The failure, however, of this great expedition was far from proving a death-blow to the hopes of the Roman Catholics. They immediately began to engage in new intrigues, in which they were encouraged by the Duke of Parma, who represented to them that the accounts of the late disasters were greatly exaggerated, and flattered them with the expectation of another armada, which should be ready to put to sea early in the spring. In the meantime, he remitted a large sum of money to a seminary priest named Bruce, with authority to apply it in any way he thought most likely to promote the cause, but particularly in securing the continued co-operation of their friends among the nobility, and, if possible, in gaining over others. These hopes were not disappointed. The popish lords, at the head of whom were Huntley, Crawford, Errol, and Maxwell (the last of whom styled himself Earl of Morton), entered into a secret correspondence with the Duke of Parma, the Pope, and the court of Spain. They expressed their deep regret, and that of the whole Roman Catholic noblemen and gentlemen of the kingdom, at the unfortunate issue of the late enterprise; they urged the King of Spain to make an attack on England through Scotland, and lamented that this had not been done before, when they were prepared to join him with a force which would have insured triumphant success. That success, however, they considered it not yet too late to achieve; and they now earnestly recommended Philip to send into Scotland six thousand of his choicest soldiers, and money for the maintenance of an equal number, which they engaged to furnish within six hours after their arrival. With these it was proposed to march directly into England, to the support of such troops as he might previously have landed there; but they strongly advised that he should not concentrate his forces on any one point, and hazard all in an encounter with the whole body of the English. Their plan was to enter England at the same moment, at different points through Scotland and Ireland, and, while the English forces were thus divided, and the attention of the government distracted, to make a descent upon the coast, which would then be left undefended. At the same time Huntley, who had renounced popery, and gone over to the Church, excused himself for this apparent dereliction of principle, on the plea that his signature to the Protestant articles had been extorted from him contrary to his conscience; but that he still remained at heart as firmly attached as ever to the Roman Catholic faith, and would endeavour to atone for his compliance by doing some signal service to the cause. In the meantime, he added, God had given him such favour with the king, that he had been able to supersede the guard formerly attendant on the royal person, by individuals on whom he could rely as entirely devoted to his own party, and who had promised their assistance, when the time for action should arrive. Errol also, who had recently gone over to the Romish Church, warmly expressed his new-born zeal for the Catholic cause, which he said he felt bound to promote to the utmost of his power; and Bruce informed Parma of the arrival of their agent Chisholm with the money, and boasted of his having already secured the Earl of Bothwell, who, though still nominally a Protestant, had been won over to their party.

The secret agents of the faction abroad, impatient of delay, eagerly urged the leaders at home to do something which might stimulate Philip to hasten the promised aid. In particular they recommended an attempt to be made to seize the person of the king, and to remove from his council the chancellor and the treasurer, whom they regarded as insurmountable obstacles to the accomplishment of their design.

All this treasonable correspondence was intercepted through the vigilance of Burghley, and copies of the letters were transmitted to the king. James, however, apparently unwilling to believe in the existence of the conspiracy, or at least in the serious intention of the parties implicated, treated them with unaccountable and most impolitic leniency. Encouraged by this circumstance, many who, through the fear of personal consequences, had formerly stood aloof, now joined in the plot; and thus a conspiracy, which might easily have been crushed in the bud, became every day more formidable, and in every quarter of the country—particularly in the northern counties—gained numerous and powerful abettors. For the sake of appearances, Huntley, the principal leader of the faction, was subjected to a nominal imprisonment; but his wife and servants were permitted to have free access to him, and the king himself visited him, dined with him, and even caressed him.* James, also, wrote to him in terms of friendly remonstrance, but he solemnly protested his innocence; and, after a short confinement, was set at liberty, and reinstated in his former authority.

With base ingratitude for this injudicious act

Rebellion of clemency, Huntley immediately the popish lords, recommenced his intrigues, and, very soon after, in conjunction with Bothwell and other lords of the popish faction, broke out into open rebellion. The king and the entire Protestant party were now, not without reason, thoroughly roused to a sense of their danger. The whole country to the north of Aberdeen was ready to rise at a moment's warning; and Bothwell had the audacity to threaten, that if the king should proceed northwards to attack the insurgents, he would march an army to the south, and commit such ravages as would soon force him to return. Filled with indignation at this presumptuous defiance of his authority, and in no degree intimidated by the threatened danger, James at once threw off his supineness, and began to adopt the most energetic measures. He immediately gave orders for assembling an army, and, placing himself at their head, with a military ardour that seemed to form no part of his previous character, he proceeded by rapid marches to St. Johnston; declaring his resolution to "wreck his rebels, and destroy them with fire and sword."* On this occasion the Protestant nobles mustered in great force, under the leadership of the young Duke of Lennox and the chancellor; and the Earls of Mar, Morton, Angus, Marischal, and Atholl, with the Master of Glamis; and the three lords-warden, Hume, Cessford, and Carmichael, joined them with all their forces. This expedition was completely successful. It was found that the numbers and spirit of the popish party had been greatly overrated. Bothwell's force, of which he had made such a vain-glorious boast, turned out not to exceed thirty horse. Everywhere the Roman Catholics deserted and fled; and James, advancing by Dundee and Brechin to Aberdeen, compelled them to evacuate that town, which they had considered as the very centre of their organisation. Huntley fled from Aberdeen to his own district of Strathbogie, whence, having surrendered himself, he was carried prisoner against the sinner by the king to Edinburgh. ^{insurgents.}

All the chiefs of the clans that had taken part in this rash and ill-concerted rebellion laid down their arms, and James having taken the Castle of Slaines, the chief stronghold belonging to the Earl of Errol, left a garrison in it, and returned in triumph to Edinburgh. He had at first intended to proceed against Bothwell without delay, but that haughty and turbulent nobleman having on his knees implored the king's mercy, was in the meantime detained a prisoner within the palace.†

Such was the power of the great nobles at this period that it overawed the king and every other authority of the State; so that it was considered dangerous, if not impossible, to visit these manifest traitors with the punishment which their crimes had deserved. Huntley and Crawford were brought to trial, and convicted of treason, but they were merely sentenced to imprisonment, the former in the Castle of Edinburgh, the latter in that of Blackness. Subsequently, Bothwell was put upon his trial; and though he protested his innocence, and defended himself with characteristic violence and audacity, his guilt was too notorious to be doubted. He had been guilty of treason under almost every form of aggravation; yet his punishment amounted to no more than a few months' imprisonment in Tantallon Castle, and the payment of a fine to the crown.‡

The important subject of his marriage now began seriously to occupy the king's attention. He stood, as he himself expressed it, "alone, without either father, mother, brother, or sister;" and he naturally longed for the society of one, who would more than supply the want of such relationships. He was the only descendant, in the direct line, of the ancient kings of Scotland, and as the prospect of uniting the two kingdoms under one sovereign would, if he should die childless, vanish at his decease, his marriage became an object of national concern, and was scarcely less ardently wished for by his people than by himself. Ever since the embassy from Denmark, he had looked towards that quarter for a matrimonial alliance. Shortly after the departure of the ambassador, he had dispatched Mr. Peter Young, who had been one of his tutors, to the Danish court, for the purpose of observing and reporting on the personal appearance, character, and manners of the princesses. His report seems to have been favourable, for soon afterwards Colonel Stewart, a pensioner of the King of Denmark, was sent to that country under pretence of attending to business of his own, but with secret instructions from James to negotiate with the Danish king regarding a marriage with his eldest daughter.

It is not easy to understand why a matrimonial alliance on the part of James with a princess of Denmark should have been unacceptable to Elizabeth; but, as soon as she heard of the Danish embassy, her jealousy took the alarm. She was apprehensive that it was a preliminary to some overture of marriage, and the subject had never ceased to give her uneasiness. Now, however, that the matter had assumed a more tangible form, she began to practise every artifice in her power to retard or prevent the union, and, by means of bribes and promises, gained over James's ministers to second her endeavours. They, accordingly, laboured to throw every obstacle in the way; until at last the King of Denmark, disgusted with the delays and apparent indecision of the Scottish monarch, bestowed the hand of his eldest daughter on the Duke of Brunswick. James, however, undiscouraged by this disappointment, paid his addresses to the second daughter, the Princess Anne. With a view to traverse this match, Elizabeth recommended instead the Princess of Navarre; and the celebrated French poet, Du Bartas, was sent on a secret mission to the Scottish court to make the proposal. But James was determined to have his own way, and would not, in a matter so personally important, submit to the dictation of Elizabeth, though her choice met with the approbation of his council, as well as of the principal nobility, who were all eager for an alliance with France. The great body of the people, however, particularly the merchants and wealthy burgesses, were as warm in favour of Denmark;* and so violent was the opposition with which James had to contend on the part of his ministers, that, in order to coerce them into acquiescence, he had recourse to the extraordinary expedient of inciting the inhabitants of Edinburgh to take up arms. Accordingly, a large body of the citizens, assembling in a tumultuous manner, threatened to tear in pieces the chancellor, whose opposition they considered as one of the principal obstacles to the fulfilment of the wishes both of the king and of the nation.* This demonstration had the desired effect; the chancellor yielded; and the Earl Marischal was dispatched with a splendid retinue to the court of Denmark, with full powers and instructions to conclude the match. All was quickly arranged; the marriage articles were drawn up, and preparations for the departure of the bride commenced with extraordinary bustle and activity. A fleet of twelve ships furnished with brass cannon was fitted up to escort her, and in a very short time she set sail from Denmark. Great preparations were made for her reception, and the young king awaited her arrival with extreme impatience; but a violent storm, which she encountered on the voyage, disabled and dispersed the ships, and drove them to the coast of Norway, where they arrived in such a shattered condition that no hope was entertained that she would be able to resume her voyage until the following season,† and it was arranged that she should pass the winter in Norway.

James, in the meantime, was in an agony of impatience, and commanded public prayers, accompanied with fasting, to be offered up to God for the safe arrival of his bride; with whom, although he had never seen her, he was, or fancied himself to be, violently in love. At last intelligence reached him of the disaster that had befallen the fleet, and the consequent postponement of his happiness; and, though he ascribed the tempests to the envious malignity of the Scottish and Norwegian witches,—from the influence of whose unhallowed incantations even kings were not exempted,—yet such was the ardour of his passion, that he suddenly embraced the determination of proceeding in person to Norway in quest of his betrothed bride. Without acquainting his council with this hasty resolution, he embarked at Leith on the 22nd of October, generally the stormiest season of the year, accompanied by Maitland, the chancellor, Mr. David Lindsay, his chaplain, several of his nobility, and a retinue of about three hundred persons. A declaration of his motives for adopting this extraordinary step was submitted to the privy council on the following day, and was afterwards published by them for the benefit of his liege subjects. This document, which was written entirely by the king's own hand, displays a peculiarity both of thought and expression very unusual in a king's message to his people. It sets forth that his long delay of his marriage had been much blamed by his subjects, and that his want of relatives or heirs had weakened his authority and strengthened his enemies, and had made many regard him as "a barren stock." It had, he said, been moreover insinuated that he was of such facile mind as to be "led by the nose" by the chancellor, as if he were a mere child, or "ane irresolute ass, who could do nothing by himself." He wished to give them a practical refutation of both these calumnies. As to the first, he had resolved to go in search of his queen, and to marry her as speedily as possible; and as to the second, he declared on the honour of a prince, that the idea of this winter voyage originated with himself, without any suggestion from the chancellor or the council, that his resolution to pursue it had been adopted, in a manner equally independent, in the solitude of his chamber at Craigmillar, and that he had given no intimation of it until the preparations were completed and he was ready to embark. "Let no man, therefore," he added, "grudge at this proceeding, but conform to the directions I have left."* According to these directions, the principal authority during his absence was vested in the Duke of Lennox; and next to him in rank and authority was placed the turbulent Earl of Bothwell, whom it was judged politic to conciliate by this mark of distinction. The other officers of State consisted of the treasurer, the comptroller, the lord privy seal, the captain of the Castle of Edinburgh, the lord advocate, and the clerk-register. A commission was also given to certain noblemen to watch over the peace of the Borders; all conventions of the nobility were prohibited during the absence of the king; to conciliate the Church, Mr. Robert Bruce, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, was nominated an extraordinary privy councillor; and, lastly, the ministers were directed to exhort their flocks to obedience, and to pray for the safety of the king on his journey.†

After a somewhat stormy voyage of five days, the king reached Upsal, where his marriage. bride then was, and riding directly to the palace, he was immediately introduced, "boots and all," to his future queen. They appear to have been mutually pleased with each other, and soon became familiar.‡ On the following Sunday the marriage was solemnized, Mr. David Lindsay, the king's chaplain, performing the ceremony in the French language. James, who had intended to limit his stay to twenty days, was induced to remain in Denmark not less than six months. After the marriage, he repaired with his young queen to Copenhagen, where the happy event was celebrated with a long continued course of festivities. James, who affected the conversation of learned men, embraced the opportunity of his residence in the Danish capital to visit the celebrated Tycho Brahe, at his retreat of Uranibourg, and to discourse with him on the science of astronomy. He also held frequent converse with the learned Hemingius, with whom he delighted to dispute on predestination and other mysterious doctrines.

The winter seems to have passed away very pleasantly, in a series of pageants and shows which were got up ^{Hospitable entertainment by the Danish court.} by the Danish court for the entertainment of their royal guest; and the proverbial conviviality of the Danes afforded him unlimited scope for the indulgence of his favourite vice of drinking. He dates one of his letters from Chronenburg, "where," he adds, "we are drinking and dryving ower in the auld manner;" and Spottiswood, in recording that no quarrels occurred among the king's attendants all the time they were in Denmark, says, with great simplicity, that this was the more wonderful, since "it is hard for men in drink, at which they were continually kept, long to agree." James was naturally anxious that before his return all due preparations should be made for his reception by his loyal subjects in a manner becoming his rank, and calculated to do him and his country credit in the presence of the distinguished strangers by whom he and his consort were to be accompanied. With this view, he wrote to his council in February the following amusing and characteristic letter:—

"My lords of counsal, that this general letter of mine may serve as weil to you ^{Preparations for the reception of the king and queen in Scotland.} all as to every one of you in particular, lay the blame I praye you upon the haste and fascheousness of the dispatch and not upon my sweirness, although I cannot denye that to write with my own hand I am both slawe and sweire enuech. I doubt not that you will take this in all good part, as if I wrote a trough of paper to every one of you.

"Ye may now knaw by the season of the yeir that my coming home, God willing, drawes neire. I am surely treated here with all the honor and hartliness that this countrie people can imagine; I think we should not be unthankfull when theires comes in our bounds. A king of Scotland with a new-maried wyfe will not come home every day. For God's sake respect not only my honor in this, but the honor of our whole nation, and speciâlie of yourselfis, for my part will be leist in it. It is knowne that I am absent, and all the world knawes that when the gudeman is away he cannot be wyted of the disorders in the house; but what may he think then of his servants and factors he has left therein?

hereof, the Maister of Wark, hes in charge of me to deliver unto you. Remember specially upon the ending out of the Abbey, as yet lying in the deid-thraw, without the which we cannot be lodgit at our landing; and in good faith it is not the maner of this countrie to lye therout for the greatnes of the frost; and for a token that ye have not forgotten us, ye may send two or three ships here to show us the way home; but let nae great men or gentilmen come in them, but many gude marinells; for I am already over-chargeable to these folks here; besides that every one of you will have enouch to do in the turnes I have employed you to do at hame. For God's sake, in anything respect my honor, that all discords, and vaniteis, and quarrels, may be supereedit at this; for gif I took sic strait order for that the last yeir, when I lookit for my weif's coming hame, and a certain company of strangers with her, how muckle mare sould it be this yeir when we are baith to cum hame and twice as gret a numbre of strangers, and specialle sen I have seen so gude ane example in this countrie.

"Indede I have gude cause to thank you all for the great quietnes that ye have already kept, as I perceive, by your last letters. Remember, likewise, that nae great man or counsellar presume to be at our landing, but such as the beirar hereof will in a roll deliver unto you—ut omnia fiant decenter et cum ordine.

"Fail not to provide gude cheare for us, for we have heir abundance of gude meit and part of drinek, to the particulars of this I remit to my directions as of all other things likewise.

"To conelude, I bothe pray you and command you sleuth na tyme, and for my part sake do at this tyme even mair nor is possible; for ye know I will never eit nor drink a fair wind."

In the same strain James wrote to the Rev. Robert Bruce, to whom in his absence he had given a kind of supervision over the morals of the kingdom:—

"Waken up all men," he says, "to attend my coming, for I will come as our maister sayeth, like a thief in the night, and whose lampe I find burning with oyle, these will I coin thanks to, but those that lack their burning lamps provyded with oyle will be barred at the door; for I will not accept their crying, Lord! Lord! at my coming, that have forgot me all the time of my absence. For God's sake, take all the pains you can to teach our people weill against our coming, lest we be all ashamed before strangers. I think this time," he adds, "should be a holy jubilee in Scotland, and our ships have the virtue of the ark in agreeting for a time at least, naturales inimicitias, inter foras; for if it otherwise fall out (quod Deus avertat) I shall behove to come hame like a drunk man amongst them, which would be no strange thing, coming out of so drunken a countrie as this! I pray you heartilie recommend me to the good provost of the town, and, in anything he can, pray him to assist my affaires, as I have ever been certain of his good will in my services. Specially desire him to further all he can the outwrecking of three or four ships to meet me here, and convoy me hame. And, likewise, I doubt not he will assist the Maister of Wark in getting as many good craftsmen as may be had for ending out the half perfyted Abbey (his palace) that now lies in the deid-thraw. Thus recommending me and my new rib to your daylie prayers, I commit you to the only All-sufficient."

During the six months of the king's absence, Scotland enjoyed a degree of tranquillity to which it had for many years been a stranger. This undoubtedly was partly owing to the prudent directions which James had left at his departure, partly to the wisdom and moderation of the persons to whom he had committed the government, but probably still more to the counsels and influence of the ministers of the Kirk. Of this James seemed deeply sensible. To Bruce especially he held himself much indebted; and in some of his letters to that clergyman he declared that he was worth a quarter of his kingdom, and that he should be beholden to him as long as he lived.

At length the royal pair embarked for Scotland, and, attended by a numerous retinue of noblemen and ladies, ^{Their majesties' arrival} arrived at Leith on the 1st of May. ^{at Leith.}

Their majesties were received on landing by the Duke of Lennox, Lord Hamilton, the Earl of Bothwell, and a large concourse of noblemen, and were welcomed with loud and enthusiastic demonstrations of joy by a vast assemblage of the people, who had come to witness the disembarkation. On the 17th of the same month the cere- ^{Coronation of} many of the queen's coronation ^{the queen.}

was celebrated in the Chapel Royal, in presence of a numerous and brilliant assembly of the nobility, the foreign ambassadors, and other persons of distinction. Not a single bishop was present, and the crown was placed on the queen's head by Mr. David Lindsay, minister of Leith. Some difficulty arose, however, regarding the anointing, which the Presbyterian clergy considered to be Jewish rather than Christian, and therefore hesitated to perform. The king, however, would not consent to the omission of this ceremony, and, after some altercation, threatened to send for the bishops. This argument silenced, though it did not convince the clergy, and Mr. Robert Bruce, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, performed the customary rite. The operation is thus quaintly described by a contemporary chronicler:—"The Countess of Mar, having taken the queen's right arm, and opened the craigs of her gown, Mr. Robert Bruce immediately poured forth upon those parts of her breast and arm of quihlk the clothes were removed, a bonny quantity of oil.* Three sermons, in three different languages—Latin, French, and English—were delivered on the occasion; and Andrew Melvil recited a Latin poem, which he had composed in commemoration of the event, and which the king declared did honour both to himself and the country. The august assembly, which met at ten o'clock in the morning, did not separate until five in the afternoon. A few days afterwards the queen made her public entry into the capital, where she was received with pompous and costly shows and pageantry, and many tiresome ceremonies common at that period. On the following Sunday their majesties went in state to the High Church; and after sermon, the king addressed the congregation, informing them that he had come to thank God for his safe return to his kingdom, and the ministers for their prayers on his behalf during his absence. He acknowledged that in the levity and inexperience of his younger years many errors and omissions had crept into his government; but now that he had got married, he would sedulously apply himself to the duties of his high office, would administer impartial justice to all his subjects, and see that the kirks should be "better provided."*

The unusual serenity of the political atmosphere during the absence of the king was speedily overcast after his return. The elements of social strife and disorder which had of late years so often disturbed the king's government, and distracted and desolated the country, were still in existence, and soon began to manifest symptoms of a coming commotion. The power and presumption of the great barons, which had grown to such an exorbitant height during the king's nonage, and which had often emboldened them to dispute and disobey his authority, to restrain his liberty, and to force themselves uncalled into his councils, were yet unsubdued. Forming a sort of imperium in imperio, they still claimed the right of private warfare; and on the slightest insult or provocation their animosities were liable to break out into deadly feuds, which the royal authority was too feeble to repress and punish. The excesses of the half-civilized and fierce chieftains of the north, who were protected by their mountain fastnesses and the inaccessible nature of their country, and the piracies committed by the roving adventurers in the stormy seas which surrounded the scattered islands of the west, were almost entirely beyond the reach of the law. Besides these sources of apprehension, the Roman Catholic faction, though partially humbled, were yet far too strong to be disregarded, and had never ceased intriguing for that supremacy which they claimed as a sacred right; while the rival pretensions of prelacy and presbyterianism still menaced the tranquillity of the Church and of the country.

The feeble will and indolent temper of James were ill fitted to grapple with these difficulties; for though he occasionally displayed vigour and resolution, his energy was fitful, expended itself in single acts, and never rose in him to the dignity of a habit. Too lenient or too timid to punish great offenders, open and undisguised murders, secret assassinations, and other enormous crimes, were perpetrated among the feudal aristocracy, with fearless audacity, and with perfect impunity. A constant familiarity with deeds of violence and blood among the higher orders of the community, exercised a most baneful influence upon men of all ranks, lowered the tone of public morality, and was rapidly bringing the government of the king into contempt.

These evils were forcibly pointed out to the king by the Chancellor Maitland. It was high time, he said, to check the insolence and presumption of the nobility, and compel them to respect the dignity of the sovereign and the authority of the law. For this purpose he recommended the utmost diligence in the collection of the royal revenues, and the utmost economy in their expenditure, in order that the power of the crown might be upheld and extended by keeping in pay a body of troops sufficient to support the judges in executing the laws, and to compel the most powerful offenders to submission. He insisted also on the necessity of continuing to maintain friendly relations with England, and of keeping a vigilant eye on the movements of the Roman Catholic faction, who were still intriguing with Spain, and were strong in numbers, rank, and resources, warm in zeal, and high in expectation.* From a document in the handwriting of Burghley, preserved in the State Paper Office, we find that, according to his estimate, the strength of the popish party in Scotland was still very formidable. He reckoned that the people of the northern counties, including Caithness, Sutherland, Inverness, Aberdeen, and Moray, and the sheriffdoms of Buchan, Angus, Wigton, and Nithsdale, were either entirely or for the most part adherents of the Roman Catholic faction, and under the guidance of noblemen who were Romanists at heart, as well as of priests and Jesuits, who, under various disguises, lurked in these districts, and unceasingly plied their dark and subtle machinations. He appears, on the other hand, to have considered that the people of the counties of Perth, Stirling, Fife, Lanark, Dunbarton, and Renfrew, were chiefly Protestant; while those of Ayr and Linlithgow were doubtful, and therefore could not properly be assigned to either party. If this estimate of Burghley's be at all near the truth, it is evident that at this crisis no ordinary wisdom, vigilance, and firmness, were necessary on the part of the king and his council, in order to preserve the tranquillity of the country.

James, at first, seemed resolved vigorously to carry out the reforms recommended by the chancellor; and commenced with a bold attempt to seize with his own hand the Laird of Niddry, who had, in the exercise of a lawless revenge almost claimed as a privilege among the barons at that period, been guilty of the murder of the Laird of Sheriff-hall and his brother, John Gifford.* Niddry, who was protected by Bothwell, having been warned of his danger, managed to escape, but this unusual display of activity and zeal on the part of the king excited the attention of the barons, and was regarded as a prelude to some attempt to circumscribe their usurped power, and subject them to the regular operation of the law. As commonly happens in such cases, every step taken in this direction excited fresh jealousy and alarm in those who conceived they had a vested interest in the abuses sought to be reformed, and ultimately had the effect of uniting in opposition to the king parties who had been formerly diametrically opposed to each other. Catholics and Protestants made common cause; and Huntley, Errol, Bothwell, and Montrose, were now confederated together. This dangerous coalition might have been broken up by apprehending these noblemen, and bringing them to trial for previous offences; but the king, who had at first resolved on this bold and politic course, afterwards shrank from its adoption, considering it safer to keep both factions in check by opposing them to each other.† Bowes, who clearly foresaw that the king would have no small difficulty in attempting to carry out his intended improvements, thus alludes to the subject in one of his letters to Burghley: "The king, according to his public promise in Edinburgh, and solemn protestations to some noblemen, ministers, and well affected, is resolved to reform his house, council, and sessions, and to banish all Jesuits and Papists. He proposeth further to resume into his hands sundry of his own possessions now in the holding of others; to advance his revenues with some portions of ecclesiastical livings; and to draw to due obedience all persons attained at horn, excommunicated, or otherwise disobedient. In the execution of which things he will find no little difficulty: for I have heard that many intend to seek to defeat and stay the king's course herein; and that sundry of the sessions will stand in law to hold their places, notwithstanding any charge to be given to avoid them."‡

Difficult as the task was, James for a time seemed fully bent on accomplishing it. He materially reduced the expenses of his household by diminishing the number of his attendants and making other retrenchments, and submitted to his council, for their consideration and advice, a variety of important points relating to both foreign and domestic policy. In particular, he required their advice as to the means for protecting the country against foreign invasion; the treaties necessary for preserving amicable relations with foreign powers; the procuring of secret foreign intelligence; the "grieves" of the nobility and people, as well against the king as the government of his councillors;" the relative strength of the Popish and Protestant parties; the prevention of private feuds and family quarrels; the decay of the royal revenues; the enforcing of obedience to the acts of the last parliament; and the defining of the powers and duties properly belonging to each of the high offices of the State.* He also laboured to bring about a reconciliation between England and Spain; he sent ambassadors to certain of the princes of Germany, to urge them to interfere for the accomplishment of this end; and, in the event of Spain proving refractory, he suggested that a general league should be formed for the defence of the common cause of true religion, and that their ports should be "shut against Philip till he was reduced to reason."†

James took care to inform Elizabeth of these proceedings; and sundry letters at this time passed between them, abounding in professions of cordial friendship, and assurances of mutual support against the machinations of the popish faction. On this occasion James gave practical proof of his sincerity by apprehending and delivering up to Elizabeth, O'Rourke, an Irish chieftain, who had been secretly practising in Glasgow to gain over parties to the Romish and anti-English faction. He wrote at the same time to Elizabeth, assuring her that he regarded her enemies as his own, and would proceed with every one of them who might fall into his hands as he had done with O'Rourke. "I would to God," said he, "your greatest enemies were in my hands; if it were the King of Spain himself, he should not be long undelivered to you: for that course have I taken me to, and will profess it till I die; that all your foes shall be common enemies to us both, in spite of the Pope, the King of Spain, and all the leaguers, my cousins not excepted, and the devil their master."‡

A brief period of comparative tranquillity now ensued, during which but little progress was made in the work of reform that James had commenced with so much apparent zeal; but he applied himself with unusual activity to the investigation and punishment of crimes, of which it is difficult to say whether they were in this instance real or imaginary—the crimes of witchcraft and sorcery. That there were at this time individuals in the country—some of them even in the middle rank of life—who believed themselves, and were believed by others, to be possessed of supernatural powers through the influence of Satanic agency, is certain; but it is impossible now to discover whether or not they were the dupes of their own imagination. Many of these wretched creatures were put to the torture, and not a few were condemned to the flames. Among these was Agnes Simpson, a woman, Spottiswood informs us, "not of the base or ignorant sort of witches, but matron-like, grave, and settled in her answers," who, in the course of her examination, accused Bothwell of having consulted her regarding the time of the king's death. A sorcerer, named Richard Graham, declared that he had consulted him on the same subject; and on a subsequent examination, rendered more communicative by a hint of the possibility of pardon, Graham confessed that Bothwell had solicited him to devise some means of shortening the life of the king, and that he had been induced to agree to this request. On these charges, Bothwell was arrested and sent to the castle, although he solemnly asserted his innocence, and protested that he ought not to be committed on the evidence of the devil, who "was a liar from the beginning," or that of the witches, who had sold themselves to his service. A convention of the Estates was summoned for his trial, but some delay having taken place in consequence of the inconclusive nature of the evidence, and the reluctance of the nobles to proceed to extremities, Bothwell, impatient of restraint, effected his escape, and fled to the Borders.* This was held tantamount to a confession of his guilt; and the king, now greatly exasperated against him, ordered him to be proclaimed a traitor, and interdicted all his subjects from holding any communication with him.

In the meantime, James continued his proceedings against witchcraft by bringing to trial Barbara Napier, a woman above the lower ranks of life, and who had the reputation of being one of the most distinguished of the sisterhood. Her character in this particular stood so high, and her alleged practice of diabolic arts was so notorious, that the king never anticipated any difficulty in establishing her guilt. The jury, however, thought otherwise; they considered the evidence defective, and, to the king's surprise and indignation, Barbara was acquitted. Whether this verdict was right or wrong, neither the law nor the practice of Scotland afforded any remedy. Proceedings by assize of error, as practised in England, were unknown in Scottish jurisprudence, which, moreover, did not admit of the king's assuming personally the office of judge in a criminal trial. Such, however, were James's rage and disappointment, and so little did he regard the restraints of the law, when opposed to the personal will of the sovereign, that he resolved to bring the jurors to trial before himself, on the charge of wilful error, in clearing Barbara Napier of treason against the king's person.† This most irregular trial actually took place, in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, the king himself sitting as judge; but the proceedings were cut short by the whole of the accused pleading guilty, and putting themselves in the king's will.* He did not, however, omit the opportunity of making them an oration, in which he descanted on the alarming prevalence of great crimes in the country, and of the crime of witchcraft in particular; and attempted to vindicate himself from the charge of encouraging the offenders by undue leniency. "I must advertise you," he said, "what it is that makes great crimes to be so rife in this country, namely, that all men set themselves more for friend than for justice and obedience to the laws. This corruption here bairns suck at the pap; and let a man commit the most filthy crimes that can be, yet his friends take his part, and first keep him from apprehension, and after, by fead or favour, by false assize, or some way or other, they find moyen of his escape. The experience hereof we have in Niddry. I will not speak how I am charged with this fault in court and choir, from prince and pulpit; yet this I say, that howsoever matters have gone against my will, I am innocent of all injustice in these behalfs. My conscience doth set me clear, as did the conscience of Samuel, and I call you to be judges herein. And suppose I be your king, yet I submit myself to the accusations of you, my subjects, in this behalf; and let any one say what I have done. And, as I have thus begun, so purpose I to go forward; not because I am James Stewart, and command so many thousands of men, but because God hath made me a king and judge, to judge righteous judgment.

"For witchcraft, which is a thing grown very common among us, I know it to be a most abominable sin; and I have been occupied these three quarters of a year for the sifting out of them that are guilty herein. We are taught by the laws, both of God and man, that this sin is most odious, and, by God's law, punishable by death. By man's law, it is called maleficium or veneficium—an ill deed or a poisonable deed, and punishable likewise by death. Now, if it be death as practised against any of the people, I must needs think it to be (at least) the like if it be against the king. Not that I fear death; for I thank God I dare in a good cause abide hazard. * * * * As for them who think these witchcrafts to be but fantasies, I remit them to be catechised and instructed in these most evident points."†

But, if the jury were guilty of error in acquitting Barbara Napier, it followed, of course, that she was guilty of witchcraft, and accordingly she was condemned to suffer on the Castle hill; but after the stake had been set, "with barrels, coals, leather, and powder," and the assembled crowd were looking for her immediate execution, she received a respite, on the plea of pregnancy, set up by some of her friends.‡ The punishment, in her case, was subsequently remitted; * but, in the meantime, another unfortunate creature, named Euphemia Makalzeane, was put to death for the same offence, † and, some months later, Richard Graham suffered death for sorcery at the Cross of Edinburgh. ‡

It was not long before James was exposed to dangers from another quarter, fully as formidable as those by which he supposed himself threatened through Satanic agency. Bothwell, whose fierce temper was exasperated to the highest degree by the proceedings which had been taken against him, and which he imputed chiefly to the influence of the chancellor, now formed the daring design of suddenly entering the palace, and surprising and making prisoners both him and the king. Maitland, who aimed at too exclusive a place in the confidence and affection of his master, had become odious to many of the courtiers, all of whom, including the Duke of Lennox, were consequently easily induced to enter into a conspiracy which promised to issue in the overthrow of that minister; and Bothwell, having collected a small band of his desperate followers, it was resolved that the attempt should be made. Accordingly, on the 27th of December, about seven o'clock in the evening, Bothwell and his party repaired to the palace, and having without noise obtained entrance by a back passage that led through the stables of the Duke of Lennox, they soon found themselves, unobserved, in the inner court of the palace. At that moment, when neither the king nor the chancellor had the least suspicion of danger, and had taken no precautions for their own protection, it would have been an easy matter to seize and make prisoners of both; but fortunately for them this result was prevented by the incaution and precipitancy of one of the conspirators. Some of

The Raid of the servants of James Douglas of the Abbey. Spot had, a few days before, been apprehended on suspicion of having been concerned in the murder of George Hume of Spot, the father-in-law of Douglas, and had been confined in the palace, preparatory to being examined by torture. Anxious for their release, and seeing no other means of effecting it, Douglas had been induced to join Bothwell in the conspiracy, and, eager only for the accomplishment of that object, he at once proceeded with a detachment of the conspirators to the chamber where his people were confined, and began to batter down the door with sledge-hammers. The unusual noise alarmed the whole household. The king, who was then at supper in the queen's apartments, rushed precipitately down a back stair leading to one of the turrets, in which he took refuge; the chancellor, who happened to be then in the palace, shut himself up with a few servants in his own chamber; and the attendants of the queen barred and barricaded the door of her apartments. Bothwell, having first sent a party to secure the chancellor, went with the rest of the conspirators to the queen's apartments, with the intention of seizing the king, whom he expected to find there; but being unable to obtain admission, he became furious with rage, and called loudly for fire to burn the door. In the meantime, the chancellor and his attendants were courageously defending themselves, and beating back their assailants; while Sir James Sandilands, one of the gentlemen of the king's bedchamber, having been informed of his majesty's danger, had run with all speed to the provost, who hastily collected a number of armed citizens, with whom he entered the palace by a private door leading to the chapel, and compelled Bothwell and his followers to take to flight.* The greater part, owing to the darkness of the night, succeeded in effecting their escape; but nine of the lower order were captured, and, without the formality of a trial, were hanged next morning at the Cross of Edinburgh.† In this daring attempt, sometimes denominated in history the "Raid of the Abbey," only one person was killed,—Shaw, the king's equerry, who was shot by Bothwell while attempting to prevent his escape.

The effects of James's lax and feeble government were every day bringing him fresh disquietudes, and plunging the country more deeply into anarchy and confusion. The intrigues of the popish faction continued to be carried on with undiminished and indefatigable zeal; and the lawless feuds that prevailed among the great families kept the public mind in perpetual alarm, and rendered personal safety everywhere uncertain. In the north the public tranquillity was disturbed by a deadly quarrel between the Earl of Huntley and the Earl of Moray, which drew into its vortex many of the surrounding proprietors, and involved an extensive and populous district of the kingdom in the desolation and bloodshed of civil war.‡ Nor could the royal presence save even the court itself from continued agitation and alarm, arising out of the growing power of the Master of Glamis, and the jealousy and exclusiveness of the chancellor.§

After the failure of the Raid of the Abbey, Bothwell withdrew to the north, and a report having arisen that he had gone to solicit the aid of his cousin, the Earl of Moray, in some other treasonable enterprise, James sent Lord Ochiltree to invite Moray to court, probably with the sincere intention, or at all events with the avowed object, of effecting a reconciliation between him and Huntley. Yielding so far to the persuasion of Ochiltree, Moray quitted his secure retreat in the north, and came to reside with his mother, Lady Doune, at her castle of Dunnibrissle, in Fifeshire; but a second rumour, probably originating with Huntley himself, accused Moray of having abetted Bothwell in his late attempt, and even of having been seen in the palace on the night of the assault. Huntley eagerly communicated this fabulous story to the king, and urged him so importunately for permission to proceed against the traitor, that, though James well knew Huntley to be the mortal enemy of Moray, he had the imprudence to grant him a commission to apprehend that nobleman, and bring him to trial. Armed with this authority, Huntley, on the 7th of February, assembled a party of his followers to the number of forty horse, and proceeded by the Queensferry to Dunnibrissle, where he arrived about midnight. He immediately beset the house, and called on the young earl to surrender. Unwilling, however, to put himself in the power of his deadly foe, Moray, though utterly unprepared for an attack, refused to obey, and, with the few retainers whom he happened to have about him, for some time maintained a desperate defence; but Huntley, collecting a quantity of combustibles from the corn-stacks in the neighbourhood, set fire to the house, so that the inmates were forced to come out, to escape being suffocated or burned to death. In this dreadful situation, Moray consulted with his friend Dunbar, the sheriff of Moray, who, being with him in the house, shared equally in the danger; and such was the devoted affection of that brave man that he generously risked, and, as the event turned out, sacrificed his own life to save that of his friend. His plan, which he immediately put in execution, was to rush out first amongst the assailants, so that while they were occupied in pursuing him or putting him to death, Moray might have an opportunity of making his escape.

Murder of the Earl of Moray. The sheriff had no sooner emerged from the burning mansion than he fell mortally wounded, but Moray, as his generous friend anticipated, succeeded in making his way through his enemies, and, eluding their pursuit, escaped unhurt to the sea-shore. Here, under cover of the darkness of night, he might have been safe, but unfortunately the velvet edge of his helmet had caught fire as he made his way through the flames; and his pursuers, attracted by the light, followed him down amongst the cliffs, where he was endeavouring to ensconce himself, and put him to death with savage cruelty. It is said that the mortal wound was inflicted by the hand of Gordon of Buckie, who, seeing Huntley keep aloof, fiercely upbraided him with being afraid to go so far as his followers, and protesting with an oath that he must be as deeply implicated as they were, compelled him to dismount from his horse, and become art and part in the transaction by stabbing the body of the fallen man. Having thus gratified their cruel revenge, they withdrew, leaving the dead body of the unfortunate earl on the beach, and even one of their own party lying wounded on the ground under the walls of the still burning castle. Huntley, apparently unconscious of the crime he had committed, or feeling secure of impunity through the timidity or favour of the king, quietly retired to an inn in the village of Inverkeithing, where he remained for the night, and in the morning he dispatched Gordon of Buckie to inform the king of what had been done.*

The young Earl of Moray, who had thus met with a cruel and untimely death, was greatly endeared to the Presbyterian party, as being the son-in-law and representative of the great regent who had done so much to promote the Reformation, and whose memory was consequently still fondly cherished by the people. In personal courage, strength, elegance of person, and manly beauty of countenance, Moray was reckoned equal, if not superior to any man of his day, while the many amiable qualities of his mind made him beloved by all ranks in the kingdom.†

Early next morning, after the murder of Moray, James went to enjoy his favourite Commotion in pastime of hunting, in the neighbourhood of Wardie and Inverleith; and, as these grounds lie near the southern shore of the Edinburgh—

Firth of Forth, and almost opposite to Dunnibrissle, the smoking embers of that ill-fated mansion must have been distinctly visible to the king and his attendants. More stress, however, has probably been laid on this circumstance than it deserves. It has been made the ground of an accusation against James, of the most heartless indifference to the deed of blood, if not, in fact, of having been accessory to its perpetration. But as James was in the field at an early hour, and the crime had not been committed until long past midnight, there is great reason to believe that the intelligence had not yet reached him. It reached the capital, however, and was universally known there before his return. To his great consternation, he found the whole city in commotion; loud lamentations for the death of Moray were heard on every side, mingled with accusations against himself as a participant in the murder. The timid mind of James became terribly alarmed, and, uncertain what course to pursue, he at first sent for some of the ministers of the Kirk, and desired them to appease the multitude by assuring them of his

* Forty-three years afterwards, when advanced to extreme old age, Gordon testified his contrition for the murder of Moray on a very remarkable occasion. Being one of the jury at the trial of Lord Balmerino for leasing-making, on which occasion it was calculated that he would be sure to vote against the accused, he disappointed the expectations of all concerned by rising up as soon as the assize was closed, and imploring them to consider well what they were about before giving an unfavourable verdict. "It was a matter of blood," he said, "and if they determined to shed it, they might feel the weight of it as long as they lived. He had himself been drawn in to shed blood in his youth; he had obtained the king's pardon for his offence, but it cost him more to obtain God's grace; it had given him many sorrowful hours." As he said this, the tears ran over his face. Burnet records that the speech of the old man struck a damp into the rest of the assize, though it did not prevent them finding Balmerino guilty. (Chambers' Scottish Ballads, pp. 78, 79.)

innocence. The ministers, however, coolly declined the office, and replied, that the best way to clear himself of the imputation would be to bring the criminals to trial, and inflict on them the punishment they deserved. Baffled in this attempt, he had recourse to a proclamation, in which he declared, on the word and honour of a king, that he had no more concern in the murder than David had in the slaughter of Abner, who was killed by Joab. The popular indignation, however, was too deep to be so easily assuaged. Facts, and vague rumours and surmises, which, by being often repeated, were believed to be facts, were combined together, and appeared to form a mass of direct as well as circumstantial evidence quite conclusive of the king's guilt. No steps had as yet been taken to bring the perpetrators to justice; Huntley sheltered himself under the plea of a royal commission for what he had done; an unusual and suspicious familiarity had of late arisen between Huntley and the chancellor; the king had been enraged against Moray, believing him to have been an accomplice of Bothwell in his late treasonable attempt; it was said that Ochiltree had been prohibited by an order of the chancellor, acting under the authority of the king, from crossing the Firth on the day of the murder; and, finally, it was whispered that the king's jealousy had been excited by some partiality to Moray, evinced by the young queen. All these circumstances formed a mass of apparent proof, which was regarded by many as quite conclusive of the king's guilt. In the meantime the excitement, far from being confined to the plebeians of the capital, was rapidly extending throughout the kingdom, and drawing within its influence persons of the highest rank, whose union soon assumed a most formidable aspect. Ochiltree, Lennox, Atholl, and many other friends of Moray, were loud and incessant in their demands for justice; and Lord Forbes, getting possession of the bloody shirt of the murdered earl, and raising it on the point of a spear, carried it through the country, and called on his retainers to revenge the slaughter of his friend. Bothwell, ever on the alert, embraced this opportunity of strengthening himself against the king, by joining these noblemen with all his adherents; while the Earl of Atholl, with the Lairds of Macintosh, Grant, Lovat, and their followers, made an inroad into Huntley's territory, carrying slaughter and conflagration wherever they went. In the midst of these alarming tumults, Lady Doune arrived at Leith, bringing with her the dead body of her son, and that of the sheriff, who had perished in the same lawless outrage. These she publicly exhibited in Leith, and was preparing to stimulate the indignation of the people of Edinburgh by the same horrid spectacle, when she was prevented by an order from the king. She then caused a picture of the mangled body to be made, and wrapping it in a fine lawn cloth, sought admission to the presence of the king, and presented it before him, with bitter lamentations and importunate entreaties for justice. While the king was paralysed with horror and indecision, she produced three bullets which had been found in the body of her son, and presenting one to the king, and another to one of the courtiers, she said, "I shall not part with this till it be bestowed on him who hindereth justice."* James was at once too partial and too weak to punish the principal offender; but with shocking barbarity he ordered for execution Captain Gordon, whom Huntley and his party had left wounded at Dumnibrissle, and who had no hand in the perpetration of the murder, together with a footman of Huntley's, who, there is reason to believe, was not even present when the crime was committed. It was vain to expect that these acts of flagrant injustice could either satisfy the friends of Moray, or allay the popular ferment, which, increasing every day, at length broke out into open and undisguised insult, so that James, considering himself in danger while he remained in the capital of his kingdom, withdrew with his council to Glasgow. In these perilous circumstances the king's determination to screen Huntley, and his foolish partiality for that disturber of his kingdom, remained unabated. In a friendly letter which James wrote to him at this crisis, he says, "Since your passing herefra I have been in such danger and perill of my life, as since I was borne I was never in the like, partlie by the grudging and tumults of the people, and partlie by the exclamation of the ministrie whereby I was moved to dissemble. Alwise I shall remain constant. When you come heere, come not by the ferreis, and, if ye doe, accompanie yourself as yee respect your own preservation. Yee shall write to the principal ministers that are heere, for thereby their anger will be greatly pacified."†

With a view to restore quiet, and stop the mouths of the incessant clamourers for justice, it was at last resolved to make a show of proceeding against Huntley. He was accordingly summoned to surrender and stand his trial; and having received from the king a secret assurance of safety, he at once obeyed, and, on the 10th of March, entered himself in ward in the castle of Blackness. Here he was permitted to surround himself with such a retinue of his followers that he became, for the time, virtually master of the place; and no sooner was public tranquillity in some degree restored than he was released, on finding security to the amount of £20,000 to re-enter and stand his trial when he should be required.‡ No trial, however, had ever been contemplated, and none ever took place; and this mockery of justice was terminated by his obtaining the king's pardon,§ and receiving permission to return to court.

The indignation of the people now broke out with redoubled fury, and was directed not only against the king, but against the chancellor, who was believed, not without reason, to be a party to the conspiracy for the murder of Moray; and such a storm was raised against him, that that able minister, no longer capable of guiding the helm of the State, was obliged to retire from office.* Disappointed and mortified at the denial of justice, overwhelmed with grief for the loss of her son, and burning with indignation against his murderers, Lady Doune took ill and died, leaving a mother's malediction on the head of the king.†

The loss of his ablest counsellor, at a time of such complicated difficulties, was severely felt by the king, who found Maitland's place but inadequately supplied by the Earls of Mar and Morton, and the Prior of Blantyre, by whom the court was now guided.‡ His position at this moment was one of unusual embarrassment, and to escape from it demanded a wiser head and a more vigorous hand than James had hitherto displayed. The great body of his subjects were refractory and discontented; the authority of the crown and of the law was utterly unable to cope with the overgrown power of the higher barons, the majority of whom had grown insolent and rebellious beyond endurance, and had now leagued themselves with his fierce and turbulent enemy, the Earl of Bothwell, who had recently been proclaimed a traitor. Elizabeth, who had so lately professed such cordial friendship, had grown cold and reserved, and had even shown herself favourably disposed to Bothwell, who was now engaged in a correspondence with her ministers; while, to crown all, the king's favour for the papist Huntley had in great measure alienated from him the affection and confidence of the ministers of the Kirk. It was to this popular and influential body, however, that he now turned as his last resource; and in his efforts to regain their favour, he was induced to make concessions utterly repugnant to his inclination, but which, as ratified by a parliament held at this time, have ever since been regarded as the "Charter of the liberties of the Kirk." By a decree now passed, the obnoxious acts of the parliament of 1584 were rescinded, the Presbyterian form of church government solemnly recognised, the order of bishops abolished, and the independent action of the church courts secured.§

The Earl of Bothwell and all his adherents were attainted by this parliament; and perhaps few better proofs can be given of the contemptible imbecility of the executive government of Scotland at this period than the fact that, notwithstanding repeated attempts had been made to seize and punish him by parties headed by the king in person, that insolent traitor was still able to remain at large, and from time to time to renew his treasonable attempts against the liberty or life of his sovereign. Shortly after the rising of parliament, James had retired to his favourite palace of Falkland, and while residing there with his courtiers in peaceful seclusion, Bothwell was busily engaged in a fresh intrigue for the seizure of his person. Several of the courtiers, who were parties to this conspiracy, had engaged to open the gates to admit the conspirators on their arrival; and the Earl of Angus, the Johnstons, and some others, had agreed to assist Bothwell, in the event of the people of the neighbourhood rallying for the protection or release of the king. Meanwhile, Bothwell, having raised a party of his followers on the Borders, advanced towards Falkland during the night, and would most probably have succeeded in his object, had he not been defeated through the vigilance and fidelity of Sir James Melvil, who having obtained information of Bothwell's movements, dispatched a confidential messenger to apprise the king of his danger. The courtiers, however, who were in the plot persuaded James to treat the warning with contempt, and insulted and derided the messenger. Irritated by such an ungrateful requital of his loyal services, the man withdrew; but as he was journeying homeward, he encountered Bothwell and his party among the Lomond hills. True to his trust, notwithstanding the rude repulse he had met with, he joined the band, as if he had been one of their number, and returned with them towards Falkland. As he approached the palace, however, he slipped from their ranks, and, hastening forward, arrived a few minutes before them. Having obtained entrance, he locked the gates behind him, and loudly entreated the king to take refuge in the tower, and the courtiers to arm in his defence. At that moment the cry of "Bothwell! Bothwell!" raised by the as- Raid of Falk- sailants, met the ears of the king, land.

who, now convinced of the reality of his danger, hastily gathered round him a number of his armed attendants, and shut himself up with them in the tower, as he had been directed. The conspirators within, finding that the plot had been discovered, did not interfere; while Bothwell and his minions without, being unable to obtain admission as they had expected, directed a steady fire into every opening of the tower through which they thought their missiles had a chance of taking effect. This was warmly returned by the party within; but after some time, Bothwell, despairing of success, drew off his men and retired towards the Lomond hills, where, worn out and exhausted by a march of two days and two nights without either rest or food, they found it necessary to repose until the dawn. Early in the morning Bothwell, apprehensive of being attacked and pursued by the country people in the neighbourhood, seized on all the horses in the royal stables, the town, and the park, and hastily commenced his retreat by Stirling, intending to lead back his followers to the Borders. In the course of that day, the news of the assault on the palace spread far and wide, and brought to the king's aid bands of armed men from all parts of the surrounding country; and with such alacrity was this loyal service performed, that before night the king found himself at the head of three thousand men. With these he set out in pursuit of the fugitives; but uncertain what direction they had taken, and perhaps unwilling to risk an encounter with these fierce and hardy desperadoes, James conducted his troops by Queensferry to Edinburgh. Next day Sir James Sandilands brought to the king nine or ten of Bothwell's followers, who, having straggled from their party, had been seized on Calder muir, where they had fallen asleep through exhaustion. Of these, five were hanged without the formality of a trial.* After such an outrageous act of treason, Bothwell did not consider himself safe until he took refuge in England; while the courtiers who had been parties to the conspiracy, were not only pardoned but received into favour. Only one of these, Lord Spence, was subjected even to the form of a trial, but was immediately afterwards restored to his office. Another, Wemyss, Younger of Logie, was for a short time confined in an apartment of the palace; but one of the queen's maids of honour, having found means to deceive his guard, let him down by a cord from the window, so that he made his escape. When the circumstance became known, it occasioned such merriment in the court, that James, with characteristic facility, abandoned all thought of treating the matter seriously. The young lady was forthwith married to her lover, and he was permitted to resume his station at court, as one of the gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber.†

About this time the notorious Captain James

Return of Cap-

court.

Stewart, who had been so long secluded from public life, once more, like a bird of evil omen, emerged from his obscurity, and, at the desire of the king, made his appearance at court.‡ He had come to Edinburgh ostensibly for the purpose of preferring certain accusations against the chancellor and Lord Hamilton, as he had previously done against the Earl of Morton;§ but his real object seems to have been to scramble, if possible, once more into the high office of chancellor, which had been left vacant by the compulsory retirement of Maitland. His reception was such as at once to flatter these ambitious hopes, and to alarm the fears of every lover of his country and his king. In anticipation of a storm being raised against him by the ministers of the Kirk, who had so much cause to dread his reaccession to power, Stewart artfully endeavoured to make his peace with the Church, by applying to the presbytery of Edinburgh, offering to give them satisfaction for his previous offences; but the reception he met with convinced him that he had no support to expect from that quarter. They told him, that for aught they yet saw they could have no opinion of him but evil, and that it would not be words, but good deeds, that would change their minds. At the same time, they sent a deputation of their number to the king, with instructions solemnly to warn him against showing Stewart any countenance or favour, and to protest that if he were again invested with any office of trust or authority, the Church would hold itself guiltless of any evil that might follow. The displeasure evinced by the king at this interference, and still more at the freedom with which some of the ministers declaimed against Stewart from the pulpit, plainly showed that, notwithstanding all the heinous crimes of which Stewart had been guilty, and the many miseries he had formerly brought on the country, James still retained an affection for him, and would willingly, if he durst, have again raised him to power. But these were not times to hazard such a perilous exercise of the royal prerogative. James yielded to a necessity which he could not avert, and Stewart withdrew from court never more to return.* Not long after this, he felt a sacrifice to the revenge of James Douglas, of Parkhead, who had never forgiven him for having occasioned the death of his uncle, the Earl of Morton.

Towards the close of this year the public mind, so long agitated by plots and treasons, was stirred to its depth by the discovery of a conspiracy of a more formidable character than any that had during this reign alarmed the country. The zeal, activity, and hopes of the popish faction, notwithstanding the blow it had sustained four years before in the overthrow of the great Spanish enterprise, were still kept alive through the agency of seminary priests and other foreign emissaries with whom the country was infested; and indefinite apprehensions of impending danger, combined with vague rumours of plots and invasions, kept the minds of men in continual inquietude, and almost prepared them for the sudden development of some dark scheme for overturning the Protestant establishment and subverting the liberties and independence of the country. The ministers of the Kirk deeply participated in these gloomy sentiments, kept a watchful eye over the movements of their enemies, and were unceasing in their endeavours to penetrate their dark designs. At a meeting which they held at Edinburgh about the middle of November, on bringing together the results of their individual investigations, they were unanimously of opinion that some conspiracy was on foot for the overthrow of the Protestant Church, and the re-establishment of Roman Catholic ascendancy. They afterwards sent a deputation to lay the result of their conference before the king, who fully concurred in their opinion, and approved of certain precautionary measures which they had suggested for meeting the emergency.

The ministers were much assisted in their investigations by Sir Robert Bowes, the resident English ambassador, whose skill in detecting conspiracies has rarely been equalled; but after all, the discovery of the plot now ripe for execution was effected through the vigilance and activity of one of their own body. Mr. Andrew Knox, minister at Paisley, having received information that George Kerr, a doctor of laws, a Roman Catholic and brother of the Abbot of Newbottle, was about to proceed to Spain on a secret mission, carrying with him important letters, lost not a moment in setting out to intercept the suspicious fugitive. Accompanied by a body of armed men furnished by Lord Ross, he proceeded to Glasgow, whither he had ascertained Kerr had gone on his way to the coast; but not finding him there, he sailed with his party to the island of Cumbray, where he found the object of his search already on board the vessel that was to convey him to Spain. On a search being made, the letters were discovered and seized, and Kerr was conveyed a prisoner to Edinburgh. He was immediately brought before the council, and on his papers being examined, there were found letters from Jesuits and seminary priests in Scotland, together with blank sheets having at the bottom the seals and signatures of the Earls of Huntley, Errol, and Angus, the Lairds of Auchindown, Fintry, and others of the popish faction.* Kerr, at first, obstinately refused to make any disclosure; but having by command of the king been put to the torture,† he confessed the whole conspiracy. It appears that the King of Spain was to land an army of thirty thousand men on the west coast of Scotland, where they were to be joined by the Roman Catholic lords with all the forces they could muster; that fifteen thousand of these were to march across the Border; while the remainder, with the assistance of the whole Romish faction, were to attempt the overthrow of the Protestant Church, or at least to secure the utmost toleration for the exercise of all the rites and ceremonies of the Romish religion. The blank sheets, Conspiracy of in allusion to which the conspiracy received the name of "the Spanish Blanks." Spanish Blanks," were to have been filled up afterwards by William Crichton, a Jesuit,‡ according to instructions with which Kerr was charged, and then to be delivered to the King of Spain.§

The excitement and alarm occasioned by these disclosures, particularly in the capital, and among the ministers of the Kirk, were almost unprecedented; and great numbers of the citizens, at the recommendation of the ministers, turned out armed to assist the magistrates, if necessary, in placing the offenders in secure custody in the Tol-booth.* The king was then at Alloa, enjoying the Christmas hospitality of the Earl of Mar, who had been recently married to the sister of the Duke of Lennox; and the privy council and ministers, satisfied of the reality of the dangerous conspiracy which had just been brought to light, dispatched Sir John Carmichael and Sir George Home to request his majesty's immediate return to the capital. In the meantime Angus, who had not heard of Kerr's arrest, having returned to Edinburgh from an expedition to the north, was, at the command of the council, apprehended by the magistrates, and lodged in the castle.† Graham of Fintry, another of the conspirators, was arrested and imprisoned a few days afterwards; and a proclamation was issued commanding all Jesuits, seminary priests, and excommunicated persons, to quit the city within three hours, under pain of death.‡

On the king's return he expressed strong displeasure at these prompt and decided measures, and censured particularly the magistrates of Edinburgh, whom he accused of unwarrantable presumption and direct encroachment on the royal prerogative in having, without his express authority, imprisoned a nobleman of such high rank as the Earl of Angus, who had lately returned from executing an important trust in a distant part of the country.

A meeting was now convened, consisting of some of the Protestant nobility and gentry, together with the ministers, to consider what measures should be proposed at the next Steps taken regarding it by the king and people.

meeting of parliament for the security of the Church and the country at this alarming crisis; when it was unanimously agreed that it was necessary to bring to trial, and to punish with the utmost severity of the law, all persons of whatever rank proved to be implicated in the conspiracy; that with respect to such of the conspirators as were still at large every exertion should be made to apprehend them, or, in the event of their eluding pursuit, that they should be declared traitors and forfeited. A deputation was appointed to lay the result of their deliberations before the king, who at first chid them sharply for having presumed to hold such a meeting without awaiting his summons; but afterwards, becoming more cool, excused their precipitancy in consideration of their good intention, and the extent and imminency of the peril they sought to avert. He promised that the trials should be immediately proceeded with; and declared the crimes to be of such magnitude that he could not pardon them even if he would. A proclamation was issued, in which the king expressed his determination to bring the offenders to trial, and to inflict such punishment upon them as to render them an example to all posterity; and he called on all ranks of his subjects to be ready with arms in their hands to support him when required, in pursuing the most vigorous measures for restoring the tranquillity and securing the safety of the kingdom.

Trusting to the king's sincerity, the assembled barons and gentlemen made offer to raise a guard of three thousand horse and one hundred foot for the protection of the royal person, and to maintain them at their own expense so long as might be deemed necessary; and this offer having been accepted, the whole force of the kingdom was commanded to meet the king at Aberdeen, on the 25th of February, in order to proceed against the traitors, Huntley, Errol, and Auchindown, if they should fail to deliver themselves up, as they had been previously charged to do, by the 5th of the same month.

There is reason to believe that with all this appearance of zeal on the part of James, he was, at heart, utterly averse to the task he had imposed on himself, and had no serious intention of proceeding against the traitors farther than he should feel absolutely compelled to do in deference to public opinion. Suspicions of his sincerity were from the first generally entertained by the better informed and more thoughtful part of the community, and were strengthened, if not confirmed, by the escape of Angus, who, breaking loose from his confinement in the Castle of Edinburgh, fled to the north, and joined his friends, Huntley and Errol. That Angus could have performed this feat without the connivance of his keepers was scarcely possible; and that they had acted under secret orders from the king, was regarded as all but certain. But James had a hidden motive for affecting a determination to proceed vigorously against the popish earls. He was politic enough to see, in the present crisis, an opportunity of crushing his enemy Bothwell at once and for ever. This traitorous nobleman had been emboldened in his daring attempts against the king's person, on the one hand, by the apparent indifference of the Protestant clergy; and, on the other, by the secret encouragement of the English queen, who still clung to her abominable policy of fomenting party discord in Scotland. The clergy were now loud in their demands for the punishment of the Romish conspirators; and James well knew that the alarm of Elizabeth at the discovery of the "Spanish Blanks" would be immediately followed by urgent solicitations to proceed against the offenders with the utmost promptitude and rigour. He was determined to make his compliance the price of the co-operation of both parties in the destruction of Bothwell; and to this condition the ministers and Protestant barons readily consented. Thus fortified, he was now in a position to demand the co-operation of his haughty and intriguing sister, and freely and firmly to remonstrate against her unjust and crooked policy, of the whole extent of which he had only recently become aware. He now knew that Bowes had been well acquainted with all Bothwell's treasonable designs, and had secretly encouraged them; that Elizabeth, though she was too cunning openly to commit herself, connived at the countenance shown to Bothwell in England, and at the participation of her ministers in his intrigues; that Mr. Lock, an agent of Burghley, had actually been sent to Scotland for the purpose of organizing a faction, in conjunction with the ministers of the Kirk and the Protestant barons, for the restoration of Bothwell, and that, but for the discovery of the Spanish conspiracy, their machinations would ere this have developed themselves in fresh acts of violence.*

Bowes, who was little aware of the king's intimate acquaintance with all these circumstances, was now admitted to an audience, when he encountered a storm such as he had never before witnessed in the Scottish court. The king was in a violent passion, which must have forcibly reminded the ambassador of some of the appalling paroxysms of his own mistress. He declared that the Queen of England had injured and dishonoured him by giving countenance to Bothwell, whom she knew to be a manifest traitor and rebel; that she had suffered her subjects to harbour and protect him, and that they pleaded her authority for so doing. If such were the case, he said, he could look on it in no other light than an insult to his authority, and a studied indignity. He added that he should make strict investigation into the matter, and should these allegations prove to be correct, there was an end to his amity with the Queen of England and all her subjects. This outburst took Bowes completely by surprise, but he found all his efforts to allay it, by solemnly assuring the king of Elizabeth's innocence, for the time unavailing.† A few days afterwards, however, Elizabeth dispatched a letter to James, written entirely with her own hand, in which she adopted that artful tone of conciliation and kindness which she knew well how to assume when it suited her purpose; and at the same time tendered him so many judicious advices, that the wrath of the young monarch was speedily appeased, and he signified to the ambassador his readiness to proceed against the popish lords. In the event, however, he added, of their refusing to deliver themselves up, as they had been charged to do, he should be obliged to lead an army against them and their feudal retainers—a proceeding which in the present impoverished condition of his exchequer he should have much difficulty in adopting; and he took that opportunity of reminding the ambassador that, instead of £5000 a year which Elizabeth had promised him, he was in receipt only of three.‡ He promised, however, to send to her Sir Robert Melvil, or some other confidential minister, who would enter more minutely into such matters.*

In the meantime, Elizabeth, impatient of delay, sent Lord Burgh to the Scottish court, with instructions to urge on the prosecution of the conspirators by every means in his power. As had been anticipated, Huntley and his associates, instead of surrendering to stand their trial, took refuge within their castles in the midst of their northern fastnesses; and the king, considering his own honour and authority now nearly concerned, resolved to march against them and reduce them, at whatever cost, to obedience. In order, however, to give proof of his sincerity, and thus appease the popular clamour which still prevailed, before setting out on his expedition he ordered Graham of Fintry to be brought to trial, who, being unprotected by any formidable family influence, was convicted of treason by an assize of barons and burgesses, and forthwith beheaded at the market-cross of Edinburgh.† This severity towards one of the subordinate agents of the conspirators, was so far from producing a conviction of James's sincerity, that on the very night of the execution a placard was publicly exhibited in the city, warning the inhabitants against being deceived by this apparent zeal, and asserting that the preparations now in progress would end in nothing, and had never been seriously intended to have any other result.‡

up for the success of the expedition, and appointed the Earl of Morton to be lieutenant-general of the kingdom during his absence, James set out at the head of his troops on the 17th of February, and marched to Stirling.§ On the same day Angus was summoned, at the Cross of Edinburgh, to appear before the king and council on the 27th of the same month, under pain of being put to the horn.|| From Stirling James proceeded to Perth, from Perth to Dundee, and thence to Aberdeen.¶ On hearing of his arrival there, Huntley and his fellow-conspirators quitted their strongholds, and fled to the mountains, leaving their wives with instructions to intercede with the king in their behalf, and to present him with the keys of their castles in token of surrender. James treated the ladies with courtesy, placed garrisons in the castles, and appointed the Earl of Atholl—who had joined him with twelve hundred foot and nine hundred horse—his lieutenant-general beyond the Spey, in order to prevent these northern districts of the country from again falling into the hands of the fugitive lords. He further compelled their vassals, together with the barons of the adjoining counties, to subscribe a bond professing their loyalty to him, and their adherence to the Protestant faith.††

These measures were followed up by the forfeiture of the popish lords, and the seizure of their lands by the crown; but this severe penalty was inflicted in such a manner as to justify the remark of Lord Burgh in a letter to Burghley, that the king only "dissembled a confiscation," and meant ultimately to leave the power of the rebels undiminished.* The Countess of Huntley, sister of the Duke of Lennox, was permitted to keep possession of the principal castle and estate belonging to her husband, while Atholl was appointed to hold the rest as factor for the crown. The Earl Marischal, father-in-law to Errol, purchased the forfeited estates of that nobleman; while his mother retained, as her jointure, his house of Logie-Almond, and Atholl, his brother-in-law, became factor for his other heritable properties. On the other hand, Angus, whom the king had little motive either of fear or favour to spare, was deprived of all his castles and estates, which were delivered over into the hands of strangers.

Having finished his expedition, James returned to his capital on the 13th of March. The result confirmed all the popular suspicions of the king's insincerity; and so entirely had he forfeited the confidence even of his own council, that they passed an act prohibiting all persons from interceding with him in favour of the three earls, and even administered an oath to his domestic attendants to the same effect. A few days after his arrival, Lord Burgh, the ambassador of Elizabeth, was admitted to an audience. He was charged by his mistress to congratulate the king on the fortunate discovery of the Spanish plot; to offer her assistance in pursuing the rebel lords, and bringing them to trial and punishment; to express her surprise and regret at his former remissness, and to urge him to make the most strenuous efforts to apprehend the fugitives, or, if that were found impracticable, at least to confiscate their estates, and thus at once deprive them of the power of again disturbing the peace or endangering the safety of the country, and strengthen his own hands by increasing the revenues of the crown. James expressed his gratitude to the queen for her friendly communication, and assured the ambassador that it was his determination to prosecute and punish with the utmost severity all who had been concerned in the plot; but, at the same time, entreated her majesty to recollect that he had many great difficulties to contend with, and would require liberal support, both in men and money. He added, that her majesty's own interest was here closely concerned, as much greater danger would arise to her dominions from the landing of a Spanish army in Scotland than in either France or the Low Countries, both of which she had liberally subsidized. At the conclusion of the audience, Burgh, in accordance with his secret instructions, artfully contrived to insinuate a plea in favour of Bothwell; but, on this point, the king peremptorily refused to make any concession. "Bothwell," he said, "that vile traitor, whose offences against me are unpardonable, and such as, for example's sake, should make him to be abhorred by all sovereign princes, is harboured in England. Let my sister expel him, or deliver him up, as she tenders her own honour and my contentment. Should he henceforth be comforted or concealed in her dominions, I must roundly assure her, not only that our amity is at an end, but that I shall be enforced to join in friendship with her greatest enemies for my own safety."*

The ambassador was well aware that Elizabeth's insidious policy had given just cause of complaint to the Scottish king. In obedience to the secret instructions of his court, he was at that very time engaged in strengthening Bothwell's faction, and encouraging him to a renewed attempt against the person of his sovereign; while the lord high treasurer, Burghley, was corresponding with that nobleman, and had even advised him to write directly, though with caution and secrecy, to the queen herself.†

It soon became obvious that the king had no intention of proceeding to extremities against the popish lords. They had indeed been declared forfeited, by proclamation, for non-appearance; but their possessions had been consigned to the keeping of their own near relations or connexions, and were, in fact, only held in trust, and ready to be restored, when the present storm had subsided, to their original owners. The forfeitures, besides, had no validity until confirmed in parliament by an act of attainder. To avoid holding a parliament in the present excited state of the country, and in opposition to the impotency of the clergy and Protestants of all ranks, was impossible, and it was accordingly summoned to assemble on the 16th of July. In the meantime, George Kerr, who had been confined in the Castle of Edinburgh, was permitted to make his escape, and though an attempt was made to recapture him, it was purposely rendered ineffectual by sending out the pursuers in one direction, while he was conveyed away in another. This artifice was so palpable and notorious that on the following Sunday it was publicly exposed from the pulpit, and stigmatised as a "mockery."‡

When parliament met it was found that the great object for which it had been summoned was frustrated and summarily set aside. In consequence of the absence of Kerr, the principal witness, the king's advocate, Mr. David Mackgill, declared that Huntley, Angus, and Errol, could not at this time be "forfaulted," as there was not sufficient legal evidence of their guilt.* The worst fears of the Protestant clergy and people were now realised; and the king, who was openly accused of being, and universally believed to be, the contriver of this artifice, agreed, in order to soothe them, to the passing of an act ordaining that obstinate contemners of the decrees of the Kirk should be denounced as rebels, of another declaring ministers' stipends free from "impositions" (taxation), and of a third against sayers of mass and the receivers and entertainers of excommunicated Papists.† In this parliament Bothwell was forfeited, and within an hour was publicly proclaimed a traitor at the Cross of Edinburgh.‡

The artful subterfuge under which the popish earls had been allowed to escape, excited strong indignation against the king among all ranks of his Protestant subjects; and a very general suspicion began to be entertained that, notwithstanding all his professions of attachment to the Reformed faith, he had actually a secret leaning towards popery. The ministers of the Kirk, as usual, spared not to express publicly from the pulpit many of those sentiments which were known to be privately entertained and expressed by their flocks. On the Sunday following the rising of parliament, Mr. John Davidson vehemently attacked the proceedings of the parliament, as well as the king himself. "It was a black parliament," he said, "for iniquity was seated in the high court of justice, and had trodden equity under foot. It was a black parliament, for the arch-traitors had escaped; escaped, did he say! no: they were absolved! and now all good men might prepare themselves for darker days: trials were at hand: it had ever been seen that the absolving of the wicked imported the persecution of the righteous. Let us pray that the king, by some sanctified plagues, may be turned again to God."§

It ought, however, in justice to James to be remarked, that the distracted state of the nobility and of the court itself rendered his position, at this time, one of extreme solicitude and embarrassment. The feuds among the ancient families were every day increasing in number, and seemed threatening to disjoin the whole framework of society. The two first noblemen in the kingdom, the Lord Hamilton and the Duke of Lennox, were at deadly enmity, having each put forth the claim of being next in succession to the crown.¶ Huntley and his friends were at feud with Atholl and the whole family of the Stewarts, on account of the murder of the Earl of Moray. The court was split into factions scarcely less inimical to each other. The Chancellor Maitland had retired from office, in consequence of some mysterious but mortal aversion entertained against him by the queen, the Duke of Lennox, and all the nobility and gentlemen of the name of Stewart, who regarded him as their enemy, and had formed schemes against his life. But at this season of difficulty, finding no other adviser in whose wisdom he could confide, James continued, though privately, to consult him, and now proposed recalling him to court and restoring him to office. This aroused the jealousy of the queen's faction to such a pitch, that they were ready to adopt almost any expedient that seemed likely to prevent his return. Lennox, Atholl, Ochiltree, and all bearing the name of Stewart, now turned their eyes to Bothwell as their forlorn hope. He was a Stewart, and therefore they regarded his cause as their own; and more especially as he was at enmity with Maitland, they determined, if possible, to procure his restoration to the favour of the king.

Accordingly, on the 23rd of July, two days after the rising of the parliament, Bothwell, accompanied by John Colville, was brought secretly to Edinburgh, and was invited by the Earl of Atholl to lodge for the night in a house immediately adjoining the palace, and then occupied by the Countess of Gowrie, Atholl's mother-in-law. Atholl had that day come to court, accompanied by a band of armed retainers—a circumstance so common among the great nobility that it excited no suspicion; but late at night they were posted at the gates of the palace, to prevent all ingress or egress, unless by the express authority of their chief. Early on the morning of the 24th of July, the Countess of Atholl, taking Bothwell and Colville along with her, entered the palace by a private passage which communicated with Lady Gowrie's house, and, conducting them into an anteroom opening into the king's bedchamber, hid them behind the arras. She then stealthily displaced the arms of the guard, and having locked the door of the queen's bedchamber, to prevent the escape of the king, retired with her attendants. In a short time, Bothwell, emerging from his hiding-place, knocked rudely at the king's chamber-door,* which was immediately opened by the Earl of Atholl; and James, who happened to be at the instant in a closet opening into the apartment, hearing a noise, rushed out in a state of dishabille, and seeing Bothwell and Colville standing before him with drawn swords, attempted to escape by the queen's bedchamber, but finding the door locked, he called out loudly, "Treason! Treason!" At that moment, the Duke, Atholl, Ochiltree, and others of their party entered the room, and James, now finding himself completely in the power of his enemies, threw himself into a chair, and faced with unwonted courage the danger which he could not avoid. Bothwell and Colville now threw themselves on their knees, but James called out, "Come on, Francis! you seek my life, and I know I am wholly in your power. Take your king's life; I am ready to die. Better to die with honour than live in captivity and shame. Nay, kneel not, man," he continued, "kneel not, and add hypocrisy to treason." Bothwell, continuing on his knees, solemnly protested that he had no such intention, but had come there to ask his majesty's pardon, and to submit humbly to his pleasure; then presenting his sword, which he held by the point to the king, and laying down his head, called on him to strike it off if he believed he had ever entertained an idea of injuring his royal person.* He declared his willingness to submit to an assize for witchcraft, and for seeking the king's life directly or indirectly, and after being tried and purged, to depart out of the realm, if it should be his majesty's pleasure, and to such place only as he should be pleased to appoint; to attempt no innovation on the State, or any change of the king's councillors, but "to like of them whom his majesty liked."† "You protest, forsooth," resumed James, "you only come to sue for pardon, to submit yourself to your trial for witchcraft, to be cleansed by your peers from the imputations which lie heavy on you. Does this violent manner of repair look like a suppliant? Is it not dishonourable to me, and disgraceful to my servants who have allowed it? What do you take me for? Am I not your anointed king, twenty-seven years old, and no longer a boy or a minor, when every faction could make me their property? But you have plotted my death, and I call upon you now to execute your purpose, for I will not live a prisoner and dishonoured." Lennox, Atholl, and Ochiltree, now warmly interposed their mediation, and James, becoming calmer, raised the suppliant earl from his knees, and drew him into a window recess, as if to converse with him aside. In the meantime, intelligence of Bothwell's enterprise had reached the magistrates of the city, who, hastily mustering an armed body of the inhabitants, flew to the king's relief, headed by the provost, Sir Alexander Hume, of North Berwick. The party had just entered the palace-yard, and Hume, standing beneath the window and seeing the king at the open casement, desired to know his condition and his pleasure; and pledged himself that, if his majesty should give the word, he and his men would instantly break down the doors, and either deliver him from restraint or lose their lives in the attempt.‡ James, who saw that a violent proceeding of this kind would expose his person to great danger, yielding to the suggestion of his tried friend the Earl of Mar, who had just entered the apartment, leant over the window, and answered that "the Earl Bothwell had come in upon him by his expectation and foreknowledge; had promised fair, and if he kept, he would keep to him."§ He, however, requested them to retire to a short distance, and promised that he would call for them again, and let them know the circumstances in which he might be placed. They accordingly withdrew to "the south-west corner of the abbey close," and after a brief space Hume was recalled, and informed by the king that he and Bothwell "were finally agreed."* In his present alarming circumstances, James was fain to gain time by a pretended reconciliation to this arch-traitor. By the advice of Mar, and through the mediation of the English ambassador, he was induced to subscribe a capitulation, promising him, on condition of his peaceable behaviour and abstinence from all interference in State affairs, in the first place a fair trial, and, in the event of his acquittal, restoration to his rank and estates. It was farther stipulated that he should, in the meantime, retire from court, and Bothwell having signified his acquiescence, his peace was next day proclaimed by the heralds at the Cross of Edinburgh. According to agreement he now removed from the court, leaving behind him, however, a strong party of his confederates to watch the motions of the king.

He had hardly taken his departure when James, who was in reality a captive, began to concert measures for shaking off the humiliating yoke imposed on him by this insolent subject and his faction. Despite the wakeful vigilance of his enemies, he managed to consult with Lord Home and the Master of Glamis as to the means of effecting his release, and to communicate with Huntley, who was raising a large force in the north. It was arranged that the attempt should be made immediately after the trial of Bothwell. James, escaping from his guard, was to mount a swift horse, which was to be in readiness for him at the park-gate, and gallop to Lochleven; and, as a strong muster of Bothwell's faction was expected to take place on the day of trial, Hume was suddenly to attack them with all the forces he could assemble, when he hoped to be able either to seize or destroy their leaders.†

The trial came on, upon the 10th of August, and lasted from one o'clock in the afternoon until ten in the evening. The indictment accused Bothwell of three different attempts to take away the king's life by means of sorcery, the only evidence being the depositions of Richard Graham, who had been burned for witchcraft; but this evidence having been deemed contradictory, and in other respects inconclusive, the earl was triumphantly acquitted. Bothwell's complete restoration now became a matter of necessity, if not of justice; and the following "conditions" were accordingly granted by the king to him and "his partakers:"

Conditions granted to Bothwell. — "Full remission of all bygone offences done to his majesty and his authority preceding this day; never to be quarrelled hereafter; that they receive present possession, restoration, and all other security of their lives, lands, goods, and houses; and his highness shall ratify the same in the parliament to be holden betwixt and the 20th day of November next to come, according to the act of repossession made in the parliament holden in Linlithgow; and this present act to serve as a sufficient security in the meantime till the parliament. These persons following shall no wise repair to the king's company: viz., the Lord Home, the Chancellor, the Master of Glamis, Treasurer, Sir George Home. His majesty's will is, the said earl, his company, and assistants, retire them to their own dwelling-places, or where they think good; and that he shall call unto him such as he shall think expedient to await on him."* All these conditions James promised on the word of a prince "to hold firm and stable;" and the document was subscribed by himself and a large number of noblemen, gentlemen, and Protestant clergymen. Notwithstanding all this formality, James had no intention whatever of fulfilling these stipulations. His aversion to Bothwell was extreme, and he determined to embrace the first opportunity of bringing about his ruin. Early the next morning, after the "conditions" had been granted, the king prepared to make his escape, and repair to Falkland; but Bothwell, who had slept that night in the palace, having got notice of the king's intention, stopped him just as he was ready to mount his horse. The king insisted that he would ride to Falkland, but Bothwell, with cool audacity, told him he should not leave the palace until public tranquillity was restored. After an unseemly altercation, during which Bothwell treated his sovereign with gross insolence and indignity, the king convened his council and sent for the ministers. He complained that he was a prisoner, and undutifully handled; but the council appointed that he should have liberty to go where he pleased, and take with him whom he pleased, with the exception of the parties named in the stipulation with Bothwell.† He, accordingly, set out for Falkland; but Lennox and some others of the faction accompanied him, in order to prevent the obnoxious councillors from obtaining access to him, and, if possible, to retain him in their own hands. James, however, was determined at all hazards to be free; and, indeed, he had now reached an age at which it was impossible for any faction, however strong, to hold him long under restraint. He now proved himself more than a match for his enemies in stratagem. Under pretence of concerting measures for quelling some disturbances that had arisen on the Highland Borders, James summoned a convention of the nobles at Stirling, and Bothwell's party being thus thrown off their guard, made no effort to appear in strength at the meeting. This was what James expected, and he eagerly availed himself of his opportunity. After a short conference on the ostensible object of the convention, he interrupted their deliberation by announcing that he had convoked them for the purpose of asking their advice on a matter of great moment, and which nearly concerned his own honour. He then gave a minute detail of the various treasonable attempts made by Bothwell against his person and government, and the many insults and indignities which he had received at the hands of that nobleman; he declared that the conditions he had lately granted him, through the advice and mediation of others, had been extorted from him by force and fear, and he now desired to know whether, in their judgment, he was bound in honour to abide by them. A large majority of the convention concurred in opinion that the conditions so imposed were not binding, that Bothwell had been guilty of manifest treason, and that the pardon which had been granted him might be revoked if his majesty should think fit. James was extremely gratified

by this decision, and, now that he was at liberty, he declared that he would grant the pardon if humbly sued for, but at the same time he desired and obtained from the convention a public act, declaring the enterprise of Bothwell and his associates to have been unlawful. Immediate intimation of this act was sent to Bothwell, together with the king's command, that, until the meeting of parliament on the 14th of November, he should absent himself from court. He was informed that upon his submitting himself to the royal mercy,* his majesty would then grant him a full pardon, and restore him to his estates and honours, after which he must leave the kingdom, but would be permitted the enjoyment of his revenues in his exile.

Bothwell, in the meantime, gave an unwilling acquiescence to conditions with which he felt himself no longer in a position to quarrel; and James, fortified by the support of so many of his nobility, found himself strong enough to recall to his councils the ministers whom he had temporarily discarded, in most reluctant deference to Bothwell and his formidable faction. During the sitting of the convention, Lord Home, the Master of Glamis, and Sir George Home, accompanied by a strong body of armed followers, had arrived in Stirling. James received and welcomed them with transports of joy, and, feeling that he could now set Bothwell and his allies at defiance, he was resolved to show that he had a will of his own, and was determined to exercise it. He invited the Countess of Huntley to court, and it was believed even consented to hold a secret meeting at Falkland with the Duke of Lennox, and his other adversaries at court.*

This unexpected revolution in James's affairs, and the unwonted energy and determination he had recently displayed in very trying circumstances, caused a reaction in his favour among the nobility. Many of them who had formerly stood aloof, and others who had more or less openly sympathised with his enemies, began, from motives of self-interest, to join the party which was now in the ascendant; and even the feuds among the barons, which had given James so much disquietude, now tended to strengthen his position by preventing their combination.

This change alarmed and perplexed Elizabeth and her ministers, who were still bent Crooked policy on their inveterate and disingenuous policy of weakening Scotland by fomenting dissension. Such was their ardent desire for the attainment of this sinister object, that notwithstanding their pretended zeal against popery, they entered into a correspondence with Huntley and the Romanist party, in the expectation of being able to effect a union between them and the faction of Bothwell, which was now dispirited, and ready to fall to pieces. The shameful inconsistency of this proceeding scandalized even Bowes himself, who, dreading the honest indignation of the ministers of the Kirk, wrote anxiously to Burghley:—"This cannot be kept from the ears of the Kirk here, who will greatly start and wonder hereat. Therefore I beseech your lordship that this may be well considered."†

Bothwell, on hearing that the king had recalled his enemies to court, once more Abortive intrigues of Bothwell. commenced his intrigues with England, and secured the co-operation of Atholl and Montrose, who agreed to bring down a strong force of their fierce and warlike retainers, to assist him in compelling the king to abide by the original "conditions," or at least to grant him an unconditional pardon. James, however, was on his guard, and, without allowing his enemies time to mature their plans and concentrate their strength, he marched directly with a strong force from Stirling, and coming suddenly upon Atholl, Gowrie, and Montrose, at the Doune of Menteith, where they had assembled a body of five hundred horse, attacked and routed them, and made prisoners Gowrie and Montrose; while Atholl, narrowly escaping the same, or a worse fate, fled precipitately with a few attendants to the security of his own wild and inaccessible district.‡ Bothwell, thus disappointed, once more fled to the Borders, and was proclaimed a rebel.

