thee for its freedom from cares and labours of the other days of the week; for its sacred rest and holy opportunities. Grant, Lord, that it may be greatly blessed, in its effects and consequences, to many souls. May there be many, this evening, in the family and closet, before thy throne, beseeching thee to follow, with much fruit to edification, the whole ordinances of the sanctuary on the past day; and hear, O Lord, their prayers, and cause the seed that has been sown in reading, hearing, and preaching thy word, to grow up richly, and bring forth abundantly, to the praise and glory of thy grace. We thank thee, heavenly Father, for the care and kindness we have experienced of thy hand through the whole day. We specially desire to bless thee, O Lord, for the gracious things we have this evening heard out of thy blessed word. O make it greatly profitable to us, and to all who have thy word in their possession. We beseech thee, O Jehovah, Lord of heaven and earth, to bless all mankind. Enlighten the darkened, reform the sinner, and build up the believer in his most holy faith. Bless all nations and kingdoms; may they soon be all blessed in the Seed of Abraham, and become kingdoms of God and of his Christ. Bless specially our native land. May the throne be established in righteousness, the church endowed with faithfulness, and the people clothed with holiness. Be a physician to the sick, a comforter to the mourner, a father to the fatherless, a husband to the widow, and a shield to the stranger. Bless with thy friendship our friends, reward with thy favour our benefactors, and subvert with thy grace our enemies. Forgive all our sins and shortcomings in duty through the day. Take us under thy protection through the night, and fit us for all the duties of the ensuing day. Hear, Lord, in heaven, thy dwelling-place, our humble prayer, and give us an answer of peace, seeing all that we ask is in Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE III. 1.

SCRIPTURE—JOB I. II.

REMARKS.

The book of Job is an historical poem, and perhaps the most ancient written record in existence. It has always been regarded by the Jews as an inspired book, and is quoted as such by the apostle Paul. That the character of Job is not fictitious is most evident from the fact, that he is referred to by name in other books of the Old and New Testaments, as in Ezek. xiv. 14, and James v. 11. From the last chapter of his book we learn that he lived to an age much greater than was usual in the time of Moses, and are therefore led to date back the period of his birth to the days of the ancient patriarchs. That he was a very great man is proved by the extent of his wealth and the number of his servants. That he was a very holy man is evinced by his fear of God, his hatred of sin, and his 'continual' observance of family worship. Yet was Job not without his enemies. One, long afterwards declared to be 'the accuser of the brethren,' full of envy because of his happiness, and of malignity because of his holiness, sought to accomplish his desolation in time, and his utter ruin in eternity. To an extent rarely if ever paralleled in the dark picture of human suffering, was this great and good man tried. For him the furnace was heated seven-fold; but out of that furnace he came like the gold purified seven times—his accuser defeated—his happiness secured—his triumph completed.

Let us learn from this portion how important the duty, and how sweet the privilege, of having a family altar at which we may, on our own behalf, and on behalf of those we love most on earth, pour forth our hearts in humble adoration, in earnest petition, in grateful thanksgiving. Such in patriarchal, prophetic, apostolic, and present times, has been the unvarying practice of God's saints when placed by him in charge of families.

Fearful is the threatening denounced by God against the man who, in the spirit of atheism, denying his providence, or disregarding his blessing, neglects family worship. When such is called to part with his children by death, as was Job; or when the summons is addressed to himself, and he is laid on that bed from which he shall be carried out to the silent tomb, how terrible must it be to look on the children whom he should have trained, by his teachings and prayers, for heaven; and to think that their best interests he has neglected; that they are now about to be cast on a cold, and dangerous, and defiling world; that for them he can do nothing now; and that with them he shall not meet again till standing before the dread tribunal of God. Let the parents who neglect Job's example, and have no altars in their houses, tremble at the prospect. If, after the condemnation of the Judge, any thing in that day will be felt bitter, it will be the curses poured out on parents by neglected families.

In coming before God, let us rejoice that we have a sacrifice of nobler name and richer blood than any presented on the altar of Job. We can plead the sacrifice of God's own Son; and on that ground may we draw near to him in holy, humble, and child-like confidence, assured that our prayers, offered up through the mediation of our great high priest Jesus Christ, will be ever heard, and so far as may be consistent with our good and God's glory, certainly answered.

As in the days of old, so now the devil goeth to and fro in the earth, walking up and down in it, and having the same object in view, even to tempt and destroy the children of men. Having once been an angel of light, his knowledge must be extensive. His cunning has been matured by six thousand years' experience. His agents in the work of tempting have often, as in Job's case (chap. ii. 9.), been those who might be least suspected to take any part in such diabolical employment; hence the frequent success of 'his devices,' and the eternal ruin of his victims. Let us watch and pray lest we too fall into his snares and perish.

PRAYER.

Eternal God, thy throne is in the heavens, and before that throne angels and redeemed spirits ever bow, ascribing glory, and honour, and praise, unto him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever. We bless thee, Almighty God, that thou dost permit us the exalted privilege of raising an altar to thee in our dwelling. It is to us as the earnest of the peace and blessedness of heaven, when, as a family, we bow us down here, and, for a time forgetting the world and its anxieties, hold communion with thee the Father of our spirits. We confess, in deep humiliation of soul, how unworthy we are even to lift up our eyes to the place where thine honour dwelleth. In drawing near to a throne of grace, oft to thine eye has the depravity of our hearts been exhibited by the wandering of our thoughts, and the coldness of our affections, and the faintness of our desires. O Lord, we entreat that thou wilt now teach and enable us to wait on and worship thee in spirit and in truth. We draw near not in our own name or righteousness, for all our righteousnesses are but filthy rags. As guilty sinners we plead the sacrifice of Christ, and for his sake implore that all our sins may be for ever blotted out from the book of thy remembrance. As Job offered a sacrifice for each of his children, so would we implore that each member of this household may obtain favour in thy sight. May we all find acceptance in the Beloved, and, through faith in the promises, be found heirs of grace here, and of glory hereafter. O our Father, if in accordance with thy will, we would pray thee to save us, and those beloved ones bowing with us, from fearful calamities, and from sudden death. We entreat thy continued protection against the wiles of the wicked one, who goeth about seeking whom he may devour. Suffer us not to be led into temptation, and when we are tempted, make a way for our escape. Forbid, O God, that satan should so far get the advantage as that any of this family should ever be instrumental in leading others from the path of duty and of safety. May we rather be enabled to cheer each other's hearts in the day of darkness; to strengthen each other's faith in the time of trial; to encourage each other in an humble submission to thy will, in the faithful discharge of every duty, and in persevering efforts to obtain a place in glory. And now, O God, grant that at whatever time we may, as a family, be broken up, and called to an eternal world, we may again meet there, each renewed in the image of our Lord, cleansed in his blood, clothed in his righteousness, and prepared to spend eternity together in celebrating his praises. And to thy name will we ever ascribe all glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LI. 5—7.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS V.

REMARKS.

In this chapter two remarkable persons are brought before us. The first is Adam, the head of the whole human family. By a gracious and divine appointment he entered into a covenant with God, not only for himself, but all his posterity. Being tempted of the devil, he broke that covenant, violated the law under which he was placed, and became subject to its penalty. By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin. The other extraordinary character referred to is Jesus Christ. When he saw the world in ruins, and man helpless and hopeless, he offered to become his surety and representative; and as the Head and Father of all the elect, entered into a covenant of grace for them. Hence he is said, in the fourteenth verse, to be typified by the first Adam; and in 1 Cor. xv. 45, he is expressly called 'the last Adam,' not because of a similarity in their personal, but in their representative character.

1. Each is head of a distinct family; the first Adam of the whole human race. Whatever distinctions may seem to exist between the nations of the earth, distinctions of colour, or constitution, or caste, or character, they are so trifling, and found affected so readily by a change of circumstances, that they cannot for a moment shake our thorough conviction, that God 'hath made of one blood all nations f men; that all are directly sprung from one common root; that all are the children of one parent.

The last Adam, Christ, is head of all those whom he hath redeemed, and who will be regenerated from among men. They are those who are 'born again,' born from above.' In whatever land they live they regard it as a strange country, and look upward and onward to another and a better.

2. Each secures to his family certain results. Do we regard ourselves as children of the first Adam? Then, as such, we inherit from him guilt, the want of original righteousness, the corruption of our whole nature, death, and the pains of hell for ever. That we inherit guilt, that is, are obnoxious to punishment because of Adam's sin, is proved in the fifteenth and eighteenth verses; and in the fourteenth verse it is expressly declared, that even on those who had not committed actual sin, like Adam, punishment was inflicted. Infants have no actual sin, and when they suffer death it must be because of sin imputed. That we want original righteousness is evident from the sixteenth verse, where it is said we are 'without strength.' That our whole nature is depraved is manifest from the term applied to us in the tenth verse, 'enemies to God.' That in consequence of Adam's sin we are liable to death, is shown in the twelfth, fifteenth, and seventeenth verses; and that we are exposed to the pains of hell for ever is awfully clear in the twenty-first verse, where life and death are contrasted. The life is declared to be eternal, and that which is contrasted with it must, to have any point or meaning, be also eternal. Such, then, are the bitter fruits of Adam's fall, such the results secured to his family.

The last Adam, Christ, hath, by his obedience unto death, removed from off every member of his family this fearful curse, and not this alone, but all their own actual sins (sixteenth verse), and opened up a pathway by which each may, and will most certainly, ascend to a higher position amidst the sons of God, and stand in a nearer relationship to Jehovah, and wear a purer robe and a brighter crown than they could have done, even though the first Adam had retained his integrity (see ninth, nineteenth, and twenty-first verses.) But it may be asked, Does not the eighteenth verse teach that this free gift is universally bestowed, that all men are justified in Christ? Did it teach this, we could have no hesitation in saying, that it must do so in direct contradiction of many other of the plainest passages of God's word, passages which declare that many are in hell, and that many more will go there. It is surely not necessary to prove that such have not been, and never will be, justified. If there be any difficulty in the passage, it arises from our forgetting that, through the whole chapter, the apostle is keeping before us the existence of two great families and their representatives; and in strict accordance with this, teaches us, in the eighteenth verse, that as by the offence of Adam judgment came upon all whom he represented, all his natural seed, to condemnation; so the free gift came upon all whom Christ represented, all his spiritual seed, to justification.

And now the solemn, the important question, arises, How may I obtain this justification? What must I do to inherit eternal life? The inquiry is answered most satisfactorily in the first and second verses: 'We are justified by faith,' 'we have access by faith into this grace.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art worthy to receive blessing, and honour, and glory, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created. Thou madest man upright; but he has sought out many inventions. We confess, with shame, that whilst thou didst plant man a noble vine, wholly a right seed, we have become the degenerate plants of a strange vine. We were shapen in iniquity, and in sin did our mother conceive us. We are by nature the children of wrath, even as others. We have carnal minds, which are enmity against God, and are not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. We are born of the flesh, and in our flesh dwells no good thing. Our whole head is sick, our whole heart is faint, and from the sole of our foot to the crown of our head, there is no soundness in us, but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores. Our heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. O Lord, thou mightest justly separate us unto all evil, according to the curses of the broken covenant, and blot out our names from under heaven. —Thou mightest put into our guilty hands the cup of trembling, and make us drink it even to the very dregs. But thou hast not dealt with us according to our sin, nor rewarded us after our iniquities. Thou art God and not man, and therefore it is that we are not consumed. And now we adore thee, that, for us sinners, there is yet hope; that thy Son Jesus has been exalted a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins. Grant, gracious God, that we may be washed from iniquity, and cleansed from sin. O wash us in the blood of the Lamb, and we shall be whiter than the snow. As Christ was made sin for us, though he knew no sin, grant that we may be made the righteousness of God in him. We glory only in his cross, and we rejoice to call him the Lord our righteousness. For his sake do thou freely pardon us, and through him let us have access into that grace wherein believers stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Let the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep our hearts and minds through Jesus Christ. If any members of this family are yet dead in trespasses and sins, O let them be quickened. Open their eyes, and turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of satan unto God. If in any of us thine own good work has been begun, do thou perfect that which concerns us. May we all have clean hearts created, and right spirits renewed within us; and being constrained by the love of Christ, may we live as those who have been born again. Give us this night to sleep sweetly, and to awake in health. May those we love be united with us in Christ; and may we all at length meet to rejoice in that rest which remains for the people of God. Hear in heaven our humble evening prayers; and to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, will we ever ascribe glory and praise. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE V.

SCRIPTURE—JOB v.

REMARKS.

It is universally admitted that God is a being of infinite benevolence. It is universally felt, that throughout this world an incalculable amount of bodily suffering and mental distress exists. And the question naturally arises, How can both these things be? If God be good, how is his creature miserable? After creating this world, has he left it and its inhabitants to the guidance and control of chance? No—we learn from the sixth, seventh, and eighth verses, that, by a painful necessity, affliction is linked to our existence here in the purpose and decree of God. Distinctly and frequently are we taught that it is God who afflicts, either by his own immediate power, or through the permitted agency of others ‘he doth afflict.’ David says, ‘Thy waves are gone over me.’ Micah saith, ‘Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it.’ Amos saith, ‘Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?’ When the wicked prevail, it is because the Lord uses them as his sword, Ps. xvii. 13. But why does God send suffering? Why is man born to trouble? Is it because of any taint of malignity in the divine Head? Any thirst for revenge? Any delight in witnessing the miseries of his creatures? To suppose so would be the guiltiest and the grossest blasphemy. ‘He doth not afflict willingly the children of men.’ We are born sufferers, because we are born sinners. For the maintaining of his throne in righteousness—for the upholding of purity and peace throughout his vast dominions—for the preservation of happiness amidst the unnumbered and yet unfallen subjects of his sceptre, has the great and good Governor of the universe, by an unalterable decree, attached suffering to sin. If at any time a blasphemous or rebellious thought arise in the sinner’s soul because of his afflictions, let him pause, and put to his conscience this question, Is this deserved? And conscience, if not seared, taking a hurried glance over the past, and looking with a piercing eye upon the scene within; upon a stubborn will—affections estranged from God—passions deeply diseased, will quickly answer, it is all deserved, and more than all ten thousand fold. Then let him remember, ‘if his heart condemn him, God is greater than his heart, and knoweth all things.’

But to God’s redeemed children afflictions are not penal. He in whom they trust has, in his own body on the tree, endured the penalty for them. ‘The Lord laid on him the iniquities of us all;’ ‘he hath finished transgression, and made an end of sin;’ ‘the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin.’ Why, then, does God afflict his children? He chastens them ‘for their profit, that they might be partakers of his holiness.’ Although renewed in the Spirit of their minds, they are not yet made perfect in holiness—the lost likeness of their Father is not in all its parts restored—the disease of sin not wholly eradicated—the estranged affections not entirely and fixedly replaced on him who should be supremely the object of them—the precious metal not perfectly separated from the dross—hence does he, as an affectionate Father, use the rod to correct every unholy passion—as a kind physician, give the bitter medicine to remove disease—as a skilful refiner, keep us in the furnace till the dross is extracted and his own image seen. Sometimes we may not be able to discover why afflictions are sent, and we are ready to repine. We have been as diligent in duty, and our hearts have been as ardently affectionate to God, not certainly as we ought to have been, but still much more than at other times when no affliction oppressed us. But we should remember, that we may have indulged in some secret sins, known only to him who trieth the reins and searcheth the hearts of the children of men; or he may foresee some coming temptation against which he would prepare us, by inducing a higher degree of spirituality and heavenly-mindedness, as when Paul received the thorn in the flesh, lest he should be exalted above measure; or he may be making trial of our faith, as when commanding Abraham to enter on a course of most intense mental suffering, from the prospect of sacrificing his own Isaac; or he may be preparing us for undertaking some more arduous duties than any to which we have yet been called, as he fitted David for a throne and a kingdom by a lengthened series of hardships and sufferings. Whatever may be the immediate object of God, whether known or concealed, still may we, with the most implicit confidence, trust in the love and wisdom of him who layeth on the rod, neither despising ‘the chastening of the Almighty,’ ‘nor fainting when we are rebuked of him;’ but resting calm in the assurance, that out of the bitter will come forth sweet; and that in every case of his parental rebuke we may in faith use the language of the seventeenth verse, and say, Blessednesses are the portion of that man whom God correcteth.

PRAYER.

Unto whom shall we come but unto thee, O Lord, in whom we live, and move, and have our being? Through another night thou hast preserved us, and we bless thee. Others have been tossing in the furnace, while we rested in peace; and many through the night have slept the sleep death, while, though utterly unworthy of thy grace, we have been privileged to see the light of another day, and to meet again around this altar. With humble and grateful hearts we would render to thee that praise which is most justly due. Teach us, O Lord, more and more of the evil nature and the bitter consequences of sin, that we may come to hate it with a perfect hatred, and be enabled to throw off its degrading yoke, and its cruel bondage. Give us grace to look on it as standing forth in the dark picture of human suffering; in the agonies of the cross; in the triumphs of death; and in the torments of the damned; and may we be filled with holy fear lest we sin. May we be watchful that we offend thee not in thought, or word, or deed. If in the temple of our hearts there be any idol set up, any accursed things hidden, O search those hearts as with a lighted candle, and bring forth and destroy whatever is hateful to thee. Though that evil thing should be valued as a right hand, enable us to cut it off; though dear as a right eye, strengthen us to pluck it out. We earnestly pray that sin may not have dominion over us, but that wrestling and striving in the might of the Holy Ghost, we may obtain the victory. Permit us, O God, to ask, that thou wilt spare us from severe suffering. With shame and sorrow do we confess how much we deserve it; and that wert thou to enter into judgment with us, and to condemn us, we must acknowledge the justice of thy sentence. But approaching in the name of thy holy child Jesus, who has borne our sins and carried our sorrows, we would beseech thee to pity us as a father pitieth his children, and freely and fully to pardon us. If, Lord, thou see it necessary to lay on the rod, O let it be in tenderness. Take us not away from each other in thine anger, nor chasten in thy hot displeasure. Prepare us at all times for coming afflictions. Strengthen us under them, sanctify us by them, and make them to work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. For thy children who are now being chastened, and especially for any such who are dear to us, we entreat these blessings. May he who walked with the three children in the fiery furnace, who can sympathise in that he also suffered, make his grace sufficient for them, and at length bring them ransomed, regenerated, and sanctified, home to heaven. All we now ask is in his name, to whom, with thee the Father and the Holy Ghost, we would ever ascribe all glory and praise. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLVII.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS VI.

REMARKS.

The fifth chapter concludes with a most emphatic statement, declaring that eternal life springs to us from the free and sovereign grace of God. The apostle, anticipating the objection often made since his day, that the natural and necessary tendency of this doctrine is to lead to licentiousness, shows they utterly misunderstood the subject who suppose that the grace of God only saves a man from the punishment, and not from the power of sin; that it suffers a man to live a life of iniquity, and then merely delivers him at death from its curse and condemnation. True though it be that a man becomes the subject of grace without any previous holiness to merit the gift, yet the moment he comes under its influence, a total change is effected, not only as regards his prospects, but as regards his present state and character. Up to this moment, whatever may have been his natural amiabilities or excellencies, he was spiritually dead, his heart was enmity against God—his members instruments of unrighteousness—his prospects dark—his reward eternal death. But now the Holy Ghost has breathed upon his soul—life is implanted—faith exercised—pardon bestowed—the old man with his lusts crucified, and a new man raised up after the image of Him who created him. Well then may the apostle ask the question, ‘How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?’ As natural death cuts off from all connection with our wonted companions, pursuits, and pleasures, so the man who, through grace, becomes dead to sin, cannot live any longer therein. This is signified in our receiving that solemn ordinance by which we are sealed as members of his mystical body. It is not said that we are baptized in the name of Christ, but into Christ, into the death of Christ; that is, into a participation of all the blessings purchased by his death, and into a conformity unto his death in our dying to sin. His death was by crucifixion, so is the death of sin in us, sixth verse. His was a most painful death; and in the death of sin there is the cutting off the right hand, the plucking out the right eye. As his death was lingering, so is the death of sin in the soul. He was put to death; and so tenacious of life is sin, that unless put to death by the Spirit of God, it would live for ever; live under the wrath of God, and amidst everlasting burnings, and yet never die.

But we must not only be baptized into Christ’s death, but into his burial also. Being buried implies our continuing under the power of death. When the body is laid in the grave, it is eternally separated from all the business of this world; and so the separation from sin which takes place is not for a little time, it is an eternal separation.

There is not, we conceive, any reference here to the mode of administering baptism. We are said to be baptized into his death; but there is nothing in the manner of his death to explain the mode in which baptism should be administered. We are said to be planted in the likeness of his death; but surely the apostle, when using this figure, is not intending to teach us how we should be baptized. Nor can we see any reason, except to serve a party, why the third figure, 'buried in baptism,' which refers to the very same thing as the other two, should be made to explain a new subject, and one altogether foreign to the apostle's object and reasoning.

It is required here that we should die to sin, and be buried or separated from it; but this is not all; we must be renewed in the spirit of our minds, and raised up in the likeness of his resurrection to walk in newness of life. When the old man is crucified, and the new man created, then, as 'a servant of righteousness,' 'a servant to God,' he for the first time comes to fulfil the end of his existence, and from the heart obeys God's word, both in the faith of its promises and the discharge of its duties. His soul, having been subdued and melted by divine grace, has been, with all its powers and affections, poured into the mould of the gospel, and taking the impression, now presents the moral and glorious image of him from whom that gospel emanated.

PRAYER.

Most holy and most gracious God, we draw nigh to bow on thy footstool, conscious of our utter unworthiness to approach thee, yet taking encouragement from thy kind invitations and thy precious promises. We bow down most humbly to acknowledge our great sinfulness. We confess that we have been the servants of sin; that iniquity has had dominion over us; and that we have most fully deserved the wages of sin, which is death. Long ere this thou mightest have cut us down, and assigned us our portion in that place where hope never cheers, and prayer is never heard. But thou hast had patience, and we now rejoice that there is mercy for the chief of sinners, even for those who were dead in trespasses and sins. Let us, O Lord, be partakers of that rich and free grace which bestows on the humblest believer eternal life through Jesus Christ. Grant that we may hear thy voice saying to each of us, Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee. However deep, or aggravated, or manifold they have been, blot them all out, and let the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, purge our conscience from dead works to serve the living God. As we are not under the law, but under grace, grant that no iniquity may have dominion over us. Let our old man be crucified with Christ, that the body of sin may be destroyed, that henceforth we may not serve sin; and let not sin reign in our mortal bodies, that we should obey it in the lusts thereof; but being made free from sin, let us become the servants of righteousness. Being baptized in the name of Christ, that it may be found we have been baptized into his death,—let us be buried with him in a complete separation from the pursuits of sin. Let us be planted together in the likeness of his death and resurrection, that as he was raised from the dead by the glory of his Father, so we may also walk in newness of life. May our hearts be moulded by the gospel into the image and likeness of our Lord. Write thy law on our hearts, that we may be the epistles of Christ; written by the Spirit of the living God, not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart. Make us to delight in the law of God after the inward man; and let us not be conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of our minds. Not satisfied with what we may have already attained to, may we be found pressing continually forward to the mark of the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus. May we be not only dead unto sin, but as those made alive unto God. May we be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, steadfast and immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labour is not in vain in the Lord. May we work while it is day; and when the night of death cometh, may we be found ready, and waiting to enter into the joy of our Lord. And to thy name, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, be all the glory. Amen.

SCRIPTURE—JOB VII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The words of Job in this passage are full of melancholy. Subjected to great and complicated suffering, he mourns the wretchedness of his state. He appears to derive some pleasure from recounting to others the misery which he felt, that he might at least have their sympathy and compassion. So agonized was his body, so distracted was his mind, that he no longer considered life a blessing, and he had rashly expressed the wish that death might close his sufferings, 'that it would please God to destroy him, that he would let loose his hand and cut him off.' He attempts to excuse his desire of death; and for this purpose he speaks of the weariness and labour of his life. He compares himself to an hireling, who, forced to earn his bread with the sweat of his brow, looks with anxiety for the shades of evening that may release him from his labour, and permit him to rest. But even night, that brings repose to the labourer, brought no comfort to the patriarch's heart. In the fourth verse he draws a vivid and affecting picture of his sufferings. He had lain down to rest, but sleep forsakes his eyes. Though he had longed or the silent hours of night, he finds that they bring no alleviation to his sufferings. Full of 'tossings to and fro,' he anxiously looks for the dawn of day, faintly hoping that the return of morning light may give some relief to his misery.

Ver. 7. Turning from his friends, who appear to have been weary of his complaints, he expostulates with God, and pours out before him 'the anguish of his spirit.' Beautiful and affecting is his description of the life of man. It is compared, in its vanity, to the wind that passes by, to 'the cloud' that riseth for a short time, and then 'is consumed and vanishes away.'

Ver. 17. In the midst of his deep despondency still there are expressions of piety. He thinks of the insignificance of the creature, and then of the greatness of the Creator, and wonders at the condescension of Him who reigns above, that he should take such care of weak and worthless man. Though he had attempted to justify himself before his friends, before God he acknowledges his guilt, and earnestly prays that his sins may be forgiven before he 'sleeps in the dust.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The example of Job is set before us in the New Testament (James v. 11.); but let us remember, that it is his patience, not his fretfulness, that we are invited to imitate. We see in this chapter that he had times of complaining. The best of men are not free from infirmities, because they are but men. When tried with affliction, let us be more anxious that it may be sanctified than that it may be removed. Let us never repine under the hand of God, who can bring light out of darkness, and good out of evil, and who makes 'all things work together for good to them that love him.' Let us be thankful to our heavenly Father when we remember the quiet repose of the past night, and think how many, like him whose words we have been reading, have been tossing on beds of sickness. And let us above all things imitate the patriarch in praying for the pardon of our sins, as we know not how soon or how suddenly we may be called before God's judgment-seat.

PRAYER.

We come into thy presence, O God, to thank thee for the light and blessings of another day. We laid us down and slept, we waked again, for it was the Lord sustained us. In thine unerring wisdom thou hast cast a veil over the events of futurity; we know not what a day or an hour may bring forth. Enable us, at all times, to rejoice in the thought, that we have a Father in heaven who careth for us, who knoweth whereof we are made, and who remembereth that we are but dust. And if, Lord, for the trial of our faith, affliction is permitted to befall us, save us from repining against thee. Convince us that thy way is the right way. Make us submit to thy will in all things, not because thou art infinitely powerful, but because we know that thou art in-initely good. Keep us from dishonouring thee by unworthy thoughts of thy dealings and character. Make us from the heart to say, It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth unto him good. Keep us this day from danger and sin. When engaged in the business of time, let us never forget the concerns of eternity. Help us to remember how short and uncertain life is; how soon we must leave this world and go to our account. Grant that every day added to our lives may find us loving thee more, and serving thee better, and at last may we be fitted to spend in heaven an eternal day of rest and glory. Look down mercifully upon us, O thou preserver of men, and pardon our sins. For the sake of our crucified Redeemer, blot out all our iniquities, receive us into thy favour, and let thy banner over us be love. O grant that before we sleep in the dust, our peace may be made with thee, our meetness for heaven may be complete. With ourselves, we pray thee to bless our relations and friends. Let their souls be precious in thy sight. May thy kingdom come. May thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven. Let the people praise thee, O Lord, let all the people praise thee. Hear in heaven, thy dwelling place, the voice of our morning supplication, which we present before thee in the name of our once crucified, but now exalted Saviour. And to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, be everlasting praise. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM XIX. 12.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS VII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

It had been objected to the gospel that the doctrine of free grace would lead to licentiousness, and encourage sin. In the preceding chapter the apostle proves this to be an abuse of the doctrine, and shows that so far from the gospel giving any encouragement to licentiousness, it had the very opposite effect, and afforded the highest motives to the cultivation of holiness.

Ver. 1—6. Here he shows that the law held dominion over us when in our natural state of sin; but as by the death of the husband, or wife, the survivor is freed from the marriage, more so by the offering of Christ's body on the cross we are freed from the demands of the law. United to him who is raised from the dead, and who liveth for ever, our hearts are sanctified; and where before the rank weeds of corrupted nature alone had sprung, we now bring forth the fruits of holiness unto God. We devote ourselves to his service with the affection of children. No longer in the flesh, and subject no more to the condemning power of the law, we serve him with a renewed and holy spirit.

Ver. 7—13. Paul here explains the use and effect of the law. 'By the law is the knowledge of sin.' The state of Paul, and of every believer before conviction of sin, is here described. In his unrenewed state he was ignorant of the pure and spiritual nature of the law. He thought himself 'rich and increased in goods, and in need of nothing, when,' in truth, 'he was wretched, and miserable, and blind, and naked.' He was once 'alive' in his own estimation. He was in peace; but it was a deceitful peace. He was ignorant of his state in the sight of Jehovah, ignorant of the dreadful opposition of his heart to God's authority, and without dread of the awful danger impending over him. But as soon as he obtained proper views of the spirituality and extent of God's law, he was roused from his stupor, overwhelmed with a sense of sin and the deep depravity of his heart. A conviction of guilt pressed heavily on his enlightened and awakened conscience, and made him sensible that he was sunk in corruption and ruin.

Ver. 14—25. Having exhibited the operation of the law in producing conviction of sin, the apostle in this section comes to show its effects on the mind of the believer. Knowing that the law is spiritual, he feels how much he falls short of its requirements. Though renewed in the spirit of his mind, he laments that his sanctification is far from being complete. Though ardently aspiring to conformity with the divine will, he feels that the power of sin is not yet subdued. He finds a law in his members opposing his better judgment; and he describes, in earnest and vivid language, the contest between the power of sin and his desires after holiness. This contest is referred to also in the fifteenth verse of the following chapter, and is described in Gal. v. 17.

Struck with a sense of danger lest he might fall again into the bondage of sin, and seeing that its wages are eternal death, his feelings burst out in the bitter exclamation, 'O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver from the body of this death?' But calling to mind the finished work of the Redeemer, his bosom glows with gratitude. His struggling spirit hears the cheering voice, 'Sin shall not have dominion over you;' 'if you know the truth, the truth shall make you free.' And in view of certain and glorious victory, he exclaims, 'I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Let us try to have, like the apostle, proper views of the law of God. We see there is great danger of our being satisfied with our spiritual state, when we ought not to be satisfied with it; and, therefore, it should be our care not to allow self-love, or the opinions of others, to sway our judgments, but to keep in view the divine law in all its holiness and purity. Our hearts should be faithfully examined; our thoughts, and words, and conduct, should be frequently brought to the law and to the testimony. If this be done, we cannot fail to be humbled in the presence of God, to feel the insufficiency of our best services, and be brought to him who is mighty to save.

We learn from this chapter that the life of the believer is not a life of ease and inactivity. There is a battle to be fought, a victory to be gained. Even in the Christian the power of sin is not completely destroyed. Still it struggles for the mastery. Be it ours to resist its attempts. Think of the misery and ruin sin brings along with it, and think of the joy and the reward of victory. 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.'

PRAYER.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, we come this evening before thy throne imploring thee to have mercy upon us, and to hear our prayers. We are ashamed, and blush to lift up our faces unto thee, for our iniquities have increased over our heads, and our trespass is grown up into the very heavens. We are wise to do evil; but to do good we have no knowledge. Our best resolutions have been as the morning cloud and early dew, that passeth away. O Lord, enlighten our darkened understandings. Give us more clear and correct views of the purity of thy holy law; and under a deep sense of our great and manifold offences, bring each of us before thee with the earnest cry, God be merciful to me a sinner. We mourn over our sinful and corrupted hearts; we lament our proneness to the world and earthly things. Take away, O God, the spirit of delusion. Forbid that any of us should say to our souls, Peace, peace, where there is no peace. Search us, O God, and know our hearts; try us, and know our thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in us, and lead us in the way everlasting. If any now in thy presence be far from thee, any in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity, O teach him his danger, spare him time to repent before it be too late. Grant that the poor wanderer may be brought back to thy fold, and made to rejoice in the message of the gospel. Make us all to know the love and compassion of our divine Redeemer, and, in our blessed experience, to feel the joy and peace of believing. Exposed as we are to many temptations, we look up to thee for aid. Send down thy holy Spirit to strengthen and uphold us. Enable us to fight the good fight of faith. Be thou, O God, our guardian and our friend. May thy divine arm support us amidst all the dangers and trials through which we are destined to pass. Putting on the whole armour of God, may we triumph over every adversary; may we be more than conquerors through him that loved us. May the experience of thy love, and the assurances of thine affection, animate us under every trial. When heart and flesh faint and fail, be thou, O God, the strength of our heart, and our portion for ever. Bless all our friends. Keep us safely his night, guide us in all our ways, and fit us for thy heavenly kingdom. Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God, and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PARAPHRASE VII.

SCRIPTURE—JOB IX.

REMARKS.

Job had been treated unkindly by his friends. Because his trials were many and severe, they unjustly concluded that he was a great transgressor. They thought it impossible that God would allow a righteous man to suffer so much and so long. 'If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous;' 'behold, God will not cast away a perfect man.' His state was one of the deepest affliction. He had been suddenly deprived of his children, his property had been destroyed, his body was bending under the load of disease. But the cup of sorrow was not yet full. His pretended friends attacked his character, and upbraided him as a reprobate and a sinner. In the ninth chapter he meekly replies to these unjust and cruel imputations. Before the eye of omniscient purity all are sinful. If God should lay to the charge of any man his multiplied transgressions, he could not answer him one of a thousand. And to contend with the strength of the Almighty, is equally vain as to impeach his wisdom. Some have dared to set themselves in opposition to the Sovereign of the universe; but was it ever known that they prospered? On the contrary, has not the vengeance of heaven been poured upon their devoted heads, and shown at once their folly and their weakness?

Ver. 5. How sublime the description here given of the power of God! Mountains, which are to us the very emblems of stability, are removed at his pleasure. The earth itself trembles to its foundation. The sun is veiled in darkness at his command, and the stars of the firmament are extinguished. The heavens are spread out by his Almighty hand, and the proud waves of the ocean are trodden by his feet. Not only have unnumbered worlds been called into being by his command, but he still superintends the vast machinery of nature. In regions to which imagination itself has never reached, the wisdom and power of the Almighty are wonderfully displayed. He is present in every part of the universe which he has formed, preserving and governing all his creatures and all their actions. Were his supporting arm to be withdrawn for a moment, all would be ruin. Though his presence is not visible to the eye of man, the operations of his wisdom and power are every where manifest.

Ver. 21. What Job had said of man's utter inability to contend with God, he here applies to himself.

Though he maintained his integrity in the sight of man, and denied the imputation of gross and secret wickedness with which they charged him, he was humble in the sight of God. He acknowledges that, in the presence of that awful Being who inhabiteth the praises of eternity, he dare not justify himself, and that the very expression of a self-righteous claim would prove it to be unfounded. What low and imperfect views of the purity of God's law, and the holiness of his character, must they have who imagine they can live up to its requirements, and claim, on the footing of their own obedience, the reward of his approbation.

Ver. 22—24. Reference is here made to the special argument of his friends. He insists that suffering is not the mark of wickedness, because it often happens that the workers of iniquity enjoy the good things of this world, when the righteous are tried with many sufferings, and sometimes go mourning to their graves. Clouds and darkness may now surround the dispensations of the Almighty; but we may rest assured that righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.

Ver. 25 to the end. It must be acknowledged that Job here speaks unadvisedly with his lips. He complains of the swiftness with which all his property had passed away, and the heaviness of his present sufferings. These were made doubly distressing by the uncharitable insinuations of his friends. It was enough, he thought, if his body was racked with pain; but it was past endurance that imputations should be cast upon his integrity. From the severity and long continuance of his afflictions, he despaired of his righteousness ever being established, forgetting to 'commit his way unto the Lord, who shall bring forth his righteousness as the light, and his judgment as the noon day.' The mind of the patriarch was heavily oppressed. He had experienced how hopeless is the task to argue with God, or to stand justified in his presence. He deeply felt the necessity of a mediator; and although at times he seems to have been favoured with a prophetic glimpse of the coming Saviour, his views were now clouded by the deep distress in which he was overwhelmed. On this all-important subject he ardently desires more clear manifestations of the divine will, and anxiously looks forward to the time when clouds and darkness shall be dispelled, and the way of pardon and acceptance be made known.

PRAYER.

Thou, Lord, art high and lifted up; thou sittest upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; thou stretchest out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadest them out as a tent to dwell in. Give us, we beseech thee, just conceptions of thy power, thy wisdom, and thy goodness. Convince us that it is vain to contend against thee, or to seek for happiness where thou hast forbidden us to walk. We beseech thee, Lord, to endue each of us with a meek and charitable frame of spirit towards all our fellow men. Suffer us not to assume thy right, or attempt to pass judgment upon their spiritual state ; but enable us to strive and pray for the conversion of all around us. Enlighten our minds in the knowledge of heavenly truth, and make us to see and acknowledge our own guilt and pollution. If we justify ourselves, our own mouths shall condemn us ; if we say we are perfect, it shall also prove us perverse. Behold us, O Lord, prostrate at thy throne. We are helpless in ourselves ; but we are encouraged by thy promises. We come unto thee through him who is the way, the truth, and the life. Look upon the face of thine anointed. Hear the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. Enable us to renounce every self-righteous plea, and to count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord. Save us, O God, we beseech thee, not only from the punishment, but also from the power of sin. Deliver us from its bondage. Let it not have dominion over us ; but, walking as children of light, may we adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. Let our path be as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. May thy blessing attend us in all the duties of the day on which we are entered. Preserve us from every danger, and keep us especially from the commission of sin. Let not the temptations of the world, nor the allurements of pleasure, nor any of our temporal interests, ever seduce us from the path that leads to glory. Forgetting those things which are behind, may we reach forth unto those things which are before ; may we press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Bless, we humbly beseech thee, all our friends. Some of them are far from us ; but we rejoice that they are near to thee. Guide them by thy wisdom, protect them by thy power. Grant them so much of temporal good as thou seest to be conducive to their eternal welfare ; but, above all things, bestow upon them those true riches that shall endure for evermore. Hear us, O God of our salvation, and grant us an answer in mercy and peace, since all we ask is for the sake of our Redeemer Jesus Christ, who is the Lord our righteousness, God over all, blessed for evermore. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLVIII.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS VIII.

REMARKS.

In the previous discussion of his subject the apostle had established the truth, that believers are not under the law, but under grace ; and from this he draws the inference, contained in the beginning of this chapter, 'there is, therefore, now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus.' He describes in this passage of scripture the privileges of God's people ; and this is the first and most important of them all, Christ has died for their sins, and being united to him by faith, they are free from the punishment due to their sins, and are accepted in the sight of God. Having broken the commands of the Almighty, and our nature being corrupted, the law cannot bring us salvation, but God has accomplished this by the sacrifice of his Son. Not only the state, but the character, of believers is here described. 'They walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.' Their minds are not engrossed with sensuality and worldliness. Were this the case, they could have neither lot nor part in the matter, for 'the carnal mind is enmity against God.' But on the contrary, they are partakers of that Spirit which is the author and earnest of eternal life. We find the works of the flesh, and the fruits of the Spirit, enumerated by the apostle in Gal. v. 19—24.

Ver. 12—28. This section contains two additional arguments in support of the apostle's theme—the safety of all who are in Christ Jesus. The first is taken from their being members of the family of God. Upon believers is bestowed the spirit of adoption ; they can look up to God as their reconciled Father in Christ Jesus. Though he was angry with them, his anger is turned away, and he comforts them. They are assured that no earthly parent can feel for them the same love and affection as their heavenly Father. And being the children of his adoption, they are heirs of his kingdom, and preparing, by a closer walk with God, to reign with Christ in glory. But as some might think that their afflictions are inconsistent with this view, he warns against this error. Though sometimes united with suffering, they are sustained by hope, and aided by the Spirit under all the trials and difficulties to which they are exposed ; and in consequence of this, all things, however painful and distressing, work together for their good. The afflictions of time are light and transient, not worthy to be compared with the glory to be revealed. They are no marks of God's displeasure to his people ; but are sent to wean their affections from this world, and prepare them for heaven.

Ver. 23. The indwelling of the Spirit in the heart of the believer is the first fruits of the heavenly inheritance, the same in kind with the blessings of his Father's house, though less in degree. Hope cheers the believer's soul with the bright prospect of future blessedness, and the Spirit sustains him by his intercessions, and stirs up an earnestness of desire which human language is unable to express. Nothing, hen, can endanger the safety of believers, notwithstanding all their sufferings, as they are the children of God, and aided and supported by the Holy Spirit.

In the concluding section of the chapter, the apostle proceeds to state two other arguments in favour of the safety of believers. The first is the decree, or purpose, of God; and the second, his boundless and unchanging love. God chooses his people from the world, and brings their temper and conduct into a conformity with Jesus Christ; but this is not the result of any excellence in them, it is alone the act of his sovereign grace. The love of God has been manifested in a way the most striking. For the sake of his people, he spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for them all; and by this great and wondrous gift, he has afforded a pledge of every other blessing. When the questions are put, 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?' and, 'Who is he that condemneth?' the apostle expresses, in the strongest manner, that those who are united to Christ have nothing to fear. God is for them. As their Judge he is satisfied; as their Father he loves them; as the Sovereign of the universe he overrules all events to the promotion of their best interests. No event can happen to do them injury. No power can separate from his love. No change of circumstances can prevent their blessedness throughout eternity.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, heavenly Father, that on those subjects on which our eternal interests are suspended, we are not abandoned to the dim uncertain light of reason, but have thy word to be a lamp unto our feet, and a light unto our paths. Glory be to thy name, O God, in the highest, who, by the gospel of thy Son Jesus Christ, hast opened to the heavy laden sinner the gates of heaven, and pointed out to the weary pilgrim the path to eternal rest. We rejoice to contemplate the privileges of thy people, to be assured that there is no condemnation to those which are in Christ Jesus. O may we be united to him, by faith, as branches to the vine, and members to the head of the body. Enable us, we beseech thee, to walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. Control, O God of purity and holiness, our actions, words, and desires. Let them never rise up in rebellion against thee; but subdue them to thy will, and bring every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. Give us the spirit of adoption. Enable us to trust in thee with filial reverence and love. May the Spirit bear witness with our spirit, that we are thy children, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. If in thy providence we are doomed to suffering, let not our confidence in thee be shaken; but cheered by the assurance of thy love, and animated by the hope of everlasting happiness, let us with patience wait thy time of deliverance. May the Spirit help our infirmities; may he teach us to pray, and excite more ardent desires for an abiding sense of thy favour, and a participation of thy glory. We rejoice in thee, the God of our salvation. We commit our immortal interests to thy care. O Lord, assure us of thy love. Make us to know, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Thou hast mercifully preserved us from the arrow that flieth by day; keep us also from the pestilence that walketh in darkness. We will both lay us down in peace, and sleep, for thou, Lord, only makest us dwell in safety. Bless and keep all our relatives and friends. Make them, we beseech thee, partakers of thy grace, and heirs of thy kingdom. Hear, O God, and answer us in mercy, since all we ask is for the sake of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in whose words we sum up the desires of our hearts, Our Father, &c.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM xxxvii. 37—40.

SCRIPTURE—JOB xii.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

We have here the answer of Job to the accusations of Zophar. In the preceding chapter Job had been compared to 'a vain man that would be wise, though born like a wild ass's colt.' The harshness of the allusion seems to have called forth the cutting irony of the second verse. 'No doubt,' &c. 'wisdom shall die with you'—with you alone wisdom lives, and in your death it finds its grave. Zophar had urged him to put away iniquity, and that then he should 'shine forth as the morning.' This appears to have produced the reply in the fifth verse, where Job complains that the suffering believer in adversity is regarded by the man at ease and in prosperity as the flickering and dying light of a lamp, which we hastily extinguish, because its feeble glare is useless, and its smoke unpleasant. Job makes his appeal (ver. 7, 8.) to history and experience, and demonstrates the truth which he is every where so anxious to establish, viz., that worldly affluence and personal ease are not always the attendants upon piety; on the contrary, that robbers prosper, and men that provoke God fare sumptuously. These things he confirms by a reference to the delicacies of their table, amply supplied with the rarest dainties which the beasts of the field, the fowls of heaven, and the fishes of the sea, could furnish, and laden with the varied productions of the vegetable world. Probably Job had here in view the rapine and plunder of the Chaldeans and Sabeans, now reposing amid their spoils in luxurious enjoyment; or it may be that he makes this appeal to the animal and vegetable kingdoms, to show that, by the wise arrangement and permission of God, the stronger and fiercer animals prey upon the unoffending and inoffensive; that the useless tares often flourish, and the good seed is made to languish.

Ver. 11. A distinction in sounds is easily known by the ear, and a difference of tastes felt by the palate, and equally apparent is the hand of God in the dispensations of his providence, permitting for a season the ungodly to triumph, and placing his own children in trouble and affliction.

Ver. 12. Bildad had claimed wisdom for old age and experience, as the attribute of men of years. Here Job admits the propriety of looking to age for these qualities, and then beautifully directs his own and his friend's contemplation to the Ancient of days, with whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and whose Almighty power was able to complete what his unerring counsel had devised.

In the concluding verses of the chapter, we see the Almighty presiding over the kingdoms of nature; one while breaking up the overwhelming fountains of the great deep, at another time drying up their channels; sometimes pulling down, at other times building up. The counsels of the wise he bringeth to nought. The advice of the trusty, and the experience of age, he turneth to foolishness. The secret and artful contrivance of the deceiver is as well known to God as the public folly of his deluded victim. Kings are overthrown and carried into captivity, or restored and reinstated by his sovereign power. Kingdoms from him take their rise, reach the summit of their glory, then decline, and either sink into a state of total insignificance, like the empire of Rome, or are cut off from the rank of nations, like the glory of Babylon. Their ruin he completes by the blindness and irresolution of the chiefs of the people, for they grope in darkness like the blind, and lose their way, and they ever fluctuate in uncertain counsels, madly staggering on like a drunken man.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The troubles that afflict the just are many. Through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom of God. Affliction is one of the evidences of our adoption, for we are assured that 'if we be without chastisement, then are we bastards and not sons.' Let us, then, not only expect, but rejoice in tribulation. These light afflictions are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall follow. If pretended friends, in the time of our calamity, stand aloof, or if they proceed to censure us as though our sorrows were our sins, remember this has been the lot of all God's people. O reflect how light a thing it is to be judged of man's judgment, knowing God judgeth righteously. The severe and unjustifiable rebukes of our fellows have a tendency to irritate, and sometimes tempt the wounded spirit to lift up false weapons of defence, such as irony and sarcasm. We have, however, a perfect example in the Lord Jesus Christ, 'who, when he was reviled, reviled not again.' If we be believers, let us never sink under any reverse of fortune, or under any personal affliction, for the promise of God continues unchangeable.

'All things work together for good to them that love God.' Let us also remember that our rational prosperity arises from the goodness of God, and that he has only to withhold the light he now affords for our guidance, and our darkened counsels would work out our fatal and final overthrow.

PRAYER.

O thou, whose name alone is Jehovah, and who art the Most High over all the earth, blessed and only Potentate, King of kings, and Lord of lords, we would humbly bow in adoring reverence before thee. O our God, we are ashamed, and blush to lift up our faces before thee, for our iniquities are increased over our heads, and our trespasses have grown up into the heavens. Behold we are vile, and we cannot answer thee. We would lay our hands upon our mouths, and put our mouths in the dust this morning before thee, and, like the polluted leper, lift up our cry, Unclean! Unclean! O what reason have we to bless thee that there is a fountain open to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness. O wash us and we shall be clean; purify us, and we shall be whiter than snow. Lord, thou hast promised, that if we confess and forsake our sin we shall find mercy with thee. Alas! we, like all flesh, must confess that we have corrupted our way; we have been alienated from the life of God by reason of the ignorance and blindness of our hearts. O forgive wherein in time past we have walked in the way of our own heart, and in the sight of our own eyes, fulfilling the desire of the flesh and of the mind. Enable us henceforth to walk by faith. Show us thy mercy, O Lord. Create in us a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within us. Lord, give us thy good Spirit. May our hearts be filled with love, joy, and peace. Enable us to exercise long-suffering and goodness. Increase our faith, make us gentle toward all men, and strengthen us to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present evil world. We give thee hearty thanks for preserving us during the watches of the night. We have laid ourselves down, and slept in safety, for God sustained us. We bless thee, O Lord, for our domestic comforts; but more especially would we bless thee for the means of grace we still enjoy. We beseech thee this day to defend us from evil, and to guide us by thy Spirit to all good. Sanctify all our motives and purposes. May our conversation be as becometh the gospel. If called by thee to suffer, may we endure affliction patiently. May all our trials be sanctified. Grant us daily to die unto sin, and make us meet for the inheritance among the saints in light. O Lord, if agreeable to thy will, continue to prosper our native land. Leave not, we beseech thee, our rulers and governors to their own counsels, lest our candlestick be removed, and darkness, even thick darkness, should cover the people. O righteous Father, do for us exceeding abundantly above what we can ask or think, and supply all our needs according to thy riches and glory by Jesus Christ. Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, be unto the Lord our God for ever and ever. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIII. 8—12.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS IX.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The doctrine of the divine sovereignty, unfolded and established in the chapter before us, is inseparably interwoven with the gospel scheme of salvation, in its origin, execution, and application. This sovereignty of Jehovah in electing love, and in predestinating grace, is here discussed in such a way as becomes the majesty of the Creator, in silencing the proud arrogance of rebellious man. This glorious doctrine is so utterly opposed to the pretensions of human merit and human wisdom, that no effort of learning, no stretch of ingenuity, has been spared to wrench it, if possible, from the book of God; but all in vain. It spreads its majesty over every page of holy writ, and shines only all the more gloriously, that impotent man has dared to impugn it. But here especially does its glory display itself; here, beyond all controversy, is its place in the scheme of revelation firmly established.

Ver. 1—5. The apostle, in introducing to our notice one of the most illustrious manifestations of this sovereignty in the election of the Gentiles to the possession and enjoyment of spiritual blessings, and the rejection of the Jews from the high privileges they had long boasted of as peculiarly theirs, does so with a most striking declaration of his hearty affection for the house of Israel. Bowing, as he did most humbly, before the manifested will of God, he was grieved to the heart for the misery of his kinsmen according to the flesh. For the day had been, when, in all the pride and hardness of his heart, he had wished himself eternally separated from Christ, even as they now did; but he had seen the enormous guilt of his wish, because he now knew the blessedness of being one with Christ, and on this ground had great heaviness and continual sorrow of heart, that Israel, so long distinguished as God's covenant people, the depositories of his truth, and, above all, the nation from whom the Messiah sprang, should be by unbelief cut off from all their privileges.*

* Such appears to be the import of the words, 'for I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ;' a clause which might justly have been rendered, 'for I was wont to wish myself accursed from Christ;' in other words, 'after the manner of the Jews, my countrymen, I was wont to detest the Saviour.'

Ver. 6—13. In order to establish the point, that in conferring spiritual privileges God is sovereign, and acts as such, Paul here refers to the case of Abraham's family. Abraham was indeed chosen; but chosen though he was, all his posterity were not included in the covenant of blessing, for Ishmael's family was excluded; nay, even of Isaac's posterity, of his who was the chosen one of Abraham's sons, Esau was rejected, and that before birth, before the natural character of this profane one had displayed itself. In short, from the Lord's dealings with the posterity of Abraham, it is clear that God acts as a Sovereign, and is to be acknowledged as such.

Ver. 14—18. The question then occurs, 'Is God righteous in acting thus?' To this question the apostle returns an unqualified answer in the strongest possible mode of affirmation, and refers to the Old Testament declarations of Moses regarding Pharaoh as positive proof. In short, in answer to all cavils against the doctrine that God is sovereign, he points simply to God's own sovereign declarations, and leaves the matter there. If a man is not satisfied with this resolution of any difficulty he may feel in admitting the solemn truth in question, no explanation on which we might venture, could remove his scruples.

Ver. 19—29. But some might be inclined to pursue the objection farther, and roll the burden of sin's guilt from off the sinner on the sovereign God. To this blasphemous impiety the messenger of Jehovah returns no answer, but a solemn arraignment for audacious hardihood in venturing upon it; and sums up his argument with God's own example of the potter, who is sovereign over the clay in his hand, and can form it as it pleases him, or leave it shapeless and unformed. Even as the potter deals with the clay, so had the Lord dealt with Jews and Gentiles, calling from both his spiritual family, and fitting each of his children to be a vessel prepared unto glory, while, as Sovereign, he had passed by the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, and manifested much long-suffering in sparing them so long; all which sovereign acts the scripture most clearly established, both in speaking of the calling of the Gentiles, and the election of a peculiar people, even out of the elect nation of Israel. And all this shows, that God's word has not failed. The covenant promise, while it had in view all Abraham's spiritual seed, did not embrace all his natural posterity. Therefore the adoption of the Gentiles was not only an instance of sovereign grace, but covenant faithfulness.

Ver. 30—33. And the conclusion of the whole matter plainly is, that the Gentiles, led of sovereign grace, have adopted God's method of justification, and attained to it; but the Jews, hardened in their pride, have spurned this method, and perished in unrighteousness.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Abused privileges issue in the deeper condemnation the loftier they are, and the longer enjoyed. Truly we Gentiles have need to lay this to heart. With Israel's condition before us as a warning, we may surely expect that, in the day when God visits our abuse of privileges, he will visit us indeed. No pride, no enmity, on the part of man can wrench the sovereignty from Jehovah's hand. Let us bow before it while as yet it is the sovereignty of grace, and rejoice that the words of Hosea are verified in our land, once alienated from God, but now become a land near to him, and inhabited by his children. God forbid that we should be as the Jews, and turn, like them, the Rock of salvation into a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. Many have stumbled at the doctrine of God's sovereignty; but we need not, nay, we never will, so long as we view it as the sovereignty of grace, and the sovereignty of righteousness.

PRAYER.

O thou most blessed Jehovah, we, thy rebellious creatures, would come into thy presence, but only on the ground of thy gracious invitation, and in the way of thine own appointment. We would humbly and gratefully confess, that our every privilege and blessing comes from thee, and is the gift of thy sovereign and unmerited grace, and that the continuance of them depends on thy sovereign will. O Lord, we humbly beseech thee grant us grace to improve our privileges and to prize our blessings, and forbid that we should come into condemnation for abusing them. In all lowliness of mind, help us to watch unto prayer; and regarding thy sovereign favours as beyond all price, and as the gifts of thy love in the blood of thy dear Son, may we stir up our whole hearts to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called, that thy love may be magnified, and thy grace glorified in us. Lord, thou art God alone; on thy word our life hangs; on thy word is suspended our eternal state. O thou that bearest long with the vessels of wrath, and hast with much long-suffering borne with us, grant still a continuance of thy sparing mercy; and do thou, who canst out of vessels of wrath raise up vessels of mercy, turn us from being children of wrath to be thy children, even children of the living God. O wash us thoroughly from all our sins, and justify us freely by thy grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. We glorify thee that this, the land of our birth, so long a land of darkness, has become a land of light; and that in this place, where it was said, Ye are not my people, thou beholdest now the dear children of thine own family. O Lord, thou hast brought this to pass in sovereign grace. Continue thy goodness, multiply the number of thy chosen in this land, until the people be all righteous, and visit in sovereign mercy the whole earth, and especially the seed of Abraham, that they may yet again rejoice as thy covenant people. Revive thy work, we most humbly beseech thee, in the midst of the years.

Pour down thy quickening Spirit upon us, and our hearts shall be filled with thy love—our lips shall be opened to show forth thy praises, and from us shall sound abroad thy word unto those that sit in darkness. Into thy hands we commend our souls, and the souls of all our kindred and friends. Be gracious to us, and bless us; and all we ask is in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CIII. 13—17.

SCRIPTURE—JOB XIV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Experience, as well as revelation, prove that man is of few days and full of trouble. All his glory and strength are laid prostrate by the stroke of death, as the flower of the field by the sweep of the mower's scythe; or like the projected shadow of some lofty tower formed with the rising sun, which ever moves onward till the decline of day, and is then lost in the darkness of night; so fleeting is the life of man, so constant and progressive is his journey to the dark chambers of the grave. Fleeting and frail as is human life, the cause of all is sin, 'for the wages of sin is death.'

In the fourth verse we have a clear and decisive testimony to the doctrine of original sin. 'Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?' Not one. If the parents are sinful, so are the children; or if the heart be polluted, the conduct cannot be unblemished. The plea of the patriarch seems to be, that God would deal with him not according to his demerit, but in promised mercy. The weary and toil-worn hireling did not more anxiously watch for the setting of the sun, which released him from the labours of the day, than did Job for the appointed hour of his dissolution as a season of repose.

The root of an aged tree, when its stock is cut down, if placed in a moist and favourable soil, will send forth green and luxuriant branches; but man revisits earth no more. As the waters of the river run toward the sea, and are there blended and mingled with the waters of the ocean; so the mouldering ashes of the human body are comingled with the dust of the earth. Yet they are not lost, they only sleep, and when the heavens shall have passed away, they shall awake at the sound of the trump of God.

The prayer of the thirteenth verse seems to be either for death or a respite from his present sufferings. Ver. 14. The Spirit of God then started the cheering and comforting inquiry, 'If a man die, shall he live again?' A joyful and glorious view of future happiness seems now to have been presented to the mind of Job; his patience is strengthened; he hears as it were the Redeemer's call, 'Come up hither;' he answers, 'Behold, I come quickly;' he feels assured of the welcome of mercy, and he contemplates Christ joining in him as his workmanship, created in him good works, and regarding him as a trophy of the avail of his soul.

Alas! how changeable are the frames and feelings of the children of God! Like the light of the moon, they are subject to many waxings and wanings, and lose it, even in its brightest effulgence, subject to temporary and total eclipses. Such seems to have been the dark and despondent clouds which now, like a horror of thick darkness, brooded over the patriarch's soul.

Ver. 16. God appears to him in rigorous severity, numbering every faulty movement, and watching every sin, laying up his transgressions in store, as a miser would seal and sew up his dearly prized treasure in a bag. Then overwhelmed with the view of the greatness and power of God, he considers the hope of man as gone,—gone, by the Almighty arm, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, like the instantaneous crumbling of the mountain, or crashing of the rock when torn by the irresistible violence of the earthquake's eruption; or gone, by gradual and imperceptible degrees, like the rippling wave rounding the pebble upon the sea beach; or the rain of heaven carrying down the seed and soil from the mountain heights to the vales below. Such are the changes that assail both the prosperous and powerful. In the hour of death, when the glassy eyeballs and pallid face proclaim the approach of the last struggle, when the body is racked with pain, and the guilty soul filled with sorrowing, then what avails the world to the dying sufferer? he is then alike heedless of the prosperity or adversity of his family.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The shortness and uncertainty of life, if duly impressed upon the mind, should make us watch and pray, as we know not the day nor the hour when the Son of man cometh; and the troubles we daily and hourly meet with here should let us see that this is not our rest, and, when sanctified, they will make us long for the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour, from whose presence sorrow and sighing shall for ever fly away. Although some have thought the views of the patriarchs, respecting the resurrection, seemed to have been cloudy, yet we have reason to bless God that life and immortality are now brought to light through the gospel. We know that the hour is coming when they who are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of eternal life, and they who have done evil to the resurrection of eternal condemnation. Let us, therefore, gird up the loins of our mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought to us at the revelation of Jesus Christ, as obedient children, not fashioning ourselves according to the former lusts in our ignorance. But as he who hath called us is holy, so let us be holy in all manner of conversation. For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, the flower falleth away, but the word of the Lord endureth for ever.

PRAYER.

Thou everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, who faintest not, neither art weary, we would approach thee in the name of Jesus. We feel assured that there is an infinite distance between us fallen and depraved sinners, and thee the God of all perfection. Thou art the Almighty; we but worms of the dust. Thou art the King eternal; we creatures but of yesterday. Conscious of our unworthiness we draw near, trembling in our approach to thee. By nature sinners, conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity, how shall we stand before thee? guilty of transgressions more numerous than the hairs upon our heads, how can we bear the piercing glance of thine eye, which searcheth the hearts and trieth the reins of the children of men? God be merciful to us, sinners. O thou who art exalted a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance and remission of sins, compassionate our low and lost estate, wash us in the fountain of thy cleansing blood, and take away all our sin. Create a clean heart, O Lord, and renew a right spirit within us. Make us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Give us that wisdom that cometh down from above, that is pure and peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. Strengthen our hearts to resist temptation, and enable us in all things to seek thy glory. Turn our eyes away from beholding vanity, and incline our heart unto thy testimonies. As the days of our pilgrimage are both few and evil, do thou give us grace to redeem the time. Help us, O Lord, to run the race set before us, laying aside every weight, and the sin which doth most easily beset us. Sanctify our thoughts. Let our speech this day be seasoned with salt, that it may minister grace to those who hear it; and whatsoever we do in word or deed, do thou enable us to do all to thy glory. Knowing the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, may that day never come upon us unawares. May we study to die daily, so that when Jesus Christ shall say, Behold, I come quickly, our hearts may be able to say, Even so come, Lord Jesus. And now, Lord, what wait we for, truly our hope is in thee. May the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make us perfect in every good work to do his will, working in us that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 15.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS X.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—5. Although the apostle had shown that his countrymen, the Jews, had stumbled at God's method of salvation, and had missed that blessing because they obstinately clung to their own ways, and rejected his, yet he could by no means glory over their fall, or regard it unmoved. As he had continual heaviness and great sorrow of heart because they abode still in unbelief, so his daily earnest prayer in their behalf was, that they might be saved from that state of wrath and misery. And this prayer he persevered in all the more earnestly, because he was persuaded that they were zealously sincere, though grossly deceived; labouring as they did to secure a personal righteousness of their own, while they abhorred the offered righteousness of God. The end of the law was indeed righteousness to all who perfectly and closely obeyed it; but this end no one could attain because of his sinfulness. It was, then, extreme folly to seek righteousness by a struggle after what no man could attain to. Besides, this end of the law was attained in Christ by all who believed, who had the righteousness of Christ's finished work imputed to them. Nay, the law itself showed this, by shutting up all, without respect of persons, to God's method of justification by him.

Ver. 6—10. And in order to show the difference between the method of self-righteousness adopted by the Jews, and the method of justification revealed in the gospel, and embraced by believers, he contrasts the one with the other; that is, the righteousness which is by the law, with the righteousness which is by faith in Jesus Christ. The former involves complete sinless conformity to the every demand of God's law. It is only by doing the things demanded that we can live. The latter requires simply a hearty acknowledgment that Jesus is the Christ, the accepted Saviour of God's appointment, and a hearty reliance on him as sufficient for the believer's wants. And this method is so simple, as to be within every one's reach. None who needed salvation could have the slightest difficulty but what they raised themselves, since God had freely revealed this method to all, and in the offer of the gospel, invited all to accept of it. But poor sinners do raise difficulties, and, in doing so, make it manifest that the Spirit must make them willing in the day of God's power.

Ver. 11—21. That this way of justification is now open to all, scripture explicitly declares. 'Who-soever believeth shall not be ashamed.' In the sight of God all are guilty, all equally in need of a Saviour. And in graciously proffering a Saviour to them he makes no distinction, but receives all who accept his gift, be they wise or unwise, barbarian, Scythian, bond, or free. He seeks not this man or that man, but the salvation of souls; and as the proffer of salvation is unlimited, so the method of its attainment is simple and unfettered. No conditions are demanded beyond the sinner's power to attain, no price beyond his resources to procure; all is free, without money and without price, for whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved. Hence arises the necessity of gospel preaching and missionary effort. If no one can be saved but by calling upon God and embracing the offered Saviour, it rests with us, as a duty from which we cannot escape, to offer Christ to all, and invite all to believe. But if salvation be thus free, and freely offered, why was it that the Jews remained in unbelief? Was it that they had never heard of the Saviour? No. Not only had they shared in the universal gospel call, and been invited to believe, but both their law and their prophets in effect had called them to faith. First Moses predicts the translation of gospel privileges from them to the Gentiles, and then Isaiah predicts the calling of the Gentiles, and that openly, without reserve; so that, taking the words of the law and prophets, and the opportunities the Jews had enjoyed, they had been privileged with an invitation to believe far above others; and their unbelief arose not from ignorance, but from rebellious obstinacy, a cause for which there was no excuse, and an evil for which there was no remedy but that of submission, which they could not brook, and so they must perish in their sins. But if Israel fell by unbelief, well may we tremble for ourselves.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O thou most blessed God, as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we are permitted to draw near unto thee. Blessed be thy name, that though every mouth is stopped, and we are brought in guilty before thee, we may yet look up to thee for pardon and forgiveness through the precious blood of the atoning Redeemer. We glorify thy name that his salvation is offered without money and without price, and offered to all without respect of persons. We glorify thee that it meets our every want, and provides grace to quicken us to seek its blessings. We bless thee, that the blessing of salvation is brought so near to us, and so pressed upon our acceptance. We thank thee, that we have not to labour to bring Christ from glory to die for us, or up from the grave to plead in our behalf. We glorify thee, that he hath died for our offences, and risen again for our justification. O Lord, work in us all the good pleasure of thy goodness, and thy work of faith with power. Help us as needy, perishing, and condemned, to embrace the Lord Jesus Christ; to confess with the mouth, and believe from the heart, that thou hast raised him from the dead that we may be saved. And do thou arise in thy mighty power to spread the glory of the name of Jesus till his gospel sound through all the earth, and his gracious invitations to the end of the world. Raise up, and send forth, many labourers—men wisely zealous for thy use, and true lovers of the souls of men; crown their work of faith with abundant success, and give them souls for their hire. And remember, we beseech thee, the seed of Abraham. Our hearts' desire and prayer to thee is, that Israel may be saved. O take away the vail that is upon their hearts when Moses is preached to them. Bring them speedily again under the bonds of the covenant. And, O Lord, prevent us by thy grace from falling under the same obstinate unbelief. Help us more and more to prize and to improve our privileges. Pardon all our past neglect and indifference, our manifold shortcomings, our unnumbered transgressions; and receive us graciously, and sanctify us fully, to bear the image of Christ. For his sake visit us with thy constant mercy. Keep us this night in thy holy care and keeping. Preserve us to thy heavenly kingdom, and do us all the good we need, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

THIRTY-FIRST WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 42.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM LXXXIX. 28—52.

REMARKS.

Having expressed his feelings, the psalmist resumes consideration of that covenant to which he had before alluded; 'then,' or as the word may, with greater force, be translated, 'of old thou spakest in vision to thy Holy One,' (see 2 Sam. iii. 4—17.) and a second time, does he introduce God declaring in person, (ver. 19—37.) the 'exceeding great and precious promises' of this covenant; and intimating, that however harsh his dealings appeared, his loving-kindness towards David's seed should be unchangeable and everlasting.

Again he seems to pause, not, however, as before, to break forth into praise, but to pour out the sorrow of his heart, (ver. 38—45.) Where are the promises of the covenant now? The strongholds of Judah are in ruins, the glory of David's house has departed, the crown is torn from the head of his descendants, and their enemies rejoice.

Still he pleads the very promises which seem so entirely forgotten; and how striking the effect produced upon his own mind, by thus disburdening it before the Hearer of prayer! His doubts are all dispelled, his misgivings removed; and even as he commenced, so does he conclude with the praise of God upon his lips, 'Blessed be the Lord for evermore. Amen, and Amen.'

But though the psalm thus primarily alludes to the circumstances of David's house, it evidently looks farther, even to him of whom David was a type, and to that covenant 'ordered in all things and sure,' shadowed forth in the dealings of God with the man after his own heart. Some of the many lessons which this view of it suggests we may notice.

1. We learn from it that all the attributes of God are pledged to the salvation of his people. How unspeakable the condescension manifested in this! That worms of the dust such as they, should, even in the depths of eternity, have engaged the attention of the Almighty, and their deliverance been the subject of covenant between the Father and the Son. 'My sheep,' said our Lord, 'shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father which gave them me is stronger than all.' Their help has been laid upon one that is mighty—omnipotence itself has guaranteed their safety.

2. We learn farther, that though thus assured of salvation, the children of God must expect to undergo much that is trying and severe. To continue steadfastly on the narrow path on which they have to walk, requires the most unremitting watchfulness, and untiring perseverance. To keep them alive to this, to quicken them in their progress, to recall them from their wanderings, to convince them that the way of man is not in himself, their transgression must be visited with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes; 'their own wickedness shall correct them, and their backslidings reprove them.' Their sins become, and that in mercy, the instrument of their punishment.

Let us ask ourselves whether we have any part in the privileges which the psalm details, and are partakers of the blessedness of that 'people who know the joyful sound.' We should remember that it will only tend to our greater condemnation, if we hear this sound, conveying as it does 'good tidings of great joy,' and close our hearts against it. And if 'the Lord be our defence,' &c. then should we strive to walk worthy of the Master we profess to serve. When visited by affliction, let us endeavour to regard it as the discipline by which our heavenly Father prepares us for that abode where there shall be no sorrow, because no sin; and in the end as we look back upon all that has befallen us, shall we have reason to say, 'Blessed be the Lord for evermore. Amen and Amen.'

PRAYER.

Almighty God, we pray thee to lift upon us, on this the morning of thine own day, the light of thy countenance, and to visit us with that blessing which alone maketh rich. In all the duties which lie before us, vouchsafe to us that preparation of the heart without which no service performed by us can be acceptable to thee, or profitable to ourselves. Convince us of the value of the privileges enjoyed by us; humble us under a sense of how little we have appreciated them as we should; and enable us to bear in mind, that unless they be the savour of life, they must inevitably become the savour of death to our souls. Unworthy we are, O Lord, that such honour should be ours, thus to be permitted to hold converse with thee. O Lord God of hosts, who is a strong Lord like unto thee, whose are the heavens and the earth, the world and all its fulness. Thou hast a mighty arm; strong is thy hand, and high thy right hand. But blessed be thy name, that to us thou art revealed as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and as made known in him, we see that while justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne, mercy and truth go before thy face. O may it be our happiness to become possessed of right and spiritual perception of thy character as thus announced; to feel the power of those glad tidings of great joy, God in Christ, laying our help upon One that is mighty, and beseeching us to be reconciled. May the enmity of our hearts be slain, and the constraining influence of thy love make us dedicate ourselves entirely to thee. May every thought be brought under subjection to thine authority, that it may become our meat and drink to do thy will; and whatever be thy dealings towards us, enable us of this to be confident, that all things are made to work for good to those that love thee. In prosperity and adversity alike teach us to place ourselves implicitly at thy disposal. May the Lord be our defence, the holy One of Israel our king. We pray of thee, O God, to go forth this day with the preaching of the gospel, and to hasten the period when its joyful sound shall be heard over the length and breadth of the world. Accept of our thanks for thy care over us during the night; keep us, and all whom we should bear upon our hearts before a throne of grace, during this day; and accept of us in the name of Christ. Amen.

PRAISE—PSALM CIII. 13.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM XC.

REMARKS.

This psalm, which is described as a prayer of Moses, is supposed to have been written on that memorable occasion when the people of Israel, in consequence of the report of the promised land carried back by the spies, rebelled against their leader, exclaiming, 'would God we had died in Egypt!' (Num. xiv.) The result is familiar to every reader of the bible. In punishment for their faithlessness and discontent, they were condemned for forty years to wander in a desert, which, in other circumstances, they might have traversed in a very short time. A sentence of exclusion from the inheritance to which they had so long looked forward, but of which they had proved themselves so unworthy, passed upon that generation, who, two individuals only excepted, perished in the wilderness.

The psalm commences with a reference to the care and providence of God over his people, suggested by their peculiar situation at the time. Moving from place to place without any fixed habitation, tents had been their only abode. But wherever they had been, God had proved himself their refuge and their safety, the seat of all their comforts, the centre of all their joys. Afraid, lest by their transgression they had forfeited this privilege, Moses acknowledges their guilt, and pleads for their restoration to favour. In his distress, prayer is his resort, and he finds in it his only solace.

We, too, in a figurative sense, may be said to be on our journey through a wilderness, without any continuing city or place of abode. What object so frail and fleeting to which our case may not be compared! The flower that blooms and fades, the shadow that passes away and leaves no trace behind, the insect that flutters out its little space in the sun-beam, the torrent which, rushing without warning, sweeps every thing before its impetuous flood, the sleep from which we awake to look back upon the time passed in it as nothing, the grass which, flourishing vigorously in the morning, lies withered and dry before the close of evening; all these are emblems, and none of them exaggerated, of the shortness of life, and the uncertainty of the tenure by which we hold every thing earthly. If we look back upon a single year, how many the breaches within the circle of our acquaintance that meet our view! Their seats in the house of God and in the family circle, are either empty or occupied by others; and to the world by whom they were honoured or despised, they are become as if they had never been. 'Truly we spend our years as a tale that is told.'

And how is it that man, the most favoured of all the creatures of God, should have thus no abiding place upon the earth specially prepared for his use? The answer to this is supplied by the psalm, 'we are consumed by thine anger.' Here is all the source of all the misery, the sorrow, and death, which now constitute the portion of our race. Our iniquities have separated between us and God.

What then are we to do? Are we to fold our hands and sit down in despair, pining over our sad condition? Is our case so hopeless that no means can avail to restore us to the holiness and happiness in which our first parents were formed? Blessed be God such is not the case. Let us imitate the example given us by Moses in this psalm; acknowledging our guilt and helplessness, let us cast ourselves upon God as our Father in Christ. Let us seek to become acquainted with his character as revealed in the gospel; thus shall we go up through the wilderness assured that God is our 'dwelling-place.' And we shall find in him an abode beyond the reach of change, whose security no enemy can disturb, whose peace no envy can poison, whose comfort no adversity can invade, because 'from everlasting to everlasting he is God.'

PRAYER.

Thou, only, O Lord, art from everlasting to everlasting, amid the changes to which every thing earthly lies exposed. Thou only art

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIV. 15.

SCRIPTURE—JOB XVIII.

REMARKS.

Not the least trying portion of the discipline undergone by the patriarch Job, was the treatment he received at the hands of his three friends. They had come when they heard of his affliction, professedly to comfort him: a purpose, the sincerity of which we have no reason to doubt; although the manner in which they discharged the duty, made it the very reverse of consolation. 'Miserable comforters are ye all,' Job might well say regarding them. And it is evident, 'howbeit they meant it not,' that for the time they were suffered to be instruments in the hands of satan, whose object they furthered by their unjust suspicious and bitter reproaches.

In the preceding chapter Job had been reiterating sentiments, to which he had often before given utterance, regarding the prosperity of the wicked, and sorrows of the righteous. The former he saw successful and flourishing, whilst the latter were permitted to pine away without sympathy or regard. Astonished and almost overwhelmed by this fact, more particularly as it was illustrated in his own case, but without impugning a providence whose ways he cannot comprehend, he would willingly seek in the grave that rest which is here apparently beyond his reach.

Bildad, who appears to have been the harshest and most uncompromising of the friends, replies in this chapter to Job's complaints, in a manner very little calculated to soothe the wounded spirit of the afflicted patriarch. He attempts to show that wickedness never failed, even in this life, to entail punishment on all who practised it; a statement which more than implied that the sufferings of Job proved him a hypocrite, richly deserving all he had undergone.

Now in reading this book, we should remember that many of the sentiments of the speakers in the earlier part of it, are founded on the most manifest ignorance of the principles on which God conducts the moral government of the universe. God himself at last takes up the subject, and vindicates his character from the injurious influence of the mistakes thus given forth concerning him.

It is evident, then, that Bildad labours here under a most erroneous impression. Although it be often the case that 'our sins find us out,' and that 'our wickedness corrects us, and backslidings reprove us,' still it by no means holds as an universal rule, that God, in this world, uniformly shows his abhorrence of wickedness by some open marks of anger. To attribute every visitation of providence to some act of iniquity on the part of those who are the subjects of such, would be to forget altogether the nature of the dispensation under which we live. It shall not be until the day when the Lord 'makes up his jewels,' that it shall be discerned 'between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not.' On this subject our Lord teaches a most important lesson, when (see Luke without variableness or shadow of turning; God ever all, blessed for ever. We thank and praise thy name, for the mighty privilege we enjoy of holding converse with thee; that we can look up to thee as the hearer and answerer of prayer, and know thou never hast, and never shalt say to any one, Seek my face in vain. But, O Lord, we confess with sorrow and shame, that too frequently we have little care to participate in the comfort which communion with thee is so qualified to afford us; our souls cleave to the dust; the world and its affairs are ever apt to engross our affections to the exclusion of any thoughts of thee. Poor and paltry as are the things which are seen, in comparison with those that are unseen, yet are the former the objects of our constant regard, whilst the latter too frequently have no place in our thoughts at all. O God, have mercy upon us. Pour out upon us thine ever life-giving Spirit, to awaken us from our lethargy, to enable us to feel the power of the truth, that we may break asunder those chains by which we are kept in bondage, and become partakers of that liberty wherewith thou dost make thy people free. Impress upon us the uncertainty of the tenure by which we hold every thing earthly. Teach us so to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Convince us that here we have no continuing city nor place of abode; that we know not how soon the time may come when we shall be summoned to render an account before the judgment-seat of Christ. O then that we were begotten again to a lively hope through the resurrection of Christ from the dead; that our life, being hid with Christ in God, we were enabled to have our affections set upon things above, and to look forward to our Lord's second coming, not with error, but with joy. Lord, satisfy us with thy mercy; let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us, and establish all the works of our hands. Follow, O God, with thy blessing, the various services in which thy people were this day engaged. May thy word have been as the rain and snow which come down from heaven, and watering the earth, make it bring forth and bud. Have mercy, we pray of thee, on all who despise thine ordinances; and keep us mindful that if our privileges are great, so also is our responsibility. We commend to thy care all who are near and dear to us. May they and we be one in him, in whom the whole family, both in heaven and earth, is named. Keep us during the silent watches of the night. We lay ourselves down, believing that thou wilt sustain us. And all we ask is in the name of Christ. Amen.

xiii.) immediately after asking 'those eighteen on whom the tower in Siloam fell and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? he adds, 'I tell you, nay; but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Thus showing that the duty of each is to look to his own salvation, and to repress that curiosity which would pry into the condition of others.

With this caution on our minds, we may see in Bildad's address much that is deserving of solemn consideration. He draws a most masterly and awakening picture of the agony of the wicked, when conscience, aroused from her long sleep, haunts him with the prospect of coming vengeance. Every thing earthly is slipping from his hold, and he can see no resting-place in that dark unknown, now opening before him! Who would not wish to escape such agony as this! If such be our wish, let us lose no time in considering the things that belong to our peace, before the hour comes when we shall mourn, but unavailingly, over our fatuity.

PRAYER.

Thou, O God, art of unspotted purity; thou sittest upon the throne of thy holiness; thou dwellest in the high and holy place, and all thy commands are just, and holy, and true. In approaching thee, how does it become such guilty and polluted creatures as we are, to acknowledge our unworthiness even to take thy name, thy most holy name, into our lips. Lord, we would be prostrate in the dust before thee; we would seek, from our hearts, to be enabled to say, God be merciful to us sinners. Our eyes are upon that hill from whence alone can come our aid. Our hope is in him whom thou hearest always; and because he hath made an end of sin, and brought in an everlasting righteousness, and now ever lives our Advocate with thee the Father, we pray thee, receive us graciously, to subdue all our iniquities, and cast all our transgressions into the depths of the sea. We bless thee for Christ Jesus, thine unspeakable gift. O that our hearts felt the constraining influence of the love manifested in sending him to seek and to save; that we were taught we are not our own, but bound to glorify thee in our souls and bodies, which are entirely thine. And, heavenly Father, we pray that wherever we are, or in whatever avocation engaged, we may remember that from thee all we have comes down; that thou art the source of every blessing we enjoy, and hope we are permitted to indulge. Save us, therefore, from losing sight of the Creator in the creature; deliver us from the tendency so strong within us, to forsake the fountain of living waters, and hew out to ourselves broken cisterns that can hold no water. Follow, with thy blessing, that portion of thy word now read. Teach us that whether in sorrow or joy, sickness or health, it is the peace of God alone can keep our hearts and minds. May this peace be ours. We thank thee for the circumstances of comfort and peace, in which we are this morning permitted to approach thee. Do thou, O Lord, be our protector throughout the day. We commend to thy care, the sick and the afflicted. Sanctify bereavements to the bereaved, and prepare us for every duty and trial that may be before us. And hear our prayers for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXX. 14.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS XI.

REMARKS.

Two very important lessons are taught us in this chapter: the first, the exceeding evil of sin; the second, the exceeding riches of the grace of God.

The first is illustrated by reference to the history of Israel. Singled out by God as his peculiar people, he had distinguished them by the most striking marks of his favour, taking up his abode specially among them, and vouchsafing them repeated tokens of his presence, to bless, to support, and protect them; and it was not until they had rebelled again and again against his authority, that 'he gave them up to their own hearts' lusts, to be filled with their own devices.' Such is his abhorrence of sin, that even in his own favourite Israel it could not be tolerated; and when, therefore, chastisement failed to reclaim, the measure of their iniquities was filled up, as was also the measure of the Lord's forbearance. But at the very time God was thus vindicating his own authority, he gave most evident proof of the exceeding riches of his goodness and grace. While Israel was cast off as a nation, many of her number became partakers of privileges more glorious by far than those enjoyed by her kings and wise men in the days of her greatness. Just as during the withering blight which seemed to have come over the whole people during the reign of Ahab, there were seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal, so now was there a remnant of Israel, which proved itself to be the true 'circumcision who worship God in the Spirit.' Of this number was the apostle himself, and all who had obtained like precious faith with him.

But more than this. What Israel had refused to receive, had met with the joyful acceptance of the Gentiles, so that among those, who, but a short time previously, had been carried away by all the delusions of heathenism, there was now a 'chosen generation,' showing forth the praises of him that had called them out of darkness into his marvellous light. What an exhibition was there in this of the wondrous grace of God; out of evil, thus to educe so much good!

And there is yet in store, a more marvellous illustration than either of the preceding, of the goodness of the Lord. It is distinctly announced by the apostle, that the period is to arrive when Israel shall be restored to her privileges, and become, as it were, the first born in that mighty family, gathered out of every kindred, and people, and tongue. We know not how this mighty change shall be accomplished; but this we are sure of, there is 'nothing too hard for the Lord.' And should we not labour and pray for the coming of a day of such deep interest to the world at large, as well as to the Jews, when the blessing bestowed upon them shall make them a blessing wherever their lot is cast.

Why was Israel cast off? because of unbelief. And such is the case with sinners in every age; 'ye will not come to me that ye may have life:' here is our guilt, the ground of our righteous condemnation.

When, then, we look back upon God's dealings in bygone times, let us remember they have been recorded for our learning. We have been grafted into that tree planted by the Lord, from which his ancient people, the natural branches, were broken off, and just as they suffered so shall we, unless we avoid the rocks on which they were shipwrecked.

But one lesson, particularly the history of the past, is qualified to teach us; that is, how very small a portion of the purposes of God we can comprehend. Truly, to us, his way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters; but still we can rejoice in believing, that whilst 'clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.'

PRAYER.

How unsearchable, O God, are thy judgments, how past finding out are thy ways to us! Thou sittest upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers in thy sight; thou rulest in heaven, and dost as seems to thee right among the children of men, and who can say to thee with a prevailing voice, What, or wherefore, doest thou? Enable us, O Lord, to contemplate all thy ways and works in that spirit of simplicity and docility which should characterize worms of the dust such as we are. Blessed be thy name, that to that man wilt thou look who is of an humble and contrite spirit, and trembleth at thy word. Give us, we pray, this frame of mind. Mould our hearts into conformity to thy will. Although thy way often appears to us in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, enable us ever to remember that he who spared not his own Son, will, with him also, freely give us all things; so that not one good thing shall fail of all thou hast said concerning thy people. We thank thee for the grace and the goodness of which we are partakers. What are we, O Lord, or our father's house, to have been thus visited and redeemed by thee. O teach us, that by thy grace we are what we are; and from our hearts may we say, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name be glory, for thy mercy and for thy truth's sake. Enable us to take warning from thy dealings of old, recorded for our learning. Lord, increase our faith, help our unbelief, strengthen the things that remain, revive thy work in us and around us. And, O God, we pray of thee to hasten that period when the whole earth shall be filled with thy glory; when the blindness shall be taken away from Israel, and the fullness of the Gentiles be gathered in; prosper the means employed for the furtherance of this mighty end; teach us what a privilege it is to be fellow-workers with thee. Convince us, above every thing else, that except the Lord build the house, we labour in vain; that unless he keep the city, we watch in vain. O then may thy blessing be abundantly poured forth, and thy Spirit come from the four winds, to quicken the dead, and strengthen the living more and more. May the joy of the Lord be our strength. Lord, watch over us during our goings out and comings in this day. Be the friend of our friends. Reward our benefactors, and forgive our enemies; and all we ask, is in the name of Christ, to whom, with thee and the blessed Spirit, be glory for ever. Amen.

PRaise—PSALM XXXIV. 17.

SCRIPTURE—JOB XXI.

REMARKS.

In the foregoing chapter, Zophar the Naamathite, reasoning from a partial and inaccurate view of God's dealings, maintains the doctrine that to each person in the present life there is a perfect retribution; and insinuates that, therefore, Job was a man of great wickedness, because he was a man of many afflictions. In this chapter Job replies. He refutes the doctrine and repels the accusation. The point to be made good, is, that there is not in every individual's case, in the present life, a perfect retribution. The direct proof adduced in support of this, extends from the 7th to the 17th verse. In this passage, there is sketched, with a skilful hand, a picture of the prosperous wicked. Though sinful, yet their life is prolonged; though unthankful, yet their substance is increased; though profane, yet their days are brightened with joy; and, though atheistic, yet they have no bands in their death. They act as if they were independent, while they owe every thing to God; 'lo! their good is not in their (own) hand.' Here is a marvel—here is a riddle. But it is not to be explained by supposing that God approves sin, and uniformly favours the sinner. No: for we behold him varying his procedure. The wicked are often prosperous, but they are also often wretched. They drink of the wrath of the Almighty. Job disclaims any intention of being the apologist of these men. 'The counsel of the wicked,' says he, 'is far from me.' He does not allege that they obtain the approval, because they enjoy the bounties of the Most High. He pretends not to solve the difficulty on any other principle than that God is sovereign. This is intimated in the 22d verse, which forms the key to the whole question—the pivot on which the whole argument revolves. Who shall fathom his counsels? who shall prescribe to him a rule? His intentions towards sinners are not always clearly shown in the fortune of their life, or in the manner of their death. One dieth at ease and in apparent comfort: another dieth in the bitterness of his soul. Their common lot is the grave and the worm. From the 27th verse, Job gives the course of the argument a particular direction, using it in defence of himself from the charges of his friends. 'Ye ask,' says he, 'where is the house of the prince?' as if the ruin of my family was a judgment for my wickedness: ought ye not to have learned from them that go by the gate—from them who have travelled and seen much of human life, that it is not always in this world the Most High displays the perfection of his justice; that there is a judgment to come; and for this day the wicked are reserved—to them a day of destruction. Then, God will be just when he judgeth, and clear when he condemns. Having reached this triumphant conclusion, Job demands of his condoling friends, how it is that they can expect him to be convinced or comforted by the views they propound, so narrow in their scope, and so unsound in their application.

Let us learn from this chapter the following amongst other things: namely, that prosperity is not always a mark of God's love, and adversity is not always a token of his displeasure: that we are not rashly to construe the calamities which befall others, to be the judgments of God for their iniquities; that although it does not always appear in every given case, yet the course of providence, upon the whole, is favourable to righteousness, and hostile to sin; that on the great day of account, and amidst the glory and the gloom of eternity, all the seeming inequalities of the divine administration will be rectified; and that it behoves us to prepare, by faith and obedience, to meet the Lord our judge.

PRAYER.

Almighty and everlasting God, we, as the subjects of thy government, draw near to thee as our king. We rejoice to behold thee as thou art revealed in the gospel, seated upon a throne of grace, and stretching forth the sceptre of thy mercy, that the perishing children of men may touch it, and for ever live. Sanctify, we beseech thee, our approach at this time. Unite our hearts to fear thy name. Graciously enable us to view our character in the light of thy law which is holy, and in contrast with thy nature, which is glorious and pure. While we ascribe all strength and majesty unto the Lord, may we feel and confess ourselves to be frail, helpless, and perishing. Out of the dust we have been taken, and soon shall we return unto the dust again. While we adore thee as the Holy One of Israel, may we discover ourselves to be altogether vile. Alas, we have nothing to hope for from thy justice. O how many are the tokens thou hast given, since the world began, that though hand join in hand, yet shall not the wicked go unpunished. O Lord our God, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day. Our iniquities have gone up, as our accusers, into the very heavens; and unless thy grace interpose, they will appear in the judgment to condemn us. O thou who hast declared thyself to be slow to anger, of great kindness, and plenteous in redemption, do thou, we implore thee, have compassion upon us. For the sake of Jesus Christ, the Lamb slain as an offering for sin, do thou be pleased to visit us with the grace of pardon and acceptance. Have mercy upon us, O God, according to thy loving-kindness; according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out all our transgressions. But we are sensible that in vain shall we look for the gift of pardon, unless we repent; in vain shall we hope for the glories of heaven, unless we turn from the vanities of earth; turn us, therefore, O Lord, and so we shall be turned. Pour out on us a spirit of repentance. Remove not only our guilt, but likewise our depravity. Remit not only our punishment, but restrain also our passions. Create in us a clean heart, renew a right spirit within us; and, though we are by nature degenerate plants, yet may we become as trees of righteousness planted by the rivers of waters, which bear fruits in their season—even the fruits of a holy, humble, and useful life; that so we may please him who hath called us to glory and virtue. We entreat thee, O gracious Father, that thou mayest be a sun to enlighten us during the day we have begun, as thou hast been a shield to defend us during the night that is past. Do thou direct our steps. May we be found setting our heart on no object, and our hand to no work, but what we know has thy holy approval. Many, O Lord, are our spiritual adversaries, let thy good Spirit instruct and help us, so that we may be wise to shun, or strong to resist, temptation. May the love of Christ constrain us to duty, and the example of Christ encourage in trouble. And while, by thy grace, our souls are kept from sin, defend, we beseech thee, our bodies also from danger—from all sudden malady—from all fatal accident. Under the shadow of thy wing may we continually abide.

Going forth in the morning to our several pursuits, attended by thy blessing, may we, in the evening, again be gathered together, crowned with thy loving-kindness, and having in us the answer of a good conscience, through Jesus Christ our friend and Mediator. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXV. 8. (Second Version.)

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS XII.

REMARKS.

This chapter, abounding with the purest precepts and the most earnest exhortations, rises as a beautiful result from the comprehensive argument, framed with so much skill and power, in the preceding part of the epistle. The love of God in Christ to his people, the means provided for their redemption, their calling, their sanctification, the high privileges of their adoption; these, and such as these, are the mercies, by which the holy apostle beseeches believers to make a solemn surrender of themselves to God. The truths of the gospel are no theoretic scheme, fair to the fancy, but powerless on the heart; ingenious in its structure, but destitute of practical use. Doctrine and practice are there joined together; and who shall put them asunder? The doctrine of the cross, in all its parts, is adduced, as the source, the reason, and the motive of every earthly virtue and every heavenly grace. From a principle of gratitude for the unmerited favours shown them, they are called to a willing and unreserved self-dedication; to present their bodies a living sacrifice. The language here employed has reference to the ancient ritual; according to which, animals were presented as free-will offerings on the altar of the Lord. The Christian's sacrifice of thanksgiving is to be a living one, to distinguish it from that of slain beasts; and to denote the energy and activity he is to display in God's service. It is to be holy, in resemblance of the offerings under the law, described as without blemish and without spot; and to intimate that the purest of our affections, the choicest of our talents, are to be devoted to him. Our bodies, our entire person and nature, are, in faith, to be thus consecrated to him who has bought them with a price, that they may be acceptable in the Beloved. And this is a service which is reasonably required at our hand. Now as the service of God and the service of the world in its interests and pleasures, are at variance with one another; as it is written ye cannot serve God and mammon, and what communion hath Christ with Belial? our first step is to separate ourselves from the world, not to be conformed to its fashions and its follies; and, next to have all our principles, tastes, and habits changed by the renewing of our mind, into agreement with the divine mind. Not that we can change or renew ourselves, but we are enjoined to use the means—to seek and cherish the influences, by which the Holy Spirit effects this important work. The word 'for,' beginning the 3d verse, shows that what follows is to be regarded as additional reasons to enforce what he has stated; and as intended to describe a mind, or a course of conduct, which is not conformed to the world, and which is acceptable to God. 'By the grace given unto me:' he here adduces the authority of his apostolical office, to give weight and solemnity to these exhortations. He warns them against pride and self-conceit; while, by allusion to the union of believers in one mystical body, of which Christ is the head, he sets forth, in their beautiful harmony and subordination, the offices and duties which it becomes them to fulfil in their several places and relations. The church of the living God is an institution, within which seemliness and order are ever to dwell. The gifts, therefore, which he imparts to its members, whether these be miraculous or ordinary, are all to be exercised in producing the end for which they were given; apart from all jarring or ostentation. He exhorts to liberality without corrupt motives, to mercy without grudging, to courtesy without deceit, to diligence in business without neglecting the devotional exercises of religion; and he crowns the whole with one of the loveliest precepts of the gospel; 'be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.'

Let it be our care to lay up these pointed and precious injunctions in our hearts, and to practise them in our lives.

PRAYER.

O Lord, most merciful and gracious, we come to thee as children unto a father. Blessed be thy name, thou hast been pleased to reveal thyself to us in this tender and endearing relation. For thou didst create us, thou hast preserved us, and thou hast also begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. O do thou enable us, in confidence and affection, to cry, Abba, Father. Worshipping one God, through one Mediator between God and man, may we come animated by one spirit—even the spirit of faith, of love, and of hope. Help us, we entreat thee, devoutly to feel, and reverently to express, what is due unto thy name. Honouring thee by our attitude and our lips, let not our hearts be far from thee. Who, O Lord, is worthy, like thee, to receive all honour, and blessing, and praise? Thy majesty is unspeakable, and thy mercies to us ward are more than can be numbered. Through thy sparing goodness, we have been upheld during another day of our pilgrimage; and the shadows of the evening again close around us in peace. Accept, we beseech thee, our united thanksgiving for thy powerful protection, and thy unwearied care, for the happiness we have enjoyed, and the evils we have escaped, for health of body and peace of mind, for the use of reason, and the prolonged offers of thy grace in Christ Jesus our Lord. For these and all thy other gifts, though we cannot render an adequate return, we would yet cherish a grateful remembrance. We are sensible indeed, O righteous Father, that, though thou hast nourished and brought us up, we have, nevertheless, proved rebellious children. Thy mercies do but aggravate our offences. Our experience testifies that thou hast dealt bountifully with us; but our conscience witnesseth that we have dealt treacherously towards thee. We bow in thy presence, convinced of sin. Spare us, we implore thee, the doom we have deserved. O let thy pardoning mercy which was not refused to the penitent publican, be imparted to our souls. Whatever thy pure eye has seen amiss in our conduct, during this day and all the days of our by-past life, whatever has been the nature or the colour of our offences, whatever the circumstances of their commission—whether our faults have been secret, or our sins presumptuous; O may the blood of Christ which cleanseth from all sin, be graciously applied for their removal and forgiveness. Lord, we believe, help thou our unbelief; so that being justified by faith we may have peace with God. And do thou so effectually work in us by the power of thy Holy Spirit, that our escape from the penalty of transgression, far from encouraging us to go on in sin that grace may abound, shall lead us, in lively gratitude, to live unto him who died for us, and to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service. No longer deluded by the vanities of the world, or by the influence of our spiritual adversaries, may we sit daily at the feet of Jesus, clothed and in our right mind; listening to his lessons, glorying in his cross, imbibing his Spirit, and waiting for his kingdom. Many, O Lord, our heavenly Father, are the stumbling-blocks and discouragements that meet us in our progress. In mercy unto our weakness, do thou remove these out of the way, or impart the measure of faith and grace needful to surmount them. In prosperity, let us remember that pride goeth before destruction, and may we strive to walk humbly before God. In adversity, let us remember that some of the children of Israel murmured and were destroyed of the destroyer, and may we hear the lesson while we feel the rod: rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulations, continuing instant in prayer. Upheld and animated by thee amidst all the trials of our life and our faith, may our path be that of the just, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. We humbly commend unto thy goodness and compassion all with whom we are connected in the bonds of kindred, of friendship, or of grace. May the young who are related to us be a seed to serve thee. May the aged be found in righteousness, and let their gray hairs be to them a crown of glory. Committing ourselves to thy Almighty protection, we retire to our repose. O God of Bethel, who with thy ministering angels, didst watch over thy chosen servant Jacob, do thou graciously guard and defend us this night from all evil; and raise us up in the morning to praise thy name and to do thy holy will. This we ask through the mediation of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXVII. 3.

SCRIPTURE—JOB XXIX.

REMARKS.

In unfolding his argument, Job contrasts, in this chapter, his former prosperity with his present adversity as recorded in the next; and then asserts, in a qualified sense, his integrity and innocence. A pensive regret fills his soul, as, reviewing his vanished honours and enjoyments, he exclaims, 'O that I were as in the months past!' Their loss has taught him the value of his earthly blessings; while it has shown him their evanescence. He recounts, in order, the elements of his past prosperity. He was happy in the favouring presence of God: then 'God preserved him' defending his interests, and strengthening his heart; then 'his candle shined upon his head,' giving him light in darkness, showing him the duties he should discharge, and the temptations he should shun; then 'his secret was upon his tabernacle,' assuring him by a pledge unknown to the world, that he was the object of a peculiar care. He was happy in his family: then his children were about him, affording him those precious and numberless delights which a parent alone can feel, when the glad voices of his little ones are heard within his dwelling. He was happy in the plenty and opulence of his condition: the fruits of the soil, and the increase of his flocks, supplying his own daily wants, with those of his own house, and removing far from him the fear of hunger, with all the other ills which extreme poverty brings in its train. He was happy in the affection and reverence which were shown him in public. And here follows a picture delineated by the patriarch himself, of the consideration in which he was held by all ranks and degrees of the pastoral community, and of the manner in which respect was paid to the man of years, of wisdom, and of benevolence, in these remote and simple times of the world: a picture of inimitable beauty; which leads us to fear that society has lost something, though it may have gained much, by assuming a more artificial form. Behold the patriarchal Job in the season of his prosperity: behold the man gifted by God with a spirit of understanding and of prudence, with persuasive lips, with liberality of heart and hand. He stands at the entering in of the gate, amidst the assembly of the people. The young retire, in deference to his presence. The aged arise, in token of their respect. He speaks; and the princes are silent. He decides; and contending litigants approve. He counsels; and the perplexities of the ignorant are removed. He walks forth; and is hailed as the friend of the poor, the protector of the fatherless and the widow, the shield of the weak, and the curb of the strong. Such was Job in the days of his health and prosperity. And now that a change has come over his condition, what wonder if his soul loves to linger around the memory of the past, and with melancholy pleasure to number his mercies, and to record the answer of a good conscience, in the employment of the gifts with which the all-bountiful One had blessed him!

Let us, like him, use wisely and well the talents and graces with which we are entrusted. Let us, when God recalls them, be contented, like him, to say, 'the Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord.' Let us, while conscious of our sins and our short-comings, before God, and convinced of our need of an atoning Saviour, duly value the answer of a good conscience, when by grace we are enabled to do any thing for his glory, and the good of our fellow-men.