The small success that had hitherto attended the king's efforts against the popish lords, while it disappointed and grieved the ministers of the Kirk, and the more zealous of the Protestant party, led to imputations of remissness, and even strong suspicions of insincerity. It was remarked that the king had evinced a degree of vigour and determination in his proceedings against Bothwell, his personal enemy, which strangely contrasted with his feeble and undecided operations against the enemies of the Church; and from this circumstance inferences were drawn, which, though probably unwarranted, were not altogether unnatural. A very general apprehension began to be entertained that James had some secret partiality towards popery, and the clergy, participating in these fears, were ready to adopt extreme measures to ward off the threatened danger. The provincial synod of Fife, at this time distinguished by its ardent zeal against popery, happening to meet in the course of its ordinary convocations, a motion was made, and after much discussion agreed to, that the Roman Catholic earls and their adherents should be excommunicated as obstinate papists; and, notwithstanding the strong objection that the parties did not reside within the jurisdiction of the synod, the awful sentence was fulminated accordingly. It will be recollected that the censures of the Church now carried with them civil penalties of the most formidable description, since, by a recent act of parliament, obstinate contemnors of her authority were denounced as rebels. That this sentence might have all the weight of a general decree, and should not be liable to be set aside on the plea of a want of jurisdiction in the synod of Fife, it was founded on the circumstance that many of the conspirators had been students at the University of St. Andrew's, and that all of them had resided within that district, and had, either by having been in connection with the Church, or by other acts, rendered themselves amenable to the synod's jurisdiction.* The synod farther appointed a deputation to communicate their proceedings to the adjacent synods for their approbation and assistance.†

The king was highly enraged, as well as deeply grieved at this proceeding, which complicated the difficulties of his position with respect to the leaders of the popish faction. That faction was daily gaining strength, particularly in the north, and James naturally dreaded that extreme measures, so far from crushing them, would only have the effect of driving them, in self-defence, to the adoption of the most desperate expedients. He sent for Mr. Robert Bruce, and desired him at least to delay the publication of the sentence; but Bruce excused himself on the plea that none could interfere with the proceedings of the synod, except the General Assembly. James was deeply disgusted at the high attitude thus assumed by the Church, and mortified by the reflection that in his attempts to conciliate that body he had armed it with an authority which he had no longer the power to control; and he seems, from that moment, to have resolved to embrace the first opportunity of subverting its system of self-government, and once more establishing episcopacy. "Well," said he, in reply to Bruce, "I could have no rest until you got that which you call the discipline of the Church established; now, seeing I have found it abused, and none amongst you hath power to stay such disorderly proceedings, I will think of a mean to help it."* He reproached the ministers with cruelty, and said that as they sought for blood, they should have it†—a threat which, as it was not believed, appears to have given them no uneasiness. Nor was he more successful with some of the higher barons, whom he endeavoured to gain over to his views. He paid a visit to Lord Hamilton, for the purpose of sounding him on the subject of granting some degree of religious toleration to the Romish party, whom he considered as too formidable, and too bigotedly attached to their ancient faith, to be coerced into a recantation. He artfully introduced the conversation in such a way as to avoid alarming Hamilton's fears, or exciting his hostility. He remarked that, notwithstanding reports to the contrary, he was assured that he still enjoyed his lordship's confidence and friendship; and added, "Ye see, my lord, how I am used, and have no man in whom I may trust more than in Huntley. If I receive him, the ministers will cry out that I am an apostate from the religion; if not, I am left desolate."—"If he and the rest be not enemies to the religion," said Hamilton, "ye may receive them, otherwise not."—"I cannot tell," replied the king, "what to make of that, but the ministers hold them for enemies, alwise, I would think it good that they enjoyed liberty of conscience." Upon this, Hamilton, becoming greatly excited, cried aloud, "Sir, then we are all gone, then we are all gone, then we are all gone! If there be no more to withstand them, I will withstand." The king, fearing he had gone too far, attempted to back out of the difficulty, and, on the approach of some of the servants, abruptly concluded the conversation by saying, with a smile, "My lord, I did this to try your mind."‡

In the meantime Huntley, Angus, and Errol, petitioned the king that they might be brought to trial for their alleged participation in the Spanish conspiracy, of which they protested they were entirely innocent. The only presumption of their guilt rested, they said, on a confession extorted by torture, and on certain signatures which, if an opportunity were granted, they could prove to be forgeries. And yet on such evidence as that they had been condemned unheard, excommunicated by the Church, banished from court, and driven like outlaws to the mountains. It was but justice, they said, that an opportunity should be given them of establishing their innocence; at all events, let them be brought to trial; if found guilty, let them suffer the penalty of the law; if otherwise, they would either make their peace with the Kirk, or retire into voluntary exile.* This apparently reasonable demand was shortly afterwards urged by the three earls in person, under circumstances which gave rise to the gravest suspicions of the king's complicity. Being about to set out on an expedition to the Borders, accompanied by Lord Home and the Laird of Cessford, he promised to the ministers of Edinburgh that he would enter into no conference with the popish lords until they should satisfy the Kirk. On the same day, however, the three earls suddenly presented themselves before him between Soltra and Fala, and, falling on their knees, implored him not to condemn them unheard, but to appoint a day for their trial; and, in the meantime, they professed their willingness to enter ward, wherever it should please his majesty to appoint. James affected great indignation at their presumption, and told them they should be worse handled for their boldness;† yet, before they parted, he not only promised them a trial, but suggested that by choosing an assize of their own friends, it would be easy to secure an acquittal.‡ In the meantime, they were ordered to repair to Perth, and to remain there until the necessary preparations for their trial should be completed.

It was universally believed that this interview took place by preconcerted arrangement with the king himself; and it was well known that the three earls had secretly summoned all their adherents to assemble in arms on the day of trial; while such was their power at that time that no witnesses for the prosecution could give evidence, no jury could convict, and no judge could condemn, but at the peril of their lives.§ This state convention, consisting of ministers, barons, and commissioners of burghs, was held at Edinburgh on the 17th of October, to deliberate as to the course to be pursued at a crisis so full of danger to the Church and the country, when it was thought good to appoint a deputation to wait on the king and present him with their advice. For this important mission they selected James Melvil, Patrick Galloway, the Laird of Calderwood, and the Laird of Murchiston, with two burgesses of Edinburgh, and one of Dundee,|| who were immediately dispatched to Jedburgh, where the king was then holding a justice-ayre. They were instructed to entreat the king that the

these noblemen in their foul treasons." They were farther commissioned to beseech his majesty that these noblemen, having been guilty of treason in its most aggravated form, should, "according to the loveable laws and customs of Scotland, be imprisoned till the Estates of parliament had advised on the manner of their trial; that the jury should be nominated, not by the accused, but by the accusers; that as the foresaid traitors were excommunicated and cut off from the society of Christ's body, they should not be admitted to trial, or have any benefit of the law, till they were again joined unto Christ and reconciled to his Kirk." They complained of the king's having permitted Lord Home, a professed Papist, and others, his followers, to attend upon him—men who were accounted dangerous to religion, as well as to his person and estate; and especially of his having admitted the excommunicated earls to his presence, and concerted measures with them to secure their immunity from the punishment due to their enormous offences. Finally, they desired that the "professors of religion may be his majesty's guard, and be admitted in the most sensible and warlike manner to be about the royal person, to defend it from violence, and accuse their enemies to the uttermost; and this," they added, "we are minded to do, although it should be with the loss of all our lives in one day,—for certainly we are determined that the country shall not bruik us and them baith, so long as they are God's professed enemies."* Nor was this an empty boast; arrangements were already made for assembling the noblemen, barons, gentlemen, and burgesses in arms, at Perth, on the 24th of October, when the trial was expected to take place; and twelve ministers were appointed commissioners to superintend these preparations, to watch the course of events, and to reside in the capital, until the king should return an answer to the message of the convention.†

had met without his authority, and would give no written reply to their application. He declined even to return a verbal answer to the convention as a body, though he condescended to give certain explanations to the members of the deputation as individual subjects. These explanations were far from satisfactory. The Earl of Home, he said, would shortly be reconciled to the Church, or be refused admittance into his presence; and, as for the popish lords, he declared they had been brought before him without his knowledge, and he had promised them nothing more than a fair and impartial trial, to which, in common justice, they were entitled. He had, however, he said found it expedient to postpone the trial, and would, in the meantime, call a convention of the Estates to meet at Linlithgow, according to whose advice he would proceed in the matter.

Such were the mutual animosities and exasperated feelings of the two great parties at this moment, that the nation was in imminent peril of being involved in a most sanguinary civil war. This result appeared to the watchful eye of Bowes, the English ambassador, to be inevitable. Writing to Burgley on the eighteenth of October, he thus apprehensively alludes to the impending crisis:—"Yesterday, at the meeting of the commissioners of the Kirk, the barons and burghs convened here together. * * * Great preparations are made for the advancement of the course thus resolved, and to stop the trial to be given at this time to these earls, whose friends (as it is told me) have mustered, and are in readiness to come to Perth at the day limited; they have already provided that the Water Gate or Water Street shall be reserved for the earls and their companies; but Atholl, Gowrie, and many of the town, are rather disposed to keep them out. The convocation and access of people to that place is looked upon to be so great that thereon bloody troubles shall arise."*

At this critical juncture the king, by a dextrous stroke of policy, averted a collision which, had the trial been allowed to proceed, would in all probability have been inevitable. On his return to the capital he issued a proclamation, attributing the delay that had taken place in proceeding against the popish lords to the distracted state of the kingdom, and to the interruption of public business consequent on the treasons of Bothwell; putting off the trial at Perth; intimating that he had summoned a convention of Estates to advise as to the time, place, and mode of the trial; and in the meantime prohibiting, under pain of sedition, all convocations of the lieges in arms, and ordering such as had already assembled to return home. The announcement of this new arrangement, which was considered so favourable to the accused, was followed by vehement complaints, remonstrances, and threatenings, on the part of the Kirk; but the cool determination of the king, strengthened by the support of the nobility, convinced them that farther opposition was hopeless.

The convention was opened at Linlithgow on the 12th of November, but was attended by very few of the nobility;† and after a brief deliberation, the whole matter respecting the popish lords was referred to a committee, who were appointed to meet at Edinburgh on the following month, and whose decision was to have the validity of an act of parliament. In this committee the three Estates of the realm—nobles, barons, and burghesses—were to be represented; six of the leading ministers of the Kirk were allowed to appear on the part of that body; and all the officers of State were appointed to assist in the deliberations.

Before the meeting of the committee the accused noblemen made offers of submission to the king and the Church. They solemnly protested their innocence of having signed the "Spanish blanks," or conspired for the admission of foreign troops into the country; but they admitted that they had renounced their adherence to the Presbyterian Church, after having subscribed the confession of faith, and had fallen away to Rome; that they had heard mass, and had been disobedient to the royal mandate when required to deliver themselves up; and for all these things they now humbly cast themselves on the king's clemency. When the convention met, these representations were laid before them; the king, in a lengthened address, urged the danger to the peace of the realm of adopting measures of extreme severity against such formidable criminals; and after some deliberation an act, termed an "Act of Abolition," which had been previously prepared by the council, was introduced, and, chiefly through the artful management of the Chancellor Maitland, received the sanction of the committee. By this act, which, in conformity with the appointment of the convention at Linlithgow, had all the legal authority of an act of parliament, it was declared that the king, "By this his highness's perpetual and irrevocable edict, statuten and ordaineth that God's true religion, publicly preached, and by law established in the first year of his highness's reign, shall only be professed and exercised by all his majesty's lieges within this realm in time coming; and that none of them presume, or take upon hand to avow, profess, or exercise, any other form of religion within the same, or to receive, maintain, supply, or entertain intelligence with any Jesuits, seminary priests, or others, adversaries of the said true religion, under the pains contained in his highness's laws, and acts of parliament made thereanent; and that all his majesty's subjects, who have not as yet embraced and professed the said true religion, or that have made defection therefrom in time bygone, shall, before the first day of February next to come, effectually obey his highness's laws, by professing and exercising of the said true religion, and satisfying his highness, the true Kirk of God, and ministry thereof, in underlying and fulfilling such injunctions as shall be given by his highness and the Kirk, until there be a sufficient proof had of their effectual and unfeigned conformity in embracing and professing of the said

true religion. Or if any of them shall think it difficult so to do, as not being yet persuaded in conscience, that then upon declaration to be made unto his majesty of their choice, and upon his highness's license first sought and obtained, they shall depart forth of the realm to such parts beyond sea as his majesty shall please and be contented with, betwixt and the first day of February next to come, and there remain, and nowise return in this realm, until first they be content to embrace and profess the said true religion, and satisfy his highness and the Kirk, and make security for that effect, in manner after specified; they and their heirs enjoying their lands, livings, and goods in the meantime to their own uses. To whom his highness giveth power and liberty, by the tenor hereof, by their procurators in their name, to stand in judgment, and pursue and defend their actions and causes by order of law, notwithstanding any act of parliament, or process led against them, wherewith his highness in that part, by these presents, dispenseth.*

It was further declared and ordained that William, Earl of Angus, George, Earl of Huntley, Francis, Earl of Errol, Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchindown, and Sir James Chisholm of Cornelix, knights, having been suspected and called before the late parliament for treasonable crimes, "upon occasion of blanks and letters intercepted, concerning trafficking with strangers for troubling of the said true religion and liberty of the realm, shall be free and unaccusable in time coming of the said crimes; and all process thereunto to be abolished, delete and extinct, and remain in oblivion for ever." They were at the same time certified that, in the event of their again intriguing with strangers for the subversion of the established Church, the disturbance of the country, or the overthrow of its liberties, then, and "in that case, this present abolition and annulling to be null, and the said persons to be accusable by law, for the same causes and crimes contained in the said summons, as if the same abolition and oblivion had never been granted." It was farther intimated to them, that if they chose to renounce popery, embrace the Presbyterian religion, and satisfy the Kirk, this must be done by the 1st of February; and if, on the contrary, they chose rather to adhere to the Roman Catholic faith, and retire into exile, they must give security to abstain from all trafficking with Jesuits and seminary priests, to the peril or detriment of their native country. And, finally, they were ordained, under pain of losing the benefit of the Act of Abolition, to make choice, before the 1st of January, of one or other of these alternatives, and to signify the same to his majesty and to the Kirk.†

The Act of Abolition was satisfactory to no party.

The Kirk dissatisfied with the Act of Abolition. That it should have been deeply distasteful to the Roman Catholics can excite no surprise, as it left them no alternative between the renunciation of their ancient faith, on the one hand, or perpetual exile, on the other. But this unmitigated intolerance was not severe enough to be acceptable to the party of the Kirk, who accordingly were filled at once with indignation and sorrow, and did not fail loudly to accuse the king of Romish predilections. They were scandalized that even in banishment these parties should be permitted to enjoy their estates, and to exercise at the same time the rites of the Roman Catholic religion, to which, it cannot be doubted, many of them were conscientiously attached. It is impossible for us to exculpate the leaders of the Presbyterian Church at this period from the charge of intolerance, and of recommending a course of policy as unwise as it was unmerciful and hostile to the spirit of Christianity. It would seem that the very idea of such religious toleration as at the present day is cordially cherished by Protestants, if it had ever entered their minds at all, was repelled with abhorrence as a profane or blasphemous suggestion of the enemy of mankind. Bowes, whose opportunities of observation were equal to his characteristic acuteness and vigilance, writing to Burghley at this time remarks:—"This edict and act of oblivion is thought to be very injurious to the Church, and far against the laws of God and this realm; whereupon the ministers have not only openly protested to the king and convention that they will not agree to the same, but also, in their sermons, inveigh greatly against it; alleging that, albeit, it has a pretence to establish one true religion in the realm, yet liberty is given to all men to profess what they list, so they depart out of the realm; and thereby they shall enjoy greater privileges and advantages than any other good subject can do."* The popish earls, in the meantime, still continued their intrigues of the treasonable intercourse with Spain, popish faction, and, encouraged by promises of speedy assistance from that country, as well as confident in the numbers and strength of their adherents at home, were in no haste to avail themselves of the Act of Abolition; but, with a show of submission, temporised and procrastinated until the time appointed by the committee had passed, and they were once more left exposed to all the penalties of the law. A convention of the Estates, assembled on the 18th of January, passed a resolution declaring them to have forfeited the benefit of the articles; and the king, after having in vain laboured to persuade them to submission, was forced to require them, under the penalty of outlawry, to deliver themselves up for trial.

The urgent remonstrances of the English queen probably contributed not a little to impel James to a course so distasteful to him. Elizabeth was highly displeased with the leniency shown to the popish earls, and even entertained suspicions of his being secretly favourable to their designs. Her uneasiness on this head was greatly heightened by information she had recently received of the unceasing plots of the Jesuits and seminary priests, with whom Scotland still continued to be infested; and she was still farther alarmed on receiving intelligence that another fleet and armament, destined for Scotland, were in course of preparation in Spain.* No sooner was she apprised of the decision of the committee with regard to the three earls, than she dispatched Lord Zouch as her ambassador to the court of Scotland, with instructions to represent to the king the danger to which he exposed himself and the country by his mistaken clemency; to remonstrate with him on the violation of his promises, to make no agreement with the traitors without her concurrence; and to require him to proceed against them with that rigour which their crimes had merited, and which the exigency of the time imperatively demanded. Besides these open instructions, Zouch was intrusted with a secret letter, written wholly in the queen's own hand, and which is well worthy of being recorded,—not only as affording a most interesting specimen of the private epistolary style of Elizabeth, but as showing in a strong light her views of James's policy, and the almost scornful contempt she entertained for her royal cousin. It runs thus:—

“My dear Brother,—To see so much I rue my Elizabeth's let- sight, that views the evident specter to James. tacle of a seduced king, abusing council, and wrygided kingdom. My love to your good and hate of your ruin, breeds my heedful regard of your surest safety. If I neglected you, I could wink at your worst, and yet withstand my enemies' drifts. But be you persuaded by sisters. I will advise you, void of all guile, and will not stick to tell you, that if you tread the path you chuse, I will pray for you, but leave you to your harms.

“I doubt whether shame or sorrow have had the upperhand when I read your last lines to me. Who, of judgment, that deemed me not simple, could suppose that any answers you have writ me should satisfy, nay, enter into the opinion of any one not void of four senses, leaving out the first.

“Those of whom you have had so evident proof by their actual rebellion in the field you preserve, whose offers you knew then so large to foreign princes. And now, at last, when, plainest of all, was taken the carrier himself, confessing all before many commissioners and divers councillors; because you slacked the time till he was escaped, and now must seem deny it (though all men know it): therefore, forsooth, no jury can be found for them. May this blind me, that knows what a king's office were to do? Abuse not yourself so far. Indeed, when a weak bowing and a slack seat in government shall appear, then bold spirits will stir the stern, and guide the ship to greatest wreck, and will take heart to supply the failure.

befall you, nor any king else, than to take for payment evil accounts; for they deride such, and make their prey of their neglect. There is no prince alive, but if he show fear or yielding, but he shall have tutors enough, though he be out of minority. And when I remember what sore punishment those so lewd traitors should have, then I read again, lest at first I mistook your mind; but when the reviewing granted my lecture true, Lord! what wonder grew in me that you should correct them with benefits who deserve much severer correction. Could you please them more than save their lives and make them shun the place they hate, where they are sure that their just deserved haters dwell, and yet as much enjoy their honours and livelihoods, as if for sporting travel they were licensed to visit other countries? Call you this a banishment—to be rid of whom they fear and go to such they love? Now, when my eyes read more, then smiled I to see how childish, foolish, and witless an excuse the best of either three made you, turning their treasons' bills to artificers' reckonings with items for many expenses, and lacked but one billet which they best deserved, an item for so much for the cord whose office they best merited. Is it possible that you can swallow the taste of so bitter a drug, more meet to purge you of them, than worthy for your kingly acceptance? I never heard a more deriding scorn; and vow that, if but this alone, were I you, they should learn a short lesson.

“The best that I commend in your letter is, that I see your judgment too good to affirm a truth of their speech, but that alone they so say. Howbeit, I muse how you can want a law to such as whose denial, if it were ever, could serve to save their lives, whose treasons are so plain; as the messenger who would for his own sake not devise it, if for truth's cause he had it not in his charge, for who should ever be tried false if his own denial might save his life? In princes' causes many circumstances yield a sufficient plea for such a king as will have it known; and ministers they shall lack none that will not themselves gainsay it. Leave off such cloaks, therefore, I pray you; they will be found too thin to save you from wetting. For your own sake play the king, and let your subjects see you respect yourself, and neither to hide or to suffer danger and dishonour. And that you may know my opinion, judgment, and advice, I have chosen this nobleman whom I know wise, religious, and honest, to whom, I pray you, give full credit as if myself were with you; and bear with all my plainness, whose affection, if it were not more worthy than so oft not followed, I would not have gone so far. But blame my love if it exceed any limits. Beseeching God to bless you from the advices of them that more prize themselves than care for you, to whom I wish many years of reign.”*

James, suppressing his resentment on the perusal of this caustic epistle, received the ambassador courteously, and with apparent cordiality. With regard to the Act of Abolition, which had been so displeasing to her majesty, he remarked that it had already become a dead letter, as the popish lords had declined to avail themselves of its provisions in their favour; and he appealed to the measures he had already taken to bring them to trial, as a sufficient proof that he meant to proceed against them with the most unsparing rigour. The ambassador, however, refused to be satisfied with this indefinite answer on a subject of such grave importance to both countries; and insisted that as the popish earls were still intriguing with Spain for the invasion of England through Scotland, and the subversion of the Protestant Churches in both kingdoms,* his mistress was entitled to be informed specifically, and in writing, what proceedings his majesty had resolved to adopt.

At this time an event occurred which diffused Birth of great joy throughout the king-Prince Henry. dom. On the 19th of February, after having been married five years, the queen presented the nation with an heir to the Scottish throne. Prince Henry was born at Stirling Castle, and was at once committed by his royal father to the charge of the Earl of Mar, the hereditary governor of that important stronghold. The news was received everywhere with exultation, and with the outward marks of public rejoicing common at that period. A discharge of twelve pieces of artillery from the castle announced the intelligence to the inhabitants of the capital; and the king sent to the ministers, requiring them to call the people together to public thanksgiving, and to the magistrates "to cause set on bale-fires."† In all quarters of the kingdom the people manifested their loyalty by such extravagant demonstrations of joy, that a chronicler of the time declares the "people in all parts appeared to be drift for mirth."‡ Scarcely, however, had the young prince seen the light, ere faction began to contemplate employing the unconscious infant as an instrument for the promotion of its base designs. It was proposed by the conspirators to seize his person, and to retain him in their hands, as a means of strengthening their party, and forcing the king to submit to their terms. To the honour of Lord Zouch, however, to whom the suggestion was made, he peremptorily refused his concurrence, and the despicable expedient was discarded.

In the meantime, Zouch, though strictly watched, busied himself, in conformity with his secret instructions, in intriguing with such of the Scottish nobility as were opposed to James's temporising policy. He even entered into a correspondence with Bothwell, who now sought to cover the gratification of his own restless ambition under a pretended zeal to reform abuses in the State, and to secure the punishment of the open enemies of the Protestant faith. A new conspiracy for seizing the person of the king was not long in being organised. Zouch was the prime mover in this treasonable design, and among the leaders were—besides Bothwell—John Colville, brother of the Laird of Wemyss, Henry Lock, an agent of Sir Robert Cecil, and some of the most violent among the ministers of the Kirk. It was arranged that Conspiracy for putting to death Maitland, Lord Home, Huntley, and other friends of the king.

Atholl and Argyle should advance suddenly to the capital, at the head of a strong levy of their fierce northern followers, and having united their forces with those of Bothwell, Montrose, Ochiltree, and the Laird of Johnston, that they should attack the Chancellor Maitland, the Lord Home, and other friends of the king, seize and put to death Huntley, and other Popish leaders, forcibly drive all evil councillors from the king's presence, and take ample though late revenge for the death of the Earl of Moray.*

That this project received direct, though secret, encouragement from the English queen is unquestionable. She was no stranger to such dishonourable and treacherous policy; and it is not to be supposed that Lord Zouch would, without special instructions, have so far derogated from the respect due to himself and his high office, as voluntarily to place himself in the position of a felon in a country to which he had been accredited as an ambassador.

The plot was not long in reaching maturity. Bothwell, with characteristic impetuosity, hastily levied a force of about four hundred horsemen on the Borders; and, on the 2nd of April, at an early hour in the morning, suddenly made his appearance at Leith. In the meantime, however, the king had received secret intelligence of the conspiracy, and promptly adopted vigorous measures to defeat it. A gentleman belonging to the ambassador's suite, who had been detected in holding suspicious intercourse with the traitors, was, by the king's order, arrested and imprisoned; Lord Home, Cessford, and Buccleuch, were ordered to assemble their forces at Kelso, with a view to intercept Bothwell immediately on his crossing the Border; and several of the more violent ministers of the Kirk, who were suspected of favouring the designs of Bothwell, and even of assisting him with supplies of money, were apprehended and placed in confinement. Bothwell, who had escaped the vigilance of Home and Buccleuch, was quickly followed by them and their party; who, though amounting to not more than about one half of the followers of Bothwell, were ordered instantly to advance against the rebels. The king, who remained in Edinburgh with a few attendants, proceeded to the High Church, where, after sermon, he addressed the people. He informed them of the treasonable designs of Bothwell against his person, and of his near approach to the capital; and excited their fears by insinuating that, if these lawless Border freebooters should prove an overmatch for him, the property and personal security of the citizens would be at their mercy. He declared his resolution to march in person against the rebels with all the forces he could muster; he appealed to them as loyal subjects to assist in the defence of their sovereign; and, lifting his hand towards heaven, he solemnly vowed to God that, if they would now arm and advance with him into the field, and if it should please God to give him the victory, he would, on his part, in return for their loyal services, never rest until he had entirely crushed the power of the popish lords, and banished them from the kingdom.* The ministers warmly seconded the king's exciting appeal; and the people flew to arms, and cheerfully ranked themselves under the banner of their prince. He lost not a moment in placing himself at their head. His troops, when assembled, were found to consist—the advance, of

James advances against Bothwell. a thousand pikemen and five hundred horse; the rear, of the infantry of the city of Edinburgh, amounting to one thousand musketeers; the whole being supported by three pieces of artillery, covered by two hundred horse. Bothwell still lay at Leith, where he seemed disposed to take up a position within the old entrenchments on the Links, and there await the arrival of Atholl and Argyle, whom he hourly expected to cross the Firth, and join him with their numerous bands of warlike followers. Hearing, however, of the king's approach with such a powerful force, he divided his company into two bands, and drew them off by the back of Arthur Seat towards Dalkeith. They halted at a place called Womet, where they took up a strong position; while the king, who was made aware of their movements, fearing that Bothwell intended to make an inroad into the city from the south side, reversed his order of march, and proceeded by the Pleasance towards the Borough Muir, where he drew up his troops to protect the town. In the meantime he had dispatched Lord Home with the cavalry, with instructions to attack Bothwell in his new position; and the two opposing forces having encountered each other at a place called Edmestone Edge,† Home's party were quickly put to the rout, twelve of them were slain, and the remainder, hotly pursued by Bothwell and his company, were driven back on the main body. The king, alarmed for his personal safety, sought refuge within the town, which he entered at a gallop;* but fortunately his panic was groundless, for Bothwell, in the eagerness of his pursuit, was thrown from his horse, and so severely injured that he retired to Dalkeith, where he passed the night. Next morning, sensible that his success had been but partial, and despairing of being able to cope with the whole body of the royal forces, he dismissed his followers, and once more sought security on the English side of the Border.

James at last began to feel that, in order to give contentment to the ministers of the Kirk, and the great body of his subjects, as well as to conciliate the English queen, it was absolutely necessary to drop his temporising policy, and proceed with vigour against the obnoxious popish lords; who, secure in their northern fastnesses, in open defiance of his authority, still continued their negotiations with Spain. He was further strengthened in his determination by the circumstance that these daring rebels had recently received a large supply of money from Philip, to be employed in the promotion of their treasonable designs. This once more roused the ministers of the Church, who, at a meeting of the General Assembly, held in the beginning of May, unanimously ratified the sentence of excommunication pronounced against “the apostate lords,” by the synod of Pife, and ordained the whole pastors within the realm to intimate the sentence publicly to their congregations, that none might pretend ignorance. Lord Home, however, was relaxed from the sentence, as he had some time before “satisfied the Kirk.”† The assembly, at the same time, sent a deputation of their number to work on the king, who was then at Stirling; to direct his attention to the imminent danger with which the country was threatened; to suggest such measures as they considered expedient at a crisis so alarming both to Church and State, and especially to move him to proceed against the excommunicated popish lords.‡ Proclamation was now made, commanding these noblemen

The popish lords required to appear and submit to their trial before the parliament to be held to stand trial. in May; and the entire military strength of the country was ordered to be in readiness to meet the king in arms, in order, if necessary, to compel these powerful rebels to submission. James was at last in earnest; and, having now resolved to gratify the eager desire of the English queen for the suppression of the Spanish faction in Scotland, he felt himself entitled to remonstrate more strongly than ever against the countenance and encouragement which Bothwell still openly received in England, and had all along secretly received from the queen herself, and peremptorily to demand the expulsion of that rebel from her dominions. For this purpose he dispatched Colville of Easter Wemyss, a distinguished military leader, and Edward Bruce, an eminent minister of the Kirk, as ambassadors to the English court; and, as

James was still smarting under the cutting sarcasms contained in his "dearest sister's" late private epistle, he seized the opportunity of giving vent to his spleen in the following letter, which, in imitation of Elizabeth's, was private, and in his own handwriting:—

"So many unexpected wonders, madam and dearest sister, have of late so overshadowed my eyes and mind, and dazzled so all my senses, as in truth I neither know what I should say nor where at first to begin; but thinking it best to take a pattern of yourself, since I deal with you, I must, repeating the first words of your last letter (only the sex changed), say, I rue my sight that views the evident spectacle of a seduced queen. For when I enter betwixt two extremities in judging of you, I had far rather interpret it to the least dishonour on your part, which is ignorant error. Appardon me, madam; for long approved friendship requires a round plainness. For when first I consider what strange effects have of late appeared in your country; how my avowed traitor hath not only been openly reset in your realm, but plainly made his residence in your proper houses, ever plainliest kything* himself where greatest confluence of people was; and, which is most of all, how he hath received English money in a reasonable quantity; waged both English and Scottish men therewith; proclaimed his pay at divers parish churches in England; convened his forces within England, in the sight of all that border; and therefrom contemptuously marched, and camped within a mile of my principal city and present abode, all his trumpeters and divers waged men, being English; and being by myself in person repulsed from that place, returned back in England with displayed banners; and, since that time, with sound of trumpet, making his troops to muster within English ground. When first, I say, I consider these strange effects, and then again I call to mind, upon the one part, what number of solemn promises, not only by your ambassadors, but, by many letters of your own hand, ye have both made and reiterated unto me, that he should have no harbour within your country—yea, rather stirring me farther up against him, than seeming to pity, him yourself; and, upon the other part, weighing my desires towards you,—how far being a friend to you I have ever been an enemy to all your enemies, and the only point I can be challenged in, that I take not such form of order, and at such a time, with particular men of my subjects, as peradventure you would, if you were in my room. When thus I enter in consultation with myself, I cannot surely satisfy myself with wondering upon these abovementioned effects: for to affirm that these things are by your direction or privity, it is so far against all princely honour, as I protest I abhor the least thought thereof. And again, that so wise and provident a prince, having so long and happily governed, should be so fyled and condemned by a great number of her own subjects, it is hardly to be believed. If I knew it not to be a maxim in the state of princes, that we see and hear all with the eyes and ears of others, and if those be deceivers, we cannot shun deceits.

"Now, madam, I have refuge to you at this time, as my only pilot to guide me safely betwixt this Charybdis and Scylla. Solve these doubts, and let it be seen ye will not be abused by your own subjects, who prefer the satisfying of their base-minded affections to your princely honour. That I wrote not the answer of your last letters with your late ambassador (Lord Zouch), and that I returned not a letter with him, blame only, I pray you, his own behaviour; who, although it pleased you to term him wise, religious, and honest, had been fitter, in my opinion, to carry the message of a herald, than any friendly commission betwixt two neighbour princes; for, as no reason could satisfy him, so scarcely could he have patience even to hear it offered. But if you gave him a large commission, I dare answer for it he took it as well upon him: and therefore have I rather chused to send you my answer by my own messengers. Suffer me not, I pray you, to be abused with your abusers, nor grant no oversight to oversee your own honour. Remember what you promised by your letter of thanks for the delivery of O'Rorick. I trust ye will not put me in balance with such a traitorous counterpoise, nor willingly reject me; constraining me to say with Virgil,—

'Flectere si nequeo superos, Acheronta movebo.'

And to give you a proof of the continuance of my honest affection, I have directed these two gentlemen unto you, whom I will humbly pray you to credit as myself in all they have in charge, and, because the principal of them goes to France, to return the other back with a good answer with all convenient speed."*

Whatever might be the feelings of the haughty queen on the perusal of a letter containing so much pointed rebuke, she betrayed no irritation to the ambassadors; and her subsequent demeanour towards Bothwell exhibited at least a change of policy, if not of sentiment. The ambassadors were charged to invite her, in the king's name, to stand godmother at the baptism of the infant prince—an office which she accepted with much apparent pleasure; and when pressed on the subject of money, and reminded of the exhausted state of James's exchequer, she promised him aid as soon as he evinced his sincere intention to punish the popish lords by actually marching against them.†

sibility, having remained at home. The king delivered an address, in which he detailed the leading circumstances of the conspiracy, and dwelt upon its aggravations; and, although he professed to leave the Estates at liberty to pronounce what judgment they might think fit, it was evident to all that he expected and desired a verdict of condemnation. "My lords," he said, "howbeit I might vote, I will only sit here, see you do right, and inform you according to the laws. I will neither command nor forbid to agree to their forfaitin. This I will say: they have committed high treason and idolatry; for I assure you they have all the mass in their houses, which I could prove by witnesses; their trafficking with Spain is certain, and I could, if it were needful, prove the same at large. As for the blanks and evils, they are thus, I assure you; therefore look ye to it, as ye will answer to God and me."* Although there were several noblemen present connected with the conspirators by ties of blood or friendship, parliament proceeded to pass upon them the most rigorous sentence known to the law. Huntley, Angus,

The popish

Errol, and all concerned in the conspiracy of the Spanish blanks, were declared guilty of high-treason, their estates and honours were forfeited,† and their banners ordered to be torn at the public market-place. Commission also was given to the Earl of Argyle, the declared enemy of the three earls, to enter and lay waste their territory, and pursue them with fire and sword. Several acts of unprecedented severity were, at the same time, passed against the papists. Amongst others, the saying of mass was declared to be a crime of the first magnitude, and punishable with death and confiscation.

In the meantime, the king had dispatched ambassadors to the courts of France, Denmark, and the United Provinces, with the joyful intelligence of the birth of an heir to the throne of Scotland, and invitations to send representatives to be present at the baptism, which had at first been fixed to take place on the 15th of July, though it was afterwards postponed until the last day of August. Elizabeth sent as her representative the Earl of Sussex, a young nobleman connected with her by the ties of blood, who reached the Scottish court, attended by a magnificent retinue, on the 27th of August, and brought with him a letter from his royal mistress, congratulating the king on the auspicious event, and abounding in expressions of friendly feeling, mingled, after her own quaint manner, with numerous advices. The baptism took place in the Chapel Royal, at Stirling, in the presence of the foreign ambassadors, and a numerous concourse of nobility. Mr. David Cunningham, Bishop of Aberdeen, was selected to officiate on the occasion, a circumstance which did not fail to excite remark, as indicating a continued secret predilection in the king's mind for episcopacy. The prince was baptized by the name of Frederick Henry, Henry Frederick; and immediately after the ceremony received the honour of knighthood at the hands of his father, who, at the same time, placed on his head a ducal coronet richly ornamented with precious stones. His titles were then proclaimed by the heralds and the Lyon King of Arms, as "Frederick Henry, Henry Frederick, by the grace of God, Knight and Baron of Renfrew, Lord of Isla, Earl of Carrick, Duke of Rothesay, Prince and Great Steward of Scotland."* The whole of the arrangements for the accommodation of the royal parents and their distinguished guests, both during the ceremony and the pageants that succeeded, were of the most gorgeous and costly description; and much ingenuity was expended by Mr. David Fowler, the master of the revels, as well as by the king himself, in planning masks, shows, and triumphs, together with curious and mysterious devices suited to the taste of that age.†

The pageants being ended and the ambassadors dismissed, the attention of the king was forcibly directed to far different employment,—the subjugation of the northern earls, whose power was becoming daily more formidable. Bothwell had now entered into confederacy with them, and had concerted a new plot for seizing the king's person, and confining him in the Castle of Blackness, until the arrival of the Popish earls with their forces from the north. These audacious traitors were, at the same time, intriguing with Sir Robert Cecil, and endeavouring to tempt him, by a large bribe of Spanish gold, to unite with them against the king; and Bothwell, false to all parties, had the baseness to counsel him to accept the money, and then betray them to Elizabeth, on condition that she would still continue to befriend him in his present desperate circumstances. But the final ruin of this fierce and lawless villain was now at hand. By means of a servant of his, named Orme, his plot for seizing the person of the king was detected; Orme, together with the keeper of Blackness Castle, was executed at the Cross of Edinburgh; and Elizabeth, not less perfidious than Bothwell himself, finding him no longer a suitable tool for her base purposes, abandoned him to his fate. She ordered him forthwith to quit her dominions, and prohibited all her subjects, under pain of treason, from giving him either shelter or assistance.‡

Agreeably to his commission, Argyle, then a youth of nineteen, took the field against the northern earls, with an army of six thousand men, mostly on foot; but he expected a strong reinforcement, chiefly of cavalry, under Lord Forbes, the

Laird of Towey, the Dunbars, and other barons, shortly to join him. Meanwhile he led his forces across the mountains to Badenoch, and laid siege to Huntley's Castle of Ruthven. The place, however, was obstinately defended by the M'Phersons; and, being destitute of artillery, and learning that the earls were advancing to attack him, Argyle thought it prudent to raise the siege, and retire to Drimmin, in Strathdown, where he encamped on the 2nd of October, awaiting the arrival of Lord Forbes and the M'Kenzie's, who were already on their march to his assistance. Huntley and Errol, however, who were at no great distance, resolved to attack him before the reinforcements should arrive. Their forces, indeed, were greatly inferior to those of Argyle in point of numbers, for they amounted to not more than from fifteen hundred to two thousand men; but, on the other hand, they were vastly superior in military skill, experience, and equipment. They consisted mostly of gentlemen of the low countries, well armed and mounted, were supplied with a train of artillery, and assisted by veteran officers. Huntley, dividing his little army into two bands, marched from Strathbogie to Auchindown, the castle of Sir Patrick Gordon, which he reached on the morning of the 3rd of October. Errol led the van, supported by Sir Patrick Gordon; while Huntley brought up the rear, with the artillery, consisting of six field-pieces. Argyle, on observing the approach of the enemy, withdrew his forces from their encampment on the plain, and took up a strong position on the adjacent heights, where he arranged his army in three divisions. The command of the van was entrusted to M'Lean of the Isles; Argyle himself led the rear, which occupied the more elevated ground, and was securely flanked by bogs and precipices. M'Lean commenced the attack, but Battle of Glenlivat. had advanced only a short distance when Huntley's artillery, which, up to that moment, had been completely masked by the cavalry, opened fire, and, at the first discharge, so astonished and terrified the Highlanders, to most of whom the deafening sound and destructive power of cannon were till then unknown, that they were thrown into utter confusion. Many fell flat on their faces, and refused to stir; others rushed desperately forward, yelling and brandishing their weapons, to attack the cavalry, when a second discharge put to flight great numbers, who quickly disappeared behind the surrounding mountains. The great body, however, of Argyle's forces still firmly maintained their position, which had the advantage not only of superior elevation, but of being protected in front by uneven and marshy ground, in which cavalry could not act without difficulty and danger. Huntley's vanguard, however, under Errol and Auchindown, advanced resolutely to the attack. The former, making a circuit, endeavoured to take his enemies in flank, but was severely wounded in the attempt; while the latter, pushing straightforward, became entangled in the morass, where the greater part of his men fell under the fire of their opponents. The rest, still headed by their valiant chief, succeeded in extricating themselves, and were making their way up the hill, when Auchindown, who was conspicuous from his great stature, was pierced by a bullet, and, falling from his horse, was speedily dispatched by the Highlanders, who rushed on him with their dirks, and, cutting off his head, carried aloft in triumph the bloody trophy. At this crisis the force under Errol, surrounded by Argyle's vanguard, under M'Lean, was in danger of being cut to pieces, when Huntley, seeing their imminent danger, hastily bringing up the rear-guard, restored the action. The contest raged fiercely for upwards of two hours, Defeat of the rebels. The adverse tidings, however, seemed rather to inflame than to damp his ardour. Vowing vengeance against the audacious traitors, he immediately, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, and the consequent wretched condition of the roads at that season, set forward with his whole army to Aberdeen, which he reached on the 15th of October.¶ At his own desire, he was accompanied by Andrew Melvil, James Melvil, and various other ministers of the Kirk, in order that they might appease the jealousy of the people by bearing testimony to his sincerity, as evinced by the severity of his proceedings against the popish earls and their adherents.¶ On his march he was joined by the Irvines, Keiths, Leslie's, Forbeses, and other clans at feud with Huntley and Errol, who, being weakened by the losses they had sustained at Glenlivet, and still more by the desertion of many of their followers, who were unwilling to bear arms against the king in person, now fled to the mountains. But though the royal army met with no resistance, the object of the expedition was in imminent danger of being frustrated from another cause. The royal exchequer was exhausted; the king's credit was at so low an ebb, that he had no means of obtaining an advance of money; and the troops, becoming mutinous and discontented from the want of pay, were on the point of deserting their standards, and returning home, when James Melvil was dispatched with urgent letters from the king to the ministers and magistrates of Edinburgh, to move the well-affected of all ranks to raise by contribution, and "send with diligence the second month's pay."* From Aberdeen, James marched to Strathbogie, where stood, deserted by its master, who had fled into Caithness,† the magnificent residence of Huntley, which had occupied fourteen years in building. The majority of the king's advisers were inclined to spare this princely mansion; but James, yielding to the importunity of Andrew Melvil, Lord Lindsay, and others, who were opposed to this lenient policy, decreed its demolition, and it was accordingly blown up with gunpowder, and levelled to the ground; the only part left being the massive old tower, which baffled the skill and resources of the "sappers and miners" of that age. A similar destruction fell on Slaines Castle, in Buchan, belonging to the Earl of Errol; Culsa-mond, in Garioch, the mansion of the Laird of Newton-Gordon; and Bagays and Craig, in Angus, the castles of Sir Walter Lindsay and Sir John Ogilvie; and there is reason to believe that the whole district would have been laid waste had it not been for the earnest intervention of Thirlstane and Glamis, by whose advice, enforced by the scarcity of provisions which had begun to prevail in the camp, the king was induced to return to Aberdeen, after having garrisoned the strongholds of the other popish insurgents. Several of Huntley's followers, who had been taken prisoners, suffered death at Aberdeen by the hands of the executioner; after which the king issued an offer of pardon to all commoners who had taken part against Argyle at the battle of Glenlivet, on condition of their paying certain fines imposed by the council.‡ He next appointed the Duke of Lennox as his lieutenant in that part of the kingdom, with a body of two hundred horse and one hundred foot, under the command of Sir John Carmichael, to prevent or repress any outbreak in that quarter, and a council of barons and ministers to assist him in the government. The appointment of Lennox, however, was declared to be only temporary; and was to be followed by that of Argyle, as permanent governor in the north.

The division under M'Lean, which had done the greatest execution, and suffered the smallest loss during the conflict, still retained their ground; but seeing the day irretrievably lost, they retired in good order from the field, though seven hundred of the retreating Highlanders were slain in the pursuit. In this contest,—generally known in history by the name of the battle of Glenlivet, though sometimes designated as that of Strathaven, Balrinnies,* or Glenrinnies,†—many gentlemen were slain, and a still larger number wounded, on both sides. On the side of Argyle there fell, Campbell of Lochnell, M'Neil of Barra, and about seven hundred of inferior rank; while Huntley lost Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchindown, and many others of his followers, amounting in killed and wounded together to about four hundred and sixty persons.‡

The popish lords, finding themselves reduced to extremity by the desertion of their followers, and by the rigour of the northern winter, which had now set in, implored and obtained the king's permission to depart out of the kingdom, having first given security that they would neither return without his consent, nor engage, during their exile, in any new attempt against the Protestant religion or the peace and liberties of their native country.*

Public tranquillity, which had never ceased to be disturbed since the discovery of the Spanish blanks, was now restored; and the rigour with which the king had at last dealt with the Roman Catholic earls and their supporters, had in a great measure dispelled the jealousy and suspicion with which he had been regarded by his Protestant subjects. Even the ministers of the Kirk were contented, and the pulpits resounded with commendations of his proceedings.† The papists, however, were not without reason deeply dissatisfied; and it could not reasonably be expected that the peace of the country could be permanently secured, so long as the intolerance of the law left to a large section of the community no alternative between renouncing their religion on the one hand, or perpetual exile on the other.

Bothwell, whose multiplied and audacious acts of treason had so long escaped the punishment they deserved, was now reduced to a most abject condition. He was cast off by the English queen, to whom he had lent himself as a tool for the promotion of her nefarious policy; he was deserted by his friends, who, though willing to profit by his success, now selfishly stood aloof from his falling fortunes; and, by his alliance with the popish lords, he had utterly forfeited the confidence of those who had been credulous enough to regard him as a champion of Protestantism, and as a patriot who desired only the common weal. In addition to these calamities, sentence of excommunication, which carried with it the highest civil penalties, was pronounced against him by the Church; he was driven from all his castles and places of shelter or concealment; and was now a wretched fugitive, hunted like a beast of prey, and chased from one quarter of the country to another. At length, after being keenly pursued through the county of Caithness, where he made many hair-breadth escapes, he found means of retiring to France.‡ From France he passed into Spain, and afterwards into Italy, where, having renounced the Protestant faith, he led for many years a life of obscurity and indigence, seeking for solace to his disappointed ambition in the indulgence of dissipation and debauchery. In vain did he attempt to reconcile himself, by the most abject submission, to the king; who, though in general facile and forgiving, continued to cherish the most implacable resentment against him, and refused to listen to any interposition in his favour.* His forfeited estates were divided among Buccleuch, Ker of Cessford, and Lord Home. To the first was assigned the lands of Crichton; to the second, the Abbey of Kelso; and to the third, that of Coldingham.†

The ministers of the Kirk were earnestly desirous that Huntley and his associates, now in exile, should be subjected to the same irretrievable ruin; and laboured to induce the king to alienate their estates, and reduce them to indigence. James, however, from motives of policy, as well as humanity, refused to accede to this unjust and cruel proposal; and the Countesses of Huntley and Errol were permitted to remain in Scotland, while the exiled earls were allowed, at least, a subsistence from their forfeited patrimony. Utterly to exterminate the families of these distinguished noblemen was inconsistent with the policy of James, who was desirous of strengthening his own position by balancing one party against another, and overawing the rivals of the exiled lords by threats of their restoration.

At the same time, the domestic happiness of the monarch was embittered, and his court divided into factions, by a contention with the queen as to the custody of the young prince.

He had been committed by his royal father to the keeping of the Earl of Mar, while the queen warmly insisted that that charge should be devolved upon herself, and importunately demanded possession of the royal infant. In this demand she was supported by the Chancellor Maitland, who was at enmity with Mar, and was now joined by Hamilton, Home, Fleming, Livingstone, Buccleuch, Cessford, and the Master of Glamis. On this point, however, James was inexorable; and he had even been heard to swear that if he were on his death-bed, and unable to utter a word, the last sign he should make would be in token of his will that the prince should remain in the custody of Mar. So far did this contest proceed that, it would appear, Maitland, in conjunction with Buccleuch and Cessford, and with the connivance of the queen, had formed the design of seizing the persons both of the king and the young prince, and impeaching Mar of high treason. This design, however, was frustrated by Maitland himself, who at the last hour shrank from embarking in so dangerous an enterprise; and, through the intervention of the ministers of the Kirk, the queen was at last persuaded to submit to the will of her husband,‡ and a reconciliation was happily effected.

On the 3rd of October, after a lingering illness, died the Chancellor Maitland, Lord Thirstane, one of the ablest Scottish statesmen of this or any preceding period. That could be no ordinary man, who was styled by the great Lord Burghley "the wisest man in Scotland." He had been eminently serviceable both to his sovereign and the country in times of unusual difficulty; he had laboured successfully to preserve amity between the two kingdoms, as well as between the king and the Kirk; and, it is probable, that to his wise counsels the decided measures ultimately adopted by the king against the popish faction were in a large degree attributable. But the vast superiority of his talents overawed all his competitors, and had procured him many enemies, especially among the old nobility, who regarded him as an upstart; and even the king himself, feeling that he had in the chancellor rather a dictator than a councillor, regarded him more with fear than with affection. The death, accordingly, of his great minister occasioned little regret to his royal master, who, though he wrote a poetical panegyric on his memory, was heard to observe that he would in future have no more great men as chancellors, "but such as he could correct, and were hangable."*

The absence of the wise head and vigorous hand that had so long exercised supreme direction and control in every department of the public service was speedily felt. As if the restraints of law had been suddenly removed, the Border districts were distracted by deadly feuds between the Maxwells and Douglasses, wasted and depopulated by spoliation and bloodshed, and harassed by invasions of the English.† The public mind was at the same time agitated by rumours industriously propagated by the ministers of the Kirk, that another powerful Spanish armament was preparing to invade both kingdoms, and that the exiled lords were on the point of returning home to assist in the subversion of the Protestant Church. In these alarming circumstances, James, in compliance with the urgent demands of the ministers of the Kirk, authorised them to assemble the whole population capable of bearing arms for the defence of the country; but while he professed his resolution to make common cause with England in support of the true religion, he peremptorily refused compliance with the request of the ministers to send an ambassador to England, to concert measures with the English government for the defence of both countries against the common enemy.‡ He complained that Elizabeth had broken her promises of pecuniary assistance; that notwithstanding all the proofs he had given of his sincere desire to resist the encroachments of popery, as well as of his own attachment to the Protestant faith, she still regarded him with distrust, and obstinately refused to advance him a farthing, although she knew he was overwhelmed with debts already incurred in his attempts to extirpate popery from his dominions, and to relieve her from all her fears of Spanish machinations. There was good ground for these complaints. He had been encouraged to undertake the expedition against the northern earls and their adherents by the express promise of Elizabeth instantly to supply him with money for the payment of his troops, but that promise had never been fulfilled; on the contrary, Sir Robert Cockburn, the Scottish ambassador, was artfully detained at the English court until the result of the expedition had been ascertained, and then an order which had already been issued for two thousand pounds was recalled and cancelled.* Such mingled meanness and perfidy could not fail to disgust the Scottish monarch, and utterly destroy his confidence in all promises of support on the part of his royal neighbour.

James's financial affairs, which had never been embarrassments. and it became evident that, without some speedy remedy, he must be involved in absolute bankruptcy, and be alike incapable of supporting his dignity as a king, and of carrying on the business of the State. His own want of economy, and the extravagant habits of his queen, had contributed largely to bring about this crisis; but great laxity, moreover, had been allowed to creep both into the levying and disbursement of the public revenue, which had now become quite inadequate to meet the necessary charges of the government. It became, therefore, imperative that a rigid investigation should be made into this department of the public service, and some strong measures adopted at once to meet the present exigency and prevent its recurrence. At this time the Master of Glamis held the office of treasurer; Seton, Laird of Parbreath, that of comptroller; and Douglas, the Provost of Glenclouden, that of collector; and it was believed that, under the protection of the late chancellor, with whom Glamis was on terms of intimate friendship, all of them had grown wealthy at the expense of the royal revenues. Before attempting any reform, therefore, it was deemed necessary to supersede these functionaries. The great power and influence of Glamis rendered him somewhat difficult to deal with; he hesitated to demit his office at the king's desire; and it was not until he had received six thousand pounds as a compensation for its loss, that he reluctantly complied.† The two others were dismissed without ceremony. The entire management of the royal revenues and household was at first committed to the councillors of the queen, Alexander Seton, Lord Urquhart, President of the Session, Mr. John Lindsay, Mr.

James Elphinstone, and Mr. Thomas Hamilton; but as the important trust assigned to these gentlemen was considered too onerous for so small a number, four others were subsequently joined with them,—Walter Stewart, Prior of Blantyre, who was nominated treasurer,* Skene, the Clerk-register, Sir David Carnegie, and Mr. Peter Young, Master Almoner. chequer, but, on account of their number, called by the people Octavians,† were invested with most extraordinary, and even unconstitutional powers. The king bound himself neither to add to their number, nor to supply any vacancy occasioned by death, without the consent of the survivors; and it was decreed that no alienation of any part of the revenue or property of the crown, no grant of a pension, nor order on the Treasury, even though signed by the king himself, should be held valid, unless countersigned by at least five of the commissioners. All their acts and decisions were declared to have the same authority as the judicial sentences of the courts of law; and on their simple warrant, without the intervention of any court, any person might be arrested or his goods distrained. They held their commissions directly and exclusively from the king himself, and were solemnly sworn to respect only the king's "weal and profit,"‡ in all their proceedings. They met daily in the Upper Tolbooth of Edinburgh, and although they acted without salary, they were amply compensated by the enormous power and influence which, through their extensive jurisdiction and the unlimited control they possessed over the public money, speedily passed into their hands. They, in fact, soon engrossed the whole executive power of the State. Forming a distinct and united body, they proved more than an overmatch for the rest of the ministers of the crown, and gradually possessed themselves of every office of honour and emolument. One important office alone, that of chancellor, escaped their rapacity; they had indeed allotted it to the president, but as he was known to be a papist, the king, aware that such an appointment would raise a storm of discontent throughout the country, and especially provoke the keen hostility of the ministers of the Kirk, refused to confirm it. Several of the commissioners, however, thus entrusted with almost unlimited authority, were either known, or supposed to have a leaning to popery, and this had already roused the ever-watchful jealousy, and called forth the ready denunciations of the guardians of the Church. The people viewed with doubt and distrust an irresponsible body of men clothed with a power in some respects superior to that of the sovereign himself, and intercepting the sunshine of the royal favour, which ought freely to fall on the whole body of his subjects; while the courtiers were incensed at finding every avenue to power and preferment blocked up, and the streams of royal liberality at once stinted in their supply and diverted into new channels. Notwithstanding, however, this general discontent, the Octavians continued to maintain their power, and even to acquire some degree of favour by the regularity and economy with which they administered the finances of the kingdom.

During the past year the public mind, both in Scotland and in England, had been kept in a state of constant alarm by vague rumours of renewed preparations on the part of Spain for the invasion of the island. Nor were these apprehensions chimerical: it was now ascertained, beyond a doubt, that Philip was occupied in organizing a powerful armament, destined, it was supposed, for Ireland, from which quarter England could be most conveniently attacked. At this crisis, Elizabeth began to feel the necessity of strengthening the bonds of amity with the Scottish sovereign, which had been not a little relaxed by her own mean and perfidious policy. She accordingly once more dispatched Sir Robert Bowes as her ambassador to Scotland, from which, more than a year before, he had been permitted, at his own earnest request, to return; * the English interest in that country having been, in the interval, entrusted to the care of Mr. George Nicolson, who, from having long acted as secretary to Bowes, had acquired an intimate knowledge of Scottish affairs. Bowes was instructed to assure James of the unalterable friendship of Elizabeth; but to add, that it was impossible for her at present to grant him the smallest pecuniary assistance, as her resources had been drained by the aid she had felt it necessary to give to Henry of France, whose throne had been in jeopardy; by the suppression of the rebellion in Ireland; and still more by the preparations, in which she was at that moment engaged, for the defence of the kingdom, Philip having fitted out for its invasion a more formidable armament than the armada of 1588. James, wisely considering that this was no time to insist on old grievances, received the ambassador with great apparent cordiality, expressed his satisfaction with the preparations of his sister against the threatened invasion, and declared his readiness, if necessary, to put to hazard his crown, his kingdom, and his life in the common cause. He made a delicate allusion, however, to the exhausted state of his own finances, and to the promises, as yet unfilled, which had been made both by Bowes himself and Lord Zouch, in the name of their mistress. He hinted also that the popish party were in no want of gold, and by no means niggard in its distribution; and that he himself had had an opportunity of refusing very large offers, which had been made to him on the part of Spain.

quest of their own country; and calling on them to give up their private animosities, to cultivate the friendship of their neighbours, and to be ready to unite with them in the common cause. It was not to be expected that the ministers of the Kirk would remain silent and unconcerned at such a conjuncture. Shortly after the arrival of Bowes, the General Assembly met in Edinburgh, and earnestly besought the king to adopt the severest proceedings against the Jesuits and excommunicated priests, many of whom still lingered in the country. They strongly remonstrated against the forfeited lords being still permitted to enjoy the revenues of their estates; and demanded that the entire livings of the rebels should be collected by officers appointed by the king for that purpose, and employed in the maintenance of hired soldiers for the defence of the "good cause," and for meeting other charges necessary for its advancement. * The line of policy thus recommended was utterly at variance with that which James was inclined, if not resolved, to pursue. Keeping his eye on the English succession, aware of the odium he had already incurred among the Roman Catholic party in both kingdoms by the intolerant laws to which he had given his consent, and sensible that his succession might be endangered, or at least the tranquillity of both countries most seriously disturbed, by any united opposition of the Roman Catholics at the important crisis in all probability now at no great distance, he was disposed rather to retrace his steps, to mitigate the punishment of the exiled lords, or even to restore them, if that could be done with safety. But, though the advice and remonstrance of the assembly must have been deeply distasteful to him, he dissembled so far as to return a favourable answer, and thus, for the time, to silence the clamours of these importunate counsellors. Some, however, there were who suspected James's sincerity, if they did not penetrate his designs; and mysterious surmises began to be circulated of the restoration of the popish lords, and other projects deemed dangerous to the Kirk. †

While the relations between the king and the more zealous and intolerant of his Protestant subjects were in this uncertain state, and a potent foreign foe was threatening the invasion of the island, an incident occurred, which, though unimportant in itself, had well-nigh compromised the peaceable relations of the two kingdoms. Lord Scrope was at that time the warden of the Western Marches of England, while Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch held a similar office in Liddesdale, the opposite side of the Border. Both were among the bravest and most skilful military leaders of their respective countries, and each had under him a deputy, invested, in the absence of his principal, with equal power and authority. It had long been customary to hold warden courts, as they were called, for the adjustment of trifling disputes between the English and Scotch borderers, as well as for the punishment of outlaws, depredators, and other offenders; and, on such occasions, a truce was proclaimed by sound of trumpet; and, according to the law of the Borders, it was a capital offence for either Scotsman or Englishman to attack even his most deadly enemy from the time of the meeting of the court until sunrise the next morning. A gentleman of the name of Salkeld was at this time the deputy of Lord Scrope, while the deputy of Buccleuch was Scott of Haining, a baron of his own clan; and at one of the warden courts held by these gentlemen, at a place named the Dayholm of Kershope, where a small stream forms the boundary between the two kingdoms, the Scottish deputy was attended by William Armstrong of Kinmont, a daring freebooter, still known in Border tradition under the name of Kinmont Willie. As this person, who was one of the retainers of Buccleuch, and a great favourite with his chief, was riding peaceably home, after the meeting, with three or four companions, along the banks of the Liddel, on the Scottish side of the Border, he was observed by a party of about two hundred English borderers, who rushed towards him in a hostile manner, chased him for several miles, and, finally overtaking him, took him prisoner, and carried him before Mr. Salkeld, the English deputy, by whose orders he was bound to a horse, and conveyed to the Castle of Carlisle. Here he was delivered to the warden, Lord Scrope, who was also governor of the castle, by whom he was loaded with irons, and thrown into prison. Buccleuch wrote immediately to Lord Scrope, complaining of this outrageous violation of border law, and demanding that Armstrong should be set at liberty; but this Scrope refused, alleging that he could not comply with the demand of Buccleuch without an order from the queen in council. Thus repulsed, he next applied to the resident English ambassador, and finally to the king himself, who wrote to Elizabeth demanding Armstrong's liberation. No attention being paid to this last demand, Buccleuch boldly resolved to take the matter into his own hands, and swore that he would fetch Kinmont Willie out of the Castle of Carlisle dead or alive.* To effect this appeared to all an impossibility; and the menace was derided by Scrope and his garrison as an empty boast. however, was in earnest, and immediately set about preparing for his desperate enterprise. Having furnished himself with scalingladders, sledge-hammers, crowbars, and other necessary implements, he assembled two hundred of his bravest followers, well mounted, at Morton Tower, about ten miles from Carlisle, an hour before sunset, on a dark and stormy night in the month of April, and proceeding thence towards Carlisle, he halted in a meadow, close by the brook

Caday, at a short distance from the town. Here he ordered eighty of his men to dismount; and leading them forward himself, they soon reached the bottom of the wall inclosing the outer court of the castle. On applying the scaling-ladders, they were found to be too short; but observing a postern in the wall, they undermined it, and soon effected a breach sufficient for a man to pass, though with difficulty. Twelve of them made their way through, including Buccleuch himself, who was the fifth to enter.* These opened the postern from the inside, and admitted their companions. In an instant the watch, who were too much surprised to make more than a feeble resistance, were overpowered, disarmed, and made prisoners, and Buccleuch and his party found themselves masters of the stronghold. Buccleuch kept watch at the postern, while twenty-four of the assailants proceeded to the castle jail, and, breaking open the door of the cell in which Armstrong was confined, carried him off, fettered as he was, in triumph. As had been previously agreed on, the trumpet was sounded in token of success, and was answered by loud shouts from the rest of the party in the outer court. Lord Scrope and his deputy were both in the castle during these proceedings, but, believing that the place had been assaulted by at least five hundred of the Scots, and that consequently resistance was hopeless, they had never stirred from their chambers; and their prisoner, as he was borne along beneath their windows on the shoulders of his comrades, contemptuously bade them "good night." Having now effected his purpose, Buccleuch ordered the guard to be released, and, as he professed that his sole object had been to vindicate the honour of his sovereign, he prohibited all attempt at spoliation. The garrison being now at liberty, the alarm-bell was rung, and the beacon-fire was lighted on the top of the castle. The inhabitants of the town were summoned to the rescue by the bells of the cathedral and the town-house; and confusion and consternation everywhere prevailed. In the meantime, Buccleuch and his party had rejoined their companions outside the town; and the whole band, without losing a man, found themselves safe within the Scottish border about two hours before sunrise. This gallant and successful exploit excited at the time universal admiration; and, to this day, the story of the bold Buccleuch and Kinmont Willie, and other doughty heroes, who, on this occasion, bearded the English lion in his den, enlivens the fireside of almost every cottage in the Border districts of Scotland.

It may naturally be supposed that the English warden felt deeply mortified when he discovered that his garrison had been surprised and overpowered, and his prisoner, who had been so pertinaciously detained, liberated and carried off before his eyes, by a party of not more than eighty men; but, feigning great indignation at what he termed an "audacious outrage," he wrote immediately to Lord Burghley and the privy council, apprising them of the fact that her majesty's Castle of Carlisle had been attacked by a body of the Scots in time of peace, and urging the queen to demand of the King of Scotland that Buccleuch should instantly be delivered up for punishment. Elizabeth was, or pretended to be, highly indignant, and ordered Bowes to remonstrate in the strongest manner with the Scottish king, and to demand that Buccleuch should be unconditionally placed in her hands, as he had insulted and affronted her beyond endurance. James, who was not disposed to comply with this peremptory demand, replied, that he might, with equal reason, require Lord Scrope, who was the first aggressor, to be delivered up to him; as it was certainly a greater insult unlawfully to seize and imprison one of his subjects, than forcibly to liberate a prisoner who had been unlawfully seized. James was supported in his resistance by the unanimous voice of his privy council, the barons, the ministers of the Kirk, and the whole body of the people, who admired and applauded the bold exploit.* Elizabeth, however, continued to urge her demand with such vehement importunity that James, dreading a positive rupture, at last yielded, and Buccleuch was first imprisoned in the Castle of St. Andrew's,† and afterwards sent to England as a prisoner on parole. Elizabeth was satisfied with this appearance of submission, and, after a brief sojourn, the Scottish warden was permitted to return home.

Some time before this Bowes had written to Lord Burghley, intimating that some popish lords' measures were in contemplation in favour of the exiled lords; that they had determined to petition the king to permit them to return;‡ and that, notwithstanding the anticipated opposition of the ministers of the Kirk, as well as of Elizabeth and Burghley, James had now finally resolved on that bold measure. Information of the king's favourable disposition had been communicated to Huntley and his companions in exile, and, taking encouragement from this, they now ventured to return secretly into Scotland. Huntley, who had taken precedence of the others, landed at Eyemouth, and, passing in disguise through the southern counties of the kingdom, once more joined his friends in the north; who, availing themselves of the present temper of the king, earnestly supplicated permission for Huntley to return, promising that he should reside in whatever part of the country his majesty should be pleased to appoint, and also give security for his peaceable and loyal behaviour. Errol and Angus soon followed; the former having repaired to Huntley's castle at the Bog of Gicht, and the latter to Perth, incognito, from which, so soon as he was discovered, he was expelled by order of the magistrates.*

But however desirous for the restoration of the popish lords, James was too politic to take the whole odium of so unpopular a measure on himself. Accordingly, about the end of August, he summoned a convention of the Estates to meet at Falkland, to deliberate on this important matter, taking care to make such arrangements that none were present except those who were friendly to the excommunicated earls. Among these was Alexander Seton, then president of the session, who, in a premeditated speech, pleaded for the recall of the exiles as a matter of policy; lest, like Coriolanus the Roman, or Themistocles the Athenian, they should unite with the enemy, to the danger or ruin of the country.† Certain of the more moderate and pliant ministers of the Kirk had also been summoned to attend the convention, but all were found to be adverse to the king's design. Nevertheless, in the end, the Estates concluded, that the king and the Kirk being satisfied, it would be proper to call home the exiles, and "that his majesty should hear their offers for that effect."‡

This resolution, which seemed to realise their worst fears, threw the judicatories of the Kirk into a paroxysm of indignation and alarm. The members of a commission appointed by the last General Assembly, directed circular letters to be addressed to all the presbyteries of the kingdom, requiring them to publish anew from their pulpits the act of excommunication against the Catholic lords, and to lay under the same dreadful ecclesiastical censure—without the delays attendant on a formal trial—all persons suspected of being favourable to popery.

In the meantime, the Countess of Huntley, in the name, and by the authority of her husband, presented to the synod of Murray certain offers of reconciliation. She denied that he had, on any occasion during his residence abroad, intrigued with foreigners or others against the Reformed religion, or the estate of his native country; and he offered, she said, if accused, to submit to a legal trial, and, if found guilty, to suffer and underly the censures of the Church, and to submit to such punishment as the king and council should think meet to inflict. Secondly, she offered that he should find security neither to attempt, assist in, nor devise anything, in time coming, tending to the alteration of the religion presently professed within the kingdom; thirdly, that he should banish from his society all Jesuits, seminary priests, and known papists; fourthly, that he was willing to confer with any minister of the Kirk on the subject of religion, and, in the event of his being conscientiously persuaded by valid arguments to renounce the religion he at present professed, he should embrace that of the Reformed Church;

fifthly, he offered, for his better instruction, to receive into his house, and maintain at his own expense, any ordinary presbyterian minister they might please to appoint; sixthly, for better assurance of his sincerity, he would willingly assist the Kirk in the maintenance of their discipline, and in the punishment of vice; and, lastly, he only desired in return that a reasonable time should be allowed him to be satisfied in his conscience, and that, in the meantime, he should be absolved from the sentence of excommunication, and that intercession should be made with his majesty to permit him to live unmolested within the country during the conference.*

These articles were presented on the 19th of October; and, upon the offers thus made on the part of Huntley, the popish earls were suffered by the king to continue in the country, and to retain their own houses and livings until the month of May following.†

Very different, however, was the reception which these offers met with at the hands of the Kirk. They were indignantly rejected as proceeding from an excommunicated traitor, who now added to his other crimes the presumption of proposing terms of accommodation with the Church, that had pronounced a sentence against him which had rendered him liable to the highest penalty of the law.

A contest now arose between the king and the Kirk, which raged for some months between the king with unexampled violence, and the Kirk.

terminated in the temporary overthrow of the presbyterian constitution and discipline, and the reintroduction of episcopacy.‡ This unhappy dispute originated in a misunderstanding between the contending parties regarding the respective limits of the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions; and there cannot be a doubt that by pushing the claims of the Church beyond reasonable limits, the leaders of the Church unintentionally paved the way for the subversion of the presbyterian system.

On the 17th of December, the citizens of Edinburgh, excited by the vehement zeal of Balcanquhall, in an address from the pulpit, rose in arms, and assaulting the Tolbooth, where the king was then in deliberation with some of his privy council, put him in the greatest alarm for his personal safety; and there seems no reason to doubt, although the tumult was altogether unpremeditated, such was the pitch of rage to which the popular mind had been worked up, and such the confusion that prevailed, that the king's life was in actual danger.§ The king, greatly enraged at this insult offered to his authority, next morning, at an early hour, withdrew with his whole court to Linlithgow, and issued a proclamation, which was read by a herald at the Cross of Edinburgh, ascribing the treasonable tumult of the preceding day to the seditious speeches uttered by the factious ministers of Edinburgh from the pulpit, and accusing them of having incited the citizens to take arms, and thereby put his life in jeopardy. He declared that he could no longer consider the capital as a fitting place either for his own residence, or for the holding of the courts of justice; that he had, in consequence, retired from it with his court; and he now discharged, under pain of death, the lords of session, sheriffs, and other judges, from holding their courts in Edinburgh, and commanded them to be in readiness to repair to such other place as should be appointed by a subsequent proclamation. He likewise ordered all persons not ordinarily resident within the city to quit the same, within six hours, under pain of treason.*

This proclamation struck dismay into the hearts of the citizens, who beheld in it the decay of their trade and the ultimate ruin of the capital. The magistrates and town-council made the most humiliating submission, and offered to make most unworthy and degrading concessions, but, for a time, James refused to be pacified. "Fair words," he said, "could not atone for such a fault, but he would come, ere it was long, and let them know he was their king." The council pronounced the tumult to be treason; the whole magistracy were ordered to enter themselves in ward, and stand their trials; and, on account of some trifling informality with regard to their appearance on that occasion, the burgesses were declared rebels, and all the public property of the burgh was confiscated to the crown. Elizabeth now interposed, and wrote a letter to James on behalf of the distressed citizens; and some of the nobles having also interceded for them, his majesty was pleased to recall the courts of law and pardon the town, having first subjected it to a fine of 20,000 marks, imposed several new and heavy burdens on the citizens, and deprived them of the privilege of electing their own magistrates and ministers.†

Shortly before these events, the queen was delivered of a daughter at Dunfermline. She was baptized at Edinburgh on the 28th of November, but without any public solemnity. She was named Elizabeth, after the Queen of England, Bowes, the English ambassador, officiating as the representative of his sovereign. After the ceremony, she was proclaimed by the heralds, under the title of "Lady Elizabeth," the first daughter of Scotland.‡

The late outrage in Edinburgh tended rather to consolidate than to shake the royal authority, and the king, having achieved such an easy victory over the citizens, now resolved to employ his utmost efforts to reduce the power and influence of the clergy, and to bring about such changes in the constitution of the Church as should subject its courts and functionaries to the control of the crown, and for ever set to rest those contentions on the subject of jurisdiction, which had so long disturbed his government and embittered his life. Accordingly, the history of Scotland for some months presents us with few events of public importance, except the proceedings of ecclesiastical courts, the crafty dealings of the king to pave the way for the introduction of prelacy, and the stormy contentions between him and the Kirk.

Amidst all these distracting cares, James found leisure to turn his attention to a project he had much at heart, that of reconciling the popish earls to the Kirk. As a preliminary step, he gave them unequivocally to understand, that he held this as an indispensable condition to their being permitted to remain in the country. He wrote to the Earl of Huntley, informing him that if his conscience would not permit him to accept of this condition he must "look never to be a Scotsman again," and concluded in these peremptory terms:—"Deceive not yourself, to think that by lingering of time your wife and your allies shall ever get you better conditions. I must love myself and my own estate better than all the world; and think not that I will suffer any professing a contrary religion to dwell in this land."* The same conditions were imposed on all the three earls,—that they should acknowledge the Kirk of Scotland to be a true Church, that they should join its communion, submit to its discipline, and subscribe the Confession of Faith; and farther, that they should banish from their society and estates all Jesuits and seminary priests. To these conditions, after some little delay, they professed their assent; and, at a meeting of the General Assembly held at Dundee on the 10th of May, it was agreed that the three earls had fulfilled all the conditions required of them, and might now be absolved from the sentence of excommunication, and received into the bosom of the Church. During these proceedings, however, the accomplices of the popish lords were busily engaged in concocting new plots; and as it was not till after the failure of these that they consented to the conditions imposed on them, there is strong reason to believe that these projects were concerted with their knowledge and consent. This presumption is greatly strengthened by the fact, that not many years afterwards they renounced Protestantism, and were once more reconciled to the Church of Rome. At this very time, it was discovered that Huntley was in close communication with Gordon, a Jesuit, who was labouring to dissuade him from consenting to the prescribed conditions; and a Roman Catholic gentleman, named Hugh Barclay, of Ladyland, in anticipation of a descent of the Spaniards on the west coast of Scotland, had taken possession of the island of Ailsa, a lofty and precipitous rock lying off the coast of Ayrshire, and was employed in fortifying and virtualling the place for their reception. This gentleman had formerly been confined in the Castle of Glasgow, whence he had made his escape and fled to Spain, where he had received the commission on which he now acted as a popish emissary to facilitate the invasion of his native country. His base project, however, was defeated by Mr. Andrew Knox, minister of Paisley, who had performed such good service to his country five years before in apprehending George Kerr, and thus defeating the conspiracy of the Spanish blanks. This martial ecclesiastic, having got notice of Barclay's treasonable attempt, speedily armed himself, and proceeding in a boat to Ailsa with a small party of courageous men, besieged Barclay in his stronghold, who, finding himself unable to hold out, and preferring death to captivity, plunged headlong into the sea and perished.* The failure of this enterprise—probably the ^{The popish} forlorn hope of the popish lords—^{earls reconciled} was followed by their immediate ^{to the Kirk.} reconciliation to the Kirk, and their restoration to their honours and estates. The ceremony took place on Sunday, the 26th of June, in the old kirk of Aberdeen, in presence of noblemen, barons, and people of all ranks; and the following day their reconciliation was publicly proclaimed by a herald, amidst the joyous acclamations of assembled multitudes, who drank their healths, and in the exuberance of their exultation threw their goblets into the air.†

Presbyterianism has ever been regarded with distrust and aversion by the abettors of arbitrary power, against the encroachments of which it has at all times presented a formidable barrier; and the spirit of democracy, to which it is undoubtedly favourable, was in this age powerfully sustained and cherished by the university. To this, therefore, as well as to the Kirk, James now ^{Attack on the} began to direct his attention; and ^{University of} while he steadily, but cautiously, ^{St. Andrew's.} pursued his great project for overturning the constitution of the Reformed Church, he made a more open and direct attack on the University of St. Andrew's, which, under the principalship of the learned, able, and indomitable Andrew Melvil, was believed to be a perfect hotbed of democracy. A strict investigation into the proceedings at this ancient seat of learning was accordingly ordered, and, though many complaints and accusations were made against its venerable principal, no culpable act could be proved against him.‡ Notwithstanding this, he was deprived of his rectorship, which was conferred on Mr. George Gladstones, minister of St. Andrew's, and appointed instead Dean of the Faculty of Theology. At the same time, many new orders and laws were introduced; the professors were enjoined to adopt a prescribed mode of teaching; and it was ordained that no masters or professors of the university, or doctors of divinity, should be allowed to sit in the presbytery on matters of discipline.* A special council was also appointed to manage the financial affairs of the university, and a more rigid economy in the disposal of its rents was introduced.

James had been so long and so arduously occupied with the affair of the popish lords and other cares of government, that many matters of internal policy had been comparatively neglected; and he seemed now resolved, by a vigorous effort, to consolidate his power, and convince all ranks of his subjects of his determination and ability henceforward to rule them with a firm hand. In no part of his dominions had the evils resulting from his hitherto feeble and vacillating administration been so severely felt as on the Borders, which were now reduced to a condition approaching to anarchy. Ruthless and lawless rapine everywhere prevailed; might was substituted for right—life and property were alike insecure. James now planned and conducted an expedition into the disturbed districts; succeeded in capturing fourteen of the most noted offenders, who were instantly hanged; apprehended and brought prisoners to Edinburgh thirty-six of the principal barons, who had countenanced these violations of law and order; and appointed Lord Ochiltree as his lieutenant and warden in that part of the kingdom.

This year was distinguished by the occurrence of a natural phenomenon, happily rare in Scotland, or in any part of the island. On the 23rd of July,

Earthquake between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, the whole northern counties of the kingdom were shaken by an earthquake,† which, although it does not appear to have been attended with any of those dreadful disasters which in less favoured regions frequently result from these appalling convulsions, cast a gloom over the minds of men by whom its causes were not understood, and was regarded by the superstitious as a portent of some approaching national calamity. About the same time, the capital and its neighbourhood were visited by a destructive agent still more alarming—the plague, whose ravages drove many of the inhabitants from the town, and did not abate until towards the end of autumn.‡

But, in the midst of real evils, the mind of James was engrossed with others, which were probably in the present instance only imaginary. He was haunted by the fear of witches and sorcerers,

Renewed proceedings against whose numbers, it was reported, were alarmingly on the increase; witches.

and he once more embarked in a crusade against these emissaries of the prince of darkness. On this, as on a former occasion, many unfortunate creatures suspected of this mysterious crime were seized and put to the torture, in order to extort confessions, which were expected to minister to a diseased curiosity by exposing the secrets of "Satan's invisible world." In the course of these investigations an unhappy woman, named Margaret Aitkin, upon whom suspicion had fallen, was, among others, apprehended, and, amid the agonies of the torture to which she was subjected, confessed herself guilty. On being further interrogated, she named certain individuals as her accomplices, declared that she knew a witch at one glance by a particular mark in the eye; and offered, on promise of her life being spared, to assist, by means of this knowledge, in ridding the country of the whole hellish sisterhood. Unfortunately she was believed, and her offer accepted; for several months she was carried through the country; all she accused were apprehended, and numbers of women, in different parts of the kingdom, but particularly at Glasgow, were, on little or no other evidence of their guilt, condemned and put to death at the stake. At last, suspicion of deception having arisen, some experiments were instituted with a view of testing the reality of this wonderful power of recognition, when the horrible discovery was made that the whole was an imposture. A woman, in whose countenance she pretended to have discovered the fatal marks, was, after the lapse of a short time, again brought before her in a different dress, and at once declared innocent. A similar trial of her skill was made again and again with the like result; and the wretched creature, on being charged with the shocking fraud, fell on her knees and implored mercy, confessing that the fear of torture had first induced her to accuse herself, and the dread of a violent and painful death had led her to adopt the fiendish expedient of accusing others. She adhered to this confession at her trial, and repeated it at the stake, to which she was sentenced, admitting, without reservation, that all her accusations, both of herself and others, were groundless falsehoods. Horror-struck by this disclosure, the king recalled the commission of inquiry he had appointed to proceed against the witches, and ordered the immediate liberation of all who had been apprehended on the charge of witchcraft, excepting such as had made voluntary confession of their guilt, whom he directed to be detained until the mode of their trial should be determined by the Estates in parliament.*

At this period Scotland enjoyed a degree of tranquillity to which for some years it had been a stranger; and the king, freed from a multitude of harassing cares by which his time and attention had been absorbed, had now leisure steadily to direct his mind to a subject of such importance that, for a time, it engrossed his thoughts, to the exclusion of almost every other matter of public policy. This was no other than his right of succession to the English throne, which it was evident, from the advanced age and increasing infirmities of Elizabeth, could not much longer be occupied by that great princess. His title was beyond a doubt, but had nevertheless recently become matter of dispute. It had been questioned and discussed in the English parliament; it had been assailed by various competitors, who were actually intriguing to establish their pretensions; and more than one publication had appeared in England claiming the succession for the Infanta of Spain. In addition to these causes of uneasiness, the king had the mortification to find that he had, by his treatment of the popish lords, lost the confidence both of the Roman Catholics and the Kirk. To the former it appeared unjust, intolerant, and unmerciful; to the latter lax, impolitic, and betraying either an entire absence of principle, or a secret leaning towards popery. There were thus two parties, formidable both from their numbers and their influence, each ready to support the cause of any pretender professing a thorough devotion to its own exclusive and illiberal policy. All these circumstances concurred to throw a shade of uncertainty over his succession, that kept the mind of James in a state of nervous anxiety, which was greatly heightened by the mysterious and obstinate silence still maintained by Elizabeth on this delicate subject, though she was actually applied to by other competitors, who were busily intriguing to advance their respective pretensions. James omitted no precaution for strengthening his position. With this view he dispatched extraordinary ambassadors to the Protestant princes of Germany, to many of whom he was allied by marriage, in order to demonstrate to them the legality of his title; to secure their aid against any competitor who might venture to dispute his just claim; and, in the meantime, to move them to send a joint embassy to the English queen, requesting her to name her successor. These princes fully acknowledged the justness of his title, and readily promised their assistance in case of need, but declined sending the desired embassy. James next instructed Edward Bruce, Abbot of Kinloss, his ambassador at the English court, to solicit Elizabeth to recognise his title by some public act; and thus, by at once and for ever putting an end to all uncertainty on this important matter, avert from her subjects the calamities usually attendant on a disputed succession. All Bruce's efforts, however, failing to extort from Elizabeth any satisfactory answer, he was directed to address himself cautiously to the leading men amongst the nobility, and labour to gain them over to his master's cause. In this mission he was more successful, many nobles of the highest rank having unreservedly pledged themselves to support the claims of the Scottish king, in opposition to those of any pretender. As a last resource, James appealed to the great body of the people, through the medium of the press. Many books and pamphlets, containing attacks on the validity of James's title, had been written, and had obtained extensive circulation, especially in England. To counteract the prejudicial effects of these publications, he employed and encouraged learned men to write in his favour on this question; and the country was speedily inundated with ingenious disquisitions on the law of succession, and the results of laborious genealogical investigations. But whatever might be the value of these performances, a still deeper impression was made on the popular mind by the numerous works which now issued from the press, setting forth the advantages which might be expected to accrue to both kingdoms from the union of the two crowns in the same line of sovereigns. Nothing, perhaps, evinced so strongly the intense anxiety of James to fortify his title at every point, than an absurd attempt to vindicate the memory of his mother from imputations which had been cast upon her. The great English poet, Spenser, had been supposed, probably without reason, to allude to Mary under the character of Duessa, in his "Faërie Queene," and James had the almost incredible folly and indiscretion to direct his secretary of state to demand that the poet should be severely punished.

On the 16th of November, the English ambassador, Sir Robert Bowes, who had so long acted a conspicuous, and, in many instances, not a very creditable part at the Scottish court, expired at Berwick, worn out with the incessant cares and anxieties of his arduous office. He was succeeded by Sir William Bowes, who, shortly afterwards, arriving in Scotland, was admitted to an audience, during which James complained, with some acrimony, of a want of confidence on the part of his royal sister, of her readiness to give credence to every false rumour regarding him, and of the harshness and severity of her remonstrances. He vindicated the steps he had taken with a view to establish his title to the succession, and declared that his desire to maintain amicable relations with England remained unabated.* Elizabeth, however, entertained great doubts of the sincerity of this declaration. Her temper, naturally suspicious, was now aggravated by the infirmities of advancing years, and was kept in a state of still greater exasperation by the representations of Nicolson, her agent in Scotland, who, during the declining health of Sir Robert Bowes, had been entrusted with the management of the English interest in that country. Various circumstances had occurred which appeared to justify a suspicion that the sentiments of the Scottish court, with respect to the sister country, had undergone an unfavourable change. The Secretary Elphinstone, who stood high in the confidence of the king, was believed to be unfriendly to England; the Countess of Huntley, an avowed and bigoted papist, was on such a footing of cordial intimacy with the queen, that they frequently occupied the same bed;† while the education of the two young princesses was committed to the care of Lady Livingston, also a Roman Catholic. The jealousy of Elizabeth being thus excited, she was in a fit frame of mind to listen with credulity to almost any accusation against the King of Scots; and it was not long ere a mysterious story was got up, which, although altogether incredible, had well-nigh issued in a real estrangement, if not in an open rupture between the two sovereigns. From some motive, which does not very clearly appear, an obscure individual, named Valentine Thomas, had the audacity to accuse James to the English government of having engaged him in a conspiracy against the life of Elizabeth; and this absurd charge, if not fully believed, produced such an impression on the mind of the English queen, that she thought it expedient to submit the matter to a solemn investigation by Sir Edward Coke, Sir Francis Bacon, and other eminent lawyers. Filled with indignation at the importance attached to an accusation so obviously false and calumnious that it ought at once to have been dismissed, and immediately followed by the punishment of the villain who had dared to prefer it, James demanded the fullest and most searching inquiry, and the infliction of the severest vengeance of the law on his vile accuser. Elizabeth, now alarmed by the serious consequences of her imprudent credulity, wrote to James with her own hand, disclaiming all belief in so scandalous an imputation on the honour of her royal brother, declaring that she was not "of so viperous" a nature as to entertain such a thought against him, and promising that the author of the audacious calumny should be punished as he deserved.* James, however, who naturally dreaded the prejudice which such an accusation, so publicly made and so solemnly entertained, might excite against him among the people of England, was not so easily pacified. He insisted that the allegations of Thomas should be cancelled by a public and formal disavowal on the part of Elizabeth; and he did not rest until this was obtained.

Amidst all these transactions, James did not lose sight of the great object of overturning the constitution of the Church, and establishing his favourite system of episcopacy. He had artfully prevailed on the commissioners appointed by the last General Assembly to complain to the Parliament that the Church was the only great institution in the kingdom that was not represented in the national council, and to petition that a certain number of the clergy should be admitted to a share in the legislature. On the 19th of December a parliament was held, at which this claim was discussed; and the Estates, acting under the influence of the king, decreed—"That such pastors as his majesty should invest with the office of bishop, abbot, or other prelate, should have the same right to vote in parliament as ecclesiastics had in former time; and that all vacant bishoprics, or such as might become vacant, should be only given to actual preachers or ministers, or to persons who were fit to fulfil, and would pledge themselves to perform, the duties of the office." With a view, however, to prevent alarm on the part of the clergy, a clause was added, remitting to the General Assembly to consult, and, in conjunction with his highness, to determine what spiritual power and jurisdiction the new order of bishops should exercise in the Church. This act went far towards accomplishing James's long-cherished purpose; but it was not until the 28th of March, 1600, that presbyterianism was finally subverted, and prelacy formally established, by a General Assembly held at Montrose.

James now took advantage of a season of comparative tranquillity to turn his attention to the condition of the Highlands and isles. These remote districts of the country had long been in a most anomalous state. Though forming a portion of the kingdom of Scotland, and nominally subject to the royal authority, they were in reality governed by native chiefs, each exercising an independent and hereditary sway over his own sept, the members of which yielded him a ready and affectionate obedience. These petty leaders had recently become united under the conduct of one powerful chieftain, Donald Gorm Macdonald, who, assuming the proud title of Lord of the Isles of Scotland, and Chief of the Clandonnel Irishmen, had the boldness to open up a communication with the Queen of England, offering, on "reasonable motives and considerations," to devote himself to her service, and shake off all allegiance to the Scottish king. Nor was this all; he declared that he and the numerous chiefs who had ranged themselves under his banner were able and ready, if her majesty so pleased, to excite rebellion throughout the whole kingdom of Scotland. Elizabeth does not appear to have seriously listened to these proposals; but it was evident that such a state of matters could not with safety be permitted to continue. The difficulty was to determine what should be done. Many different projects had been suggested, considered, found impracticable, and abandoned. At one time, James had it in contemplation to put himself at the head of a numerous army, and, supported by a powerful fleet, to enter the territories of these semi-barbarians, and compel them to respect his authority; but the difficulty of making head against savage tribes, entrenched behind inaccessible mountain fortresses, and scattered throughout numerous islands, surrounded by stormy and unfrequented seas, appeared so great, that the enterprise was never undertaken. Nor did the scheme of sending a deputy, invested with royal authority, appear, on mature consideration, more feasible; although it had proceeded so far, that the Duke of Lennox had been twice appointed to that honourable and important post.* At last, a remarkable and somewhat ingenious expedient was devised for the gradual introduction of civilization and order among these turbulent and unmanageable hordes. This was to colonize with lowland noblemen and gentlemen, and their agricultural assistants and dependents, under the protection of the crown, two of the principal islands of the Hebrides. With this view, a company of barons, mostly belonging to the county of Fife, was formed for the purpose of occupying and cultivating the Isle of Lewis; and another, composed of noblemen and gentlemen in the Lothians, for taking possession of the Isle of Skye. These associations obtained leases from the crown of the islands which they had respectively selected as the field of their operations. The conditions were that they should, after seven years' possession, pay to the king an annual rent of 140 chalders of victual, and that they should conquer their farms at their own charges. In anticipation of opposition from the natives, a force of 600 soldiers was provided to accompany them; and, thus fortified, the whole colony proceeded to take possession of their island territory. They had no sooner arrived than they had to encounter the hostility of the inhabitants, and, instead of commencing the peaceable pursuits of agriculture, had to fight for their very existence. The contest was maintained for some time with the greatest fury, but at length the colonists, having formed an alliance with some of the native chiefs, their assailants were no longer able to cope with them in the open field. Still the islanders were as far as ever from making peace with their Saxon invaders. They harassed, plundered, and assassinated them on every opportunity; until at last, after the lapse of a few years, worn out with incessant disquietude, obstructed in the pursuits of industry, and thinned by disease, famine, and slaughter, the colony could no longer maintain its existence. The principal gentlemen belonging to it were made prisoners, and were only liberated on condition of their giving up all claim to the land they had occupied, and taking an oath never to return.†

It is difficult to characterise the government of Scotland at this period. Theoretically it was far removed from what in modern times we are accustomed to regard as a simple despotism. The fundamental laws of the realm were enacted by the Estates in parliament, and were held to be equally binding on the prince and the people. Still the power and prerogatives of the crown were far from being strictly defined, and consequently it was no uncommon occurrence to find the will of the monarch expressed either by private warrant or public proclamation, possessing all the validity of established law, and enforced even with more stringent severity. It was at once the fault and the misfortune of James, and of all the race of monarchs to which he belonged, to be ever inclined to stretch this elastic prerogative to an extent utterly inconsistent with public liberty; while, at the same time, the genius of the people over whom they ruled was equally incompatible with arbitrary government.

Two instances occurred at this time, in which James had the mortification to find his will successfully checked and resisted by the administrators of the law, and which, it has been well observed, "had he been accustomed to watch such political indications, might have been full of warning and instruction."* A criminal, who had been arrested by order of the magistrates of Edinburgh, was rescued by a gentleman of the king's household, and set at liberty. A prosecution was instituted by the civil authorities against the courtier, who was in the first instance so leniently dealt with that he was simply compelled to promise to deliver up the culprit to justice. Failing, however, to perform his engagement, the magistrates had him apprehended and committed to prison. James, who seems to have taken this as an affront to himself, commanded the magistrates to set his attendant at liberty. This mandate, however, they declined to obey; and a more peremptory order, which was instantly issued, was met by an equally prompt and peremptory refusal. They professed their readiness to resign their offices, if required, into the hands of the king, but declared that so long as they remained in office they would do their duty. James had the penetration to see that to pursue this altercation further would only be to incur additional mortification. He smothered his indignation, and allowed the municipal authorities to deal with the courtier as with a common offender.† The other instance was of a much graver character, being no less than an attempt on the part of the king to overrule the decisions of the supreme court of the kingdom. Mr. Robert Bruce, one of the ministers of the Kirk, having been deprived of his stipend by an order from the king, raised an action against the crown for its restitution before the court of session, and obtained judgment in his favour. Against this judgment the king entered an appeal, appeared in court in person, pleaded his own cause with great warmth, and concluded by commanding the judges to reverse their decision. To their honour, however, they boldly asserted their independence, and maintained the supremacy of the law. Sir Alexander Seton, the president of the court, rising from his chair, thus addressed the monarch:—"My liege, it is my part to speak first in this court, of which your highness has made me head. You are our king; we, your subjects, bound and ready to obey you from the heart, and, with all devotion, to serve you with our lives and substance: but this is a matter of law, in which we are sworn to do justice according to our conscience and the statutes of the realm. Your majesty may indeed command us to the contrary, in which case I, and every honest man on this bench, will either vote according to conscience, or resign and not vote at all." Lord Newbattle, another of the judges, next rose and remarked, "that it had been spoken in the city, to his majesty's great slander, and theirs who were his judges, that they dared not do justice to all classes, but were compelled to vote as the king commanded—a foul imputation, to which the lie that day should be given; for they would now deliver a unanimous opinion against the crown." Accustomed to the flattery and obsequiousness of his courtiers, including some of the proudest of the ancient nobility, and not unused to the subserviency even of parliament itself, James was wholly taken by surprise to find such steadfast resistance to his will on the part of men whom he himself had placed in their present dignified position, and whom it would be no great stretch of power to deprive of office. He made one effort more to induce them to comply with his wishes, and in a prolonged and vehement harangue exhausted all his powers of persuasion, and had the meanness even to descend to taunts and menaces. All, however, was unavailing. With only two dissentient voices, the judges affirmed their original decision; and the king, in a paroxysm of rage, rushed out of court, muttering vengeance against these obstinate ministers of the law.*

James was now once more distracted by pecuniary embarrassments. The Occasionalists, who had managed his financial affairs with signal ability and success, unable to maintain their ground against the envy and enmity of the other courtiers, and weakened by disunion amongst themselves, had some time before resigned their invidious functions; and the care of the royal revenues had in consequence been devolved upon others, by whom they were neither collected with the same diligence, nor administered with the same frugality. Meantime James's own profuse habits, his lavish gratuities to his favourites, and the ruinous extravagance of his queen and household, had concurred in bringing matters to an alarming crisis, and had reduced him to a condition alike incompatible with his own dignity and the safety of the State. It was in vain to apply to Elizabeth, whose repeated violation of her promises of assistance had already disappointed and disgusted him, and whose niggard parsimony left him nothing to hope for the future. In this exigency he was led once more to dally with the popish party, in the hope that by resuming friendly intercourse with them, and indirectly flattering their expectations, some aid might be tendered him in the shape of Spanish or Roman gold. This apparent tendency towards Romanism alarmed Sir Robert Cecil, who had succeeded his father, the great Lord Burghley, recently deceased, in the office of English secretary of state, and had for some time taken the principal management of the English interest in Scotland. There were many circumstances, indeed, calculated to excite a suspicion that James had cooled in his attachment to the Reformed Church. His principal secretary of state, the president of the court of session, and Lord Livingstone, the governor of the young princesses, were all Roman Catholics; and Huntley, whose sincerity, notwithstanding his reconciliation with the Kirk, was still strongly suspected, stood high in his confidence.* These and other circumstances were all esteemed by Cecil as symptoms of declension, and did not fail to excite serious apprehensions in Elizabeth and her ministers. These alarms, however, appear to have been groundless. All this apparent leaning towards popery was the result of James's deplorable poverty, which had now reached such an alarming crisis, that it was with the utmost difficulty he could get any of his ministers to accept the office of lord high treasurer. Even so insignificant a matter as the expenses attendant on the baptism of the Princess Margaret, which took place at this time, was found too much for the royal resources; and these charges were actually paid by the lords of the bedchamber out of their own private pockets.†

A transaction which came to light at this time tended to confirm all Elizabeth's suspicions of the king's defection. James accused James, it appears, had written a letter to Pope Clement VIII., in which, after many expressions of regard, he promised to treat the Roman Catholics with greater indulgence, professed a desire to have a resident minister at the court of Rome, and requested that Drummond, Bishop of Vaison, a Scotchman, should be appointed a cardinal. The restless and intriguing Master of Gray, who had been for some time in Italy, apparently acting as a spy for the English court, had procured a copy of this letter, and transmitted it to Elizabeth; and as she had previously received some information regarding this correspondence from another source, she could entertain no doubt of its reality. Elizabeth was, notwithstanding, scarcely prepared for such a discovery, and she instantly dispatched Bowes to the Scottish court, with instructions to inquire fully into the matter, and to reproach James with his inconsistent and disingenuous conduct. James heard the accusation with unfeigned astonishment, confidently denied all knowledge of the letter, and pronounced the whole story a vile calumny, devised by his enemies in order to throw suspicion on his sincerity with respect to religion, and damage his reputation with the Protestants of England. His secretary, Elphinstone, made a similar disavowal of the obnoxious document, and at once pronounced it to be a forgery. A dark shade of uncertainty was thus left on the whole affair; but some years afterwards an accidental circumstance occurred, which brought to light the secret history of this singular production. James had published a controversial treatise, in which he exposed some of the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome; and Cardinal Bellarmine, who undertook to reply, produced and published the identical letter in dispute, in proof that James had once entertained opinions respecting the Romish religion very different from those for which he now contended. It was impossible for James to allow an imputation by which his own honour was so seriously compromised to pass unnoticed; and Elphinstone, on being interrogated, admitted that he had surreptitiously introduced the letter among other papers requiring the royal signature, and the king, having no suspicion of the deceit, had, without being aware of the contents of the paper, signed it along with the others. He protested, however, that his only motive was his zeal for the king's service. His object was to conciliate the Roman Catholic party, and, by leading them to look forward to the enjoyment of greater toleration and indulgence under the government of the king, to obviate all opposition on their part to his accession on the demise of the Queen of England. For this offence, however, he was arraigned on a charge of treason, found guilty, and condemned to death; but, on the intercession of the queen, received the royal pardon.* Elphinstone's account, notwithstanding the danger and distress which it had brought upon him, was far from being universally believed. It was suspected that, to save his master's honour, he had sacrificed his own, as well as hazarded his life. "It is not likely," says a contemporary historian, "that he would have been so forward for the advancement of the king to the crown of England if the king himself had not been privy to it, yea, an urger of it; howbeit after, when he was troubled (to procure the king's favour), he did cast this cloak upon it."† Be this as it may, it is certain that, with a view to the English succession, James was at this time labouring to gain the confidence and affection of the Roman Catholics; and, in this way, incurred the heavy suspicion of Elizabeth, who kept an anxious and watchful eye over his conduct.

During this year, James signalised himself as an author by the publication of a treatise on government, the fruit of some years' previous study at intervals of leisure from the cares of the State. This work, entitled "Basilicon Doron," was addressed to his son Prince Henry, for whose instruction it had been drawn up, and does not appear to have been originally intended for general perusal. The prince was yet an infant, but such was the anxiety of James that his son should receive this royal gift, even if he himself should not survive to present it, that he caused seven copies of it to be privately printed, each of which he committed to the care of some confidential person, under strict injunctions of secrecy. It so happened, however, that one of the gentlemen of his household, Sir James Sempil, who had been employed in transcribing it for the press, showed it to Mr. Andrew Melvil, who, taking exception to certain passages relating to the Kirk, procured copies of them, and, without communicating the name of the author, submitted them to the consideration of the presbytery of St. Andrew's. The Kirk was speedily in a ferment; the passages contained an attack on the presbyterian form of church government; the Reformation itself was denounced as the offspring in part of "popular tumult and rebellion, of such as were blindly doing the work of God, but clogged with their own passions and particular respects." The authorship could not be concealed; and James perceiving the storm he had raised, and imagining that the detached passages, which had given such offence, might be explained or modified by other parts of the work, ordered the publication of the whole treatise.

In point of literary merit, it is admitted that the "Basilicon Doron" is a respectable production, and not inferior to most of the works which appeared in that age. With respect to the political doctrines it inculcates, and the sentiments it expresses regarding the Reformation and the Presbyterian Church, not merely different, but diametrically opposite opinions have been entertained from the time of its production up to the present day. By the abettors of despotic government, and the advocates of prelacy, it has been lauded as a masterpiece of political sagacity and ecclesiastical wisdom; while the friends of constitutional government and the independence of the Church, have justly regarded it as the most direct and undisguised defence of unlimited kingly power over all matters, spiritual and temporal. According to Archbishop Spottiswood, the impression it produced in England was highly favourable to James, and contributed more to reconcile the people to his succession than all the dissertations that had been published on that subject. High expectations of national happiness and prosperity were entertained under the rule of a prince who had evinced so much wisdom and piety, and such paternal solicitude for the welfare of his subjects.* Very different were the sentiments which this piece of royal authorship excited among his subjects in Scotland. Though their notions of public liberty and of the necessary limitations on the royal prerogative were not very strictly defined, the genius of the people had ever been essentially free; and this native instinct, while it probably contributed to the establishment of that peculiar form of church polity to which they were so much attached, was in turn fostered by it. Presbyterianism has always been,

and, from its very nature, must ever be, in antagonism with arbitrary power. The publication, accordingly, of a work by the sovereign, in which he inculcates upon his son, the heir-apparent to the throne, principles of unmitigated despotism, and labours to excite his aversion to the men who were regarded as the ornaments and champions of the national Church, could not fail to rouse strong feelings of indignation and alarm. The ministers of the Kirk were exasperated to the highest pitch when they found their most distinguished brethren stigmatised in such terms as these:—"Take heed, therefore, my son, to such Puritans, very pests in the Church and commonweal, whom no deserts can oblige, neither oaths nor promises bind; breathing nothing but sedition and calumnies, aspiring without measure, ruling without reason; and making their own imaginations (without any warrant of the word) the square of their conscience. I protest before the great God,—and, since I am here as upon my testament, it is no place for me to lie in,—that ye shall never find with any Highland or Border thieves greater ingratitude, and more lies, and vile perjuries, than these fanatic spirits." The dangers to which the Kirk and the nation appeared to be exposed were sought to be averted by humiliation and prayer. A general fast was proclaimed, and observed for the unusual period of two days, with a solemnity that struck the English ambassador with astonishment and awe.* On this occasion, the ministers, in their addresses from the pulpit, expatiated, with all their ancient license, on the state of the nation. They lamented that the enemies of the Church, who had been driven into exile, were now permitted to return; they openly censured the king as the calumniator of the Kirk, and a favourer of popery, as was manifest by his committing the education of his children to the care of an excommunicated papist; and they denounced the declension of the nobility in sending their sons to be instructed abroad, whence many of them returned either atheists or Roman Catholics.†

At this crisis the apprehensions of the ministers of the Kirk were strengthened, and the jealousy of the English queen once more roused, by the arrival of a French ambassador at the Scottish court. This event, sufficient of itself to cause uneasiness to the Protestant party, was attended by circumstances which gave rise to the gravest suspicions of some popish intrigue in which James himself was an accomplice. The ambassador, though a papist, was received with marked cordiality; he had brought with him a Jesuit, who was admitted to repeated private interviews with the king; and, above all, he was allowed openly to exercise all the superstitious observances of the Romish Church. Even the prescribed mass itself, which, in less tolerant times, it was death to celebrate, had been once more set up, to the great grief and scandal of every true son of the Kirk.

The heart-burnings arising from these causes were just beginning to subside, in Alarm at the arrival of the departure of the ambassador and English actors. his companion, when an occurrence of a very different nature gave a new direction to the fiery zeal of the ministers of the Kirk. This was no other than the arrival of a company of comedians from England, at the special invitation of the king, who took great pleasure in theatrical representations, and had granted them a license to enact plays within the capital. Whatever diversity of opinion may now exist as to the moral influence of such entertainments, it is certain that they were viewed by the early fathers of the Kirk, and probably by the more rigid members of their flocks, with extreme abhorrence. Accordingly, the appearance of a company of play-actors, men who, in addition to their obnoxious profession, were at this period generally openly licentious and profligate in their lives, was followed by a fresh outburst of clerical alarm; the kirk sessions prohibited attendance on theatrical performances under pain of ecclesiastical censure; and the magistrates of the city, acting in accordance with the earnest exhortations of the clergy, issued a proclamation containing a similar prohibition under civil penalties. James was highly offended by these interdictions, which, by annulling his license, he considered a direct encroachment on his royal prerogative. He summoned the provost and town-council before him, and compelled them to withdraw their prohibition. He caused proclamation to be made that the actors should proceed with their performances; and ordered the ministers to announce from their pulpits on the following Sunday that the people were at liberty to attend the "comedies and plays," without incurring the censures of the Church. The ministers at first showed a disposition to resist this mandate; but, afraid to risk the consequences of a fresh contest with the king, they at last yielded a reluctant compliance.

Towards the close of this year, an association was formed for the purpose of General "band" aiding the king in securing his on the succession.

According to the fashion of the times, a band or covenant was entered into, "purporting to be made by the good subjects of the king's majesty, for the preservation of his person, and the pursuit of his undoubted right to the crown of England and Ireland."* This confederacy, there was reason to believe, originated in a suggestion of the king himself, who continued in a state of feverish anxiety on the subject of his succession; and he hoped to be able to manage the matter with such secrecy, that no intimation of it should reach the English queen, to whom there was reason to fear it would be peculiarly offensive. "Princes," however, according to Elizabeth's own saying, "have long ears:" Nicolson had found means to penetrate the secret, and, on the 27th of November, wrote thus to Cecil:—"I hear, which I beseech your honour to keep close, that there is a general band subscribed by many, and to be subscribed by all earls, lords, and barons, binding them by solemn vow and oath to serve the king with their lives, friends, heritages, goods, and gear, and to be ready, in warlike furniture, for the same, on all occasions, but especially for his claim to England."* In a parliament which was convened in the following month, it was expected that some measure would be adopted for replenishing the king's exchequer, to enable him to arm his subjects, if necessary, in vindication of his title; but the appeal which he made to them was listened to with coldness, and answered by delay; and various schemes of taxation which he proposed, and which were remarkable for their simplicity and moderation, were warmly discussed and finally rejected. To James's honour it should be recorded, that in all these expedients for raising money—of which he stood lamentably in need—he evinced an evident desire to press lightly on the less opulent classes of his subjects, and was ready to abandon his most favourite plans if any less burdensome could be proposed.† But though he had employed extraordinary and even unconstitutional means to bend this parliament to his purpose, all he could obtain from them was a general assurance, that when he should find it necessary to have recourse to arms, they would take care that, in accordance with an act passed two years before, the country should be furnished with munitions of war.‡

At this time, an act of permanent importance was passed by the king with the concurrence of his secret council. Previously to this period, the Scottish year had commenced on the 25th of March. It was now ordained that, in all time coming "the first day of the year should begin on the 1st of January." The statute was appointed to take effect "upon the first day of January next to come, which shall be the first day of January, 1600."§

Amidst the comparative tranquillity which Scotland at this period enjoyed, there occurred one of the darkest and most mysterious events in Scottish history. This was the affair commonly termed the Gowrie Conspiracy. Its author was the grandson of Patrick Lord Ruthven (who was so deeply implicated in the atrocious murder of Riccio), and the son of William, first Earl of Gowrie, the associate of Lord Lindsay in extorting from the unhappy Mary the surrender of her crown at Lochleven, and who was ultimately found guilty of treason, and executed at Stirling, in 1584.* King James, however, after the downfall of the infamous Arran, restored the title and estates to Gowrie's eldest son, and treated the whole family with the greatest kindness. Two of the daughters he placed in the suite of his consort; others he married to influential noblemen—one, in particular, to the Duke of Lennox, his most favoured courtier.

The young earl dying soon after the restoration of the family honours was succeeded by his brother John, the author of the conspiracy, who manifested at a very early age the hereditary disposition of his race to engage in perilous intrigues and enterprises. In 1594 he was implicated in the plots of the popish earls, mainly, it is supposed, through the influence of his brother-in-law, the Earl of Atholl; but the offence was either unknown to the king, or was overlooked by him on account of Gowrie's extreme youth. Having received the royal license to complete his education abroad, the earl, along with his younger brother Alexander, passed into Italy, and studied for five years with great distinction at the University of Padua. Like his father and grandfather, he was addicted to the study of the pretended science of magic, for which Italy was then famous, and he was also a dabbler in chemistry and judicial astrology. On leaving the continent in 1599, he passed through England, where he was received by Elizabeth with flattering distinction, and, it is said, was even allowed by her a guard to watch over his safety. It is probable that these attentions, acting upon a mind naturally ambitious and proud, inspired the youthful earl with a lofty notion of his own power and importance; and, combined with the desire to revenge his father's death, induced him to form a conspiracy against the person of his sovereign.

On the return of the earl to Scotland, in May, 1600, he was received with every mark of popular favour. His entry into the capital took place amidst a brilliant retinue of friends and dependents, and great crowds of the citizens went out to welcome his approach. His handsome countenance and graceful manners soon rendered him a special favourite of the queen; while his learning and scholarship made him equally acceptable to the king, who often conversed with him on strange and abstruse subjects.† It speedily became apparent, however, that Gowrie had no intention of becoming a courtier, or of looking to the royal favour for promotion. The mind of James was, at this time, almost exclusively occupied with the necessity of making preparations for the death of Elizabeth, with a view to secure his peaceful succession to the English throne. He, therefore, summoned a convention of the three Estates to meet on the 20th of June, for the purpose of granting him a sum of money to raise and equip a body of troops, which should be in readiness on the queen's death to maintain his title and to overawe his enemies. To his great surprise and indignation, however, the barons and the representatives of the burghs stoutly resisted the proposal, and all the entreaties and threats of the king and his courtiers failed to convince them of the necessity of taxing themselves to raise the sum he required. In the end, they declared their willingness to raise an army when this should be actually needed; and, instead of forty thousand crowns which James demanded, they offered to give forty thousand pounds Scots, on condition that they should never again be taxed in his time, and that the money should go to supply his own wants, and not be lavished on his needy courtiers. This offer, however, was contemptuously rejected by the king, who insisted that it should be put to the vote whether it had not been agreed in a former convention at Perth, that a thousand persons should advance a hundred thousand crowns for his majesty's use.

The opposition to the king's demand was headed by the young Earl of Gowrie, who contended that the offer of the barons and burghs was every way a reasonable proposal, and ought to be accepted; that the demand of the king would bring discredit upon all parties; and that it was dishonourable for a monarch to ask more than his subjects could give, and for a people that their poverty should be disclosed to the world. This daring conduct of the earl excited great surprise in the assembly. "Alas!" said Sir David Murray, "yonder is an unhappy man; his enemies are but seeking an occasion for his death, and now he has given it."

The king's displeasure. The king was enraged beyond measure at his defeat, and dismissed the assembly with loud and angry invectives against their behaviour, reminding the burghers that their matters might come in his way, and that he would assuredly remember this day and be even with them. "It was I," he added, "who gave you a vote in parliament, and it will be well for such as you to remember that I can summon a parliament at my pleasure, and pull you down as easily as I have built you up." The Laird of Easter Wemyss courageously replied to this insulting speech, and reminded the king how much he owed them, and what great sums they had given him in his necessities. "We have done your majesty," said he, "as good offices for our Estate, and we, your majesties burghs and barons, are as worthy your thanks as the proudest earl, or lord, or prelate here. Our callings may be inferior, but our devotedness is as great, and so your majesty will find it when the proper time arrives. As for our places in parliament and convention, we have bought our seats; we have paid your majesty for them; and we cannot with justice be deprived of them. But the throne is surrounded by flatterers, who propagate falsehoods against us.

Let us be confronted with our accusers, and we engage to prove them liars."*

It is supposed that the actual rise of the Gowrie conspiracy may be dated from this Gowrie's views moment, but there can be little and feelings. doubt that the earl had at a much earlier period begun to cherish feelings of revenge against all who had been concerned in his father's death, the king himself not excepted. On one occasion, shortly after his return to Scotland, as he was entering the long gallery at Holyrood, he perceived Colonel William Stewart enter it from the other end, having just left the apartment of the king. As this officer had taken an active part in apprehending his father at Dundee, the earl, from a natural repugnance to meet him, stepped aside to permit Stewart to pass. One of his servants, however, observing this, called out, "What, my lord! will you give back for any man here? Come forward boldly." Gowrie then resumed his walk along the centre of the room, which being observed by Stewart, and construed into an insult, he returned to the king's chamber, and entered a complaint against the earl. "Sir, will it please you," said he, "to listen to this strange matter? that for service done to your majesty I should be so evil rewarded as I am. Here comes in the Earl of Gowrie, and I see he intends to begin with me; but beware the best of you all!" The earl, entering the apartment at this moment, Stewart withdrew without saying more. To the surprise of all present, Gowrie took no notice of the complaint, but conversed with the king about other matters. Being afterwards asked the cause of this, he replied by quoting the significant proverb, "Aquila non captat muscas."† It is remarked by an old chronicler, that this brief and proud answer was a covert intimation that he scorned to punish the subordinate agent, but would revenge his father's death upon the king.‡

The precise object of the plot is still enveloped in mystery, but there is no reason Object of the to believe that the conspirators conspiracy. cherished any design against the king's life. The probability seems rather to be that they intended an enterprise similar to the Raid of Ruthven, in which Gowrie's father was concerned; and that their object was to make themselves master of the king's person, to administer the government in the royal name, and thus to gratify at once their ambition and their revenge. The most extraordinary thing about this conspiracy is the small number of persons who seemed to have been privy to it. Gowrie, it appears, had deeply studied the various plots which chequer the history of Scotland, and had observed that most of them had failed in consequence of too many being admitted as accomplices. William Rhynd, his tutor, gave evidence afterwards, that, having several times conversed with the earl regarding the best way of conducting a dangerous enterprise, his lordship always professed for his opinion, that he was not a wise man that, having intended the execution of a high and dangerous purpose, communicates the same to any second person—because, keeping it to himself, he could never be discovered or disappointed.* This statement is corroborated by a curious anecdote preserved by Spottiswood: A few days before the earl's unhappy death, William Couper, minister of Perth, found him in his library perusing a work on the subject of "Conspiracies against Princes," probably the Latin translation of Machiavel's "Discourses on Livy," and, on inquiring the subject of his studies, was told that it was a collection of the conspiracies made against princes. "A perilous subject," was Couper's reply.—"Yes," said the earl, "because most of such plots have been foolishly contrived, and faulty either in one point or other; for he that goeth about such a business should not put any man on his counsel."†

Acting on these views, Gowrie took into his confidence only his brother Alexander, commonly called the Master of Ruthven; Robert Logan of Restalrig; an old borderer called Laird Bower, a follower of Logan's; and a fourth conspirator, still unknown, who appears to have been a person of rank, and was probably connected with the royal household. Logan was a gentleman of ancient family, the uterine brother of Lord Home, but a reckless, unprincipled villain—a scoffer at religion, and a person of openly profligate life: in the words of the Governor of Berwick, "a main loose man, a great favourer of thieves reputed."‡ He was, indeed, an adherent of the infamous Bothwell, to whom, as he boasted, he had at one time given shelter in his unapproachable eyrie of Fastcastle. This fortalice, which is perched on the brink of a steep and almost perpendicular rock, two hundred feet above the German Ocean,§ formerly belonged to a branch of the powerful family of Home, and had recently come into Logan's possession by marriage. It is supposed that it was to this impregnable tower, which twenty men could have maintained against an army, that the conspirators designed to convey the king after getting possession of his person; and the selection of this remote and inaccessible place of detention, so near the English Border, renders it by no means improbable that Elizabeth was privy to the scheme.

§ It was believed by Logan that his castle contained a vast quantity of hidden treasure; and a curious agreement is still extant between him and Napier of Merchiston, in which that celebrated philosopher consents to make search for the treasure by divination, on condition that he was to obtain half of all that should be discovered, and to have his expenses paid, whatever might be the result. It is scarcely necessary to say that the project was completely unsuccessful. Fastcastle, now in ruins, is the Wolf's Craig of "The Bride of Lammermuir."

Several letters, which Logan addressed to his brother conspirators, have been preserved, and throw considerable light on the object of the plot, and the means by which it was to be carried into effect. It appears, from these documents, that early in the month of July, 1600, Gowrie wrote to Logan, appointing a secret meeting, to confer "on the purpose he knew of;" that later in the month the Master of Ruthven and Logan met, and arranged the mode in which the plot was to be executed, and resolved that "the king's hunting" was the most favourable time for their attempt, in which "life, land, and honour," were to be perilled, "in case the matter were not wisely used;" and that between the 18th and the 27th of July the conspirators held another meeting, to complete their arrangements, and that it only remained to fix the precise day. The last two letters of the series are so important that we give them entire. The first is dated July 29th, only a week before the fatal result of their attempt, and was sent to Gowrie by Laird Bower, Logan's household man, as he termed him.

"MY LO.—At the receipt of your lordship's letter I am so comforted, especially at your Lo.'s purpose, communicated unto me therein, that I can neither utter my joy, nor find myself able how to encounter your Lo. with due thanks. Two days after the date of this letter to Gowrie. Logan wrote the following letter to the unknown conspirator, from his house of Gunn's Green, near Eyemouth.

"RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR,—My hartly duty remembered. Ye know I told you at our last meeting in the Canongate, that M. A. From Gunnisgreen, the last of July, 1600."

From these remarkable letters we learn that the conspirators were determined to revenge the Machiavelian massacre of their dearest friends, and especially anticipated a glorious revenge for the death of Grey Stiel—the soubriquet of the late Earl of Gowrie; that, under the pretence of a pleasure party on the sea, they were to hold a secret rendezvous at Fastcastle; that an appointed signal was to be given to those who were to be on the outlook from the fortalice; that a previous secret conference was to be held at Restalrig over their "hattit kit and wine;" that the king's buck-hunting was expected to bring them good cheer and happy success; that Logan's assistance had been secured by the promise of the valuable estate of Dirleton, then the property of Gowrie; that Lord Home and the earl's old tutor, Mr. William Rhynd, were not safe persons to be entrusted with the secret—the former on account of his timidity, the latter because he would dissuade them from their purpose "with reasons of religion," which, the profligate Borderer characteristically adds, "I can never abide;" and that his resolution to go through with the plot was so strong, that he would not be deterred from keeping his promise, "although the scaffold were set up."

The last letter of Logan was written on the Proceedings of 31st of July; and on the night of the earl and his Monday, the 4th of August, the brother. Earl of Gowrie called his chamberlain, Andrew Henderson, into his bedchamber, and asked him what he intended to do next day. Henderson, who seems to have been a simple-minded person, answered, that he thought of riding to his lordship's estate of Ruthven, a few miles distant, to confer upon some matters of business with the tenants. The earl said, "Stay that journey; you must ride to-morrow to Falkland with my brother and Andrew Ruthven. See that you be ready at four in the morning; and if my brother directs you back to me with a message or letter make all the haste you can." Accordingly,

* William, Earl of Gowrie, who was beheaded May 28th, 1584, was known among his contemporaries by the chivalrous soubriquet of Grey Stiel, a hero of popular romance.

† This story, probably some dark tale of Italian vengeance, seems to have taken a deep hold of the imagination of the Master of Ruthven. In a previous letter, Logan says M. A. R. "is very conceited. For God's sake be very wary of his reckless toys of Padua, for he told me one of the strangest tales of a nobleman of Padua that ever I heard in my life, resembling the like purpose."

Mr. Alexander left Perth next morning early, accompanied by Henderson and Andrew Ruthven, and made the best of his way to Falkland, where he arrived a little after six o'clock.

The king was at this time residing at the palace of Falkland, for the purpose of The king buck-hunting, of which he was enticed to Gowrie House. very fond; and on the morning in question the nobles were assembled in the great park, between six and seven o'clock, ready to proceed to their sport, "the weather being wonderful pleasant and seasonable." His majesty was walking in his boots towards the stables, when the Master of Ruthven came up, and, with a low courtesy, addressed the king in a perturbed manner, and requested a private audience on a matter of great importance. James stepped aside with him, and Ruthven began, with eyes bent upon the ground, to relate a singular adventure which he said had befallen him on the preceding evening. In taking a walk through the fields, near Perth, he had met a man of mean appearance, with his face muffled in a cloak; and perceiving that he faltered in his speech and became confused, when questioned, he had seized him, and on searching had found under his cloak a large pot full of broad gold pieces. He had immediately taken the fellow into custody with his treasure, and, without mentioning the matter to any person, had confined and bound him in a solitary house. Believing it to be his duty to communicate the matter immediately to his majesty, he had come to Falkland for that purpose, and now besought the king to ride with him to Perth on the instant to take possession of the money. According to the king's own account of this conference, his first answer was that the treasure could not by law belong to him, unless it were found under the earth; but afterwards suspecting that the man was some trafficking priest, who had come to Scotland with money to stir up a new popish rebellion, he inquired what kind of coin it was, and what sort of a fellow he was that carried it. Ruthven at once caught at the suggestion; and replied that the coin seemed foreign, and that although the man appeared a native of Scotland, yet he could not recollect to have ever seen him before. James then proposed to send a warrant to the magistrates of Perth to receive the man and the treasure from the Master's hands, and to inquire into all the circumstances of the story. Ruthven, however, protested strongly against this step: if either his brother, he said, or the bailies got possession of the money, his majesty would receive but a poor account of it; it was only for the great affection which he bore to the king that he had preferred him both to his brother and himself in this matter; and that all the recompence he asked for this service was that the king would ride with him to Perth, see the treasure, and judge for himself.

James alleges that he still continued irresolute; and that as his attendants were all on horseback, the game found, and the huntsmen impatient at the delay, he was obliged hastily to break away from the Master, with a promise that he would give a definite answer when the chase was concluded. Ruthven expressed great dissatisfaction at the delay, observing that there was not such a hunting to be got every day as that which he had proposed to his majesty; that the man and the treasure might be discovered and meddled with during his absence; and that his brother, who with the townspeople was at church, might miss him; whereas, if the king were immediately to accompany him to Perth, they might investigate the matter before the dismissal of the congregation. The king proceeded to join the hunt, but the story haunted him; and sending for Ruthven, who lingered near at hand, he informed him in a whisper that he had formed the resolution to accompany him to Perth as soon as the chase was ended. The Master then, unknown to the king, dispatched Henderson to inform his brother that his majesty was coming to Perth with a few attendants, and to desire him to cause dinner to be prepared.

About eleven o'clock, after a very hard chase, the buck was brought down about the distance of two arrow-flights from the royal stables; and James suddenly announced to his courtiers that he was going to Perth to speak with the Earl of Gowrie, and should be back before the evening; and without remaining as usual to superintend the "curry," or dissection of the deer, or even waiting till fresh horses could be brought for himself or his attendants, he rode off instantly at a rapid pace with Ruthven. Within a mile he was overtaken by a fresh horse, which his servants sent after him; but he was some miles on the road before he was overtaken by Lennox and the rest of his suite. All this time the behaviour of Ruthven was calculated to excite the king's surprise: he urged him to finish the chase with all speed; to set out the moment it terminated, and especially not to permit Lennox, Mar, or any of the other nobles, to follow him, as it might spoil all; and, though his jaded horse could scarcely keep pace with the king's, he still continued eager and importunate in his entreaties to him to make haste. This extraordinary deportment on the part of the young man excited the king's surprise and suspicion that "he was not well settled in his wits," and, taking Lennox aside, he said to him, "You could not guess what errand I am riding for? I am going to Perth to get a pose.* Mr. Alexander Ruthven has informed me that he has found a man that has a pitcher full of coined gold of great sorts." And he asked the duke "what humour he thought Mr. Alexander to be of." Lennox answered that he knew nothing else of him "than that he was an honest, discreet young man." James then related to the duke the whole circumstances connected with the alleged discovery of the treasure, to which the duke replied, "Sir, I like not that; it is not likely." The king, however, went on, but he took the precaution to enjoin

Lennox to observe where he and Ruthven went, and to follow him—an order which he repeated after his arrival in the Earl of Gowrie's house. This private conference was observed by Ruthven, and, coming close to the king, he implored him to make none living acquainted with their purpose till he had himself seen the fellow and the treasure. James replied, with a laugh, that "he was no good teller of money, and behoved, therefore, to have some to help him in that errand." Shortly after leaving Falkland, the Master had dispatched his other servant, Andrew Ruthven, to ride forward with a second message to the earl; and, on coming within a mile of Perth, he requested, and received, permission to ride on before, in order to make some preparations for his majesty's arrival.

Meanwhile, Henderson, on his arrival in Perth at ten o'clock, found the Earl of Gowrie in his chamber engaged with two gentlemen. He instantly withdrew to another room, and earnestly inquired what word he had brought from his brother—had he brought a letter? how had the king taken with the Master? what number of persons were with the king at the hunting—what noblemen? To these questions Henderson answered by giving the message with which he was entrusted—that the king would be at Gowrie House incontinent, and that the earl must prepare dinner. He added that the Master "was weel tane with, and when he did his courtesy the king laid his hand upon his shoulder;" that his majesty had sundry of his own suite with him, and some Englishmen; and that the only nobleman he noticed was my Lord Duke. Henderson then went to his own house, pulled off his boots, and returned to Gowrie House about eleven, when the earl commanded him to put on his "secret"† and plate sleeves, as he "had a Highlandman to take in the Shoegate.‡" Henderson did as he was ordered, and afterwards assisted in taking up the earl's dinner, which was served at half past twelve. Apparently that the king's visit might appear to take him by surprise, Gowrie entertained at dinner three friends who had happened to wait upon him, and as they sat at table, Andrew Ruthven, the Master's second messenger, came into the room, and whispered to the earl that the king was on his way. Soon after the Master himself came in, and announced his majesty's approach, upon which the earl hastily rose from the table, and, assembling his servants, walked to the South Inch, or meadow, immediately without the town-walls, where he met the king. The royal retinue did not exceed fifteen persons, including Lennox, Mar, Sir Thomas Erskine, Lords Inchaffray and Lindores, and a few others, who were armed only with a sword or deer-knife at their girdle, and wore hunting-dresses, with a horn slung over their shoulder. The earl was attended by nearly a hundred of his retainers and fellow-townsmen, who had turned out to welcome his majesty.

Gowrie House, into which James was thus conducted, was a large baronial mansion of quadrangular shape, standing on the bank of the Tay, which formed the eastern boundary of the garden. In the south-east corner of the garden stood the Monk's Tower, and to the westward of the house stood the Spey or Spy Tower, a strong fort which guarded the south gate of the city. The city wall extended in a line nearly due west and east from the Spey to the Monk's Tower. The house itself formed three sides of a square, the fourth side, that which abutted upon the street, being formed by a wall, in which was the entrance gate into the interior court. It consisted of three stories, the lower being occupied by cellars and the apartments of the servants; the second, by a dining-room (A) looking out upon the river, a hall in the centre (B), and a room at the further end looking out upon the street; and the third, chiefly by a long picture gallery (D), which extended along one side of the square, and communicated by a door at the end (E) with a chamber (F), which, in its turn, led to a small circular room (G), constructed in the interior of a turret overhanging the outer wall, in which were two windows, the one looking towards the Spey Tower, the other looking out upon the court, but visible from the street before the court. It was in this, the most ancient part of the house, on the south side of the square, that the affray took place. The various apartments were arranged, as was usual in those times, en suite, and so as to communicate with each other. The principal access to the various stories was by a spiral stair (C), which was at the south-east angle of the court. But there was another and smaller stair, called the "Black Turnpike" (H), which led direct to the chamber on the third floor, at the end of the picture gallery, opening into the turret. It is necessary that the reader should keep these details in mind in order to understand the subsequent narrative.

The arrival of the king caused a considerable commotion in Gowrie's household. The earl himself appeared exceedingly embarrassed respecting the proper entertainment of his dignified and apparently unexpected guest. Craigengelt, the master of the household, was obliged to leave his sick bed to take charge of the preparation of his majesty's dinner, and messengers were dispatched throughout Perth to seek for some delicacy fit to be set upon the royal table. The king, though very hungry from the effects of six hours hard riding, was obliged to wait more than an hour for his dinner—to his no small annoyance.* During the interval, his majesty asked the Master, in a whisper, if they might not now go to examine the man and his pot of gold. But Ruthven told him it would be better to wait till after dinner; and in the meantime he entreated the king not to seem too familiar with him, lest it might excite the suspicions of his brother. James then addressed himself to the earl, but was surprised to find that he could not engage him in anything like conversation, his whole discourse consisting of "half words and imperfect sentences."

It appears to have been about this time that Alexander Ruthven sent for the Arrangements key of the gallery chamber; and of the conspirators. soon after the king had sat down to dinner, Gowrie sent for Henderson his chamberlain, and bade him go to his brother in the gallery. He obeyed, and was instantly followed by the earl himself, who commanded him to remain there and obey the Master's orders. Henderson, who was now fully armed except the head, apprehending some danger, asked "what they were about to do with him?" They replied by directing him to enter the little round closet, and locking the door, left him there. Gowrie then returned to take his place at the table of his royal guest, and stood at the end of it, "very pensive, and with a dejected countenance, oft rounding [whispering over his shoulder] one while to one of his servants, and another while to another, and oftentimes went out and in to the chamber."† When the king had almost dined, the earl conducted Lennox, Mar, and the other noblemen into the adjoining hall, and saw them sit down to meat; but, instead of taking his own place at the board, as seems to have been the custom, he immediately returned, and resumed his position at the bottom of the king's table. At this moment Alexander Ruthven whispered into the king's ear that now was the time, when the courtiers were all engaged, to step away by themselves to see the treasure, if they could get rid of the earl his brother. James then turned to Gowrie, and in a "merry and homely manner" accused him of having been so long in foreign parts as to have forgotten his Scottish courtesies. "Wherefore, my lord," said he, "since ye have neglected to drink either to me or my nobles, who are your guests, I must drink to you my own welcome. Take this cup, and pledge them the king's scoll† in my name." Gowrie accordingly carried the pledge to the noblemen in the hall, and while they were busy returning the health, the king and the Master passed quietly through the hall, and ascended the great stair which led to the gallery. Before rising up, James desired Ruthven to call Sir Thomas Erskine, but he evaded the message, and Erskine never received it. Lennox, too, proposed to follow his majesty, as he had been enjoined, but was prevented by Gowrie, who alleged that his highness had retired on a quiet errand, and would not be disturbed.‡

yond, the Master carefully locking the doors as they passed, and observing with a smile, 'We'll make very sure of him.' At last they entered the small room in the round turret already mentioned. On the wall hung a picture with a curtain before it,* and beside it stood a man clad in armour, with a sword and dagger by his side. James started back in alarm, and Ruthven, having first locked the study door, clapped his hat on his head, snatched the dagger from the girdle of the man in armour, and drawing aside the curtain from the picture, showed the features of the late Earl of Gowrie, his father. Holding the dagger with a threatening aspect to the king's breast, he exclaimed, "Whose picture is that? Remember ye not the murder of my father? Does not thy conscience accuse thee of his innocent blood? I shall be avenged upon thee now. Thou art my prisoner; thou must be in my will, and be used as I list." He also, according to James's account, "swore many bloody oaths that if the king cried one word, or opened a window to look out, that dagger should presently go to his heart." James, although greatly alarmed by these threats, did not lose his presence of mind, but began to expostulate with Ruthven, who stopped him by the fierce rejoinder, "Hold your tongue, sir, or by Christ ye shall die!" But here Henderson wrenched the dagger from the Master's hand, and the king, resuming his remonstrance, said in his homely dialect, "Maister Alexander, ye and I was very great† together; and as touching your father's death, man,‡ I was but ane minor, my council might have done anything they pleased. And further, man, albeit ye bereave me of my life, ye will not be king of Scotland; for I have baith sons and dochters, and there is men in this town and friends that will not leave it unavenged."§ Ruthven, seemed moved by this appeal, and protested that his life was not what was sought. "What racks|| then," said the king, who, amid all his perturbation, forgot not his princely demeanour, "albeit ye tak off your hat?" Ruthven uncovered himself, and the king proceeded to say, "What is it ye crave man, an ye crave not my life?" Ruthven replied, "Sir, it is but ane promise."—"What promise?" inquired James.—"Sir," said the Master, "my brother the earl will tell you." The king then desired him to bring his brother. Ruthven, having exacted a promise from his majesty that he should not open the windows or cry out while he was absent, commanded Henderson to keep the king at his peril, and then left the room, locking the door behind him.

Immediately after his departure, James entered into conversation with Henderson, and asked him how he came there. "As God lives," answered the unfortunate and trembling chamberlain, "I was shot in like ane dog."—"Do you think my Lord of Gowrie will do me any evil, man?" inquired the king. The man answered, "I vow to God, sir, I shall die first." James then, apparently thinking that, although he had promised not to open any window himself, he might command the chamberlain to do so for him, said, "Open the window." Henderson immediately opened one of the two small windows by which the turret was lighted—that which looked toward the Spey Tower. "Fye!" cried the king, "the wrong window, man." Henderson instantly perceiving his mistake, crossed towards the opposite window, but before he reached it Ruthven. The struggle again broke into the room, and between them.

exclaiming, "By God, sir, there is nae remeid!" sprang at the king, and attempted to bind his hands with a garter which he had brought with him.* James, by a strong effort, wrenched his hands loose from the gripe of the conspirator, exclaiming, "I am ane free prince, man, I will not be bound!" and Henderson at the same moment snatching away the garter, the king "leapt free," and had almost reached the window when Ruthven again seized him by the throat with one hand, and thrust the other into his mouth, to prevent him giving the alarm; while they were struggling in this attitude close by the window, Henderson put his hand over the king's left shoulder, and drew up the movable wooden board which, according to the general custom in Scotland at that period, constituted the lower part of the casement. James had thus an opportunity of thrusting his head half through the opening, and shouting to a group of his attendants on the public street below—"Treason! help!—Earl of Mar, I am murdered!" Ruthven, however, succeeded in dragging him back into the chamber, and calling out to Henderson, "Is there nae help with thee? woe worth thee! thou wilt cause us all die!" he attempted to draw his sword, which James prevented by grasping his right hand. During this desperate struggle they reeled out of the closet into the chamber adjoining, and the trembling and panic-struck chamberlain unlocked the door of the room which opened upon the Black Turnpike, for the double purpose, according to his declaration, of making his own escape and letting in the king's servants.†

We must now return to the Earl of Gowrie, who, shortly after the king's departure from the dining-hall with his brother, asked Lennox and the other nobles to step with him into the garden, and take an additional dessert from his cherry-

* This highly graphic and dramatic circumstance is not mentioned in the depositions, or in the account published by authority; but it is to be found in Johnstone's Contemporary Narrative of the Conspiracy, and it greatly heightens the force of Ruthven's language when about to commence his treasonable attempt. trees. Opening a side door in the hall, he led the way, by an outer stair, into the garden, on the south side of the house. They had not been long there, however, when Thomas Cranston, one of Gowrie's domestics came to them hastily, and informed his master that the king had left the house, and was riding over the Inch. The earl then cried to horse; and he and Lennox, with the rest of the courtiers, rushed through the hall into the courtyard, shouting for their horses. On coming to the outer gate, the Duke of Lennox asked the porter if the king had passed. The man replied in the negative; and persisted in his affirmation, although his master angrily told him he lied, for his majesty had left the house by the back gate, and gone through the Inch. "That cannot be," said the porter, firmly, "for I have the key of the back gate, and of all the gates of the place." Gowrie, somewhat confused, proposed to run back to the house to ascertain the truth.* Returning in a few minutes, he informed the courtiers that the king had really left the house. At this moment a shrill cry was heard, betokening the extremity of mortal fear; and the Duke of Lennox exclaimed to the Earl of Mar, "That is the king's voice, be he where he will himself!" and looking up they saw the king's face at the window of the turret—the head uncovered, the features red, and a hand grasping his mouth, while he cried out, in a tone of extreme distress and terror, "I am murdered! treason, treason! my Lord of Mar, help!" Sir Thomas Erskine and his brother James seized the Earl of Gowrie by the collar, exclaiming, "Traitor, this is thy deed!" and threw him on the ground. The earl asserted his innocence; and his servants soon rescued him from the gripe of Sir Thomas, who then hastened to the assistance of the king. Meanwhile Lennox and Mar, and some others of the royal suite, crossed the courtyard, and rushed up the great staircase to the long gallery, which they found open, but the door (E) of the chamber (F) at its upper extremity was locked, and resisted all their efforts, although they battered it with a ladder which lay hard by. At this critical moment

* It is supposed by some that Gowrie ran back for the purpose of holding a conference with his brother, for the Master's retirement from the round turret corresponded, in point of time, with the earl's going up into the house; and the circumstance of the gallery-door, which is said to have been locked by Ruthven, being open when Lennox and Mar went up to the king's rescue, seems to prove that the Master came out to the staircase, or else admitted his brother into the gallery, for the purpose of holding a conference with him. On the other hand, Andrew Henderson was of opinion that the Master did not leave the back of the door; and his return was so precipitate as to have left little or no time for a conference with his brother. The probability is that Ruthven had been abashed by the collected demeanour of the king, and had become quite unnerved by the desperate situation in which he felt himself placed, and therefore availed himself of the king's proposal to call for the earl, his brother, to retire, and "screw up his courage to the sticking point." John Ramsay entered the gallery shortly after the king and Ruthven passed through it, and spent some time in examining the pictures with which it was adorned; and it is probable that this took place at the very time that the king was remonstrating with Ruthven in the round room.

a page, named John Ramsay, who had heard the king's cry for help, observing the door of the Black Turnpike standing open, rushed up the stair to the top, dashed open the door of the chamber with his foot, and perceived the king and Ruthven wrestling in the middle of the room—the Master's head pressed under the king's left arm, and his hand thrust upwards against his majesty's face. Ramsay was hampered by a hawk, which had that day been presented to the king, and which at that moment he carried upon his wrist; but casting off the bird, he drew his whinger, or short hunting-sword, and stabbed the Master, the king calling out, "Fye! strike him low, he has on a pyne doublet!"* The next moment, James, exerting all his strength, thrust him out of the chamber, and down the stair. Ramsay then ran to the window, and perceiving Sir Thomas Erskine in the courtyard, called upon him to come up the turnpike. Sir Thomas immediately complied; and entering the staircase, followed by Hugh Herries, the king's physician, and George Wilson, a servant, he met Alexander Ruthven staggering downwards, bleeding in his face and neck, and cried out, "This is the traitor! strike him!" The unhappy youth was mortally wounded by Herries, and almost instantly expired, exclaiming as he turned in the death agony, "Alas! I had not the wyte † of it!"

The king was for the moment rescued, but the danger was by no means over. His friends were only four in number, for Henderson had glided down the turnpike and fled from the house immediately after Ruthven was dispatched; and they were uncertain whether the attempts of Lennox and Mar to break open the door by which the chamber communicated with the gallery were made by friend or foe. At this moment the alarm bell rung out, and the din of the gathering citizens, who were devoted to their provost, Gowrie, was heard from the town. There was besides a still more imminent danger.

The earl on being rescued by his servants from the grasp of Sir Thomas Erskine, retired a short way, then drawing two swords which he wore in one scabbard, and, with one in each hand, rushed into the courtyard, exclaiming that he would either be in his own house, or die by the way. One of his lackeys put a steel bonnet on his head, and, thus armed, he crossed the court and entered the Black Turnpike, preceded and followed by seven of his retainers. At the bottom of the stair lay the dead body of Alexander Ruthven. "Whom have we here?" said Thomas Cranston, one of the earl's attendants, for the face was turned downward. "Up the stair!" was Gowrie's brief and stern reply. Cranston accordingly ran up the stair, followed by the earl and the rest of his servants, who all rushed together into the gallery chamber, where they found Erskine, Ramsay, Herries, and George Wilson, standing with their swords drawn, having previously provided for the safety of the king by thrusting him into the round closet within the turret. A fierce contest now ensued, in which the king's friends were all wounded at the first onset and completely over-matched; for not only were they greatly inferior in numbers, but Gowrie was renowned for his skill in the use of the double sword,* while Dr. Herries, one of the king's party, was embarrassed in his movements by a clubfoot. The contest, however, was speedily decided, for Ramsay, calling out that the king was slain, the Earl of Gowrie dropped the points of his weapons, as if paralysed with horror at such a catastrophe, and Ramsay, throw-

His servants, seeing their master fall, and having received several wounds, immediately fled. Mar, Lennox, and the other nobles continued all this time battering with hammers the door of the gallery chamber, but in vain; and the party of the king were afraid to open lest they should give admission to another company of Gowrie's retainers. It was at length ascertained who they were, and a hammer being handed through a hole in the door, the lock was forcibly wrenched off, and an entrance effected. The first object that met the eyes of the astonished courtiers, was the dead body of the Earl of Gowrie, whom they had so recently parted with in the street, and the king standing unarmed amid his brave deliverers. James, now assured that the principal danger was over, piously knelt down upon the floor, and, surrounded by his friends in the same attitude, returned fervent thanks to God, "out of his own mouth, for that miraculous deliverance and victory."†

The danger, however, was not yet over. An immense mob of the citizens, among whom the earl was very popular, had assembled at the sound of the alarm bell, and, together with the retainers of Gowrie, beset the house, and with shouts and maledictions threatened vengeance on the "bloody butchers" who had murdered their young provost, and his brother. Violet Ruthven, and other females, ran wildly out to the street, crying, "Thieves, limmers, bloody traitors that have slain these innocents; may God let never nane of you have sic [such] plants of your ain. The Earl of Gowrie had anew to tak meat and drink fra him, but has nane to revenge his deid." Others exclaimed, "Greencoats, we shall have amends of you. Ye shall pay for it. Give us our provost." Many did not hesitate to threaten the king himself, crying out, "Come down, come down, thou son of Seignor Davie! thou hast slain a better man than thyself."‡ One of the citizens brought a beam to break open the door of the vaults; and Alexander Ruthven, a near relative of the Gowrie family, cried for gunpowder, and searched some of the merchants' booths for it to blow up the house.* A number of Gowrie's retainers, mingled with the citizens, rushed up the Black Turnpike, and thrust their pikes and halberds through the small square aperture, which, according to an old custom in Scotland, was left in the lower corner of the door. By one of these weapons "Meikle John Murray," a retainer of Tullibardine, was wounded in the leg.† James endeavoured to pacify the enraged multitude by addressing them from the windows, and explaining what had taken place, but for some time without effect. At length the magistrates, having made their way into the house, received from his majesty an account of all that had happened; and, returning to the crowd, commanded them to disperse, which they were at last persuaded to do.‡ The king then committed the bodies of the two brothers to the care of the magistrates; and on searching the pockets of the earl for any documents that might throw light upon the conspiracy, they found a little parchment bag full of "magical characters and words of enchantment," which his tutor, Rhynd, recognised as the same he had discovered him wearing at Padua, and which he would never suffer to go out of his possession.§ It is gravely stated, in the royal narrative, that no blood had issued from the wound till the spell was removed from the body, after which it gushed out profusely.||

James left Perth at eight in the evening, and rode to Falkland amid crowds of his subjects, who had already heard to Falkland. James returns vague reports of his danger, and poured in from all quarters to ascertain that he was safe. The

‡ It appears that the people of Dundee bore a bitter grudge towards the citizens of Perth, in consequence of an ancient dispute between the two towns for burghal precedence; and a rumour respecting this tumult having reached Dundee, twenty miles distant, in a remarkable brief space of time, the inhabitants expecting, and no doubt hoping, that the rival town would be given up to pillage, armed themselves and came up in a body, in the course of the evening, for the purpose of obtaining a share in the spoil. Doubtless to their great disappointment, on their arrival they found everything quiet. (Fleming's MS. Chronicle; Pitcairn, vol. ii. p. 247.)

§ Declaration of W. Rhynd, ibid., p. 220. The propensity to magical pursuits seems to have been hereditary in the Ruthven family. Patrick Lord Ruthven, the murderer of Rizzio, gave Queen Mary a magic ring as a preservative against poison. His son, the first Earl of Gowrie, when in Italy, had his fortunes foretold by a wizard. His example was followed by his son John, the author of the conspiracy. Nicolson, in a letter to Cecil, 12th November, 1600, says, "One Colvil hath sent the king the collection of the fortune to befall Gowrye upon his nativity, written with the earl's hand in French, at Orleans, and there found; containing that he should return, be in great credit, seek for a wife, and yet die with his sword in his hand before he should be married." It was stated in evidence by James Wenyns of Bogie, one of his friends, that he was present with the earl in Strathbran, when some of the company killed an adder, and that Gowrie told them if the adder had not been slain they should have seen good sport, for he would have made it stand still by pronouncing a certain cabalistic Hebrew word, which he had learned from a great necromancer in Italy. (Pitcairn, vol. ii. pp. 218, 219.)

* It appears that these swords were, according to a custom then prevalent in Italy, worn in one scabbard, and served for double defence, as the sword and dagger. The earl was singularly skilled in the use of arms.

account of his danger and remarkable escape having been brought to Edinburgh next day, the privy council commanded the ministers of the city instantly to assemble the people, and to return thanks to God for the king's deliverance from the imminent danger with which he had been threatened. A few days after, James himself returned to the capital, and was met on the sands at Leith by the citizens, headed by their magistrates and the judges, who welcomed him with enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. The king went first to the church of Leith, where prayers were offered up; he then, followed by an immense concourse of all classes of his people, proceeded to the Cross, where his chaplain, Mr. Patrick Galloway, preached a sermon to the assembled multitude, and related all the circumstances of the conspiracy, and the king's miraculous deliverance. At the close of the discourse, James himself rose, and, in the hearing of the people, solemnly attested the truth of his chaplain's narrative. Soon after an account of the whole transaction was drawn up by the king, and published; and his statements regarding all the leading facts were confirmed by the evidence of Lennox, Mar, Erskine, and Ramsay, and especially by the testimony of Andrew Henderson, Gowrie's chamberlain, who, upon a promise of pardon, had discovered himself, and confessed all that he knew.

The royal narrative, however, was somewhat exaggerated in its statements; many parts of it seemed exceedingly improbable; in various minor points it did not agree with the evidence of Henderson, and of the courtiers, which was only what might have been expected, considering the confusion and terror accompanying the event. These circumstances, together with the apparent absence of all confederates—the strange and unaccountable behaviour of the man in armour in the turret—and especially the unusual presence of mind and energy which James represented himself to have displayed, gave rise to strong and not unnatural suspicions respecting the credibility of the narrative, and even led some to hint that the plot was a conspiracy of the court against the two brothers, not of Gowrie against the king. The ministers of Edinburgh, in particular, still continued incredulous and unconvinced, and refused to do more than return thanks in general terms for the preservation of their sovereign's life, declaring that their consciences would not permit them to mingle what might be false with the edicts of

James was exceedingly provoked at their refusal to obey his injunctions, and after several fruitless attempts to remove their scruples, and to explain and reconcile every minute particular in his narrative with the deposition of the nobles, he became so incensed at their obstinacy, that he banished them from the capital, and interdicted them, under pain of death, from preaching in any part of Scotland. In the end, they all declared themselves satisfied of the truth of the conspiracy, except Mr. Robert Bruce of Kinnaird, a younger son of the family of Bruce of Airth, in Stirlingshire, and one of the leaders of the National Church. Being well aware of the great influence which Bruce possessed among the people, as well as among his brethren, James held several personal interviews with him, and used every effort to remove his doubts. He was at last brought to express his belief of the guilt of the Ruthvens, but he peremptorily refused to preach upon the subject in the manner prescribed by the king, declaring that his conscience would not allow him to submit to the dictation of any man respecting the mode in which he was to conduct public worship. "Are you willing to preach according to these articles?" said the king, in his third conference with him.—"I am discharged [forbidden] to preach the pleasure of men," said the undaunted successor of John Knox. "Place me where God placed me,* and I shall teach fruitful doctrine as God shall give me grace. But we have not that custom to be enjoined to preach, nor I dare not promise to keep that injunction. It lieth not in my hand to make a promise. I know not certainly what God will suffer me to speak."† The king was so displeased at this refusal that he deprived Bruce of his benefice, and banished him to France.

Measures of the most revolting severity were speedily adopted against the ill-fated family of Ruthven; and the king and his greedy courtiers sought, with the most disgraceful avidity, to hunt them down, and extirpate them like wild beasts. On the very night of the catastrophe, after the king's return to Falkland, two of Gowrie's sisters, who were maids of honour to the queen, were dismissed from office, and expelled from the palace.‡ On the same night an attempt was made to seize the two surviving brothers of the family, who at the time were living with their mother at Dunkeld; but they fortunately received some intimation of their danger, and, accompanied by their tutor, succeeded in making their escape in disguise to England.§ At the meeting of parliament, which was held in the month of November, the dead bodies of the unhappy brothers were produced there according to law, and tried, and found guilty of treason; their estates and honours were forfeited; their bodies were hanged and quartered; their heads were fixed on the top of the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, where they remained till some time during the civil war; and their quarters exhibited in the most conspicuous places of Perth, Stirling, and Dundee. The very name of Ruthven was abolished; those who had borne it were forbidden to approach within ten miles of the king; and the brothers and posterity of the house were declared to be for ever incapable of enjoying inheritance, place, or dignity in Scotland. So ruthlessly did James carry into effect his threat, to "root out that whole house and name," that no male descendant of the family is now known to exist.*

§ Ibid., p. 316. The following extracts from the letters of Sir John Carey, Governor of Berwick, to Sir Robert Cecil, may serve to show the keenness of the pursuit made after the two younger brothers of Gowrie, and the vindictive cruelty with which the king and his grasping courtiers sought to revenge the crime of the Ruthvens on their innocent kinsmen:—

"Aug. 10. The king has made great search, and lays great wait, for the two younger brothers, who, by great fortune, escaped from the schools; and not daring to tarry in Scotland, they are this day come into Berwick closely in

disguised apparel; and being brought to me, they only desire that their lives may be safe, and they may have a little oversight here till the truth of their cause may be known. And the pitiful case of the old, distressed, good countess hath made me, the willingier, to give my consent for their stay here awhile, till I may, by your honourable means, know the queen's majesty's pleasure, whether they shall stay here, or go some whither farther into the country; for they only desire the safety of their lives; and the old countess's case is pitiful and lamentable. I beseech your honour let me know her majesty's pleasure with as much speed as may be; for that I would do nothing to offend her majesty. The poor gentlemen stole into the town this morning closely, and I could not well turn them out again; seeing they come for refuge to save their lives, till I know her majesty's further pleasure therein.

"Sept. 4. Before this day, I could not by any means get the present Earl of Gowrie and his brother out of the town; for that they had sent to their mother for maintenance, and could not hear till now anything from her; and now it falls out so ill with them as she hath sent them no manner of maintenance, hoping they should have staid here still; neither dares she trust many of her servants; for if it should be known that she did any manner of way either give them succour, or maintenance, or any manner of help, she should presently forfeit, and be thrown out of all that she hath. Such secret search and privy spial there is through the whole country for her and her sons, as no friend either dare or can travel between them. Such privy search is laid for them in all places, as almost no man can travel in their country but he is searched. And if I had sent them away sooner, I should but have sent them to very great danger either of being killed or taken; so that they being very poor themselves, and having no friends nor any acquaintance, could neither have told whither to have gone or what to do. I have sent them with a man of my own to Durham, where they shall be secretly for twenty days, and then they mean to travel to Cambridge, and there to study for a time." (Piteairn, vol. ii. pp. 316, 317.)

* The first Earl of Gowrie, who was executed at Stirling in 1584, left five sons and eight daughters, viz.:—1. James, second Earl of Gowrie, who was restored in 1586, and died at the age of fourteen, in 1588. 2. John, third earl. 3. Alexander, commonly called the Master of Ruthven, who was born at Perth, 22nd January, 1580-1, and was killed along with his brother. 4. William, who was famous for his skill in alchemy, &c., and died abroad. 5. Patrick, who was for many years confined in the Tower of London; he wrote the admirable letter to the Earl of Northumberland, published in the "Cabala," (Servitia Sacra, 4to, London, 1654. p. 106.), which shows talents of no ordinary description. His daughter married Sir Anthony Vandyke, the celebrated painter. The Earl's daughters were:—1. Mary, married to John Stewart, fifth Earl of Atholl. Their daughter Dorothea was married to William Murray, Master of Tullibardine, who was of the king's retinue during the affray at Gowrie House. 2. Jean, married to James, Lord Ogilvie. 3. Sophia, married to Ludovic, Duke of Lennox. 4. Elizabeth, married to John, Lord Graham, Master of Montrose, afterwards the fourth Earl of Montrose; she was

In keeping with these cruel proceedings was the treatment of Gowrie's servants. Three of them—Thomas Cranston, George Craigengelt, and John McDuff, were brought to trial as accomplices in the conspiracy of their master; and though it was evident that they had no knowledge of the plot, and their conduct in drawing their swords against the king's attendants in the gallery chamber was entirely in accordance with the ordinary ideas of the time regarding the duty of a servant to a master, they were found guilty of treason, and executed. * On the other hand, the king granted the sum of a thousand marks yearly to the poor out of the rents of the forfeited estates, as a token of his gratitude to God for his remarkable preservation; and the fifth of August was appointed to be held annually as a day of thanksgiving for his deliverance.

It was not until eight years after the fatal result of the conspiracy (August 1608) Discovery of that Logan's share in it was dis- Logan's letters. covered. Laird Bower, to whom Logan committed the perilous task of carrying the letters which passed between him and the other conspirators, was unable to read or write, and had been obliged to obtain the assistance of George Sprot, a notary in Eyemouth, a seaport near Fastcastle, to read the instructions which were addressed to him by his master. Sprot kept the secret till after the death of Logan and Bower, when he was so imprudent as to hint to several persons that he was acquainted with some secrets respecting the Gowrie conspiracy. These intimations were reported to the privy council, who immediately caused Sprot to be apprehended and examined by torture. He made a full confession of all that he knew, and, in confirmation of his testimony, five of Logan's letters,—which, fatally for himself, Sprot had stolen from among Bower's papers,—were produced, and, after a careful examination, were proved to be in Logan's handwriting.†

† These letters have been engrossed in the records of parliament, and the originals are still preserved in the Register Office, at Edinburgh. The whole of the documents connected with this memorable conspiracy—the depositions of the king's suite, of Henderson and other retainers of Gowrie, and of the citizens of Perth—the royal narrative—the sermons preached by the king's chaplain—the letters of Logan—the examination and confession of Sprot, &c. &c.—have been published by Mr. Piteairn in the second volume of his valuable work "Criminal Trials in Scotland." John Pinkerton, in a dissertation prefixed to the first edition of Malcolm Laing's "History of Scotland," endeavours to prove that it was not Gowrie and his brother who conspired against the king, but the king, who by a prearranged plan murdered them in their own dwelling. And an attempt has recently been made by Mr. James, in his novel of "Gowrie; or, the King's Plot," to revive this exploded theory. But the evidence on the other side is quite overwhelming; and the recent discovery of the originals of Logan's letters, at Edinburgh, has set the question finally at rest. The Gowrie conspiracy has been made the sub-

The unfortunate notary was condemned to be hanged for misprision, or concealment of treason. He adhered to his confession to the last, and after being thrown off the ladder by the executioner, he thrice clapped his hands in confirmation of the truth of his deposition. The bones of Logan were dug up and tried for high treason, and, by a sentence which has justly been pronounced equally odious and illegal, his lands were forfeited and his posterity declared infamous.

A strong suspicion had taken possession of the mind of James, that the mysterious conspiracy to which he had so nearly fallen a victim, had been secretly encouraged by the English queen. Many circumstances concurred to create and to foster such a suspicion. It was quite in accordance with the base policy of her government, to seek to strengthen the English interest in Scotland by covertly seizing on every opportunity of fomenting dissension in that country. In every treasonable attempt that had hitherto been made to disturb the king's government, or to seize his person, English influence could distinctly be traced; and, on the present occasion, it was known that for some time before the treason of Gowrie, that nobleman had stood high in the favour of Elizabeth, and enjoyed her intimate confidence. Nor were these suspicions confined to the king. The Earl of Mar even accused Lord Wyloughby, the governor of Berwick, of being accessory to the conspiracy,—a charge which seems to derive some colour of probability from his close familiarity with Gowrie during his residence at the English court, but which he scornfully declined either to admit or to deny.* Many of the nobility concurred in the views of the king, whose convictions of English complicity, thus corroborated, became so strong, that when Nicolson, the English envoy, expressed gratitude to God for his majesty's preservation, James smiled incredulously, without returning any reply. On the other hand, there were many persons, as we have seen, who persisted in altogether denying the existence of the conspiracy; and Nicolson, Lord Scrope, and Sir William Bowes, in their communications to their government, threw the principal blame on the king himself.

In the meantime, James sent Captain Preston to inform Elizabeth of his narrow escape. Chafed however, by James's intrigues with reference to the painful subject of the succession, she was in

Elizabeth's no mood warmly to congratulate letter to James. the Scottish king on his preservation; but she dispatched to him Sir Harry Bruncker with a letter written by her own hand, in which, after some slight expressions of joy for his safety, she gave vent to her spleen in obscure sarcasms, and indirectly reproached him with betraying an indecent impatience for her death:—

"And though a king I be," she says, "yet hath my funerals been prepared, as I hear, long ere, I suppose, their labour shall be needful; and do hear too much of that daily, as I may have a good memorial that I am mortal: and withall so be they, too, that make such preparation aforehand; wherewith I smile, supposing that such facts may make them readier for it than I."

"Think not but how wilyly soever things be carried, they are so well known that they may do more harm to others than to me. Of this my pen hath run farther than at first I meant, when the memory of a prince's end made me call to mind such usage, which too many countries talk of, and I cannot stop my ears from. If you will needs know what I mean, I have been pleased to impart to this my servant some part thereof; to whom I will refer me; and will pray God to give you grace to know what best becomes you. Your loving sister and cousin.*"

Though some of the passages in this strange epistle are of dark or doubtful import, it is easy to gather from it that Elizabeth was fully aware of James's busy intrigues with respect to the succession,—a subject on which she had always been reserved, but which, as her end approached, she regarded with increasing aversion. His embassies to foreign princes with reference to this matter, his attempts to ingratiate himself with the Roman Catholic party, and the "band" recently formed among his own subjects in defence of his title, had all given deep offence, and were probably still rankling in her mind. It was painful to see that the decay of nature, which she would fain have concealed even from herself, was obvious to others, and that such anxious preparations were in progress in anticipation of her decease. But the source of deepest mortification was the correspondence of James with her own courtiers, and the eagerness with which, as she was well aware, they "were looking," as she expressed it, "to the rising sun."

On the 19th of November, James's queen gave birth to a son, at Dunferm— Birth of Prince line.† On this occasion the king Charles. remarked,—probably with some sentiment akin to superstition,—the singular coincidences that he himself was born on the 19th of June, Prince Henry, his son, on the 19th of February, Lady Elizabeth, his daughter, on the 19th of August, and that he himself first saw the queen on the nineteenth day of the month.‡ On the 30th of December§ the infant prince was baptised with much state and ceremony, under the style and title of Prince Charles—a name afterwards distinguished in history as that of the unfortunate Charles I.

At this time James was gratified by the receipt of a friendly letter from Elizabeth, conveyed to him by his ambassador, Captain Preston, who had just returned from the English court, to which he had been commissioned to carry an account of the Gowrie conspiracy. Concerning that event Elizabeth expressed herself in her letter with great warmth, and professed deep thankfulness to the Almighty Power, by whom the king's life and liberty had been so wonderfully preserved. James in return frankly communicated to her all the secret intelligence he had received from Spain, and promised to assist her in the pacification of Ireland with a force of two thousand Highlanders.* He reckoned, however, without his host: the Highlanders, regarding the Irish as their kinsmen, and the Saxons as their ancient and bitterest enemies, peremptorily refused to stir on such an expedition. Fortunately their services were not required, as shortly afterwards the Earl of Mountjoy gained a decisive victory over the united forces of the Spaniards and Tyrone.†

At this time, two rival factions contended for the chief management of public affairs at the English court. These were headed respectively by the Earl of Essex, and Sir Robert Cecil, son of the lord treasurer, Burghley, both men of great ability and address, but of very different characters. In the former were united political talent of a high order, with the polish and affability of a courtier, and the generous bravery of a chivalrous soldier. The latter inherited much of the coolness, caution, penetration, and forecasting sagacity by which his father was so eminently distinguished. As might naturally have been expected, each sought to strengthen his present position, and to lay a foundation for a claim to future preferment, by securing the friendship of the King of Scots. James had the art to coquet with both, and thus to profit by their counsel, and to secure their interest, without fully committing himself with either. Essex, however, was deficient in caution. His correspondence with the Scottish king became known to Elizabeth, and probably contributed more than any other cause to render her inexorable in his hour of utmost need. Essex had been an especial favourite with the queen, even from his youth. She admitted him at an early age into her most intimate confidence, and distinguished him by the highest honours. At his own earnest desire, seconded by the insidious advice of his rival, Cecil, who gladly embraced the opportunity of getting him removed to a distance from the queen, he was appointed to the command of the army employed against Tyrone, in Ireland, and preferred to the high office of lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. His partial failure in both these capacities irritated the fretful temper of Elizabeth, who, urged on by the malicious representations of the opposite faction, wrote him a letter, in which she censured his conduct with a severity that drove him to despair. In the first paroxysm of his grief and indignation he contemplated making a sudden irruption into England, at the head of a chosen body of troops, and violently expelling his enemies from court. On further reflection, however, he abandoned this hazardous design; and, summoning around him a few confidential adherents, he suddenly embraced the resolution of repairing to the queen's presence, where he hoped, by his personal influence, to regain the favour of his mistress, and turn the tide of royal resentment against his enemies. Accordingly, travelling with the utmost expedition, he arrived at court, and presented himself unexpectedly before the queen, who, being taken by surprise, received him at first without any marked indications of displeasure. On the same day, however, having had time to reflect on his misconduct, she ordered him to be committed to the custody of the Lord-Keeper Egerton, and to be examined by the privy council. He was afterwards brought to trial, on the charge of misgovernment of Ireland, and of having relinquished the duties devolved upon him without the permission of her majesty. He was found guilty, and sentenced to deprivation of all his offices, and to imprisonment during her majesty's pleasure. The haughty spirit of Essex could ill brook this disgrace; and, after an unsuccessful attempt to incite James to interpose in his behalf through promises of assistance in vindicating his title to the English crown by force of arms, he broke out into open insurrection, a crime for which he was tried by a jury of his peers, and condemned to death.

Though James was too prudent to consent to the violent measures proposed by Essex, he entertained a warm affection for that unfortunate nobleman, and a high admiration of his genius, and was quite willing to accept the offer of his assistance in the event of any contest for the succession. Accordingly the present unhappy and precarious condition of Essex, now a prisoner in the Tower, under sentence of death, excited in James most painful sentiments of anxiety and commiseration. With the hope of arresting by intercession the fate impending over his friend, James lost no time in dispatching two ambassadors to the court of England,—the Earl of Mar, one of his most confidential friends, and Edward Bruce, Abbot of Kinloss, who is described as “a person of great judgment and experience.” They took their departure about the middle of February,* but so slow was the process of travelling at that period, that they arrived too late to save the unfortunate earl, who was brought to the scaffold on the 25th of the same month.†

frustrated, the ambassadors, in the name of their master, congratulated the queen on her escape from the treasonable attempts of Essex. Elizabeth, who was perfectly aware of James's correspondence with Essex, received their congratulations with coldness; and, on being presented with a sealed letter written by the king's own hand, complaining of her credulity in giving ear to every calumny raised against him by his enemies, she manifested strong symptoms of displeasure. When reminded of James's pecuniary necessities, and urged to make him some advances in return for his assistance against the common enemy, she refused to give any ready money, but promised to add two thousand pounds per annum to the pension she already allowed him,—querulously remarking, however, that while boasting of his services against the common enemy, it would be but consistent to hold less frequent intercourse with the pope and the court of Spain. On being moved to give some explicit declaration respecting the succession, she assumed a haughty and indignant tone, and expressed her astonishment at their presumption in daring to bring so repulsive a subject under the notice of her and her council.* The ambassadors were somewhat discouraged by this uncourteous reception; but their commission embraced other objects, in which they were more successful. They were instructed to sound the English nobility on the great subject of the succession, and labour to gain them over to the interest of their master; and as Essex, on whose influence James had placed so much reliance, was now dead, they were commanded, above all, to endeavour to gain over Cecil, who now, without a rival, wielded the whole power of the state, and as James expressed it in his secret instructions to the ambassadors, was “king there in effect.”† The success of the ambassadors in these delicate and important negotiations amply compensated for the coldness and reserve of Elizabeth. Many of the English nobility, and other persons of rank and influence, professed their attachment to the cause of the king, and gave assurances of their support in the maintenance of his just claim against every competitor.

Cecil professes his attachment to the king's interest.

Even the cautious Cecil, who had hitherto stood aloof, now signified his adherence, and opened up a secret correspondence with

James, who thus had the happiness to find the main obstacle interposed between him and the accomplishment of his hopes, converted into an auxiliary, and to feel that the great prize so long and so ardently coveted was already within his grasp.

Previously to this happy result of their labours, the ambassadors had written to their master, requesting instructions as to their parting interview with the queen, provided she continued to maintain the same reserved and sullen demeanour. The answer of James is too remarkable to be altogether omitted. It exhibits a favourable specimen of his temper and his talents, and shows that he had pondered at once deeply and wisely the points to which it refers. “As to your doubt,” he says, “in what sort to leave there, it must be according to the answer you receive to the former demands: for if ye be well satisfied therein, then must ye have a sweet and a kind parting; but, if ye get nothing but a flat and obstinate denial, which I do surely look for, then are ye, in both parts of your commission, to behave yourself thus:—

“First, ye must be the more careful, since ye come so little speed in your public employment with the queen, to set forward so much the more your private negotiation with the country; and if ye see that the people be not in the highest point of discontentment (whereof I already spake), then must ye, by your labours with them, make your voyage at least not all utterly unprofitable; which doth consist in these points: First, to obtain all the certainty ye can of the town of London, that in due time they will favour the right; Next, to renew and confirm your acquaintance with the lieutenant of the Tower; Thirdly, to obtain as great a certainty as ye can of the fleet by the means of Lord Henry Howard's nephew, and of some sea-ports; Fourthly, to secure the hearts of as many noblemen and knights as ye can get dealing with, and to be resolved what every one of their parts shall be at the great day; Fifthly, to foresee anent* armour for every shire, that against that day my enemies have not the whole commandment of the armour, and my friends only be unarmed; Sixthly, that, as ye have written, ye may distribute good seminaries† through every shire, that they may never leave working in the harvest until the day of reaping come; and generally to leave all things in such certainty and order as the enemies be not able, in the mean time, to lay such bars in my way as shall make things remediless when the time shall come.

“Now, as to the terms ye shall leave in with the queen, in case of the foresaid flat denial, let your behaviour ever be with all honour, respect, and love to her person; but, at your parting, ye shall plainly declare unto her, that she cannot use me so hardly as it shall be able to make me forget any part of that love that I owe to her as to my nearest kinswoman; and that the greatest revenge I shall ever take of her shall be to pray to God to open her eyes, and to let her see how far she is wronged by such base instruments about her, as abuse her ears; and that although I shall never give her occasion of grief in her time, yet the day may come when I shall crave an account at them of their presumption, when there will be no bar betwixt me and them.‡

"You shall plainly declare," he adds, "to Mr. Secretary and his followers, that, since now, when they are in their kingdom, they will thus misknow me, when the chance shall turn I shall cast a deaf-ear to their requests: and whereas now I would have been content to have given them, by your means, a pre-assurance of my favour, if at this time they had pressed to deserve the same, so they now, contemning it, may be assured never hereafter to be heard, but all the queen's hard usage of me to be hereafter craved at their hands."*

It can scarcely be doubted that these menaces, communicated through the ambassadors, were mainly instrumental in inducing Cecil, at this juncture, to break the silence, which, it is probable, the fear alone of arousing the absurd jealousy of Elizabeth had led him so long to maintain. This might be inferred from the extraordinary caution he displayed on this occasion. Before communicating with the ambassadors on this forbidden topic, he placed them under solemn injunctions, and even oaths of secrecy.† He then unbosomed himself freely, professed his perfect satisfaction with the equity of the king's claim, and assured them of his zealous determination to uphold it, when the time should arrive, to the utmost of his power. James, who felt that to gain this highly influential personage was, in fact, to gain the object of his solicitude, eagerly accepted these offers of assistance; and, though he had long looked on the secretary with a doubtful eye, he soon gave him his unreserved confidence, and finally intrusted to his able hands the whole conduct of this momentous affair.