PRAYER.

Gracious and ever living God, who art the Ruler of heaven and earth, the Creator and Judge of angels and of men, with thee is the fountain of life, and to thee shall all flesh come. In thee we live, and move, and have our being. All our well springs are in thee. Mercifully be pleased to listen unto us, while in lowly reverence we come, owning our guilt, with our obligations, and entreating thy gracious aid. It is through the merits and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ, that we draw near to address thee. On what other ground can we venture into thy presence? Thou only art holy. Evil shall not dwell with thee, neither shall the doers of evil stand in thy sight. The imaginations of our hearts have been evil, and that continually. We are all as an unclean thing. Our righteousness is but as filthy rags. We all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have carried us away. We have wearied thy patience; we have misapplied thy gifts: we have resisted thy government: we have quenched thy Spirit, and in the presumption of our hearts we have said, Who is the Almighty that we should serve him; and what profit is there, if we pray unto him? O Lord, most merciful and holy, enter not into judgment with us. For the sake of him who poured out his soul unto death, and was numbered with the transgressors, let us now obtain thy favour, which is better than life, and hereafter let us be numbered among thy saints in glory. Our sins have come between thee and our souls, intercepting the light of thy countenance; do thou, we beseech thee, blot them out as a cloud, and our transgressions as a thick cloud; and may we return unto thee, for thou hast redeemed us. By all our felt obligations as creatures, by all the dealings of thy providence, by all the constraining influences of thy word and Spirit, by the cords of a man, and by the bands of love, do thou draw us near to thyself, the blessed fountain of happiness and peace. Be thou henceforth our portion: and let thy law be our delight. May frequent communion with thee hallow our intercourse with the world. Like thy servant Moses, may we endure as seeing him who is invisible. Like Caleb, may we follow the Lord fully; and may our resolution, like that of Joshua, be, that whatever others may do, as for us and our house, we will serve the Lord. O God of our fathers, we humbly implore that, as a family, we may see much of thy goodness in the laud of the living, and that thou mayest prepare our hearts by thy grace for the changes that are sooner or later to befall us. We cannot penetrate the veil that hides the future. We know not what a day may bring forth. Soon our faith may be severely tried by prosperity or by adversity. Soon we may be scattered by providence, or separated by death. Shepherd of Israel, go thou before our face, prepare our way before us. Hold up our goings, and we shall be safe. Preserve us from the error of the wicked, and our feet shall not slide. What thou givest, may we receive with humble gratitude; what thou takest away, may we resign with meekness and patience. Avoiding the extremes to which our sinful nature is prone, may we neither despise the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when we are rebuked of him. Grant unto us, we beseech thee, a happy issue out of all our afflictions; and, at death, an abundant entrance into the kingdom of heaven. Fit us for meeting with thee our final judge; and as this morning we have risen from a bed of refreshing sleep, to praise thee in the land of the living, O may we, on the morning of the resurrection, be raised from the bed of death, a rejoicing family, to give praise unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS XIII.

REMARKS.

The subject presented to us from the first to the end of the seventh verse of this chapter, is one of great importance to the welfare of society. It is one, also, on which questions of extreme difficulty may be raised, in the handling of which the utmost delicacy is required. The times during which the Christian church was first formed, were times of trouble and commotion; there was danger, therefore, lest the members of the church should, from ignorance of duty, involve themselves in civil broils. This danger was increased by the circumstance that, while the church was itself a kingdom in the midst of other kingdoms, owning Christ for its Prince and Lawgiver, the limits of the allegiance of its members to earthly, and especially to Pagan rulers, were liable, through mistaken zeal, to be infringed. Under these circumstances, the apostle lays down, in a clear and comprehensive manner, certain principles and precepts for observance. While he defines indirectly the duties of the civil ruler, declaring that he is designed to be 'not a terror to good works, but to the evil;' and that 'he is the minister of God for good,' while he shows what every government ought to be, he propounds a general rule, enjoining every soul to be subject to the existing government. The reason on which this rule is founded, is a solemn one—and one not rashly to be set aside: 'for,' says he, 'there is no power but of God; the powers that be, are ordained of God.' The Almighty is the author of order in the world. Without civil government, confusion and every evil work would ensue. God, therefore, ordains its existence. When it is just and lawful, it exists by his will and with his approbation; when it is the reverse, it exists by his providential permission. 'Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God.' This, as a plain practical rule, is sufficient for the guidance of the Christian. Cases may be supposed, and cases may arise, in which profligate and unprincipled rulers inflict the bitterest wrongs on society. And it may be asked, Is not the Christian justified in such cases, if he unite with others in resisting the power? to this question, it may be answered, that he will do well first to consider that a government of this kind is self-destructive, and will contrive, ere long, to ruin itself without his assistance; that God, in his providence, has a thousand ways of removing or of correcting it; that rebellion is the most fearful of evils, involving a lengthened train of miseries, and retarding, it may be, for centuries the progress of improvement; that all security is at an end when individuals assume the right to determine when it is that resistance becomes a duty. If the Christian weigh seriously with himself these and other considerations of the kind, he will not hastily meddle with those who are given to change; but will bear patiently, and 'be subject not only for wrath, but for conscience sake.' One thing, however, is indisputable—that though we may endure wrong, we are never to commit wrong, in obedience to the command of rulers. Our duty to God forbids us to do ought that is at variance with his word and will, however high the earthly authority that enjoins it. Like Daniel, we must resist the bidding, and brave the wrath of princes, rather than rob God of his glory. Like Peter, we must obey God rather than man. The remainder of the chapter defines and recommends the duties of justice and benevolence. It enjoins also a diligent preparation for eternity, by putting off the works of darkness, and putting on the armour of light.

Let us, then, honour God, by honouring the ordinance of civil government which he has appointed. Let us obey kings and them that are set in authority, that we may live quiet and peaceable lives under them, in all godliness and honesty. Let us love the brethren, and do good to all men as we have opportunity. Let us cultivate purity of heart and life—looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, who searchest the hearts and triest the reins of the children of men, we bow before thee as sinners, who stand in need of pardon and of peace. Convinced of our danger, we flee for refuge to lay hold of the hope that is set before us. In Christ Jesus once crucified but now crowned, thou art declaring thyself to be just, and the justifier of him that believeth. Lord, we believe, help thou our unbelief. In him we rejoice; Lord, let our joy be unspeakable and full of glory. Behold God is our salvation; we will trust, and not be afraid; for the Lord Jehovah is our strength and our song. Therefore, with joy shall we draw water out of the wells of salvation. We are the partakers of numberless gifts; but Christ the Lord is thy unspeakable gift. O may we prize and appropriate him as the treasure of our souls, as the source of our present and our endless joy. If there be any amongst us who have not yet received him as a Saviour from sin, and a teacher of holiness, do thou, in thy great pity and compassion, pour out on the erring soul a spirit of repentance, unite savingly to him, and turn the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. Those amongst us who have experienced the blessed change, do thou graciously strengthen and encourage. Send forth thy light and thy truth, and let them be our guides. And may our path be that of the just, shining more and more unto the perfect day. May the love of Christ constrain us, so that we henceforth live not unto ourselves, but unto him that died for us and rose again. O for a livelier sense of the debt we owe unto him, that we may glorify God in our bodies and in our spirits which are his. O for a larger measure of his love within us, that meekness, temperance, brotherly-kindness, and charity may shed their lustre and their loveliness over every day of our lives. O that Christ were not only formed in us the hope of glory, but that we were found growing up into spiritual perfection. While we thus pray for ourselves, we plead with thee, as the great Father of all, in behalf also of our friends. Be thou to them a friend that sticketh closer than a brother. Wherever they dwell, let them abide under the shadow of thy wing. In the hour of temptation, cover thou them with thy feathers; and in the time of trouble, hide them in thy pavilion. Grant that they and we may be so kept from the follies to which we are prone, and so assisted in the duties to which we are called—so impressed by thy fear, and so cheered by thy promise, that after having finished our course with joy, we may enter into the blessed inheritance, there to be ever with the Lord. Prepare, we beseech thee, a people for serving thee on earth, and for enjoying thee in heaven. Succour and crown the labours of thy missionaries and ministers in every land of the world. Give thy Son the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. We commit ourselves to thy care during the dark and defenceless watches of the night: ascribing to thee all honour and glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CXXXI.

SCRIPTURE—JOB XXXVIII.

REMARKS.

How ignorant is man, even after he has received all the learning of the schools, the gracious teachings of divine providence, yea, and the experience of a lifetime, a learning the most profound, an experience the most varied, and a lifetime the most prolonged! And yet how proud of his knowledge, which is but ignorance; how conceited of his wisdom, which is but folly; how vain of the glow-worm glimmerings of his intellect, which serve but to show the shadows by which we are surrounded, to manifest the gloom in which our origin, our being, our destiny, are shrouded; and yet how fond of speculating upon the most mysterious subjects, enunciating, with oracular dogmatism, his baseless speculations, as if they were inspired verities, and, instead of dashing back the shadows which envelope the most interesting problems, do but 'darken counsel by words without knowledge,' ver. 2.

Of God and his ways, his authoritative will and his moral works, we know nothing absolutely, nothing but what he has himself most graciously condescended to reveal unto us in his word. And what he has revealed was made known not to excite a vain spirit of speculation, or gratify an idle curiosity; but to convince us of our own ignorance and folly, and thus teach us to confide in the wisdom and knowledge of God; to manifest unto us his glorious perfections, and thus induce us to love, seek, and obey him, that so, by the doctrines, sacraments, and discipline of his church, he might prepare us for the enjoyment of an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, but reserved in heaven for all who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. This is the only proper end of knowledge: for 'though I speak with the tongue of men and angels, and have not charity'—love to God, love to man, love to truth and holiness—'I am become as a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal; and though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and have not charity, I am nothing,' and nothing shall it profit me in my relation to eternity. The man who knows Jesus as the Saviour of sinners, God as the Father of mercies, the Spirit as the Comforter, the Guide, and Sanctifier, and the bible as the law of the kingdom, the charter of his inheritance, and the standard of his actions, knows enough for real utility, for domestic peace, for personal comfort, for social purposes, and for secular advancement; and knows, besides, all that can enlighten, justify, sanctify, and save his soul. Let us, then, acquaint ourselves with the truth revealed in God's word, for that is the science of heaven, the knowledge fitted for eternity.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God. Of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish; but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment, and as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. We thank thee with united voices this morning, that in thy good providence, and of thy sparing mercy, we have had our lives prolonged to behold the light of a new day. And now again we desire to approach thee through the new and living way, into the holiest of all, even our Lord Jesus Christ, and pray that we may obtain mercy to pardon and grace to help us in every time of need. Impart unto us of the grace of thy Spirit, whereby we may be enabled throughout this day to serve thee acceptably, with reverence and godly fear, even amidst the secularities of this life. Whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, may we do all things to thy glory. And with singleness of eye looking forward to eternity, may we by thy grace be enabled to use this world as not abusing it; to weep as though we wept not, to rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and to buy as though we possessed not, seeing that the fashion of this world passeth away. And this we likewise pray, that our love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and all judgment, that we may discern things that differ, and approve things that are excellent; that we may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ, being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God. We thank thee for the glad tidings of salvation which have reached our ears, and we pray thee to send them home to our hearts. We bless thee that it is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, even the very chief. O may he of God be made unto us wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption. May we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, through the exceeding riches of thy grace, which have abounded towards us through Jesus Christ our Lord. We do bless thee that thou hast laid our help upon one who is mighty and able to save; yea, able to save to the very uttermost all that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. Thou hast made him, who knew no sin, to be a sin-offering for sinners; so in like manner do thou make us, who of ourselves know no righteousness, to be made the righteousness of God in him, that being justified freely through thy grace in him, we may be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. Preserve us during this day from all danger. Lead us not into temptation; but preserve us from evil. Bring us home again after our dispersion, not one of us being absent through the influence of sin or the occurrence of calamity, that as now we cast ourselves upon thy care, so then we may thank thy fatherly guidance and protection. These our prayers are now before thee. Hear us in mercy, forgive us and do us good, for the sake of Christ Jesus thy Son, to whom, with thee the Father, and the blessed Spirit, one God, be ascribed all praise, world without end. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXIII.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS XIV.

REMARKS.

‘Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity,’ when that unity is based upon the truth, cemented by love, and directed by a tender regard to the rights of conscience! The great source of dissension in religious matters, arising from our pride and ignorance, is when men, presuming to be lords over God’s heritage, exalt things in themselves indifferent, and not enjoined in the word of God, into matters of essential moment and of stringent obligation, make them terms of communion, standards of the soundness of faith, and tests of the pureness of morals. What God has revealed, that let us believe; what he has enjoined, that let us obey; what he has sanctioned, that let us approve and observe: but what he has not revealed, that let us not introduce into the public formularies of the faith; what he has not enjoined, that let us never impose upon the consciences of our brethren; and what he has not authoritatively laid down as a fundamental article of faith or morals, let us never suffer to divide us from our brethren in Christ Jesus. ‘Holy scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith, or to be thought requisite or necessary to salvation.’ But even when a weak brother, in his ignorance, deems a thing in itself indifferent to be so important as to demand and deserve compliance, let us not despise him or hold him up to ridicule, for he but obeys the voice of conscience, whose mandates are at all times possessed of sovereign authority. Rather let us esteem him the more for his sacred regard to the rights of conscience; and in our intercourse with him, let us remember, that according to the principles laid down by Paul, it is the strong who is to yield to the weak, and not the weak to the strong. But, then, neither let us fancy that whatever conscience commands is therefore right, for conscience itself may be in error. The word of God, and not conscience, is our rule of faith, our law of life, our test of character. Still, to the individual himself, conscience is a sovereign. We may sin by following her mandates, and do so when we act against the word of God; but we must sin whenever we disobey conscience, because then, in that case, we disobey what at the moment we believe to be the voice of God. The sin here, however, consists not in following the dictates of conscience, but in suffering conscience to remain in error. ‘He that doubteth is damned,’ if he yet persist in doing that of which conscience has disapproved, for this manifestly is not of faith, and ‘whatever is not of faith is sin.’ Happy, then, is he that condemneth not himself in that which he alloweth; but happier he that alloweth nought but what is sanctioned in the word of God.

PRAYER.

O Lord God, who art the Father of all mercies, the God of all grace, the giver of every good and perfect gift, in approaching thee we rejoice with trembling that this is thy name, and thy memorial to all generations, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty. O do thou enable us to estimate aright the obligations under which thy mercy has laid us. Thou hast redeemed us not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. May the love of Christ then constrain us to live no longer unto ourselves, but to him who died for us and rose again. Buried with him, by baptism, into death, like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so may we walk in newness of life. May our old man be crucified with him, that the body of sin may be destroyed, that henceforth we may not serve sin. May the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, appear unto us, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live holily, righteously, and godly, in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, even our Saviour Christ Jesus, who gave himself for us, that he might cleanse us from all iniquity, and purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. We must truly confess, that in many things we transgress thy most holy law, and times and ways without number provoke thee to wrath against us. But, O Lord, mind not against us former sins, but have mercy upon us according to thy loving-kindness. According to the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out our transgressions. Wash us thoroughly from our iniquity, and cleanse us from our sins. Hide thy face from our sins, and blot out all our iniquities. Create in us clean hearts, O Lord, and renew right spirits within us. Cast us not away from thy presence, and take not thy Holy Spirit from us. Restore unto us the joy of thy salvation, and uphold us with thy free Spirit. Do thou sprinkle clean water upon us, that we may be clean from all our filthiness, and from all our defilements do thou cleanse us. A new heart, also, do thou give us, and a new spirit do thou put within us, and do thou take away the hard and stony heart out of our flesh, and give unto us an heart of flesh, upon which do thou write thy law, and cause us to walk in thy statutes, and keep thy judgments and do them. O do thou implant in our hearts that love which is the fulfilling of the law, a supreme love unto thee, and a love unto our neighbour even as unto ourselves, manifesting itself in doing unto him what we wish that he should do unto us. May we have a tender regard to our brother's comfort, and even consent to sacrifice our own rights, and abridge our own liberties, rather than offend and cause him to stumble. O Lord, we pray for all lawfully constituted authority throughout the world, but especially for thy servant our sovereign. Do thou now enable us to thank thee in a becoming manner for the preservation of the past day. Forgive all the sins we have committed. O let thy good hand be around us this night. May we lie down in peace, taking our quiet rest under the shadow of thy wing. These our prayers we present, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXIX.

SCRIPTURE—JOB XL.

REMARKS.

It might appear, at first sight, impossible that any man who verbally acknowledges the being of a God, infinite in knowledge and wisdom as in all perfection, should even, by the most indirect inference, so much as seem to insinuate any lack of wisdom or knowledge in the all-wise and all-knowing Jehovah, or any defect of practical prudence, propriety, or fitness, in any of his works, his ways, his will; and yet have we not often caught ourselves wondering at God's dealing with ourselves or others? Now, were we closely to inspect, minutely to analyse, our feelings at such times, we should generally find that they were excited by some distrust of God's wisdom, and were connected with some disbelief of his love. To repress such daring presumption, it were well that we should remember God's language to Job in the second verse of this chapter. Yet no censure, however severe, no amount of mere secular knowledge, however varied and profound, can ever enable us fully to repress such inveterate cavilling at the dispensations of God. Yea, while smarting under the folly of believing ourselves wiser than he, we may often be tempted, like Jonah in his controversy with God, to say, 'I do well' thus to think and thus to act. But when God, by his Spirit, has convinced us of his wisdom and our folly, his goodness and our baseness, his mercy and our guilt, we learn to abase ourselves in the silence of self-condemnation, and leave all things to the wisdom and goodness of our benign Father, saying with Job, in the fourth and fifth verses of this chapter, &c. Vast, mysterious, and magnificent are the works of our God, and most worthy of our contemplation and study; but how much more worthy of our intensest contemplation and our profoundest study is the great and the glorious Jehovah himself! Yet there is no way by which we can know God except by knowing Jesus, 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath revealed him. But, moreover, the only knowledge of God which does not overwhelm us with its immensity, and by its appalling bearings upon our own destiny, is the knowledge of God manifest in the flesh. God, as seen without Christ, is only a Being of almighty power, inexorable rigour, inflexible justice, untainted holiness, unimpeachable veracity, immutable resolution, and intense irreconcilable hatred towards sin; and all this, if seen and believed, can be only appalling to the sinner. For God's almightiness may be exerted to punish, his justice to condemn, his rigour to refuse our prayers, his holiness to repel our approaches, and his veracity to inflict the threatened penalty; but when God is seen in Christ, there is power to protect us—justice to demand satisfaction but once, and that once for all, in the sacrifice of Jesus—holiness to impart unto us of the divine nature—form and fashion us for fellowship with himself in glory—and veracity to implement all his promises to Jesus, and in Jesus to us. Such is God as seen in Christ. And does he not deserve our contemplation, our trust, our love?

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, thou art exceeding great, and works by thee are done which are to be had in remembrance. From everlasting to everlasting thou art God, filling space with thine immensity, and eternity with thy duration. How truly may we take up, each one of us for himself, the language of thy servant, and say, Whither shall I go from thy spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there; if I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, surely the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be light about me; yea, the darkness hideth not from thee, but the night shineth as the day; the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. We thank thee, O Lord, for the rest and preservation of the past night. It is of thy gracious and providential care, of thy fatherly love and goodness, that we have been ushered into the light of a new day, and in the possession and enjoyment of such manifold mercies of which we are so very undeserving. O that we might remember our obligations unto the Lord, and our duties to God our Saviour! We go forth this day to our varied engagements, and avocations of life. We know not the snares and pit-falls by which our path is environed, the temptations and the dangers by which we may be assailed. We know not the bereavements, the pains, the perils, we may be called upon to encounter, and it may be to endure. We, therefore, seek to cast ourselves upon thy care; and we pray that as our Father in Christ thou wouldst strengthen us for duty, fortify us for trial, shield us from danger, and succour us in the hour of need. Ward off every stroke of calamity, we pray thee, or soften its fall, or strengthen our hearts to bear it; humble our wills to acquiesce in it, and sanctify it to our spiritual improvement and growth in grace. And that we may be the less exposed to the sorrows and bereavements of this life, and also the better disposed towards eternity, teach, and by thy grace enable us to wean ourselves from created enjoyments, and to set our hearts upon thee, our imperishable treasure, that changeth not. And seeing that while we are here, in obedience to thy law, we must engage in the avocations of this world, we pray thee to bless our lawful endeavours in our lawful callings, that we may have food and clothing, and that our hearts may bless the Lord. In our respective relations and various walks in life, that we may be enabled to perform our duties to thee, our neighbour, and ourselves; that we may do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with thee, our God, O do thou endow us very richly with the special gifts of thy Spirit. May our sins, which are many, be blotted out, and may the blood of Jesus cleanse us from their stain. United to him by a true and living faith, may we have peace with God, through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Renouncing all false confidences, may we place our sole dependence upon his merits and mediation alone. As now we separate for the day, be thou, O our God, never separate from one of us; but be ever at our right hand and at our left, our God, our guide, our stay. Bring us home again in peace in the evening, in thy good pleasure, that as now we implore thy presence and protection, so then we may celebrate thy praise, and, with grateful hearts, return thee due thanksgivings, as even now, also, we do through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS XV.

REMARKS.

If God hath exalted us above others in any attainments, we ought so to conjoin these gifts with humility and gratitude, as, in our feelings towards God, to manifest our thankfulness for his distinguishing grace; and in our intercourse with mankind, to remain sensible, that, as it was God that caused us to differ, so we ought not to despise our weaker brother, but rather ought we to bear patiently with his infirmities, and faithfully, but mildly, to instruct him in the truth. What an injunction to such tenderness and patience towards our weaker brethren is the gracious forbearance which Jesus manifested while on earth, and manifests still, towards the sincere, though erroneous, scruples of his disciples' consciences, yea, towards the petulant disputings of gainsayers, and the perverse prejudices and passions of the obstinately ungodly! And his example here, as in every other department of his conduct, is binding upon us in our intercourse with the world, and much more in our fellowship with brethren in the faith. It is only by such mutual forbearance towards one another in the love which is according to Christ Jesus, that it is possible to enjoy church fellowship, or, indeed, constitute a church communion on earth. On no other principle can we, with one mind and one mouth, glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Let the strong then bear with the weak; and let not the weak charge with licentiousness the more enlarged freedom of the more robust in spiritual health and strength. And as a means, and a most important means, for this consummation, let us be more frequent and more fervent in our prayers for one another. We cannot long remain indifferent to the state of those for whom we daily pray. Prayer for them will beget love towards them. Upon this account, as well as by reason of gratitude for mercies already received, and hope for gifts yet to come, ought the people to pray for ministers, and more especially each flock for its own pastor. In omitting this grievously neglected duty, men injure themselves. In praying for our pastor, we in reality pray for ourselves. The minister is but the depository of God's gifts, and the channel by which they are distributed and dispensed to the church. But if the depository be empty, the channels shall be dry, and our souls shall lack nourishment. But, then, how can we expect our pastor to dispense to us the instruction, the reproof, the consolation we require, if he has not obtained it from God; and how can we expect that he should receive it from God, if we have failed to pray for him. The health of the nurse is essential to the health of the child; and the piety of the pastor, to the piety of his flock. In our prayers, therefore, let us never forget the brethren, and especially the brethren who are over us in the Lord.

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever blessed God, we would this evening bend our knees before thee in token of our humility and desire to ascribe to thee all honour and glory, dominion, power, and praise. We must, indeed, confess, that by nature we are proud and yet fickle, easily elated by prosperity, and as easily depressed by adversity. Our hearts are selfish. We would be every thing ourselves, make all others minister to our pleasure and yield to our desires. Too much, we must confess, have we been living to ourselves, indifferent to the condition of our neighbour, careless about his interests, and unconcerned about his destiny. If not in speech, yet have we in actions, each one of us, asked, like the first murderer, Am I my brother's keeper? And by our selfish pursuits and heedless practice, have we cast a stumbling-block before our weaker brethren, the tender lambs of the flock, for whom the great Shepherd has laid down his life. O Lord, forgive us these sins, and give us now of thy grace, that, with the enlarged philanthropy of the gospel, with the benevolence and self-sacrificing brotherly kindness of our Lord Jesus Christ, we may look every one not at his own interests, but also at those of our brethren in Christ. Do thou, therefore, we beseech of thee, give us grace that we may, as we ought, pray for all men, for those that are in authority over us, for our sovereign, and all judges, rulers, and magistrates. O do thou endow them with the spirit of their station, and the disposition becoming their office, that they may be instrumental in promoting the civil, commercial, and social, but much more the spiritual and ecclesiastical interests of these realms. May pure religion and undefiled flourish every where. Give testimony to a preached gospel, as thine own instituted ordinance for the salvation of men. Clothe thy priests with salvation, that thy saints may shout aloud for joy. Bring into the pale of the church of Christ thine ancient people the Jews, and the fullness of the Gentile nations. Destroy the man of sin with the breath of thy nostrils and the brightness of thy coming. Rescue the deluded votaries of idolatry, error, and sin, from the power and slavery of satan, and bring them to the freedom and the truth which is in Christ Jesus. As we have confessed before thee the sins of this day, do thou enable us from the heart to repent of them, and forsake them, and to repair to the blood of Christ, that our sins may thereby be forgiven us. May the blessedness of that man be ours whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered, unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile. And now, O Lord, what thanks are due unto thee for our preservation during the past day? Thou hast truly been mindful of thine own mercy, and hast caused the outgoing of the evening and the morning to rejoice over us. O may our spared lives be devoted to thy glory. And this night we cast us upon thy care, praying that thou wouldst give unto us the rest of thy beloved ones, and bring us to see the light of a new day (if it be thy pleasure) in some measure of health, and strength, and soundness of mind. May the everlasting arms ever be underneath us, and the banner over us be love. When we pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death, be thou our guide and protector; and at length do thou receive us into glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PRAISE—PSALM LI.

SCRIPTURE—JOB XLII.

REMARKS.

The concluding chapter of this beautiful poem affords an encouraging proof that the Lord our God is merciful and very gracious, and that though he may try his servants for a while for the perfecting of their faith, he will never finally forsake the man whose hope is towards him, and who, in humble dependence on divine grace, hath said to himself with Job, 'though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.' In verse 3d, the now humbled patriarch repeats, in substance, with feelings of the deepest self-abasement, the pregnant words in which God had first addressed him from the midst of the whirlwind. 'Who, indeed, am I,' he exclaims, 'that hide counsel without knowledge, that pretend wisdom without understanding? Therefore have I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.' In the same spirit of unfeigned humility, the patriarch alludes, in the 4th verse, to the words in which Jehovah had rebuked his presumptuous confidence when he thus addressed him: 'gird up thy loins now like a man: and I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.' Conscious, at length, of his utter inability to make answer unto God, the patriarch, from the depths of a subdued spirit, pours forth the fervent and affecting prayer; 'hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak; I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me;' as if he had said, 'O God, I am now convinced that I know nothing, that the wisdom on which I plumed myself is the veriest foolishness, and that it becomes me, therefore, to learn of thee, that I may obtain true wisdom. I will ask of thee, then, O God, and do thou declare unto me the things that are too deep, that I may be able to understand them.' The captivity of Job, spoken of in the 10th verse, is a figurative expression for the deep affliction with which God had visited him. The names given to his daughters, literally 'days upon days,' 'Cassia,' the plant of aromatic fame, and 'the flowing horn,' or 'horn of plenty,' are expressive of the rich blessings which God caused at length to be poured into his lap, and also of the gladness of heart with which it had been farther given to him to enjoy the bounties of a benign providence. Applying Job's expressions in a spiritual sense, deeply and feelingly may every sincere Christian exclaim, 'how little can be known of God by the hearing of the ear!' While our knowledge of him is confined to what others can teach us, while there is no light in our minds but that which entereth from the outer world, we are destitute of the knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation, and we are destitute of the light which is also our life. It is only when God, by his Spirit, revealeth himself in the hidden man of the heart, when he inscribes his laws on our consciences, and writes his statutes on our inward parts, when he discovers to us himself, both in the awful effulgence of his immaculate purity, and in the more subdued light of his unsearchable mercy, that we truly know the depths into which we have fallen, that we see and feel our utter vileness, and that we are capable of exclaiming, in the affecting words of Job, under an awful consciousness of their meaning, 'we abhor ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes.' O that we could thus see God as he is, that he would thus declare himself unto us by the teaching of his Spirit, that he would thus give us that view of our own unworthiness, through which we shall be led, with becoming fervour, to desire an everlasting righteousness, and in fine, that he would work in us that deep conviction of our own weakness, which shall constrain us to lay hold on the strength of omnipotence, ver. 7, &c. How much may we be indebted to the prayers of our fellow-Christians, even of those of whom, in our presumption, we have judged most harshly, and how urgently and impressively, therefore, are we called on to have fervent charity towards all men, and to remember our brethren at a throne of grace, verses 9, &c. Whatever portion the Christian may obtain in the world that now is, it is such a portion as God sees to be most conducive to his everlasting good; and his, assuredly, is that better part which shall never be taken from him, even the heavenly inheritance, which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. The Lord himself is the Christian's sufficiency; his everlasting portion is the God of Jacob.

PRAYER.

Almighty and everlasting God, thou rulest supreme in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of this earth. None can stay thy hand from working, or say unto thee effectually, What doest thou? Thou art our creator, and preserver, our Lord, and rightful proprietor. In our bodies and in our never-dying spirits we are thine. Our perishable part is fearfully and wonderfully made by thee. There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of thee the Almighty hath given him understanding. Impress this consideration deeply and permanently on our hearts, and may we be brought to exclaim, in a distinct and grateful consciousness of dependence, with thy servant of old, Here I am, let the Lord do with me whatsoever seemeth good in his sight. Thou art, O Lord, possessed of almighty power, so that thou canst do every thing, and the whole universe is thine, so that thou mayest righteously act according to thy sovereign will and pleasure. We are before thee as clay in the hands of the potter. And yet, O searcher of hearts, from whom no thought can be withholden, thou knowest how much dissatisfaction, and ingratitude, and faithlessness, has characterised our past history, and thou hast recorded all the hard thoughts which we have sinfully entertained respecting thy providential dealings towards us. We have been too prone to forget our unworthiness of even the least of all thy mercies, thine unwillingness to afflict or grieve the children of men, and the divine inscrutableness of thy ways; and we have presumed too often to utter things which we understood not, and to pry into the secret things which belong to the Lord alone. But now, we would desire, O merciful God, with repentant and humbled hearts, to return unto thee. Beholding ourselves in all the ignorance, and guilt, and depravity which cleave to us by nature; and thee in all the mercy, and light, and purity, and justice of thy glorious character; we would feel constrained to adopt the language of the ancient penitent, I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes. Lead us, we beseech thee, to a just and believing view of thyself, and especially may we be enabled to claim thee as our own God in Christ. May we enjoy the blessedness of thy chosen ones, who feel that all things work together for their good, that thou lovest whom thou chastisest, and scourgest every son whom thou receivest. Compassionate the condition of the afflicted. Bless and sanctify all their trials to thy glory and their spiritual good, and produce in them a resigned and confiding temper of mind. May no evil befall us, or any of those who are near and dear to us, this day. Keep us constantly in thy fear and love; and may our death be that of the righteous. Our heart's desire and prayer for all men is that they may be saved. Hasten the coming of Messiah's kingdom; and to thee the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, we will ascribe all praise, dominion, and glory, now and for ever. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM C. (First Version.)

SCRIPTURE—ROMANS XVI.

REMARKS.

There is little in this chapter which requires explanation. Phebe, called a servant of the church of Cenchrea, was properly a deaconess of that church. In the east, women were not permitted to mix in the society of men, but were, for the most part, kept secluded in separate apartments, to which no stranger could have access. It became, therefore, highly important for the church to have deaconesses as well as deacons, in order that the sick or indigent of the female sex might have their necessities ministered unto, by persons whose attendance upon them should involve no breach of decorum. The same order of office-bearers seems to be alluded to by Paul in his first epistle to Timothy. The persons spoken of in the 17th and 18th verses, as causing divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine of Christ, were probably those who enforced the institutions of Moses, lest they should suffer persecution from the unbelieving Jews, or those who, by abusing their Christian liberty, in partaking of sacrifices offered to idols, laid a snare in the way of their weaker brethren. Of both these classes of persons it might be justly said, that they served not the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth, and that they had regard rather to the means of pampering their fleshly appetites.

The chapter, considered in a practical point of view, is replete with instruction. It breathes throughout the genuine spirit of catholic Christianity. The absent members of Christ's spiritual body dwell in the affectionate recollections of the apostle; he makes grateful remembrance of their several special claims upon his regard, and of the services done by them to the cause of Christ; distance divides them not from his brotherly love. The interest which he shows in the welfare of the whole Roman church, and also the greetings transmitted by him, from the churches among which he was sojourning at the time when he wrote his epistle, to brethren whom, in all probability, they had never seen in the flesh, point out to us, in the liveliest colours, the feelings and sympathies by which we must be actuated, if we are genuine disciples of the Lord Jesus, if we have, in truth, been made partakers of the Spirit of Christ. Behold, exclaimed the heathen, in the pure times of the primitive church, behold these Christians how they love one another! Reader, it is only when the spirit of catholic brotherly love shall return to the church, and to each individual member thereof; when between us and Christians in every part of the world, whatever be their nation, or kindred, or tongue, whether they dwell beneath the fires of a tropical sun, or amid the perpetual snows of an arctic winter, there is felt to exist a tie of brotherhood, stronger, infinitely, than are the ties of flesh and blood, a tie which death itself can neither break nor unloose,—it is then, only, that the vine which the Lord planted in our land shall take deep root, and really flourish, covering the hills with its shadow, having its boughs like the goodly cedars, and sending them forth unto the sea, and its branches unto the river.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art God, and we will bless thee; thou art our fathers' God, and we will exalt thy name together. Thou art the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, of those who love and serve thee on the earth, and of all who in heaven are inheriting the promises; but in an especial manner thou art the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. We adore and bless thee as the same to-day, yesterday, and for ever.

Thou hast been the refuge and counsellor of thy people in all past times, and thou art now a present God to those who call upon thee. We rejoice in thy unchangeable mercy. The mountains may depart, and the hills may be removed; but thy loving-kindness shall not depart, nor shall the covenant of thy peace be removed from those who place their trust in thee. Lead us, we beseech thee, to that fountain which has been opened for sin and for uncleanness to the whole house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and may we be there washed, and justified, and sanctified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. May the Spirit guide us to the rock of ages, under whose grateful shade many a weary traveller has been privileged to rest in safety on his journey through the wilderness which we are now traversing, and by drinking of whose refreshing stream many a drooping spirit has been comforted, and strengthened for pursuing its heavenward course. Create in us clean hearts. Renew right spirits within us. Purify us unto thyself a peculiar people. Prepare us for the fellowship of the godly upon earth, and for holy communion with the blessed above. Seeing that we are encompassed with such a cloud of witnesses as those whose names are already written in the book of life, and casting our eyes upward in humble faith and hope to the blissful countenances of those whose memory is dear to us, who used to share in our earthly griefs and joys, and who now appear, with hearts full of love to Christ, to invite us to the mansions of our heavenly Father's house, may we be all constrained to lay aside every weight, and especially the sins that most easily beset us, and to run with perseverance the race set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and the finisher of our faith. Take up thine abode, O gracious God, in the hearts and houses of our friends and relatives this evening. Give thine angels charge over them. May no plague come near our dwelling. May the angel of the covenant encamp about us. May we lie down under a deep sense of our guilt and sinfulness, and with humble confidence in thy pardoning mercy, and sanctifying grace. May we lay our heads upon our pillows, at peace with thee our God, at peace with our own consciences, and breathing peace and good-will to all the human kind. Give us quiet and refreshing slumbers. Raise us up, if it be thy blessed will, in health and strength, prepared for all the duties, events, and trials of another day. Extend the knowledge and the savour of the name of Jesus. For his sake be our God and guide even until death, and in that solemn hour be our strength and joy, and through eternity our portion, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THIRTY-SECOND WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XLVI.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM XCI.

REMARKS.

It is uncertain by whom this psalm was written. It is believed by some to have been composed on the occasion of that grievous pestilence which is recorded in the 24th chapter of the second book of Samuel. That it refers to the Messiah, there can be no doubt, seeing that parts of it, quoted in the New Testament, are applicable to him. The chief singer is supposed to chaunt the first verse with evident allusion to the promised deliverer. The second verse represents the Messiah as replying, and declaring implicit confidence in God. Such language as he uses in this passage, must be regarded as uttered by him only in his assumed character. As God, he is equal in every respect with the Father. In the 3d verse the Levite is again introduced, and addresses the Messiah with assurances of protection, and strength, and victory over all his enemies, till the end of the 13th, with the exception of the former clause of the 9th, in which the Messiah breaks in upon the song of the chaunter. The last three verses of the psalm are spoken by God himself. But although this beautiful portion of scripture may have been sung by the Old Testament church, as primarily descriptive of the character and prospects of the great Mediator of whom the ancient prophets prophesied, and who was the burden of inspired songs of antiquity; yet it was meant then, and it is intended now, to cheer and comfort the hearts of Christ's chosen and believing people. If the language here employed, may be applied to the head, it must also be shared in by the members of Christ's mystical body. If such is the description of the nature, and stability, and fruits of the vine itself, the only difference in the corresponding qualities of the branches can be, that they are derived from the parent stock. Ver. 1, 2. When a man is driven out of himself, and out of the world, and being justified by faith, has free access into that grace wherein the people of God stand, he dwells in the secret place of high and holy communion with his reconciled Father through Christ; and as the shadow, cast by the projecting rock, affords to the traveller a welcome retreat from the direct rays of an eastern sun, so the true Christian has his life hid with Christ in God, lays all his burdens on him who is willing and able to bear them, and finds, in the finished work of his Redeemer, a refuge from a broken and avenging law, a fortress against the temptations by which, both from within and from without, he is daily assailed, and a ground of confidence in God, amid the most trying dispensations of providence with which he can be visited. Ver. 3—13. In these verses, deliverance is promised to the believer from all his secret and all his open enemies; but the promise must not be understood in an absolute sense, as it frequently happens, either that from a want of faith on man's part it remains unfulfilled and unenjoyed in his experience, or that God sees it to be needful for the spiritual edification of his saints to bring them through great tribulation. Certainly, however, the time will arrive, when the child of God shall be rescued from every danger, extricated from every difficulty, and rendered superior to every foe; when he shall overcome the strongest as well as the most deceitful of his adversaries; when he shall tread upon the lion and the adder. Ver. 14—16. Here God enumerates some of the reasons of his favour. Doubtless the love of the Godhead is the originating cause; but as fruits of the implantation of this love in the hearts of men, there will be produced, first of all, a corresponding affection and devotedness to God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; secondly, a growing desire after divine knowledge; and thirdly, earnest and persevering prayer. He who possesses these features of character, has the assurance of long life; not, it may be, in a world whence the apostle desired to depart, but in a world where God's favour is life, and where his loving-kindness is better than life.

PRAYER.

Most merciful and ever-blessed God, thou art great, and greatly to be feared, and to be had in reverence by all who draw nigh unto thee. The angels, those pure and high intelligences who have kept their first estate, veil their faces with their wings in the presence of him who inhabiteth eternity and the praises thereof. The redeemed ones in glory, who having passed through great tribulation, stand before thee in robes which have been washed in the blood of the Lamb, cast their crowns at thy feet, and adore thee as the Father of all their mercies, and the fountain of all their present joys. And, O holy and eternal God, shall not we, sinful dust and ashes, thy dependent creatures, the daily pensioners on thy bounty, and needy suppliants at thy throne, humble ourselves in thy pure and adorable presence, and approach thee clothed with the reverence which becomes us. O pour out upon each of us the spirit of supplication. Impart unto us a deep sense of our own guiltiness and unworthiness, and at the same time an exalted view of our all-sufficient Saviour. May we be enabled in his name to come to thy throne with the unfeigned humility, and the holy boldness of children, that we may find mercy to pardon, and grace to help us. Implant in us the principle of faith which is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, that our hearts may be weaned from the love and pursuit of earthly and perishable objects, and our affections may be set on those things which are above. Enable us to cast off the worldliness and carnality under which we are weary and heavy-laden. O for the wings of a dove, that we might fly away and be at rest. In the midst of a wicked and ensnaring world, a world that crucified the Lord of glory, and bearing hearts about with us that daily crucify him afresh, may it be ours to dwell in the secret place of the Most High, and to abide under the shadow of the Almighty. We would at all times say of the Lord, He is our refuge and our fortress, our God in whom we would trust. We would confide in thy atonement for the forgiveness of our sins, and we would be regarded as accepted in thy beloved One. We would repair to thy grace for strength wherewith to discharge the duties, and patiently to endure the trials of life. We would implore thy special presence in the hour of death. On that solemn occasion may we feel in our blessed experience, that because thou hast set thy love upon us, thou wilt then be our deliverer. In the name of Jesus Christ our elder brother, we desire to commend to thee all our kindred and friends, and all everywhere who belong to the household of faith. May grace, mercy, and truth, be multiplied unto them. May thy kingdom come throughout the world; may the time be hastened when thy will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven. For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXVIII.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS XCII. XCIII.

REMARKS.

PSALM XCII. This psalm, as its title would appear to intimate, was sung by the Jewish church on the weekly sabbath. The subjects contained in it are beautifully adapted to the occasion on which it was used. In the first three verses, the inspired prophet calls upon the worshippers to express their gratitude to God; and in the succeeding part of the psalm, he enumerates the reasons of their thanksgiving and praise. As the God of creation, the Lord is addressed in the 5th verse; and the devout and adoring soul in using the expression, 'how great are thy works,' joins in the anthem of praise, which the morning stars sang together on the appearance of the world in all its beauty and order, out of the darkness and confusion by which it was preceded. The psalmist next addresses the Lord as the God of providence; and in this character the Almighty is set forth under several aspects. He is viewed as the upholder and governor of all his creatures, as the sovereign ruler of all men, visiting the wicked with deserved punishment, according to the laws of his righteous administration, and rewarding those who diligently seek him, and as causing all things to work together for the spiritual and everlasting good of his church and people. Now, while in our observance of the Christian sabbath, emphatically styled the Lord's day, we are not to forget, in our praise and thanksgiving, the God of creation and providence, who, at first, out of his mere good pleasure, brought us into being, and by whose arm we have been hitherto sustained, there is one of God's ways toward sinful men, transcending all the rest, which, on the Christian sabbath, we are called on gratefully to commemorate. On the first day of the week our blessed Redeemer rose from the grave, having finished the work which the Father gave him to do. He then rested from his labours, as God did from his on the seventh day. And it is our duty, and our privilege, to pour out our souls in thanksgiving, for the light, and beauty, and order, and stability of the new creation, the foundations of which are laid in the unfathomable love of the everlasting covenant. On every day it was the custom of the pious Jew to offer up the morning and evening sacrifice, to show forth the loving-kindness of God in the morning, and his faithfulness every night; and especially on the seventh day of the week, did he never fail to join, at those two solemn seasons, in the worship of his creator and preserver. And shall we, who live in the enjoyment of gospel privileges, refuse our tribute of deserved praise, morning and evening in our families, to the Author of all the bounties of providence, and of all the inestimable blessings of grace; and especially, shall we, who have been born under a perfect and permanent dispensation, refuse to grant 'one whole day in seven, to be a holy sabbath unto God himself?'

PSALM XCIII. According to the Hebrew doctors, this, and the six following psalms, belong to the times of the Messiah. The majesty and power of God; the certainty of his word and promises, and the necessity of holiness on the part of those who shall dwell with him in his house on earth, and in his heavenly sanctuary, are the topics which it contains. The two inferences which naturally flow from the subject matter of this psalm are these: First, there is much ground for comfort to God's people in the thought that he exercises sovereign and universal dominion over the world, and that as certainly as the Lord reigneth, shall their adversaries be discomfited by him whose voice is mightier than the noise of many waters; secondly, we have an intimation and assurance of the accomplishment of the promises respecting the triumphs of the Redeemer in every land. When God shall cease to be clothed with majesty, when the throne of the everlasting One shall tremble, when he who has promised shall no longer fulfil, then, and not till then, may the humble Christian part with the cheering assurance, that notwithstanding the superstition, idolatry, and vice, which still darken the habitations and the hearts of men, in many lands the Sun of righteousness has certainly arisen, which will enlighten every nation of the earth.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, thou art worthy of our deepest gratitude, and our loudest praise. We bless thee for our creation, and for the high place which thou hast been pleased to assign to us in the scale of being. We praise thee for the returning bounties of thy providence, and for the undeserved blessings of thy grace, which from time to time we are permitted to enjoy. Truly it is our bounden duty and our highest privilege to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night. During the darkness and silence of repose thy sleepless eye watches over us, and during our waking hours thy power defends us from innumerable dangers which we can neither foresee nor prevent, and thy never-failing goodness supplies our daily wants. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits, who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases, who redeemeth thy life from destruction, who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies. O Lord, how great are thy works; how manifold and marvellous is thy goodness; thy thoughts are very deep. In the work of redeeming love, how boundless and unspeakable thy mercy! Eternal praise be ascribed to thy name for the gift of thy Son. May our hearts be melted, by contemplating the cross, into profound abasement and the warmest love; may a look be cast on us from thence, such as that with which Peter was regarded when he went away weeping bitterly for his sins. Withhold not from us, we entreat thee, convincing, converting, and purifying grace. In regard to our three-fold foes, the world, and satan, and the flesh, enable us to say with the psalmist, Mine eye shall see my desire on mine enemies; and fulfil in our experience thy three-fold promise, I will help thee, I will strengthen thee, yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness. May we die daily unto sin, and live more and more unto righteousness. May the condition of our souls be described by the flourishing of the palm tree, and the growth of the cedar in Lebanon. Increase our faith in thy promises, which are exceeding great and precious. Inflame our love to him who loved us even to the death. Deepen our repentance on account of sin; and produce in us a growing desire after spiritual and divine things, a greater hungering and thirsting after the righteousness of faith. Go forth, O blessed Jesus, conquering and to conquer in the hearts and habitations of all the human family. The floods of opposition to Messiah's reign have lifted up their voice; but it is consoling to reflect that the Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters. Thy testimonies, O God, are very sure, and in virtue of thy promise the gospel will have free course, and will be glorified. Arise, shine, O Sun of righteousness. May the arms of thy providence be around all who are bound to us by the ties of nature, of sympathy, or of grace. Never leave nor forsake us in life, and in the deep swellings of the spiritual Jordan, may our souls hear thee saying to us in words of comfort, When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; and after death may we be received into glory. These, our prayers, we present, O Lord our God, in the name and for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ, our chosen strength and righteousness. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIV. 11—16.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS I.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—6. Contain the introduction to this precious book, and set forth the object of its inspired author, which is to teach ignorant man heavenly wisdom, and to furnish him with practical lessons suitable for his guidance in all the various circumstances in which he can be placed in this world. Sin has rendered every one of us deplorably blind, and constantly apt to err from the right path; but if we study these divine Proverbs with an humble mind, and with fervent prayer for the teaching of the Holy Spirit, we shall be enabled 'to know wisdom and prudence,' to form distinct and just ideas of things; 'to perceive the words of understanding,' to apprehend them, to guard against mistakes, and to accommodate what we are taught to our own necessities; 'to receive the instruction of wisdom,'—even that knowledge which will influence our practice in justice, judgment, and equity, prompting us to render to every one his due,—to God the things that are God's, in the different exercises of religion,—and to all men what appertains to them, according to our several obligations, whether as arising from relationship, from official station, from express engagements, or from any other source whatsoever. Seeing the simple have need of this gracious subtility, and seeing the young and inexperienced, particularly, stand much in want of this divine knowledge and discretion; if they have any desire for true wisdom, they will open their ears to Solomon's instructions, and set themselves diligently to follow the rules which he has prescribed. Ver. 7—9. O let us all remember the great general truth here announced to us! 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge.' But how shall we fear the great and holy God aright, except by believing in his Son, and experiencing that new birth, without which we shall have no love to him, and no disposition to reverence and obey him. They are fools indeed, whose religion starts from any other point. 'I am the way,' says Christ, 'and the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me.' 'The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.' And let the young specially observe, that while it is their solemn duty to hear the instructions of the father that begat them, and not to forsake the law of the mother that bare them, in no way can they perform their duty acceptably to God, and satisfactorily to their own conscience, but by acting habitually under a sense of that awe of God, and of that responsibility to him, which his Holy Spirit implants in the heart in regeneration. Respect for their parents, and cheerful obedience to their lawful commands, guided by such a principle, will indeed be an ornament of grace to their heads, and chains of gold about their necks,—unspeakably more becoming in the estimation both of God, and of all good men, than any external decorations with which they may seek to adorn themselves. Ver. 10—19. How earnest and affectionate is the exhortation which these words contain! While it is suitable to every man, whatever be his age or circumstances, it is peculiarly suitable to young persons; indeed, we see it is directly addressed to them, because they are more susceptible of pernicious impressions from wicked and designing men than others. But let them be entreated to beware of the enticements of the artful and profligate: whatever advantages they may promise them, the only issue of confederating with them in their evil plots and adventures will be, if grace prevent not, their utter ruin both in time and in eternity. Ver. 20—23. What is the wisdom which here addresses us? Strong reasons might be adduced to prove, that it is none other than the Lord Jesus Christ, who is 'the only wise God and our Saviour,' and 'who of God is made unto us wisdom,' &c. Ver. 24—33. When the despisers of Christ come to be laid upon a death-bed, and the terrors of judgment and eternal torment begin to enter, like sharp arrows, into their souls, they will cry eagerly for mercy, but no mercy will be granted to them. Whoso, however, now hearkeneth to the Lord Jesus, shall dwell safely, when these terrible days come, and shall be quiet from all fear of evil.

PRAYER.

O Lord, help us, we beseech thee, to draw nigh this morning with acceptance to thy footstool. Pour forth thy Holy Spirit upon us, as a Spirit of grace and supplication. Thou knowest that we cannot pray to thee either acceptably or profitably, without his light and guidance. Give us also that lively faith in thy Son, in his mediation and merits, without which it is impossible to please thee, and vain to hope that we shall receive any blessings from thy hands. O our God, we have all sinned grievously against thee, though thou hast made us, soul and body, for thy holy service, and hast laid us under the highest obligations to live entirely devoted to thy glory. We have forsaken thee, the fountain of living waters, and have been hewing out unto ourselves broken and empty cisterns which can hold no water. We have violated every one of thy righteous commandments, both in thought, word, and deed. Truly, we are miserable, and wretched, and poor, and blind, and naked; and we desire, therefore, to be profoundly abased in thy presence, and to cry out with shame, and with contrition of heart, Unclean, unclean; woe is unto us, for we have sinned. But, O Lord, we praise and thank thee, for the precious and abundant intimations thou hast given us of thy pardoning mercy and renewing grace. We bless thee, that there is mercy with our Lord, that he may be feared, and plenteous redemption, that he may be sought after, and confided in, by his sinful creatures; and we especially rejoice to think, that thou art in Christ Jesus reconciling a guilty world to thyself, not imputing to them that truly believe in his blessed name their trespasses. O grant each of us, now before thee, an interest in all the blessings which this divine Redeemer purchased for his people by his atoning sufferings and death. Give us of that wisdom which is treasured up in him for our illumination and guidance. Sprinkle his cleansing blood upon us, that all our iniquities may be blotted out. Vouchsafe to us that Holy Spirit, the treasures of whose influences he holds in his hands, to renew and sanctify, to strengthen and comfort our souls. If thou hast already given us to know him, and to glory in him, as all our salvation, and all our desire, O Lord, we desire to bless thee with all our hearts, for this thy distinguishing grace; and we earnestly pray, that thou wouldst carry forward unto perfection, the good work which thou hast commenced, enlightening and purifying, quickening and establishing us more and more. But, O Lord, if we are still without God, without Christ, and without hope in the world, speedily convert us, we entreat thee, from our evil ways. Pluck us as brands from the burning, that we may yet be the monuments of thy redeeming love, and may yet praise thee in the land of the living. Bless and render effectual thy word, and all thy other ordinances, for this end; and O let us never for a moment forget how dreadful will be the eternal portion of all the finally unbelieving, and ungodly. Guide us through all the duties and trials of this new day; keep us in thy fear all the day long. Keep us near to thyself; and enable us, in every thing we plan or attempt, to set thy glory before our eyes, as our chief end, and all the praise shall be thine, for Christ's sake Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVI. 5—9.

SCRIPTURE—1 COR. 1.

REMARKS.

In ver. 1—3. the apostle salutes the church at Corinth, expressing his earnest desire, as was his custom in addressing the different churches, that they might have grace and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. Observe here, that he represents Christ as equal with the Father, and intimates, not only that spiritual blessings come equally from both, but that we ought to pray for these blessings to the one, as well as to the other. Observe, also, the character which he here gives of Christians; they are sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints. Such language obviously implies far more than a mere profession of religion; it denotes that they are holy persons,—persons who are not only externally called by the gospel, but internally and efficaciously called by the special operation of the Spirit within them, to be a holy people both in heart and life. What need have we all to examine ourselves in regard to this matter! If we are not sanctified, and saints in this sense, we are none of Christ's. Ver. 4—9. Many of the Corinthians had received the grace of God in rich abundance, miraculous gifts, indeed, had been liberally conferred upon them; and in this respect they were behind none of the primitive churches. But they were also ransomed sinners; the testimony of Christ, as given by his apostles, had been established in their minds and consciences, so that it was true of them, that 'the gospel had come to them, not in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance, and was effectually working in them that believed.' Moreover, it was characteristic of them, that they were waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, who will come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe. This they did, by looking, longing, praying, preparing, and patiently waiting for that solemn event: and therefore the apostle assures them, that he who had begun a good work in them would carry it forward unto perfection, and present them blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ, thus fulfilling the promises and the covenant which he ratified with them personally, when he effectually called them to the fellowship of his Son. Now, is this really our character? If it is not, how dreadful will be our consternation when the great Judge appears, and how awful the doom which he will then award to us! Ver. 10—16. It appears that sad divisions existed in the Corinthian church; some of its members professing that they belonged to Paul's company; others, to that of the eloquent Apollos; others, to that of Peter, the great apostle of the circumcision; while not a few alleged that they were the disciples of Christ alone, thus evincing their disregard for all his ministers. While the apostle deeply deplored such an unhappy state of things, he earnestly warned the Corinthians against its pernicious results. Let us remember, that divisions among persons who profess to hold the same grand doctrines, and are called by the same blessed name, are exceedingly sinful, and awfully ruinous in their consequences. What do they arise from? They have their origin in spiritual pride, ambition, selfishness, and other malignant passions. They are the wicked seed which the devil sows in the church, with a view to hinder the work of Christ, and ruin souls. Let us, then, avoid such evils, and study to speak the same things, and to be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment, shunning the society of those who would in any way prevent us from keeping the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace; and let us pray for the speedy arrival of the period when peace and unity shall dwell in all the borders of the visible church. Ver. 17—31. The great object for which the apostle had received his commission, was to proclaim the gospel to perishing men; and this he laboured to do with all plainness of speech, that the end of his ministry might not be frustrated. The preaching of faith in a crucified Jesus, as the only way in which a sinner can obtain reconciliation with God, and meetness for heaven, might be regarded as foolishness, by proud, perverse men, and it was actually so regarded both by Jews and Greeks; nevertheless, it is the power of God, and the wisdom of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. None of the ancient philosophical schemes could save a single soul. But the despised doctrines of the cross have been mighty through God's Spirit to save souls, and in such a way as that God alone should have all the glory.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we draw nigh to thee this night in the name of thy beloved Son with whom thou art ever well pleased, and for whose sake thou art well pleased also with all such as rely on his righteousness. We adore thee, as God over all, the blessed and only potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. Thou art worthy of all praise, and honour, and glory, for thou hast created, and thou constantly upholdest all things. Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens; and thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds, thy righteousness is like the great mountains; thy judgments are a great deep; O Lord, thou preservest man and beast. How excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God! therefore, the children of men may well put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. Many, O Lord, our God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward; they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee; if we would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered. We praise and thank thee for all the mercies of which we have partaken this day: we trace them all to thee, the Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift. But we praise and bless thee, especially for Jesus, thine unspeakable gift, and for the gospel of thy grace, which thou proclaimest to us in thy word. While that gospel is to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness, O let it be to all of us the power of God, and the wisdom of God unto salvation! Open our eyes that we may perceive how admirably suited it is to our case, as a message of mercy; convince us of our guilt and sin, that we may feel our need of the unspeakable blessings which it offers to us; and give us faith cordially to embrace it, and to commit the whole interests of our souls for time and eternity into the hands of that divine Redeemer, whom thou, in thy unfathomable love, hast provided for a fallen world. O Lord, prevent us, we beseech thee, from despising and rejecting him whom thou hast sent, seeing none other can deliver us from the guilt, and dominion, and punishment of sin. May he be made of thee unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption; and being effectually taught to believe in his name, and made to experience the quickening power of his Spirit, and the joys and hopes of his great salvation, may we ever be disposed and enabled to give all the glory to thee, by whom thy people are chosen, and called, and justified, and glorified. O make us more like thyself, more like our divine Master, more holy, and humble, and meek, and heavenly-minded. Deliver us from all the remains of sin within us; perfect thine own work in our souls, and prepare us, by whatever means thou judgest best, for dwelling with thee for ever. Take us all, O Lord, under thy fatherly care and protection this night, and fit us for the duties and trials of another day, if thou shalt spare us to see it; and all we ask is for the sake of thy blessed Son. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVII. 4—8.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS 11.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—9. Here Wisdom, that is, the Lord Jesus Christ, is represented under the figure of a father instructing his children. Having already warned the perverse of the tremendous consequences of their rejection of her wholesome counsels, he now proceeds to point out more particularly the way in which men may obtain heavenly knowledge, and the blessed effects, both here and hereafter, of this invaluable acquisition. Let us mark the directions which she gives us regarding these all-important matters. We must entertain her exhortations, and store them up in our memories; we must listen with eager attention to her precepts, and exert ourselves to comprehend them. Like men in earnest about the salvation of their souls, we must, above all, plead with God for the teaching of his Holy Spirit, that we may thereby be led into all the truth, supplicating with David, 'open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.' As the knowledge which divine wisdom imparts is infinitely more precious and desirable than the most valuable earthly treasures, so we must desire it with far more avidity, and strive to be possessed of it with far more diligence and perseverance, than we would search for hidden stores of gold or silver. We must evince our esteem of it, by studiously seeking for it, as covetous men seek for money, seizing every opportunity of profiting in it, and pursuing such advantages as may occur for obtaining it, not relaxing our efforts though we do not immediately reach our object; but continuing to inquire, and search, and pray, and sparing no pains to ascertain what the will of the Lord is. If we act in this manner, what will be the result? Our labour will be abundantly rewarded; for 'we shall understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God.' Indeed, the result could not be different, seeing the Lord has promised to grant wisdom to all who seek it in faith and earnestness, and has even stored it up in his beloved Son, for the very purpose of being communicated to his praying people. 'Our life is hid with Christ in God,' and 'in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.' And when he vouchsafes to them his wisdom, in answer to their fervent supplications, they are enabled to keep the paths of judgment, and to understand righteousness, and judgment, and equity; yea, every good path. Ver. 10—22. 'The first steps towards heavenly wisdom may be attended with difficulty, and seem unpleasant; but, it is here intimated, that when once wisdom has really obtained an entrance into the heart, it will become pleasant to the soul; and by its pleasantness, as well as its instructions, it will preserve the possessor from the destructive allurements of sin.' Manifold are the snares and temptations to which we are continually exposed; some of these proceed from our own deceitful and desperately wicked hearts; many of them from the world; and many more from the suggestions and wiles of the devil, 'who walketh about continually, as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.' But besides these abounding evils, which are ever ready to entangle and ruin us, we are encompassed on all hands with bad examples, and cunning seducers of both sexes; with men of reprobate minds, who speak froward things, continually endeavouring to spread infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness, especially among the rising generation,—who have abandoned the paths of uprightness, that they may walk without restraint in the ways of darkness,—who rejoice in the practice of all manner of iniquity; and with adulterous women too, who, like Delilah of old, the bewitching ensnarer of Samson, by their vile flatteries, are continually attempting to draw the young and unwary into their fatal net. It is truly said here, that the houses of such infamous persons incline unto death, and their paths unto the dead; so that none that go unto them return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life. What can effectually preserve us from these fearful evils? Heavenly wisdom will do it; but it will do it only if it enters into our hearts, and is fixed there by the hand of the Holy Spirit, as a powerful practical principle within us.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we come before thee confessing our unworthiness. O Lord, deal not with us, we beseech thee, according to our deservings, but according to thine own boundless mercy in Christ Jesus. Behold, O God, our shield, and look on the face of thine anointed. For his sake receive us graciously, and love us freely. Though our trespasses be more numerous and more aggravated than we can conceive, yet the blood of thy beloved Son, shed on the cross for the remission of sin, can wash them all away; and we flee to that blood; we entreat thee to wash our polluted souls in that precious fountain which thou hast opened for sin and uncleanness. Though we can bring nothing to thee but nakedness and filthy rags, yet the perfect righteousness of Emmanuel can clothe our nakedness, and make us stand accepted before thee; and we desire to take hold of this unspotted robe, that we may be clothed therein. O Lord, do thou clothe us in it; and do thou also renew us in the spirit of our minds, by the sanctifying grace that is in Christ Jesus, that we may be a holy people unto thee the Lord. O give us faith to look to him alone, to receive him in all the fullness of the blessings which thou hast treasured up in him for the supply of thy people's necessities, and to cleave to him through all the remaining days of our life, as the Lord our righteousness, and peace, and strength, and consolation. Thou knowest how blind we are; O send forth thy saving light and truth into our hearts to lead and guide us. O impart to us thy Holy Spirit to open our eyes, that we may behold the wondrous things which are contained in thy law. Let it ever be our chief desire to know thee as thou art in Christ, to know thy beloved Son, as the only Saviour of a perishing world, and to know, and love, and obey all thy revealed will. Let us never be weary of searching thy blessed word; make its inestimable truths plain to us; above all, render them sweet to our taste, even sweeter than honey from the honey-comb, and more precious than thousands of gold and silver. Let them be a light to our feet, and a lamp to our path. We look to thee for strength and guidance this day. O Lord, it is not in man that walketh to direct his own steps; lead thou us, then, in the way in which we ought to go; keep us from the paths in which destroyers walk; and let all the trials which we have to encounter this day tend, through thy blessing, to prepare us for thy blessed rest above; and all we ask is for the great Redeemer's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 17—20.

SCRIPTURE—I COR. II.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—5. What a noble pattern of a Christian minister was the apostle Paul! With what simplicity of mind and unwearied diligence did he labour in his Master's cause! He had ever but one end in view, which was, the declaring unto men the testimony of God concerning Jesus Christ and him crucified: and this testimony he delivered to the Corinthians, and every where else, without the smallest parade of human oratory or human learning. Christ was the centre and the sun of his preaching; and knowing that this was God's appointed method for the salvation of men, he was fully assured, that wherever it was set forth, even in the most unadorned manner, it would be blessed for the conversion of as many as had been ordained to eternal life. He was most solicitous that the faith of the Corinthians should stand not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God; and it was this feeling which often oppressed him with fear and trembling, lest his infirmity should hinder his success, or in any way thwart the glorious doctrines which he promulgated. It is impossible, but that the ministrations of such a devoted servant of Christ should be eminently successful. He tells us they were so; for his speech was in demonstration of the Spirit and of power. Ver. 6—9. Let us mark the import of the wisdom of which the apostle here speaks. It is no other than the gospel of the grace of God, which, as a grand scheme of divine contrivance, signally displays the manifold wisdom of God, and is suited, designed, and blessed for making men wise unto salvation, through faith in a crucified Saviour. This wisdom is very different from the wisdom of the men of this world, whose various devices for propitiating the favour of God, and making corrupt man better, are trifling and vain, and will perish with themselves. It is the wisdom of God in a mystery, being too deep and unsearchable to be fully comprehended by any created being, and too spiritual and holy to be duly understood and received by men of carnal minds. The Mosaic dispensation only conveyed some obscure intimations of it. It was hidden under Jewish types and shadows. In a word, it was ordained and intended by God, before the world began, as the scheme by which he should conduct his chosen people to the enjoyment of salvation here, and of eternal glory hereafter. Proud, self-righteous men may despise this mystery as foolishness; yet all who are perfect, that is, all who are savingly enlightened by the Holy Spirit, and have attained to some considerable measure of knowledge and grace, through their acquaintance with it, regard it as the power of God, and the wisdom of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth; and as providing blessings for all who cordially embrace it, which far surpass any thing that has been seen, or heard, or imagined by men. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.' Ver. 10—13. Even the apostles themselves did not discover the mystery of divine wisdom in the redemption of sinners by the incarnation, righteousness, atoning sacrifice, and mediation of God's coequal Son, by their own sagacity; but God revealed it to them by his Spirit; for that divine agent alone knoweth the deep things of God, and therefore none but he can discover them savingly and effectually to the soul of the sinner; just as no man knoweth and can reveal the thoughts and secret purposes of a man's heart, save the spirit of man which is in him. What need have we all to remember this vital truth of the gospel! Let it, then, be our daily fervent prayer, that the Lord would pour down the Holy Ghost upon us, to lead us into all the truth, and to make us savingly acquainted with that mystery of godliness which he has devised for our salvation. Ver. 14—16. How humbling, yet how true are these words, 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually-discerned.' Though the spiritual things which the Holy Ghost reveals in the scripture, be placed in the clearest light before the minds of unregenerate men, yet they do not embrace and approve of them, because through the darkness, pride, and depravity of their carnal hearts, they account them uninteresting, unnecessary, inconsistent, or absurd; yea, they are under a moral incapacity of understanding them in a truly spiritual and practical manner, because sin has deprived them of the power of spiritual discernment, and of all spiritual relish. It is widely different with those, however, who have been renewed in the spirit of their minds. Having been led into an acquaintance with divine things by the Holy Spirit, they are capable of forming a right judgment concerning all that relates to God's way of salvation by the Lord Jesus Christ, they can distinguish truth from error in every thing connected with that all-important matter; they discern a heavenly glory in all its parts; and they feel their transforming power within them.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we adore and praise thee as the great parent of mercies. We bless thee for life, and health, and every temporal comfort we possess. Above all, we thank thee for the inestimable religious privileges which we enjoy in the happy land wherein we dwell. Thou hast sent the glad tidings of thy great salvation to this distant island of the sea; and many of its inhabitants hast thou drawn to thyself through faith in the blood of thy beloved Son. Thou hast opened wells of salvation in the midst of us, to which thou art daily inviting us to repair, that we may drink, and be refreshed by their healing waters. O Lord, let us not, like too many, despise thy rich mercy. Let us not account thy gracious plan of saving sinners foolishness, because it tends to humble our proud carnal hearts, and requires that we should render to thee all the glory of our salvation. Let us be ever so much abased, but be thou and thy great name exalted. To us belong shame and confusion of face, but to thee be everlasting honour and glory ascribed. O Lord, help us to embrace the Son of thy love, as he is freely offered to us. Make him our prophet, priest, and king. Reveal him to our hearts by thy Holy Spirit, that we may know the things which are freely given us of thee. O Lord, thou hast promised the gift of thy Holy Spirit. O Lord, we now plead thine own promise; deny us not this gift, and that we may be brought into a holy resemblance to him. O Lord, we would be satisfied with nothing short of a full share of all the blessings of the everlasting covenant, and a real union with Christ. Enable us to live by faith upon the Son of God; and growing daily in all holiness, and humility, and meekness, and heavenly-mindedness, to become more and more conformed to his blessed image, and more and more fit for dwelling with him where he is. Deliver us from every remnant of indwelling sin, and fill us with love to that Saviour who loved us and died for us. O Lord, let the savour of his name be diffused abroad through the whole earth. Let his great salvation be speedily proclaimed in every land, that people of every nation, and tongue, and colour, may praise thy name. May thy Holy Spirit abundantly bless the means that are now used for evangelizing our benighted and guilty race, and let all men soon be brought to feel his illuminating, and converting, and sanctifying power. O Lord, we desire to thank thee, for all the kindness, and care, and protection which thou hast caused us to experience this day, and we would now commit ourselves to thy fatherly keeping for this night. If it be thy will, let our rest be refreshing, that we may be strengthened for the duties and trials of a new day. Hear us, O Lord, and accept of us, and answer us for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXI. 7.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS III.

REMARKS.

Christ is emphatically called the wisdom of God, because he came to destroy 'the wisdom of the wise, and to bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent, by bringing life and immortality to light through the gospel. It is immaterial whether in this chapter we suppose 'wisdom' to personify Christ, or the gospel he reveals. For just as the sun is seen by the bright beams he throws around us, so is Christ revealed to us in that religion of which he is the author.

Wisdom affectionately addresses us as a tender parent, solicitous about the dearest interests of his children. 'My son, forget not my law, but let thine heart keep my commandments.' The soul which is filled with love to God, and under the influence of his Spirit, will yield a cheerful obedience to the divine law; for once the spirit of adoption is imparted, God's commandments are no longer felt to be 'grievous,' they are become the joy, rejoicing, and strength of the new-born child of grace. In the spirit of filial affection he prays, 'O let me not wander from thy commandments,' for 'I delight in the law of God after the inward man;' 'on God's law will I meditate day and night.' His heart, once the dwelling-place of all iniquity—the seat of enmity and rebellion to God and to his law, is now become the treasury of the commandments of his God. Here he hides them and keeps them in safe custody. He suffers not the fowls of the air to pick away the precious seed, nor the wild beasts of the desert to trample it under foot, nor enemies to choke it with tares, nor the 'little foxes' to pluck its tender fruit. 'The word of God dwells in him richly in all wisdom.' On it he fixes the steadfast eye of faith, and adopts it as the rule of his life. He binds it about his neck as his highest ornament and boast, the conspicuous badge, and undoubted evidence of his fidelity and love to God, and thence he receives grace in every time of need. In all his ways the humble and devout man acknowledges God, asking directions of his heavenly Father in every undertaking. While the worldly unrenowned man never doubts his own prudence and ability, flattering himself he has foresight and penetration enough to discover the right path, as well as resolution to pursue it, the man possessed of heavenly wisdom leans not on 'his own understanding, but trusts in the Lord. He has been taught from experience, from scripture, and from the Holy Spirit, that 'it is not in man to direct his own steps' aright, and that he has neither a sufficiency of wisdom, nor of righteousness, nor of strength in himself. In arranging his plans, in forming connections, in choosing associates, in regulating his pursuits, he prays that God would direct him aright, and would either thwart or prosper his measures, as they might prove favourable or unfavourable to his best interests. In all things he cultivates a sense of his dependence on his heavenly Father.

'Happy, truly, is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding; happy here, and happy hereafter. In this world, he possesses the favour and friendship of God and good men. With a conscience void of offence towards God and man, he can enjoy, without abusing, all the comforts of life, and regard them as tokens of a Father's love. Even affliction, the effects of sin, is deprived of its sting, when known to proceed from the hand of a wise and tender Father, affording an evidence of God's love, and of the believer's sonship. In short, he is not only led by a right and secure way to the 'city of habitation,' but the ways thither are ways of pleasantness and paths of peace. But what will be his blessedness in heaven? No heart can conceive! There his joy will be full. He will be put in possession of treasures more precious than rubies, more durable than the purest gold, an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. There 'Christ is made of God to him wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption.' 'Mark the perfect man, and behold the up-right, for the end of that man is peace.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art God, and there is none to be compared unto thee—infinite in wisdom, in knowledge, and in truth. Thou art worthy to be praised, and to be had in reverence of all that draw nigh to thee. Wherewithal shall we come before the Lord, and bow ourselves before the most high God? We, who are sinful dust and ashes, are undeserving of the very least of that mercy which we are daily experiencing from thee, our heavenly Father. We have renounced thy parental authority—rejected paternal counsel—forsaken our Father's home—and broken thy holy law,—and by our wilful and unnatural rebellion rendered ourselves obnoxious to thy wrath and curse. Deeming ourselves wiser than thee, we sought our happiness and peace in the ways of sin, and folly, and shame, and are plunged into a state of sin and misery, from which we are both unable and unwilling to deliver ourselves. We have loved idols, and after them would we go. Justly, O Lord, mightest thou have left us to reap the bitter fruits of what we have sowed to ourselves, and said to us in thy hot indignation, He hath loved idols, let him alone. Behold thou art wroth, for we have sinned without cause, and deserve to die without mercy. But thou art God and not man; therefore it is that we are not consumed. Thou art our Father; we are the clay, and thou the potter. Be not wroth very sore, neither remember iniquity for ever. Return, O Lord, deliver our souls, and save us for thy mercies' sake. See God, our shield from merited wrath, look upon us in the face of thine anointed. Let thy mercy and truth in Christ Jesus be engraven on the table of our hearts, and make our souls the faithful depositories of thy holy law. Enable us to renounce ourselves, and to trust in the Lord with our hearts, and not to lean to our own darkened understandings. When we lack wisdom, may we ask it of thee, who teacheth savingly and to profit. When thine arm is uplifted to chasten us with the rod of affliction, may we learn to kiss the rod, and bow in submission to those sovereign appointments, which while they trouble us, and cause us to tremble, yet make our heart soft, and work in us the blessed fruits of righteousness. If thou anointest our head with oil, and causest our cup of blessing to overflow, may our souls overflow with gratitude, and our hearts with love, to thee, the bountiful Giver of all good. As we have freely received, may we freely give. Enable us to devise liberal things, doing good when it is in the power of our hand to do it; honouring the Lord with our substance; and in all things endeavouring to do to others, as we, in like circumstances, would have them do unto us. Dwell, O God, in our hearts, and dwell in our habitation. May our earthly dwelling-place be the habitation of the just, on which thy blessing rests. Then will goodness and mercy follow us all the days of our life, and we shall dwell at length in thine house for ever. Hear, Lord, our prayers, and grant us an answer of peace for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—I COR. III.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The Corinthians had been blest with the labours of several faithful ministers of Christ, especially of Paul, who had planted the gospel among them, and of Apollos who had watered the seed which had been sown. After their departure, other teachers had arisen, who, pursuing their own ambitious views, beguiled the unstable Corinthians, puffed them up by flattery, filled them with a conceit of their own attainments, undermined the peace of the church, and made the cross of Christ of none effect. Pride begat jealousies, strifes, and divisions, and finally led to lamentable errors in doctrine, and gross irregularities in practice. Their high spiritual privileges, instead of being improved for their advancement in the divine life, proved the occasion of discord and animosity. They became divided into various parties, of which they constituted their favourite ministers the separate heads, and by their eager contentions for the glory of their leaders—over-estimating one, and depreciating their opponents, they entirely lost sight of the grand essentials of genuine godliness. To repress these unchristian rivalries, the apostle remonstrates with his converts on the sinfulness of a conduct so injurious to themselves, and to the holy religion they professed. He points out the source, the inconsistency, the evil effects now, and the bitter consequences hereafter, of the conduct he deprecates; and then directs them to the only means by which these evils may be remedied, and their consequences prevented.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

If believers would desire to make attainments in scriptural knowledge, it must be pursued in the way of holiness and of faith. For the man who has made the highest attainments in spirituality of mind, will also be the best instructed in the deep things of God. 'Mere knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth.' If any man love God, the same is known of him; and the secret of the Lord is with such as fear him, and he will show them his covenant. Whatever tends to carnalize the mind, or withdraw the heart and affections from God, ought to be carefully avoided, even though in itself lawful, as the soul is thereby exposed to the wiles of satan, the evidence of a personal interest in Jesus is apt to be overshadowed; and that progress in the knowledge of God is retarded which might qualify the believer for higher degrees of perfection and happiness in heaven.

Satan often appears as an angel of light, especially to God's children, because in this form he can assail them unsuspected. In this character he tries to avert their faith and dependence from Christ, and to substitute in his stead ministers, who are but earthen vessels, or ordinances, which are only channels of grace, and satan cares not to what object their love and hope is transferred, provided he can deprive them of the true source of all their strength, an humble trust in God. How many has he thus deluded with a name to live, while they have in reality forsaken Christ, the true and only foundation of a sinner's hope; and on a mere profession of faith in his name, erected an edifice of a fair self-righteous morality, which will present as feeble a resistance to the storm of divine wrath, as wood, hay, or stubble to the devouring flame! 'Let no man deceive himself,' 'God is not mocked;' what profit is there in self-deception, if sinners cannot succeed in deceiving God. Better far to 'awake to righteousness, and no longer sin against themselves and God.' If our hearts be the temple of God, let us permit them to become the residence of the Holy Spirit. Let nothing unholy or that defileth be permitted to enter, but let the incense of praise, and the pure offering of a contrite spirit, be daily presented to Jehovah from the altar of the heart. But if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, whatever he may profess, that man is none of his. But whosoever possesses the meek and lowly Spirit of Jesus, is enriched with all the fullness of God. The wisdom of God instructs his ignorance; the strength of God is perfected in his weakness; the honour of God is the theme of his glorying; the unsearchable riches of Christ his unfailing treasury. In short, 'all things are his; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are his; and he is Christ's, and Christ is God's.'

PRAYER.

Almighty God, before whom angels veil their faces with their wings, and seraphs bend in lowly adoration, bow down thine ear to the thanksgivings and supplications of thy guilty children, who would approach thee through Jesus Christ. Consume us not in the fire of thy holy indignation, but regard us with that favour and love which thou bearest to thine own. We thank thee, that we have an advocate with thee, even Jesus Christ, the righteous one, who has a fellow-feeling with all our infirmities, who knows the frailties of our frame, who sympathises in all our afflictions, whose plea is all-powerful, and whose advocacy is all-prevalent. Through him we approach with boldness to thy throne of grace to seek and obtain mercy; and to find grace to help us in our time of need. We would desire to place all our dependence, and build all our hope of salvation on the stone, the tried stone, the precious corner-stone, the sure foundation, which, in mercy and love, thou hast laid in Zion for thy believing people; for other foundation can no man lay, but that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. To whom thou, O God, hast entrusted the mighty work of our salvation, may we by faith intrust with the keeping of our souls. On whom thou hast laid the iniquities of us all, may we lay the burden of our sins, and our sorrows, and take his yoke which is easy, and his burden which is light. Through him may we find access by the Spirit unto thee, the Father, bound to thee, and to our Christian brethren, by him who is the corner-stone of the church of God; and on this pearl of great price, may we be enabled to rear an edifice adorned by the fruits of the Spirit, and reflecting the beauties of holiness. Permit us not to fall into the soul-ruinous sin of deceiving ourselves with a mere name to live, while we are in reality spiritually dead. Let us not make a Saviour of mere instruments and outward ordinances; but looking by faith, through the means of the God of all grace, may we value the earthen vessels as the blessed channels of communicating to our souls the pure waters of life which flow from the throne of God. May we obey them that are our spiritual overseers, and submit ourselves; for they watch for our souls, as they that must give account. Make our hearts, O God, the honoured temples of the Holy Ghost, that, by his indwelling and sanctifying power, we may become more and more qualified for dwelling for ever with the Lord, in the glorified and heavenly temple of the Zion above. Enrich our souls with the treasures of grace; give us to be spiritually minded, which is life and peace. Make us heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ Jesus; this is all our salvation, and all our desire. And to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, be ascribed all glory and praise, now, and for ever. Amen.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS IV.

REMARKS.

Solomon was fully alive to the importance and good effects of a religious education. He had himself possessed the advantage of being trained under the watchful eye of a pious father, who had taught him the commandments of God from his childhood. He esteemed these early lessons of wisdom as his greatest blessings, and desired to transmit them to his own children, and to future generations, as his most valuable legacy.

As life is the seed-time for eternity, so is childhood and youth the seed-time for ripper years. According to the seed then sown will be the future fruit. 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.' What duty can be more consonant with reason and scripture than that of the religious instruction of the young by their parents, their natural guardians? When professing Christian parents can trample under foot the most solemn vows—exhibit an utter destitution of Christian, if not of natural, affection, towards their offspring—set before them no holy example—instil into their youthful minds no sound religious principles—and disregard their spiritual interests, how can it be otherwise than that the rising generation should spring up a seed of evil doers—children that are corrupters—that they should prove forsakers of God, disobedient to parents, covenant-breakers, unruly? Each successive generation, copying the evil example of that which preceded, becomes in this manner more deeply depraved, departs farther from God, and at last, when their measure of iniquity is full, God is provoked to pour out his fury on the families and nation that call not on his name.

How awfully mistaken are those who act as if they thought true religion beneficial only for a dying man, a good preparative for such a change, but as rather detrimental than otherwise to a man's temporal prosperity! Even Christian parents entertain some false notion of this kind, as if to train up their offspring for heaven were to unfit them for the occupations and duties of life. Solomon's views of the effects of religion in this life are very different, ver. 7—14. The fear of God he had found to be the best safeguard against the indulgence of selfishness, covetousness, malice, wrath, envy, deceit, as well as against those grosser vices which entail shame and misery in this life on those who practise them. 'The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked; but he blesseth the habitation of the righteous.'

But whatever lessons of moral instruction may be taught, and however diligently they may be inculcated, they will, for all spiritual good, prove vain, unless they be not only engraven on the memory, but impressed on the heart, by the stamp of the divine Spirit. Solomon was taught, by experience and observation, that the heart was the root of all evil, as well as the seat of holy principles of heavenly planting. 'Out of the heart proceed all evil thoughts;' and also out of the heart are the issues or springs of spiritual life. If the life would be reformed, it is necessary, first, that the heart be renewed, for according to the state of the heart will be the life. Purify this fountain, and all its streams, its thoughts, words, and actions, will be pure. Well, then, does Wisdom teach us, 'keep thy heart with all diligence.' It is of vital importance to the interests of the immortal soul, that a habit of ruling and governing the thoughts and dispositions of the heart be early acquired and diligently practised, that its evil propensities may be nipped in the bud before they attain maturity.

PRAYER.

Father of mercies and God of all grace, we would desire to kneel before thee, our Maker, and to offer thee up our humble tribute of gratitude and praise. Thou hast guarded us from all outward evil, watched over us with parental tenderness during the obscurity of night, and brought us in safety to the blessings of another day. We have laid us down and slept, for thou, Lord, hast caused us to dwell in safety. To thee we are indebted for all the temporal and spiritual blessings we enjoy. It is of thine infinite goodness that we have been born in a land where the sound of the gospel may be heard, and its privileges freely enjoyed. It is to thee we owe the advantages of a scriptural and godly education, whereby we have been taught to know our Creator in the days of our youth, and instructed in the way of everlasting life. Thou hast given us line upon line, and precept upon precept; and in the enjoyment of sabbath blessings and gospel ordinances, thou hast hedged in our path, so that we should not err from thy ways. Thou hast led us about, and instructed us, and kept us as the apple of thine eye. Well mightest thou say regarding us, What could have been done more to my vineyard that I have not done to it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes. Notwithstanding all thy tender solicitude and long-suffering forbearance, how unfruitful have we proved ourselves to be! Have we not refused to listen to the voice of heavenly wisdom? How have we hated instruction, and despised reproof, and disobeyed the voice of our teachers! How have we gone in the path of the wicked, and followed the multitude to do evil! and breaking through all thy hedges, and bursting all the barriers of conscience, and scripture, and godly friends, and providential warnings, that opposed us in the indulgence of our ungodly inclinations, have we not drunk in iniquity as the ox drinketh up water? Our sins are highly aggravated, in that they have been committed against knowledge, light, truth, warnings, and all the means of grace, leaving us, O God, without an excuse to plead for our multiplied transgressions. Against thee, thee only have we sinned; for we acknowledge our transgressions; our sins are ever before us. We lothe ourselves in our own sight for our iniquities and abominations. Wash, then, us thoroughly from all our iniquity, and cleanse us from our sin; for though they be as scarlet, thou canst make them whiter than the snow; though they be red like crimson, thou canst make them pure as wool. Create within us clean hearts; renew a right spirit within us. O that the blood of Christ might be savingly applied by thy Spirit to purify the bitter fountain of the heart, to purge our consciences, renew our wills, and sanctify our natures, that their issues might be life for ever. Give us grace to exercise a godly jealousy over our thoughts, feelings, and words, that we may cease to do evil and learn to do well. Establish all our goings in the ways of holiness and eternal life, that we may be seduced by no temptations to turn aside either to the right hand or to the left. And may our path be yet that of the just, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. All our supplications we present in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—1 CORINTHIANS IV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The causes which led to the lamentable declension of the church of Corinth have been already adverted to. The task of removing them was both painful and delicate to the tender-hearted and humble apostle of the Gentiles. Painful, that it should have been requisite for him, who 'travailed in birth until Christ should be formed in them,' to administer reproof to his children in the faith; and delicate, lest, by provoking their enmity to himself and to the truth, he should sacrifice altogether the hope of advancing their farther good, and defeat the very ends he sought most earnestly to promote. Under the influence of such feelings and views most men would have deemed it prudent to refrain from giving offence, under the plea that their future usefulness might be impeded. But the apostle Paul did not 'confer with flesh and blood,' but acted in the manner which he was persuaded fidelity to Christ, and love to the souls of the backsliding Corinthians, imperatively demanded.

Before animadverting directly on their heinous offences, he reluctantly enters into a vindication of his own character, in order to remove the injurious suspicions they entertained respecting the motives of his ministerial conduct. Necessity was laid upon him, as an apostle of Jesus Christ, to reprove, rebuke, correct, with all authority, as their conduct required, uninfluenced either by their praise or censure. Their censure he disregarded, for God was his Judge; their praise he sought not, for though he magnified his office, he did not exalt himself; so far otherwise, he wished both himself and them never to forget, that he and his friend Apollos, as well as all other ministers of Christ, had nothing to glory of. They were but instruments in God's hands—servants, stewards, ambassadors of Christ, whose commission they bore, and whose embassy they were bound faithfully to discharge. The worldly circumstances of the Corinthians was one of ease and comfort, honour and affluence; while his was, like his Master's, one of painful destitution and disinterested sufferings, rewarded by cold ingratitude and bitter persecution. By what motives, then, could he be actuated, but those of faithfulness to Christ, and love to the souls of men?

Well might the Corinthians be ashamed of their base ingratitude to him who thus toiled and suffered solely for their good. With singular tenderness of soul, and beautiful simplicity of language, the apostle, in verses fourteen and fifteen, hastens to overcome evil with good. His sole vengeance is love; all the retaliation he seeks is their salvation. A father's bowels yearn over them; and he expostulates with them as his beloved children, whom he would far rather reclaim to the ways of Christ, and to the paths of righteousness, by gentleness and affection, than by the painful rod of severity and rebuke.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The design of God, in all his works, is to advance and secure the glory of his own name. This great design should never be lost sight of, either by ministers, by congregations, or by individual Christians, and ought also to be carefully distinguished from the means and instruments employed to advance it. All other ends must be regarded as subordinate and inferior, and, if incompatible with this, must be renounced as unworthy and unsafe. Nothing can so dignify and exalt the creature, nothing can elevate its character and secure its happiness so effectually, as to deny selfish ends, and be devoted to God's glory. That soul enjoys the closest walk with God, which, in self-denying dependence on the Spirit of Christ, aims most simply at God's glory. This is the spring of all true and unreserved obedience. Whenever this high principle of the Christian character ceases to operate, the believer relapses into pride and vanity. Self becomes the object of his idolatrous pursuit; and he seeks the glory of others, with the view thereby of promoting his own, and indulges a censorious and uncharitable spirit towards those whose views suit not his selfish and unholy ends. The conduct of Paul and of the Corinthians strikingly exemplify those very opposite characters. Gazing at God's glory in the salvation of souls, and denying himself, the former stands a bright pattern for the imitation of all who serve Christ, and especially of those who are put in trust with the ministry of the gospel. The latter stands a beacon on the fatal rock of self-righteous pride, lest believers should make shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience.

PRAYER

O Lord, who is a God like unto thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? We would give thanks at the remembrance of thy holiness and justice, thy mercy and grace, as unfolded in the work of our redemption. In thy cross, O blessed Jesus, we see mercy and truth meeting together, righteousness and peace embracing each other, the glory of God exalted, and the rebellious sinner saved. Our souls, O Lord, would bless thee, and all that is within us would be stirred up to bless and magnify thy holy name, for thou forgivest all our iniquities; thou healest all our diseases; thou redeemest our lives from destruction; thou crownest us with loving-kindness and tender mercies. We have nothing that is good but what we have received from thy gracious hand; yet with thine own would we serve and glorify thee. We would not regard ourselves as our own property; we are thine, thou hast bought us with an infinite price, and we would desire to manifest our love to thee by glorifying thee in our bodies and spirits which are thine. Assist us, O Lord, in rendering to thee the true service of an undivided heart, for with such sacrifice thou art well pleased. Yet, alas! our consciences testify against us, that, during the past day, thy glory has not been our single or chief aim in all we have done. We have been endeavouring to serve God and mammon; or, alas! serving the world and ourselves to the utter exclusion of God from all our thoughts. And if our hearts condemn us, thou, who art greater than our hearts, and knowest all things, must condemn us also. We humbly confess, and with sorrow lament, how much we are influenced by the fear of the world's censure, or the love of the world's praise, by selfishness, and the love of carnal ease and security, and are thereby deterred from making any sacrifices of personal feeling or comfort for thy cause and glory. Pardon, O gracious God, our ingratitude, unbelief, and coldness of heart. Strengthen our faith, and augment our love to him who loved us, and gave himself a sacrifice for our sins, that we may be constrained to live no longer to ourselves, but to him who died for us and rose again. Grant us holy boldness and confidence through the faith of Jesus, that we may count it all joy to bear our Lord's reproach, and rejoice if we are counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. We would desire to glory in nothing but in the cross of Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto us, and we unto the world. Forgive us all our sins, and hear, answer, and accept of our prayers and praises, for Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXI. 7.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS VIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

There can be little doubt that Christ is the person by whom we are here addressed. Whether or not the inspired penman was fully aware of the real scope and bearing of the language which the Holy Ghost put into his mouth, is a question not so easily determined; but to us who have the New Testament writings as a key to explain the mysteries of the Old, it can hardly admit of a doubt, that he who was known to the ancient saints as 'Wisdom,' the impersonation of wisdom, intelligence, and truth, was none other than the second person in the Godhead, the eternal 'Word,' 'the Truth,' 'the Power of God, and the Wisdom of God.' Indeed there are many things in this chapter which it is impossible to apply to wisdom considered simply as an attribute of the divine nature; whilst there is no part of it that does not admit of an easy and obvious explanation, when we view it as the language of uncreated intelligence and Wisdom, addressed to the ignorant and guilty 'sons of men.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

It is grievous to think of the backwardness which there is in the human heart to receive the lessons of divine truth. Every other kind of instruction, even 'the instruction that causeth to err from the words of knowledge,' is willingly listened to and greedily devoured; but for the words of eternal life, the intimation of God's love toward a fallen world, sinners have no relish and no appetite. Upon this subject, of all others, 'their ears are dull of hearing.' They speak of religion as a difficult and abstruse subject, and talk of the impossibility of arriving at any certain conclusion, when the most pious and learned men have differed so widely. This, however, is but a mere subterfuge. What is the real state of the case? In every question of duty, and in every thing that concerns the way of a sinner's salvation, the language of God's word is plain, intelligible, and emphatic. 'Doth not Wisdom cry, and understanding put forth her voice?' Does not the proclamation of God's mercy to sinners, and the free invitation to all to come unto the Saviour, stand forth broadly and legibly on every page of the inspired word? And how precious are the words of Christ, to which sinners are thus turning a deaf ear! They are 'better than rubies, and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to them.' They speak to us of a reconciled Father, who, that we might not perish, but have everlasting life, gave up to the death his only begotten Son, that Son who 'was by him as one brought up with him, and was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him;' and who, in compliance with the will of his Father, came and tabernacled with men upon the earth, because 'his delights were with the sons of men.' Let us, then, reverently hearken to the counsels of infinite 'Wisdom,' even of Christ, when he counsels us to buy of him 'gold tried in the fire, that we may be rich, and white raiment, that we may be clothed, and eye-salve, that we may see.' And let us never forget, that 'whoso findeth Him, findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, our heavenly Father, we desire this morning to bow ourselves down in humble reverence at the footstool of thy throne. We would remember that thou art in heaven, and we upon the earth; that thou art our Creator, and we the work of thy hands; that thou art from everlasting to everlasting, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, and that we are of yesterday and know nothing. O Lord, make us duly sensible of our own ignorance and foolishness. Make us to see how far we have gone astray from the paths of true wisdom in forsaking God, the only permanent and satisfying portion of an immortal soul, and seeking for happiness in the empty and perishing joys of a vain world. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; but we have neither known nor considered the hand that feeds us, and that is daily loading us with benefits. We acknowledge, O God, the guilt, as well as the foolishness, of our ways. With shame and confusion of face would we confess the sin with which we have been chargeable, in preferring the creature to the Creator, and postponing the claims of God to the calls of our own wicked and corrupt inclinations. O Lord, pardon our iniquity, for it is very great. Deal with us not in thy wrath; vex us not in thy hot displeasure. Leave us not to reap the consequences of our own pursuits, or to be filled with the fruits of our own devices; but save us with an everlasting salvation, and magnify thy power and grace in the midst of our abounding iniquity. O make us all monuments of thy redeeming mercy, and glorify thy great name in rescuing us from the bondage of corruption, and bringing us into the glorious liberty of thy children. We thank thee for the promise of the Holy Spirit. O may his influences be richly shed abroad in our hearts, purifying our affections, renewing our wills, and transforming us wholly into the divine image. May he implant and cherish within us every holy disposition, confirm every right resolution, and strengthen us for the discharge of every duty. We desire to feel more and more our absolute dependence on thy promised grace. Lord, we are weak and insufficient; we have no strength in ourselves. We are ever ready to be drawn away into the communion of sin by the snares and temptations of a world that lieth in wickedness; and if left to ourselves, we must infallibly make shipwreck of our faith, and come short of eternal life. But our dependence is on thee; our hope is in thy word. Leave us not, O Lord, nor forsake us. Make thy grace sufficient for us, and perfect thy strength in our weakness. We thank thee that we have been preserved throughout the past night, and brought to see the light of another day. Keep us throughout this day from evil. Defend us from every accident and danger. Preserve us especially from sin. In all our intercourse with our fellow-men, may we be enabled to conduct ourselves as the followers of the Lord Jesus. May we set a watch upon our lips, that we offend not with our tongue. May we be enabled to keep our heart with all diligence from the intrusion of every sinful thought. And in the midst of the business and the various pursuits of time, may we be enabled ever to bear upon our minds the grand realities of eternity. Hear us, O Lord, in these our supplications, and graciously accept of us and of our services, for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LI.

SCRIPTURE—1 CORINTHIANS V.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In this chapter the apostle takes notice of a gross scandal that had broken out in the Corinthian church, and gives authoritative directions for purging it away. He commands them, without delay, to cast out that wicked person from their communion, to 'deliver him to satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus,' i. e. to excommunicate him; to regard him no longer as a Christian, but as a subject of satan's kingdom; 'a heathen man and a publican.' And this they were to do, not only for the safety of the Christian body, but out of a regard to the best interests of the offender himself, that in him the 'flesh,' or carnal nature, might be 'destroyed,' and his 'spirit saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.' It seems strange that in these circumstances the Corinthians should be

'puffed up,' and not rather humbled and overwhelmed with grief. But at this time party disputes and jealousies ran high among them. 'One said, I am of Paul; another, I am of Apollos; and so eager were their feelings of partizanship, and so anxious was each contending faction to uphold the reputation and screen the delinquencies of their favourite leaders, of whom it is probable this incestuous person was one, that they rather gloried and made a boast of his extraordinary gifts, and plumed themselves on their connection with one so eminent as a teacher, than mourned over the flagrant wickedness by which their church had been polluted. 'Your glorying,' says Paul, 'is not good;' meaning that it is eminently the reverse. He then reminds them, that a 'little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;' that wickedness is contagious, and if not speedily checked, would soon spread and contaminate the whole body. That even as the Israelites searched for and put away all leaven out of their houses before partaking of the passover, so it became them for whom 'Christ, their passover, was slain,' to purge out all such wickedness from among them, in order to a comfortable and profitable communion with Christ, and with one another, either at the Lord's table, or in the ordinary exercises of worship. He tells them, moreover, that although it was impossible, without going out of the world altogether, wholly to avoid the society of grossly immoral persons, they should studiously shun the companionship of every man professing to be a 'brother,' who was notoriously addicted to any one of the gross sins which he enumerates.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

How feeble is all human virtue without the restraining influence of the grace of God. In the case of the most heinous offender, the believer may behold what he himself might have been, had God only left him to the suggestions of his own corrupt heart. Let us, then, not be high-minded, but fear, and trust not to our own resolutions, but to the strength of promised grace. It is melancholy to think, that, even in this advanced period of the Christian church, we must needs go out of the world, if we would escape the contact of wicked and profligate men. But although we cannot, in the ordinary intercourse of life, avoid mingling with such characters, let us be careful to shun their society as much as possible, seeing that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.

PRAYER.

O Lord, to whom can we go but unto thee? Thou hast the words of eternal life. Thou only canst pardon our sins and sanctify our natures; canst heal our backslidings, and give grace to help us in every time of need. We would approach thee this evening under a deep sense of our guilt and unworthiness. It is of thy great mercy that we have not, long ere this time, been cast down as cumberers of the ground, and had our portion assigned us with the workers of iniquity, in that place where thou hast forgotten to be gracious. But in the exercise of thy wondrous forbearance and long-suffering, we are still spared in the land of the living, and in the place of hope. O may it not be to add iniquity unto iniquity, and to multiply provocation against thee, until thy long-suffering be exhausted, and thy Spirit cease to strive with us. May we esteem the time past of our lives more than sufficient to have wrought the will of the flesh, and resolve henceforth to live no longer the rest of our time in the flesh, to the lusts of man, but to the will of God. With deep humility and reverence would we acknowledge the sovereignty of thy grace in all thy dealings with the children of men. We feel that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy. And if we have been saved from falling into those gross transgressions of which others of our fellow-creatures have been guilty, it is not because we are by nature better than they, or because we have done any thing to deserve thy grace, but only through the free and sovereign mercy of God, who alone maketh us to differ. O may we never lose the impression, that our hearts are by nature deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. And may we learn every day to lean less and less on the strength of our own resolutions, and more and more on the strength of promised grace. Grant, O heavenly Father, that we may not only have deeper convictions of the evil of sin, but livelier views of the power, and grace, and sufficiency of the Saviour. May Christ be every day more precious to us; and whilst we rest upon him all our hopes of pardon and acceptance, may our affections flow out towards him in lively gratitude for the great love wherewith he has loved us. O that his name and praise were universally known and proclaimed! Lord, let the time soon come when his kingdom shall extend from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. Stir up in the hearts of all thy people a more ardent zeal for the glory of Christ, and the extension of his kingdom throughout the world. Bless all ministers and pastors in thy church; may they be wise to win souls unto Christ. And may a special blessing accompany the ministry of the word in our native land. Let thy Spirit descend like rain upon the mown grass, and as showers that water the earth. O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of us, and grant us times of refreshing from thy presence. Bless, we beseech thee, all with whom we are connected, by whatever tie. Enrich their souls with the communications of thy grace, and make all things to work together for their good. Be merciful to the poor, the sick, the afflicted, and the dying.