Under the guidance of Cecil, the ambassadors continued for three months to follow out their instructions, during which time they succeeded in gaining assurances of attachment and promises of support from many of the English nobility who had hitherto stood aloof. Even Elizabeth herself had softened down, and, although she still maintained her reserve with respect to the engrossing subject of the succession, manifested a degree of amicable feeling, from which the envoys augured hopefully of the object of their mission. In a letter to James, with which she intrusted them, while she mildly complained of his having again pressed this painful topic upon her attention, she expressed her satisfaction that he had done so openly and to herself, and warned him that he had nothing to expect by holding secret communication on this matter with any of her subjects. After expressing some kindly and respectful sentiments with respect to Mar and Kinloss, whom she denominates a "well-chosen couple," she adds, "let not shades deceive you, which may take away best substance. * * * An upright demeanour bears ever more poise than all disguised shows of good can do. Remember that a bird of the air, if no other instrument, to an honest king shall stand instead of many feigned practices to utter aught that may anywise touch him. And so leaving my scribbles with my best wishes that you scan what works becometh best a king, and what in end will best avail him. (I rest) your loving sister, that longs to see you deal as kindly as I mean."*

Towards the end of October, James dispatched the Duke of Lennox on a private Mission of mission to London, with general Lennox to instructions to seize every opportunity of pushing forward his claims, to labour to secure fresh adherents to his cause, and to confirm alliances already formed. It happened that the English parliament—the last that was held during the reign of Elizabeth—was then sitting; and while, on the one hand, hopes were entertained by the friends of James that the question of the succession would be taken up by that body, the jealousy of the queen was excited, on the other, lest the opportune visit of Lennox should have some reference to a topic, any allusion to which was sufficient to discompose her.† Lennox, however, had the address not only to lull these suspicious asleep, but to ingratiate himself into her favour and confidence, by offering his services as leader of the Scottish forces destined to assist the English army against the rebellious Irish and their Spanish auxiliaries. But though the most alarming rumours were again in circulation of hostile preparations on the part of Philip, so high had Lennox risen in the queen's estimation, that from a regard to his personal safety, she declared she would not suffer him to peril his life in such a hazardous expedition.‡

As the health of Elizabeth declined day by day, the competition to anticipate, and, if possible, monopolize the favour of the future sovereign, led to a system of misrepresentation, slander, abuse, and fulsome flattery, which Competition of the English courtiers to secure the favour of James. to a prince of James's discernment must have been deeply disgusting. Cecil and his party had already succeeded in obtaining his unreserved confidence, and, in reality, were at this moment his authorised and most active agents; but not satisfied with this, they laboured incessantly to vilify the opposing party in the State, and to persuade James that it was composed of men not only utterly unworthy of credit, but even, if honest, incapable, from their want of influence with the country, of rendering him the smallest assistance. At the head of this party were the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Cobham, and Sir Walter Raleigh; and as it was obviously the interest of James to secure the cordial co-operation and support of all, Lennox had considered it one of the most important objects of his mission to conciliate this party,—a course of policy which ought not to have excited the jealousy of Cecil and his adherents. They were resolved, however, that, so far as they could prevent it, James should be indebted for his success to none but themselves. Actuated less by patriotic motives than by a base and engrossing selfishness, they viewed all others as rivals, rather than as fellow-workers in the same great cause, to which they professed such a zealous and devoted attachment. No effort, accordingly, was spared to exaggerate the merits of their own services and to depreciate those of others; and it is but justice to Cecil's party to say, that in the article of courtly flattery they far outstripped their opponents. Cecil, indeed, himself still kept in the background. He appeared to be entirely absorbed by the cares of the State, and anxiety to please his royal mistress; whilst, by means of his agent, Lord Henry Howard, he kept up an active correspondence with the King of Scots, whose affairs, at this time, occupied by far the largest share of his time and attention. For the correspondence referred to, though nominally Howard's, Cecil is at least equally responsible; and it is but fair to infer that he must have formed a very low estimate both of the judgment and the moral feelings of the master he was so anxious to serve, when he imagined he would be gratified by the revolting and often impious, if not positively blasphemous adulation, in which that correspondence abounded.*

James was shrewd enough to detect the selfishness of Cecil and his coadjutor in their attempts to injure the reputation of their competitors, and wise enough to consult his own true interest. He wrote to Northumberland, thankfully accepting of his proffered services, and treated with kindness, respect, and gratitude, all, of whatever party, who professed attachment to his interest.

Cecil and his party were not a little disconcerted by these proceedings. They discovered that they had greatly underrated James's penetration, and that instead of a puppet, who should move only when they pulled the strings, they were courting a master who had sufficient sagacity to perceive his own interest, and sufficient decision of character to pursue it. Cecil was far too politic and ambitious to quarrel with his future sovereign, and thus to throw him into the hands of his opponents, but he had received a lesson which compelled him and his courtly agent to change their tactics.

All now was fair weather with James, but one black cloud still continued to darken the horizon, and who could say whether it might not portend a storm, which might eventually blast all his hopes? Was it to be expected that the Roman Catholics, a body so numerous and powerful at home, and supported by formidable foreign alliances, would yield without a struggle to a Protestant succession, and thus lose, or at least indefinitely postpone, their chance of ascendancy in England? The opportunity of once more asserting what was considered to be a sacred right had been ardently longed for, and was now about to occur; and the supreme pontiff had already sent his briefs to England, admonishing all persons there who owned his spiritual jurisdiction to acknowledge no man as king, whatever might be the nature of his title, unless he should take an oath to maintain and promote the Roman Catholic religion to the utmost of his ability. James was, in fact, in a very perplexing situation. He had coquetted with the papists, and flattered their expectations; he had corresponded with the pope, and intrigued with Spain. Was he now to break with this party, to dash the hopes he had raised, and thus to incur the active opposition of a powerful confederacy both at home and abroad; or was he, by adopting a policy of toleration and indulgence, to arouse against his claim the yet more formidable hostility of Elizabeth and the Protestants of England? Fortunately for James, there was at this time a division in the popish camp arising out of this very question of the succession. The Romanists were now split into two factions, that of the English exiles, under the leadership of Paget, and the Spanish faction, at the head of which was Father Persons, who, under the assumed name of Doleman, had published the celebrated treatise on the succession. As the former had all along insisted on the legality of Mary's title, they could not with consistency deny the claims of her son; and were willing, on the death of Elizabeth, to acknowledge him as their sovereign, provided he would guarantee to them the free exercise of their religion. The latter had advocated the cause of the Infanta, in support of whose claim Doleman's treatise had been written, but, despairing of success in their original object, they now aimed merely at securing the succession of a Roman Catholic prince.* James eventually succeeded in conciliating both parties. By a series of secret intrigues, the history of which is involved in much uncertainty, an impression in his favour had been made on the whole Roman Catholic body, both in England and on the continent. The last obstacle was now surmounted, and all men looked forward to his succession as a matter admitting no longer either of doubt or dispute.†

Relieved from all further anxiety on a subject which had so long held him in a state of feverish excitement and activity, the king once more addressed himself to the laudable task of endeavouring to heal those dissensions which still unhappily prevailed among the Scottish nobility. A temporary success crowned his efforts in this good work, and that atrocious system of private warfare arising out of family feuds, which, bequeathed from son to son, had for generations distracted the country and desolated some of its fairest provinces, was for the present suppressed. Deadly contentions were succeeded by mutual friendships, family alliances cemented the new-born amity of hereditary enemies, and great joy pervaded both the court and the country.*

The long and brilliant career of Elizabeth was now rapidly approaching its termination, and all the servile tribe of courtiers and other expectants of royal favour, convinced that they had nothing further to look for at her hands, began openly and most assiduously to pay court to her successor. Men of all ranks, sects, and parties, eagerly pressed upon his notice their professions of attachment to his person, and their readiness to acknowledge his claim and submit to his government. The ingratitude of princes has become proverbial, but it is at least equalled by the ingratitude of courtiers. Some even of her own servants, whom past benefits ought to have strongly attached to their aged mistress, began to desert her, and in their eagerness to participate in the bounty of the new sovereign, longed for the hour of her dissolution. That hour was now at hand. The queen's disorder, which was daily increasing, was much aggravated by a cold which she caught about the middle of January, in removing from Whitehall to Richmond, and she never afterwards rallied. The gradual decay of nature was hastened by a settled melancholy, which was generally attributed to her grief for the death of the Earl of Essex, for whose memory she cherished an extraordinary regard, and whose name she could not mention without tears. She struggled long and resolutely against the attacks of "the last enemy," but resistance becoming no longer possible, she forsook all her customary diversions, shunned society, sat almost constantly alone, and sighed, groaned, and wept incessantly. She abstained almost entirely from food, refused all the medicines prescribed by her physicians, and declared she did not wish to live longer. She resisted all the entreaties of her attendants to undress and retire to bed, but sat on cushions night and day with her finger pressed upon her lips, as if afraid some secret might escape her, and her eyes fixed vacantly on the ground.* In this condition she continued for ten days and nights, during which she rarely uttered a word, but the inarticulate expressions of despondency which she emitted, showed that her mind was a prey to intense suffering. Her mental agony was evidently hastening the dissolution for which she longed, and it was thought proper to send for the ministers of religion. Whitgift, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and her almoner, the Bishop of London, were speedily in attendance. They earnestly exhorted her to take some nourishment, and to avail herself of the remedies prescribed by her medical attendants. They were unable to shake her resolution, and she persisted in saying she did not wish to live any longer. When advised by the archbishop to fix her thoughts upon God, she answered that she did so; and when exhorted to provide for her spiritual safety, she replied, "That I have done long ago."† She grasped the hand of the primate, and seemed to listen attentively to his prayers, and though she did not join audibly, she was observed to lift her eyes towards heaven, and to clasp her hands, as if engaged in devotion.‡

The privy council having assembled, Cecil, the Lord Admiral Howard, and the Lord Keeper, were deputed to wait upon the queen, to know her pleasure with respect to her successor; but she seemed reluctant even yet to break the mysterious and obstinate silence she had all along maintained on this important point, and notwithstanding the unqualified assertions of historians to the contrary, § it is by no means certain that she ever unequivocally signified her wish that James should succeed her on the throne. Her answer to Cecil, who now importuned her to make an explicit declaration on this subject, was vague and unsatisfactory; "her throne," she said, "had been the throne of kings, and she would have no mean person to sit upon it." So far, however, were Cecil and his co-deputies from construing this declaration as conclusive in favour of James, that they urged the dying princess to make a more definite announcement of her will; and, on her remaining silent, named successively the King of France and the King of Scots, but without eliciting any word or token of approbation. On their mentioning, however, Lord Beauchamp, the heir of the house of Suffolk by his mother, the Lady Catherine Grey, she became agitated with indignation, and fiercely replied, "I will have no rascal's son in my seat."§ It is affirmed by Lady Southwell, one of the maids of honour, who was present, that these were the last words the queen uttered on this subject, and that, in fact, after the close of this interview, the queen never spoke again. Nor is this contradicted by the account of Cecil and the two lords who accompanied him, though they declared positively that, at a subsequent hour of the night, the queen intimated by unmistakeable signs that the King of Scots should be her successor. But, besides the difficulty that commonly exists of interpreting with certainty signs made by a sufferer during the agonies of death, it must be recollected that Cecil had so deep an interest of his own in securing James's succession, that his testimony should be received with great caution. There is, moreover, something so fanciful in his interpretation of the sign as to throw suspicion over the whole story. The expiring queen, it would appear, when James's name was mentioned, had joined her hands together, and, raising herself in her bed, held them over her head as if to represent a crown, thereby intimating that he alone was entitled to wear her crown. However this may be, the basis was certainly too narrow for the superstructure; and had James's claim to the succession rested on no other foundation, it could not have stood for a single hour.

Between two and three o'clock on the following morning, the 24th of March, 1603, Elizabeth, then in the seventieth year of her age, and forty-fifth of her reign,* expired calmly and without a struggle. By six o'clock the same morning, the privy council had assembled in London, and before ten o'clock the important event was made known to the people by the proclamation, first at the gate of the palace at Whitehall, and afterwards at the cross in Cheapside, of James VI. as king of England, in virtue of his title as nearest of kin to the deceased monarch, and, as it was alleged, by her own express appointment. The announcement appeared to give general satisfaction to the people; and a copy of the proclamation was immediately transmitted to Ireland to be published there. The council prolonged their sedesunt until ten o'clock in the evening, when they dispatched Sir Charles Percy, brother to the Earl of Northumberland, and Thomas Somerset, son of the Earl of Worcester, with a letter communicating the intelligence of the queen's death to the Scottish king. This letter was subscribed by upwards of thirty councillors and noblemen,† who, in their own names and those of the whole nobility and commons of the kingdom, invited him to take possession of the throne of England, and humbly proffered their allegiance to his "majesty's person, to whose right the lineal and lawful succession of all their late sovereign's dominions" was declared "justly and only to appertain." The messengers, however, were anticipated in their mission by Sir Robert Carey, the youngest son of Lord Hunsdon, who was ambitious of the distinction of being the first to salute the Scottish monarch in his new capacity as King of England and Ireland. This gentleman, who was a near relative, and had been an especial favourite of the deceased queen, after being for five years Warden of the Middle March, happening to be on a visit to court, and observing the declining state of the queen's health, determined to remain and embrace the opportunity, now evidently not distant, of putting his design in execution. Some difficulties, however, lay in the way, as Cecil, apparently apprehensive of some such project being on foot, had, on the last night of the queen's life, ordered all the gates of the palace to be kept shut. Assisted by his sister, Lady Scrope, one of the ladies in waiting, Carey managed to surmount this obstacle.

He stationed himself, ready equipped for the journey, underneath one of the windows of the palace, and no sooner had Elizabeth drawn her last breath than Lady Scrope, who was watching by her couch, hastily drew from the queen's finger a ring which had been the gift of the Scottish king, and abruptly leaving the apartment, and opening the window of an adjoining chamber, dropped it down to her brother. Carey was instantly on horseback, and such was the extraordinary speed with which he posted to Scotland, that although he did not leave Richmond until three o'clock on Thursday morning, he arrived at the palace of Holyrood on Saturday night, shortly after the king had retired to bed. He was instantly admitted into the monarch's apartment, and, falling on his knees, saluted him as King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, and then presented him with the ring—the appointed token—in the name of his sister. James received the intelligence with thoughtful composure, and, without betraying any emotion of joy, gave the messenger his hand to kiss, bade him good-night, and dismissed him. Percy and Somerset did not arrive until three days afterwards, and, during the interval, as Carey was only a private messenger, no intimation of the great event was made to the people. It is observable that Cecil and the lords of the privy council must have received information of Carey's self-imposed mission before dispatching their own messengers, as the letter with which they were entrusted contains a severe censure on the conduct of that gentleman. "Farther," they say, "we have thought it necessary to advertise your highness, that Sir Robert Carey is departed this morning from hence toward your majesty, not only without the consent of any of us that were present at Richmond at the time of our sovereign's decease, but also contrary to such commandments as we have power to lay upon him, and to all decency, and manners, and respects which he ought to so many persons of our degree; whereby it may be that your highness, hearing by a bare report only of the death of the late queen, and not of our care and diligence in establishing your majesty's right here, in such manner as is above specified, may either receive report or receive doubts of other matters than, God be thanked, there is cause ye should; which we would have clearly prevented if he had borne so much respect to us as to have staid for a common relation of our proceedings, and not thought it better to anticipate the same. For we would have been loath that any person of quality should have gone from hence, who should not with report of her death have been able to relate these first effects of our assured loyalties."*

On the last day of March, James was proclaimed, at the Cross of Edinburgh, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, amidst the enthusiastic acclamations of the people, who seemed to accession of honour to themselves. As his immediate presence in London was absolutely necessary, not only to take formal possession of the vacant throne, but to satisfy the wishes of the people, who were impatient to welcome their new sovereign, James began, without delay, to make preparations for his departure. He entrusted the government of Scotland to his privy council; committed his eldest son, Prince Henry, to the care of the Earl of Mar; Prince Charles to Sir Alexander Seton, President of the Session; and the Princess Elizabeth to the Earl of Linlithgow; and appointed the queen with his children to follow him in about a month.

On the Sunday immediately preceding his departure the king attended public worship in the High Church of Edinburgh, when a sermon was preached by Mr. John Hall, in which he expatiated on the Divine goodness to his majesty in having given him peaceable possession of the powerful kingdom now subjected to his rule; exhorted him to thankfulness; and urged him to manifest his gratitude by steadfastly maintaining God's truth, and labouring to promote the welfare of his subjects. After the sermon the king rose, and addressed the congregation in a speech of some length, and which was frequently interrupted by the sobs and tears of his audience. He professed an unalterable affection towards his people of Scotland; promised frequently to visit them; and declared that, "from the meanest to the greatest," they should always have ready access to his person to "pour out their complaints in his bosom." He reminded them that, though removing to London, he was more accessible to them, and they to him, than if he had been removing to Inverness or Aberdeen, "for all our marches," said he, "are dry, and there be ferries betwixt them. Therefore," he added, "think not of me as of a king going from one part to another, but as a king lawfully called, going from one part of the isle to the other, that so your comfort may be greater." He concluded his address—which is remarkable for its simplicity, its apparent earnestness, and the absence of that affected ornament by which his orations were generally distinguished—by requesting the prayers of the people in his behalf.*

On Tuesday, the 5th of April, the king set out on his journey, amid the tears rank; the Bishops of Ross and Dunkeld, and several of the ministers of the Kirk. In addition to these, his train was swelled by many of the English nobility and gentry, whom the hope of sharing in the favour of the new sovereign had drawn to Scotland. He was met at Haddington by a deputation from the synod of Lothian. He received them with courtesy and kindness, assured them that he had no intention of making further innovations in the Church, and exhorted them to live together in peace and amity. He halted on the first day at Dunglas, a mansion belonging to Lord Home, and next day, with a train augmented by continual accessions, he arrived at Berwick. He was received on the frontiers of his new dominions by the Marshal, Sir John Carey, amidst the shouts and acclamations of a vast multitude of people, and the discharge of musketry and artillery from the fortress. On entering the gates, he was presented with the keys of the town by William Selby, the gentleman porter, on whom he conferred, on the spot, the honour of knighthood. On reaching the market-place, he was received by the municipal authorities, headed by the Mayor, who presented him with a purse containing two thousand pounds sterling in gold coins.* Here also he was welcomed by the Bishop of Durham in the full costume of his ecclesiastical rank; an harangue was made in his honour,† according to the custom of the time, and people of all classes loudly testified their gratification at the presence of their prince.

Next day the king examined the fortifications and magazines, and reviewed the troops stationed in the place. During his brief stay in Berwick, he was called on to exercise, for the first time, his royal authority as King of England. Intelligence was brought to him of some alarming depredations committed by a gang of desperate freebooters, amounting to about three hundred men, who, after plundering and laying waste the open country, now seemed to threaten a hostile inroad into the town of Penrith. He lost no time in dispatching Sir William Selby against the marauders, with a body of two hundred foot soldiers and fifty horse, authorising him to demand the co-operation of all the troops, both English and Scotch, at the various military stations on his route. A large force was thus speedily collected, and the banditti, taking the alarm, dispersed and fled in all directions. Their leaders, however, were captured and carried to Carlisle, where they paid with their lives the penalty of their crimes.

In his progress through England he visited Newcastle, York, Doncaster, Newark, Burghley, Royston, and other towns, and was everywhere welcomed with demonstrations of loyalty and joy, and entertained with the most princely magnificence.‡ The noblemen and gentlemen of the country escorted him throughout their respective counties,§ and eagerly vied with each other in the costliness and splendour of the banquets prepared for him at their houses and castles, and the gifts which they proffered for his acceptance. The jails in the different towns through which he passed were thrown open, and all the prisoners were set at liberty, with the exception of such as were confined on charges of murder, treason, and other heinous crimes.* The whole journey occupied about a month, and all historians of the time agree in representing it as one continued triumphal procession. James himself, who was inordinately fond of field-sports, was so transported, that he compared it to a prolonged hunting excursion.

James entered the capital of his new dominions on the 7th of May, 1603, attended by a numerous retinue of noblemen and gentlemen from all parts of both kingdoms, and greeted by the deafening acclamations of countless multitudes, unanimous in their loyalty to their new sovereign. The Lord Mayor and aldermen of London met him at Stamford Hill, arrayed in all their official trappings, and with a mounted band of five hundred of the citizens, ushered him into the metropolis, and attended him as far as the Charterhouse, near Smithfield, where he was met by the Recorder of London, who addressed him in a long and elaborate oration, abounding in expressions of loyalty, and the most exaggerated and fulsome panegyrics. Inflated as many of these eulogies may seem to us on a calm perusal, it is probable that, in the enthusiasm and excitement of the occasion, they were meant to express no more than the general sentiments of the people, who were intoxicated with joy at the commencement of a reign, from which they expected a large increase of national happiness and prosperity. The Recorder concluded his oration in these words:—"Receive, then, most gracious sovereign, that loyal welcome which our city sendeth out to meet your majesty. Our city, which, for the long trial of her loyalty, obedience, and faithful readiness in all occasions, your majesty's royal progenitors have honoured with the title of their chamber; whose faithful citizens, with true and well-approved hearts, humbly lay at your royal feet their goods and lives, which they will sacrifice for your majesty's service and defence, with longing eyes desiring to receive your majesty within their walls, whom they have long since lodged in their hearts. Praying to Heaven that your majesty's person may be free from practise, your soul safe from flattery, your life extended to the possibility of nature, and that if not your natural life, yet your royal life may have a period with the world, your princely offspring sitting upon their father's throne for evermore; and we, your majesty's humble servants, surrendering into your majesty's hands that authority we hold from you, wish, from our hearts, that all plagues may pursue his posterity that but conspires your majesty's danger."† kingdom which had long been regarded with hostile feelings by the English nation, obtain possession of the throne of England, not only without a contest, but with the cordial approbation of all parties in the State, both religious and political. The combination of circumstances which led to this result was as rare as it was fortunate. His hereditary right, indeed, according to the established law of succession, was unquestionable. He was the third in descent from Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII.;* and, after the death of Elizabeth, the grandchild of that monarch was the only male representative of the house of Tudor. But in an age in which might so frequently triumphed over right, this claim, though legally indisputable, might, through a concurrence of opposing events, have been easily set aside; or, at all events, the opposition of any powerful party might have left the succession to be determined by the result of a civil war. The vacillating and often contradictory conduct of James with respect to religion operated singularly in his favour, by exciting the hopes of all the great religious parties in the kingdom, however much opposed to each other. The Puritans, who considered the presbyterian doctrines as nearly allied to their own, anticipated under his sway the amplest toleration. The established clergy augured well for their order from his known predilection for Episcopacy: and even the Roman Catholics looked for indulgence at the hands of a monarch who had secretly corresponded with the Pope, intrigued with Spain, and incurred the odium of his own Church, by the toleration and even favour he had shown to his Scottish Roman Catholic subjects. Nor was there any competitor to divide the suffrages of the nation. The absurd claim set up in favour of the Infanta had never been supported by more than a section of the popish party, while it was utterly repudiated by the rest;† and, after her marriage with the Archduke Charles, had been finally abandoned as hopeless.‡ Besides all this, the ministers of Elizabeth, anxious to perpetuate their power, had, towards the close of her reign, eagerly sought to pre-occupy the favour of her only probable successor, by employing the whole weight of their influence in support of his claim; and, finally, it was alleged and generally believed that Elizabeth, on her death-bed, had nominated him as heir to her crown.

The union of Scotland and England under one monarch, though not immediately productive of all the advantages which were naturally expected to result from it, was the first step towards that more intimate incorporation, under which Great Britain has risen to a degree of national prosperity, power, and eminence, and to a position in the great European family, which, separately, neither country could ever have attained.

CHAPTER XLII.

JAMES THE SIXTH.

A.D. 1603—1625.

THE vast accession of power and wealth which State of the James had now acquired, placed country. him in a position to carry out many of those improvements which he had long meditated, and to rectify many of those disorders which he had long helplessly lamented in his paternal dominions. The condition of Scotland at this period was, indeed, in many respects truly deplorable. The people were in general wretchedly poor, and the want of resources for pursuing extended commercial schemes had, at last, as was natural, been followed by a decline of industry, and a repression of that spirit of enterprise, which is at once a cause and an effect of national prosperity; and by which, in later and happier times, Scotchmen have been eminently distinguished. The removal of the seat of government fell like a blight upon the capital, whose inhabitants were mainly supported and enriched by the expenditure of the royal household, and that of the noblemen and gentlemen composing the court, and the numerous official personages by whom by it was occasionally visited, or who were permanently resident in its neighbourhood. The manufactures of the country were few and simple, and consisted for the most part of the coarsest productions for home consumption.* The trade, which was extremely limited, and confined to a few small seaport towns, consisted almost entirely of raw produce, such as hides, wool, sheep, black cattle, and fish, which were exported in small vessels and bartered, for the most part, for such articles of luxury as were then in demand among the wealthier orders of the people. Nor was agriculture in a more thriving condition. The methods employed were rude and unskilful, and even in the most fertile districts of the country, the poverty both of landlords and tenants obstructed or prevented improvement. Many of the nobility and other landed proprietors, attracted to the neighbourhood of the court, exhausted their fortunes in vain attempts to vie with their more wealthy neighbours in luxury and splendour, while their tenants were impoverished and oppressed in order to supply the money necessary for these extravagances. Both were thus reduced to comparative indigence; large portions of the soil, which might have proved an inexhaustible source of individual and national wealth, lay unreclaimed, and the remainder so poorly cultivated as to yield a return far below its capability. All ranks of the community suffered accordingly, so that the union of the two crowns, so far from being productive to Scotland of the benefits expected from it, seemed, in the first instance, to threaten the ruin of that part of the kingdom. These were far from being the only evils with which James had to grapple. The fierce and turbulent Borderers still maintained their lawless and predatory habits, and, regardless of their new relations as fellow-subjects, continued their mutual inroads and depredations with all the sanguinary hostility of hereditary enemies. In the northern districts of the country the restraints of law were equally powerless for the preservation of order; and deadly feuds and sanguinary conflicts among the numerous petty chiefs and their retainers desolated the country, and not unfrequently bands of these hardy mountaineers, descending into the Lowlands, alarmed and pillaged the inhabitants. The islands afforded refuge to a race of men at once more savage and less accessible to the arm of the law: they, in fact, were nests of pirates, the terror of the adjacent mainland and surrounding seas, and scarcely less fierce and formidable than those who were wont to infest the rocky and desolate islands of the Mediterranean.

For repressing these disorders and improving the condition of the country, James now possessed means sufficient, if judiciously applied; but he seems to have fallen into the mistake common at that crisis, of expecting all these ameliorations to spring, in a great measure, from the union of the two kingdoms. He accordingly proposed, as a preparatory measure, that both Proposal for an should concur in the formation of incorporating an "incorporating union," and an union. equal participation in all the rights which each respectively enjoyed.* What he understood by an "incorporating union," appears plainly to have been the introduction of the English law into Scotland. "It was not," he said, "his desire to deprive England of its laws, but to lay Scotland subject to the same laws. He did desire that they should be subjected both to one rule and to one law. I mean, such a general union of laws as may reduce the whole island, that as they live already under one monarch, so they may be governed by one law."† This measure, when proposed to the English parliament, met with so little favour that, in a conference which took place between both houses, it was not without difficulty that the Chancellor, Lord Ellesmere, prevailed on the members to agree to the appointment of forty-four commissioners, to negotiate with the Scottish parliament on this important matter. When this body assembled at Perth, on the 11th July, still greater reluctance was manifested to take any steps towards the proposed union; and it was not until the King signified his displeasure at their delay, that the nobles agreed to the nomination of thirty-six commissioners appointed. Commissioners to treat with those of England. The parliament, however, expressly prohibited any compromise of the independence of the kingdom, or any alteration in its laws and constitution; and limited the powers of the commissioners to the abolition of such laws and local customs as were calculated to keep alive the memory of hostilities between the two countries, or were likely to lead to their revival. On the first mention of a union, the ministers became alarmed for the safety of the Church. They were apprehensive, not without reason, that, with uniformity in civil laws, an attempt would be made to enforce uniformity in religion; and the commissioners of the General Assembly petitioned for leave to summon a meeting of that body to concert measures for maintaining intact the constitution and discipline of the Church. Their request, however, was refused by the king, who alleged that the union under consideration would in no respect interfere with the rights and liberties of the Church, but was purely a political matter, in which that body had no immediate concern.

The Countess of Mar refuses to deliver the young prince to the queen.

Before taking her departure for London, the queen, accompanied by a small retinue, proceeded to Stirling, in order to bring with her the young prince, her son, who was there in the keeping of the Countess of Mar, to whose care he had been committed during the absence of her husband at court. The countess, however, resolutely refused to part with her charge without the express authority of the king; and the queen, in consequence, became so exasperated that she fell seriously ill, and gave premature birth to a child at Stirling, on the 10th of May. On the 12th, the Earl of Mar arrived with a message from the king, but her majesty refused to see him, and desired only to have the letters from his majesty, of which Mar was the bearer. These, however, he declined to deliver up, unless he were admitted to an interview, at which he might have an opportunity of discharging his secret commission. Both parties were obstinate, and both immediately wrote to the king, desiring to know his pleasure regarding this unseemly contest. The king instantly dispatched the Duke of Lennox to Stirling, who arrived on the 19th, bringing with him a commission to convey the queen and the prince to London, and a declaration "that the Master of Mar, his mother, and friends, had done good service to the king."*

constrained to smother her resentment; but having obtained possession of her son, and having sufficiently recovered her health, she left Stirling for Linlithgow on the 27th of May, accompanied by the duke and several other noblemen. Next day they reached Edinburgh, and, on the 1st of June, took their departure for England. On the queen's arrival in London, a stormy interview seems to have taken place between her and her royal consort. She refused to be reconciled to Mar, and being exhorted by the king to thank God for the peaceable possession he had obtained of the throne of England,—an event which had been brought about chiefly through the instrumentality of Mar in his last embassy,—she passionately replied, "She would rather never have seen England, than have been beholden to him for it." Such was the queen's resentment against the unfortunate earl that James, at last, brought the matter before the privy council; and Mar having, in order to appease her wrath, condescended to make an humble submission, the council passed an act declaring that, as the refusal on the part of Mar's family to restore the prince was without his orders or even his knowledge, that nobleman had done nothing derogatory to the honour of her majesty. Notwithstanding all this, it was not without great difficulty that she was prevailed on so far to overcome her aversion as to consent to see Mar before the ceremony of the coronation.*

James had not been more than a few weeks in London when a conspiracy, or Raleigh's Plot.

rather, as it would seem, a congeries of separate conspiracies was detected, known in history by the name of "Raleigh's Plot." Much obscurity hangs over this affair. The conspirators appear to have had neither object nor plan in common; and, if acting in combination at all,—a circumstance which has never been very clearly brought to light,—their only bond of union seems to have been their common dissatisfaction with the new order of things. A Roman Catholic gentleman, named Sir Griffin Markham, had formed the design, in conjunction with two popish priests, Watson and Clark, of endeavouring to extort from the king some concessions in favour of their religion; and Lord Grey de Wilton, a puritan, had formed a similar design for the relief of that sect to which he belonged. It is not easy to conceive how there could be any coalescence between parties in pursuit of objects so irreconcilably different, unless we suppose that they aimed at securing universal toleration—a principle at utter variance with popery in all ages. Be this as it may, their plans of procedure were similar. Each was to present a petition to the king, supported by such overpowering numbers as to intimidate him into compliance. These schemes, which were not very carefully concealed, attracted the attention of certain unprincipled adventurers, who cared nothing for the success of either party, but who banded themselves together for the purpose of seizing an opportunity of promoting their own selfish purposes in that moment of general confusion which was expected to arise. At the same time, a conspiracy was in progress for deposing the king, and raising Arabella Stewart, his cousin, to the throne. At the head of this plot were the celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh and Lord Cobham—a young nobleman who is described as utterly unworthy of such a companion even in crime. The foundations of this scheme seem to have been more deeply laid, as the conspirators had been led to expect assistance from the King of Spain, and the Archduke of Austria. The leaders of these conspiracies, and a number of their agents, were arrested, tried, and condemned, and several of them were put to death. Lord Grey de Wilton, Markham, and Cobham, were pardoned after they had laid their heads on the block. Raleigh was reprieved, and committed to the Tower; and, after suffering a rigorous confinement for fifteen years, was at length brought to the scaffold. It is worthy of remark, that on the trial of this great man, and his despicable coadjutor, no evidence whatever was produced of their guilt, except the confession of Cobham and his inculpation of his accomplice, in the hope of saving himself at the expense of his friend.

At this time London was visited by a fearful Plague in London. Pestilence, which continued for several months, and carried off weekly thousands of the inhabitants. In the midst of the gloom and perturbation thus occasioned, the king and queen were solemnly crowned at Westminster, and, immediately after the ceremony, the court was removed from the capital, and an order was issued prohibiting the nobility from repairing to London before the commencement of winter.

In obedience to the command of the king, the commissioners assembled at Westminster, but so strong as yet were their national prejudices and jealousies, so crude and imperfect were their conceptions of what was necessary to form the basis of a permanent union, and so little did they understand their own interests, that, after repeated and protracted conferences, scarcely any progress was made in the business assigned to them. With the exception of one man, the illustrious Bacon, they seemed incapable of understanding how the two kingdoms could be incorporated while each retained its distinct nationality, its own ecclesiastical establishment, and its ancient system of jurisprudence. On these points it was vain to look for agreement. The Scottish commissioners, in obedience to their instructions, and deeply imbued with that patriotic feeling by which their countrymen are still distinguished, would agree to nothing that seemed to imply the surrender of the smallest particle of the national independence. To do this would be to sink Scotland—which, despite secret intrigue and open hostility, had for ages proudly maintained her national existence—into a mere province of the British Empire. The commons were not alive to the commercial advantages of an unrestricted intercourse with their more wealthy neighbours. They had as yet little or no trade with other nations. Their manufactures were few and simple, and were intended only for home supply; and so imperfectly were the benefits of commerce understood, that they regarded the export of raw produce as injurious to the public interest. The nobility, on the other hand, even if they had been prescient enough to perceive that the extension of commerce would necessarily lead to an amelioration of the condition of the country, by encouraging arts and manufactures, promoting industry, extending knowledge, elevating the mass of the people, and increasing the national wealth, were probably unwilling for such prospective advantages, in which they had only an indirect interest, to sacrifice the hereditary distinction and importance of their order, to lose their share in the management of public affairs, and sink into the obscurity of private gentlemen, in all but the title, which would thus become little more than an empty sound.

The English commissioners were not less hampered by narrow views and illiberal prejudices. They erroneously considered the advantages of the proposed union as exclusively on the side of the Scots, and were unwilling to admit to a participation in their rights, privileges, and national traffic, a race whom they regarded as aliens and intruders, except on conditions which the Scottish commissioners rejected with scorn, as implying the utter extinction of the independence of their country. Nothing less was insisted on than an entire surrender of the ecclesiastical and civil polity of Scotland, and the unqualified acceptance of the religious establishment and municipal laws of the sister kingdom.

It was thus found impossible to arrive at any agreement as to the basis of a union, which was in consequence indefinitely postponed. Certain conciliatory measures, however, were concurred in, which tended to draw closer the bonds of amity, and by leading to the gradual dissipation of mutual prejudices, contributed to pave the way to that happy incorporation of the two kingdoms, which took place in a subsequent age. It was agreed that all laws and customs having a tendency to perpetuate hostile feelings between the two countries should be abolished, and that the name of "the Borders" should henceforth be discontinued. In accordance with these salutary proposals, James assumed the title of King of Great Britain, ordained that the distinctive names of England and Scotland should no longer be employed in public acts and proclamations, gave orders that all the Border strongholds should be deprived of their outworks, and their gates of iron converted into ploughshares, and withdrew the garrisons from the fortresses of Berwick and Carlisle. His anxious desire to promote at least a feeling of union between the two divisions of the island already united under his sway, was further characteristically manifested by his ordering gold and silver medals to be struck, on which were inscribed the mottoes, "Quæ Deus conjunxit nemo separat,"* and "Paciâ eos in gentem unam."†

At the instigation of the king, the commissioners further proposed, for the consideration of parliament, that the post nati, by which term they designated all persons born after the decease of Elizabeth, should be entitled to all the privileges of the natives of both kingdoms; and that the whole people of Great Britain should be capable of inheritance in both countries, and equally admissible to all honours, dignities, and offices—with this exception, that until a complete union should be effected, no one should be permitted to hold any situation under the crown, or have any voice in the legislature, save in his native country.* Beyond a few regulations regarding commerce and the admission of the natives of each country into the trading companies of the other, no nearer approach to an incorporating union was practicable at this period. National jealousies and prejudices were still too strong, and the principles on which such a union could be based with safety and mutual advantage were not sufficiently understood.

The union of the two crowns, though ultimately productive of incalculable advantage to both kingdoms, was in the first instance in many respects prejudicial to Scotland. The vast wealth, and consequent power and influence which the king had thereby acquired, enabled him to carry out those projects which he had long meditated for the subversion of the constitution and discipline of the Presbyterian Church, and the establishment of a form of ecclesiastical polity scarcely less abhorrent to the nation than that of popery itself. Whether James had ever been sincere in his professions of attachment to the Scottish Church it is impossible to determine, though there are not wanting facts which might incline us to answer this question in the negative. Though often compelled to yield to the force of circumstances, he was from the first at heart an unmitigated despot. At an early period of his reign he had begun to entertain ideas of the royal prerogative utterly inconsistent with anything deserving the name of civil liberty, and, as he advanced in life, we find him engaged in a constant struggle to stretch that prerogative over the Church, and to constitute himself supreme judge in ecclesiastical as well as civil affairs. The system of self-government, as well as the separate and exclusive jurisdiction claimed by the Church, seemed to him incompatible with the very existence of kingly government; and his favourite apothegm of "No bishop, no king," which he often repeated, showed how closely the presbyterian form of church government was associated in his mind with republicanism—of all forms of civil government the most repugnant to his transcendental notions of the rights of kings, and the necessary subordination of the people. Notwithstanding his often reiterated and solemn protestations of inviolable attachment to the Kirk, and his assurances, confirmed by oath and attested by tears, of maintaining to the utmost of his power its privileges and independence, he had scarcely mounted the throne of England when,

The king proclaims his adherence to prelacy. in an address to his parliament, he openly proclaimed his adherence to prelacy. "At my first coming," he said, "though I found but one religion, and that which by myself is professed, publicly allowed, and by the law maintained, yet I found another sort of religion, besides a private sect, lurking within the bowels of this nation. The first is the true religion which by me is professed, and by the law established."* Nor was this all: he now commenced a system of persecution in Scotland, with a view to the utter extirpation of Presbyterianism from that country,—a system which was pursued with inflexible pertinacity, and relentless violence, through the remainder of his reign; and which, bequeathed to his descendants, for many years deluged Scotland with blood, and, by a righteous retribution, ultimately proved the ruin of his race.

The chief events of the next three years belong to another department of this History; but it may be here observed that, in a parliament held at Perth

in 1606, the presbyterian constitution was completely overthrown, and the royal prerogative declared to extend over all persons and causes whatsoever, civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical. "The setting up of bishops of new," was decreed, "with their whole livings, rents, privileges, conform to those of old in time of popery, and a confirmation of their new gifts; and the erection of seventeen prelaties in temporal lordships." Concerning the king's prerogative, it was declared, "the estates and whole body of this present parliament all in one voluntary, humble, faithful, and united heart, mind, and consent, truly acknowledge his majesty's sovereign authority, princely power, royal prerogative, and privilege of his crown over all estates, persons, and causes whatsoever within his said kingdom."† Again, in the Act of Supremacy passed by the same parliament, we find the following clause: "The king's majesty, whom the whole estates of this present parliament, of their bound duty, with most heartily and faithful affection, humbly acknowledge to be sovereign monarch, absolute prince, judge, and governor over all persons, estates, and causes, both spiritual and temporal, within this said realm."‡ popish machinations, is so framed as to contain an explicit admission of the same doctrine of ecclesiastical supremacy. That famous document runs thus: "I, ———, for testification of my faithful obedience to my most gracious and redoubted James, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, affirm by this, my solemn oath, testify and declare, that I acknowledge my said sovereign only supreme governor of this kingdom, over all persons and in all causes; and that no foreign prince, power, state, or person, either civil or ecclesiastic, has any jurisdiction, power, or superiority over the same. While the country was harassed by persecutions, and distracted by dissensions, arising out of James's interests were on the decline, its manufactures languished, its fisheries were neglected, its incipient commerce seemed on the point of extinction. Nor was this all: an irregular and partial administration of justice had loosened the bonds of society, emboldened great criminals to set the law at defiance, and acted most injuriously on public morality. Hereditary feuds had revived, and had grown to such a height that the proceedings of parliament and the courts of law were frequently interrupted, business was obstructed, and the public peace disturbed by deadly conflicts even in the streets of the capital.† These grievances attracted the notice and awakened the solicitude of the king, who, in a convention of Estates held at this time, recommended the state of the country to the attention both of the nobility and the commons. The intervention of the privy council was, for a time, partially successful in suppressing the public outrages arising from long cherished animosities among the great families and their retainers; but such was the difficulty or uncertainty of obtaining redress from the courts of law, and such were the chances of escaping punishment, even for the most atrocious crimes, that the practice of private revenge, which Lord Bacon has defined to be a species of "wild justice," was gradually superseding the legal tribunals of the country. Sir Walter Lindsay, a relation of the Earl of Crawford, was treacherously assassinated by that nobleman, who, nevertheless, as if he had been guilty of no crime, or had only performed a necessary act of justice, continued to reside openly and without molestation in the capital; until a nephew of the murdered man, taking the law into his own hands, collected a band of armed men to avenge the death of his kinsman, and, in the encounter which ensued, Lord Spynie, another relative of the family, attempting to separate the combatants, was accidentally slain. About the same time, a contest had arisen between the Earl of Morton and Lord Maxwell, each of whom claimed the right of holding courts in the district of Eskdale; and as neither would yield, instead of appealing to a court of law, they prepared to decide the matter in dispute by force of arms. The privy council, however, interposed, and ordered both parties to dismiss their followers, who had already taken the field, and were on the point of commencing the conflict. Morton obeyed; but Maxwell, proving refractory, was, after some delay, arrested and conveyed a prisoner to the Castle of Edinburgh. After a confinement of two months he contrived to make his escape, and, eluding all pursuit, was proclaimed an outlaw. In these desperate circumstances his life was preserved through the fidelity of his friends and followers, but a sense of personal injury still rankled in his bosom, and as, in his present condition, he could obtain no redress from the law, he determined to avenge his own wrongs. Accordingly, he invited the chief of the Johnstons—who had slain his father—to a friendly conference, under pretence of engaging him to intercede with the king to procure his pardon, and having Treachery of thus got the unsuspecting chieftain Maxwell in his power, he basely murdered him by shooting him through the back.* Deeds such as these, perpetrated under colour of justice, manifested a radical defect in the administration of the country, and called loudly for the application of some powerful and immediate remedy.

But while such was the alarming condition of the central provinces of the kingdom, where a higher civilisation might have been expected, the inhabitants of the northern and southern districts, and the population of the scattered islands of the Hebrides, were still less under the restraints of law, and less accessible to the coercion of the government.

The social condition of the Highlands at a previous period of the History has Condition of the been already described, and at the Highlands. period which we are now considering it had undergone little or no alteration. The people of these wild and mountainous regions owned little more than a nominal subjection to the royal authority, at least, the allegiance due to the sovereign was always held to be subordinate to that which they had been accustomed to yield to their hereditary chiefs, who ruled, each over his little sept, with absolute and irresponsible sway, and whose commands were implicitly obeyed, not from motives of fear, but with the ready alacrity of confidence and affection. These petty tribes were at almost perpetual war with each other, and their hostilities were generally carried on with savage and unrelenting cruelty. An affront or an injury to the humblest individual from one of another tribe was held to be an insult to the whole clan—it was never forgotten or forgiven; nothing but blood could atone for it; if not avenged by one generation, the feud was bequeathed as a precious legacy to the next; when force would not avail, no treachery, however base, was deemed dishonourable; and when opportunity offered, the extermination of a whole family, or even a clan, was not considered too great a sacrifice to their revenge. In a state of society in which human life was held so cheap, it could not be expected that the laws of property should be regarded. Accordingly mutual depredations, either by stealth or open violence, were matters of daily occurrence, and the cunning was equal to the rapacity with which they were perpetrated. But, besides plundering each other, not unfrequently several clans uniting, would descend like a flood upon the wealthier districts of the neighbouring Lowlands, and sweeping away flocks and herds and harvests, would retire with equal precipitancy to the security of their mountains.

An attempt was made to restrain the excesses of these lawless hordes by compelling them to deliver hostages, who should be answerable with their lives for the peaceable behaviour of the clans to which they belonged, for the restoration of property taken by pillage, and the surrender of notorious criminals to the public authorities; but such methods of dealing with semi-barbarous tribes were not easily pursued, and were found to present too feeble a barrier against the outbreak of those fierce passions, which were but little accustomed to either internal or external control. One of the most turbulent of these clans was that of the Macgregors, who made repeated inroads into the district of Lennox, and plundered and massacred the Colquhouns, with whom they had long been at deadly feud. To put a stop to these enmities, a commission was given to the Earl of Argyle to proceed against these sanguinary marauders, and compel them to respect the authority of the law. In this expedition he was joined by the Marquis of Huntley, with a formidable array of armed followers; but no sooner did the Macgregors become aware of their advance, than they fled with their women and children to the most inaccessible parts of the Highlands, and sought for shelter in the caves and forests of these inhospitable regions. Tracked and pursued by Argyle and Huntley, they wandered about for months, subsisting entirely by plunder, until fatigue, exposure, and famine, had thinned their numbers and reduced them to despair. Their chief, finding further resistance vain, at last surrendered to Argyle, on condition of being transported out of the kingdom. The privy council, however, on whom this condition was undoubtedly binding, treacherously "kept the word of promise to the ear, but brake it to the hope." They ordered as a rebel, along with seven individuals who had been detained as hostages, but who had not participated in the crimes for which he suffered. In the meantime, the wretched remains of his clan pursued their predatory wanderings through the Highlands, until, at last, Argyle, having discovered their lurking places, fell upon them with such indiscriminating and merciless slaughter, that a band of defenceless orphans were almost the only survivors.* As these grew up to maturity they became a fierce and hardy banditti, who so harassed the surrounding country with their depredations, that, at a subsequent period (1633), the clan itself was abolished, and the very name of Macgregor suppressed and prohibited by act of parliament. This statute was repealed at the Restoration,* revived in 1693, and it was not until so late as the reign of George III. that it was finally annulled.†

The people of the Hebrides, or Western Islands, are represented as still more barbarous than those of the High-Hebrides. This may be partly accounted for from their insular situation, by which they were for centuries almost entirely cut off from all communication with the more civilised portion of the nation, with which they had little more than a nominal connexion, but still more from the adverse influences to which the race had for ages been subjected. Originally a colony of vagrant Irish, they had fallen under the domination of a race of Norwegian pirates, and added to their own original barbarity the still more revolting barbarity of their conquerors, the most ferocious and brutal of mankind. Their territory continued in the possession of the Norwegians for nearly four hundred years, and though ceded to Scotland about the middle of the thirteenth century, little seems to have been done to reclaim the savage islanders, or improve their condition. They are spoken of by historians as a race deficient in religion, morality, and common humanity, and almost incapable of subordination or culture. James himself seems to have entertained the lowest opinion of them, and to have despaired of being able to reclaim them to civilised life. "The Highlanders," he said, "that dwell on the mainland are barbarous for the most part, and yet mixed with some show of civility; they that dwell in our isles are utterly barbarous."‡

The project of colonising the islands, as a means of reforming the natives, and introducing among them habits of subordination and industry, had already been repeatedly tried, and had uniformly failed; and James now proposed the expedient of expatriating the most turbulent and unmanageable among them, and supplying their place with more civilised inhabitants. Stornoway was selected as the first field for this new effort. The chieftain of the district was betrayed by his own brothers, and the subjugation of the islanders was effected without difficulty. An attempt was then made to divide and appropriate the island of Lewis, but after some progress had been made the colonists were attacked during the night, their houses were burnt, and they were compelled to relinquish their newly acquired possessions. A succeeding expedition was alike unsuccessful. The colonists, unable to maintain their ground against the ceaseless hostility of the natives, abandoned the project, and returned home.§ At last the islands, with the exception of Lewis and Skye, were offered to the Marquis of Huntley for ten thousand pounds, but he declined giving more

 Condition of what more advanced in civilisation, than those of the Highlands and islands, while their position on the confines of the two kingdoms rendered them much more troublesome and dangerous.

 Like the Highlanders, they were divided into septs or clans; they were not less devoted to their chiefs; they were equally averse to industry, impatient of the restraints of law, bold, warlike, enterprising, and addicted to theft, robbery, incendiarism, and ruthless violence. Before the accession of James, the mutual depredations and desperate inroads of these savage tribes had frequently endangered the peace between the two kingdoms; but all the efforts of both governments had hitherto failed to eradicate their predatory habits, and subject them to the authority of the law. To effect this the most severe measures were now adopted. The most formidable and notorious offenders were conducted by Buccleuch to the Continent, where most of them were cut off in the Belgic wars; while those who were left behind were almost totally exterminated through the merciless severity of the Earl of Dunbar. The de- batable lands, as they were called, which had hitherto separated the two countries, without properly belonging to either, and which had consequently become an asylum for criminals of all sorts, were now divided, and a part allotted to each kingdom; and a whole tribe of Grahams, who had rendered themselves conspicuous for their crimes, above all the other freebooters of the Border, were forcibly ejected from their settlement on the banks of the Esk, and transported to Ireland.† By these severities the Border districts were at last reduced to some degree of subordination. The fertile fields, which had been allowed to lie waste, began to be cultivated, and the habits of the people began to exhibit many symptoms of improvement. But the licentious manners and disregard of moral principle which had so long prevailed, were not thus to be rooted out; and it was not until after the Restoration, when the persecuted ministers, who had sought an asylum among the moors and mountains of that part of the country, had introduced among the ignorant inhabitants some knowledge of letters, religion, and morality, that they finally abandoned their lawless habits, and assumed those of civilised society.

The important subject of the union with England was at this time again submitted to the consideration of an assembly of the Estates, who, in deference to the wishes of the king, manifested less reluctance than formerly to carry through that measure, but the English parliament were not so subservient. The discussions which took place among the members of that body showed that little progress had yet been made in estimating the mutual advantages of such a conjunction of interests, or in discovering any rational foundation on which it could rest, and the scheme was accordingly again dismissed as impracticable.

The profuse habits of the king, which previously to his accession had kept him in a state of degrading indigence, continued unaltered, and at last began to tell with alarming effect even on the rich revenues of the English crown. But, about this time, his hopes of an abundant supply for the relief of his own poverty, and that of the country, became suddenly elevated by the discovery of a silver mine in the neighbourhood of Linlithgow. The specimens first examined were unusually rich, Discovery of a silver mine near Linlithgow.

 James, however, disgusted his Scottish subjects by ordering the ore to be conveyed to London, to be refined in the Tower; and his own expectations, as well as those of the court and the country, were speedily disappointed, as the vein was soon lost or exhausted.* Similar hopes, ending in similar disappointment, were excited by the discovery of gold ore in Crawford Muir. Three thousand pounds were expended on this occasion in mining, and in the processes of extraction, and the result obtained was somewhat less than three ounces of gold.†

At the period of the Reformation the business of commissary or consistorial courts, which had previously devolved on the clergy, being then deemed inconsistent with their office, had been transferred to civil judges; but in a Parliament held this year, these courts were taken out of the hands of laymen and restored to the bishops, and their jurisdiction was extended to all spiritual and ecclesiastical causes arising within their respective dioceses. At the same time, a frivolous act was Act for regulat-laughing matter for those whom it more im-

contempt have arisen to the ecclesiastical estate of this kingdom, by the occasion of the light and indecent apparel used by some of that profession, and chiefly those having vote in parliament, it is, therefore, statuted that every preacher of God's Word shall hereafter wear black, grave, and comely apparel, becoming men of their estate and profession; likewise, that all priors, abbots, and prelates having vote in parliament, and especially bishops, shall wear grave and decent apparel, agreeable to their function, and as appertains to men of their rank, dignity, and place." That the high court of parliament should thus degrade its important function by a piece of elaborate legislation respecting a matter of costume may justly excite astonishment; but so subservient had that body now become, that there is reason to think the act, if not originally dictated by the king himself, was intended simply as a vehicle for courtly adulation. It concludes thus: "And because the whole estates humbly and thankfully acknowledge that God, of his great goodness, has made the people and subjects of this country so happy as to have a king reign over us, who is most godly, wise, and religious, hating all erroneous and vain superstition, just in government, and of long experience therein, knowing better than any king living what appertains, and is convenient, for every estate in their behaviour and duty; therefore it is agreed and assented to by the said estates, that what order soever his majesty in his great wisdom shall think meet to prescribe for the apparel of churchmen, the same being sent in writ by his majesty to his clerk of register, shall be a sufficient warrant to him for inserting thereof in the books of parliament, to have the strength and effect of an act."

The court of session had originally consisted of an equal proportion of temporal and-spiritual judges, but, after the Reformation, churchmen had been declared incapable of holding any civil or judicial office. With the revival of prelacy, the ambition of possessing secular power was not long in making its appearance among the clergy; and, at the request of the bishops, Spottiswood, Archbishop of Glasgow, was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, as a preliminary to the restoration of the court to its primary condition.* The pro-seution of this purpose was, however, speedily cut short by the establishment of two new tribunals investing the prelates with a measure of power far beyond what the most ambitious and sanguine amongst them had ever dared to expect. Without the intervention of parliament, and in virtue of his assumed prerogative alone, the king issued a commission under the great seal authorising the Archbishops of Glasgow and St. Andrew's to hold in these cities courts of high commission, similar to the court of that name already existing in England, for the trial of ecclesiastical offenders, and with authority to cite before them any individual, to examine into his life, conversation, and opinions on the subject of religion, and to excommunicate, fine, or imprison at their discretion. The powers conferred on the judges of this court were to the last degree arbitrary, from their decision there was no appeal; and so extensive was their jurisdiction over persons of all ranks, churchmen and laymen, that it may with truth be said that the civil, as well as the religious, liberties of Scotland were laid prostrate at their feet. On the translation of Spottiswood to the see of St. Andrew's the two courts were united, and never was an instrument of more grievous and harassing oppression employed by a weak and tyrannical prince.

On the death of the Earl of Dunbar, the favourite and the chief counsellor of the king, and a zealous and unscrupulous tool of his arbitrary power, the officers of state endeavoured to regain their influence in the councils of their sovereign by the revival of the Octavians—a body of commissioners, eight in number, who, it will be recollected, had formerly been entrusted with the collection and disbursement of the revenues of the crown; but James adopted another favourite, who, though far inferior in abilities to Dunbar, was at least his equal in obsequiousness, and succeeded to more than his influence. This was Robert Kerr, a young man of the family of Fer-

travels, had become the pupil and favourite of the king. He was now created Earl of Somerset, and appointed collector, treasurer, and comptroller of the royal revenues; and very soon he contrived to obtain for himself or his friends almost every office of trust or emolument in the State. His cousin, Sir William Kerr of Ancrum, obtained the command which had been held by Sir William Cranston on the Borders; his maternal uncle, Sir Gideon Murray, was appointed deputy treasurer; and his brother-in-law, Sir Thomas Hamilton, the king's advocate, was first made register, and subsequently appointed to the office of secretary. The ambition and cupidity of Kerr and his friends were viewed by the nobility with disgust and impatience; and these feelings were greatly heightened by the condemnation of Lord Maxwell without trial, and by a sentence pronounced in his absence. That unhappy nobleman, after having long arrested in Caithness, conveyed to Edinburgh, and summarily executed. But although the crime of which he had really been guilty must, if proved against him, have been followed by a capital punishment, he did not suffer for this crime, but for that of wilful fire-raising, which, as it was held to imply a species of treason, was punishable also with confiscation of his large estates. The flagrant injustice of these proceedings alarmed the nobility for the safety of their order, and deepened their indignation against the Kerrs, at whose instigation, and to gratify whose avarice, this ancient and noble family had been attainted and ruined. The next victim was the Earl of Orkney, whose exalted rank as cousin-german to the king afforded him no protection against the audacious rapacity of the favourite. Mary had bestowed on her illegitimate brother, Robert Stewart, the islands of Orkney, with the title of earl. His son, who had succeeded to his title and estates, having exhausted his revenues in the erection of sumptuous buildings, and other extravagant expenses, the king meanly purchased a large mortgage with which his estates were burdened; and the unfortunate earl having, after three years' imprisonment, refused to resign his right of redemption, his estates were seized by his royal cousin, and he was reduced to indigence. In this extremity he prevailed on his son, commonly called the Bastard of Orkney, to endeavour by force of arms to recover possession of the Castle of Kirkwall. In the meantime, the earl, having been conveyed to the fortress of Dunbarton, was prevented from taking any active share in this hazardous attempt, which, however, in the end proved his ruin. The castle was reduced by the Earl of Caithness, and the Bastard surrendered on condition that he should not be required to make any explanation tending to inculpate his father.

Orkney. He was arraigned on a charge of treason, convicted, and executed;* and his possessions, which consisted partly of certain episcopal revenues, of which he had received a grant from the crown, were divided between the bishops and the insatiable favourite.

It has been remarked that weak men in power are generally tyrannical. It was so with James; but such was the indolent facility of his temper, that he could easily be induced, through the persuasion of his favourites, to manifest a degree of lenity and indulgence alike inconsistent with his own dignity, and with the demands of public justice. His impolitic leniency to the chieftain of the Macdonalds stands in strong contrast with his severity towards his near relative, the unfortunate Earl of

Their chieftain, who had repeatedly resisted and defied the government, and who had been guilty of murder and other atrocious crimes, managed, in the meantime, to save himself by flight; and, in a few years afterwards, was not only recalled and pardoned, but had a handsome pension bestowed upon him.

A short time previous to these events, the Prince Palatine arrived in England with a numerous train, to solemnise his marriage, which had been previously negotiated, with the Princess Eliza-promise, was seized with a violent fever, which, on the fifth day, terminated fatally. He had been much beloved by the nation, but had become in the same proportion an object of jealousy to his father, and of aversion to his favourites, of whose exorbitant ambition, rapacity, and profligacy, he had often and openly expressed his abhorrence. His known attachment to the principles of the Protestant Church, while it rendered him obnoxious to the Roman Catholics, had greatly endeared him to the professors of the Reformed religion both at home and abroad. A very general belief prevailed at the time that he had died by poison; and the horrid imputation fell at first alternately on his father and on the popish party. History, however, affords no evidence to criminate either; but a dark shade of suspicion hangs over the memory of Somerset,* who had motives in this case sufficiently strong to instigate a mind like his to the perpetration of any conceivable atrocity. Charles I. is said to have assured Colonel Titus that he knew his brother was poisoned by Somerset; and, in a letter addressed by Charles to his sister, previously to his accession, he throws out some obscure hints, which seem to have reference to the same circumstance. "I know you have understood," he says, "by our father's secretary's letters, what great changes the poisoning of Overbury has made.† I suspect other matters shall be found out, by the which it will appear that more treacherous purposes were perchance intended against some, and practised against others; but of this you will hear more within a short time." The chancellor, the Bishop of Glasgow, and some others, were dispatched by the council with a message of condolence to his majesty, but ere they had reached Newcastle they were commanded by letters from the king to return home.‡ The court mourning was laid aside with indecent precipitation, and the marriage festivities proceeded with a gaiety apparently unclouded by the melancholy event which had just occurred.

Hitherto the union of the two crowns, so far from conferring on Scotland the commercial advantages expected from it, seemed to threaten with annihilation the little foreign traffic which that country already possessed. Previously to that event, the impost on Scottish merchandise imported into France had been so light as to afford peculiar encouragement to a commercial intercourse between the two countries, while the duties levied upon English commodities were so heavy as to be almost prohibitory. Now, however, that Scotland was no longer a separate independent state, the French government decreed a new tariff, by virtue of which the tax on Scottish imports was raised to an equality with that which had hitherto been laid on the products and manufactures of the sister kingdom. A similar regulation was adopted in the Low Countries; and in the states bordering on the Baltic, the trade with Scotland was entirely prohibited. No participation in the vastly more extended commerce of England had as yet compensated for these losses, which so seriously affected a large portion of the community that the convention of burghs thought it necessary to memorialise the king on the subject, and solicit his interposition. James, who had been all along anxious to encourage manufacturing industry and commercial enterprise in his native country, listened favourably to their request; but, though some ameliorations took place in consequence of his interference, he did not succeed in restoring the trade of the country to its former channels. He seems to have attached great importance to the fisheries of Scotland as a means of promoting the national prosperity, and suggested various plans for their encouragement and improvement; but, at the same time, with characteristic inconsistency, as well as despotism, imposed by his own sovereign authority so heavy a tax upon herrings that the fishermen, from whom it was exacted with unusual rigour, threatened entirely to abandon their occupation rather than submit to pay it; and so loud were their complaints, that by order of the privy council the tax ceased to be levied.*

The law denouncing the penalty of death against Jesuits and seminary priests was felt to be so inhuman that it had never hitherto been carried into effect; but, at this time, one Ogilvy, a Jesuit, having been apprehended in Glasgow, application was made by the bishops to the king requesting instructions how to deal with him. James, who had not the same motives as in the case of the popish lords to induce him to show leniency to this obscure individual, granted commission to the secretary, deputy-treasurer, and advocate, to examine him and bring him to trial. On his examination, he obstinately refused to name any individuals as his associates; and the commissioners, in order to extort a confession, had the shocking cruelty to cause him to be deprived of sleep for several consecutive days and nights. In the partial aberration of mind which supervened, he was induced to make some disclosures, real or imaginary, which, however, he positively retracted so soon as he was restored by repose to the proper use of his faculties. James, on being informed of his obstinacy, transmitted a series of interrogatories to be put to the accused, which, if explicitly answered, were almost certain to involve him in the guilt of treason, but, at the same time, prohibited the employment of torture to overcome his reserve. He was arraigned before the provost and bailies of Glasgow, as the king's judges in that part of the kingdom.* At a previous examination before the Trial, condemnation, and execution of Ogilvy. bishops and some members of the council, he admitted his belief in the supremacy of the pope, and his power to excommunicate princes; but when questioned as to the power of the pope to depose excommunicated kings, and to absolve their subjects from their oath of allegiance, and whether it was lawful to murder a king placed without the pale of the Romish communion, he declined to answer, alleging that these were points which the Church had not yet determined, and that neither the king nor his council were competent judges in these matters. This, which was construed into a decline of the authority of the king and council, was the substance of his accusation; and, as he had subscribed the answer with his own hand, there was no difficulty in establishing the fact. He was accordingly convicted of high treason, and hanged the same day. Various motives have been assigned by historians for this unjust and cruel proceeding, which certainly was not in accordance with James's previous policy in cases of this description. "Some," says Calderwood, who was a contemporary, "interpreted this execution to have proceeded rather of a care to bless the king's government, than of any sincere hatred of the popish religion. Some deemed that it was done to be a terror to the sincerer sort of the ministry not to decline the king's authority in any cause whatever."† Others have imputed it solely to the king's vindictive feelings against one who ventured to dispute the doctrines which he maintained.‡

Shortly afterwards another Jesuit, named Moffat, was apprehended and brought to trial; but he scrupled not solemnly to deny every proposition by which he might criminate himself, and was accordingly acquitted and allowed to leave the country; the king declaring, with an affectation of great liberality, that he never would hang a man for his religion.§

About the same time three papists, named Sinclair, Wilkie, and Cruikshanks, were brought to trial on a charge of harbouring Jesuits and hearing mass. They were convicted, and sentenced to suffer death, according to the iniquitous law then in force. On the following day they were brought, with their hands bound, to the scaffold erected at the Cross of Edinburgh, where a vast multitude had assembled; but at the moment when they expected the awful sentence to be carried into effect, a warrant was presented to the magistrates, commanding them to stay the execution, and the culprits were carried back to prison.||

Though James, on his leaving Scotland, had publicly promised a triennial visit to his native country, his promise had now remained unfulfilled for nearly fourteen years. His incurable poverty, arising from his own inveterate extravagance, seemed to be the chief cause of the delay. That obstacle, however, was now removed by the acquisition of the large sum of £250,000, which he received for the surrender of the cautionary towns

for visiting Scotland were "a natural and salmon-like affection, and earnest desire to see his native and ancient kingdom of Scotland," as well as to discharge some points of his kingly office, so far as he might without giving offence to his subjects, in respect to either civil or ecclesiastical matters. He promised that he would do nothing without the approbation of all parties, and that he would hear complaints and redress grievances, if any such existed.* He sent also directions that the palace and the chapel-royal, should be repaired, and that such alterations should be made in the latter as were necessary for the reception of an organ, and the accommodation of the choristers. To decorate the interior of the edifice, wooden statues of the twelve apostles, curiously carved and richly gilt, were sent down by sea, and landed at Leith, under the care of some English workmen, who had been entrusted with the superintendence of the alterations.† These innovations alarmed the people, who regarded them as the probable harbingers of the introduction of popery; and so loud and general were their murmurs and discontent, that some of the bishops, dreading an outbreak of popular fury, wrote to the king entreating him to remove the cause of offence by countermanding his order for setting up the images. James had the prudence to accede to this request, but unwilling to have the appearance of yielding to what he stigmatised as ignorant clamour, he declared that he had done so, "not to ease their hearts, or confirm them in their errors, but because the work could not be properly finished within the time intended."

The king re-entered Scotland on the 13th of May, attended by a numerous concourse of English nobility, clergy, and gentlemen of all ranks, and proceeded from Berwick, at which point he crossed the Border, by slow stages to the capital. He stopped two nights at Dunglass, the seat of the Earl of Home, and one night at Seton, the residence of the Earl of Winton; and on the third day he reached

His arrival in Edinburgh, which he entered by Edinburgh. the West-port. Here he was received by the provost, the other magistrates, and the members of the town-council in their robes of office, and by a number of the principal citizens, some of them arrayed in gowns, and others bearing pointed staves.‡ An harangue, which continued for nearly an hour, was made, according to custom, by the town-clerk, in which he complimented the monarch in a style of bombastic and fulsome flattery such as we can scarcely now read without emotions of contempt and disgust. From the West-port the king proceeded immediately to "the Great Kirk," where a sermon was preached by the Bishop of St. Andrew's, and thanksgiving offered up for his majesty's prosperous journey. He was afterwards invited by the citizens to a sumptuous banquet, when they presented him with a purse of gold in a vessel of the same precious metal.* On his arrival at the palace, he was met by the professors and students of the university, who welcomed him in a Latin harangue, and presented him with a whole volume of poems in the same language, composed expressly for the occasion. Similar congratulations were presented to him in every town and university which he subsequently visited—a striking proof of the extensive culture of the classical languages at this period.

After a brief sojourn in the capital, James made a progress through the principal counties of Scotland. He was everywhere welcomed with enthusiastic demonstrations of loyalty and affection, and, at the different towns and noblemen's seats which he visited, was entertained with princely hospitality and magnificence.

James, who was eminently conceited and pedantic, took great delight in scholastic disputations, in which he might have an opportunity of ostentatiously displaying the acuteness of his intellect, the readiness and brilliancy of his wit, and the profundity of his erudition. On a visit which he made to St. Andrew's at this time he presided at sundry disputations, instituted no doubt for his special gratification, among the members of that ancient seat of learning. He subsequently ordered all the professors of the College of Edinburgh to meet him at Stirling, where a grand debate was held in the chapel-royal within the castle, in the presence of many learned men, and a large assemblage of English and Scottish nobility. The king, though he presided on this occasion, did not omit so rare an opportunity of astonishing his courtiers by an exhibition of his own intellectual gladiatorship. He entered the lists with the debaters, and not satisfied with the distinction of at least appearing to be victor in every encounter, still further displayed his skill by alternately attacking and defending the same propositions. At the close of the disputations he retired to supper; but he afterwards sent for the professors, and discoursed to them at great length on the various subjects which had been under discussion. Having finished his harangue, he proceeded to compliment the disputants individually on the manner in which each had acquitted himself in the contest. These laudatory remarks, which were intended to be exceedingly witty, were mixed up with a series of puns on the names of the professors; with which, however they might be regarded by the learned individuals to whom they were addressed, he was himself so much delighted that he ordered them to be rendered both into Latin and English verse. He further testified his respect for the professors by announcing himself as patron of the College of Edinburgh: he gave it the designation of King James's College, and ordered his name to be placed over the gates.*

The principal object of the king's visit to Scotland seems to have been to complete the work which he had begun, of enforcing uniformity in religious worship. He had already succeeded in overturning the presbyterian form of church government, but the mode of worship remained the same. This he now desired to abolish, and to substitute in its place the entire ritual of the English Church. An attempt had been previously made to effect this object, but, at the request of the bishops, it was not persisted in; and James now hoped to be able to accomplish his long-cherished purpose, by procuring the passing of an act which should invest him and his council with nearly absolute power in ecclesiastical affairs.

Parliament assembled on the 17th of June, when Meeting of James received a check which he parliament. little anticipated from a body that had been most obsequious during his absence. The nobles, indeed, cared little about the innovations he was desirous of introducing into the Church; but the great extension of the royal prerogative, and the growing power and ambition of the prelates, had begun to excite their alarm for the safety of their own order. They beheld with jealousy and apprehension the advancement of a body of men from the inferior orders of the people to an equality of rank with themselves; repined at the favours bestowed on them by the king; and, above all, they began to entertain suspicions that some design was in contemplation of still further extending the power and influence of the Church, by revoking the grants of church-lands, by which many of the nobility had been enriched at the time of the Reformation. After a short sermon by the Bishop of St. Andrew's, and a speech from the king, in which he expatiated on the great desire he had felt to revisit Scotland, that he might "see the Kirk settled, and the country reduced to good order,"† the parliament proceeded to the election of the lords of the articles. Here the barons made their first stand for the maintenance of their independence, and the security of their estates from revocation. They rejected nearly all the candidates recommended by the king, and chose, in their stead, men who were known to be less subservient to the court; and although it had hitherto been customary to conjoin the officers of state with the lords of the articles, their admission was now so violently opposed, and the contest rose so high, that the nobles were on the point of dispersing, and the king purposed to dissolve the parliament.

ment.* At length a compromise was made by the admission of the chancellor, the treasurer, and the master of the rolls; and the meeting broke up at a late hour of the night, amid the dissatisfaction of both parties, and in such confusion that the king and Estates, regardless of "the order of their going," and without being preceded, as was customary, by the crown, sword, and sceptre, huddled down to the palace, some in carriages and arrayed in their robes, and others walking on foot.†

The lords of the articles, though mostly chosen in opposition to the wishes of the king, were to the last degree obsequious to his will in matters about which they felt personally little concern. Accordingly, they secretly prepared an act, declaring "that in ecclesiastical affairs, whatever should be determined by the king, with the advice of the prelates and a competent number of the clergy, should receive the operation and the force of law."‡

It was easy to see that, as the choice and the number of the clergy to be consulted was thus left entirely to the king's own discretion, this act would naturally invest him with the sole and absolute direction of the affairs of the Church. It was, nevertheless, passed by the Estates in parliament; but intelligence of this design having previously reached those ministers of the Church who were still attached to presbyterianism, they prepared a protestation against it, in which they appealed to the law of the Church, established by various acts of parliament; to the reiterated promises of the king to make no innovation; and particularly those contained in his letter, written but a few weeks before, and publicly read by his command from all the pulpits throughout the kingdom. This protest was presented to parliament at the moment when the act was about to become law by the touch of the sceptre. It was impossible for James to proceed without convicting himself of repeated and deliberate falsehood. To avoid, however, the humiliation of yielding to remonstrance, he ordered the act to be withdrawn, declaring it to be superfluous, as by his royal prerogative he already possessed greater power than the act was meant to confer; and he considered it "very prejudicial to his prerogative and power to be bound to take advice."§

By another article, however, a further step was made towards uniformity, by establishing chapters for the different sees, and prescribing the mode of electing the bishops nominated by the sovereign.¶ The promoters of the protest, including Calderwood, the historian of the Church, whom we have so often had occasion to quote, were prosecuted on the charge of presenting "a seditious remonstrance," and punished with vindictive severity.||

Towards the end of July, James began to think of terminating a visit which had disappointed and

disgusted the people of Scotland, and was far from proving satisfactory to himself. As he had made his entrance by the east side of the island, he resolved to make his exit by the west. Leaving Stirling, he proceeded to Glasgow, where he remained two days. Thence he advanced to Paisley, and afterwards visited Hamilton, Sanquhar Castle, Drumlanrig, and Dumfries. Here the townspeople testified their loyalty by entertaining him at a public banquet, and after an affecting farewell sermon by the Bishop of Galloway, he recrossed the Borders, and on the same day (the 5th of August) reached Carlisle. During his stay here, intelligence was brought to him that John Brown, admiral depute under the Duke of Lennox, having sailed in one of the king's ships to collect the duties on fish, payable by the Hollanders who fished in the north seas, had been enticed on board a Dutch fishing vessel, and, notwithstanding his having produced the king's commission under the great seal, had been made prisoner and carried to Holland. Indignant at this insult, James sent orders to the magistrates of Edinburgh and other towns on the eastern coasts, to arrest all Dutch vessels found in the British seas, and commit their captains to prison. Similar orders were transmitted to London; and the English ambassador in Holland was directed to make complaint of this outrage to the Estates, and to demand that the offenders should be delivered up for punishment. This affair, however, which at first assumed so serious an aspect, seems to have terminated by the return of Brown shortly afterwards, who reported that he had simply been set ashore on the coast of Holland, and had been suffered to remain unnoticed and to depart unmolested.*

About the middle of November, great alarm was excited throughout the whole island by the sudden appearance of the south-east quarter of the sky of a prodigious comet, with a tail extending towards the north-west for forty-five degrees across the heavens. This natural phenomenon was universally regarded as the harbinger of some impending national calamity. Science has now stripped these occasional visitants of the terrors in which superstition was wont to array them; but their connection with coming events of a disastrous kind was then an article of popular belief, from which even cultivated minds were not exempt. "This comet," remarks a grave historian of the time, "by appearance portended the wars of Germany, which began not long after, and continueth yet to this hour."† Others believed that it foretold the death of the queen, an event which occurred on the 3rd of March following,‡ in the forty-fifth year of her age. Her

Death of majesty had been for more than a year in a declining state of health, but it was not until within a few hours of her dissolution that she would believe her life to be in danger. She had accordingly made no arrangements for the disposal of her property, which she now bequeathed verbally to her brother, the King of Denmark. It consisted chiefly of jewels, gold and silver plate, and clothing, and was said to amount in value to about one million pounds sterling.* At the time of the queen's demise, the king was confined by indisposition at Newmarket; but when he and his council were informed of the manner in which she had disposed of her valuable effects, the vessel destined for their conveyance was interdicted from sailing.† Her remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey, on the 13th of May, with great pomp and magnificence.‡ The death of his consort does not appear to have made any deep or lasting impression on the mind of the king. In less than three months, having recovered from his illness, he laid aside his mourning, and we find him making a public entry into London, arrayed in a suite of blue satin, with a white feather in his hat, and riding on a horse gaily caparisoned in the same colours.

At this time the states of Bohemia rose in arms in defence of their liberty and religion, and finally revolted from the house of Austria; but a powerful combination of Roman Catholic princes having been formed against them, they sought to strengthen their position by inviting Frederick, the Elector Palatine, son-in-law to the King of Great Britain, to become their sovereign. Relying on the countenance and assistance of his father-in-law, and of his uncle Maurice, then the ruler of Holland, he at once accepted the offer, and proceeded with the forces at his disposal to vindicate his claim. James, however, contrary to the earnest wish of his English subjects, refused to render him the least assistance. He considered the Bohemians as rebels against their lawful prince, whose authority, founded on what he conceived to be divine right, he regarded as inviolable and sacred. Frederick, who was a vassal of the emperor, by putting himself at their head had become involved in the same guilt. About two thousand English volunteers, however, were permitted to join him, but the result was disastrous. By the unfortunate issue of the battle of Prague, Frederick not only lost the crown of Bohemia, but his own hereditary dominions on the Rhine, and he and his house were reduced to ruin and driven into exile.

Influenced probably as much by the scorn and reproach of his subjects as by affection for his only daughter, James at length made an effort by negotiation to effect the restoration of Frederick to his dominions. With this view he lavished such an amount of treasure on embassies to different courts, that even war itself, while it would probably have been more efficacious as well as more acceptable to the majority of the nation, would scarcely have been more expensive. The exhausted state of his finances at length reduced him to the necessity of applying for relief to the English parliament, but the supply which they voted to him, though liberal, was not sufficient for his reckless extravagance. In this exigency he had recourse to Scotland for assistance by soliciting voluntary contributions from the nobility, the city of Edinburgh, and the College of Justice; but the characteristic caution of the Scots became alarmed lest such grants should form a precedent, and lead to the introduction of the vile system of "benevolences," from which their country had been hitherto happily exempt, and the request was firmly though respectfully declined, on the plea that there was a scarcity of money in the country.* As a last resource, he was recommended to summon a meeting of the Scottish parliament—a step to which he was extremely averse, as he had found the members of that body on a late occasion so unmanageable. All other projects, however, for raising money having failed, he was reduced to the necessity of adopting that expedient, and dispatched the Marquis of Hamilton as his representative, with commission to hold a parliament in Edinburgh.

Hamilton arrived in the capital on the 18th, and Meeting of parliament met on the 25th of parliament. July. After a short prayer, the reading of a passage of Scripture, and an address by the Bishop of St. Andrew's recommending the tax about to be proposed, Hamilton, as royal commissioner, opened the proceedings in a speech of great length, in which, after many unmerited panegyrics on the king, he represented his majesty's present pecuniary necessities as arising entirely from his constant disbursements for the support of his son-in-law, until, by means of negotiation, that unfortunate prince should be restored to his hereditary dominions; "from his continual sending ambassadors to France, Germany, and Spain, to travel for peace among Christian princes; and his extraordinary aids given to the German princes, to retain them within the band of friendship and alliance."† He affirmed that the king, in giving his daughter in marriage to the Elector Palatine, had been influenced solely by his regard to the maintenance of the Protestant religion, for the sake of which he had refused most tempting offers from some of the most powerful Catholic princes in Europe; and he added "that his majesty sustained and suffered more for the persecutions and afflictions of the Protestants, and for the defence of the Reformed Kirks, than did all the princes of the world besides."† He therefore urged them to be liberal in their contributions; assured them, in his majesty's name, that in that case he would not trouble them again with any similar demand; and insinuated for their encouragement "that he had a warrant to give way to a good advice, whereby money might abound in the country after the taxation."§ A subsidy of about four hundred thousand pounds Scots—equal to about thirty three thousand pounds sterling—was granted, but the manner in which it was proposed to be raised met with strenuous opposition. This was by a land-tax, and an impost of five per cent. on annual income. The former was agreed to without much discussion, but the latter was warmly resisted by the lesser barons, and particularly by the burgesses, who considered that the inquisitorial nature of the tax would be highly injurious to many persons engaged in business, by leading to disclosures which might injure their credit and occasion their ruin. Many of the noblemen and barons were no less adverse to this part of the scheme; and the commissioner, alarmed by apprehensions of its failure, had the presumption arbitrarily to prohibit them from exercising their undoubted right of assembling together to consult on the measures submitted to parliament before giving their votes; while, in the meantime, he treacherously laboured, through the intervention of pretended friends, to sow discord among them, and prevent them from acting in combination. It was at last agreed that, in addition to the land-tax, an impost of "the twentieth penny," or five per cent., should be levied on interest—a mode of taxation which showed how little the principles of political economy were then understood. To avoid exposing the poverty of the country to the English—among whom it was a favourite topic of reproach—the precise amount of the grant was artfully kept out of view; and poor indeed must Scotland have been at this time, since it was found necessary to spread the collection of a sum so comparatively small over no less a period than three years.*

In this parliament the "Articles of Perth," by which the English mode of worship was imposed upon the Scottish Church, were, after a most determined opposition, carried by a majority of twenty-seven, on assurance being given by the commissioner that no farther innovations would be proposed by the king. An important change was also introduced into the mode of electing the lords of the articles. Hitherto the temporal lords had nominated eight of the spiritual, and the spiritual eight of the temporal; while the commons, from their own order, had chosen eight commissioners for the shires and an equal number for the burghs. On this occasion the commissioner artfully managed virtually to throw the whole election into the hands of the king, by a manœuvre so dextrous that it seems at first to have escaped observation. The election, by Hamilton's order, commenced with the bishops, who nominated the temporal peers; these, in turn, nominated eight of the bishops; and the sixteen thus elected chose the representatives for the shires and burghs. By this device, as base as it was subtle, the choice, with one exception,† was confined to individuals who "by a private roll," had been previously selected for their known subserviency to the court.* The dissatisfaction of the populace with the passing of the five Articles was significantly manifested, on the last day of the parliament, by their sullenly remaining within doors during the procession of the Estates from the palace to the Tolbooth, and allowing it to pass through streets nearly deserted. A natural phenomenon, which occurred at the close of the sitting, was regarded by many of the zealous Presbyterians as an evident token of the Divine displeasure against the parliament that had so presumptuously interfered with their spiritual privileges. At the moment when the commissioner, rising from his throne, was about to confirm the Articles by the touch of the sceptre, a terrific thunderstorm suddenly burst over the place; three appalling flashes of lightning, each attended with a tremendous peal of thunder, followed one another in rapid succession; the house became involved in darkness, rendered more perceptible and solemn by the fitful illumination of the electric fire; torrents of rain fell together with hailstones of enormous size; the gutters were swollen into rivulets; and, after a confinement of an hour and a half, the parliament broke up in confusion, and, without the customary "riding in state" or the formality of carrying the regalia, the members hurried home, some in coaches and others on foot, with most undignified precipitation. This day (the 4th of August, 1621) was long commemorated in popular tradition under the name of "the black Saturday."†

The remainder of James's reign was disgraced by a series of harassing persecutions directed at first against the recusant ministers, and afterwards against private individuals. Armed with the authority of the law, and stimulated in their cruel career by the despotic intolerance of the king,‡ the bishops were guilty of atrocities by which Protestantism itself was deeply dishonoured, and which have left an indelible stain on the page of Scottish history. Nor were these the only calamities by which the nation was afflicted at this gloomy period. The harvest was late and deficient, and the price of food rose in consequence so high, as to subject the great mass of the people to unprecedented privations. "There was never seen," says a contemporary writer, "in this country, in so short a time, such inequality of prices of victuals; never greater fear of famine, nor scarcity of seed to sow the ground. Every man was careful to ease himself of such persons as he might spare, and to live as retiredly as possibly he might. Pitiful was the lamentation not only of vaging beggars, but also of honest persons."§ Throughout a great part of the autumn, but particularly in the month of October, rain fell so copiously and

corn, and cattle, and in many places laid the country entirely under water. The rivers Tay and Almond rose to such a height that the streets of Perth were completely submerged; much property contained in the lower parts of the houses was destroyed; a stately bridge across the Tay was broken down by the flood; and for five or six days the inhabitants were confined to their houses, or only communicated with each other by means of boats.* A new stone bridge recently erected across the Tweed, at Berwick, was swept away by the weight and impetuosity of the waters on the very day when it was to have been publicly opened by the mayor and magistrates of the town, by the insertion of the key-stone inscribed with the motto sent down by his majesty, "Hoc uno ponte duo regna conjunzi; Deus diu conjuncta seruet."†

Notwithstanding James's recent boast, that from his attachment to Protestantism he had rejected the offers of many powerful Roman Catholic princes who had solicited the hand of his daughter, he was now eagerly courting an alliance with a princess of Spain for his only son, the heir-apparent to the British crown. Among his Protestant subjects in both divisions of the kingdom, but more particularly in Scotland, this proposal excited universal alarm, which was greatly increased by his directing all priests and others who had been imprisoned for their attachment to popery to be immediately set at liberty. In obedience to his command, the lord keeper, in a letter addressed to the judges, informed them that it was his majesty's pleasure they should "make no niceness or difficulty in extending his princely favour to all such papists as they should find imprisoned in the jails of their circuits for any recusancy whatsoever, or for having or dispersing popish books, or hearing mass, or for any misdemeanour which concerned religion only, and no matter of State." The motives which induced the relentless persecutor of the Nonconformists to overstretch the royal prerogative at this juncture, in favour of the Roman Catholics, are too obvious to require to be stated; but, to the great joy of the nation, the detested match, which all this apparent toleration was intended to facilitate, was, after a protracted negotiation, finally broken off; the differences between the creeds professed by the two parties, and the difficulty of obtaining the consent of the pope, having presented insurmountable barriers to its completion.