Sanctify family affliction to all who are visited with it; and prepare us for every dispensation of thy providence that awaits us in life. Prepare us for living or for dying. Teach us to submit with implicit acquiescence in every arrangement of thy holy will concerning us. And may we feel, that to us to live is Christ, and to die, unspeakable gain. We desire to commit ourselves to thy care and keeping this night. Forgive all the sins of the past day. Give us refreshing rest, and bring us to see the light of another morning in health and strength, to fit us for all our duties. And to thee, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, one God, be glory, and dominion, and praise, world without end. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XLI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XI.

REMARKS.

The various important instructions contained in this chapter may be comprised under three distinct heads, viz. Integrity, Discretion, and Liberality. The wise man presents these different topics under a variety of aspects, contrasting them with their opposites, and pointing out the consequences that respectively result from the practice of virtue and of vice. Let us endeavour, then, to lay to heart the weighty truths suggested by this portion of sacred scripture.

We are enjoined, in the first place, to observe the most rigid integrity and uprightness in all our dealings with our fellow men. 'A false balance is an abomination to the Lord; but a just weight is his delight.' It is lamentable to think of the fraud and deceit that is every day practised by men in their commercial intercourse one with another, each striving to over-reach his neighbour, and get the better of him in a bargain. Many who will not be guilty of literally employing a 'false balance,' will have no scruple to rob another of his substance by means scarcely less discreditable, taking advantage, for instance, of his pecuniary necessities to make him part with his goods below their value; or pretending to depreciate their worth, in order the more easily to get possession of them. 'It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer; but when he goeth his way, then he boasteth.' Let us remember, however, that 'riches' so acquired 'profit not in the day of wrath;' that day when God shall weigh every man's actions in the just balance of the sanctuary; and that, even as it respects this present world, honesty is the best policy; for whilst 'the integrity of the upright shall guide them, the perverseness of transgressors shall destroy them;' and that not only shall 'the righteous be recompensed on the earth, but also the wicked and the sinner.'

Secondly, We are instructed in this chapter to exercise prudence and discretion in all our intercourse with our fellow-creatures; to avoid detraction, tale-bearing, and rash and unwarranted suretyship for others.

Thirdly, We are here taught to exercise the grace of liberality. How encouraging is the promise, 'the liberal soul shall be made fat; and he that watereth shall be watered also himself.' Let us never forget that we are but stewards of the wealth which God has given us; and that although we have permission, first of all, to provide for the necessities and comforts of ourselves and families, we are bound to employ all that remains in the way that may most advance the glory of God. Men are never the richer of what they withhold from the cause of God, nor the poorer for what they give away; for 'there is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.' Nothing is a greater snare to men than making riches their confidence, and imagining that their happiness will always keep pace with their wealth. Let us remember, that 'he that trusteth to his riches shall fall; but the righteous shall flourish as a branch.' Let us bear in mind, moreover, that our liberality must extend itself to the temporal as well as the spiritual interests of mankind; and that we ought to provide for the hungry the bread that perishes, as well as that which endureth unto everlasting life. No character is more justly detested among men than he who strives to enrich himself at the expense of the sufferings of starving thousands. 'He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him; but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, we bless thee that what holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, has been by them committed to writing, and handed down for our edification and instruction, upon whom the ends of the world have come. Make us thankful for the holy scriptures, and teach us to draw from every part of them that instruction which they are designed and fitted to afford. And whilst we search them diligently, in order that we may know the things that are freely given us of God, even the things that belong to our everlasting peace, may we strive also to imbibe those maxims of practical wisdom with which they furnish us for directing our footsteps amid all the duties, and difficulties, and perplexities of life. In every part of our conduct may we be regulated by that wisdom which cometh from above. As the disciples of the Lord Jesus, may we strive to adorn his doctrine in all things; and by the uprightness, and consistency, and circumspection of our lives, endeavour to convince the world around us, that it is a doctrine according to godliness. Enable us to exemplify, in all our dealings, that honesty and integrity of conduct, which would rather suffer injury than inflict it; that charity which thinketh no evil, and taketh not up an ill report against its neighbour; that Christian prudence, which guides its affairs with discretion, so as to be able to distribute, with liberality, to the necessities of the poor and destitute. May we ever bear in mind, that we have nothing in this world which we can call our own; that all that we have is thine, and to be employed only in the way which will most promote thy glory. May we esteem it, therefore, our privilege, as well as our duty, to honour the Lord with our substance, and prize the bounties of thy providence only as affording us more extended means of advancing thy kingdom and cause in the world. O Lord, we would humble ourselves before thee on account of all our past shortcomings in these respects, and on account of all our other aggravated and multiplied sins. Lord, be merciful unto us, and deal with us not as we have deserved. Wash away all our guilt in the blood of the Lamb. We cast ourselves on thy sovereign and unmerited grace, beseeching thee to justify us freely, and to sanctify us wholly. And may we be enabled henceforth to love thee more sincerely, to serve thee more faithfully, and to render a more suitable return for all the goodness which we have experienced at thy hands. Our heart's desire and prayer for all our brethren of mankind is, that they may be saved, and brought to the knowledge of the truth. Let thy way be known upon the earth, and thy saving health among all nations. Bless especially our native land, and prosper a preached gospel in the midst of us. Pour out abundantly thy Spirit upon all thy servants in the ministry; and be pleased to add daily to thy church of such as shall be saved. Lord, take us into thy keeping this day; fit us for every duty and for every trial which may be awaiting us; and bring us at last into thy heavenly kingdom, where there is fullness of joy, and pleasures for evermore. And all that we ask is for the sake of Jesus Christ, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM CXXXIII.

SCRIPTURE—1 CORINTHIANS VI.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In the first part of this chapter the apostle reproves the Corinthians for their quarrelsome and litigious disposition generally; and in particular, that in the settlement of their differences they were in the habit of dragging each other before heathen tribunals, instead of submitting to the arbitration of their Christian brethren. His remarks have no reference to the public administration of justice, which is an ordinance of God, and most important to the well-being of civil society. He refers exclusively to personal disagreements among brethren, the very existence of which reflected upon their Christian character, much more the having recourse to 'unjust' or unbelieving magistrates for redress. Upon such matters even the 'least esteemed' saint in the church was sufficient to decide, not to speak of pastors and other office-bearers, whose time would be much better employed otherwise. He reminds them, that the humblest saint shall, on the great day, be associated with Christ in the general judgment of men and angels; and that they ought, therefore, to consider such as fully adequate to take cognizance of the 'smallest matters.' He then proceeds to administer a solemn warning, suggested, probably, by what he had heard of the immoralities that prevailed in the Corinthian church; and after enumerating a hideous catalogue of crimes, any one of which would effectually exclude them from the kingdom of heaven, encourages them to the exercise of faith and repentance by the intimation, that 'such were some of them' who were now, nevertheless, 'washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of the Lord.' The most crying enormity in the church of Corinth seems to have been the prevalence of sins of uncleanness, against which the apostle, in the concluding part of the chapter, lifts up his voice in a strain of indignant rebuke and earnest exhortation, pointing out at once their offensive character in the sight of God, their ruinous consequences to the soul, and the aggravated guilt incurred by those who could thus dare to desecrate and defile a temple of the Holy Ghost.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Nothing is more unseemly in the professors of the gospel than a quarrelsome and contentious disposition. The followers of the Saviour ought to be distinguished above all others by a spirit of meekness, gentleness, and self-denying kindness, qualities that shone so conspicuously in the character of their divine Master. And where differences do occur (as can hardly fail occasionally to happen, constituted as even the best of men are), it is infinitely preferable to have such disputes settled by the friendly interposition of Christian brethren, than by having recourse to courts of law, and rather to suffer wrong, than bring discredit on our holy faith. And let all who name the name of Christ, be careful to depart from all iniquity. And let us learn, also, from this chapter, the necessity of keeping all our appetites and passions under salutary control. As Christians, we are 'bought with a price,' emphatically a 'price,' a price which no language can express, and no imagination conceive—even the blood of God's own Son; and are, therefore, not our own, but God's, and bound to glorify him in our bodies and our spirits, which are his. O let us abstain, then, from every thing that might defile or damage such a costly purchase, and strive so to purify ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit, that we may be indeed 'temples of the Holy Ghost,' and 'habitations of God through the Spirit.'

PRAYER.

O thou that dwellest in the heavens, whose name is Holy, and who art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, how shall we, thy guilty and polluted creatures, venture to approach thy footstool, or to lift up our eyes to the place where thine honour dwelleth! O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee; but unto us, shame and confusion of face, because we have rebelled against thee. We have reason to be deeply abased when we come into thy presence, and think of all our past ingratitude, and unbelief, and disobedience. We have forfeited all claim to thy favour, and have no reason whatever to show why sentence against our evil works should not be executed speedily. God be merciful to us sinners. For the sake of thine own dear Son, look upon us in mercy, and not in wrath. Behold, O God, our shield, look upon the face of thine Anointed, and for the sake of him who died the just for the unjust, who bore our sins, in his own body, on the tree, and who has fully satisfied all the claims of a broken law in our room and stead, pardon all our iniquity, justify us freely, and receive us into the number of thy children. O teach us to hate sin with a perfect hatred. May the contemplation of all that the Saviour endured on account of it impress us with such a sense of its enormity, that we may henceforth stand in awe and sin not. May the love of Christ constrain us to shun resolutely that evil and abominable thing which he hates; and may it be our constant aim to mortify every unholy desire, and every inordinate affection, and purify ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit. Remembering that we are bought with a price, may it be our ambition to glorify God in our bodies and our spirits, which are his; and, as the living temples of the Spirit, may we seek to be so adorned with all the graces of personal holiness, as that we may be instrumental in showing forth the praises of him who loved us, and gave himself for us. With ourselves, we would beseech thee to be gracious to all our brethren of mankind, and especially to such as are of the household of faith. Lord, bless thy church; save thine inheritance; feed them also, and lift them up for ever. May a spirit of brotherly love be more and more manifested among all the followers of the Lamb; and may the time speedily come, when the disciples of a common Lord shall see eye to eye, when all offence shall be removed, and when there shall be nothing to hurt or to destroy in all God's holy mountain. We desire this evening to lay ourselves down to rest, full of thankfulness to thee for all the goodness which thou hast made to pass before us throughout the past week. O thou who never slumberest nor sleepest, watch over us during the silent watches of the night; and if thou art pleased to bring us to see the light of another day—another day of the Son of man—fit us, we beseech thee, for all the duties of thy holy sabbath. May our hearts be prepared for thy worship; and whether engaged in thy service in public or in private, may we find it to be a good thing for us to draw near unto God, and to wait upon him in the ordinances of his appointment. O thou hearer of prayer, hear our evening supplication; blot out all our sins, and answer us graciously, for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

THIRTY-THIRD WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXLV. 17.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM XCIV.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—7. The psalmist, surveying the many evils around him, breaks forth in prayer for divine interposition. His pleadings dwell upon several of the causes that are surest to bring down the correcting judgments of heaven. There was strife and oppression in God's household. The affliction fell heavily upon the widow, the orphan, and the stranger. It was caused by unprincipled men, set loose from government, or themselves powerful, who gave rein to their wicked passions against God and men; who inflicted, without fear, their cruel calamities, commands, and threatenings upon the helpless; who scrupled not even to shed innocent blood; reprobates, who proudly gloried in their misdeeds, aware of their atrocity, but denying that God would either see or avenge them. The Lord, however, had said, 'vengeance belongeth to me.' (Deut. xxxii. 35.) The 'ruler,' whom he had appointed over Israel as his 'minister,' a revenger to execute wrath upon them who did evil,' (Rom. xiii. 4.) found himself, as matters then stood, not strong enough to discharge his office. Grieved, therefore, to the heart, by the daily spectacle of iniquity and outrage, David vehemently implores the aid of an Almighty arm. The vengeance of God, he well knew, is not passion, but the calm dictate of unerring wisdom. It is never causeless or partial; never too hasty or too severe. It is justice executed by the hand of mercy; a necessary, though dreadful, rigour. The prayer of the psalmist, therefore, is not the language of rage or hatred, uttering imprecations against his personal enemies; but the cry of sympathy with the distressed, beseeching God, in his righteous providence, to deliver them from the hands of extortioners and murderers. It presents, not the decision of a fallible man, defining, ere it arrive, the doom of his fellow-sinners; but rather the solemn warning of the Holy Spirit by the mouth of his prophet, that the crimes and impieties of these transgressors were fast approaching the limit at which it would become the sovereign judge no longer to wait for their repentance, but vindicate his own glory in their merited destruction.

Ver. 8—11. Accordingly the psalmist next proceeds to assail those hard hearts and depraved minds with the weapons most likely to subdue and convert them. In a strain of awful remonstrance, he urges them with reasons which they cannot refute, pointed with keen, because just, reproaches. They had said, 'the Lord will not see.' But he who alone imparts to men the entire informations of sense, and reason, and conscience, shall he not, replies the psalmist, himself possess transcendent knowledge? 'The God of Jacob,' they had said again, 'will not regard.' But 'he that chastiseth the heathen,' that rained fire on Sodom where he was not known, and consumed the Canaanites, worshippers of other gods, that all the sinful nations might take warning from their fate, 'shall he not correct' his own peculiar people? They bear his name; they have heard his law; they dwell in his presence, and inherit his blessing. Then holiness is his peculiar praise; their sin holds up his great name to special dishonour and blasphemy. By the very terms of his covenant made with them at mount Sinai, he is not more pledged to prosper the obedient of their number, than to cut off the rebellious. Therefore in proportion to the advantages abused by any, shall be the punishment suffered. It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah, than for you. Will ye then persist in all evil, in the midst of the congregation and assembly? Understand ye 'fools' among the wise! Repent, ye brutish,' among the holy.

Ver. 12—15. The rest of the psalm is addressed to the establishment and consolation of godly men in their adversities. Whether it were the psalmist himself, or any of those who suffered with him in the like spirit, 'blessed,' he fervently testifies, 'is the man' whom God has taught, by sanctified sharp experience, by the commentary of his chastisements upon his word, to place a genuine confidence in him—a heart's trust, without wavering, without suspicion, without reserve. He shall have peace and assurance in his soul, what tempest soever of injuries or calamities may rage without. And while 'his heart is fixed,' the time will change. God, who never ceases in secret to preserve his people, and restrain his enemies, will, in due season, appear openly in his true relation to both. The troubles of the just, the triumphs of the wicked, shall cease. Confusion and discomfiture shall overtake the transgressors; prosperity and peace shall re-enter the dwellings of the righteous; and all the upright in heart, as they hail the change in its approach, will help forward its progress, and rest on its completion, with heart-felt accordance and delight.

PRAYER.

O Lord, the great King, the all-knowing Judge of the world, we stand in awe of thy righteousness; with lowly hearts, in the name of Christ, we do homage before thee. Blessed be thy name that thou hast made him, even thy beloved Son, and the Son of man, Head over all things, in all ages, for thy church. Increase our faith in him, and accept of us, the unworthy, for his sake. How many and grievous are our sins! How ungodly our hearts! Surely if thy free mercies prevent not, they will number us with thy foes on the great day of retribution. O pardon us freely through him who bore our sins in his own body on the tree: and shed thy love abroad in our whole heart by the Holy Ghost given to us. How long, O Lord, shall the throne of iniquity within us, have fellowship with thee? Shall the law of sin in our members, be ever prevailing against the law of our mind engraven by thy Spirit? O make thy grace triumphant that we may praise thee. Within and without, thy aids are alike needful to us: along with our infirmity, behold our temptations. Innumerable evils compass us about, make thou a way of escape. Compassionate, O Lord, the cares, perplexities, and sorrows of our lot; when our foot slippeth, let thy mercy uphold us. Known it is to thee, if we suffer wrong at the hands of man. Raise up for us such earthly friends as thou seest meet; but be thyself, Lord, our sure defence; our God, be thou the rock of our refuge. If we have adversaries, and thou reprove them, yet let it be in mercy; forgive, and sanctify, and comfort them too: and whether it be they or we, let the man be blessed whom thou chastenest. So teach us out of thy law, that our hearts may rest inwardly from the days of adversity, even while they continue, and may wait with quiet hope, where thy providence permits, to see the goodness of the Lord anew in the land of the living. How many of thy benefits, O Lord, do we daily enjoy! Thy grace enables us to use as not abusing them: and as we have here no continuing city, the Lord lead us into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ. These blessings at large do thou bestow on all those whom we love and should pray for. So visit thy whole church and people, so restore this guilty, this calamitous world. Every where let the wicked be reprov'd and converted, while thy afflicted servants are delivered and comforted. Every where let every power be abolished that would frame mischief by a law; and in the coming of thy kingdom, let judgment return unto righteousness, that all the upright in heart may sing for joy. Hear, Lord, our prayers, with those of all who love thy name; and to thee, in Christ, be glory, now and ever. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXV. 1—5.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS XCV. XCVI.

REMARKS.

What exercise of religion can be more edifying or delightful, than, with reliance upon the aids of the divine Spirit, to lay open our whole mind and heart to the influence of these noble songs? It is not then so much the psalmist's words that reach our ears, as the power of his inspired and enraptured spirit, that is felt exalting our souls into the presence of God, and the joyful fellowship of his worship. How many hearts, fraught with adoration, praise, and thanksgiving, have thus been borne into the 'holiest place of all,' like vessels, richly laden, wafted into harbour, less by the efforts of the mariners, than by the prosperous force of wind and tide! The greatness and glory of God, as the sole creator and possessor of heaven and earth, are, no doubt, magnificently celebrated in these psalms. Yet the chief subjects of them are the wonders of his providence and grace, as affecting his rational creation. He is proclaimed in plain terms, 'a great King above all gods,' that is, above all the principalities of heaven, and all the potentates of this world: not forgetting his absolute control over evil angels that usurp, as gods, the homage of mankind. The nations and multitudes of men, moreover, whose states of commotion or rest are here typified by the sea and the dry land; governments which are the hills, and their princes the trees of the forest; are all declared to be the subjects of God's throne; and are exhorted to praise, honour, and obey him, with a fervour which foresees that, one day, they will hear the call. The main address of the psalmist, however, is made to that people who say of the Lord, 'he is our God,' 'the rock of our salvation,' and 'we are the people of his pasture, and the flock of his hand.'

These are warned against unbelief and disobedience, from the fate of ancient Israel, in not being permitted, for their sin and rebellion, to enter the promised land.

The next generation believed, obeyed, and possessed the land. But after God had long rested there in the midst of them; nay, after the gospel had been preached in the world, and believed in by many, giving rest to their souls; still 'there remaineth,' said the apostle Paul, 'there remaineth a rest for the people of God,' a rest far beyond all earthly quiet or contentment—a sabbath in the heavens, more especially after the resurrection of the just; in which shall be combined and consummated the joy of God in his six days' work of creation; the joy of Christ in his work of redemption, completed when, as he rose himself from the grave, he shall also have raised his people; and the joy of God's assembled saints, in the glorious issue of their obedience, and in the ceasing of all their toils, temptations, and sorrows: 'for he that hath entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his.' Beholding his workmanship in its finished perfection and immortal beauty, God, the creator, Saviour, and sanctifier, will rejoice in his people; and his people, beholding all things in his light, willing all things in his will, doing all things in his strength, shall share, as created natures can, the divine blessedness itself—shall 'enter into the very joy of their Lord.' Such is our inheritance.

To lead us into the possession of it, the guide of Israel in the desert is ours also throughout our earthly pilgrimage. His claims to their confidence all extend to us; and he has added many more. Calvary presents greater wonders than the Red sea. The throne of Christ in heaven is brighter, yet more accessible, than his pavilion in Horeb. Thence he sustains our souls with angels' food; refreshes them with water from the river of life. All our spiritual foes he hath overthrown and cast out; and instead of the temple on mount Zion, built by man, and long since desolate, he is preparing for us 'a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' O let us labour then to enter into rest, and exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day, lest any of us be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin!

Without such a spirit of watchfulness and pious fear, never can the church of Christ be qualified, either to celebrate the divine praises with becoming ardour and enlargement in her own worship, or to alarm, convert, and edify an ungodly world.

PRAYER.

O Lord! we lift up our souls to thee, the one living and true God, of whom, and through whom, and to whom are all things. Thou rulest among the hosts of heaven; thou bindest in chains the armies of darkness. The earth is thine, and all that dwell therein. Thou art in Christ reconciling the world unto thyself, not imputing unto them their trespasses. O pour down thy Spirit like refreshing rain upon thy churches, that thy saints may praise thee with their whole heart, and may publish the glad tidings of great joy among all nations. Quicken us also by his loving presence in our souls, that we may now make joyful mention of thy greatness and glory, of thy wisdom, might and goodness incomprehensible. O Lord! thou art holy, who would not fear thee? As sinners we abase ourselves in the dust at thy feet. But thou takest no pleasure in the death of such; long-suffering art thou, and slow to anger, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin. O pardon our trespasses. In Christ Jesus accept of us, and bless us in Christ Jesus. Our trust towards thee is alone in the merits of his obedience unto death, and in the power of his living sovereignty. To the guidance of his truth we surrender our souls: we devote our whole being to the obedience of his most righteous law: we make over the care of all our interests, our earthly life, our eternal welfare, to the wisdom, faithfulness, and mercy of his all-disposing Providence. O preserve us steadfast in our allegiance to him by the grace of thy good Spirit. Let his wonderful works, the evidences of his saving might, and of his love that passeth knowledge, be continually before us, lest setting our thoughts on vanity, satan prevail, to blind, pervert, and harden, and destroy us. O Lord, how solemn is our state, as placed by thee upon the trial of our faith and patience; while thou sittest over us as a refiner of silver, waiting to collect the treasure, and to put the dross away! Have mercy upon us, O God. Thyself undertake for us. Strengthen us with all might, by thine own Spirit, in the inner man. Daily give us to watch and pray, even as we are daily tempted. Train us daily to sober self-restraint, and to cheerful service; and when the hidden hour of thy decision comes, whether it find us alone, or associated with many, whatever be the nature or duration of our conflict, uphold us when, we pray, with the right hand of thy righteousness; then make us more than conquerors through him that loved us. Thine oath against Israel, They shall not enter into my rest, be then far from our souls; and near be thine oath to Abraham, By myself have I sworn, that in blessing I will bless thee! Living, may it be our constant privilege and our delight to praise thee; and dying, may our portion be with such as die in the Lord, who rest from their labours, and their works do follow them. Hear us, O Lord, for ourselves, and for kindred friends and neighbours; and thus accept and bless us all, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIV. 11—16.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XV.

REMARKS.

In this chapter, as every where else, the wise king refers all things to God as the supreme disposer. The knowledge of the Lord, he tells us, descends the mysteries of hell, as well as the counsels of heaven, and the influences of both upon the hearts and ways of men, with a clear intuition, as if, in every place, he were all eye to behold them, ver. 11, 3. The regards of the Lord, he adds, correspond to the characters of men. The speech, the prayers, the persons of the godly, are objects not merely of his approbation, but of his love, complacency, and delight: while the thoughts and practices, nay, the very devotions of the wicked, are, each of them, an abomination in his eyes, ver. 26, 9, 8. The doings of the Lord are just the exhibition of these regards practically. He sustains the righteous man, forsakes the wicked. He destroys the prosperity that has been reared in haughty contempt of his law, but surrounds with a sure protection, the helpless that put their trust in his mercy, ver. 29, 25.

Man's wisdom lies in conforming himself to these characters of God, his folly in the contrary. The wise, in humility and fear, look first to him, and aspire after him, as their highest hope, ver. 33, 24. His words, works, and ways, are their diligent study. Those who can aid them in that pursuit of knowledge, are their constant associates. Reproof itself from the hand of God or man, however bitter, is welcome as improving their spiritual understanding: and so with much present advantage to themselves, and joy to kindred and friends, they attain the heavenly life. But fools turn away from God, give their thoughts to earthliness, disregard the chastenings of providence, hate reproof, however seasonable, and even when it is sweetened by the tenderest concern and affection of father or mother, and living so as to miss all true enjoyment themselves, and to fill the heart of every well-wisher with sorrow, are found at last, except they repent, the foes of God, and the guilty destroyers of their own immortal souls, ver. 33, 24, 14, 31, 10, 12, 5, 20, 32.

The good or evil of a man cannot be shut up within his single person. What he has, that he communicates. The wise disperses wisdom, the fool folly, ver. 28, 2, 7. The one, like a medicinal tree, drops balm upon the distempered spirits of men; the other, like some deleterious shrub, taints them with a festering venom. Delighting himself in mischief, because unhappy within, the one, by intemperate speech and wicked conduct, produces anger, strife, and wretchedness in all around him: the other, watching the fit occasions of expressing, by word and deed, the meekness and charity that possess his own heart, is a flowing fountain of love, and peace, and comfort to his neighbours; a rich blessing, and richly blest, ver. 4, 18, 1, 23. Through slothfulness, caprice, and want of concert, the better designs, at least, which bad men some times form, are wont to drag on but heavily, and often miscarry; while, usually, by the united counsels, mutual confidence, and stedfast energy which holy principle inspires, the enterprises of good men, as favoured by God, clear their own way through the most formidable difficulties, to a happy accomplishment, ver. 22, 19, 21.

Spiritual blessings are the surest, as well as the most precious acquirements of true wisdom, yet it leads also to much worldly good. Pleasant sights, and happy tidings—competent wealth, undisturbed in the possession, because acquired by upright means; and in the enjoyment, consecrated by the divine blessing, and sweetened by domestic harmony and love—habitual cheerfulness of mind, endowing even the body with the vigour of health, and the ornament of a pleasant countenance; whatever good is found in these things, and whatever evil in their opposites, is the native product respectively of wisdom and folly. It may indeed appear on the surface of human affairs, that all things happen alike to all. Solomon saw this fact and recorded it. Yet it could not alter his judgment, that 'wisdom excelleth folly, as much as light excelleth darkness;' still less can it subvert the great principle that 'godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is; and of that which is to come.' This law works deep in the frame of our earthly condition; and however its operation may, at times, be concealed from our view, by the interference of other laws, not less important than itself, still it is never really departed from in the sight of that wisdom which looks all things through, ver. 30, 27, 6, 16, 17, 15, 13.

PRAYER.

O Lord God, all-wise and almighty, who art ever present throughout thy creation, upholding, ordaining all things, and working all things according to the pleasure of thy will; thou art righteous in all thy ways, and holy in all thy works. A God of truth, and without iniquity, just and right art thou. O how shall we, the children of folly and of sin, already under just condemnation, present ourselves before thy searching eyes? From ourselves there is no hope—no hope from any creature. Thy mercy, O Lord, through Christ Jesus, is our only refuge. Our errors, our trespasses, our stains, our deserved miseries, are past reckoning. Now would we be low in thy presence, judging, dooming our own selves; and encouraged alone by thy gracious call to the chief of sinners, and by the warrant of thy express command to all the sons of Adam, we would now place all our trust in him who is freely made unto us of God, wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Blessed be thy name, that in him we see God manifest in the flesh! O strengthen us by thine almighty Spirit, to put off ourselves, and to put on Christ Jesus, that so thy favour, and not thy frown, may be our portion. Delivered from our perversity of mind, and heart, and life, no more, O God! let us be the occasions of distress or of sin to those whom we ought to love; but actuated by the wisdom which cometh from above, which is first pure, and then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy, and of good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy, let the fruit of righteousness be sown by us in peace, while we make peace. Bestow what is good of this world's prosperity on us and ours, but above all things, let our souls live before thee, and our inheritance be made sure in thy glorious kingdom. O shed down, on thy church, the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Christ, the Spirit of power, of love, and of a sound mind; and increase the numbers, unite the counsels, and bless the labours of those who publish salvation, until thou make this land a well watered garden, thy wasted heritage again a fruitful field, and the heathen wilderness a vineyard of the Lord. Hear us, O Lord, hear us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXVIII.

SCRIPTURE—1 COR. VII.

REMARKS.

In this chapter some precepts seem, at first sight, to be delivered merely as the Christian counsel of the apostle, without inspiration, and others as the express law of Christ. But let us attend to circumstances. The Corinthians had, by letter, requested the apostle to set forth the duties of persons of both sexes with respect to marriage, ver. 1. and as the whole members of that church were divided about their teachers, one saying, 'I am of Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas,' and another, 'I am of Christ,' i. 12. it is probable that they had inquired particularly what commands the Lord himself had given on the subject during his personal ministry, as well as what additional rules he communicated through the apostle. To a request thus stated, Paul in reply, would naturally use the expressions, 'I command, yet not I, but the Lord,' ver. 12. and, 'to the rest speak I, not the Lord,' without at all intending to suggest that the one class of precepts was less divine than the other; but rather with the distinct assumption, that both alike were the dictates of the Holy Ghost. Again, although he says, ver. 25, 26, 'I give my judgment,' 'I suppose that this is good,' and afterwards, ver. 40, 'I think that I also have the Spirit of the Lord,' it should be remembered that such mild forbearing forms of speech are constantly used by men high in authority, just to take off the appearance of pride or harshness in their treatment of those put under them, and not in the least as implying that they deem their own power doubtful, or that what they 'think,' 'suppose,' 'judge,' is not to be held decisive. Here, the true force of those phrases may be gathered from the context. At the 25th verse, in a matter where he 'had no commandment from the Lord,' Paul 'gives his judgment,' he 'supposes' that a certain course is good. A little before, at the 12th verse, he had said, in the same manner, 'to the rest speak I, not the Lord,' and then follow certain instructions. These two cases are exactly parallel to one another; in each it is Paul who discourses, not the Lord: and, therefore, what he 'judges' and 'supposes' in the one case, is on the same footing precisely with what he 'speaks' in the other. But what he 'speaks,' he also 'ordains in all churches,' ver. 17. therefore his 'judgments,' and 'suppositions,' are 'ordinances' too. Would he so exalt them if they were merely his own opinions? or even if he doubted whether they were taught him by the Spirit or not? That could not consist with the faithfulness to which, in the act of recording them, he lays claim, as a steward of the mysteries of God, ver. 25; ch. iv. 1, 2. All these precepts, therefore, it is clear, are equally from the Lord, and differ only in being given, some with his own lips, and some through the pen of his apostle.

In another view, however, they are of two kinds: 1st. Commands, to be strictly obeyed in all cases. 2d. Permissions, wisely to be used or not used, according to circumstances.

Married persons are 'commanded,' 1. To have each but one consort; 2. To live in conjugal affection and fidelity; and, 3. Not to dissolve the bond of marriage, except, of course, in the case where divorce is allowed by the Lord, (Matt. v. 32.) They are 'permitted,' 4. While dwelling together, to withdraw from each other for a time, if it be by consent, and for holy ends. 5. But if living separately, without lawful divorce, they 'must' continue single, unless they can be reconciled. Though the precept, 'be not unequally yoked to unbelievers,' undoubtedly has application to marriage; yet, 6. Such Christians as have already married heathens, 'are forbidden' to put them away; conversion being possible, and their children, meantime, being admissible into the church. Yet, 7. If the unbeliever will depart, the Christian is 'free;' only, the division 'must not' originate with the Christian. Lastly, The death of either party, dissolves the conjugal relation.

Unmarried persons, whether always such, or widowed, are classed together by the apostle under the same rules. 1. If celibacy, in any, proves a hindrance to the maintenance of Christian purity, it is 'better' for such to marry. 2. But if any, through the grace of God, can preserve both heart and life unstained, it is, generally speaking, 'expedient' for them to remain as they are. At all times, this makes one tie the less to earth; in times of persecution, it exempts from many cares and sorrows. 3. Yet, upon just occasion, the purest are 'free' to marry; and in doing so, 'they sin not,' ver. 28.

Monastic vows, therefore, being the commandment of men, are, in either case, directly contrary to scripture. Where God gives liberty of choice, they plant a prohibition; and where he makes a way of escape from temptation, they cast a snare upon men's souls.

Parents and guardians are bound by the same rules, in reference to the marriage of their children or pupils, as if their own were in question. Consideration and kindness are to be used; nor must they either insist upon marriage, against God's permission to live single; or oppose it, when, by the living precept, it ought to take place, ver. 36—38.

The gospel does not require the man who embraces it to change his lawful condition or calling, whether in point of outward religious profession, or of the relations and employments of civil life.

PRAYER.

Thy law, O Lord! is perfect, converting the soul; thy testimony, O Lord, is sure, making wise the simple, the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes; the fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever; the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. Blessed be thy name, O God, who ondescendest thus to inform the unworthy. What privilege is equal to ours, who receive not only the revelation of thy saving mercy in Christ, and of thy holy, just, and good commandments, but also the counsels and admonitions of thy fatherly love, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth! O may that gracious instructor unite all thy sayings deeply in our hearts. May he enable us to observe thy law with reverence and godly fear, and apply thy precepts with understanding and prudence to the government of our lives. O Lord, sanctify us in all our relations one to another. Forgive our past wanderings and sins. Remove every obstruction to our spiritual improvement, in the time to come. Have compassion on such as are walking in the way of their own hearts, and make a mock of thy sacred word. Bring near its truths to them in power, rebuking their lusts, casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. O let the love of him reign paramount over all our affections. Let the hope of glory, and not of this world's good, be the guiding star of our conduct through life. Our days are as an handbreadth; impress us with the solemnity of our coming change; and strengthen us, far more mightily than ever, to redeem the time. May we do and suffer all thy holy pleasure with confidence and joy, knowing, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. What are we, O Lord, that thou shouldst hear us? Pardon the iniquity of our prayers, and answer them according to the riches of thy heavenly compassion and kindness, for the sake of Christ Jesus, thy Son, our Saviour. Amen.

PRaise—PSALM CXIX. 129.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XVI.

REMARKS.

This chapter contains much important instruction, the leading points of which may be thus particularized: verses 1, 4, 9, 33, teach the sovereignty of God, that high and absolute control which he exercises over all his creatures and all their actions; a control which extends not only to the material world, but also to the words and thoughts of his intelligent offspring, the very wicked being constrained to execute his purposes. Verses 2, 5, 25, relate more particularly to the justice of God, as displayed in weighing the actions of men, and in punishing the wicked. Yet, however men may impose upon themselves, while indulging in sin, with the hope of impunity, they shall, sooner or later, be made to feel that the end of these things is death. But though God is just, we are assured, in the sixth verse, that he is also merciful, and that he hath provided an expiation to purge away the iniquities of his people, and to deliver them from the power and dominion of sin.

Verses 3, 7, 8, 17, 20, 31, are descriptive of the blessedness of the righteous, and of the peace and security bestowed upon them by God, so that their very enemies are constrained to esteem them; and most of all will the righteousness of such be honourable and obvious when they increase and abound in it to extreme old age, and are found waiting and watching for the coming of their Lord. Verses 10—15, teach the mutual duties of kings and subjects. Kings are reminded that civil government is God's ordinance for the good of mankind, and that they must, therefore, rule in his fear, and govern by his laws; for it is thus only that they can secure the respect of their subjects, and be established on their thrones. And subjects are enjoined not to flatter those who have the rule over them, but to tell them the truth, and to obey the laws, as they will thus avoid the wrath of the prince, and obtain his favour and protection.

We are exhorted, also, in verses 16, 21—23, to cultivate wisdom, religious and heavenly wisdom, so often recommended by Solomon in this book of Proverbs. In verses 18, 19, we are exhorted to be humble. Pride is, of all the sentiments of the corrupt heart, most unbecoming and most offensive to God, and he will not suffer it to go unpunished. Let us, then, cultivate humility, a sentiment so becoming in us as guilty sinners and as redeemed men, ever remembering that God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the lowly.

Verses 24, 28—30, are directed against evil speaking and the sins of the tongue. Kind and pleasant words have a sweet and soothing influence over the soul; but envious and malicious words are the cause of strife, and often separate between friends. Verse 32 contains an injunction against anger, and to cultivate meekness, as the greatest conqueror is he who subdues his own spirit. And we are exhorted to diligence in our secular callings, in the 26th verse, as industry is the great law of God and of our present nature, neglecting which, man would be miserable, or might even perish of want.

PRAYER.

Knowing, O Lord, how often and grievously we have offended and provoked thee to anger by our sins and shortcomings, how multiplied and highly aggravated are our transgressions, and how completely the spirit that is in us lusteth to envy, we would humble ourselves in the dust before thee, and beseech thee not to visit us according to our sins, but, in the midst of merited wrath, to remember us in mercy. O we would adore the riches of that mercy which is over all thy works, and which has been most conspicuously displayed in the redemption of a lost world. We thank thee that thou hast brought us within the pale of the visible church, and that we have been trained up from our tenderest years in a knowledge of the great salvation. O that this knowledge may be blest to each of us. Quicken our dead natures, influence our cold hearts, subdue our stubborn wills, and enable us daily to make progress in the divine life, and in that heavenly wisdom so often commended in the scriptures. May we be growing in knowledge, in the knowledge of thy glorious character and perfections; of our guilty and fallen condition; of our infirmities and weaknesses; and of the grace and mercy of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and of all the precepts and requirements of thy holy word. And may this knowledge have a sanctifying influence upon our hearts and lives, leading us no longer to live unto ourselves, but unto him that died for us and rose again. And may we be enabled to persevere in the good course on which we have entered unto the end of life, so that we may finish our course with joy, and may be admitted at last into the mansions of bliss. We pray for all our brethren of mankind that they may be saved, and that they may be enabled suitably to adorn those stations of life in which they have been placed. Bless our sovereign and all in authority. May they rule in thy fear, and may the throne be established by righteousness; and may those who are subject, be subject not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake. And now that we are about again to enter upon the labours and duties of another day, we would implore thy protection and blessing. May we be preserved from danger; may we be kept from temptation and sin, and be enabled vigorously and efficiently to perform our several duties. While diligent in business, may we be fervent in spirit serving the Lord. And may the love of God the Father, and the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with us all, now and for evermore. Amen.

PRaise—PARAPHRAse XLIX. 9—14.

SCRIPTURE—1 CORINTHIANS VIII.

REMARKS.

We learn from this chapter, that some of the members in the Corinthian church, led away by an affectation of superior intelligence, and destitute of charity, conducted themselves in such a way as to give great offence, and to do much injury to their weaker brethren. The matter in dispute seems to have been the lawfulness of Christians feasting in an idol temple, or eating of meat known to have been killed in sacrifice to idols; and it would appear that some, abusing their knowledge concerning the vanity of idols, acted upon the principle, that, as an idol was nothing in the world, a Christian might both feast in an idol temple, and partake of flesh, knowing it to have been offered in sacrifice to idols, without sin. But the apostle, while he concurs in the general principle of the vanity of idols; and that a person, whose conscience had been properly enlightened, might eat flesh sacrificed to idols without sin; and while he declares the fundamental principle of the Christian faith, the unity of the divine essence, and that there is only one God, one Father, and one Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, of whom, and by whose joint operation are all things, thus teaching the co-equality of these persons in one undivided Godhead; yet he at the same time declares, that as all Christians possessed not this knowledge of the vanity of idols, but many regarded them as a reality, and could not feast in their temples, or partake of flesh which had been offered to them in sacrifice, without defiling their consciences, and feeling that they had been guilty of an act of idolatry,—it was the duty of Christians, if not for their own sakes, yet, acting under the influence of charity, for the sake of their weaker Christian brethren (the least of whom had been redeemed by the blood of Jesus), and for the sake of the unconverted heathen, to abstain entirely from any such apparent countenance of idolatry, and to manifest on all occasions a just abhorrence of a sin so contrary to the divine law, and so much opposed to the spiritual interests of mankind. For if any Christian should become the means of offending a weak brother, even by practices which were in themselves indifferent, it would be accounted by Christ, the great Head of the church, as an offence committed against himself, and a violation of the principles of charity and love.

Let us seek, then, to manifest the noble sentiments inculcated by Paul in this chapter, and upon which he ever acted, to give no offence to any, and to become all things to all men, that he might gain some. More especially let us beware of ascribing an undue importance to forms and customs, and the lesser matters of the Christian law, which has been one great source of schism in the church of Christ, and a pertinacious adherence to which is still a chief cause of unseemly strife among brethren, and of the perpetuation of the parties, and feuds, and divisions into which the church of Christ has been rent asunder. Let us, then, rather than become the occasion of such strife and offence to the brethren, forego our own opinion in matters of indifference; yea, let us even submit to acts of self-denial; let us, like St Paul, give up the use of flesh altogether, or any other gratification, rather than become the occasion of divisions in the church, or of weakening the hands, or subverting the religious principles of any of our brethren.

PRAYER.

O Lord, who is a God like unto thee, who art glorious in thy holiness, fearful in thy praises, ever doing wonders? All the gods whom the nations worship are but dumb idols, stocks and stones, graven by art and man's device; but thou art the living and true God, the eternal Jehovah, the Creator and Governor of the universe. All thy works proclaim thine existence and perfections. But we bless thee that thou hast not sent us to the volume of nature to learn thy character and perfections, what thou art, and what thou wouldst have us to be; that thou hast given to us a surer word of prophecy, to which we do well to take heed, as unto a light shining in a dark place. We would desire ever to receive with humility and lively faith all the discoveries of thy word, whether these respect thy nature and government, our original and fallen condition, the way of recovery through Jesus Christ, or that eternal life which thou hast provided for thy people in heaven for evermore. We worship thee as the three-one God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three distinct, co-equal and co-eternal persons in one undivided Godhead. We would not presume to explore the mysteries of thy Being. We receive with humility the declarations of thine own word; we believe and adore. We believe, also, that thou hast made man upright; but that he hath sought out inventions; that he hath fallen, through wilful disobedience, from his original purity, and that he is now a child of wrath and an heir of hell; that the whole human family have transgressed, and that there is none righteous, not even one. We would desire especially to confess and bewail our own sins and imperfections, our multiplied transgressions, our vain imaginations, our cold hearts, our stubborn wills. We acknowledge that we have justly merited thy highest displeasure, and that thou mightest glorify thy justice in our destruction. But we cry unto thee for mercy; we take hold on thy covenant. We believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, saying, with the disciples, Lord, increase our faith. Lord, we believe; help our unbelief. See, then, O God, our shield; look on the face of thine anointed. Blot out our sins as a cloud, and our transgressions as a thick cloud. Write our names in the book of life, and give us a right and a title to all the privileges of thine adopted children. Help us to walk worthy of our Christian profession, to live soberly, and righteously, and godly, in the world. May we love all men with a love of benevolence, and our fellow-Christians as brethren. May we avoid every thing that might become an occasion of offence, sacrificing our own feelings and inclinations in smaller matters, rather than offend one of the least of Christ's little ones. We would pray for the greater unity of the visible church; that thou wouldst heal the divisions of Zion; that Judah may no longer vex Ephraim, nor Ephraim Judah; but that all true Christians may be one in sentiment and affection, even as thou, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, art one. We thank thee for the mercies of this day, for all our family and individual blessings. Truly the lines have fallen to us in pleasant places, and ours is a goodly heritage. Be the friend of our friends; reward our benefactors, forgive our enemies. Be very gracious to all the sons and daughters of affliction. Grant us thy protection during the night. May we enjoy refreshing sleep, and enter again, if it be thy holy will, with renewed vigour, on the duties and occupations of a new day. Guide and protect us by thy counsel and grace while we are in the body, and receive us all at last into thy kingdom and glory, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XIX. 12.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XVIII.

REMARKS.

In this chapter Solomon has crowded together a number of weighty maxims touching some of the most important events in life. He begins with that leading topic which recurs so frequently throughout this book of Proverbs—the excellence and desirableness of heavenly wisdom. This subject is treated by him in verses 1, 2, 4, 15. He alludes to that curiosity or insatiable desire of wisdom, which is one of the most striking characteristics of the human mind, and which leads multitudes, separating themselves from every other pursuit, to devote all their energies to the attainment of it; and especially will Christians manifest this ardour in the pursuit of that knowledge which is saving and divine. The law of the Lord will be prized by them above worldly riches. It will be daily perused by them; they will meditate in it day and night; and they will find in it not only nourishment and consolation to their own spirit, they will be able from this source, also, to instruct and edify others.

Another topic in the chapter is the proper management of the tongue, especially the sin and punishment of evil speaking. This is dwelt upon in verses 6—8, 20, 21. The tongue is represented as a powerful instrument for good or for evil. How careful, therefore, should Christians be to set a watch upon their mouth, lest they speak unadvisedly with their lips, or indulge in evil speaking. This were to scatter firebrands and death, and to do an injury to the reputation of our neighbour which might never be repaired.

A third topic, which has received a good deal of notice in the chapter, as we may regard verses 5, 13, 16—18, as more or less connected with it, is the practice of integrity and uprightness, especially in the administration of justice, and while acting in a judicial capacity. Judges must scrupulously guard against any bias or partial feeling towards either party, patiently hearing both sides of the cause, and accepting neither of gift or bribe, which is so apt to blind the eyes of men.

We are also presented in the chapter with sundry admonitions regarding the acquisition of wealth, and its influence over the mind, verses 9—12, 23. As there are two ways of procuring and retaining wealth—industry and frugality; so there are two ways of becoming poor—sloth and extravagance. And we are assured, in the 9th verse, that the one is as criminal and injurious as the other; and while we condemn the folly of those who waste their substance in riotous living, we should remember that those act a part not less unworthy who neglect to provide for their household, and to improve the talents which have been bestowed upon them. Solomon, also, cautions us against another evil, trusting in our riches, and the pride of wealth, in which the rich are so apt to indulge; and assures us, that they who make silver or gold their confidence, would be cruelly disappointed; but that they who trusted in the Lord would be happy and safe whatever might befall.

The remaining verses of the chapter refer to detached subjects, which it is unnecessary minutely to particularize. Thus we are assured, in the 14th verse, of the superior intensity of the griefs of the heart to bodily ailments; of the difficulty of effecting a reconciliation between offended brethren in the 19th verse; of the great blessing of a prudent and virtuous wife in the 22d verse; and the necessity of showing ourselves friendly, if we would have friends, in the 24th verse.

PRAYER.

Almighty and most merciful God and Father, we would desire again, on this the morning of a new day, to encompass our domestic altar, and to offer thereon the sacrifices of prayer and thanksgiving. Great art thou, O Lord, and greatly to be feared; thou art good, also, and much to be praised; thy goodness and greatness are unsearchable. We especially adore thee that thou hast delivered our souls from spiritual and eternal death. Ever praised be redeeming love, that mercy has been proclaimed from heaven to guilty man, and that a way has been provided for dispensing this mercy in accordance with the perfections of thy nature, with the demands of justice, and with the interests of thy moral administration; and that when neither man nor angel could redeem his brother from destruction, nor offer unto God a ransom for his soul, thou thyself hast provided a ransom; hast laid help upon one mighty and able to save; hast spared not thine own Son, but delivered him up a propitiation and atonement for the sins of mankind. And our souls would bless thee for the gracious assurance that there is now no longer any condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit; and that whosoever believeth in him is justified from all things, from which he could not be justified in any other manner. O most merciful God and Father, we beseech thee to have compassion on us, miserable sinners, and to suffer us not to perish utterly, seeing thou hast provided for us redemption in Christ Jesus. O send forth thy Holy Spirit into our hearts to convince us of sin; to quicken our dead natures; to bestow upon us spiritual life; to strengthen our faith; to fill us with patience and love; and to produce and perfect within us every Christian grace. Fill us, above all, with that heavenly wisdom so often commended in thy holy word, and of which we have this day again been hearing. May we be daily searching the scriptures, and acquiring an increasing acquaintance with thy revealed will; and while we thus look into the glass of the law, may we be changed into the image of our Master, and become the living epistles of Christ, read and seen of all men. Help us to adorn our profession of the Christian faith by devoted attachment to Jesus, and by a life of holy obedience. Enable us to bridle the tongue, never to murmur against any of the allotments of thy providence, however adverse and afflictive, and never to calumniate or reproach any of our fellow-men, however unworthy may have been their conduct, or however injurious to us. May we speak the truth every man to his neighbour, and endeavour always to edify one another, having our conversation with grace, seasoned with salt. And may we, in all our intercourse with our brethren, be actuated by a love of integrity and justice, and abhor whatever is fraudulent and base. May we provide things honest in the sight of all men; and make our light so to shine around us, that others, seeing our good works, may be led to glorify our Father which is in heaven. And while we set not our hearts on the world, nor trust in uncertain riches, and are willing, without a murmur, to part with our goods at thy bidding, may we be enabled to manifest a commendable diligence and prudence in the management of our affairs and in our callings, that we may have enough to supply our own wants, and also to give to him that needeth. Fit us especially for the duties of this day. Wherever we go, may we enjoy thy protection; and whatever we do, may we do it to thy glory. And may these our humble prayers be heard and answered, for the sake of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Redeemer. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVI. 5—9.

SCRIPTURE—1 COR. IX.

REMARKS.

It would appear from this chapter that there existed a party in the church of Corinth, most probably Jewish converts, who, taking offence at St Paul's neglect of the ceremonial law, endeavoured to depreciate his apostolical commission, and to assert his inferiority to the other apostles; and among other proofs of this, they alleged his want of a personal attendance on the ministry of Christ, and of a proper apostolical commission, and also his own conduct while at Corinth, in refusing to accept from the church that pecuniary support which was given to the other apostles by the churches, as if he had had no proper claim to exact it. And it was in opposition to these that St Paul claims in this chapter, and in his other epistles, an apostolical commission as authoritative and as dignified as that of the very chiefest of the apostles. He tells us that he had been favoured with a sight of the Lord in circumstances the most remarkable, and had received a commission from him as an apostle. And with regard to the other point, his right to be supported by the churches, he claims their right, to its fullest extent, equally with Peter, and James, and Jude, and the other apostles, who received support not only for themselves, but also for their wives, whom they carried along with them. And this allusion to the marriage of Peter, and the kinsman of our Lord, and their continuing to live with their wives after their vocation to the apostolical office, has ever been regarded by the protestant church as an invaluable testimony against the celibacy of the Romish priesthood, and in support of the great ordinance of reason and scripture, that marriage is honourable in all.

The apostle insists, at great length, upon his own right, and the right of every minister of the gospel, to a secular maintenance, in return for his religious and spiritual labours. And he places this support not on the footing of a gratuity, which the Christian church may bestow or withhold at pleasure, but of a debt or obligation, which it were sinful to refuse to discharge.

The apostle, however, says nothing in this chapter concerning the source whence this support of a Christian ministry was to be derived. It might come from the free-will offerings of the particular flock who were ministered unto; or it might come from the voluntary contributions of other congregations; or it might come from the gift of private individuals, either in the shape of a temporary grant, or of the annual proceeds of a permanent mortification; or it might come from the gift of a godly society or nation, acting through its representatives. Each of which modes of supporting the teachers of religion has its advantages and disadvantages, and instances of each of which are to be met with in the scriptures, both in the Old and New Testaments. Christians are not restricted in this passage to the maintenance of their pastors in any one of these ways exclusively. The only point which is conclusively settled by the apostle, and which pervades the whole passage, is the right of the Christian ministry to a competent maintenance in return for their spiritual labours; a right which every true Christian will willingly concede.

The apostle then explains the reason why he had not accepted of any pecuniary support from the church at Corinth. It was from considerations of expediency, that he might not be burdensome unto them, and that he might not hinder the gospel. For this reason he tells them that he had maintained himself with the labour of his own hands, and with the contributions of the churches in Macedonia, and had submitted to much inconvenience in order that he might make the gospel without charge, and gain the more converts. And from this part of the apostle's conduct we may learn, that for a pastor to depend exclusively for his maintenance on the free-will offerings of those to whom he ministers in holy things, may sometimes be the most inexpedient and objectionable of all the methods of supporting a gospel ministry. The apostle next declares the constraining obligation under which he was placed to preach the gospel, the sacrifices he was willing to make, and the strenuous exertions we ought all to make for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

PRAYER.

Most gracious God, we would again approach thee at the close of this day, confessing our guilt, and imploring thy forgiveness. We pray that, for Christ's sake, our sins may be forgiven; that our natures may be sanctified; that our persons and services may be accepted; and that grace and strength may be imparted to us to know and obey thy will in all things. O Lord our God, how manifold is thy goodness to us, thine unworthy creatures, in conferring on us our being, in preserving our lives, and in showering down upon us daily unnumbered mercies! We thank thee for the protection which thou hast afforded us during this day; for our bodily health; for our mental vigour; for our worldly substance; for our social comforts; for our family blessings. May we not be resting in these creature comforts, but look beyond them unto thyself, our only true and satisfying portion. While they are continued with us, may our hearts be truly grateful unto thee, the bestower of them. And shouldst thou see meet, for the trial of our faith and the chastisement of our spirits, to remove any of them from us, enable us to submit to the bereavement without a murmur, and suitably to improve the visitation. But most of all would we thank thee for thy marvellous love to our precious and never-dying souls. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend; but herein hath God commended his love toward us, in that, while we were yet enemies, Christ died for us. For God hath so loved the world, as to give for our redemption his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. Thanks, then, eternal thanks, be unto God for his unspeakable gift. Blessed be he that came in the name of the Lord to save us. Hosannah to the Son of David, hosannah in the highest! For he that is mighty hath done great things for us; holy and reverend is his name. O grant that we all may be partakers of this great salvation; and that as we have outwardly assumed the Christian name, we may be Christians in deed and in truth. Begin and carry on the work of grace in each of our souls. May we be born again, created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works. May we be daily putting off the old man, with his corrupt deeds, and clothing ourselves with the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. And O may we be enabled in all things to walk worthy of our religious profession. And should we be reproached for the sake of Jesus, or even reviled and persecuted by an ungodly world, may we take it patiently like our great Master, and like the apostles of our Lord. Enable us at all times to honour thee with our substance, and to give liberally for the maintenance of the gospel of Christ at home, and for its diffusion in heathen lands. And may we be animated to run with ardour our Christian race, and to persevere in every good work, by a constant regard to the great reward that awaits us when we shall have finished our labours, and entered into our rest. O Lord, we beseech thee dispose and enable us all so to run that we may obtain. Bless the whole family of man. Have mercy on perishing sinners, and save them; and enable all who name the name of Jesus to depart from all iniquity. Be with us this night; spread thy banner over us, and may it be a banner of protection and love. And unto the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, we would ascribe praise, and blessing, and honour, and glory, now and ever. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XIX. 9.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XX.

REMARKS.

The believer is expected to exemplify holiness in all the relations and avocations of life; and this chapter presents a series of the duties he should discharge, and the sins he should avoid. Temperance is a duty he should rigidly observe; and this is enforced upon him by the statement, 'that wine is a mocker, and strong drink raging.' When a man seeks happiness in the exhilaration of the intoxicating bowl, he quenches, for the time, the lamp of reason, which distinguishes him from the inferior animals, and sinks into a state of grovelling degradation. When Noah, after escaping the horrors of the deluge, yielded to the snare of inebriating indulgences, he exposed himself to shame and reproach. What a difference was exhibited between the conduct of that patriarch, when, as a preacher of righteousness, he warned an obdurate world, and 'when he drank of the wine and was drunken, and lay uncovered within his tent.' Truly wine is a mocker, and, in the case of many, it is raging, and urges them to the most vehement impetuosity of passion. Saints should beware of giving unnecessary provocation, and especially to kings and men in power, who may be able to inflict exemplary punishment; but when, through a train of unexpected circumstances, they are involved in disputes and quarrels, they should consider it honourable to cease from strife. According to the maxims of the world, it is dishonourable to give up strife until our enemy is humbled; but the believer incurs no dishonour in the sight of God, though, by magnanimous forbearance, he sometimes recedes from his own rights. When two contending parties, exasperated by mutual injuries, both allege that the opposite party is in the mistake, and must give in before concord can be re-established, the flame of discord is perpetuated, and their rancour proves irreconcilable. When we are entangled in such unhappy disputes, we should ask ourselves, When man, in his primeval seat of happiness, infringed God's law, which party was it that first made advances towards reconciliation? Was it man the aggressor, or God his injured benefactor? It was God; for at the very time when Adam crowned all his other sins by charging them upon God, saying, 'The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat,' he benignantly forgave him, and announced that the seed of the woman would retrieve his lost condition. It is godlike, therefore, to make proposals of renewed amity even to one who has offered us indignities, and in the highest degree foolish to inflame disputes by a meddling disposition.

Activity in business, and fidelity to every trust assigned us, will obtain the blessing of God, and will extend the same benediction to our children. Rigid justice is useful when exercised by all in whatever gradation of society they may be placed. It is especially fraught with beneficial consequences when practised by a king, for then he frowns upon the wicked, and with his very glance drives them away. Integrity in the transactions of business is several times recommended in this chapter. We have reason to infer from this passage of scripture, that few iniquities are more revolting in God's sight than dishonesty in trade. Divers weights, or weights adjusted according to the proper standard, and produced when the owner fears detection, while he has false or different weights when injustice can be successfully practised, are detestable in the eyes of God. A strong proof of the importance God attached to undeviating honesty in business, is derived from the fact, that the standard of weights and measures among the Jews was not entrusted to the civil magistrate, but kept in the sanctuary as a sacred deposit; hence we read of the 'shekel of the sanctuary.' There are ways of earning fraudulent gains often practised in the negotiations between the buyer and seller. The former disparages the articles he means to purchase; he alleges faults which he knows do not exist; and when, by undervaluing, remarks he has obtained them at a price beneath what is a proper equivalent, he goes away and boasts of the bargain he has made by his dexterity. On the other hand, the seller, when dealing with an inexperienced and credulous customer, gives an exaggerated description of the worth of his commodities, and, by his skilful knavery, realises exorbitant gain. Bread of deceit may be pleasant; wealth unjustly acquired may yield a momentary satisfaction; but it generally entails a withering curse, which dissipates the owner's substance, and fills his own mouth with gravel; 'the end shall not be blessed.' But although a man may sustain injuries from an intriguing and circumventing neighbour, he is not to retaliate the wrong, but wait on the Lord, who will in due time redress all his injuries. Let him rather, with conscience as a candle, inspect the secrecies of his own heart, and discard every thing that is evil, expecting to hear the animating sentence pronounced, 'well done, good and faithful servant.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art a being of spotless purity, and all who shall dwell with thee for ever in heaven must imbine a resemblance to thy character here. Help us to cultivate that purity, which will form a resplendent proof that we are pilgrims travelling to the better Canaan. Keep us from the fleshly lusts which war against the soul, and would enslave us to the dominion of satan. May we not be drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit, striving daily to mortify our members which are upon the earth, and to bring every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. Fill us with a spirit of forbearance towards others. Though injured, may we never breathe any thought of revenge. May we be tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us. As the Saviour bore with uncomplaining meekness the indignities he endured from his enemies, and was, when most contumeliously reviled, as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, may we patiently endure wrongs, knowing that our Father in heaven will in due time deliver us from all afflictions. Preserve us from all those injurious actions towards our neighbours which the native selfishness of our nature would prompt; and give us that self-sacrificing affection towards them which would make us surrender any object, however dear, by which their well-being may be promoted. May we yearn over them with all the tenderness of him who wept over impenitent Jerusalem, and who, amidst the agonies of the cross, said, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. May the same mind be in us which was also in Christ Jesus, who, though he reposed in the bosom of the Father from all eternity, yet made himself of no reputation, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. When we survey his generous condescension and unparalleled humiliation, may we be willing to stoop to any office, however mean, by which others may be benefited, and, if necessary, even to lay down our lives for them. May we be enabled so to glorify God, that others, seeing our good works, may be led to devote themselves to the service of our Father in heaven. Accept of us through Jesus Christ, whom thou hearest always. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—I CORINTHIANS X.

REMARKS.

Scripture supplies us with numerous instances in which saints, in former ages, have been placed in the same variety of circumstances with ourselves; and if we inspected the inspired records with care, we would obtain instructions to guide us in the most arduous seasons of the Christian conflict. The narrative of Moses presents us with a striking development of the complicated workings of the human heart in the history of Israel; and hence their privileges and sins formed a very instructive picture to the Corinthians, which Paul exhorted them to study. They had been brought through the Red sea by the guidance of the effulgent symbol of God's presence; and this was an emblem of the great change of regeneration through which a sinner passes, and which is shadowed by baptism. They were fed by manna, which was designated spiritual from its representing Christ, the living bread. They drank of the streams which gushed from a rock as from an exuberant fountain; and so remarkable was the supply issuing from it, that wherever they journeyed through the arid desert, they followed them. If they transferred their encampment to any new quarter, whether towards the east or west, the north or south, the waters shifted their course, and rolled murmuring after them, to obviate their necessities and cheer their minds; and to whatever place the saint removes in this howling waste, streams from the rock Christ follow him; and little should he care to what clime he may be driven, if such exhilarating treasures are conveyed to him. But although the Israelites were highly privileged, they lusted after the voluptuous indulgences which were associated with idolatry; and their conduct closely resembled that of the Corinthians, who would not forego the gratification of a sensual indulgence in abstaining from what was offered to idols, although they might thus wound the conscience of many weak brethren. They were exhorted to remember, that when they attended an idolatrous feast they gave their sanction to rites offered to idols, or, in reality, to devils. That they did so was illustrated by the fact, that when the Corinthians sat at the Lord's table, they became one with Christ and one another; as much as the grains of wheat in a loaf, though many, compose one substance; or the particles of wine which are poured into the sacramental cup are one when blended into the same mass. If they were present at an idolatrous feast, they held communion with devils, and the votaries of devils, as truly as they who eat of the sacrifices offered at the temple, during the Old Testament dispensation, held communion with God. But the Corinthians were not only to avoid frequenting the idolatrous feasts, they were to exercise self-denial in eating what had been offered to idols, even though, in some circumstances, no blame would attach to them. They might freely consume whatever was sold at the market, whether it had been offered to idols or not; but in the presence of a brother who thought it unlawful to do so, their eating flesh which came from a heathen altar (though they had knowledge to see such an action was not in itself sinful) might tempt him to do what he thought sinful. This teaches us that we may sometimes be called to abstain even from things which are pronounced lawful in God's word, when a peculiar combination of circumstances requires such self-denial. Paul did this, even when great sacrifices were to be incurred. It was perfectly in accordance with God's word for him to have exacted a pecuniary provision from the Corinthian and Thessalonian believers, yet, lest his doing so should subject him to imputations of sordidness, and obstruct the usefulness of his ministry, he waived his right, and 'travailed night and day' at a manual occupation to earn a scanty subsistence. And let us, therefore, please all men in all things, not seeking our own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

PRAYER.

O Lord, help us to profit by all the diversified experience of thine ancient people Israel. Thou didst guide them by a luminous cloud in all their wanderings, and didst irradiate their camp by night with a pillar of fire. But thou hast made a more glorious light to beam upon our nation, in setting before us Christ Jesus as evidently crucified. Thou didst vouchsafe them for many years an unbroken supply of water from the rock of Horeb; but thou art offering us that water of which, if a man drink, he will never thirst. Heavenly manna is lying in profusion around us, and we have only to stoop down and gather it up. But we have abused our mercies, and made the very goodness which should incite us to repentance an encouragement to sin. Thou hast borne us, and carried us, and in every stage of our journey astonished us with tokens of forgiving love, when we have expected nothing but vengeance for our manifold sins; and yet we have not rendered unto thee according to the goodness we have received. Our whole lives present a melancholy contrast between thine abundant compassion and our ingratitude. They furnish us with an innumerable series of vast benefits, followed by a train of backslidings. Neither mercies, nor warnings, nor judgments, nor privileges, have produced on us that durable influence they were calculated to effect. Yet, although we deserve new rebukes and corrections, and might justly be brought low for our iniquity, thou art willing to deal with us not according to our trespasses, but according to the multitude of thy tender mercies. We thank thee that we have one greater than Moses to stand in the breach for us; behold our shield; look on us in the face of thine anointed. We rejoice to think he ascended up on high that he might lead captivity captive, and receive gifts even for the rebellious, that God the Lord might dwell among them. As rebellious sinners we would implore the favours he has purchased for such as we are. We are indeed dogs; but dogs such as we are may eat of the crumbs which fall from our Master's table. Feed us with the living bread that came down from heaven; pardon all our iniquities; receive us graciously, and love us freely, for Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 33.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XXII.

REMARKS.

Of the many earthly advantages which God confers on the human race, none is more valuable than reputation. Riches may be possessed, but 'the course of the tongue,' the breath of calumny, may poison all the enjoyment they are calculated to confer; but still fame, considered in itself, is a perishable good. The antediluvians were men of renown during the period that was signalized by their achievements, but their memory has been forgotten, or covered with infamy. The scribes and pharisees sought celebrity by the multiplicity of their alms and prayers, and God did not withhold from them the object after which they aspired; Christ said, 'verily I say unto you, they have their reward,' but the attainment of this boon was not a blessing, as it prevented them from seeking after a more substantial good. Reputation, though of little consequence in itself, is of great importance as a mean of usefulness. Solomon had a splendid reputation for wisdom, and this drew men to that country where they may have acquired a knowledge of the living God. One of the most effectual ways in which men may acquire riches, and honour, and life, is by humility and the fear of the Lord. Godliness hath the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come. Ruth forsook her native country for love to the God of Naomi; she was determined, that whatever adversity might cloud her, the God of the latter should be her God, or in the language of Boaz, 'she came to trust under God's wings,' and hence she was married to a 'mighty man of wealth,' and obtained that opulence which she did not covet; and certain it is, that though godliness is often connected with harassing trials, it frequently ensures splendid temporal benefits. The duty of training up a child aright, is associated with great blessings. The Hebrew word here translated train, is the same that is used to denote the dedication of the temple of Solomon, (1 Kings viii. 63.) the dedication of the altar, (Num. vii. 1.) and the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, (Neh. xii. 27.) and when applied to the moral rearing and tuition of our children, portrays the solemn consecration of them to God. The temple and altar were to be used only for the worship and service of God; and believing parents should regard their offspring as the property of Jehovah, which they are as little entitled to use for their personal pleasure and advantage, as the Israelites could the sanctuary of God. When, instead of training their children for his service here and hereafter, they seek merely to grace them with those accomplishments by which they may attain lucrative situations, and advance the family dignity, they are perpetrating as great a sin as the Israelites would have done, if they had taken, for their own use, any of the holy vessels in the temple, and employed them for common purposes. Parents may be compelled, when enforcing salutary discipline, to employ the rod of correction; but there is a promise that it will become an efficient organ of good; 'foolishness is bound up in the heart, but the rod of correction will drive it away.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art the Father of light, with whom there is neither variableness nor shadow of turning. Give us strength to discharge the many arduous duties incumbent upon us here. It hath pleased thee, that in Christ all fullness should dwell; may we obtain from his exhaustless stores enough to supply our wants, and arm us with vigour for all the difficulties and temptations before us. We have evil hearts that indispose us for all that thou requirest, and an evil enemy who is ready to inflame our corruption. Assist us in our spiritual warfare. When we would do good, evil is present with us, but thou canst make the worm Jacob thrash the mountains, and beat them as chaff; thou dearest to make thy strength perfect in our weakness. We rejoice to think that our elder brother is seated on the throne of the universe, that he is touched with a feeling of our infirmities, and that having suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour those that are tempted. We plead that, for his sake, we may be strengthened with all might by thy Spirit in the inner man; that our faith be like that of the just, resembling the morning light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. We are bowed down by many depressing infirmities, we are encumbered with a burden of sin, which makes us exclaim, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? but we rejoice to think he can give us a victory over the dominion of sin; he can give us the faith which works by love, and purifies the heart, and overcomes the world. We delight to know that he came not only that we might have life, but that we might have it more abundantly; he has promised us such abundant communications of grace, that out of us shall flow rivers of living water. We would rest on these declarations, in full confidence that what thou hast promised, thou art fully able to accomplish. Make us triumphant in all our conflicts with the powers of darkness, and bring us finally to the rest that remaineth to the people of God, for Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM xcvi. 7.

SCRIPTURE—1 Cor. xi.

REMARKS.

It is our incumbent duty to be followers of those who have exhibited a bright pattern of holy obedience; and though Christ is the great model which we should emulate, yet it is encouraging to have instances like that of Paul presented to us, in which men who have laboured under the same native pollution with ourselves, have reached a sublime elevation of purity. The Corinthians were most urgently called upon to imitate the sanctity of Paul, as many abuses and corruptions abounded among them which tarnished the lustre of the golden candlestick that God had planted at Corinth. Were it not for the disclosures of this chapter, we could scarcely have supposed that such glaring irregularities as those here specified, would have prevailed in a church in which God expressly informs us he had 'much people;' but it shows us that grace may co-exist with many obscuring blemishes, and that we should not rashly pronounce persons strangers to Christ, because we are startled with their many inconsistencies. Some of the women at Corinth had been endowed by the Spirit, and enabled to prophesy, that is, to predict future events, or explain the scriptures; and because gifted with miraculous communications, they seem to have divested themselves of those recognised tokens of subordination to the man which marks their place in the scale of creation. The apostle, therefore, reminds them that the woman was created to be a subsidiary instrument of gratification and comfort to the man, and that, however highly privileged with celestial communications, she must still retain her appropriate place in society. This teaches us, that however distinguished persons may be by spiritual knowledge, or Christian attainments, they are not to arrogate a superiority over those who are placed, by God, in a higher station to themselves; the servant is still a servant, though called of God, and ennobled by high acquisitions in the divine life. What is it, according to the reasoning of the apostle, that entitled man to his supremacy in creation? because he is the image and glory of God; his having God's image originally is associated with his grant of uncontrolled dominion over the creatures, (Gen. i. 26.) 'And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.' And what he retains of the divine image is the ground of the more limited dominion with which he is yet invested. The Lord's supper is a spiritual banquet in which we should maintain sweet fellowship with God, and animating communion with each other; but an institution so pre-eminently fitted to regale the soul with heavenly comfort, is sometimes prostituted from its legitimate end. The wealthy Corinthians brought viands of their own to the Lord's table, which they shared among themselves, leaving their impoverished brethren empty and hungry, thus making a rite to minister to pride which was intended to bow them in lowly abasement before God, and feeding a spirit of exclusive illiberality by a sacrament which should have been a bond of mutual fellowship, and a badge and mark of their equality as sinners. God was so provoked with their selfish passions, and glaring improprieties, that some of them were afflicted with pining distempers, and some were cut off by death. God may permit the frown of his anger to accompany believers to the very grave: their sun may set in a cloud as in the case of Eli, and the prophet who was sent to denounce the sin of Jeroboam, and who was slain by a lion because he returned to Bethel. Let us, therefore, shun every sin, and show the value we attach to such institutions as the sacramental supper, by improving them to God's glory, and our growth in grace.

PRAYER.

O Lord, help us to be followers of those who, through faith and patience, are inheriting the promises. Thou hast set before us a cloud of witnesses, who, though naturally encompassed with the same frailties as ourselves, have soared above the temptations and snares of this life, and who, in the most arduous situations, have been more than conquerors over every enemy. Help us, like them, to follow the Lamb of God whithersoever he goeth. We thank thee for those sacred ordinances, such as the sacramental supper, by which our faith is quickened, our hope is enlivened, and our preparedness for heaven advanced. But we have to lament that we have often defiled the most hallowed institutions with our abominable lusts; we have carried them like foul ill-omened birds into the house of God, and resembled the disciples of Christ, who, on the very night of the last passover, were betrayed into an unseasonable contention as to which of them should be the greatest. Pardon the sins of our holy things; for they form a peculiar aggravation of our other transgressions, and withdraw not from us those religious privileges which we have despised; in wrath remember mercy. Thou didst dwell among the Israelites in the wilderness, by a visible symbol of thy presence for forty years, and though their provocations were heinous, thou didst never withdraw from them that endearing pledge of thy favour: their murmurings, their contempt of thine authority, did not make thee forsake them. And, Lord, leave not us; though thou mayest visit our iniquities with rods, and our transgressions with stripes, take not thy loving-kindness from us, nor suffer thy faithfulness to fail. Vouchsafe still to bear with us; and finally, conduct us to that world where we shall be freed from all remains of that sin which provokes thee to hide thy face from us; for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XI.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XXIV.

REMARKS.

'The wisdom that is from above' is the only safe guide we can follow, amidst the various temptations and difficulties of this life. This is evident from what is here stated regarding those who neglect and those who attend to the maxims of this heavenly monitor. The former of these classes are declared to be fools; void of understanding; evil men; wicked, mischievous persons; scorners, whose heart studieth destruction, and whose lips talk mischief; who devise to do evil; who lay wait against the dwelling of the righteous, to spoil his resting-place; who justify the wicked, and forbear to deliver the afflicted and oppressed, often under pretence of being ignorant of their condition; who practise deceit, and bear witness, without cause, against their neighbour; and who are given to change, to revenge, to indolence, sensuality, and other vices. How grievously these err, and how bitterly they suffer for their folly, is manifest. When wisdom, counsel, and influence are needful, this portion of scripture, which corresponds with experience, shows them to be awaiting, and condemned of themselves and others. They open not their mouth in the gate, the place of deliberation and judgment; they are held in abomination; the people curse them; and they faint in the day of adversity. He, too, that pondereth the heart and knoweth it, considers them, and visits them according to their doings. He turns his wrath upon them as a flood, and their candle is put out. Hence they fall into mischief, and have no reward. Often does calamity come suddenly upon them, and involve themselves, and those whom they have misled, in terrible ruin. Poverty, desolation, and wretchedness, in some form and degree or other, come upon them, as an armed man that cannot be resisted.

But the reverse of all this takes place, in the lot of them that attend to the directions of wisdom—to the law of the Lord. They cannot escape all the evils of this life. But, when any of these come upon them, they are softened and rendered harmless to them, and more than compensated by many and great advantages, in mind and morals, in temporal and spiritual things. They have knowledge, understanding, strength, and counsel, and these, too, in a state of progressive increase. Hence, they desire not the society and the portion of the wicked, nor fret and feel envious at the success of such, when God sees fit to let them prosper in their way. They indulge no revenge against their enemies, and rejoice not over them when they fall. They respect not the vile, and refrain not to show them their dislike to their conduct, and their determination to maintain the interests of truth and uprightness, when duty calls. They fear God, honour lawful authority, shun those who are carried away by the love of change, guard against all violations of the rights of others, and diligently attend to their personal duties. Their plans of life are, therefore, less frequently marred than they would otherwise be. Their expectation is not cut off. The pleasant things which wisdom bestows are gathered around them. The righteous delight in them, and the wicked cannot hurt them. They have a resting-place in the Lord's presence; and no weapon formed against them shall prosper. The very follies and sins of the wicked are made to instruct them; and all things work together for their good. How precious then is that wisdom from above, which thus guides and blesses the children of God! How needful is such an instructor, to keep us right and safe, amidst so many temptations and dangers, as beset us in this world. Let us pray that this heavenly teacher may be given to us, and that we may never err from the way in which she leads those that trust in her.

PRAYER.

Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good and every perfect gift, send forth thy light and thy truth, and enable us to walk therein. O give us the wisdom that is from above, that we may fear thee, and depart from evil, and do thy will continually. Lead us to the rock that is higher than we; and there may we have a resting-place, secure from every weapon formed against us. Cleanse our souls from sin, in the blood of sprinkling, and let the Spirit of grace work effectually in us, that the enemy and the avenger may have nothing against us. Preserve us from all evil affections, and lead us in the way of righteousness and life. Let envy, and fretfulness, covetousness, and revenge, the love of evil society, and of them that are given to change, and to sloth, and wickedness, be far from us. Give us prudence to manage our affairs with discretion, and direction in all the difficulties of our state. May our hearts be softened and freed from selfishness, that we sympathise with the afflicted, and deliver the needy and distressed, as we have opportunity. May we have faithfulness and firmness to discourage transgressors in their wickedness, and to be helpers to the righteous in every labour of love and godliness. Enable us to render to all their dues; tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour; and to owe no man any thing, but to love and serve him. May the same mind be in us which was in Christ, whose meat it was to do thy will, and finish the work for which he came into this world. Whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, may we do all to thy glory, and be, at last, admitted to thy presence on high, there to be blessed for ever. May these blessings be also given to all for whom we should offer up our prayers at thy throne. Be very gracious to our sovereign, and all in lawful authority in the land, and the whole body of the people. Bless the church established amongst us, and may it long be distinguished for the purity of its doctrine and discipline, and the faithfulness and success of its pastors and people, in every thing well-pleasing in thy sight. Let thy blessing also rest on other churches that walk in Christ Jesus, and maintain the truth as it is in him. Remove all error and corruption from every community of professing Christians, and send the light of thy gospel over the whole world. Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven, for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLIII.

SCRIPTURE—1 COR. XII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

By nature we are in a state of alienation from God, and of subjection to the enfeebling and enslaving power of sin—'carried away and led' to false objects of desire, as unprofitable as 'dumb idols.' While our hearts are thus pre-occupied, Christ is an object of dislike to us. We hold him, as it were, 'accursed.' So long as we are in this state of feeling, we cannot see God. We 'must be born again,' and made 'new creatures.' The effecting of this change in us is the office of the third person of the Godhead. We are, therefore, told that we must be 'born of the Spirit,' and that 'no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.' In this work of regeneration, however, the other two persons unite with him. Their operations are diverse; but the end they have in view is one—our recovery from sin—as they themselves are one. 'The same Spirit,' 'the same Lord,' 'the same God,' three-in-one, 'worketh all in all; for 'God is one.' All who are thus renewed and brought to rest their interests on Christ, and to live by his law, are so united to him and to one another, as to be termed 'the body of Christ, and members in particular.' Hence, we are severally compared, according to our gifts and offices, to the eyes, the ears, feet, &c., in the natural body, some being more, and some less, honourably and usefully employed, in the service of him who is our 'Head,' and who directs us all in our different departments of duty. When Christ had finished his work on earth, and had ascended to the Father, the Spirit came forth to dispense amongst us the gifts which the sufferings on Calvary had purchased. He has, consequently, given a great variety of endowments to various persons, and has assigned them also many offices—'dividing to every man severally as he will,' or sees meet. But whatever be the gifts he may have given us, whether faith, the power of healing, or any other, and to whatever offices he may have appointed us, whether those of teachers, or those of rulers, or any other, in the church, 'the manifestation' of his agency, in these several ways, is given to us that we may 'profit withal.' He has arranged the whole for our good—for 'the perfecting of the saints—for the edifying of the body of Christ.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

This passage of scripture should lead us seriously to inquire whether we be in a renewed, or still in a natural state. If yet unrenewed, we should earnestly pray for the Spirit to give us a new heart and a right mind. If already renewed, we should be grateful, and glorify our God who has visited and blessed us with much grace. We should diligently improve all the gifts and privileges, so benevolently vouchsafed to us, for abiding in Christ, and growing in him, and fulfilling all the ends of our membership in his body. We should, moreover, study that there be no schism amongst us. As the operations of the three persons of the Godhead are various, and yet combined, as the three themselves are united and one God, and as all the different members of the natural body have different offices, and yet all constitute but one body, and minister to one another, for the general good, so, whatever be the diversities of gifts, stations, offices, and operations amongst us, we should 'endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,' suffering and rejoicing together, honouring and doing good to each other continually. Finally: we should always be satisfied with the gifts, the place, and the office assigned to us by the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and strive to walk worthy of the undeserved goodness poured down upon us, even in the lowest department of service, as well as the highest, in which any of us is engaged.

PRAYER.

O thou who canst enlighten the dark mind, subdue the proud will, and break the hard heart, be pleased to destroy the natural man in us, and enable us to feel that we are renewed unto righteousness. Give us the manifestation of the Spirit, that we may know that we are in Christ Jesus, and are members of his body in particular. For every such evidence of renewing grace in our souls, O Lord, make us thankful. Enable us to have the temper of mind, and the character of life, to which it should lead. May we have that faith in Christ which takes hold of his finished work, and to which, alone, pardon and peace are promised. May we have that feeling of fellowship towards them that are in Christ which overcomes selfishness, and schism, which keeps the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and prompts to brotherly-kindness, and charity, and every good work. May we honour and aid one another in every thing pertaining to life and to godliness, that thereby we may be fellow-workers with all saints, in edifying the body of Christ, and giving glory to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost. May we all, in our several places, and according to our several gifts, reverence thine appointments, and attend to the duties assigned to us. We bless thee, most gracious God, for the protection and direction, and manifold mercies which thou hast vouchsafed to us during the course of the past day's events, and for all our present privileges and comforts. Watch around our dwelling this night, and let no evil come nigh unto any one of us. Forgive our sins; sanctify our souls; prepare our hearts for all the duties and enjoyments of thy day; and fit us for life, death, judgment, and eternity. May there be many, too, among our kindred and neighbours, and in all ranks of life, from the throne to the cottage, made partakers of these blessings. May thy ministers and people have all a portion of heavenly things given to them, suited to the several departments of service in which they have to labour. May thy work go on in every land, and in every heart, till all, whom thou hast appointed unto life, shall be perfected, and gathered together in Zion above. Let the time come when the whole earth will be the Lord's, and the dwellers therein his ran-somed ones, through Jesus Christ; so let it be. Amen, and Amen.

THIRTY-FOURTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM xcvi.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS xcvi. xcvi.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

PSALM xcvi. The sovereignty and supremacy of God, and his right to the worship of all, are here asserted. 'The Lord reigneth;' he is 'high above all the earth,' and 'exalted far above all gods' or created beings, however elevated and revered they may be. 'Worship him all ye gods.' We have next a description of the terrors with which he surrounds himself when taking vengeance on his enemies, who are designated as persons 'that serve graven images; that boast themselves of idols,' or 'serve and worship the creature more than the Creator.' From these he hides himself, as 'in the secret place of thunder,' where 'clouds and darkness are round about him.' But righteous judgments, consuming dispensations, sooner or later, come forth from his throne, and then, like lightning, 'a fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about.' However wise, immovable, and exalted they may think themselves, when he thus reveals himself in wrath, they are 'confounded,' and 'tremble,' and 'melt like wax.' Many such consumptions of the wicked has the world witnessed; hence it is said, 'the earth saw it,' 'his lightnings enlightened the world.' These things are so evident to all, high and low, who study his ways, that it is farther said, 'the heavens declare his righteousness, and all the people see his glory.' How much more evident will all this be in the judgment of the last day! But we have here another description of a more pleasing nature, that of the blessed state of 'them that love the Lord.' Of these it is said, 'he preserveth the souls of his saints,' and 'delivereth them out of the hands of the wicked,' even when their danger seems most pressing. When all is dark and discouraging, he leads them in a path that they thought not of, and 'compasses them about with songs of deliverance;' for 'light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart.' How often did this happen to God's people in the days of old! 'Zion heard it and was glad, and the daughters of Judah rejoiced, because of the judgments of the Lord.' Often, too, has it happened to the godly in all ages.

PSALM xcvi. The judgments and deliverances set before us in the last psalm, and other such like dispensations, are here termed 'marvellous things,' whereby the Lord's 'right hand, and his holy arm, hath gotten him the victory.' The history of the law and the gospel abounds with such things. But the most marvellous of all is the great victory over the powers of darkness—the salvation of mankind—which he accomplished on Calvary. That has been widely proclaimed throughout the world. 'The Lord hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the heathen.' Many heathen lands have already been converted to Christ; many more have heard of him; and the time will come when, in the strictest sense, it can be said, 'all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.' It will then be made evident to the most incredulous, that 'he hath remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel.' The full and final manifestation of this will take place in the day when 'he cometh to judge the earth.' Before him shall then be gathered all nations, and he will render to all according to their deeds; for 'with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

'Ye that love the Lord, hate evil,' which leads to such misery, and practise 'holiness,' which enjoys so great and so many blessings. 'Flee from the wrath to come,' that, in the day when 'the Lord is revealed,' and he decides the doom of every one for ever, he may remember his mercy and truth towards you, and give you a place among the redeemed. Be also ready, at all times, to adore him in every way in your power. 'Sing a new song' to him. 'Sing unto the Lord with the harp and the voice of a psalm, with trumpets, and sound of cornet.' 'The multitudes of the isles,' 'the sea and the fullness thereof,' 'all the earth,' 'the world and they that dwell therein,' are all invited and commanded to unite in the song of praise. Let us all, then, stir up our souls to magnify the Lord, especially on this his own day, which he has set aside for these ends.

PRAYER.

King of kings, and Lord of lords, to whom every knee must bow, and every tongue confess, how fearful and wonderful are thy works among the children of men! Thou reignest over thine enemies in clouds and darkness, in righteousness and judgment. When thou takest vengeance on them, they are confounded, and tremble, and melt as wax at thy presence. Thou reignest, also, over them that love thee in grace and peace. Thou preservest the souls of thy saints, and deliverest them from the hand of the wicked. Thou givest them light and direction in times of perplexity and trouble, and fillest their hearts with gladness. Thou hast done marvellous things in their behalf. Thine own right hand hath won for them the victory over the enemy; and the salvation which that victory has made theirs, thou hast openly showed in the sight of the heathen. For all these things, O Lord, we desire to rejoice, and to sing a new song unto thee. Our hearts will be glad before thee, and we will make a joyful noise to the Rock of our salvation. We bless thee for this day which thou hast given us to call these wonders of thy mercy to our remembrance. O enable us to count it honourable, and to devote it to thy holy work. May it be a day of thy right hand, and of delight to our souls. May it add strength to our hatred of evil, and love of holiness, and make us walk more determinately by faith, and not by sight. O deliver us from the pollution, the power, and the punishment of sin, through the righteousness of our Redeemer, and the grace of our Sanctifier; and may all our sabbaths on earth tend to fit us the more effectually for the endless sabbath, which the ransomed of the Lord enjoy in heaven. May much bread be cast upon the waters, and much seed be sown in good ground this day, and many hungry souls be satisfied with the goodness of thy house. May all that preach, all that hear, and all that read, thy word, feel its power, and live as its directs. O send it forth into all lands, and make thy salvation extend to the ends of the earth. Bless thine own work every where, that many may rejoice when thou comest to judge the world in righteousness, and the people in equity, by Jesus Christ. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM C.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS XCIX. C. CI.

REMARKS.

PSALM XCIX. In this psalm we are commanded to serve the Lord with godly fear. 'Let the people tremble, let the earth be moved,' and with deep humility 'worship at his footstool;' and to offer him outward adoration, 'let them praise thy great and terrible name;' 'exalt ye the Lord our God,' even 'at his holy hill,' in the presence of his people, as the Jews did when assembled on the hill on which the temple was built. To induce us to do all this many moving considerations are laid before us, such as his sovereignty, 'the Lord reigneth;' his greatness, 'he sitteth between the cherubims' and 'is great in Zion;' his supremacy, 'he is high above all people;' his holiness, 'for the Lord our God is holy;' his love of justice, 'the king's strength loveth judgment;' his righteousness, 'thou dost establish equity, thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob;' his impartiality in punishing even his own people when they sin, 'thou tookest vengeance on their inventions;' and, also, his condescension and kindness, 'he spake unto them in the cloudy pillar,' and gave them 'testimonies' and 'ordinances;' and his mercy and forgiveness, 'thou answeredst them,' and 'forgavest them.' The example of distinguished saints too, is mentioned, of those who 'called upon the Lord' in times of old, such as 'Moses, and Aaron, and Samuel.'

PSALM C. This psalm refers chiefly to public worship. 'All lands' are commanded to 'make a joyful oise unto the Lord ;' to 'serve the Lord with gladness ;' to 'come before his presence with singing ;' to 'enter his gates with thanksgiving, and his courts with praise ;' to be 'thankful to him, and bless him.' All this implies public and universal homage. For his many motives are here also submitted to us. 'The Lord is God,' whose right to be thus honoured is supreme and indisputable ; 'it is he that made us, and not we ourselves,' and made us for himself ; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture. Hence we have been led 'beside the still waters,' and made 'to lie down in green pastures' by 'the good shepherd,' who has given 'his life for the sheep.' He is indeed 'good ;' his mercy is everlasting ; his truth endureth to all generations.' His infinite goodness, and our unspeakable obligations to him, thus combine to urge us on to serve and honour him with the utmost fervour of soul, and in the most public manner in our power.

PSALM CI. This psalm relates principally to family worship and family conduct, and may be regarded as the householder's directory. What David here says, in his kingly capacity, we, in more lowly stations, cannot adopt ; but in so far as his principles and conduct, in regulating his household arrangements, are laid before us, they are evidently such as become all heads of families, and ought to be followed. All of us so situated should daily pray, as he did, that the Lord may 'come to us,' and enable us to 'sing of mercy and judgment unto him,' and to 'behave ourselves wisely in a perfect way.' We should study and strive, in divine strength, to lead our household to praise and serve God ; to 'walk within our house with a perfect heart ;' to 'set no wicked thing before our eyes ;' to 'hate the work of them that turn aside from the right path ;' and to be examples and helpers to all about us in every duty. Our authority should also be used to preserve our families from being corrupted by the admission or continuance among them of improper persons. We are not warranted to say, literally, 'I will early destroy all the wicked of the land ;' I will cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord ;' but we ought to cut or break off all family and familiar intercourse with such, and have nothing more to do with them than what is rendered unavoidable by duty. We should be able to say, in the full sincerity of our souls, 'a froward heart shall depart from me ; I will not know a wicked person' as a companion, friend, or servant ; 'whoso privily slandereth his neighbour, him will I cut off' from my fellowship ; 'him that hath an high look and a proud heart will not I suffer' to abide with me ; 'he that vorketh deceit shall not dwell within my house ; he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight.' If this course were strictly and invariably followed, how much guilt and misery in individuals, families, and larger communities, would it prevent ; but this is not enough, our eyes should 'be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with us ;' and we should study to have him only to serve us 'that walketh in a perfect way.' If we were always to act thus, all our interests, civil and sacred, would be much more effectually promoted than they have ever yet been.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art great in Zion, and high above all the people. Thou sittest between the cherubim in awful majesty, executing judgment and righteousness in Jacob, and taking vengeance on the sinful inventions of men. When we think of all this, our souls bow down before thee, and with godly fear we worship at thy footstool. But thou art also good and gracious, forgiving the sins of thy people, and answering the supplications which they offer up to thee. Thy mercy is everlasting, and thy truth endureth for ever. O God, thou hast made us, and not we ourselves. We are thy people, the sheep of thy pasture. The good Shepherd hath laid down his life for us, and revived our souls, and led us beside still waters. Our lines have fallen in pleasant places, in a land of ordinances, where thy word, thy sabbaths, and the assemblies of thy people, refresh our souls, and make our hearts glad. For all these precious privileges we bless and magnify thy glorious name. We adore and praise thee for all thy benefits bestowed on us this day, whether in thy house, when worshipping with thy people, or in our family intercourse, when speaking of thy wonders of grace to us ; or in our solitude, when thinking of the numberless mercies we have received at thy hand. As a family of thy favoured ones, grateful for past mercies, we desire to glorify thee ; and feeling our manifold infirmities, we pray that thou wouldst enable us to serve thee faithfully in time to come. May we daily sing of mercy and judgment unto thee, and behave ourselves wisely in a perfect way. May we walk within our house with a perfect heart, and set no wicked thing before our eyes. May we hate the work of all that turn aside from thee, and cut off from our fellowship all that do wickedly. May our eyes be on the faithful of the land, and our delights with them that serve thee. Let such dwell with us, that this house may be a Bethel, where thy name is loved and honoured, and thy blessings abound. Let all the dwellings, also, in this neighbourhood, and throughout the land, and throughout the whole world, be places wherein thou makest thine abode. May the sanctifying influences of thy word and sabbaths be felt even to the ends of the earth. Let thy truths, which have this day been proclaimed to many, be remembered and made profitable to them ; and may they be declared and received wherever they are yet unknown. O let thy kingdom rule over all, and in all, now, henceforth, and for ever, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVII. 29.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XXVI.

Ver. 1—12. By what a variety of expressive similitudes does the sacred writer here illustrate the pernicious consequences of folly! To confer honour and authority upon the foolish, is to bestow what will be injurious to themselves, and to all over whom they have rule. It is like confounding the course of nature, and disturbing the revolutions of the seasons. But happily the desire of the ungodly to oppress often 'outruns their power; and their 'causeless curses' (like harmless birds) fly over the heads of the innocent against whom they are directed. In dealing with those who are 'like the horse or mule, which have no understanding,' a degree of severity, which alone can move their intractable and stubborn natures, must sometimes be resorted to. Indeed it is impossible to lay down a rule in such cases of universal application. Sometimes a fool should not be answered at all; or if he be, care should be taken not to degrade ourselves to his low level by rendering railing for railing, and opposing folly by folly. But when silence would only have the effect of increasing his presumption, and encouraging him to persevere in his folly, we should be ready to give such an answer as may show how groundless is his self-complacency, and put his ignorance to shame. There is no limit to the absurdities of the foolish; but never do they appear more truly contemptible, and exhibit their real character more conspicuously, than when they affect to be wise. 'Excellent speech becometh not a fool.' His attempted wisdom demonstrates his folly, and furnishes materials for his own condemnation. As we would beware, then, of following his pernicious ways, let us learn not to lean to our own understandings, or to form a lofty estimate of our character and attainments. But far from being thus 'wise in our own conceit,' let us be willing, in a certain sense, 'to become fools, that we may be wise.'

Ver. 13—16. Of the various forms which folly assumes, indolence is one of the most despicable, and the most hopeless. The indolent are seldom, indeed, without excuses for their sloth. They can easily conjure up imaginary difficulties. There is always some 'lion in the way' when there is a peculiar call for exertion. They slumber on in listlessness and inactivity, wretched themselves, and involving their dependents in wretchedness; wasting the precious hours of time, and laying up in store a good foundation neither for this life nor for the life to come. And yet, with the evidences of their folly meeting them on every hand, they think themselves superlatively wise. How often do we see this spirit manifested in relation to the things of eternity!

Ver. 17—28. It is the part of true wisdom to avoid interfering unnecessarily in the strifes of others, which, in many cases, will have the effect of pleasing neither of the parties, but only of turning their resentment from each other against ourselves. Painful it is to reflect that there are so many who delight in kindling strife. They may, indeed, excuse themselves, while deceiving their neighbour, defaming his character, and stirring up contention, by pleading that it is 'in sport;' but so likewise does the madman, who 'casteth firebrands, arrows, and death.' Wo unto them that sport with falsehood, their laughter shall at length be turned to mourning. Especially aggravated is the sin of the slanderer, who feels a malignant pleasure in blasting the reputation of his brethren. But amid all the wickedness of men, there is a God that judgeth in the earth; and frequently, even in this world, the devices of the slanderer signally recoil upon themselves. And even when judgment against the evil works of the impenitent is not executed speedily, there is not a remission of the penalty; its infliction is only delayed, so that their 'judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their condemnation slumbereth not.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, pour out upon us, at this time, the spirit of grace and the spirit of supplications, that we may offer unto thee the prayer of faith, and obtain the blessings which thou hast promised to thine acceptable worshippers. May our prayer be set forth before thee as incense, and the lifting up of our hands as the morning sacrifice. We bless thee for the mercies of the past night; that our sleep hath not been unto death, and our awaking in the world of spirits; and that we are the living, the living to praise thee, as we do this day. We thank thee for the privileges of the Christian sabbath which we yesterday enjoyed. Thou didst bring us to thy holy temple, and make us joyful in thy house of prayer. May the solemn impressions then made not terminate with the day of sacred rest. May we carry the spirit of the sabbath with us into the other days of the week, and seek to have them all leavened with its heavenly influence. May we remember, when we go forth into the world, that we have been on the mount with God; and though we have now descended from it, may our faces still shine, and may men take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus. We beseech thee, heavenly Father, to grant unto us the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Christ, and to enlighten the darkened eyes of our understanding. We confess that folly is bound up in our hearts, and frequently manifests its influence in our lives. Deliver us from its fatal dominion, and lead us to cry after knowledge, and lift up our voice for understanding. May we repose no confidence in our own wisdom, but seek for that wisdom which cometh from above. May we beware of sinking into a state of lukewarmness and spiritual indifference, sporting ourselves with our own deceivings, and lulling our souls into the slumbers of spiritual death. In our intercourse with our fellow-men, may we walk in wisdom towards them that are without, and be preserved from the malice and the calumnies of the ungodly. Or if we must endure grief, suffering wrongfully, may we consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be wearied and faint in our minds. We wait for thy salvation, O Lord; and we entreat that it may be the portion of every member of this family, of all with whom we stand connected, and of all whom we should bear upon our hearts when we approach thy throne. When we rise from thy footstool, may we not be estranged from thy gracious presence. Compass us with thy favour as with a shield; and in thy name may we rejoice all the day. May the Lord deliver us from every evil work, and preserve us into his heavenly kingdom. To him, with the Son, and the ever blessed Spirit, be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LI. 6.

SCRIPTURE—1 COR. XIII.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—3. The design of the apostle in this chapter is to show the superiority of charity, or love, to all the spiritual gifts which the Corinthians estimated so highly. He delineates the effects of love as respects our fellow-men; but these are connected with the love of God in the heart, which is the great principle from which they flow. 'By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God and keep his commandments.' Of this Christian grace it is declared, that it is more excellent than the gift of tongues, and of prophecy, and the possession of all knowledge. It is more excellent than the faith of miracles, than the most unbounded benevolence to the poor, or even than martyrdom itself. We may impoverish ourselves in relieving the poverty of others, and yet this divine love may not dwell within us. We may sacrifice our lives, and give our bodies to the flames, while yet we present not ourselves a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God. Though we were to possess a faith powerful for the working of miracles, if to this faith we add not brotherly-kindness and charity, it would be powerless for working out our salvation. For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, or the gift of prophecy, nor the gift of tongues, nor faith which can remove mountains—'but faith which worketh by love.'

Ver. 4—7. How important is it for us to inquire whether this be a just delineation of Christian love! Is it distinguished by the various characteristics enumerated in these verses? Is such a love as this an essential constituent of the Christian character? Did Jesus say, in reference to this grace, 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another?' If it be so, how few possess the character of his disciples! In how few hearts does this queen of the Christian graces reign! Which of us has not much cause for self-condemnation when we look on this picture, drawn by the apostle under the guidance of inspiration, and then look into our own hearts for the counterpart which ought there to be exhibited? Let us inquire whether we possess, in any considerable degree, this ennobling, this heavenly principle? Do we show it in the various practical ways here described?

Ver. 8—13. Love is farther declared to be more enduring than spiritual gifts. The gifts of prophecy and of tongues were soon withdrawn from the church. The communication of knowledge by inspiration ceased with the completion of the sacred canon. And the greatest amount of terrestrial knowledge will be as nothing when compared with the perfect knowledge of heaven. Like the knowledge of our childhood, it will at length appear to us as ignorance itself. It will be like the view which we obtain of an object by means of the reflection of a mirror, compared with that which is obtained by immediate vision. But it is otherwise with the cardinal graces of the divine life. The gifts of prophecy, of tongues, and of knowledge, have ceased; but faith, hope, and love, 'abide,' and will abide while the world itself endures. But love possesses more than an equality of dignity with the two graces with which it is associated. As they soar above all others, it is super-eminent among them. Faith, hope, and love, abide; but love alone abideth for ever. Faith, hope, and love, are great; but love is the greatest. It is greater than its kindred graces in respect of the extent of its influence. In its first and directest actings it regards not only God and ourselves, as do faith and hope, but our brethren of mankind. It is greater in respect of the perfection of its influence. Our love is indeed imperfect; but love is not in itself imperfect. For he who is the perfection of beauty, and the fountain of all excellency, claims it as his distinguishing characteristic. 'God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.' Love, moreover, is the end which faith and hope are designed to promote and accomplish. They terminate not in themselves. But love looks not beyond itself to any higher grace, to any greater source of enjoyment, to any attainment of man's transcendent excellency. It is the consummation of the whole scheme of salvation. When faith and hope have kindled love, they are eclipsed by its brightness, nay, they at length expire. Yes, when faith is lost in vision, and hope fades in enjoyment, love will still remain. It will survive the shock of the body's dissolution. It will accompany the soul in its mysterious flight to regions unknown. It will enter in with it through the gates into the heavenly city; and there love will reign in every breast eternally, intense, expansive, unalloyed. In obtaining love, then, we obtain all. In exercising it, we exercise all, for love is the fulfilling of the law. It is the bond of perfectness. It is the image of the invisible God.

PRAYER.

Eternal and ever blessed God, look down from heaven, the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory, upon us who are kneeling this evening before thy throne of grace. To thee belongeth righteousness; but unto us shame and confusion of face, because we have sinned against thee. Blessed be thy name, that, notwithstanding our helplessness and unworthiness, thou hast not cast us off utterly and for ever, but hast revealed to us a glorious Saviour and a great salvation, and hast proclaimed thyself as just, and yet the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. Forbid that any of us should receive thy grace in vain, or that we should refuse to close with the offers of a beseeching Saviour. If we have been enabled to receive Christ Jesus the Lord, may we walk in him, rooted and built up in him, and stablished in the faith as we have been taught. And when we put on the breastplate of faith and love, may we take for an helmet the hope of salvation. May the hope set before us be the anchor of our souls, sure and steadfast, and entering in within the vail. Grant that while our faith and hope fail not, they may ever work by love. May the love of God be shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us. And may we purify our hearts in obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren, and thus know that we have passed from death unto life. Under the influence of this spirit of love, we would make intercession for all our brethren of mankind. Let thy way be known upon the earth, and thy saving health among all nations. Have mercy upon thine ancient people, who are still beloved for the fathers' sakes, and remove the vail from their hearts. May thy name soon be great among the Gentiles, from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same. And may thy Spirit be poured out upon the churches in copious effusion. Remember our absent relations and friends. May great grace, mercy, and peace, be multiplied unto them all. Draw near to the afflicted. Comfort those who seek for repose in vain, and are full of tossings to and fro until the dawning of the day. Protect us during the hours of darkness and silence. May no evil befall us, no plague come nigh our dwelling. And when that night comes when we shall lie down to awake not again till the heavens be no more, Lord, grant that we may sleep in Jesus, and be satisfied when we awake with thy likeness. These our supplications we present before thee in the name of our Redeemer, and for his sake we beseech thee to send us an answer of peace, and the glory shall be thine for evermore. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM xc. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS xxvii.

REMARKS.

How solemn is the admonition with which this chapter is introduced, and how just and impressive the reason by which it is enforced! We know not what a day may bring forth; and, therefore, should never presume to 'boast of to-morrow.' There are events in the womb of time which are hid in impenetrable darkness until their accomplishment. No human wisdom can foresee them, or provide for them. This night our souls may be required of us. To-morrow may find us in eternity.

Since then life is so transient and uncertain, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness! How sedulous should we be to approve ourselves as the servants of Christ, and to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things! If we live under the influence of these feelings, our own works will commend us without our having recourse to the unseemly expedient of self-commendation. We will be enabled rightly to estimate, and not unduly to be alarmed by the resentment of the ungodly; and though we may not avoid their envy, we will not thereby be detained from the fearless discharge of our duty. We will highly value the cautions, and even the reproofs of those who regard us with affection; although for the time they may be felt to be painful. Their 'hearty counsel' will at length be like 'ointment and perfume rejoicing our hearts;' while the plausible professions of the flatterer will be found to be deceitful. Even when they are sincerely given, lavished commendations are not to be coveted. They defeat their own end, by provoking the malice of those who will not fail to counterbalance them by their ungenerous aspersions and malignant insinuations. Unhappy is his case, who is the object of this hostility, from whatever quarter it may proceed: but peculiarly is he to be pitied, whose 'foes are those of his household;' and who is harassed by domestic strifes which he seeks in vain to conceal. This detracts, however, in no degree from the justly-commended advantages of social intercourse, and friendly companionship; when it is regulated by the directions laid down in the word of God. If we be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers—if our friends be likewise the friends of God, our fellowship with them can scarcely be too intimate and endearing. 'The companion of fools shall be destroyed, but he that walketh with wise men shall be wise.' For 'as iron sharpeneth iron,' the intercourse of friendship whets the ingenuity, draws forth the latent powers, strengthens the hands, and cheers the hearts of men. What an encouragement does this afford for cultivating the society, and the converse of the people of God! It is painful to turn from the contemplation of such a scene, to that of the obstinately wicked. Their intercourse with each other stimulates their propensities to evil, and hardens them in crime. 'Evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived.' The severest judgments move them not. One alarming visitation of providence after another passes over them; but it disturbs not their security. God leads them into the wilderness; but there they continue their provocations. He casts them into the furnace, that the fountains of their iniquity may be consumed; and they do not only fall down bound in the midst of it, but after they come forth from it their iniquities still find them, and they are holden with the cords of their sins. He says to them, at last, in his wrath, why will ye be stricken any more?' And then abandons them to their fate.

But blessed is the man whom the Lord chastens, and teaches out of his law! His afflictions are tokens of love, seals of discipleship, and preparations for glory. When all earthly comforts fail, 'God is the strength of his heart;' and with him he has all and abounds. The consciousness of his being an object of the divine favour, moreover, gives a zest to all the enjoyments of life, which the ungodly can never experience. Pleasing it is to such a man, to behold the goodness of the God of seasons, in 'causing grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man.' Having food and raiment, he is therewith content; nor does he desire to exchange his humble circumstances for the ensnaring advantages of wealth and grandeur. He can say, 'the Lord is the portion of mine inheritance and of my up; thou maintainest my lot. The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art from everlasting to everlasting God. Thy years are throughout all generations. But as for man his days are as grass, and as a flower of the field he fades away. We know not what a day may bring forth: for our times are entirely in thy hand. We are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled. Lord, teach us then to know our end, and the measure of our days, that we may know how frail we are. Suffer us not to hold things transient as with an immortal grasp. May we not have our only portion in this life. May we be content with the allotments of thy providence, and feel that the least of all thy mercies exceeds our deservings. Teach us implicit submission to thy will, however trying thy dispensations may be. Let it not be said of us, Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved: thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction. May we humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt us in due time. Alas! we must confess that we have provoked the infliction of thy righteous judgments. For we have misimproved our privileges. We have followed after vanity, and have become vain. We have loved the praise of men more than the praise of God. We have not delighted as we ought, in holding communion with thy people; and unfrequent has been our fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. Instead of mounting up with wings as eagles, we have been contented to grovel in the dust. Our love soon waxes cold. Our faith becomes feeble and ready to expire. Our affections are entangled with the things of time. A multitude of vain thoughts rush tumultuously into our minds. The adversary obtains an advantage over us. And by our secret transgressions, and sinful conformity to the world, we estrange our souls from thee. But, Lord, we would return unto thee, though we have fallen by our iniquity. We would plead the merits of thy Son for the pardon of our guilt. We implore the aids of the Holy Spirit to strengthen us in the hour of temptation. May we instantly comply with his holy suggestions; and surrender our whole souls to him with unresisting acquiescence. As we are now about to mingle with the world, do thou keep us from the evil. May we be diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. May every member of this family, and all our beloved relations and friends, be members of the household of faith. May we all walk with God on earth, that we may dwell with him for ever in heaven. All that we ask, and all that we hope to obtain, is for the sake of Jesus, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 15.

SCRIPTURE—1 COR. XIV.

REMARKS.

While the apostle exhorts the Corinthians to follow after love, which in the preceding chapter he had so highly commended, he encourages them also to desire spiritual gifts, which although inferior to it in value, were yet not to be neglected. It is those which are useful, however, after which he would have them peculiarly to aspire; and, therefore, he prefers prophesying—or making known the will of God, either under the influence of direct inspiration, or by explaining what was already revealed, to the power of speaking in an unknown tongue. The latter might edify the individual who possessed the miraculous endowment: the former alone could edify the church. To speak in a language unknown to those who were addressed, was, therefore, unprofitable and vain. It was 'speaking into the air.' The language indeed might be most expressive and significant; but it was neither the one nor the other to those by whom it was not understood. Paul was well qualified to pronounce a decision in this matter. He surpassed all the Corinthians in this very attainment on account of which they prided themselves. But in a Christian assembly, he would rather 'speak five words' by which others might be edified, than 'ten thousand in an unknown tongue.' The gift of tongues was designed for the conversion of unbelievers, manifesting as it did a divinely-communicated power: but there was a danger of its being so perverted as to prejudice them against the truth, and confirm them in their infidelity. He therefore concludes by giving them directions that 'all things should be done unto edifying;' that no irregularity or disorder should disturb the solemnity of their worshipping assemblies; that women should not take part in the public ministrations: and that none, under the pretence of inspiration, should presume to contravene these instructions, which were the express 'commandments of the Lord.'

How prone are men to abuse the gifts of God, when even those which are miraculous could be so perverted and misapplied! We ought to feel the liveliest gratitude that while these extraordinary gifts are no longer enjoyed, the Spirit still imparts those gifts and graces which are far more intrinsically valuable—that whereas tongues have ceased, faith, hope, and love abide. Let us duly appreciate our privileges, in having the devotional services of the sanctuary conducted in a language which we can understand: while we pity the blinded adherents of the church of Rome, in pertinaciously cleaving to the opposite custom, which the apostle, in this chapter, so explicitly and strongly condemns. But let us also remember that it is possible for the ends of edification to be defeated, when the language employed is not one unknown. It is, therefore, incumbent on all preachers of the gospel to study great plainness of speech, so as to make the truth level to the apprehension of all. If they thus 'preach not themselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord;' and are influenced by love to Christ, and love to the souls of men; while deep solemnity and reverence characterize the demeanour of the assembled worshippers, strangers and unbelievers who may be present will sometimes be savingly impressed. The word, like a sharp two-edged sword, wielded by him who alone can render it living and powerful, will pierce to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit. So that 'the secrets of their hearts being made manifest,' they will be constrained to acknowledge that the self-evidencing power of the gospel is no delusion, and that God is of a truth in the midst of his church.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the omnipotent and omniscient Jehovah: as the searcher of the hearts, and the trier of the reins of the children of men. At all times we are surrounded by thy presence, and subjected to the piercing gaze of thine omniscience: but especially are we naked and open to the eyes of thee with whom we have to do, when we approach thee in the exercises of worship, and advance into the sanctuary, when thou who dwellest between the cherubim shinest forth to thy people. May we take heed to ourselves that we offer not strange fire which thou hast not commanded, lest thou shine forth to us in terrible majesty, and consume the offerers instead of accepting of the offering. Realizing thy presence, may we lie low in the dust of which we were made, acknowledging our weakness, and our vileness. But while overwhelmed with a sense of our unworthiness and guilt, may we be cheered by beholding thy glory as it shines in the face of Jesus; and be enabled to feel that in him thou art reconciled; so that we who were once afar off, are now made nigh by the blood of Christ. And having thus liberty of access to thee at all times, may we value more than we hitherto have done, the ordinances of thine appointment. In them may we meet with the Saviour, and be satisfied with his goodness. May we even pray with the spirit, and with the understanding also. As new born babes, may we desire the sincere milk of the word, that we may grow thereby. May nothing be done through strife or vain glory, but in lowliness of mind. May we thus become strong in faith, abound in hope, and have the flame of divine love not only kindled within us, but rendered more bright, and glowing, and unquenchable. Prosper thy cause, we beseech thee, in our native land. Give us a season of refreshing from thy presence. Send a plenteous rain to confirm thine inheritance when it is weary. Pour out thy Spirit upon all flesh. Turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Bring in the fullness of the Gentile nations. Let satan's kingdom be destroyed. Advance thine own. Be gracious to those who are laid on beds of languishing and pain. May all who are near and dear to us participate in thy favour. Accept of our thanksgivings for the mercies of the past day. When we are sunk in unconscious slumber, may the angel of the Lord encamp around our dwelling, and do thou, who neither slumberest nor sleepest, watch over us, and bless us. And now unto the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, we ascribe the praise, and the glory, world without end. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM I.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XXVIII.

REMARKS.

The righteous differ from the wicked in their ways, so likewise in the fruits which they gather; many portions of scripture set forth in general terms, that the fruit of the righteous is sweet, and that of the wicked bitter in the end; thus, in the first psalm, the godly man whose blessedness continues, is contrasted with the ungodly whose way shall be verthrown. In this chapter of Proverbs, the same truth is set forth more particularly; the two opposite characters being brought into close comparison, as it were, in a great variety of positions, in each of which the measure of good or true happiness enjoyed by the one, is equalled by the measure of evil or real misery endured by the other. The instances given relate to the greatest concerns of human kind. If the powers of reason and understanding are to be applied with success to the conduct of life and its business—if the soul is to be made glad in the kind flections of our social condition in this world, or, if escape is sought from the bitter regrets, the depressing fears, and the anxious longings to which our fallen nature exposes us, then, as to all these, it is declared that the godly man hath the advantage over the ungodly; yea, it is shown, that by bringing the two characters together, we come to be comparing good possessed with evil endured. The more extensive our experience of human life may be, the more readily will we own the truth as to the particular instances herein set down; nor can we doubt that one purpose of their being so set down, was this, that the mind might pass from acknowledging the one or more of them to the settled belief, that how far soever any other forms or circumstances of human life might be multiplied as instances, still the same truth would be made evident in them all. Let our hearts yield then to the impression of a deep sense of the immutable counsel of the all-wise Creator. And let us never, as to any particular transaction, great or small, as to individuals, or households, or kingdoms, or portions of the visible church, expect that the end shall be any thing else than a fulfilment in the works of his providence of what God hath spoken in his word, as when it is said, great peace have all they who love thy law, and nothing shall offend them; 'but the wicked are like the troubled sea when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.' Let sin never appear before our view without causing this word to come up into our remembrance, 'there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.'

We cannot attentively compare the fruits of godliness and ungodliness without making this reflection, 'behold what sin hath wrought!' For each suffering that falls on the transgressor's head, is, to some extent, a destroying of the works of God. It is something turned to sorrow, that was once capable of giving joy. And thus viewed, how exceeding great is the sinfulness of sin! What variety of gifts and talents are entrusted to man's keeping! by none fully occupied—by most wholly wasted to their own and their neighbour's hurt: and that through all the relations of life—all the ranks of society—all the offices of government, whether in civil or in sacred things—and in all the kingdoms of the earth! Well may we then cry out, O the patience of God; who seest thy law, holy, just, and good, trampled on, and thy well-ordered works broken, and yet correctest not in anger, but with judgment and in goodness, that we may be led unto repentance! Let us not, however, forget, that for the impenitent workers of iniquity, there is reserved a day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. But being moved by a sense of the goodness and of the severity of God, let us account it as something gained when we have been enabled to discover our transgressions or shortcomings, that, by breaking off from them, we may come nearer and nearer unto that blessedness with which it is promised that Christ Jesus will bless all that come unto him, not only in giving them the remission of their sins, but also in turning away every one of them from their iniquities.

PRAYER.

O God most holy, incline our hearts unto thy worship in the name of Jesus Christ, the only Mediator between God and man. Heavenly Father, direct our thoughts and our words by the promised Spirit, helping our infirmities. Blessed art thou, O God. In thy presence is fullness of joy; and out of the river of thy pleasures hast thou given a portion to the creatures of thine hand. Even in our fallen condition here, thou daily loadest us with thy benefits, while thy word telleth us that we are departed far from thee, and have provoked thine anger, and are visited by thy corrections for our many sins. We must own thee to be just, in causing vanity and vexation of spirit to be mingled with our present state; yea, we have cause to say, Great is thy long-suffering and patience. It is of thy mercies that we are not consumed, and because thy compassions fail not. Thou, O God, mightest justly have left us to perish in our sins. Yet thou art giving us warning to turn away from evil, and thou art giving us counsel that thou mightest bring us unto good. Praise be unto thee, who thereby provest unto us thy fatherly love, and showest unto us that thou hast no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that he should turn unto thee and live. How much more have we cause to exalt thy name for that way of access now opened up by the Saviour, so that the sinner might be brought back to thee. Thou hast not suffered the weight of our sin to fall on our own head; but thou hast laid the iniquity of us all on him who came to take away the sin of the world. Through him thy long-suffering waiteth to lead us unto repentance. Through him thy grace inviteth us to reconciliation, and the gift of righteousness, and sanctification, and eternal life; nevertheless, if left to ourselves, we cannot believe in thy good-will toward us, nor can we accept thine offered gifts. O give unto us the Spirit. Let our hearts be melted by his power, that we may abhor ourselves and repent in dust and ashes—that we may know the love of Christ constraining us. Then shall thy commandment be no longer grievous unto us; but we shall delight in all thy counsel, leading us in the way of holiness, and turning us away from all manner of iniquity; and whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we shall do all to the glory of God. We desire to thank thee for thy goodness in bringing us to a new day. Take us under thy care. Preserve us from all evil. Keep us back from all sin, not only as fearing thine anger, but also as trusting in thy goodness and loving-kindness. Be thou near unto all that seek thee and the glory of thy kingdom, strengthen their hearts by faith in thy promises, and let the works of righteousness and peace be multiplied. Give a Spirit of grace and supplications to all that are in sickness and trouble, and make them to know thy compassions. Regard not our unworthiness. Take away our iniquities. Hear, and answer us in peace, for the sake of Christ Jesus. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LXI.

SCRIPTURE—1 CORINTHIANS XV. 1—34.

REMARKS.

We may suppose, from the language of this chapter, that some of the professing disciples in the Christian church at Corinth had been denying that either there had been or could be a resurrection of the body, in the sense in which it was understood by their less learned brethren. There is little surprise to be felt at such opinions having been formed in that portion of the church at that time, seeing the most celebrated philosophers of Greece had taught in their schools and in their books, that all matter, or corporeal substance, is in its nature inherently corrupt. Those persons, therefore, who had been used to such a doctrine, might readily begin to doubt whether the soul, in a sanctified state, could be united to the corporeal frame. And still more might they be willing to refuse their belief to the testimony that the divine Redeemer himself had ascended into glory clothed with a body. They had not, perhaps, by that time in their hands any written account of Jesus and of his doctrine. And thus, although Paul had preached Christ unto them that he rose from the dead, some among them, still honouring their earthly teachers, had begun to say that there is no resurrection of the dead, while the rest had only their own recollection of the apostle's preaching to bring forward in defence of the hope that was in them, that the dead should rise again. In these circumstances the apostle gives them his written testimony to the truth, by appealing to which, all their contentions on the subject might be ended. He confirms the account of the resurrection of Christ, by declaring it as he had received it from the Lord himself, making known what the evangelists have not recorded, viz. the appearing of the risen Saviour to above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part were then alive and able to bear witness to it. He declares that he himself also had seen the Lord; and he shows, that unless Christ had risen from the dead, he should not have accomplished the salvation of his people. For if his body remained in the grave, then he was overcome by death. And if he could not destroy death as to himself, how could he destroy death, or him that had the power of death, as to his people? So that for Christians to let go their hold of the truth of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, were to make shipwreck of faith, and to renounce all their hopes.

How thankfully should we bless God for the written word in our hands! Without a fixed standard of truth, to which teachers and taught can appeal, what opposite opinions, traditions, genealogies and fables, would soon have occupied the minds of men, to the shutting out the light of divine truth! Let us keep in mind that we are accountable for the use we make of the scriptures. Let every doctrine set forth be tried by them. If they do not make us wiser than all our teachers; they should, at least, qualify us to try the spirits whether they be of God, and to judge, as men of understanding, what our teachers say.

How honourable and glorious is the work of God in the salvation of fallen man! Mighty to save to the uttermost, he provides a deliverance beyond all the expectations of the wise and prudent. Let us then receive the things of the kingdom of God as little children, not presuming to judge, or to question how far, or in what manner it is meet for God to magnify his grace and his power in us. And then, believing, we shall see the salvation of God, such as it is worthy of him to bestow, leaving, in our souls and in our bodies, no trace of the sin, the corruption, or the death that once reigned over us. Is there a promise left to us of entering into such a rest? O let us fear lest any of us should seem to come short of it! either as they whose understandings are darkened by science, falsely so called, exalting the mind against the knowledge of God; or as they who are conformed to the world in its sinful pleasures, and become willing to forget the wonders of the grace of God, lest they should be roused from the sleep of death.

PRAYER.

Thou, O God, alone art worthy to be adored who hast life in thyself, and with whom is the fountain of life. By thy power, at the first, was man made a living soul. By his own sin, who was the covenant head of human kind, came death which hath reigned over all. How dark hath been its reign over the children of men! How grievous the bondage unto which many have been subject all their lifetime through the fear of it! How unutterable its terrors, as it leadeth downward to that second death which is a weeping and wailing, and gnashing of teeth! We desire to abase ourselves before thee, and to acknowledge that such is, by nature, our inheritance; and that except thy good-will towards us prevent, such will be, ere long, our portion. May our souls be stirred up unto the trembling that cometh us. May we be moved to ask with unfeigned earnestness, What must we do to be saved? Thanks be to thee, O Lord God, that thine own word doth encourage us to look to thee for help. Of old thou didst promise that the serpent and his work should be destroyed. In the fullness of the times thou hast given the deliverer Christ Jesus, that he, by tasting death for every man, might destroy death and him that had the power of death. Blessed are they who believe on him. They find in Jesus, the second Adam, a quickening Spirit having power to give life to as many as he will. They look unto him, the Prince of life, who suffered and died, and rose again and revived, that he might become the author of eternal life to as many as believe in his name. O make us to be partakers with such, that we may live and not die. Behold we are yet in the place of hope, and we are invited to come unto Jesus who is the resurrection and the life. We have the promise not only of pardon and of renewing grace, but also of life complete in the likeness of him who was dead and is alive again, and liveth for evermore. Suffer us not to provoke thee to anger by unbelief. Let us not doubt either thy good-will, or thy power, to glorify thyself in saving us to the uttermost. But yielding to thee in faith unfeigned, and in repentance not to be repented of, may we wait to be filled with all the fullness of God; according to thy good pleasure which thou hast purposed in thyself, and according to the power that worketh in thy people, exceeding abundantly above all that they ask or think. Be pleased, O Lord, to glorify thy word in this place and neighbourhood, and in our land, and among the nations of the earth. Bring again the children of Abraham from their unbelief, to honour Jesus as Lord and Christ. Take us, and all that are dear to us, under thy keeping. Accept, in the name of Jesus, whatsoever thou hast enabled us to do this day according to thy will. Blot out our offences and shortcomings. Watch over us in the night. And incline us by thy grace from evening to morning, and from morning to evening, to be committing our souls unto the Saviour's hands, so that when he cometh we may be found watching, and may be accepted in him the Beloved. Hear us in his name, and answer us graciously for his sake. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM XIX. 9—11.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERES XXIX.

REMARKS.

While we read these sayings of wisdom as here set down without regard to the order of subject, one sentence being applicable to things of public interest, and the next to things of private and domestic concern, may we not, from that very circumstance, receive instruction? Does it not seem to tell us that the eye, enlightened by heavenly wisdom, looking on the affairs of men, will see in every part of them the evil done by despising wisdom, and truth, and the holy commandments? In like manner, when we see that in every department of human life to which the principles of wisdom have been applied, the blessed effects are to be traced in the prosperity that follows, whether as to high or low, rich or poor, young or old, public or private, the mind may well be stirred up in the desire to know what one principle that is, which, being laid hold on, would enable the mind to discern for itself what is desirable in each situation and office of life. Accordingly, that principle is from time to time brought forward, viz. 'the fear of the Lord.'

If we look at any of the works of righteousness commended, we perceive that a desire to honour the Lord was sufficient to prompt to each of them; or if we look to any of the sins and follies reprov'd, we as readily perceive that the fear of offending God would effectually restrain from them. The king, or ruler, would seek to make the people rejoice by placing the righteous in authority, and forbidding the wicked to bear rule, by judgment that alike refuses to receive gifts or to hearken unto lies; the parent would correct, by the rod and reproof, while there is hope; the child would neither harden his neck against reproof, nor be careless as to the recompense of delight that should reward parental cares and kindnesses; the master would forbear threatening and injustice; the servant, contented with his place as assigned to him by God, would not aspire after any thing, either of dress or of food, that belong not to his station and employment; the rich would neither receive flattery nor deal scornfully; the poor, putting their trust in the Lord, would neither seek the ruler's favour by deceitful means, nor become partner with the thief, where the wicked are multiplied and bear rule.

How important, then, is it that the principle should be implanted in the soul, the language of which is, as to obedience, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?'

and as to transgression, 'How shall I do this wickedness and sin against God?' The great things done by God, in executing judgment, may do somewhat towards forming the fear of wrath, and may, through that fear, operate to stir up to some activity of obedience. But how much more powerfully would the feelings of love and gratitude operate to the same end if a motive for the exercise of these feelings could be formed, and, if it were permitted to the sinful creature, to express that love to God as reconciled? This is what is held out in this gospel of Jesus Christ. The manifestation there given of God, as having first loved us when we were dead in trespasses and sins, and as having commended that love, in its greatness, by the gift of his own Son not spared, but given up for us all, is presented as the motive to stir us up to love God. We are taught on the divine testimony, that wherever it does affect the heart at all, it takes deep root, and spreads, and causes to be multiplied, the fruits of righteousness.

If these things be so, how foolish and perverse are they, who, despising the divine word and its meaning, would train up a people, in the instructions of man's wisdom, to pass through all the painful experience of folly, instead of having the truth presented at first to their minds; or who would expect more benefit from those portions of the word of God which present the particulars of the fruits of divine life, rather than from those portions through which we have ground to hope the principle of divine life itself is most readily formed, and most effectually strengthened—even the testimony of the love of God in Christ Jesus, blessed to the awaking of the like principle of love in its operation back again from us to God.

PRAYER.

Heavenly Father, it becometh us to adore thee as the only wise God, of whose understanding there is no searching. It becomes us, also, to abase ourselves before thee, because we are of yesterday, and know nothing. May we be brought to thy word, given to us to make known thy will; and let the convictions, the desires, and the purposes stirred up in us by the reading and hearing of it, bring forth in our lives the fruits of righteousness. O may a sense of thy power and great glory dwell in our hearts, that we may fear to offend, and may say to each temptation, How shall I do this wickedness, and sin against God? Then should we escape from the snares of evil, and be delivered from many sorrows; then should we also lay hold on much good that is now passing away from us, or hid in the earth as a talent bringing no increase. But how, O God most holy, shall our hearts be brought into the exercise of such love towards thee? They are by nature enmity to thee; that enmity is increased by multiplied transgressions, so that oftentimes we remember God and are troubled. We would do good, and evil is present with us. We own the commandment to be holy, and just, and good, while yet it is grievous to us, and we are ready to cry out, O wretched, who shall deliver us from the body of this death and inward corruption. Ever blessed be thy name, O God and Father of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Thou hast brought unto us salvation in him. In him thou dost draw unto thyself a people loving thee, because thou first lovedst them. Thou makest them to know the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto them; and by the power thereof they are enabled to say, Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Make us partakers with them. Let Christ Jesus be made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption, and we shall know that the faith which is in him is indeed the overcoming of the world. Multiply, O Lord, the number of those throughout the earth who shall become monuments of the riches of thy grace, their good works putting to silence the ignorance of the foolish. Let thy word have free course and be glorified, till the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of God and of his Anointed, and the children of Israel be brought in with the fullness of the Gentiles. Refresh our native land with the influence of thy grace. Dwell in our house with thy blessing. Keep what concerneth us, and all who are dear to us. Preserve them by thy mighty power through faith unto salvation. Preserve us this day in thy fear. Let our going out and our coming in be directed and blessed by thee; and if thou bring us unto the evening, may we have to present unto thee some fruits of obedience to thy praise. All that we ask is in the name of Christ Jesus our intercessor. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PARAPHRASE L.

SCRIPTURE—1 COR. XV. 35—58.

REMARKS.

To confirm the church at Corinth in the certainty of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, and of the resurrection of all mankind, the apostle had given them his testimony again in the foregoing verses; and he had farther shown, that the glory of God, and the salvation of man, and the destruction of satan, alike required that Christ should be raised up as the first-fruit; and that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. Death shall not retain its power over the body, either to hinder the blessedness of the redeemed, or to lessen the sufferings of them that perish. They 'that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some shame and everlasting contempt.' Some 'shall away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal.'

Seeing that great truth had been made known to the disciples at Corinth, the doubting or disbelieving was to the reproach of their unteachableness. But the apostle proceeds, in the remainder of this chapter, to show that it was to the reproach of their foolishness if any should still doubt because of the difficulty that seems to us to stand in the way, saying, 'How are the dead raised up, and with what body they come?' How can that body be brought together whose parts have been separated, perhaps far under, and even mingled with other elements? or can it be put together as it was at death, how could the wrinkled or the maimed body, being restored again, become a glorious habitation for the ransomed soul? The answer is, the work is to be wrought by that God who keeps every atom of the material elements in being; who works those elements, even in our sight, into the many different forms and uses which the changing seasons require, giving to every seed its own new body, as it hath pleased him, from that body which was sown, but not quickened till it died. The work is to be wrought by that God who, out of the same ground, made at the beginning flesh of man and flesh of beasts; and who, out of the same waters, made, at the beginning, flesh of fishes and flesh of birds. He proves to us every day, by the works which we behold, that his power is able to subdue all things unto himself, and that with him all things are possible. It is indeed true that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Yet the Almighty Creator, who, at the first, even as it pleased him, gave to the celestial bodies one glory, and to the terrestrial bodies another glory, can surely, in the resurrection of the dead, raise in incorruption that which was sown in corruption; can raise in glory what was sown in dishonour; can raise in power what was sown in weakness; can raise a spiritual body what was sown a natural body; can, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, when it shall sound, cause the living inhabitants of this earth to be changed, the corruptible putting on incorruption, and the mortal putting on immortality. In doing all which, God is moreover just keeping the same order that had been kept in all his dispensations to the church, viz. giving first that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual—the first man of the earth, the second Man, the Lord from heaven, the children of God being made to bear first the image of the earthly, and then, also, the image of the heavenly. 'He shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.'

What a disarming of death! What a spoiling of the grave! Being thus made known, it is, indeed, by the bringing to pass the saying of Isaiah (xxv. 8.), 'We will swallow up death in victory.' But shall we not lift up our voice and praise the Lord that his gracious thoughts toward us are more than we can number? Shall not the name of Jesus be precious for ever to our souls, through whom God giveth such redemption?

PRAYER.

Lift our souls unto thee, O God, and teach us to bless thee, who art become our salvation. Great is thy faithfulness who keepest covenant and mercy even to them who trust in thee. Hast thou spoken, and shalt thou not do it? has often been the language of thy people in the days when they waited on thee. How much more doth it become us to joy in thee, O God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ! In him thou hast visited thy people with a salvation exceeding great, even the abolishing of death, the spoiling principalities and powers, and making a show of them openly, triumphing over them. Thou permittest us to see, in the risen Saviour, the first fruits of them that sleep, the earnest of redemption, from the power of the grave, for all that are given unto him. O suffer not our faith to fail because of the greatness of the promises. Incline us, in the spirit of the little child, to believe, because the Lord hath spoken it; and to say, in the name of Jesus, Be it unto us, O Lord, according to thy word. Leave us not, therefore, to look only at the sinfulness and transgressions that cover us, and call down thy righteous vengeance, that render us unworthy of the grace and glory promised. But enable us also to look unto Jesus becoming poor, that he might make many rich; magnifying the law, that he might deliver many from its curse; making himself an offering, that through sufferings he might be perfect as a Captain of salvation. And let our souls be strengthened by faith in him, to joy in God, through the atonement, as a just God and a Saviour, when, in the name of Jesus, many souls are made rich in the gift of eternal life, when many sons and daughters are brought unto glory, and when the redemption of soul and body from all the effects of sin and death shall cause them to say, O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? Thanks be unto thee, O Lord, that it is so preached unto us. Help us by the Holy Spirit given unto us so to believe. Called with such an hope, may we never cease to feel that it is an high and holy calling; and may this be the testimony of our conscience, that it moveth us to diligence in laying aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and may it stir us up to be reaching daily after the things that are before, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord. Visit the sons and daughters of affliction, and all such as draw nigh to death. Bring unto them the comfort of this gospel of the resurrection and the life eternal. Speak peace to the hearts of those who are still subject to bondage through fear of death. Look in thy compassions on the dark places of the earth where death reigns. Let the light of the Sun of righteousness speedily shine unto them. Make the children of Abraham to see the glory of him who redeemed from the power of the grave. Take away our unworthiness. Look on the face of thine Anointed; and for his sake keep us now, henceforth, and for ever, and do in us, and by us, exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think; and to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, be glory now and for ever. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XIX.

SCRIPTURE—PROVERBS XXX.

REMARKS.

The sacred writings have not informed us who the author of this chapter was; it is sufficient for us to know that he was directed by the Holy Spirit to write it for the edification and instruction of the people of God. We may remark that all scripture has reference to the Saviour. The words of Agur are said to be spoken to Ithiel and Ucal, that is, Emanuel, God with us, and the Almighty. In the 4th verse there appears, also, to be a very plain reference to the second person of the Trinity.

The prophet, inspired with heavenly wisdom, acknowledges humbly his own darkness of understanding, arising from the corruption of his nature, and feels the want of righteousness perverting his whole faculties. How glorious, then, the assurance to believers, that Christ of God is made unto us righteousness! Like him, too, let us receive with humility, and the most heartfelt gratitude, the declarations of the truths of God. He who would ask of God a reason of the plan of man's redemption before he will receive it on the authority of his Maker, must conceive himself to be not a fallen, guilty, lost creature, but equal with God. God grant that we may be delivered from that evil heart of unbelief, which would adapt, by additions, or by sinful compromises, the word of the Almighty to the darkness and the prejudices of unregenerate men. Like Agur, the believer should fervently pray to be delivered, through God's grace, from the pride of self-righteousness and of superior knowledge, and to attain every day to higher degrees of experimental faith in Jesus Christ. With respect to temporal blessings he will pray, not as dictating to the Almighty, but as conscious of his own weakness and unworthiness, that he may escape the snares of abject poverty, its tendency to create murmuring, recklessness of our eternal interests, and disregard of honesty and truth. And, again, he will pray that he may be delivered from the danger of falling into sensuality, pride, worldly-mindedness, and a fearful forgetfulness of God, which riches too frequently engender. In whatever state we are, may we learn of Christ therewith to be content. The influence of the gospel must be felt in the regulation of our whole temper and conduct. Faith in Christ will pervade the whole soul if it is the work of the Spirit. It behoves the believer to keep a strict watch over his lips, lest at any time he sin with them to the injury of the characters, and the ruin of the souls, of those whose characters are their chief dependence in this world. But innumerable are the sins in which professing Christians indulge without remorse, because they are habitual; viz. fancied purity of heart, because they avoid all open scandals; pride, which they cloke under the semblance of independence, yea, of gratitude to God; oppression and covetousness, which they disguise under the name of a love of strict justice, a sin most severely denounced in the word of God. The insatiable nature of covetousness is here illustrated by four things utterly insatiable. By the daughters of the horse-leach, Agur probably means covetousness and pride. Other great offences are here enumerated, especially disobedience and ingratitude to parents. The word of God has declared, that they who commit such sins, without genuine repentance, shall be accursed of God and abhorred of men. By a variety of comparisons he illustrates the infamous deceits by which the licentious prosecute their base objects. The indulgence of such passions leads to the total alienation of the heart from God. Professors of the gospel ought, therefore, to watch against every impurity of thought as most ruinous to their advancement in holiness.

By various similitudes we are admonished of the danger of forming alliances in marriage with persons who are not under the influence of true religion; of rashly employing our influence in society, if God has bestowed upon us that influence, in the advancement of unworthy and unqualified persons from mere motives of private favour; and of manifesting a haughty deportment when, if such be the appointment of God, men have been raised to power and pre-eminence from stations of meanness and obscurity. The believer ever remembers that it is God only that maketh him, of his free mercy and sovereign grace, to differ from another. Yet these impressions, however deep, are perfectly compatible with the most vigorous employment of our faculties and opportunities in the service of God, and with the display of great prudence, and energy, and of decision, in the religious and moral training of our families and dependents. But while we ask of God the possession of such a character, yet deeply humbled by the remembrance of our many acts of rebellion against him, let us watch and pray that we yield not to the temptation of rendering railing for railing, and of warring against the ungodly with the carnal weapons of their own warfare.

PRAYER.

O Almighty God, we would this morning approach the footstool of thy throne with our earnest supplications, in the all-prevailing name and merits of Jesus Christ. We bless thee for the gracious preservation we have experienced during the past night, and would desire to have on our minds a deep sense of our dependence on that kind providence, of whose beneficent care we are generally unconscious, and always unorthodox. Called as we have been, by thy free mercy, to the knowledge of the gospel, we would earnestly beseech thee that, through thy grace, we may be enabled to see our natural darkness with respect to the truths of salvation, and our natural inability to do thy holy will, and that, by thy grace, we may be led to the foot of the cross, to look in faith on him whom we have pierced, and be healed. We would bless thee with our whole hearts for the many blessings that surround our lot. Teach us, O Lord, in whatever state we are, therewith to be content. Renewed by thy grace, may we be enabled to devote our faculties to thy glory and the benefit of our brethren of mankind; and regarding time in the light of eternity, may we, by the teaching of the Spirit, know, savingly and to profit, the truth, that now is the accepted time, and now is the day of salvation. Through thy grace may we be led to make a daily progress in Christian holiness, in controlling our appetites and passions, and in loving our brethren, especially such as are of the household of faith. Grant that the love of Christ constraining us, we may count it our privilege to devote to thy service, and the cause of the Saviour, a portion of our substance as God hath prospered us. O God and Father of our Lord and Saviour, we pray for a blessing on the reaching of the truth every where, that it may go forth conquering and to conquer. We pray for the poor and the afflicted, that they may be the poor in spirit, and that they may have thee for their comforter. We pray for the members of this household, that they may be enlightened by the Spirit with that wisdom which maketh us wise savingly and to profit, and guided by thy grace through the paths of this deceitful world. Throughout this day, O Father of mercies, would we commend ourselves to thy protection. May the arms of thy love be ever about us. And having on our minds an abiding sense of thy holy presence, by thy grace may we be enabled to spend this day to thy glory. And all we ask and hope is for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM XL.

SCRIPTURE—1 CORINTHIANS XVI.

REMARKS.

It is plain, from the manner of the apostle, that charitable collections were frequently made in the early Christian churches. The practice of benevolence, particularly towards our fellow-Christians, so necessarily attends a saving faith in Christ, that where it exists not, faith cannot be genuine. Yet, far from every professor of the gospel be the doctrine, subversive of vital Christianity, that sins may be compensated by alms deeds. The collection was to be made on the Lord's day, which was consequently recognised by apostolic authority as the Christian sabbath, and the contribution of each member was to be as God had prospered him. Might not the professors of the gospel oftentimes hide their heads and be ashamed to enter the house of God, on the day of their Redeemer's triumph, when a special call is made on them for the Redeemer's service, that, though abundantly prosperous, they cast in only the mite they have saved from the service of vanity and of a world lying in wickedness? The servants of Jesus must inculcate Christian liberality as a great Christian duty; but they must not lord it over God's heritage in the control of the revenues of benevolence. Their high vocation is to win souls unto Christ. By the example of the apostle we may learn, that the heart of a real minister of Christ will ever yearn towards his spiritual children. Yet, even here, all private feelings must give way to the great object of the ministry—the advancement of the cause of the gospel. Wherever the widest field of usefulness presents itself, whatever be the obstacles and the strength of opposition, there, if he can select his own field, will the minister of the gospel be found, relying on the sufficiency of Christ and the strength of the Lord. We may also see how necessary it is that Christians take a lively interest in the work of their pastor, that they pray with him, and for him; and how little the spirit of Christ is in those professing Christians, who, by their factious opposition, prevent the message of the minister of the gospel from being heard with acceptance. We have a message from Christ, and do not such persons endeavour to stop its publication?

From the manner in which the apostle speaks of Apollos, who had been set up, not with his own consent, but by some ill instructed Christians at Corinth, as a rival to Paul, we may learn that true servants of Christ never entertain any paltry jealousies of each others' influence and popularity; and that it shows an unchristian spirit in their hearers to form factions with respect to their favourite ministers, as if the preaching of the gospel could be rendered profitable to their souls only by the mouth of one individual. Believers must beware of carrying on discussion, either among themselves or with adversaries, in the bitter, frivolous, scornful style of the potsherders of this world, when they strive with each other.

It is the duty of the disciples of Jesus Christ not only to esteem very highly in love, for their works' sake, faithful ministers of the gospel; but also to show gratitude and affection towards those benevolent persons who have been instruments in the hands of God of rendering important services to his most honoured servants and to the churches. Such they ought to regard as their own benefactors, and imitate their labours of love. The gospel of Jesus Christ, as we know from the practice of Paul, encourages all the genuine courtesies of life, though it may discard the mere language of empty compliment. The courtesies of Christianity have a reference to the eternal happiness of man.

How awful the denunciation against all who love not the Lord Jesus Christ! It means, let him be accursed among men, and the Lord will come to take vengeance. Let each professing disciple ask himself if he could answer his Master, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. If he loves not the Saviour, he knows the tremendous alternative. He may also test his love to the Saviour by the solemn inquiry, if he loves all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, in sincerity and in truth.

PRAYER.

O thou who in Jesus Christ hast declared thyself to be the hearer of prayer, pour out, we beseech thee, into our cold hearts the spirit of supplication, that we may worship thee in spirit and in truth. We would bless thy holy name that, at the close of another day, we are permitted to praise thee in the land of the living and the place of hope. But, O God, who art the searcher of hearts, how little have we had thee in our thoughts! How deeply must we lament our coldness in thy service, and our warm interest in the follies and unsatisfying vanities of this world! O how little have we communed with thee; how seldom have our meditations been of the blessed Saviour! and how little have we feared to grieve the Spirit! O Lord, help thou our unbelief. O may thy grace be made sufficient for us, that we may be entirely delivered from the evil heart of unbelief, from the influences exercised by a corrupting world. May Christ subdue our souls unto himself. We pray, O Lord, that the Spirit of truth may work in us the deepest sense of our gospel privileges, the strongest impression of the awful responsibility under which they have been bestowed, and of the heavy obligation under which we are bound to improve them in thy strength, to thy glory, and to the benefit of the souls of men. We bless thee, O Lord, for the blessing of a faithful ministry of the gospel. O for the sake of thy beloved Son, command thy blessing on thy servants who are proclaiming the message of salvation. O Father of mercies, enter not into judgment with us for the sins and shortcomings of the day that is about to close; but may they be blotted out in the blood of the Lamb. God forbid that we should be deceiving ourselves into the belief that we are among the number of thy people, while we are making to ourselves other lords and other saviours than the Lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world. O Lord, shield us while we rest this night. If it be thy will that we shall behold the light of another day, may it find us prepared for thy service. Hear us in Christ. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXIII. 24.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLES. I.

REMARKS.

This book is called Ecclesiastes, or, the Preacher. The work was evidently written by Solomon after he was brought back, by afflictive dispensations of providence, to the ways of truth and holiness. Its object is twofold; first, to show the utter vanity of all human occupations, pleasures, and pursuits, and their entire insufficiency to satisfy the soul of man, who cannot be made completely to forget his immortal destination; and secondly, to set forth the praises of heavenly wisdom in its most extensive sense, that is, of the wisdom of God, and the power of God, unto the salvation of men—Christ crucified. It is the voice of real penitence, declaring to men what are the wages of sin, and the results of a better and penal experience.

The preacher briefly announces his theme, 'All is vanity.' All human pursuits, riches, pleasures, sensual enjoyment, fame, even the noblest kinds of knowledge, can never satisfy the soul of man longing for permanent happiness. It is only the labour which is directed towards the heavenly inheritance, purchased by the blood of the Lamb, that the soul finds to be completely satisfactory. Nature exhibits a countless variety of change. The senses may be fatigued, and the man bewildered in the investigation of its causes and effects; but though it may be engaged, it remains unsatisfied, and the rapid approach of death extorts from the laborious inquirer the agonising confession, that the knowledge which would shun acquaintance with the knowledge of God reconciled in Jesus Christ, supplies nothing consolatory either for time or eternity. Of merely human enjoyments, there are no sources absolutely new. The folly and corruption of men, continually counteract those plans that hold out the fairest promise of happiness to our race. The unregenerate heart remains always the same fountain of impurity. Even discoveries, extravagantly commended, as conferring what men, in their fantastic language, call immortality on their authors, are often found not to be new. They have been already proved, and thrown aside, leaving human happiness pretty nearly as it was. The grace of God only can effect a change in the hearts of men. Those to whom God has given great intellectual powers, are laid under a solemn obligation to their diligent cultivation and improvement, that they may be dedicated to the glory of their Maker, and the benefit of the human race. Yet, this is a responsibility of which professors of the gospel sometimes dream not at all. But, however successful the pursuit of useful and important knowledge, if it be prosecuted with the intention of filling the soul with its speculations, to the exclusion of God and Christ, it usurps the place of God in that soul, and will lead only to the withering discovery, that the mind has endured all this toil to learn that it is miserable and without hope. Let us, then, lift up our hearts in fervent thankfulness to God, who hath called us to the knowledge of the ght, and of the truth in Jesus Christ, and pray earnestly, that while we are enabled to employ our faculties on their proper objects, we may, by divine grace, rest in that wisdom which maketh wise savingly, and to profit.

PRAYER.

Most merciful God! who hast spread thy covering wings around us during the silence of the night, we would again address to thee the voice of thanksgiving—that while many have been summoned to judgment, thou art still lengthening out our days of preparation. While we bless thee for all thy temporal mercies, above all would we bless thee that we know that Jesus Christ hath died to save sinners. Fallen and guilty as we are, by nature the children of wrath, yet, through the work of the Spirit, may we be enabled to lay all our burden on him who is mighty, and willing, and able to save unto the uttermost. We bless thee, O Lord, that our lot has been surrounded with innumerable advantages, and that we have so many encouragements to the improvement of our faculties. May we then be enabled, by thy grace, to devote them to thy glory, and putting far from us the fleshly mind which puffeth up, cling to the wisdom which maketh wise to everlasting life. Cast down every vain imagination and thought that exalteth itself, and every presumptuous and invidious work in aught but the perfect work of Jesus Christ. May our hearts be satisfied with the fullness of his love, and our souls be filled with the peace of God which passeth all understanding; and may we be made to taste the stability and happiness of those who, justified by his blood, and sanctified by the Spirit, are become members of thy family. This day would we commit and commend ourselves to thy gracious care and protection. Shield us by thy providence, guide us by thy grace, enable us to devote this day to thy service. May we ever stand thee at our right hand, and at our left. May we be enabled to look up unto thee in the discharge of every social and private duty, and be deeply impressed with a sense of our responsibility. Abandon us not unto ourselves. Grant us answer in peace to our imperfect supplications, and do unto us abundantly above what we can ask or think, for the sake of him whom thou lovest always. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM I.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. I.

REMARKS.

The second epistle to the Corinthians, written, it is probable, about a year after the first, has a direct reference to the important matters of which it had treated. The sorrow of the Corinthians for the sins so severely rebuked in that letter, had given testimony to the holy zeal and faithfulness of the apostle. Still, there appear to have been persons in their church, who, adhering factiously to heretical teachers, sneered at what they called Paul's infirmity of purpose, because he had delayed his coming, to inflict heavy spiritual censures. Against such detractors he vindicates his character; but, at the same time, breathes the warmest love to the Corinthian church, and the most fervid zeal for the interests of Christ's kingdom.

The apostle, while magnifying his office, as instituted by Christ according to the will of God, shows his humility by joining Timothy with him in the same salutation. He gives the glory to Christ. In his salutation, he shows us here peace is attainable. It is the work of grace, and grace is the gift of God. The very mention of this subject always makes the apostle burst forth into rapturous thanksgivings to God, not as the God of nature, but the God and Father of his Lord and Saviour, as the source of all comfort in difficulty and tribulation. He rejoiced in his sufferings, because he could, from his experience of the consolations of the Holy Spirit, comfort others in their afflictions. Let us look then to the cloud of witnesses, and the example of those true believers, who, by the grace of God, have endured such a fight of afflictions, and have kept the faith. Have we not the promise of him who is faithful, that if, in the strength of the Lord, we imitate their faith, by the strength of the Lord we shall be partakers of their consolations? The apostle proceeds to state his sufferings with joy and triumph, not to exalt his fortitude according to the custom of the world, or to awaken their sympathies on his behalf; but, in the belief that they might be made instrumental in strengthening the faith of the Corinthians. He renders thanksgivings to God, that thus he had been taught to cast himself entirely on divine grace, it being sometimes a part of God's fatherly dealings with his children to leave them almost to the extremity of affliction, that he may practically impress this lesson on their hearts. But, while he inculcates the utmost confidence in a God reconciled through Jesus Christ, he directs to the use of means, especially earnest prayer for ourselves, and our fellow Christians. When he speaks of the testimony of a good conscience, we must understand the apostle as not laying claim to entire purity of conscience, but as rejoicing that, through the Spirit, he had been enabled to declare to the Corinthians the whole counsel of God. The minister of the gospel must be judged of by the whole tenor of his ministry, walk, and conversation. If he has spoken the truths of God, and in his conduct has, by God's grace, brought forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness, let those who, by their rash censures, would hinder his usefulness, be assured that it is not the man, but his work, that they dislike. Yet, it behoves private Christians, who can bless God they have a good conscience, as well as ministers, to use all prudent means for removing false impressions as to their characters and motives, lest this should be injurious to the progress of gospel truth. In vindicating himself from the aspersions of those who had imputed his delay in coming to Corinth, not to motives of tenderness, but to fickleness, the apostle shows the real ground of his earnestness. It was zeal for his Master's cause. Infirmity of purpose in what relates to the discharge of a plain Christian duty is inconsistent with real faith in Jesus Christ; but, an obstinate adherence to every resolution which any individual, however gifted, has formed, without regard to circumstances, savours of a claim to infallibility. But, whatever might have been his reasons for delaying his visit, the truth of his doctrines was not thereby shaken. How frivolous then the excuse often made by professors of the gospel, for their indifference to its truths, that they have discovered some inconsistency in the conduct of its ministers! The promises of the gospel are all made sure in Jesus Christ, all confirmed by the mighty evidences of his incarnation and resurrection, and further confirmed by the earnest of the Spirit. With that humility which is so peculiarly the fruit of grace, the apostle declares that he is not the Lord of their faith. He and his fellow-workers in the ministry, were only instruments in the hand of God, for calling them to that faith, without which no man can be saved. Christ is the Lord of our faith, as well as its end and object, and our faith must be tested by its fruits, joy and peace in the Holy Ghost, and that energy of Christian virtue which proves that it is the gift of God.

PRAYER.

Almighty God! who wast, who art, and who art to come, we would lift our souls in grateful acknowledgments unto thee, that we have this day, received so many tokens of thy love and mercy. O may we, through thy grace, be enabled to remember the rapid flight of that time which is fast hurrying us into eternity; and to look forward with joy to that eternity, as purchased for us by the blood of Jesus Christ. Father of our spirits, our earnest supplication at the footstool of thy throne of grace is, that the warmest love of Christ may be kindled in our souls. O how cold have our hearts hitherto been towards that Saviour, who, while we were yet sinners, gave himself for us. O thou, before whom our secret thoughts are open, well doth it become us to tremble, when we reflect how little we have loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and in truth. Grant, O Lord, we beseech thee, that the wonders of redeeming love being continually made present to our minds by the influences of divine grace, we may feel our hearts animated with the liveliest affection towards him whose love passeth knowledge. May we be enabled to show it forth towards all the members of Christ's body, and to make it manifest, that we regard it as our privilege to dedicate ourselves to thy blessed service. O Lord, by thy grace may we guard against that hypocrisy, which, professing to love the Lord Jesus Christ, is indifferent to the great interests of the gospel, and the salvation of souls. O may the iniquities of this day, and of the week, not be remembered against us. And having the Spirit of supplication poured out upon us, may we be enabled more diligently to watch, and more fervently to pray, that we enter not into temptation. We would desire this night to commit ourselves to thy fatherly care, that no evil thing may come near us to hurt us. If we shall be preserved to another day, a day which thou claimest as thine own, O may our hearts, through thy grace, be solemnised to its duties. May we go up to thy house as those who delight in thy courts. And there may we experience a blessed communion with the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost. We spread our supplications before thee. Hear, in heaven thy dwelling-place, and when thou hearest, forgive, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THIRTY-FIFTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CII. 16.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CII.

REMARKS.

What a refuge is God at all times to his people. What time their souls are in affliction, they have not to look from side to side as do others, nor to cast the eyes wildly around, as not knowing how or whither to turn them; but already their course is taken; already their 'heart is fixed; their heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord;' and their language, accordingly, is what is here recorded (ver. 1, 2.), 'Hear my prayer, O Lord, and let my cry come unto thee,' &c.

Ver. 3—12. Of all the trying circumstances to which a soul can at any time be subjected, next to that, at least, in which a conscience, for the first time awakened, and vainly seeking a refuge, has been able to discover, as yet, nothing but dark and yet darker clouds of despair closing upon and thickening around him, the most overwhelming assuredly is, when a child of God, through some temporary defection, or for trial of his faith, finds the Almighty's hitherto cheering and enlightening countenance all of a sudden from him withdrawn. Compared with this, alas! poverty is nothing; reproach of enemies is thing; nothing even the desertion and abandonment of friends. Indeed, to one so circumstanced, these together are generally found mingled in the same cup. But O it is the thoughts of that cupping of God's mingling, and that indignation, on his part, lies at the bottom of it, that gives it all, or chiefly, its bitterness, and constrains him to exclaim, as in the 4th verse, 'My heart is smitten and withered as grass, so that I forget to eat my bread.'

Now, one thing alone serves to impart relief and restoration at such an hour, and it is this which the psalmist found (ver. 12, 13, &c.), viz. the remembrance or assurance of God's holy covenant, a covenant that 'endureth unto all generations,' and the sweet benefits of which, once tasted and felt, however lost they may seem to be, or obscured, for a time, shall never wholly or ultimately be withdrawn.

Ver. 13—23. Reverses, moreover, experienced by the church of God collectively, if perhaps less frequent, are no less trying, at least when they do occur, to the body general, than they are felt to be when experienced by individuals; and if here, as generally is, the ground of controversy is the same, viz. sin declared to be sin, felt to be sin, the same may be supposed, also, must be her refuge and her remedy. Relying, in a word, upon the covenant, that broad and solid basis of gospel kind which has never yet failed, she, too, may take comfort, she, too, shall find peace. And this, from the 14th verse, may go to stimulate not a little her reviving hope and confidence, if in truth her people can say, that, amid all their sad declensions, they have never wholly lost their interest in, and their affection towards, God's holy mountain. Their sanctuary, it is true, may now lie in ashes, and her towers, the material records of the Almighty's past mercies, may be equally hrown down; but 'her very dust to them is dear,' and so long as has not so perished, too, the grateful record within, the record of their own heart's memory, there may still be cherished confidence and cherished hope, not only that the Lord will yet have mercy upon Zion, but that the time to favour her, yea, the set time, is come; a time of terror and of retribution to the heathen, his enemies; but of joy unspeakable to all them that 'wait for consolation in Israel.'

Ver. 19—28. So clear and satisfying is the view of faith, that already, before the believer's prayer is ended, ere the altar at which he bowed is left, his voice of supplication is heard, and is turned into praise. In the vision of faith he sees all his desires already accomplished, all his expectations abundantly and graciously fulfilled; and no wonder, then, if his heart overflows with gratitude and his lips with praise. He remembers his former weakness and vanity, when the hand of the Lord was upon him, only to contrast it now with the magnitude of that mercy which has raised him up again, even God's mercy, unto whom, in every case, do exclusively belong the issues from death.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art our confidence and our strength, wherefore should refuge fail us? Wherefore should the noise of great waters from without trouble us, and we go mourning all the day? What time our souls are overwhelmed and in perplexity, lead thou us to the Rock that is higher than we, for in the shadow of thy wings will we make our refuge, until these our calamities be wholly overpast. Blessed be thy name it is God and not man we have had to trust unto, else must we have already been consumed, instead of being privileged, as this day, to bow before thee, both at this time, and, as we hope, in the sanctuary, in the great congregation, at once the living monuments of thy mercy, and, through Christ Jesus the beloved, the expectants and the sharers of thy grace. Enable us, we beseech thee, to approach unto thee in faith; and humbled, deeply humbled under a sense of our own unworthiness, grant that we may find, even at this hour, that there is forgiveness with thee that thou mayest be feared; yea, mercy to pardon, and grace to help in every time of need. Lord, not only would we confess the evil, but we would deplore before thee the sinfulness of sin, and the miseries attendant upon it, as still witnessed, alas! in our breasts. Our days, in consequence, are like a shadow that declineth; we are withered as the grass because of thine indignation and thy wrath. Yet, O the comfort of thy covenant children! Though in wrath, yet to them thou rememberest mercy. Thou hast pity on Zion. Thou shalt appear in thy glory when thou buildest her again. In sadness, therefore, thou causest us to hope, and in sorrow the souls of thy people are comforted. Give us grace this day to behold thee in righteousness, through the righteousness of him who alone in thy sight is exalted. Let the cry of the destitute come up before thee; and looking each of us towards thee as the gracious restorer of Zion's children, may Judah rejoice and Israel be glad. Thou, Lord, art everlasting; but we are perishing: thou endurest; but we are of none abiding. It is of thy great mercy that we have been permitted to see the light of another returning sabbath. Grant, we beseech thee, that waiting upon thee this day in the sanctuary, its services may to us be sweet, and its exercises refreshing unto our souls. And now to the King eternal, immortal, and invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CIII. 13.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

This is peculiarly a psalm of thanksgiving; it is a song of praise, wherein the believer (ver. 1—5.) retiring, as it were, within himself, holds converse and communion with his own soul; and out of the multitude of God's mercies, variously vouchsafed, but all of them sweetly treasured there, he seeks to stir up that soul by 'putting it in remembrance.'

Ver. 6—10. From the believer's own experience of the almighty Maker's mercy, as well as by reference to God's dealings generally toward the church in all ages, he takes occasion herein to instruct and encourage others to wait upon him in like manner, and to trust in him, seeing 'he executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed.'

In verses 11—13, we have this same mercy farther set forth by three very apposite and natural images, such as are intelligible to every understanding, and cheering and encouraging to every willing heart. The two former exalting, by reason of the idea of height and distance usually attached to them; and the latter sweetly constraining, from the impression which it naturally conveys of tenderness, compassion, and love. 'As the heaven is high above the earth,' &c.; 'as far as east is from the west,' &c.; 'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.'

Ver. 15—17. Not all the natural frailty of man; not his inferiority in place, or station, or physical condition, will ever stand in the way of God's mercy toward him; nothing, in short, but sin, continued, obstinate, and persevering sin. God's mercy, on the contrary, through these becomes magnified; and the contrast of man's weakness serves only to bring forth, in bolder relief, the character of God's eternal and unchanging love.

Ver. 17, 18. Limited as the manifestation of this mercy must necessarily be in the case of individuals, by reason of the shortness of the period during which they can personally enjoy it, it finds exercise, nevertheless, in a manner more befitting its infinitude, by descending downward to posterity, and there flowing fresh, and copious, and clear as ever, in the sight and experience of 'children's children.' Being one in covenant, as they are one in spirit, they become no less one in the enjoyment, likewise, of the same blissful and gracious experience.

Ver. 19—22. The more the psalmist indulges in this heavenly contemplation, the more is his heart filled with rapture and his tongue with praise. And yet, conscious at the same time of his own inadequacy thereto, as he could wish to proclaim it, in very self-relief he calls aloud to others, to those intelligences above, higher and holier than he, and therefore worthier, in his estimation, of the honour, to aid him in this ascription; and yet, far from silencing his own expression of ardent gratitude, his fervour is still the same, and his language the same. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

How needful and how profitable for each of us to indulge, from time to time, with David in similar contemplation! that thus musing on the divine mercy, the fire of love and gratitude may be made to burn anew within us, and we be prepared the rather to 'speak unto God with our tongue' the language at once of grateful affection and of adoring praise. Without exercise such as this, our holiest principles would soon degenerate, and our warmest affections and feelings would shortly suffer sensible decline.

Ver. 2—6. How manifold are God's mercies toward them that fear him! If we would earnestly set about the inquiry, as experienced even of ourselves, we should soon find them more by far than we could number. Are our souls, then, filled with a like adoring gratitude? Are we alike burdened under a sense of our own inadequacy to show forth aright all his praise? Drawing near to his footstool in humble spirit, how gracious the welcome! How cheering the encouragement that awaits us there, in and through the mediation of the Lord Christ Jesus! 'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.'

As the frailty and mortality inseparable from our present and earthly condition, are found to operate in no degree against us in our approaches, at any time, to the heavenly footstool, the consideration of them ought to be allowed, at least, to influence ourselves, both in hastening now, and in multiplying hence, our approaches thither, so that, enjoying this and other valued privileges in our day, we may leave them with comfort and confidence in the end to be inherited in turn by our 'children's children.'

PRAYER.

O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! Thou hast set thy glory above the heavens. Nevertheless, exalted as thou art in thy heavenly excellency, yet thou condescendest to visit, and even to dwell, with man upon the earth, so that ourselves can testify of thy goodness, and our own lips show forth thy wondrous praise. Bless the Lord, then, O our souls, and all that is within us bless his holy name; bless the Lord, O our souls, and forget not all his benefits. Adored be thy name thou hast not confined thy grace and mercy to former generations; but thy ways made known to Moses of old, and thine acts to Israel's sons, have not only been extended unto, but enlarged in our day. Nevertheless, gracious Father, it becometh us to confess, that these thy mercies we have not appreciated, and our privileges in the gospel we have not improved, and justly mightest thou, in times past, have visited us accordingly. Yet, blessed be thy name, thou hast not so dealt with us after our sins, nor so rewarded us according to our iniquities. O that our minds and hearts may hence be turned toward thee as a merciful Father, and a kind, and gracious, and compas-enate God. May the love of Christ constrain, by the grace of the Spirit sanctify us, that as far as east is from the west, so far may be removed our transgressions from us. Daily art thou reminding us, Lord, of our frailty and mortality, that our days are as the grass, our lives but as an handbreadth. O that this consideration may lead us to close the more readily with, and to cling the faster unto, that refuge which mercy hath provided, and the gospel hath made sure. We bless thee, Lord, for the opportunity already enjoyed of meeting together this day in thy house of prayer, and so having the remembrance of thy loving-kindness renewed to us in the morning. O that we may be the rather quickened thereby to show forth, in turn, thy faithfulness this night. Take us now, we beseech thee, under the shadow of thy wing; and may all dear unto us equally enjoy the comforts of thy protection and the sweetness of thy fellowship. Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not the heritage to reproach. May the heathen every where speedily come to know and to appreciate thy character; and may all that oppose themselves now, soon be made to acknowledge and to bow before thy power. Hear, Lord, and accept these our humble prayers. Pardon thou our imperfect services. And all that we ask, and all that we hope for, is in and through Christ, or strength and Redeemer. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XXVI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES II.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The Preacher in this chapter but resumes the inquiry instituted in the former, into the origin and source of all true happiness. With sore disappointment he had already ransacked all the treasures of mere intellectual wisdom, and purposes for himself now the free and unrestrained enjoyment of every sensual pleasure; but ah! miserable resource for a mind already so far miserable. What had been before but bare disappointment, quickly resolves itself into positive self-loathing and unspeakable disgust.

Forced, then, to flee from such grosser delights, he seeks next a resource in lighter vanities, in the frolics and amusements of a gay, a worldly, and what is generally termed a fashionable life. But, alas! his exclusion hence was still abundantly pitiable. 'Behold,' says he (ver. 11.), 'all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there is no profit under the sun.'

Groping still in that path, however, every foundation in which had already proved bitter, and never once aspiring into a region at all above or beyond it, we see him contenting himself now with a simple revision of those schemes already tested, resolving, since none was found perfect, to abide by the one from among them which of evil seemed to involve the least (all the triumph which proud philosophy can boast of); and fixing, accordingly, upon the first, this is his judgment regarding it (ver. 13.): 'When I saw that wisdom (i. e. the pursuits of intellect and science) excelleth folly (i. e. the pleasures of the world and of sense) as far as light excelleth darkness.'

But what, after all, has his conclusion gained him? He has fallen, to be sure, on a somewhat lesser evil; but has he therefore comfort? Is his grand object yet accomplished, and is he now contented and happy? O no. It promised the most, but still it proved perverse (ver. 15.); 'Then I said in my heart that this is also vanity.'

Ver. 17—23. Scared thus and disappointed on every side, it is hatred of life, and all its enjoyments together, that for a while succeeds; so that, pining under all the plaintiveness of a morbid and self-destroying spirit, he can no longer enjoy his 'good things' himself, and far less can he tolerate the thought of merely storing them up for others 'who should come after him;' and this, accordingly, he soon finds 'is also vanity.' The conclusion reached now, therefore (ver. 24 to the end), is, that where worldly substance is, there providence intended it should be cheerfully and thankfully enjoyed; a conclusion, doubtless, which has soundness in it. Taken in connection especially with verse 26, and those principles of moderation and purity which God's word inculcates, still, nevertheless, there is a mingling at the best, and an obscurity about it, as here expressed, which evinces that all that he had yet reached was but the glimmering of 'truth' rather than the clear, and broad, and solid principle wherewith his argument closes in the end. It still falls grievously short of that which the bible tells us is needful, and which alone is fitted, according to the wisdom of the Spirit, to fill the capacity, and to satisfy the cravings, of an immortal mind.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1st. What a comment have we got here in the absolute futility of all human device to secure for a heart unchanged either settlement or peace! Let a soul once set aside the dictates of heavenly wisdom, and those principles of divine truth which God and scripture do so clearly reveal, and seek for happiness through some by-paths of his own, and how soon is it manifested that the light that is in him is darkness, and how great is that darkness!

2d. How deeply do we stand indebted to God for the light, and knowledge, and purity set forth in his holy word, which, according as these affect the life and character, must no less promote the happiness even of the present state! and how true in experience, therefore, as well as strong in apostolic authority (1 Tim. iv. 8.), that godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

3d. Considering the result of Solomon's experience as above narrated, and the testimony unequivocal there subjoined, against the capability of any such schemes as those attempted to command desired happiness, how strange that these should be the very methods, notwithstanding, eagerly put forth by the worldly still, instead of the assumption of gospel faith and of gospel principle, which alone can secure it! Does it not just go to prove very palpably the deep corruptness and obduracy of the human heart, that, with all that true religion hath to commend it, it should always be the last that men will have recourse unto; and how needful, consequently, to beings so constituted, not only the light of God's word to clear our way, but the influence of God's Spirit so to change, and to elevate, and to purify the heart, that we may be brought to choose for ourselves and adopt that way; and not certainly until we be so influenced, and so directed from above, will the ultimate and really sound conclusion at which the wise man at length arrives (chap. xii. 13.), in a practical sense, be made ours, viz. 'Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man,' solemnly and powerfully enforced in the closing verse though that sentiment be, 'for God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil.'

PRAYER.

Enable us, O Lord, to draw near unto thee this morning under a deep sense of our obligations unto thee, and of our entire dependence upon thee for every needful blessing. None, Lord, but thy providence can minister unto our necessities, and nothing but thine abundant grace in Christ Jesus can meet the wants, or fully and effectively supply the exigencies of our souls. O that we had grace given us to teach us this dependence, and that we might be led from day to day to give practical proof and demonstration thereof, by casting ourselves upon thee, and seeking our refuge alone on thy faithfulness. But, alas! O Lord, we have not only forfeited thy favour by our sins, but we have thought to satisfy ourselves without it. We have sought, in this respect, the living among the dead, and have said, Peace, peace, to our souls, when there could be no peace. How often and how foolishly have we looked to things without for that comfort and security which are alone to be found in thee! We have said unto ourselves, Lo! here, and lo! there, are these to be found; but, alas! we only deceived ourselves; our foundation was in the dust, instead of resting with thyself on the holy mountains. Thy people, in a word, have committed two evils; we have forsaken thee, the fountain of living waters, and have been hewing to ourselves cisterns, broken cisterns, which could hold no water. And often, O Lord, as we have been deceived thereby, and often as we have been disappointed through our own devices, still have we had recourse but to another and another such, neither holier nor better than any which preceded them, and respecting which we had repeatedly declared, This also is vanity. True, indeed, our own wickedness might now well correct us, and our own repeated backslidings might well reprove us; yet, alas! our own experience, in times past, but too sadly confirms the truth and the testimony of thy word, that without thy teaching, without the convicting, enlightening, sanctifying influences of thy grace, all is, and will be, ineffectual; all doth but end in vanity and in vexation of spirit. We come, therefore, O Lord, to thee. Lord, we plead with thee, we plead the merits of him who alone hath merit, and who suffered and died for us, that we might have access to thee through him; and instead of saying, as before, Who will show us any good? we would make this the language of our prayer, Lord, do thou, for Christ's sake, lift up the light of thy countenance upon us. For his sake pardon, and through his grace help us, and delivering our souls from evil in time, be our exceeding great reward throughout eternity. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XXVI. 5.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. II.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

This chapter, like the preceding, is partly apologetic, partly doctrinal or instructive. The apostle here puts his continued absence from them on the ground of pure forbearance on his part, and tender regard to themselves. It is painful to Christ's ministers to be ever finding fault, while it prejudices that very gospel, whose spirit is so opposite, which they are commissioned to teach.

Ver. 5—9. The gross sinner once reclaimed, and others made to fear, the great end of church discipline is then accomplished, and its censures, accordingly, at first salutary and needful, are thence to be withdrawn. 'He hath not grieved us but in part,' intimating that his grief, in that painful case, had been greatly counterbalanced by their general steadfastness.

Ver. 10. In the person of Christ, that is, with all the authority of Christ as the divine Head, or in the presence of Christ; intimating, that what he said or did in that matter was with all the solemnity of one who felt that he was answerable therein to Christ as the Judge.

Ver. 14, to the end. The illustration employed in these beautiful verses is taken evidently from the custom of the Roman triumph, wherein the victorious general, seated in a splendid chariot, was, with kingly honours, drawn through the city to the capitol. To the captive kings and princes, together with the spoils, led in procession before the chariot, the apostle particularly alludes: 'Always causeth us to triumph in Christ,' or leadeth us in triumph, as it might be translated; thus putting himself and fellow-captives, as it were, in their place, and rejoicing that, in the glorious triumph of grace, they should be led through the world as monuments of that triumph, yielding thereby honour to God and their victorious King, Christ Jesus, and casting, at the same time, an honour around them (alluding, also, to the fragrant incense which, on such occasions, issued from the temples), which, while it might prove a savour of life unto some—to all who would not bow themselves to the victor's authority—should prove, nevertheless, a savour of life unto others, even to as many as should obey and believe in his name. Note. At the conclusion of the triumphal procession, the captives were consigned to death or to liberty at the pleasure of the victor.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

No kind of charity usually calls forth so little sympathy, or meets in general with so equivocal a welcome, as charity to souls; and seldom is the faithfulness of the affectionate pastor put to severer trial, than when, in the exercise of that charity, reproof is found to be necessary. Yet, forbearance in such case he knows to be cruelty, and to withhold would be to injure, if not to ruin, an immortal soul. Note. How often do the declensions and backslidings of ungodly professors cause far greater anguish to pious friends and faithful ministers than to themselves! (Psalm cxix. 16.) 'Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law.'

How merciful and compassionate the spirit and principles of the gospel! It takes 'no pleasure in the death of the wicked,' or in the perpetual exclusion of the guilty offender from the pale of its privileges; but on approved evidence of contrition and penitence, restores and welcomes back again, that all things may be done for the 'use of edifying.'

Learn the solicitude of every godly minister after the spiritual welfare of his people; and mark, at the same time, what obligation rests upon persons and congregations so blessed, to be tender in turn of their pastor's spirit, seeing, by unnecessary delays, or undue reserve on their parts, his spirit may be troubled, and his usefulness, it may be, hindered to themselves and others.

How rich the grace of God which accompanies the gospel, and how many and great the victories which it achieves! What the enlargement in midst of trials! What the comforts, in midst of difficulties, enjoyed by those who faithfully and freely publish it. In every weakness they are strong; and whether triumphing themselves, or led in triumph, the sweet savour, or odour, of their Master's presence and power is sure to accompany them; and whether yielding life, or scattering death, it is to his glory, to the glory of his mercy, or of his righteous and heavenly power.

But how very solemn the position occupied by the ministers of Christ in undertaking and instrumentally crying out this work! Is it any wonder that their hearts should at times be overwhelmed, and their expression be, Who is sufficient for those things? or that turning, with intensity of interest and earnestness, unto those among whom they labour, this should be their request to them, 'Brethren, pray for us.' Nevertheless, in certain respects, the position of every people and congregation, so blessed with the faithful word, is almost equally solemn. Never does the ministration of that word leave any as it found them. The savour of God has been there; and while it ascends daily unto him, wafting praise unto his name, it is a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death, unto them, according as they receive or reject, despise or improve it. How emphatic in this light the exhortation of the Saviour (Luke viii. 18.), 'Take heed, therefore, how ye hear.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art the Father of mercies, and the God of consolation, in thee will we put our trust. Thou art a refuge for us. Thou art a holy God, and we will bow before thee with reverence. Thou art a merciful and compassionate Jehovah, a reconciled Father in Christ to thy people, and with humble confidence will we approach unto thy footstool. Blessed be thy name that a way of access hath thus been opened up, and Jesus offered himself a ransom for us. Enable us, O Lord, to lay hold upon him in faith. Give us a participation in his mercy, an interest in his death, and a portion and a part in his glorious resurrection. O that the blood of Christ, which alone can justify, may cleanse us from all our sin; and that the Spirit of Christ, which alone can sanctify, may fit and prepare us for the enjoyment of thee in heaven. Were it not, Lord, that there is forgiveness with thee, we must ere now have perished in our iniquities; and instead of meeting together at this time around our family altar, we might have been reaping elsewhere the portion of the impenitent and unbelieving, thy mercy for ever turned from us, and our prayer from thee. O that this very consideration may be blessed of thee for the solemnizing of our hearts, for the deepening of our convictions, and for confirming the obligations under which we lie to love, honour, and obey thee. May the Holy Spirit himself help our infirmities; and leading us onward to higher and higher degrees of advancing holiness, render us conformable at last to thine own divine image. Let the prayer of the destitute, Lord, be heard, the mourner comforted, and the saints' desire every where accomplished and fulfilled. Bless us, we entreat thee, as a family, and as members of that community, civil and sacred, to which we belong. May thy name be universally honoured, and the sweet savour of Christ be universally diffused. Take us now, we pray, under thy preserving and protecting care. Watch over us, and all dear unto us, for good. Spare us, if it be thy blessed will, to see the light of a new day. And prepare us for whatever thou hast prepared for us, and the glory everlasting be thine own. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVI. 5—8.

SCRIPTURE—ECC. III.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1—10. Men are passing from one condition, and from one state of feeling to another, during all the time they are in this changeful world. Such is the variety, and such the unceasing character of their employments, that it would almost appear that they have no profit in that wherein they labour. But all this is given of God, in order that they may be exercised in their hearts, and trained for heaven by them. Ver. 11—15. As we know who reigns above all, we may rest assured that these arrangements are beautiful, that is, wise and good; yea, even so is that by which man who is meant for better things, nevertheless takes such an interest in the matters of this world, as to engage in them with ardour. Yet, after all, the use of them is to honour God when employed with them, and in the enjoyment of them. The same course of labour and of duty belongs to every age. Where there are duties, there is accountableness. Ver. 16, 17. The unjust judge will yet meet with one who hath no unrighteousness, who will reverse his judgments, and judge himself. Ver. 18—21. There is a tendency in men to forget their humble estate. In many respects their lot is like that of the creatures beneath them; like them, they return to dust. For all that appears at the close of life, you would not know that man was intended for immortality. This should make him humble. Ver. 22. We should now seek to live in such a faithful discharge of every duty, as to have enjoyment in the performance of it.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The various situations into which we are brought, are the appointments of him who ruleth over all. Let us, then, beware of counting any circumstance in our lot, either as unimportant or accidental, or view it as involving no responsibility. The great question for us, as new circumstances arise, is, how may I best glorify God? And although the very travail and toil wherewith we are engaged, are the sad fruits of our departure from God; yet, as our heavenly Father has mitigated the evils of the fall by many gifts, both providential and spiritual, let us receive them all with grateful hearts, nor allow even the sense of our unworthiness to spoil our relish of them. As we have a judge to deal with at last of strict impartiality, let us see to it that we strive after a faithful performance of what is due to God and man, having a conscience void of offence towards both; and to keep us humble, let us remember that the same earth which is to be the grave of the brutes, is also to be ours, and that soon their dust will not be distinguishable from ours.

PRAYER.

O Lord, our heavenly Father, we draw near unto thee this morning, through the way of thine own appointment, the Lord Jesus Christ, and in dependence upon thy blessed Spirit. We thank thee for thy gracious protection of us during the past night, for the mercies of sleep, and rest, and refreshment, and that when we awake we are still with thee. While we are with thee as the objects of thy providential care, may we be with thee as the children of thy love in Jesus our Redeemer. We confess, O Lord, our melancholy and guilty alienation from thee, the only living and true God, and most bountiful Father, and that our iniquities are so great, as to deserve nothing at thy hand but wrath, and that for ever. Thou mightest justly leave us with all the requirements of thy law before us, but without any ability to perform them. But blessed be thy holy name, that, through our adorable Mediator, we may look for strength to discharge duty, as well as mercy to take away sin. Bestow on us, we beseech thee, O Lord, thy grace, whereby we may perform all the duties which thou mayest be pleased to lay upon us this day, faithfully, and in thy fear. May we count nothing too unimportant to make conscience of. Whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, may we do all to the glory of God. As events arise, may we feel as if we saw written upon them by the finger of God, Occupy till I come. May we weep with them that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice. May we let no opportunity pass, either of promoting the cause of Christ, or doing good to our fellow-creatures. And, O God, we pray, that while we have confidence in thy strength, we may also be quickened to the discharge of all duties, by the thought that we must one day appear in judgment, and that thy judgment is impartial, that thou wilt judge the righteous and the wicked. Let us, therefore, now judge ourselves, that we be not judged of thee. Grant, we beseech thee, that our condition, as dying creatures, may keep us in a state of continual humility, as without this, we cannot value our relation to thee, nor see our need of a Saviour, nor love thee with the love of those who owe all to grace. And grant also, that the difference thou hast made between us and the beasts that perish, inasmuch as thou hast bestowed on us an immortal soul, and above all given thy Son to die for us, may induce us to seek after a better portion hereafter, and live in this world as those who are the heirs of a healy inheritance. And all we ask, is in the name and for the sake of thy Son and our Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LXIV.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. III.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Ver. 1—3. Those who exhibit, in their lives and conversations, the graces which the gospel recommends, give evidence that they have been taught by the Spirit of God, as well as rightly instructed by human teachers. Ver. 4, 5. Past success is a great encouragement to Christian ministers in their work; and whatever triumphs are obtained over Satan's kingdom, are owing to the power of the Lord. Ver. 6. The mere letter of the gospel kills, it is the spirit which saves. Ver. 7—11. The gospel is greatly superior to the Mosaic dispensation. The latter told of the judgments of God against sin; the former tells of a method of obtaining righteousness before God. The Mosaic dispensation was preparatory, the gospel is the completion of that scheme which was begun under the law. Ver. 12, 13. The abolition of the shadowy rights of the ceremonial law, of which the vail on the face of Moses was a significant emblem, affords to the ministers of the truth, ability to speak the word of the Lord plainly, and the coming of Christ is the cause of this. Ver. 14—16. The Jews are still in darkness, but they will one day turn to Christ; and when this is done, the obscurity which now surrounds them will be dispersed. The perception of Christ in the Old Testament is essential to the right understanding of it, and thus read, it becomes the instrument of sanctifying the Lord's people, and rendering them like Christ.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The ministers of Christ have much cause for thankfulness, that the truth of the doctrines they teach is evidenced by the characters which are produced by their faithful proclamation of the gospel. What joy can equal his, who can look upon his flock, and say of many of them, 'ye are our witnesses, known and read of all men?' It is a sure way by which a people may cheer and encourage the heart of their minister, when they are obviously making progress in the Christian life. At the same time, ministers will do well, both for their own comfort, and for success, to remember that the efficacy of their instructions is altogether dependent upon God. They have a dispensation to make known which far outshines that of which ancient Israel was accustomed to boast, for Christ has come and shed meaning upon all that was obscure under the law. They who preach under this dispensation, should do so more zealously, and spiritually, and plainly, than was done in ancient times. Instead of leading their people to hear the thunders of Sinai, which spoke threatening to the hearts of sinners, they can lead them to mount Zion, from which issues the gentle invitation of that meek and lowly one who speaks peace to those whom law terrors have alarmed. While we enjoy the blessedness of beholding the revelation of God in its true meaning, which is Christ, the object of type and prophecy, let us lift up our hearts in prayer, and beseech God, that he would hasten the promised time when the vail which now obscures their ancient scriptures to the Jews will be removed, and they will receive Jesus as their long expected Messiah. And let us so study the character of Christ, and so dwell upon his perfections, that we may become like him, in the way, and as far as the members of Christ's body may resemble their divine Head.

PRAYER.

O Lord God, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we bless thee as the God of salvation and the source of consolation in Jesus Christ. There is no God but thyself, and thou art glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, ever doing wonders. We thank thee that thou hast manifested thy character in thy word, and law, and made thy glory to be exhibited to man in the face of thy Son Jesus Christ. In him we behold God manifest in the flesh. And we thank thee that thy people show, by the holy lives they live, that thou art working effectually in them. As we, O Lord, have been created in the likeness of the first Adam, may we be born again in the image of the second Adam, the Lord Jesus Christ. May all our iniquities be blotted out through his perfect atonement. May all our means of grace, the word, sacraments, and the preaching of the gospel, be made efficacious in our experience by thine own Spirit. May our eyes be opened to the full glory of the gospel, so that we may see in it an excellency far exceeding that by which the Old Testament dispensation was distinguished. May we feel that we are without excuse and have no way of escape, if we neglect so great salvation. God forbid, that such a vail should be upon our hearts, as that which now hides, from thine ancient people, the glory of the gospel. Lord, remove that vail from them, and all blindness to thy truth from us. May Jesus be formed in us, the only hope of glory. May the reading of thy word, and the contemplation of the excellency of Jesus, be blessed by thy divine Spirit, so that the image of Christ may be distinctly impressed on our souls, and his example followed in our lives. For his sake, heal all our backslidings, receive us graciously, and love us freely. Pardon especially the sins of this day, which we have been allowed to spend. Accept our thanksgivings for all the mercies we have enjoyed during its continuance. Be with us to protect us through the night, and raise us up to the duties of another day. Bless our friends, and relations, and benefactors, and enemies. Be gracious to the poor, the afflicted in body and spirit, the bereaved, and the dying. Prepare us for death, and for meeting thee in judgment. And unto thee, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, be everlasting praise. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE V.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES IV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Wherever we turn our eye we behold the weak made the prey of the strong. This is as true as in the days of the Preacher, and will continue to exist as long as the evil heart dwells in man, and as long as man has power. So great is the tyranny exercised in the world, that while he beholds it, the man of God will conclude the dead to be in a more desirable condition than the living. Sin is the cause; and the grace of God only can bring men who are naturally untender and despotic to put on bowels of mercies.

Envy is another of the manifestations of the heart of sin, which makes us grudge and grieve any good which shall fall to the lot of our neighbour. The fruit of the Spirit, on the other hand, is love. They who are successful in any department must submit to be envied. But we shall not improve our condition, if, in attempting to escape the envy arising from success, we consign ourselves to inactivity. There is a lust of acquiring, not for the sake of others who are to come after us, not for the gratification of our own comfort, but for mere covetousness, which may well be called, as in the passage before us, 'Vanity, yea, sore travail.' There is much benefit from those social connections which men are naturally disposed to form; they aid in the way of support, and comfort, and defence.

When men look about for a station insuring happiness, they are apt to look to the station of a king, possessing, as it does, power, and more than a common share of wealth; but it has its anxieties and cares. The subject, even the poorest, by a change may become more prosperous—out of prison he may come to reign. But while the king cannot rise higher, he may be reduced to poverty.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

It need not be to us a matter of surprise when we behold the acts of oppressors. These have been witnessed since the world began. The bible alone can afford us a correct explanation of how it is that man should so cruelly lord it over his brother. Let us be thankful when we reflect that the same record which proclaims the cause of this, also exhibits the only remedy for it, which is, fleeing to God as our protector. Let us all seek to be distinguished by a different spirit, created in us by the gospel, which will lead us to do to others as we would have others to do to us.

Those who are successful in their honest calling, may expect that they shall not enjoy their prosperity without envy. But a disposition to share their success with others, which is just the law of Christ, will tend to allay the malignant feelings even of the most depraved; but it is recklessness, and not wisdom, to choose idleness in the hope thereby of escaping all evils along with the evil of envy. There are many necessary consequences of a baneful kind which accompany indolence.

It ought to be a Christian's endeavour to beware of that debasing and irrational appetite, so often condemned in the word of God, the love of money for its own sake. Before this the finest appearances in character are destroyed; and many a one, who has begun well in the Christian life, has been shrunk up and become an offence instead of an ornament to the cause of the Redeemer. 'For the love of money is the root of all evil, which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.'

The social life, which is an arrangement in providence, and which is accommodated to our natural constitution, ought to be acknowledged by us as a matter of gratitude. He who made us, gives us for our comfort parents, brethren, and sisters, partners, children, and friends. It ought to be felt as an argument for contentment, on the part of those who are humble in their circumstances, that cares multiply in proportion to the loftiness of a man's station.

PRAYER.

We desire this morning, O our God, to approach thee through the only way whereby sinners may come to thee, thine own dearly beloved and only begotten Son. Thou hast given us quiet rest, and when we awoke thy hand sustained us. At the beginning of another day we seek together, as a family, thy blessing and grace. Keep us, O our Father, through this day, from all evil to our bodies, and, above all, from the contamination of sin. We avow ourselves the children of a holy God, and the sincere disciples of the holy Jesus. O may we spend this day in accordance with this honourable connection, this solemn profession. If thou art pleased this day to give us the exercise of authority, enable us to act with tenderness and Christian discretion. If we are subject to reproach or oppression, give us, O Lord, the spirit of meekness and submission, that we may thus adorn the doctrine of our Lord. Enable us to rejoice in our neighbour's prosperity, instead of envying him, as we will do if left to our own natural tendencies. Make us not slothful in business, but fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. Preserve us from making the world our God. Let us not trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who is the soul's only sure, and abiding, and everlasting portion, and who has made himself over unto us people graciously in covenant by Jesus Christ. Accept of our united thanks in that thou hast set us together as a family, making us, in this manner, mutual helps, and comforts, and defences to each other. May each of us discharge the duty which is assigned us by thee, as in thy sight. May we exercise a spirit of contentment and submission to thee, in respect to the station thou hast assigned us in life. Bring us together, if it be thy will, at the close of this day, in peace and safety. May the Spirit himself dwell in us, and keep us from evil. And unto thee the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, be praise everlasting. Amen.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XLII.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. IV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The work of the ministry is laborious and difficult, so that men are apt to faint under it. But it is a mighty encouragement under all discomfitures, that the servant of God feels, as Paul did, that it is the duty he proclaims, and that he has no secular end to serve by what he preaches.

As one may be prevented, by a veil being thrown over him, seeing the beauties of creation; so unbelievers are hindered seeing the excellency of the gospel by the circumstance, that their eyes are blinded, their intellects are obscured, so that they perceive not the superlative excellency of the gospel, by the snares of the great enemy of souls. There is a transcendent beauty in the gospel, but men cannot see it so long as satan blinds them. The unbeliever who boasts of his freedom from the weakness of believing the gospel, should be an object of real pity to the follower of Christ, who knows the cause of his unbelief. Ministers, and even apostles, are no more than what God has made them, vessels of earth holding inestimable riches, which God has placed in them. They judge falsely of the Christian life who conclude from its trials that it is an unhappy one. Its trials are all purifying, perfecting, and therefore, to souls who view purification as the real end of being, means of blessing. In committing his truth to men, as the preachers of it, the Lord has had regard to his church; and although the heralds of the truth are made to suffer by their faithful proclamation of the gospel, yet they too are sustained by the rich rewards and promises made to them by their Master.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

While those who hear the gospel should sympathize, and feel for, and strive to support, the hearts of Christ's servants, whose office, in its arduous duties, renders them liable to faint, they also should seek to commend the truth to every man's conscience, by making it evident that they are disinterested in their aim. The ministers of the gospel should not allow themselves to be swallowed up with over much sorrow, when their labours have not been attended with the success they could have wished, and which they hoped for. Some of those at whose long obduracy they may be wondering, are judiciously blinded by the power of the great enemy. The cause of their refusing Christ may lie neither in the obscurity of the gospel, nor in the defects of the Christian minister, although both of these may be blamed for it.

It is well when the servant of the Lord is impressed with the same feeling of his nothingness as Paul here manifests, testifying that he is nothing of himself, and acknowledging that the work is committed to him not to lift up the creature, but more gloriously to make it evident that it is the Lord's, by the contrast between the imperfection of the vessel and the excellency of its contents. Well is it for those, whether they be ministers or private Christians, who, out of all trials and afflictions, can extract benefit, and can thus glory in tribulation. A matter of thankfulness it is, too, when, labouring as they do for the honour of Christ and the good of his church, they are content to wait for their reward in that exceeding and eternal weight of glory which the Lord has promised to those that are faithful.

PRAYER.

Ever blessed Lord God, we thank thee at the close of another day for the mercy which has watched over us during its continuance. Thou art the preserver of men. Wherever we are, we are in thy keeping; and wert thou for a moment to withdraw thy protection, we immediately perish. And while it is so with our bodies, it is equally so with our immortal spirits. Thou impartest spiritual being, and thou keepest it alive in thy gracious love. We praise thy name for the provision thou hast made for our souls in thy word, for the spiritual manna, and the refreshing streams which are contained therein, and for the blessing we enjoy in the preaching of the gospel. O Lord, increase the number of faithful ministers of the truth in our own land, and throughout the world. Make those who are labouring in the word eminently successful. By thine own effectual grace sustain their drooping hearts. May we esteem them very highly for their work, and their Master's sake. By the success thou givest them in their work, make it apparent to all that the excellency is of thee; therefore, O Lord, shed down the influences of the Spirit upon them and their ministrations. May many, through the operation of the Spirit, be pricked in their hearts, and led to ask what they should do to be saved. As thy people, grant to us that we may grow in knowledge of the gospel, and in admiration of its excellency and suitableness to our necessities. Be pleased, O God, to take care of us through the ensuing night. Be thou with us during its silent watches. We commit ourselves to thee, our Father in Christ Jesus. We pray thee to blot out all our transgressions, more especially those of the day now past. And unto thy name in Christ we ascribe praise everlasting. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES V.

REMARKS.

This chapter may be divided into four successive parts. The first extends to the seventh verse, and relates to public and private worship. Amidst the losses, afflictions, and manifold vicissitudes of life, which, in the previous chapters, the sacred writer has so pathetically and vividly described, the soul of the believer seeks and finds a glorious retreat in public and private fellowship with God. In the 'dry and thirsty land' he betakes himself to the Fountain of living waters. But even into the noble and enrapturing pursuits of piety, the 'vanity' of sin and folly may intrude; and he who professes to worship God may be but rendering 'the sacrifice of fools.' Against these evils this passage is a solemn and authoritative warning; and O let the wise, and kind, and monitory call be meekly and thankfully received. Let us 'keep our foot when we go to the house of God.' It is the house of Him before whose presence angels 'veil their faces with their wings'; therefore, 'put off thy shoes'—in lowly reverence adore. It is the house of prayer; sincerely, earnestly, believingly, invoke God's grace, and 'bring no more vain oblations.' It is the house of Christian doctrine; be 'ready to hear,' and having heard, go, study to obey. Nor let us omit the sacrifice of praise, and, if circumstances call for it, the free-will offering of the vow. But if we vow, let prudence, as well as honesty, accompany the act; and having given the sacred pledge, let us also yield the promised offering. How sad if, in this respect, we should 'suffer our mouth to cause our flesh to sin!' How sad if what we call our praises and our prayers should be but 'divers vanities,' a 'multitude of dreams!' How sad if God should 'be angry at our voice, and destroy the work of our hands!'

The second great division of the chapter consists of the eighth verse. It seems to be but little connected either with the previous or with the succeeding context; but may have been suggested by the exhortation at the close of the seventh verse—'fear thou God.' It briefly, but vividly, describes a state of things in which government commits outrage on itself, and defeats the very end for which it is ordained—in which justice is violently perverted, and the poor are cruelly oppressed. Yet 'marvel not,' says the sacred writer, 'at the matter;' and by the consideration which he adduces to enforce the counsel, he virtually cries to the cruel and unjust themselves, whether in private or official place, Beware. And what is that consideration? 'He that is higher than the highest regardeth, and there be higher than they.' O yes, there is another government than that of man; and 'What mean ye, saith the Lord of hosts, that ye beat my people in pieces, and grind the faces of the poor?'

The third division extends from the ninth to the seventeenth verse, and relates to the insufficiency of earthly riches, and the destitution of the wealthy worldling. In this passage the sacred writer develops the five following principles: 1. That the most important of man's physical wants are easily supplied; and that, in respect of these, the monarch is dependent on the very commodities by which the poor man is sustained, ver. 9. 2. That to him who makes earthly property his portion, 'vexation of spirit' accompanies both the pursuit and the possession of that on which he so sinfully sets his heart, ver. 10. 3. That as wealth requires a corresponding number of dependents, by these the rich man's resources are drained, and, it may be, his mind is fretted and annoyed, ver. 11. 4. That whereas, by the want of care, and even by the labour which poverty demands, the man of humble station and industrious habits secures sweet and refreshing sleep, the rich man's slumbers are apt to be broken and disturbed by the anxiety and fear which his very abundance may produce, ver. 12. 5. That men are apt to be injured by the very wealth for which they are so often envied, ver. 13. 6. That a man may lose his riches even before he goes down into the grave, and that into the eternal world he cannot carry them along with him, ver. 14—17. What monitory views are these! Let not the poor man murmur at his lot. Let not the rich man glory in his wealth. Ours be the 'treasure in the heavens,' ours the inheritance of God.

In the three remaining verses of the chapter, the sacred writer shows how happiness may be derived even from temporal and earthly blessings. In the previous part of the book he represents them as utterly inadequate to meet the necessities of man, considered as a moral and immortal being, and as often failing to supply and satisfy even his natural and ordinary wants. But he does not regard them with a cynic's frown, or with a hermit's scorn. He acknowledges them to be gifts of God; and declares that, in the temperate and religious use of them, much personal and social comfort may be enjoyed. Wherefore, let us 'use the world as not abusing it,' and while we 'take our portion and rejoice in our labour,' let us pause, and bethink ourselves, 'this is the gift of God.'

PRAYER.

Eternal and most glorious Jehovah, show us what thou art, and what we are, that we may worship reverently before thee. Thou art greatly to be praised, and thy greatness is unsearchable. But not for thy power, and holiness, and terrible majesty alone are we called to magnify thy name. For how great is thy goodness! how constant is thy care! how countless are thy benefits! For temporal provision, and for power to eat thereof; for peace by day, and for sleep by night; for all thy common mercies, we would praise thee. But O convince us that we need a nobler heritage; and make us thankful, that our man's degenerate nature salvation has been purchased and wrought out by the mediation of thy Son. On that salvation may we all lay hold, and experimentally find it to meet the amplest capacities and the deepest wants of our immortal souls. Though by nature dead in trespasses and sins, may we be made alive unto thee. Though by nature heirs of hell, may we be begotten to a lively hope—to an inheritance that is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. United together by the bonds of nature and society, may we also be fellow-heirs of the grace of life. We kneel together before thee here; O may we all enjoy thine endless fellowship hereafter. Meanwhile, may we diligently and devoutly attend on the public and private means of grace. May we wait at wisdom's gates; may we watch at the posts of her doors. May we keep our foot when we go to the house of God. With willing ear may we listen to thy word, and receive with meekness its authoritative truths. With earnest prayer may we ask thy pardoning, sanctifying, and consoling mercy. And O withhold not that mercy from our souls. Answer us in the joy of our hearts. Even now refresh us with thy grace. Dispose us, in entering on the business of another day, to aim at the promotion of thy cause; and grant that the events which shall this day befall us may conduce to the spiritual improvement of our souls. Let not the love of money, nor any sinful disposition, hold dominion over us. May we remember that thou, O Higher than the highest, lookest into our very hearts; and may the thought of that eternity to which time is carrying us away, make us habitually serious and devout. Pardon our sins, sanctify our souls, and answer in mercy these our unworthy prayers, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. v.

REMARKS.

What a glorious succession, what a rich variety of practical and consolatory views does this chapter comprehend! These views, however, may be classified under five particulars. 1. The apostle describes the hopes and desires of believers after future glory, ver. 1—8. But yet, to be an 'unclothed' spirit seems alien to the feelings of his heart, and he clings to the idea of being 'clothed on with a heavenly house.' O glorious prospect! majestic destiny! Yet to the Christian believer, how poor, how mean, how unnoticed soever he may be, that prospect, this destiny pertains. For the soul to rest in paradise, for the body to rise in glory, and for soul and body, linked together in holy harmony, to rejoice throughout eternity in fellowship with God, is a privilege which belongs to every one who 'falls asleep in Christ.'

2. The apostle exhibits the judgment-seat of Christ, ver. 10. 'Before it,' says he, 'we must all appear, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.' Yes, we must all be there; we must all appear; we must all be judged. But O the momentous alternative! Ours, in the day of doom, be the sentence which shall open the gates of heaven; and ours let it be to choose now as it may be supposed that we shall wish to have chosen then.

3. The apostle describes that mediatorial work of Christ by which provision has been made for the believer's acquittal at the judgment-seat, and enjoyment of the endless happiness of heaven, ver. 14, 15, 18, 19, 21. And here it is explicitly declared, that the mission and mediation of Christ are traceable to God; that Christ, as a substitute for sinners, bore the transgressions of such as should believe upon his name; and that, from his atoning death and mediatorial grace, both reconciliation and sanctification flow. Precious truths! In that heavenly glory, and in that awful judgment-seat, which in this chapter the apostle so vividly describes, let us trace the value of the Saviour's sacrifice. Except for his character of Saviour, how fearful to meet him as a Judge! And what were heaven to the believer except for an interest in him!

4. St Paul indicates the influence which the truths now enumerated had in his own case and that of Timothy, and may be expected to have in the case of all who really believe them, ver. 9, 11, 14, 20, 21. 'We labour,' says he, 'that whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him;' 'Knowing, therefore, the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men;' 'For the love of Christ constraineth us;' 'Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ,' &c. By the truths referred to, then, St Paul and his companion were prompted to seek salvation for themselves, to urge salvation on others, and to labour for the promotion of the Saviour's cause. Are we thus constrained? Do we thus exert ourselves? The cross, the judgment-seat, heaven, hell, eternity—these are no empty names, no idle dreams, no antiquated fables. Each is a reality, and to each of us that reality solemnly appeals. O let us act according to the truth of things, according to the verities of God. We must stand before the judgment-seat—shall we be heedless of our souls? Heaven may be attained—shall we recklessly reject it? Christ has died—shall we set his sacrifice at nought? Sinners are perishing—shall we look idly on?