James, however, who was fully sensible that his change of policy towards the papists had laid him open to grave suspicions, had the effrontery to attribute his conduct to his zeal for the protection of his Protestant brethren in foreign countries. He pretended that he was engaged in a negotiation with the King of France, for securing to the Protestants in that country the peaceable exercise of their religion, and with the King of Spain for the withdrawal of his troops from the Palatinate; and that, in order more readily and effectually to secure these desirable objects, he had thought proper to show the example of granting a limited degree of toleration to the Roman Catholics within his own dominions. These plausible prettexts deceived nobody. On the contrary, their utter disingenuousness disgusted and irritated the public mind, until at length the popular discontent manifested itself in murmurs sufficiently loud to discompose the jealous and overbearing temper of the king, to whom even complaint seemed an attack on his dearly cherished prerogative. He immediately wrote to the privy council of Scotland, haughtily commanding them to apprehend all persons who had the presumption to canvass his acts or impugn his motives, and to visit them with the severest punishment.

Meantime the bishops continued to employ, with such indefatigable diligence and unsparing severity, the sword which had been put into their hands, that the great mass of the people rejected their ministrations; and many began to assemble in private houses, where they enjoyed the instructions of their pastors, who, on account of nonconformity, had been deprived of their livings and driven from their charges. These proceedings excited the jealousy of the bishops, and called forth a fresh outburst of royal wrath. James forthwith issued a proclamation forbidding the holding of such private meetings, and certifying "that if any hereafter shall be duly verified to do in the contrary, in any of the pre-misses, they shall be esteemed and reported seditious, turbulent, and rebellious persons, contemners of our authority, disobedient to the laws of the Church and kingdom, and punished in their persons and goods with all extremity, in example of others."* This was followed by a severe rebuke to the magistrates of Edinburgh for their remissness in punishing such as refused obedience to the laws of the Church, and a peremptory command to all the inhabitants who were of age to attend the communion, and to receive it after the prescribed mode in a kneeling posture. This mandate was enforced by the threat that, in the event of non-compliance, the courts of law would be removed from the capital. This menace, however, failed to produce its intended effect, many of the principal citizens openly declaring that they would prefer seeing the city reduced to ashes; † and the attempt, which was no doubt made first on the capital from a persuasion that, if it could be brought to yield, the example would be followed by the rest of the country, was frustrated by the breaking out of the plague, which induced most of the principal inhabitants to remove from the city. ‡

Even at this early period, the press, that great adversary of arbitrary power, began to give James serious uneasiness. To have silenced it within his own dominions would have been no difficult task, but works printed in foreign parts, particularly in the Low Countries, found their way into the kingdom; and by means of these a spirit of thoughtful inquiry was fostered, and opinions were propagated, which he vainly laboured to eradicate. In these circumstances, James resorted to the coarse expedient still practised by despotic governments engaged in the hopeless task of forging fetters for the human mind. He issued a proclamation setting forth "that there were sundry seditious persons who had written certain pamphlets and books tending to treason and sedition against the king, which were printed in the Low Countries, and were to be brought in Scotland; and, therefore, all magistrates of seaports, customers, searchers, and other officers, to suffer no ships coming forth of the Low Countries to come within harbours, nor any merchant or passengers to come on land, till first the ships were searched for these seditious writs, pamphlets, and books; and that the same be presented to the lords, to be sighted by such as were appointed to that effect." The titles of the proscribed books were not mentioned in the proclamation,* and the selection being thus left to the discretion of the officials, their ungracious functions would be exercised with more or less discrimination and rigour, according to their individual opinions and feelings, or their readiness to signalise themselves as the zealous instruments of a tyrant's will. The publications chiefly aimed at were probably such as related to the subject of religion, as many of the persecuted ministers who had sought an asylum on the Continent still laboured to maintain a communication with their brethren at home, and to encourage them in the midst of their trials. Certain it is, that a day or two before the search commenced several works of this kind had been imported and disseminated.†

But James's reign, which had thus become a curse to his country, and, as a just retribution, a source of continual disquietude to himself, was now drawing to a close. In the beginning of March, he was deprived by death of his cousin and confidential councillor, the Marquis of Hamilton, for whom he had all his life cherished a sincere affection, and whose loss he now mourned with proportionate sorrow. A rumour prevailed at the time that Hamilton had been poisoned, either directly by the Duke of Buckingham, or at the instigation of that nobleman, ‡ who, like most of the unworthy favourites whom James at different periods of life had adopted, was capable of any atrocity. He was, however, never judicially accused of the crime, and the evidence which has been transmitted to us by contemporary historians is too slender to warrant so grave an imputation. James, though by no means an aged man, had been from his birth of a fragile constitution, and, probably beginning now to experience some symptoms of decay, he is reported to have exclaimed, when he heard of the death of Hamilton, "If the branches be thus cut down, the stock cannot be expected to survive long."* The indulgence of such melancholy forebodings may, indeed, have precipitated the final event, but for some months previously his health had been perceptibly declining; and a day or two after the demise of his relative, he was seized with a tertian ague, which, though to a robust constitution not generally a fatal disease, seems to have been an overmatch for his feeble frame, rendered probably a more easy prey to disease by his indulgence, during the latter years of his life, in the luxuries of the table, and particularly in copious potations of spiced wines, to which he was immoderately addicted. After the lapse of a few days, his disease assumed the form of a continued and violent fever, which baffled all the skill of his medical attendants; and after much suffering, during which he spoke but little, he expired on the 23rd of March, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, the fifty-seventh of his reign as King of Scotland, and the twenty-second as King of England. It was generally believed that his death was accelerated by poison, administered by the Countess of Buckingham, and her son, the profligate favourite to whom James had manifested such a blind and undeserved partiality. Circumstances, indeed, had occurred sufficient to account for, if not to justify, such a suspicion. Buckingham and his mother, who were in attendance on the king during his sickness, took upon them, in the temporary absence of the physicians and without their knowledge or consent, to mingle a white powder with the king's drink, and to apply a plaister to his heart and breast. Whatever might be the nature of these pretended remedies, it is certain that James, immediately after their administration, was seized with the most violent symptoms, and from that hour he never rallied. Dr. Eglisham, who had been one of the king's physicians for a period of ten years, having soon after the death of the king retired to Flanders, wrote and published a pamphlet in which he expressly accuses Buckingham of having poisoned, not only the king, but the Marquis of Hamilton, and various others of the nobility. The details given by Eglisham are remarkably circumstantial, and he offers to prove his accusations to the satisfaction of James's son and successor, as well as of the parliament. The publication is entitled "The Forerunner of Revenge upon the Duke of Buckingham, for the poisoning of the Most Potent King James, of Happy Memory, King of Great Britain, and the Lord Marquis of Hamilton, and others of the nobility; discovered by Mr. George Eglisham, one of King James his Physicians for his Majesty's Person above the space of Ten Years." The work consists of two parts, the first being in the form of a complaint addressed to King Charles, and the second in that of a "Petition, or humble Supplication to the Most Honourable the Nobility, Knights, and Burgesses of both the Houses of Parliament."* After a minute and revolting description of the effects of the alleged poison upon the king's body, both before and after death, the petition goes on to say—"Your petitioner needeth to say no more to understanding men. Only one thing he beseecheth, that, taking the traitor—who ought to be taken without any fear of his greatness—the other matters be examined, the accessories with the guilty punished."† The great power of Buckingham, and especially his habits of confidential intimacy with the new king, probably protected him from a public trial. The evidence which has reached posterity affords at least a strong presumption of his guilt, and there is no reason why the historian should fail to record it out of any tenderness to his memory.

James's personal appearance was far from being prepossessing. He was about the middle stature, and, though not corpulent, had the appearance of being so from the peculiar fashion of his doublet, which, as a security against assassination, was quilted, so as to be stiletto-proof. His legs, which had been so weak in infancy that he was seven years of age before he could walk, seem never to have acquired sufficient strength gracefully to support his body; and in addition to this original infirmity he was, especially in the latter years of his life, afflicted in his knees and feet with a species of gouty affection which sometimes deprived him of the power of motion. At the best, his gait was feeble, awkward, and undignified. His habits were slovenly and disgusting. He never washed his hands, but simply wiped the points of his fingers with a wet napkin. Nor was his countenance more gainly than his figure. His eyes, though large, had little expression save that of a suspicious curiosity, and he kept continually either rolling them about, as if in quest of some half-concealed object, or staring out of countenance any stranger who happened to be in his presence. He had but very little beard. His tongue seemed as if too large for his mouth. His utterance was in consequence thick and indistinct, and when he drank, a portion of the liquor usually escaped back into the cup from each angle of his mouth.‡ If this picture be correct, James certainly inherited none of the elegance and beauty which all historians have agreed in ascribing to both his parents.

Except in a very few particulars, the whole character, habits, and dispositions of James may be pronounced a mass of contradictions. In him were strangely blended apparently opposite and incompatible qualities. He was in no sense of the word either a great man or a great monarch. His intellect, though wisely disciplined by the sage tutors of his youth, never reached mediocrity, but remained essentially puerile to the end of his life. Its deficiencies, however, were not unfrequently supplied by a species of low cunning in which he excelled, and which, with superficial observers, often passed for profound political sagacity. He was naturally timid and irresolute, yet, on various critical occasions he spoke and acted with great resolution and presence of mind. He was vain and conceited, and cherished most overweening notions of his kingly dignity; yet he permitted himself to be governed by the most contemptible minions, whom he selected as favourites, and whom he treated with undignified familiarity. He could discourse with fluency of religious and moral obligations, yet he was addicted to profane swearing; and in his intercourse with others, both on public and private matters, he scrupled not, if it served his purpose, to manifest a shameless disregard of truth and honesty. His constitutional indolence disposed him to be lenient, but his leniency was generally reserved for great offenders, who had endangered his own safety or that of the State; while to their subordinate agents, or even to persons whose only offence consisted in differing from him in opinion, he was implacable and vindictive to the last degree. He was intensely selfish, yet always in poverty through his senseless profusion to unworthy favourites. The great errors of his reign, which during his later years proved a curse to his people, may be traced to the extravagant notions he entertained regarding the extent of the royal prerogative. These notions, imbibed in early life from the unprincipled sycophants by whom he was surrounded, reached a fatal maturity at the period of his accession to the English throne. At that time, the doctrine distinguished by the name of "Divine right" first began to be promulgated, and was openly defended by many of the prelates, who sought in this way to ingratiate themselves into the royal favour. According to this doctrine the king, as the vicegerent of God, is accountable for his actions to the Supreme Power alone; while, as regards his subjects, he is placed beyond the sphere, not only of their control, but of their animadversion: nothing is left to them but unreserved and unconditional obedience—he is supreme and absolute arbiter in all matters, civil and ecclesiastical. These extravagant ideas of the regal power led directly to that train of grievous persecutions, "for conscience' sake," by which Scotland was for many years harassed and convulsed, and which only terminated with the irretrievable overthrow of the house of Stewart.

CHAPTER XLIII.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

AFTER the Raid of Ruthven, the Church enjoyed a brief period of comparative peace. The noblemen who had been concerned in that questionable and dangerous proceeding were for the most part favourable to the Reformed doctrines; and, as they needed all the support which they could obtain from every quarter, they manifested the utmost favour to the ministers for the sake of the influence which they possessed over the people.* But a great change took place in the position of ecclesiastical affairs immediately after the king escaped from the hands of the Ruthven lords. The old maxims of government not only recovered their former sway, but they were applied with more unbending rigour than before. Arran was reinstated at the helm of affairs; and the king and his favourite were determined to take vengeance, not only upon the lords connected with the late revolution, but also upon the Church, for the countenance which she had shown to them. It was difficult, indeed, to find any plausible ground for proceeding against the Church as a body; for the General Assembly had declined to express any approbation of the measures adopted by Gowrie and his associates, until they consulted with the king himself, and received from him the assurance that he was pleased with the steps which these noblemen had taken.† But the proceedings and words of individuals were narrowly watched, with the view of finding matter of accusation against some, and of bringing them to trial, and inflicting such punishment upon them as might inspire others with fear.‡

John Durie, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, was among the first whose conduct incurred the displeasure of the court. He had publicly denounced the recent proceedings of Arran, and maintained that the Raid of Ruthven was attended with some beneficial effects. For this offence he was summoned before the council, and treated with all the severity due to a criminal. The king asked him if he considered it a beneficial effect that he had been detained as a prisoner, and that his kinsmen and servants had been seized and separated from him; to which Durie replied, that it was not effects of that kind to which he had referred at all. With the view of compelling him to retract his words, the threat was held out to him that his life should be exacted as the price of his temerity, and that his head should be affixed to the west port or gate of the city. His opinion was asked, as well as that of Lawson, with regard to some new act which had just been passed by the privy council, when they both replied, that as the act in question was altogether civil in its complexion, they, as ministers, had nothing to say against it. This answer immediately gave rise to the rumour that the ministers had yielded to the court; but John Davidson promptly set himself to remove this impression in a discourse upon the character of Manasseh, in which he inveighed with extreme severity against the king and his courtiers. Yet while reproving the king's offences, he maintained that he was acting the part of a faithful friend to him; "for honey," said he, "is sweet, and yet when laid to a sore it biteth vehemently." At length, although Durie seems to have made some modified retraction, it was intimated to him, and to the kirk session of Edinburgh, that it was the king's pleasure that he should retire within nine days beyond the Tay, and confine himself to the town of Montrose.* His son-in-law, James Melvil, mentions that he accompanied him all the way from St. Andrew's to Montrose. While they were crossing a swollen river, Durie's horse lay down under him, and he would have been swept away by the flood, if his son-in-law had not caught him by the neck of his coat, and thus enabled him to seize the mane of his horse, and to wade to land.† This escape was viewed by Melvil as a favourable omen, and he employed it for the encouragement of his dejected father-in-law, assuring him that although now encompassed with afflictions, yet the Lord would, in his own good time, deliver him out of them all.

Proceedings were also instituted in February against Andrew Melvil, Principal of the College of St. Andrew's, charged with sedition. who was charged with having uttered treasonable and seditious sentiments on a fast day during the month of January. The professors and regents of the university, being fully persuaded of his innocence, of which they had ample means of judging, prepared and subscribed an attestation, in which they declare that they had been "continual and diligent auditors of his doctrine," and that they had never heard anything from his lips, either on the recent fast or on any other occasion, which did not tend directly to the glory of God and to the establishment of his majesty's crown. He had always been ready, when opportunities presented themselves, to pray with fervour that the richest blessings of Heaven might descend upon the king; and to exhort all classes of subjects to render obedience, not simply to his majesty, but even to the meanest magistrate acting under his authority. was borne to Melvil's loyalty by the town-council of St. Andrew's, the kirk session, and the presbytery.*

In presence of the king and his council, Melvil gave an account of the discourse which he had preached on the fast day, and which had been

subject handled by him was the address of Daniel to Belshazzar, in which the prophet first reminds that impious monarch of the marvellous dealings of God with his father Nebuchadnezzar, and of the salutary effects which they had produced upon him; and then charges him with having failed to profit by these most wonderful and instructive occurrences, though he was well acquainted with them all.† From the historical incidents thus brought under notice, Melvil had deduced, with a logic which does not admit of question, the general doctrine that it is the duty of ministers to apply examples of God's mercy and judgment belonging to other ages, to the kings, and princes, and people of their own times; and further, he had argued that the more nearly the persons so dealt with are related to us, the example becomes the more applicable, and is deserving of the greater attention. And one of the remarks which he had made, while expounding this part of the subject, was, "that if now-a-days a minister should rehearse in the court the example that fell out in King James III.'s days, who was abused by the flattery of his courtiers, he should be said to vaige‡ from his text, and perhaps he might be accused of treason." With regard to the report which had been brought to the king's ears, that he had said, "Our Nebuchadnezzar—meaning the king's mother—was twice seven years banished, and would be restored again," he utterly denied that any such words had proceeded from his lips, or that any such application of the text had even suggested itself to his own mind. With equal solemnity he denied that either in that sermon, or in any other, he had ever uttered the idea that his majesty had been unlawfully promoted to the throne. On the contrary, he reminded the council that the Church had all along been noted for the faithfulness and zeal with which she maintained the king's authority; and he assured his majesty that, with regard to this point, he had always, both in public and private, maintained the same views, as all with whom he had associated since his return to Scotland could testify. He acknowledged, however, that adverting on the one hand to the fact of Nebuchadnezzar's having succeeded to the throne by hereditary right, and on the other to the statement of Daniel that it was God who gave him the kingdom, he had grounded upon these considerations the general doctrine that, whether kings are raised to their thrones by election, or by succession, or in any other way, their authority is derived from God, although, in the day of their prosperity, they are too much disposed to forget this fact. Illustrations of such forgetfulness he had drawn from the case of good kings mentioned in Scripture, viz., David, Solomon, and Joash, who had all forgotten the God who advanced them, and had all been punished in the course of Divine Providence for their declension. Still he had not made any direct application of this principle to his majesty, but had offered up prayer to the Most High, as was his custom whenever he spoke of the king, that it would please the Lord, of his mercy, never to suffer him to forget the goodness of that God who had raised him in so extraordinary a manner to the throne of his country, when he was but a child in the cradle, his mother being yet alive, and a great portion of the nobility opposed to his advancement.*

These explanations and statements of Melvil did not satisfy the council, but they ^{Reasons of pro-} adhered to the purpose of proceed- ^{test prepared} ing with his trial. Therefore, after ^{by Melvil.}

consulting with his brethren, he drew up a paper, in which he embodied all the explanations which had already been verbally given by him, and protested against the course which the council were pursuing. In this document he maintained that, as the accusation against him rested upon certain expressions said to have been used by him in the pulpit, his trial ought, in the first instance, to take place before the ecclesiastical courts, which, both according to Scripture and the laws of the kingdom, were the proper judges of his ministerial conduct. He also argued that as the alleged offence was committed in St. Andrew's, impartial justice required that his trial should be conducted there too. Another of the grounds of his protest was, that as a member of the University of St. Andrew's he was entitled to the benefit of the privilege granted by the king's most noble progenitors to all masters and students of that university, of being tried in the first instance before the rector and his assessors for any fault committed within the university. He craved likewise that he might have the advantage—to which, as a free subject of the realm, he was entitled—of being made acquainted with the name of his accuser; and he added, that if William Stewart† was the individual who had given information against him, he had good ground for objecting to his admissibility as a witness, because it could be proved that he entertained a deadly enmity against him,

Before these reasons of protest were presented to the council, commissioners from the presbytery and University of St. Andrew's attended, with the view of guarding the liberties of the Church, and securing the privileges of the rector's court. But the council refused to hear them, and therefore Melvil at once determined to present his protest or declinature. When this paper was read, the king and Arran, now chancellor of the kingdom, were filled with such fury that the council were thrown into confusion by their violence, and an alarm spread among those who were waiting without, interested in the proceedings and desirous of hearing the result. But Melvil was so far from quailing before the storm, that his spirit rose with the occasion, and with fearless intrepidity he defended the course which he was taking; and plainly told the king and his councillors that they were guilty of an unwarrantable encroachment upon the liberties of the Church, when they presumed to judge the doctrine and to control the ambassadors and messengers of a King and council greater than themselves. Then unloosing a small Hebrew Bible, which was fastened to his girdle, he threw it down upon the table, and said, these are my instructions and my warrant, see which of you can judge of them, or show that I have exceeded my commission. The chancellor, opening the book, and perceiving that the character was Hebrew, put it into the king's hand, and said, "Sir, he scorns your majesty and council."—"No, my lord," rejoined Melvil, "I scorn not; but with all earnestness, zeal, and gravity, I stand for the cause of Jesus Christ and his Church." Again and again he was removed from the presence of the council, and then brought in afresh, that some new expedient might be employed to break his resolution, and to oblige him to withdraw his declinature. Menaces and fair speeches were alternately tried, but all in vain. His courage wavered not, although he stood quite alone, for his friends and brethren were all debarred from access to him during the proceedings. At length, when it was obvious that he would not submit, William Stewart, whom he had already described as his personal enemy, and as therefore disqualified to appear against him, was introduced as his accuser; and a number of witnesses from St. Andrew's, all of them known as hostile to him, were examined. But nothing could be extracted from them adequate to establish a charge of treason against Melvil: yet he was not set at liberty, although the charge first preferred against him was allowed to fall to the ground. He was pronounced guilty of behaving irreverently before his majesty and the council, and for this offence he was condemned to be imprisoned in the Castle of Edinburgh, and to be further punished in his person and goods as the king might be pleased to appoint.*

The sentence thus pronounced upon Melvil spread consternation among his friends, and all the adherents of the Reformed Church, and it immediately became a question whether he should be advised to seek safety in flight, or to surrender himself to the power of his enemies. While he remained in concealment about Edinburgh, his nephew, James Melvil, waited upon the leading men connected with the court, for the purpose of ascertaining what were the ulterior views entertained regarding him, and whether his life was in any danger. Some of those who were consulted expressed the conviction that no serious consequences were to be apprehended, but others made significant reference to the proverb of the house of Angus—"Loose and living;" and gave it as their opinion, that if he were once within the walls of a prison, he was not likely ever to escape with his life. This more unfavourable view received confirmation from the circumstance, that whereas the Castle of Edinburgh was first named as his place of confinement, Arran afterwards changed it to Blackness, which was a dark and noisome dungeon, entirely in the power of this unscrupulous man. While his friends were in a state of painful uncertainty, averse to lose his services, which were so important to the cause of religion and learning in the land, and at the same time afraid to imperil his life by advising him to remain in the midst of such threatening dangers, Melvil himself became persuaded that flight was indispensable to save him from the machinations of his enemies. His determination was therefore fixed, but concealing his purpose, he appeared among his friends in public, dined in the house of James Lawson with a number of ministers, and conversed with more than his usual cheerfulness. During the course of the evening the macer entered the apartment, and delivered to him the charge to enter into the Castle of Blackness within twenty-four hours. He received the mandate with all respect, but within an hour or two he retired from the company, and meeting his brother Roger by appointment, they left the town, and within twenty-four hours not Blackness but Berwick received them.†

The departure of Melvil from Scotland was felt to be a grievous calamity by his brethren, who lamented that the most learned man in the kingdom should be obliged to seek the protection of a foreign country, and that his native land should be deprived of his invaluable services. Much indignation was expressed against the king and his council for their severity to so distinguished an individual, and prayers were publicly offered up for him by the ministers of the Church. The public excitement was so great that the king and his council judged it necessary to issue a proclamation, in which they disclaimed any intention of acting with rigour against Melvil, and described his flight as an act of his own, which was altogether unnecessary to the safety of his person.* Yet with palpable inconsistency they passed an act of council ordaining that any preachers, against whom accusations should henceforth be made, should be apprehended without the formality of a legal charge; and it was also declared to be treason to hold intercourse with those ministers who had fled to England.†

The conduct of Melvil in declining the judgment of the king and council, in his declinature was regard to the particular offence justifiable. with which he was charged, has been keenly canvassed, and condemned by many as tending to the subversion of all civil authority. In particular, it has been identified with the claim, successfully urged at one period by the Romish clergy, that they should be exempted from all civil jurisdiction, whatever might be the offences laid to their charge, and placed under responsibility to the tribunals of the Church alone.‡ The Scottish Reformer, however, restricted his claim to things done or spoken by him in the discharge of his official duties, as a recognised office-bearer of the Church. In regard to his general conduct as a citizen, he considered himself to be directly and immediately amenable to the civil government. This makes an immense difference at the very outset. No doubt, under the pretext of discharging official duties, an individual might propound sentiments, and devise and execute measures, highly detrimental to the well-being of society; and the public safety might require that the strong arm of the law should at once arrest his destructive career. He might carry about rebellion under cover of his official vestments, and his ecclesiastical associates might not be disposed to treat him with the requisite impartiality and severity. Before their slow procedure applied any kind of remedy or check, the most serious consequences might have been extensively developed. This is all quite true, but it does not touch the question, how far Melvil's declinature of the judgment of the privy council in regard to his case was liable to censure. This is not a question to be settled on general principles, but by a consideration of the particular circumstances of the times. Melvil did not decline absolutely and finally the judgment of the privy council. He never insinuated that, whatever he might say or do as a minister of the Gospel, the government had no right to take cognisance of his conduct. He only claimed that, for an alleged fault committed in the pulpit, he should be tried in the first instance by the church courts, and by the authorities in the university; and he grounded this claim partly upon privileges which had been long enjoyed by the university, and partly upon an arrangement which the king himself had sanctioned, that for what was spoken in the pulpit ministers should first of all be tried before their ecclesiastical superiors. It admits of no doubt, therefore, that Melvil was acting in strict conformity with the constitutional principles recognised at the time. He was pursuing a perfectly legal course, and in resisting a prosecution which was designed to crush all liberty of speech, he was certainly entitled to avail himself of every lawful weapon of defence.*

There are great difficulties connected with the question of the boundary lines between the civil jurisdiction and the sacred, particularly in a country where an established church is maintained. It may admit of doubt whether the principle which runs through Melvil's defence, viz., that a minister is entitled to be tried in the first instance by the church courts for whatever is done by him in his official capacity, furnishes the best solution of the perplexing difficulties of the question. But this was not a principle of Melvil's origination; it was already recognised by law, and the king himself had expressly sanctioned it. A much better mode of preventing the two jurisdictions from coming into collision with one another, is to define the kind of causes which the civil courts shall be entitled to take under their cognisance, and those also which shall be assigned to the exclusive management of the ecclesiastical courts; though, even on this principle, there remains a middle ground which hardly admits of satisfactory allocation. In the days of Melvil, civil and sacred things were far more intermingled than they are now. The problem of their disentanglement was forcing itself onwards to a solution. The civil courts laid their hands upon causes of almost every description; and the ecclesiastical authorities also extended their oversight over the whole domain of life; and in these circumstances the plan of allowing the church courts to judge in the first instance regarding everything done by a minister in his official capacity, was perhaps one of the best arrangements that could be made. And at all events, whatever may have been the merits or demerits of the plan, Melvil was not responsible for it; he was taking his stand upon a principle already recognised and sanctioned.

It is proper also, in judging of the case before us, to keep in view the tyrannical spirit by which the court was actuated. They were deliberately carrying out a plan for crushing the liberties of the Church, and bringing all things, sacred as well as civil, under their own immediate control. It was quite ridiculous to ground a charge against Melvil upon any of the statements which he was even alleged to have made in his discourse upon the passage relating to Belshazzar. When such expositions and applications of Scripture were construed into treason, it was high time that a strenuous resistance should be given to the encroachments of arbitrary power. And those who condemn Melvil for the attitude which he assumed on this occasion, would do well to remember that it is to the efforts made by him, and others of similar spirit, that we owe the invaluable privilege of free discussion which we enjoy at the present day. What would be thought of any administration in Great Britain that should now place a minister at the bar on account of such language as was alleged to have been uttered by Melvil? But in those days there was more need of plain speaking from the pulpit on public matters than there is now, because then there was no periodical press. The pulpit combined the functions of the newspaper, and the public religious instructor; there was no other organ through which the general sentiment could find ready expression, and therefore it was of the highest importance that its privileges should be guarded with scrupulous care. Many things of very questionable tendency are tolerated in the newspaper press, because they cannot be checked without endangering that freedom of discussion, whose loss would be a far greater evil than the inconveniences and annoyances referred to. And with reference to the case of Melvil, it should be remembered by those who are disposed to condemn his procedure before the privy council, that the best justification of his conduct, after all, is to be found in the fact that the council could not establish one of the charges which they brought against him. They quite departed from the accusation of treason; and when they condemned him to imprisonment, which it was believed by many was only designed as a prelude to his death, they grounded the sentence not upon the original charge, nor upon the evidence adduced in support of it, but upon the alleged irreverence of the mode of defence which he had adopted. Nothing more oppressive or tyrannical, or more inconsistent with the most common principles of justice, could be imagined.

The absence of Melvil from the kingdom removed one great obstacle to the execution of the design which the king and Arran had long cherished, of overthrowing the presbyterian constitution of the Church, and substituting episcopal government in its room. A meeting of the General Assembly was held in April at St. Andrew's, but the number of ministers who attended was, in consequence of the exceedingly troubled state of the kingdom, so very small that they considered themselves incompetent to the transaction of business, and thus their influence upon the state of public affairs was for the time nullified. The king's commissioner, Graham of Hallyards, a man of fierce and overbearing disposition, was instructed to demand from them a reversal of the decision which they had formerly pronounced with regard to the Raid of Ruthven.* But the meeting rapidly melted away, and the few who remained behind declared to the commissioner, that they could not decide so important a question in the absence of so many of their brethren. The smallness of this assembly, and the want of everything like an organised plan for maintaining their rights, must have afforded the utmost encouragement to the court to persist in carrying their despotic purpose into effect. If the assembly had congregated in full force—if they had remained at their post in spite of every danger—if they had boldly avowed their determination to maintain their principles at all hazards, they would have overawed their enemies, and probably have succeeded in warding off the fatal stroke which was destined so soon to lay the fabric of their ecclesiastical polity in the dust.

In the beginning of May, Patrick Adamson, who had been acting as Arran's agent in England, with the view of prepossessing the court of Elizabeth against the Scottish exiles, and against the constitution and discipline of the Church of Scotland, returned to his native land. He was a man of most plausible and deceitful character. His famous sermon on the occasion of the installation of the Bishop of St. Andrew's, in 1572,† coupled with his own acceptance of the same bishopric shortly afterwards, furnished a decisive and palpable index of his selfish and temporising disposition, and his whole subsequent career was in keeping with these discreditable antecedents. At the time of the parliament in Stirling, in 1578, he was openly convicted of double-dealing, and exposed to public shame.‡ And after the Book of Policy was finally adopted by the General Assembly, in 1581, he subscribed it,§ and made professions of great zeal for carrying out its provisions, which so much rejoiced the heart of honest John Durie that he warmly embraced him, and wrote a letter of great length to James Melvil in his favour.|| Melvil, however, seems not to have been so sanguine as Durie; for although he waited upon Adamson after the reception of Durie's letter, to offer him the right hand of fellowship, yet when Adamson spoke of the motions and workings of the Spirit, James replied, "Well, that Spirit is an upright, holy, and constant spirit, and will more and more kythe ¶ in effects, but it is a fearful thing to lie against him." Now, however, Adamson, belying all these fair promises, had lent himself to Arran as an instrument for the overthrow of the very system which he was so deeply pledged to uphold; and he had returned to Scotland openly to carry on the work of demolition, for which he had been secretly preparing the way in England.

In May, a parliament was held, which was conducted in a manner altogether unprecedented, and but too significant of the kind of work which it was intended to perform. No public proclamation of it took place. Only those who were of Arran's party, or from whom no opposition was apprehended, received notice of the meeting. The Lords of the Articles were sworn to secrecy at the commencement of every sitting. The business was all prepared beforehand, and notwithstanding the sweeping character of the measures which were adopted, the meeting was nearly over before the public in general became aware that the legislature had assembled. On the day before the session closed, one of the lords sent notice to a minister in Edinburgh to the effect that, being bound by an oath, he could not disclose the particulars of what they were doing, but this much might be stated in general, that the whole force of the parliament was directed against the Church and its discipline. This mysterious and startling intelligence was communicated to as many of the ministers of Edinburgh and its neighbourhood as could be hastily summoned together; and they appointed David Lindsay, minister of Leith, to wait upon his majesty, and to crave that nothing might be done in parliament prejudicial to the liberties of the Church, until the assembly should first be heard for their own interest. But Lindsay was apprehended before he could enter the gate of the palace, and hurried off to Blackness. Other messengers were then sent to parliament, to protest openly if anything were concluded in opposition to the interests of religion, but they found the doors so closely guarded that they could not obtain admittance.*

The acts passed with so much secrecy, and in utter disregard of the views of those who were most deeply interested in them, overthrew completely the presbyterian form of church government, and established Episcopacy in its room. It was declared to be treason to decline the judgment of the king or his council in any cause whatsoever. All convocations or assemblies to treat of any matter, civil or ecclesiastical, were forbidden, unless his majesty's special licence were first obtained. It was agreed that the order of bishops should be restored, and that authority should be given to them to arrange and settle all ecclesiastical business in the several dioceses: and with the view of securing to the prelates the undisturbed possession of their seats in parliament, it was declared to be treason for any one to speak against the three Estates, or to aim at diminishing the power of any of them. The excommunication too of Robert Montgomery, who sat in this parliament along with Adamson, and aided Arran in carrying out his despotic measures, was annulled, and thus the authority of the Presbyterian Church was entirely set at nought. The fabric which had been erected with so much toil and labour, and whose progress was signalled by so many years of suffering, was overthrown in a day.*

These acts, which were commonly designated the Black Acts of 1584, spread consternation through the whole country. Both the manner in which they were passed, and their intrinsic character, equally evinced a settled purpose on the part of James and his advisers, to disregard the views and wishes of the nation, and to set aside all the principles on which the government had hitherto been conducted. Aware of the impression which they were certain to produce, the privy council commanded the provost and bailies of Edinburgh to drag any ministers out of the pulpit who should venture to say a word against them, and to commit them to prison. Undismayed by this threat, Lawson boldly denounced the unconstitutional character of the proceedings of parliament, which so enraged Arran that he vowed to make James Lawson's head, though it were as big as a haystack, to leap from his halse.† And when the acts of parliament were proclaimed at the market-cross, Balcanquhall and Pont, by appointment of their brethren, formally protested against them in the name of the Church of Scotland, as subversive of her constitution and liberties. Orders were immediately issued for their apprehension, but they fled, and, journeying all night, reached Berwick by sunrise.‡ Thus, while the nobles and barons looked passively on, at the proclamation of laws which were alike destructive to civil and religious freedom, the ministers, at the hazard of their lives, and with the certain prospect of being driven into exile, protested against the iniquitous and tyrannical proceedings of the court. And in fact it was the uncompromising character of the presbyterian clergy, their abhorrence of despotism, their uniform practice of placing the law above the will of the prince, which alienated from them the arbitrary mind of James, and made him sigh for a more submissive and courtly order of ecclesiastics. Presbyterianism has generally shown itself the friend of constitutional liberty, alike opposed to the sway of arbitrary power, and the dangerous licence of the multitude.

Besides Melvil, Lawson, and Balcanquhall, many other ministers were obliged to flee into England, in order to escape the tyranny which sought to crush them at home. Lindsay was already in Blackness, where he was confined forty-seven weeks, and others were soon subjected to similar treatment; John Howison, minister of Cumbuslang, was thrown into the Spey Tower of Perth for refusing submission to Montgomery as Bishop of Glasgow, and for censuring the proceedings of the king and his council. During his examination at Falkland, he declared that never while he lived would he submit to Montgomery; he avowed the belief that there was no other head of the Church but Christ; he expressed the confident hope that a day of deliverance would come; and when asked what he meant to insinuate by speaking of a day of deliverance, he replied, that he thought the present state of the Church was one of bondage and thralldom. Nicol Dalgleish, also, minister of St. Cuthbert's, was brought to trial on the charge of praying for rebels, and holding correspondence with them.* He confessed that he did pray for his exiled brethren, but argued that he saw nothing wrong in this; and he acknowledged that he had perused a letter from Balcanquhall to his wife, in which friendly regards were sent to him. On these grounds he was declared guilty of treason, and sentence of death was pronounced upon him. This outrageous sentence was not indeed carried into execution; but the gallows was erected, and allowed to continue standing for several weeks within sight of the prison windows.†

In June a letter reached Edinburgh, written by Lawson and Balcanquhall to the session and members of the church there, with the view of explaining the reasons of their departure from Scotland, and also of exhorting them to continue steadfast in the faith under their present trials. This letter having been betrayed into the hands of the court, the Bishop of St. Andrew's was commissioned by the king to prepare a reply to it, in the name of the kirk of Edinburgh, which they were urged to subscribe and transmit to England as their own answer. This document repudiated the authority of the absent ministers; censured them for their contemptuous treatment of the proper and necessary laws which had been enacted by parliament; and expressed the purpose of resting satisfied with such good and quiet-spirited pastors as his majesty might be pleased to provide for them. "In respect of the aforesaid causes, we, by these presents, discharge ourselves from you, esteeming ourselves no longer your flock, nor you any more our pastors; and we thank God, the revealer of secrets, that he hath made you manifest to your shame, and relieved us of wolves instead of pastors."‡ Some few individuals did append their names to this supposititious paper; but although Arran came from Falkland to Edinburgh for the very purpose of urging on the subscription of it, the majority of the people refused to put their names to what was so contrary to all their most cherished convictions.* On account of this obstinacy they incurred the severe displeasure of the court. Eleven of the elders and deacons were summoned to Falkland, and charged with treason for receiving, reading, and concealing letters sent to them by their ministers. John Blackburn being asked why he would not subscribe the reply, answered, because it was opposed to the Word of God and his conscience, which drew from the king the mocking exclamation, "We have gotten a scriptioner!" All efforts to induce him to subscribe proving ineffectual, he was kept in irons for six days, and then put into confinement in Dunfermline.

Notwithstanding the efforts thus made to procure subscriptions to the reply prepared for transmission to England, only sixteen individuals could be prevailed upon to adhibit their names to it;† and after being signed with such reluctance and so sparingly, it was transmitted to the ministers as the answer of the church to their pastoral letter. When it reached its destination, it filled the exiled brethren with the profoundest sorrow. Lawson, in particular, who was a man of sensitive disposition, and deeply lamented the necessity of leaving his flock, was so much affected by their seeming apostacy, and the thought of their having repudiated him, that he fell into a malady of which he died at London during the autumn following.‡ Before his decease, however, he concurred with Balcanquhall in writing a rejoinder to another reply, which Adamson most officiously took upon himself to send to the letter addressed by them to their flocks in Edinburgh, in which they handled him with cutting sharpness and severity. They also wrote a reply, to what may be designated the forged answer from the church in Edinburgh, in which they expose with much eloquence and force the unfair representations which were given alike of their conduct, and of the bearing and tendency of the late acts of parliament. "If all doctrine from the pulpit shall be controlled by the court, where shall be found a free speaking of the truth and liberty of the Word, wherewith the Lord blessed Scotland in time by past? If all judgment in ecclesiastical sessions may be stayed, suspended, and made null, by those who are not called to the spiritual government, but to civil administration in the commonwealth, what place shall be left to discipline, repentance, and removing of slanders from amongst the Lord's inheritance? If elderships, provincial, national, or general assemblies, which were the only bridle to vice in our country, and all ecclesiastical conventions shall cease, the staff of beauty is broken in thee, O thou afflicted Kirk of Scotland! thy ornament is taken from thee, and, under colour, thou mayest be spoiled speedily of the liberty of convening to hear the Word of truth. If the jurisdictions that remain be devolved into the hands of bishops, the deadly enemies of the most sincere preachers, if they shall receive presentations, give collations, admit and depose ministers, reform colleges, and use their tyrannous empire as they list above their brethren, what place shall be to good men? Hirelings and corrupt teachers must abound. O ye of our flock, who hath bewitched you, that ye should call the deep counsels of Satan profitable and necessary laws of the country? O would to God we had liberty to speak to you from the stool of truth. But since the Lord hath plucked us away from you, our very absence preacheth unto you, and if ye saw our tears for your blindness, they would wound you.* Awake out of your deadly sleep; seek for remedy in time; repent that you have given your consent, lest ye be guilty of the crime and participate of the plagues which hang over the heads of those who wilfully have run this course against the majesty of the great Judge of the world."

In accordance with the late acts of parliament, Adamson created Archbishop the episcopal office by his majesty, of St. Andrew's, under the designation of Archbishop of St. Andrew's, and empowered to convene synodal assemblies of the ministers, to plant kirks, to give admission and collation of benefices to qualified persons, and to depose all whose life or doctrine he might judge to be immoral or unsound, and generally to do whatever was understood to appertain to the episcopal function.† And with the view of securing universal submission to the new order of things, a bond was prepared, to be subscribed by all ministers and masters of colleges and schools, in which promise was made of submission not only to his majesty, but also to all bishops or commissioners whom his majesty might appoint to exercise spiritual jurisdiction; it being at the same time expressly declared that disobedience should infer the forfeiture of benefices, livings, and stipends.‡ Some of the ministers agreed without much opposition to affix their names to this document, but the great majority of them decidedly refused. The recusants were summoned before the king and his council, and the question was put to them why they dared to refuse submission to the late acts of parliament.§ They replied that they believed them to be repugnant to the Word of God. And in a written document, which some of them prepared to exhibit what they considered the scriptural view of the subject, they object to the titles of archbishop and ordinary as unwarranted by the Word of God, and grounded only on the pope's decrees and the canon law. They affirm that it is quite opposed to the Word of God for one man in the ministry to claim superiority over his brethren. "For the word bishop just means an overseer of the flock of God; and this office is the same as the office of ministers, who are all overseers of the flock of God. This is proved by the admonition of St. Paul to the elders of Ephesus, whom he styles ἐπισκοπὸν in Acts xx.; and in the Epistle to the Philippians he saluteth as bishops all the pastors. In Titus he writeth that he should constitute elders throughout the cities of Crete, and immediately afterwards he calleth them bishops, whence it is plain that elders and bishops are in Scripture the same. So if those bishops who now move your majesty to alter the order of the Kirk formerly established, would make the Word of God the judge, as it should be in matters of religion, we doubt not that our cause would triumph. But they leave the Scriptures and flee to consuetude, alleging it to be an old custom for bishops to be superior to presbyters; and we deny not that this is an old error, but we deny that it should, therefore, now be retained in the Kirk of God, for an evil consuetude becomes worse the older it grows."*

When all efforts to break down the resolution of the ministers proved ineffectual, Adamson, with that art and duplicity for which he was so remarkable, proposed to meet their scruples by inserting into the bond the ambiguous clause "according to the Word of God, or agreeing with the Word of God."† Such a phrase, with the views which they entertained, really made the document self-contradictory, but it had the effect of introducing division into their ranks. Some of them allowed themselves to be deceived by this contrivance, and under the impression that they were only assenting to such things in the bond as were agreeable to Scripture, they appended their names to it. Of this number were Craig, Dundanson, and Erskine of Dun, who imagined that their subscription implied no approbation of the recent acts of parliament, nor of the episcopal function, but simply bound them to obey his majesty according to the Word of God; and their example, as well as the efforts which they made to give currency to this view, prevailed upon many who had at first refused to append their names.‡ There were numbers, however, whose acuteness and integrity would not allow them to be blinded by such sophistries, who persisted in refusing to subscribe the bond. And, to the honour of the presbytery of Ayr, in particular, it is recorded that they expressly condemned the acts of parliament, by which the government of the Church was overthrown, as contrary to the Word of God, for which courageous procedure they were punished by being deprived of their stipends.§

gious institutions of the country were overthrown, were so generally condemned, and the scruples, even to give a modified acknowledgment of their authority, were so great that the court judged it advisable to issue a declaration in the king's name with regard to the ground and object of them. Adamson, who had taken a leading part in drawing them up was entrusted with the preparation of this document also. It was issued in January, and was widely circulated in England, where it had great influence in modifying the views which were taken of Scottish affairs.* It was put together with much skill. It spoke in the most laudatory terms of the king's character, of his wisdom and learning, and of his desire to maintain the Gospel of Christ in all purity. It disclaimed the idea of making his majesty the head of the Church, and acknowledged that this honour belongs exclusively to the Son of God; but, at the same time, it affirmed that as the king was the principal member of the Church, the responsibility devolved upon him of providing that God should be glorified, and true virtue maintained. This function of the royal name, it was alleged, certain ministers in seditious and factious sermons had called in question, and particularly one named Andrew Melvil, an ambitious man, of a salt and fiery humour, who had usurped the pulpit of St. Andrew's without a lawful calling, and had attempted to inflame the hearts of the people by odious comparisons of his majesty's progenitors and council. And it was stated that the conduct of the said Melvil in declining his majesty's judgment, with regard to the doctrine which he had taught in the pulpit, was the occasion which had led parliament to affirm that the royal authority extended to all causes, civil and sacred. This enactment, however, was not to be understood as intimating that the king designed to abrogate the lawful and ordinary authority of the Church. It was his majesty's purpose that as there are justicers, constables, sheriffs, provosts, bailies, in temporal matters, so there should be synodal assemblies convened by bishops or commissioners twice in the year, for the purpose of judging in matters belonging to the ministry and their estate. Accordingly, another act of parliament had discharged all judgments ecclesiastical, and all assemblies not allowed by his majesty. The object of this act was to abolish the form lately invented in the land called presbytery, in which the ministers of certain bounds, accounting themselves all equal, and associating a number of laymen with them, usurped all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and altered the laws at their own pleasure without the knowledge of the king and parliament, a procedure unexampled in any country governed by a Christian prince. As an illustration of the inconveniences which had ensued to the king and his government from the authority of presbyteries, the circumstance was introduced and enlarged upon, that on a day when the authorities of Edinburgh were giving an entertainment to the French ambassador, the ministers proclaimed a fast, and thus interfered with the honour which his majesty intended to do to his ally the King of France. And the same act which effected the subversion of presbyteries was designed also to abolish the General Assembly, which was described as an assemblage of ministers from various presbyteries with some gentlemen, who acted upon no fixed principles, but took upon them to alter laws by a plurality of votes. Among the misdeeds of the assembly was mentioned the circumstance that, although at one period they had agreed that the estate of bishops should be maintained during his majesty's minority, and had acted upon this agreement for many years, yet they had become more hostile to the order, and had ultimately abolished it in their own pretended manner, forbidding that any more bishops should be appointed for the future. In the room of bishops they had for a time appointed commissioners, whom they had wished to send to parliament as the representatives of the spiritual estate. One consequence of these changes, it was said, was that whereas under episcopacy his majesty might select the most godly, learned, wise, and experienced of the ministry to take part in the counsels of the nation, he would, according to the assembly's plan, be under the necessity of accepting such as the multitude, by the vote of the most unlearned, should be pleased to appoint. In the end, too, they had dispensed with commissioners, visitors, and superintendents; and there was every appearance that they could not be kept from making continual changes in the commonwealth, to the great detriment of the public interests. A prominent place also was given to the approbation which the assembly had expressed with regard to the Raid of Ruthven, which was described as a matter with which they should not have meddled at all. For all these reasons it was represented, his majesty was under the necessity of subverting the presbyterian form of church government, and re-establishing the order of bishops, and great benefits were expected to accrue from this change. "As it becometh his majesty (as Eusebius writeth of Constantinus the Great) to be a bishop of bishops, and universal bishop within his realm, in so far as his majesty should appoint every one to discharge their duty; so his highness cannot, his country being large and great, take him to every minister that may offend or transgress against duty, or quarrel with the whole number of the ministry: but it behoveth his majesty to have bishops and overseers under him, that may be answerable for such bounds as the law and order of the country hath appointed to every one of them. And they, having access to his majesty's parliament and council, may intercede for the rest of the brethren, propound their griefs unto his highness, and receive his favourable answer. The which form doth preserve a goodly harmony, unity, concord, and peace in the estate, and a solid order in the Kirk; as, contrariwise, the pretended equality divideth the same, and, under pretext of equality, advanceth and enricheth the most crafty and subtle dealers.”*

This document was drawn up with consummate skill and plausibility, but it is full of sophistry and misrepresentation. Character of Adamson's declaration.

It accuses Melvil of absolutely declining the king's authority, while he was guilty of no such rebellion. He only claimed a privilege which had been conceded by special agreement to ministers and professors, of being tried in the first instance before their brethren for offences committed in the discharge of their official duties. It blames the assembly for approving the Raid of Ruthven, which was pronounced treasonable by the king and his council. But it is not stated that at the time when the assembly expressed their approbation of it, it was commended by the king himself, and declared to have rendered good service to the country; and, in fact, it was this declaration of the king's views which led the assembly to pronounce an opinion upon the subject at all. And with regard to the allegation that the principles of episcopacy enable the king to appoint the most godly, pious, and learned men to office in the Church, whereas presbytery introduces those who may happen to gain the suffrage of a majority, it proceeds upon the supposition that civil rulers are always far more likely to consult wisely for the interests of piety and religion, than the members and office-bearers of the Church can be expected to do.

The sophistry of the declaration penned by Adamson, and issued in the king's name, was ably exposed by Andrew Melvil. Passing over all that related to himself, he subjected the general principles laid down in the document to a most searching scrutiny. The several intentions said to have been cherished by his majesty in the late proceedings of parliament are examined one by one, and their inconsistency with facts and Scripture is clearly and forcibly pointed out. “The ecclesiastical and civil jurisdictions which Christ hath separated are now confounded, and a new popedom is established in the person of the king; that he being chief judge in all causes and controversies, and having absolute power to determine, may put up and throw down religion at his pleasure. For why? First the ecclesiastical jurisdiction given by God to his Church is transferred, by the usurped authority of the prince, to the bishops who are his own creatures. Next, this jurisdiction is not granted to them as to the Church, but as to the king's councillors or commissioners, the king being the head from which the power floweth. Thirdly, this jurisdiction is so limited that from the bishops, appellations may be made to the king and his council as chief judge, to give definitive sentence in the same at his pleasure, and to correct the bishops as he thinketh good.”†

Another reply was given to Adamson's elaborate paper, which is commonly supposed to have been the work of James Melvil. It is composed in the form of a dialogue; Zelator, Temporizer, and Palemon, being the speakers. Zelator condemns the proceedings of the late parliament, and defends the privileges and liberties of the Church; Temporizer takes the opposite side; and Palemon occupies the place of umpire between them. Temporizer condemns the conduct of Andrew Melvil, in declining the judgment of the king and his council. Zelator's reply is, that to question the competency of a court to proceed with a particular case, is a totally different thing from denying the authority of government. “Such declining is not a new thing. Fallett not that forth almost every day before the secret council. Declined not Mr. John Cramond, within twenty days after Mr. Andrew's diet, the king and council as judges competent for exhibition of the heretrix of Badravill, and he was never charged with declining his majesty's authority.”* Temporizer excuses the prohibition of the meeting of ecclesiastical courts on the ground that they have not been absolutely interdicted, but only made dependent upon the king's licence. “A fine shift,” replies Zelator, “you make it lawful to his majesty, who is a Christian prince, to restrain the liberty which God has given to Christians. But if there arise a prince who is not settled in religion, he will say it is as lawful to me to discharge simpliciter, as to my predecessors to restrain. Now say, in your own conscience, what an unhappy thing this granting of licence is. What mouth without blasphemy dares to say that, although God hath commanded this or that, you are not to do it without special licence.”† Temporizer brings into view the conduct of the ministers in regard to the banquet given to the French ambassador. Zelator maintains that the representation made in Adamson's paper was quite unwarranted. It was the council of Edinburgh and the kirk session who alone had anything to do with the business; and neither the Church as a body, nor even the presbytery of Edinburgh, were at all implicated in the matter.‡

Meanwhile the tyranny of the government was becoming every day more intolerable. The leading ministers being all in exile, and most of the others having signed Adamson's fallacious bond, there was no efficient check to control the arbitrary designs of Arran.

* Calderwood, vol. iv. pp. 301, 302.

‡ Dr. Mc'Crrie says that Adamson's declaration deserves particular notice as the original of those misrepresentations of Scotch affairs which prevailed so long in England, and are not completely removed at this day. By means of some of Arran's agents it was reprinted in London, with a preface more odious than itself. Being published in the name of the king, it was embodied in Hollinshead's Chronicle as an authentic document, from which it continued to be quoted and copied and reprinted, after James had disowned it, and Adamson had retracted it as an unfounded and slanderous libel. (Mc'Crrie's Life of Melvil, vol. i. pp. 319, 320.)

Another answer to Adamson's declaration.

Return of the banished lords, and overthrow of Arran's power.

Even the wives of the ministers became the objects of his dislike and persecution. Two of them having written an answer to a letter of Adamson's addressed to their husbands, in which they handle the archbishop's publication with no little severity and with admirable skill, his grace threw down the pen which he had been the first to take up, and directed against them the sharper weapon of a royal proclamation. They were commanded instantly to leave their manses, along with their families, under pain of rebellion. And certain other matrons also, who had called in question the propriety of the late acts of parliament, were charged to remove from the capital, and to retire beyond the water of Tay, "till they gave further declaration of their good disposition." Neither age, nor sex, nor character, furnished any protection against the oppressive and tyrannical measures of Arran. The whole country was filled with disgust at his arbitrary conduct. Even the leading men about court, who had enjoyed his favour, began to cool in their attachment to him, and to prepare for a change which they saw was inevitable. And the king himself, it is supposed, was growing impatient of the influence which the favourite had long exerted over him. In these circumstances, the noblemen who had been living for a time as exiles in England met on the Borders by concert, and with Elizabeth's permission, and entering Scotland, they marched with a continually augmenting train of followers to Stirling, which they entered almost without resistance. After a brief negotiation, they were admitted to favour by the king, who promised to be governed by their advice and council in time to come; and Arran fled from the vengeance which he had too much reason to apprehend would be inflicted upon him.*

This change of administration was upon the whole beneficial to the Church. The ministers who had fled to England from oppression at home were restored to their places, and full liberty was granted them to resume their labours among the people. But when they craved the abrogation of the tyrannical statutes of 1584, and reminded the nobility of the promises which they had given before leaving the south with reference to this point, they found to their sore disappointment that the interests of religion were likely to be sacrificed to the more clamorous demands of private ambition. The lords did not question the importance or justice of the changes which the ministers were solicitous they should effect, nor did they deny that they had pledged themselves to make an effort for their accomplishment; but they argued that, as the king was strongly attached to episcopacy, and felt his honour implicated in the support of the statutes complained of, it was altogether inexpedient to press him at present for a change. Let them have time to gain his affections, and to consolidate their power, and then they should be able, and would show themselves willing, to procure for the Church all those alterations which might be judged requisite or desirable. It was hardly to be expected that these excuses and professions could appear satisfactory to the ministers. They saw that the noblemen had employed the grievances of the Church as a means of advancing their own ends; but that now, when they were restored to honour and power, they were not disposed to make sacrifices for the remedy of evils which did not touch themselves.*

Parliament was appointed to meet at Linlithgow in December; and as it had been customary for the General Assembly to hold a meeting immediately before parliament, with the view of considering what points it might be requisite or desirable to bring under the consideration of the supreme authority in the nation, it was determined that an extraordinary meeting of this body should take place at Dunfermline in the end of November. But when the brethren repaired thither from all parts of the country, they found the gates of the town closed against them, by an express order, as the provost alleged, from his majesty.† A brief meeting was held in the fields, at which it was agreed that they should adjourn to meet again at Linlithgow, a few days before the opening of parliament. But when they gathered together once more, and proceeded to business, it soon became apparent that the hopes which they had built upon the recent change of administration rested upon a foundation of sand. They quite failed in securing attention to their demands. This was owing mainly, no doubt, to the indisposition of the court to yield to their wishes; but their influence also was much weakened, in consequence of a division which sprang up among themselves, with respect to the subscriptions appended to Adamson's bond. James Gibson, having preached a sermon in Edinburgh, in which he condemned the conduct of the subscribing ministers, Craig, who had both subscribed himself and made zealous efforts to induce others to do the same, took up the subject in a discourse preached at Linlithgow before the members of parliament, and not contented with defending what he had done, he warmly censured the conduct of the ministers who had fled to England; and, contrary to the principles formerly maintained by him, he exalted the authority of the king to the highest pitch.‡ It appears from the record of a conference between the Earl of Angus and Hume of Godscroft, that Craig maintained the duty of submission to kings, whatever might be the enormity of their wickedness, or the oppressiveness of their tyranny. The whole body of their subjects were bound to obey until God, in his providence, was pleased to send deliverance, either by changing the tyrant's disposition, or by removing him from the earth.*

Although this unseasonable dispute was brought to an amicable termination by the interference of some of the wiser brethren, yet doubtless the very existence of it would encourage the king to persevere in the arbitrary course upon which he had entered.† Repeated interviews took place between his majesty and some of the ministers, at which he censured them with extreme severity, and they also expressed their feelings to him with no small measure of freedom and even acrimony. At length they were desired to draw up a statement, exhibiting whatever they considered faulty in the acts of May, 1584. When the document which they prepared in compliance with this appointment was presented to his majesty, he shut himself up in his cabinet for twenty-four hours, and with his own hand "wrote and penned" a reply, which he presented to the ministers as his declaration and interpretation of the obnoxious acts of parliament; and he told them, at the same time, that his statement should be as good as an act of parliament. This royal commentary contained an implied disavowal of the declaration emitted by the Bishop of St. Andrew's with his majesty's sanction, but still it justified all the changes which had been made in the constitution of the Church, and manifested no disposition to make any concessions to the views and wishes of the ministers. Episcopacy was to continue the settled order of the Church. Assemblies were not to be held without special licence from the sovereign. And with regard to points which were still left undecided, it was his purpose to summon a general assembly of bishops, ministers, and other godly and learned men, to be held under his own presidency; and at this meeting a more ample scheme of policy and jurisdiction should be digested, with the view of being brought into operation. And in conclusion, his majesty, carried away by the ardour of a polemical spirit, threw out a challenge to the ministers, in which he offered to prove all that he had affirmed "by the Word of God, purest ancients, and modern neoter-

It was now obvious that no satisfactory adjustment of differences was to be expected at present. The meeting of parliament was drawing to a close, and the inclemency of the season occasioned a general impatience of delay. In these circumstances, the ministers abstained from further comment upon the topics embraced in the king's reply. They simply presented a supplication to his majesty, in which, after praising God for the judgment and knowledge with which he was so liberally furnished, they craved that the question of a policy for the Kirk might be brought under the consideration of the most learned and godly men in the kingdom, with the view of being permanently settled; and that, in the meantime, they should have liberty to hold their ordinary assemblies, and to proceed in all things as they had done prior to the recent changes. They also desired that all ministers and masters of colleges should be restored to their livings and offices. This last demand was the only one which the king could be prevailed upon to grant.†

The fondness of the king for debate, and the high opinion which he entertained of his own polemical skill, appeared in the challenge which he gave to the ministers at Linlithgow, and in the offer which he made to maintain the principles of his explication by irrefragable arguments drawn from all different sources. Another exhibition of the same unkingly spirit took place shortly afterwards in the High Church of Edinburgh. Balcanquhall having made some statements in the course of his sermon tending to impugn the scriptural authority of bishops, the king, who was present, started up from his seat in the loft, and demanded of the preacher what evidence he could adduce for the doctrine thus taught. Balcanquhall replied that he could bring from Scripture ample evidence of all that he affirmed. This James denied, declaring that he could prove the contrary, and at the same time he pronounced a censure upon the preachers for meddling with such questions in their addresses to the people.‡

Although the proceedings at Linlithgow had been attended with no satisfactory results, still there existed in the adherents of the Presbyterian Church such a strength of attachment to her policy, and such a spirit of stubborn endurance, as promised at no distant day to secure victory to her. The king found that he could not by his simple authority overawe the ministers, or secure anything like general acquiescence in the principles which he was pleased to lay down. With the view of smoothing the difficulties which lay in

* Hume exposes the unsoundness of Craig's principles in a very clear and powerful manner. "He argued that if liberty to disobey or slay wicked kings be granted, then shall not good kings be obeyed, for the seditious will call a good king a tyrant. But your lordship may see the impiety of this reason, for thus shall we take away all laws and the punishment of all vices; for if thieves be punished, wicked judges will call an honest man a thief. If you permit blasphemy to be punished, Jezebel will find means to have Naboth counted a blasphemer; and if you permit sedition to be punished, a tyrant will call a good patriot seditious—and more frequently a tyrant calls an honest man seditious, than subjects call a good king a tyrant. The people suffer much—what by custom, what by the natural love of their princes—bear with many great faults, and seldom rise against them without great, enormous, and intolerable injustice."—Dialogue between the Earl of Angus and Hume of Godscroft, in Calderwood, vol. iv. p. 470. his way, he appointed a conference to take place in February, between some members of the privy council and certain of the more moderate ministers of the Church, at which some principles of ecclesiastical policy approximating to episcopacy, and yet not receding very far from presbytery, were agreed upon. The bishop was always to be the minister of a particular kirk, where he was to officiate like other ministers. He was to be presented by the king, but at the same time he was to receive admission from the General Assembly, and was to be responsible to that court. He was to be guided by the advice of a senate or presbytery, who were to be chosen by the General Assembly. Where he could not undertake the duty of visiting the whole bounds, commissioners were to be appointed, whose authority was to be of precisely the same kind. And general assemblies were to be summoned by royal proclamation.*

The spirit which continued to animate the bosoms of the ministers, notwithstanding the oppression to which they had been subjected by the king, was somewhat strikingly displayed at a meeting of synod held in April at St. Andrew's. James Melvil, as former moderator, preached the opening discourse, in which, after pointing out the characteristics of church government which the Scriptures warrant, and denouncing episcopacy as a human corruption, he lamented the changes which the ambition and avarice of members of their own body had been the means of introducing, during the last two years, into the discipline of the Church of Scotland. Then, turning to Adamson, who was present, arrayed in the robes of his official dignity, he recounted the leading circumstances of his career, pointed out the ruinous measures which he had been instrumental in originating and carrying out against the discipline of the Church, and admonished the synod to consult the wellbeing of the whole body by cutting off so corrupt a member. The synod, carried away by the ardour of their feelings, and overlooking the extreme irregularity of such proceedings, at once put the bishop into the position of a culprit, and proceeded to try him for the offences with which the moderator had charged him in his sermon. He at first refused to answer, but he ultimately appeared, and gave in replies to the accusations brought against him. These answers however were not considered satisfactory, and at length sentence of excommunication was pronounced against him; and although he protested and appealed to the General Assembly, yet the synod ordained that the sentence should be instantly carried into effect. The chief grounds upon which the sentence rested, were that he had usurped the function of the ministry after being lawfully suspended by the General Assembly in 1583, and that he had conspired the overthrow of the order and policy of the Church, after having subscribed the same with his own hands. These charges were no doubt well grounded, but still the trial manifested a glaring disregard of the most common forms of justice.*

A meeting of the General Assembly took place in May with the royal sanction. The opening discourse, which was entirely occupied with questions of church order, served as an index of the feelings by which the adherents of the Church were animated. Before a new moderator was chosen, the king required the assembly to meet with him in the chapel-royal, where he stated to them that there were two reasons which had moved him to agree to the calling of this meeting. The first was that he might have the opportunity of declaring his soundness and constancy in religion, which some persons had dared to call in question, but he offered to satisfy any man who would adduce a reason for suspecting him. His second motive was that the assembly might resolve among themselves in regard to a form of discipline and church government most agreeable to the Word of God, which it was his purpose to establish throughout the realm. Having delivered this somewhat remarkable address, he then expressed it to be his pleasure that the assembly should proceed to the transaction of business, and he nominated three individuals as candidates for the office of moderator. He voted first himself, and as David Lindsay was the individual whom he supported, the majority followed his example, and Lindsay was placed in the chair.†

It was plain from these proceedings that the views of James had undergone considerable modification. Perhaps he was alarmed at the spirit which the strong measures of the synod of Fife demonstrated to be at work among the ministers; or he might be desirous of soothing the assembly for the sake of ensuring a more favourable consideration of Adamson's case; or he might really, when no longer under the influence of Arran, have become more disposed to consult for the good of the Church. But whatever were the considerations which influenced him, his address to the assembly manifested a disposition to concede more to the views and feelings of the brethren than previous events gave ground for expecting; nor was the manifestation of such a disposition lost upon the assembly. When Adamson's case came under review, they agreed, at the suggestion of his majesty's commissioners, to adopt what was called a middle course. It is possible that the readiness with which they fell into this measure, might arise partly from the conviction that the synod of Fife had been too rash in their proceedings, but doubtless it was mainly owing to the concessions which his majesty appeared disposed to make, and to the influence which he exerted in favour of Adamson. The assembly agreed—although not a few of the most influential ministers, such as Pont, Spottiswood, Hume, Durie, and Dalgleish, dissented—that they would not enter upon a rigorous consideration of the charges against Adamson, but would at once set aside the excommunication, on condition that he subscribed a document repudiating the claim of supremacy over his brethren, and promising to submit in all time coming to the judgment of the General Assembly. The bishop having given the required assurance, the assembly declared that they held the process against him as “unled, undeduced, or pronounced, and reponed the said bishop in all respects, so far as may concern the said process and sentence of excommunication, in the former estate he was immediately before the same, like as no process had been led and deduced against him, providing always that he observe what has been promised by him in the premises, and behave himself dutifully in his vocation in time coming.”* At the same time they declare that one of the leading reasons for their peculiar procedure in this case, was the desire which they felt to give testimony of the goodwill with which they would obey his majesty, so far as in conscience they could, and of the good hope which they entertained of his favourable concurrence in building up the house of God.†

Another business of great importance which came before this assembly, was the articles which had been prepared at the conference held in February between some members of his majesty’s council and certain ministers. At the outset they were told by the king’s commissioners that either they must adopt these articles in their integrity, or that all things must continue as they were.‡ Nevertheless the assembly proceeded to consider them singly, and although there were some of them which they agreed to without much difficulty, there were others in regard to which they were sorely perplexed. At the first, they decided that bishops and commissioners should be subject like other ministers to presbyteries and synods; but when they were assured that the king could not on any account allow these functionaries to be made amenable to any other court than the assembly, they agreed, in consideration of the present posture of affairs, to concur with his views.§ With regard to one point, however, they were quite firm. They absolutely refused to acknowledge that the Scriptures warranted any superiority of bishops above other pastors. The minister of the Word was the only scriptural bishop. Pastor and bishop were upon a level, so far as the nature of their office was concerned. The question was proposed to them whether bishops might not have pre-eminence over other ministers, if not as a matter of jurisdiction, yet at least of order. And the answer of the assembly was, that it could not stand with the Word of God; only they must tolerate it, if it were forced upon them by the civil authority. Upon the whole, the proceedings of this meeting were successful in regaining some small portion of the territory, which had been snatched from the Church by the royal raid and the black acts of 1584; and they showed what potency belongs to a united and intelligent body of men, acting as the representatives of a numerous constituency. James abolished in one day the whole ecclesiastical order of the kingdom, and took the direction of all things into his own hands; but at the very first meeting of the assembly which was summoned even by his own authority, he was obliged to recede to a considerable extent from the lofty claims which he had advanced. The old policy was not restored, but enough took place to convince the ministers, that through perseverance and firmness they should certainly in the end attain the object of their desires. The concessions made to them by James are viewed by Spottiswood as the fruit of a temporising policy, his object being merely to keep them in some measure of moderation, until he should find himself possessed of sufficient power to establish the episcopal jurisdiction in all its amplitude of authority.*

Shortly after the close of the General Assembly, Andrew Melvil was sent for to court; Andrew Melvil and although he met with a very laid under gracious reception, yet he was for restraint. bidden for the present to resume his labours in St. Andrew’s. He was enjoined to proceed to Angus, Mearns, Perth, and other northern districts; and to enter into conference with the numerous Jesuits who were at work in those parts, that he might either convert them to the true Christian religion professed by his majesty and the whole realm of Scotland, or bring them to trial according to existing acts of parliament. The ostensible reason for this temporary banishment of Melvil from the scene of his ordinary labours, was the disordered state of the University of St. Andrew’s, occasioned by the dissensions between him and the bishop, and their respective favourers and adherents;† but the real object of it seems to have been to give Adamson the opportunity, when freed from the presence and competition of his rival, of recovering his lost influence. The bishop was appointed not only to preach, but also to deliver lectures in Latin in St. Salvator’s College, which the whole university were commanded to attend. Some months afterwards Melvil was permitted to resume his labours, but it was found that when he preached in the college, the great bulk of the people deserted the parish church where Adamson officiated. An order, therefore, came from the privy council, supposed to have been procured through the solicitation of Adamson himself, forbidding the principal and masters of the new college to preach to the people in English, and commanding them to use those languages which they professed for the instruction of the youth. Thus every effort was made to prop up the declining credit of the bishop.*

The acquiescence of the late General Assembly in sundry impositions of the king, although declared by themselves to be merely temporary, had yet the effect of raising an outcry against them in many parts of the country. It was alleged by the people that they were divided in their opinions regarding the true policy and government of the house of God, and that many of them had abandoned the views of the early reformers; and the same impression became current among the Reformed Churches of the Continent. These rumours

Proceedings of the Synod of Merse became so loud and frequent as to attract the notice of the synod of Merse.

Merse, Teviotdale, and Tweeddale, at their meeting in October; and they considered it requisite for their own sake, and for the sake of truth, to give them a direct contradiction. The entire body of the synod concurred in declaring, that there was no difference of opinion among them with regard to the government of the Church. They still held unanimously that the ecclesiastical order, which had prevailed in Scotland prior to the parliament of 1584, was the form of government most conducive to the wellbeing of the Church, and the only one which the Scriptures sanctioned. And with regard to the document which some of them had signed at the king's desire, they explained that they did not consider it as implying anything else than an obligation of obedience to the king's majesty, and so many of his laws as were agreeable to the Word of God. Those of them who had signed the document in question, and those who had refused to do so, equally concurred in rejecting the supremacy of bishops and archbishops over ministers, and in condemning those acts of 1584 which referred to the policy of the Church. They were quite united in their views as to the proper method of conducting the affairs of the house of God, and they directed that every presbytery should take measures for spreading abroad the knowledge of this declaration, "so that all slander might be removed where it was most spread."†

There might be inconsistency in the enactment of the synod of Merse, by which they thus attempted to explain away the subscription given by some of their number to Adamson's bond regarding the unpopular acts of 1584. Most certainly their signature was considered at the time, by the king and his advisers, as implying something more than a mere general acknowledgment of the royal authority, and a profession of willingness to submit to it in accordance with the Word of God: and it is difficult to imagine what could have been the worth of it in the king's estimation, if this had been the whole extent of its meaning, or why such efforts should have been made to obtain it, at a time when hardly any, and certainly none of the adherents of the Reformed Church, thought of questioning the title of James. Still, however, the present procedure of the synod placed it beyond question that the ministers, with scarcely an exception, were devotedly attached to the old policy of the Church, and that all the efforts of the king to secure their acquiescence in his favourite form of ecclesiastical government had been utterly unavailing. They retained their views, and were determined to bring them into full operation with all possible speed.

Another manifestation took place, during the course of the winter, of the independent although, doubtless, in some cases mistaken feeling, which prevailed among the presbyterian clergy. When Mary was brought to trial by Elizabeth, and contrary to all justice, as she certainly was not a subject of the English crown, but had been detained in England contrary to her own will, was condemned to death,* James issued a command that prayers should be offered up for his mother's preservation, in all the churches of the kingdom. This royal mandate was by no means acceptable to the ministers or adherents of the Reformed Church; and as they conceived that the prayer which was prescribed implied an acknowledgment of Mary's innocence, they at first refused to adopt it. Nor were the people more favourably disposed, for the session and Church of St. Giles declined also, when reference was made to them, to enjoin upon their ministers compliance with the king's will. In these circumstances James appointed the Bishop of St. Andrew's to preach in St. Giles's Church, and to offer up public prayers for his mother's preservation; but when his majesty arrived, he found the pulpit preoccupied by one John Cowper, who is described by Spottiswood as not yet a licensed preacher. The king, interrupting Cowper, said that he might go on with the service, if he prayed according to the form prescribed; but as Cowper replied, that he would do as the Spirit of God directed him, the king commanded him to give place to Adamson. At first he manifested some reluctance to obey this order, but perceiving that the captain of the guard was preparing to enforce it, he yielded, exclaiming as he descended,† that this day should bear witness against his majesty in the great day of the Lord. When the bishop presented himself in the pulpit to go on with the service, a murmuring and confusion arose among the people, and many of them retired from the church. Cowper was committed to Blackness, but he was very speedily released on account of the extreme discontent which was manifested by the inhabitants of Edinburgh. And the king, shortly afterwards, stood up at the close of public worship in St. Giles's Church, and expressed his sorrow for what had occurred in regard to Cowper, protesting that he cherished no dislike to the ministry, or to the religion at present professed in the country, but that he had acted under the impulse of affection for his mother.* His desire was that prayer should everywhere be offered up to God, both for her illumination with divine knowledge, and also for the preservation of her life from the imminent danger with which she was threatened.

The ministers have been severely censured for their conduct on this occasion, which has been described as utterly unchristian, and even savage. And the text on which the Bishop of St. Andrew's preached when he stood up in the room of Cowper—"I exhort that prayers be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority"†—has been appealed to as decisive of the question. And certainly the ministers appear to have been more scrupulous than was needful, although their conduct is by no means deserving of all the censure which has been poured upon it. There is some force in the reason assigned for their hesitation. It is one thing to pray for the soul of a person condemned to death, and it is quite a different thing to pray for the preservation of his life. This last prayer, more especially when offered up in public, may be very readily understood as implying the conviction that the individual is innocent of the crime laid to his charge. Prayers are not usually offered up in public for the preservation of persons condemned to death by a legal sentence. Such prayers would never spontaneously suggest themselves, excepting where there was a strong conviction of the excellence and innocence of the party condemned. After all, however, the ministers did overcome their reluctance to comply with the king's mandate;‡ and with but few exceptions they prayed, not only for the illumination of Mary's mind, but also for the preservation of her life. And perhaps they were as zealous in regard to this matter as James himself;§ for while he was issuing orders to pray for his mother's life, and punishing those ministers who felt any scruple as to the propriety of doing so, there is too much reason to believe that he was himself extremely indifferent to her fate. Courcelles, the French ambassador,|| mentions in a despatch to his royal master, that the nobility believed there was some secret understanding between the king and the Queen of England; and that it was supposed he would not declare himself openly against Elizabeth for anything done to his mother, unless he were himself deprived of his right to the English crown. On the very night when the intelligence of Mary's execution arrived, he could not forbear saying to confidential friends around him, "I am now sole king," referring to the project of association between him and his mother, which the friends of Mary had laboured so strenuously to accomplish.* And shortly afterwards, when Andrew Melvil was at court one day, the king was in such an exuberance of spirits, that the contrast between his demeanour and the mourning garb he wore, reminded Melvil of the conduct of Mary herself after the assassination of Darnley, and excited feelings which he expressed to a gentleman who was near him in two lines thrown off at the moment:—†

Scilicet hie matrem deflet, ut illa patrem."‡

The assembly which met in June maintained possession of the ground which Proceedings of had already been recovered from the General episcopacy; and it is no slight Assembly. proof of their determination to persevere in their efforts for the complete re-establishment of their policy, that they elected Andrew Melvil to the office of moderator. During the preceding year, although desirous of subjecting bishops and commissioners to the authority of presbyteries and synods, as well as to the General Assembly, they had yielded to the king's strongly expressed views, and had rested satisfied with declaring them responsible to the supreme ecclesiastical court. But at this meeting an act was passed that all pastors, of whatever sort they were, should be subject to the authority of their brethren, as well in presbyteries and synods as in the General Assembly. Now, although no mention is here made of bishops, it is obvious from the frequently reiterated judgment of the assembly as to the scriptural identity of bishop and pastor, that this act was specially designed to refer to those who were invested with episcopal rank. And, in fact, unless this be allowed to be its meaning, no reason for its enactment can be imagined; for there never was any controversy in regard to the submission due from ordinary pastors to all the ecclesiastical courts. It was bishops only in whose favour it had been claimed, that they should be subject to no church court but the General Assembly.§

The king having been pleased to signify his will to the assembly that Mr. Robert Pont should be promoted to the bishopric of Caithness, vacant by the death of the Earl of March,||—an advancement which was designed to serve as the means of indemnifying him for certain losses which he had sustained in the public service,—the assembly, while praising God that his majesty was disposed to favour so excellent a person as Mr. Pont, and one whom his brethren acknowledged to be truly a bishop according to the description of Paul, yet declared that they considered the office of bishops, as commonly understood and defined in modern times, to be a "corrupt estate," and not agreeable to the Word of God. They added also that Mr. Pont himself was not willing to be invested with the proffered dignity, and that therefore they had taken no other steps in the business, than to appoint commissioners to confer with his majesty and council upon the subject at next meeting of parliament.*

At this assembly an effort was made to obtain possession of the records of the Church, which had for some time disappeared. Evidence having been procured that Adamson had been heard to acknowledge they were in his hands, an humble supplication was presented to his majesty, that he would be pleased to order them to be delivered up to the Church. After many ineffectual efforts to get hold of these documents, the assembly were at length so far gratified, that five volumes of them were produced in their presence, but upon examination they were found to have suffered extensive mutilation. Heavy complaints were made to his majesty with reference to the damage which the records had sustained, but it does not appear that any redress was obtained; nor were the volumes allowed to remain in the keeping of the assembly. They were to be produced from time to time for their use, but after every meeting they were to be restored to the custody of the lord privy seal.† It is commonly supposed that Adamson was the person who mutilated these valuable documents, though some are of opinion that the king himself was not innocent in regard to this shameful deed. The impunity of Adamson gives a colour of probability to this view. The motive for the mutilation plainly enough appears from the parts of the records which have been invaded by the destroyer's hand, and the course of policy pursued alike by the king and by Adamson was such as harmonizes with the supposition that either of them might feel the influence of this motive, and might desire to suppress the facts exhibited in the written memorials of the Church. The leaves which were torn out contained the minutes describing the submission of the bishops of St. Andrew's, Glasgow, and the Isles, to the General Assembly, in October, 1580; and whoever it was that perpetrated the base act, which must have taken place between the years 1584 and 1587, aimed without a doubt at destroying the proof that the bishops had ever submitted to the authority of their brethren.‡ Sufficient evidence, however, of their submission at the time specified, survives in other documents of that period, and the mutilation, therefore, has only served the purpose of exposing the bad faith of those who were guilty of an act so mean. It is a very grave crime to attempt to poison the sources of history.

The ancient practice in Scotland was to celebrate marriages publicly in the churches, after three several proclamations of bans. The General Assembly rigidly resisted all deviation from this rule. On the present occasion, a minister was held to have incurred deprivation of office for solemnising a marriage in a private dwelling,* although proclamation had duly taken place beforehand. The attention of the assembly was also engaged at this meeting with another irregularity, which is still found not a little troublesome in church courts. Members did not all arrive at the appointed hour, nor did they remain faithfully at their post during the whole day. It was therefore enacted that each individual who transgressed in either of these respects should be fined in one groat for every offence.† A law of this kind would now constitute quite a mint of fourpennies.

The proceedings of the General Assembly at their meeting in June were but little impeded by the civil power, and the measures which they adopted carried them some way onwards to the recovery of their former liberty. The old hostility to the existence of the episcopal order was very palpably manifested. But a measure far more fatal to the bishops, and to the whole policy of the king in ecclesiastical matters, than anything which the assembly were able to devise, was adopted by the parliament at its meeting in July. This was the annexation of the church lands to the crown. Temporal possessions of bishoprics, abbacies, and priories to the crown. It is true this measure was not expressly designed to overthrow episcopacy, nor even to diminish its influence. The avowed object of it was to repair the dilapidated revenues of the crown, and to place his majesty, who was now declared to be of age, in a position befitting his kingly dignity.‡ It was represented that the prelates' houses, with the grounds around them, and the tithes of the churches annexed to their benefices, would be quite sufficient to maintain them in a manner suitable to their rank; but there were also some who supported the project of annexation as the most likely means of crippling episcopacy, and ultimately effecting its overthrow. Let the rich benefices, it was said, be taken away, and then the prelates must succumb, as there will be no sufficient livings to maintain them in their accustomed dignity. And this certainly was the most correct view of the operation of the plan. The tendency of the measure was to shake the foundation upon which the episcopal order stood, and to prepare the way for its speedy abolition.* Deprived of their baronial possessions, the bishops could not exert the same influence in parliament as formerly; and one of the grounds was thus removed which had influenced the court to maintain them in opposition to the declared wishes of the Church. They were exposed, defenceless, to the persevering assaults of the advocates of presbyterian parity. The measure was afterwards regretted by the king when the nature of its operation became apparent, and he pronounced it a vile and pernicious act;† but no remedy was left, for the lands which accrued to the crown were speedily conferred by his majesty upon individuals, either as gifts or rewards of services, and thus they passed out of his own hands.

During the interval between the General Assembly and the meeting of parliament, the king paid a visit to St. Andrew's, having in his company the celebrated French poet, Du Bartas, whom he had invited to Scotland, and who was also entrusted with a matrimonial commission from the King of Navarre.‡ Having arrived too late to hear Melvil's ordinary lecture, his majesty insisted that the principal should deliver another, which with much reluctance, as he was quite unprepared, he consented to do. The discourse, although eloquent, was by no means pleasing to his majesty, as it bore hard upon some of his favourite views in regard to ecclesiastical affairs. Next day, the Bishop of St. Andrew's delivered a lecture in support of prelacy and the royal supremacy, of which Melvil was observed to take copious notes. Immediately after the dismissal of the meeting, the principal caused the college bells to be rung, and sent notice to his majesty that he designed to lecture in the course of two hours. A message having been sent back to him, warning him of his danger if he transgressed the bounds of moderation, Melvil replied that he could not suffer the dangerous errors which had been promulgated in his hearing to pass unrefuted; but he promised that he would conduct himself with all the reverence due to his majesty's honour. A crowded meeting assembled to hear the principal's reply to the bishop, and the king and his attendants also formed part of the audience. Melvil took no notice of Adamson's discourse, but quoting from popish works all the leading positions which the bishop had laid down, he proceeded to answer them as popish errors, and exposed them with such invincible force of reason and splendour of eloquence that the bishop, who was present with the view of defending himself, was struck dumb. At the close of the discourse the king addressed the meeting, stating some distinctions with the view of mediating between the views of the presbyterian and the prelate, and concluded with enjoining upon the ministry the duty of yielding obedience to the bishop. He also partook of wet and dry confections and wine in the college hall,* where he enjoyed himself very merrily for a considerable time. The discourse of Melvil made a deep impression upon Du Bartas, who remained in conversation with the principal and his nephew a whole hour, and the favourable opinion which he expressed of him to the king may have contributed to render his majesty somewhat more reconciled to Melvil.†

The remainder of this year was a time of great perplexity and alarm through the whole country. It was known that the popish princes upon the Continent had entered anew into a league for the suppression of the Protestant faith by force of arms, and on this ground an alliance had been concluded, more than a year ago, with England for mutual defence. The danger was becoming every day more imminent. The king of Spain had prepared an immense armament for the invasion of Elizabeth's dominions; and his emissaries were at work in every part of Scotland, taking advantage of the alienation produced by the execution of Queen Mary, and striving to exasperate the feelings of the people against their southern neighbours. The country swarmed with Jesuits and seminary priests, who, anticipating the undoubted success of the Invincible Armada, conducted their proceedings with undisguised openness in every quarter.‡ The Protestant population were filled with dismay. Rumour, with her hundred tongues, was busy everywhere. One day the report went that the Spaniards had landed at Dunbar; next day it was said they had made their appearance at St. Andrew's, or Aberdeen, or Cromarty. "Powerful and piercing were the sermons of the preachers; earnest, zealous, and fervent were the prayers of the godly."§ Immense excitement pervaded the kingdom, and anticipations of coming disaster agitated every bosom.