5. The apostle defines the character and condition of true Christians, by representing them as reconciled to God, and as new creatures; attributing both parts of the attainment to the agency of God, ver. 5, 17—20. Let us not deceive ourselves by supposing that we are the children of God and the heirs of heaven, if our persons remain unjustified, and our moral natures unrenewed. But why should we not be justified? Why should we not be renewed? O why should we not be saved?

PRAYER.

O Lord God, whose message the gospel, and whose gift salvation is, impress upon our minds the precious truths contained in that portion of thy word which has been now read. May they prove profitable to us for doctrine and reproof, for correction and instruction in righteousness. We have heard of the judgment-seat of Christ as a scene of terror and dismay; but, thanks be to thy name, we have also heard of an atoning Saviour, and of an incorruptible inheritance. In that Saviour may we all believe—of that inheritance may we all be heirs. If our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, may we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. In life may we have a good hope through grace of a happier life to come. By the gate of death may we enter into paradise. At the resurrection-day may our bodies be raised in glory. At the judgment-seat of Christ may we be accepted of him. Throughout eternity may we be glad with the joy of the redeemed. Grant, Father of mercies, that even now, in the believing contemplation of Jesus Christ, in the experience of thy saving grace, and in the anticipation of the glory yet to be revealed, our hearts may be comforted and cheered. But while we rejoice in thy salvation, may we also labour in thy cause. To our own souls may we give earnest heed; and may we seek the salvation of all to whom our influence can reach. May the spiritual condition of the world arouse us. May the love of Christ constrain us. May the Holy Ghost assist and prosper us. God of mercy, have mercy on the world. May it become as a field which the Lord hath blessed. Give thy ministers great success. May thy church be edified. May many souls be saved. Regard with kindness all more especially related to ourselves. Do them good in thy good pleasure. From the youngest to the oldest, from the richest to the poorest of them all, peace be on them and mercy. Accept of our thanks for thy great kindness towards us in the course of this day. Follow its events with thy blessing, and pardon its innumerable sins. Grant us refreshing sleep this night. Raise us up, if it be thy will, to-morrow morning; and give us grace to devote our continued lives to thy holy service. Answer our prayers in peace, O God, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXI.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES VI. VII.

REMARKS.

The former of these two chapters, in its style of thought and description, greatly resembles that which immediately precedes it. The picture presented in the two first verses, however, affords a strong contrast to that with which the fifth chapter concludes. The case represented here is that of one 'to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth; but to whom he giveth not power to eat thereof.' This description corresponds, in a great degree, to the miser's wretched and dishonourable life; but its terms are still more applicable to cases in which, how strong soever a man's wish to use and enjoy his property may be, personal sickness, domestic bereavement, or the prospect of death, renders wealth, and power, and honour unable to afford an hour's enjoyment to his heart. In ver. 3—6. a similar picture is presented. The man described is supposed to be the father of many children, and to have his life protracted for 'many years.' But 'his soul is not filled with good'—he enjoys not the worldly blessings he possesses; and at the last, from his own misconduct, or from gross ingratitude, he dies unhonoured. More to be desired, than such a lot, it is declared, is that of the 'untimely birth,' which 'cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness.' From these sketches of specific cases, the sacred writer proceeds to a representation of human life in general, considered without reference to true religion, ver. 7—12. It is described as a life of labour and affliction—as vain and shadow-like. And, 'who knoweth,' it is asked, 'what is good for a man therein?' Apart from revelation and religion, man is left in ignorance and uncertainty, with respect both to the physical and the moral department of the subject. But the question has been answered, what is good for man? yea, God himself has answered it. In one view, life is vanity; but, as associated with eternity, it is mighty and momentous. 'Vexation of spirit' characterizes man's residence on earth; but there are principles provided by the grace of God, and pressed on the acceptance of the sinner, by which that disquietude may be in a great degree neutralized and overborne—by which life may be not only consecrated to a noble end, but fraught with a majestic happiness.

In the seventh chapter, Solomon prescribes a great variety of practical principles and rules. In its miscellaneous character, it resembles a chapter in the book of Proverbs. The sacred writer sets forth, 1. The pleasantness and value of a good name; both of which ideas may be comprehended in the comparison between it and 'precious ointment,' ver. 1. 2.

the superiority of death to birth considered, the one as an entrance on, the other as a departure from, the miseries of life, ver. 1. 3. The wisdom and advantage of going rather 'to the house of mourning,' than 'to the house of feasting,'—declaring, on the one hand, that 'by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better,' i. e. that scenes of affliction are fitted to press upon the mind very salutary views and feelings in regard to moral evil, one's own death, the eternity that follows, and the wants and claims of others; and on the other hand, that 'as the rackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool,' i. e. that idle and vicious merriment, like the blaze of thorns applied to the domestic purpose specified, is noisy and tumultuous, indeed, but notwithstanding, inefficient and transitory, ver. 2—6. 4. The evil of oppression, bribery, impatience, pride, irritability, persevering anger, and discontent, ver. —10. 5. The excellence of wisdom and knowledge, ver. 11, 12. 6. The duty of exercising dispositions corresponding to the respective situations and circumstances in which one may be placed by Providence, ver. 13, 14. 7. The danger of being, as Solomon expresses it, either 'righteous overmuch,' or 'overmuch wicked,' a subject on which it may be proper to state, that, inasmuch as a man cannot be too righteous, in the sense of holy, and ought ever in the least to be wicked, in the sense of unbelieving and immoral, the sacred writer is here to be regarded as either speaking ironically, or denoting by the expression 'righteous overmuch,' extreme rigidity, and intemperate zeal, ver. 15—19. 8. The sinfulness of human nature, ver. 20. 9. The impropriety of a person being jealous and suspicious in regard to what is said of him by others, ver. 21, 22. 10. The danger and prevalence of female wickedness; the strong comparative terms employed by Solomon on which subject were probably occasioned by his own experience in regard to his concubines. What a host of practical principles is here! Let us shun the sins denounced. Let us cherish the virtues urged. By consistent and persevering holiness, life is ennobled, and man is blessed; and often, by the considerate, humble, patient, kind, and zealous believer, even 'the house of mourning' has been found to be 'the gate of heaven.'

PRAYER.

Great and merciful Jehovah, hear us graciously, when we now present before thee the offering of our prayers and praises; and do thou thyself enable us to worship thee aright. We acknowledge thee as the only living and true God; as the infinitely perfect One. Nor, in the celebration of thy praises, would we be unmindful of thine encouraging attribute of love. Truly thou hast commended it towards men—thou hast commended it towards us. We deserve not a cup of cold water at thy hand; and it is a remarkable manifestation of thy mercy and forbearance, that we are not consumed. And yet we are here before thee on the morning of another day, in the continued possession, not only of many common comforts, both personal and social, but also of many inestimably precious, religious privileges. O may we taste and see that thou art gracious, by accepting of those spiritual and everlasting blessings which thou art so ready to bestow. May we enjoy a better portion than the world can give. May we have thee for our reconciled Father, and heaven for our secured inheritance. And so, amidst all the losses, afflictions, and changes of life, may we know, in our own souls, that in heaven we have an enduring substance, and that all things work together for our good. Revive and gladden our hearts, O God, with thine exceeding great and precious promises. Enable us also, while we enjoy the comforts, to perform the duties, of the Christian life. For this purpose may thy word, as now read, be profitable to those who heard it. This day, and in the habitual course and tenor of our lives, may we exercise and cherish the virtues thus recommended and enforced. May we willingly enter the house of mourning, to comfort the heavy heart, and to receive useful lessons for our own souls. While, in the faith of Christ, the good hope of heaven, and the participation of thy common benefits, we find devout and holy satisfaction, may we, nevertheless, avoid the laughter of the fool. May we do good, as we have opportunity, to all men; yea, even like thee, O heavenly Father, to the unthankful and evil. May we be humble, patient, merciful, and meek. In the events that befall us, may we recognize thy hand; and by the discipline of providence, and the lessons of inspired truth, accompanied by the blessing of the Holy Spirit, may we become wiser and better the longer we live. Regard, with great kindness, our relatives and friends. Over them be thy benignant eye, and underneath them thine everlasting arms. Bless our sovereign, and all in authority over us—our church, and her pastors; and our native land. Send thy gospel forth throughout the world. Let the people praise thee, O God, let all the people praise thee. Answer us, we beseech thee, in peace and mercy, through the mediation of thy Son, Jesus Christ. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. VI.

REMARKS.

The first thirteen verses of this chapter describe the ministry of Paul and Timothy, who, in this epistle, as in their personal travels, stand associated together. It is specified, 1. That the apostle and his companion, taking advantage of the opportunity which 'the accepted time,' 'the day of salvation,' afforded, urged on the Corinthians the claims of Christian faith and piety, ver. 1, 2. 2. That, in the performance of their ministerial work, they were involved in many varieties of suffering and distress, ver. 4, 5, 8. 3. That, supported and guided by the Holy Ghost, they conducted themselves with circumspection, intelligence, forbearance, benignity, and affection, ver. 3, 6, 7. And, 4. That though, in one sense, sorrowful, they were happy notwithstanding, and though, in one sense, poor and destitute, they yet themselves were rich, and made many rich besides, ver. 8—13. In the five remaining verses of the chapter, St Paul cautions the Corinthians against intermarrying, or being otherwise 'unequally yoked,' with unbelievers; enforcing the precept by showing, 1. That there could not be a safe and satisfactory communion between persons who were mutually so widely dis severed, and so decidedly opposed, ver. 14—16; and, 2. That God had promised to be a Father to such as renounced the fellowship of sinners, and the practice of sin, ver. 17, 18. Although so large a portion of the chapter is occupied with the experience and conduct of Paul and Timothy as ministers of Christ, it may suggest to persons in private station some practical and useful lessons. While our passing life remains, let us diligently use it as an 'accepted time,' as a 'day of salvation.' Ours be the faith and hope which cheered the hearts of Paul and Timothy amidst all the labours and afflictions of their ministry, so that, even if placed in like circumstances of peril and distress, we may experience like enjoyment. Ours be the 'purity,' the 'knowledge,' the 'long-suffering,' the 'kindness,' the 'patience,' by which they practically showed what Christianity can do. Ours be the 'treasure in the heavens;' and ours the strenuous attempt to 'make many rich'—rich in soul, rich for eternity. Let us meet the personal kindness, and the authoritative message of our ministers with gratitude, and faith, and practical obedience. Let us shrink from sin, though it assume the guise of 'an angel of light;' and avoid such fellowship with wicked men, as is inconsistent alike with the credit of Christianity, and with our own spiritual safety. And having become the children of God, and the heirs of glory, let us in all things act accordingly—thankful for our Father's kindness, obedient to our Father's will, and happy in our Father's fellowship.

PRAYER.

Hearken to the voice of our cry, our King and our God—for unto thee will we pray. We deserve no blessing at thy hand. Our sins are many, and our unworthiness is great. But thou hast invited us, and Christ has died. For his sake hear the prayers in which we now invoke thy blessing on our souls. That blessing O do thou graciously bestow. Justified by faith, may we have peace with thee. May thy Holy Spirit help our infirmities, and lead us in the way everlasting. Strong in his strength, and wise in his wisdom, may we resist temptation, avoid sin, and perfect holiness in thy fear. Lead us, O Lord, in thy righteousness; make thy way straight before our face. Grant also, that, in our own experience, we may find that wisdom's ways are pleasantness, and that godliness, with contentment, is great gain. Even if severe affliction should assail us—cleaving to thee, may we feel a holy joy. Be thou our strong habitation, to which we may continually resort. And grant that, experiencing thy saving grace ourselves, we may also seek to do good to the souls of others. May we instruct the ignorant, console the sorrowful, admonish the careless, and hold sacred fellowship with thy believing servants. May we labour to promote thy kingdom and thy cause; and may we be honoured instruments of doing so. Establish upon us the work of our hands, and bless our unworthy efforts to the salvation of immortal souls. May one generation praise thy works to another, and declare thy mighty acts. May men abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and sing of thy righteousness. Bless thy church. Build up her waste places—repair her desolations. Promote within her the cause of purity and peace. May her members be active in thy service, and importunate in prayer. Have respect unto the covenant, and regard in mercy the dark places of the earth. Infuse the meekness and gentleness of Christ into the habitations of cruelty. Tell the world that there is one God, and one Mediator between God and man; and let all flesh bless thy holy name for ever and ever. Defend and refresh us during the darkness and silence of another night. Watch over us for good, and not for evil. Hide thy face from the sins we have committed against thee in the course of this day. Command thy loving-kindness on our souls. And if thou art pleased to raise us up to the light and business of to-morrow, grant that we may commence it with thy praise, and spend it in thy fear. For Christ's sake, hear our prayers; and to him, with the Father and Holy Spirit, be glory and honour for ever and ever. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XC. 11.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES VIII.

REMARKS.

This chapter begins with a general commendation of wisdom or true religion, and then goes on to show how it should influence our conduct. It will lead a an to obey the civil rulers of the country in which he lives, ver. 2—5; and that as Paul says not only in wrath, but for conscience sake; and much more surely will it teach us to obey him, who is supreme ruler over all. From the 6th to the 8th verse we are exhorted to prepare for the events of life, and especially for our last great change. Truly the misery of man is often great upon him, because he is not ready for the hour of dissolution. That last event in our earthly history, though the time of it, is fixed by him, in whose hand is the length of our days, is to us altogether uncertain in its approach. We must all die, and there is no discharge in that war. When the hour comes, we cannot delay a moment: for no man hath power over the spirit to retain the Spirit. Wicked men, meanwhile, may live as if they thought they could live for ever, but wickedness shall not deliver those, who are given up to it, from death. O that we were wise, that we understood these things, that we would consider our latter end. From the 9th to the 13th verse we have in account of wicked rulers, and are shown how at last all shall receive their due reward. Men often are able to their own hurt, being miserable in this world, and, by the indulgence of their passions, treasuring up wrath for the next. How vain is all their dignity! In a little while they are buried, and soon forgotten in the city where they ruled. They are unmindful, however, of their end, and because in the meantime they are allowed to go on with impunity, they are emboldened in sin. This, indeed, is the case with all ungodly sinners. The long-suffering of God hardens them, instead of leading them to repentance. How foolish is such conduct! However long the righteous retribution may be delayed, yet surely we know that in the end it shall be well with them that fear God, but it shall not be well with the wicked. From the 14th verse to the end of the chapter, we see how we ought to regard the mysteries of providence. Here below, we often see the righteous in calamity, while the wicked prosper like a green bay tree. This shows the vanity of the world, and raises our thoughts to a future state, where rewards and punishments shall be equally dispensed. Let us all be contented with our own lot, and adore God whose judgments are unsearchable, and his ways past finding out.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, how precious are thy thoughts towards us! How great is the sum of them! If we should count them they are more in number than the sand. When we awake we are still with thee. We have laid ourselves down to sleep, and we have awaked again this morning, because thou hast sustained us. Blessed be thy name for all thy goodness—for preserving us in life—for raising us up in health and comfort, and allowing us to read thy word, and surround thy throne of grace. O Lord, bless to us that portion of thy word we have now read together, and teach, by thy Spirit, to number our days that we may apply our hearts to wisdom. When we read in thy word of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death, O may the Holy Spirit bring these truths home with power to our hearts, and teach us to know our end, and the measure of our days, how short it is. Each day we rise may we remember that it may be our last, and help us to improve it in preparing for eternity. O may we count that the long-suffering of God is salvation, and may we have grace to be up and doing while it is day. Holy Father, we thank thee that, while we are reminded of our fleeting existence here, thou hast made known to us that work of Jesus, by which death hath been abolished. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. We rejoice that Christ hath purchased the heavenly inheritance for his people by the shedding of his own blood, and that, as their Head and elder Brother, he hath taken possession in their name. Accept of us, O Lord, in the Beloved. May we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of all our sins, according to the riches of thy grace. We have sinned grievously against thee, and if thou wert to deal with us according to our deservings, thou wouldest swear in thy wrath that we shall never enter into thy rest. But we beseech thee, O Lord, to have mercy upon us for Jesus' sake, that we may receive the forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified. And we entreat of thee, O Lord, that, since thou hast told us of a better and more enduring substance, we may be enabled, by divine grace, to live more under the power of the world that is to come. Help us to live as strangers and pilgrims on the earth. May we never look on any thing in the world as our portion, but as pilgrims and sojourners, may we be always passing through it on our way to heaven, feeling thankful for all comforts we receive by the way; but ever looking for our home in our Father's house above. May we no more be conformed to the world; but being transformed in the renewing of our minds, may we set our affections on things above, where Christ sitteth on thy right hand. Quicken us, O Lord, by thy Holy Spirit, and raise us from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. Sanctify us more and more every day, and make us meet for the inheritance of the saints in light. Bless and protect us, O Lord, through this day. Keep us in thy fear, and whatsoever we do in word or deed, may we do all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Bless our dear friends we pray thee, and prepare them also for a place in thy kingdom. Remember in great mercy the sons and daughters of affliction, and sanctify to them all their trials. Arise, O Lord, and plead thine own cause. Let thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Dwell, O Lord, in our hearts, and enable us to abide in Jesus by faith, and walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. Hear us, O Lord our God, and accept of us: for all that we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVI. 7.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. VII.

REMARKS.

The first verse of this chapter should have belonged more properly to the preceding one. Having spoken of believers as the temple of God, and as the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, Paul here exhorts them to act worthy of such a high and holy relationship. It becomes the children of God to be dead unto sin, and alive unto holiness. While we call God Father, let us strive to be holy. At the second verse he claims due respect for the ministers of the gospel. Many false teachers had risen up in the church at Corinth, and had been doing all in their power to depreciate the character of Paul. Paul vindicates himself in both his epistles, and here he appeals to them as to his integrity, declaring that he had never injured them in any thing. He deals with them in much tenderness, and declares his affection for them to be so strong, that if it were consistent with his duty as an apostle, he could cheerfully both live and die with them. He then mentions the joy he felt in all his tribulations, when he thought of his spiritual children at Corinth. In his first epistle he had reproved them sharply for their sins, and among other things enjoined them to excommunicate a person who had brought scandal on their Christian profession. He had sent Titus also to teach the same things by word of mouth. And here he refers to the matter again, and assures them how refreshing it was, amid all his trials, to hear of the favourable change that had taken place at Corinth. He was cheered by the very sight of his beloved brother Titus, but still more so when he heard the good tidings about the mourning Corinthians. He declares that he did not repent of having written to them the former epistle, though at the time he had felt very sorrowful, at being obliged to reprove them so severely. Now he expresses himself glad, not that he had grieved them with his reproofs, but because these had led to their sorrowing after a godly sort. And after having thus expressed his joy at the report he had heard of their state, he assures them that he wrote his first epistle, not so much on account of the person who had offended, as to show to the whole church his care for them in the sight of God. And then he closes the chapter by again repeating how much he had been refreshed and comforted, and assuring them that he was not ashamed of them, but had confidence in them in all things. Let us all seek to have such views of sin as are here described, regarding it as that abominable thing which God hates, and on account of which our Saviour died. Let us look for mercy through Jesus, and let us study to bring forth fruits meet for repentance, and to show that carefulness, and indignation, and fear, and zeal, and vehement desire, which Paul approves so much in the Corinthians.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, we appear before thee self-condemned: for behold we are vile and what can we answer? But we hope in thy mercy through Jesus Christ. Verily it is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom we are the chief. O Lord, if thou dost mark iniquities against us we cannot stand. O deal not with us according to our merits, but according to thy great mercy in Christ Jesus. O let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, on the Son of man, whom thou hast made strong for thyself. We would plead the merits of Jesus our Saviour, and thine own promise to us in him, saying, I will remember your sins no more. O blot out all our transgressions, and be well-pleased with us for the sake of him whom thou hearest always, and in whom thou art ever well-pleased. We beseech thee, O Lord, that thou wouldest increase our faith, and enable us to commit our souls to Jesus, that we may be washed in his blood, and clothed in his righteousness, and sanctified by the Spirit. Sanctify us, we pray thee, through thy truth, thy word is truth. O may the Holy Spirit convince us of sin, and excite within us that godly sorrow which leadeth unto repentance, not to be repented of. May we hate sin more and more, and shun it as that evil and bitter thing which thou abhorrest. May we depart from evil and do good, and dwell for evermore. May we live henceforth not to ourselves, but to him who loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood. Help us to live as those who have been bought at such a price. Help us to live as those who have such glorious promises and prospects. May we have grace to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord. O Lord, we commit ourselves to thy care and keeping this night. May our bodies be refreshed by sleep, and our souls by thy grace. If we awake in the night season, may we meditate on thee. If it be thy holy will, spare us to see the light of another day of the Son man, and when we rise in the morning, may our best and best thoughts be of thee and of heavenly things. O Lord, we earnestly pray for thy blessing on our friends; may they be thy friends, and may they and we meet at last in heaven. Our afflicted brethren we commend unto thee, and O do thou, who comfortest those that are cast down, give them strength and comfort in their trials; and prepare them for a happy issue of them all. Bless all thine own people, and may their number be greatly increased throughout the world. Save thy people and increase thine inheritance; feed them also, and lift them up for ever. O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive. O Lord, hearken, and do; defer not for thine own sake, and for thy dear Son's sake, to whom with thee, and the Holy Spirit, we ascribe kingdom, power, and glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

THIRTY-SIXTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CIV.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CIV.

REMARKS.

In this psalm God is praised as the God of nature and of providence, and it shows with what feelings we ought to contemplate the divine goodness, which fills the whole earth. How blind must those be, who can look abroad throughout the world, without seeing any traces of the Lord's working, and without having their thoughts raised in holy adoration? Well may we exclaim, 'O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all!'

The psalmist being about to speak of God's works, opens with a magnificent view of the divine greatness and majesty, describing him as having light for garment, the heavens for a tent, the clouds for his chariot, and the winds for his messengers. From thus beholding the Lord's majesty in the heavens, we next come down to the earth, and are called to behold his wisdom in its formation, and his goodness with which it is filled. We have an account of its state of chaos, where the waters covered the face of the earth, and then of the way in which order was brought out of confusion, when the waters were gathered together into one place, and the dry land appeared. Having thus seen the waters confined within their appointed bounds, we are called to look abroad over the earth, and even into the depths of the sea; and behold everywhere the riches of the Lord's goodness. The earth is visited with refreshing showers, and yields abundance for supplying the wants of all the creatures. The inferior animals have their food and their habitations provided for them. The birds, which sing among the branches, have their nests, and the wild goats have the high hills for a refuge. And surely he, who clotheth the grass with beauty, and feedeth the fowls of the air, and provideth habitations for all his creatures, will never allow his redeemed people to want any good thing, but will be to them both a refuge and a portion in the land of the living. The psalmist also praises God for the succession of day and night, and the constant revolution of the seasons. And, O let us remember that our days are rapidly passing away, and let us redeem the time. Does man go forth to his work and ply his labour till the evening? and shall we not improve the day of grace while it lasts, knowing that the night cometh when no man can work? After such a review of the Lord's works, the psalmist concludes by declaring his own resolution to praise God, and the destruction of those who refuse to do so. And, O let us join the psalmist this day, when we are led to review a greater work than that of creation, and to give thanks for better blessings than those which supply our temporal wants. If the Lord rejoiceth in the works which are here described, much more does he rejoice in the work of our redemption. Surely our meditation may be sweet, when we remember that our Lord is risen indeed, and that his right hand and his holy arm hath gotten him the victory.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and with majesty; thou coverest thyself with light, as with a garment, dwelling in light which is inaccessible and full of glory. Thou hast laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens also are the work of thy hands. Thou art worthy to receive glory, and honour, and blessing, and praise: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created. We adore thee, O Lord, for all thy goodness. Every morning that dawns brings us new tokens of thy love, and every evening we have to rejoice in thy faithfulness. Alas, that we are so ungrateful for thy favours! Each day we rise it becometh us to bless thee, and to praise thy name as long as we live. This morning especially we will be glad in the Lord, and our meditation of him shall be sweet. This is the day thou hast made, we will rejoice and be glad in it. The stone which the builders rejected, has become the head stone of the corner. This is the Lord's doing, and it is wondrous in our eyes. Hosannah to the Son of David! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord to save us! Hosannah in the highest. O Lord, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we bless thee that thou art reconciling the world to thyself, not imputing unto men their trespasses; and we entreat of thee to be merciful unto us, and grant us thy favour for Jesus' sake. We have sinned and done very wickedly, and if it had not been for thy great mercy, we had long ago been consumed out of the earth. O enter not into judgment with us as we deserve, but regard us in the face of thine anointed, and pardon our great and manifold iniquities, for the sake of him who died for us and rose again. O Lord, we bless thee for sending the promised Comforter, to take of the things that are Christ's and show them to our souls; and we earnestly entreat of thee, to grant us an abundant outpouring of the Spirit this morning. With the light of this morning, may the day-spring from on high visit us, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Come, O blessed Spirit of grace, and breathe on the dry bones that they may live. Revive and quicken us, O God. Enlighten our minds, and enlarge and purify our hearts. Help us to enter into the spirit of this day's services, and may they be blessed for our spiritual improvement and growth in grace. May it be a time of refreshing to us from the presence of the Lord. We would, this morning, remember before thee all our brethren of mankind. May this be a great day in the church, and may many be added to it of them that are to be saved. O may many be glad this day, when it is said, Let us go to the house of the Lord, and be in all the assemblies of thy saints, and make them feel that thy house is indeed the very gate of heaven. O be with all the afflicted who are this day to be detained from thy house of prayer. Be a little sanctuary to them in their retirement, and when kept away from the streams, may they draw, by faith, from the living fountain. Bless all our dear friends this day, and may they and we join in spirit, and be all prepared for a final meeting in the temple above. And now, O Lord, we commit ourselves to thee. Go with us to thy house, fit us for thy service, and accept of us and our worship. Let the words of our mouths, and the meditations of our hearts, be acceptable in thy sight, through Jesus Christ our strength and Redeemer. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CV.

REMARKS.

In this psalm God is praised as the God of grace, and mention is made of his special goodness to the church. We learn from 1 Chron. 16th chapter, that the first part of this psalm was composed and sung, when David brought up the ark and placed it in Zion; and how suitable, that on such an occasion, the people should talk of all the wondrous works of the Lord. The psalmist begins calling upon all to praise the Lord; and to excite their praises, he reminds them of the marvellous events of their past history. He gives a beautiful narrative of God's dealings with his ancient church, representing all as the fulfilment of the covenant he made with Abraham. This covenant God remembered, although, at some dark periods of their history, his people might be ready to think he had forgotten it. They were few in number when the promise was made, and for a long while they were strangers going from land to land; but few and feeble as they were, they were quite safe under the protection of God, who suffered no man to do them wrong. He sent Joseph before them into Egypt, to secure for them a favourable reception in the land where they were to sojourn for so many years. In that land his people increased according to the promise, and when they were oppressed by their enemies, and to human appearance were on the eve of destruction, God again remembered his covenant, and sent his servant Moses to deliver them. They were brought out with a high hand, and after being miraculously supported in the wilderness, they got the lands of the heathen for their possession. These things God did for them, that they might observe his statutes and keep his laws.

Such are the wonderful works for which the psalmist calls upon all to praise the Lord, and surely we cannot read this psalm, without remembering things still more interesting in the history of the gospel church. Truly God hath remembered his covenant in sending his Son to suffer and die for our sins. In what is here said of God's ancient people, we are reminded of the early history of the Christian church. When believers were few in number, and treated as the filth of the world, God protected them and made his word to grow mightily, and prevail even in the midst of persecutions. In what is here said of Joseph, who was sold into Egypt as a slave, and afterwards made ruler of the land, we are reminded of our Redeemer, who was sold and imprisoned, but who, when the appointed time came, was delivered from the power of the grave, and exalted as the Head of the church, to dispense among his people all the blessings of salvation. In what is said of the deliverance of the Israelites out of Egypt, we are reminded of our own spiritual redemption. Jesus having shed his precious blood as an atonement for our sins, and having rescued us from the power of satan, leads us through the wilderness of this world to the promised land of rest in heaven. And let us remember that as God placed his ancient people in Canaan, that they might observe his statutes and keep his laws, so Christ hath died to redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

PRAYER.

O Lord God of heaven and of earth, it is a good thing for us to draw near unto thee, and to sing praises to thy holy name—to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night. This evening we would renew our grateful thanksgivings for the great salvation. Thanks be unto thee, O Father of all, for thine unspeakable gift. Thanks be unto thee, O eternal Son, because though thou wast rich, thou didst for our sakes become poor. And thanks be unto thee, O blessed Spirit of grace, because thou condescendest to dwell in our sinful hearts, and dost purify us from our corruptions. Behold what manner of love is this! the height and the depth, the length and the breadth of such love! it passeth knowledge. We beseech thee, O Lord, that we may be all partakers of those blessings which Jesus hath purchased with his blood, and is exalted to bestow. We deserve not any favour. We are altogether vile and unworthy, and merit everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power. But grant, O Lord, that we may be sprinkled with the blood of Jesus, that all our guilt may be washed away, and justice may see in us no iniquity. O grant that our robes may be washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb; and being redeemed from all sin, may we be a peculiar people, zealous of good works. May the love of Christ constrain us to live not to ourselves, but to him that died and rose again. May we be enabled to bear about with us the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifest in our mortal bodies. We thank thee, O Lord, for the promise of a better country, and O grant that every day we may be more prepared for it. Support and protect us, O Lord, while we are in this wilderness. Enable us to use thy word as a light to our feet, and a lamp to our path. Feed us daily with the hidden manna—the bread of life that cometh down from heaven; and refresh our souls with those living waters, which flow from the rock of our salvation. O Lord, we pray for thy blessing on the religious exercises of this day. Forgive the sins of which we have been guilty in waiting on thee. Pour out upon us the influences of thy Holy Spirit, and water the seed sown, and make it bring forth abundantly. Bless the whole Christian church, and extend the gospel throughout all the earth. Send, we beseech thee, a plenteous rain to refresh thine inheritance when it is weary. Revive thy work in the place where we dwell; and quicken more and more our own souls. O Lord, be the friend of our friends; be the comforter of the afflicted; be the support of the dying. O Lord, we commit ourselves to thy keeping this night. Give us the sleep of thy beloved, and awake us in the morning, if it be thy will, strengthened in body, and refreshed in spirit, and enable us to go on our way rejoicing, asking the way to Zion, with our faces thitherward. Now, unto him that is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God, and our Saviour, be glory, honour, and praise, now and for ever. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIX. 4.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES IX.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—3. In this world, the providence of God makes no open and marked distinction between the righteous and the wicked. The wheat and the tares are permitted to grow together until the harvest, and are equally exposed to all the vicissitudes of this chequered scene: 'there is one event to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not.' The children of God are not exempted from the trials and afflictions of life; but they are assured that all things shall work together for their good. Their eternal interests are secured by the word of promise, for 'as the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so is the Lord round about his people from henceforth, even for ever.' He will guide them by his counsel through all the stages of their pilgrimage upon earth, and afterwards receive them into glory. He may now lead them by a way which they know not; but the time is fast approaching when the mystery of providence will be laid open to their view; and then, they will see cause to adore for ever the infinite wisdom by which they were guided amidst so many dangers, and brought at length to a haven of eternal rest. Although in this world, there may seem to be no distinction between the righteous and the wicked, yet assuredly the Lord knoweth them that are his; and on the day of judgment there will be a complete and final separation of the clean from the unclean; for any thing that defileth shall in no wise enter within the gates of the New Jerusalem. Though hand join in hand, yet the wicked shall not be unpunished. Ver. 4—12. The present life is a precious season, and therefore ought to be carefully improved. While we are in the land of the living, we are in the place of hope; for now is the accepted time and the day of salvation. We know that it is appointed for all men once to die, and we are frequently reminded of the shortness and uncertainty of life. Our fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live for ever? One generation cometh, and another goeth, and ere long the place which now knoweth us, shall know us no more for ever. We too must bid farewell to all that is dear to us here below, and take our departure into that world of spirits whence there is no return. How important then to obtain an interest in him who is the resurrection and the life, that when he who is our life shall appear, we also may appear with him in glory! We know not what a day or an hour may bring forth. Neither youth, nor health, nor strength, can ward off the stroke of death; and, therefore, it is our interest, as well as our duty, to be up and doing while it is called to-day, seeing that there is neither wisdom, nor knowledge, nor device in the grave, whither we are fast hastening. Ver. 13—18. It is not in man who walketh, to direct his own steps. He must be instructed by the word and Spirit of God, before he will pursue the path of duty, or attend to the things which belong to his peace. ‘The wisdom which is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and of good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy.’ He who is under the influence of this heavenly principle, has sources of comfort which the world know nothing of; while at the same time, he is a blessing to the community in which he dwells. His holy walk and godly conversation have a tendency to form the character, and regulate the conduct of those with whom he associates; and hence it is said that he who walketh with the wise shall be wise: hence also our Lord enjoined his disciples to let their light so shine among men, that others seeing their good works might be led to glorify their Father who is in heaven. Let us seek then the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom, and a fountain of life, that we may walk as becometh the children of the light and of the day. Let us seek that Christ may be made of God unto us, wisdom, and righteousness, sanctification, and redemption: that he may be formed in us the hope of glory.

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou art great, and greatly to be feared; thou art possessed of every perfection which is fitted to call forth the reverence, the admiration, and the love of thine intelligent offspring. Thou art seated upon a throne of glory; but we rejoice to know, that it is also a throne of mercy. Thou didst not leave us to perish in our sins; but didst lay our help upon one mighty to save, even upon Christ Jesus the righteous. We thank thee for all that he did and suffered, in the room of his people. We thank thee that he satisfied all the demands of law and justice; and that he is now revealed in the gospel, as the author of eternal redemption to every one that believeth. We have no merit of our own; but we plead the merits of Christ. For his sake, do thou pardon our iniquity, do thou receive us graciously, and love us freely. May we be reconciled by the blood of the cross; and enjoy communion with thee the Father, and with thy Son Christ Jesus. Make us thy temples: do thou dwell in us, and walk in us; be our God, and we shall be thy people. Adorn our souls with every grace; and may we advance from one degree of spiritual attainment to another; even till we arrive perfect, before thee in Zion. O Lord, it is not in us who walk to direct our own steps: do thou keep our feet from falling, and our eyes from tears. Guide us by thy wisdom, protect us by thy power, and bring us at last to thy heavenly kingdom. Make thy grace sufficient for us, and thy strength perfect in our weakness. May we dwell in safety under the shadow of thy wing; and rejoice in thee, the God of our salvation. Subdue, we beseech thee, the pride of our hearts, take away the carnality of our minds, and conform us to thine own image. May the mind which was in Christ, be also found in us. And, O Lord, enable us to bear in mind, that every moment is bringing us nearer to the grave; that ere long, we must appear at thy solemn tribunal, to render an account to thee, the Judge of all the earth. O make us the subjects of thy grace here, that we may enter into thy glory hereafter. Heavenly Father, we thank thee for the means of grace with which we are favoured: may these be rendered effectual, in promoting the salvation of our souls. Follow, with a blessing, the preaching of the gospel, and all the religious exercises of thy holy day. Water the seed which has been sown, that it may take root in the hearts of many, and bring forth fruit to thy praise and glory. Prosper thine own cause in the world; may the Holy Spirit be poured out as in former days, that the moral wilderness may be made to rejoice, and to blossom as the rose. May thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Bless our friends and relations: give them an interest in thy favour, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified. Go with us this day wherever we go: may thy presence be with us and give us rest. Thou knowest our besetting sins, thou knowest the temptations to which we are exposed: O may thy holy arm be around us for good; keep us in thy fear, and in thy favour. Blot out our manifold sins: give us that which thou knowest to be needful for us: accept of our united thanks, for thy care over us, through the silent watches of the last night; and all that we ask is for Christ’s sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXV. 6.

SCRIPTURE—2 CORINTHIANS VIII.

REMARKS.

In his former epistle to the Corinthian church, the apostle had recommended to the sympathy and charity of its members, the persecuted and destitute Christians in Judea. They had, at first, felt the force of the appeal which he made to them, and had begun to prepare such a contribution as might express the sincerity and strength of their commiseration, and alleviate the sufferings which a resolute adherence to the gospel had brought upon their fellow-believers; but the divisions and contentions which arose and prevailed among them, not only weakened the fervour of their mutual love, but also cut asunder the tie of interest and affection which connected them with other and distant churches. A whole year had elapsed since they had begun to collect, and yet the contemplated expression of their Christian sympathy had not been made. In order to awaken them to a sense of duty, and to provoke them to a ready and hearty discharge of it, the apostle, in this chapter, points to the example of the churches of Macedonia. These believing communities had themselves suffered a severe persecution, which must have diminished their resources, and crippled their charitable efforts; yet they had spontaneously, and with much self-denial, contributed to the relief of their fellow-sufferers in Judea, and had requested the apostle to take charge of the transmission of their offering. He refers to the fact, that, as a church, they were remarkable for possessing in great diversity the gifts of the Spirit, and counsels them to complete the number by adding that of a ready and considerate charity. He gives them to understand that they ought not to consider what he says as amounting to a command, as their contributions would be deprived of their appropriate character, if they were not offered without the slightest constraint. He appeals at once to their judgments and feelings, by pointing to the authoritative and persuasive example of Christ, with which they were already familiar; for he, though he was rich in divine and celestial glory, became poor in his outward condition as a man, in order to remove the spiritual destitution and wretchedness of the human race. He anticipates the objection which might be grounded upon their inability to contribute liberally, by assuring them that the willingness of the giver was of much greater importance than the intrinsic value of the gift. And he declared to them that his object was not to enrich the Jewish believers by making unreasonable exactions from them, but only to procure a temporary relief for those who had been reduced to the greatest straits on account of the gospel, and who would not, in other circumstances, be behind in their liberality towards the necessitous. The apostle thus urges the Corinthian believers to a charity which was in unison with the spirit of their religion, and which could not fail to find many objects on which it might well be expended in that age of cruel persecution. The principle to which he appeals is characteristic of the followers of Christ. It has not ceased to exist, and has not changed its modes of displaying itself, in this later age of the church and the world. It still burns with intensity, and prompts to active exertion, when either temporal or spiritual destitution are beheld. It renders the believer a minister of God for good to all with whom he comes in contact. While it embraces particularly the household of faith, like that which resides in the divine nature, it blesses even the evil and the unthankful. 'My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God. We come unto thee in the name of Christ, believing that thou art nigh unto all that call upon thee in sincerity and in truth. Thou wilt fulfil the desire of them that fear thee; thou wilt hear their cry, and save them. Who would not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name; for thou only art holy? We have cause to be deeply humbled in thy presence, for we are guilty and polluted: we have forfeited every claim to thy favourable regard: we have not given to thee, the glory which is due unto thy name. It is because thou art merciful, and full of compassion, that we, the children of men, are not consumed. Let thy hand be still upon the man of thy right hand, whom thou hast made strong for thyself. See God our shield, and look upon us in the face of thine Anointed. Deal with us in Christ, that for his sake we may obtain mercy to pardon, and grace to help us in our time of need. May we be washed, and justified, and sanctified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. Do thou sprinkle us with clean water, and then we shall be clean: from all our filthiness and from all our idols do thou cleanse us. Put thy Spirit within us, that we may walk in thy statutes; that we may keep thy judgments, and do them. May we be united to Christ by a living faith; and receiving daily out of his infinite fullness, may we resemble the tree planted by the rivers of water, which yieldeth fruit in season, and whose leaf shall never fade. Be as the dew unto our souls, that we may grow even as the lily, and cast forth roots like Lebanon. Do thou establish thy throne in each of our hearts: bring every thought, and desire, into cheerful subjection to thy holy will. Save us, we beseech thee, from the hardening influence of sin; let none of us be found grieving thy Holy Spirit. May we ever be duly impressed with a sense of duty; and live as seeing thee who art invisible. O Lord, we thank thee for the mercies of the past day. Thy goodness is new to us every morning, and thy faithfulness is manifested to us every evening. Bless the Lord, O our souls, and forget not all his benefits. We confess that in all things we have sinned, and come short of thy glory. We would come anew to that fountain which thou hast opened for sin and for uncleanness. Pardon, we beseech thee, the guilt which we have this day contracted: O remember us in mercy for thine own name's sake. Bless us individually: bless us as a family. May we go up through the wilderness of this world, leaning upon Christ as the Beloved of our souls; and grant that when our wanderings here below have come to a close, we may all meet at thy right hand, to sing throughout eternity the praises of thy redeeming love. O Lord, do thou remember in mercy all for whom we should plead at thy throne of grace. Bless the afflicted, and sanctify to them all the dealings of thy providence. Comfort those whom thou hast visited with bereavement; teach them to be still, and to know that thou art God. Look in mercy upon the dying; prepare them for their great change; give them an interest in Christ, who is the resurrection and the life; that when he who is their life shall appear, they also may appear with him in glory. Bless thine own people everywhere; and give success, we beseech thee, to the means employed for the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom in the world; that thy name may be known upon the earth, and thy saving health among all nations. Heavenly Father, be with us as we now retire to rest, never leave us, never forsake us; and to thy name, in Christ, be all the praise. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXLV. 17.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES x.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1. Among the Jews perfumes were generally used in the form of ointments. It is necessary to know this fact in order to perceive the beauty of those comparisons in scripture in which ointments are mentioned. The statement in this passage is, that as the finest perfume may be deprived of its peculiar odour, and rendered positively offensive by the presence of one dead insect, however small; so one instance of folly mars the beauty of character, and injures the good reputation, which result from uniform wisdom in conversation and conduct. It is readily discovered, because it stands alone and furnishes a contrast; it is made the subject of remark, because it excites surprise; and it is published and exaggerated, because many are eager, by detraction, to gratify revengeful feelings, or to palliate their own misconduct. Unless professing believers be careful to cultivate every excellence of temper, and disposition, and behaviour, and to shun every form and appearance of sin; unless they be watchful and guarded at all times, and in all society, their good will be overlooked, or evil spoken of, and the cause of pure and undefiled religion, with which their conduct is necessarily bound up, will be greatly injured. Christians, by blemishing their own reputation, at once misrepresent the gospel, dishonour its author, and put a stumbling-block in the way of the ignorant and ungodly.

Ver. 2, 3. It is by the actions of the life that the possession or destitution of true wisdom is proved. A speculative acquaintance with the proper rules of behaviour is merely knowledge, and is compatible with the greatest practical folly. It is in having such rules always at hand, and in reducing them readily and habitually to practice, that wisdom properly consists. Of what benefit is it to have a heart to feel the appeals which are made to it, and an understanding to perceive the path of duty, if these are always at the 'left hand,' if they are not available for directing the conduct? As the outward actions show the true character of a man, and as these are open to the observation and judgment of all, the wisdom or folly of no one can be long concealed. If the discretion of any should fail him, he immediately betrays his imprudence—'he saith to every one that he is a fool.'

Ver. 4—11. Subjects ought not to quarrel with their civil governors as such, on grounds which are strictly private. They ought not, on account of an injury to themselves as individuals, to renounce their allegiance, and retire altogether from the post of duty. It is the dictate of true wisdom, as well as in accordance with the spirit of the gospel, to refrain from retaliation, and to conquer by quietness and submission. In civil society men are not always placed in the particular rank, or in the several offices to which their qualifications are apparently suited; but this ought not to provoke to violent changes. Those who attempt forcibly to overturn the existing order of things, and to set aside long established usages and institutions, generally do so to their own hurt, as well as to the injury of others.

Ver. 12—15. As it behoved Christ, in all things, to be made like unto his brethren; so it becomes his brethren in all things to conform to him. Grace was poured into his lips, and many wondered at the gracious words which proceeded from his mouth; and it is here said, that 'the words of a wise man's mouth are gracious;' 'let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man.'

Ver. 16—20. The prosperity of a country is dependent, to a very great extent, on the sagacity, the activity, the uprightness, and the piety of its rulers. The people cannot be happy when their governors are childish and voluptuous; and on the other hand, it is their own fault if they are unhappy when the public interests are managed by those who are wise, and sober, and temperate, and given to business. Disloyal thoughts ought never to be entertained, not only because they are positively sinful, but because they are likely to find expression, and thus to involve in outward and needless trouble. Above all, let no one, even in his thoughts, curse Him who is the King of kings, for he sees the hearts, and tries the reins, and judges the very secrets of men.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and majesty; thou coverest thyself with light as with a garment. Who is a God like unto thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? Who can utter thy mighty acts, or show forth all thy praise? Righteous art thou, O God, when we plead with thee; and thou wilt be justified when thou speakest, and clear when thou judgest: We come into thy presence believing that thy throne of glory is also a throne of grace; that thou wilt regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer. We place all our dependence for acceptance with thee on the atonement and intercession of Christ. If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord, who could stand? But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared. With thee there is mercy, yea, with our God there is plenteous redemption, and he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities. Let the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, purge our conscience from dead works to serve thee the living God. Say unto our souls that thou art our salvation. O be merciful to us, and bless us, and cause thy face to shine on us. Deliver us, also, we beseech thee, from every taint of inward pollution, and every form of outward sin. Let us be planted together in the likeness of Christ's death and resurrection, that as he was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life. O that the love of God may be shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. O that Jesus Christ may be very gracious to us, as he is to all that believe, that he may be in our account the chiefest of ten thousand, and altogether lovely. And let the love of Christ toward us constrain us to live not to ourselves, but to him that died for us and rose again. We thank thee, O most merciful Father, for our preservation throughout the past night. May we enjoy thy care and protection while we are engaged in the duties of this day. May we seek to glorify thee in all that we do, and say, and think. May we have a constant, and simple, and sensible dependence on Christ for grace and strength. Whatever we do, in word or in deed, may we do it in the name of the Lord Jesus. And may our walk and conversation be such, as that we shall shine as lights in the world, and recommend the gospel to all with whom we associate. May we this day make progress in every excellence of temper, and disposition, and conduct, in every thing which qualifies for thy service on the earth, and for thy presence and worship in heaven. May our path resemble that of the sun, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. These our confessions, and thanksgivings, and prayers, we offer in the name of Jesus Christ, to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, be undivided and eternal glory. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXVI. 5.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. IX.

REMARKS.

The object of St Paul, in writing this chapter, was to urge the Corinthian believers, not so much to make a collection for the poor saints in Judea, for to this they were prompted by their own feelings and principles, as to have it in readiness when he came to them. From his acquaintance with their character, from his thorough confidence in their Christian sympathy and liberality, he had boasted to the Macedonians that Achaia was prepared since the end of the last year. He had, however, learned, through Titus, that though their contribution would be most cheerfully given, they were not yet fully prepared with it. He had, therefore, sent the brethren, mentioned in the preceding chapter, to encourage them to go on more quickly, that his boasting might not prove utterly groundless, and he and they both be put to shame; and that, having completed their collection before his arrival, it might not have the appearance of being forced from them by his presence. That they might be induced to give liberally, he reminded them of the divinely appointed rule, that as a man soweth, so shall he also reap, in respect of quantity as well as quality. He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord, and shall receive again with interest. This rule is equally applicable to every other department of duty. They who are most hearty and active in the service of God, shall enjoy most of his blessing. We have no reason to suppose that, in the heavenly state, all receive the same measure of glory. Such, indeed, is inconceivable; for the true glory of a moral creature consists in the attainments which he has made. He who has reached the highest spiritual excellence, shall catch and reflect most of that effulgence which radiates from the divine throne. Every one shall receive up to the measure of his capacity; but the capacities of all shall not be alike. Every one shall obtain as large an inheritance as he can enjoy; but all these powers of enjoyment shall not be equally great. No one shall feel as if any thing were withheld from him which he is capable of enjoying, for then would his happiness be manifestly incomplete; but some having higher attainments than others, shall be able to take in more of the delights of paradise, to drink more abundantly from the rivers of pleasure which make glad the city of God. The apostle, however, gave directions as to the manner, as well as to the propriety, of administering to the wants of others. He desired every one to consult his own heart, as well as to consider his own circumstances, and to give what he thought right, without reluctance and grudging. He whose alms are not given cheerfully, is destitute of the true principle of charity in the judgment of God. The action is performed in the absence of the virtue, and seems to indicate dispositions and feelings which do not exist. The Corinthians are further reminded, that we have no reason to distrust the divine goodness, which is able to give an abundant increase, both of spiritual and temporal things. God can make us content with what we have, restore to us what we give, and enable us to be even more bountiful in our charity. The apostle offers up a prayer that they may experience an increase in respect both of their willingness and ability to communicate to others, that thereby thanksgiving might be rendered to God, an illustration of the effects of the gospel might be afforded, and prayer on their behalf, as benefactors, might be made by the recipients of their bounty. In the last verse the apostle's mind, by a very natural transition, passes from the benevolent contributions of the Corinthian church to their suffering fellow-believers in Judea, to the inestimable gift of the Father to a perishing world. May we feel its transcendent value! On account of it, may we give eternal thanks.

PRAYER.

Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Pour upon us, we beseech thee, the Spirit of grace and supplications. We know not what, or how to ask, because of the darkness that is in us. We are ignorant equally of our own wants, and of the unsearchable riches of Christ. We have become insensible both to the one and to the other, through the searing and deadening influence of sin. Gracious Father, we acknowledge the number and heinousness of our sins. Iniquities continually prevail against us, so that each successive thought, and word, and action, is a manifest violation of thy law. While we have disregarded our obligations to thy service, as thy creatures, we have also broken our vows and engagements as thy professing people. We have neither been deterred by thine anger, nor drawn by thy love, from the indulgence of pride, and envy, and deceit, and covetousness, and vain-glory, and the various depraved inclinations of our hearts. We have not been careful to shun the very appearance of evil in our conversation and conduct. We have not acted from a desire to glorify thy name, to extend the spiritual kingdom of Christ, and to promote the temporal and eternal welfare of our fellow-men. Of these sins we acknowledge the guilt, and entreat the forgiveness. Have mercy upon us, O God, according to thy loving-kindness. According unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out our transgressions. O for Christ's sake wash us thoroughly from our iniquities, and cleanse us from our sins. And deliver us, we pray thee, not only from guilt, but also from pollution; not only from punishment, but also from disobedience. Give us grace that we may serve thee in holiness and righteousness in all the relations of life; that we may continually honour and obey thee; that we may glorify thee in our bodies and in our spirits which are thine. May we be temples of the Holy Ghost, and exhibit in our walk and conversation examples of his sanctifying power. May we, in our whole characters, be beautified with holiness. Bless abundantly, we beseech thee, all for whom we ought to pray. Let our friends and relatives enjoy thy friendship, and be related to thee as sons and daughters. May the afflicted and the dying experience thy sympathy and forgiveness. Increase greatly the number and the spirituality of thy people. Let thy Spirit be poured upon thy church like floods upon the dry ground, so that sinners may be enlightened and converted, and believers quickened and edified. Arise, O God of our salvation, and plead thine own cause. Accept of our grateful thanks for the blessings of the day which has just come to a close. Extend to us thy care and protection during the watches of the night. Spread over us thy covering wings, till our wanderings in this world shall have terminated, and then receive us into everlasting habitations. Forgive the sins of this approach to thy throne; and do for us more than we can either ask or think of, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXVII. 37.

SCRIPTURE—ECCLESIASTES XI. XII.

REMARKS.

Serious reader, turn away thy heart from folly, and seek a heartfelt satisfaction in doing good to thy poor brethren. The words of the gospel correspond with those of Solomon; for Christ lays great stress upon works of charity in his account of the last judgment. Give alms as one who expects nothing in return—give liberally to-day, lest thy ability be gone against to-morrow, when thou mayest in thy turn need help of others, and God will make thee feel that it is more blessed to give than to receive. Let thy goodness distil as the rain; be useful and bring forth fruits of beneficence in what sphere soever providence has assigned to thee; wait not for more favourable opportunities, nor heed those discourage-ments which may be compared to baffling winds or lowering clouds, that may perplex but must not stop the husbandman. Be assured the divine blessing will descend upon thine efforts, though thou canst not see how; and so be always doing thy best, withholding not thy hand from pious and charitable endeavours, either late or early, as in due season thou shalt reap if thou faint not. Thus do thou live, as one who prepares to die. Life is God's gift, and it is sweet; but though it should be long and prosperous, remember there are many days drawing on when thou shalt be shut up in the darkness of the grave. A young man may scoff at wisdom, and think it folly, but while he sits over his cups, let him look at that writing on the wall, 'God will bring thee into judgment,' and then let him flee from that carnality which would end in sorrow, for the delusive brightness of early days will speedily be quenched in night. Let persons in early life glorify their Maker, while their faculties are fresh and their feelings are tender; let them serve him with their strength, and not as if by constraint, when through gathering years earthly pleasures become flat and unprofitable. We are all fading fast, and melancholy is the decay of age, for then the lights in the firmament, like the powers of the mind, grow dim and dark; grief follows grief, as in rainy weather shower succeeds shower; the bodily powers sink and decay, and refuse their office. We shall soon go whence we shall not return; our friends shall wear for us such weeds of woe as we have worn for others; the functions of life shall have ceased, the corpse shall sleep in the cold grave, and the disembodied spirit shall appear before God. Well might Solomon say, that all is vanity. He commends to our attention as sure what the Spirit had taught him to utter, and what he had spoken both carefully and gracefully; he tells us that these words of the Shepherd of Israel are to stimulate and fix our minds when we hear them in our worshipping assemblies; he suggests the important thought that what is contained in holy scripture, proceeding as it all does from the same source of truth, is enough to instruct us as to the way of happiness, and that if we seek for what is better in other books we shall weary ourselves in vain. He sums up all by saying, that the perfection of man, of his duty and his felicity, lies in a devout reverence of our holy Creator and his holy commandments; and it is a solemn announcement with which the book closes, one which should rivet our regards to the counsels of inspiration, that all that is open, all that is hidden in our habits and our history, shall be exposed and tried at the day of doom.

PRAYER.

Our Father who art in heaven, we would offer thee our united thanks that we have all been suffered to see the light of the morning—that we have been called up again to active duty, and the enjoyment of wonted privileges—that we have had an opportunity of reading that word which testifies of Him who is the light of the world. Father, we are not worthy of any of these benefits, for we have every one trespassed against thee, and it becomes us to say, if thou shouldst mark iniquity, O Lord, who should stand? Blessed be thy name that thou hast not dealt with us according to our deserts, for thou didst deliver up thy Son unto the death for us all, and of thine abundant mercy hast begotten us again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. In his name we now draw near, through his intercession may we be heard, by his blood may our iniquities be taken away, and as his brethren may we find acceptance in thy sight. O that we may obtain mercy to pardon, and grace to help us, peace in believing, and joy in the Holy Ghost. And we entreat, heavenly Father, that the truths and the counsels of that portion of scripture which we have just perused, may by thy Spirit be impressed upon our hearts. May we be enabled to do good in our day and generation, to give out of what we possess for the bodily and spiritual advantage of our fellow-creatures, especially those of the household of faith, to give disinterestedly, liberally, and whensoever we have an opportunity. Save us from folly, and prepare us for the day of our death, and for the resurrection of life. Make those who are old among us ready for that happy state in which they shall renew their youth. Lead those who are young to serve thee ere the evil days of age overtake them. Let thy words be acceptable to us, and by them may we be admonished, and while we feel that all here is vanity, and that on earth we have no continuing city, may we be taught to fear thee and keep thy commandments, that our flesh may at length rest in the dust in hope, and our souls may be found watching when the master cometh. Bless not only us, but all for whom we ought to pray—thy people in the whole earth, thy church in our land, our relatives, our neighbours, our friends, our enemies. Give us this day our daily bread. Aid us in every duty. Deliver us from every evil. Let a sense of thy presence abide with us, and a savour of goodness be about us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXIX. 92.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. X.

REMARKS.

In the present world we must expect to find God's work and his servants misrepresented and opposed by open enemies and false friends, and here, accordingly, in the first century of the church, we have St Paul obliged to defend himself and his ministry from the charges of pretended apostles, who had appeared at Corinth. They had alleged that he was lowly when amongst them, but bold when far away; and instead of replying wrathfully, the pattern which he copies in his answer to them is the meekness of Christ. They had denied his authority, he prays that he may not be forced to use it against adversaries so presumptuous. They had said he acted with a cunning worldly policy; he declares that the instrument of his success in fighting the battles of the Lord were not efficacious through human craft, wisdom, and strength, but through a divine energy. By such heavenly aid, were pride, prejudice, and unbelief beaten down, and all the thoughts of converted men led captive to Christ, as in the bonds of a sweet constraint. Besides his prayers and labours, however, he had another weapon in store for obstinate enemies, and he was ready, by the severity of miraculous judgments, to punish the deceitful teachers, when those misled by them had been restored to obedience. If an opponent called himself a minister of Jesus, Paul and his brethren were at least equally so; nay, his miracles and success might have warranted him in boasting somewhat more of the apostolic authority given to him for their edification, yet he was not disposed to enlarge thereon like one who wrote to terrify them. It appears, they said, that his letters, meaning probably his first epistle to the Corinthians, were weighty, but that his appearance, address, and unadorned plainness of manner were contemptible—a way of estimating God's servants not peculiar to that age or country—and he admonishes them that they would find his dealings when he appeared among them as sharp as his denunciations when at a distance. The members of the faction attacked by Paul, might foolishly set up a standard of excellence by which to measure and magnify each other, but he would abstain from copying their example, boasting of doing things which the Lord had not commanded him to do, and would only say he had kept closely to his divine commission, preaching in a regular course in Lesser Asia, Macedonia, Athens, and finally in Corinth, where the truth was previously unknown. It could not be alleged that he went beyond the line of duty, or that he sought the credit of other men's labours, like his opponents who had intruded upon them, and he hoped when the Corinthians were sufficiently instructed, to be so appreciated by them in doctrine and character, that he should be able to leave them and proceed onward in preaching the gospel to the regions which lay beyond them, such as Italy and Spain. The apostle had, in self-vindication, been led to talk like one praising himself, but in the conclusion of the chapter he breathes the lowly spirit of a Christian; as he gloried only in the cross for justification, so he gloried in the Spirit of the Lord as the author of whatsoever good was either in him or effected by him. He teaches both pastors and people that it is not success, or learning, or eloquence, or human admiration, or self-praise which is any true honour, but it is the commendation which cometh from the Lord. His will is to be our rule and his glory our motive, and we are to feel that by his grace we are what we are.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we would pour out our souls in thanksgiving for the watchful care which thou hast taken of us this day, for the bread we have eaten, the raiment we have worn, the health of our bodies, the soundness of our faculties, and for the assistance in duty, the deliverance from evils, and the measures of grace which thou hast granted to us. O Lord, when we look back upon the occupations of the day, we see that we have not remembered, and feared, and glorified thee, as always faithful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. We would not glory or commend ourselves before thee, but implore forgiveness through that blood of the Redeemer which cleanseth from all sin; we would ask for the grace of repentance, and desire that being justified by faith we may have peace with God, through the Lord Jesus Christ. Do thou render profitable for our instruction in righteousness those words and that example of thine apostle which we have just now been called to consider. Let us never be led away from the simplicity of the faith by false disciples or false doctrine; let us not measure ourselves by ourselves, or compare ourselves with the foolish standards of religious character which men may set up; let our thoughts be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, and let us strive to overcome the opponents of the truth by the persuasions of thy word, and with the meekness and gentleness of Christ. Enable us to ascribe all the glory of any good that is done in us or done by us, unto the Lord. Give us that faith which shall appear in growing fruitfulness, that love which shall evermore constrain us, that consistency which shall commend the gospel to others, that humility which shall make us walk softly, that zeal which shall animate us like Paul, with a holy boldness in behalf of the cause of Christ. We pray for the speedy overthrow of all deceitful systems of religion, and the universal spread of that which is true. Take unto thee thy great power and reign in our hearts, in our dwelling, in our parish and neighbourhood, in our church, in our land, in all regions of the earth, so that at the name of Jesus, among Jews and Gentiles, every knee may bow. Preserve this night our bodies from danger, and our souls from temptation. When we are falling asleep may we commit ourselves to thee; when we awake may we be still with thee. Do thou alway keep us as our watchful Father, and may we have in us thy Spirit witnessing with our spirits that we are thy children, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM I.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH I.

REMARKS.

Isaiah is a prophet of great dignity and sublimity, who delivered the messages with which he was entrusted by the Holy Spirit, between seven and eight hundred years before the advent of our Lord, who spake so fully of gospel blessings, that he has been called the evangelical prophet, and whose name is in some measure descriptive of his high character, since it signifies the salvation of Jehovah, a suitable designation for one who foretold Messiah's coming. The prophecy condensed in this chapter constitutes an entire piece of itself; and from the picture it presents of the distressed state of the country of the Jews, it seems probable that it was uttered in the wicked reign of Ahaz, and that it points to the invasion of Judah by the kings of Syria and Israel. It contains a severe remonstrance against the inclination to idolatry manifested by the Jews, their want of inward piety, and other corruptions; and this remonstrance is mingled with exhortations to repentance, threatenings to the impenitent, and promises of better times, when, through divine judgments, the nation should have been reformed. The discourse of the prophet directs the attention of the ancient church, and of the church in our own times, to such lessons as these: that sin, public and private, is so odious to the Lord, as to cause both rulers and people to be classed with those of Sodom and Gomorrah, which, in righteous judgment, were destroyed by fire from heaven; that there is a dreadful possibility of making a seemly religious profession, and yet belying it by persevering in sinful practices; that such a profession is an abomination to the Lord, and that the sincerity of our solemn services must be shown, not merely by ceasing from all evil, but learning to do well, studying what is just and good in our public and private stations. We are made to see how ample and condescending are the Lord's promises to the people who are brought to submit their will to his; and how sure is the wrath which awaits, whether here or hereafter, the hypocritical and disobedient. From the whole we may receive a word of caution, and another of encouragement. Mark as a caution, that there is often a close league between superstition and wickedness; in consequence of which men are seen holding on from year to year in most unholy habits, and yet, to pacify their consciences, zealous devotees of some sort of will-worship; 'aye,' says one, 'many that will readily part with their sacrifices, will not be persuaded to part with their sins.' Mark as an encouragement, that very merciful are the dealings of God with sinners of our rebellious race; though he hates the transgression, he offers, through Jesus Christ, mercy to the transgressor.

PRAYER.

O God, we thank thee that at sundry times, and in divers manners, thou didst speak in ages past unto the fathers by the prophets; we thank thee, that the word addressed to them hath, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, been recorded in the scriptures for our edification; and that thou hast, in these last days, put away types and shadows, and spoken unto us plainly by thine own Son. As our blessed Lord took upon him the seed of Abraham, we pray that we may be enabled to give earnest heed to the messages addressed by wise men of old, to the people of whom, according to the flesh, Christ came; and that, by the exhortations, threats, and promises delivered to the ancient church, we may be instructed, aroused, and comforted. Save us from provoking thee to anger as the Jews so often did; save us from such evils as came down upon them for their corruptions, and which we doubt not are our due if thou shouldst enter into judgment with us; save us from placing our dependence on an outward and empty profession of religion, as if by the multitude of sacrifices we were to be justified. Conduct us to a true, a pure, a spiritual religion; to that faith which, while it looks up to the cross of Christ, is yet not alone, but bringeth forth much fruit. In our natural state there is indeed no soundness in us, from the sole of the foot even unto the head; and in our state of grace, are there not many wounds requiring to be closed and bound up? Let us approach with grateful confidence, and wash in the fountain open for uncleanness, so that our sins which are as scarlet, may be as snow; at the same time, let us be so cleansed, by the washing of regeneration, that we may cease from the perverse practice of evil, that we may do good according to the spirit of the gospel; that we may approve ourselves willing, and obedient, and growing in a relish for such satisfactions as shall be the portion of those who shall eat the good of the land of perfect rest. We pray thee to look down mercifully upon this family, and to purify us as a peculiar people, zealous of good works. We thank thee, that, in the watches of the night, no evil has assailed us, and that, with the opening day, we have again opened our eyes upon the light. How fair are the heavens stretched out above us, and the landscape spread around us! We would magnify thee as the Maker, Preserver, and Master of all, and implore strength that we may glorify thee amidst thy works, as ever seeing the being who is invisible. Bless our relatives, friends, and fellow Christians, enable us to live at peace with all men, guide us in the several duties and relations of life. Provide for the supply of our wants, and let the sentiment of our hearts this day be, Thy will be done. We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord, for our Mediator's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM CXIX. 41.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. XI.

REMARKS.

Here is Paul still labouring to remove the hurtful impression made upon the Corinthians by deceitful instructors, and to commend his own disinterested labours to their just esteem. They might deem, and his accusers might call it folly in him to speak in his own praise; but feeling it necessary, he solemnly entreats their indulgence till he has done. He was jealous for their spiritual welfare and constancy, since he had been the means of leading them to be members of the Christian church, which is the Lamb's wife; and he feared lest they should be seduced from pure doctrine by designing men, as Eve was beguiled by the subtlety of satan. If a new preacher could show them a greater Saviour, or a better Sanctifier, or a more suitable gospel, they might well prefer him; but Paul felt that there was no defect in the instructions he had given them, and that he was equal, as an apostle, to Peter, James, or John; not admitting, therefore, what the Romish church alleges about the supremacy of Peter. They were thoroughly acquainted with his principles, and although they might cavil at his style, they could not question his qualifications to teach them. He hoped his preaching to them free of charge, and at the expense of other churches, would not be reckoned an offence; nor his drawing help, when in need among them, from the Christians of Macedonia; as he had done so, lest, by being burdensome, he should prejudice their minds, and was resolved that he would accept nothing from any one in Achaia. This resolution he adopted from no want of love to them, but to prevent the charge of selfishness, and to show those who were disposed to boast, how to justify their pretensions. The individuals, however, at whom he levelled his denunciations were not apostles, but selfish pretenders to that character, whom retribution awaited; and if satan is able to disguise himself as an angel of light, it was no wonder that his servants could, for evil purposes, assume the air of devoutness. Even though they should think him vain glorious, and though not enjoined by the Lord, he would, since others were given to boasting, try to counteract it by a statement on his own behalf. They, in their wisdom, suffered the glorying of the foolish, and bore with people who enslaved their consciences, devoured their goods, and tyrannised over them: and if they suffered the pretensions of such men, he had a right to claim far higher authority among them. He proceeds through seven verses to mention the amazing proofs of his being a true minister, and zealous apostle of Christ; and when we contrast our sacrifices with his, we may almost ask, are we Christians at all? A noble triumph of grace is the character of Paul, and the necessity for vindicating it, has caused it to shine forth the more illustriously. He was solicitous about individuals as well as churches, feeling for any one reported to him as weak in faith, zealous against any who threw a stumbling-block in a brother's way. Since he had been led to say so much of himself, he dwelt on the things which at once exhibited his own infirmities, and the Lord's grace made sufficient for him; and to the great Being whom he blessed he could appeal for the truth of his statements. The concluding verses present an illustration of Christ's watchfulness over his servants; and O that, like Paul, we could all trust to his care, and be ready to suffer the loss of all things for his sake!

PRAYER.

O Lord, again would we lift up the voice of praise and thanksgiving. In thy wondrous condescension thou dost visit us; in thy unwearied goodness thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice over us; in thy abundant grace, thou hast commanded us in every thing, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, to make our requests known unto thee. We would thankfully comply with thy command, seeing that we may have boldness to enter into thy holy presence by the blood of Jesus; and we would beseech thee to forgive the trespasses of the bygone day, and to blot out our iniquities as a thick cloud. Lord, we lament the evil that is still unsubdued within us, the law in the members that is still warring against the law of the mind, the remains of corruption cleaving to us, the weakness of our Christian principle as compared with the pattern of Paul, and the sacrifices we so often make to satan, the world and the flesh. O hear our cry for more grace, that we may strive against sin, that we may resist the devil, that we may grow more consistent as we grow daily older, that the hues of heaven may be more vividly reflected from our characters, that we may be filled with love, and joy, and peace, and perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. We thank thee for pastors and ordinances given unto us for our edification, and we pray that we may never be led astray from the pure gospel through the subtlety of the serpent; or, through the sounding professions of false teachers, be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. Enable us to follow that which is good, to copy the noble zeal of the apostle of the Gentiles, to think less of our own ease, to study meekness, patience, and perseverance in well-doing; to view ourselves as soldiers of Christ, and to face labour, pain, poverty, and reproach if needful, for his sake. We are frail and insufficient for these things; but we look up to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and entreat thee to gird on us the Christian armour, and to give us strength, that we may stand fast in the faith, and fight the good fight till we enter into rest. Father, let us ever say, As for us and our house, we will serve the Lord. In all our ways let us acknowledge thee; and in all our intercourse and dealings with relatives, friends, and neighbours, let our inquiry be, not, how would our own likings and tempers lead us; but, what doth the Lord command us? Spare us, if it please thee, to assemble here for thy praise on a new day; but if we should never all meet again to worship at thy footstool below, may we meet in a brighter world, to engage in a more perfect service; and now, glory be to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH II.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The prophet (verses 1—5.) foretells the glory and blessedness that were to characterise the times of the Messiah, when the gospel should be promulgated from mount Zion, and multitudes, not only of Jews, but of Gentiles, from every known region of the earth, should joyfully enter into the church, accounting it alike their duty and privilege to submit to the statutes of the Redeemer. Recognizing him as a Prince and a Saviour, a willing people should bow before him, and his enemies be subdued under his feet; while the bonds of evangelical love, that united the company of believers, would illustrate the benign influence of his government. This was strikingly realized immediately after the outpouring of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost. But the period specially referred to as 'the last days, is yet to come, when, after the destruction of antichrist, the authority of Jesus, as 'the Prince of the kings of the earth,' will be every where acknowledged, and Israel, converted and restored, will occupy a peculiarly honoured position among the nations. Old feuds and jealousies will then be forgotten; wars, with the desolations attending them, will cease; and the people of every kindred and of every tongue, united in the faith of the gospel, will vie with each other in zeal for the honour of the Lord, and in a devoted regard to his service. Much, however, of a very different aspect (verses 6—22.) had previously to be developed. Heavy judgments were awaiting the Jews because of their unbelief and impenitence. On account of their wicked and idolatrous practices, copied from the heathen, of their desire to lay up treasure, and of their trust in warlike stores, the Lord was angry with them. Their land, therefore, would be laid waste, and their treasures scattered; their pride would be brought low, and their idols destroyed; and they themselves, reduced to the extremity of feebleness and fear, would flee to rocks, and dens, and caves, to escape, if possible, from the avenging visitation. This, accordingly, was their sad experience, when Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, invaded their land, and carried them away captive; as it afterwards was, in a manner still more awful, when Jerusalem was taken, and the Jewish polity subverted by the Romans under Titus. The wrath of God, which was then visibly kindled against them, has pursued them, during their subsequent dispersion, for nearly eighteen hundred years. Instead of embracing an offered Saviour, they clung to their carnal views, and put their trust in an arm of flesh; and their fate is an affecting illustration of the vanity of all such confidence in opposition to the Lord of hosts.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

It is animating to think of the prospects which are yet awaiting the church of God upon earth, when the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ; and when not only shall the profession of the gospel of the blessed Jesus prevail from the rising of the sun to its going down, but the divine spirit which it breathes shall in like manner be diffused among the nations. It is now only the day 'of small things.' The followers of the Redeemer are at present but a 'little flock,' and divisions, contentions, and corruptions, unhappily abound. Such a state of things affords ground for sorrow and humiliation. Yet, where the means of grace are enjoyed, what cause there is for thanksgiving and praise! It becomes us to consider seriously whether we prize these means, and study to improve them; whether, professing to have received the truth, we feel its power, and exemplify its spirit, in our life and conversation. Happy are we if we 'walk in the light of the Lord,' and are admitted to 'behold his beauty,' and to 'inquire in his temple.' Rejoicing in this as our highest privilege, it will be our desire that others participate in our joy. In the day of prosperity wicked men imagine that they can do without God; but in the time of adversity, how are their lofty looks humbled! How powerless are they seen to be when the hand of the Almighty is lifted against them! And O how vain will their efforts be to elude his righteous indignation, when he shall be 'revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know him not, and obey not his gospel!'

PRAYER.

O Lord, it is good for us to draw near unto thee, for they that are far from thee must perish. In thy favour is life, and thy loving-kindness is better than life. May we esteem it our highest privilege to be permitted to come before thee to ask an interest in thy gracious regard. We acknowledge our unworthiness of the least of thy mercies, for we are guilty and polluted creatures.

We have forgotten thee our Maker, and have lightly esteemed thee, the Rock of our salvation. We have had respect unto lying vanities, and have been lovers of pleasures more than lovers of thee. It is because thy compassions fail not that we have not ere now been visited with everlasting destruction from thy presence, and from the glory of thy power. Our only hope is in the Lord Jesus Christ, thy Son, whom thou hast set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood. We bless thee for him as thy unspeakable gift, and pray that we may be made partakers of all his benefits. May he be made of thee unto each of us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. May he be, in each of us, the hope of glory. And while we desire to rejoice in the freeness and fullness of the grace that is treasured up in him, may we feel the obligation under which the manifestation of this grace has laid us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in the world. While we entreat thee, for the sake of the blessed Redeemer, to give us the pardon of every past transgression, may the Holy Spirit so take possession of our hearts, that we may be thoroughly furnished unto all good works, and be advancing daily in a meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light. We thank thee for the means of grace with which thou hast favoured us. May we be enabled to improve; and may the blessings which we enjoy be imparted to the people of every land, till at last all shall know thee from the least unto the greatest. May Christ the Lord be speedily revealed as a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Israel; and may every scriptural means employed for the conversion of the nations be blessed by thee. We praise thee for all the kindness with which thou art daily visiting us; for food and raiment; for health of body and soundness of mind; for protection by night as well as by day. We desire to begin this day with thee, and to commit ourselves to thy guidance in our going out and coming in. With ourselves we would remember before thee those in whom we are specially interested, and our fellow-men every where, whether in health or sickness, in prosperity or adversity. May we never forget what we owe to thee, the giver of all good. May we be kept in the love of thee our God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. And all that we ask is for his sake. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXIV. 17.

SCRIPTURE—2 Cor. XII.

REMARKS.

In defence of his character and office, which a party at Corinth had called in question, the apostle continues his narrative of the manner of the Lord's dealings with him; adverting to a remarkable vision, with which, fourteen years before, he had been favoured of the glories of the upper sanctuary. Whether in the body, or in spirit only, he could not tell; but he had been so brought into contact with the heavenly world, that its very language had burst upon his ear, and he had heard, in consequence, that to which no mortal tongue might give utterance. Thus graciously had the Lord owned him: nor may we presume to set limits to the measure of blessed experience, with which he may see it meet to visit any of his people here below. Of the nearness, indeed, to which the believer may have been admitted to the presence and enjoyment of God, it becomes him not to boast, yet there are occasions, on which he may, and ought to tell, what the Lord has done for his soul. We are in danger, however, of being elated under a sense of high privileges. Accordingly, lest the apostle should have been tempted to arrogate to himself in any measure that which was due to God alone, he had since been subjected to 'a thorn in the flesh,' which, whatever it may have been, had made him feel in a very painful manner his own weakness, and which, as 'the messenger of Satan to buffet him,' was the more trying, inasmuch as it had apparently been a means of impeding his usefulness in the Lord's vineyard. Those of the faithful, who have been favoured with an 'abundance of revelations' above their brethren, have usually had greater trials than they in the spiritual life. Their blessed Master sees it necessary that it should be so, that a conviction of their unworthiness as sinners may ever be present to their mind, and that, after the example of Him whose followers they are, the cross may be felt by them to be the way to glory. Under the agonizing experience of the visitation which had come upon him, the apostle had recourse to prayer for its removal; and the earnestness with which he desired this was to be inferred from his having thrice made it specially the matter of his supplication. So it is the duty and privilege of the people of God to express unto him their wants and wishes, and to be instant and persevering in their petitions at the throne of the heavenly grace. None have ever thus waited upon the Lord in vain. It is true, notwithstanding his earnest and repeated supplications, the occasion of the apostle's distress continued. But he had, nevertheless, an answer given, which was fully adequate to all that he could have desired. The promise was made to him of a sufficiency of grace to sustain him under the trial, and that, in and through the very weakness which distressed him, the glory of the divine power would be made the more manifest. Thus we are reminded to look away from ourselves, and to look unto God. It was regard for the glory of that God who had invested him with his high office, that had induced the apostle thus to vindicate himself by adverting to his own experience. And it would be well in such circumstances for the men who had resisted him to consider the proofs of his apostleship, which he had been enabled to exhibit, not only in what he had now declared, but also in what he had done, while in the midst of them. If, on proof being demanded, there was any thing in which he had failed, it would, on their own showing, by his not having availed himself of that maintenance on their part, to which, as an apostle of the Lord, he was entitled; while others, whom he had sent to labour among them, had in like manner declined. On a similar principle, it was his resolution to act, should he again be enabled to visit them; for, in the strength of his Lord, he was ready to spend and be spent for them: and he thus spake 'before God in Christ.' It is desirable that they who preach the gospel should be so situated in regard to the means of living, as 'not to be burdensome' to the people amongst whom they labour; although in no circumstances can the servant of the Lord be secure against the insinuations of censorious and worldly-minded men.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the King eternal, immortal, and invisible. All things were made by thee, and by the word of thy power they are upheld. We bless thee for the fearful and wonderful manner in which thou hast formed us, and for the care thou hast taken of us, and the kindness thou hast shown us since we entered into life. Every day, as it closes over our heads, reminds us of the bounties of thy providence, and of the gratitude which we owe to thee the Giver of all good. But especially, as we call to mind the glorious hopes which the gospel has revealed, would we magnify thy name for thine amazing interposition in our redemption from sin and misery. But we plead the finished work of our once crucified, but now risen, exalted, and glorified Mediator, and beseech thee, for his sake, to come over the multitude of our provocations, and to hide thy face from our sins. Grant us deliverance, alike from the power, the guilt, and the punishment of sin. Give us a comfortable sense of an interest in Christ. Give us the Holy Spirit, to enlighten our understandings, to purify our hearts, and to lead us into all truth; so that, as thy redeemed people, we may be devoted to thy will, and ever ready to show forth thy praise. May we have such evidence of a good work having been begun within us, and of its progress towards maturity, that the close of each successive day may be associated in our minds with the conviction that our salvation is nearer than when we first believed. Forgive the many trespasses we have this day committed, and grant that the thought of our daily shortcomings may stimulate us to increasing watchfulness, and to a livelier sense of our need of supplies out of the fullness that is treasured up in Christ. And now that we desire to commit ourselves to thy care and protection throughout the night, be pleased to keep us from all evil, and to prepare us for all that may be awaiting us in the course of thy providence. With ourselves we would make mention of all whom it becomes us to remember at the footstool of thy throne, whether in health or sickness, in prosperity or adversity, whether life or death be the portion in store for them. And especially would we pray for the spiritual well-being of our fellow-men, entreating thee to cause the light of thy truth to shine in every land, till at last the whole earth shall be filled with the Redeemer's glory. Bless the efforts that are now being made to evangelize the nations. Be gracious to that portion of thy church planted amongst ourselves. Grant that a spirit of division may cease, and let all who name the name of Christ depart from iniquity. Graciously hear and answer these our prayers, for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ, our strength and Redeemer. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM XXXIII. 10.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH III. IV.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Because of the shameless effrontery with which they committed all manner of iniquity, and because of the confidence with which they trusted in an arm of flesh, the Lord announces that he would bring the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem low. He would demonstrate his omnipotence, as a sin-avenging God, by removing all on which they had relied as a ground of security; by cutting off the ordinary supplies of food; by taking away from among them the most distinguished of their warriors, senators, and teachers, and the most skilful of their workmen in the several branches of industrious labour, and by suffering the government to fall into hands unfit to carry it on, so that insubordination and anarchy would follow, till, in despair, amidst the general wreck, it would be accounted a matter of consequence if any man, who had the least appearance of respectability, could be prevailed upon to undertake the management of public affairs. These judgments were fulfilled soon after the death of good king Josiah; while they have been strikingly exemplified in subsequent calamities that have befallen the Jews, and which lie heavy upon them at this very day. But while the Lord would thus punish the wicked, he would show that he remembered those who trusted in him, and that he would stand up for them in opposition to their oppressors (ver. 10—15.), giving to each the reward of their hands. And lest it should be imagined that the predicted judgments were to overtake one sex only, the miserable fate of 'the daughters of Zion' is foretold, ver. 16—26, and chap. iv. 1. Their wanton and proud deportment, affected delicacy, inordinate fondness of vain ornament in their dress, and desire of admiration and of a family establishment, exposed them to the wrath of God; and they would be signally deprived of all that they delighted in, and exposed to shame and contempt in those very things which they had been accustomed to regard as investing them with influence and honour. But to prevent the hearts of a believing remnant from fainting, even in the worst of times, the judgments that were about to come upon Zion would at last (chap. iv. 2—6.) be succeeded by the permanent establishment of Zion's glory. The Messiah, 'the Branch of the Lord,' on whom the hope of the faithful rested, would in due season be manifested. Those who, amidst the tokens of God's anger, laid hold of him as their refuge, would live. In and through him their defilement would be purged away; and under the reviving and animating light of his gracious countenance, they would be safe from all that might hurt or annoy. Multitudes were thus purified and blessed by a saving application to their hearts of the truths of the gospel, when these were first promulgated at Jerusalem. And that which then took place is an earnest of the tokens of God's gracious presence on mount Zion, when the glory of the latter day shall be revealed, and the outcasts of Judah shall be restored, to have the divine favour withdrawn from them no more.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

In nothing are the blindness of the human understanding, and the hardness of the human heart, more manifest than in the disregard, so generally evinced, of the solemn fact, that God governs the nations, and visits them with his desolating judgments, on account of sin. Yet true it is, that the Lord is King over all the earth; and without his blessing, vain is the reliance that is so often placed on princes and nobles, on senators and men of skill, on fleets and armies, and on any or all of the supposed resources of a country. The best concerted schemes, accordingly, for a kingdom's welfare, how frequently have they not been utterly blasted! And why? Because the Lord has had a controversy with the nation for its manifold sins. Thus, those who, under God, might have done much to promote the public weal, are mysteriously removed when their services were most needed, and the weak and worthless are permitted to occupy their place, and become a curse to the people over whom they rule. The mal-administration, however, of such is not overlooked by God, who, for all their misdeeds, and especially for their oppression of the poor and helpless, will bring them into judgment. Good government, wherever it is established, is a blessing for which a people cannot be too thankful. It is the gift of a gracious God. And it is animating to be assured, that a period in the history of the world is approaching, when, under Messiah's government, to which a willing people shall render a hearty obedience, the nations shall live in purity, peace, and safety.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we adore thee as the King of kings, the blessed and only Potentate. Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations. The nations of the earth are thine, and thou enlargest them, and straitenest them again, as it seemeth good in thy sight. While we are reminded in thy word of the judgments which thou executest against nations because of abounding iniquity, may we feel, and be enabled from the heart to acknowledge, that we are sinners before thee, and that, as transgressors of thy law, we merit thy wrath. By nature we are unclean, and from our youth up we have been guilty of innumerable actual offences against thee. If we would attempt to justify ourselves in thy sight, our conscience would instantly condemn us. But blessed be thy name, thou hast not given us over to destruction, but art waiting to be gracious, and inviting us to come unto thee that we may have life. We thank thee that thou hast provided for us an all-sufficient Saviour, who, by his own blood, hath obtained eternal redemption for us; and who, having borne our iniquities in his own body on the tree, now liveth at thy right hand to plead our cause, and to make intercession for us. We thank thee for the gift of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, to apply to us effectually the benefits of the Redeemer's purchase. Grant, we beseech thee, that we may be enabled to receive and rest upon Christ as he is freely offered to us in the gospel, and that we may have that faith in him which worketh by love, which purifieth the heart, and which overcometh the world. And while we desire to be filled with godly sorrow for sin, may we have grace given us to die unto it daily, and to live unto righteousness, mortifying every corrupt affection, and perfecting holiness in thy fear. Clothe us with the garments of salvation. Deliver us from the deceitful influence of lying vanities; and let our conversation in all respects be as it becometh the gospel which we profess to have received. May thy Spirit lead us into all truth, and keep us from every false and wicked way. May the happy period speedily arrive, when the nations of the earth shall no longer set themselves in opposition to the claims of thy anointed One, but submit to his authority, and enjoy the blessings of his gospel; and may thy tabernacle be established in this land while the sun and moon endure. Be gracious to all of us now before thee, and to all for whom it becometh us to pray.

Have compassion on the poor, the afflicted, and the dying. Accept our thanks for all thy mercies, for thy goodness in having preserved us during the night, and brought us to see the light of this day. Continue to watch over us, and keep us from all evil. Forgive our every sin; and hear us for Christ our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXV. 10.

SCRIPTURE—2 COR. XIII.

REMARKS.

In the prospect of revisiting Corinth, the apostle intimates his determination, that, by the exercise of sharp but salutary discipline, his authority as a duly commissioned messenger of Christ should be established. By the most sifting evidence the matter between him and his opposers should be tried. And although in his absence his enemies might flatter themselves that he was weak, and unable to defend himself against their assaults, he nevertheless felt assured that, in the power of God through the ever-living Redeemer, who himself seemed to be weak when he was crucified, he would be enabled to show that his apostolical commission, received from Christ, was not a dead letter, as some vainly imagined it to be. Wicked men may affect to mock at the authority which the Lord has committed to his ministers, and resist and despise the discipline of the church. But a day is at hand, when, if they have not previously repented, they will be made to see and acknowledge, to their own confusion, that they have been fighting against God. Many professing Christians spend their time in fomenting in the church a spirit of dispeace and dissension, who would be more profitably employed in examining themselves on scriptural grounds whether they had a saving interest in the Redeemer. This the apostle calls upon the Corinthians to do. And if, after such a search, they had evidence that Christ by his Spirit was dwelling in them, they would by that very process be made aware of the reality of his apostolical commission, inasmuch as he had been honoured to be their spiritual Father. Those have the best evidence of their pastors being invested with the true apostolical succession, who have been brought, under their ministry, to a saving knowledge of the truth. Trusting that many at Corinth would thus know that he and his fellow-labourers among them were 'not reprobates,' who had assumed a character to which they had no title, the apostle prays that their conduct might be such, as would allow him no opportunity of establishing his authority amongst them to their confusion. As the advancement of the truth was the great concern which it became him to have in view, he would be satisfied to appear in the midst of them divested of those proofs of his apostleship which some demanded, provided they, as members of the church, were strong in the faith, and were found occupying a high position in regard to every evangelical attainment. Ministers of the gospel, who have the cause of Christ at heart, will rejoice in the spiritual welfare of their people, even although it were at the expence of sacrificing their own popularity. Such was the mind of the apostle; and it was his desire that the Corinthians should so profit by his epistle, that, when he came to visit them, there might be no occasion for him to 'use sharpness' in demonstrating the power 'which the Lord had given him.' It only now remained that he should bid them 'farewell;' which he does by expressing his desire that they might arrive at the highest evangelical attainments, and enjoy those consolations, and exhibit that spirit of unanimity and peace which is enjoined in the gospel. Thus would they be owned and blessed by him who is the God of love and peace. Ministers and people must part. The closest and tenderest of earthly unions must be broken up. But, when called to bid one another farewell, how animating to think of that tie which cannot be broken, and by which the whole company of believers of every age and country are united together in Christ! The apostle concludes his epistle by expressing his desire, in the form of a prayer or blessing, that 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, might be with them all;' adding his solemn 'amen,' in testimony of the sincerity of his wish, of his faith in the reality and preciousness of the mercies referred to, of his hope that they would be enjoyed by those for whom they were implored, and of his full assurance of the stability of that everlasting covenant on which they were founded. The three persons of the glorious Godhead are here distinctly acknowledged and invoked; a consideration which ought to impress us in the most serious manner when this benediction is pronounced, as it usually is, at the close of the public worship of the sanctuary.

PRAYER.

At the close of another day we desire, O Lord, to present ourselves at the footstool of thy throne; confessing our sins and imploring forgiveness. We beseech thee, for the Redeemer's sake, to pardon our iniquity, though it be very great, and to wash our polluted souls in the precious fountain of his all-cleansing blood. May every blessing which he hath purchased for his people be savingly applied to us by the effectual working of the Holy Spirit; and, under his teaching and guidance, may we be led into all truth, and be kept from every false and wicked way. We thank thee for every past experience we have had of thy goodness and grace, and look unto thee for a continued supply of all that thou knowest to be needful for our progress in a life of faith and holiness. If it be thy blessed will, may we be enabled to mount up with wings as eagles. Or, should so high a privilege be withheld, may it be given to us to run without becoming weary, or at least to walk without becoming faint. Help us to be ever pressing forward, animated by the consideration of thy promise, that, as the day of thy people is, so their strength shall be; and that thou wilt never fail nor forsake any who put their trust in thee. Blessed be thy name for the many mercies of the past day, and for the goodness and mercy which have followed us all the days of our life. Thou hast loaded us with benefits; thou hast furnished our table; thou hast made our cup to run over. May a law of gratitude be written in our hearts; that, as we are sustained by thy providence, and enriched with thy grace, it may ever be our desire to live to thy glory. May the blessings which we enjoy be shared in by others, and not only by those with whom the ties of blood, or friendship, or obligation have connected us, but by all men according as thou knowest their circumstances to be. May those who are in weakness or pain, or who feel thy hand to be heavy upon them, be strengthened, supported, and comforted; and may the consolations of the gospel be vouchsafed to the dying. Bless the interests of thy church every where; and hasten the blessed period when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. Grant that each successive day may bear witness to the progress of the Redeemer's cause in the world. And now that thou hast brought us to the close of this day, we implore the protection of thy gracious hand during the watches of the night. If it be thy will that we should see the light of the morning, fit us for the discharge of the several duties assigned to us. May we be thine while we are here, and thine in glory hereafter. And all we ask is for Christ's sake. Amen.

THIRTY-SEVENTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CVI.

REMARKS.

This psalm appears to be an appendix to the preceding; for as that contains a history of God's loving-kindness to Israel, this details their rebellions and provocations. It both commences and ends with praise; for not even a review of the wickedness of men ought to hinder the divine praise, ver. 1, 2. The Lord is to be praised and thanked, both for his glories, as he is in himself, and also for his mercies towards his people. The perfections of his nature ought to command our esteem, and the blessings of his hand to excite our gratitude, ver. 3. In his service alone is true blessedness to be found, ver. 4, 5. A participation in the favour he beareth unto his people, and the enjoyment of the good of his chosen, will alone satisfy the desires of every true Israelite. In these blessings consists the happiness of the soul; they yield a joy that the world cannot give, and they impart a peace that is unspeakable, ver. 6. The experience of such blessings will ever beget a sorrow for sin, and lead to a penitential confession of it; and what need is there for this! ver. 7. For we have sinned with our fathers, and committed iniquity; we have, like them, provoked God by our unbelief, forgotten God our Saviour, grieved his Holy Spirit, idolized created objects, and indulged the passions of the flesh. In the melancholy catalogue of their provocations, how true and faithful a representation do we find of our own iniquity and wickedness. The guilt of our sins, too, like theirs, is often aggravated by the circumstances in which they are committed. Ingratitude to God is the basest, at the time when he is kindest to us; distrust of God is the most sinful, at the time when he is displaying his power and goodness most visibly in our behalf; despising his grace is the most heinous, at the time that his love is strongest towards us, ver. 8. Yet the Israelites provoked God at the Red sea, ver. 21; they forgot, and tempted God their Saviour in the desert, notwithstanding the 'wonderful works, and terrible things' that he did in their behalf. 'They understood not his wonders, nor remembered the multitude of his mercies.' How truly may the same be laid to our charge! We, too, remain insensible to the grandeur of his power, and indifferent to all the attractive charms of his mercy. We learn the reason why God spared his people amidst their provocations, ver. 8. 'He saved them for his name's sake, that he might make his mighty power to be known,' not because they deserved it, but for the honour of his name, and the glory of his power. The power of his grace in sparing sinners, is as much to be adored as the power of his hand in dividing the waters, ver. 23. 'Moses, too, his chosen, stood before him in the breach, to turn away his wrath, lest he should destroy them.' Who does not see, in this interposition of Moses, a type of the mediation and intercession of the blessed Jesus? God's covenant mercies in Christ stood and pleaded for Israel, notwithstanding all their provocations. Though spared in mercy, they were, nevertheless, rebuked and chastised for their sins, ver. 40. 'The wrath of God was kindled against his people.' 'With many of them God was not well-pleased, for they were overthrown in the wilderness.' But in the midst of judgment, God remembered mercy. It was not for their destruction, but for their correction, that God punished them. The fearful judgments that fell on them were 'our examples, to the intent that we should not lust after evil things as they also lusted,' and they happened unto them for ensamples, and they are written for our admonition on whom the ends of the world are come.' Let us pray for grace to profit by Israel's history; we have sinned with them, and our sins are marked with infinitely deeper guilt and ingratitude. May the Lord remember his covenant, and save us from our sins for his name's sake. May his grace teach us to forsake the sins that so easily beset us; and may all our outward privileges be accompanied with eternal and spiritual blessings; and blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from everlasting to everlasting; and let all the people say, Amen, praise ye the Lord.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, great art thou, great is thy power, and of thy wisdom there is no end; we will praise thee, O Lord, we will give thanks unto thee, for thou art good, and thy mercy endureth for ever. Who can utter thy mighty acts, who can show forth all thy praise? Remember us, O Lord, this morning, with the favour which thou bearest to thy people; visit us with thy salvation, that we may see the good of thy chosen, that we may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, and that we may glory with thine inheritance. O Lord, we would rejoice and be glad in that triumph of our Saviour over death and the grave, which this morning brings so closely into our view. And we would pray that as he arose from the dead, we may be enabled to arise from a death of sin to a life of holiness. May that same divine and Almighty Spirit, that raised our Saviour from the dead, descend into our hearts, and animate us with the power of a divine life, and enable us to live to thy praise and glory. Hitherto, O Lord, we have sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly; like them, we have provoked thy displeasure, and grieved thy Holy Spirit by the most daring rebellion, and the basest ingratitude. We have been, like them, often insensible to the grandeur of thy power, and to all the attractive charms of thy mercy. O enter not, we pray thee, into judgment with us, for in thy sight no flesh living can be justified; cast us not away from thy presence. Remember thy covenant, and save us for thy name's sake. Cause the mighty power of thy grace to be known in our salvation. See, God, our shield, look upon us in the face of thine Anointed. Through the merits and intercession of our great High Priest, have mercy upon us; grant us mercy to pardon, and grace to help us in every time of need. Sanctify us by thy Spirit of truth. Rebuke us not in thy hot displeasure. When thou visitest us with affliction, be pleased to bless and sanctify it for good. May we not despise the chastening of the Lord, neither be weary of thy correction. Inspire us, O Lord, with gratitude for the mercies of the past night and this morning;

prepare us for the services of thy sanctuary; enable us to worship thee who art a Spirit, in spirit and in truth. Bless and strengthen thy servants in the ministry. Give them, this day, a word in season; enable them to preach thy word with fidelity and earnestness, for the glory of thy name, and the good of thy people. Enable thy people to hear the truth with faith and affection. Extend the knowledge of thy grace this day. May thy kingdom come. May the people praise thee, may all the people praise thee. Gather thy people from among the heathen, to give thanks unto thy holy name, and to triumph in thy praise. Send us, O Lord, an answer to our prayers, for the sake of thy well-beloved Son, in whose name we would say, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from everlasting to everlasting; and in whose words we would continue praying, Our Father who art in heaven, &c.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CVII. 1—20.

REMARKS.

This psalm is a continued call to the exercise of the same delightful duty of praise, so strongly recommended in the preceding psalms. No less than four times in the course of it, does the psalmist repeat the earnest desire of his soul that men would praise the Lord. The manner in which he puts the call is peculiarly emphatic and impressive; it speaks more forcibly than the strongest imperative injunction could have done, 'O that men would praise the Lord,' &c. ver. 8. The reasons, too, that he assigns, are the most urgent and pressing. A general review of the divine goodness is placed before us; God's mercies are mentioned in a great variety of ways; the general blessings of his providence, and the special riches of his grace are laid down, as so many irresistible motives to praise. In this view, the psalm opens with a general exhortation to all men to give thanks to the Lord for his goodness and mercy. All who are capable of reflection must feel their obligations to infinite goodness; wherever a divine being is acknowledged, there a tribute of praise and thanksgiving is considered due to him; such a principle appears to be a direct, simple, unsophisticated dictate of nature, and the light of revelation confirms this general sentiment, and expressly inculcates thanksgiving as a universal and indispensable duty. None, however, will be properly impressed with a sense of their obligations to this duty, who are not redeemed by the blood of Christ, and renewed by his Spirit of grace. Of all the graces that adorn the true people of God, that of gratitude is one of the most prominent. When once men have indeed tasted that the Lord is gracious, and have been made sensible of the riches of redeeming love, then they gratefully view the goodness of God in all his dispensations; and not only praise and glorify him themselves, but also call upon all to join in this delightful exercise. Hence it is, that the redeemed are especially called upon in this psalm, ver. 2. to praise and thank God. They alone can sufficiently appreciate the unsearchable riches of the grace of Christ; and they alone will rightly feel the obligations that lie upon them to praise and glorify his name. There are, next, allusions made to special instances of the goodness and mercy of the Lord. There seems, in ver. 3—7. to be some reference to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, their wanderings in the desert, and their settlement in Canaan; yet, these verses appear not to apply exactly or exclusively to these events. In ver. 10—16. we have a declaration of God's goodness to prisoners and captives. A description of the deplorable condition of such is given—their sins and rebellion are stated as the cause of it; and the Lord is represented as regarding, in mercy, their cry. No particular instances are referred to, but the deliverance of the Jews from their abject state of slavery in Egypt, and from their captivity at Babylon, must, with many more, occur to the mind of the reader as appropriate examples. In ver. 17—20. is instanced the mercy of God to those that are afflicted on account of their transgressions; when they cry unto the Lord in their distresses, he healeth and saveth them.

In these instances of the goodness of God in providence, the redeemed may behold striking representations of the riches of his grace in redemption. Are sinners of mankind 'like sheep gone astray?' 'The Lord hath laid on Christ the iniquities of us all.' Are 'they hungry and thirsty?' he has invited them to partake of the bread and water of life freely. Are they prisoners to his justice, captives to satan, and slaves to their own corruptions? he has exhorted them 'to turn to the strong hold,' for deliverance and safety. And are they afflicted and distressed? he has promised, when they cry to him, to lead them to that rock that is higher than they, for comfort and support. Let the redeemed then praise and thank the Lord, for the bounties of his providence, and the blessings of his grace; and let their hearts respond, 'O that men,' &c.

PRAYER.

Most gracious and blessed God, we would give thanks to thee this night, for thou art good, and most worthy to be loved; thy mercy endureth for ever. We would call upon our souls, and all that is within us, to praise and bless thy holy name, for all the blessings of another Christian sabbath; and for all the means of grace that we enjoy. But, O Lord, we are not sufficient of ourselves for this service. May thy Spirit assist our infirmities; and may our offerings of gratitude and praise be perfumed by the incense of a Saviour's merits, and be acceptable in thy sight. We would adore and praise thee as the God of providence, and the Father of mercies.

Thou art good to all, and thy tender mercies are over all thy works. In thee thy people find grace equal to their necessities, and sufficient for their wants. Thou hast delivered our souls from death, our eyes from tears, and our feet from falling. Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift. Blessed be he that came in the name of the Lord to save us. O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy. O Lord, may a sense of thy goodness, both in providence and grace, fill our hearts with love to thee, and lead us to devote ourselves to thy praise and glory. May the love of Christ constrain us, to live not unto ourselves, but unto him who died for us and rose again. May we feel that we are not our own, but that we are bought with a price the most precious; and are bound by every tie to glorify God in our bodies and spirits which are his. May the services of this day be blessed and made effectual for this purpose, for we have to lament that we have hitherto been ungrateful recipients of thy mercy, and unprofitable servants. We have been too insensible to thy loving-kindness towards us, and too unmindful of our obligations to thee. We have not loved, served, and glorified thee as we ought to have done. We have not devoted our time and our talents to thy glory, even on this thy holy day; we have been too much taken up about the things of time, to the neglect of God, and the things that belong to our peace. Pardon, O Lord, our unworthiness, and enable us, in time to come, to love thee more and serve thee better. May thy Spirit be poured out from on high upon us this night, as a family, and as individuals. May he seal upon our hearts the instructions we have this day received from thy word, that our faith may be strengthened, our hopes confirmed, and our love enlivened; and that thy name may be glorified. Bless all with whom we have this day joined in thy services. Bless the word preached throughout the world. May the Lord God make known to all men his salvation. Be the God of our friends, make them objects of thy love and mercy, remember them with that favour which thou bearest to thy people. O thou who art the keeper of Israel, watch over us, and let no evil befall us during the hours of rest. Hear us, O Lord, and accept of us, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXX. 14.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH V. VI.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

CHAP. V. Ver. 1—7. In the form of a sacred song, inscribed to the honour of his well-beloved Son, God, by the mouth of his prophet, here describes by parable, his peculiar care of his ancient people, and his loving-kindness towards them; and declares his righteous judgments against their ungrateful and unfruitful conduct.

A catalogue of their prevailing sins is then given, and a correspondent woe is denounced against each respectively. Ver. 8—10. Avarice and covetousness, 'joining house to house, and laying field to field,' were to be visited with desolation and barrenness. Ver. 11—30. Dissipation, intemperance, the love and indulgence of sin; disregard of the providence, contempt of the justice, and despite of the law of God; self-conceit, confounding of the principles of right and wrong, and the perversion of justice, were all to be visited for the vindication of the honour of the Lord, with the righteous judgments of captivity, famine, and all their attendant evils. No particular instruments for the accomplishment of these judgments are mentioned, but we learn how truly they have been inflicted by the invasion of Sennacherib, and by the destruction of Jerusalem, first by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans.

CHAP. VI. The prophet here receives a more direct and explicit commission to the prophetic office. Ver. 1—4. In the temple, by symbolical vision, he beholds the Lord, (doubtless Christ himself, see John xii. 41.), on his throne of grace and glory; above it, as his bright attendants, stand the seraphim—angels of light and love; their position such as bespoke their reverence, humility, and devotedness to the divine will; their anthem in praise of the holiness and glory of the Lord of hosts, was such as moved the posts of the temple. Ver. 5. At such a vision the prophet was at first dismayed, the glory of it, and the holiness displayed in it, overwhelmed him with a sense of his own sinfulness, and that of his countrymen. He is, however, encouraged by another symbolical action of a seraph, 'who flew,' &c. Ver. 6. The live coal taken from the altar, its being laid upon the prophet's mouth, and the consequent remission of sin, represent the sacrifice of Christ, the application of his atoning blood, and the consequent assurance of pardon and acceptance. Ver. 8. The prophet, formerly undone by the vision of the holiness, is now warmed into zeal and love by this token of the grace and mercy of the Lord; 'he is made willing,' 'here am I, send me.' Ver. 9, 10. His commission is of the most awful nature; it is, however, rather descriptive of the effect that the prophet's teaching would have through their blindness and hardness of heart, than of its natural tendency. Those that remain wilfully blind, will finally become judicially blinded. God, sometimes in a way of righteous judgment, gives up men to blindness of mind and strong delusions, because they will not receive the truth in the love of it. Ver. 11, 12. The prophet's solicitude was naturally awakened about the continuance of the spiritual judgments; 'how long?' until they be succeeded by the temporal judgments of captivity and desolation; yet, a remnant as monuments of mercy shall be reserved, like the tenth or tithe, holy to the Lord, ver. 13.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

How various are the methods which God employs to bring men to repentance. He celebrates in song, and represents by parable, the love of Christ to them; then contrasting it with their own ingratitude, leaves them to pass judgment on themselves; and if our hearts condemn us, God is greater than our hearts, and knoweth all things. He will not continue privileges with these nations, churches, families, or individuals who misimprove or abuse them. The world and the flesh are the most destructive enemies to the souls of men, the chief hindrances to fruitfulness in the Lord's service, and the great causes of drawing down on men his righteous judgments. There is nothing so calculated to convince us of sin and uncleanness, as a view of the glory and holiness of the Lord, as revealed in the face of Jesus Christ. The effectual application of the blood of Christ by the Holy Spirit, is the only balm to the guilty and troubled soul.

PRAYER.

Holy, holy, holy art thou, O Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of thy glory. Thou art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, thou chargest even thine angels with folly. They worship thee with their faces veiled, and the heavens are not clean in thy sight; we, then, the sinful beings of the dust, can approach thy thrice holy presence, only in the name, and trusting to the merits, of him whom thou hearest always, and in whom thou art always well-pleased. For his sake, be pleased, we beseech thee, to receive us graciously, and love us freely. We praise thee for the gospel privileges we so richly enjoy, for the ministration of word and ordinances, for the means of grace, and the hopes of glory; and we pray that thy Spirit may lead us to a right and becoming improvement of them. Enable us to remember, that to whomsoever much is given, of them will much be required. O Lord, we have to confess that we have indeed been unprofitable servants, barren and unfruitful in thy service; other lords have had dominion over us; we have been serving the world and the flesh more than the living God. We are indeed undone, a people of unclean lips, and we dwell among a people of unclean lips. If thou wert to enter into judgment with us, we could not answer thee for one of a thousand of our sins and provocations. But we rejoice, that with thee there is mercy and forgiveness. To whom can we go but unto thee, thou alone hast the words of eternal life. Have mercy upon us, O Lord, according to thy loving-kindness. In the midst of thy threatened judgments against sin, remember mercy for the sake of Christ. Cleanse us from our sins in the fountain of his blood, purge our consciences from dead works to serve the living God. Put thy Spirit within us; may he take of the things of Christ and show them to us. May we, by the eye of faith, behold thy glory as revealed in the face of Jesus Christ; and may we be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord. Deliver us, O Lord, from being carnally minded, which is death. Give us to be spiritually minded, which is life and peace. For this purpose, may thy blessing rest upon the services of the past sabbath. May the influence of them remain on our hearts during this day and during the week. May the word of God then read and preached, prove to us the savour of life unto life. May thy grace now prepare each one of us for all thy will respecting us this day. Accept, O Lord, of our united thanksgivings for the repose and peace of the past night, and for the blessings of this morning; be with us during the day, strengthening us for every duty, aiding us in every trial, defending us from every danger, delivering us from all temptation, and enabling us to glorify thee in all that we do; and all that we ask is in the name of the Lord Jesus, our advocate. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—GALATIANS I.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Galatia was a district or province of Asia Minor. Its inhabitants were most probably first converted to the Christian faith by the ministry of St Paul. He wrote this epistle to them in order to correct some most destructive errors in doctrine, that certain judaizing teachers had, after his departure, disseminated among them. Ver. 1. He opens it by an assertion of his divine appointment to the apostolical office; his authority as an apostle, had likely been denied by the false teachers; he, therefore, asserts it in the strongest terms, and rests it on the surest grounds; then, ver. 3—5. follow the apostolical benediction, and an ascription of praise and glory to Jesus Christ. Ver. 6—9. Here the apostle at once enters upon the subject of the epistle, expressing his astonishment that the Galatians had allowed their confidence in him as their teacher, and their belief in the fundamental doctrines of the gospel which he had taught them, to be soon subverted, and assuring them, at the same time, that there could be no other gospel than that which he had preached to them; that there could be no way of justification and salvation but by faith in the merits and righteousness of Christ alone; and that those teachers, who taught that the observance of the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic law was necessary to salvation, perverted the gospel, and rendered themselves obnoxious to the divine displeasure. Ver. 11, 12. The apostle spoke on this fundamental subject with such confidence, from the assurance that he had received his commission to preach the gospel as he had done, not 'from man, but from the revelation of Jesus Christ.' Ver. 13—24. And in order to convince those to whom he wrote of the truth of this his divine commission, he gives them an account of his conversation previous to conversion—acquaints them how he was converted and called to the apostleship, and details the different steps of his subsequent conduct.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

All power and sufficiency to minister in things sacred, must come from the Lord Jesus Christ, the divine Head of the church, and from God the Father. All who have tasted of the grace of Christ, will esteem it both their duty and delight to pray that grace and peace may be multiplied to all men. It is the will of God, it is the design of Christ, in giving himself for sin, that believers should be delivered, not only from the wrath to come, but also from the power, love, and service of this present evil world. So great and blessed a purpose calls for our praise and gratitude. Let us 'hold fast the form of sound words, which we have heard, in faith and love which is in Jesus Christ;' 'and be not tossed about by every wind of doctrine.' Let us beware of those 'who pervert the gospel,' lest the judgments of God come on them and us; and let us pray for the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Jesus Christ. In all things let us strive to approve ourselves to God who judgeth us, not as 'men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart fearing God.' Let us mark, with gratitude, the assurance given us that the doctrines taught by St Paul were the immediate revelations of the Lord Jesus Christ. In the conversion of St Paul, we behold a proof of the power of divine grace, and a testimony to the truth of that religion he so faithfully preached. Let us give glory to God for such a manifestation of the power and riches of his grace.

PRAYER.

Almighty and everlasting God, we would adore and praise thee this night, as the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and we would draw near to thee by faith, and our spirits would hold communion with thee, as our reconciled Father in him. We have, indeed, offended thee times and ways without number, we are by nature children of wrath, enemies to God in our minds by wicked works; but behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God. We give thee, O God, all praise and glory for this assurance of thy love; we bless thee that when we were without hope, and without help, thine own eternal and well-beloved Son gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God our Father; and we rejoice to think that thou hast raised him from the dead, appointed him head over all things to his church, and exalted him a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance and forgiveness of sins to Israel. May we, indeed, be children of God by faith in Jesus Christ; may we be called by his grace, and separated from a world lying in wickedness by his Spirit for his service. May we be justified freely by his grace, and have peace with God. May we know the truth as it is in Jesus, and may the truth make us free. May we enjoy the glorious liberty of the children of God. May we hold fast the form of sound words which we have heard in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. Be pleased, O God, to reveal thy Son in us, and give us the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Jesus Christ; forbid that any of us should come short by unbelief. Lord, help our unbelief; increase our faith, make it a vital, active, and constraining principle of holiness in our hearts; bring us more under the influence of faith, that our lives may be spent more to thy glory—more to the honour of our Christian profession, and thus more to our own peace and comfort. Forbid, O Lord, that any of us should deceive ourselves, by a form of godliness, without the power of it; forbid that any of us should rest satisfied with knowing the first elements of religion; but may we all, assisted by thy grace, press forward to the blessed experience and full enjoyment of thy service. Be pleased, O God, to hear our prayers in behalf of the sick, the afflicted, and the dying; be a present help in every time of need. For our friends and brethren, we would also put up our supplications before thee, O Father of mercies. May grace and peace, from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, be to all men. May all people be blessed in Jesus, and may all call him blessed. With grateful hearts for all thy goodness to us individually, and as a family, we would this evening commend ourselves to the protection of him who neither slumbers nor sleeps. May we be raised up in the morning, in health, and in soundness of mind, ready and willing to devote our preserved lives and refreshed powers to the service and glory of our God. May our services at this time be acceptable in thy sight, O our God, through Jesus Christ our Redeemer—to whom, with thee, O Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all glory for ever and ever. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII. 15—19.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH XI. XII.

REMARKS.

The prophet having comforted the people of God with the promise of distinguished temporal mercies, gives them, in the chapters before us, the promise of yet more distinguished, because spiritual, mercies. He speaks to them of the establishment of a peaceful kingdom; and first he describes (ver. 1, 2.) the founder of this kingdom. According to the flesh he is descended from the royal house of Israel, not, however, when in its greatness and glory, but when sunk into indigence and obscurity. As a slender twig shooting out of the trunk of an aged tree, he is represented, ver. 1. Yet this tender branch, which is so weak in outward appearance, grows and becomes fruitful. He whom it represents is possessed of true greatness, and endowed with all those qualifications which peculiarly fit him for erecting a spiritual kingdom in the earth, for being the Ruler and Teacher of his people, and for subjecting all minds to his sway, ver. 2, 3. Hence the manner of his government is such as is suited to such eminent endowments, ver. 3—5. This is indeed the promised Messiah.

But the kingdom of Messiah is a peaceful kingdom. It is founded in righteousness, it is administered with equity, it is grafted upon the affections of its subjects. The language which the prophet employs (ver. 6—9.) to describe its character, is indeed figurative, but well adapted to the purpose which he has in view. Creatures which are naturally the fiercest and most ravenous, are subdued and made to feed peaceably among the most gentle and timid. Nothing hurts or destroys in Messiah's kingdom. How descriptive is all this of the transforming power of the gospel! How cheering the prospects which it affords us in reference to the future! The change which the introduction of this gospel has produced upon the whole aspects of society, in the regions where it is known in any measure of purity, is of the most beneficial character; and its effects upon the sentiments and conduct of those by whom it has been received in the power thereof, have been uniformly of such a nature as irresistibly lead us to conclude that its universal reception would indeed prove the harbinger of universal peaceableness among men.

And let no one fear lest any of these things should fail of accomplishment, for the prophet (ver. 10—16.) points anew to Messiah's days, and shows us what shall assuredly happen in the last time. He says that 'there shall be a root of Jesse which shall stand for an ensign' both to Jews and Gentiles; and that 'his rest'—the place of his presence—his church, shall be 'glorious,' both in its extent and for the blessings which it shall dispense. The 'second time' the 'Lord shall set his hand to recover the remnant of his people,' removing every impediment that stands in the way of their subjection to Messiah's sway; assembling 'the outcasts of Israel,' and gathering together 'the dispersed of Judah;' destroying national jealousies and antipathies, and making the most ample provision for the entire fulfilment of every prediction regarding the peaceful character and the universal extent of Messiah's kingdom. But this prophecy has been already in part fulfilled. It was fulfilled after the death and resurrection of Christ, when, through the divine blessing upon the labours of the apostles and first preachers of the gospel, multitudes both of Jews and of Gentiles, in all regions, embraced the doctrine of Christ. And it will be yet more signally fulfilled when the 'fullness of the Gentiles' shall be 'come in;' for then 'all Israel shall be saved. As it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.'

Let not then the people of God despond. He is faithful who has promised. And as they have personal experience of the blessings of that redemption, for which the prophet (chap. xii.) teaches the faithful to give utterance to a song of thanksgiving, let them learn to sing this song with joyful hearts; and let them exult in the prospect of that day, when, throughout all the regions of this earth, the people shall say, 'Sing unto the Lord, for he hath done excellent things: this is known in all the earth. Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion, for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee.'

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, we desire, on this morning of a new day, to present ourselves before thee, and to bless thee for thy continued goodness. We laid ourselves down and slept; we have awaked, for the Lord sustained us. And we are this morning reminded of our manifold obligations unto thee, and of the strong claims which thou hast upon our gratitude, our love, and our obedience. We adore thee as the Maker of all things, as the righteous Governor of the universe, as the God of grace and of salvation. Thou madest man upright, and adornedst him with thine own image, and gavest him dominion over thy creatures. But, alas! man being in innocence, abode not therein. The crown fell from his head; the gold became dim, and the most fine gold was changed. We mourn over this fall, by which we have been despoiled of the divine image, and have become guilty and miserable creatures. And we mourn over it because, in consequence thereof, we are become depraved, and are alienated in heart and mind from God, and are ever prone to sin. But we bless thy name, that though thou wast angry with us, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst us. We rejoice in that we are privileged to say, Behold, God is my salvation; I will trust and not be afraid, for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation. And we pray that we may each of us have a personal interest in the blessings of this salvation, and that, having received the doctrine of Christ, and found it to be light and life to our souls, we may each of us be enabled this day, and through the whole of our life, to live as it becomes those whom God hath delivered from the power of darkness, and hath translated into the kingdom of his dear Son. O Lord, let thy kingdom come, and let thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Hasten the glory of the latter day, even the day when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. And as the promise has been given that Christ shall have the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession, O let this promise be speedily accomplished, and let Christ be acknowledged in all lands, and let his doctrine be received by all people. Let the time come when the outcasts of Israel shall be assembled, and the dispersed of Judah shall be gathered together from the four corners of the earth; when Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim; when the fullness of the Gentiles shall be come in, and all Israel shall be saved; and when all nations, drawing water with joy out of the wells of salvation, shall say, Praise the Lord, call upon his name, declare his doings among the people, make mention that his name is exalted. Our prayers, O God, are before thee. We ask all in the name and for the sake of Christ. And unto the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, one God, we ascribe all praise and glory. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PARAPHRASE XLVI.

SCRIPTURE—GALATIANS II.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In this chapter the apostle prosecutes the same design as he had in view in the preceding, namely, to prove that his apostleship and his doctrine are divine, received not from man, but immediately from Jesus Christ. He adverts (ver. 1, 2.) to the time of his going up to Jerusalem, and affirms that he 'went up by revelation,' and in order, among other reasons, to satisfy the 'brethren' there that the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles was indeed the truth as it is in Christ. And then, for the purpose of demonstrating that circumcision, and the ceremonial rites of the Jewish economy, were certainly abolished by the death of Christ, the apostle shows the Galatians (ver. 3—10.), that, on the occasion referred to, neither was Titus, who was a Greek, 'compelled to be circumcised,' nor was any 'place by subjection' given to the judaizing teachers who sought to bring them into bondage unto the Jewish ritual; and that when the apostles James, Cephas, and John, perceived how signally God had owned the ministry of Paul among the Gentiles, they gave to him and Barnabas 'the right hands of fellowship,' and thus cordially approved of their mission to the Gentiles, and recognized it as divine. But Paul, in further vindication of himself, states (ver. 11—13.), that he had afterwards resisted Peter at Antioch, judging him blameable, because, through fear of the Jews, he had dissembled in the matter of ceremonial obligation, and proved a cause of stumbling unto others. And in his address to Peter (ver. 14—17.), Paul triumphantly vindicates his doctrine from the charge both of judaism and of ungodliness; and exposing the inconsistency of Peter's conduct on the occasion, shows that, as man is justified only 'by the faith of Jesus Christ,' and as 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified,' so they that are thus justified will be careful to live holly. Having renounced all expectations from the law, and placed their entire dependence upon Christ alone for righteousness and life, justified persons, as the apostle shows by a reference to his own case (ver. 18—21.), not only do not, but cannot live in sin. And as Christ himself is the principle of their spiritual life, and the fountain of their strength, so they, living by the faith of the Son of God, who loved them and gave himself for them, 'do not frustrate the grace of God,' but show that this grace is according to godliness.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Though we are not now favoured with special revelations from heaven, yet we have reason to bless God that we have the book of his revealed will, in which we are taught, both by precept and by example, what manner of persons we ought to be, and that we have the promise of the Spirit to guide us into the knowledge of all the truth. May this Spirit enable us to understand what has been written for our learning; and may he lead us, like the great apostle of the Gentiles, to oppose whatever is erroneous and sinful, to contend earnestly for the truth, and to withstand all attempts to rob us of our Christian liberty. And as the apostles at Jerusalem, on perceiving that the ministry of Paul was owned of God, cordially gave him the right hand of fellowship, let it be our desire and endeavour that charity may obtain among all the followers of Christ, and that we may 'keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.'

But do we find that even an apostle allowed himself to dissemble? The circumstance should lead us to guard against that fear of man which bringeth a snare. And while we are warned, by the example of Peter, of the danger of yielding to temptation, and are thus excited to watchfulness, let us imitate him in the meekness with which he seems to have received the admonition of Paul, and account it our honour and wisdom patiently to receive a just rebuke. And as by the works of the law we cannot hope to be justified in the sight of God, let us look to Christ, through whose righteousness alone we are justified. And rejoicing in the knowledge that, by the faith of Christ, we have a righteousness that is all-meritorious to our justification, and that Christ is not, and cannot be, the minister of sin, let us seek that this faith may engage us closely and continually 'to live unto God,' and thus enable us to manifest that we have not received the grace of God in vain, and that the doctrine of the cross is indeed a doctrine according to godliness, not only bringing peace to the conscience, but securing holiness in the life.

PRAYER.

Almighty and most merciful God, we desire to lift up our souls unto thee, and to beseech of thee to pour out upon us the Spirit of grace and of supplications. Unto thee, O God, we desire to give thanks, for thou hast created us, and hast brought us up hitherto. We are the work of thy hand, the sheep of thy pasture, the objects of thy favour. We will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever, and make known thy faithfulness to all generations, for thou alone art merciful and gracious, thy mercy shall be built up for ever, and thy faithfulness shall be established in the heavens. We, O Lord, are in ourselves destitute and helpless. All our righteousness is as filthy rags in thy sight, and all our strength, weakness and vanity. And there is no man that can give a ransom for his soul, or that can obtain acceptance with God by any righteousness of his own. But we rejoice to know, that as by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified in the sight of God, the righteousness of Christ is all-meritorious to the sinner's justification. And we pray that, through the teaching of the Holy Spirit, we may attain to right views of the way of acceptance and of peace with God; and that, from a deep sense of our guilt and misery, we may be enabled to flee by faith to Christ, and thus be justified through him. And being justified by the faith of Christ, may we beware lest we walk in unrighteousness, and lest we live as those who frustrate thy grace, or as those who go about to establish a righteousness of their own. Save us, O God, from that fear of man which bringeth a snare. Let us never be tempted to dissemble; but may we be enabled to walk uprightly, and to be vigilant and humble, as knowing that we are compassed with infirmity, and exposed to manifold temptations. And may we be zealous for thy truth, seeking to evidence its excellence and power by that charity which is the bond of perfectness, and by a life of holy devotedness to God. May we, through the law, be dead to the law, that we may live to thee. And may each one of us, knowing his calling of God, and exercising an implicit reliance upon Christ, be able to say, I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me. We thank thee, O God, for the mercies of the past day; and we pray that for Christ's sake thou wouldst freely pardon the sins of which we have been guilty in the course of it, and give us grace to live more holily for the time to come. We desire to commit ourselves to thy care during this night. We pray that our sleep may be quiet and refreshing. And if thou art pleased to bring us to the light of a new day, may we find increased delight in thy service, and a growing desire after entire conformity to thy image. Hear us, O Lord, and do for us above all that we can ask or think, for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XX.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH XXV. XXVI.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The sacred writer here breaks off, for a little, from his prophetic narrative, and gives utterance (chap. xxv. 1—5.) to a song of praise, in which he celebrates the divine glory as manifested both in punishing the wicked and in protecting the righteous. The works of the Lord are represented as being wonderful, and as being done according to the eternal counsels of faithfulness and truth. Divine power is shown to be irresistible; and as the Almighty is strong both to destroy and to defend, so he can as easily quell the rage of the fiercest enemies of his people, and turn aside the effects of their wrath, and thus prove the refuge of his chosen, as in the ordinary course of his providence he allays the parching heat by the shadow of his clouds, and refreshes the 'dry place' by the gentle showers.

The remainder of the chapter is evidently prophetic, and the salvation which God provides for his people is the subject of which it treats. Reference is plainly made to gospel times. The 'mountain' spoken of (ver. 6, 7.) is Sion, the church. And under the emblem of a rich banquet (ver. 6.) are shadowed forth gospel blessings. The Lord Christ is represented (ver. 7, 8.) as a light dispelling the darkness that covers the people, and destroying the ignorance which as a 'vail is spread over all nations,' and as the divine source of that life and of those consolations which no earthly vicissitude can impair, and which death itself cannot destroy. Well, therefore, may the church be glad and rejoice in the Lord (ver. 9.), for upon her shall his 'hand rest,' his powerful and gracious presence shall abide with her continually. Her enemies 'shall be trodden down under him,' ver. 10; and stretching forth his hand against them, he shall, as the prophet predicts (ver. 11, 12.), wholly subdue and destroy them.

The prophet next indites a spiritual song for the use of the church, chap. xxvi. It is a continued ascription of praise to God. The blessings of salvation, the judgments of God upon his enemies, the displays of the Lord's faithfulness in the chastisements of his people, the misery from which God redeems his chosen, are the topics which the prophet insists upon, and by which he seeks to quicken the church's love and gratitude, and to lead her to place unfeigned trust and confidence in God. And then (ver. 19.) assuring the church that the 'dew' of God's favour would rest upon her, and that 'the earth shall cast out the dead,' or, as the words may be better rendered, 'thou shalt cast the violent ones down to the ground.' He concludes (ver. 20, 21.) with an exhortation to her to wait patiently the Lord's time, sheltering herself under the divine protection 'until the indignation be overpast.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

The people of God assuredly may well say, 'The lines are fallen to us in pleasant places, yea, we have a goodly heritage;' 'We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks.' He who is wonderful in working, and whose 'counsels of old are faithfulness and truth,' is their refuge. He makes the most ample provision for their security and enjoyment. Nothing that is needful for their peace and prosperity is awanting. They have 'the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.' Rich and enduring are the blessings which they receive. All things are theirs; whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are theirs; and they are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

Let not the people of God, then, be greatly cast down or dismayed. On the contrary, let them encourage their hearts in God amidst even the most trying circumstances of their lot, and rest satisfied that he will bring them in safety out of the hands of their enemies; that he 'will wipe away their tears,' and 'will take away their rebuke from off all the earth.' And reflecting upon the divine goodness, and the divine faithfulness, as manifested towards them both in providence and in grace, let them be taught to place their confidence in God, to make joyful mention of his loving-kindness, and to praise him for his great salvation.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, thou art great, and greatly to be feared and to be revered. Thou art righteous in all thy ways, and holy in all thy works. Thou art good also, and greatly to be loved; thy tender mercies are over all thy works. We desire to come unto thee this morning under a deep impression of our unworthiness, and our insufficiency, and our guilt. And in waiting upon thee we would take encouragement from knowing that thou regardest the prayer of the destitute, and that thou art ready to succour all that call upon thy name. Let the desire of our souls be towards thee, O God, and to the remembrance of thee, for thou art the centre of all perfection, and the source of all blessedness, and the giver of every good and every perfect gift. May we stand in awe of thy judgments. May we rely upon thy promises. May we hope in thy mercy. May we rejoice in thy salvation. Let the remembrance of thy goodness towards us in providence, and especially in grace, quicken our gratitude and love to thee, lead us to confide in thee continually, and make us willing to go forward in the path of commanded duty, whether that lead to doing or to suffering. May the time past of our life suffice to have wrought the will of the flesh, and to have walked after the course of this world. And though hitherto other lords besides thee have had dominion over us, and led us captive at their pleasure, we would now desire to say, By thee only will we make mention of thy name. By thy grace and strength alone we are delivered from the power of all our enemies. In thee alone we find a sure and unfailing refuge; therefore will we celebrate thy praise, and trust in thee for ever. O save us, we pray thee, from a spirit of rebelliousness against thy holy will, and make us humble, and contented, and patient. Deliver us from the evil that is in the world around us, and from the wickedness of our own hearts; and may thy Holy Spirit dwell within us, and be unto us a Spirit of adoption, and of sanctification, and of prayer, that thus we may know our calling of God, and may serve thee acceptably and joyfully all the days of our life. O Lord, let all the nations praise thee. Let all people enjoy the rich provision which thou hast made in the gospel of thy Son. Let the veil that is yet spread over the nations be withdrawn; and let him who is the light, and the life, and the consolation of all people, speedily appear to all the ends of the earth. Suit the supplies of thy grace to the varying circumstances of all whom we ought to bear upon our minds before thee. And may each of us be enabled to live this day and henceforth in thy fear and to thy glory. And all that we ask is in the name and through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXXII. 1—5.

SCRIPTURE—GALATIANS III.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

Justification, by faith in Christ, without the works of the law, either ceremonial or moral, is the great truth which the apostle asserts and proves in this chapter. First of all, however, he sharply reproves the Galatians, ver. 1—5. for having lost sight of what he had taught them on this subject by the gospel; appeals to their own experience, whether it was not by the gospel that they had received the Holy Spirit and his graces; and expostulates with them on the folly of turning from the gospel method of justification, to the carnal ordinances of the law. The apostle then shows, ver. 6—9. that Abraham's righteousness was by faith, and that, therefore, by faith alone we are the children of Abraham, and partakers of his blessing. Next it is demonstrated, ver. 10—14. that as the law requireth perfect obedience, all are naturally under its curse, and no one can be justified thereby; and that as Christ has been made a curse for us, all that believe on him are delivered from the curse of the law. But the promise made to Abraham was confirmed in Christ, Abraham's 'seed,' ver. 15—18. and, therefore, could not be disannulled by the law, which was given long after the promise. The law, however, is of important use, inasmuch as it shows the necessity, ver. 19—24. of a better righteousness than man's own, and as it serves as a schoolmaster to bring us for justification to Christ, by whom the law was fulfilled. Therefore, all that believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, ver. 25—29. being 'the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus,' are 'one in Christ,' are 'Abraham's seed,' and are 'heirs' of the blessing with him, not by the law, but 'according to the promise.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

It is the sight of Christ crucified which both brings peace to the conscience, and constrains to holiness in the heart and the life. Let the eye of our faith then be steadfastly fixed upon him, and as all that believe on him are the children of faithful Abraham, and are blessed with him, let them be engaged by the view of the cross of Christ to receive the truth concerning him, and to beware of looking elsewhere for happiness. Woful had been our condition if justification had not been by faith. For by reason of sin, we are under the curse of the law, and utterly unable to yield that perfect obedience which the law requires. What reason, then, have we to bless God for Christ, who 'hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us;' and how earnestly should we seek to be justified by the faith of him, and to receive the blessing of Abraham, and the promise of the Spirit through faith, that being enlightened and quickened, we may live as those in whom true faith abides.

Precious are the privileges which all that believe enjoy through Christ. Rich and enduring is the inheritance of which they are the heirs. Let no man, therefore, seek to be justified by the works of the law; but let the law, which is holy, and just, and good, prove a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, and to shut us up unto the faith of him. And having been baptized into Christ and put on Christ, let us remember, continuedly, that we are thus obliged to be like unto him. And as Christ is the Head, so believers, though many, 'are one body in him, and every one members one of another.' Therefore ought believers, as the members of this one body, to be one in affection and in mind; and to be solicitous to manifest, by the growing holiness of their walk and conversation, the reality of their union with Christ, the excellence and the power of divine faith, and the blessedness of those hopes which they are privileged to cherish regarding the future and the glorious inheritance.

PRAYER.

O Lord, enable us this evening to come before thee, deeply impressed with a sense of thy majesty and glory, and give us grace that we may present unto thee a spiritual sacrifice acceptable unto God through Jesus Christ. We are indeed most unworthy to approach unto thee: for we are less than the least of all thy mercies, and are become estranged and defiled by sin. But we bless the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, in him, hath been pleased to draw nigh to us in mercy, and to make known to us the method of reconciliation and of peace. And we pray that we may be made sensible of the greatness of our privilege in having received the revelation of thy will, regarding the means of acceptance with thee, and of being made like unto thee. Give us, O God, a lively apprehension of our misery by nature as lying under the curse of a broken law, and of the impossibility of being justified in thy sight by our own righteousness, or by any works of the law. And seeing that thy law shows us to be transgressors, and to lie under a sentence of condemnation, may we be effectually moved by thy Spirit to make application unto Christ, that through faith in him we may be accepted as righteous, and may be delivered from condemnation. May we look to Jesus as having been evidently set forth crucified among us, and as having thus redeemed us from the curse of the law, and purchased for us the gift of eternal life. May his cross be that alone in which we glory; and may nothing be allowed to draw off our attention from it, or to prevail with us to hope for either peace or purity independently of it. Work in us, we pray thee, that faith which was accounted unto Abraham for righteousness, and which is the great means of attaining unto all other spiritual blessings, that thus we may be the children of Abraham, and may be blessed with him. And having been baptized into Christ, may we study to put on Christ, and to resemble him wholly in his disposition and character, and thus to evidence that we are indeed the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, and heirs according to the promise, and growing in meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light. We thank thee, O God, for all thy goodness to us during the past day, and ever since we came into the world. Be with us, we earnestly beseech thee, through this night. Let thine everlasting arms be around us; and let thy good Spirit uphold and protect us. May the close of every day remind us that we are advancing to the close of life, and that the night cometh in which no man can work. And may this recollection move us to quicken our diligence in all the work of holy living, and constrain us to live under the power of the world to come. Be thou the God of our friends and relatives wherever they are, and under whatever circumstances they may be placed. Sanctify to them all thy dealings with them; and give them all an interest in Christ, and prepare them for the enjoyment of thyself in heaven. Compassionate, we beseech thee, the sorrowful, the afflicted, and the dying; and suit the supplies of thy grace to their varying need. Prepare us all for every thing thou hast prepared for us, and receive us at last into thy glory. And all that we ask is for the sake of Christ, to whom, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, be glory for ever. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 15.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH XXXII.

REMARKS.

The reformation of the church and re-establishment of the Jewish polity, under the religious and vigorous administration of Hezekiah, may have been primarily shadowed forth in this prophecy which is generally supposed to have been uttered towards the conclusion of the reign of Ahaz; but it is evident that a greater than Hezekiah, and a more enduring and illustrious administration than his, are here. These glorious things are spoken of the church of the living God—things which many kings and righteous men desired to see but did not see them, and to hear but did not hear them. But we have seen them. A sight of them, in part, has been vouchsafed unto us; and they shall be fully manifested unto the generations which are to come.

The Lord Jesus Christ after having purchased the church with his own blood, sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high. His throne is for ever and ever; his dominion is a universal dominion; and a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of his kingdom. The church of God, therefore, has nothing to fear. If faithful to her Head, no weapon formed against her can prosper. Long and assiduous, indeed, has been, and may yet be, the conflict on this earth between good and evil; and under the varied, subtle, and untiring opposition of the rulers of the darkness of this world the cause of godliness may seem at times to be almost hopeless, yet, still the Christian ought to remember that his Saviour 'reigneth in righteousness,' and that, consequently, the time must come when Christianity shall pervade the whole human family, when the princes of this world will with submission to Christ's acknowledged authority, rule in justice and in judgment, and when their subjects shall be peaceful and prosperous, because the faith of the gospel, with its hopes and holiness, shall universally prevail.

The present, however, is a season of trial and discipline to the faith and patience of Christians. Every possible form of evil is, apparently, to be permitted to try God's people, in order, perhaps, that sin's exceeding sinfulness may be disclosed, and the manifold resources of God's wisdom, and excellencies of the Spirit's grace, called forth and manifested before the universe. But the believer has not been left comfortless. There is One, a man, his elder brother, bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, who knows the force of all trials; for unto the very uttermost has he had experience of them all, unto whom the Christian can apply for encouragement and assistance in every time of need. When satan assails him with temptation to seduce, or with persecution to drive him from his steadfastness, he will stand his ground in the conviction of his Saviour's presence, and gather indomitable courage from the gracious assurance, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.' The various influences of the Spirit of Jesus, adapted to the believer's varying circumstances, will revive his heart and restore his soul, as streams of water do the thirsty ground. And when wearied and fainting under the trials and vexations of his pilgrimage through the waste and howling wilderness of this world, he will seek, and always find, rest and recruited vigour, under the shelter of the rock of ages, whence all the streams of spiritual influences well forth, and within whose mighty shadow the refreshing verdure of heavenly graces spreads around, and gladsome melody may be heard from sinners sanctified and saved, rejoicing in the God of their salvation.

'Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord,' shall all these things be brought to pass. But God, nevertheless, honours men by calling upon them to be workers together with himself. Let us be up then and doing. Let us speak for Christ, and act for Christ, whenever we have an opportunity. The greatest rewards are promised to such conduct, and the greatest good will accrue from it. 'He that converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins.' Blessed is he who soweth beside all waters, and who sends forth the patient and laborious tiller of the ground. 'They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.'

PRAYER.

We worship, O God, and adore thee who art the high and lofty One, whose name is Holy. Cherubim and seraphim are thy servants. Thy throne is exalted above all height, and thy name above all blessing and praise. All fullness is thine. Grant unto us this morning, we most humbly beseech thee, the Spirit of grace and supplication, that through Jesus Christ we may come with acceptance into thy presence, and offer up the desires of our heart for things agreeable unto thy holy will. We rejoice that thou hast raised up our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ from the dead, and hast given him to be head over all things unto the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who filleth all in all. The hearts of all men are in thy hand, and as the rivers of water thou canst turn them which way soever thou wilt; render the princes and the rulers of this world submissive unto the Prince of the kings of the earth, that justice may roll down like waters, and judgment like a mighty stream. Bless with all temporal and eternal blessings the sovereign of our native land. Establish the throne in righteousness, and surround it with wise and Christian advisers. Be gracious to the nation. Look down from heaven, O God, behold and visit with loving-kindness thy church which thou hast planted amongst us. In every season of rebuke, of doubt, and of perplexity, acknowledge, confirm, and direct thy people. Arm us, O Lord, with the whole armour of God, that we may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. Strengthen us with all might, by thy Spirit, in the inner man, so that if called upon, we may resist even unto blood, striving against sin. Enable us to walk by faith and not by sight, to look unto Jesus, and to have respect, not unto the light affliction which is but for a moment, but unto that which it worketh out for us, even the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. O that the wickedness of the wicked were brought to an end! Confound their devices, O God, and frustrate their purposes, but convert and save their souls. Pour out thy Holy Spirit upon us, O Lord. We bless thy name for what our ears have heard, and our eyes have seen, and our hearts have experienced, of this thy goodness. Revive thy work in the midst of the years. Revive it in the church and congregation to which we belong. Bless, O God, thy ministering servant, and give success to his labours amongst us. Let thy Spirit descend upon all flesh, till, before the light and life of the gospel, falsehood and all ungodliness shall for ever flee away, and faith and holiness, assurance and peace, universally prevail. We thank thee for having protected us during the night which is passed; be thou with us throughout this day. Deliver us from evil, from satan, and from sin. Give us bread to eat, and raiment to put on. Honour us by making us workers together with thee in the cause of truth and righteousness. Wash all our guiltiness away in the blood of Immanuel. And grant us an answer of peace unto these our humble supplications, for all that we ask is for the sake of Jesus Christ, who, together with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, one God, liveth and reigneth, for evermore. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXLV. 7.

SCRIPTURE—GALATIANS IV.

REMARKS.

This chapter, in which Paul continues his argument in support of the grand doctrine of justification by faith alone, is occupied chiefly with setting before the apostatizing Galatians the great practical truth, that reliance on legal observances for acceptance with God, is destructive of all freedom, enlargement and confidence of mind in his service. With this view he shows that the law, though of divine institution, kept, during the time it was binding, the church in a state of pupillage, like an heir in his minority; and by its ceremonies and restrictions, limiting its subjects on every side, was calculated to produce in their minds a spirit rather of bondage and servile fear than of filial confidence and love.

With the law he proceeds to contrast the gospel, and rapidly specifies several of its essential doctrines which bear upon the point in discussion. The mission by the Father, of his only-begotten Son, attests and measures his love to the world. The coming of the Son and his incarnation, evince both his love and his fellow-feeling for us. Our redemption from the law by his vicarious obedience and death, emancipates us alike from its justifying and condemning authority. His obtaining for us the adoption of sons, both delivers us from our natural state of alienation from his family, and admits us to the privileges of the children of God. All these privileges are involved in the sending by God of the Spirit of his Son into the hearts of his adopted children. The Holy Ghost enables him in whom he takes up his abode, to discern the love of God in Christ, removes away distrust, fear and mercenary motives from the heart, and implants in their stead, enlargement, confidence, and liberty, so that he can approach God not with the feelings of a bondsman, but with the sentiments and language of a child, crying Abba, Father, unto him.

Having thus contrasted the law with the gospel, Paul, after having reminded the Galatians of the ser-vitute which, in the days of their heathenism, they had yielded unto mere imaginary deities, asks, with a tone of affectionate reproach, wherefore, when they had by the kindness of God been delivered from the thralldom of idolatry, and had tasted of the liberty wherewith the gospel makes the believer free, they should desire to be brought again into bondage under the weak and beggarly elements of a worn out and abrogated dispensation. He candidly tells them that he stands in doubt of their spiritual state, and is afraid that he has bestowed labour upon them in vain.

After having urged them to depend, as he then did, for acceptance with God on Christ alone,—for he once in his unconverted state had depended, as they then did, on legal righteousness, and having affectionately expostulated with them for abandoning him in whom they once placed unbounded confidence, for false teachers whose zeal for their interests was affected, for the purpose of withdrawing them from the faith of Jesus Christ,—the zealous apostle concludes this part of his argument with allegorising what the law says respecting the two sons of Abraham, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a free-woman, and thereby shows that even the law itself teaches the discerning reader that it ministers rather unto bondage than unto confidence of spirit. Hagar, the bondwoman, whose son was according to the flesh, represented the law, which ‘gendereth to bondage,’ and all that depend, as the temporal Jerusalem then did and still does, upon legal righteousness or works of law, for acceptance with God. But Sarah, the freewoman, whose son was the child of promise, shadowed out the heavenly Jerusalem reared upon the promises and grace of God in Jesus Christ our Lord. All who believe as did Abraham, are, according to the scriptures, children of the promise; the heavenly Jerusalem is, therefore, the mother of us all. And as the son of the bondwoman persecuted the child of promise, so one’s own righteousness is irreconcilably opposed to reliance upon Christ. But as the son of the bondwoman was disinherited and cast out, so shall all those ultimately be who trust unto their own righteousness, while the children of promise shall remain in their Father’s house, and enjoy the possession of that inheritance which is ‘incorruptible, undefiled, and which fadeth not away.’

PRAYER.

O God, who art the hearer and answerer of prayer, unto thee should all flesh come. Grant us boldness, we humbly beseech thee, to enter by the blood of Jesus into the holiest, by the new and living way which thou hast consecrated for us through the rent veil of the Redeemer’s flesh. Deliver us, we pray thee, from all carnality, pride, and self-sufficiency. Set before us the length, and breadth, the height, and depth, and spirituality of thy law. Teach us that no righteousness but that which is perfect, can meet with acceptance before thee. Unite us, therefore, unto Christ, that we may be found in him, not having our own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, even the righteousness which is of God by faith. Remove away from us all servile fear and all mercenariness of soul, and enable us to serve thee not in the oldness of the letter, but in the newness of the Spirit. Shed in our hearts the love of thee by the Holy Ghost, and convince us that, in Christ Jesus, thou art a God of pardons, merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and of great kindness. Enable us to look with a living faith unto him who died for our sins and rose again for our justification. Teach us that our completeness is in Christ, that he fulfilled the whole law for them that believe, and suffered the punishment due to their sins; and that therefore there is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. Adopt us, O God, into thy family. Be thou unto us a father, and may we be children unto thee. Give us the hearts and feelings of children. Send forth the Spirit of thy Son into our hearts whereby we shall cry Abba, Father, unto thee. O that he would make intercession for us according to thy holy will. May he strengthen, establish, and confirm our hearts with grace, in the faith and obedience of the truth. Open the scriptures unto us, O Lord, that we may understand thy law. Give us spiritual discernment in all things. Shine in upon our minds, O God, with the light of thy countenance, reconciled in Jesus Christ, that satan may never succeed in leading us astray from the faith, and hopes, and holiness of the gospel. And now, most gracious God and Father, we beseech and implore thee to forgive the sins of which we have this day been guilty. Blot them out, O Lord, and cast them behind thy back into the depths of the seas of the blood of Immanuel, that they never more may be remembered against us. Let whatever work thy Holy Spirit may have wrought upon our hearts this day be carried on to completion. We bless thee for all the goodness which thou hast made to pass before us, and we desire to lie down in quietness and to close our eyes in sleep with our hearts in a state of peaceful reconciliation to thy holy will, through Jesus Christ, our all-prevailing intercessor. And now to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, be glory, and honour, and power, everlasting. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXVI. 5.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH XL.

REMARKS.

In the conclusion of the preceding chapter, we have a prediction of the Babylonish captivity, uttered in rebuke to Hezekiah king of Judah, for his having vain-gloriously displayed all his treasures before certain ambassadors, whom the king of Babylon had sent to congratulate him on his restoration to health after a dangerous illness; and to inquire respecting the wonder which had occurred in the heavens in connection with his miraculous recovery. The Jewish monarch was deeply humbled for his sin, and God, who waits to be gracious, immediately commissioned Isaiah to foretell unto Jerusalem her deliverance, not from the Babylonian captivity merely, but ultimately from a bondage of which the Babylonish, Egyptian, and every other in which she had at any time been enthralled, were but types and shadows. Great, indeed, had been her sinfulness; but greater would be the grace of Jehovah, who would forgive her iniquities, terminate her tribulations, and, instead of the punishment which her transgressions deserved, would, of his spontaneous mercy, heap multiplied blessings upon her.

Anticipating the flight of ages, the prophet demands attention to the preaching of John the Baptist, proclaiming the near approach of Jesus Christ the great Deliverer. No difficulties can defeat his purpose. Opposition cannot impede his progress. His power will subordinate all nature, even the very hearts of his enemies, to his holy will; and glory to God in the highest shall be manifested, and shall brighten, and spread, until all the world shall behold, and be converted, and turned unto the Lord, 'for the mouth of Jehovah hath spoken it.'

The hopes of God's people in the fulfilment of these great and precious promises, are assured by various convincing considerations. The weakness and evanescence of man are adduced as encouragements to trust in the faithfulness of God. Of what avail must all opposition be from a creature, whose strength is frail as the grass, and all whose excellence is fleeting as the flower of the field. God is omnipotent, and can crush the most extensive opposition with infinitely greater ease than the scorching blast can wither the fading flower. Let Christians, then, exult in their Saviour; and call upon all the world to acknowledge him as God. Let them proclaim his strength and might; and take encouragement from the beneficence and compassionate loving-kindness of his character. We should feel assured, that the word of our God, who is Jehovah, the creator of the heavens, and the sustainer of the ends of the earth, cannot fail. What power in nature can overbear him 'who taketh up the isles as a very little thing?' What confederacy can thwart him, before whom the nations are as 'a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance?' and what inducement can sway from his purpose, him in comparison of whom all created excellence is 'less than nothing and vanity?'

And what are all the false religions of the nations? What are their gods? The devices of men's vain imaginations. And what are these to the living God, the Creator and Lord of all, and Redeemer of his people?

Why should Christians ever be despondent, as if God overlooked their cause, and did not regard the difficulties with which it is generally beset, and the contradictions, vexations, and persecutions which they themselves must encounter? The dispensations of God to his people from the days of old, may convince us that Jehovah, the creator and sustainer of all, cannot faint and fail like the children of the dust. We may not always see the reason of every trial, for he does not render an account of his actions, and there is no searching of his understanding; but this we know, that all opposition against him shall fade away, while they who wait upon his grace shall attain to nearer and yet nearer communion with the Father of their spirits; shall be supported under every trial, shall advance in the path of duty with renovated vigour, and gather fresh courage, zeal, and determination from the difficulties and dangers which, in this world of wickedness, beset the cause of holiness, till, having fought the good fight, and finished their course, they receive, from the Judge, that crown of righteousness which is laid up in heaven for all that keep the faith.

PRAYER.

Thou art God thyself alone, O Lord, and there is none beside thee: from everlasting to everlasting thou art God. Thy thoughts unto uswards have been, from all eternity, thoughts of peace. At sundry times, and in divers manners, thou foretoldst unto the fathers, by the prophets, that thou wouldst send forth into this world a great Deliverer, one mighty to save. And when the fullness of time was come, thou sentest forth thy well-beloved Son to suffer and to die for us, who had forfeited our souls in rebellion against thy laws. O the height, and the depth, and the length, and the breadth of the love of God in Christ Jesus; it passeth all understanding. O that thy Holy Spirit would take our hearts of stone away, and give unto us hearts of flesh, susceptible of being affected, impressed, and moulded by the love of God. Who can save us but thee? What can cleanse our guilt away but the blood of thy Son? Who can create within us clean hearts, or renew right spirits within us, but the Holy Ghost? Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, one living and true God, we come to thee. Cast us not out of thy sight. Thou wast our fathers' God, be thou the God of their children. Cleanse us, ever merciful Saviour, in thy blood which cleanseth from all sin. Pardon our sin, most gracious Father, for it is great. Ever-blessed Spirit of all grace, we desire to yield up ourselves unto thee. Take us and sanctify us wholly, in spirit, soul, and body; and preserve us blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. We will put thee in remembrance, ever-faithful God, of thy promise, to give unto thy Son the nations for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for her possession. Satan has now been, O Lord, for a long time the God of this world. Cast him out. Let not other lords than Jesus Christ continue to have dominion over man. Let thy church, O God, stand forth in the might of thy Holy Spirit. Let her put on her beautiful garments of the righteousness of Christ. Let her no where lean upon an arm of flesh, but every where upon him who loved her and gave himself for her. Lead her forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners. Let her lift up her voice and proclaim that her Saviour is God; that behold he cometh with a strong hand, that his arm shall rule for him, that his reward is with him, and his work before him. Let not disappointment fret, nor opposition wear out thy people; but let them remember that the cause is God's, and that in due time they shall reap if they faint not. And now, most gracious Father, we beseech thee to be with us throughout this day. Let not business engross our hearts, nor pleasure seduce our affections from thee. Let thy Holy Spirit continually remind us, that thou, God, seest us. Let us never forget the love which thou bearest unto us in Christ. In eating, and in drinking, and in whatsoever we do, enable us to do all unto thy glory. Defend us from evil, and deliver us from sin. Forgive all our trespasses. And hear these our humble supplications, for all that we ask is for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LI.

SCRIPTURE—GALATIANS V.

REMARKS.

Having showed in the preceding chapter, that spiritual freedom and confidence of mind can be conferred and secured only by the grand evangelic doctrine of justification by faith in Christ alone, without works of law, Paul, in the beginning of this chapter, exhorts Christians, or rather, with apostolic authority, commands them, to stand fast in that liberty with which Christ has made them free. Christ is in himself the substance of which the ceremonial law was but the shadow; and, therefore, its rites are abrogated, and its restrictions repealed for ever. By his having fulfilled all righteousness for them, he has likewise freed his people from the condemning and justifying power, even of the moral law. This immunity, purchased for them by the blood of God, believers ought to prize as their most important privilege; and they should stedfastly withstand all attempts to bring them again under the thralldom of rites and ceremonies, or of legal observances of any kind, as a ground of justification or acceptance with God.

Reverting to the momentous question of justification, Paul declares, with a solemnity becoming his apostolic authority, and with an earnestness befitting the great importance of the subject, that, in reference to the ground of acceptance before God, there must be no divided reliance. Either on Christ, or on the law we must exclusively depend. Either we must be saved solely by grace, or we must be saved solely by works. If, with the view of rendering ourselves acceptable unto God, we perform a single legal observance, instantaneously we become bound to build our hopes on the foundation of works exclusively. If we seek justification by works, then we have abandoned Christ.

In verse fifth, Paul dissuades from legality, by referring to the case of himself and other converted Jews. Once they relied upon the righteousness which is by the law; now they have cast it behind their backs, and wait for the reward of that righteousness which is by faith. Christianity recognises no distinction between Jews and Gentiles. There is but one thing which is of any avail, and its availment is equal for all mankind, and that is faith which 'worketh by love.'

But if, on the one side, there is a danger, through the natural leaning of our hearts to self-justification, of abandoning the liberty wherewith Christ has made his people free, there is, on the other, through the no less natural aversion of our hearts from all holy restraint, a danger of our using our liberty for a cloak of licentiousness. But Christ did not make his people free, that they might make themselves more fleshly. He did not emancipate them from carnal ordinances, in order that they might plunge into deeper carnality of mind. He did not, by his righteous life, and most painful death, deliver them from the law as a procuring cause of justification, in order that they might trample it underfoot as a rule of conduct. He did not magnify the law by being made under it, in order that they might dishonour the law by placing themselves above it. Love was what induced our Saviour to set us free, therefore, we owe a debt to love. Love is the rightful return required from us, for that love wherewith he loved us.

Let us, then, live in love as dear children. Let us submit ourselves to the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and we shall be delivered from the lusts of our fallen nature. If we walk according to the flesh, and fulfil the desires thereof, we yet are under the law; for if we are not under the law, but under grace, we shall be led by the Spirit. Let us, therefore, not deceive ourselves. Let us judge our spiritual state by the scriptures. They who do the works of the flesh, shall not inherit the kingdom of God. They that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit. If, then, we profess to live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit. This is the only satisfactory evidence that we possess the Spirit, which is, again, the only evidence that we are Christ's. 'For if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.'

PRAYER.

Thou art, O Lord, the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, through whom we humbly crave, this evening, access into thy presence. We bless thy name that he hath finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness. We rejoice in believing that, by his own blood, he hath entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for all who come unto thee through him. We flee from our sins and from our own righteousness, unto the blood and obedience of Jesus Christ. Wash us, O God, in his blood, that we may be clean, and clothe us in his righteousness, that we may be acceptable in thy sight. Deliver us, O Lord, from all reliance on ourselves. Guard us against even the slightest encroachments of a legal spirit. May we be taught our Christian liberty, by the Holy Spirit, and enabled by him to stand fast therein, and never again to come under a yoke of bondage to rites or ceremonies, or to the justifying and condemning power of the law. May we clearly see and deeply feel our utter inability of our own selves, even to think a thought as we ought to think it. Let us, therefore, cast the salvation of our souls upon Christ. We plead the sufferings of Christ: for their sake, forgive our sins. We plead his righteousness before thee: look upon us in him, see us in the face of thine Anointed, in whom thou beholdest no iniquity in Jacob, nor discoverest perversity in Israel. Guard us, O God, against the delusions of our wicked and deceitful hearts. Let us not turn the grace of God into licentiousness. May we never use our liberty for an occasion to the flesh. Let thy law be a light unto our feet, and a lamp unto our path. Enable us to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit, and to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. May we not forget that our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost; and that whosoever defileth the temple of God, him will God destroy. Implant love in our hearts to one another. As much as in us lieth, may we live peaceably with all men. Let thy people be kindly-affectioned one to another with brotherly love, in honour preferring one another. Close up, O God, divisions, and put an end to schisms and separations among those that are called by thy name. We bless thee, heavenly Father, for all thy loving-kindness to us during this day; and we commit ourselves and all that belong to us unto thy care and keeping throughout this night.

Watch over us and ours, O thou who never slumberest nor sleepest, and let not evil come near our dwelling. Open our eyes in health and peace upon the light of another morning. Continue to be gracious unto us through life, support us at death, and at last receive us into thy glory. For all that we ask is for the sake of thy well-beloved Son, our only Lord and Saviour; to whom with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, our God and the God of our fathers, be salvation, and blessing, and praise, from this time henceforth, even for evermore. Amen, and Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXXVI. 8.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH XLI.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1. God having manifested himself in the foregoing chapter, as the only living and true God, proceeds in this to challenge idols and idolaters, in order to demonstrate the vanity of the former, and the folly of the latter. For this important purpose he summons the nations to debate the matter with him. Ver. 2—4. He, first of all, reminds the idolatrous world of what he had done to establish Abraham and his seed as witnesses against idols. 'At the time Abraham was called, the nations had almost to a man renounced the true God for idols, and they dreaded them as mighty; but it was one proof of the vanity of these false gods, that they could not, with all their boasted might, either destroy the witness called of God, or by all their efforts extinguish his posterity. But Abraham's safety, and his family's advancement, were proof, that 'the Lord, the first and the last,' the 'I am,' had wrought all this to the glory of his great name. Ver. 5—7. He next recounts all that the nations had done to counteract his testimony against idols. They had been more zealous in multiplying their gods, more careful in adorning their images and perfecting their worship. They held them to be firmly established, yet they feared the presence of Jacob's family, which testified against them. Egypt had laboured hard to destroy Jacob's family by hard bondage. Edom had come against them in battle, the Amorites had opposed them with all their might, Moab had solemnly attempted to curse them in the name of the Lord, and Canaan's idolatrous tribes, had united to sweep the witnesses away; but God gave the posterity of Ham as dust to their sword, and as stubble to their bow; and Israel, his servant, was established in the very centre of the world, a witness to all nations against idolatry. Ver. 8—16. But the nations, enraged against the Jews, still sought to destroy them, and having prevailed on them to learn their ways, enticed these witnesses against idolatry to countenance the sin; thus accomplishing by guile, the destruction which they could not effect by force. For God punished his people by sending them to Babylon; and the nations were glad that the standing testimony against their follies was removed out of the way. In remorse and sorrow for their shameful conduct, they might be driven to think that God had cast them off. But he reminds them that Abraham was his friend, that he had covenanted with him regarding his posterity, and would not forsake them; therefore, to comfort and encourage them in their desolate state, he assures them, that not one of their enemies should prevail to destroy them, but they should triumphantly conquer and destroy every enemy, and rejoice once more in the Lord, whose it is to give victory. They would once more become his witnesses. Ver. 17—20. Yea, in the most difficult circumstances, he would appear for their help; and Israel, in captivity, like a dry and barren wilderness, should become as a fruitful and well-watered field, yea, as a forest, filled with fruit-bearing, ornamental, and useful trees; and all to the glory of his great name. He would not forsake his witnesses. He would restore them to their land, and bring them to it in comfort and safety. Ver. 21—24. Turning then to idols, the prophet challenges them to do the works of God, that they may prove their title to be acknowledged worthy of the name. The work to which they are specially challenged, is that of predicting coming events. On this power of fore-knowledge, and the consequent ability of declaring beforehand what is coming to pass, God builds his sovereign claim to be received as the true God. And since the idols cannot compete with him here, since they neither can foretell, nor do good, nor do evil, he denounces them as nought, and solemnly curses him who shall choose them. Ver. 25—29. Then, to demonstrate his own indisputable claim, he proclaims the coming and the conquest of Cyrus, the great deliverer of his people—no less than 172 years before that monarch proclaimed the freedom of the Jews; and then asks, 'Who hath declared from the beginning, that we may know? and beforetime, that we may say, He is righteous?' Neither idols nor idolaters can answer a word. Therefore does he claim to be the only true God, and challenges the love and affection of his people on this ground.

PRAYER.

O most holy and most gracious God, we prostrate ourselves before thee this morning, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Thou art the one living and true God. Besides thee there is none else, and idols are an abomination before thee. Help us, Lord, to glorify thy name, because of thy mercy. Our fathers sat in darkness, and at this day, we, their children, might have been bowing down to the workmanship of our own hands; but in thy mercy, thou hast dispelled our darkness, and turned us from idols, to serve thee the living God. O Lord, help us to put away all the idols of our heart and imagination, and worship thee alone in spirit and truth. Make us witnesses for thee. May we, in all lowliness of mind, and in dependence on thy grace, avouch thee to be our God, and make it manifest in our whole conduct, that thou art our God, and that we are thy people. We would lament that we have been in time past so faithless as witnesses for thee, and we confess that as thou didst deal fearfully, in the way of chastisement, with thine ancient people, so now mightest thou deal fearfully with us. O Lord, in the humble confession of our evil desert, we would cast ourselves on thy forgiving grace. Be pleased to glorify the power of Christ's atoning blood, and thine own sovereign love, in blotting out all our transgressions. Receive us graciously and love us freely. Make us thy children by faith in Jesus, that we may enjoy the privileges and the blessings promised to Abraham thy friend. Do thou strengthen and help, yea, uphold us with the right hand of thy righteousness. Make us more than conquerors over the world, and every enemy of our souls, and amid all our contests with self and the world, the flesh and the devil, be thou our strength; amidst all the weariness and painfulness of our present wilderness condition, when poor and needy we seek water and find none, and our tongue faileth for thirst, forsake us not, O God of Israel, but make our wilderness pools of water; refresh our souls, and at length bring us safely to thy holy hill, even to thine own dwelling-place, that we may for ever rest in peace. Overthrow, we beseech thee, the idolatry of the world. Let the cross of Christ have free course and be glorified. Do thou, according to thine own holy decree, utterly abolish idols, and make the name of Jesus glorious in all lands. O let our own land share richly in this blessing, and be established as a praise in the whole earth. And remember poor perishing Israel. Return, in mercy, to the seed of Jacob. Reveal Jesus to them in thy love, and turn their hearts to thee. Accept of our thanksgiving for the mercies of the night, and this morning. Keep our going out and our coming in this day. Guide us in all our ways, sanctify us fully, and the glory shall be thine in Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LIV.

SCRIPTURE—GALATIANS VI.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—10. Pursuing the practical strain, which he had begun in the former chapter, the apostle proceeds to remind his Christian brethren in Galatia of various duties which he had suspected had been forgotten and transgressed amid angry contention for external rites, and the indulgence of self-righteous pride. First of all he suspected that where the hope of salvation was built on external sanctity, they would deal harshly with such as had fallen into sin, instead of remembering that they were brethren, and each liable to fall after the same manner. From a consideration of personal frailty, he enjoins brotherly love, and care in reclaiming backsliders, ver. 1. Next he suspected that where they were severally turned from the one foundation of hope to personal efforts, each would look to himself and leave his neighbour; therefore, as dependent on one Saviour, brethren in one hope, he enjoins mutual love and mutual help, ver. 2. To enforce these considerations he enjoins the duty of self-examination, that each might know how wretched he really was in himself; how mean, how insignificant, both in righteousness and strength, and might learn to prove what was his actual standing in the sight of God. Self-deception would thus be prevented, and the testimony of the Spirit with his spirit that he was a child of God, would be a cause of rejoicing infinitely above all exultation in the praises of others, whom external appearances might easily deceive, ver. 3—5. Further, dreading that their party-spirit had shut up their hearts against the claims of their proper pastors, and that the false teachers who crept in had turned to themselves the maintenance due to others, he enjoins the duty of making provision for the support of the ministry. The solemn declaration which follows, 'Be not deceived, God is not mocked,' &c., may be viewed, like every other such passage, as standing alone, and thus supplying a most extensive ground of practical admonition regarding our whole conduct; but if viewed in reference to the duty of maintaining the ministers of the gospel, must mean, that giving of one's substance for the support of teachers who argue for nothing but external rites and outward purity, a sowing to the flesh, as it betrays the lurking of self-righteousness and spiritual death, can only confirm both, and end in eternal woe; whereas zeal for the spiritual ministrations of Christ's truth, a sowing to the Spirit, a dealing with the heart, must terminate in its enlightenment here, and its eternal life. This care of Christ's ministers would superinduce care of Christ's people, and the heart's attention bestowed on both would speedily return in personal blessings, just as a careful use of the seed time insures an abundant crop.

Ver. 11—18. And here Paul would have concluded his letter; but the subject of it was weighty, and the cause of his discussing it heavy on his heart. Let Christians in Galatia judge how he felt, when they knew that, instead of using an amanuensis, (Rom. xvi. 22; 1 Cor. xvi. 21; Coloss. iv. 18.), as he generally did in writing his epistles, he had, out of his zeal for his deluded brethren, written all with his own hand. This thought turned him once more to the main subject of the letter, and by a few master strokes he sends home his argument and his practical admonitions with irresistible emphasis. The aim of the judaizing teachers was selfish. It was from no desire to promote saving truth, but from a selfish desire of avoiding persecution; and the proof of this was, that after they had been personally circumcised, and bound to keep the whole law, they were transgressors as others, thus showing that their sole desire was to make proselytes. How different the zeal of the apostle! His glory was in the cross of Christ, which, though a stumbling-block to the Jews, and the scorn and derision of self-conceited Gentiles, was yet the power of God unto salvation to humble believers, who, convinced of the folly of trusting to external rites, would be satisfied with nothing but victory over the world in the renewal of their hearts. After pronouncing his authoritative blessing on all such as walked by this rule, he adds, 'Let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus Christ.' Others might bear the mark of devotedness to Moses, in being circumcised; but as for him, the scourges, the stones, and the fetters of his Jewish countrymen, had left marks that he was not the servant of Moses, but, like Moses, a servant of Christ. His usual benediction closes the epistle.

PRAYER.

Almighty Father, at the close of another day we would bow humbly before thee in the name of Jesus. Blessed be thy name that in him thou art still gracious to us, to sinners. Thou art indeed our Shepherd. Thou restorest our souls. Thou alone healest our backslidings, when thou mightest justly leave us to wander for ever. O Lord, help us to deal kindly with our erring brethren. Give us a spirit of meekness, and humbling remembrance of our past failings, that we may pity our fellow-disciples who fall into transgression, and strive to recover them from the snare of the devil. O Lord, impress our hearts with the arousing truth, that we are still in the body, still surrounded with manifold temptations, still liable to fall into sin. Be thou our strength in the day of trial. Help us, we earnestly beseech thee, to overcome the flesh. Let us not deceive ourselves, as if we could mock and deceive thee, with external professions of regard, while our hearts are not right before thee. O God, give us grace to sow to the Spirit. Implant thine own truth in our hearts, that blessed seed of the word, which produces fruit, both in heart and life, unto holiness, that our end may be life everlasting; and grant that, as we overcome by the blood of the cross and this word of Christ's testimony, so our only glorying may be not in men or in ourselves, but in the cross of Christ. Abounding in all holiness of heart and love to thee, may we also abound in love to our brethren. Help us to do good to the household of faith. Let us seek the peace and prosperity of Zion, and loving her, may we prosper. In due season let us reap, and support us that we faint not. O grant that every dream of self-righteousness may be dispelled from our hearts, and Christ alone exalted there; and grant that speedily the world may be converted to him. Let thy arm scatter all opposition to his righteous truth, and raise up and send forth to Jews and Gentiles multitudes of faithful ministers and missionaries, who shall spend and be spent for Christ, till his name be great from the rising to the going down of the sun. May we bear about with us in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifest in our mortal flesh. And thus daily living in Christ, may we die in Christ, and be eternally thine. Blot out in his blood all the offences of the day. Refresh our bodies with rest, our souls with the peace which passeth all understanding, and the glory shall be thine for ever in Christ. Amen.

THIRTY-EIGHTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXXIX. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CVII. 21—43.

REMARKS.

The key to the proper explanation and use of the 107th psalm is found in its closing verse. It is throughout a testimony to God's sovereignty in the kingdom of providence, and a solemn call on every subject of that kingdom, to recognise and acknowledge the hand which wields the sceptre. Having exhorted exiles restored from banishment, and captives delivered from bondage, and the sick and afflicted who have been rescued from death, to acknowledge the grace and kindness of God in their several deliverances, ver. 21—30. he turns to address himself to such voyagers by sea, whether mariners or others, who have been in imminent peril by tempest, yet delivered from a watery grave. The fury of the tempest, and the consternation of the voyagers, are graphically described in this portion of the psalm. But God is declared to be the author of the tempest as well as of the calm. How seldom do seamen remember this. Fixing their every thought on the furious ocean, they dread it, but fear not God. Yet is it at his command that the wind lashes the ocean into fury—even as it is at his command that the wind ceases and the waves subside. How sweet to remember that even in the raging of the sea is he the author, the hearer, and the answerer of prayer. The cry of the distressed enters not in vain into his ear. He delivers them and brings them into their desired haven. Surely a joyful sacrifice of thanksgiving is justly due for such manifest grace. Ver. 31—43. Having discussed such exhibitions of providence as more immediately regard individuals, he next adverts to national providences; introducing this portion of the psalm, with the oft repeated call to praise the Lord for his kindness and his wonderful works; and not to confine the expressions of gratitude to individual hearts, but to assemble the congregation, and proclaim it among the rulers, for the dealings of God now to be noticed regard not individuals but nations.

And here he notices various evolutions of Jehovah's providential government. A fruitful and joyous land becomes a wilderness, and while philosophers speculate on the cause, and speak of luxury and effeminacy, producing careless security and its consequent evils, the true cause is God, who has cursed the ground because of the sin of the people. Again a land brought to desolation by famine and poverty, and inhabited by a people on the brink of extermination, gradually rises into fruitfulness and populousness; commerce advances, cities are built, agriculture is pursued, and the philosopher again prates about arts, and science, and industry, and perseverance, and education, and rivalry—all means in the hands of God to produce the prosperity; but he speaks not of God, who alone is the cause. Yea, this flourishing land may again be minished by tyrannical and oppressive rule, and the ambition of a few, or the grasping of one, is fixed on as the cause; but God, in his providence, permits the oppression, and gives power to the oppressor, (Isa. liv. 16; Dan. iv. 17,) in order to inflict chastisement on a nation for national sin; and secure, as may seem, the throne of the tyrant, the very next evolution of providence hurls him from it, a wanderer it may be, in a foreign land, if not a victim to popular rage, while the oppressed are called to rejoice; yea, God's own people praise him for the mercy, and the upholders of oppression, the minions of deposed tyranny, are fain to be silent. In all these things changes in the affairs of individuals and nations, we forget our duty if we fail to discern and acknowledge the hand of God. We are as much called to be students of providence, as of the bible, because when we confine ourselves to either we misunderstand both.

PRAYER.

Father of mercies, God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we prostrate ourselves on this the morning of thine own day, at the footstool of thy throne of grace, in the name of Jesus. Help us to praise thee for thy goodness, for thy wonderful works to us the children of men. Blessed be thy name for all the merciful deliverances vouchsafed to us hitherto, and for all the privileges with which we are this morning surrounded. Thou hast often delivered our eyes from tears, our feet from falling, and our souls from death, otherwise we would not now be here thanking thee for thy mercy, and waiting the hour which summons us to thy house of prayer. O Lord, help us to feel our obligations, and to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called. Bless, for this purpose, the portion of thy word on which we have this morning meditated; may it deepen our conviction, that thou the most High rulest in the affairs of men and the nations; and may it encourage us to acknowledge thee in all our ways, that thou mayest direct our steps. O lead us into thy courts with joy. May we see thee there, as thy people have, in times past, seen thy goings in thy sanctuary. All-gracious God, manifest thyself to us in the forgiveness of all our sins, and the complete renewal of our hearts. Show us the Saviour, and quicken us to pant after his image. Satisfy our longing souls with the provision of Zion. Bless that provision to us, and to all our fellow-worshippers. Make thy worship our delight. Assist thy ministering and missionary servants. May thy Holy Spirit give them a mouth and wisdom, adding, this day, many to the redeemed of the Lord, to give thanks for the mercy that endureth for ever. May these be gathered from all lands, but specially may they abound in our own.—And number, we beseech thee, among them, and that speedily, the seed of Jacob. May the Deliverer come out of Zion, and turn away ungodliness from Abraham's seed. Bless our rulers with thy fear; make the sceptre of the land a sceptre of righteousness. O bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end, but establish thou the just, that the righteous may see and rejoice, and all iniquity stop her mouth. Be thou ever gracious to the storm-tossed mariner, and hear his cry in the hour of his distress; and even as thou bringest him to his desired haven, so grant, that, when the voyage of our life is come to a close, we may rest within the vail, where now we desire to cast our anchor, and whither our fore-runner is already entered. Hear us graciously, and answer us in peace, for Jesus sake. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXXVIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CVIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

The 108th psalm is, with some slight change in the expressions, a combination of the latter portions of the 57th and 60th. It is a psalm of triumph, and appears to have been composed by David after he perceived that God had established the kingdom in his hand, and delivered him from the fear of all his enemies. When he composed the 57th psalm, he was in imminent danger of falling into the hands of Saul, and though he closes it with triumph, yet he begins it with complaint. In like manner when he composed the 60th, he had to confess that God had showed his people hard things, and had made them to drink the wine of astonishment. But the day of his unmingled triumph had as length come, and the psalmist wished to record his gratitude and joy in strains of unmingled praise, such as became the mercy conferred on him. Arousing his whole heart to the duty, and feeling there, that God alone was the author of his safety and success, he not only desires that, as an individual, he may set him on high, but prays that he may be acknowledged as the Lord by the whole earth. Then rapidly surveying the land of Israel with the surrounding tribes which he had subdued, he enumerates the fruits of assured triumph, ascribing all to the decree of God. Shechem and Succoth, Gilead and Manasseh, Ephraim and Judah, that is, the whole land conquered by Joshua, and possessed by his fathers, would now own him as king. While he would deal with Shechem and Succoth as if they were his own, assigning them in portions to his friends and defenders, and have all the odours and spicery of Gilead at command, the thousands of Manasseh would fill the ranks of his army, and the ten thousands of Ephraim be his strength in the day of battle. The royal domain would still be Judah, and Jerusalem the seat of government. He would find among the wise men of Judah, able and devoted counsellors and judges, who, in firm execution of the law, would as much defend his kingdom, as did the prowess of his army. Nor would foreign tribes less own his sway. Moab would be reduced to the lowest vassalage, Edom bow to his resistless prowess, and Philistia, the oldest and most inveterate of his enemies, would add to his triumph; yea, the city of Edom, the impregnable Bozra, would be compelled to open its gates to him as a conqueror, for God would go forth with his armies, and in his strength they would do valiantly.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Surely the Lord will bestow on his people a victory as glorious, a conquest as extensive, over sin, satan, and the world, as ever he granted to David over Canaan. Though at first perhaps they may be made to mourn the inroads of evil and the triumph of foes, and amidst many occasions of thanksgiving, be compelled to grieve, that lasting and perfect victory is not theirs; yet, surely that victory will come, for God has decreed it, and he will effect it. Let us be up and doing; 'Through God we shall do valiantly.' Not only shall enemies be kept in abeyance and laid prostrate no more to distress us, but we shall get the whole land in possession. And more than conquerors, we shall reign with Jesus for ever and ever. Let but our hearts be fixed on the victory, and the possession of it will fix our hearts on him who gives it, from henceforth, even for ever.

PRAYER.

O God, we draw near to thee once more this day in the name of Jesus. How precious is a day spent in thy courts. O Lord, we have this day heard anew of thy love in Jesus. We would fix our hearts on thee, and thy saving mercy in the blood of the cross. O Lord, thy mercy is great above the heavens, and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds. Thou hast magnified thy wonderful works of grace toward us miserable sinners, and challenged the affections of our inmost souls. O forbid that we should withhold our heart from thee. O that we could open to him that stands at the door and knocks. Constrain us by thy love to admit the Saviour. Awaken us to yield our whole selves to thy service, and suffer us not to rest satisfied with any thing short of spiritual life, and that in the measure of the stature of perfect men in Christ Jesus. We bless thee, that thou hast promised a glorious and lasting victory to thy people, over all their spiritual foes. We beseech thee to bestow that victory upon us. Give us help, we implore thee, in this our warfare, for vain is the help of man.—We have no strength, our strength is but weakness, even as our righteousness is, in thy sight, but filthy rags. Do thou, then, strengthen and uphold us, with the right hand of thy righteousness. Stretch out thy hand against the wrath of our enemies, and may thy right hand save us. Perfect that which concerneth us, and bring us to thy holy hill, even to thy dwelling-place. We bless thee for a sabbath of rest in our pilgrimage state. We would enjoy it constantly as a pledge of the eternal rest above. O Lord, blot out the sins thou hast discerned in our services this day, and forgive the iniquities of our holy things, and answer our prayers for spiritual mercy, not according to their meanness and want of heart, but according to thy riches in glory by Jesus Christ. Follow, with thy blessing, the word preached, that it may profit them who heard it. O let not this sabbath day pass without many tokens to the efficacy of thy word, and the power of thy grace. Build up thy own people in the faith, and so bless the word that it may arouse sinners, and convert them to Christ. O blessed God, grant that the Son of David may speedily mete out the earth as his own, and establish his rule throughout the whole world. Give to him the throne of his father over the house of Israel. O turn the heart of Abraham's seed to thee, and the heart of all nations to thy own dear Son. Let his enemies be scattered before the light of thy countenance, and his church be established in the whole earth. Into thy hands do we commit this great work; carry it on both in our hearts, and among our fellow-worshippers, in our own land, and in all lands, till all ends of the earth turn unto the Lord, and all kindreds of the nations do thee homage. May the good Lord hasten it in his time. Into thy hands we commend our souls for the coming night. Keep us in peace, refresh us with the sleep of thy beloved, and raise us on the morning of a new day, renewed for thy service. And all we implore is for Jesus' sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XXIII.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH XLII.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—4. In a prophecy of so great importance, it is cause of thankfulness that we are not left to vague conjecture either respecting the speaker or the person spoken of. The speaker is Almighty God. He points out the promised Deliverer; and when the Son of God tabernacled here below, he explicitly declared that in himself was this prophecy fulfilled. Though the Son of God, and equal with the Father, to accomplish the great work of redemption he took on himself the form of a servant, and the likeness of man; but he was the chosen servant of God, in whom his soul delighted, whom he upheld, and to whom his Spirit was given without measure. Though he was all meekness, and engaged in no unseemly strife, and was of tender mercy, not breaking the bruised reed, and not quenching the smoking flax; yet with unflinching firmness was he to carry on the work, till Jews and Gentiles were enlightened, and the isles should wait for his law.

Ver. 5—9. Having pointed out the Redeemer to man, the Father addresses him himself. As Creator of the heavens and of the earth, and the giver of breath and immortal spirits to the inhabitants of the earth, he promises to his Son, whom he called in righteousness, that he would hold his hand and keep him. For God's glory, as well as for the salvation of man, was he to be sent forth. Blinded by satan, the inhabitants of the earth, robbing the Lord of his glory, had changed the truth of God into a lie, and had worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator. But 'my glory,' says he, 'I will not give unto another, neither my praise to graven images;' and therefore, to destroy the works of satan, to take the prey out of his teeth, and to show forth his own glory in the redemption of perishing man, he sent his eternal Son to enlighten the blind eyes, to break the iron fetters, to bring them that sat in darkness out of the prison house, and to seal by his own blood an everlasting covenant of grace, and mercy, and peace.

Ver. 10—12. Enraptured with the prospect of gospel times, the prophet calls on the inhabitants of the earth to rejoice. A new song was to be sung, for the Lord was to work a new work, more wonderful than the creation of the earth and all its inhabitants. The song of praise for the great salvation was not to rise from God's ancient people only, but from those who had not been a people; from the wandering Arabs; from the ends of the earth; from the isles of the sea; from our own blessed isle, then covered with heathen darkness, and regarded as almost beyond the bounds of the habitable world.

Ver. 13—17. Long left to their own devices, notwithstanding the boasted powers of human intellect, the world by wisdom knew not God. All followed after lying vanities, and satan seemed to reign supreme. But the Lord was at last to make bare his right hand, and to go forth as a mighty man of war, on a work both of judgment and of mercy, showing mercy in the salvation of those whom he was to lead to repentance, and overwhelming with merited judgments the obstinate enemies of the gospel of his Son.

Ver. 18—23. Then he describes the ungrateful Jews in language applied to them by the Saviour when he tabernacled among them; as seeing, but not observing; opening the ears, but not hearing.' And yet to this rebellious people the Lord was to proclaim a message of mercy. He was to declare that for Christ's righteousness sake he was to be well pleased to accept, in the Beloved, returning penitents, beholding them in the face of him, who, by his death on the cross, was to magnify his law and make it honourable, that God might be just, and yet the justifier of the ungodly. Yet as multitudes would continue deaf to the message of mercy, and unmoved by the most wonderful manifestation of love, he would give Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers; he would pour upon him the fury of his anger; he would set him on fire, yet, though burned, with a sinful stupidity which is to this day exhibited, he would not know it, neither lay it to heart.

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever blessed God, at the footstool of thy throne would we this morning bow ourselves, rendering unto thee that homage which is so due from the rational creatures whom thou hast formed. Thou art exalted indeed above all blessing and praise. Thou art King of kings, and Lord of lords, the great, and wise, and only potentate. Thousands of thousands of holy spirits surround thy throne, saying, Great and marvellous are all thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true art thou in all thy ways, thou King of saints. The most exalted of the heavenly intelligences veil their faces and their feet with their wings in the presence of the Eternal, while they cry out, Halleluia, halleluia, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. With what reverence, then, should the inhabitants of the dust approach thee, crying, Unclean, unclean; Lord, be merciful to us, miserable sinners! And yet, O Lord, polluted though we be, thou hast not shut us out from thy presence; yea, thou hast given us a Mediator, and invited us to approach thee; and coming to thee in his name, we may say, The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice, and let the multitudes of the isles be glad. The Lord reigneth, and he reigneth in mercy and in faithfulness; mercy is over all his works. O how wonderfully has thy mercy been manifested to the children of men! When all had sinned, when all had gone astray like lost sheep, when Lebanon was not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereon for a sin-offering, thou didst say, Redeem from going down to destruction, for I have found a ransom. Behold my servant whom I uphold, mine elect in whom my soul delighteth. I have called him in righteousness; I have given him for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles, to open the blind eyes, and to bring them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house. And blessed be thy name, this promise which thou gavest thou didst graciously fulfil, for thou didst set forth thy Son as a propitiation for sin, to die the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God. O draw us by the bands of love, and by the cords of a man. Draw us, and we will run after thee. May we say, Lord, we are wholly thine. What wilt thou have us to do? What dost thou require us to suffer for thy name's sake? We are thy servants, truly we are thy servants, thou hast loosed our bands. O may this be not only the language of our lips, but the prayer of our heart, and the desire of our souls. May our lives be a song of gratitude and praise to him who loved us, and gave himself for us. May the love of Christ constrain us to live unto him through whose goodness and mercy we live. May we bear about with us the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of the blessed Saviour may be manifested in our mortal bodies. Hasten the happy time when the wilderness shall blossom, when the inhabitant of the rock shall sing, when the most distant isles shall wait for thy law, and when thine ancient people the Jews shall be brought in, with the fullness of the Gentile nations. Hear these our prayers, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXV.

SCRIPTURE—EPHESIANS I.

REMARKS.

Ver. 3—6. As an apostle called and commissioned by God, and now in bonds for the gospel, Paul addresses the saints at Ephesus, i. e. believers sanctified through the Spirit of Christ, and rendered faithful to him as their Master. Though already possessed of grace and peace, he prays for richer supplies as the greatest blessings that could be bestowed on them in this wilderness; and as these spiritual blessings are solicited both from the Father and the Son, we are taught that they are two persons of the one living and true God. For many rich spiritual blessings the apostle raises his grateful acknowledgments to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, his God, as man; his Father, as God and man, and, through Christ, our covenanted God and Father, and the giver of all our blessings. How free as well as rich is the grace of God, for he hath chosen believers in Christ before the foundation of the world, not because he foresaw that they would believe and become holy; but to bless them with faith, and to render them holy, that all might redound to the praise of the glory of his grace, who made them accepted in the Beloved.

Ver. 7—12. Well may the apostle speak of the richness of grace, when the forgiveness of sins is purchased by the blood of the Son of God, and when he has revealed to us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he has purposed in himself, to gather together, in one blessed family in Christ, the ransomed on earth, and the holy angels in heaven. So certain was it that believers were to be raised to glory, that they are spoken of as having obtained the inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of the unchangeable God, that they should be to the praise of his glory.

Ver. 13, 14. But it was not only the Jews, who were the first who believed, that were to be saved, but also the Gentiles, who believed on hearing the word of truth, the gospel of our salvation. In proof of this, they had been sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, marked and secured as God's jewels. And precious was the sealing of the Spirit of grace, as it gave a foretaste of heaven, and a sure pledge of the purchased possession when at the great day of final retribution, to the praise of his glory, they were to enter on the everlasting inheritance.

Reflecting on the grace God had bestowed, and looking forward with holy joy to the fulfilment of their brightest hopes, the apostle assured them, that by hearing of their faith in Christ, and of their love to his followers, he was encouraged to raise his thanksgivings to God for the blessings he had communicated, and also to raise his supplications to God that he would still grant to them more abundant mercies. That, in particular, as our covenanted God, he would give them brighter and sweeter views of Christ, and increase of experimental acquaintance with him, whom to know is life everlasting; that he would give them livelier hopes, and richer foretastes of the glorious inheritance; that they might further understand his power already experienced, and to be more gloriously displayed when they were raised from the dead, even as their blessed Redeemer had been raised from the dead, and exalted to glory at the right hand of God, far above every name in heaven or on earth, and made the Head over all things to the church for ever and ever.

PRAYER.

We would this evening bow ourselves before the Lord who made us; and may we have grace that we may approach thee acceptably, with reverence and with godly fear, for thou art greatly to be feared in the assemblies of thy saints, and to be had in reverence by all who are about thee. Thou art exalted above our highest thoughts. Who by searching can find out God? Who can find out the Almighty unto perfection? But when the world by wisdom knew not God, thou didst deign to reveal thyself not only as glorious in holiness, but as the Lord merciful and gracious, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin, through the atoning blood of the Redeemer.

Yea, thou didst so love the world as to give thine only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but should have everlasting life. May we believe unto the saving of our souls. May the love of Christ constrain us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live to themselves, but to him who died for them and rose again. May we all be sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of the purchased possession, to the praise of his glory. May the work of the Spirit on our hearts give us richer pledges of future felicity, and more delightful earnestness of the happiness of heaven. May we more frequently meditate on our corrupt state by nature, that we may be more convinced of our need of that spiritual Physician, who alone can heal the deadly plague of our hearts. May we more frequently meditate on the merited doom of rebellion, that we may be more thankful that, according to the riches of thy grace, we have redemption, even the forgiveness of sins, through the blood of Christ. And may we never forget that salvation originates in this glorious grace, that when enabled to lead lives of faith and godliness, we may ascribe unto thee the glory and the praise. Lead us to more frequent meditation on the blessedness of the saints in light, who, with songs of rejoicing, surround thy throne, that we may be ready to say, O that we had the wings of a dove, that we might fly away and be at rest. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly; even so come, Lord Jesus. Go forth with the preaching of thy holy word throughout the earth, till the wilderness blossom and the desert rejoice. Bless this family and all our friends. Our hearts' desire and prayer is, that they and we may be saved. Hear the prayers we now raise to thee, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XXIV.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH L. LI.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—6. This may be regarded as a prediction of the murmurings of the Jews during the Babylonian captivity, or in latter times, during their long continued dispersion. The Lord condescends to reason with them, and to show that they had no ground of complaint, and had only themselves to blame. 'Behold, for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves, and for your transgressions is your mother put away.' If they were still in a state of alienation, it was not owing to unwillingness on the Lord's part to receive them back, nor to any inability to save them, had they in their distress become humble and penitent. He had called, and they had not answered. He had wrought wonders in behalf of their fathers in Egypt, at the Red sea, in the wilderness, and amidst the swellings of Jordan, and his hand was not shortened that he could not save. Yea, the Redeemer was to show more of his power, and wisdom, and mercy, for he was to suffer, that they might be saved from misery; he was to die, the just for the unjust, that he might bring them to God. 'He gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: he hid not his face from shame and spitting.'

Ver. 7—9. Great above all human conception were the trials that awaited him; but with unflinching fortitude he went forward, setting his face like a flint, going forward in divine strength, till he could say, 'It is finished.'

Behold the end of the matter: He that believeth shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be condemned and destroyed. The righteous may walk in darkness for a time; weeping may continue for a night, but joy will come in the morning. The wicked may walk for a little in their own boasted light, and rejoice in sinful pleasure as sparks of their own kindling; but their joy shall be as the crackling of thorns, and their lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness.

CHAP. LI. God's people were, in the former chapter, described as those 'who fear the Lord and obey the voice of his servant;' and here they are still further described as those 'who follow after righteousness.' Before, we had obedience as the fruit; here we have the root from which it springs, for they are following after righteousness, seeking salvation through faith in the Lord our righteousness. They might be brought to a low estate; but they may be encouraged by looking at the hole of the pit whence they were digged; and at the low estate of Abraham, whom the Lord called alone, and blessed, and increased; and greater prosperity is here promised to the Jews than they have ever yet attained in their most flourishing condition, ver. 1—3.

Ver. 3, 4. Gospel times were to be ushered in; the righteousness of the Lord was near, and his salvation gone forth; light was to arise not only for the Jews, but for the Gentile nations, to whom the gospel was to proclaim everlasting salvation.

Ver. 5—16. 'Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness.' Here his people, who had been addressed as following after righteousness, are addressed as now knowing righteousness, and as having his law in their hearts; and they are assured that they have no cause of fear, as their enemies are to be consumed as a garment is eaten by the moths. And in full assurance of faith and hope, the believer calls on the Lord, in sublime terms, to awake, and put on his strength, as in the days of old, when he cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon, visiting Egypt with heavy plagues, and humbling and destroying Pharaoh and his host, while a way of escape was miraculously made by the Lord for his people. And greater deliverances are still promised, and shall be fully accomplished.

Ver. 17—23. As the prayer was, 'Awake, awake, O arm of the Lord,' the answer is, 'Awake, awake, stand up, O Jerusalem,' to receive the message of the Lord. Mournful is now thy condition. Desolation by famine, and destruction by the sword, have come unto thee. Who can comfort thee? Who can give thee help? Thy sons have fainted. Rebelliously struggling to escape from merited judgments, they have only added to their wretchedness. Therefore, hear now this, thou afflicted and drunken, but not with wine: 'O what is the Lord now to say? Is he to deal with them according to their sins, and to pass the irrevocable sentence of condemnation? Hear, O heavens, and be astonished, O earth! it is a message of peace and mercy:—'Thus saith the Lord,' &c., ver. 21—23.

PRAYER.

Almighty Creator of all things, with reverence and contrition we would present ourselves before thee. How shall we, who are sinful dust and ashes, present ourselves before the Lord, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity without abhorrence? We have sinned, and what can we answer? we have sold ourselves for nought, and our iniquities, as the wind, have carried us away. We have encompassed ourselves with sparks; we have walked in the light of our own fire, and in the sparks of our own kindling; and hadst thou left us to ourselves, our light would have been put out in utter darkness, and our fire would have been the unquenchable burnings of hell. But O Lord, when our iniquities had brought us low; when we were laden with pollution; when we deserved to lie down in everlasting sorrow; when thou sawest us in our blood, thou didst behold us with compassion; yea, when we were in our blood, thou didst say unto us, Live, and the time was a time of love. Thou didst seal thy covenant of grace with redeeming blood. Thou didst send a Saviour. He gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, and hid not his face from shame and spitting. He was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities; he died that we might live. O may we, then, love and fear the Lord and his goodness, and obey the voice of the heavenly Saviour. May we know righteousness, and walk in the light of the Lord's countenance. And if at any time we walk in darkness and see no light, may we trust in the Lord, and stay ourselves on the most high God. When we remember the years of the right hand of the Most High, in difficulties and dangers we will say, Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O arm of the Lord; awake as in the ancient days, the generation of old. Art thou not it that hath cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon? Art thou not it that hath dried the sea, the waters of the great deep; that hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over? O Lord, may we be under thy kind care and keeping; covered as in the hollow of thy hand; guarded as the apple of thine eye. O remember us in the multitude of thy tender mercies. May we avail ourselves of our gospel privileges, and go on from strength to strength, till every one of us appear in Zion. O Lord, bless the church of Christ on earth. For Zion's sake we will not hold our peace, and for Jerusalem's sake we will not rest, till the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. Say at last, Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion, put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, that thou mayest be for a name and a praise, and that all the ends of the earth may see the salvation of God. Bless us and all whom we are bound to have upon our spirits. Hear the prayers we now raise to thee for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE.—PARAPHRASE LVI.

SCRIPTURE.—EPHESIANS II.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1, 2. Mournful had been the state of the Ephesians. They had been spiritually dead. Their whole conduct gave proof of their spiritual deadness; for walking according to the course of this world, they walked also according to the power of the prince of the air, even of satan, called the Prince of the Air, because of the power he is allowed to exercise in the airy regions, that he may more successfully work in his willing slaves, the children of disobedience.

Ver. 3. And this mournful state was not the condition of the Gentiles only, but also of the Jews, till they were turned from darkness to light, from the power of satan to the living God. Before they were converted, they fulfilled the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others.

Ver. 4. Having set forth their miserable state by nature, and shown that, whether Jews or Gentiles, they were the children of disobedience, and, consequently, the children of wrath, he shows whence their help came. It came from God, against whom they were in rebellion, 'God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved them, quickened them together with Christ.'

Ver. 5—7. And not only does he raise believers from the death of sin, but brings them into a state of favour; and having brought them into a state of grace, he will also raise them to a state of glory, making them sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. And what he has done for them, he is both able and willing to do for others, who are thus led to repentance, by being shown the exceeding riches of his grace.

Ver. 8—10. This leads the apostle very explicitly to declare, that their salvation, from first to last, was owing to the free grace of God; that he begins the work and carries it on; that their good works are not the cause of their salvation, but the effects of a work of grace begun in the heart. But lest any should think that, since it is of grace, there is no need of good works, he declares that, as God's workmanship, they were created anew in Christ Jesus to good works, that they should walk therein.

Ver. 11—18. He again calls on them to remember the state from which they were delivered, when they were without God, and without Christ, and without hope in the world; and also the blessed state to which they were raised, when they who were far off had been made nigh by the blood of Christ; and when by him, who is our peace, Jews and Gentiles had been reconciled, and brought into one fold, under the care of the good Shepherd; that through him they both might have access, by one Spirit, unto the Father; Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, thus co-operating in their salvation.

The chapter commenced with their being dead in trespasses and sins, the slaves of Satan, the children of disobedience and of wrath. But behold the blessed change, they are now fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. In expressive figures the apostle sets forth their happiness, as a city, as the household of God, as a holy building or temple; and this temple, composed of believers, of which Christ is the foundation, he describes as increasing in numbers, and growing in grace, for a habitation of God through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.

PRAYER.

O thou who dwellest in the heavens, King eternal, immortal, and invisible, with reverence and humility would we this evening bow ourselves before thee. Thou dwellest in light inaccessible and full of glory. Myriads of holy spirits are around thy throne, delighting to celebrate thy praise, and rejoicing to do thy will. What is man that thou shouldst be mindful of him, or the children of men that thou shouldst deign to visit them. Thou didst indeed create man very good, and didst delight in the work of thy hands; but man being in honour abode not; he rebelled against the God who made him; he became sinful himself, and entailed corruption and woe on all his posterity. We had all gone astray like lost sheep; we had all walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in trespasses and sins, sent his Son to quicken us, that we who were without Christ, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world, might be reconciled in the body of Christ's flesh, through death; and though once far off, might be made nigh by the blood of Christ, having, through him, access by the Holy Spirit unto the Father, that we may be presented holy, and unblameable, and unprovable in his sight, with exceeding joy. O may it be our joyful experience that Christ has become our peace, and that by the cross he has slain the enmity, and has enabled us to come unto God as children to a Father, who is both able and willing to help us. Meditating much on the wonders of redeeming love, may we say, We are not our own, but bought with a price, not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot; therefore will we glorify thee in our bodies and in our spirits, as we are wholly thine. May we remember that by grace we are saved through faith, and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast; and may we show that, as believers, we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works, that we should walk therein; and may our lives be a song of gratitude and praise to him who loved us, and gave himself for us. Bless our brethren of mankind. Have mercy on those who are yet fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind. May they be led to see that the end of these things is death; and when roused to a sense of their guilt and their danger, they cry, What shall we do to be saved? lead them to him who came to seek and to save that which was lost. Lead them to flee to him as the stronghold; and may they find that he is a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the storm. Bless this family and household, and all our friends. May we all be of the household of God, built on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. Hear our prayers, and grant an answer in peace, for Christ's sake. Amen.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH LII. LIII.

REMARKS.

CHAP. LII. This chapter refers to the deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity; but it must be understood also, as pointing to more spiritual and more interesting events, namely, the restoration of the Jews to the church, and the deliverance of the Gentiles from ignorance and idolatry, by the gospel of the Son of God. Ver. 13—16. These verses properly belong to the next chapter. Behold the blessed Redeemer in the depth of his humiliation, the height of his exaltation, and the glorious success of his cause among the nations of the earth. May the opposition of kings and of people give way to the reception of his gospel in love; may the nations be sprinkled with his atoning blood and purifying Spirit, that they may see and understand the things which belong to their everlasting peace.

CHAP. LIII. This is one of the most important chapters in all the prophetic writings. It is so full, so plain, so rich, so minute and circumstantial, in all that relates to the person, character, and office of Christ, that it might rather be taken for a history of past events than a prophecy of things to come. Well might the eunuch ask Philip, Acts viii. 34, 'I pray thee of whom speaketh the prophet thus? of himself, or of some other man?' The ancient Jews admitted that the whole chapter related to the Messiah; but since the Messiah has come, and the prophecy, to the very letter, been fulfilled in him, they interpret it as referring to themselves, and the judgments inflicted upon their nation by the Romans. Alas! the veil is still upon their hearts, but when they shall be turned to the Lord, it shall be taken away, and this chapter will then perhaps become the principal source of conviction to the whole nation. We have, 1. The prediction of the unbelief of the Jewish nation. Ver. 1. The Jews looked for a Messiah clothed with temporal power and authority, and hence they despised the poor and lowly Jesus of Nazareth, saying, 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' Let not pride and prejudice blind our minds to the importance of the gospel report, but let us account it 'a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' 2. From ver. 2—9. We have an account of the low condition, undeserved contempt, and extreme sufferings of the Saviour. How mean his external appearance! 'as a root out of a dry ground,' &c. His parentage obscure, his circumstances poor, his companions illiterate, humble fishermen. How deep his sorrow and sufferings! 'A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.' 'My soul,' said he, 'is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death,' Luke xxii. 42—44. How great the contempt with which he was treated! 'He was despised, and we esteemed him not.' How injurious the opinion formed of his sufferings! 'We did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted,' as one justly punished for his own offences. How great his love! 'All we like sheep had gone astray, and the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all.' How patient and meek in the midst of his sufferings! 'He was oppressed and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth,' Matt. xxvi. 67, 68. How iniquitous his sentence! 'He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth.' How efficacious his death! 'With his stripes we are healed.' Ponder, O my soul, on the sufferings of thy Saviour, and remember these were all borne for thee. Ever plead the atonement of his death. 'Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.' We have, lastly, the glory consequent upon the sufferings of Christ. Ver. 10—12. 'He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied.' How remarkable the expression! What an inexpressible dignity does this consideration confer on the redemption of man! Let us seek, by penitent and obedient lives, to add to that delight which the Saviour experiences in contemplating the trophies of his victory, the purchase of his blood, the monuments of his grace. And having ourselves tasted that the Lord is gracious, may we cheerfully embrace every opportunity to extend the knowledge of his gospel throughout the world.

PRAYER.