In these circumstances Melvil, by virtue of the authority with which he was invested as moderator, summoned an extraordinary meeting of the General Assembly, for the purpose of considering the dangers with which the Church and commonwealth were threatened. The excitement which prevailed in every quarter congregated a meeting of unusual size. It may appear to some that the General Assembly was hardly the body which should have taken the initiative in such an emergency; but it must be remembered that it was not invasion simply which was dreaded, but invasion for the avowed purpose of overthrowing the Protestant faith. Besides, fears were entertained by not a few that the king was not sufficiently alive to the danger which threatened the country; and it seemed not unlikely that the appeals made by foreign emissaries to his mother's death, might produce an impression upon his mind unfavourable to co-operation with Elizabeth. Whatever might be the path of duty and safety in this alarming crisis, it is not at all wonderful that the Scottish king had much to overcome, on the score of feeling, before he could think of publicly concerting measures with one whose garments were stained with the blood of his mother.*

It was considered most expedient at the assembly that the barons and gentlemen, the Measures suggested by the assembly. commissioners of the boroughs, and the ministers, should hold three separate preliminary meetings, and that afterwards the whole body should assemble together to decide upon the course to be followed. The result of these meetings was, that a deputation was appointed to wait upon his majesty, and to state the apprehensions with which the present posture of affairs inspired all classes of the community. They were to crave that the laws of the kingdom should be carried into execution against Jesuits, seminary priests, and idolaters; and, particularly, that James Gordon and William Crichton, who were known to be plotting against the religion and liberties of the country, should be seized and compelled to depart with the first ships that sailed.† They were also to crave that commissioners might be appointed to investigate the state of the kirks in the north and south-west districts, that ministers might be settled in vacant parishes, and the Gospel more widely preached in the land. And they were to make offer to his majesty of their lives, lands, and friends, to be employed for the defence of the country in this trying emergency. James was somewhat offended‡ at the proceedings of the assembly, viewing them as an interference with his royal prerogative; but the advice which they offered was so sound, and their readiness to make all sacrifices for the support of his throne so conspicuous, that he thanked them for their zeal, and appointed a committee of the privy council to meet with them and devise measures for the public safety. And much benefit ensued from this meeting. All ranks of men were stirred up to zeal in behalf of their religion and liberties. One feeling animated the whole country. And if James ever wavered under the efforts which were made by the King of Spain to detach him from the English alliance, and to secure his co-operation against Elizabeth, he became now quite decided, and heartily laboured for the defence of his kingdom against the machinations of popish adversaries. The expedient of which Scottish history exhibits so many examples was adopted, with the concurrence of his majesty, and the privy council, and the General Assembly, of a national bond or covenant for mutual defence. A document was drawn up, designated a bond touching the maintenance of the true religion and the king's majesty's person and estate, in which reference was made to the detestable conspiracy against Christ and his Gospel, called the Holy League, and to the rumour of the approach of foreign powers to this realm.* The subscribers, considering that religion and the king's authority have the same friends and enemies, bind and oblige themselves by oath to assemble, in arms or in a quiet manner, at such times and in such places as his majesty may appoint; and to hazard their lives, lands, and goods, and whatever God has given them, in defence of religion, and of his majesty's person against all enemies. They also engage to do their utmost to search out papists and other enemies of religion, to give information regarding them to his majesty and council, and to sacrifice every private interest to the public welfare. And in order to their complete union, they agree that all existing feuds and variances should be composed by the arbitration of five or seven indifferent persons appointed by his majesty; and whoever withdrew his signature was to be regarded as a traitor to God, and to his king and country.†

This bond was extensively signed in all parts of the kingdom. Proclamations were issued by the government calling upon all classes to subscribe it, and the General Assembly commanded all the ministers of the Church to promote the signature of it in their parishes, and to endeavour to secure the names of men of all ranks, from the highest to the lowest. These various measures were attended with the happiest consequences; and when his majesty summoned a convention of the Estates in August, one feeling animated the whole meeting. The firm and decided appeal which he made to them met with a most hearty response,‡ and the determination was formed to resist with combined energy the threatened invasion of the enemy.§

At the meeting of the General Assembly held this summer, the dangers to which the Church of Christ was exposed from the continued influx of Jesuits and seminary priests, engaged a large share of attention; and several days of fasting were appointed, during which certain ministers were to bring this subject under the consideration of the people, and to exhort them to defend their religion and liberties, and to maintain the authority of the king. Grievous complaints were also made of the increasing poverty with which the ministers were afflicted in consequence of the continual spoiling of the patrimony of the Church; and a deputation was appointed to wait upon his majesty, for the purpose of craving that some measures might be adopted for their protection. It was found, too, that an evil far worse than the mere loss of property had resulted from the late annexation of church lands to the crown. There were patronages connected with these lands, which had previously been administered by their ecclesiastical proprietors. Now, these patronages were laid hold of, as well as the lands of the Church, by the king; and when the lands were bestowed, as large portions of them were, upon different noblemen, the patronages were disposed of along with them. Nay, in many cases the patronages were disjoined from the lands, and conferred separately upon laymen. This undoubtedly was an unjust proceeding. It might be quite a wise and proper measure for the government to annex the church lands to the crown, and then portions of these lands might be made over to individuals as the reward of services; but there was not the shadow of a reason for laying hold at the same time of the patronages, which were altogether of a spiritual character, and which, if they were to exist at all, should naturally be in the hands of the Church herself. It was the Church that created these patronages, authorising certain of her office-bearers to make certain appointments, and the seizure of ecclesiastical revenues was the worst of all reasons for claiming the right also of nominating ministers. It was as if acquiring possession of your neighbour's property, you should for that reason insist upon being entrusted likewise with the management of his family.*

This subject engaged the serious attention of the assembly, and they considered that the transference which had been made, since the late act of annexation, of patronages from his highness to various "temporal men," as earls, lords, barons, and others, evidently tended to the danger, hurt, and prejudice of the whole Kirk. Therefore it was determined to present a supplication to his majesty, not only that he would make no more such transferences, but also that he would be pleased to take measures for annulling those which had already taken place. At the same time, the assembly forbade all commissioners and presbyteries to give collation or admission to any persons presented by the said new patrons until next meeting.

A strong feeling was cherished by the assembly, apparently more on religious than on sanitary grounds, against the practice of burying the dead within the walls of churches. It is described as a practice permitted in no place where anything like religion prevails. Yet many cases of it had recently occurred in violation of existing acts, and, therefore, the assembly renewed their condemnation of it, and agreed to request his majesty to forbid it by an act of council.†

It might have been expected that the signal overthrow of so mighty a force as the Spanish Armada would have crushed the hopes of the party in Scotland favourable to its objects; but it was not so. Jesuits and seminary priests continued to prosecute their measures with unabated zeal, and they were still sanguine in the belief that, by means of a foreign army landed in Scotland, they might be able to invade England and dethrone Elizabeth. A widely ramified conspiracy was actually organised for this purpose, and through the supineness of the king it seemed not unlikely to succeed. These proceedings, however, were not unobserved by the adherents of the Presbyterian Church. Numbers of the brethren met together in Edinburgh to consult regarding the best means of warding off the dangers with which the nation was threatened; and they presented a petition to his majesty praying that commissioners might be dispatched to all parts of the country, to ascertain who were rightly affected to the true religion, and willing to join in the defence of it. They also besought his majesty to dismiss all papists from his house and council, and from every department of service under the crown, alleging that it was his "employment of them in sundry places which begat sinistrous suspicions of his religious sincerity," and encouraged the Jesuits to persevere in their seditious practices.* At this meeting ten laymen, comprising noblemen, lawyers, and burgesses, and ten ministers, were appointed to consult together in private; and after they had conferred with one another, they offered some suggestions as to the manner in which Jesuits and priests, and those who harboured them, should be dealt with; and also strongly recommended that there should be a weekly meeting of certain brethren in Edinburgh, to watch the progress of events, and to suggest such measures as might be needful in so dangerous a crisis.

As his majesty was now of full age, it was considered desirable that he should subscribe the Confession of Faith anew; and certain brethren having brought this point under his notice, a proclamation was issued, calling upon all subjects of every rank to append their names to it, as a token of their agreement in religion, and their determination to maintain and defend their privileges. Some ministers were also commissioned by an act of council to receive subscriptions afresh to the "general band," which had been subscribed during the preceding year; and both this national covenant and the Confession of Faith were subscribed at this period by persons of all ranks and conditions.† The patriotic feeling displayed by the Church, and her evident interest on the side of James, produced a favourable impression on the royal mind; and as his efforts against the popish conspirators when they rose in arms were crowned with success, the events of the spring and summer were all of a kind to weaken still further the prejudices which he had long entertained against the Presbyterian Church.*

When his majesty embarked in October for Norway, to bring home his royal bride, whom storms had prevented from leaving her native shores,† the king's absence in he manifested his conviction of the influence of the Church by appointing Robert Bruce, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, an extraordinary member of the privy council. Bruce was the second son of the Laird of Airth. He had been educated for the profession of law, and had begun to practise at the Bar with the most flattering prospects of success; but the conviction arising in his mind that it was his duty to devote himself to the work of the ministry, he had abandoned his secular occupations, and entered as a student of theology at St. Andrew's.‡ His friends were strongly opposed to this step, and he himself at first resisted the unaccountable impulse by which he felt himself hurried on to it; but the agony of mind which he experienced during this struggle between worldly considerations and the voice of conscience, was so extreme that he was obliged to assure his father that he could see nothing but wretchedness before him, unless he were allowed to place himself as a student under the care of Andrew Melvil. One day, while he and James Melvil were walking in the fields near St. Andrew's, he stated to him that sooner than expose himself again to the torment of conscience which he had experienced, while resisting the call of God to the ministry, he would walk through a fire of brimstone half a mile long.§ After his studies were finished, he was recommended by Andrew Melvil as in all respects qualified to fill the pulpit where Knox and Lawson had proclaimed the unsearchable riches of Christ with so much power; and although he himself was averse to occupy so conspicuous a position, and would have preferred to settle in St. Andrew's, in compliance with a call from that place,|| yet the unanimous and urgent entreaties of the commissioners from Edinburgh, and of his brethren in the ministry, prevailed upon him to lay aside his scruples, and to accept the charge.¶ He was held in the highest esteem by all ranks of men. His eloquence as a preacher, and his faithfulness in the discharge of every duty, secured for him the admiration of the common people; and his family connexions opened up a ready way for him to the respect of the nobility. His influence had no small effect in mitigating the prejudices of the royal mind against the Presbyterian Church; and when James appointed him as one of the council who were to be entrusted with the affairs of government during his absence, he declared that he placed more confidence in him and his brethren for preserving the peace of the country than in all his nobles.*

Nor did the result belie the expectations of the king. During the entire period of his absence, which extended to half a year, unwonted tranquillity prevailed in every part of the kingdom. Some feeble efforts were made to renew the insurrection which his majesty had crushed before his departure, but they were promptly resisted, and the parties concerned in them compelled to remain quiet. Hardly such a thing as bloodshed occurred during the whole time, although previously scarcely a week elapsed without the breaking out of some quarrel which ended fatally.† Even the turbulent Bothwell, who was never at rest, presented himself spontaneously to Mr. Bruce, and publicly, in the Church of Edinburgh, professed sorrow for his turbulent conduct, requesting the people to pray for him, and promising to lead quite a different life in days to come. It was found by the General Assembly in spring, when they instituted an inquiry into the state of the kingdom, that there was no movement of any kind among the papists, nor any disturbance excited by unruly individuals of any class. And with the view of maintaining this favourable position of affairs, it was agreed that the practice which had been adopted by the church in Edinburgh, should be extended to other places, and that every Sabbath-day should be observed as a day of fasting and moderate diet till his majesty's return. The king was so sensible of the beneficial influence exerted by Bruce over the state of the kingdom, that he wrote him several letters with his own hand, in which he declared that he considered him worth the quarter of his kingdom, and promised that he would never forget his services. "Good Mr. Robert, besides the welcome news that by your last letter you sent unto me, you painted out so vividly therein your honest meaning to my service, besides the good report I have otherwise heard of your daily travails to that effect now during my absence, that I think myself beholden, never while I live to forget the same." There are also letters extant from Chancellor Maitland to Bruce, which give the same view of the value of his services, acknowledging the great burden which had come upon him since the king's departure, and expressing the confident belief that God would strengthen him to sustain it, as it was so intimately connected with the interests of religion.‡

When the king returned with his royal bride, the Danes who accompanied them home were desirous that the coronation of the young queen should take place on the Sabbath-day. Some of the ministers opposed this as a desecration of the day's sacred rest, but others maintained that as crowning was a mixed action, like marriage, and as a solemn oath was interposed between the prince and his subjects, and the officiating minister invoked the blessing of Heaven upon the parties, so important and religious an act might be quite lawfully performed on the Lord's-day. A similar question was raised with regard to the ceremony of anointing, which the majority considered as no part of the office of a Christian minister, but as a rite borrowed from the Jews, and therefore bordering upon superstition when practised by Christians. It was allowed, however, that if the king chose to authorise its performance, it might be used, not as a religious rite, but as a civil ceremony; and as his majesty was determined that unction should be employed on the occasion, and even spoke of having recourse to the bishops,* his will was acquiesced in. The coronation accordingly took place on the Lord's-day, in the chapel of Holyrood House; Lindsay, assisted by the chancellor, placing the crown upon her majesty's head, and Bruce pouring the oil on her right hand, forehead, and neck.† And, as if to give proof of the king's reconciliation to the Presbyterian Church, Andrew Melvil also was not only invited to be present, but was even asked to take part in the proceedings. He recited a Latin poem in honour of the great event of the day, which excited the highest admiration, and which was declared by the king to do such honour to himself and the country as he could never forget. It was immediately printed by his majesty's command, and extended the fame of Melvil's learning over the Continent.‡

A meeting of the General Assembly took place in August, at which James Melvil, as moderator of the previous meeting, delivered the opening discourse. He entered at great length into the question of the proper discipline of the house of God, and recounted the efforts which had been made during a course of years for establishing a scriptural order in the Church of Scotland. He admonished the brethren to make themselves well acquainted with this subject, that they might be able to speak with effect in defence of their church order, and to resist the numerous and insidious influences which were at work for its complete overthrow.§ And, in particular, he refers to one who was hatching a cockatrice's egg. "This is Patrick Adamson, false Bishop of St. Andrew's, who is employed upon a book against our discipline, which he entitles 'Psyllus,' and dedicates to the king. The epistle dedicatory of which is in my hand, wherein he shows his purpose to be to suck out the poison of the discipline of the Kirk of Scotland, as the Psylli, a people of Africa, suck out the venom from the wounds of those who are stung with serpents. But I trust in God he shall fare like the silly Psyllies, of whom Herodotus, in his 'Melpomene,' writes that they perished in this manner:—When the south wind had dried up their cisterns of water, they took counsel to proceed against it in arms, but when they came among the deserts, the wind blew fiercely, and overwhelmed them with dry sand."*

Another point which he handled at considerable length was the obligation under which congregations were placed by Christ, not only to love and honour their ministers, but also to provide them with all things needful to their comfortable subsistence. "God bids thee honour him in the ministry of his appointment with the best of thy substance; and if thou do not this way acknowledge the owner and giver of all thou hast, thou art but an unthankful thief, and not a lawful possessor with a good conscience; and in the day of God's justice court, thou shalt hear the doom, and receive the punishment of a thief, if thou prevent not by repentance." Nor were flocks to excuse themselves from this duty on the ground that the tields were rigorously exacted, and that therefore the support of the ministry should be devolved upon those who received them. As they would spare no cost to procure food for the body, so they should be solicitous to a much greater extent for proper supplies of nourishment to the soul. And the conviction was expressed that if the importance of Gospel ordinances were more frequently made the theme of discourse in the pulpit, many would be stirred up to procure and maintain pastors on their own charges. Melvil's discourse was highly approved by the assembly, and the reception which was given to it showed that the ministry retained all their affection for the old policy, and would hardly desist from their efforts till it was completely restored. At this meeting of the General Assembly the king made his appearance in person, and delivered a panegyric upon the Church of Scotland, which has been often quoted. He praised God that he had been "born in such a time as that of the light of the Gospel, and in such a place as to be king in the purest Kirk in the world. The Kirk of Geneva keepeth Pasch and Yule.‡ What have the yfor them? They have no institution. As for our neighbour Kirk in England, their service is an evil-said mass in English, wanting nothing but the liftings.‡ I charge you, my good people, ministers, doctors, elders, nobles, gentlemen, and barons, to stand to your purity, and I, forsooth, so long as I brook § my life and crown, shall maintain the same against all deadly."||

on the ground of various charges, among which were included the mutilation of the records of the General Assembly, and celebrating the marriage of the Earl of Huntley, contrary to an express prohibition of the commissioners of the Church. The case having been transmitted for trial to the presbytery of Edinburgh, they found the bishop guilty of falsehood and double-dealing, erroneous doctrine, opposition to the discipline of the Church, and contempt of the late public thanksgiving; and therefore they excluded him from the communion of the Church, till he should manifest signs of repentance. He was at this time occupied with a work under the title of "Psyllus," the object of which was to defend episcopacy and the royal supremacy, and to warn the neighbouring kingdom of England of the dangerous rocks upon which the Church of Scotland had struck.* He was also engaged in a correspondence with Bancroft, chaplain to the lord chancellor of England, who had preached a sermon at Paul's Cross, at the opening of the English parliament in February, 1588, in which he traduced the character of Knox and the Scottish Reformers, and represented the Presbyterian Church as full of sedition, treason, and tyranny. This sermon, which was bitterly complained of in Scotland, as doing the grossest injustice to the Presbyterian Church, drew its representations mainly from Adamson's famous declaration; and Adamson's correspondence with its author was designed to prepare the way for the assimilation of the ecclesiastical polity of Scotland to that of England.† But the bishop's day of influence was now gone. His efforts to stir up the mind of the king against the liberties and discipline of the Presbyterian Church utterly failed. James took an early opportunity of contradicting the statement made by Bancroft in his discourse, that the recent concessions in favour of presbytery were merely made under the pressure of circumstances, and that they might be expected to be soon recalled. He also withdrew his countenance from Adamson, being disgusted with the complaints which were poured in against him from all quarters.‡ The bishop was continually exposed to lawsuits for the recovery of property unjustly detained in his hands; and although it is probable that it was mismanagement rather than dishonesty with which he was chargeable, still the effect was to lower his character, and to hold him up to universal contempt.§ The temporalities of his bishopric too were made over to the Duke of Lennox, and as the king refused to afford him any assistance, he fell at once into extreme poverty and the deepest dejection.|| He was under the necessity of applying to Andrew Melvil for assistance, who with a generous forgetfulness of all the wrongs which the bishop had inflicted upon him, supported him for some months out of his own private resources, and afterwards procured for him a contribution from the members of the church in St. Andrew's. From this time he expressed an earnest desire to be loosed from the sentence of excommunication; and several brethren having been deputed to converse with him on the subject, their report was such that his request was complied with. He was asked, however, His recantation. to sign a recantation, which he did, acknowledging that he had done wrong, in desiring to be more than a simple pastor of God's Word,* and in describing presbyteries as a foolish invention, whilst they were really an ordinance of Christ.† He also professed sorrow for having married the Earl of Huntley contrary to the prohibition of the Church; and he owned that he was the author of the act by which ministers were deprived of their stipends for not subscribing the enactments of 1584. For this harsh treatment of his brethren he confessed that in God's providence he was now receiving a righteous recompense. With regard to the document styled the King's Declaration, he does not deny that he wrote it, and he allows that it traduced the order of the Kirk, and was full of misrepresentations, but he excuses himself on the ground that he was commanded by the king's ministers for the time being to undertake the work.‡

The circumstances in which this recantation was written were such, that but little Estimate of value can be attached to it. It is recantation. impossible to ascertain how far it was the result of sincere conviction. Spottiswood ascribes it to the pressing difficulties in which the bishop's own mismanagement of the funds of the Church had involved him, coupled with the fact that he received pecuniary assistance from his former opponents; and the probability is that but for these causes, no such document would ever have been signed by the Bishop of St. Andrew's. It is surprising, however, that Spottiswood represents the publishing of this document as an injury to Adamson; and intimates that the bishop himself complained heavily of the wrong which was done to him, and with the feeling of an injured man committed his cause to God. But for what other purpose can it be imagined that a recantation was asked from him at all, if not in order to be published? The sole use of a recantation is to make it known that a change of opinion has taken place; and if it was conceived that the paper which Adamson signed ought to be suppressed, it was an utter mockery that his name should be affixed to it at all. If he really felt that the publication of it did him injustice, then nothing more is needful to show that he was acting an hypocritical part when he subscribed his name to it.‡

No gleam of prosperity ever again visited the Adamson's fallen Bishop of St. Andrew's. The death. few remaining months of his life were spent in extreme indigence, and he died on the 19th of February, 1592. He was a man of distinguished ability and most extensive attainments; as a public speaker, he was endowed with a singular gift of eloquence, and he could handle a pen with rare facility and grace; * his writings exhibit a wonderful ingenuity and elegance: but he was deficient in principle, and therefore, with all his eminent talents, he never acquired any lasting influence over the minds of men. No trust could be reposed in him when his own interest or ambition came into play. From the very commencement to the close of his career, cases of undeniable tergiversation abound in his life. One of his first public appearances was devoted to the condemnation of episcopacy, and yet he accepted a bishopric a very short time afterwards; and one of the last acts of his life was to affix his name to a recantation of the episcopal principles which he had so long professed. And the whole interval between these first and last scenes of disgrace exhibits inconsistencies of a similar kind, such as signing the book of policy when presbyterian principles were in the ascendant, and then labouring to overthrow it when the aspect of the political heavens changed. He was utterly devoid of that stern integrity which distinguished his opponents in so remarkable a degree, and which made them willing to die rather than to sacrifice their principles. His name might have been honoured in Scottish history if he had been consistent in his support of episcopacy, which, notwithstanding his recantation, must be conceived to be the scheme of ecclesiastical policy which he really approved; but a cloud hangs over his character which can never be dispelled. Every supposition which it is possible to make obliges us to charge him either with defective and feeble judgment, or rather with a want of integrity and honesty.

It could not be the removal of Adamson from the scene which led to the full recognition and establishment of the presbyterian system, for his influence had expired long before himself. But certain it is, that within four months after his death there was effected a settlement of the differences by which the nation had been agitated for a number of years. The king himself had been growing rather more favourably disposed towards the presbyterian leaders, probably because he saw that their influence in the country was unbounded, and that consequently there was no likelihood of his being able to secure anything like a general acquiescence in his own favourite scheme. Chancellor Maitland, too, now Lord Thirstane, although formerly connected with Arran, and implicated in his assaults upon the freedom of the Church, had yet come to perceive that true policy required an abandonment of the struggle for the establishment of episcopacy in opposition to the will of the nation; and his influence tended powerfully to soften and modify the dislike of James to the presbyterians. The conduct of the ministers, also, during the period of his majesty's absence in Norway, and the benefits which had accrued from their influence over the people, did much to counteract the prejudices of the royal mind against them. And in particular, Robert Bruce, both on account of his valuable services at that time, and his intimacy with Maitland, and his family connexions, was eminently instrumental in disposing the king to restrain his hostile feelings, and to look with some small degree of favour, or at least patience, upon the scheme of ecclesiastical polity which was so dear to the nation.*

At the meeting of the General Assembly held in May, it was agreed that a strenuous effort should be made to procure the repeal of the obnoxious acts of 1584,† and for this purpose several articles were prepared, and a deputation was appointed to present them to his majesty. The scene which occurred when the members of the deputation were admitted to the royal presence, was far from promising a successful termination of the business on which they had come. The king expressed much displeasure at the favourable opinions entertained by the ministers in regard to Knox, the Good Regent, and George Buchanan, who were men, he said, that could not be defended but by traitorous and seditious theologues. This remark roused the spirit of Andrew Melvil, who spoke so warmly in defence of these illustrious men that the chancellor, afraid of the impression which might be made upon the king, reminded him that it was a different business on which he had come; but Melvil refused to be silent on such a subject, unless his majesty himself positively forbade him to speak. The king found fault with Buchanan's book, "De Jure Regni," which led Melvil to remark that the men whom he was blaming so severely, were the very individuals who had placed the crown upon his head. To this James replied that the crown came to him by succession, and was not bestowed upon him by any one.‡ But Melvil rejoined that the men in question were the instruments of his elevation, and assured him that whoever strove to prejudice his mind against them, were neither his friends nor the friends of their country.

Another ground of offence was given to the king by Balcanquhall, in a sermon preached upon the 2nd of June, in which he censured the rulers of the country for negligence in the discharge of their duties; and reminded them of the Earl of Morton, who, at his execution, just eleven years past that very day, bitterly regretted that, when he had time and opportunity, he did not do the good which was in his power. Balcanquhall was summoned into the king's presence, and charged with declaiming against the government in a style unprecedented in any country. But he defended himself by appealing to the example of the prophets in Israel. To this James replied that the office of prophet no longer existed; but Balcanquhall alleged that a greater office had succeeded in the ministry of the New Testament. Proof was demanded by James; and the case of John the Baptist was adduced in reply. The liberty of speech assumed by the ministers was so displeasing to the king, that he earnestly pressed the lords of articles to frame an act calculated to restrain them, and to propose the appointment of some special magistrates, who should be authorised to eject them from the pulpit when they transgressed. Such a thing, remarked the Provost of Edinburgh, to whom his majesty specially addressed himself, he could never do, but would rather resign his office. "What," said the king, "do you prefer them to me?"—"I prefer God before man," replied the provost.*

Notwithstanding these altercations, which chafed the mind of the king to a great extent, and were calculated to rouse into violent action all his strong prejudices against the presbyterian ministers and the republican genius of presbytery, the claims of the Church were favourably entertained by parliament; and an act was passed very greatly in advance of what the ministers expected, by which the encroachments of 1584 were removed, and the old policy, in all its leading features, was restored.† Various influences conspired to bring about this unexpected result. Public indignation was strongly excited on account of the recent assassination of the Earl of Moray, son-in-law of the Good Regent, who while residing with his mother, Lady Doune, at Dunnibristle Castle, was attacked and killed in cold blood by the Earl of Huntley, on the ground of some existing feud. Moray, who resembled his father-in-law both in appearance and in character, and was considered the handsomest man of his times, being popularly designated the "Bonnie Earl of Moray," was held in the highest regard by the people; and as no disposition was shown to bring the perpetrator of the foul murder to punishment, the public discontent rose to a high pitch, and songs and placards everywhere appeared, charging even James himself with a share of the guilt.‡ Bothwell, too, although defeated in his recent attempt to seize the king's person, was still in arms, and his unscrupulous and daring character rendered the position of his majesty not a little insecure. These and other causes, such as James's lavish profusion and consequent poverty, diminished the royal power, and rendered it imperative to make some concessions to the Church, with the view of regaining its support. Chancellor Maitland, too, exerted his influence to prevail upon the king to accede to the wishes of the ministers, and James at length consented, though there is reason to believe that he repented immediately after the deed was done.*

The act of parliament obtained as the result of all these concurring circumstances, Substance of has always been considered as the the act of great charter of the Church of Scotland. 1592.† It begins with confirming all the liberties, privileges, and immunities, which had ever been granted by his majesty, or by regents in his name, or by his predecessors, to the true and holy Kirk presently established in the realm. It does not ratify, or even mention, the Second Book of Discipline, but it sanctions most of the leading principles of government embodied in it, and employs not a little of its language. In the first place, it was declared lawful to hold general assemblies at least once in the year, or oftener should occasion and necessity require; but it was at the same time provided, that either his majesty in person or his commissioners should at each assembly fix the time and place of the next meeting, unless neither of them were present, in which case the assembly itself was allowed to make the appointment, as had been the practice for some years past. Authority was likewise granted for holding synodal or provincial assemblies twice each year; and presbyteries and sessions were sanctioned without any restriction of the number of meetings which they might hold. Synods were to be entrusted with the consideration of weighty matters connected with the wellbeing of the churches within their bounds, and they were also invested with power to handle, order, and redress all things done amiss in subordinate judicatories. To presbyteries it belonged to carry the ordinances of the General Assembly, and of provincial synods, into effect; to attend to the good order of the churches within their bounds; to see that the Word of God was purely preached, the sacraments rightly administered, discipline properly executed, and ecclesiastical goods honestly distributed. Particular churches, also, were to be ruled by a sufficient ministry and session, and they were to exercise through these office-bearers power and jurisdiction over their own members in matters ecclesiastical. It was likewise enacted by parliament, that when persons charged with misconduct were excluded from office in the Church by sentence of presbytery, synod, or the General Assembly, this exclusion was to deprive them of all interest in the temporalities of benefices which they had formerly possessed; and notice of the sentence being communicated to the patron, he was to be bound to present another qualified person to the vacant church within six months, on pain of losing his right of patronage for that time. It was further provided that if the presbytery should refuse to admit a qualified minister presented to them by the patron, it should be lawful for the patron to retain the funds of the benefice in his own hands.*

Besides these provisions, the new law embodied some other enactments. It abolished a variety of acts of parliament favourable to popery, which had remained upon the statute book, some of them for more than a century; and it also declared that the more recent enactments of 1584 should in no respect interfere with the privileges of spiritual functionaries, in regard to heresy, excommunication, and the settlement or deposition of ministers. The commissions granted at that time to bishops and other judges to receive his majesty's presentation to benefices, and to decide in ecclesiastical causes, were declared to have expired, and to be null in time coming, and of no avail, force, or effect; and presentations were ordained to be laid before presbyteries, which should have full power to give collation to benefices, and to settle all ecclesiastical questions within their bounds, "providing the foresaid presbyteries be bound and astricted to receive and admit whatsoever qualified minister presented by his majesty or laic patrons."†

It is considered by Dr. M'Crie as a defect in the act of parliament, passed in 1592, regarding the Church, that the supreme court was deprived of the right of appointing its own meetings, and that the power of presbyteries, and the liberties of the people, were fettered by the continuance of lay patronage.‡ The question of the relations which should subsist between an established church and the civil government is one encompassed with extreme difficulty. Where a church neither asks nor receives from the State anything in the shape of recognition or pecuniary support, there exists no reason why its proceedings should be in any respect interfered with, unless it were charged with raising the standard of revolt, and attempting to introduce civil disorder into the land. But it must be quite different with a church whose principles have received a civil recognition, and whose ministrations are supported by funds which the State has supplied. If it be the magistrate's duty to make laws and provide means for the religious instruction of the people, it must also be his duty to watch the agencies which he brings into operation, and to take steps for securing that they really serve their purpose. It seems quite unreasonable on the one hand to affirm that it is the duty of a particular person to provide for a certain object, and yet on the other hand to deny that he has any right to control or regulate the means which he considers it proper to employ. There must be some point in an established church upon which the magistrate has a right to lay his restraining and guiding hand; and the principle of the Confession of Faith seems a very reasonable one, as applied to such churches, that the magistrate "has power to call synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."* This appears to be the only consistent theory on which an established church can rest.

The Presbyterian Church had now attained what was considered a settled and very favourable position. And notwithstanding the numerous difficulties with which she had been struggling for years past, her ministers had gradually augmented in number. It was during the course of this summer that measures were taken for the division of Edinburgh into eight congregations,† to be supplied by eight ministers; and it was arranged that the stipends should be provided in the manner suggested by James Melvil‡ two years previously, by a yearly contribution from the godly people of the town, until the "common good" of the burgh should be able to bear the burden.§ It thus appears that the voluntary principle outran the scheme of legal support; and we doubt not that, if it had been employed not merely to supplement the deficiencies of that scheme, but as an independent method, in whose intrinsic power confidence was placed, and whose scriptural obligation was believed and felt, it would have shown itself in all respects adequate to maintain the ordinances of religion; and the Church of Scotland might have been saved those struggles with the State, into which she was thrown in consequence of her dependence upon the civil power for support. But the ideas of that age in regard to religious liberty were radically and totally wrong. It was the universal conviction that only one church ought to be allowed by government to exist, that that church should be supported by the authority of parliament, and that all deviation from its principles should be suppressed by civil pains and penalties. This was the belief of the Romish Church, and she had acted upon it with unrelenting rigour so long as she possessed the power, persecuting with fire and sword in all directions; but it was also the belief of the Reformed Church, though she had been restrained by the influence of her purer faith from carrying it out to the same extent of cruelty.|| The universal prevalence of this most erroneous and unscriptural idea, which has been productive of such fearful woes to the human race, by making men the deadly enemies of one another on account of conscientious differences of religious opinion, rendered it impossible for the voluntary principle to obtain anything like a trial at all. The right of men to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, whatever those might be, required first to be seen and recognised before the idea could suggest itself, that not public funds, but the contributions of godly and Christian men, are the only proper means of supporting the ordinances of God's house.

Edinburgh was not the only place where the number of ministers had greatly increased; this was the case also in most other districts of the country. In the presbytery of St. Andrew's, for example, there had been only five parishes provided with ministers at the time when Andrew Melvil became connected with the university, but we know that shortly after the period which we have now reached, the number amounted to sixteen. This increase of Christian pastors throughout the country manifests how strong a hold the principles of the Reformed Church had taken of the public mind in Scotland, and accounts for the influence which the religious teachers were enabled to exert over the public affairs of the nation.*

The power of the clergy had been exerted in a very beneficial manner at the time of the threatened invasion of the Spanish Armada; and now again a somewhat similar posture of affairs demanded a similar interference. It was known that seminary priests from the Continent were at work in various parts of the kingdom, and rumours of plots and invasions were succeeding each other with portentous rapidity, so that the public mind was in a state of constant agitation and alarm. An extraordinary convention was, therefore, held at Edinburgh in November, which was numerously attended by brethren from all parts of the country.† The information communicated to this meeting at once gave rise to the general conviction, that some scheme was on foot for the subversion of the Reformed Faith, and for the overthrow of the existing government. With the view of averting the dangers with which it thus appeared that the country was threatened, it was agreed that a general fast should be observed in all the churches of the kingdom on the 17th and 24th days of December, when, with true humiliation and unfeigned repentance, they should supplicate God's help in this trying emergency. The reasons assigned for this fast were the intention of the enemy to execute the bloody decree of the Council of Trent against all Protestants; the spiritual destitution of so large a portion of the country for want of pastors and sufficient means of upholding the gospel; the defection of many from the faith, particularly among the nobility, through the efforts of Jesuits and priests; and the general disorder of the commonwealth, and wickedness of all kinds that abounded in the land. It was agreed that a committee of brethren should meet weekly in Edinburgh to watch the progress of events, and to take care that the Church should suffer no damage;* and instructions were sent to all the different presbyteries, to the effect that they should endeavour to compose all existing disagreements in their several neighbourhoods; that they should warn the congregations under their care of the dangers which were apprehended; that they should gather all the information which they were able to procure, and transmit it to the committee in Edinburgh without loss of time. These measures were communicated to the king, and obtained his sanction.†

It seems to have been in consequence of the activity of the Church, and the instantaneous communication of intelligence between the ministers of different districts, that discovery was made of a plot for landing a Spanish force of thirty thousand men upon the west coast of Scotland, partly for the invasion of England, and partly for the subversion of the Protestant faith in Scotland itself.‡ Andrew Knox, minister of Paisley, acting upon secret intelligence which he had received, proceeded with a number of students belonging to the University of Glasgow, and some gentlemen from the neighbourhood, to the island of Cumbray, and there apprehended George Kerr, a doctor of laws, and brother of Lord Newbottle, just as he was preparing to set sail for Spain. On his person were found letters from certain priests in Scotland, and blanks subscribed and sealed by the Earls of Huntley, Angus, and Errol. The nature and extent of the plot were thus completely unmasked. The intelligence discovered was immediately transmitted to the king, who was absent; and he was requested to hasten to Edinburgh with all possible speed. At first he was disposed to resent the proceedings instituted in the case, as an encroachment upon his prerogative; but as the existence of the plot was undeniable, and the objects of it were plainly of the most traitorous kind, he gradually gave his approbation to the measures proposed, and declared that he would prosecute all parties implicated in the conspiracy with promptitude and severity.§ The utmost zeal now animated all ranks in the community. A body-guard was provided for the king, to defend him from the machinations of his enemies. A new bond was subscribed for the defence of religion, and the support of his majesty's government. A proclamation was also issued by the king warning the lieges of the dangers to which the country was exposed, exhorting them to hold fast their religious privileges, and commanding them to be in readiness to follow his majesty to the field, as occasion might require.|| And, meanwhile,

they were to communicate to him, or to his council, all such intelligence as they might be able to procure regarding the treasonable proceedings of Jesuits and seminary priests. Graham of Fintry, an accomplice of Kerr, was brought to trial and beheaded at the Market Cross of Edinburgh.* Kerr also was examined at great length, but as he had powerful friends, the proceedings against him were somewhat dilatory; and at length he was allowed, it was said with the connivance of the king himself, to escape from prison. Immediately after Graham's execution, James marched northwards against the popish earls, with the view of apprehending them and bringing them to trial; and his proceedings seemed to be conducted with vigour.†

Meanwhile a meeting of the General Assembly Demands of was held at Dundee. They craved the Church. of his majesty that all papists within the country might be punished according to the laws of God and the realm; that the act of parliament might ipso facto apply to all manner of men, landed and unlanded, in office or not, as it applied to beneficed persons; that a declaration should be issued against Jesuits, seminary priests, and trafficking papists, pronouncing them all guilty of treason; and that all such persons as the Kirk found to be papists should be debarred from holding any office in the country, from having access to his majesty's presence, and even from enjoying the benefit of the laws.‡ These demands, when brought into juxtaposition with the ideas prevalent at the present day, appear altogether unreasonable; and Tytler bitterly censures the Church for her procedure against papists. But this historian forgets that the true idea of religious liberty, or even of toleration, was quite unknown to any party in those days. And when it is considered that a conspiracy had just been discovered for the overthrow of the Protestant faith, and the substitution of the popish religion in its room, it is not at all wonderful, if the principles are kept in view which were then universally recognised, that the severest measures should be recommended. The Romanists might complain of persecution, but experience left no room for doubt, that if they succeeded in their designs there would indeed be a persecution, compared with which any intolerance shown by the Reformers was hardly worthy of being mentioned. That the Protestants held persecuting principles as well as their opponents is undeniable, but they never acted upon them to the same extent. They were better than their principles. They were restrained by emotions of humanity, and the mellowing influence of Christian feeling; and even when most provoked, they stopped short of the lengths to which their opponents made no scruple of going. But still they were strangers to the true idea of religious liberty; and so were all others as well as they.

Men might have some dim visions of the excellence of liberty of conscience when they were in a minority, but no majority ever looked upon it as anything else than a deadly sin. The exclamation of Lord Hamilton, when James ventured one day in private to throw out the idea of granting liberty of conscience to the popish earls, "Sir, then we are all gone, then we are all gone, then we are all gone!" gives a just view of the horror with which everything like recognised toleration of religious differences was regarded.* Nor was the king himself at all an exception. Those who ascribe the coldness which James manifested with regard to the measures proposed by the Kirk, to a zeal for the interests of religious liberty, claim an honour for him to which he has no title. He could speak of liberty of conscience, like others, when he felt an interest in the parties for whom it was claimed; but the idea of such liberty, to be enjoyed as a privilege and a right by all, was as foreign to the mind of James as it was detested by every one else. The motives by which the king was swayed, in looking coldly upon the proposals of the Church, seem rather to have been a wish not to offend the popish party in England, lest they should oppose his succession; † a consideration of the power, of many of the leading individuals implicated in the recently discovered plot; the unhappy dissensions prevailing among the nobility; and the fear that the royal authority was too feeble to bring them all to punishment. Mere dislike of persecution will not account for the fact that the Earls of Huntley, Angus, and Errol, Gordon of Auchindown, and Chisholm of Cornelix, who were undeniably guilty of treason, were treated with the utmost lenity, and in the end acquitted on the ground of some informality in the libel against them. The views of James are sufficiently apparent from the declaration which he afterwards made, that he would purge the land of papists, and suffer no man, in whatsoever degree, to be of a different religion than he was of himself.‡

To the requests of the General Assembly, James sent an answer, in which, proceeding upon the principle that the enemies of the Church and of his own authority were one and the same parties, he expressed the desire that in all the presbyteries there might be persons appointed, to gather the utmost possible information regarding papists and Spanish factioners, and also regarding the practices of Bothwell, and to communicate their discoveries to his council. He found fault too with the assembly for convening without his appointment, in violation of the late act of parliament; and he required that before breaking up they should send two of their number to him, that he might prescribe the day when their next meeting should be held.§ He likewise desired the assembly to pass an act forbidding ministers, under pain of deprivation, to declaim in the pulpit against his proceedings or those of his council; and this demand he grounded not only upon his acknowledged favour to piety and justice, but also upon the facility with which ministers could obtain access to his presence, to make known their grievances to himself. With these views of his majesty the assembly expressed their entire concurrence; and they admonished ministers to avoid rash and irreverend speeches against the king or his council, and to make sure that in all public admonitions they proceeded upon just and necessary causes. This admonition, however, was not considered by James as at all constituting a sufficient remedy for the evil of which he complained; and therefore he in his turn felt the less disposed to enter warmly into the views of the assembly with regard to Jesuits and seminary priests, and other adherents of Rome.*

To the dissatisfaction of the Kirk with the lenity of the king towards the papists, and their consequent refusal to co-operate with him for the preservation of good order, Tytler ascribes

the tumults and irregularities which everywhere abounded about this time.† But there is no evidence to show that the ministers at all relaxed their efforts for the preservation of the public tranquillity. A far more likely cause of the disorderly spirit which now began to manifest itself, was the lenity shown by the king and parliament to men who were undeniably guilty of treason. It was not mere popery with which Angus, Huntley, Errol, and Auchindown were charged, but it was a conspiracy to land thirty thousand Spaniards in Scotland for the overthrow of the religion of the country: and yet it was the mere form of a trial which they were required to undergo, and no punishment whatever was inflicted upon them. This was a positive encouragement to all sorts of disorders; and the deplorable outrages which Tytler enumerates, are just the consequences which might have been anticipated from a feeble administration of the law. It was too apparent from the first that James had no intention to take any decisive step against the conspirators, whom he was unwilling to exasperate, as they had a powerful party on their side; and with this acknowledged fact in view, it is certainly surprising that any historian should search for another cause of prevailing disregard of law, and more astonishing still that he should fix upon the alleged connivance of the Kirk at breaches of the public peace. Were James Gray, a gentleman of the king's suite, Lord Home, the Duke of Lennox, the Earl of Mar, Campbell of Ardkinglass, the Earl of Argyle, Lord John Hamilton, Chancellor Thirlstane, the Master of Glamis, Lord Spynie, Lord Maxwell, Lord

Cessford, Sir James Sandilands—who are all mentioned by Tytler as implicated in the disorders of this period—were these men more likely to be influenced by the inactivity of the Kirk, than by the manifest feebleness of the royal arm?

The lenity shown by the king to the popish lords, of whose connection with the conspiracy recently detected hardly anyone entertained a doubt, was highly displeasing to the whole country, and excited grave doubts with regard to the sincerity of his majesty's own attachment to the Protestant faith. The subject was brought before the synod of Fife at their meeting in September; and, with bitter lamentation for the encouragement which was afforded by the king to the enemies of the Reformed Church—who were known to be boasting that they would soon make all men receive their religion—they determined to institute proceedings against the Earls of Angus, Huntley, and Errol, Lord Home, Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchindown, and Sir James Chisholm, on the ground that, having signed the Confession of Faith while studying at St. Andrew's, they were amenable to their jurisdiction.* And they did accordingly excommunicate these noblemen, and “deliver them to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be safe, if God were pleased to reclaim them by true repentance;” and they appointed not only that intimation of the solemn deed should be made by every minister in his own church, but that notice of it should be sent also to all the adjacent synods. These proceedings, while they were approved of by the great body of the Presbyterian Church, and considered as the most efficient means of warding off danger from the country,† were highly displeasing to the king, because they tended to defeat his views with regard to the case of the popish earls, which, although postponed, still stood over for final judgment. He sent for Robert Bruce, and endeavoured to prevail upon him to prevent intimation of the sentence from being made, alleging that it was unjust and informal; but Bruce assured him that it was quite beyond his power to interfere with the proceedings of a neighbouring synod.‡

During an interview with commissioners from a convention in Edinburgh, in October, the king inveighed bitterly against the synod of Fife for excommunicating the popish earls, and even threatened to summon a meeting of parliament for the purpose of restoring episcopacy. James Melvil defended the course which the ministers had taken, and assured his majesty that they were actuated by all reverence for him, and that their object was to ward off imminent dangers which were threatening the religion and liberties of the country. Other meetings took place with regard to this business at Linlithgow and Holyrood House, but the final result was that the king carried his purpose, and an "act of abolition" was passed, by which the process against the popish earls was stopped, and they were declared "free and unaccusable" in all time coming with regard to the crimes charged against them, provided they abstained for the future from all treasonable correspondence with foreigners.*

Andrew Melvil attended the meeting at Holyrood House as one of the six commissioners for the Church, nominated by the convention of Estates at Linlithgow. Disapproving of the proceedings, he expressed his mind with his wonted freedom, and censured the king for the terms in which he spoke of the leaders of the Reformation, and for the favour which he showed to the enemies of religion, and particularly to the house of Huntley. He called upon those who were the advisers of this course to avow themselves in presence of the Estates, and he offered to prove them guilty of treason against Christ and the king's person,—expressing himself ready, if his proof failed, to go to the gibbet, provided the same measure were meted out to them, if he succeeded.† His words made the king and his courtiers smile, and they said that he was more zealous and choleric than wise.

The proceedings of the king were highly displeasing to the adherents of the Presbyterian Church, who regarded his lenity to men that were undoubtedly guilty of treason, as warranting the suspicion that he was favourably disposed to their principles. Yet while the act of abolition was certainly by far too lenient in one respect, it wears, as read by the light of the nineteenth century, an aspect of revolting severity in another. In fact, it is a document which it is both painful and at the same time highly instructive to peruse; and it strikingly exemplifies the difficulties which must necessarily perplex government, where religious liberty is either not understood or not practised. The popish earls were declared "unaccusable" in regard to the treason of which it was not questioned that they were guilty, and their estates, instead of being forfeited, were spared to them; but the conditions prescribed were that they should either embrace the Protestant faith, and make their peace with the Kirk, or quit the kingdom and live in perpetual exile.‡ Now, although the principles prevailing among Protestants would oblige us to characterise such a condition, if proposed at the present day, as most unreasonable and unchristian, yet according to the views which were then universally prevalent, and which maintained their sway for more than a century afterwards, it was the most lenient course which could possibly have been adopted. Where hostile parties conscientiously entertained the belief, that if they tolerated one another's religious opinions they became chargeable with the guilt attaching to erroneous doctrine, there was an utter absence of everything like a mediating or harmonising principle, and no alternative remained but to carry on the conflict, till one party gained such a superiority as the other could not venture to contest. We are sometimes apt to wonder that the Protestant leaders did not sooner discover the principle of toleration, which appears to us so obvious and reasonable; but we forget the personal experience which they had had of the horrid cruelties inflicted by popery upon alleged heretics; we forget that popery continued the dominant system over Europe, and displayed the same cruel spirit everywhere; and we forget that at this very period there was a powerful league in existence for suppressing protestantism by force of arms throughout Christendom. If it required all the philosophic calmness and experience of Locke to reason out the principle of toleration, and that too in a state of society so exceedingly different, was it to be expected that the early Reformers should be able to discover and assert this principle amid the plots, and alarms, and leagues, and conspiracies with which they were surrounded? It admits of no doubt that, tried by the principles prevalent at the time, the treatment given to the popish lords was in some respects most culpably lenient. They had conspired to land a foreign force in the country to overthrow its religion, and yet their lives were spared, their estates were not forfeited; they were only required, if they could not conform to the religion of the country, to live in a foreign land. Would any Romish power have treated Protestant rebels in this manner?*

But not only did the popish lords not accept within the prescribed period the terms offered to them, but they continued to carry on a treasonable correspondence with Spain, and made every effort to procure a foreign force to aid them in their rebellious designs.† The king, now thoroughly persuaded of the folly of tampering any longer with so flagrant a case of treason, determined to take prompt and decisive measures against the conspirators;‡ and the General Assembly also, as guardians of the religion and liberties of the nation, brought into exercise the spiritual weapons which belonged to them. They confirmed with entire unanimity the sentence of excommunication which had been pronounced upon the popish lords by the synod of Fife,§ and ordained that every minister in the kingdom should make solemn intimation of the sentence from his pulpit, that none might be able to pretend ignorance, or become chargeable with the crime of harbouring excommunicated persons.* Lord Home, however, was not included among the rest when this final step was adopted. As he had appeared before the assembly, made professions of penitence for his fault, and craved to be released from the sentence of excommunication pronounced by the inferior court, the brethren took a favourable view of his case; and after he had given his consent to certain conditions which they prescribed, such as signing the Confession of Faith, attending public worship, supporting the true religion, and abstaining from all intercourse with Jesuits and seminary priests, they ordained that he should be formally released by the moderator from the spiritual burden under which, according to his own profession, he was suffering so much distress of mind.† Andrew Melvil was moderator at the time, but in consequence of suspicions which he entertained of the sincerity of Home, and on account of the view which he took of the unsettled state of the country, he could not bring himself to undertake the performance of this duty. His reasons having been stated to the assembly, they respected his scruples, and appointed David Lindsay, the former moderator, to supply his place for the occasion.‡ Such consideration of private feelings has not always characterised the procedure of church judicatories. Not unfrequently individuals, who have conscientiously disapproved of decisions adopted by the majority, have been compelled to take an active part in carrying them into effect, when their place might easily have been supplied by others to whom the task would have been quite agreeable; and thus much wanton cruelty has been inflicted, and in some cases the unity of the Church has been broken. The plea of conscience is one which should never be lightly regarded, or rashly set aside, by an ecclesiastical court.§

At this assembly it was agreed that a deputation should be appointed to bring to his majesty. under his majesty's notice the dangers to which the religion and liberties of the country were exposed from the designs of Spain, and the continued machinations of the popish lords, and to request that vigorous measures might be adopted for warding off the threatened perils and bringing the guilty parties to justice.|| James Melvil was nominated as one of the individuals who should compose this deputation; but several members of the assembly objected that his appointment was inexpedient, as he had incurred the displeasure of the king on account of certain rumours against James Melvil. It had been alleged that monies intrusted to him by good Christians for the purpose of being transmitted to

Geneva,* and applied to the relief of the suffering brethren there, had been misappropriated by him, and employed, with his uncle's connivance, to further the designs of Bothwell, who was pretending that he had a commission from the Church against papists. Assuming the very attitude which conscious innocence would dictate, Melvil remarked that his name had often been put upon commissions in times of greater danger than the present, when there was a difficulty of finding individuals to act; that in ordinary circumstances he had no wish for such appointments, but that at present the very reason assigned for the omission of his name, made him earnestly desirous of being appointed one of the deputation. It was his wish to have the opportunity of presenting himself at court, that he might openly meet the charges which any individuals might be able to bring against him. Accordingly, his name was put upon the list of the commissioners, and after they had brought the public business with which they were intrusted under the notice of his majesty, he adverted to his own private concerns. He begged of the king that his traducers might be brought face to face with him, and that any charges which they had to make might be plainly stated. But the king at once assured him that he gave no credit to anything alleged against him, but, on the contrary, considered both him and his uncle to be trusty and faithful subjects.† So, says James Melvil, "I that came to Stirling a traitor, returned to Edinburgh a great courtier, yea, a cabinet councillor." This bold and open procedure on the part of a poor minister at the court of his sovereign could only proceed from a consciousness of perfect integrity, and is of itself sufficient to sweep away all the slanders which have been heaped upon the memory of James Melvil. This courting of inquiry stamps the seal of truth upon the denial he made: "I never liked the man, nor had to do with him directly or indirectly; yea, after guid Archibald Earl of Angus died, I knew not one of the nobility in Scotland with whom I could communicate my mind touching public affairs, let be to have a dealing with in action."‡

Reference is made, in the proceedings of the assembly, to a singular custom which prevailed in Garioch, and many other parts of the country, of dedicating a parcel of ground to the devil, under the designation of the "Good man's Croft." The object of the practice seems to have been to purchase the goodwill of the powers of darkness, and thus to secure immunity from any damage which it might be in their power to inflict; and the plot of ground thus dedicated, being considered as no longer belonging to its human proprietors, was left uncultivated from year to year. This most superstitious and wicked practice the assembly loudly condemned, and they urged upon parliament the propriety of enacting a law that all such lands should be immediately brought under cultivation by those to whom they belonged, under pain of being forfeited to the crown, and bestowed by his majesty upon such persons as would engage to make a proper use of them.*

After the popish lords were defeated by the vigorous measures of the king, and received permission to betake themselves to a foreign country, public tranquillity again blessed the nation, and the suspicions which many had cherished with regard to his majesty's attachment to the Protestant faith were allayed. The ministers of the Church appeared satisfied with the issue of the king's expedition to the north, and commendations of his zeal and ability were heard from many of the pulpits.† Thus relieved for a time from the dread of insurrections, designed for the restoration of popery, the leaders of the Church now turned their attention in good earnest to the deficiency and precariousness of the means provided for her support, and set themselves to devise some efficient and permanent remedy. The poverty of the ministers was extreme. The great mass of ecclesiastical property had passed into the hands of the nobility; new temporal lordships had been founded upon lands wrested from the Church, or bestowed by his majesty after the act of annexation; and the stipends which had been fixed as payable to the ministers of the Gospel were not only small in themselves, but they were never paid faithfully or regularly. On this account many ministers had been compelled to leave their charges, and a large number of parishes remained destitute of the ordinances of religion altogether. ‡

This important subject was brought under the consideration of the General Assembly in June, and after mature deliberation it was resolved that a commission, consisting of individuals from all parts of the kingdom, should be appointed to meet in Edinburgh in the beginning of September, for the purpose of devising some permanent scheme. In order to prepare the way for the labours of the commissioners, all the presbyteries were commanded to institute a previous inquiry with regard to the state of the churches within their bounds, and to digest the information gathered by them in an orderly form, stating the names of patrons; whether the benefices were distinct, or conjoined with others; who possessed the revenues, and by what right; the old rent of the ground, the present rent, and what was considered their just value. The whole mass of information thus collected was to be brought under the consideration of the brethren appointed to meet in Edinburgh; and with the aid of an individual from each presbytery, they were to prepare what was designated a "constant plat of the kirks."* This scheme, after its completion, was to be again reviewed by the commissioners, in conjunction with deputies from each of the fifty presbyteries in the kingdom; and when it had passed through these several ordeals, it was to be presented to his majesty and council for ratification.

The subject of "a constant plat" was under discussion for a long time. It was no favourite with the court or the nobility. Hay, the clerk of register, held it to be an impossibility, as things then stood in Scotland, either to devise or to execute such a measure. Lindsay, however, the secretary, one of the Octavians,† was inclined to take a more favourable view of the subject, and he made an effort to construct a scheme which might prove acceptable, and set the vexed question of ministerial support at rest. His scheme, which embraced as one of its leading provisions the allocation of a certain quantity of victual in every parish to the minister, together with a manse and glebe of at least four acres, and also contemplated the support of schools and a provision for the poor out of the tithes, was received with the highest approbation by the friends of the Church, who considered it the best which had ever been devised, and would gladly have embraced it; but the obstacles thrown in its way, by those who were interested in its rejection, were too numerous and powerful to be overcome.‡ At length Lindsay himself abandoned the attempt as hopeless in existing circumstances. It was obvious that those who had obtained possession of ecclesiastical revenues and lands would never accede to any such scheme; and their number and influence were so great as to render their opposition decisive. The "constant plat" was frequently brought forward by the king and his council, when they had any object in view, in regard to which it was considered desirable to obtain the concurrence of the ministers; but they had no serious intention of ever really carrying it into effect.

The assembly, which met in the spring of 1596, exhibited a scene of a very remarkable and impressive kind. The dangers and difficulties which had beset both the Church and the nation for some years past, led many of the best men in the country to the conclusion that some great national reformation of manners was needed, as the means of averting the wrath of God. A proposition bearing upon this subject was brought by John Davidson before the presbytery of Haddington, and after being cordially embraced by them, it was transmitted to the General Assembly, that it might obtain the sanction of the supreme court, and be immediately carried into effect. The assembly entered most heartily into the views of the presbytery of Haddington. It was the universal feeling that the sins prevailing among all ranks and conditions of men exposed the country to the displeasure of Heaven, and demanded some special act of repentance and humiliation. A document was accordingly prepared, by appointment of the whole meeting, specifying under four different heads the sins which were considered to stand in need of immediate reformation.* These heads were transgressions and blemishes in the lives of ministers of the Gospel, faults chargeable upon persons connected with his majesty's household, corruptions prevailing among all ranks and classes of men, and lastly, defects in the administration of justice both in civil and criminal cases.

As it is common for men to see more clearly, and to expose more unsparingly, faults committed by others, than those with which they themselves are chargeable, some may be ready to imagine that the first of the above heads would be very gently handled as compared with the rest. But the very reverse was the case. While the document touches but slightly upon the faults of his majesty's household and the courts of law, it dwells at great length upon the offences of Christian ministers, and treats them with inflexible severity. A high standard of excellence is set up for ministers, both as regards their personal demeanour and the discharge of their ministerial functions; and no toleration is extended to deficiencies and shortcomings among them.

With the view of stirring one another up to sorrow on account of their faults, and a resolute purpose of amendment, it was agreed that the ministers should meet by themselves in the little church, and engage in a solemn act of conjoint confession and supplication for divine assistance. Davidson, from whom the proposal had first emanated, was appointed to preside at this meeting. He conducted the services in the most affecting manner. His addresses, to God, in confessing the sins of the ministry, and supplicating forgiveness, were so fervent, and his appeals to his assembled brethren were so pointed and exciting, that the feelings of every heart were profoundly stirred; and at one period, for the space of a quarter of an hour, the whole church resounded with sighs and groans, and every eye streamed with tears of penitence. The scene was such as had never been witnessed from the commencement of the Reformation in Scotland. When the meeting was about to dissolve, all the members rose, at the request of the moderator, and holding up their right hands, they entered anew into a solemn covenant with God, and engaged "to walk more warily in their ways, and more diligently in their charges."*

Many of the ministers throughout the country were not present at the General Assembly; and as the benefits accruing from the solemn service in which this court had engaged were conceived to be of great and permanent value, it was appointed that similar acts of humiliation, confession, and importunate prayer, should take place in all the synods of the Church, and also in all the presbyteries. Prompt and cheerful obedience was everywhere accorded to this command. The services were conducted in the same manner as had been followed in the General Assembly itself; and they were the means of stirring up the whole ministry throughout the country to unwonted earnestness and zeal in the discharge of their official duties. Many were led to discover deficiencies in their own conduct which they had previously overlooked. The weighty responsibilities connected with the ministerial office were more deeply felt than they had ever been before. And all were filled with a salutary fear of being visited with wrath, should their negligence occasion the loss of any of the souls whom God in his providence had committed to their care.† Such a reverence of the divine Being was fostered in their minds as tended to exclude every other fear.

The exercises with which all the ministers of the Church, in all its judicatories, had thus been occupied, produced a very solemn impression upon their minds, and seemed as if designed in providence to prepare them for the severe trials by which their attachment to their principles was so soon to be tested.‡ The king had never heartily acquiesced in the restoration of the presbyterian scheme of church government. His assent to the measure had been extorted by the pressure of circumstances, and he had repented of it as soon as the act of parliament was passed. Of late, his dislike to the ministers and their proceedings had been sensibly increasing; and indications were not wanting that he meditated the overthrow of presbyterianism, and the restoration of the episcopal system. At the time of the queen's coronation he had honoured the presbyterian ministers by employing them to perform the rites connected with the august ceremonial; but when the ordinance of baptism was to be administered to his son Prince Henry, it was observed with alarm by the adherents of the Church, that he sent for the Bishop of Aberdeen to officiate on the occasion. act of 1592, was now gone; and James, so far from regretting the loss of a councillor who was considered by Burghley as the wisest man in Scotland, seemed rather to rejoice that he was free from the guidance of one whose intellectual superiority inspired him with too much awe.*

The event which mainly contributed to precipitate the rupture between the king and the Kirk, was the return of the popish lords to Scotland. The ministers contended that as these men had undeniably been guilty of treason, and as they had also been excommunicated by the Church, they could not be allowed, consistently with the authority of the laws, to remain on Scottish ground; but the king, although he did not question the principles and statements thus advanced, and although he affirmed also that he had not given permission to the earls to return,† yet was disposed to overlook their past offences, and to sanction their continuance in the country on proper submission being made by them.‡ The view thus taken by the king appears the more tolerant and generous. Yet James was just as severe in his exactions from the popish lords, as the most rigid member of the Kirk could be. In a letter to the Earl of Huntley, he assured him plainly, that unless he adopted the Protestant faith, he need never think of being recognised as a Scotsman again: "Think not that I will suffer any one professing a contrary religion to dwell in this land."§ In judging of the proceedings of this period, the question is not, whether the king or the Kirk was more tolerant of opinions avowedly opposed to their own; in this respect there was no difference between them. The sole question of any moment is, which of the parties took the more correct view of the dispositions and designs of the returned noblemen? On the principles which the king and the Kirk alike recognised, their banishment was just, and they ought not to have presumed to return till they had given satisfaction to the authorities, and obtained their sanction. There was too much ground for suspecting that their object in revisiting their native land was to prosecute the same designs which had formerly brought them so prominently before the tribunals of the country; and it is a fact that during the very agitation which their arrival occasioned, their accomplices were engaged in contriving new plots. It was known, too, that Philip of Spain was organising another armament for the purpose of making a descent upon some part of the British Isles.¶ These considerations ought to shield the ministers from all charges of bigotry and intolerance, with reference to the course which they now pursued. It admits of no question that they were actuated by the truest patriotism; and every circumstance seems also to favour the idea that they took a juster view of the exigencies and dangers of the times than his majesty's government did.*

Although desirous that the popish lords should be restored to their position in the country, the king would not venture to incur the odium of reinstating them himself, without the sanction of the Estates of the realm. For the purpose of obtaining this sanction, a meeting was summoned at Falkland in August, and care was taken that there should be a numerous attendance of the friends of the noblemen whose case was to be considered.‡ Some ministers, also, who were supposed to be more moderate than their brethren were invited to be present, and to take part in the deliberations. Andrew Melvil was not one of these, but he considered it to be his duty to attend, as being one of the commissioners of the General Assembly. His presence was most unacceptable to the king, who at once put to him the question why he had come without being called. Melvil promptly replied, "Sir, I have a call from Christ and his Church, who have a special interest in this convention; and I charge you and your Estates, in their name, that you favour not their enemies, nor go about to make citizens of those who have traitorously sought to betray their country to the cruel Spaniard, to the overthrow of Christ's kingdom."† In the midst of his harangue he was interrupted by the king, who commanded him to leave the meeting; and he obeyed, thanking God that the opportunity had been afforded to him of stating some wholesome truths. The other ministers remained, and endeavoured to enforce the same views which Melvil had advanced; but they were overruled, and the meeting in the end decided that the popish lords might be restored on certain conditions, which were to be drawn up and proposed to them by the council.§ This decision, however, gave such general offence to the community, that the king considered it prudent to declare that he had no intention of carrying it into effect. His words were hailed with satisfaction, and the presbytery of Edinburgh were so much delighted with this statement, that they sent two of their number to express their acknowledgments to his majesty,|| when he repeated to them the assurance which he had already given, that it was not his purpose to proceed any further in this business. Yet almost immediately afterwards another convention of the Estates was held at Dunfermline, to take the subject into further consideration; and although the king was reminded of the repeated promises which he had made, not to proceed with the restoration of the popish lords, still the decision pronounced at Falkland was confirmed.*

These proceedings having excited the utmost excitement among the ministers, alarm among the adherents of the Kirk, a meeting was held at Cupar by the commissioners of the General Assembly, and other zealous friends of the presbyterian cause; and it was agreed that a deputation should be sent to Falkland, to represent to his majesty the dangers which were apprehended from the restoration of the popish lords, and to beseech him to exert his influence and authority in order to save the nation from calamities so great.† When the deputation was admitted into his majesty's presence, James Melvil, whom his brethren had appointed, on account of his mild and courteous manners, to speak in their name, began to inform the king of the meeting which the commissioners of the Church had held at Cupar. The mention of this meeting at once excited the displeasure of James, who charged the ministers with sedition for holding such conventions without his express warrant, and blamed them for spreading alarms among the people which were utterly groundless. James Melvil was on the point of replying to these charges of his majesty when Andrew, who could restrain himself no longer, burst upon the king in a style of passionate address altogether different from that of his nephew. And although his majesty took every means of showing that he did not wish to hear him, yet he persisted in pouring out the sentiments which were struggling in his bosom for utterance. Seizing the king by the sleeve, and calling him God's silly vassal, he proceeded, amid much hot reasoning and many interruptions, to address him in the following singular and unexampled strain:—"Sir, we will always humbly reverence your majesty in public; but since we have this occasion to be with your majesty in private, and since ye are brought in extreme danger both of your life and crown, and along with you the country and the Church of God are like to go to wreck for not telling you the truth, and giving you faithful counsel, we must discharge our duty, or else be traitors both to Christ and you. Therefore, sir, as divers times before I have told you, so now again I must tell you, there are two kings and two kingdoms in Scotland: there is Christ Jesus, the King of the Church, whose subject King James VI. is, and of whose kingdom he is not a king, nor a lord, nor a head, but a member. Those whom Christ has called, and commanded to watch over his Church, and govern his spiritual kingdom, have sufficient power and authority from him to do this both jointly and severally; the which no Christian king or prince should control and discharge, but fortify and assist; otherwise they are not faithful subjects of Christ and members of his Church. We will yield to you your place, and give you all due obedience; but again I say, you are not the head of the Church; you cannot give us that eternal life which even in this world we seek for, and you cannot deprive us of it. Permit us then freely to meet in the name of Christ, and to attend to the interests of that Church of which you are the chief member. Sir, when you were in your swaddling clothes, Christ Jesus reigned freely in this land, in spite of all his enemies; his officers and ministers convened and assembled for the ruling and welfare of his Church, which was ever for your welfare, defence, and preservation, when these same enemies were seeking your destruction and cutting off. These assemblies, since that time, continually have been terrible to these enemies, and most steadable to you. And now, when there is more than extreme necessity for the continuance and discharge of that duty, will you, drawn to your own destruction by a devilish and most pernicious counsel, begin to hinder and dishearten Christ's servants, and your most faithful subjects, quarrelling them for their convening, and the care they have of their duty to Christ and you, when you should rather commend and countenance them, as the godly kings and emperors did? The wisdom of your counsel, which I call devilish, is this, that ye must be served by all sorts of men, to come to your purpose and grandeur, Jew and Gentile, Papist and Protestant; and because the Protestants and ministers of Scotland are over strong, and control the king, they must be weakened and brought low, by stirring up a party against them; and the king being equal and indifferent, both shall be fain to flee to him. But, sir, if God's wisdom be the only true wisdom, this will prove mere and mad folly; his curse cannot but light upon it; in seeking of both ye shall lose both; whereas, in cleaving uprightly to God, his true servants would be your sure friends, and he would compel the rest, counterfeitedly and lyingly, to give over themselves and serve you."*

This singularly bold address of Melvil, so far from fanning the flame of the king's anger, had the effect of extinguishing it. He now spoke to the deputies in a kindly and pleasant manner.† He repeated to them the statements which he had formerly made, that he knew nothing of the return of the popish lords, until information was brought to him that they were actually in the country. He also promised that although permission had been given to them to make offers of submission, still no offers should be received from them until they put themselves once more in the position of exiles; and whatever might be the offers which they made, it was his determination that they must satisfy the Kirk, otherwise they should receive no favour from his hands. But notwithstanding these promises of his majesty, the popish lords were permitted to remain in the country, and everything indicated that it was his design to restore them. The Countess of Huntley was invited to the baptism of his infant daughter Elizabeth; and Lady Livingston, an adherent of the Romish Church, was entrusted with the care of the young princess.*

These events rekindled once more the jealousy of the Church. The presbytery of Edinburgh immediately took steps for convening the commissioners of the General Assembly;† and when they met in October, they were of opinion that the dangers with which the country was threatened were great and urgent. The declaration constantly made by his majesty that the popish lords had returned without his warrant or approbation, seemed to them to prove, either that they must have a secret force at home adequate to defend them, or that they expected assistance from abroad. Reference was also made to the confident statements put forth by the friends of the popish lords, that they had already procured his majesty's protection and pardon, formally subscribed in council; and that they were encouraged to expect advancement to office, charge of guards, and lieutenantancies.‡ As a means of guarding against the dangers and troubles which were apprehended, it was agreed by the commissioners that notice should be sent to all the presbyteries, of the critical posture of affairs; so that every minister in the country might be on the alert, and take opportunities both in public and in private of awakening the zeal of the whole body of the Christian people. It was also agreed that the excommunication of the popish lords should be intimated anew from every pulpit in the kingdom, and that a day of humiliation should be universally observed on the first Sabbath of December. And besides these measures, it was considered expedient that a few commissioners from the four quarters of the kingdom—the north, the south, the middle, and the west—should be appointed to attend to the interests of the Church, to watch the progress of events, and to suggest such measures as the emergency might seem to demand.§ They were to reside, by monthly rotation, in Edinburgh, one from each quarter being there at a time; they were to meet together every day along with some members of the metropolitan presbytery, and the expenses of each commissioner were to be defrayed by the district to which he belonged; and if the danger should appear to increase, they were authorised, in conjunction with the presbytery of Edinburgh, to summon a meeting of the General Assembly, comprising ministers from all parts of the country, with a good number of the best affected noblemen, barons, and commissioners of boroughs, that “by a common advice the most expedient way

These proceedings of the ministers and other friends of the Church were highly offensive to his majesty; and certainly the views which are now entertained would lead at once to the conclusion that they opposed too pertinaciously the design of the government to pardon the popish lords. Why were they not satisfied with pronouncing their own sentence of excommunication in their church courts? and why did they not leave the government to deal with the offenders for their political delinquencies in the way they judged best? But we forget that civil and sacred things were far more intermingled in those days than they are now. The sentence of excommunication inferred civil consequences of the most tremendous kind, and this was not the law of the Church merely, but it was also the law of the land. The theory of an established church, as it was then universally understood, made the Church and the nation co-extensive, so that exclusion from the Church involved the loss of the rights of citizenship; and although this was a most erroneous and pernicious principle, yet it was not an error chargeable upon the ministers only; it was equally shared in by all ranks of the community. It was a root of bitterness which nobody as yet had even dreamed of attempting to pluck up. Besides, it was not popery merely, but treason, which was laid to the charge of the popish lords; and there was a general and, as the result demonstrated, a well-grounded conviction, that they were still engaged in treasonable correspondence, and were only watching a favourable opportunity to renew their attempts. True, the Countess of Huntley presented a paper to the synod of Moray, in which she engaged for her husband that he would banish from his society all Jesuits and seminary priests, and would assist the ministers in maintaining their discipline; and she craved that he might be allowed some reasonable time to meditate upon the points of difference between the Romish and the Protestant systems.† And the moderation of the requests preferred in this document leads Tytler‡ to condemn the proceedings of the Kirk with the most acrimonious severity. But this historian admits that similar assurances made by Huntley himself at an earlier period had been utterly disregarded by him, and that after engaging to be faithful to his country and to the Kirk, he had entered into a more active correspondence with Spain than ever.§ What confidence then could be placed either in the promises of this noblemen with regard to himself, or in the engagements of another made in his name? Is it at all to be wondered at that the offers, whose moderation Tytler so highly extols, should be looked upon with suspicion? or is it in any degree marvellous that jealousy should still be entertained, with regard to the favour which his majesty was disposed to show to the popish lords? The king himself, too, was to blame for a considerable part of the asperity which was manifested at this period; for he had declared that, as the popish lords had returned without permission obtained from his government, they should be required to leave the country before any attention was paid to the offers which they might make. But the royal promise was forgotten, and it was not unnatural that men should misconstrue the king's intentions, and ascribe to him something worse than he at all thought of. Still it was unfortunate that the opposition given to his majesty's procedure, with regard to Huntley and his associates, needed to be made through the Kirk; and yet it is vain to complain of this, for there was no other channel in existence through which the popular will could readily manifest itself.

His majesty was at no pains to conceal the deep displeasure which he cherished against the ministers, nor is it at all surprising that he was offended with them; for although their proceedings were quite consistent with the recognised theory as to the co-extensive limits of Church and State,—it being allowed on all hands that no man had a title to citizenship who disowned the national religion,—yet certainly they interfered most inconveniently with the movements of the machine of government. The measures too which the ministers suggested might perhaps be wiser, allowance being made for the ideas prevailing at that period, than those of the king; but still it could hardly be expected that the State would always consent to square its procedure in accordance with the wishes of the Church. The dissatisfaction of James with the conduct of the ministers, which was everywhere expressed without reserve, excited very uneasy feelings among them; and they sent a deputation to him to inquire into the grounds of the offence which he had taken against the Church, and to endeavour to remove the jealousies which were springing up between them. It was at the interview to which this deputation were admitted, that the design of the court to commence an attack upon the privileges of the Church first became apparent. When they expressed their desire for a better understanding and agreement with his majesty, he replied that there could be no good agreement between him and them, until the marches of the civil and sacred jurisdiction were properly adjusted, and he laid down several principles which he considered indispensable to harmonious co-operation.* The ministers must not comment in their discourses upon his proceedings and those of his council: no General Assembly must ever be summoned excepting by his authority and special command: nothing transacted at any General Assembly must be considered valid, until it should be ratified by himself or his commissioners, as in the case of acts of parliament: and synods, presbyteries, and sessions must refrain from meddling with any causes which were punishable by the civil law, and must confine their censures to fornication and such slanders.*

These principles, so distinctly enunciated by the king, manifested the design, already to a considerable extent matured, of reducing the Church to complete subjection under the State, and the ministers at once saw the full extent of the danger which threatened them. The commissioners, when his majesty's answers were reported to them, declared themselves to be very glad that he had uttered his meaning so plainly;† and being thus forewarned, they determined on making a vigorous defence of their rights and privileges. They admonished all the brethren to study carefully the discipline of the Church, that they might be able wisely to defend it; they appointed that a collection should be made of all the acts of council and parliament which had been passed in favour of the Church and her discipline; and they wrote to all the presbyteries throughout the kingdom, warning them of the perilous times which were at hand, and counselling them to united and vigorous efforts in self-defence.‡ A church such as the king desired, although very peaceable and unobstructive to government, was justly considered by the ministers as one which would prove utterly inefficient for good. It was a problem, however, far more difficult than was imagined in those times, so to regulate the position of a church supported by the state, that neither on the one hand should the spiritual functionaries interfere inconveniently with the proceedings of government, nor on the other should the government disturb the legitimate action of the spiritual functionaries. The church feels the evil when the balance declines too much to the one side, but equally the government is hampered when it leans too much the other way; and it is now the belief of many, that a settlement of this question perfectly satisfactory to all parties, and conservative of every right and privilege which each can claim, is really not possible. While the state affords pecuniary support and the protection of its statutes, the church which receives these must relinquish some portion of its liberties. If it be the magistrate's duty to support the truth, and to provide for its preachers, he must have some control over them. Already in the Church of Scotland, according to the constitution of 1592, it was provided that no assembly could be held without the king's sanction; and patronage was perpetuated as another bond or bridle by which her movements might be controlled. But now it was proposed to tighten the reins beyond endurance. The views enunciated by

James were calculated to reduce the Church to a still more helpless condition, in which she must appear despoiled of everything like liberty of action.

The first attempt to carry the principles of the Case of David king into effect was made in the shape of an assault upon David Black, minister of St. Andrew's, who was summoned to appear before his majesty's council to answer for certain "undecent and uncomely speeches," said to have been uttered by him in the pulpit during the month of October. His case seems to have been laid hold of by the king, merely as a convenient weapon for aiming a blow at the ministers, and circumscribing the privileges claimed by the Church. There was no specific charge at first made against Black. He was cited to appear in regard to certain points which were to be inquired into.* And when he complained of this mode of procedure as contrary to act of parliament, he was told that the general terms of the summons were to be understood as restricted to the particular offence which had excited the displeasure of the English ambassador. It was alleged that he had called the Queen of England an atheist, and described the religion of the sister kingdom as nothing better than an empty show. It was also said that he had charged James himself with treacherous connivance at the return of the popish earls; that he had represented the court as being under the influence of Satan; and that he had said all kings were devil's bairns. The lords of session, too, and the Queen of Scotland herself, it was alleged, had been spoken of by him in most disrespectful terms.†

With regard to the truth of the charges preferred against Black, grave doubts may be entertained; for although he was condemned, yet on account of the course which the proceedings took, the case was never properly sifted. Certain it is that he himself utterly denied the allegations made against him, and his whole career shows that he was not a man likely to shrink from any position which he had once assumed.‡ Testimonials, also, in proof of his innocence, were produced from the provost, bailies, and council of St. Andrew's, and from the rector, dean of faculty, professors, and regents, of the university, all of whom had most ample opportunities of knowing what he had really said.§ It was shown too that the persons who had informed against him, were actuated by personal hostility, because their delinquencies had been exposed to censure through his means. John Rutherford, the minister of Kilconquhar, was the principal informer; and he had been prosecuted by Black before the presbytery for neglect of his pastoral duties.* And more than all this, it is a fact that the king himself did not attach much importance to the charges against Black, for during a conversation which the commissioners of the Church held with him on the 16th November, with regard to a variety of points, he declared when the case of Black was brought under his notice, and a request was made to him to abandon the prosecution, that "he did not think much of that matter, only they must cause him to appear and take some course for pacifying the English ambassador; but take heed, he added, that you do not decline the judicatory, for if you do so, it will be worse than anything that has yet fallen out."† And even the English ambassador, whose concern in the affair was thus represented by James as the most important feature of it, declared himself quite satisfied with the explanation which he received from Black in a private conversation.‡

These considerations make it obvious that the case of Black was really not considered one of intrinsic importance at all. Probably he did utter some rash words, which respect for existing authorities should have led him to suppress, but they had been greatly exaggerated; and no attention would have been paid to them on their own account, had it not been that the king needed a case which he might employ as a weapon against the ministers. The simple object of James was to obtain from the Church an acknowledgment that his jurisdiction as king extended not only over all persons, but also over all kinds of causes.§ But this was an acknowledgment which the ministers would not make, for they considered it utterly subversive of the liberties and immunities of the Church; and therefore the commissioners of the General Assembly made common cause with Black, and advised him to decline the jurisdiction of the king and his council, in regard to words spoken in the pulpit. They adopted the principle, which had formerly been acted upon by Melvil, that a minister in the first instance is only responsible to his ecclesiastical superiors for his official conduct; and that, therefore, such a case as that of Black should be remitted to his presbytery, although it might afterwards, if necessary, be brought before the civil courts. Accordingly, after mature and grave consideration, they prepared a declination of the king's jurisdiction in spiritual matters, to be presented by Black to the council when he should appear before them.|| This document is drawn up with much ability, and exhibits a full and clear view of the motives and principles by which the ministers were actuated. "Albeit the conscioussness of my innocence upholdeth me sufficiently against whatsoever calumnies of men, and that I am ready, by the assistance of the grace of my God, to give a confession and stand to the defence of every point of the truth of God uttered by me in the said sermons, either in opening up of his Word, or application thereof, before your majesty or council, or whatsoever person or persons that, upon any lawful cause, will crave an account of that hope which is in me, in whatsoever place or manner, so far as shall be requisite for clearing and maintenance of the truth and of my ministry, and may be done without the prejudice of that liberty which the Lord Jesus has given and established in the spiritual office-bearers of his kingdom; yet seeing I am not at this time brought to stand before your majesty and council, as a judge set to cognosce and decern upon my doctrine, by which means my answering to the said pretended accusation might import (with the manifest prejudice of the liberties of the Kirk) an acknowledging also of your majesty's jurisdiction in matters that are purely spiritual, which might move your majesty to attempt further in the spiritual government of the house of God, to the provocation of his hot displeasure against your majesty, and in the end, either a plain subverting of the spiritual judicature, or, at least, a confounding thereof with the civil, if at any time profane and ambitious magistrates might, by such dangerous beginnings, find the hedge broken down, to make a violent irruption upon the Lord's inheritance, which the Lord forbid: Therefore I am constrained, in all humility and submission of mine, to use a declinature of this judgment, at least in prima instantia; which I beseech your majesty to consider earnestly, and accept of according to justice, for the reasons following:—

"1. The Lord Jesus, the God of order and not of confusion, as appeareth evidently in all the kirks of his saints, of whom only I have the grace of my calling, as his ambassador (albeit most unworthy of that honour), to bear his name among his saints, he has given me his Word (and no law nor tradition of man), as the only instructions, whereby I should rule the whole actions of my calling, in preaching of the Word, administration of the seals thereof, and exercise of discipline. And in the discharge of this commission, I cannot fall in the reverence of any civil law of man, but in so far as I shall be found to have passed the compass of my instructions, which cannot be judged according to the order established by that God of order, but by the prophets, whose lips he has appointed to be the keepers of his heavenly wisdom, and to whom he has subjected the spirits of the prophets. And now, seeing it is the preaching of the Word, whereupon I am accused, which is a principal point of my calling, of necessity the prophets must first declare whether I have kept the bounds of my directions, before I come to be judged of your majesty's laws for my offence.

"2. Because the liberty of the Kirk and whole discipline thereof, according as the same has been, and is presently exercised within your majesty's realm, has been confirmed by divers acts of parliament, and approved by the Confession of Faith, by the subscription and oath of your majesty, your majesty's Estates, and whole body of the country, and peaceably bruiked* by the office-bearers of the Kirk in all points; and namely, in the foresaid point, touching the judicature of preaching of the Word in prima instantia, as the practice of diverse late examples evidently will show: Therefore the question touching my preaching ought first, according to the grounds and practice foresaid, to be judged by the ecclesiastical senate, as the competent judge thereof in the first instance."†

Copies of this declinature were dispatched by the commissioners of the General Assembly to all the presbyteries throughout the kingdom, with a letter explaining the perilous situation of the Church, and pointing out the necessity of union among her ministers, that they might be able to stand "whole and unbroken." All were admonished to affix their names to the declinature, and to study diligently the whole question of ecclesiastical policy; and the fear was expressed that "Satan's first onset was to be made upon this hedge of the Lord's vineyard, that he might break down the same, and afterwards waste and wreck the plants thereof at his pleasure."‡ The success which attended this appeal manifests the deep and wide-spread interest which was felt in the case of Black. The declinature received about four hundred signatures, and among these was included the name of Spottiswood, who was as zealous at this period—though his sincerity has been suspected—in defending the liberties of the Church, as he afterwards became in bringing her ministers under the yoke of bondage.§

Earnest endeavours were made by the commissioners of the General Assembly, ^{Attempts at accommodation of differences.} before the day of Black's trial arrived, to prevail upon his majesty to depart from the charge against him; and the king expressed his willingness to comply with their request, on the condition that they also withdrew their declinature of his authority in reference to such questions; but to this proposition the commissioners could not on any account accede. A proclamation was, therefore, now issued by royal authority, commanding the commissioners of the General Assembly to leave Edinburgh within twenty-four hours, and to return home to their several flocks and congregations, under pain of being denounced as rebels and put to the horn. But the commissioners immediately assembled, and having laid the proclamation and charge open before the Lord, and implored divine counsel and help in their present straits, they appointed the ministers of Edinburgh and all who were to occupy the pulpits to "deal mightily with the Word of the

Lord, the king of glory, that the honour and liberty of his kingdom might be vindicated from the yoke of oppression.* On the day of Black's trial, while a number of the brethren were appointed to aid him in his defence, the rest assembled to make humble acknowledgment of their sins before God, and with penitent hearts to pour out their prayers for divine assistance, and they continued all day in supplication before the throne of grace.† When it was reported to the commissioners that his majesty and council had declared themselves competent judges in regard to the points charged against Black, they at once ordained that the doctrine, or exercises of the pulpit, should be directed against the said interlocutor on the following day.‡ Meanwhile the treasurer and provost of Edinburgh, being sent by the king to hold conference with certain of the brethren, assured them that although his majesty and council had declared themselves competent judges in the case, yet for the sake of the peace of the Church he was willing to pardon Black, if he resolved his majesty of the truth of the points libelled by the declaration of his own conscience. To this it was replied, that if it was Mr. David Black's own personal interest only which was at stake, or that of any of the brethren, his majesty's offer would be thankfully accepted: "but seeing it was the liberty of Christ's Gospel and kingdom that was so heavily hurt and wounded in the discipline thereof by the proclamation and charge given out on Saturday, and now in the preaching of the Word by usurpation of the judicature thereof by the interlocutor pronounced that day, it was a matter of such importance and weight in the estimation of all the brethren, that if the king had taken Mr. Black's life, and a dozen of theirs also, he could not have wounded the hearts of the brethren more, nor done such injury to the Lord Jesus. And, therefore, either these things behoved to be retreated and amended, or then the brethren could nowise be content, but oppose themselves to such proceedings to the extremity of their lives."§ These solemn words made a deep impression upon the provost and treasurer, and also upon his majesty, when they were reported to him, and, after spending a very restless night, he dispatched a messenger early next morning with a request that "the dint of the doctrine might stay that day." But it was answered that the doctrine could not be blunted, unless there were an evident appearance of amending the wrongs; for the brother appointed to preach had God to answer to, in a good conscience, and his brethren's expectation, whom he would not offend for the sake of pleasing all the kings upon the earth.|| And the doctrine accordingly took its usual course, and sounded mightily. The oppressions of Zion and the indig-

Repeatedly, during the progress of these events, the contending parties were on the very point of coming to an amicable adjustment of their differences; but the opposing factions at court found it to be their interest to perpetuate the strife, and by means of suggestions and rumours they fanned the flame, whenever its intensity began to abate. The cubiculars, or lords of the bedchamber, were exceedingly jealous of the Octavians, who had long engrossed the whole power of the State; and as it was conceived that a breach between the king and the Church would facilitate the scheme of ejecting them from power, every plan of conciliation was defeated by secret machinations.* And thus the feelings of both the contending parties became continually more exasperated. The pulpits resounded with denunciations of the wickedness of those men who were forging chains of bondage for the Church of Christ; fasting and prayer were employed as means of obtaining redress from God; and a prodigious excitement prevailed among the people.† Notwithstanding this, however, Black was condemned by the council, and commanded to confine himself beyond the north water, and to remain there at his own charges during his majesty's pleasure.‡ And as the period for the yearly modification of stipends was now at hand, his majesty gave the ministers to understand that those who acknowledged the authority which he claimed should at once receive their accustomed payment, whilst those who continued to deny it should be cut off from all emolument; and with the view of securing an accurate discrimination between these parties, a bond they were told was to be prepared, to which every minister's subscription should be demanded. On the 14th of December, too, another proclamation was made by sound of trumpet at the Market Cross, commanding the commissioners of the Church to leave the capital within forty-eight hours; and although the brethren were of opinion that they might disobey such an order, yet they judged it more expedient to comply with it. Before their departure, however, they considered it requisite, lest any of the ministers should be tempted for the sake of their stipend to subscribe the bond of which the king spoke, to prepare a declaration containing a full statement of the origin and progress of the present differences, and to send copies of it to all the presbyteries. In this document they expressed the conviction that the present troubles had sprung from the efforts of the friends of the popish lords, and that their object was to compel the ministers to abstain from all proceedings against these lords, by assailing their own liberties, and thus com-pulling them to expend all their energies in self-defence. The commissioners also expressed the belief that freedom in rebuking sin from the pulpit was the principal butt which was shot at in this whole action. "And because that impiety dare not yet be so impudent as to crave in express terms that iniquity be not rebuked, it is only sought that his majesty and council be acknowledged judge in matters civil and criminal, treasonable and seditious, which shall be found uttered by any minister in his doctrine; thinking to draw the rebuke of sin to the king and his council under the name of one of these crimes, and that way either to restrain the liberty of preaching, or else to punish it under the name of sin or vice, by a pretence of law and justice; and so at length to bind the Word of God, that sin may go forward with hand lifted up to the highest."*

This whole process exhibits the unsatisfactory character of the relations subsisting between the Church and the State. There can be no question that the ministers were actuated by the purest motives. What they dreaded was, that the free preaching of the Word should be obstructed, and the doctrine of ministers brought under the censure and controlment of his majesty's council.† And there was too much ground for apprehending this danger. Under an arbitrary monarch like James, the right of controlling the pulpit would have been employed to check everything displeasing to himself or any of his courtiers, and in the absence of a free press vice would have stalked without check through the land.‡ Yet, on the other hand, the claim which the ministers made of being exempted in the first instance from civil control in regard to everything done in their official capacity, was liable to immense abuse. The Church was right in being jealous of restraints imposed upon the free preaching of the Gospel, but she was wrong in the course which she adopted for the protection of her privileges. On the other hand, the king was right in thinking that treasonable language, no matter where it was uttered, was an offence of which the civil courts were warranted to take immediate cognizance; but his whole history makes it obvious that in his view everything wore the aspect of treason, which was at all opposed to his own opinions and wishes.