Our Father who art in heaven, we thine unworthy creatures, thy rebellious children, would this morning bow before thee, to thank and to bless thy holy name for all thy goodness and mercy towards us. Thou causest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice over us; thou fillest our mouths with food and our hearts with gladness, and by the visitation of thy Spirit are our lives preserved. We bless thee especially for that rich provision which thou hast made for our spiritual wants in the gospel of thy Son, in that we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of our sins, according to the riches of his grace. We rejoice that thou didst so love our world as to give thine only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life. Herein indeed is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and gave his Son to die for us. O may we ever join trembling with our mirth, knowing this is the condemnation, that light has come into the world, and men love the darkness rather than the light. But may the consideration of thy great love to us in the gift of thy Son constrain us to live no longer to ourselves, but to him that died for us and rose again. Truly, all we like sheep had gone astray, we had turned every one to his own way, and thou didst lay on him the iniquity of us all. We bless thee that the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and that with his stripes we are healed. Grant that whilst we contemplate the sufferings of the Son of God, endured on our behalf, our hearts may be melted into contrition and love. May we see in these sufferings the exceeding demerit of sin, and be led to hate it perfectly, and to shun every appearance of evil. May we learn in the price paid for our redemption, something of the worth of the soul and the weight of eternity, that we may be led with truly penitent hearts and humbled minds to lay hold on the hope set before us in the gospel, that Christ may be formed in our hearts the hope of glory; that in us he may see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied; that being delivered out of the hand of all our spiritual enemies, we may serve thee without fear, in holiness and righteousness, all the days of our lives. And, O Lord our God, whilst we desire an interest in all the blessings of salvation for ourselves, we pray that thy saving health may be made known to all the nations of the earth. Extend the bounds of our Redeemer's kingdom. Build up the waste places in Zion. Increase the number of faithful ministers, and grant them an abundant supply of the spirit of wisdom and love. Make bare thy holy arm, that all the ends of the earth may see the salvation of our God. We thank thee, O God, for thy care of us last night, and for the health and comforts of this morning. Give us this day our daily bread, preserve us from all evil, keep us back from all sin, and lead us in the way everlasting. In mercy visit the sick and the dying, comfort the mourner, be gracious to all who are dear to us, and bless all for whom we should pray. And now unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and unto the Father and ever blessed Spirit, be glory and dominion, for ever and ever. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM xcvi. 1.

SCRIPTURE—EPHESIANS iii.

REMARKS.

1. This chapter consists of two parts. The first, from ver. 1—13, inclusive, in which the apostle notices his own appointment by God to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, and the discovery of the mystery of their calling into the Christian church. The second, from ver. 14—21, contains a most devout and affectionate prayer by the apostle for the Ephesian converts.

Paul was now a prisoner at Rome, in the cause of Christ, and for the sake of the Gentiles. The calling of the Gentiles is here styled a mystery. How thankful ought we to be for the discovery of the knowledge of this mystery, yea, and of a greater mystery, God manifested in the flesh. The revelation of this mystery was made to the apostle by the Spirit. Note. All thorough and saving knowledge of the things of God must be taught us by his own Spirit. Ver. 2, 7, 8. Paul was called directly by the Lord himself to the office of the ministry, (Acts ix.) and by the effectual working of his power was he made a new man, and duly qualified for that important service. How wonderful the triumphs of divine grace!

Ver. 10, 11. How great must have been the admiration of the angelic hosts when they beheld the eternal purposes and manifold wisdom of God clearly discovered in the full developement of the plan of man's redemption. Ver. 12. Christ is the way unto God, both of access and of acceptance, and faith in him expels all servile fear, so that we can come with the humble confidence of children unto a father. Ver. 13. It is an honour to suffer for Christ, 1 Peter iv. 16.

2. Ver. 14—19. In this prayer notice, (1.) The posture of the apostle. In drawing nigh unto God in prayer, if the heart be filled with a sense of his awful majesty, the outward behaviour will always be becoming, humble, and reverent. Observe, (2.) The title by which he addresses God,—the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ! Observe, (3.) The subject of his prayer, which is, First, ver. 16. The Spirit of God is the source of all strength in the Christian. Faith, love, and hope, all the graces of the Christian life, are wrought in the renewed soul by his operations, according to his unbounded fullness of power, wisdom and mercy. God's goodness is his glory, Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19. Second, ver. 17. When the Spirit has wrought a conviction of the infinite importance of Christ to the soul, and impressed the heart with a clear and lively apprehension of him, in his glorious person, infinite love, and atoning death, then is Christ enthroned in the heart, a constant dependence is placed on his merit and promises, his word is studied, his commandments obeyed, and the disposals of his providence cheerfully submitted to. Third, latter clause of ver. 17—19. 1. Unless we be fixed in our love to God, our Saviour, and to one another, we shall neither be steadfast and immovable, nor abound in the work of the Lord. If we be not 'rooted and grounded in love,' we shall become unstable as water and can never prevail. But 2. and chiefly, The mystery of redeeming love is known in some measure and degree by all saints, and the more our hearts are brought under the influence of faith and love, the better able shall we be more clearly to understand it, and more firmly to believe it. Lastly, the apostle concludes with an ascription of praise unto God, ver. 20, 21. Mark the representation which he here gives of God, as not only able to do all that he had asked, but 'above all,' yea, 'exceeding abundantly above all he could ask or think.' 'The stores of God's grace and mercy are inexhaustible,' James i. 5; Psalm lxxxi. 10.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, we adore thee as the Father of our spirits and the framer of our bodies, the source of all our blessings and the foundation of all our hopes. We rejoice that ever thou didst proclaim thy name to be the Lord, the Lord God merciful and gracious, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin. We bless thee that thou didst lay our help upon One who is mighty, and that when the fullness of the time was come thou didst send forth thy Son, made under the law, to redeem us from its curse. This is indeed a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, even the chief. We bless thee for all that he did, and taught, and suffered, while he remained upon earth, for the words of salvation which flowed from his lips, and for the atoning sacrifice which he offered for sin by his death upon the cross. We thank thee for the gracious commission given to his apostles, to preach the gospel to every creature; that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, unto all who believe. We thank thee that to us has the word of this salvation come. O grant that we may feel all its transforming energy and power upon our hearts and lives; that being delivered from all ignorance, and error, and sin, we may be unto the Lord for a peculiar people, zealous of good works; that having in us the hope which the gospel inspires, we may rise superior to all the trials and temptations of life, and purify ourselves even as thou art pure. For this cause would we bow the knee unto thee the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that thou didst grant us, according to thy riches in glory, to be strengthened with all might by thy Spirit in the inner man, that Christ may dwell in our hearts by faith, that being rooted and grounded in love we may be able to comprehend with all saints the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, and to be filled with the fullness of God. Give us much of that faith which worketh by love, purifieth the heart, and overcometh the world, that we may walk by faith and not by light, that the lives which we now lead in the flesh may be by the faith of the Son of God. Shed abroad abundantly thy love in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, and teach us to love thee, the Lord our God, supremely, and each other with true hearts fervently. Clothe us with humility, and give us the meek and quiet spirit which in thy sight is of great price. We thank thee, heavenly Father, for thy care of us during the past day, for the supply of our wants, and the protection of thy kind providence. We commit ourselves this night to thy care and keeping. Spread the curtain of thy providence around our dwelling, and let no evil come nigh to us. Bless our family and dwell in it. May each member of it be a subject of thy renewing grace, and an heir of life eternal. Bless all our friends. Supply the wants of thine own people. Dwell in the families of all who call upon thy name, and greatly increase the number of them that fear thee. And now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think, be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XXX. 4.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH LIV. LV.

REMARKS.

CHAP. LIV. The prophet having, in the preceding chapter, spoken of the humiliation, sufferings, and death of Christ, and the consequent glory and blessed fruits which would result therefrom, proceeds now to foreshow more fully the great enlargement, prosperity, and security of the church under the Christian dispensation. Ver. 1—4. The church, represented here under the character of a married woman who had long been without children, is called upon to break forth into singing, and to enlarge greatly the bounds of her habitation, on account of the numerous offspring which should be born into her family. Great blessings and privileges are promised to her children, though she had departed from the Lord.

CHAP. LV. VER. 1—3. How rich and free are the invitations of the gospel! Under the emblems of water, wine, and milk, are the blessings of salvation offered to all—to all who thirst, that is, to all who vehemently and ardently seek after them. Thirst is a very painful sensation; and when a man has been thoroughly awakened to a sense of his real character and state before God, then will he be forced to cry out, What shall I do to be saved? who shall deliver me from the wrath to come? Then will he be disposed to hearken diligently to the message of the gospel, and joyfully to embrace its salvation. The emblems here employed are striking and instructive. Water is fertilizing, cleansing, necessary to life, and suited to men of all countries and climes. The blood of Christ cleanses from all sin, his Spirit quickens and sanctifies the soul, and renders it fruitful in every good word and work; his gospel is glad tidings of great joy to all nations, and its blessings are adapted to the exigencies of the whole human race. Lord, evermore give us this water, that we thirst not. Wine and milk refresh, and nourish, and strengthen, and comfort the body; and the precious promises of the gospel, the gracious communications of God's Spirit, refresh the soul during its journey through the wilderness, strengthen it for duty, comfort it under trials, and nourish it up till it comes to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. May we by a believing application of the grace of the gospel to ourselves, secure an interest in these blessings. Note. All who pursue unlawful pleasures; all who pursue lawful objects, whilst they forget things unseen and eternal; all who maintain a form of godliness, but remain strangers to its power; all who are seeking happiness in the creature, and not in the Creator, may justly be said to spend their money for that which is not bread, and their labour for that which satisfieth not. How great is the number, how extreme the folly and danger of all such! Ver. 6, 7. Mark, 1. Our duty. We must seek the Lord by fervent, persevering, believing prayer; by repentance and reformation, both of heart and of life; by returning unto the Lord from whom we have deeply revolted. 2. The motives presented, (1.) Of terror and alarm. The words in the 6th verse represent God in the attitude of one withdrawing himself from us. 'While he may be found,' 'while he is near,' evidently imply that he will not always be found, will not always be near. Short as the life of man is, his day of salvation is sometimes shorter. This was the case with many of the Jews in the days of our Saviour, as appears from his own language, Matt. xiii. 15; Luke xix. 42. God will not withhold pardon from returning penitents, how numerous or aggravated soever their transgressions may have been; but sinners may so completely silence the remonstrances of conscience, and extinguish every religious feeling, as to render their salvation impossible, without God's departing from the ordinary means which he employs to save them, Hosea iv. 17. O Lord, keep our hearts soft, and our consciences tender, and ever teach us to do thy will. (2.) Of encouragement. He will have mercy upon us and abundantly pardon. The goodness of God should lead us to repentance, Ezek. xviii. 32. Ver. 8—13. It is matter for constant gratitude that God's thoughts and ways are not as ours. He deals not with us as we would with one another, but manifests long-suffering and forbearance, Psalm ciii. 11. The preaching of the gospel, making known God's promises and purposes towards our fallen race, is his own ordinance, and we ought to rejoice that his word is pledged, that in defiance of all opposition it shall prosper and prevail. Let us ever seek to feel its power upon our hearts and lives, that we may be unto God for a people, and for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory.

PRAYER.

Father of peace and God of love, it well becomes us to show forth thy praises every morning, and to speak of thy faithfulness every night. For thou art good unto all, and thy tender mercies are over all thy works. It is because thy good hand has been upon us that we have been preserved even until now. Thou hast kept our eyes from tears, our feet from falling, and our souls from death. O enable us to walk before thee in the land of the living. Teach us to feel our dependence on thee for life, and breath, and all things, to know the obligations under which we lie to serve thee, and ever to remember our accountableness unto thee our judge. O Lord, we confess our sins and shortcomings in thy sight; thou knowest all our sins, all our foolishness is before thee. O deal not with us as we have sinned against thee; reward us not according to our deserts, but in the midst of deserved wrath remember us in mercy. Show us thy mercy and grant us thy salvation, love us with that love which thou bearest unto thine own, and let no iniquity ever have dominion over us. May our sins be all washed away in the blood of atonement, and may we have the new heart and the right spirit given to us, that henceforth we may no more go back, but keep thy precepts continually. Too long, alas! have we spent our money for that which was not bread, and laboured for that which satisfied not. We have set our affections upon the creature more than upon thee the Creator, but now would we desire to return unto thee, now would we forsake all our sinful ways and unrighteous thoughts. Do thou, O Lord, have mercy upon us. Pour out upon us a spirit of grace and of supplication, that we may seek thy face with our whole heart. Work in us that repentance which needeth not to be repented of, that henceforth we may keep ourselves unspotted from the world, and shun every appearance of evil. Yea, work in us all the good pleasure of thy goodness, and the work of faith with power, that our fruit may be unto holiness, and the end life everlasting. Lord, make us to know our end, and the measure of our days what it is, that we may know how frail we are. Give us to believe more truly the reality of things unseen and eternal, to feel their importance more deeply, and to live more constantly under their influence. Enable us to lead the life of the righteous, that our last end may be as his. We thank thee for thy care of us during the last night; we have lain down and slept, and have again awakened, because thine arm sustained us. Preserve us this day in thy fear, guide us in the path of duty, of purity, and of peace. Bless the people among whom we dwell; preside over us, and prosper thine own cause in the midst of us. Let thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven. Take away all our sins, and hear our prayers, for our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXVIII. 18.

SCRIPTURE—EPHESIANS IV.

REMARKS.

In this chapter, we have, First, Some very affectionate exhortations, and some weighty motives presented, to Christian unity, peace and concord. The apostle exhorts, 1. Generally, to a becoming Christian walk. Ver. 1. The promises and prospects to which Christians are called by the gospel, require of them a corresponding temper and conduct. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' 2. And more particularly, to cultivate those dispositions by which love and harmony can alone be maintained. Ver. 2, 3. Lowliness of mind will lead us to esteem others better than ourselves, and guard us against pride, by which cometh contention. Meekness will dispose us to be careful not to offend others, and not to be easily offended ourselves. 'Long-suffering and forbearance in love.' How opposite is this to the spirit of the world! Man is naturally a resentful being, Titus iii. 2. But the gospel inculcates a different spirit, and where its power is felt there is that disposition of love which leads to the patient bearing of injuries, and which prompts us to do good to them that hate us, and to pray for them that despitefully use us. 'The fruit of the Spirit is love.' May he ever fill our hearts with that charity which is the bond of perfectness. Motives to unity. Ver. 4—6. In these important particulars all true Christians are in reality united, and ought they not to live together in love and peace? How much would Christianity be recommended to the world were its professors of one mind and of one heart! And how trifling and unimportant will many of those things be found at last, when the days of ignorance and imperfection are over, which now keep those asunder who are one in the great essentials of salvation! Ver. 7—16. The grand end of that variety of gifts and graces which the great Head of the church had bestowed upon its members, was designed to promote this very object, 'to perfect the saints, to edify the body of Christ,' that is, the church, 'till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of Christ, unto a perfect man.' Note, ver. 8. When Christ ascended up on high he ascended as a triumphant conqueror. 'I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand.' Learn, (v. 14.) the necessity of being well-grounded in the knowledge of the great doctrines of the gospel—of holding fast the profession of faith without wavering—of being established in the truth.

We have, Second, Exhortations to holiness, and purity of heart and life, to the renunciation of the old and the putting on the new man, to guard against every thing that would be displeasing to the Spirit of God. Let us cultivate the tender and forgiving Spirit exhibited to ourselves by the Lord Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit cannot suffer grief as we do; the expression is used merely to suit our apprehension and capacities, and means that we should not conduct ourselves in such a manner as might justly give him offence, as might, humanly speaking, furnish him with a cause of grief. Let us take care that we despise not his admonitions, that we turn not a deaf ear to his friendly voice, that especially we guard against the sins enumerated and forbidden in this chapter, as lying, stealing, anger, corrupt communication, bitterness, evil-speaking, and malice.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, to whom can we go but unto thee, thou hast the words of eternal life, thou art the God of salvation? Thou art good, and thy tender mercies are over all thy works; we are the living monuments of thy sparing mercy. For iniquities we confess prevail against us, do thou blot out all our transgressions. Hide thy face from our sins, and give us to know the blessedness of the man whom thou choosest and causest to approach unto thee. We bless thee that thou hast no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, but rather that all should turn unto thee and live. Turn us, O Lord, and we shall be turned; draw us, and we shall run after thee; heal us, and we shall be healed; save thou us, and we shall be saved. For the sake of thy dear Son who died for our sins, do thou heal all our backslidings, receive us graciously and love us freely. We rejoice that he died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God. We bless thee for the hopes and promises of the gospel. We rejoice that life and immortality have now clearly been brought to light, that thou hast made known to us the way everlasting. O teach and enable us to improve diligently the means of grace with which we are so highly favoured, remembering to whom much is given, of them much shall be required. May we be enabled to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called; to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour by a life and conversation becoming the gospel; so to conduct ourselves at all times and in all circumstances, that we may not grieve thy Holy Spirit, by whom we are sealed unto the day of redemption. God of all grace, do thou shed down thy Holy Spirit upon our hearts in rich abundance, to inspire us with a hatred of every thing that is displeasing to thee, and to form us to a love of universal goodness, and a desire to make continual advancements in it. For this end, bless to us those religious services in which as a family we engage. May we wait upon thee in them with prepared hearts, that we may be acceptable worshippers in thy sight. Enable us to hear thy word with due attention, open our minds to all the instructions which we receive from it, and bow our hearts to humble obedience. By thy grace may we ever be enabled to show mercy and speak truth, to do righteousness and to follow peace. Fill us with all kind and charitable dispositions towards each other, and let the peace of God rule in our hearts. May we ever keep our tongue from evil and our lips from speaking guile. And may the very God of peace himself sanctify us wholly; and we pray God that our whole spirit, and soul, and body, may be preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord Jesus. We pray for the advancement of the gospel in the world, and for the conversion of Jews and Gentiles. May those places of the earth which are still the abodes of horrid cruelty, be speedily visited with the peace-giving life-inspiring influences of the Sun of righteousness. And, O God of love and mercy, do thou spread among Christians of every profession a spirit of forbearance, and candour, and love, that all may endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Be favourable to our beloved land. Bless our friends and give them an interest in the salvation of Christ. Look in mercy upon the sick, and sanctify affliction to them. Visit the dying to save them, and teach us to remember the shortness of time and the awful importance of eternity. Bless the young with teachable minds and sanctified hearts, that they may remember thee their Creator. Watch over us this night. May we lie down impressed with a sense of thy goodness, may we awake in thy fear, enjoying thy favour, and rise with renewed strength to discharge the duties of life and with more confirmed resolutions to run the way of thy commandments. Hear our prayer, forgive our sins, sanctify our nature and save our souls, for our Redeemer's sake, thy Son. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XIV.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH LIX.

REMARKS.

What a sad picture of our natural depravity does this chapter exhibit! Even the nation most highly favoured of heaven, and in the days of such a prophet as Isaiah, is conspicuous for every species of daring and hateful crime! But how awful is the accumulation of national guilt also, even in our own enlightened and privileged land! The description here given of the impiety and degeneracy of Israel is too faithfully realized in this Christian country. 'None calleth for justice, nor pleadeth for truth; they trust in vanity and speak lies; they conceive mischief and bring forth iniquity. Judgment is turned away backward and justice standeth afar off; for truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter.' In public and in private, among rulers and ruled, there is a deplorable laxity of right and high-toned principle. Not the glory of God or the love of righteousness, but carnal expediency and selfish ambition, are the prevailing motives by which men are actuated. And vast multitudes have openly cast off all fear of God, and walk after the counsel of their own wicked hearts, indulging without remorse in every bad passion, and perpetrating the most horrid crimes, so unavailing are the greatest external advantages in checking the progress of vice, or in restraining the native wickedness of the human heart, out of which proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, blasphemies. Let us bewail then the sin of our nature—let us mourn over the guilt of our country—let us confess with deep contrition our own personal pollution and multiplied offences.

But let us meditate for a moment on sin's awful consequences. It has occasioned a rupture betwixt heaven and earth. It has rendered God the enemy of man, and man the enemy of his own happiness. It has separated the creature from the Creator, and caused the Almighty to hide his face in anger from our fallen and miserable race! And the worst feature of our apostacy, as well as the strongest proof of it, is our strange unwillingness to be cured. We love our sins so well, and have such a rooted aversion to holiness, that we wish to be let alone in our carnal pursuits and indulgencies, and would rather die in cleaving to them than be turned from our iniquities and live. But let none say that there is any want either of power or will on the part of God to save them, while their own consciences tell them that they are attached to the ways of sin. For although it is only through faith in the righteousness of Christ that we can obtain a title to the blessings of salvation, yet personal holiness is one of those blessings, and is an indispensable qualification for heaven. The love of sin must be eradicated from our hearts, and the love of righteousness implanted in them, before we can enjoy the divine friendship. And whatever our privileges or professions may be, or however multiplied our sacrifices or our prayers, the Lord will not hear us, but will hide his face from us, if we regard iniquity in our hearts.

Yet it is a consoling truth to the church and to every humble and right-hearted Christian, that times of sad declension and abounding iniquity shall be succeeded by seasons of revival. Although spiritual religion may be reduced to a low ebb, and the love of many may wax cold, and profligacy and crime may become general and daring, although the enemies of God may muster their forces, and threaten like a mighty inundation, to overwhelm and bear down every remaining land mark of pure religion and undefiled, yet the Spirit of the Lord will lift up a standard against them, and utterly defeat and scatter their wicked imaginations. They may hatch cockatrice (or serpent's) eggs—they may plot mischief and propagate poisonous error, by which, alas! many souls may be corrupted and ruined. But their counsels shall come to nought, and they shall fall into their own snare. Wickedness shall not always prosper, truth shall ultimately triumph over all iniquity. When the divine Redeemer shall come in the power of his kingdom, he shall purify his church and destroy his enemies. His gospel shall be preached from one generation to another, and his Spirit shall not fail to accompany it with demonstration and power, and to render it effectual for enlightening and reforming the nations, till all the kingdoms of this once rebellious world shall become the one blessed and obedient kingdom of Messiah!

PRAYER.

O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping covenant and mercy to them that love thee, and to them that keep thy commandments, we are ashamed and blush to lift up our faces before thee, for we have sinned and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts and thy judgments. Our sins, alas, have separated us from thy favour, and exposed us to thy dreadful wrath. And we are so blind and infatuated as to love our iniquities and go after our idols, forsaking thee the living God, the fountain of living waters, the source of all spiritual life, and light, and joy. We have all gone astray like lost sheep, we have turned aside every one unto his own way, and the way of peace we have not known. And our sins are deeply aggravated by the peculiar favour thou hast shown us. We have abused our high privileges, we have despised our own mercies, we have neglected the warning voice of thy word, we have resisted the striving of thy Spirit with our hearts. Surely our wound is incurable, we have refused to be healed. Yet to the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him. Thy hand is not shortened that it cannot save. But we have reason to lament our own perverseness in cleaving to our sins, and our own aversion to apply for the precious blessings of thy grace. O turn us therefore and we shall be turned. Grant us a deep and affecting sense of our own depravity and blindness, of our own guilt and folly in being so backward to avail ourselves of the new and living way by which we have access to thy favour. Turn us effectually both from the love and practice of iniquity. And cherish in our hearts every holy principle and devout affection, that we may serve thee the Lord our God in newness of life, imitating the perfect and blessed example of our divine Redeemer. But we have reason to bewail before thee, not only our own personal corruption and guilt, but our barren and unfruitful condition as a church of Christ, and our woeful degeneracy as a Christian nation. We have provoked thee to anger by our sins, and exposed ourselves to thy just and awful judgments. O Lord, we humbly deprecate thy wrath against our sinful land. Deprive us not of our privileges, but give us grace to improve them better. Cut us not down as cumberers of the ground, but in mercy prolong our space for repentance, and send us times of revival and times of refreshing from thy presence. In the midst of wrath remember mercy. Let not the wickedness of the wicked prosper. Lift up a standard against the enemies of piety and righteousness, and arrest the progress of sin. Heal the backslidings of thy people, and all the unseemly divisions of the church. Give greater efficacy to the ministrations of thy servants and to the word of thy grace, that sinners may be converted unto thee, and all thy people edified and built up in love. And may our own souls prosper and be in health before thee. May we be interested in the great salvation, and being justified through the blood of Jesus, may we share in the blessed triumph and coming glory of his kingdom. Pardon our many offences and direct our steps this day in thy ways. And hear us for our Saviour's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XLIII. 3.

SCRIPTURE—EPHESIANS V.

REMARKS.

Christian practice is based upon Christian doctrine. We must be well instructed in the great principles of the gospel, and in all its high and holy mysteries, to prepare us for serving God aright. The violation of the law rendered the gospel necessary, and it is now through the gospel alone that we can learn how to keep the law. It furnishes us with motives to obedience which can be derived from no other source. The peculiar doctrines of the gospel, therefore, must be constantly affirmed and illustrated, in order that they who believe in God may clearly see the reasons why they should be careful to maintain good works. It was accordingly the uniform method of the apostles to lay the foundation in doctrine, on which the superstructure of holiness was to be reared. And there is no other method that will ever prove effectual. To imagine that the grace of God which bringeth salvation can ever tend to licentiousness of practice, is to betray an utter misconception of its real nature and of the whole plan of redemption. We are not saved by our works, but we work because we are saved. Salvation is by grace, and a sense of obligation for the free gift of so unspeakable a benefit, attaches the pardoned and accepted sinner to the service of him who has bestowed it. So that without faith, by which the blessings of salvation are realized and appropriated (and faith implies knowledge of the doctrine) it is impossible to please God.

But how sublime is the believer's pattern! He is called to be a follower of God himself—to imitate the divine character—to aim at being perfect as his Father in heaven is perfect. And the love of Christ, 'who hath given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice unto God,' is proposed as the motive by which we should be influenced in aspiring to this exalted standard! The divine conduct is exhibited in the ways of his providence, and in the plans of his grace, to the children of men. It is reflected both from his works and from his word. His law is the transcript of his moral perfections, and the principles of that law are embodied in the bright and spotless example of 'God manifest in the flesh.' Here then are not only abstract rules given, but a living and glorious pattern is set before our eyes. If we keep our attention fixed then on this exalted pattern, and are actuated by the love of Christ, how can we have any fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness? How can we indulge in vile affections, in impurity, or in covetousness, which is idolatry? How can we be partakers with the children of disobedience? We are no longer in darkness, but are now light in the Lord, and must walk as children of the light, and reprove the works of darkness, by the holiness of our example. If we are raised from the death of sin, and Christ hath given us light, we must walk circumspectly, not as fools but as wise, redeeming the time, living to the glory of God, and preparing for a blessed eternity. We must shun intemperance and every carnal excess, and seek to be filled with the Spirit. We must be devout and humble, walking with God and delighting in spiritual exercises. We must not only regulate our outward behaviour, but our speech and our hearts also, by the precepts of the gospel, living 'as becometh saints,' and rising superior alike to the practice, and to the ridicule of an ignorant and ungodly world. For otherwise, we are mistaking the tendency of the gospel, and allowing ourselves to be deceived with vain words. Although we are not saved for the sake of our attainments in righteousness, yet without being made righteous we cannot inherit the kingdom of Christ and of God. Christianity inculcates the purest morality, and enjoins, from the highest motives, the faithful discharge of all relative duties.

PRAYER.

Almighty Father! enable us to draw near unto thee in the exercise of faith, and of a true heart, not trusting in our own righteousness, but in the merits and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ. O give us the Spirit of adoption, to produce and cherish in us the principles of a new and holy nature, that as dear children we may be followers of God, and walk in love as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us. We earnestly desire to be united to Christ by a living faith, that we may receive out of his fullness all needful supplies of grace, and may bring forth the fruits of righteousness and holiness in life and conversation to thy praise and glory. We devoutly thank thee for calling us out of darkness into thy marvellous light, if so be that we have tasted that the Lord is gracious. O teach and enable us to walk as children of light, having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reproving them by our good conversation. While we would place all our trust for acceptance in thy sight, in the atoning sacrifice and perfect righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ, we pray for grace to enable us to live as becometh saints, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, shunning all uncleanness and covetousness, all filthiness and foolish talking, and every sinful practice, and seeking to perfect holiness in thy fear. Having fled for refuge to Christ, the hope set before us in the gospel, may we never forget nor mistake the character which becomes his disciples. As he who hath called us is holy, so may we study to be holy also, in all manner of conversation and godliness. Grant us the grace of spiritual wisdom that we may understand what thy will is, and earnestly seek to fulfil it. O preserve us from all intemperance, and from every unhallowed indulgence and excess, that we may not dishonour thy holy name, nor degrade our Christian character. But fill our souls with the comforting and pervading presence of thy Holy Spirit, and with all peace and joy in believing. And give us grace to submit ourselves one to another in thy fear, and to discharge with fidelity all relative duties, taking Christ as our great example, and seeking to be subject unto him as the exalted Head and Husband of the church. In his name would we now desire to render thanks unto thee the Father, for the mercies of this day, and for all the temporal good we enjoy, but more especially for our invaluable spiritual privileges. And we pray for the enlargement of our Saviour's kingdom, and for the removal of every obstacle to its progress. May great accessions be daily made to that glorious church which is sanctified and cleansed with the washing of water by the word, and which Christ shall at last present to himself without spot or wrinkle or any such thing, that it may be holy and without blemish. O do thou graciously pardon the sins we have committed this day, and take us under thy providential care during the night. Never leave nor forsake us, but be our covenant God and everlasting portion. And all that we ask is for the sake of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be glory and dominion ascribed, now and for ever. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII. 17.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH LX.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

This chapter is strictly prophetic, and refers to a period still future. In elevated and magnificent strains it predicts the 'latter day glory,' the millennial rest and felicity of the church. It corresponds with several other prophecies of the same subject, particularly the description of the New Jerusalem in Rev. xxi.; although the latter, as a whole, seems to refer to a still more perfected condition of the church, even to its glorified and heavenly condition. Because it seems to be the city of Jerusalem which is here personified, sitting as a disconsolate widow in the dust, and mourning over her desolations, some have inferred that the prediction must relate to the restoration of the Jews. But although inclusive of that event, it cannot be restricted to that alone, for it is expressly said, 'the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising.' In the symbolical language of prophecy, Jerusalem and Zion are terms employed to signify the true and spiritual church of Christ, because they formed the literal seat of the church under the typical dispensation. And the figure here presented to us is beautifully poetical and striking. While darkness covers the earth, the church is portrayed as sitting in the midst of it in sackcloth and ashes, persecuted, afflicted, and forsaken. But comfortable words are addressed to her, and she is commanded to arise and put on her beautiful garments, and shine forth in the glorious lustre of her Lord, because the day of her light, her joy, and triumph is come. She is commanded to raise her down-cast weeping eyes, and behold, with wonder and with gladness, the converted nations flowing into her sanctuary from every region of the globe, and bringing along with them all the abundance of their wealth and honour! And a most animating description is given of this new and blessed era—this tide of prosperity setting in from all quarters upon the church, when God's set time to favour her is come. Her gates are represented as standing open continually day and night, for the admission of the converts who are repairing in crowds from every nation of the world, 'flying as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows.' All kings are vying with each other to do her honour, the descendants of her persecutors are making their humble submission unto her, and the sons of strangers building up her walls. And it is a very remarkable expression, that 'the nation and kingdom that will not serve her shall perish.' Nor is this state of the church's high prosperity to be transient and delusive, but to be stable and permanent. For 'her sun shall no more go down, neither shall her moon withdraw itself: for the Lord shall be her everlasting light, and the days of her mourning shall be ended.'

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

When the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ, rises upon the benighted soul of the sinner, with what new and holy lustre does he shine! Then all his darkness is dispelled—his ignorance is removed—the clouds of his fear and despondency are scattered, and his ravished eyes, anointed with heavenly eye-salve, look round upon new and joyful scenes. He now perceives the rich provision that is made for him—the eternal felicity and glory which await him. He perceives that all things are now his, and are working together for his good—that God is his friend, that salvation is his portion, and that heaven is his home. Though he suffer for a season, he knows that he shall soon be delivered out of all his trials. He knows that the Lord is his Saviour and Redeemer, who, in his favour, has had mercy upon him, and shall finally wipe away all tears from his eyes. And under all his temporary sorrows and afflictions, he is animated by the lively hope of that blessed inheritance, for which these are appointed to prepare him. But he remembers that the people of the New Jerusalem are all righteous—that violence shall no longer be heard in that happy land, wasting nor destruction within all its borders; and that nothing that is unclean shall ever enter into its gates of praise, or be admitted within its walls of salvation. And, therefore, the believer diligently cultivates holiness, and labours to purify himself even as Christ is pure. But what glorious things are spoken of Zion! And what a blessed world will it be, when God shall bring them to pass!

PRAYER.

O thou eternal Spirit, who didst, in the work of creation, cause the light to shine out of darkness, shine graciously into our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ. Our souls are by nature dark and polluted; and, alas! by reason of the ignorance that is in us, through the blindness and corruption of our hearts, we are alienated from God, and prone to prefer the darkness to the light. But, O do thou dispel the darkness, and subdue the enmity of our carnal minds, and shed abroad a divine light, and a divine love in our souls. Almighty Father, we thank thee for the external light and privileges of the gospel, for the record thou hast given of thy Son in the scriptures, for the knowledge of salvation, and for the offer and the means of eternal life. May we duly prize such blessed advantages, and rightly improve them. O give us grace that we may love the light, that we may come unto it, and walk in it. Give us the light of spiritual knowledge in our minds, and the light of faith and of hope in our hearts. And make the light of thy gracious and reconciled countenance to shine upon us, that we may know that our sins are forgiven, and that we are called by thy Holy Spirit to be partakers of the blessings of the new covenant. In thy wrath thou hadst reason to smite us; but glory to thy name, that in thy favour thou hast had mercy on us. O fulfil in our individual experience, all the good words and the comfortable words, thou hast spoken concerning thy Israel. Called out of nature's darkness, into thy marvellous light, O help us to walk as children of the light, and as becometh our high and holy calling, and our glorious destiny, ever remembering that we are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, and a peculiar people, and that we ought to shine as lights in the world. And we would rejoice, O Lord, in our connection with the church and kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. We thank thee for all thy precious promises regarding her extension, and her latter day glory; and we beseech thee to fulfil the blessed predictions which thy mouth hath spoken, and to hasten the happy era when darkness shall no more cover the earth, nor gross darkness the people; but when all the kings of the earth shall know and honour thee, and promote thy cause. Hasten, O Lord, the peace and prosperity of Zion, beautify the place of thy sanctuary, and glorify the house of thy glory. Put an end to the afflictions and persecutions of thy church, and let her no more be forsaken and hated; but let her be called the city of the Lord, the Zion of the holy One of Israel. Make her officers peace, and her exactors righteousness. Let her people also be all righteous, that it may be seen that she is the branch of thy planting, the work of thy hands, in which thou art glorified. And, O may we all share in her felicity, and be honoured to extend her blessed influence in our generation. Hear, O Lord, these our humble prayers, and mercifully pardon all our sins, for our Redeemer's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XCI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—EPHESIANS VI.

REMARKS.

This chapter naturally divides itself into two distinct parts, the first inculcating the reciprocal duties of various relations, and forming a sequel to chapter v.; the second exhorting believers to realize their danger, and to arm themselves against it. In every relation of life, we should seek to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, not forgetting that we owe many important duties to one another, whether as children or parents, servants or masters. God has placed us in the particular station we occupy, whether it be superior or subordinate, and to please him, and consult his glory, should be our high and holy aim, in faithfully and diligently performing whatever is required of us, 'doing the will of God from the heart.' This, indeed, will ever be the conscientious endeavour of every true Christian, who is actuated by the love, and seeks to regulate his whole temper, life, and conversation, by the law, and by the example of Christ. But alas! how sadly are relative duties neglected, even by many who make a religious profession. And how unlovely is the spectacle of undutiful children, and selfish or injudicious parents, and mercenary or dishonest servants, and proud or oppressive masters, with which even Christian society is too much disfigured! But these things ought not so to be; and we deceive ourselves if we suppose, that either our knowledge or profession will avail, if our practice be habitually at fault. Nor must we think it enough to approve of the duties of other relations, while we neglect those of our own, for this is a great source of self-deception. Masters, for instance, may highly approve of fidelity in servants, and servants of kindness and condescension in masters. But servants must study to be faithful, and masters to be kind and condescending themselves; and each in their own department, in these and in all other relations, to approve themselves unto God, with whom they have to do, and with whom there is no respect of persons.

But finally, how important is it for the Christian to realize his spiritual condition and danger, and to put on the whole armour of God, that he may resist the devil, and all the invisible powers of darkness, who are insidiously labouring to seduce him from his stedfastness, and to effect the eternal ruin of his soul! He cannot contend, indeed, with such formidable and malicious adversaries in his own strength; but the grace of God is sufficient for him, and he will be made strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. But while a complete suit of holy armour is provided for him, girded in which he cannot possibly be conquered, but must, on the contrary, be triumphantly victorious; while God has prepared for him both a breast-plate and a helmet, both a shield and a sword; the believer is required to 'put them on,' and to use them, otherwise he will not be able to withstand in the evil day. His shield is faith, his helmet is salvation, his breastplate is righteousness, and his sword is the word of God. And if he employs these divine weapons well, girding his loins also with truth, and having his feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, and continues instant and persevering in prayer, and in holy watchfulness, then the Spirit of God will 'teach his hands to war, and his fingers to fight,' and render him more than conqueror at last, through him that loved him, and gave himself for him. And every one who engages in the Christian warfare, will sympathise with his fellow-soldiers, who are fighting under the same banner, and the same Captain of salvation; and he will make supplication, not for himself alone, but also for all saints, and especially for the ministers of the gospel, that utterance may be given to them, and that they may open their mouths boldly and successfully for God.

PRAYER.

Heavenly Father, we would humbly approach thee with holy reverence, and yet with filial confidence; rejoicing to believe that with thee our God there is mercy, that thou mayest be feared, and that thou art now reconciling a guilty world to thyself, through the death of thine own Son. For his righteousness' sake, we implore thee to forgive our offences, and to renew our hearts. We lament the deep corruption of our nature, and our constant proneness in consequence of it, to forget and omit the duties thou requirest of us. We are convinced in our minds, that the way of duty is the way of happiness, and that there is no true satisfaction, no peace or profit in sin. But alas! we feel a law in our members, warring against the law of our minds, and preventing us from doing the things which we would. O do thou deliver us from the dominion of sin, and write thy law in our hearts, and give us the spirit of new obedience. Thou hast placed us in the various relations in which we stand to our fellow-men. May we study to discharge all the duties that belong to them in thy fear, and with a single eye to thy glory. We can do nothing in our own strength, but do thou, O Lord, make thy grace to be sufficient for us. And teach us ever to recognise, especially, the relations in which we stand to thee as creatures, and as redeemed sinners; and to feel the infinite obligations under which we are laid to serve thee, and the deep sense of gratitude by which we should be actuated. May it be our grand aim to please and honour God in all that we do. And may we daily search thy word, for the purpose of learning thy will, and with a sincere desire to perform it. But surrounded as we are in this sinful world with adverse influences, may we never foolishly trust in our own weak and treacherous hearts, but in the promised assistance of thy Holy Spirit. Fortify us to withstand the temptations by which we are assailed; help us to resist those formidable powers of darkness which are arrayed against us. Let not our great adversary the devil prevail over us, or entangle us by his insidious wiles. Enable us to put on the whole armour of God—to fight the good fight of faith, and in thy strength, to overcome all our spiritual enemies. We humbly thank thee for thy past goodness and protection. We pray for thy counsel to guide us this day, and during all our future progress on earth. And O grant us grace, so to employ our time here as to prepare for heaven. Graciously bless each of us, and all near and dear to us. Reward our benefactors, and forgive and change the hearts of our enemies. We pray for the universal diffusion of our holy religion, and for the entire subversion of all idolatry and sin. And we humbly entreat thee to hear and answer our prayers, for our divine Redeemer's sake. Amen.

THIRTY-NINTH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM XXXVII. 37—40.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CIX.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

In Acts i. 20, we have the inspiration of this portion of the word distinctly recognized, and are guided to a right interpretation of the same. From the application the apostle there makes of the eighth verse, 'his bishopric, or office, let another take,' the following things are abundantly evident—that the psalmist here speaks in the person of the Messiah; that the curses pronounced by him are to be regarded in the light of prophetic denunciations; and that they fell upon Judas, the son of perdition, and by parity of reasoning, may be considered as having fallen on his countrymen, who shared in his guilt, and filled up the measure of their iniquities by crucifying the Lord of glory. In their present condition we can clearly trace the various calamities which are here enumerated. Their habitation is desolate; their children wandering as outcasts; their labour spoiled; their name, as a church and a nation, blotted out; and their cursing is to them as the garment which covereth them, and for a girdle wherewith they are girded continually. When thus viewed, the psalm before us is peculiarly fitted to awaken our sympathy, stimulate our zeal, and call forth our prayers in behalf of the ancient people of God, who are yet to be brought into the fold of the Redeemer, as well as in behalf of all who are lying in wickedness, that they may be saved from the wrath to come, of which the misery of the Jews is only a faint representation.

God is the protector and avenger of all who put their trust in him, and has constituted prayer the medium through which he imparts to us the needed supplies of grace. Even the Redeemer gave himself to prayer, offered up supplications, with strong cryings and tears, and was heard in that he feared, ver. 1—4. The depravity of the heart is especially manifested in requiting his disinterested and unparalleled love with hatred, ver. 4, 5. The effects of unbelief and apostacy are felt in time as well as in eternity, by our posterity as well as by ourselves, ver. 6—20. All our pleas for deliverance should be grounded on the promised mercy of God, ver. 21—25. A sense of his gracious presence far outweighs every earthly trouble in which his service may involve us, ver. 26—28. The judgments of God on the enemies of his church furnish matter for praise, as thereby his administration is proved to be both holy and powerful, just and good, ver. 29—31.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Christ also hath suffered, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps. The conflict we have to maintain, the sufferings to endure, and the obloquy to encounter, are not for one moment to be compared with his. As he gave himself to prayer, so ought we. When our motives are misconstrued, our feelings wounded, our reputation or our usefulness marred, we must put far away from us the suggestions of unsanctified and worldly men, crush every thing like a proud and revengeful spirit, and commit our cause to God, who judgeth righteously. Let us think on him who endured such rebellion of sinners against himself. Let us seek by prayer the supplies of his Spirit, and we may rest assured they will not be withheld. They will be experienced by ourselves in a freedom from turbulent feelings, a holy serenity of soul. They will be seen by others in our meekness, patience, and fortitude, our spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. We will live down calumny and opposition, and force those to be ashamed who have falsely accused our good conversation in Christ.

PRAYER.

O God of our praise, we desire this morning to lift our souls in humble and grateful adoration unto thee. Turn not away our prayer from thee. Withhold not thy grace from us. Command thy blessing upon us, even life for evermore. What cause have we for gratitude that thou hast not cast us off for ever; that thou hast not rendered our habitation desolate, and brought wrath upon us even to the uttermost? We are enemies to thee in our minds by wicked works. We have manifested our enmity in various forms; in our aversion to prayer; in our want of subjection to thy law; in our neglect of the great salvation; in our practical disregard of thy threatenings; and in living to ourselves, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind. Our backslidings are many, they testify against us. We cast ourselves on thy mercy in Christ Jesus our Lord. Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously, so will we render unto thee the fruit of our lips, the sacrifice of praise continually. When we read in thy word of the awful effects of apostasy from thee, may we fear lest we fall after the same example of unbelief. May we watch unto prayer. May we cultivate a growing acquaintance with the character and work of Christ, and labour in his strength to enter into the rest that remains for the people of God. May we esteem his reproach greater riches than the treasures of the world, and not be overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good. Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou us from secret faults, keep us back from presumptuous sin, and let no iniquity obtain dominion over us. We thank thee for the undisturbed enjoyment of our spiritual privileges, and more especially for permitting us to see another sabbath. Unite our hearts to fear thy name, to hallow thy day, to utter abundantly thy praises, and to draw nourishment from thy word. Increase our spiritual appetite, and satisfy us with the goodness of thy house, even of thy holy place. Be very gracious to our pastor. Stand by and strengthen him in his varied labours. May he speak to the heart; by manifestation of the truth commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God, and be blessed of thee in winning souls to Christ. Awaken the careless to serious thought. Send relief to thy poor and afflicted ones. Save thy people, and bless their inheritance; feed them also, and lift them up for ever.

Forgive, we beseech thee, our manifold sins, and graciously accept of us for Christ's sake. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM XLV. 1—5.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS CX. CXI.

REMARKS.

The former of these psalms applies exclusively to Christ, who was both the Lord and the Son, the root and the offspring of David; and though written many ages before his advent, contains a full and most impressive description of his mediatorial kingdom.

Ver. 1. How exalted the station, which, as God-man, he occupies! His dominion, which was given him by the solemn decree of the Father from eternity, is fixed, supreme, and subversive of all opposition, so that every knee, either willingly or through overpowering dread, shall bow to him.

Ver. 2, 3. How extensive and gracious his conquests! When he ascended up on high, and sent forth his Spirit, giving effect to the rod of his strength—the gospel of his grace, which proceeded out of Zion or Jerusalem—then was the day of his power. The early converts to the faith, constrained by his love, made a voluntary surrender of themselves to him; sanctified by his Spirit, they shone in the beauties of holiness; and called secretly by his grace, out of every nation and every class, were countless as the drops of dew glistening when morning opens on tree, and bush, and flower.

Ver. 4. How full the provision made in and through him for their final salvation! By the decree of the Eternal, which, for our strong consolation, our sure ground of hope, was ratified by an oath, he was constituted a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek. That distinguished personage, in the days of Abraham, was invested both with the regal and priestly office; and as nothing is said of the time of his assuming or resigning the latter office; as he stands forth to view in the sacred volume simply in the character of priest of the most high God, and 'has a kind of perpetuity given to him,' he is a faint type of him who hath an unchangeable priesthood, and who is able to save to the very uttermost all who come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

Ver. 5, 6. How terrible when he rises to judgment! The kings of the earth may plot; the heads of many countries may combine; the beast and the false prophet may concentrate their forces to break in pieces his rod, and to wear out his saints; but in the day of his wrath they will be pierced through, and their ruin will be great and irretrievable.

Ver. 7. How broad and deep the foundation on which his mediatorial power rests! He has drunk of the brook or torrent issuing from the violated law and insulted government of God. He has endured that wrath which would have swept us away, and involved us in perpetual desolation; and what he has left behind of suffering, is just what is needed to conform us to his image, and prepare us for sharing in his glory.

PSALM CXI. forms an appropriate and beautiful sequel to the former, and is generally thought to have been used during the celebration of the pass-over, when all the males were assembled in Jerusalem. The grand theme of praise in the congregation of the saints is the works of the Lord. They trace with delight his wisdom, power, purity, and beneficence, manifested in them all. What awakens, however, their highest admiration, their most fervent gratitude, is the bread of life he has provided for their support, the heavenly Canaan he has given them in promise, which is greater far than the heritage of the heathen; the eternal covenant which he bears in mind, notwithstanding their unbelief, selfishness, and backslidings; the complete redemption from sin, death, and hell, he has sent them, through Jesus Christ the Lord. In these works, which will continue for ever, his name or character is clearly seen to be merciful and gracious, just and true, holy and reverend. Spiritual wisdom, good understanding to discern the glory of them, is to be found only in those who feel their own nothingness and unworthiness, and leads to increasing delight in holy living and grateful praising.

We are, either by baptism or by partaking of the Lord's supper, in profession the subjects of Christ, united to the assembly of his justified ones. Let us never forget that they only will be acknowledged as such who are born again by his Spirit through the word; who yield to him the throne of their hearts; who make war with the kingdom of satan in his strength; who seek to be conformed to his death; and who, by him, offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of their lips, giving thanks to his name.

PRAYER.

O God, thou art glorious above all blessing and praise. We have only a very faint conception of the greatness of thy majesty, the extent of thy dominion, the glory of thy character, the riches of thy grace, or the power of thy wrath. When we had fallen into the depths of guilt and misery, thou didst, in the fullness of time, send forth thine own Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem us who were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. We rejoice in the assurance that he has finished the work which thou gavest him to do; that he hath put away sin by the sacrifice of himself; that he hath brought in an everlasting righteousness; and that he is able to save to the very uttermost all that come unto thee by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. Penetrate us with a deep sense of our sinfulness. May we be ashamed and confounded, and never dare to open our mouths any more in our own defence. May we feel and acknowledge, that if we had our due, the place of torment would be our portion. May we seek and find redemption through the blood of Christ, even the forgiveness of all our sins. Make us a willing people in the day of thy power. Enrol us among the number of thy called, and chosen, and faithful ones. Nerve us for the contest with sin, satan, and the world. May we go forth to duty and trial, leaning on the omnipotent arm of the Redeemer; and may all our need be supplied out of thy riches in glory by Christ Jesus. Lord, increase the faith and patience of the saints. Give abundant success to the armies of the Lamb. Gird thy sword on thy thigh, O most Mighty, and in thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness. Hasten the time when every knee shall bow to Jesus, and every tongue confess that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Follow, we beseech thee, with thine enriching blessing, the dispensation of word and sacrament, this day throughout the church. May sinners in Zion be afraid. May the stout-hearted, and those who are far from righteousness, be subdued, and brought nigh unto thee by the blood of the cross. And may thine own people every where increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men. We bless thee for the continued supplies of spiritual food. Evermore give us the bread of life. Satisfy us early with thy mercy, so shall we rejoice and be glad all our days. Forgive, we humbly entreat thee, all our sins and shortcomings. Restore our souls, and lead us in the paths of righteousness for thy name's sake. We desire this evening to lie down in peace, committing ourselves, and all who are dear to us, to thy blessed guardianship. May we awake in safety, and ever walk closely with thee. Graciously listen to the voice of our petitions; and do unto us above all that we can ask or think, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXXVI.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH LXI. LXII.

REMARKS.

Our Lord applies the striking words with which the former of these chapters opens, to himself, and thus leaves us in no doubt of whom the prophet speaketh. (See Luke iv. 16.) Viewed in reference to him, this portion of the word is full of the most precious evangelical truth.

1. The solemn consecration of Christ. The Spirit of the Lord was upon him in unmeasured effusion.

He was anointed with the oil of gladness, and thereby invested with a fullness of gifts and graces.

2. The work he had to perform. To preach the gospel, or glad tidings of salvation, through his own death; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, the great spiritual jubilee, which, if misimproved, would be succeeded by a day of vengeance; and to do all this with effect, so that the meek, however poor, would be satisfied; the broken-hearted, however desperate their case, healed; the slaves of sin, however degrading their bondage, set free; and the mourners in Zion, however deep their dejection, comforted, and made to bring forth fruit with patience, to the praise and glory of God.

3. The enlargement of the church by the calling and conversion of the Gentiles, as well as the blessedness of the period when strangers should stand and feed the flock of Christ. Considered as a whole, it would be marked by a great regard to ordinances, and to those who faithfully administered them; by an increase of spiritual riches; the rolling away of reproach; the prevalence of truth and justice; most visible tokens of the divine regard, and sustained rejoicings in the perfection of the Redeemer's work, and the triumphs of his grace.

In the latter chapter the prophet dwells on the splendid vision presented to his mind, and intimates his resolution that he would plead, with holy importunity, till the righteousness of the Redeemer, in the salvation of his church, should shine with such brightness in the eyes of all nations, as to attract their adoring, confiding, and admiring regard. He then brings out, under the guidance of the Spirit, some additional features of this happy period.

1. The new name which would be given to the members of the church, a name which was actually bestowed when the gospel was first preached to the Gentiles as a body, and which is beautifully descriptive of their character, privileges, and hopes. The disciples were first called Christians at Antioch.

2. The peculiar honour conferred upon the church. She is represented as a crown of glory, a royal diadem in the hand of God, full of spiritual gems bought by the blood of Emmanuel, polished by his Spirit, and destined to shine for ever and ever. She is, moreover, represented as no longer desolate and forsaken, but married, standing in the high and blessed relation of spouse to Christ, and surrounded by a numerous and united progeny. What a meaning will be given to the words of the prophet when ancient Israel are restored to their own land, and after ages of desolation and trial have passed over them, are again received within the bosom of the Christian church.

3. The means by which the promises of God, in regard to the church, should be accomplished, even the earnest and continued prayers of the watchmen, or ministers of Zion, as well as of all the remembrancers of the Lord, those in every place who call upon his name.

4. The ample security that all would be fulfilled. The omnipotence of Jehovah was pledged to give the church outward prosperity as well as inward peace; to bless abundantly her provisions; to remove every obstacle in the way of her enlargement; and to render her not only an object of complacency to himself, but a source of light and centre of attraction to all around her.

The grand end which Christ has in view in all the light, freedom, peace, and consolation he imparts to the humble and penitent believer, is to render him fruitful in every good work.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, adored be thy name, that thou hast not left us like millions of our fellow-creatures, naturally no worse than we are, to feel after thee if haply we might find thee. Through the tender mercy of our God the day spring from on high hath visited us, to give light unto us who sat in darkness, and in the region and shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace. Thou hast brought near thy righteousness, and revealed unto us the abundance of grace and truth. Thou art inviting and beseeching us all, unworthy as we are, to receive the atonement; to be reconciled unto thee through the death of thy Son; to be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation. What manner of persons ought we to be in fervent gratitude, in deep humility, in holy conversation and godliness? Alas! we have requited thy love with the basest ingratitude. We have disregarded thy solemn and affectionate calls. We have undervalued the exceeding great and precious promises of the gospel. We have turned to our farms and our merchandise, our studies and amusements, and neglected the things that belong to our everlasting peace. We have grieved thy Spirit, both by our remissness and carnality. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. Blot out, we beseech thee, as a thick cloud, our transgressions, and as a cloud our sins. Revive and quicken us for thine own name's sake. Rescue us from the spiritual poverty, degradation, and misery, in which we are involved. Bring us into the glorious liberty of thy children. O let thy Holy Spirit be upon us, that we may venerate the power of the Redeemer; that we may confide in his love; that we may rejoice in his salvation; that we may grow in conformity to his image; and that we may seek the good of his church always. Lord, do thou accomplish, in thine own good time, the glorious things which thou hast spoken of Zion. Remove every obstacle in the way of her enlargement. Strengthen the bars of her gates. Preserve peace in her borders, and fill her with the finest of the wheat. Make bare thy holy arm in the conversion of thine ancient people, and render speedily Jerusalem a praise in the whole earth. We bless thee, O Lord, for thy protecting care, and thine unwea-ried goodness. Thou hast made our cup run over. Thou hast punished us far less than our sins deserve. In wrath thou hast remembered mercy. May our comforts be blessed, our trials sanctified, and our brotherly love increased. Be very gracious to all who are dear to us. If they be in danger, do thou protect them; if they be in sorrow, do thou comfort them; if they be exposed to temptation, do thou keep them from falling; and if they be still in their sins, do thou save them by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost. Give food to the hungry, execute judgment for the oppressed, and raise up all that are bowed down. O Lord, hear; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not for thine own name's sake. And unto thee be ascribed all glory and power for ever and ever. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE XXII. 5.

SCRIPTURE—PHILIPPIANS I.

REMARKS.

Paul here associates Timothy with himself, because he happened to be with him in Rome, where he was a prisoner, and was well known to the Philippians as his beloved companion and devoted fellow-labourer. He addresses the saints in Christ Jesus, those who were sanctified by his Spirit, with the bishops and deacons, or pastors and elders, the only two permanent office bearers in the Christian church. After the usual salutation, which comprises every spiritual blessing, he expresses his gratitude to God that, by the reception of the gospel, they were partakers with him of grace, and joined together in holy communion; and his conviction, from the sympathy they felt with him in his bonds, that the good work begun in them was of God, and consequently could not fail to reach a glorious termination. Aware, however, that his gracious purposes were usually carried into effect through the use of means, he proceeds to avail himself of these. He first of all lifts a comprehensive prayer in their behalf, that their love might be expanded by an increase of spiritual knowledge; a growing experience of the graciousness of God, so that they might be quick in discerning what was good, sincere, inoffensive, and steady in pursuing it, abounding in holy and benevolent deeds to the praise of grace. He next endeavours to obviate the offence which his imprisonment in Rome, with all his subsequent trials, might occasion, assuring them that they had fallen out rather to the furtherance of the gospel. Some, even in the palace of Nero, where vice reigned triumphant, had, through his instrumentality, cordially embraced the truth. Others, who had yielded to fear, and shrunk from an undisguised profession of Christianity, had, on witnessing his holy fortitude, assumed a decided tone, and preached the word undeterred by what man could do unto them. And though some, under the cloak of zeal, and a form of sound words, had sought to diminish his authority and pierce him to the heart, still even they, by the eternal truths which they promulgated, advanced, contrary to their intentions, in spite of themselves, the common cause. In the advancement of this cause he saw abundant ground for rejoicing. As for himself, he dreaded not their opposition, convinced that, through the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ given in answer to their prayers, it would turn to his salvation, or progressive sanctification. He feared not death, knowing it would be gain, an immense accession to his happiness. He had a desire to depart and to be with Christ, ushered into the glorious presence of him who was the Author and end of his life, his all in all; and he clung to existence not from any selfish considerations, but for this reason, among others, that he might contribute to their furtherance and joy of faith. Lastly, he exhorts them to demean themselves in a way becoming the gospel. Efforts would be made to move them away from their faith and hope. They were to be united and determined in their resistance, accounting their sufferings for the sake of Christ a peculiar honour conferred on them; a token of their salvation; a proof that they shared in his conflict, and consequently would share in his reward.

What elevation of mind! what generosity of disposition! what purity of heart! what singleness of purpose! what conspicuous evidences of grace! Have we so learned Christ? Is the same mind in us that was in him? tender sympathy with others; earnest prayer for their and our growth in grace; humble acquiescence in the divine will; warm concern for the advancement of the Redeemer's cause; joyful hope of being eternally with him, and an ardent desire to magnify him whether it be by life or death?—then we have abundant tokens of salvation. The good work has been begun in us, and will assuredly be carried forward till the day of Christ. While we admire the devotedness of the apostle, let us never forget the means by which he was enabled to be faithful to the death; the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, and the prayers of his brethren. Let us continue in the exercise of lowly dependence and fervent intercession. In this way we will suppress selfishness, foster charity, sweeten mutual intercourse, and become more and more meet for eternal communion in heaven. Doubtless our friendships there will be all the more tender and sweet from the recollection of the blessings we have imparted and received by fervent supplications here.

PRAYER.

O God, we adore thee as the Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift, and with whom there is no variableness, neither the least shadow of turning. We rejoice to know that what thou hast done for countless multitudes, in every age of the church, thou art able and willing to do also for us. With thee there is enough of heavenly provision, and to spare. O do thou begin thy good work in each of our souls. Disclose to us the full extent of our depravity. Lead us in brokenness of spirit to the footstool of thy throne. Cause all thy goodness in Christ Jesus to pass before us. Shine into our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of thy glory in the face of Christ. May we rejoice here in having no confidence in the flesh. May we be constrained by his love to resist temptation, to mortify sin, to endure afflictions, and to abound in the fruits of righteousness, which are, through Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God. May we never be moved away from the faith and hope of the gospel. May we follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; in sunshine and darkness; in joy and sorrow; through good report and bad report. May we continue steadfast and immovable, always abounding in thy work, in nothing terrified by our adversaries; and in the prospect of death, may we have a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better. We thank thee, O Lord, for thy continued goodness. Unless the Lord had been our help, our souls had almost dwelt in silence. When we said, Our feet are slipping away, thy mercy, O Lord, held us up. In the multitude of our thoughts within us, thy comforts delight our souls. God of our fathers, be the God of our children. Bring all with whom we are connected, and in whom we are interested, to the fellowship of the gospel. Make them partakers of thy grace. Remove every root of bitterness from our hearts, and prepare us for eternal communion in heaven. Regard the prayer of the destitute; hear the groaning of the prisoner; and loose those that are appointed to death. Go forth with thy faithful ministers and missionaries everywhere, making the mountain a plain before them. Let idolatry with its unnumbered evils be speedily abolished. Let those who are incensed against thee be ashamed, and all who trust in thee rejoice. Let the whole earth be filled with the glory of the Lord. And now, O Lord, what wait we for? Our hope is in thee. Free us from all our trespasses. Stretch over us this night the shield of thy blessed protection. Let goodness and mercy follow us all our days, and may we dwell at last in thy house for ever. And to thy name, in Christ Jesus, be eternal praise. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVII. 31.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH LXIII. LXIV.

REMARKS.

The scripture now read opens with a striking description of the vengeance which the Messiah executes on the enemies of his church. In the affecting representations given of the singular compassion of the Son of God, so strikingly displayed in the mysterious death which he bore for sinners, we are apt to forget that there are features in his character which frown awfully on those who are engaged in active resistance to his enterprise of mercy. Though his patience may suffer long, the year of his redeemed will come, and then the 'day of vengeance' will be in his heart. There is no infatuation so hazardous as that which at last awakens to evoke him in whose nature boundless mercies dwell; but who never can disregard the injuries done to his people for his sake, though, for a season, his anger frequently seems to sleep.

Israel often grieved the Holy Spirit, when he spoke to them by the ministry of a long succession of prophets; and to this all their internal disasters are to be ascribed in former periods of their history, as well as in that long and dreary rejection with which they have now, for many centuries, been visited. God is at all times equally disposed to befriend his people when they maintain their allegiance to him; but when he turns to be their enemy, their condition is pitiable indeed. His ancient people presented a striking illustration of this truth. When they had no chariots, and no assistance from neighbouring countries, they were invincible in the succour of their God, even when assailed by those who were most abundantly provided with the weapons of aggressive warfare; but at the period of their greatest internal opulence and most extensive alliances, they proved an easy prey to the invader, because their disloyalty to God had deprived them of his protection, and caused his wrath to summon the eagles as to a carcass doomed to destruction. What a warning to the inhabitants of the world, who may see, in his providence towards Israel, an exhibition of the principles on which his administration proceeds, by whose will all nations prosper or decline!

In this portion of scripture we have an exemplification of the feelings with which such as fear God should survey the calamities brought on communities by transgression. The prophet not only depicts the scenes by which his feelings were deeply wounded, but lays them before the throne of grace in the language of impassioned intercession. It is easy to set up for censurers of abounding evils; but to make these the matter of earnest prayer, is quite a different matter. And no man can fully estimate the importance of such intercession when people are becoming ripe for judgment. How long such supplications may have, in every case, delayed the devastation of the land, we are not told; but we know, that on account of the humiliation and tears of Josiah's time, the impending wrath was delayed during the entire period of his life.

PRAYER.

Holy God, we acknowledge the entire righteousness of all thy dispensations in the government of this world. Thou mightest have done with our church and nation as thou didst to other churches and other lands, for we have in many respects grievously offended thee, both as regards our duty in thy church, and in the civil community wherewith we are connected. Be merciful to us according to the multitude of thy compassions, and the merit of our Redeemer's propitiation, and not according to our own deservings. May we be enabled ever to feel the influence of the death of Christ subduing the enmity of our hearts, and producing in us the renouncement of all rebellion against thee. And do thou grant that our church and country may so turn from all which is displeasing in thine eyes, as to experience the fulfilment of the promise thou hast made to all who reform and forsake their sins. O Lord God, remember the desolate condition of thy people Israel, far more afflicted now than when it was in former times deeply bewailed by thy prophets. Great has been their sins, as a people, against the Messiah, for whom their fathers, in former times, looked with longing desire. Do thou speedily remove the vail which is upon their hearts, and give them savingly to know him, whom, with wicked hands, their fathers crucified. And may the ingathering of Israel be to the Gentile nations even as life from the dead. May all the other nations of the world, now sitting in darkness, whose forefathers enjoyed the brilliant shining of the Sun of righteousness, be enlightened and awakened by thy Holy Spirit. Their candlestick has been removed out of its place by reason of their undervaluing and misimproving their exalted privileges: may their day of merciful visitation even return, in which the glad sound of the eternal gospel shall invite them to thy feet. And do thou lead those who enjoy the true light of thy word to consider seriously the darkness which has arisen on the countries where some of thy most famous churches were once located, lest they imitate them in the sin which has brought on them so terrible a calamity. Hear us, forgive us, save us, for the Lord Jesus' sake. Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, for ever. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LI. 8.

SCRIPTURE—PHILIPPIANS II.

REMARKS.

The true ministers of Christ consider their joy as fulfilled when the several fruits of the Christian life appear on those who have been watched over by them, with anxious assiduity, as the seals of their ministry. This ought to have some effect in leading the followers of Christ to watchfulness and diligence in exhibiting themselves as being illustrations of the effects of the doctrines by which they profess to have been brought from darkness to marvellous light. But the great motive which ought to lead to living Christianity, is the example set before us by the Author and Finisher of our faith. What an illustrious exemplification of devotedness to the will of God have we in the mysterious agonies to which Emmanuel submitted, in order to open a way for the execution of the Father's purposes of mercy towards a lost world! The mind feels utterly at a loss whether to wonder most at the extent of obedience rendered by the human nature of Christ, amidst these unutterable sufferings, or at the height of excellence to which that same nature was raised, as the recompense of this amazing devotedness.

What a solemn incentive to diligence in working out our own salvation is the thought, that God works in us 'both to will and to do of his good pleasure!' The neglecting of carrying the will thus wrought in us into energetic activity, is the resisting of the gracious impulse of a present God. May not the want of duly weighing this be the reason why many complain of willingness departed, and a heavy load of death felt pressing with augmenting weight on their spirits? There is serious danger, not only in directly resisting the emotions awakened by the Holy Spirit, but in neglecting to improve them by activity in the path of duty to which they point. Though a true Christian never will finally perish, he may, by neglecting the spiritual life communicated at the season of conversion, be left to mourn many days in heaviness over departed joys and experiences, which have left in his heart an aching void such as the world can never fill.

What a striking specimen of Christian feeling do we see in the statements here given by Paul of himself, and of some who followed Christ with him, at this early period in the history of the church! Timotheus and Epaphroditus were deeply imbued with the same spirit as the apostle whom they zealously endeavoured to aid in the execution of his ministry. The fervent love of these disciples stands forth in striking contrast with the selfish feelings which characterized many others, of whom the melancholy declaration is made, that they sought 'their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's.' Alas! there has been in every age too much of this spirit in the professing church; and this sometimes appears in a guise extremely plausible in the case of men seemingly immersed in anxiety about their own spiritual condition and improvement, but evidently indifferent to the situation of a perishing world, and the manifestation of the Redeemer's glory in the increased number of stars destined to glitter in his diadem. Successful efforts for advancing them in salvation are uniformly found put forth by those whose solicitude, beginning with the concerns of their own souls, is limited only by the wide circumference which includes the place of hope, and the multitudes of immortal beings travelling through it to an unchanging eternity.

PRAYER.

Eternal God, we are ashamed to think how much our anxieties have been confined to our own individual concerns, and how feeble has been our intercession in behalf of the heathen who are living without thee in the world. Lord Jesus, we blush to look on thy cross, where unspeakable sufferings bespoke thy compassion for mankind, feeling the deep reproach cast by the light streaming thence on the feebleness of our endeavours, and the insignificant nature of the sacrifices we have made to advance the holy cause of celestial compassion. Father of mercies, may our hearts feel the impress of thy great benevolence, and show our fellowship with thee by the odour of that love breathing in our lives, which led thee to give thy Son, for man's transgression, to die. May the mind which was in Christ be increasingly seen pervading the hearts and lives of his followers. To the great harvest of souls, ripening in the fields of this world for an endless life, send forth many labourers, who will not count their lives dear unto themselves, that they may testify on this sinful earth the gospel of the grace of God. And may the whole earth soon be filled with the knowledge of the glory of God shining in the face of Christ, even as the waters cover the channels of the stormy sea. We commend ourselves and our supplications to the ever-prevalent intercession of our great High Priest, who has passed into the heavens. Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—ISAIAH LXVI.

REMARKS.

Here we have statements, solemnly blended, of wrath against the enemies of God, and mercy to his people. This chapter, in this respect, bears a striking resemblance to the general outline of revelation, which displays, in solemn proximity, the awakening threatenings, and the gracious declarations, which issue from the throne of the Eternal. It is one of the most dangerous mutilations of truth to dis sever, in our apprehension, two things so closely united in the manifestation of those counsels, by which the present and the future destinies of mankind shall be determined. By an utter exclusion of the terrors of the Lord from our thoughts, we may lose sight of all the accusing considerations which are drawn from the danger of neglecting his great salvation, and which have the most important influence on our exertions for our own safety and that of our fellow-sinners. While, if our eyes are turned away from the gracious declarations which encourage the sinner's return, and revive the drooping spirits of the saints, we may sink into the darkness of despair, or have our energies in the path of duty depressed by the lowering aspect of external circumstances.

Where so many striking annunciations are set before us, it is difficult to speak of them with brevity, or to select the more prominent statements, where all are so striking. The chapter opens with a majestic description of the greatness of God, and then states the object on the surface of this earth on which he looks with the greatest complacency. We are too apt to conceive that magnificent buildings, and numerous worshippers, and a ritual calculated to fascinate the attentions of men, are contemplated with the same interest by him who dwells on high. There may be edifices exquisitely ornamented, thronged by attentive auditories, and where the feelings are excited by all the appliances of human eloquence, and the heart moved by strains of transporting music, while yet the whole is surveyed by God with unmingled abhorrence, because the whole assemblage thus engaged are alienated in affection from him, and engaged in a course of unbroken rebellion. But wherever there is a poor and contrite spirit, trembling at the word of God, whether worshipping at the princely altar, in buildings decorated by human art, and set apart for the public ordinances of Zion, or on the cold and lonely moor, where persecuted wanderers once poured out their hearts in prayer, there the Lord looks as on the object of deepest interest to him of all which earth contains.

The conclusion of the chapter forms a striking contrast to its commencement. The destruction of impenitent transgressors is set forth in language exceedingly awful. Men are often urged on in the ways of rebellion by the applause they meet with from their fellow-worms. What a striking change shall yet take place in this world, when the godless, who were greeted with the loudest applause during many ages, shall have their memories loaded with universal reproach as the enemies of their species! And what a still more appalling spectacle will be their final ruin, when they shall be, through ceaseless centuries, living objects of abhorrence to the whole unfallen and restored creation of God! The destruction of the finally rebellious will be contemplated by the saints with mingled feelings, but without the slightest dissent from the righteous judgments of God. They will regard their own security from this ruin as effected by the undeserved grace of God, which turned them from the ways of disobedience to the wisdom of the justified. And in the terrible spectacle revealed before their gaze, they, in common with the rest of God's holy universe, will learn the dismaying effects of sin.

PRAYER.

O merciful and righteous God, thou art terrible in thine anger, as well as glorious in thy mercy. Who would not fear thee, whose judgments have often desolated the earth, in righteous retribution, on account of the sins of men, and whose judgments will still more awfully appear when the heavens shall declare thy righteousness at the great day of thy final judgment? Thine anger, so justly provoked, is no cause of wonder; but the extraordinary grace thou revealest now to lost mankind, is most amazing. It may well fill, with profoundest astonishment, the minds of angels, that thou, whose greatness surpasses the highest flight of excited imagination, shouldst condescend to dwell with those whose hearts have been taught to tremble at thy word. O Lord, give us wisdom so to perceive thy mercies and thy terrors, that we may at all times be found poor and of a contrite spirit. May thy truth be diffused still more extensively on earth, until the revelation of thy character, there set forth, subdue many out of every people. We tremble to think of the danger to which many, in whom we ought to feel deeply interested, are exposed by reason of their rebellion against thee. O touch their hearts that, made willing in a day of thy power, they may really return to thee by the way thou hast consecrated, and by which the greatest sinner may find mercy at thy throne. Do with us as thou pleasest during the few short years of this our mortal life; but grant unto us that we may find mercy with thee at the great day, which shall unchangeably decide the destiny of all the inhabitants of earth for eternity. Hear us for thy beloved Son's sake. Glory be to thee who sittest upon the throne, and to thee, O Lamb of God, who once for us was slain. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXII. 17.

SCRIPTURE—PHILIPPIANS III.

REMARKS.

After stating the reason, for which he had more cause than many vain-glorious men, to trust in the flesh, Paul here says, that all these he counted loss for Christ. And well might he say so, when he surveyed the vast demerit of his own righteousness in his unbelieving state, which, in its most attractive external appearance, was the production of motives of the most unworthy description. Even the inherent righteousness of believers, produced by the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, is accompanied with a variety of imperfections and deficiencies. What then must be the righteousness which is the production of no higher cause than a motive universally depraved and corrupted? The righteousness of Christ, in which Paul desired to be invested, was in all respects perfect; and as the righteousness of him who was in one mysterious person both God and man, was exceedingly honouring to the authority and dignity of the law. How strange is it, that so many, whose righteousness falls greatly short of that of Paul, little as he thought of it, should still be unwilling to part with it, for the stainless robe of imputed righteousness.

Great as were the attainments of Paul, he deemed himself still far short of what he aimed at. So far was the fact of his being justified by the righteousness of another, in destroying his anxiety after personal holiness, that it quickened greatly all his anxieties. He was satisfied before with his attainments, but now, gazing on the perfect image of the blessed God, as that to which the Lord Jesus came to restore all whom he redeems, he says, in language indicative of vehement desire and intense exertion, 'I press towards the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.' Happy, indeed, are they in whom the love of Christ Jesus awakens these intense desires and efforts after holiness. For these are not only the indications of real union to Christ, but to these belong the assurance, 'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.'

At the close of this chapter, melancholy and joyous objects are presented to our contemplation. The case of those, who, whatever may be their public profession, are discovered by their walk as enemies of the cross of Christ, draws tears from the eyes of the apostle. To see men courting their own destruction, and glorying in what is their present and future shame, and minding earthly, in preference to heavenly things, is very mournful. But to find these persons demonstrating thus their enmity to that cross, where the Son of God displayed the most disinterested and astonishing love to sinners, is awful indeed! In contrast to these self-deceivers, he places them, of whom he says that their conversation and citizenship was in heaven. Blessed privilege! to be free in the immunities and privileges enjoyed by the citizens of the celestial city. Well may their eyes be directed towards the second coming of their Master; for, bright and glorious are the benefits which then await them. Even their bodies, which were sown in corruption, in the dreary domain of the sepulchre, shall then be made like to that glorious body with which Christ is now invested, where the inhabitants of the majestic abodes of the heavenly paradise worship him in holiest reverence.

PRAYER.

Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we render thee our humble thanks for having so loved this rebellious world as to give thine only begotten Son to a life of sorrow, and to a death of untold agony, that we might live through him. We magnify thee, O ever glorious Son of God, for the mysterious righteousness, the righteousness of God made manifest in the flesh, by which sinners may now be made righteous notwithstanding all the guiltiness into which they have been plunged by transgression. O Holy Ghost, we bless thee for the revelation of this plan for justifying sinners, devised in the counsels of eternity, and now declared by thee in the word given by thine own inspiration. Eternal God, may this sacred righteousness be all our confidence in life and death. May that faith be in us which unites to the Lord Jesus; and do thou impute to us his righteousness for our justification before thee. We renounce and forego all dependence on ourselves and on our own deservings, and turn to this as our only confidence. And may our hearts be constrained by the love he displayed in making this amazing provision for our recovery, to live only to him. May the great object for which he came into the world—the destruction of the works of satan, ever be the foremost object of our lives; and to his second coming may we look with longing expectation, as the period of our perfect sanctification, and of his completed glory. Lord, increase the number of those who walk under the constraining influence of the cross of Christ. Awaken those who dream of peace while really at war with him; and hasten the period when he shall reign undisputed and unresisted from shore to shore, even to the earth's remotest boundary. Hear us for his, our Redeemer's sake. Glory be to the God of Israel, even to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost for ever. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CXVIII. 6.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH I.

REMARKS.

Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world, and from the beginning he hath chosen and set apart his ministers and agents, for revealing his will to mankind, and accomplishing the purposes of his moral administration of the universe. St Paul tells us, that he was separated or destined to the apostleship from his mother's womb; and the Lord here says to Jeremiah, 'before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee, and before thou camest forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations.' In the spirit of humility, and foreseeing, perhaps, the dangers to which, in the faithful discharge of his duty as a prophet he would infallibly be exposed, Jeremiah was disposed to decline the appointment. After the manner of Moses, he pleaded his incompetency to undertake such an arduous and important office. 'Behold I cannot speak, for I am a child,' unqualified from youth and inexperience. But the Lord sends none a warfare on his own charges, and imposes no duty which he does not give grace and strength to perform. He repels Jeremiah's excuses, renews his commission in terms more peremptory than before, but at the same time encourages him with the assurance of his presence and protection; 'be not afraid of their faces, for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the Lord.' By a significant symbol, the Lord intimated to him that he would give him a mouth and wisdom, which his adversaries would not be able to gainsay or resist, and he ordained him his prophet, not only to deliver his message to the people of Israel, but to foretell the destruction of wicked and incorrigible nations, and to proclaim his mercy to those who humbled themselves and repented of their evil ways. The first exercise of the prophetic office to which Jeremiah was called was one of a painful nature; it was to denounce the judgments of heaven against his own countrymen. They had forsaken the God of their fathers, and had become the worshippers of heathen idols, and of images of their own formation. The Almighty had determined to punish their wickedness by the invasion of the king of Babylon, and the more northern nations under his sway—within a short period they were to be visited with that calamity. This was intimated to Jeremiah by the vision of a rod or branch of an almond tree, one of the first trees that blossom in the spring; and it was shadowed by a second vision, the agitation and commotion of a boiling pot over a fiery furnace, so adjusted in its position, as to indicate the quarter whence the enemy was to come, and that the affliction was to be of the most awful and overwhelming nature. To denounce this judgment, must have been most distressing to the prophet himself, and he could not be ignorant that it would expose him to the hatred and persecution of a depraved and devoted people. But he was enjoined to address himself to the work assigned him without delay; and (as he valued his own safety) fearlessly and faithfully to deliver the message with which he was charged; whilst for his encouragement, he was assured of defence against all ranks and classes in the land, and that their attempts to destroy him would be ineffectual, 'for I am with thee, saith the Lord, to deliver thee.'

God hath appointed us our several places and relations in life, and whatever may be our station in society, if we earnestly desire and endeavour to please God, and to be accepted of him, he will qualify us for the service which he requires at our hands. We may be called to arduous duty, and placed in perilous circumstances, but precious are the promises in which we are encouraged to hope; 'fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God. I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.' Having these promises, let us be strong and of good courage, for the Lord our God will not fail us, nor forsake us. If we be fearful and faint-hearted, the Lord may put us to shame in the presence of our enemies; but if we stand fast in the Lord, depending on the promised aids of his grace, we shall not be ashamed nor confounded, world without end.

PRAYER.

O Lord, we adore thee as the Creator and the Governor of the universe, the sovereign disposer of all events. Thou madest us, and not we ourselves. Thou upholdest us in life, and orderest every circumstance in our lot; and all thy paths are mercy and truth to such as keep thy covenant and thy testimonies. Give us grace to take hold of thy covenant in Jesus Christ. May we joyfully receive him, as he is offered to us in the gospel, as the propitiation for our sins, the end of the law for righteousness, our advocate and intercessor with thee the Father. And whilst we rely on his merits and mediation for pardon and justification for righteousness and eternal life, may the love of Christ constrain us to live not unto ourselves, but unto him that died for us and rose again, adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour by a walk and conversation becoming the gospel. And do thou, O Lord, fit us for whatever may be thy will and our duty. Thou hast made all things for thyself, and hast a right to employ us according to thy pleasure. In the respective situations which thou hast appointed us, may we be active, diligent, and laborious; and may we obtain mercy of the Lord to be found faithful. Sensible of our own weakness, that in ourselves we are without strength, may we be clothed with humility. But knowing that there is help for us in God, assured that he is faithful who hath said, My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness, may we go on in the strength of the Lord, declining no service, and fearing no danger. May our only inquiry be, What, Lord, wilt thou have us to do? and do thou work in us both to will and to do of thy good pleasure, that we may glorify thee in all things through Jesus Christ. Should fidelity to thee, our God, expose us to hatred and persecution from men, let us not be dismayed at their faces; but knowing who hath said, I will never leave nor forsake thee, may we boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me. We bless thee, O Lord, that thou hast, in all ages of the church, raised up and qualified men for thy service. Be very gracious to all ministers and missionaries. Let thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. May great grace be unto all who love our Lord Jesus in sincerity; and do thou add to thy church such as shall be saved. Have compassion on the poor and destitute, on the afflicted and the dying, and grant them grace according to their need. Regard in mercy our beloved friends and relatives. May their names be written in the book of life, and may they be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. We thank thee for the mercies of the past night and of this morning. Let thy presence go with us throughout the day. In all our purposes and pursuits may we act in a humble dependence on thy grace, with an earnest desire to do thy will and to promote thy glory; and do thou prosper all our undertakings for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVI. 8.

SCRIPTURE—PHILIPPIANS IV.

REMARKS.

The apostle having, in the close of the preceding chapter, reminded the Philippians of the glory to which they looked forward, at the second coming of Christ, 'who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body,' in language the most tender and affectionate, exhorts them in that prospect, and standing on the strength of God, to be stedfast in the faith and obedience of the gospel, as they had already distinguished themselves by their zeal and fidelity, so to endure unto the end. In the same view he earnestly entreats, that all differences may be laid aside, that they would be of one accord and one mind, maintaining the peace of the church, strengthening the hands, and contributing to the comfort of the faithful. And he once and again encourages them, as he had done before, chap. iii. 1, to rejoice in the Lord; however dark their prospects, however severe their sufferings, still to rejoice in God their Saviour. With joy in the Lord he recommends moderation, or meekness and forbearance towards men, amidst all the persecutions and tribulations that they endured. And he urges them to this conduct by the consideration that the Lord was at hand, that he was now present with them, to sustain them by the arm of his omnipotence; and that the day was fast approaching when he would receive them to himself, and their sorrow would be turned into joy. As connected with moderation, he guards them against sinful anxiety and solicitude about the things of this world, and teaches them in every condition to pour out their hearts before God in humble, fervent, and believing prayer, mingling with their petitions for future blessings, thanksgivings for mercies received; and thus casting all their cares upon the Lord, exercising a humble dependence on his bounty, they might expect to be blessed with that confidence and composure, that holy tranquillity of mind, which is the purchase of Christ's blood, and the fruit of his Spirit, which exceeds all comprehension, and which God only can bestow. Finally, he exhorts them to ponder and to practise all those graces and virtues which are enjoined in the gospel of truth, which they had learned from his lips, and witnessed in his life, which are amiable and excellent in themselves, of good report among men, and approved of God; and acting in this manner, he assures them, that the God of peace and love would ever be with them, to bless, protect, and comfort them.

The Philippians, as we learn from the 10th and subsequent verses, had contributed a second time to the support of the apostle in his present confinement. On this account, he tells them that he rejoiced in the Lord greatly, expressing, by this language, the satisfaction which he derived from this renewed proof of their esteem and affection, and at the same time, tracing their bounty to its proper source, that goodness whence all our blessings flow. But lest they should imagine, that whilst he thus acknowledged with gratitude their kindness, he repined at the poverty and hardships to which he was subjected in the service of his Lord and master; he assures them, that he acquiesced cheerfully in the divine appointments, that he was contented and happy in every condition, and that through the power of Christ resting on him, he was prepared for whatever God might be preparing for him. Still he regarded the Philippians as discharging a sacred duty in ministering to his necessities; and hence, he tells them also, that he rejoiced in their liberality, not for his own sake, but for theirs, because he considered it as the fruit of their faith in the Lord Jesus, as a sacrifice acceptable in the sight of God, which he would abundantly compensate, by supplying their wants in this world according to the riches of his goodness, and by bringing them at last to his eternal glory through Jesus Christ, in which prospect he exclaims, 'Now unto God and our Father be glory, for ever and ever. Amen.'

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the King eternal, immortal, and invisible, the only wise God; and we bless thee that life and immortality are clearly brought to light in the gospel; for we believe that as Jesus died and rose again, even so them which sleep in Jesus, God will bring with him. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for those who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. O Lord, may we be among those whom thou hast chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth; and looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour, who shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his own glorious body, may we be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labour is not in vain in the Lord. Zealous for the honour of the Redeemer's name, and the interests of pure and undefiled religion, may we walk in love as Christ also loved us, following after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith we may edify one another. And, O Lord, let not the weakness of our faith, the imperfection of our graces, or the troubles and the trials of this life, rob us of those consolations which the gospel of Jesus is intended to administer. Claiming relation to thee as our God and Father in Christ, contemplating the fullness of righteousness and grace that is treasured up in our divine Redeemer, and anticipating an eternity of blessedness in heaven, may we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Living on these holy and heavenly joys, knowing that the coming of the Lord draweth nigh, may we exercise a merciful and forgiving temper, and exhibit a becoming moderation in all our worldly concerns, and constant resignation and submission to thy will. May satan's kingdom be brought to desolation, and on its ruins do thou every where establish the kingdom of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Let thy peace rest on our Zion. Appoint salvation for walls and bulwarks, and may the glory of the Lord be her defence. Bless our friends, and abundantly reward our benefactors. May our God supply all their need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus. Forgive our enemies, and help us to forgive them from the heart. Visit in mercy the sons and daughters of affliction; sanctify affliction; spare useful lives; and prepare the dying for their great change. Accept of our thanksgivings for the mercies of the past day, and take us under thy protection throughout the night. Let thy peace rest on our habitation. May our sleep be sweet; and may we awake in the morning refreshed in body, and rejoicing in that peace of God which passeth all understanding. Hear us, O Lord, and when thou hearest, answer and forgive, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXVIII. 56.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH II.

REMARKS.

In this passage of holy writ, the Lord, by the mouth of his prophet, reproves the Israelites for the sin of backsliding, and sets before them the guilt and the danger of that conduct. In the first place, he reminds them of the kindness which he had shown them in the early part of their history, and of their professions of gratitude and allegiance in return. He had delivered them out of the land of Egypt, and out of the house of bondage; he had covenanted to be their God, and had engaged them to be his people, to serve him in holiness, and to be the first fruits of his faithful worshippers in every succeeding age. He had led them through the wilderness, and had severely punished those nations which attempted to impede their progress; and they had sung his praise on the shores of the Red sea, and at the foot of Sinai had taken hold of his covenant, and dedicated themselves to his service. These things the Lord remembered in their behalf. He would still have delighted to bless them, had they been steadfast and faithful to their engagements; but they had forsaken the God of their fathers, to worship the idols of the heathen, and they persisted in their disloyalty and disobedience. He, therefore, expostulates with them on the ingratitude, the guilt, and the folly of this conduct. They could not allege that their fathers had found him unfaithful to his promises, or unreasonable in his demands; they could not say that his commandments were grievous, and that there was no profit in his service. But they retained no grateful sense of his miraculous interpositions in their behalf, when he guided them through the trackless desert, which was dreary as the shadow of death; when he fed them with manna from heaven, and with water out of the rock, and at length planted them in Canaan, a land fair and fruitful as the garden of God. Instead of living as his devoted and peculiar people, they had defiled the land by the worship of idols, and by the foulest crimes; and this guilt attached not only to the people, but to the priests, the pastors, and the prophets—all were sunk in a state of the grossest ignorance and depravity; they had apostatised from God, and were become the servants of Baal.

Such defection, the prophet tells them, was unknown even among the heathen. They were constant in their adherence to what they called gods, which were, in fact, no gods, but vanity and a lie; but Israel, whose glory it was to know the only true God, and who had been distinguished by him with privileges and blessings above all other nations, had 'forsaken the Lord, had provoked the Holy One of Israel to anger, and were gone away backward.' Of such wickedness, how justly does the Lord call upon the heavens to testify their abhorrence and detestation. But their guilt was not greater than their folly. The Lord had acknowledged Israel as his Son and his first-born, and it might have been expected that this would ensure to them his favour and protection against all their enemies, whereas, the Assyrians and Egyptians had successively triumphed over them, had laid waste their land, and burnt their cities with fire. This the prophet teaches them was the natural consequence and just punishment of their transgressions. And as they were disposed to seek for safety, by forming alliances with these nations, rather than by returning to that God from whom they had deeply revolted, he warns them, that they would be visited with still heavier judgments. 'Thine own wickedness shall correct thee,' &c.

In the latter part of the chapter, the Lord again sets their sins before them in all their enormity and aggravations—repeats his expostulations, and shows them that their guilt would admit neither of excuse nor palliation. But being merciful and full of compassion, he commissions the prophet, in the conclusion of his message, which is carried forward to the 4th verse of the chapter following, to invite them to return, in the assurance that he would show mercy, and pardon abundantly. 'Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father; thou art the guide of my youth.' This invitation he still addresses to us, and to all the apostate children of men. Let us comply with his call, and say with the penitents of old, 'Behold we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God: take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously, so will we render the calves of our lips.'

PRAYER.

O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee would we lift up our souls, for thou art good and ready to forgive, and plenteous in mercy to all that call on thee. Thou hast made goodness and mercy to follow after us all the days of our life. But, alas! we have forgotten the God that made us, and have lightly esteemed the Rock of our salvation. And thou mightest justly have left us to eat the fruit of our own ways, and to be filled with our own devices. But to our God belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against him. In the counsels of eternity thou didst devise a scheme of reconciliation and peace. When the fullness of time was come, thou didst send forth thy Son, made of a woman, made under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons; and in the gospel of salvation thou art addressing us in these gracious words, Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings; return, and I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you. Turn thou us, O Lord, and we shall be turned, for thou art the Lord our God. Open our eyes to see the vanity of this world, and all its perishing enjoyments. Convince us that they who are far from thee shall perish; and O dispose us all to come unto thee, saying, in the language of the prodigal, Father, we have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and are not worthy to be called thy children; and do thou, O Lord, embrace us in the arms of thy mercy; restore us to thy family and favour. Say unto us, I will be to you a Father, and ye shall be my sons and daughters. I will be merciful to your unrighteousness; your sins and iniquities I will remember no more. Return unto me, for I have redeemed you. And, O Lord, do thou give us the affections and dispositions of thy children. Henceforth may we bow with reverence to thine authority, meekly submit to thy chastisements, study thy will, and render to thee a hearty and a constant obedience, animated and strengthened by thy Spirit. May we be followers of God as dear children, holy as thou art holy, merciful as thou art merciful, perfect as thou our Father in heaven art perfect. May the gospel of Jesus soon be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations. Revive thy work in the midst of us, and let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us. Heal the sick and comfort the afflicted. When their heart is overwhelmed, lead them to the rock that is higher than they. May all our friends be the friends of God. Be near to those who are far from us. May our prayers meet before thy throne of grace. Thou hast preserved us from the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and hast permitted us to see the light of a new day. Lord, lift thou up upon us the light of thy countenance. Quicken us in duty, and prepare us for whatever may be the allotments of thy providence. Whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, may we do all to the glory of God, through Jesus Christ the Lord, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM LXXII. 17.

SCRIPTURE—COLOSSIANS I.

REMARKS.

This epistle seems to have been written to caution the converts at Colosse against some false teachers, who, under the influence of pagan philosophy, and Jewish prejudice, were attempting to introduce among them the worship of angels, and to enforce the observance of the Mosaic ritual, as essential to salvation. After saluting them, St Paul, in his own name, and in the name of Timothy, tells them, that having learned from Epaphras their steadfastness in the faith, and love to their fellow disciples, he gave thanks to God on these accounts, and that it was the subject of his earnest and unceasing prayer, that they might not be disappointed of that blessedness which was laid up for them in heaven, to the hope of which they had been called by the gospel of Jesus.

Epaphras having informed the apostle of their Christian attachment to himself personally, he assures them, that he also bore them on his heart, constantly praying in their behalf for the various blessings specified. These blessings, the apostle teaches them, could not be attained by the Levitical sacrifices, which could neither take away sin, nor make the comers thereunto perfect. They were to be enjoyed only through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, who, by the shedding of his blood as an atonement for sin, had purchased for his people redemption, and forgiveness, and all spiritual blessings. To satisfy them that the sacrifice which Christ offered up, was a sufficient propitiation for the sins of the whole world, that he had power to forgive sins, and was the sole object of religious worship, to the exclusion of every creature, even the most exalted; he reminds them of his divine excellence and glory, as God manifest in the flesh, the Creator of heaven and earth, and of all their hosts, the Lord and Governor of the universe; he reminds them also of his mediatorial character and dignity, as constituted the supreme Head of the church, the author and the finisher of our faith, and the first who rose from the dead to an endless life. For it was the will of the Father, that this plenitude of essential dignity and mediatorial excellence, should dwell in Christ's mysterious person; that his sacrifice might possess an infinite value and efficacy; that through the satisfaction which he made to offended justice, he might reconcile sinners of all nations to himself, and that he might unite angels and men, Jews and Gentiles, as the willing and obedient subjects of his mediatorial kingdom. In proof of this, the apostle refers to the case of the Colossians themselves. Though by nature they had, in common with other men, been alienated from God, and at enmity with him in their hearts, through faith in the blood of the cross, that enmity had been slain; though aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, they were admitted into fellowship with the saints, and would be accepted as righteous in the day of judgment, if they persevered in the faith and hope of the gospel. This doctrine, St Paul, by divine appointment, had preached to the Colossians and other heathens, enduring persecution from his countrymen on that account, but suffering joyfully, because he was instrumental in bringing Gentiles into the church, thus promoting the end of Christ's suffering, and fulfilling the predictions of his word, that in him all nations of the earth should be blessed. This purpose of mercy, unknown to preceding generations, and therefore styled a mystery, God was pleased to discover to the apostles and other holy men, that they might proclaim to all the world the riches of his grace, displayed in this precious truth, that Christ dwelling in the heart by faith, and by the power of his Spirit, warranted in Gentiles as well as in Jews the hope of eternal glory. Thus did the apostles preach Christ to Jews and Gentiles without distinction, warning all to flee from the wrath to come, instructing them in the way of salvation, as they had themselves been taught by the Spirit of wisdom, and zealous to bring all to him, who was able to present them faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. In this service, St Paul laboured with peculiar success, for which he takes no credit to himself, but ascribes the glory to the power of the Holy Ghost, which wrought in and by him mightily.

PRAYER.

Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. Who should not fear thee and glorify thy name, for thou only art holy. Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil; thou canst not look upon iniquity; and iniquities, we must confess, prevail against us. We have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and are utterly unworthy to approach into thy presence, or to take thy sacred name into our polluted lips. But though we have sinned, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, who is the propitiation for our sins, and who is able to save to the uttermost of all that come unto God by him, because he ever liveth to make intercession for us. In the name, and relying on the intercession of our great High Priest in heaven, would we now prostrate ourselves before thy throne of grace, to implore mercy to pardon, and grace to help in time of need. God be merciful to us sinners. May we have redemption through the blood of Jesus, even the forgiveness of our sins, and may we be reconciled to thee by the death of thy Son. And O may the Holy Spirit take of the things of Christ and show them to us, that we may be filled with admiration of his glory, that we may rely with confidence on his grace and power to save, and may live devoted, soul and body, to his service. Contemplating him as the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, as the Creator and Preserver of all things, the Lord of angels and of men, may we honour the Son even as we honour the Father. And may we be filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, that we may walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God. Extend the boundaries of the Redeemer's kingdom. Hasten the time when the fullness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Israel shall be saved. Enlarge and purify our beloved church. May her peace be as a river, and her righteousness as the waves of the sea. Regard the prayer of the destitute, and prepare of thy goodness for the poor. Hear the cry of the distressed, and send help from above. May the dying die in the Lord, that death may be to them the entrance into everlasting life. May those in whom we are specially interested by the ties of nature and affection be the objects of thy special love, thy paternal care, and saving grace; and enable us to put on bowels of mercy, bearing with one another, and forgiving one another. Thou hast brought us to the close of another day. Lord, teach us so to count our days as to apply our hearts unto wisdom. To the Keeper of Israel we commit our souls, and our bodies, and all our concerns, through the night. May the eye that never slumbers watch over us, and underneath us be the everlasting arms. To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXV.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH VI.

REMARKS.

The prophet in this chapter continues to warn the Israelites of their impending captivity in Babylon; the children of Benjamin being associated with the tribe of Judah, and those measures being recommended to them, which they would employ in a case of rival invasion. Zion is likened to a comely and delicate woman, who had been preserved hitherto from evil; but was soon to be exposed to the horrors of cruel war. These calamities are traced to the great wickedness of Jerusalem, which abounded in iniquity, as a fountain sends forth streams of water. Yet, while the Lord pronounced the punishment that would fall on the people, if their sins were not forsaken, he tenderly besought them to be instructed, that he might not depart from them. Should, however, their impenitence continue, the land would be laid waste, and fresh desolations would rapidly follow each other; as the grapes of the vineyards are not only gathered but gleaned. Among those who are charged with peculiar guilt, are the prophets and priests, who 'dealt falsely with the people,' and healed their hurt slightly, saying, 'Peace, peace; when there is no peace.'

Let us be instructed by these warnings of the prophet. If we do not repent and believe the gospel; if we meet in a spirit of stern defiance the advances toward reconciliation made to us by our Father in heaven; the Lord will visit us with his righteous indignation. Let us pray that his 'soul may not depart from us,' that we may not perish in our own corruption; but that the Holy Spirit may incline us to accept his gracious offers. Pastors who unrighteously conceal the truth, and who do not bring 'the terrors of the Lord' before their people, to persuade them, are involved in guilt of the deepest dye. It is their duty to mourn over the sins of the impenitent in their flocks, and from a love to their souls, to be earnest in calling them to faith and repentance. Were they only to pass over the feelings with which they may be regarded by the careless in this world, and to consider the feelings with which they shall be regarded, when they, and all who are under their pastoral care meet at the bar of God, they would never shun 'to declare the whole counsel of God.'

The prophet exhorts the people, 'stand in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and ye shall find rest to your souls;' and because they would not walk therein—because they refused to tread in the pious steps of their fathers, he declares that their incense and offering would be rejected; that fear and anguish would be on every side, and that they would be destroyed, as reprobate silver is consumed in the fire.

Those ages that are farthest advanced in knowledge and refinement, are not always most distinguished for vital godliness. In order to find the era in the history of the chosen people in which God was most faithfully worshipped and obeyed, an Israelite, in the days of Jeremiah, had to go back to the times of Abraham, and Jacob, and Moses, and David; and a Christian, in order to see his most holy faith shining in its brightest lustre, must often leave his own age and return to earlier and more primitive times; to the age of the apostles, when the danger incurred by the profession of faith in Christ, deterred hypocrites and formalists from entering within the pale of the church; and to the era of the reformation, when religion held a more prominent place in men's thoughts, and exercised a more powerful sway over the lives of believers than it has done in later times, and when the gospel was recognized as furnishing the principles which should regulate their conduct in all the scenes of domestic and social life. Let us ask for the old paths—let us walk in the good way—let us follow our fathers in all things wherein they followed Christ, that we may find rest to our souls.

PRAYER.