While the minds of men were excited by these conflicting views, a tumult took place in Edinburgh, which, although altogether unpremeditated, and attended with no serious consequences, was eagerly laid hold of by the king as a means of reducing the ministers to subjection.§ The rumour having been spread by the cubiculars that the Earl of Huntley had been closeted with his majesty, and that the papists were contriving

a massacre of the Protestants,* the excitement of the public mind, already sufficiently great, was augmented tenfold; and Balcanquhall, on whom it devolved by rotation to preach, addressed the numerous audience which assembled with fiery eloquence, painted in glowing terms the dangers with which religion was threatened, and exhorted the noblemen and barons to concur with the ministers in averting those dangers.† A meeting was immediately held in the little church, from which Lords Lindsay and Forbes, the Laids of Barganie and Balquhan, two bailies, and also two ministers, Bruce and Watson, were sent as a deputation to the king, sitting at the time in the Tolbooth with his council;‡ and, on their being admitted, Bruce explained the nature of their commission, and besought his majesty to take measures for warding off the dangers of the Church. "What dangers?" said James; "I see none; and who dares to convene contrary to my proclamation?"—"Dares!" retorted Lord Lindsay; "we dare more than that; and shall not suffer the truth to be overthrown, and tamely stand by." Meanwhile, new rumours were industriously spread among the excited people, and an emissary § of the cubiculars raised the shout "To arms!—to arms!" and a scene of great confusion ensued. Some ran to the Tolbooth, thinking the king was in danger; others hastened to the kirk, hearing the ministers were slain; and others demanded that President Seton, Elphinstone, and Hamilton, should be delivered up to them for punishment.|| At length, through the efforts of the provost and magistrates, assisted by the ministers, the tumult was quelled without the slightest damage having been done to person or property.¶

This was a very unfortunate event for the Church, for although the ministers were really less to blame than the king's own courtiers, and, so far from exciting the tumult, did everything in their power to restrain the people, yet it was employed as a weapon to assail them. The bond already spoken of was immediately prepared, and subscription to it was demanded from all the ministers under pain of forfeiting their stipends. A proclamation was issued commanding the ministers of Edinburgh to put themselves in ward in the castle, and the magistrates were enjoined to apprehend both them and a number of other citizens. David Black was denounced at the Market Cross as guilty of slander and sedition, and declared unfit to be a minister. And sheriffs and other magistrates were authorised and enjoined to apprehend all preachers who should introduce matters

In these circumstances the leading ministers were Withdrawment advised by their friends to withdraw of the leading draw for a period, and some of them ministers. retired into England, whilst others concealed themselves in their native land.† Bruce was averse to quit the scene of his labours, but the most judicious members of his Church were persuaded that he would expose himself to extreme danger by remaining among them, and therefore they urged upon him the propriety of seeking shelter from the storm. Before his departure he addressed his people with reference to the threatening aspect of affairs, and reminded them that present difficulties were designed in God's providence for the trial of their faith and constancy. "Sorry am I that I should see such weakness in many of you, that ye dare not so much as utter one word for God's glory and the good cause. It is not we who are the party in this cause, the quarrel is betwixt a greater Prince and them. What are we but silly, unworthy creatures? yet it has pleased Him to set us in this office, and to make us His own mouth, that we should oppose the usurpation which is made upon the spiritual kingdom and encroachment upon our liberties. I am heartily sorry that our holy and gracious cause should be so obscured by this late tumult, and that the desperate enemies should be so emboldened to pull down the crown off Christ's head."‡ Bruce also wrote a letter, in conjunction with several of his brethren, to the Lord Hamilton, requesting him to take an interest in the present state of the Church, and to aid the barons and gentlemen who were endeavouring to act as mediators in her behalf. This letter was altered in a variety of respects after it reached the hands of Hamilton, and then transmitted to the king, who immediately drew from it the conclusion that the ministers were concocting rebellion, and had formed the design of placing Hamilton at their head, and perhaps of offering him the crown.§ From a subsequent letter of Bruce it appears how much he considered himself injured by the vitiation of his first communication, and how remote from his mind was everything like a wish to introduce civil disturbance. "I hear that your lordship has presented a copy of my letter directed unto your lordship unto his majesty; a copy, as I have seen, not transumed out of the original, but a vitiated copy, manked,|| altered, and so adulterated, that scarcely it keeps the right portraiture of my letter."¶

¶ That the alterations were made designedly and maliciously is obvious from the nature of them. The expression in the original letter, "the people, animated partly by the Word and violence of the course, took arms," was thus exhibited in the copy sent to the king, "the people, animated no doubt by the Word and motion of God's Spirit,

And in a defence of himself which he wrote, he says, with regard to his letter to Lord Hamilton, "In that letter we craved no other thing but that he, with the rest of the barons, as a chief nobleman and peer of the realm, would intercede and employ his credit and influence at his majesty's hand, to see, if it were possible, the Kirk restored to the liberty and freedom she wont to have. Of all the fools in the world we had been the greatest if we had designed, as I hear it is taken, to set him in a chair foreuent* his majesty."† From this time the king conceived a rooted dislike of Bruce, forming a marked and instructive contrast to the favour which he had shown to him, and the confidence which he had placed in his judgment, during the time of his visit to Norway. There might be imprudence in some of the expressions which occur even in the genuine letter of Bruce,‡ but the idea which many have taken up, that he and his brethren contemplated an armed resistance to government, is utterly without foundation.§ It was a constitutional opposition to what they considered the encroachments of arbitrary power, which alone they thought of; and the dangers which they declared themselves prepared to encounter were not the dangers of war, but the sorrows and suffering of persecution.

The absence of the leading ministers, the panic which seized the inhabitants of Measures taken by the king against the Church. Edinburgh after the unfortunate tumult of the 17th December, and the consequent diminution of the influence of the Church, afforded to the king an opportunity of carrying out his designs, of which he promptly availed himself.|| It was his fixed purpose to restore episcopacy as speedily as possible; and although this design was not avowed, yet all his plans and measures were regulated with a view to its accomplishment. A convention of took arms." And this sentence, descriptive of the efforts of the ministers to repress the tumult, was omitted, "But, by the grace of God, we repressed and pacified the motions incontinent." Spottiswood, although at the time he was as zealous in the same cause as the other ministers, yet afterwards allowed his party spirit so far to sway him as to insert only the vitiated copy of Bruce's letter in his history. § Tytler, vol. ix. pp. 250, 251. Tytler follows in the main the vitiated copy of Bruce's letter, and at the same time he introduces the clause mentioned above as left out of that copy. The consequence is that the letter becomes absurd and contradictory, for on the one hand Bruce is made to say that the people were animated "no doubt by the Word and God's Spirit" to take arms, and yet, on the other, he represents himself as restraining their fury. Why restrain them, if he believed them animated by God's Spirit? With more consistency, the vitiated letter having introduced the words "no doubt animated by the Word and by God's Spirit," omits the statement about the efforts which the ministers made to repress the tumult. The one forgery requires the other as its complement. Who would restrain what he believed to be a work of the Spirit of God?

estates and a meeting of the General Assembly were appointed to be held at Perth in the end of February. Fifty-five questions, drawn up by Secretary Lindsay, and bearing upon the constitution and discipline of the Church, were printed and circulated among the synods and presbyteries, with the view of preparing the way for the contemplated assault upon the policy of the Church. They had been concocted before the 17th of December, to be in readiness for any suitable opportunity which might offer, and the events of that day occasioned them to be brought immediately into the field.* They were questions which involved many nice and delicate points, and which, although they might appropriately enough be discussed through the press, yet would never be moved in any deliberative assembly met for actual business, unless with the view of overturning the existing order of things. The very proposal of them, therefore, was fitted to excite alarm. It was asked whether matters relating to the external government of the Church might be brought into controversy; whether it was the king or the pastor who should make laws for the Church, or both conjointly; what vices it was allowable publicly to rebuke from the pulpit; whether the regents of universities should have a vote in church courts; whether the king, when pious and Christian, might not convoke a general assembly of the Church; whether a believing king might not annul a notoriously unjust sentence of excommunication; whether summary exclusion from the communion of the Church was lawful in any case; whether fasts might be proclaimed by a Christian prince; and whether, when pastors neglected their duty, the king might not apply a remedy to the evil?†

The questions of the king were first taken up by the synod of Fife, who held a meeting expressly for the purpose of considering them. Some of their answers were such as manifested a want of perception of the difficulties which really do encompass the subject of the connection between sacred and civil concerns, where there is an established Church. Without any misgiving, they exhibit the following as their reply to the second of his majesty's queries:—"All acts of the Kirk should be established by the Word of God contained in holy Scripture, the ordinary interpreters whereof are the pastors and doctors of the Kirk: the extraordinary, in time of corruption of the whole estate of the Kirk, are prophets and such as God endues with extraordinary gifts; and kings and princes ought by their civil authority to ratify and approve that by their laws, and vindicate by their civil sanctions, which they declare to be God's will out of His Word,"—a reply which gives the sovereign no deliberative voice, in a case where nevertheless he is conceived bound to act: he is made merely the executor of the will of the Church.* But many of the synod's answers were lucid, conclusive, and scriptural; and all of them manifested an accurate perception of the purpose which the king had in view, and a determination to maintain the existing ecclesiastical order to the utmost extent of their ability.†

The proceedings of the synod of Fife convinced the king, that although the Church now occupied a very disadvantageous position, there would still be great difficulty in procuring her consent to his measures in any assembly collected together in the usual manner. Sir Patrick Murray, therefore, one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber, was immediately dispatched to the north country, where the ministers were by no means so zealously attached to the presbyterian system, nor in general so well informed as their southern brethren; and the object of his mission was to gain them over to the king's views, and to secure their attendance at the approaching meeting in Perth. And by expatiating upon the good intentions of his majesty, by exaggerating the late tumult in the metropolis into a dangerous rebellion, by representing the ministers of Edinburgh as traitors and popes, and by ascribing to the ministers of the south a desire to engross the whole management of church affairs to themselves, he produced such an impression upon the minds of the northern ministers, that an unusual number from Angus and Aberdeen made their appearance on the field, when the time of the assembly appointed by his majesty arrived.‡ Faces were seen which had hardly ever been exhibited in a church court before; and flocks of ministers were observed going in and out at the king's palace, late at night and betimes in the morning.§ Still, notwithstanding the efforts which had been made to strengthen the royal interest, three days were spent in debating the question whether the meeting could be acknowledged as a lawful assembly or not, and it was only in consequence of threats and persuasions and promises, addressed to individual members in private, that it was agreed in the end to acknowledge it as a lawful assembly extraordinarily convened.|| James Melvil mentions that his especial friend and bedfellow, James Nicholson, who had hitherto agreed with him on all points, was conducted by Sir Patrick Murray into his majesty's presence, and detained there till midnight, after which his views underwent a considerable alteration, and he spoke and voted on the king's side. These intrigues so disgusted the honest minister of Kilrenny, that after protesting, agreeably to the instructions which he had received from the synod of Fife, against the lawfulness of the meeting, he withdrew from Perth, afraid to trust himself any longer in an atmosphere of so much corruption. He was shocked at the thought that the friend, in whose virtue he had reposed the highest confidence, should be so strangely altered by one night's conference with the king.*

A number of the king's questions were now brought under the consideration of the assembly; but although such unworthy means had been employed to bias the meeting, the answers which they prepared were by no means satisfactory to the royal mind.† His majesty, therefore, proposed that the assembly should convene along with the Estates for a more full discussion. At this joint meeting he delivered a speech calculated to overawe the minds of the ministers; and thus schooled, by a lecture from the throne, they met again in their own separate capacity, and amended their answers so as to render them more palatable to the king.‡ They agreed that the prince might propose to the General Assembly changes in matters of external government; that no minister should find fault with the enactments of parliament, unless he had first sought remedy from the king; that ministers should not hold unusual conventions without his majesty's sanction; that in the chief towns no minister should be appointed without the consent of the flock, and of his majesty; that in preaching there should be no application made, but what had respect to the edification of the persons present at the time; and that in rebuking sins the name of no individual should be mentioned from the pulpit.§

Some progress having thus been made in unsettling the existing order of things, and imposing restrictions upon the freedom of the pulpit, the king appointed that another meeting of the General Assembly should be held in May, at Dundee, for the consideration of the remaining questions. Meanwhile the moderator of the assembly which had been held prior to the meeting in Perth, and a number of the most zealous brethren, convened at St. Andrew's at the time when, according to the usual order of procedure, the General Assembly should have met; but so few appeared that, without transacting any business, they referred all matters to the meeting appointed to take place at Dundee on the 10th of May.* Every effort was made to render this assembly subservient to the king's views. The restrictions laid upon the ministers of Edinburgh and upon David Black were relaxed, although they were not allowed all at once to resume their clerical functions.† Aware that no small part of his success had been owing to the absence of Andrew Melvil, his majesty was determined that he should not be allowed to attend the meeting at Dundee. For this purpose Sir Patrick Murray sent for James Melvil, and used means to prevail upon him to advise his uncle to return home, as the king could not abide him, and might be tempted to take some strong step against him. But the minister of Kilrenny replied that it would be altogether vain for him to suggest such a course, as he was certain his uncle would not follow his advice. "Surely," replied Sir Patrick, "I fear he shall suffer the dint of the king's wrath."—"And truly," rejoined Melvil's nephew, "I am not afraid but he will abide all."‡

The king experienced rather more difficulty in managing this assembly than the Proceedings at one at Perth. However, the law- Dundee. fulness of that meeting was acknowledged; all that had been done there was sanctioned with certain explanations; and some more of the king's questions were answered, although in a very guarded manner.§ Measures were agreed to for the restoration of the popish earls, and they were shortly afterwards admitted to the communion of the Church with great pomp at Aberdeen, James having distinctly told them that they must either adopt his religion or quit the kingdom.|| That it was his majesty's fixed purpose to subvert the presbyterian government admits of no doubt. Yet, perceiving the difficulties in his way, he concealed the full extent of his designs, and under the pretext of maintaining concord between the Kirk and himself, he obtained their consent to a measure whose tendency was to undermine the power of the General Assembly. It was agreed that fourteen ministers should be nominated as commissioners, any seven of whom might meet with his majesty to advise with him regarding the planting of churches, and the providing of stipends for ministers throughout the kingdom, "and whatever concerned the weal of the Church and the obedience due to his majesty within the realm."¶ These functions were wholly different from any commission which had ever before been granted to individual ministers. The persons named became his majesty's ecclesiastical council, and they were at the same time armed with the authority of the Gene-

§ At first the answers of the assembly were not so general, but were moulded by a consideration of existing circumstances. The first answer, for example, stood thus: "The brethren convened give their advice that it is not expedient to make any law or act concerning that matter, lest a door should be opened thereby to turbulent spirits; otherwise they think it lawful for his majesty to propose anything whatsoever for consideration." They felt that they could not deny the abstract propriety of making occasional changes, but at the same time they were sensible that, as at present proposed, his majesty's question was an ensnaring one, being designed to pave the way for overturning their whole system. ral Assembly; and thus they were enabled to arrogate an overwhelming power to themselves. They are designated by Calderwood "the king's led horse," and "a wedge taken out of the Church to rend her with her own forces." James Melvil calls them "the very needle which drew in the episcopal thread."*

Having thus obtained a compendious method of bringing his influence to bear upon the ecclesiastical affairs of the kingdom, James was not slow to make full proof of the efficiency of the plan. The attention of his commissioners was directed to the University of St. Andrew's, from the rectorship of which they excluded Andrew Melvil, putting into his room George Gladstones, minister of the town; and they decided that no professors or regents should be allowed to preach in congregations or to sit in church courts.† The ostensible design of this regulation was to promote the interests of learning, but its real object undoubtedly was to get rid of the opposition of Andrew Melvil, whose intrepidity and eloquence exerted so mighty an influence in the meetings of the General Assembly. The next step taken by the commissioners of the Church, through whose instrumentality it was now most convenient for the king to act, was to present a petition to the parliament which met in December, praying that representatives from the Church might be allowed to sit and vote in the supreme council of the nation. Many of the nobility were opposed to this measure, but their scruples were overcome by the king, and an act was passed providing that such ministers and pastors as his majesty should at any time advance to the office, title, and dignity of bishop, abbot, or other prelate, should have a vote in parliament, in the same manner as had been the practice in former times.‡ A clause was added, to the effect that this measure was adopted without prejudice to the jurisdiction and discipline of the Church, as established by act of parliament. This clause was designed to lull suspicion asleep, and to afford a pretext to those who were disposed to acquiesce in the plans of the king. The reasons assigned for the enactment thus passed were that the Kirk had long lain under contempt and poverty; that by having representatives in parliament she would be able to consult more efficiently for her own interests; that she would no longer require to stand at the door waiting many days for an answer to her petitions, but would be in a position to secure immediate attention to her wishes. And the spiritual estate, it was added, had always been recognised as one of the estates of the realm.§

too plain to deceive any person of ordinary understanding; and although the commissioners represented it as a signal benefit to the Church, and expatiated upon the efforts which had been requisite to secure it, yet its true character and design were very generally appreciated. The synod of Fife were always distinguished by uncommon activity and zeal for the interests of religion, and, true to the character which they had earned, they proceeded at their meeting in February to discuss the merits of the alleged boon which the king had bestowed upon the Church. James Melvil maintained that if ministers were once admitted to sit in parliament, it would be found necessary to make them bishops, and thus all the efforts which for years had been made to establish their present constitution would be neutralised. When Andrew Melvil was speaking in the same strain, he was interrupted by Thomas Buchanan, who questioned his right to be present; but Melvil retorted upon him with vehemence, saying, "it was my province to solve questions from the Word of God, to reason, vote, and moderate in assemblies, when you were occupied in teaching grammar rules."* David Ferguson, the oldest minister in the kingdom, detailed the mischiefs which had flowed from the office of bishops in Scotland, and described the long and painful struggle which had been requisite for its abrogation; and, adverting to the alleged benefits of the recent act of parliament, he compared it to the wooden horse by which the Greeks succeeded in taking Troy, and emphatically warned them to be on their guard against this artifice. And John Davidson exposed the fallacy of the arguments employed to conceal the real tendency of the measure, exclaiming, "Busk him as bonnielie as ye can, and bring him in as fairly as ye will, we see him well enough—we see the horns of his mitre."†

When the General Assembly met at Dundee in March, the great subject which General Assembly at Dundee. demanded their attention was the late act of parliament, with reference to the admission of ministers into the supreme council of the nation. Andrew Melvil, although debarred by the restrictions recently laid upon professors, determined to take his place as formerly, that he might lift up his voice in opposition to the insidious measures which the king was bent upon carrying. But when he made his appearance, his majesty questioned his right to sit as a member. Melvil replied that he had a commission from his presbytery, which nothing but force would prevent him from executing. It was in vain that Davidson defended Melvil's right, and reminded the king that he was not president of the meeting. James declared that Melvil must retire, otherwise he would put a stop to the proceedings. At first Melvil was confined to his lodgings, but when it became known that his brethren visited him, to consult with him regarding the interests of the Church, he was commanded to leave Dundee on pain of rebellion: * such was the dread which the king entertained of the eloquence, influence, and unbending firmness of one man! and John Knox, nephew of the great Reformer, was bold enough to tell James that this was the true secret of the restrictions recently laid upon the universities.† After the departure of the intrepid Melvil, and others who were tired out by the length of the preliminary discussions, his majesty delivered a speech to the assembly, in which he dwelt upon the great services which he had rendered to the Church, and the deep interest which he felt in the planting of churches and the providing of suitable stipends for ministers; and then declared that in order to enable him to accomplish all he desired, it was needful that the ministers should have a vote in parliament, without which the Kirk could not be vindicated from poverty and contempt. "I mean not," said the king, "to bring in papistical or Anglican bishops, but only that the best and wisest of the ministry should be selected by your assembly to have a place in council and parliament, to sit upon their own affairs, and not to stand always at the door like poor supplicants, utterly despised and disregarded."‡

A long and keen argument now ensued between the contending parties; but the royal authority, backed by the northern legion, prevailed against all opposition; and it was at length carried by a majority of ten votes, that it was expedient for the welfare of the Church that the ministry, as the third estate in the realm, should have a vote in parliament. This question being settled, others were started, which laid bare to the most incredulous the true nature of the whole proceeding.§ It was agreed that the number of ecclesiastical representatives should be the same as that of the bishops, abbots, and priors, who were wont to come to parliament in the old popish times, viz., fifty-one, and that the appointment of them should belong partly to his majesty and partly to the Kirk.|| The assembly then proceeded to consider what should be their designation, how long their tenure of office should continue, and what should be their emoluments. These questions aroused the fears of many who had been cajoled into the belief, that no restoration of episcopacy was contemplated; and it was judged prudent to postpone the consideration of them till another time.¶ Meanwhile it was agreed that each synod, after hearing the opinions of the presbyteries within its bounds, should appoint three delegates, who along with the professors of theology should hold a conference, in presence of his majesty, regarding the points which were still unsettled; and they were to have power, if they were of one mind, finally to arrange the whole business; but if they disagreed, it was to be referred to the next meeting of the General Assembly. The anomalous commission, too, which had been the means of bringing these grave questions before parliament was re-appointed, and the same ample powers were entrusted to it, or to any nine of its members convened with his majesty.*

Meetings of the conference thus appointed to consider the proposed changes in the constitution of the Church were held successively at Falkland, St. Andrew's, and Holyrood House.† The first point which was debated was whether ministers could, consistently with the responsibilities of the sacred office, appear in parliament and act as representatives. On the one hand it was argued that the Gospel does not destroy civil policy; that Scripture affords examples of the union of sacred and civil offices; that ministers were as much distracted by the visitation of Churches, and proceedings with regard to stipends, as they would be by sitting in parliament; that the admonition "not to entangle themselves with the affairs of this life" was no more inconsistent with holding civil offices than with the relations of domestic life; and that ministers were as much entitled to be represented in parliament as other citizens. To these arguments it was replied that many political institutions were inconsistent with the Gospel, and therefore wrong; that the union of sacred and civil offices occasionally mentioned in Scripture was by no means common among God's people; that the visitation of churches was a part of the ministerial function, and not a superadded encumbrance; that if ministers were distracted by difficulties connected with stipends, this was not their own fault; that the illustration drawn by the Apostle from the case of a soldier makes it plain, that he considered any worldly occupation as an entanglement which ministers should shun; and that preachers of the Gospel no more needed separate representatives than other distinct classes in the community. They were represented, like physicians and lawyers, by the commissioners of shires and boroughs.

The next point which was handled related to the length of time during which clerical representatives should hold their office. Those who were favourable to the king's views were desirous that the tenure should endure for life, or at least until the representatives were guilty of some fault which exposed them to church censure, whilst the zealous presbyterians were all in favour of annual election. On the one hand it was argued that the trouble and expense connected with the office would indispose any person to accept it for so short a period as one year; and also that that space of time would not suffice for acquiring sufficient experience, or for bringing any piece of business relating to the Church to a satisfactory conclusion. But on the other hand it was alleged that regulations should be made, not for the convenience of individuals, but for the good of the Church or commonwealth; that although perpetual attendance on parliament might lead to extensive acquaintance with the laws of men, it would certainly be attended with diminished attention to the oracles of God; and that the General Assembly itself would consult far more efficiently and wisely for the good of the Church than a few individuals perpetually sitting in parliament. The undue influence also, which perpetual representatives would acquire, their elevation above their brethren, the temptations to which they would be exposed to neglect their spiritual functions, were adduced as arguments of great force.

The next point which was brought under discussion was the title which the clerical representatives in parliament should bear. Those who regulated their views by the king's wishes were prepared to call them bishops, arguing that if the substance were agreed upon, the mere name was a matter of small moment. It was considered an argument of much weight that bishop was a scriptural title, and it was also alleged that when the late parliament agreed to the admission of clerical representatives, it was on the supposition that they were to be bishops. It was acknowledged by the opposite party that ἐπίσκοπος, or bishop, was certainly a scriptural designation; but it was argued that, according to the usage of the Apostles, it belonged indifferently to all pastors. And therefore Andrew Melvil sarcastically suggested that, as something was added, in the case of the representatives now spoken of, to the office of the scriptural bishop, it was proper also to add something to their name, and he proposed to apply to them the designation used by Peter, ἀλλοτριεπισκοποι, busy bishops, who interfered with the concerns of other people. If they were named simply bishops, they must bear this title either according to its proper significance in Scripture, or according to the ideas commonly associated with it by the people. They could not bear it in the former sense, for Scripture applied it indiscriminately to all pastors, and not to a favoured few; and as little could it be given to them in the latter acceptation, for that would imply the restoration of all the corruptions, against which they had been labouring for years, contrary to the assurances so solemnly made by the king and his courtiers.*

The effect of this conference was not at all, either what the king expected or desired. Instead of mollifying the opposition of the zealous presbyterians to the changes which he was labouring to introduce, it only confirmed them in their views. The conference, therefore, was abruptly brought to an end, and, in dismissing the meeting, his majesty addressed them in the following strain:—He had been moved, he said, by the commissioners to appoint this conference for the satisfaction of such as felt scruples, but he saw men were so full of their own conceits, that they were rather confirmed in their opinions than disposed to give place to reason. He would, therefore, leave the matter to the assembly. If they would receive the benefit which he offered, he would ratify their conclusions with a civil sanction, so as to paralyse all opposition; but if the assembly rejected the proffered benefit, let them blame themselves if increased poverty and contempt overspread the Church. As for him, he would not want one of his estates. He would put in the vacant place such persons as he knew would accept the office, and perform their duty to him and the country.*

The opposition which most of the presbyterian ministers gave to the measures proposed by James, and the jealousy with which they regarded all the safeguards against abuse which were spoken of, were greatly strengthened by the views which the king himself put into print. He had published the preceding year a work entitled "The True Law of Free Monarchies," in which the most arbitrary principles of government were advanced. The sovereign, in such a monarchy as James delineated and declared to be the beau idéal of government, was free from all restraint; and in no circumstances was it allowable to offer resistance to his will. "A good king will frame all his actions according to the law; yet is he not bound thereto, but of his good will; although he be above the law, he will subject and frame his actions thereto, for example's sake to his subjects, and of his own free will, but not as subject or bound thereto."† And during the course of this summer, some extracts from another work of the king, of which only some seven copies were printed for the use of the court, were brought under the notice of the synod of Fife by one of its members.‡ These extracts made it plain that, whatever might be the views of some of the commissioners, as to the security of the presbyterian system in its leading principles, and the efficiency of the checks which it was proposed to lay upon the clerical representatives in parliament, it was his majesty's settled purpose to overthrow presbytery as speedily as possible, and to rear episcopacy upon its ruins. James Melvil mentions that it was these extracts which changed their previous strong suspicions of the king's designs into certain knowledge and absolute conviction.§ The following are some of the propositions which were contained in these extracts:—The office of a king is a mixed office betwixt the civil and the ecclesiastical. The ruling of the Kirk well is no small part of the king's office. The minister who appeals from the king's judicature in reference to his doctrine should "want his head."* No man is more to be hated by a king than a proud puritan. Parity among ministers cannot agree with a monarchy. Godly, learned, and modest men among the ministry should be promoted to bishoprics. Without bishops the three Estates in parliament cannot be re-established; therefore there must be bishops, and parity must be banished. Those who preach against bishops should be punished with the rigour of law. Puritans are pests in the commonwealth, and for a preventative against their poison there must be bishops.

The meeting of the General Assembly held at Montrose in March, 1600, was one of great importance. The conferences of the preceding year were merely designed as preparations for it. They were the marshalling and reviewing of the troops before the decisive engagement, or rather skirmishes in which the combatants made proof of their weapons. The ground selected as the scene of the final conflict was most skilfully chosen by James, as it gave him the opportunity of readily mustering his northern legions,† which had rendered such signal service to his cause at Perth and Dundee. And as his majesty thus took pains to secure a full attendance of those favourable to his own views, so he strove also to weaken the influence of his adversaries. Andrew Melvil, having been appointed one of the representatives of the presbytery of St. Andrew's, made his appearance in Montrose to take his seat in the assembly; but no sooner was his arrival reported to the king, than he sent for him, and demanded why he persisted in attending assemblies after he had expressly prohibited him. Melvil replied, that he had a commission from the Church, which it was his duty to discharge; and putting his hand to his throat he said, "Sir, take this head, and cut it off, if you will; you shall have it sooner than I shall betray the cause of Christ."‡ But James was too much afraid of his intrepidity and eloquence to give him the opportunity of speaking in public, and, therefore, he peremptorily forbade him to appear in the assembly. He was not expelled from the town, however, as he had been from Dundee in 1598; and being thus allowed to remain upon the spot, he was exceedingly serviceable to his brethren, both encouraging them by his presence and aiding them by his counsel.

The same questions, which had been handled in the Proceedings of the conferences at Falkland and the assembly. Holyrood House, were discussed at this assembly. The greatest eloquence and power of debate were undoubtedly displayed on the side of the advocates of the existing scheme of church government; and appearances seemed to indicate that the decision formerly obtained in favour of clerical representatives in parliament might be overturned; but the king interposed with the declaration that he would not allow that decision to be disturbed, and the assembly were constrained to acquiesce in this expression of the royal will.* With regard to the designation, which the ministers who might be deputed to parliament should bear, it was decided that it should not be bishops, but commissioners. And, notwithstanding all the arguments and influence which could be employed both in public and private, the majority gave their voice, not in favour of a perpetual, but of an annual appointment; although the minute was by some means or other so drawn up as to express rather a different idea, and in this altered shape it was sanctioned at the close of the assembly. As to the mode of appointing the representatives of the Church, it was agreed that the assembly should nominate six individuals for each vacant place, and that from amongst these the king should select any one whom he pleased, to occupy the seat in parliament. If none of the six met his views, then other six names were to be submitted to his inspection, from which it was to be imperative that a choice should be made.†

At Falkland various checks or safeguards had been suggested, with the view of overcoming the opposition made by the zealous presbyterians to the changes proposed by his majesty.

Checks on the power of clerical representatives.

As the opposition to these changes seemed now fully more formidable than ever, these checks, or caveats as they were designated, were all agreed to by the advocates of the new measures, and their declared object was to guard against the abuse of the powers, with which the commissioners were to be entrusted.‡ Clerical representatives were held bound, under pain of deposition, to propose nothing in parliament in the name of the Church without her express warrant; nor were they to remain silent when any measure prejudicial to her interests was brought forward by others. At each General Assembly they were to render an account of the manner in which, during the course of the year, they had performed the duties confided to them. They were to be content with whatever portion of the revenues of their benefice the king was pleased to assign to them, without encroaching upon the provision made for other ministers. They were to abstain from all dilapidation of their benefices; to attend upon their own particular congregations as faithful pastors; to claim no higher power than their brethren in the administration of discipline or the general government of the Church; to be subject, like other ministers, to the authority of presbyteries, synods, and assemblies; to sit in the General Assembly only when commissioned as the representatives of their presbyteries; to swear and subscribe to the observance of all these conditions at the time of their appointment; and should any of them be deposed at any time from the office of the ministry by the sentence of a church court, they were ipso facto to lose their place in parliament.*

These cautions were well adapted to guard against all abuse of the powers with which clerical representatives sent to parliament were entrusted; and if they had been faithfully observed, the presbyterian scheme of polity would have suffered exceedingly little infringement.† But James, unfortunately, considered falsehood and lies as legitimate elements of that king-craft upon which he prided himself so much; and he seems never to have intended that engagements, which were so solemnly sanctioned, should be ought else than empty words. They had served their purpose when they deceived the zealous presbyterians, whose simple minds confided in the sanctity of an oath. The extracts already quoted from the "Basilicon Doron" make it obvious that whatever James might pretend, the complete restoration of episcopacy was what he meditated. And, in fact, Spottiswood acknowledges that it was far from being the purpose of the king, or of those who acted along with him, to pay any regard to the caveats. "It was neither the king's intention, nor the minds of the wiser sort, to have these cautions stand in force; but to have matters peaceably ended, and the reformation of the policy made without any noise, the king gave way to these conceits."‡ Thus it was considered a proof of wisdom to employ oaths, which were never designed to be kept, to deceive an opponent; for one of the caveats required the bishops to swear and subscribe, that they would faithfully observe the whole of them under pain of deposition, and they were not afterwards repealed. It would have been much less offensive to the feelings of the upright, and much less injurious to the interests of morality, if the king, by his own despotic authority, had at once abolished presbytery, and substituted his own favourite scheme of church government in its room.

The affair of the Gowrie conspiracy, details of which have already been furnished to our readers,§ was very prejudicial to the Church, by widening the breach which already existed between James and the ministers. Immediately after that mysterious event, a command was issued by his majesty that public thanks should be rendered in all the churches for his escape from "a vile treason;" but although the ministers were prepared to bless God for the king's deliverance from any danger to which he had been exposed, yet many of them doubted the reality of the conspiracy laid to the charge of Gowrie, and therefore they scrupled to use the words embodied in the form of thanksgiving which the king prescribed.* James was filled with indignation that any man should question the enormity of a treason which he himself had discovered; and for this offence five of the ministers of Edinburgh were expelled from the metropolis, and forbidden to preach in Scotland at all. Four of these afterwards submitted to the king's will, acknowledging that they were wrong; and they were obliged to appear in various churches, and make public profession of sorrow for their incredulity. But Bruce, who had still doubts respecting the accuracy of the royal narrative, refused to make his peace on the terms prescribed by the king,† and was therefore banished from the country, and obliged to seek an asylum in France, where he remained for a considerable time.‡ His resolute opposition to the policy of the court had rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to his majesty. Some time before this he had been exposed to serious annoyance on account of the circumstance, that when he was originally admitted by the General Assembly to the ministerial office, the ceremony of imposition of hands had on some account or other been omitted. The validity of his ordination was, therefore, denied by the king, who insisted that he should be formally ordained anew, to which Bruce and many of the best ministers were opposed, as attaching a stigma to the deed of the assembly, as an undue preference of the form to the substance, and as nullifying all the acts of his ministerial life.§ It was soon after the arrangement of this affair that he was expelled from the kingdom; and although at a subsequent period he was permitted to return from France, yet he was never allowed to resume his ministerial functions in Edinburgh, but continued all his days exposed to malignant persecution from the king and his bishops.|| He was deficient in that suppleness and laxity of principle, which were indispensable to the continued enjoyment of the favour of a king, who considered that his will was entitled to regulate, not only the conduct, but the creed of all his subjects.

And not only did James make belief in the Gowrie conspiracy a condition of the enjoyment of his favour, but he even went the length of ordaining by act of parliament that the day of his deliverance, viz., the 5th of August, should be yearly observed in all coming ages as a day of thanksgiving for "his miraculous and extraordinary deliverance from the horrible and detestable murder and parricide attempted against his majesty's most noble person."¶ This enactment was calculated to give extreme offence, not only as being at variance with the disapprobation of religious anniversaries and holidays characteristic of Scotland, but also as implying the right of parliament to appoint religious observances. Yet by means of the influence which the king had now acquired over the General Assembly, he obtained their sanction, at a meeting held at Holyrood House in 1602, to the appointment which parliament had made.* Many of the ministers, however, who had not scrupled to observe the single day of thanksgiving for his majesty's deliverance, absolutely refused to give the slightest heed to the anniversary. They were summoned before the king's council to answer for their disobedience; but although they were severely threatened, yet their number, and the determination which they evinced, led his majesty to desist from further proceedings. The king's mode of managing assemblies appears from an incident which occurred at the meeting, where the anniversary commemorative of the royal deliverance was sanctioned. James Melvil having been sent for to the palace, and favoured with an audience in the cabinet, the king was overheard, as he retired from the royal presence, saying to one of his attendants, "This is a good, simple man. I have streaked cream on his mouth. I'll warrant you he will procure a number of votes for me to-morrow." The vote of next day, however, given in a clear, distinct voice, was such as was fitted to show the king what a mistake he had committed in confounding simplicity and guileless manners, with laxity of principle and a disposition to easy compliance.†

No further changes of any moment took place during the continuance of James in Scotland.

Although the design of restoring prelaacy was not for a moment laid aside, yet it was not prosecuted with any special zeal. The caveats, indeed, were but little regarded from the beginning, as appears from a complaint of the synod of Fife in 1602.* In utter disregard of these checks, several individuals were summarily appointed by the king to vacant bishoprics; as, for example, David Lindsay to that of Ross, Peter Blackburn to Aberdeen, and George Gladstones to Caithness.† And everything indicated that it was his majesty's fixed purpose to follow up the victories which he had already gained, by making such appointments from time to time as were calculated to advance his views. Meanwhile, Elizabeth died, and the event occurred which James had so long, and so anxiously anticipated; and he succeeded to the English throne without a struggle, his title being universally and peaceably acknowledged. Before he left Edinburgh to take possession of his new and more extensive dominions, he made reference, in the speech which he delivered in the High Church, to the state of peace in which he left the church. And when the members of the synod of Lothian came forth, and waited on him as he passed through Haddington, praying that the blessings of heaven might come down abundantly upon his head, he expressed the hope that they would live together in peace and unity, and declared it to be his purpose to make no further innovations in their ecclesiastical institutions.‡

THE accession of James to the throne of England was calculated to excite the hopes and fears of the various religious parties in both kingdoms. Those who concurred with him in the design of introducing episcopacy into Scotland would naturally feel that with the augmented power which he now possessed, he would be more able to overcome the opposition which was certain to be given to this object in every stage of its progress; whilst those, on the other hand, who were attached to the existing presbyterian institutions would be filled with alarm, lest all their efforts to uphold the policy which was so dear to their heads should prove unavailing. In England the Romanists not unnaturally hoped that James's descent from a mother who had been true to their religion through a long captivity, and under the terrible stroke which cut short her days, would dispose him to extend some degree of toleration to them; and they were probably not ignorant of the fact, that before Elizabeth's death he had written a letter to Pope Clement VII.,* in which, with the view of smoothing his way to the English throne, he promised that greater indulgence should be extended to the Romanists in Britain. The puritans, too, who had suffered so much during the reign of Elizabeth for their nonconformity, could hardly forbear cherishing the expectation that, under the sway of a monarch who had been brought up in a Church holding views so similar to their own, the severity of the pains and penalties affixed by law to their religious principles might be somewhat relaxed. The episcopalians again, who being the party in power had everything to lose, whilst, on the one hand, they might entertain apprehensions for the same reasons which inspired their opponents with hope, yet, on the other hand, were quite aware of the efforts which James had made for the introduction of episcopacy into Scotland, and of the disgust with which the proceedings of the presbyterian leaders had inspired him; and, therefore, they must have felt that their institutions were exposed to no real danger, but that probably they might still be permitted to domineer over other parties just as they had hitherto done.

While James was on his way to London, a deputation from the puritans met him, and presented to him a petition, usually designated from the number of ministers' names appended to it, the Millenary Petition. In which they prayed for a redress of the grievances under which they had long laboured, and for the reformation of abuses acknowledged to be such by the great mass of Protestants. They had been sounded by his majesty while he was still but the King of Scotland; and being decidedly in favour of his title to the succession, they had been flattered with the prospect of a favourable consideration of their case; and now they fondly hoped that the expectations thus inspired were on the eve of being realised.* But the two universities at once took the alarm. Oxford published an answer to the petition of the puritans, charging them with a factious spirit, abusing the principles of the Scottish Church, and extolling the polity of the Church of England, as at once possessed of every excellence, and as constituting the surest support of the throne. At Cambridge it was declared that whoever opposed by word or writing, or in any other way, the doctrine or discipline of the Church of England, or any part of it, should be suspended ipso facto from any degree already taken, and be disabled from taking any degree in future.†

Whatever might be the promises held out by James to different parties before he was actually acknowledged King of England, no sooner did he feel himself firmly seated upon the throne, than it became obvious to every eye that he was devoted to episcopacy, and would grant no indulgence to any one upholding a different system. His favourite maxim—no bishop, no king—became dearer to him than ever. The extraordinary deference shown to him by the English bishops, the admiration which they expressed for his wisdom and learning, and their practice of frequently falling upon their knees when they addressed him, were infinitely more agreeable to his feelings than the sturdy independence which he was so often obliged to encounter in Scotland.‡ The presbyterian ministers had imbibed the manly and generous sentiments inculcated by Buchanan, with respect to the responsibilities and limitations of kingly power; and they often found themselves under the necessity of remonstrating with James, who, in disregard of the lessons of his early preceptor, now carried his ideas respecting the power of princes to the most extravagant length. But the English bishops avowed the same sentiments which were so dear to the royal mind; they echoed back all his views with regard to the unlimited authority of princes, and the criminality of resistance in any conceivable case; and by thus flattering the prejudices of a mind of no great compass, they acquired an extensive influence over him, and secured his exclusive support of their system. He soon gave them to understand that the constitution of the Church of England was entirely in accordance with his mind, and that he would allow no innovations to be made upon it for the sake of any parties whatever.*

Still it was requisite that the promises which James had given to the puritans to take their case into consideration should not appear to be utterly disregarded by him; and, therefore, he appointed that a conference should take place at Hampton Court between the episcopalians and some of the leading men among the puritans.† The professed object of this conference was to bring about an accommodation between the opposite parties; but it was plain from the very first that the whole affair was a wilful deception. In a speech which the king delivered to the episcopal clergy, at a meeting from which their opponents were excluded, he assured them that he looked upon the policy of their Church as so excellent that it needed no amendment; and he felicitated himself upon the happy change that had taken place in his own condition, transferred as he was in God's good providence from a disorderly kingdom, where no reverence was paid to him, to one where he was surrounded by prudent, grave, and learned men. And the conference was conducted with hardly the semblance of justice or impartiality. Those who spoke in favour of the existing order of things were allowed to take the utmost latitude, while those who pleaded for some reforms, and craved that the scruples of nonconformists might not be altogether disregarded, were subjected to most vexatious interruptions, and loaded with insult and scorn. The king himself gave free expression to his abhorrence of the presbyterian scheme of government. "You aim," said he, in reply to Reynolds, one of the puritan speakers, 'at a Scotch presbytery, which agrees as well with monarchy as God and the devil. Then Jack and Tom, and Will and Dick shall meet, and at their pleasure censure me, my council, and all my proceedings. Stay, I pray you, for one seven years before you demand this of me.'" And when the conference drew to a close, he addressed them in the following strain:—"We have taken pains to conclude here a resolution for uniformity, and you will undo all by preferring the credit of a few private men to the peace of the Church. This is the Scottish way, but I will have none of this arguing; therefore let them conform, and that quickly, too, or they shall hear of it. The bishops will give them some time; but if any are of an obstinate or turbulent spirit, I will have them forced to conformity."‡

These proceedings were watched with the deepest interest in Scotland. When the account of them, transmitted by Galloway, who was present at the conference, was read in the presbytery of Edinburgh, the ministers were struck dumb for a time with apprehension. The hostile feeling which the king cherished against the puritans, who agreed in many respects with the presbyterians of Scotland, was but too well fitted to suggest to them the idea, that times of trial and persecution were soon to visit their native land.* If the puritans were a sect intolerable, as the king affirmed in his speech before parliament, in any well-governed commonwealth, what had the friends of the presbyterian discipline in Scotland to expect, when they differed even more than the puritans from the Church which James now regarded with so much favour? And the circumstance was fitted to deepen their alarm, that while the king spoke with so much severity of the puritans, whom he acknowledged to be sound in the great principles of religion, he applied much milder language to the Church of Rome, which he described as "our mother Church," although defiled with some infirmities and corruptions. How different from the professions which James had formerly made! What value could be attached to the solemn promises which he had given before leaving Scotland, that he would make no further changes in the state of ecclesiastical affairs? All the worst suspicions which the friends of the Presbyterian Church in that country had ever entertained with regard to his majesty's sincerity were confirmed from his own mouth. His duplicity was apparent to every eye. His kingcraft, upon which he prided himself so much, was a compound of dishonesty and lies. Honour, integrity, conscience, and truth, were entirely set at naught by him when they stood in the way of his own views and wishes.†

One of the measures which the king proposed to his first parliament at Westminster was, that as England and Scotland were now governed by one king, they ought to be united into one kingdom. The ministers of the Scottish Church were not averse to a legislative union of the two kingdoms, but they were afraid that in bringing it about the ecclesiastical institutions of their native country might be assimilated to those of England; and, therefore, when it was appointed that a parliament should meet to take the subject into consideration, they requested that a meeting of the General Assembly should be summoned at the same time.‡ But this was refused, on the ground that the parliament could do nothing more at present than choose commissioners to consider the terms of union; and the assurance was also given that the king would alter nothing in the order and discipline of the Kirk, provided that the ministers conducted themselves quietly at this time. When all efforts to procure a meeting of the General Assembly proved unavailing, the synod of Fife, ever foremost in defending the rights of the Church, adopted the only means now within their reach of guarding against the dangers which were apprehended, and which appeared not the less threatening that the royal promises were repeated.* The commissioners of the General Assembly having, in accordance with the cautions, craved advice from the presbyteries with regard to the points which parliament was to consider, the synod took the opportunity of addressing to them in reply a solemn admonition, which displays the clear perception the presbyterians of Scotland had of their present dangers, and how firmly determined they were rather to die than to sacrifice their principles. The document is one of great importance, and exhibits decisive evidence at once of the loyalty of the presbyterians, and of their devoted attachment to the liberty of their country. "For as much as, by your missives directed to the presbyteries, we were warned to give in our advice to you before this proclaimed parliament, with regard to matters to be proposed concerning the good of the Church; for discharging of that duty we have set down, and sent to you in writing, by our commissioners, with all hearty salutations in Christ, the following articles for our advice:—

"1. We thank God for the purpose of this union of these realms, as most desirable, in respect as already, by the profession of the Gospel, they have been united in God these many years past; and now, by a special blessing of that same Gospel of peace and union in Christ Jesus, they are come under a king, for graces and virtues incomparable; and, therefore, we earnestly wish the same, by all good means and endeavours of all the Estates, particularly of the ecclesiastical, to be prosecuted even till it be effectuated, for the establishment and maintenance of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, which is the kingdom of true peace and union, working sure safety and firm welfare to all kings and kingdoms reigning and standing with Christ and in him.

"2. Because the occasion of the treaty respecting the union, so happily of God's good and great providence fallen out, is since the last General Assembly of the Church in this realm, ye could, therefore, have no warrant, direction, or information, to treat of particulars concerning the same, yet we think you may, and should do this in general, in name of the said assembly, crave that the acts made by our parliaments in favour of the Church should be ratified and confirmed, and then solemnly protest that nothing be done by way of commission or otherwise at this time, whereby any innovation, alteration, hurt, or prejudice may ensue against the present right and possession of the doctrine, discipline, and government of the Church and kingdom of Jesus Christ within this realm, established by the Word of God, confirmed by the laws of the country, briefly comprehended and published in the king's Confession of Faith, whereunto all his highness's subjects were moved with their king and sovereign lord solemnly to swear, and which his majesty, going to his prosperous promotion, most graciously vouchsafed it should enjoy peaceably and unaltered hereafter; and in case there be anything done to the contrary, as God forbid, to protest that it is null and of no force in itself, in respect that neither the General Assembly was warned thereto, or had directed any commissioners thereanent.

"3. That the old petition of the General Assembly be renewed, and so much the more at present urged, as the danger is greater, viz., that none vote in name of the Church, and for the estates thereof in parliament, who bear not office within the same, nor have any commission from it so to do; and if they be admitted to sit and vote, to protest it be not esteemed the vote and judgment of the Church of Scotland.

"4. Forasmuch as it is expressly provided that those of the ministers, who, in name of the Church are appointed to vote in parliament, shall not presume at any time in parliament, council, or convention, to propose anything in name of the Church without express direction and warrant from the same, neither shall keep silence in opposing, if they shall hear or perceive anything uttered to her hurt or prejudice, under the pain of deprivation; therefore we think that ye should charge the said voters in parliament, in name of Christ and his Church, so to do, under the pain of deprivation, and farther as Christ by his Church may inflict; and to recommend to them the order and discipline of the Church to be well considered, studied, and had in memory, that they may maintain, stand fast, and defend the same to the uttermost, remembering the account they must give to the General Assembly of the Church within this realm, but particularly to Jesus Christ, at that general, great, and glorious parliament of his last appearance, when he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

"Lastly, we most earnestly beseech you, in the bowels of Christ, yea, attesting and adjuring you, before God and his elect angels, as ye will make answer to that great judge, to whom you must give an account of your stewardship, that ye, by these presents, inform and certify the commissioners who are to be chosen in this parliament, to treat upon this union for the part of the Church, and so by them the king our sovereign, his most excellent majesty, that we believe in our consciences instructed, cleared, and assured by the Word of God, written in Holy Scripture, that the essential grounds of the discipline and government of the Church and kingdom of Jesus Christ, established and in use in this realm of Scotland, is not a thing indifferent or alterable, but a substantial part of the Gospel, having the like warrant with any other point of our faith and religion, which to renounce or pass from we will esteem as hard as to renounce the manifest truth of God revealed to us in Scripture, yea, harder than to suffer death; which expressly, by these presents, we protest and profess, choosing rather so to do now beforehand for the ease and relief of our consciences than too late hereafter, when there may be, as God forbid, constitutions and laws made to the contrary."*

The admonition thus addressed by the synod of Compromise Fife to the commissioners of the in parliament. General Assembly exerted a very beneficial influence, not only upon them, but also upon many of the barons and noblemen. When the parliament met at Perth, the Earl of Morton, whose years and Christian character made him venerable,† proposed that the commissioners appointed to treat of the union should be forbidden to consent to anything, which might be prejudicial to the doctrine or discipline of the Church as at present settled. But though he was supported by most of the barons and burgesses, yet the courtiers and newly appointed prelates opposed the motion so strenuously, that it was defeated, and a commission unlogged by conditions was sanctioned. Parliament, however, acceded so far to the views of Morton, as to pass an act that no proceedings in regard to the union should prejudice the doctrine or discipline of the Church.‡ To appearance, this was not very different from what the friends of the existing ecclesiastical polity desired, but in reality it was a comparatively worthless concession. It was like providing for the future ejection of a foe from the citadel, while in the meantime a wide door was opened for his entrance. And nothing more is requisite to show the insincerity and double dealing of the prelates and courtiers, than the fact that they opposed with dogged determination the insertion of a restrictive clause into the commission, which was to be taken up to England, and made the ground of immediate action, while they offered scarcely any opposition to the embodiment of the very same clause in an act which was only to be recorded in the statute book at home. Their expectation manifestly was that the act would be a dead letter, if in the meantime they accomplished their object through means of the unlimited commission.§

The General Assembly which should have met

Fears excited by the prorogation of the assembly.	at Aberdeen, in July, 1604, having been prorogued for a year, under the pretext of waiting till the conferences regarding the union should be brought to a close, meetings were held during the course of the winter at St. Andrew's and Perth, for the purpose of considering what steps should be taken to defend the liberties of the Church, now so seriously threatened.|| Loud complaints were made at these meetings, that the cautions which had been adopted with universal consent, and made obligatory with all the solemnity of an oath, were utterly disregarded. Individuals left their flocks and went up to London, where they received bishoprics directly from the king, and then assumed titles which had been expressly condemned by the General Assembly at Montrose. John Spottiswood, Alexander Forbes, and others, had thus set at nought the authority of the Church.*

In the end it was agreed that a petition should be addressed to his majesty, praying that the General Assembly might be allowed to meet according to act of parliament and long custom. And appearances seemed to indicate that the king was disposed to accede to their wishes; for when the distinguished and upright John Forbes, minister of Alford, was admitted to an audience with the king in London, he was not only assured by James that he continued faithful to the religion in which he had been brought up, and was determined to make no further changes in the constitution of the Scottish Church, but he was also authorised to communicate these welcome tidings to his brethren, and to admonish them to adhere to the acts of parliament and the decisions of those General Assemblies which had been attended by his majesty.†

Yet while the king was thus spontaneously sending assurances of his goodwill to the ministers in Scotland, nothing was farther from his intention than to gratify the hopes which he was exciting.

His plan was formed, and, accordingly, when the time approached for the meeting of the General

General Assembly at Aberdeen.

Assembly at Aberdeen, he signified his will that it should not take place; and the council in Edinburgh accordingly prohibited it. After an interview, however, between Forbes and the chancellor, the prohibition was recalled, on the understanding that the assembly after it met should immediately at his request be adjourned. The missives directed to the presbyteries were subscribed by the clerk of the commissioners, but those transmitted to the north country specified the second day of July as the time of the meeting, while those sent to the south named the fifth, the discrepancy being apparently designed to render the meeting abortive.‡ When the former of these days arrived, nineteen ministers, the representatives of nine different presbyteries, made their appearance in Aberdeen. With the sanction of Laurieston, the king's commissioner, they elected Forbes moderator; and the council's letter requesting them to adjourn the meeting having now been read, they at once agreed to dissolve the assembly. Before separating, however, they desired the king's representative to appoint the time and place of their next meeting, but this he peremptorily refused to do, and commanded them instantly to disperse. They were willing to separate, but they felt that if they did so without making any provision for another meeting, they would themselves be accessory to the destruction of their polity. They agreed therefore to meet again in the same place on the last Tuesday of September, and then wrote to the council explaining the reasons of this appointment. His majesty's commissioner, alarmed now at what the ministers had done, and dreading the resentment of his royal master, declared that from the first he had considered this assembly an unlawful meeting on account of the absence of the late moderator and the usual clerk; and he afterwards maintained that on the first day of July he had commanded all the ministers to depart from Aberdeen, under pain of being denounced as rebels.* This was undoubtedly a fabrication on the part of Laurieston, designed to shield himself from the charge of having given too much countenance to the assembly. It had now become very obvious that it was the wish of his majesty to have no more such meetings.†

With regard to the proceedings of the assembly at Aberdeen, which have been so loudly condemned, there is no room at all for doubt that they were quite constitutional.‡ The simple question was, whether the laws of the kingdom or the will of the prince should be the rule of government. By act of parliament a yearly meeting of the General Assembly had been authorised, and the only restriction imposed was, that the time and place of meeting should be fixed by the king or his commissioner, or failing them by the assembly itself. But his majesty, without having procured a repeal of this law from the legislature, arbitrarily prevented the meeting of the assembly; and on the occasion of the prorogation at Aberdeen, his representative refused to name any time for a subsequent meeting, thus warranting the inference that he designed to annihilate the supreme court of the Church altogether. And what was the extent of the offence perpetrated by the ministers? They presumed to name a day, when the commissioner failed to do so, for their next meeting. Less than this they could not have done, without betraying the rights of their Church and the liberties of their native country. When the magnitude of the interests at stake is considered, so far will their conduct appear from exhibiting anything like violence, that they must rather be acknowledged to merit the praise of extreme moderation. Resistance to the arbitrary conduct of James was the duty of every good citizen; and if the prelates of England, instead of flattering his vanity and echoing all his slavish maxims, had joined in withstanding his encroachments upon the liberties of the nation, he might have been prevented from pursuing a most pernicious course, and his son might have been saved from that ruin in which the accumulated wrongs of many years eventually overwhelmed him.

When intelligence of the proceedings at Aberdeen was conveyed to his majesty, he was filled with indignation at the ministers, and sent immediate orders to the council of Edinburgh to proceed with the utmost rigour against them. Fourteen ministers were accordingly apprehended and thrown into prison; and when they declined the authority of the privy council in a cause which was purely ecclesiastical, six of them, viz., John Forbes of Alford, John Welsh of Ayr, Robert Durie of Anstruther, Andrew Duncan of Craill, John Sharp of Kilmany, and Alexander Strachan of Criegh, were singled out to stand their trial for high-treason before the court of justiciary at Linlithgow.* Their defence was conducted with singular eloquence and skill by Forbes and Welsh,† but the most infamous arts were employed to secure their condemnation. The judges were tampered with, and the jury were threatened and cajoled.‡ In a letter addressed by secretary Balmerino to his majesty, he says:—"To disseemble nothing, if the Earl of Dunbar had not been with us, and partly by his dexterity in advising what was fittest to be done in everything, and partly by the authority he had over his friends, of whom a great many passed upon the assize, and partly for that some stood in awe of his presence, knowing that he would make faithful relation to your majesty of every man's part, the turn had not framed so well, as blessed be God it has."§ And even with the aid of all these arts of intrigue, it was only by a majority of three that a verdict of guilty was extorted from the reluctant jury; six of the fifteen persisted in declaring their conviction that the ministers were innocent. Undeterred by the profound horror which these proceedings excited through the whole country, the king sent down orders to the council to proceed immediately with the trial of the remaining eight ministers, who were still in prison; but they felt constrained to assure him that the recent scenes could not be repeated, that they were regarded with detestation and horror by the whole country, and that no jury could now be found that would return a verdict of guilty. Yet the ministers, though not brought to trial, were not set at liberty. They were banished to the Orkney and Shetland Islands, where several of them died under the sufferings and privations to which they were exposed.||

§ The lord-advocate, too, addressed a letter to the king in a similar strain. This letter is embodied in the Memorials published by Lord Hailes regarding the reign of James I. The learned judge makes the following observations upon it:—"This letter gives a more lively idea of those times than an hundred chronicles can do. We see here the prime-minister, in order to obtain a sentence agreeable to the king, address the judges with promises and threats, pack the jury, and then deal with them without scruple and ceremony. It is also evident that the king's advocate disliked the proceedings as impolitic and odious, but that he had not resolution to oppose them."—Lord Hailes' Memorials and Letters, vol. i. pp. 1—4.

Shortly after these cruel and shameful proceedings, an attempt was made by the government to prevail upon the synods to accede to five articles, which were designed to relieve the bishops from the responsibility which they owed to the General Assembly, and also to establish the power which the king claimed over the supreme judicatory of the Church. They were in flagrant contradiction to the solemn assurances repeatedly given by his majesty, that he would not alter the constitution of the Scottish Church; for although the first article merely required the ministers to originate no changes themselves, yet the others proposed that the bishops should have full jurisdiction over the ministers, that the commissioners of the General Assembly should not be changed, that no appeal should lie from them to the General Assembly, and that the king should be acknowledged supreme ruler of the Church under Christ, and the source of all the powers which were exercised by ministers.* These were chains of bondage and degradation which the synods were asked to fasten upon themselves; but although ample evidence was furnished by the recent trial of what they had reason to expect from the rage of lawless tyranny, they decidedly refused, with the single exception of the synod of Angus, to comply with the royal mandate. Such questions, they answered, could only be considered in a general assembly of the Church. James Melvil was confined to a sick-bed at the time, but he felt impelled, "out of the midst of his pains," to write to the synod to which he belonged, which was convened at Cupar; and while he declared that he could hardly believe such proposals were really made, he admonished them to stand fast in the liberty of the Gospel, "not only at the bar and in prison, but even in the fire and upon the scaffold."†

The king had more success with parliament than with the synods, for at a meeting held at Perth in August, 1606, the bishops were restored to all their ancient honours and dignities. In vain did deputations from all the presbyteries attend with the view of opposing the measure; their remonstrances and protestations were disregarded. The chancellor plainly declared that "so they were commanded;"‡ and, in fact, they were not a free parliament, but the mere tools of arbitrary power. At last it was craved, that at least the cautions formerly agreed to by his majesty should be inserted in the act of parliament; but this was absolutely refused. The nobility, for the most part, were opposed to the measure, but they had not the courage to withhold their consent from it, because it was now much more dangerous to displease the king than it had formerly been. Besides, the prelaties were reduced in number, and all the grants which had formerly been made of church lands to noblemen were confirmed, and seventeen new temporal lordships were created out of ecclesiastical property. Hardly was the measure passed, however, when the arrogance of the newly-created spiritual peers excited the resentment of the nobility. The first day they presented a magnificent spectacle, riding between the earls and the lords, clothed in silk and velvet; but on the second day they refused to join the procession at all, because they were not allowed to take their place before the earls, and next to the marquises, as had been the practice in old popish times.*

The protest proposed by the ministers against the changes which it was known the king designed to accomplish in the parliament, is drawn up with much judgment and force, and it forms a striking contrast to the slavish maxims which the noblemen and other members of the legislature were not ashamed to avow. Parliament so enlarged the royal prerogative as to extend it beyond all bounds, declaring that "the Estates, of their bounden duty, with most hearty and faithful affection, humbly acknowledged the king's majesty to be sovereign monarch, absolute prince, judge, and governor, over all persons, estates, and causes, both spiritual and temporal, within the realm."† But the ministers, on the other hand, maintained that there was no absolute and unbounded authority in this world, excepting that of Christ himself. "All other authority is entrenched within the marches of the divine commandment. For this cause, my lords, let the authority of your meeting in this present parliament be like the ocean sea, which, as it is the greatest of all waters, so it containeth itself better within the coasts and limits appointed by God, than any river of fresh running waters hath done."‡ The protest next denounces the pre-eminence of bishops above their brethren as an ordinance of man, which all experience has shown to be productive of idleness, pride, tyranny, and ambition; and it also describes this pre-eminence as having been the germ of popery. "The antichristian hierarchy climbed up by the steps of the pre-eminence of bishops, until the man of sin came forth as the ripe fruits of the wisdom of man, which God shall consume with the breath of his mouth. Let the sword of God pierce the belly that brought forth such a monster, and let the staff of God crush that egg which hath hatched such a venomous cockatrice; and let not only that Roman antichrist be thrown down from the high bench of his usurped authority, but also let all the steps whereby he climbed up to that unlawful pre-eminence be cut down and utterly abolished in this land." And the document concluded with offering to prove that the dignities and powers with which it was proposed to invest certain ministers were contrary to the word of God, the ancient canons and fathers of the Church, the opinions of the most learned modern divines, the constitution of the Church of Scotland from the time of the Reformation, and the well-being of all ranks of the community.*

This protest, which was totally disregarded by parliament—the reading of it being interdicted—was penned by Patrik Simpson of Stirling; and the reasons, to which reference is made in the close of the document, were the production of James Melvil, aided by his uncle. These reasons enter at great length into the subject of church government. The scriptural argument is fully exhibited. An immense array of ancient and modern authorities is produced; and the paper concludes with some powerful reasoning as to the dangers likely to ensue from the subserviency of bishops to the will of the prince:—"They have their lordship and living, their honour and estimation, profit and commodity, from the king more than others. The king may set them up and cast them down, give to them and take from them, put them in and out at his pleasure; and, therefore, they must be at his direction, to do what liketh him. If any succeeding prince please to play the tyrant, and govern not by laws, but by his own will and pleasure,† signified by missives, articles, and directions, they shall never admonish him as faithful pastors, for such they are not, having no lawful calling and authority from God and his Church; but as they are made up by man, they will flatter, pleasure, and obey men. As they stand by the prince's affection, so they will by no means jeopard their standing, but be readiest of any to put his will and pleasure in execution, suppose it were to apprehend, imprison, or banish such as stand for the freedom and the laws of the realm. Unless men of whatsoever rank and degree give them their styles, places, and salutation, they shall not miss to be crossed by them in their affairs, and traduced at court by them or their means. Their company and train shall be an example of riot and excess. The bishop, in his own city, and amongst his vassals, will think himself a petty king. Who dare deny to lend, give, or serve him with whatsoever they have? If he do, cannot they and their lawyers, domestics, and dependents, devise a way how to draw him within danger of the laws? and then his estate, falling in the bishop's hand, he shall certainly be pillaged and polled. Finally, it is already too manifest, that if the prince be prodigal, or would enrich his courtiers by taxations and imposts laid upon his subjects, who have been, or shall be so ready to satisfy his desire in parliament, as those who are set up for that and like service?"*

In the month of May letters from the king had been addressed to eight of the principal ministers who were opposed to episcopacy, viz., Andrew and James Melvil, William Scott of Cupar, John Carmichael of Kilconquhar, William Watson of Burntisland, James Balfour of Edinburgh, Adam Coult of Musselburgh, and Robert Wallace of Tranent, requiring them to appear, all excuses set aside, in his majesty's presence in London before the 15th of September.† The ostensible reason for imposing this long and burdensome journey upon them was, that his majesty desired to hold a conference with them in regard to the best means of restoring and maintaining the peace of the Church of Scotland; but the whole course of events makes it obvious that the real design was to weaken still further the party opposed to the king's measures by the removal of their ablest men. Fourteen ministers had already been either imprisoned or banished on account of the proceedings of the assembly at Aberdeen, and eight more were now commanded, under false pretences, to leave the scene of their labours. As they augured no good from the journey, they requested the Earl of Dunbar to use his influence with the view of inducing his majesty to excuse them from it; but the earl either deceived himself, or accessory to the plot for tearing them away from their native country, urged them to comply with the king's desire, and expressed the confident belief that the step would be attended with most beneficial consequences. Certain it is that so early as June, Gladstones, Bishop of St. Andrew's, was felicitating himself on the idea that Andrew Melvil would never more appear at the university.‡

When the eight ministers reached London, they were first admitted to a private interview with his majesty, who demanded their opinion with regard to the late assembly at Aberdeen, and also with regard to the best mode of restoring peace to the Church of Scotland.§ After presenting their congratulations to his majesty on the high honour and dignity to which he was now raised, they requested that they might be allowed some time to advise with one another respecting the answers which it might be proper to give to his questions. On the following day they were again introduced into the royal presence, where they found themselves in the midst of a splendid assemblage of the English nobility. The Scottish bishops and commissioners were first called upon to state their views of the assembly at Aberdeen; and with one voice they declared that they had always condemned it as an unlawful convention. The king now addressed himself to Andrew Melvil, saying, "You see that your brethren here cannot justify these men, nor their assemblies. What say you therefore? Think you that when a small number of eight or nine do meet, without any warrant, wanting the chief members of an assembly, the moderator and the scribe, convening unmannerly without sermon, being also discharged before by open proclamation, these can make an assembly or not?"* The several points thus adverted to by the king were handled by Melvil in a speech of nearly an hour's length. The thinness of a meeting did not destroy its legality. The numbers present were amply sufficient for all the business that was transacted, which was merely to adjourn to another time. The absence of moderator and clerk could never be considered fatal to the validity of a meeting, for it was easy to elect others in their room. With regard to the alleged want of sermon, his majesty had been misinformed, for James Ross, minister of Aberdeen, had preached at the opening of the assembly. And as to a public proclamation forbidding the ministers to constitute themselves into a court, Melvil brought the matter to the test at once, by appealing to the king's commissioner, who was said to have made the proclamation. "I adjure you in the name of the Kirk of Scotland, as you shall answer before the great God at the appearance of Jesus Christ to judge the quick and the dead, to testify the truth, and to tell whether any such discharge was given or not."† The silence of Laurieston made it plain that the facts of the case had been grossly misrepresented.‡ All the ministers were called upon to speak in order, and perfect harmony characterised their views and representations. "If your majesty," said James Melvil, "find fault with that meeting, let the presbyteries that commissioned the members be punished, and not the persons whom they sent. If your majesty urge me to deliver my judgment according to my conscience, then my judgment is that, unless the alleged wrongs done to them and presented to your majesty's Estates in the last parliament held at Perth be considered, and rightly judged, I would not for all the world condemn them."§ When William Scott was speaking, a legal argument ensued between him and Hamilton, the lord-advocate, with regard to the trial of the ministers at Linlithgow for treason; and Scott gave such a view of the case, and made such disclosures, as brought the blush to Hamilton's cheek. The thought of the wrongs which these brethren had suffered fired the bosom of Andrew Melvil with indignation, and falling down upon his knees, || he besought his majesty to allow him to speak a second time; when he poured forth such a torrent of eloquence in defence of injured innocence, and in reprobation of the conduct of the lord-advocate, that the English nobility and clergy were filled with amazement, both at the boldness of his carriage, and at the dignity and elevation of his sentiments and language. Detailing the insidious wiles and malicious craft which Hamilton had employed against the ministers, he applied to him the words ὁ κατήγορος τῶν ἀδελφῶν.* "What is that?" said the king, turning to the Archbishop of Canterbury; "I think he calls him Antichrist, out of the book of Revelations. Nay, by God! he calleth him the very devil. That is the devil's own name in the Apocalypse."†

Nothing was to be gained by further conference. The eloquence and firmness of the ministers, and the perfect accord- Close of the conference.ance of all their representations and views, were producing a deep impression upon the minds of not a few of the independent English nobility. The proceedings were, therefore, abruptly brought to a termination. Before the king retired, however, he demanded of the Scottish brethren what proposal they had to make with regard to the best means of restoring peace and tranquillity to the Church. With one voice they answered, that a free General Assembly was the only means which they could imagine for removing disagreements and restoring the country to anything like repose.‡

As the ministers were accused of no crime, and as they had now answered all the Efforts made to ensnare the ministers.questions proposed to them, it might naturally have been expected that they should be allowed immediately to return home; but nothing was farther from the king's intention. Hardly had they left the royal presence, when they were overtaken by Alexander Hay, the secretary for Scottish affairs, who delivered to them a message from his majesty, charging them not to return to Scotland, nor to come near the court without special licence or invitation. After a few days they were summoned to appear before the Scottish council, met in the Earl of Dunbar's lodgings, and there they were plied with ensnaring questions by the lord-advocate, whose object was to extort from them some unguarded expressions, on the ground of which a charge might be brought against them. James Melvil, who was first called in, refused to answer. "I am a free subject of the kingdom of Scotland, which hath laws and privileges of its own, as free as any kingdom in the world; to them I will stand. There hath been no summons lawfully executed against me. The noblemen here present and I are not in our own country. a charge against myself.* Andrew Melvil was called in last, and he indignantly reproached the Scottish noblemen for lending themselves as the tools of oppression. They had degenerated from the ancient nobility of Scotland, who were wont to give their lives and their lands for the freedom of their country and the Gospel, but they were betraying and overturning the dearest interests of both. Shortly afterwards they were served with written questions, to which they were required to return answers each for himself.† It was asked whether they had not transgressed their duty, in praying publicly for the brethren placed by sentence of a lawful judge under restraint; whether they acknowledged his majesty's right as a Christian king to convoke and prorogue, for reasons known to himself, the assemblies of the Church; and whether his majesty was not invested with the power of citing before him all persons for any faults, civil or ecclesiastical, and passing sentence upon them? Their answers to these questions were so guardedly expressed, that, without at all contradicting their own principles, they afforded no handle of which their enemies could lay hold.‡

During the course of these proceedings the ministers were compelled to hear sermons from English bishops touching the points in dispute, to which of course they were not permitted to give any reply.§ On one occasion they were obliged to attend in the royal chapel at the festival of St. Michael, which was celebrated with much pomp. Perceiving upon the altar two shut books, two empty cups, and two unlighted candles, Andrew Melvil wrote the following verses:—

“Cur stant clausi Anglis libri duo regia in ara, Lumina caeca duo, pollubra siccæ duo?
Num sensum cultumque Dei tenet Anglia clausum,
Lumine caeca suo, sordè sepulta sua?
Romano an ritu dum regalem instruit aram
Purpuream pingit religiosa lupam?”||

Through some unknown channel a copy of these verses, which were never intended for publication, was conveyed to his majesty, and they were immediately made the ground of proceedings against their author before the English privy council. Melvil at once frankly acknowledged that he had written them, but he maintained that there was nothing of the nature of a crime in them, and that even if they were criminal, he was not answerable to the privy council of England. When the Archbishop of Canterbury characterised the verses as treasonable, Melvil could not forbear exclaiming, “Andrew Melvil was never a traitor. But, my lords, there was one Richard Bancroft—let him be sought for—who during the life of the late queen wrote a treatise against his majesty's title to the crown of England; and here is the book,” pulling it out of his pocket, “which was answered by my brother, John Davidson.”* This completely silenced Bancroft, upon which Bishop Barlow advanced to the conflict, but Melvil's comment upon a statement of his regarding the king, contained in his account of the Hampton Court conference, that he was in the Church of Scotland but not of it, at once drove him from the field. To affirm of any one that he is in a church, but not of it, is to brand him with hypocrisy. One of the Scottish noblemen now admonished Melvil to remember where he was, and to whom he was speaking. “I remember it very well, my lord, and I am sorry that your lordship, by sitting here and countenancing such proceedings against me, should furnish a precedent which may yet be used against yourself or your posterity.” In the end Melvil was declared guilty of a scandalum magnatum, and confined as a prisoner in the Tower of London, where he remained for four years, after which he was allowed, at the solicitation of the Duke of Boulogne, to remove to the Protestant University of Sedan, where he was installed as professor of theology, and remained till the time of his death.† Thus disappears from the field of Scottish history Andrew Melvil, a man of exalted genius, vast learning, fearless intrepidity, and incorruptible integrity; one of the greatest men whom Scotland has produced, one who lived for the benefit of his country regardless of every selfish aim, and who, next to Knox, did more for the highest interests of his native land than any other man of his age.

With regard to James Melvil, nothing in the shape of a crime was laid to his charge, yet he was punished with perpetual exile from his native country. Mild, obliging, courteous, pious, incorruptible, he was commanded to confine himself as a prisoner to Newcastle, and such was the rigid restraint under which he was placed, that he was not even allowed to visit his wife when she was upon her death-bed. Afterwards he was permitted to return to Scotland for one month to arrange his family affairs; but he was debarred from preaching, and after the expiration of the brief allotted space, he was obliged to go back to England, where he remained an exile to the day of his death, which took place at Berwick some years afterwards. Thus, at one blow, was Scotland deprived of uncle and nephew; two men who had rendered the most eminent services to the religious interests of their country, who, though widely different from one another in their intellectual features and general bearing, yet stood upon a par in regard to integrity and zeal and piety and self-denial. Not unaptly might they be designated, with reference to their peculiar qualities and their inestimable services, the sun and moon of the Scottish ecclesiastical sky in their day. The other six ministers, after presenting many entreaties in vain, were at length allowed to revisit Scotland, but they were not permitted to settle in their own parishes.* The treatment given to these men was every way worthy of their mean and dastardly oppressor. They were guilty of no crime; they were lured away from their native land under false pretences; detained in a neighbouring kingdom contrary to their own wishes; obliged to appear before a tribunal to which they owed no responsibility; and subjected to manifold insults and restraints. Surely, when the king invited them to a conference, he was bound by every principle of honour to send them home with all convenient speed? And so he would have done, if they had violated their consciences, and sold themselves to him as the instruments of his arbitrary and lawless oppression.†

So many of the leading ministers being now either in prison, or banished, or excluded from their parishes, it was considered a suitable time for attempting some further innovations upon the constitution of the Scottish Church.‡ Letters were addressed by his majesty to all the presbyteries, in which he informed them that a convention was to be held at Linlithgow on the 11th of December, to devise measures for promoting the peace of the Church; and so little regard was paid to their privileges, that the individuals were named whom they were to appoint as their representatives at that meeting. The spirit of the ministers was not yet so completely subdued, that the designs of the king could have been carried into effect, if a free election had been allowed. And, in fact, some of the presbyteries refused to give any commission to the persons pointed out by his majesty; but these individuals nevertheless received injunctions from the court to attend, whether their presbyteries authorised them or not. When this convention,§ thus constituted in utter defiance of all the principles of the presbyterian polity, met, not a little was said about the necessity of checking popery, and making adequate provision for ministers; but after these topics, which had been generally employed of late years to prepare the way for some new encroachment, were sufficiently discussed, the grand business was brought under the consideration of the meeting in the shape of an overture from his majesty, in which it was declared to be his "advice and pleasure," that until the time when papists should be repressed, and all disquietudes removed out of the Church, constant moderators should be appointed in all the presbyteries.* The most godly individuals, the gravest, and the meetest for government were to be selected for this office, and wherever there was a bishop within the bounds of a presbytery, he was to be placed in the chair of presidency. These propositions, however, were distasteful even to this meeting, although it consisted almost entirely of ministers named by the king himself. It was readily perceived that continued moderatorship was merely designed as a means of transferring the government of the Church to the bishops. They had already been recognised by act of parliament, and if they were now invested with the privilege of presiding at presbyteries, their authority would rest at once upon a civil and an ecclesiastical basis. Constant moderators, it was said, were the little thieves entering by the narrow windows, to open the doors to the great thieves.† With the view of obviating these objections, sundry caveats were suggested, such as that the moderators should be responsible to synods, and removable by them after trial; and the meeting was likewise solemnly assured, that neither had his majesty any intention to subvert the discipline of the Church, nor had the bishops any desire to tyrannise over their brethren. Hopes, too, were held out that his majesty's clemency would be extended to the ministers who were at present under restraint. In consequence of these various influences it was in the end almost unanimously agreed that the moderators of presbyteries should, in accordance with the king's desire, obtain a permanent tenure of office. It was presbyteries only that were at first mentioned by the king, and it was to them only the decision of the meeting at Linlithgow extended; but it was afterwards found when the act was published, that it placed synods and presbyteries upon the same footing, and assigned constant moderators to both classes of courts.‡ At first, too, the convention at Linlithgow was not designated a General Assembly, but afterwards, when it was found that the proposition of the king was agreed to, it received this title; and the change effected was thus represented as the act of the whole Church, while it is perfectly certain that an Assembly freely chosen by the different presbyteries would have come to a very different conclusion.§

The justice of this affirmation is obvious from the resistance which was made, both by synods and presbyteries, to the new mode of supplying them with moderators. And, in fact, James himself was perfectly sensible that the Church would never have freely consented to such a measure; for when informed of the decision adopted at Linlithgow, although he was highly gratified, yet he remarked that, notwithstanding the opinion given by the assembly that the act would be universally received, he knew the ministers too well to expect any such thing. Their conscientious zeal to maintain parity, and their desire to keep all things "in a state of volubility," as he expressed it, were such that they would never agree to a settled government. Besides, he knew that several of those who were nominated to the place of moderator would refuse to accept the office, lest they should be thought to affect superiority over their brethren. Therefore he desired the council to look to that business, and to direct charges as well to those who were nominated, to accept the moderatorships, as to the ministers of every presbytery to receive those appointed to them.* Accordingly the most strenuous resistance was given, both by the presbyteries and the synods, to the reception of the perpetual moderators named by the court. Many scenes of violence occurred. Ministers were put to the horn and imprisoned. Of all the synods, that of Angus was the only one which agreed to accept a perpetual moderator. Of the presbyteries, a number, after refusing to submit to the imposition, at length yielded. The bishops sedulously availed themselves of the means which they possessed for influencing the minds of individual ministers.† To them the modification of stipends was now committed, and thus they had it in their power to favour the submissive, and to distress those who resisted their will. Visitations of presbyteries too were undertaken, and efforts were made, by means of private intercourse with the ministers, to lull their suspicions asleep, and to secure their acquiescence in the king's views; and through these various appliances considerable progress was made in disarming opposition.

At length it was arranged that a conference should be held at Falkland on the 15th of July, 1608, preparatory to a meeting of the General Assembly, which it was hoped his majesty might now permit to proceed to business without proroguing it, as had so frequently been done of late years. The ministers, who first met by themselves, prepared certain articles with reference to the maintenance of the old discipline, which they presented to the bishops and commissioners; but they, although professing to be quite satisfied with them, yet assured the ministers that, unless they were considerably modified, there was every likelihood that his majesty would be displeased, and prorogue the General Assembly.‡ The necessity of concord, and the dangers with which the prevalence of popery threatened the country, were strongly insisted upon, and in the end it was agreed that the questions which were agitated among the ministers relating to matters of government, should remain untouched and unhandled on either side till the next General Assembly, and no occasion be given, by private or public speeches, of any further distraction of mind; but that, as brethren and ministers of Christ, they should use their common endeavours, especially in the pulpit, against papists, both as to their superstition in religion and their pernicious practices. It was also considered proper that the General Assembly should meet at the time appointed, and that his majesty should be most humbly entreated to sanction the meeting. And it was even agreed that nothing at present controverted, or causing strife in the Church, should be discussed in said assembly; but that such matters should be handled in a private conference by suitable persons nominated "to prepare a way" for composing these differences. The assembly itself should appoint a meeting of some brethren at such time, place, and manner as they judged fit.*

As the conference at Falkland had thus pledged themselves not to introduce matters of policy at the General Assembly, it was now considered safe that a meeting of the supreme court should take place, and accordingly it was held at Linlithgow on the 26th of July. Above forty noblemen and gentlemen attended in obedience to his majesty's direction, and claimed the privilege of voting, which, after a feeble resistance on the part of the friends of constitutional order, was conceded to them.† For the first time since the Reformation, in calling the roll the names of bishops were separated from those of ministers, and mentioned first, and thus their precedence, though not formally allowed, was tacitly sanctioned. Much time was occupied with discussions regarding the causes of the increase of popery, and the best means of arresting its progress. It was found that the Earl of Huntley, notwithstanding all his promises, continued the same practices which had formerly occasioned so much disturbance, and therefore it was agreed that he should once more be excommunicated.‡ These proceedings occupied so much time, that hardly any was left for the transaction of other business. It was agreed, therefore, that the differences with regard to the government and discipline of the Church should not be considered at present; that the brethren should all pledge themselves to cultivate Christian affection towards one another, and to cast away all grudges and rancour; and that certain persons should be appointed to meet privately, for the purpose of deliberating upon disputed points, and preparing a report to be submitted to the next meeting of the General Assembly. A commission was likewise given to a large number of brethren, among whom all the bishops were included, to hold correspondence with his majesty in regard to the suppression of popery, and to provide with ministers such churches as either were or might become vacant before next assembly.* Any eleven of them were empowered to act, and thus they were virtually entrusted with the whole power of the Church, to the utter subversion of the presbyterian system.†

In this assembly the bishops laid the foundation of their ecclesiastical power. It is true no act was passed recognising their superiority to other ministers, but they were, in fact, allowed to assume the chief direction of affairs, whilst all questions of church policy were carefully pushed aside, and committed to the consideration of a private committee.‡ The names and official designations of the bishops were engrossed in the minutes of the assembly, and they were constituted, along with some other individuals, a committee for the general superintendence of ecclesiastical interests: nor was it an unimportant circumstance that a precedent was established for always naming them before other ministers, whether in calling the roll or in arranging committees. Their apparent zeal, too, for peace and brotherly love§ was calculated to make an impression upon many, who did not reflect that the peace which they were so loud in extolling, was just the quiet submission of the Church to the encroachments which they themselves, as the instruments of the king's arbitrary authority, were continually making upon her constitution. It is easy for those to cry "Peace, peace!" who want to continue their aggressions without being troubled with opposition.