Most gracious God, we, thy frail and dependent creatures, would present our united thanksgivings for the mercies of the past night, and the light of this morning. We lay down and slept, we awaked, for thou the Lord sustainedst us. And now, that we are entering upon the duties of the day, we should seek thy guidance, and commit ourselves to thy care. O Lord, we confess that we are unworthy of the least of thy mercies; for we are partakers of a fallen nature, and are chargeable with many violations of thy holy law. Enter not into judgment with us. Let not our iniquities be remembered before thee, but blot them out for the sake of him whom thou hearest always, and for whom thou art ready to forgive the chief of sinners. May Christ be made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. May we be instructed by the scriptures which he inspired; may we be animated by the spirit which he breathed; may we be cultivating the graces which he exhibited; may we at all times be seeking to be meet for the mansions which he hath gone to prepare for his people. O Lord, let us always remember that thou art faithful in thy threatenings, and that thy judgments shall fall on the impenitent and ungodly. Lord, teach us to see the evil nature and bitter fruits of sin, that, knowing how much it dishonoureth thee, and how ruinous it is to our own souls, we may depart from all iniquity. Cause us to hear thy loving-kindness in the morning, for in thee do we trust; cause us to know the way wherein we should walk, for we lift up our souls unto thee. Thy thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are thy ways our ways; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are thy ways higher than our ways, and thy thoughts than our thoughts. Grant, O Lord, that we may be encouraged by thy merciful invitations, returning to thee that thou mayest have mercy upon us, and that thou mayest abundantly pardon. May a sense of thy goodness subdue our obdurate hearts, and may we hereafter glorify thee in our souls and in our bodies which are thine. Enable us, O Lord, to look back with profit upon those ages of thy church that were most distinguished for faith and holiness. And while we find examples of many in early times who witnessed a good confession in the world, let us copy their patterns, and seek to grow in their manifold graces, yielding in meek submission to thy holy will, contending for the faith that was once delivered to the saints, and confessing that we are strangers and pilgrims on the earth, whose great endeavour should be, to be travelling toward the city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. To thee, the God of all comfort, we commend those of our brethren who are visited with trial, beseeching thee to heal their sorrows, so that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. Bless all who are connected with us by the ties of nature, and the bonds of grace. O Lord, may thy grace descend on all conditions of men, so that they may choose the good part that cannot be taken away, and lay hold on eternal life. And now, to thee the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, be ascribed all glory and honour. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIV. 8.

SCRIPTURE—COLOSSIANS II.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Paul, while in prison at Rome, assures the Christians at Colosse, that he fervently prayed they might advance in Christian knowledge, and grow in the practice of Christian virtues,—a prayer which we should ever offer in behalf of our brethren, and which we should prove to be sincere, by our use of those means through which they may be encouraged in the faith and obedience of the gospel. With great earnestness he warns them against corrupting the truth as it is in Jesus Christ, by blending the theories of a vain philosophy with the glorious discoveries of the gospel. The doctrine which science, 'falsely so called,' was most prone to disparage, was that of Christ's divine nature, and hence the apostle declares that great mystery of godliness in the clearest manner, throughout the chapter, especially in the 3d and 9th verses, in which he says, 'in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge;' 'in him dwelleth all the fullness of the godhead bodily;' expressions which are as strong as can be conceived, and which show that Christ is the same in substance with the Father, equal in power and glory: and in order to persuade them how entirely their favour and comfort depended on this truth, Paul shows that it was only from their union with Christ as their head, that they were complete in spiritual blessings, pardoned, sanctified, and redeemed. If you are truly united to Christ by faith, how consolatory is this truth to your minds. There is no degree of guilt that the blood of sprinkling cannot wash away. There is no hardened sinner that cannot be pardoned through such unspeakable merits. There is no want of your spiritual nature that cannot be supplied by so exalted a Redeemer. Christ can save to the uttermost all that come to the Father through him; he can guide you by his counsel, and afterward receive you into glory. Well might Paul describe the death of Christ, as the event by which he saved his people from the curse of the law! Well might he borrow his imagery from the manner of Roman triumphs, and declare that it was in his cross that Christ spoiled principalities and powers, and led, as captives at his chariot wheels, all the spiritual enemies of his people!

As the ceremonial law was fulfilled at Christ's death, which was prefigured in its sacrifices and symbols, it is no longer binding on the followers of Christ. This abrogation of the ritual law does not, however, extend to those commandments which are essentially moral and spiritual in their nature. The ordinance of the sabbath, in particular, preceded the Mosaic dispensation, was enjoined in the moral law, and is subservient to the good of God's servants in all ages of the church. From a regard to God's honour, and our own spiritual profit, it ought to be hallowed in our hearts and lives.

Christ being the only name through whom there is access to the Father, it is not permitted us to approach him through created beings, however exalted and holy. 'There is one God and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.' We are not, therefore, to impeach the dignity of his office, or to discredit the offering of his prayers, by giving that honour to another which belongs to him alone. But believing in him not only as having died for his people on earth, but as now interceding for them in heaven, we are to come to the Father solely in his name, and pleading solely the merits of his obedience and death. And while we guard against worshipping God in any way not appointed in his word, we are to be equally careful that our fidelity in his service may not show itself in any penances that God hath not required, but in those acts of holy obedience that can alone evidence the power of religion in our souls.

PRAYER.

Almighty and most merciful God, who hast watched over us during the engagements of this day, vouchsafe to us thy grace, while we present before thee our prayers at its close. Help us to worship thee who art a spirit, in spirit and in truth; and grant that in all our approaches to thy throne of mercy, we may look to be heard and regarded only through the merits of our once crucified but now exalted Lord. O Lord, do thou enable us with the docility of children, to receive into our understandings and hearts all the discoveries of thy holy word, as coming from thee the Father of lights, and as necessary to be believed and obeyed for our everlasting welfare. Great, O Lord, is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory. May we see this truth to be the only foundation for peace of mind; may we regard it as proving the efficacy of Christ's atoning blood. And grant that we, believing in his greatness and glory, as the Son of God; and in his compassion and mercy, as the Son of man; may through him receive the remission of our manifold sins, and enjoy that peace of mind which passeth all understanding, and which flows from faith in thee as a reconciled Father. May we, O Lord, be delivered out of the hands of all our enemies; may we be saved from the devil, and the world, and the flesh; and may we serve thee without fear, in holiness and righteousness, all the days of our lives. Let us, O Lord, stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free; yet ever reverence and ever regard as of perpetual obligation all those ordinances which are enjoined in thy word, and which may prepare us for serving thee on earth, and for enjoying thee in heaven. O Lord, we confess the hold which the world hath over us, how prone we are to be allured by its pleasures, and distracted by its cares, and we desire, now that the business of the week is closing, to bless thee for the appointment of the Sabbath, and for the prospect we have of entering on its holy engagements. Spread around us the shield of thy protection during the silence of the night, and preserve us, if it be thy good pleasure, to the light of another day of the Son of man. And grant, most merciful Father, that thy blessing may so abundantly descend on the religious exercises of the Sabbath, that our souls may be prepared by them for an everlasting Sabbath in heaven. Convey the glad tidings of redemption to all the tribes of men, and let the banners of the cross be unfurled in every land. In thee, O Lord, all the families of the earth are blessed. Be pleased to bless all the members of this family, and grant that we may all have one faith and one Lord; so that we who are travelling through the world together on earth, may be heirs together of thy kingdom above. Let our prayers, O Lord, go up before thee as incense, and the lifting up of our hands as an evening sacrifice, acceptable through the mediation of Jesus Christ, our ever-blessed Redeemer. Amen.

FORTIETH WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXIX. 15—18.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS CXII. CXIII.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS.

PSALM CXII. presents to us the character and condition of a renewed and sanctified man. For it is only he who is the subject of divine grace, that will both fear the Lord, and delight greatly in his commandments. There is a conformity in him to the image of the Saviour, whose 'meat' it was 'to do the will of God.' The blessedness of such a man is set forth, ver. 1—9. and the remarkable thing is, that however he may be circumstanced, still he is blessed. Not that he has not troubles even as other men. The psalm speaks of 'darkness,' and 'evil tidings,' and 'enemies,' to him. But when grace reigns in the heart, it makes all welcome that God is pleased to send. It finds a blessing, where worldly men experience only distress. It communicates joys, which ordinary tribulations cannot take away. He 'that delighteth greatly in God's commandments,' has that which makes him happy, although the things of the world do not belong to him. But he is blessed also in what he possesses of them. He is blessed in his family—the generation of the upright—trained up in the knowledge of God's will, and becoming 'strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might,' ver. 2. He is blessed in his outward circumstances, which, whether affluent or otherwise, are sufficient for his moderate desires; and which, even when most abundant, have not the effect of withdrawing him from a humble reliance on that righteousness which is man's only ground of acceptance with God, ver. 3. He is blessed in the comfort which his faith and hope afford him in the time of affliction, and in the improvement which he makes of the chastening of the Lord, ver. 4. He is blessed in his friendly intercourse with others; in the respect that he meets with; in the serenity of his temper; and in the support, which, when misrepresented, or threatened with evil, or looking forward to approaching dissolution, he receives from his habitual trust in that gracious and omnipotent Saviour who knows his people, and has said of them that 'they shall never perish,' and will ultimately bruise both their enemies and his under his feet, ver. 5—9. The close of the psalm is fitted to heighten our conceptions of the blessedness of godly men, by exhibiting to us, as if in contrast, the condition of the wicked, whose own bad passions are a torment to them, who meet with much to disappoint them in their schemes of earthly happiness, and to whom a coming futurity is enveloped in appalling gloom, ver. 10.

PSALM CXIII. fixes our attention upon the glorious majesty of God, ver. 4, 5; and on his wonderful condescension to the children of men, ver. 6. Instances may be mentioned, in which God, in the kindness of his providence, has literally done such gracious acts as are spoken of, ver. 7—9. But it is in the dispensation of grace, that the statements there made are most amply verified. We are all sunk in sin. Yet doth he 'that dwelleth on high,' and whose glory and felicity our condition cannot affect, bring us up 'out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay.' The 'poor' and 'needy,' are those whom he specially favours. 'God giveth grace unto the humble.' The Gentile world, too, which Isaiah addresses 'as a barren woman,' (liv. 1.) on account of its unfruitfulness toward God, has been made 'a joyful mother of children.' Nor does God limit 'his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus,' to mere deliverance from our wretched condition. He sets us 'with princes, even with the princes of his people.' He admits us to the glorious liberty of his children; and having 'made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light,' he will bring us to dwell with them in his presence for ever.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

How comforting is it to the mind, under a sense of our own helplessness and guilt, to think that it belongs to the character of God to 'lift the needy out of the dunghill;' and that no depth of misery can prevent him from administering the aid which we require! In all our efforts for the spiritual welfare of others, we should take encouragement, from knowing that God himself is concerned to promote it, and that, as 'his name is to be praised from the rising of the sun, unto the going down of the same,' we must be rightly employed in endeavouring to accomplish this object.

PRAYER.

Most gracious God, who, in tenderness to man, hast appointed one day in seven to be a holy sabbath to thyself, we praise and bless thee that our sleep has not been the sleep of death, and that a Christian sabbath has again returned to us. May we be in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and in all our religious exercises may we glorify him who is the Lord of the sabbath. Keep us from profaning thy day, by either the omission or the careless performance of its duties. May it be a day of refreshing to our souls from the presence of the Lord. May we have larger views of thy love to us through Jesus Christ, and of our duty to thee. May we be made more fully aware of our lost condition by sin, and of the great salvation which was wrought by him, who put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. May our admiration of the excellence of Christ in his divine nature, and his holy character, and his various offices, as prophet, priest, and king to his people, increase more and more. May we experience more of the work of the Spirit in our hearts, casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, bringing about a conformity to the image of Christ, and producing its blessed fruits of faith, hope, and charity. Make the sabbath, O Lord, to be more reverently and devoutly observed throughout the land. May every attempt to violate its sacredness, be discouraged by men of influence and power; and may the poor become sensible of its value, to both their temporal and their eternal welfare. Avert, we beseech thee, the judgments which our abounding iniquities have provoked. Pour out a spirit of repentance and reformation upon the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the old and the young. Suffer us not to imagine that our state is secure, because riches increase, or arts are improved, or our munitions are strong. May it be graven on our minds that a nation prospers, and individuals are blessed, in proportion as the law of the Lord is revered. Let it not be our condemnation that we have forsaken thy law, and are walking after the imaginations of our own hearts. May the pride of self-righteousness be removed from us, and may we be so thoroughly convinced of our sinfulness and guilt, that we may thankfully accept of the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, and may glory in nothing save in his cross. May the ministers of Christ have grace to be faithful in warning their people to flee from the wrath to come, and in bringing them to know the Lord, who delighteth in loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, and exercises these things in the earth. Go with us, and our fellow-worshippers, this day to thy sanctuary, and show us thy salvation. Comfort and revive with thy presence, all those who are prevented from engaging in the solemnities of thy house. Uphold and direct our pastor in discharging his sacred duties; and let all our devotional exercises throughout the day be productive of the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God. Hear, O Lord, and forgive, and accept of us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XCVI. 1—5.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS CXIV. CXV.

REMARKS.

PSALM CXIV. celebrates the care which God exercised over Israel, when he brought them out of Egypt, and the mighty miracles which he wrought for them. It is highly poetical, and very beautiful, representing inanimate objects as endued with life, overawed by the presence of God, and obedient to his will. It shows the omnipotence of God, and the security of his people under his protection. It teaches his people, that whatever be their state, he is able to 'deliver them out of all their troubles.' And it should lead them not only to tremble before him, but also to trust in him. In the deliverance which was effected for Israel from the bondage of Egypt, we may contemplate the deliverance which has been wrought for us from the bondage of sin. The same Lord was the author of both. The Saviour of sinners was that glorious being who 'was in the beginning with God,' and who 'was God.' His stupendous miracles betokened 'the presence of the Lord.' The earth, and the sea, and the things that are therein, were obedient to him. His power was acknowledged even by 'the rulers of the darkness of this world.' His language to his people is, 'when thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.' He has made a way for them to enter into the heavenly Canaan; and during all their pilgrimage in the wilderness of life, he sustains, and comforts, and invigorates them by his grace, 1 Cor. x. 1—4. Let us trust in this Saviour, and humbly and thankfully commit ourselves to him. Let us beware of resisting or grieving his Spirit. Let us ask of him continually that he would take us, as he took Judah and Israel of old, to be 'his sanctuary,' and 'his dominion,' Heb. xii. 25.

PSALM CXV. begins with the language of deep humility and earnest prayer. The church expresses its desire, that deliverance might be brought to it from great and overwhelming distress, and that God would make his glorious perfections manifest in effecting it. Deliverance was to be looked for only from God in the exercise of his abounding mercy, and it was desirable for the vindication of his character and truth, ver. 1. For were it withheld, the heathen might consider that God was unable to effect it, or was unacquainted with the circumstances of his church, ver. 2. But the psalmist, speaking in the name of the church, repels this impious idea, and confirms himself in his dependence upon God by recalling to his mind the superintending providence which he exercises over the universe, ver. 3; and by drawing a very striking contrast between the living, ever-watchful God, who, according to his pleasure, sustains and governs all; and the useless idols which the heathen worshipped and held entitled to their confidence, ver. 4—8. He then, in very animated terms, exhorts all, whether priests or people, whether connected with the house of Israel, or proselytes and strangers, to trust in the Lord Jehovah, ver. 9—11. He mentions grounds for trust in the Lord, ver. 12; and speaks not doubtfully, but with lively faith, and in prophetic terms, of blessings to the church, ver. 12—15; and closes the psalm with solemn reflections on man's condition upon earth, and a devout expression of his own purpose, under every circumstance, to bless the Lord, ver. 16—18. The difference of tone between the commencement and the close of the psalm, is very remarkable. There is throughout the whole of it the exercise of faith. But the psalmist rises from a state of deep depression, to one of grateful exultation. The difference appears to have been produced by meditation on the perfections of God, and especially on his kindness towards us. 'Our God is in the heavens,' 'The Lord hath been mindful of us.' Thence flow the church's confidence in God, and the certainty with which it looks for blessings. When times of depression occur to us, and spiritual sorrows weigh upon our minds, let us apply to the same remedy which is suggested to us here. 'The Lord hath been mindful' also 'of us.' We all have reason to say so, even in regard to temporal concerns: and how true is it in regard to our spiritual state! 'Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us.' 'He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?'

PRAYER.

O thou, who didst breathe into our nostrils the breath of life, and by whose kind visitation we are preserved and blessed, we give thee thanks for all thy temporal mercies, and we humbly pray, that in whatsoever measure thou art pleased to supply them, we may acknowledge thine undeserved goodness, and may show forth thy praise, by living in obedience to thy law. O thou, who art the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and who, according to thine abundant mercy, hast begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of thy Son from the dead, we give thee thanks that thou hast quickened us together with Christ, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. May that spiritual life which we derive from thee, be cherished and sustained by the gracious influences of the Holy Ghost. Having raised us from the death of sin, and mortified within us the desires of the flesh, may he enable us to set our affections on things above, and to be continually advancing to a greater meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light.

May he render us watchful against sinful thoughts, and sinful words, and sinful deeds, which bring down the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. May he render us diligent in exercising and improving humbleness of mind, meekness, charity, and all the other graces, which are the ornaments of thine elect. May he prepare our hearts for receiving the word of Christ; and so accompany the reading and the preaching of the word with his own demonstration, that it may be quick and powerful in enlightening our understandings, and directing our conduct. May love to the Saviour so dwell within us, that whatsoever we do, we may do all in the name of the Lord Jesus. In all the relations of life may we strive to adorn his doctrine. In our social and domestic intercourse, and in every situation in which we are called to act, may we maintain the dispositions and the character of those who serve the Lord Christ, and who hope through him to receive the reward of the inheritance. We give thee thanks, O Lord, for the comfort which we have enjoyed, and the instructions which we have received from the exercises and employments of thy holy day. Pardon wherein we have sinned in our religious services. Bless them to us and to our fellow-worshippers; and as sabbath after sabbath returns, may the Lord make us to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, to the end he may stablish our hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints. We pray for the good of our country, and for our sovereign. We pray for the good of our church, and the universal diffusion of the blessings of the gospel of Christ. May they be the portion of all who labour under affliction. May they be the portion of every member of this family, and of every friend and relation that we have. Watch, O Lord, around our bed while we sleep, and whether we wake or sleep, may we be accepted with thee, for Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXXV. 6—11.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH IX.

REMARKS.

The prophet bewails, in very pathetic terms, the calamities that were about to befall his countrymen, ver. 1. All the statements that are made throughout the chapter, respecting these calamities, are indicative of their extreme severity. 'The slain,' ver.

1; 'cities desolate without an inhabitant,' ver. 11; 'the land burnt up, like a wilderness, that none passeth through,' ver. 12; the people scattered and oppressed among the heathen, ver. 16—19; pestilence raging among them, and the destruction of life so terrible, that the dead cover the land, and there is none to bury them, ver. 20—22. One circumstance, in connection with eastern manners, is particularly expressive of the sad and overwhelming nature of these calamities, ver. 17, 18. Mourning women were hired in on occasions of death in a family, (see Matt. ix. 23, 24.) Their melancholy tones, and their loud and continued wailing, were suited to the feeling of the survivors; and, at such times, were deemed as indispensable by the Jews, as our ordinary demonstrations of sorrow are by us. The call for 'the mourning women,' showed that the destruction which hung over Judea was not to be evaded, and that when it came, it would make 'every one teach her neighbour lamentation.'

The great practical question for us is, what was the cause of these direful calamities, which made the prophet feel as if weeping day and night for his people should be his sole occupation. The cause is stated again and again to have been their enormous and universal wickedness. It is so stated by the prophet, who, notwithstanding the affection which he bore to his people, would have preferred the solitude of the wilderness, with no other dwelling-place than the rude and temporary shelter which was used by the way-faring man, to remaining among them, and being 'vexed with their unlawful deeds,' ver. 2, 3. It is so stated by the Lord himself, who mentions their sins in detail, and charges them with forsaking his law, and reiterates his awful purpose to 'visit them for these things,' ver. 3—5, 6, 9, 12—16. The majesty of God cannot be offended with impunity. National distress, and individual suffering, are the bitter fruits of not obeying his voice. But what were the sins which called forth his judgments in their case? Let us look to our own ways; for, alas! the sins which brought destruction upon Judah, are the very sins with which our own land, and we ourselves, may be charged. Adultery, ver. 2; 'lies,' 'slanders,' 'deceit' in all its varied forms, disregard of God, increase of crime, ver. 3—6; 'walking after the imagination of their own heart,' ver. 14; 'glorying' in such things as 'wisdom, and might, and riches,' ver. 23; being 'uncircumcised in the heart,' ver. 26. (see Rom. ii. 28, 29.) These are sins which are not by any means peculiar to the Jews; and if God will 'be avenged' for such things, well may the people of our land, and every member of every family within it, be humbled, and alarmed, and cry earnestly to God, 'if peradventure, he would give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth, and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil.' There is one charge against the Jews which is repeatedly mentioned, and which must consequently be offensive to God in a more than ordinary degree. 'They know not me, saith the Lord,' ver. 3; 'they refuse to know me, saith the Lord,' ver. 6; 'they have forsaken my law which I set before them,' ver. 13. There is an intimate connection between the disowning of God, or the refusing to know him, and the practice of sin. 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the holy is understanding.' We are expressly told, that because men 'did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind,' Rom. i. 28. So will it always be. When pains are not taken to keep up a knowledge of God, as he has been revealed to us by his Son, there will be a forsaking of his law, and a proceeding 'from evil to evil,' that will bring down the judgments of God. It is the knowledge of God in Christ, as a perfectly holy and righteous being, who 'will by no means clear the guilty,' but is full of compassion and gracious, and will admit us to his favour through the merits and intercession of his Son, that puts an end to every thing like pride and vain glory, and makes the things of this world, in whatever abundance they are enjoyed, be regarded as talents to be used in his service. When pride exists, or any thing like glorying in our own, or our country's greatness, influence, attainments, or wealth, God is either altogether unknown, or is very imperfectly known; and there is room for the solemn warning, ver. 23, 24. Let us humbly and diligently avail ourselves of every means for growing 'in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' Let it be our object, by our example and our endeavours, to bring all around us to know the Lord. So may we hope that his judgments will be averted from ourselves and our land; and, as is most tenderly expressed in regard to the 'daughter of his people,' ver. 7. his purpose in regard to us, in subjecting us to 'the furnace of affliction,' will be, not to be avenged upon us, but to make 'the trial of our faith—unto praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.'

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, thou dwellest on high, and thy glory is above the heavens. Thou inhabitest eternity, and art supremely and unchangeably happy in thyself. The services of men and of angels can add nothing to thee. Their transgressions cannot lessen thy glory. Who is like unto thee, that humblest thyself to behold even the things that are in heaven? Yet thou hast respect unto the lowly upon earth; yea, thou dwellest with him that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the spirit of the contrite ones. Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us. Our hope is in thee. We are poor and needy; and we adore and praise thee that thou dost regard the prayer of the destitute, and dost not despise their prayer. We thank thee also, that we have a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, through whom we can come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. Behold, O God, our shield, and look on the face of thine Anointed, that we, believing in him, may find favour in thy sight.

May we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins. May our wants be supplied out of his fullness, that we may be as men of God, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. May his Spirit help our infirmities, so that our feet may be set as on a rock, and our goings may be established in the way of thy commandments. May we know the blessedness of them that fear thee, and delight in thy law. In our intercourse with others, and in all our temporal enjoyments, may we be kept from the evil which the things of the world are apt to beget. In tribulation, may the hope of the gospel be as the anchor of our souls, sure and steadfast. Depending upon thee, as reconciled to us by the death of thy Son, and providing for us with a father's care, may we be enabled to possess our souls with patience. May the changes of life be borne with cheerful submission to thee; and may the approach of death be regarded, not as the extinction of our joys, but as the period of our entering into peace, to be for ever with the Lord. As members of a family, we offer grateful thanks for thy kindness in preserving us to another day, and allowing us again to meet at the throne of grace. Be with us, O Lord, in all our out-goings and in-comings, to direct our ways, and keep us from evil. May blessings, even showers of blessings, descend upon our kindred, our neighbours, and our friends. Show tokens for good to those who are in trouble. Be favourable to our land, and to all who rule over us. Prosper our Zion; and give effect to the means that are employed for extending the knowledge of thyself, and of thy great salvation; that from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same, thy name may be praised. Hear us, O Lord, in these our prayers, and answer us in thy mercy, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

MONDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PARAPHRASE LVI. 4—7.

SCRIPTURE—COLOSSIANS III.

REMARKS.

It is implied, in the opening words of this chapter, that by nature we are 'dead in trespasses and sins;' and the same truth is expressly stated, ver. 3. But Christians are not left in this sad condition. They are 'quickened' by the Spirit of God, and enabled by him to 'walk in newness of life.' This spiritual change is spoken of, ver. 9, 10. It is declared to be indispensable for all Christians, whatever be the country to which they belong, or the condition which they occupy on earth, ver. 11. And throughout these three verses it is held forth as a reason for their maintaining a line of conduct directly opposite to what they followed in their unregenerated state. All the precepts which the chapter contains, are addressed to them on the supposition of their being 'risen with Christ;' for it is then only that any attainments in holiness can be made. And we may consider the great object of the chapter to be to exhibit the character of those who, by divine grace, have been 'begotten again,' and are become 'alive unto God.'

They are remarkable, ver. 1, 2. for the elevation of their sentiments and views. They put a high value 'on things above,' and they seek them with unabated ardour. They have every encouragement to do so from the exaltation of the Saviour, and the endearing connection which subsists between him and his people. He will not fail to assist them in their holy aspirations, and 'to give them an inheritance among all them that are sanctified.' Intimately connected with this are their constant endeavours to subdue all sinful propensities and habits, ver. 5—9; and to cultivate the lowly and forbearing disposition which becomes those who have the Spirit of Christ, ver. 12—14. Expecting forgiveness through him for themselves, they shrink from harbouring an angry and unforgiving disposition to others. Theirs is the charity which 'beareth all things.' Having 'peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ,' there is produced in their minds a heavenly and abiding calm, which they are careful that resentful passions do not disturb, ver. 15. The sentiments which they breathe are the very opposite to unkindness, ver. 16, 17. Dependence upon Christ as the only 'Mediator between God and man,' a constant reference to him as 'the way' which all must employ for access to the Father; gratitude to God by him; regard for his glory; admiration of his word; concern for the welfare of others; these are sentiments which cannot give birth to either unkindly words, or unkindly deeds. They are sentiments which never lose their hold upon Christians. Their influence is acknowledged in all situations, in the more private intercourse of life as well as in public, and, most of all, in those various domestic relations which afford the best and largest scope for the expression of Christian love, ver. 18—22. By the affectionate and assiduous manner in which relative duties are observed, Christians 'adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.' They know that their condition is appointed by him who is their Lord, and the Lord of all; and they perform their duties not merely with the view of satisfying men, but with the higher object of giving glory to God, ver. 23. They know that whether their station is humble or exalted, they are all the servants of 'the Lord Jesus Christ;' that they have all to render an account to him; and that if they are 'faithful unto death,' they have all to look from him for 'the reward of the inheritance.'

This chapter is a manual for Christians. They cannot study it too often. It shows not only what are their duties, but in what spirit they should be performed. Above all it directs them to the great source from which ability to discharge them is derived, ver. 3, 4. Union with Christ must be steadfastly maintained, (John xv. 4, 5.) The life which we live in the flesh, we must live by the faith of the Son of God. We must go in his strength, making mention of his righteousness, even of his only; living in him, and by him, seeking grace from him; and walking after his Spirit, we shall find that he will neither fail nor forsake us. He will perfect that which concerns us here; and when the period of the great consummation arrives, and he shall appear to gather his elect, we also shall appear with him in glory.

PRAYER.

We adore thee, O Lord, as the living and the true God. Thou art possessed of every perfection, and all thy perfections are infinite. Thou didst create all things by the word of thy power. Thy throne is in heaven, and thy dominion ruleth over all. Thou art every where present. Thou art acquainted with the circumstances of all thy creatures, and thou art ever doing them good. Thou hast been mindful of us; and we render hearty thanks for the great and unwearied kindness of thy providence. Thou hast supplied all our wants. Thou hast relieved us from many difficulties. Thou hast given us much enjoyment in life. Thou hast been mindful of us; and how shall we express the gratitude that is due for the riches of thy grace! Thou didst effect the deliverance of thy chosen Israel from their bondage of old, and didst manifest thy kindness to them by marvellous interpositions in their behalf. But how much greater is the deliverance which thou hast effected for us from the bondage of sin; and how much more hast thou magnified thy mercy to us, in sending thine only begotten Son to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons! Adored be thy name, for all the signs and the wonders which assure us that God did set him forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, and that God has accepted him as such. Adored be thy name, that when he had offered the one sacrifice of himself for sins, he was raised from the dead by the mighty power of God, and exalted by thy right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins. Thou hast commended thy love toward us, in that while we were sinners, Christ died for us. Thou hast not spared thine own Son, but hast delivered him up for us all. By him thou art giving us exceeding great and precious promises; and with him thou wilt freely give us all things that pertain unto life and godliness. May we be rooted and built up in him, and stablished in the faith, abounding therein with thanksgiving. May our convictions of the love of the Saviour be deep and abiding, that we may praise him while we live, and trust in him continually as our help and our shield. May he dwell in our hearts by his Spirit, and bring us wholly under his dominion, that we may be a willing people unto him in the beauties of holiness. May that church which he purchased with his blood, be blessed of the Lord in its people and its priests. May the light of true religion shine within it; and may numbers be added to it daily of such as shall be saved. Make Gentiles and Jews to tremble at the presence of the Lord, and to own him as the God of their salvation. May all whom thou art pleased to chasten, be brought to trust in that Lord who will bless them that fear him, both small and great. May it be the experience of every member of this family, and of all to whom we are tenderly attached, that we are blessed of the Lord, who made heaven and earth. To thy fatherly care do we commit ourselves through the night. Forgive all our sins, and accept of us for Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM CV. 4.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH XII.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

In the five first verses at the beginning of this chapter, the prophet expostulates with God regarding the prosperity of the wicked. In the remaining part of the chapter, God condescends to answer the inquiries of his servant. Jeremiah had been exposed to imminent danger by the faithful delivering of the Lord's message to the people, and by his affectionate warnings to them to repent, so that the threatened judgments might be averted. As he was conscious that he was influenced by the purest motives, in his endeavours to instruct and reclaim them, he seems to have been surprised and agitated by the unrelenting hostility of his enemies, to whom he could have made an appeal like that of the apostle 'am I therefore your enemy, because I tell you the truth.' While, therefore, he declares his faith in the rectitude of God's government, he beseeches the Almighty, to lay open to him the reasons of his permitting the wicked to triumph over the just. To them, as deriding his predictions, he traced the unbelief of the great mass of the people, and he inquired, why they were not punished, that his countrymen might be deterred from following their pernicious ways.

To this expostulation, the Lord answers, by informing the prophet that calamities were about to happen, far greater than those by which his mind was disquieted, and which would put his faith to far severer trial. God was about 'to forsake his temple,' and 'leave his heritage;' the surrounding nations were about to assault the land of Judah, as the flocks of birds attack a fowl of strange and speckled plumage.

Still, however, the Gentile nations would not be permitted to pass unpunished, although they were chosen as the instruments of inflicting God's judgments on his rebellious people. They would be visited with his displeasure, and the Israelites would be restored to their own land. Even to the Gentiles, indeed, mercy is promised if they believed in the only true God, and in that Saviour that was to come into the world.

The great lesson to be taken by the followers of Christ from these declarations, is that of never distrusting the wisdom and goodness of their Father in heaven. Though the wicked may seem to prosper in the world, their happiness is only apparent; for so long as they are separated from God, they cannot possess those enjoyments which are alone able to satisfy the desires of rational and immortal beings. And though the people of God may be subjected to many trials, their sufferings are appointed for the promotion of their spiritual good. Their graces are refined in affliction, as gold comes forth purified from the fire. If, notwithstanding our care to walk in wisdom towards them that are without, we are reproached for the sake of Christ and his gospel, we may feel persuaded that some great and good end is to be secured by those anxieties and troubles we have to bear; that our minds are to be more bent down to lowly resignation, that our faith is to be strengthened, that our hope is to be enlivened, and that we are, by the discipline of God's providence, to be led to adorn more fully the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. And while Christians have this assurance regarding the purpose of all the troubles they endure, they have also the promise, 'if we be dead with Christ, we shall also live with him,' 'if we suffer, we shall also reign with him.' Their sorrows are like the fleecy clouds which gather around the rising sun; their joys are like the light of the sun itself, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Wherefore, let us take with patience the chastening of the Lord; let us trust in him as reigning over the world through the mediation of his Son; let us rejoice in the victories which his gospel is to gain in every nation under heaven; and let us look forward to the time when that which is in part shall be done away, and that which is perfect shall come.

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever blessed God, in whose hands is the breath of every living thing, and the soul of all mankind, we desire this morning to pour out our hearts before thee in prayer. Every day presents us with fresh tokens of thy goodness, and renewed memorials of thy grace. When thou upholdest us by thy Spirit, we are able to rejoice in our strength; when thou withdrawest thy face we are troubled, and go down to the dust whence we came. Above all, O

Lord, we would bless thee for thy saving mercy manifested towards us in Jesus Christ. Herein indeed, is love, not that we loved thee, but that thou lovedst us, and gavest thine only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have eternal life. O the height, and the depth, and the breadth, and the length of thy love, shown to us in not sparing thine own Son, but delivering him up to the death for us all. May our minds be enlightened by the discoveries of thy word. May our hearts be enriched by the visitations of thy grace, so that we may sincerely believe in the Saviour, and thankfully embrace his great salvation. May we renounce all refuges of lies, to lean on the only name given under heaven among men whereby we must be saved. May we stand as suppliants at the foot of the cross, confessing our lost condition, and asking humbly for pardon and redemption as thy free and unmerited gifts, through the mediation of thy blessed Son. O Lord, do thou open our understandings, to learn the unsearchable riches of thy grace. Do thou dispose our hearts to love and serve thee. May the Holy Spirit deliver us from the dominion of evil, and restore us to the glorious liberty of the sons of God. O Lord, we acknowledge that the ways of thy providence seem often dark to our weak and ignorant minds. Let not our souls be disquieted within us, when thy dispensations are beyond the reach of our limited knowledge. Enable us, in the most perplexing difficulties, and under the most painful trials, to preserve a firm faith in thee, as ordering all things after the counsel of thine own will, and over-ruling all events for thine own glory, and for the spiritual good of thy believing people. Teach us, O Lord, to possess our souls in patience, and give to us the blessedness of the man whose mind is stayed upon the Lord, and whose spirit is joyful in the God of his salvation. Hasten, O Lord, the time foretold by the prophets, when every form of idolatry shall be overthrown, when the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, when the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. Most merciful Father, let thy blessing descend on all who are laid on beds of languishing, and let thy mercy be extended to them that are appointed to die. Watch over our friends, to keep them from the evils that are in the world, and to enrich them abundantly with spiritual blessings. O Lord prepare us for the duties of this day, let our lives be spent in thy fear, and let us be received at death into glory, for the sake of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

TUESDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CVI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—COLOSSIANS IV.

PRACTICAL REMARKS.

Among the many pleasing effects produced by the gospel, one of the most interesting to a well constituted mind, is the spirit of kindness which it diffuses throughout the various classes in society. By bringing before us the circumstances in which all men are similar to one another, as accountable creatures that have fallen from innocence, and by pointing out the Christian privileges which all equally enjoy, it teaches us that the distinctions of this life are always to be viewed in connection with the discovery of another, and that every man has a Lord and master in heaven. Let masters act toward their servants under this conviction, not only giving them what is just and equal as a recompence for their services, and speaking to them in terms of courtesy, and consulting their good in this world, but setting before them pure and pious examples, and admonishing them to be servants of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Prayer is the bond by which Christians maintain a union with their Father in heaven. It is our duty to watch against those temptations to neglect it, that may arise either from the cares of the world, or the natural coldness of our own hearts, for unless we are instant in prayer, we cannot profit by other means of grace, nor can we be faithful in discharging our incumbent obligations. Our prayers should be offered for them that minister in sacred things, that they may be faithful in their Master's cause, and that their labours may issue in the spiritual improvement of their people.

No department of Christian duty requires more judgment than that which relates to those who are either averse to religion altogether, or who regard it with frigid indifference. Believers are in consequence 'to walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time;' giving offence to no man, shunning all appearance of evil, and presenting their most holy faith before the thoughtless and irreligious, in its most winning and alluring form.

Christ called his followers the salt of the earth, to denote the purity of conduct they preserved, and by which they saved the world around them from sinking into universal corruption. When the apostle enjoins, 'let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt,' he commands us to imbue our language on all subjects, and on all occasions, with the temper and disposition of the gospel, which are equally necessary to render it suitable to our Christian profession, as salt is requisite to save from decay. Whatever be the topic to which our attention is turned we are to treat it as becometh the followers of Jesus Christ. Let it be our care to follow this difficult but important rule in our lives, that we may know how to answer every man, and may promote the glory of our blessed Redeemer.

On those counsels and salutations by which the epistle is closed, no observations need be offered, except in reference to Onesimus, who is called 'a faithful and beloved brother.' This is the same person who is alluded to in Paul's epistle to Philemon, and who is there spoken of as having deserted his master Philemon's service, and as having been converted by Paul to the Christian faith. During the interval that elapsed between writing the one epistle and the other, a remarkable change had taken place in his character, and in the feelings with which Paul regarded him. And this is a very pleasing example of the manner in which the gospel elevates the character of all that embrace it, of the way in which the men who are least useful in the world become valuable members of the church and of society, as soon as they embrace its enlightened doctrines, and come under its purifying sway.

The apostle besought the Colossians to 'remember his bonds,' to commend him in their prayers to God's protection, and to ask for his deliverance if it was God's will, that he might prosecute anew his apostolical labours. Let us 'remember them that are in bonds as bound with them, and them which suffer adversity,' as being ourselves also in the way, and give our sympathy and our prayers especially to those who suffer for righteousness' sake.

PRAYER.

O Lord God of our salvation, let our prayer this evening come before thee, and incline thine ear to our cry. We have sinned against thee, O thou preserver of men, and we are no more worthy to be called thy children. We have not received the lessons of thy word into our hearts, we have not been improved as we ought to have been by the ways of thy providence. Neither thy solemn warnings, nor thy tender invitations, have made a suitable impression on our souls. O Lord, pardon our sins and save us from temptation. Take the stony hearts out of our flesh, and give us hearts of flesh, that we may walk in thy statutes, and keep thine ordinances, and do them, that we may be thy people, and that thou mayest be our God. O may the love of Christ constrain us thus to judge, that if one died for all then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live, should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again. Let the Holy Spirit dwell in our souls; let faith, and hope, and love, and joy, and humility, and resignation, take up their abode in our hearts, and let us look not at the things that are seen and temporal, but at the things that are unseen and eternal. O Lord, teach us to remember that we have all one Master in heaven, and let us, under the influence of this conviction, be regarding all our brethren with a brother's eye, and be doing good to all men as we have opportunity. Let us feel the necessity, and let us value the privilege of making our requests known unto thee, and let us be praying always for thy grace, and for the supply of our many spiritual wants. We confess that we are prone to speak unadvisedly with our lips. Lord, let our speech be always with grace, let us reverence thy name, let us yield to thy law, let us seek thy glory in all the language we employ, so that we may in all our words and in all our ways, show that we are Christians in sincerity and in truth. And enable us, O Lord, to glory in the cross of Jesus Christ, and to confess him before men, that he may confess us before thee in heaven. We pray, O Lord, for them who are stewards of thy grace, that they may be supported under every discouragement, that they may be guided in every difficulty, and that they may be honoured as the instruments of winning souls to the Redeemer. Let them be taking heed to the ministry which they have received of thee, that they fulfil it. Gracious Father, bless the old, and let them be walking in wisdom, redeeming the time, because the days are evil; bless the young, and let them in the morning of life be choosing thee as the guide of their youth, so that there may be a seed to serve thee while sun and moon endure; bless all who live under this roof, and let us be so continually living under a sense of thy presence, and so earnestly doing what Christ commands, that we may be all admitted into the number of the redeemed, and may serve thee for ever in thy temple above. Hear, O Lord, these our evening prayers, for Christ's sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXX.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH XIV.

REMARKS.

The chapter now read commences with a very affecting account of that distress into which the inhabitants of Judea were thrown by the severities of a continued drought and consequent famine. Our attention is rather drawn to the consequences of which it was productive as here recorded.

Ver. 7—9. It led the prophet to humble himself before God, on account of the iniquities of the people, and to implore the returning favour and mercy of heaven. Such should be the effect of all our afflictions, whether they come on individuals or on nations; it is for this purpose they are sent.

Ver. 10—12. It would appear, from what we read in the 10th verse, that though as a nation they had publicly proclaimed a season of fasting and humiliation, and come before the Lord professedly penitent for sin, and deprecating his wrath, the love of sin yet reigned in their hearts, their offerings were not the sacrifices of broken and contrite hearts, which God will not despise. It ought, therefore, to be borne in mind, as accounting for the repeated declarations of the Almighty that he would not accept them, that the language of fervent supplication and entreaty here employed was the language of Jeremiah himself, and not of the Jewish nation. The cry of Jerusalem was indeed gone up, but merely the cry for deliverance from the evils which lay heavy upon them. And how often is it thus with ourselves when overtaken by afflictions and calamities! How much more urgent is the desire of relief from suffering, than that it may be the means of searching out our sins, and leading us to seek reconciliation through the blood of Jesus!

The command issued in the 11th verse, forbidding the prophet to pray for this people's good, is not to be regarded as absolute, but only as an intimation, that because of their heinous transgressions, he could scarcely expect his prayers to be answered. Like Moses, therefore, when similarly addressed by the Almighty, his heart glowed with love to his brethren according to the flesh—he continued to supplicate the divine favour and blessing. And so, if by the grace of God we have been brought to feel the power of the gospel in our own hearts, let us not be discouraged in praying for the conversion of our unbelieving relatives and friends.

Ver. 13—16. The prophet, still anxious to secure the favour of God, now pleads in behalf of his countrymen that the false prophets had encouraged them in their wickedness, by assurances that evil would not befall them. But this, instead of proving any extenuation of their guilt, only serves to call forth the same denunciations against the deceivers as against the deceived, and in addition to their present calamities, they are forewarned of the greater miseries of Chaldean invasion and captivity. From this we learn both the danger of continued impenitence as only tending to aggravate our final doom, and the folly of thinking to shelter ourselves at the bar of the Eternal under the false teaching of those who pervert the counsel of the Lord, and prophesy deceits in his name. But God hath given us a sure word of prophecy, whereunto we do well if we take heed; he hath promised the teaching of his Spirit to them who ask in faith; he hath told us of only one way of salvation, and it is at the peril of our souls to accept any other, Ezek. xxxiii. 7—9.

Ver. 17—22. The prophet endeavours still farther, though apparently in vain, to awaken the people from their spiritual deadness and insensibility, by pouring forth the most touching lamentations over the impending desolation of their city and land. He then, at the 19th verse, turns again to address himself to God in their behalf, in terms of the deepest humility, and the most earnest entreaty, and concludes by expressing his determination still to wait upon the Lord, as the only source of deliverance and peace. 'Art not thou he, O Lord our God, who hast made all these things?'

If the prophet thus fervently pleaded with God for the averting of temporal judgments, surely it becometh us to plead with no less earnestness and importunity to be delivered from that wrath, which, if not turned away, will terminate in the destruction of both soul and body in hell. Sinners we must feel that we are. Our iniquities do testify against us. Let us then seek unto the Lord in unfeigned repentance, let us plead the glory of his grace in the salvation of sinners, let us plead his covenant engagements in Christ, the efficacy of his atonement, the freeness of his salvation. Our prayers may not be answered at the time we may expect, in the words of the prophet, 'we may look for peace, and there is no good—for the time of healing, and behold trouble;' but never, since the foundation of the world, did one sinner perish who laid hold on his covenant, and rested on it as all his salvation and all his desire. 'Whosoever asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened.'

PRAYER.

Unto whom, O Lord, can we go but unto thee, for in all ages thou hast been the hearer and the answerer of prayer, the rock and support of them that put their trust in thee. We would take encouragement from thine own revealed word, that them who come unto thee through Christ, thou wilt in no wise cast out; and we would desire, on this morning which thou hast spared us to see, to lift up our hearts with our voices in prayer and supplication unto thee. Help us now to do so in the name of Jesus. We humble ourselves before thee because of our manifold sins. We have requited thy loving-kindness with ingratitude, we have despised thy warnings, we have misimproved our privileges, we have trifled away our precious time. How little have we been awed by thy threatenings, or affected by thy merciful invitations! How low a place does the love of thee, and of Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent, hold in our hearts! How often is it dispossessed by the perishing things of time! And with how little earnestness and faith have we sought reconciliation with thee, or the sanctifying power of thy Spirit! Justly, instead of loading us with mercies, mightest thou have visited us with judgments, as thou didst thine impenitent people of old. May thy goodness lead us to our repentance. Magnify thy name in our salvation. We would plead the merits of Christ's sacrifice, the efficacy of his atonement, the power of his grace. Hear us, for thy mercy's sake. Save us from being led astray by those who would speak unto us smooth things, and prophecy deceits, saying, Peace, peace, when there is no peace. But give us to know the preciousness of Christ, and to cleave to him as the hope of Israel. May he be formed in our hearts the hope of glory, and by his Spirit given unto us, may our souls be transformed after his divine image. Lord, bless our native land. Let not our sins, as a nation, provoke thee to anger. Do not abhor us for thy name's sake, be still in the midst of us, leave us not. Remember unbelieving Israel in mercy. Speedily bring them in with the fullness of the Gentiles. Be the friend of our friends, give comfort to the afflicted, prepare the dying for meeting with thee. We give thee thanks for the rest and protection of the past night. Bless us all individually as thou seest we have need. Keep us this day in thy fear. May we engage in nothing on which we cannot ask thy blessing, and may all we do for thy glory prosper. Blot out all our sins, and hear us graciously in these our requests, through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

PRaise—PSALM CIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—1 THESSALONIANS I.

REMARKS.

You will remember, in reading the Acts of the Apostles, that Paul was miraculously led by a vision which appeared to him at Troas, to go and preach the gospel in Macedonia. After labouring with greater or less success in several places, he came to the city of Thessalonica, where he planted a Christian church. 'Some of the Jews,' we are told, 'believed and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few.' Towards the church thus formed, his affection seems to have been peculiarly strong, for twice he sent Timothy 'to establish and to comfort them concerning the faith.' It was in consequence of the favourable account of their state brought by him as we read in the 3d chapter, that he wrote this epistle to confirm them in their profession of the gospel, and to animate their hearts under all the trials to which they were exposed.

After the usual salutation, he begins by offering up his thanksgivings to God for them. He claims no merit to himself, he ascribes to God alone the praise and the glory. Let us observe the grounds of his thanksgiving: these were, 1. Their work of faith. This is the root and foundation of the Christian character. Many make a profession of faith who know not the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour, and therefore have no part in his salvation; but with the Thessalonians, it showed itself to be genuine by their active obedience, by the works they were enabled to perform. 2. Their labour of love. There can be no vital religion where love to the Saviour does not reign in the heart, and pervade all the powers and affections of the soul. 'Faith worketh by love.' 3. Their patience of hope in the Lord Jesus Christ. They cherished the hope of eternal life as the free gift of God through Jesus Christ, and this hope was shown to be real, by the patience with which they were enabled to meet the difficulties and trials of the Christian life. A hope which shrinks from every trial for the sake of the truth, which gives way before every blast of temptation, which leaves us murmuring under the afflictions of life, cannot be that hope which is an anchor of the soul, sure, and stedfast. 4. He gives thanks because these graces were manifest in the sight of God. We may impose upon our fellow-men by false appearances, by a pretended zeal for the advancement of Christ's cause; but no veil can hide from God's all-seeing eye, and that only which is approved in his sight can stand the impartial scrutiny of final judgment.

The apostle, in the 4th verse, traces the bestowal of these blessings to the sovereign and electing grace of God. 'Believers are chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they should be to the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made them accepted in the Beloved.' The evidences of their election of God are thus given: 1. Because the gospel came to them not in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance. They heard it not merely as an interesting system of religion, but it affected their hearts, and produced such holy impressions as plainly showed the accompanying power of the Holy Ghost, convincing them of sin, renewing their minds, and so assuring them of the truth, that for the sake of it they willingly sacrificed every earthly comfort and worldly advantage. 2. Because it led them to be followers of the Lord Jesus, walking as he also walked, and enduring, with joy of the Holy Ghost, the severest afflictions which the rage and fury of their enemies could heap upon them. 3. Because they were not only ensamples to believers, but were effectually turned from idols to serve the living God. They abandoned the false worship in which they had been educated, and devoted themselves unreservedly to the service of the true God. 4. Because they set themselves in the attitude of waiting for the coming of the Son of God. They looked to him as the author of their faith, of their salvation from wrath, and they longed for his second coming in power and glory to effect their complete deliverance from sin and death, and the final redemption of all his ransomed, chosen people. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.

May the gospel produce in us the like blessed effects. May God, in mercy, save us from the fatal delusion of resting in a mere outward profession of Christianity. Multitudes, it is to be feared, are thus deceiving themselves, and ruining their own souls. But let us remember the declaration of scripture, 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, old things are passed away, behold all things are become new.' Lord, evermore give us that faith which is the work of thine own Spirit, and may 'the trial of our faith, being much more precious than that of gold which perisheth, be found unto praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.'

PRAYER.

O Lord, who art good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all thy works, we come before thee on this evening, confessing that we have nothing to hope for, but from the riches of thy free and unmerited goodness in Christ Jesus our Lord, and giving thee thanks for the word of truth which thou hast put into our hands, making known the rich provision for our souls in the gospel of thy Son, the free offers of salvation, and the promise of thy Spirit to make us partakers of its blessings and benefits. Give us to feel our need of a Saviour; show us more and more our danger and guilt apart from Christ; send forth thy Spirit into our hearts, and may he take of the things that are Christ's and show them unto our souls; and may the gospel become unto us the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation. Forbid that any of us should be deceiving ourselves by a mere profession of attachment to Christ, that any of us should be resting satisfied with a form of godliness while destitute of the power, with a name to live while the spirit is really dead; but may we be the Lord's disciples in deed and in truth. Give us that faith which worketh by love, which purifieth the heart, and overcometh the world. Shed abroad thy love in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost given unto us. In all our intercourse with the world, may it animate our whole conduct, and pervade all our thoughts, and words, and actions, leading us to follow after holiness, and righteousness, and truth, even after those things which are well-pleasing in thy sight. Make us living epistles of Christ, known and read of all men, whilst we wait for thy Son from heaven, whom thou didst raise from the dead, even Jesus, who delivered us from the wrath to come. Pardon, most merciful God, the iniquities of the past day, our forgetfulness of thee, our indifference to the things which concern our everlasting peace. We ever stand in need of the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Jesus, wash us in it from every defilement, and cover us with the perfect righteousness of Christ. Watch over us this night, as thou hast done in the days and nights that are past, and over all who are near and dear unto us, wherever they are. Let thy way be known upon earth, thy saving health amongst all the nations. Let the people praise thee, O Lord, yea, let all the people praise thee. Pardon our unworthiness, send us thy blessing from on high, and accept us graciously, for the sake of Jehovah our righteousness. Amen.

THURSDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LVII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH XVII.

REMARKS.

Impenitent sinners usually think lightly of sin. At the 10th verse of the preceding chapter, the hardened and rebellious Israelites are represented as putting this question to the prophet, 'Wherefore hath the Lord pronounced all this evil against us? or what is our iniquity, or what is our sin that we have committed against the Lord our God?' He is at the same time informed what answer he should give to their inquiry, and in the beginning of the chapter before us, the Lord intimates still further the enormity of their sin, declaring that it was deeply engraven on the book of his remembrance; yea, that it was written on the table of their own hearts, and witnessed by the altars on which they sacrificed to idols. Their children also bore witness against them, having been early taught to participate in their abominations, and to forsake the worship and service of the true God.

Ver. 5—8. The Jews, instead of betaking themselves to their Almighty protector, had frequently in the time of distress, and when assailed by their enemies, called in the assistance of the neighbouring nations and princes; the Lord therefore takes occasion to denounce his righteous indignation against such as trust in an arm of flesh, and most significantly contrasts their condition with that of believers, whose hope and confidence the Lord is

Ver. 9—11. Wicked indeed and deceitful is the heart of man. No man can tell the depths of corruption which lurk within his own breast. 'He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool.' What need have we to pray that God would keep us continually by his grace! that he who alone knoweth the heart would create in us clean hearts and renew right spirits within us, and ever lead us in the way everlasting. This should be our daily constant prayer; for the end for which the Lord searches and tries the heart is, 'that he may render to every man according to his works,' Gal. vi. 7, 8.

Ver. 12, 13. In Mount Zion, in the temple erected there of old, God met with his waiting people—there he displayed the glory of his grace, and gave forth the manifestations of his special presence. To us hath been given the privilege of access in every place, by that new and living way which he hath consecrated for us through the vail; may we then cleave unto the hope of Israel—Zion's king, through it, and thus shall our names, instead of being written on perishable dust, be enrolled in heaven among the true Israel of God.

Ver. 14—18. The children of God are in this life exposed to the ridicule and scorn of the unbelieving, more especially the faithful ministers of God's word are often treated with contempt, and their warnings regarded with indifference. Such is the complaint of Jeremiah. But in this they only experience the same treatment as their heavenly Master. 'If they have persecuted me,' he says, 'they will also persecute you.' Whatever may be the trials which they endure at the hands of an ungodly world, however lightly their labours in the cause of Christ may be esteemed, there is a day coming when these shall be acknowledged with approbation before an assembled universe, while their adversaries shall be punished with everlasting shame.

Ver. 19—27. The Lord is a jealous God. His name and his honour will he not give to another. He challenges a special propriety in the sabbath, and hath guarded the sacredness of that day by many awful sanctions. Of so much importance did he consider the hallowing of that day to the peace and prosperity of the nation, that he commands the prophet to proclaim his will concerning it in the ears of all the people, at the gates of the city, whither they were wont to resort. Indeed, it is a fact attested by the experience of every age, that the manner in which the Sabbath is observed, is a just index of the state of religion in the land. Let us all then as individuals, and as families, in our respective spheres, labour to sanctify God's blessed day. Let us carefully guard against the intrusion of secular employments or unhallowed thoughts; let it be specially set apart for communing with our God, and then shall our souls be blessed from on high, our families shall be the favoured residence of the God of Jacob, and that righteousness which alone exalteth a nation shall flourish and abound amongst us.

PRAYER.

Thou art the omniscient and the heart-searching God. All things are naked and open before thee. Thou settest our iniquities before thee—our secret sins in the light of thy countenance. Help us, therefore, to approach thy throne of grace with the deepest humility, and with that sense of our own unworthiness which becomes us as transgressors of thy holy law. Our consciences do testify against us—our own hearts do condemn us, and thou art greater than our hearts, and knowest all things. We can plead nothing in ourselves, O righteous God, in extenuation of our guilt; but we rejoice that the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin, and by looking unto the Lamb that was slain, may every iniquity which stands against us be blotted out from the book of thy remembrance; may we attain that peace which passeth all understanding, which the world can neither give nor take away. We know from thy word, and we feel in our own experience, that the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. We know from thy word, and we feel in our own experience, that he who trusteth in his own heart is a fool. O create in us clean hearts, and renew right spirits within us. Take away the hard and stony hearts out of our flesh, and give us hearts of flesh. Put thy Spirit within us, to dwell and abide in our hearts. Keep us ever distrustful of ourselves, and strong in thy promised strength, that we may run and not be weary, that we may walk and not faint. Save us from putting our trust in any created thing, but may the eternal God be our refuge, and receiving out of the fullness that is treasured up in Christ, those supplies of grace of which we stand in need, may we become fruitful trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that thou mayest be glorified. Let the same mind be in us, which was also in Christ. May we not be ashamed of him or of his cause; but may we be enabled to stand forth as witnesses to the power, and grace, and glory of the Redeemer. Let the kingdom of Satan be destroyed, let thy name be hallowed, let thy sabbath be sanctified, let the kingdom of Christ be built up and established. Put an end to the reign of ignorance, of superstition, of vice, and idolatry, and may the time soon come when pure incense and offering shall be presented unto thee, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof. Bless all whom we ought to remember before thee; be gracious to our friends, reward our benefactors, forgive our enemies. Keep us this day from the evil that is in the world. May we regard each day as a day in connection with eternity. And the Lord preserve our going out and our coming in from this time forth, even for evermore. Hear us from thy holy sanctuary, and take away all our sins, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXII. 5.

SCRIPTURE—I THESSALONIANS II.

REMARKS.

One principal end, it is to be observed, which the apostle had in view, in writing to the Thessalonian converts, was to confirm their attachment to the gospel as 'the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation.' Having, therefore, for this purpose, called their attention, in the commencement of the epistle, to the blessed and holy influence, which, through the divine Spirit, it had produced upon their own souls, he proceeds, in illustration of the same point, to remind them of the manner in which he had fulfilled his ministry amongst them—proving that he was actuated by no worldly motive, and appealing to their own consciences for the truth of what he affirmed. The chapter before us, then, may be regarded as furnishing an instructive lesson to ministers in every age. And happy are they who, with a pure conscience in the sight of God, can call their charge to bear witness to the faithfulness and zeal with which they have sought to win souls to Christ.

We observe, 1. His unshaken constancy, notwithstanding the opposition of men, in making known the glorious gospel of the blessed God.

2. He had a single eye to the glory of God. He sought not honour from men.

3. His affection for the Thessalonian converts. We can scarcely conceive words or sentiments more expressive of sincere and fervent attachment than those set before us in the eighth and ninth verses. Love to Christ, and, as a necessary consequence, love to the souls of men, are indispensable requisites in the Christian ministry. Without these there will be neither life nor vigour in the ministerial work. 'We seek not,' says Paul, 'yours, but you.'

4. The holiness and blamelessness of his life. The labour of ministers, however fervent and zealous, will be effectually marred, if in their conduct there is a want of that purity and devotedness to Christ's cause which become his disciples. It has been well said, that wherever you behold a Jew, you behold a living evidence of the truth of Christianity; so wherever we behold exemplified in the Christian minister the influence of those doctrines which it is his work to commend, what force of persuasion does it add to his words! how much does it tend to stop the mouths of the gainsayers and profane! 'Give no offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed.'

If we have received the gospel not as the word of men, but as the word of God; if we are believers; if it has wrought effectually in us, one of its blessed effects will be, that we will become followers of Christ through good report and through evil report. For this the apostle gives thanks in behalf of the Thessalonian converts. Persecuted by their own countrymen, even as the churches of Judea were by the Jews, they yet continued stedfast in the faith, rejoicing inasmuch as they were counted worthy to suffer for the sake of Christ. Having mentioned the Jews, he is reminded of their ingratitude in crucifying the Lord of glory; and adds this awful truth, that the enmity which they now showed to the truth, in their endeavours to prevent the word of life being offered to the Gentiles, was as it were the filling up of that cup of iniquity for which the wrath of God was to come upon them to the uttermost. How strikingly has this been verified! 'Jerusalem is now trodden down of the Gentiles, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' And how solemn is the warning here recorded to us as individuals, as a church, and as a nation!

In the concluding verses of this chapter ministers still farther learn, from the example of Paul, that whatever opposition they may encounter from the devices of satan, they ought not to be cast down or discouraged. He in whose cause they are engaged is mightier far, and can in a moment defeat his malicious designs. Let them still affectionately seek, by prayer and by every way of God's appointment, the conversion and edification of those committed to their care; for what is their hope, and joy, and crown of rejoicing, in the day of the Lord Jesus? will it not be the souls saved, through their instrumentality, as additional trophies of redeeming grace? How transporting the thought, both to the faithful servant of God and his believing people! and how much fitted to inspire and invigorate his labours, that concerning any of his flock he should at last be permitted to say, 'Behold me and the children whom thou hast given me!'

PRAYER.

O Lord, thou hast brought us in safety to the close of another day, and we would desire to give praise and thanks unto thy name. We come not into thy presence trusting in any thing which we possess. We have no holiness of our own to recommend us unto thee; we have no righteousness of our own to justify us in thy sight; we have no wisdom of our own to guide us; we have no strength of our own to enable us to serve; but we rejoice that all these are treasured up in Christ Jesus, and that we are invited to ask and we shall receive; to seek, and we shall find; to knock, and it shall be opened unto us. We are not straitened in thee the Lord. May we not be straitened in ourselves. Thou hast invited us to ask for great things, and we would now desire to do so. We pray for the pardon of all our sins; we pray for thy Spirit, as the greatest of those gifts which Christ procured for his believing people. May he lead and guide us into all truth, and make us the followers of Christ through good report and through evil report. If thou in mercy hast given to any of us to taste and see that the Lord is gracious; if thou hast enabled us in any measure to glory in the cross of Christ, and to give evidence of the divine life begun in our souls, carry on thy good work, perfect that which concerneth us. Enable us to labour, as far as our influence extends, for the advancement of thy kingdom; and may the whole earth be filled with the glory of the Lord. Bless thy ministering servants every where. Make them workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. Be especially gracious to him whose ministrations we enjoy. May his own soul be abundantly enriched with the treasures of thy grace; speaking the truth in love, may we receive the word at his mouth, not as the word of man, but as the word of God, which effectually worketh in them that believe. Lord, grant that he may have many amongst us as his joy and crown of rejoicing in the presence of Jesus Christ at his coming. Prosper and extend thy church. Convince the careless, convert the unconverted, and stablish and strengthen thine own people. Sanctify afflictions to the afflicted. Raise up the bowed down. Comfort those who mourn in Zion. Draw near unto those who are drawing near unto death. Pardon for Christ's sake wherein we have offended against thee during the past day, for in all things we offend and come short of thy glory. We commend ourselves, and all whom we ought to remember before thee, to thy care and keeping this night. Thou Shepherd of Israel, who neither slumberest nor sleepest, preserve us from all evil. Whether we live, may we live unto the Lord; whether we die, may we die unto the Lord. Whether living or dying, may we be wholly thine. All that we ask is in the name and for the sake of Christ Jesus, to whom, with thee and the Holy Spirit, one God, be glory for ever. Amen.

FRIDAY MORNING.

PRaise—PSALM XXIII.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH XXIII.

REMARKS.

The woes and the promises of this chapter were alike fulfilled in the subsequent history of Israel. The false prophets and priests were slain or taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar; the scattered remnant of the flock were afterwards brought again to their fold, from all the countries whither they had been driven; faithful shepherds were set over them, such as Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah; and at length Israel beheld in Jesus of Nazareth, the promised Branch of David, the Lord their righteousness, who wrought out for them a redemption far more glorious than their deliverances from Egyptian and Chaldean bondage. But let us apply the chapter to ourselves.

1. Let it remind us of our privileges as members of the visible church. We are now the sheep of God's pasture, as the Israelites once were, and he has set over us a great and a good Shepherd, to lead us beside the still waters, and to cause us to lie down in the green pastures, with shepherds under him to feed our souls with the words of knowledge, and to draw water for us out of the wells of salvation. And what a union of excellencies do we find in the chief Shepherd! He is the Lord our righteousness; he laid down his life for the sheep, and in him we have pardon, acceptance, and eternal life. In him, too, we have strength and a sure defence; for he is a king, he reigns and prospers, and he restrains and conquers all our enemies. How 'safely' then do we 'dwell' under a guardianship like his, and how well may we say, in the exercise of like precious faith with David, 'The Lord is our shepherd, we shall not want. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow us all the days of our lives, and in the house of the Lord we will dwell for ever.'

2. Let the chapter remind us of the strong claim which the pastors of the church have upon our sympathies and prayers. How solemn are their responsibilities! They must be careful to abide in the counsel of the Lord, ver. 22. They must declare to the flock the whole truth, keeping back nothing that is profitable; not saying, 'ye shall have peace, while there is no peace,' ver. 28. It is at their eternal peril that they neglect the flock, and the blood of souls will be required at their hand, ver. 15—19. On the other hand, what a blessing is their ministry fitted to be to our souls, when they receive grace to be faithful in dispensing the word of God, or that word is not like the arm of man. It is as wheat compared with chaff, ver. 28; having weight and worth, taking root in the soul, and bringing forth a rich harvest. It is like a fire, ver. 29; melting and purifying the natural heart, and enkindling the flame of zeal and love. It is like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces, so that the stoutest and most stubborn feel its subduing power. Whether, then, we look to their awful responsibilities, or to the blessed effects which their ministry, if faithful, is fitted to produce upon ourselves and others, they have a powerful claim upon our sympathies and prayers. We should never forget them in our family devotions. The domestic altar should help the pulpit, and our own pastor especially we should bear continually on our hearts at the throne of grace. We shall thus strengthen his hands, and encourage his heart; and the word of the Lord, in answer to our prayers, shall have free course and be glorified. What a blessing to the families of a flock to have a faithful pastor! And what a blessing to a pastor, seeking to be faithful, to have a sympathising and praying flock.

PRAYER.

O Lord our God, we bow before thee in humble adoration of thy greatness and holiness, and the glorious honour of thy majesty. We unite in blessing thee as the author of all our mercies, the giver of every good and perfect gift, and we renew our supplications in the name of Jesus, the Lord our righteousness, that thou wouldst be merciful to us and bless us, and cause thy face to shine upon us, and give us peace. Holy Father! we own our utter unworthiness of the least of thy favours; we are a people laden with iniquity, an unthankful, a rebellious people. All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one of us to his own way. But adored be thy mercy, thou hast not cast us off; thou hast done great things for us, whereof we are glad. Thou hast sent the good Shepherd to seek and to save us, and hast laid upon him the iniquity of us all; and him who knew no sin thou hast made sin for us, that he might bring us to thee. O may we all be brought back to thee. May he come after us into the wilderness until he find us; and when he hath found us, may he lay us on his shoulders rejoicing, and carry us back to the fold. May we live through his death, may we be accepted through his righteousness, may we be blessed with his love, may we be defended by his power, and restrained from wandering by his grace; and may we at last be brought to his heavenly fold. And do thou grant unto us, O God of all grace, the character of Christ's sheep, as well as their privileges. May we hear his voice, may we follow his footsteps, may we flee from the stranger. Cleanse us, O Lord, from all our pollutions. Free us of the stain of sin, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, and make us meet to join that holy and beautiful flock above, which the Lamb, who is in the midst of the throne, feedeth and leadeth unto living fountains of waters, and from whose eyes thou wipest all tears away. We bless thee, O Lord, for the pastors whom thou hast appointed to feed the church which Christ has purchased with his own blood, and we earnestly beseech thee to give them all grace to be faithful and successful in their solemn work. May they stand in thy counsel, and cause the people to hear thy words, that thus they may turn them from their evil ways. We pray more especially for the pastor whom thou hast set over ourselves. May he be a man full of faith and the Holy Ghost. Let the word of Christ dwell in him richly in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, and may he be enabled rightly and wisely to divide it both to the sheep and lambs of thy flock. And be thou thyself, O Saviour, the Shepherd of his flock. Seek that which is lost, bring again that which is driven away, bind up that which is broken, and strengthen that which is sick. Feed them in a good pasture, and let them lie in a good fold. And cause the shower to come down in his season; yea, let these be showers of blessing. We acknowledge thy goodness, O Lord, in sparing us to see this new day; we commend ourselves to thy grace ere we enter upon its business, and feel the power of its temptations. O keep our feet from falling, our eyes from tears, and our souls from death; and enable us to glorify thee in our bodies and spirits, which are thine. We invoke thy blessing upon our kindred and friends, and we entreat thee to be their Father as well as our Father, their God as well as our God. And now may the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make us perfect in every good work to do his will, working in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

FRIDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XV. 1.

SCRIPTURE—I THESSALONIANS III.

REMARKS.

This chapter forms a very suitable sequel to the portion we read in the morning.

1. It presents a beautiful example of that love to souls which should animate the pastors of Christ's flock, and his people at large. While the apostle was present with the Thessalonians, he had been gentle as a nurse towards them; he had exhorted, and comforted, and charged every one of them as a father doth his children; and when he left them, he had rather 'been taken from them,' than gone willingly, and it was only in presence, not in heart. And now that he was absent from them for a season, mark the depth and the tenderness of his solicitude on their account. He could not bear to be without tidings of their spiritual welfare. He was willing to be left alone at Athens, in order that Timothy might visit them to know their faith, and to establish and comfort them. And when Timothy returned, the good tidings he brought regarding them, were comfort enough to him amidst all his afflictions, and filled him with a gratitude to God, too great to be expressed. It was his unceasing prayer that he might see them again, and his very life was bound up in their steadfastness; 'now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord.'

What a pattern is this for the ministers of Christ and his people in general! What a reproof to our coldness and selfishness in regard to the spiritual interests of mankind! And what a cause for thankfulness is it to the chief Shepherd, that he has made the standard of pastoral love and faithfulness so high as this, for which he thus teaches his ministers to be ever aiming at higher degrees of affectionate concern for their people; he provides that their flocks shall be ever enjoying more abundant tokens and fruits of their pastoral care.

2. We may learn, from the objects of the apostle's solicitude, what we ought to be chiefly concerned about ourselves, as professing believers.

You observe his great anxiety was about the faith of the Thessalonians, that it should be steadfast and immovable, ver. 2, 3; mature and perfect, ver. 10; and rich in the fruit of holy love, 12, 13. And such are the qualities that should characterise our own faith, and must do so, if it be the faith of God's elect; a plant which our Father in heaven has planted. Its root must be firm and deep, so as not to be uprooted by the storm and tempest to which it is exposed; its stem must be ever aspiring to the fullness of its stature, and its branches must be loaded with the golden fruit of love, the love of brotherly kindness towards all the household of faith, and of self-denying benevolence towards all mankind; the love of deeds, not of words; a love that turns all its good wishes into prayer, and follows up its prayer with large and liberal performance; to have our faith established, and what is lacking in it perfected, so that its fruitfulness in love may continually increase and abound to an object which concerns us more deeply, and should engross us far more than all worldly affairs, for it is only thus that our hearts can be established or assured before God, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

PRAYER.

Almighty Father! we would anew draw near to thy footstool with one accord. O enable us to commune with thee in spirit and in truth; and may all the day's anxieties and vanities be banished from our thoughts, that we may wait upon thee without distraction. We approach thy throne, O Lord, in the new and living way which thou hast opened up for us in the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, and through him we present unto thee our worship, so polluted and unworthy. Incline thine ear unto us, O God, for his sake, and remember us with the love thou bearest to thy people. We adore thy greatness, which is unsearchable, and acknowledge our own insignificance in thy sight. Holy, holy, holy art thou, Lord God Almighty; just and true art thou, O thou King of saints; but we are all as an unclean thing, and our iniquities, like the wind, have carried us away. We would lie low before thee, we would cast away all high thoughts and proud imaginations, we would cry out, God be merciful to us sinners! If thou wert strict to mark iniquity, who, O Lord, could stand? But do thou justify us freely through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Magnify the riches of thy grace in us. Make us the monuments of thy sovereign mercy. Thanks, everlasting thanks be unto thee, for thine unspeakable gift Christ Jesus, and for the new covenant which thou hast sealed with his blood, and made known to us by his gospel. Lord! we flee to this refuge, we plead the promise of this covenant, and the preciousness of that blood, and we beseech thee, according to thy sure word, be merciful to our unrighteousness; our sins and our iniquities remember no more. Put thy laws into our minds, and write them in our hearts. Be unto us a God, and make us unto thee a people. If thou hast begun a good work in us, O do thou carry it on and perfect it, for it is thou only who canst work in us both to will and to do. Stir us up by the Spirit of life to imitate the example of the first believers. Cause us to abound like them in the work of faith, the labour of love, and the patience of hope. Let the Holy Ghost work in us mightily. May he increase our faith, stablish, strengthen, settle it in our hearts, give it the mastery in our souls, and the victory over all our temptations. And may he cause us to increase and abound in love one toward another and toward all men, to the end he may stablish our hearts unblameable in holiness before thee, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints. We pray, O Lord, for the good estate of the church of the Redeemer on earth. O heal its painful divisions, increase its zeal for thy glory, and extend its limits more and more on every side. Animate its ministers with the spirit of the apostles, and adorn its members with primitive faith and charity. Giver of all good, we bless thee for the mercies of the past day. It is thou who fillest our mouths with good things, and inspirest our hearts with gladness. Continue to bless us as a family. May we all be numbered with the household of faith. Watch at our pillows this night, O thou keeper of Israel, who neither slumberest nor sleepest, and open our eyelids to behold the light of another day. May all our days and nights be spent in thy favour; and at last may we all come to thine eternal joy, through Jesus our only Mediator. Amen.

SATURDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM LXXX.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH XXV.

REMARKS.

The character of Israel is a mirror in which we may see our own; and the history of God's dealings with them illustrates the principles of his procedure with ourselves. Let us then learn from this chapter,

1. That God takes a strict account of all the means of grace which we enjoy, and of the use we make of them. Observe he computes exactly the number of years that Jeremiah had laboured among the people, he recalls the zeal and diligence which the prophet had shown in his ministry; and he reminds them that it was not Jeremiah alone who had preached to them, but all the other prophets who lived at that time. And be sure he takes a similar account of our privileges; he reckons up every year that we enjoy the ministry of the gospel; he records the name of every ambassador of Christ who addresses us; he computes all the care and pains which our pastors have bestowed upon us; and the principle of his final reckoning with us will be this, that 'from those to whom much has been given, much shall be required.'

2. Let us mark what is the great practical end of the institution of the ministry, the burden of Jeremiah's message to Israel. His unceasing cry was, 'Turn ye again!' And what was the burden of Paul's preaching in like manner? It was, 'that men should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance,' and the commission of Christ to all his ministers is, that they should 'preach repentance and remission of sins in his name among all nations.' This then is the great end which must be accomplished in us by the ministry of the gospel.

The love which the gospel reveals to us, must be a cord to draw us back to God, in newness of confidence, love, and obedience. We must be made new creatures in Christ Jesus. And if this is not done, the object of the ministry is altogether frustrated, in so far as we are concerned.

3. Let us be warned of the consequences of impotence and unbelief; 'Because ye have not heard my words,' said the Lord to the house of Judah, 'I will utterly destroy the inhabitants of this land.' And so with ourselves, the question of repentance is one of life and death, 'Except ye repent,' said the Saviour, 'ye shall all perish.' 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' God's remonstrance with us is, 'Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?' Let us give heed to his remonstrance, let us be in earnest about repentance unto life, let us look to him who is exalted to give not only remission of sins, but that repentance and faith which lead to it. Let it be our prayer, 'turn us, O Lord, and we shall be turned.'

4. What an impressive testimony does this chapter bear to the truth that Jehovah is governor among the nations of the earth, a righteous governor. We are too apt to imagine that his moral government was of old confined to the Jewish nation. How different was the fact! He punished the kings of Babylon, as well as the kings of Judah; nor was it only with the Chaldeans that he had a controversy, but 'with all the kingdoms of the world,' for they had all alike dishonoured him by their idolatry and wickedness. And 'his kingdom,' let us remember, 'is an everlasting kingdom, his dominion endureth throughout all generations.' What he was then, he is still—the King of kings, and the ruler of all nations. He presides over the destinies of our own country. If we nationally dishonour his law and gospel, he will punish us nationally, bringing down our greatness, recalling his precious gifts, and putting into our hands 'the wine cup of his fury.' The fear of the Lord, then, is the beginning of political as well as personal wisdom; the pure and undefiled religion of Christ is the palladium of our land; and it is the best expression of patriotism, as well as an undoubted obligation of piety, to pray and to labour for the spread of truth and godliness among all its people.

PRAYER.

We come before thee, O our God, in the multitude of thy tender mercies, and would call upon all that is within us fervently to bless thee for all thy loving-kindnesses. How precious are thy thoughts towards us, O God; how great is the sum of them! If we should reckon them up, they are more than can be numbered. We bless thee above all for thy dealings towards our souls; for the inestimable gift of the Lord Jesus Christ; and for all the spiritual privileges which thou hast vouchsafed to us through him. Thou hast been drawing us unto thee by the bonds of love, thou hast borne long with us, thou hast multiplied thy calls and invitations, and to us, as to Israel of old, thou hast given line upon line, and precept upon precept. But like Israel too, O Lord, thou knowest we have been stiff-necked and rebellious, and we have refused to turn to thee with full purpose of heart. But O do thou turn us, and we shall be turned. Thou art the Lord our God. Let the exalted Redeemer give unto us repentance and remission of sins. Let the Spirit of Christ reveal to us the love and the holiness of the cross, that we may be filled with grief and hatred of sin; and, apprehending thy mercy in Christ Jesus, may turn unto thee, to walk before thee in righteousness all the rest of our days. O heal our backslidings, love us freely, and receive us graciously; through the stripes of Jesus may we be healed. Let his dying love overcome our enmity, let his Spirit give us light and life, holiness and comfort; and now at length after all our slowness and backwardness of heart, may we be happily joined unto the Lord in the bonds of an everlasting covenant; and hereafter grow in grace and meetness for the inheritance of the saints. Lord! thou hast been reminding us from thy word that thou art the governor among the nations, and that it is only truth and righteousness that preserves and exalts a people. We adore thee as the supreme Disposer of the destinies of our own land. Avert from it, we beseech thee, thy merited judgments, and cast not its crown and glory down to the ground. Pour out upon us the spirit of national repentance, and of public zeal for thy truth and honour. Let thy name be hallowed, let thy will be done among us as it is in heaven. Restrain our backslidings, arrest the progress of infidelity and superstition; reform, and purify, and extend the churches which thou hast planted among us more and more; and bless the labours of all thy ministers and people to diffuse the gospel of Christ, and revive the power of godliness throughout the land. We thank thee, O Lord, for the repose of the past night, and for the glad some light of a new day. Enable us to walk in thy fear all this day long, and may we be strong in the grace of our Lord Jesus, to resist temptation, to fight the good fight of faith, and to perform whatsoever things are just, and true, and pure, and honest, and lovely, and of good report. Let thy blessing rest upon us as a family, and upon all who are dear to us, wherever they are. Knit our hearts together in the bonds of faith and love, and unite us all at last in the enjoyment of thy heavenly kingdom. We ask all in the name of Christ Jesus our Advocate, whom thou hearest always. Amen.

SATURDAY EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM XVI. 8.

SCRIPTURE—1 THESSALONIANS IV.

REMARKS.

To his prayers in behalf of the Thessalonians in the preceding chapter, the apostle here adds urgent exhortations; thus teaching ministers to give themselves unitedly to 'prayer and the ministry of the word,' and reminding all, that while they wait upon the God of all grace for the spirit of faith and love, they must also give attendance to the word, as the instrument which the Spirit employs. We are reminded in this chapter of the peculiar characteristics of the Christian walk.

1. It is a walk of increasing holiness, ver. 1—8. While others care only about pleasing man, or their own sinful lusts, it should be the Christian's great object to please God, and to do so more and more. And the reasons for this are many and weighty. It is the commandment of Christ Jesus, whose gospel is not the minister of sin, but 'a doctrine according to godliness.' It is the will of God with regard to us, and his will is law to the creature, a law of liberty to the believer. It is the object of the gospel calling, which while it is a free, a high, a heavenly calling, is also pre-eminently a holy one. It is the end of the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, ver. 8; for 'the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus is given us, to make us free from the law of sin and death.'

2. It is a walk of expanding and growing love, ver. 9, 10. The Thessalonians did not confine their love within the narrow circle of their own society, but extended it to 'all the brethren in all Macedonia, i. e. they manifested it towards all within the sphere of their intercourse in whom they recognised the features of Christ. What a contrast, what a rebuke to that narrow and sectarian spirit which delights rather to contract, than to extend the range of its sympathies, and which leads so many to look coldly and jealously upon all who do not belong to the same section of the universal church as themselves. The Thessalonians did not need to be exhorted to cultivate the spirit of love, but how much do Christians need to be exhorted now!

3. It is a walk of quiet and honest industry in our worldly callings. It should be made obvious to those that are without, that the citizens of heaven are also the best and most useful citizens of earth: 'no brawlers,' but quiet and peaceable; no busy bodies in other men's matters, but minding 'their own business;' no idlers, but diligent in business, as well as fervent in spirit; not dishonest, but giving to all their due; not sunk in disreputable and squalid poverty, but having lack of nothing, as the fruit of God's blessing upon their decent industry.

4. It is a walk of comfort and good hope, ver. 13—18. If it has its duties, it has also its privileges. If we are called to walk in the fear of God, we have also the comforts of the Holy Ghost. If Christ be truly formed within us, our view is not confined to the narrow limits of time, our best hopes will be realized, our highest happiness enjoyed when time shall be no more. Mark the blessed elements of our Christian hope: The second glorious appearing of the Lord from heaven, ver. 16, whom it is now our happiness to believe in, though we see him not, but whom it must be ecstasy to gaze upon 'as he is,' arrayed in all the glory of his Father, and covered with all the lustre of his own excellencies. The resurrection of our bodies from the sleep of death, ver. 14; for he who is the resurrection and the life, has promised to change our vile bodies, and fashion them in the likeness of his own glorious body. And how blessed not only to behold his glory, but to reflect it; to be made like him, as well as to see him as he is. Reunion with those whom we loved on earth, and from whom it cost us so bitter a pang to be torn asunder; we 'shall be caught up together with them to meet the Lord; the joy of that meeting with him being, if possible, enhanced by the charm of their renewed fellowship. Last of all, and to crown the whole prospect,'—'So shall we ever be with the Lord.' The bonds of that heavenly fellowship are never to be broken, the joy is to be as abiding as exuberant, it is to flow on in a stream unbroken and unmixed, throughout eternity.

PRAYER.

Father of mercies, and God of all grace! we bless thee for the free access we have to thy throne through the mediation of Jesus, and for the precious promises which thou hast given us to encourage us always to pray and not to faint. Blessed be thy name that thy love is freely proffered to us anew in Christ Jesus. The wages of sin is death, but thy free gift to us is eternal life through him. Thou hast laid the burden of our guilt upon him. Thou hast redeemed us from the curse of the law by making him a curse for us; and in him art thou reconciling the world unto thyself, not imputing unto men their trespasses. O do thou reconcile us. May we be at peace with thee through the blood of the cross. Forbid that any of us should continue strangers and foreigners; may we all be fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. Give us, O Lord, the faith of thy people, that we may experience the joy and peace of believing, and that thy abundant grace may redound by our thanksgivings to thine own glory. We bless thee for the instructions and admonitions of thy holy word. Seal upon our minds the portion which has now been read. Let our walk as a family be according to thy will, and the commandments of the Lord Jesus. May we follow after holiness, without which no man shall see thee. The Lord make us to increase and abound in love, and in the hour of domestic trial and sorrow, may we enjoy the consolations of thy grace, and be sustained by the blessed hope set before us. May we all be numbered with those who love the Lord's second appearing.

May this glorious hope regulate and sanctify our whole spirit and conversation; and as thou hast united us together on earth by the nearest and dearest ties, so may we be eternally united in the presence of the glorified Redeemer. Yea, Lord, do thou count us worthy of this high calling, and meanwhile fulfil all the good pleasure of thy goodness in us, and the work of faith with power, that the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in us, and we in him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ. Lord, we would review with grateful hearts all thy goodness and mercy to us during the past week. Truly we are not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truths which thou hast made to pass before us. Blot out all the week's transgressions, and crown with thy blessing all its labours. We rejoice in the prospect of another sabbath. Fulfil our hope, say unto us again, Go ye up to the house of the Lord, and bless abundantly to our souls the provision of Zion. We commend to thy grace all the ambassadors of Christ. May they come forth on the morrow in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel. May their preaching be with power, and let thy word have her course, and be glorified in the conversion of sinners, and the edification of saints. Lord, all our desire is before thee. Deal bountifully with thy servants, for the sake of him in whom thou art ever well-pleased, and in whose words we sum up all our petitions, Our Father, &c.

FORTY-FIRST WEEK.

SABBATH MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXVI. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALMS CXVI. CXVII.

REMARKS.

PSALM CXVI. It is not quite certain by whom or at what time this psalm was composed, whether by king David, or by some servant of the Most High at a later period. Whoever was the penman of it, we have here the exercise and experience of a child of God, written upon a tablet of ever-during remembrance, for the instruction and benefit of the church to the end of time. Let us, on the morning of another sabbath, seriously and devoutly consider what is thus recorded.

Ver. 1.—8. The psalm opens with a declaration of the psalmist's 'love' to the hearer and answerer of prayer. His heart is full of the remembrance of his goodness, and it overflows in irrepressible expressions of affection, while he recalls the mercies and deliverances of which he had been the subject. The psalmist had had sad and bitter experience of distress. What language can present to us a stronger idea of suffering and inward trouble? 'The sorrows of death compassed me—the pains of hell gat hold upon me—I found trouble and sorrow.' He was 'brought low,' so that affliction was the cup given him to drink. Tears were his meat day and night; his feet were prone to 'folly;' and his soul was oppressed with the very chill and awfulness of 'death.' What was the course that he pursued when brought into such trying circumstances? He tells us himself (ver. 4.), 'Then called I upon the name of the Lord;' yea, and he tells us, moreover, the substance of his prayer. The words are few, but they are full of meaning. There is in them the believing recognition of Jehovah in his grace and power; there is the earnest and 'beseeching' cry of a suppliant groaning beneath the pressure of his burdens, conscious of the greatness of his want, and, at the same time, immovably convinced that help is to be found in him whose ears are ever open to the cry of his people—'O Lord, I beseech thee, deliver my soul.' It is the solemn testimony of this man of God, that not in vain did this prayer of faith enter into the ears of the Lord God of sabaoth; not in vain did his 'cry' ascend, out of the utmost 'depths' of his trouble, and pain, and sorrow, to his heavenly Father. 'Gracious is the Lord, and righteous,' he says (ver. 5.), speaking of him according to his own experience of his goodness, 'Yea, our God is merciful. The Lord preserveth the simple. I was brought low, and he helped me. Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee.' 'Because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live.' It was his experience of what God had done for him, as a God 'merciful and gracious,' the 'hearer and the answerer of prayer,' that pressed out these words of warm attachment from his lips, 'I love the Lord, because he hath heard my voice and my supplication.' And it was his estimate of all this thus formed, that led him to call upon his soul to 'return unto the Lord,' with the fixed and unalterable determination 'to call upon him as long as he lived.'

Ver. 9—19. It was because he thus knew the benefit of prayer, that the psalmist was led to form the determination 'to call upon the Lord as long as he lived.' It was because he had had experience of the 'good will of him that dwelt in the bush,' that he was led to form further resolutions of closer walking with God. This world is, in every respect, an uncongenial sphere to the man who would do this. It is full of idols and ungodliness; it is full of the means of seduction; all its pursuits and enjoyments having the tendency to lead us away from God. The psalmist, however, records his determination to 'walk before the Lord in the land of the living.' The secret of 'walking before the Lord in the land of the living,' is to be continually waiting upon him, and 'calling upon his name,' ver. 13, 14, 18, 19. It is thus that strength will be obtained for every exigency, supply for every want, and the power of a new perseverance adequate to the necessities of each new day. On a serious review of all these things, surely no language can be more becoming in our life, or can better express the emotions of the believing heart, than that which is contained in the succeeding psalm, cxvii.

PRAYER.

Almighty and ever blessed God, we would approach thee, on this the morning of thine own day, in a filial spirit, laying hold of thee as a Father. Help us to pray, and hear us when we cry unto thee. O Lord, we acknowledge our dependence on thee for the bestowal and the continuance of every blessing. Enable us to walk before thee in the land of the living. We are dwelling in a world sunk in ungodliness. We are surrounded by many enemies. We are exposed to innumerable snares. We feel that if our footing is to be maintained as the followers of the Lamb, it can only be in the strength of divine grace; and that we can only advance onwards towards higher measures of spiritual attainment by the powerful leading of thy Spirit. We have had experience of our weakness; and we do earnestly beseech thee, O thou God of all grace, to pour out thy Spirit upon us from on high; to revive thy work in our souls; to quicken, strengthen, and to comfort us; to fit us for every duty; to support us under every trial; to deliver us from every enemy; and, finally, to make us more than conquerors through him that loved us. Keep us in thy fear, for the fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, to deliver from the snares of death. We would take encouragement, O Lord, from what thou hast told us concerning thyself in thy word, and concerning thy dealings with thy chosen. Hast thou not established for ever thy covenant of life and peace? Hast thou not written in thy book many glorious promises, whereon thou hast caused us to rest? Art thou not that God who didst lead thy people, like a flock, by the hands of Moses and Aaron? Who didst bear them as on eagles' wings; who didst bear them and carry them, all the days of old? Art thou not he in whom David trusted, and who didst send an answer to his prayers? Yea, thou art the same God now that thou wert of old, faithful to all thy promises, true to all thy threatenings, keeping thy people as the apple of thine eye, that thou mightest make unto thyself a glorious name. We will trust in thee in whom our fathers trusted. We will pray to thee, the prayer-hearing God. Answer us in peace. Be with all the ministers of the everlasting gospel this day. May they preach thy word boldly, and without fear. May they feed thy lambs. May they feed thy sheep. Give efficacy to the word of thy grace. Dwell in all the assemblies of thy saints. Comfort and bless thy people.

Be with us when we go into thy house and pay our vows. May we offer unto thee the sacrifices of thanksgiving and praise. May we worship thee in spirit and in truth. Wash away all our sins in a Redeemer's blood. Cleanse us, and we shall be whiter than the snow. And may these, the words of our mouth, and the meditations of our hearts, find acceptance with thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SABBATH EVENING.

PRAISE—PSALM CXVIII. 1.

SCRIPTURE—PSALM CXVIII.

REMARKS.

Ver. 1—4. This psalm commences and ends with an exhortation to thanksgiving, upon the ground of the goodness and mercy of the Lord. The whole of the people of Israel, and especially the 'house of Aaron,' with them that 'fear the Lord,' are called upon to rejoice in his mercy; and to proclaim its perpetual endurance. What reason have we to do the same! The goodness of the Lord has been 'new unto us every morning and every evening;' and if we have a single hope for eternity, we owe it entirely to that 'mercy' which we are called upon to celebrate. The 'mercy of the Lord' was manifested of old. It was displayed in that ancient covenant of grace, which was formed 'before the mountains were brought forth, ere ever he had formed the earth and the world.' It was early displayed in its exercise. It is manifested now in the universal offer of the gospel, and in the saving of many souls. The glorious effects of it will continue for ever, so that we may take up this language and say, 'that his mercy endureth for ever.' 'The Lord is not a man that he should lie, neither the Son of man that he should repent.' How cheering, how animating, how satisfactory the thought, that that 'mercy,' to which the believer is indebted for every privilege, and enjoyment, and sublimer hope, is not something that may be withdrawn or changed, but that, like 'the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness nor the least shadow of turning,' it 'endureth for ever.'

Ver. 5—18. The psalmist refers to instances serving to illustrate this mercy, and to show the grounds of thanksgiving. He speaks of the answer that had been granted to his prayer in his time of need, of the deliverance he had obtained, and of the liberty and enlargement into which he had been graciously conducted. He speaks of the Lord fighting on his side, when enemies rose up against him. When the nations 'compassed him about,' great in number, fierce and cruel in their enmity, and bent on his destruction, then the Lord stood by him and helped him with a mighty arm. In consequence of which he takes up this song into his mouth, 'The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation.' He speaks also of the 'mercy of the Lord,' as shown in his afflictions. He might have justly afflicted him, even unto death. He might have justly let loose against him all his plagues, and given him over to suffering for ever; but he says, 'He hath not given me over unto death.'

If the psalmist be here regarded as a type of Christ, all this language is emphatically and most affectingly applicable to him. 'In the days of his flesh he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared,' ver. 5. 'When the kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers took counsel together against the Lord and against his anointed' (ver. 11.), the Father was on his side, that he might 'glorify his name.' And when satan, that great adversary, whose works he was 'manifested to destroy,' 'thrust sore at him that he might fall,' so it was that that very thrust was made instrumental for furthering the triumph of mercy. Recoiling, it inflicted a deadly wound upon himself. 'The right hand of the Lord is exalted; the right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly.'

Or, if the psalmist be regarded in these verses as the representative of the believer, realizing in his own experience, and describing, from his own case, what is common to all them that 'fear the Lord,' we are thus taught that we should mark well, and frequently reflect upon, the dealings and dispensations of God towards us; that we should note, and bear ever in remembrance, the answers that he gives to prayer. Truly he 'sets his people in a large place.' He stands by them when amid their enemies, whom he will ultimately destroy and trample upon. There is expressed here the care that he exercises over his people; the power that he will put forth in their behalf; their perfect security within his Almighty protection; and the awful vengeance which he will execute upon their enemies.

Ver. 19—29. 'David, preserved from death, triumphant over his enemies, and now, going up to the temple to offer his thanksgivings, attended by the thousands of Israel, seems here to call upon the porters and other Levites to open the gates of the sanctuary for his admission.' 'Those who were within seem to have sung responsively, "This is the gate of the Lord, into which the righteous shall enter;" and then the whole company, perhaps in parts, sung the following verses.'—Scott. All that we have here presented to us is prophetic of Christ. He was the 'stone which the builders refused,' but who is become the 'head stone of the corner.'

PRAYER.

O Lord God, we would approach thee in the Son of thy love. Who is a God like unto thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, excellent in working. Thou art Jehovah, God over all, blessed for ever. We would approach thee on the evening of thine own day, believing that thou art, and that thou art the rewarder of them that diligently seek thee; believing that thy mercy endureth for ever, and that thou art girt about with truth and faithfulness. We thank thee for the mercies of this day, for the ordinances of thy house, for all that we have heard and tasted of the good word of life; and we pray that an abundant blessing from on high may have accompanied the dispensation of word and ordinance. Blessed be the Lord, who hath caused the day-spring from on high to visit us; who hath reconciled us to himself through the blood of the cross, and who giveth us the hope of eternal life. Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift. O that we may be enabled to estimate its value; and that, under a deep sense of the guilt of sin, we may be led to flee for refuge to the hope set before us in the gospel. May it not be in vain that from sabbath to sabbath we hear the word of this salvation preached. May it not be in vain that our lot has been cast in a land of ordinances. Forbid that our hearts should be hardening amid the means of life. Forbid that it should be our condemnation that light hath entered into the world; and we have loved the darkness rather than the light, because our deeds are evil. May the seed this day sown take deep root in our hearts; and may the fruit be unto holiness, and the end life everlasting. We lament that our progress in the divine life is so little in proportion to our privileges; and our prayer is, that we may be made more in earnest about our souls, more conformed to thine image, more devoted to thy service, so that the close of every succeeding sabbath may find us advancing in every spiritual attainment, and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ our Lord. Blot out our sins. Teach us how aggravated they are. Forgive the iniquity of our holy things. We have to confess, that after having done all we are unprofitable servants. Take us under thy care throughout this night. May we lie down in thy fear. May no evil thing come near us. And grant that when we again mingle in the world, it may be in the spirit of those who have been with thee on the mount. Bless the sick and destitute, the poor and afflicted, and especially the dying. Hear, and answer, and accept in Jesus, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.

PRAISE—PSALM XCII. 10.

SCRIPTURE—JEREMIAH XXIX.

REMARKS.

Jeremiah exhibits much of the conduct of the faithful minister of God. He was jealous for the honour of him who sent him; zealous in prosecuting the work entrusted to him; deeply affected in consequence of the iniquities of the people; anxious to do them good; and approved as faithful. There are many interesting things to be noticed in the letter as recorded here, which he sent 'from Jerusalem unto the residue of the elders which were carried away captives, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the captive people.'

He was interested in their condition. They were his 'kinsmen according to the flesh,' led away, according to the providence of God, into captivity in a strange land; but they were much upon his heart, and it was this that gave occasion to the letter, of which this chapter is principally composed. It reminds us somewhat of the spirit of Paul, in later times, as it is breathed in his epistles. He too was deeply interested in the condition of the people of God; and it was that spirit that urged him to all that frequency of admonition, and to all that earnestness of warning, which he says he prosecuted 'day and night with tears.' This ought to be the spirit of all who are actuated and dwelt in by the same spirit. No man is allowed to say, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' No man is allowed to live to himself. 'Look not every man upon his own things, but every man also upon the things of others.'

The interest that the prophet felt in his countrymen led him to address them, even though they were far away. No doubt he was found in the way of 'exhorting daily' all who were immediately around him, and were brought into personal contact with him; but he thought also of those who were far away in a distant land, peculiarly exposed to temptations on every side, and, by the Spirit of God, he addressed them in a letter. Let us do the same. Our influence should be made to extend, not only to those who are around us, but to those connected with us by the ties of family, of country, and of kind; who are settled in other lands, far away from the sound of our voice, but not beyond the reach of our communication. Removal by distance is apt to weaken the sense of responsibility; but this should not be. And the influence, even of one individual, by letters and by writings, may tell not only to the utmost extremities of the earth, but hundreds of years after he is dead, and may thus be absolutely incalculable.

There is much wisdom in the substance of the epistle, much that was well calculated for direction and encouragement. They were in danger from false prophets. These individuals were leading them astray, and unsettling their minds with the idea of a speedy deliverance, contrary to the word and counsel of God. Nothing could be more calculated than this to aggravate the evils of their captivity. It would naturally render them careless and disregarding of those from whose land they were to be, in their estimation, so speedily delivered, and thus would excite, at the hands of their oppressors, a loftier insolence and tyranny. Thus the false prophets, besides speaking contrary to truth, acted a most unmerciful part towards those whom they attempted to delude. Jeremiah told them expressly, that only 'after seventy years' would the Lord visit them. And how much wisdom was there in the counsel he gave them! He told them to make that land in which they were sojourning their home, to 'build houses,' and 'plant vineyards,' and 'take ives,' and act in all respects as if they were settled here, waiting the Lord's time for deliverance. He retold the destruction, and pronounced the doom, 'the lying prophets, who had led the people to trust in a lie;' and he assured them, that previous to the time of their deliverance a great spirit of prayer would be poured out on them, and that it would be in answer to prayer that restoration and deliverance would come. 'Then shall ye call upon me, and ye shall go and pray unto me, and I will hearken unto you; and ye shall seek me and find me, when ye shall search for me with all your heart.' Let us mark these things, and enter upon the duties of a new week in the remembrance of them. Let us use all the influence that God in his providence has given us for the benefit of the brethren. Let us be occupied with immediate duty. Let us pray even for those who persecute us. Let us 'seek the Lord with all our heart,' that we may find him. There is such a blessed promise connected with such earnest seeking. And let us ever be well assured, that whatever advantage may be in the meantime secured, 'lying lips' are full of cruelty, and will be brought down in dishonour to the dust.

PRAYER.

O thou ever blessed God, we would approach thee this morning in faith, believing that thou art, and that thou art the rewarder of all them that diligently seek thee. Do thou hear and answer us in the Son of thy love. O Lord, we are sinners exceedingly in thy sight. We are full of shortcoming. We are full of iniquity. Our iniquities, like the wind, have carried us away, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags. We do acknowledge, with grief and self-abasement, that we have been transgressors from the womb, and that thou mightest justly have visited us in judgment, and stained all thy raiment with our blood. Our great sin, O God, has been, that we have neglected and despised thy gospel. This is the condemnation, that light hath come into the world, and we have loved darkness rather than light, because our deeds have been evil. A deceived heart hath led us aside. Lord, change our hearts. Give us a new heart, and create a right spirit within us. Wash us in the blood of atonement, and purge away all our sin. Give us that delightful confidence in thee, which, by the Spirit, is begotten in the heart. Give us the sweet sense of forgiveness, the blessedness of the man whose iniquity is pardoned, whose sin is covered. Give us the spirit of adoption, whereby we shall be enabled to cry, Abba, Father, and to hold fast the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end. We lament that we have experienced so little of the enlargement of the gospel. Pour out upon us the spirit of prayer and of supplication. May we be enabled to make known all our wants to thee.