Another conference was held at Falkland on the 4th of May, 1609, between the bishops and the ministers appointed at the late assembly, to consider questions relating to the policy of the Church.|| It was urgently pressed by the bishops that the plan of appointing constant moderators to presbyteries and synods should be everywhere adopted and acted upon without any further opposition, and also that the cautions employed to limit the powers of the episcopal office should be dispensed with, as altogether unnecessary. But the ministers could not be brought, by all the arts and persuasions which were employed, to acquiesce in these proposals, and therefore the final settlement of them was postponed, in the hope that the aspect of affairs might be more propitious at some other time. Similar success attended another meeting held at Stirling in August.¶ But if checked for a moment in one direction, the bishops received ample compensation in another; for the parliament which met in June agreed to restore to them the civil jurisdiction which they had possessed in popish times.* And shortly afterwards the king himself, without consulting parliament, extended their power still further by trans-planting to Scotland the abominable courts of high commission, which had been productive of so much misery in England during the reigns of Henry and Elizabeth. The two archbishops of St. Andrew's and Glasgow were authorised, by an act of council under the great seal, to hold such courts in their respective provinces, and thus they were invested with higher powers than had ever belonged to the episcopal order in popish times. Several bishops and laymen were associated with the archbishops, and any five of them were empowered to act, provided an archbishop were among them.† Their own discretion was their sole law. Whatever persons they were pleased to consider scandalous in life or religion, they were empowered to summon before them, and, after a trial not protected by the usual safeguards of law, they might order them to be excommunicated, or oppress them by fines and imprisonment. They were particularly instructed, too, to observe the conduct of all ministers and public instructors, whether in schools or colleges, and to bring them to punishment for any impertinent words which they might utter in public.‡ Nothing more odious or oppressive, or more alien to the spirit of a free country could be imagined. Yet this change, which equally affected men in their civil and religious relations, was introduced by a monarch who was continually declaring that he had no intention to alter the existing order of things. Of how little value the king's word must by this time have become in Scotland there can be no difficulty in conceiving. If one wilful lie destroys all confidence in a man, the repeated falsehoods and habitual deceptions of James must have produced in every honourable mind a feeling of loathing at the very mention of his name.§

High courts of commission established.

Large strides had now been made by the king towards the destruction of the presbyterian polity, and the erection of the episcopal system upon its ruins; and he not unnaturally concluded that he might be able, by means of the undue influence which he had acquired over the church-courts, to bring the long-contemplated change to a state of completion. It was therefore determined that a General Assembly should be summoned, so that the Church herself might appear to effect the alterations with her own hand. A free General Assembly, however, could not have served the purpose, and therefore his majesty repeated the experiment which, successful as it had been formerly, recent changes now rendered more certain than ever to succeed, of prescribing to the presbyteries the individuals whom they should appoint to represent them.* In his missive to the presbyteries, he requires them to make choice of the most wise, discreet, and peaceably-disposed ministers among them; and as they might perhaps be at a loss to know who these were, he mentions that he had furnished the Archbishop of St. Andrew's with a special note of the names of those whom he desired to attend, and expressed it to be his pleasure that they would conform themselves to his views, and choose the persons whom he took to be fittest for giving advice. Nor was this all;—money was distributed where it was supposed likely to be most effective; and thus was the attempt made to rob not only the Church of her privileges, but also the ministers of their character.† So notorious was this distribution of money that even Spottiswood acknowledges it, and owns that it was stigmatized by the zealous presbyterians as bribery, though he himself represents it as the payment of just debts. And part of it, no doubt, consisted of what had been promised to constant moderators four years before; but much of it, also, was the price of subserviency to the king's will. On this ground it is, and not on account of the superior sanctity of its members, that this assembly has sometimes been designated the "Angelical Assembly"‡—angels being the coins that were distributed, to persuade where argument might have failed. With the view, too, of influencing the ministers present, an appeal was made to their hopes and fears; for the king's letter, which professed much zeal for religion, and claimed credit for condescending to call this assembly, concluded with stating that he intended, under the guidance of the reports of the Earl of Dunbar and the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, "to take special notice of every one's affection and forwardness in this service, and thereupon to acknowledge and remember them hereafter, as any fit occasion for their good shall occur."§

It is plain that a meeting so convened, and subjected to influences of such a character, could not be considered as at all expressing the mind of the people of Scotland. It did not even express the opinions of its own members—they merely gave a reluctant assent to the propositions which were brought under their notice. And it is quite certain that the king, when he used such influences to mould the meeting to his views, and that too when so many of the leading ministers were either imprisoned or banished, and the terrors of the courts of high commission were suspended over the rest, knew perfectly that he was running in direct opposition to the convictions of the whole body of the nation.

The measures adopted by this assembly were such as might have been expected from its constitution, and the circumstances in which it met. They were discussed in private conference, and then proposed in open court for adoption, not one after another, but all in a body; and the whole meeting, with the exception of five individuals, voted for them. The assembly held at Aberdeen in 1605 was declared unlawful. The power of calling general assemblies was declared to be a prerogative of the crown. Bishops were constituted moderators of synods. No sentence of excommunication was to be pronounced against any person without the knowledge and approbation of the bishop of the diocese, who was to be answerable to his majesty for the formality of the proceedings. All presentations for the future were to be directed to the bishop of the diocese, who, after satisfying himself by means of testimonials and examination with regard to the character and abilities of the presentee, was to take the assistance of the ministers of the district, and then complete the whole act of ordination. In cases of deposition, the bishop was to associate with himself the ministers of the neighbourhood, and after trying the cause, and finding just ground, he was to pronounce sentence. Every minister, at his admission, was to swear obedience to his majesty as the only lawful supreme governor of the realm, as well in things temporal as in the conservation and purgation of religion, and to do homage for the emoluments of his benefice as held in tenure from his majesty and crown royal of the realm. The visitation of dioceses was to be the work of the bishops, or of individuals appointed by them; and all ministers absenting themselves without just cause from their visitation or diocesan assembly, were to be suspended, and failing amendment, ultimately deprived. The weekly exercise of doctrine was to be continued by the ministers at their meeting, the bishop acting as moderator, or some one appointed by him. Bishops were to be subject in regard to life, conversation, office, and benefice, to the censure of the General Assembly, and being found culpable, they might, with his majesty's advice and consent, be deprived. No bishop was to be elected under forty years of age, nor of less than ten years active service in the ministry. No minister, either in the pulpit or in public exercise, was to impugn or disobey the acts of the present assembly, under the penalty of deprivation; and particularly the question of equality or inequality in the ministry was not to be discussed in the pulpit under the same penalty.*

These decisions, it is obvious, overthrew almost entirely the presbyterian scheme of polity. Indeed, the very word presbytery had become odious to the king, and the use of it was discouraged among the ministers, who were instructed to employ such phrases as, the ministers of the bounds, or the brethren of the exercise; and, in fact, there was now no presbytery possessed of an independent power of judgment, and free to act according to its own views. The ministers of the bounds were entirely under the control of the bishops.*

The work of transforming the Presbyterian Church into an episcopal hierarchy, which had so long engrossed the king's thoughts, and in the prosecution of which he had acted with so much duplicity and falsehood, was now nearly completed. Another step was soon taken, in regard to which it was not considered requisite to consult the General Assembly at all, nor any presbyterian court, although it was a measure which most vitally affected the character of the Church, and ought on no account to have been even thought of without her express sanction. The mysterious virtues of episcopal ordination were not yet possessed by the Scottish bishops, and none of the ministers therefore were conceived by James to be rightly ordained at all—their consecration to office having been merely the work of presbyters. In order to remedy this radical defect, which was regarded by some as placing the Christians of Scotland in the anomalous position of having a religion without a Church, his majesty summoned Spottiswood, and two of his episcopal associates, to London,† that they might receive the hallowing touch of the English bishops, and then carry home with them the ethereal virtue thus obtained, to diffuse its influence among the ministers of Scotland. An objection was started to this course by the Scottish bishops, on the ground that some colour might thus be afforded for the old claim of superiority on the part of the English Church over that of Scotland; but the king declared that he had sufficiently guarded against the danger, by excluding the Archbishops of Canterbury and York from all share in the ceremonial, and confiding it to the Bishops of London, Ely, and Bath. Another difficulty now presented itself to the mind of the Bishop of Ely, who conceived that as the Scottish bishops had never received episcopal ordination to the ministry, it would be requisite to ordain them twice, first as presbyters, and secondly as bishops; but his Grace of Canterbury removed this obstacle by declaring that where there were no bishops, ordination by presbyters ought to be recognised as valid. Heylin says his argument was, that the higher rank of bishop included the lower one of presbyter, and that consequently ordination to the episcopal office was all that was needed in the present case.‡ And accordingly the three Scottish bishops were ordained with all the requisite solemnities, and thus elevated to a position of spiritual authority, which it was conceived nothing in Scotland could give them. This was a far wider departure from the principles of the Reformed Churches than even the violent changes which had already been effected. It set aside, or at least depreciated, the validity of the orders of every minister in Scotland from the days of Knox. It seemed to imply that there had never been any right administration of Christian ordinances in any part of the country. For the first time a proper Church was now to be planted in the land; and the ministers, hitherto mere preachers without adequate warrant or authority, were to be changed into channels for the communication of grace. And what was worst of all, and most insulting to the Christians of Scotland, the whole of the steps with regard to this grave question were taken, without its being considered in the slightest degree necessary to consult the persons whom it most intimately concerned. The bishops were inoculated in London, on the sole authority of the king, with what was considered in Scotland as the virus of superstition, and then they were sent home to spread the plague over the length and breadth of their native land. A more short-sighted policy it is difficult to imagine. The direct tendency of it was to fill the country with abhorrence of those very bishops whom the king wished to recommend and uphold.*

Two years elapsed before the changes made by the General Assembly at Glasgow were ratified by act of parliament. This delay did not arise from any difficulty or obstacle which impeded the progress of the king's designs, but the parliament which met in October, 1612, was the first which it was considered necessary to summon. On this occasion, the conclusions which had been adopted by the ecclesiastical authorities were brought before the legislature, that they might receive the civil sanction also; and they were all ratified without hesitation, and thus became part of the law of the land. Before being submitted to parliament, however, they were altered in a variety of particulars, and made in all respects more agreeable to the bishops. The act passed at Glasgow placed the bishops under the authority of the General Assembly, prescribed the age of forty as the earliest at which episcopal functions could be undertaken, enjoined the continuance of the weekly exercise of doctrine, and entrusted to the ministers the task of certifying to the bishops the qualifications of those applying for ordination; † but these provisions were all omitted from the assembly's act as presented to parliament for ratification. On the other hand, various points were introduced into the measure on its way from the assembly to the legislature, of which the Church was by no means disposed to approve. The parliament empowered the bishops to depute others to moderate for them in synods, authorised them to dispose on lease of portions of their benefices without being liable to the charge of simony, and allowed appeal to be made from any bishop who refused to admit a qualified person to the archbishop, and ultimately to the lords of session; but none of these points were embraced in the act as it was passed by the assembly at Glasgow. And besides such omissions and insertions, not a few features of the General Assembly's decision were changed, as, for example, the oath of allegiance to be taken by a minister at the time of his ordination. Instead of the words "conservation and purgation of religion," employed by the assembly to describe the king's duty with regard to the Church, the phrase "matters spiritual and ecclesiastical" is used, which was conceived to have a wider amplitude of meaning; and, conjoined with the oath of allegiance, there stands in the act of parliament the new matter of an oath of submission to the bishop of the diocese and his successors.* Now in all this there was manifest bad faith. The thing pretended was, that parliament was merely giving a civil sanction to what the Church had already agreed to; but instead of this, the legislature affixed the stamp of its authority to very different regulations, as if these had received the approbation of the Church. And besides thus positively sanctioning the authority and power of the bishops in ecclesiastical matters, the parliament completed the work of demolishing the presbyterian system by repealing the famous act of 1592, which had always been regarded as the great charter of the Church, erected in Scotland with so much toil and difficulty.†

Thus at length was the presbyterian system abolished, and prelacy established in its room. And no man, be his views of church government what they may, can deny that the change was effected in utter contempt of the wishes and convictions of the nation, and by means of the most disgusting duplicity, and the most oppressive tyranny. The king continued for years to repeat without a blush the declaration that he had no design to make any change on the ecclesiastical polity of the country; and yet change succeeded change with all the rapidity which was practicable. That obstacles might be removed out of the way, large numbers of the most influential and able ministers were imprisoned, or banished, or forbidden to appear in church courts—really on account of their devoted attachment to presbyterian principles, but professedly on account of proceedings which it was ridiculous to call crimes. And when General Assemblies were summoned to sanction some contemplated innovation, only those ministers were allowed to attend whom the king chose to name. Falsehood, fraud, and tyranny, were the foundation upon which episcopacy was reared in Scotland; and when the facts connected with its establishment are kept in view, it cannot appear surprising that it should have become to Scotch minds the object of an abhorrence and detestation, which remain to this day deep-seated in the nation's heart, the lapse of two centuries having failed to remove these feelings. The ministers have sometimes been blamed for acting so as to disgust the king at an early period with their pretensions, and thus themselves exciting the desire in his bosom for an ecclesiastical revolution. Be it so. Their faults will never justify the wilful falsehoods, and acts of oppression, by which James sought to accomplish his designs. Yes, the ministers had faults. Their leading error was that they did not exactly perceive where the line separating civil from sacred things should be drawn. But were they alone in this? Did not the same error exist in James himself in a far more aggravated form? What sacred thing did he consider beyond his control? And were the bishops blameless? Their courts of high commission mingled the civil with the sacred in a way which the poor presbyterian ministers had never dreamed of. The real fault of the ministers, whom James so relentlessly persecuted, was that they would not lend themselves as the tools of his tyranny.* They were men devotedly attached to the civil liberties of their country. Not the will of the monarch, but law was with them the supreme rule. But the avowed doctrine of James was that laws were not for kings, but only for subjects. This was all along the radical difference between the king and the presbyterian ministers. Even in the case of Huntley, where modern sympathies are most apt to be enlisted on the side of the king, they stood upon the undoubted law of the case, and James's view was an illegal plan of his own, which though it pleases us from its resemblance to toleration, was yet essentially different in principle. The ministers were men whose whole souls were engrossed with the highest interests of the community.† There was a rare abnegation in all their procedure of selfish ends. They were not courtly; they were plain-spoken. In their view, sin wore the aspect of sin, by whomsoever committed; and the fact that so many of them chose dungeons, and poverty, and exile, rather than the high preferment which was offered to them, on condition of acceding to the king's views, shows that they were men of most exalted soul and unimpeachable integrity. Andrew Melvil had only to say the word, and he would have been Archbishop of St. Andrew's, or primate of all Scotland; but he rather chose to lie a prisoner in the Tower of London, oppressed by the infirmities of age, and the diseases incident to close confinement. James must have been "meanest of mankind" not to admire the grandeur of such conduct, and one of the blindest not to perceive that the man by whom it was displayed was a true friend of his country, and fitted to shed lustre even upon the throne of his sovereign.

In the decisions adopted at the assembly in Glasgow, it had been implied that the supreme council of the Church should meet annually; but as the sole power of calling such meetings was vested in the king as part of his royal prerogative, this was obviously a provision of no practical value; and, in fact, all reference to it was omitted from the enactment, as ratified by parliament in 1612.* The king was left to call meetings just as seldom or as frequently as he pleased; nor was it of the least importance whether he called them or not, for no free discussion was ever allowed to take place at them, nor were the presbyteries permitted to choose their own representatives. Indeed, the friends of the Church must rather have deprecated such General Assemblies as had been held in recent years; and the announcement that one was in contemplation, which formerly would have been hailed with universal delight, must now have been regarded with suspicion, as the signal for some new encroachment. The king, however, was satisfied for the present with the great progress which he had made in carrying out his designs, and therefore he did not consider it advisable to appoint any meeting till the year 1616.†

During the interval the bishops consolidated their power, and effected such changes by their own authority as they conceived they might venture upon. But they made no progress in disarming the hostility which was cherished against their order, nor did they seem to care much for the good opinion of the nation, if they only succeeded in pleasing the king. Looking to the court as the only source of dignity and influence, they treated their inferiors with haughty disdain, and were at all times ready to defend the worst measures of the king, and to aid in carrying them into effect. They were observed, too, to be comparatively inattentive to religious ordinances; and it is reported of Spottiswood that his journeys to court were generally commenced on the Lord's-day, during the time of public worship, to the great disgust of all religious people.‡

Episcopal authority was now firmly established in Scotland, and presbyteries and synods were entirely under their control. Still the modes of worship followed in the churches were nearly the same as formerly, and the change therefore which had taken place, great as it was, did not continually obtrude itself upon the public view. The king, however, became desirous that the Scottish Church should be assimilated in all respects to the Church of England; and the bishops felt themselves bound to aid him in effecting this transmutation. Holidays had always been lightly valued by the Scottish Reformers, it being considered that the Lord's-day was the only portion of time which there was any warrant for regarding as sacred; and these views universally prevailed among the people. But what were the convictions of others to a king who conceived that his own will was entitled to absolute and universal submission? His majesty determined to trample under foot the feelings and scruples of his subjects. Upon the 4th of March, 1614, proclamation was made at the Cross of Edinburgh commanding the ministers to prepare the people for the observance of Easter; and all were enjoined to communicate on that day at their own parish churches. The same proclamation, too, was repeated the following year, with the addition that the communion was to be celebrated at Easter in all time coming. These mandates created extreme dissatisfaction in all quarters, both because they ran in direct opposition to the feelings of the nation, and also because the innovation was introduced by the arbitrary authority of the king, without any colour of law.*

It was during the summer of this year that Spottiswood was translated to St. Andrew's, and inaugurated as archbishop of that see; and shortly after his installation the two courts of high commission were united into one, and placed under his authority as primate of Scotland, and that of the bishop of Glasgow, conjointly and severally. It had been found that the two courts interfered with each other's proceedings, and were not possessed of sufficient influence and authority. The one court now constituted consisted of a large number of individuals, any five of whom were empowered to act, provided an archbishop were present; and they were authorised to fine or imprison at their discretion for whatever seemed to them faulty in life or religion, it being at the peril of captains of castles, or keepers of jails, to disregard a warrant under their hand.†

An interval of six years had now elapsed since any General Assembly was held. The ostensible reason for the one which was appointed to take place at Aberdeen on the 13th of August, 1616, was the great increase of popery, particularly in the northern parts of the kingdom; but the real object of the meeting was, that some additional changes which the king was desirous of effecting might receive an ecclesiastical sanction. The reference to popery afforded a good reason for fixing upon Aberdeen as the place of meeting; and Aberdeen was the most suitable of all places for mustering those ministers who were likely to support the schemes of his majesty.‡ The bishops were now the supreme rulers in the Church, presbyteries and synods possessing no real or independent power; but there were still many features, and those, too, more patent to the eye than the constitution of the church courts, which distinguished the Scottish establishment from that of England. James, however, was determined that all such distinctions should be swept away,* and for this purpose it was requisite that a liturgy should be introduced into Scotland, that holidays should be observed, that confirmation and other religious rites should be practised. A small trial had already been made with regard to Easter, but the impatience of his majesty was not satisfied with isolated triumphs. He wished the whole Church at once to adopt a variety of new regulations; and a meeting of the General Assembly, if its members were properly selected, seemed the most expeditious method of securing this result.†

When the assembly met the Archbishop of St. Measures adopted at Aberdeen. Andrew's took the chair without election, as a dignity pertaining to his high office. Four days were occupied in devising measures for the suppression of popery; and, at length, the instructions of his majesty with regard to the discipline and policy of the Church were brought under consideration. Nothing like freedom of debate was allowed.‡ The moderator asked the opinions of such persons as he chose, and others were prevented from delivering their sentiments. "How can we either vote or speak here freely, having the king's guard standing behind our backs?"§ was whispered to one another by those who were dissatisfied with the proceedings. A new Confession of Faith was adopted, embodying the same doctrinal principles as the two former confessions, but omitting the peculiar features of the presbyterian polity. It was ordained that a liturgy and form of divine service should be prepared, to be read in all the churches every Sabbath-day, that the common people might learn it, and by custom serve God rightly. For the purpose of securing a uniformity of discipline, it was also agreed that a book of canons should be composed, gathered from the decisions of former assemblies, and where these were defective, from the canons of councils and ecclesiastical conventions of former ages. This important and delicate task was confided to a committee, who were to present the result of their labours to the commissioners of the General Assembly; and they were authorised, if they were satisfied with the document, to transmit it to his majesty for his sanction. The celebration of the communion at Easter was made imperative, and regulations were adopted with regard to the examination of children by archbishops and bishops in their visitations, with the view of preparing the way for the English rite of confirmation.||

When the proceedings of the assembly were His majesty's reported to his majesty by the view of the Archbishop of Glasgow, and the proceedings. Bishop of Ross, he expressed his satisfaction with everything that had been done, excepting the act with regard to children, which he characterised as a "hotch-potch," that was altogether deficient in transparency.* At the same time he sent down to Scotland some additional regulations, having reference to holidays, kneeling at the communion, private dispensation of the two sacraments, and the confirmation of children, which he ordered to be inserted among the canons of the Church.† A representation, however, being made to him by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's of the difficulty of admitting his articles, as they had never at any period been proposed to the Church, he consented to their withdrawal for the present; but signified his purpose of taking measures at the time of his approaching visit to Scotland to satisfy scrupulous consciences, and to obtain the Church's consent to his proposals.‡ Thus the bishops were solicitous that the forms at least of liberty should be preserved; they knew that the course proposed by his majesty would excite to extreme dissatisfaction; they recognised the principle that nothing should be made a law of the Church, to which her own consent had not at some period or other been accorded. But what was the value to the Church of the privilege of being consulted, when the presbyteries were not allowed freely to choose their own representatives; when the members of assembly were frowned upon if they ventured to utter one word in opposition to the views of the king; and when they could not meet unless they were summoned together by his majesty? The king's present plan of forcing laws upon the Church without asking her consent, and the bishops' plan of obliging her to give her consent by threats and intimidation, by the invasion of her meetings, and the exclusion of all independent men from them, were not very materially different. They resemble two robbers, of whom the one boldly rifles the person of his victim without uttering a word, while the other, with bludgeon in hand, asks him to be so good as to empty his own pockets.

During his majesty's visit to Scotland, in the summer of 1617, a meeting of parliament took place. Before leaving England he had written to the council, commanding them, because he knew that evil-disposed persons would spread unfavourable rumours, to issue a proclamation that it was not his purpose to make any changes in the civil or ecclesiastical state of the kingdom. Yet, even after this public announcement, he wished parliament to enact that whatsoever project was adopted by his majesty, with the advice of the archbishops and bishops, in matters of external polity, should have the power and strength of an ecclesiastical law:§ so little was James in the habit of considering that adherence to the truth, or fidelity to promises, formed any part of the duty of a king!

This proposal excited universal alarm, as it was considered that such an act would sweep away the last fragment of the liberties of the Church. The very bishops themselves were averse to it; and through their persuasion James consented that mention should be made, not only of archbishops and bishops, but also of a competent number of the ministry.* But this addition afforded nothing like an effective safeguard, for it remained with the king to determine what a competent number of the ministry was, and also to select the individuals whom he should invite to his counsels. It was therefore determined by a number of ministers, who were desirous of preventing the Church from being reduced to abject and hopeless bondage, to present a protestation to his majesty; and they persisted in their purpose, although the bishops endeavoured to dissuade them by assuring them that no advantage would be taken of the act, to introduce anything without their consent.† This protestation, which was expressed in firm yet respectful language, and signed by more than fifty ministers, had the effect of preventing the proposed measure from being passed into a law; for the king himself threw aside the bill, when it was presented along with a number of others for final ratification, not out of deference to the wishes of his people, but because he considered it prejudicial to his prerogative to be obliged to take advice from any quarter.‡

Although the protestation of the ministers was successful in preventing the obnoxious measure, against which it was directed, from being passed into a law, and thus saved for a time the liberties of the Church, yet it brought much trouble upon some of the persons connected with it. The king was enraged against them. Simpson, who had acted as clerk, was imprisoned in the Castle of Edinburgh.§ David Calderwood, to whom the paper containing the names of those who approved of the protestation had been confided, was also summoned before the court of high commission at St. Andrew's. Sentence of suspension having been pronounced against him, he denied the competency of the court, on the ground that it had received no authority from the Church, and therefore he declared that he would not submit to its decision. The king suggested that if he would not submit to be suspended spiritually, he should be suspended corporally; and the Archbishop of St. Andrew's declared that he deserved to be hanged as well as Ogilvie the Jesuit. But as all these threats failed, to induce him to withdraw his declinature of the ecclesiastical authority of the high commission, he was at length banished from the realm, and thus the country was deprived of the services of a very distinguished and excellent man.||

Shortly after the dissolution of parliament a meeting took place at St. Andrew's Meetings at between the king and the bishops, St. Andrew's. with a number of the ministers. His majesty spoke with great severity of the opposition which had been given to the articles inserted by him, among the canons of the Church, and stated that he had summoned them together for the purpose of hearing what their objections to these articles were. "I mean not to do anything against reason; and on the other part, my demands being just and religious, you must not think that I will be refused or resisted. It is an innate power and prerogative of Christian kings to order and dispose external things in the polity of the Church as we, by the advice of our bishops, shall think most fitting; and for your approving or disapproving, deceive not yourselves, I will never regard it, unless you bring me a reason I cannot answer."* These words produced an appalling effect upon the whole meeting. Falling down upon their knees, they besought his majesty to allow them to confer with one another before they returned an answer to his demand; and after having met by themselves for two hours, they petitioned him to call a General Assembly, and expressed the persuasion that his articles would be adopted in it, and thus become ecclesiastical law by common consent. A General Assembly accordingly was appointed to meet at St. Andrew's in November. Meanwhile, no pains were spared by the bishops to prepare for this meeting; they used every means of securing the attendance of individuals disposed to comply with the king's views; but all their efforts were unavailing. The assembly could not be brought to agree to the proposals of James; instead of rejecting them, however, they modified some of them, and delayed the consideration of the rest till another assembly.†

This issue of a meeting, which the king had been led to believe would ratify all he Despotie desired, filled him with indigna- conduct of the tion. He wrote in great wrath to king. the archbishop; he scornfully rejected the modifications of two of the points to which the assembly had agreed; he commanded them to take measures for securing the observance of Christmas on pain of incurring his highest displeasure; and he ordered the council to withhold stipend from every minister who refused to conform to the articles which he had desired the assembly to adopt. A proclamation too was issued, ordering that all men should observe not only Christmas, but also Good Friday, Easter, Ascension-day, and Whitsunday, under pain of being denounced as rebels and despisers of his majesty's authority.‡

These demonstrations made it plain that the king was determined to carry his purpose; and they shook the resolution of many who had refused to concur with his articles at the late assembly.

Meanwhile the bishops used every means in their power to prevail upon the ministers to relinquish their opposition; and when the success of their efforts became apparent in the quietness with which the meetings of the several synods took place, they ventured to propose to his majesty that an assembly should be appointed to meet at Perth in August, at which they fully anticipated that all his articles would be adopted.*

Accordingly the royal sanction was procured for General a meeting, which took place on the Assembly at twenty-fifth day of August. It
 Perth. was numerously attended by noblemen and barons in the king's interest, who were all allowed to vote, although they had no regular commission from the Church.† The Archbishop of St. Andrew's, of his own accord, stepped into the moderator's chair; and when George Crier, minister of Haddington, ventured to suggest that it should be filled by election, according to the law and practice of the Church, he was interrupted by the archbishop, who declared that, as they were met within the bounds of his charge, it was his undoubted privilege to preside, and he would allow no one to displace him. The noblemen, barons, bishops, burgesses, and doctors, were seated at a long table; his majesty's commissioners and the moderator at a short table, set across the end of the long one; and the ministers were allowed to stand behind, as if they had been merely spectators. His majesty's letter was read twice. It was a most insulting communication. It arrogated to the king the innate power from God of arranging all external matters connected with the Church, in whatever way he judged most convenient and profitable; it demanded from the assembly a simple and direct acceptance of his articles just as they stood; and it declared that he would be satisfied with no excuses, delays, or mitigations. He had received many provocations from them already, and therefore he cautioned them against provoking him further. He expected an humble submission to the just demands which he was now making. The reading of this letter was followed by a speech from the archbishop, in which he set forth the dreadful consequences which must ensue from the wrath of the king, if they refused to enrol his articles among the canons of the Church. The whole estate and order of the Kirk would be overthrown; some ministers would be banished, others deprived of stipend and office, and all would be exposed to the royal displeasure. "Oh! I know when some of you are banished, and others deprived, you will blame us, and call us persecutors; but we will lay all the burden upon the king, and if you call him a persecutor all the world will stand up against you."‡

pose of bringing him a particular account of all that was done. The dean delivered a long speech, full of flattering laudations of James—the matchless mirror of all kings, the nursing father of God's Church; and he laboured hard to prove that duty to God, loyalty to the king, and a regard to their own wellbeing, temporal and spiritual, alike required them heartily to adopt the articles which his majesty wished inserted among the canons of their Church.*

Some feeble efforts were made by those who were opposed to the articles to introduce His majesty's articles a full and free discussion of their merits; but the archbishop was adopted. determined to apply a tight bridle to all liberty of speech. The merits of the articles, it was said, were to be canvassed in a "privy conference;" and the moderator himself at once proceeded, without asking the assembly's advice, to nominate the individuals who should take part in this consultation. As was to be expected, the articles were sanctioned at this meeting as proper to be adopted by the assembly. When the court resumed its sitting, those who were opposed to what the privy conference had done made an effort to state their sentiments, but they were so vexatiously interrupted, that they found it impossible to proceed; and when they presented a written document explanatory of their views, only a few sentences of it were read, and then it was thrown aside. In vain they besought the moderator that the decision might be delayed till their reasons were transmitted to his majesty, and an answer came back from him. They were assured that out of the house they should not go till the business was concluded. The articles were not proposed for adoption singly, but as a whole, and the refusal of one of them was declared equivalent to the refusal of them all. When the vote was about to be taken, the question was thrown into this shape, Will you consent to these articles, or disobey the king? and the moderator did not blush to say, that whoever voted against the articles should have his name reported to his majesty. And accordingly he stood with the roll in his hand marking the votes; and ever and anon he exclaimed, when any voter seemed in doubt, "Have the king in your mind! Look to the king!"† A voting so conducted proved nothing but the tyranny and shamelessness of those who could condescend to such mean arts. The decision might be exhibited as the judgment of the Church; but it remained as alien from her mind, as if nothing in the name of an assembly had ever adopted it. The articles of the king were carried by a considerable majority; but there were forty-five ministers who had the courage to vote against them, in spite of all the arts of seduction and intimidation which were employed. And the names of William Scott, John Carmichael, John Weems, and Alexander Henrison, are worthy of being held in honour on account of the lead which they took, in opposing enactments that were forced upon the Church with such total disregard of the views at once of her ministers and members.

The articles thus adopted at Perth, and therefore commonly designated the five articles of Perth, occupy a conspicuous place in Scottish ecclesiastical history. They enjoined kneeling at the communion, the observance of five holidays, and episcopal confirmation; and they also authorised the private dispensation both of baptism and of the Lord's Supper.* After being adopted by the assembly, they were ratified by the secret council; and proclamation was made, not only at the market cross of Edinburgh, but in all the leading boroughs, that all men were to yield implicit obedience to them. Those who violated them in any respect were to be considered despisers of the royal authority, and punished in their persons and goods with all rigour and extremity. They were introduced under the pretext of honouring God, and adding solemnity to religious ordinances; but they became an engine of grievous oppression, and gave rise to many scenes which were a disgrace to religion. The powers of the court of high commission were actively brought into play to enforce them. Many ministers were deprived of their offices; some were thrown into prison; and some were banished. But these proceedings only augmented the intense dissatisfaction with which the Perth articles were regarded by the whole country. The ministers of Edinburgh were for the most part under the influence of the bishops, and therefore wished to celebrate the communion agreeably to the king's wishes; but the bulk of the people were determined against compliance, and multitudes of them absented themselves from their own churches, and attended others where the services were conducted according to the old form. Great contention thus arose in the churches of the metropolis. The ministers, the elders, and the people, were divided into factions, and many disgraceful scenes were exhibited.† Similar contentions prevailed in other parts of the country, and everywhere many were punished for neglecting the new regulations. Prisons were filled with men chargeable with no crime, but that of refusing to kneel at the Lord's table, which they considered as countenancing the Romish doctrine of the real presence.‡ A greater prostitution of the magistrate's office it is hardly possible to imagine.

Yet the strife and tumult and confusion with which the kingdom was thus filled, in consequence of the attempt to enforce the Perth articles, never once suggested to James a doubt as to the policy of the course which he was pursuing. In his view the source of all the mischief, so destructive to his own peace, and so ruinous to the country, was the wilful stubbornness of the people, who would not obey the commands of their lawful sovereign. And the only remedy which he could think of, was augmented severity in punishing the violations of his own bigoted and unchristian impositions. It cannot be pleaded in his defence that he was urged on by sincere, though mistaken religious zeal. His ruling principle was, that his subjects were bound to believe and obey whatever he, as prince, was pleased to command. It was not the idea that he was upholding God's authority which made him a persecutor, but it was the determination to enforce his own will. He was not misled by religious fanaticism, but by the extravagant and insane notions which he entertained of the extent of the royal prerogative. He viewed the ceremonies which he enforced so rigidly as indifferent in themselves, and therefore he considered that others were bound to observe them at his command, although they might conscientiously believe them to be altogether opposed to God's will.*

After the lapse of three years, during which many individuals suffered severely for their refusal to comply with the Perth articles, they were brought before parliament for ratification, that they might be armed with all the authority of the Estates of the realm. Most disgraceful methods were employed to influence the decision of the legislature. Individuals who were known to be opposed to the king's views were tampered with in private, and all kinds of arguments were used to remove their hostility. Sir John Hamilton, Laird of Preston, having at the meeting of the lords of articles expressed disapprobation of the new ritual, the Bishop of Dunblane and Lord Scone were successively sent to him; but he declared to them that he would not, for any consideration, deliberately offend God, and thus make to himself a hell in his own conscience. The secretary next requested that at least he would absent himself; but he refused, declaring that he would stay and bear witness to the truth, though his life should be the forfeit. These words drew forth the threatening reply, "We shall make both you and your minister repent this." A number of ministers, deeply interested in the present posture of affairs, having come to Edinburgh, in order to consult what steps should be taken, they were charged with neglecting their own flocks, and commanded, by proclamation at the Cross, instantly to leave the town. They had prepared a protestation to be presented to parliament; but sentinels were stationed at the doors with strict orders to prevent all ministers from entering, excepting such as could exhibit a written permission from a bishop. David Barclay, minister of St. Andrew's, who was entrusted with the protestation, by some means or other eluded observation, and reached "the uttermost bar,"† where he waited half an hour, in the hope that he might be able to overcome this last obstacle too; but he was noticed in the end, and expelled into the street. In these circumstances he did all that was possible, affixing one copy of the document upon the door of the parliament-house, and another upon the Cross.*

The business was introduced by the grand commissioner, the Marquis of Hamilton, who earnestly urged parliament to ratify the five articles of Perth, assuring them that nothing under heaven could be so acceptable to his majesty, and promising that no additional ceremonies should be imposed during the king's life. He declared that the five articles were things indifferent in themselves, and that therefore his majesty might enforce them by his royal authority. He also expressed his confidence in the good affection of the members of the house, and mentioned that he would let his majesty know every man's part in the proceedings. The chancellor followed in a similar strain, and then the question was hurried on to a vote. All reasoning was discouraged. The delay of twenty-four hours, which was requested by some of the nobility, that they might be enabled to give their votes after due consideration, was refused. The disputed articles were proposed, not separately, but as one measure, although they were of very different characters, and some of them were far more exceptionable than others. Yet, in spite of all these influences, it was only by a small majority that the measure, upon which the king had so unreasonably set his heart, was carried. The bishops all voted without exception in accordance with the royal will; the noblemen were divided in the proportion of thirty-five to fifteen; the representatives of sheriffdoms were divided equally; and there was a majority of the commissioners of boroughs opposed to the ratification of the obnoxious articles.†

The measure thus passed by parliament was entirely opposed to the convictions of the nation. Neither did it express the mind of the parliament itself. It was agreed to merely to please the king, and through fear of his displeasure. Even the bishops themselves would have preferred that the Perth articles had never been proposed. The Bishop of Aberdeen plainly declared that he considered the Kirk of Scotland in a better case without these articles than with them; but as the king was determined upon their introduction, those who opposed them must be viewed as troublers of the peace, and deserving of punishment.‡ This vexatious business was brought to a close upon Saturday, the 4th of August—a day long known under the designation of Black Saturday. Two reasons conspired to suggest this title. It was considered by the zealous presbyterians a black day, when ceremonies which they all looked upon as superstitious and popish, were sanctioned and authorised by the legislature of the country. And it so happened that just at the moment when the grand commissioner rose to ratify the acts, by touching them with the royal sceptre, the clouds, which had been gathering for some hours in dense and gloomy array above the city, darted forth three most vivid flashes of lightning, which were instantly followed by peals of thunder of extraordinary loudness. The darkness was appalling. Hailstones of prodigious size fell; torrents deluged the streets. The coincidence attracted universal attention, and it did not fail to be interpreted as a proof of the Divine displeasure against the proceedings of parliament.*

The king had so often promised during the last twenty years that he would make no farther changes in the state of ecclesiastical affairs, that not the slightest credit could be given to his assurances. Whether the similar promise made by the grand commissioner in his majesty's name, at the late parliament, was more sincerely meant than its predecessors, it is impossible to say, but certain it is that no additional innovations were introduced into the Scotch Church during the reign of James. The main reason of this, it is probable, was that his majesty found himself sufficiently occupied with the dissatisfactions which began to break out in the English parliament.† No relaxation, however, took place in the efforts which were made to enforce compliance with all those changes which had already been effected in Scotland. The bishops, armed now with the authority of parliament, and urged on by letters from the king, were indefatigable in citing before them those who scrupled about conforming to the late enactments. The king's words were, "The sword is now put into your hands; go on therefore to use it, and let it rust no longer till ye have completed the service entrusted to you, or otherwise we must use it both against you and them. If any or all of you be fainthearted, we are able enough (thanks be to God) to put others in your places who both can and will make things possible which you think so difficult."‡

But in spite of all the efforts of the bishops, opposition to the requirements of the Perth articles continued unabated. Multitudes absolutely refused to kneel at the communion, or to observe any of the holidays. All the most faithful and pious ministers joined with their people in disregarding what they conceived to be unscriptural and superstitious forms. In some cases the ministers, either belonging to the prelatical party or swayed by fear, expressed their readiness to conform, but they could not prevail upon their people to follow their example. Not unfrequently some of the communicants kneeled, while others stood; and there were instances of most indecorous disputes between the minister and individual members in the very midst of the service.* Many ministers were summoned before the court of high commission, separated from their churches, and banished to other parts of the country. Professors, too, were ejected from their chairs on the same ground, as in the case of Robert Boyd of Trochrig, and Robert Blair. And members of churches, in some instances, were thrown into prison and subjected to heavy fines, which were sufficient to involve them in ruin.†

The difficulty which the king had found, first Stern severity in procuring the ecclesiastical, and of the king. secondly the civil sanction, for his favourite articles, seems to have quite chafed his temper, and he acted towards the recusants in the most vindictive spirit. Robert Bruce, having been allowed to return from Inverness, had been living for some time in retirement in his own house at Kinnaird, but having ventured to appear in Edinburgh on urgent private business, he was apprehended, immured in the castle, and then banished once more to Inverness. Bruce's residence had become the resort of many pious people, and the motive for his banishment appears from the sneering language which accompanied his sentence—"We will have no more popish pilgrimages to Kinnaird." Welsh had now been an exile for fourteen years, and as his health was sinking under the severe trials to which he had been exposed, application was made to the king for permission to him to return to his native country, as a means of promoting his recovery, but it was refused, unless he would agree to conform to episcopacy. His wife, impelled by conjugal affection, made her way into his majesty's presence, and besought his favourable consideration of her husband's case; James meanly endeavoured to employ her as the instrument of inducing him to renounce his long-cherished principles. He promised that if she would persuade him to submit to the bishops, he would allow him to return to Scotland; but she, with the heroic spirit of her father,‡ lifted up her apron and said, "Please your majesty, I would rather keep § his head there."||

The leniency which the king showed to the Romanists presented a striking contrast to the severity with which he treated the puritans in England, and the presbyterians in Scotland. The difference had been evinced on many occasions; and it was very prominently exhibited during the protracted negotiations with reference to the Spanish marriage. Many priests and recusants who had violated the laws were released from prison; and the lord-keeper was enjoined to write to the judges "not to make any niceness or difficulty in extending the royal favour to all such as they should find prisoners in the jails of their circuits for any church recusancy, or refusing the oath of supremacy, or dispersing popish books, or for any other point of recusancy that concerned religion only, and not matters of State.*" So far as the terms of this injunction are concerned, it might have been considered as designed for the relief of all who were suffering on account of religion; but no benefit accrued from it, either to the puritans in England, or to the presbyterians in Scotland. Persecution was directed against them with unabated rigour.† This partiality of the king naturally excited many suspicions among the people. And these were aggravated by the proceedings of the bishops, who discussed the question at one of their meetings at St. Andrew's,‡ whether the differences between the Church of Rome and themselves were so great and radical, that no kind of accommodation could be contemplated. Forbes, too, a minister whom they had translated from the north country to Edinburgh, brought this very delicate question into the pulpit; and maintained, to the extreme dissatisfaction of the people, that a reconciliation between the Church of Rome and the Protestants might easily be effected.§

Nor did the king's sentiments undergo any change to the very last. Towards the close of 1624 a proclamation was issued, commanding that Christmas should be observed with all possible solemnity. The plague, however, broke out, and thus the royal mandate was set aside by a higher authority than man's. Disappointed of securing a universal compliance with his will on the occasion of the winter festival, James was determined that no effort should be spared to insure the observance of Easter through the whole of Scotland: but before that time arrived he was divested of his kingly sceptre by a monarch more powerful than himself. Seized with an intermitting fever, which no medical appliances proved adequate to overcome, he expired on the 23rd of March, 1625.||

CHAPTER XLV.

STATE OF THE BORDERS.

THE tract of country known by the designation of the Borders extends from the German Ocean, near Berwick on Tweed, to the Solway Firth—seventy or eighty miles in length, and from ten to thirty or forty miles in breadth. A considerable portion of the district was formerly in the condition of a forest, and now consists of extensive sheep walks. It was divided into east, west, and middle marches, which were placed under the charge of officers of high rank holding special commissions from the crown, and entitled wardens or guardians of the marches. The persons who filled this important office were usually noblemen or chiefs possessed of great personal influence in the districts committed to their jurisdiction. The duties entrusted to their charge were of a very extensive nature, comprehending the maintenance of law and good order among the inhabitants of their own districts, the control and administration of all the crown manors within their jurisdiction, and the power of apprehending and inflicting summary punishment on those who had been guilty of march treason and felony, or of violating any of the ancient rules and customs of the marches. In time of war the warden was captain-general within his district, with full power to call out all “the fencible men,” for the purpose either of defending their own territory, or of invading that of the enemy. In time of peace he had the difficult duty committed to him of maintaining the amicable relations between the two countries, and of redressing the various grievances arising out of the continual incursions of the moss-troopers on both sides.

The weakness of the Scottish monarchs usually compelled them to confer the office of warden on some of the chiefs of the great Border clans, who appear, without any scruple, to have employed their authority to crush their private enemies rather than to preserve the public peace, or to secure the impartial administration of justice. The extensive power of these turbulent chieftains made it almost equally dangerous to withhold or to grant whatever boons they chose to exact. Their numerous and devoted clansmen and allies were ever ready to obey their commands, even in opposition to the royal authority; and a combination of these formidable barons, on more than one occasion, proved too strong for the reigning sovereign.

The system of clanship existed at a very early period on the Borders, and continued to flourish there until the union of the crowns. The frontier provinces of England and Scotland were inhabited in ancient times by several tribes of Britons or Celts; and the patriarchal form of government remained on the Borders long after the abrogation of the other peculiar usages of the ancient inhabitants, and in

despite of the feudal system with which it was often at variance. According to this simple mode of government, which was universal among the Celtic nations, the chief of the clan was supposed to be the immediate representative of the common ancestor whose name they usually bore, and from whom, it was alleged, they were all descended. He was their counsellor in peace, and their leader in war. His authority over them was absolute and they paid the most unlimited obedience to his commands. Indeed, they respected no other authority; and so completely were they devoted to the service of their chief, that they were at all times ready to follow him against the king himself. In return for this devoted attachment to his person and interest, the clansmen looked up to their chief for advice, subsistence, protection, and revenge. He was expected to display the most profuse hospitality, and to expend his means of subsistence in the service of his clan. He seems to have had little that he could properly call his own, except his horses and his arms. However extensive his domains, he derived no advantage from them—save only from such parts as he could himself cultivate or occupy. The rest of his territories were distributed among his friends and principal followers, who repaid him by their personal service in battle, their assistance in labouring the land retained in his own possession, the payment of the various feudal casualties, and probably by a share of their plunder. Payment of rent was unknown on the Borders till after the union of the crowns. The revenues of the chieftains were, therefore, almost exclusively derived from their extensive flocks and herds, and from the black-mail which they exacted from their neighbours, in payment of the protection afforded them from plunder.

As the clansmen were expected to exhibit the deepest devotion to the interests of their chief, so, in return, he was expected to extend to them his protection under all circumstances, and by all means, legal or illegal. The authority of the feudal superior was greatly inferior to that of the chief; for in the act regulating the Borders we find repeated mention of “clannes having capitaines and chieftaines on whom they depend, oft-times against the willes of their landeslodes.” Consequently, these laws looked to the chieftain, rather than to the feudal superior, for the restraint of the disorderly tribes; and it is repeatedly enacted, that the head of the clan should be first called upon to deliver those of his sept who should commit any trespass, and that on his failure to do so, he should be liable to the injured party in full redress. Hence, in accordance with the ancient Celtic usage, the chief not unfrequently made atonement for the murders or acts of aggression committed by his clan, by the payment of such a fine or “as-sythement,” as it was called, as might make up the feud. Oftener, however, the chieftains not only connived at the misconduct of their clansmen and allies, but protected them in all their deeds of

rapine and bloodshed; and as the offended clan

Custom of considered it a sacred duty to blood-revenge. avenge the death of any of their number, not only upon the homicide, but, in the phrase of the time, upon "all his name, kindred, maintainers, and upholders;" deadly feuds were of frequent occurrence, and the most savage acts of cruelty were remorselessly committed. Speaking of this custom of blood-revenge, which it justly terms most heathenish and barbarous, the statute (1594) expressly declares that the "murders, ravage, and daily oppression of the subjects, to the displeasure of God, dishonour of the prince, and devastation of the country," was occasioned partly by the negligence of the landlords and territorial magistrates within whose jurisdiction the malefactors dwelt, but chiefly by the chieftains and principal leaders of the clans and their branches, who bore deadly quarrel, and sought revenge for the hurt or slaughter of any of their "unhappy race," although done in form of justice, or in recovery of stolen goods. "So that the said chieftains, principals of branches, and householders, worthily may be esteemed the very authors, fosterers, and maintainers of the wicked deeds of the vagabonds of their clans or surnames."

Of the invertebrate determination of the Borderers

Murder of Sir to act vengefully, we have a striking example in the case of Sir Robert Ker, warden of the middle marches in the year 1511, who was slain at a border meeting by three Englishmen—Heron, Starhead, and Lilburn. The English monarch delivered up Lilburn to justice in Scotland; but the other two escaped. Starhead fled for refuge to the very centre of England, and there lived in secrecy and upon his guard. Two dependents of the murdered warden were deputed by Andrew Ker of Cessford to revenge his father's death. They travelled through England in various disguises till they discovered the place of Starhead's retreat, murdered him in his bed, and brought his head to their master, by whom, in memorial of their vengeance, it was exposed at the Cross of Edinburgh. Heron would have shared the same fate, had he not spread abroad a report of his having died of the plague, and caused his funeral obsequies to be performed.

A deadly feud of this kind, attended with all the Feud between circumstances of horror peculiar the Maxwells to a barbarous age, raged between and Johnstones. the powerful families of Johnstone and Maxwell about the close of the sixteenth century. In the year 1593, Lord Maxwell, who was then warden of the west marches, armed with the royal authority, assembled all the barons of Nithsdale, and displaying his banner as the king's lieutenant, invaded Annandale at the head of two thousand men, with the purpose of crushing the ancient rival and enemy of his house. The Johnstones, however, assisted by the Scotts, Elliots, and other clans, boldly stood their ground, and in a desperate conflict, which took place at the Dryffe Sands, not far from Lockerby, gained a decisive victory. Lord Maxwell was struck from his horse, mutilated of his right hand, and then cruelly slain under a tree, still called "Maxwell's Thorn." His followers suffered grievously in the retreat; many of them were slashed in the face by the pursuers—a kind of blow which to this day is called in that district "a Lockerby lick."

So feeble was the royal authority, that the king not only found himself unable to exact any vengeance for this outrage, but was even constrained to bestow on Johnstone the wardency of the middle marches. The feud between the Maxwells and Johnstones was carried on with every circumstance of ferocity which could add horror to civil war. The son of the slain Lord Maxwell vowed the deepest revenge for his father's death. With this view he invited Sir James Johnstone to a friendly conference, under the pretence of a desire to terminate the feud between the clans. They met, each with a single attendant, at a place called Auchmanhill, on the 6th of August, 1608 (fifteen years after the battle of Dryffe Sands), when Lord Maxwell, availing himself of a favourable opportunity, treacherously shot Sir James Johnstone through the back with a brace of bullets. The gallant old chief died on the spot, after having for some time bravely defended himself against the traitorous assassin, who endeavoured to strike him with his sword while he lay dying on the ground. "A fact," says Spottiswood, "detested by all honest men, and the gentleman's misfortune severely lamented, for he was a man full of wisdom and courage." The murderer, finding no refuge in the Borders, made his escape to France; but, having ventured to return to Scotland after the union of the crowns, he was apprehended through the treachery of his kinsman, George, fifth Earl of Caithness, and brought to trial at Edinburgh; and the royal authority being now much strengthened, the king caused him to be publicly executed, 21st May, 1613.* "Thus," says Sir Walter Scott, "was finally ended by a solitary example of severity, the 'foul debate' betwixt the Maxwells and Johnstones, in the course of which each family lost two chieftains—one dying of a broken heart, one in the field of battle, one by assassination, and one by the sword of the executioner."

In cases of deadly feud, vengeance was sought not only against the offender, but against all who were in any way connected with him. The exaction of blood for blood to the uttermost drachm was indeed handed down from father to son as a sacred duty, which no lapse of time could set aside.

The deadly feud between the clans of Scott and Ker, which arose out of the Feud between slaughter of the Laird of Cess- the Scotts and ford, at the battle of Melrose, in Kers. the year 1526, raged during the greater part of a century, in spite of all the efforts made to bring about an agreement. Among other expedients resorted to for this purpose, there was a bond executed in 1529 between the heads of each clan, binding themselves to perform reciprocally the four principal pilgrimages of Scotland, for the benefit of those of the opposite name who had fallen in the quarrel. All was in vain. Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch was slain by the Kers in the streets of Edinburgh, in revenge for the death of Cessford, twenty-six years after that event had taken place; and half a century later, the animosity between the families continued to rage as fiercely as ever. A story, which has been handed

tween the Mur- quarrel between the Murrays and rays and Scotts. Scotts, would seem to indicate that these family feuds had sometimes a more amicable termination. During the reign of James VI., William (afterwards Sir William) Scott, eldest son of Scott of Harden, made an incursion upon the lands of Sir Gideon Murray of Elibank, subsequently deputy-treasurer of Scotland, and a great favourite of the king. But the Laird of Elibank was upon his guard, and having collected his retainers, attacked the marauders when they were encumbered with their plunder, defeated them, and made young Harden prisoner. Sir Gideon conducted his captive to Elibank Tower, where his lady received him with congratulations on his victory, and inquired what he intended to do with his prisoner. "I intend," said the victorious laird, "to consign him instantly to the gallows, as a man taken red-hand in the act of robbery and violence."—"Hoot na, Sir Gideon," answered his more considerate lady, "that is not like your wisdom. Would you hang the winsome young laird of Harden when ye have three ill-favoured daughters to marry?"—"Right," answered the baron, who joyfully caught at the idea; "he shall either marry our daughter, Meikle-mouthed * Meg, or strap for it." When this alternative was proposed to the prisoner, he for some time stoutly preferred the gibbet to "Meikle-mouthed Meg," and persevered in this ungallant resolution till he was literally led forth to execution, when, seeing no other chance of escape, he consented to save his life at the expense of marrying the young lady. The marriage contracted under such singular circumstances proved eminently happy, and it appears to have completely terminated the feud between the Murrays and the Scotts. The contract of marriage, executed instantly on the parchment of a drum, is still in the charter-chest of Laird Polwarth, the representative of the Harden family.

chiefs. The most powerful of these were—the Douglasses, Homes, Kers, and Scotts, on the east and middle marches; and the Maxwells, Johnstones, and Jardines on the west. The power of these mighty families was greatly increased by the bonds of alliance (or man-rent, as they were termed), which they were in the habit of forming with the chiefs of the smaller clans, who, in return for maintenance and protection, engaged to become their followers and liegemen. In this way several of the Border barons became possessed of such exorbitant power, as to be enabled to set the royal authority at defiance. The formidable house of Douglas, in particular, on various occasions contended with the sovereign on equal terms, and had at one period nearly gained possession of the Scottish throne.

Each of these mighty chiefs, surrounded by his own officers, and supported on all occasions by a train of knights, squires, and inferior chiefs, was almost a king in miniature. Every chieftain, too, was the supreme criminal judge in his own territories, possessed the power of life and death over his own retainers, and even of reclaiming from the supreme court any vassal who lived upon his lands. Can we wonder that privileges so extensive were often abused, and that the excesses of these petty tyrants should have frequently proved altogether intolerable?

The tradition of the country has preserved many instances of the cruel and oppres- Their tyranny

Border chiefs; and though it may sometimes be difficult to separate facts from fables, yet, making every allowance for popular exaggeration, enough remains behind to show the fearful miseries which the exorbitant power of these nobles produced. The crimes of the last Lord Soulis—a great feudal oppressor, who held extensive sway in the Borders about the beginning of the fourteenth century—have left an indelible impression on the popular mind. The scene of his cruelties is said to have been the strong Castle of Hermitage, in Liddisdale, the ruins of which are still regarded by the peasantry with peculiar aversion and terror. Local tradition represents him as a cruel tyrant and sorcerer, combining prodigious bodily strength with cruelty, avarice, dissimulation, and treachery; as constantly employed in oppressing his vassals, harassing his neighbours, and employing all means, human and infernal, to fortify his castle against the royal authority; invoking the fiends by his incantations; and forcing his vassals to drag materials like beasts of burden. Tradition proceeds to relate that the neighbouring Borderers, having irritated the king by reiterated complaints against this oppressor, he at length hastily exclaimed, "Fient nor he were sodden, and suppit in broo [broth]!" The petitioners, satisfied with this answer, which they chose to understand literally, proceeded with the utmost haste to execute the commission, and actually, it is said, boiled Soulis upon the Nine Stane Rig—a declivity that derived its name from an old Druidical circle of upright stones, nine of which remained till a late period. Five of these stones are still visible, and two are particularly pointed out as those that supported the iron bar upon which the fatal caldron was suspended. Shortly after the fall of the family of Soulis, Hermitage Castle passed into the possession of the Douglasses, and became the principal stronghold of the "Black Knight of Liddisdale," a natural son of the good Lord James Douglas, the companion of Murder of Sir Bruce. In 1342 it was the scene of the following terrible story:—

Alexander Ramsay.

Sir Alexander Ramsay of Dalhousie was one of the bravest of the Scottish barons, and had distinguished himself by his gallant and patriotic exploits in the wars with England. Having taken by storm the Castle of Roxburgh, a fortress of great strength and importance, King David bestowed upon him the government of the place, together with the sheriffdom of Teviotdale. Douglas, who had previously held the office of sheriff, was enraged at this act, and vowed revenge against Ramsay, his old companion in arms. He came suddenly upon him with a strong party of his vassals while he was holding his court in the open church at Hawick. Ramsay, having no suspicion of injury from his old comrade, invited him to take his place beside him; but the ferocious warrior, drawing his sword, rushed upon his victim, wounded him in a vain attempt at resistance, threw him across a horse, and carried him off to the remote and inaccessible Castle of Hermitage. Here he was thrown into a dungeon, and left to perish of hunger. He is said to have prolonged his existence for seventeen days by some particles of corn which fell from a granary above his prison. "It is a melancholy reflection," says Mr. Tytler, "that a fate so horrid befell one of the bravest and most popular leaders of the Scottish nation, and that the deed did not only pass unrevenged, but that its perpetrator received a speedy pardon, and was rewarded by the office which had led to the murder."

We are not to imagine that this was a solitary case. Deeds of equal atrocity were of frequent occurrence on the Border. The Douglasses, in par-

Cruelties of the Douglasses. ticular, seem to have had no law but their own will, and inflicted vengeance for their real or imaginary wrongs entirely by their own authority, and according to their own arbitrary pleasure. In the year 1451, Herries of Terrigles, a gentleman of ancient family and considerable influence in Dumfriesshire, having attempted to defend himself against the attacks of some of the followers of the Earl of Douglas, who were ravaging his lands, and to recover from them their plunder, was defeated and dragged before the earl, who caused him to be hanged, although the king sent him a positive order by a herald, enjoining him to forbear any injury to the person of his prisoner.

But a still more flagrant breach of law, and insult to the royal authority, occurred in the following year. Maclellan, the guardian of the young Lord of Bomby, ancestor of the Earls of Kirkcubright, having refused to join Douglas in a treason-able league, was seized by him and imprisoned in his strong fortress of Thrieve, in Galloway. As Maclellan was much esteemed by the king, and the nephew of Sir Patrick Gray, captain of the royal guard, the king sent "a sweet letter of supplication," praying the earl to deliver his prisoner into the hands of his kinsman. When Sir Patrick arrived at the Castle of Thrieve, Douglas, who had just risen from dinner, received him with great apparent courtesy, but declined entering upon the business which had led to the visit until Gray also had dined. "It was ill talking," he said, "between a fou [full] man and a fasting." But suspecting the object of Sir Patrick's visit, and determined to defeat it, he gave private orders that Maclellan should be immediately led forth and beheaded in the courtyard of the castle. After dinner Sir Patrick presented the king's letter to the earl, who received and read it with great affectation of reverence. "Sorry am I," said he, with a look of much concern, "that it is not in my power to give obedience to the commands of my sovereign, much as I am beholden to him for so gracious a letter to me, whom he has been pleased of late to regard with somewhat altered favour; but such redress as I can afford thou shalt have speedily." He then took his visitor by the hand, and led him to the castle green, where the bleeding trunk of Maclellan was still lying. "Yonder, Sir Patrick," said he, "is your sister's son, but, unfortunately, he wants the head. Take his body, however, and do with it what you will."—"My lord," said Gray, suppressing his grief and indignation, "if you have taken his head, you may dispose of the body as you will." But when he had mounted his horse, which he instantly called for, his resentment broke out in spite of the dangerous situation in which he was placed. "My lord," said he, "if I live you shall be rewarded for this deed according to your merits." This expression of natural indignation, however, had nearly cost him his life; for the earl was highly offended, and gave orders for an instant pursuit; and if Gray had not been well mounted, he would in all probability have shared the fate of his nephew. The chase was continued almost to Edinburgh, a distance of fifty or sixty miles. It is not uninteresting to mention, that when Douglas was shortly afterwards stabbed by the king in Stirling Castle, Sir Patrick Gray, who was present, at one blow felled him with his battle-axe.

The overthrow of this great family followed soon after; but the Earl of Angus, whose share in the ruin of his kinsmen led to the saying that "the red Douglas had put down the black," obtained a large portion of the forfeited domains of this mighty house, including the strong castles of Douglas, Hermitage, and Tantallon, and appears to have very soon enjoyed almost the same extensive supremacy on the Borders. Archibald Bell-the-Cat. The same system of rapine and bloodshed was consequently pursued. Archibald, sixth Earl of Angus, called Bell-the-Cat, who was at once warden of the east and middle marches, and Lord of Liddisdale and Jedwood Forest, seems to have had as little respect for law or royal authority as his kinsmen and rivals, the Earls of Douglas. His share in the murder of the favourites of James III., at Lauder, and of the overthrow and death of the unfortunate monarch in the battle of Sauchieburn, is well known. A quarrel which he fastened on Spens of Kilspindie, a favourite of James IV., cost him his lordship of Liddisdale and Castle of Hermitage. Spens, who was a renowned cavalier, had been present when Angus was highly praised for strength and valour. "It may be," answered Spens, "if all be good that is upcome." Shortly after Angus, while hawking near Bothwell, with a single attendant, met Kilspindie. "What reason had ye," said the earl, "for making question of my manhood? Thou art a tall fellow, and so am I, and by St. Bride of Douglas one of us shall pay for it."—"Since it may be no better," answered Kilspindie, "I will defend myself against the best earl in Scotland." With these words they encountered fiercely, till Angus, with one blow, severed the thigh of his antagonist, who died on the spot. The earl then addressed the attendant of Kilspindie, "Go thy way: tell my gossip, the king, that here was nothing but fair play. I know my gossip will be offended; but I will get me into Liddisdale, and remain in my castle of the Hermitage till his anger be abated." James, however, took advantage of the opportunity to compel Angus, as the price of his pardon, to exchange the remote and almost inaccessible stronghold of Hermitage for Bothwell Castle, in Lanarkshire, which was a considerable diminution to the family power and greatness.

The grandson of Bell-the-Cat married the widowed queen of James IV., and obtained the supreme authority in Scotland during the minority of James V. In the words of an old historian, "He ruled all which he liked, and no man durst say the contrary. There dared no man strive at law with a Douglas, or yet with the adherents of a Douglas; for if he did, he was sure to get the worst of his lawsuit." And he adds, "Although Angus travelled through the country under the pretence of punishing thieves, robbers, and murderers, there were no malefactors so great as those which rode in his own company."

The high spirit of the young king, who was now fourteen years old, was galled by the ignominious restraint in which he was held; and in a progress to the Borders, for the purpose of repressing some excesses of the Armstrongs, intimation was secretly given to Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch that he should raise his clan, and rescue the king out of the hands of the Douglases. Buccleuch immediately levied his retainers and friends, comprehending a large body of Elliots, Armstrongs, and other broken clans, over whom he exercised great authority. Angus had passed the night at Melrose, and the Kers and Homes, who had accompanied him in his expedition, had taken their leave of the king, when Buccleuch and his followers suddenly appeared on an eminence called Halidon Hill, and interposed between Angus and the bridge over the Tweed. "Sir," said the earl to the king, "yonder is Buccleuch, and the thieves of Annandale with him, to interrupt your passage. I vow to God they shall either fight or flee; and ye shall tarry here on this know [knoll], and I shall pass and put yon thieves off the ground, and rid the gate unto your grace, or else die for it." The earl with these words alighted, and hastened to the charge; and the Borderers, shouting their war-cry, immediately joined battle and fought stoutly. The encounter was fierce and obstinate, but the Homes and Kers returning at the noise of the conflict, set upon the wing and rear of Buccleuch's men, and decided the fate of the day. The death of the Laird of Cessford, who was killed in the pursuit by a retainer of Buccleuch, occasioned the deadly feud between the Scotts and Kers, of which we have already spoken.

The residences of the Border chieftains by no means corresponded to the extent of their power and the number of their retainers, and presented a striking contrast to the magnificent fortresses of the great English nobles. This, however, was not always the case. During the interval of more than a century, which elapsed between the reign of William the Lion and the death of Alexander III., there was profound peace between England and Scotland, and the Borders appeared to have been in a state of progressive improvement. At this period were erected several monastic edifices within the Scottish Borders, which formed the refuge of learning, and whose inmates must have contributed, in ordinary times, to allay the fierce passions of the neighbouring inhabitants. Among the structures of this kind may be named the abbeys of Melrose, Dryburgh, Jedburgh, and Kelso, on the eastern marches, and Lincluden on the west. These, with some other monasteries, formed seats of refinement and peaceful contemplation, while all around was little better than a mental wilderness. Usually these sanctuaries were respected by the hand of rapine, but in the case of national wars, they suffered in common with other buildings, and were laid waste with fire and sword. In all cases, however, the piety of the age restored them, until they finally sunk under the violence of the Iconoclasts in the sixteenth century.

In some instances, adjoining these religious houses, towns arose, and numerous strong and extensive royal and baronial castles graced and defended the frontier. There is little reason to doubt that if the peace with England and Scotland had not been broken by the unjustifiable pretensions of Edward I., the Borders would have gradually been improved in character with the rest of Scotland, and centuries of misery would have been avoided. The war of Scottish independence, which raged through nearly the whole of the fourteenth century, at once stopped all advancement, and on the Yarrow

threw the Borders back into a state of disorganisation. Monasteries were destroyed, towns sacked, castles stormed, and thousands of the inhabitants killed. Perceiving that the only means of preserving the liberties of their country consisted in laying waste the district, the Scots burned and erased many dwellings, and pulled down all the strongholds of importance likely to fall into the Warlike tactics hands of the enemy. When the of the Borderers. good Lord James Douglas three several times recovered possession of his ancestral castle, upon each occasion he laid waste and demolished it, and took refuge with his followers in the hills and forests. "He loved better," he said, "to hear the lark sing than the mouse squeak." The same devastating but uncompromising, and effectual system of warfare was carried on during the whole of the struggle which the Scots maintained for their independence, and was delivered by Robert Bruce as a legacy to his successors, in what is affectionately called the "Good King Robert's testament." On his death-bed he enjoined his followers in their wars always to fight on foot; to trust for protection to their mountains, morasses, and woods, rather than to walls and garrisons; to employ for arms the bow, the spear, and the battle-axe; to drive their herds into the narrow glens, and to fortify them there whilst they laid waste the plain country by fire, and compelled the enemy to evacuate it. "Let your scouts and watches," he concluded, "be vociferating through the night, keeping the enemy in perpetual alarm, and worn out with famine, fatigue, and apprehension, they will retreat as certain as if routed in battle." These judicious counsels were followed by the Scots in all their wars with the English down to the days of Cromwell. Hence the great baronial and royal castles which existed on the Borders were, with very few exceptions, levelled to the ground during the wars of Bruce and Baliol. The Castle of Jedburgh, one of the strongest of these fortresses, remained for a long time in the hands of the English, and was a source of annoyance to the adjacent country. On its reduction by the Scots, in 1408, it was immediately ordered to be destroyed; but so strongly was it constructed, and so unskilful were the Scots in the work of destruction, that it was proposed to impose a tax of two pennies on every hearth in Scotland to defray the expense of razing and levelling the fortifications. But the regent ordered the sum required to be paid out of the royal revenues.

The lesser strengths, consisting of single towers or peels, as they were called, each forming the lodgment of a petty chief, do not seem to have suffered the same devastation at the hands of their proprietors, who probably reckoned on defending them from all casual assaults. These towers, whose remains are now the most remarkable features in the Border landscape, were for the most part built in some situation of great natural strength—on a precipice, or on the banks of a torrent, or surrounded by woods and morasses, which rendered them almost inaccessible. The position of these Border houses, in short, so plainly indicated the pursuits and apprehensions of their inhabitants, that James V., on approaching the Castle of Lochwood, the ancient seat of the Johnstones, is said to have exclaimed "that he who built it must have been a knave in his heart." The principal part of these fortresses consisted of a large square tower, called a keep, having walls of immense thickness, which could easily be defended against any sudden or desultory assault. The residences of the inferior chiefs, called peels or bastle-houses, were usually built upon a still smaller scale, and consisted merely of a high square tower, surrounded by an outer wall, which served as a protection for the cattle at night. The apartments were placed one above another, and communicated only by a narrow stair, which could be easily blocked up or defended—so that the garrison could hold out for a considerable time, even after the lower story was in the possession of the enemy. In such circumstances the assailants usually heaped together quantities of wetted straw in the lower apartments, and setting it on fire, drove the defenders from story to story by means of the smoke, and sometimes compelled them to surrender. Around these fortresses were placed the habitations of the vassals and retainers of the chief, who were ready upon the first summons either to take arms for the defence of the castle, or to follow their lord to the field; and as much ground in the vicinity was cleared and cultivated as was necessary for their support.

The Border towns, before and after the war of independence, were usually furnished with a number of towers, and villages. like the peels of the inferior gentry, and were the abodes either of the wealthier burghers, or of the neighbouring proprietors, who occasionally dwelt within the town. "In each village or town," says Sir Walter Scott, "were several small towers, having battlements projecting over the side walls, and usually an advanced angle or two, with shot-holes for flanking the doorway, which was always defended by a strong door of oak, studded with nails, and often by an exterior grated door of iron. These small peel-houses were ordinarily inhabited by the principal feuars and their families. Upon the alarm of approaching danger, the whole inhabitants thronged from their own miserable cottages, which were situated around to garrison these points of defence. It was then no easy matter for an hostile party to penetrate into the village, for the men were habituated to the use of bow and fire-arms; and the towers being generally so placed that the discharge from one crossed that of another, it was impossible to assault any of them individually." In the village of Lessudden, when burned by Sir Ralph Evers, in 1544, there were as many as sixteen of these strongholds, which afforded excellent posts for resisting the assaults of an enemy, even after the town was taken. On the approach of a superior army, the chieftain and their retainers usually took to the woods and mountains, leaving their habitations to the fate of war. There is scarcely a single instance known of a distinguished baron having been made prisoner in his own house. In these dismal times all the ordinary class of houses in the Border towns were thatched, and as it was almost certain that these would be set on fire by the enemy, it was customary for the inhabitants, at the approach of invaders, to clear off all the thatch from their dwellings, and, if possible, flee with their cattle and other property to the mountains. Still further to guard against fire, as well as rapine, the lower stories of the houses were vaulted, and accessible only by a low doorway. Domestic strongholds of this kind may still be seen in all the Border and some other of the old towns of Scotland. To

bale-fires. was usual for Scottish Borderers to give telegraphic warning of the approach of an enemy by means of beacons or bale-fires lighted on the tops of the hills or loftiest battlements of the principal castles. Thus signals from Berwick up the vale of Tweed to Lanarkshire, and from the Tweed to the Forth, made the whole country aware of the coming danger.

The precautions taken by the English against the inroads of their northern neighbours were of a somewhat different kind, and suited to their superior wealth and civilisation. They paid great attention to defence, as they had something of value to defend. All along the English frontiers arose baronial castles of magnificent structure, great extent, and fortified with all the art of the age. Their great strength afforded a secure asylum to their inhabitants, and enabled them to set at defiance the attacks of the Scottish Borderers. Newcastle, Hexham, Carlisle, and other towns along the English Border, were in like manner much more strongly and skilfully fortified than those of the opposite frontier, and afforded, therefore, a much better protection from invasion. A line of communication was established along the whole Border, from Berwick to Carlisle, with setters and watchers. watchers, by day and night. The fords over the rivers were either strictly guarded or stopped and destroyed; and narrow defiles through the mountains were blocked up or rendered impassable. But although these precautions served to a considerable extent to protect the English frontier from extensive invasions, they were wholly insufficient to prevent the desultory incursions of the Scottish marauders, who, making sudden and rapid inroads into particular districts, laid all waste, and returned loaded with spoil before a sufficient force could be collected to present an obstacle to their return. These unceasing raids were scarcely less destructive than the more extensive invasions of the English armies.

Beside the chiefs who carried on a predatory warfare for the sake of spoil, or the wantonness of

legiance, or who would be bound for their good behaviour. These men, with their petty trains of dependents, were viewed as broken clans, and were only countenanced by the great barons when they stood in need of assistance. Living in small towers about the Border valleys, they were in the habit of sallying out at night to pillage the flocks and herds of some unsuspecting neighbour—for they were by no means particular whether their prey belonged to the Scots or English. The principal marauders of this class within the Scottish borders were the Elliots, Armstrongs, Turnbulls, Rutherfords, and Scotts. When hard pressed in pursuit by the enraged wardens of the marches or others, they would flee for temporary refuge to mosses unapproachable by those not acquainted with the paths, and there hold the law at defiance. One of their most noted places of refuge was the Tarras Moss, in Liddisdale—a desolate and horrible morass, accessible by paths known only to themselves. Through this marsh a small river runs furiously among huge rocks. Upon its banks are found some dry spots, which were occupied by these outlaws and their families in cases of emergency. The morass is so deep that, according to an old historian, two spears tied together would not reach the bottom. Into this inaccessible retreat the Armstrongs fled when pursued, in 1588, by Archibald, ninth Earl of Angus, lieutenant on the Border. The earl used to declare that he had as much delight in hunting a thief as others in chasing a hare. But on this occasion he was completely foiled by the impracticability of the morass, and the cunning of the outlaws who harboured in it. From their frequenting morasses, these marauders came to be known by the name of moss-troopers. They were generally well mounted on horseback, with light armour or buff coats, and provided with a sword and short musket; some carried spears, which were exceedingly formidable to an enemy.

Camden gives the following account of the character of these moss-troopers, and of their strange and adventurous mode of life:—"What manner of cattle-stealers they are that inhabit these valleys in the marches of both kingdoms, John Lesley, a Scotchman himself, and Bishop of Ross, will inform you. They sally out of their own Borders in the night in troops, through unfrequented by-ways, and many intricate windings. All the daytime they refresh themselves and their horses in lurking-holes they had pitched upon before, till they arrive in the dark at those places they have a design upon. As soon as they have seized upon the booty, they in like manner return home in the night, through blind ways, and fetching many a compass. The more skilful any captain is to pass through those wild deserts, crooked turnings, and deep precipices, in the thickest mists and darkness, his reputation is the greater, and he is looked upon as a man of an excellent head. And they are so very cunning, that they seldom have their booty taken from them, unless sometimes, when, by the help of bloodhounds following them exactly upon the track, they may chance to fall into the hands of their adversaries. When, being taken, they have so much persuasive eloquence, and so many smooth insinuating words at command, that if they do not move their judges, nay, and even their adversaries (notwithstanding the severity of their natures), to have mercy, yet they excite them to admiration and compassion.*

Freebooters as these men unquestionably were, we should form an incorrect estimate of their character were we to associate them in idea with the mean felons of modern days. Rapine at the time seems to have been a legalised principle; law and justice were at the lowest ebb, and many of the broken clans were men who had been ruined by national wars, and denied all form of reparation. Of the more "respectable" heads of these freeboot-

Auld Wat of ing bands, Walter Scott of Harden, Harden, commonly called "Auld Wat of Harden," may be taken as a specimen. Tradition has preserved a great variety of anecdotes respecting this redoubted chief. His castle was situated on the very brink of a dark and precipitous dell on the Borthwick, about three miles from Hawick. The spoil which he carried off from his neighbours was concealed in the recess of this deep and impervious glen. From thence the cattle were brought out one by one, as they were wanted to supply the rude and plentiful table of the laird. When the last bullock was killed and devoured, it was the lady's custom to place on the table a dish which, on being uncovered, was found to contain a pair of clean spurs—a hint to the riders that they must shift for their next meal. A kindred saying is recorded of a mother to her son, which has now become proverbial—"Ride, Rowly (Rowland), hough's i' the pot," that is, the last piece of beef was in the pot, and therefore it was high time for him to go and fetch more. Upon one occasion, when the village herd was driving out the cattle to pasture, the old laird heard him call loudly to drive out Harden's cow. "Harden's cow!" echoed the affronted chief; "is it come to that pass? By my faith, they shall soon say Harden's kye [sows]." Accordingly, he sounded his bugle, mounted his horse, set out with his followers, and returned next day with "a bow of kye and a bassen'd [brindled] bull." On returning with his prey, he passed a very large haystack. It occurred to the provident laird that this would be extremely convenient to fodder his new stock of cattle; but as no means of transporting it were at hand, he was fain to take leave of it with this apostrophe, now proverbial: "Had ye but four feet, ye should not stand long there."† In short, nothing came amiss to him that was not too heavy or too hot. This renowned freebooter was married to Mary Scott, celebrated in song by the title of the "Flower of Yarrow." By their marriage contract, the father-in-law, Philip Scott of Dryhope, was to find Harden in horse-meat and man's-meat at his tower of Dryhope for a year and a day; but five barons pledged themselves that, at the expiry of that period, the son-in-law should remove without attempting to continue in possession by force—a caution strikingly illustrative of the times, and of the character of the contracting parties. By the Flower of Yarrow the Laird of Harden had six sons, five of whom survived him. The sixth son was slain at a fray in a hunting-match, by the Scotts of Gilmanscleugh. His brothers flew to arms, but the old laird secured them in the dungeon of his tower, hurried to Edinburgh, stated the crime, and obtained from the crown a gift of the lands of the offenders. He returned to Harden with equal speed, released his sons, and showed them the charter. "To horse, lads!" cried the savage warrior, "and let us take possession. The lands of Gilmanscleugh are well worth a dead son!"

The armorial bearings adopted by many of the Border tribes were remarkably appropriate to their character, and show how little they were ashamed of their trade of rapine. It was their vocation; and, with Falstaff, they reckoned it no sin for a man to labour in his vocation. Like this same worthy, they were "Diana's foresters—gentlemen of the shade—minions of the moon," under whose countenance they committed their depredations. Hence the emblematic moons and stars so often charged in the arms of Border families. Their mottoes, also, bear allusion to their profession:—"Reparabit cornua Phœbe" ("We'll have moonlight again"), is that of the family of Harden, now represented by Lord Polwarth. "Best riding by moonlight," was the ancient motto of the Buccleuch family. The crest of the Cranstouns is a crane holding a stone in his foot, with the emphatic motto, "Thou shalt want ere I want."

Various statutes and regulations were made for the purpose of repressing the depredations of these Border freebooters, but they remained for the most part a dead letter. It happened not unfrequently that, when the disorders caused by their marauding incursions reached a certain height, the Scottish kings or governors marched to the Borders, seized and imprisoned the chiefs, and executed without mercy the inferior captains and leaders. The most noted of these expeditions was the famous one undertaken by James V., in the year 1529. Before setting out on his journey, he very sagaciously took the precaution of securing in safe custody the most powerful Border chieftains—the Earl of Bothwell, Lords Home and Maxwell, and the lairds of Buccleuch, Fernyhirst, Polwarth, and Johnstone—who were the chief protectors of the marauders. The king having thus secured the principal offenders, placed himself at the head of an army of eight thousand men, and marched rapidly forward, visiting in succession the upper part of Peebleshire, Ettrick Forest, Teviotdale, and Eskdale, and inflicting punishment as he proceeded on Cockburn of Henderland, Adam Scott of Tushielaw, Johnnie Armstrong, and other marauders. This justiciary excursion was long remembered for the rigour, dispatch, and excessive severity of the royal vengeance, which struck such terror into the Border freebooters that for a season "the rush-bush kept the cow." * Various expeditions of a similar kind were undertaken on subsequent occasions, especially by the Regent Moray, who suppressed with a firm hand the outrages of the moss-troopers, whom he caused to be hanged or drowned by dozens. But these examples of sanguinary justice had no permanent effect in tranquillising the Border districts. Hence it was found necessary to intrust the wardens of the marches with the most extensive powers for the maintenance of peace and order. These officers seem to have imitated closely the royal example, in the summary execution of those marauders who fell into their hands: the next tree, or the deepest pool of the nearest stream, was indifferently used on such occasions. Great numbers of the moss-troopers are said to have been drowned in a deep eddy of the Jed, near Jedburgh. The ordinary proverb of "Jedburgh justice," where men were said to be hanged first and tried afterwards, appears to have taken its rise from these summary proceedings.

One of the most important regulations, both for Days of truce preventing and punishing the disorders committed by the lawless wardens. banditti on the Borders, was the holding days of truce by the wardens on either side, in which the offences complained of by the subjects of both kingdoms were, with great solemnity, inquired into and remedied. The wardens, on these occasions, took the field in great state, attended by the chief men within their districts, all in their best arms, and well mounted. After an assurance had been mutually given for keeping the peace from sunrise till sunset, the two wardens met in great form, embraced each other, and then proceeded to examine the "bills," or complaints tendered on either side. In doubtful cases, the matter was tried by a jury of twelve, chosen equally from the two nations, or was referred to an umpire mutually chosen, or in some cases to the oath of the party accused. The wardens were bound to have the offenders, against whom complaints were made, in custody, in order that they might be in readiness to answer the charges brought against them. But as this would have been often difficult, and sometimes impossible, the warden usually took security from the chief or kinsman of the accused party, that they should be forthcoming when called for. If the persons charged were found guilty, they were delivered up to the opposite warden, by whom they were imprisoned until they paid treble the value of the goods stolen. A kind of account-current was made up of the extent of mutual damage sustained by both kingdoms, and the complaints found proved on each side having been enumerated, the balance was struck against that country whose depredators had committed the greatest number of offences. While the wardens were engaged in these judicial investigations, their retainers intermixed fearlessly and peaceably with each other in mutual sports and familiar intercourse—"in merchandise and merriment." These peaceful meetings, however, were often converted into scenes of battle and bloodshed. Among the fiery spirits by whom each warden was respectively attended, there must often have been many betwixt whom deadly feud existed, and not a few whose interest it was to instigate any quarrel which might interrupt the course of justice, and prevent their depredations from being inquired into. Among such combustible materials the slightest spark served to kindle a flame. Hence, as the poet remarks—

"'Twixt truce and war a sudden change
 Was not infrequent, nor held strange,
 In the old Border day."

Repeated instances occur of such casual affrays happening, in which the Border chiefs, and sometimes even the wardens themselves, were wounded or slain. One of these skirmishes is vividly portrayed in the old ballad of the "Raid of the Reidswire."

On the 7th of July, 1575, Sir John Carmichael, warden of the Scottish middle ^{Raid of the} marches, and Sir John Foster, the ^{Reidswire.} English officer on the opposite frontier, held a meeting for the regulation of Border affairs, each being as usual attended by his retinue, and by the armed clans inhabiting his district. According to the old minstrel, the Borderers of Tynedale and Reedsdale, who attended the English warden, all well armed "with jack, and spear, and bended bows," were much more numerous than the Scottish clans. The meeting began in mirth and good fellowship. The wardens proceeded to the usual business of the day, and their attendants engaged in sports and gaming. The pedlars erected their temporary booths, and displayed their wares, and the whole had the appearance of a peaceful holiday or rural fair. During this mutual friendly intercourse, a dispute arose respecting one Farnsteen, a notorious English freebooter, against whom a bill, at the instance of a Scottish complainant, had been "fouled," that is, found a true bill. Foster alleged that he had fled from justice; Carmichael, considering this as a pretext to avoid making compensation for the felony, bade him "play fair;" to which the haughty English warden retorted, by contemptuously desiring Carmichael to match himself with his equals. The English Borderers, glad of any pretext for a quarrel, immediately raised their war-cry of "To it, Tyndale!" and discharged a flight of arrows among the Scots. A warm conflict ensued, in which Carmichael was at first beaten down and taken prisoner, and the Scots, few in number, and surprised, were with difficulty able to keep their ground. But the Tynedale men, beginning greedily to rifle the "merchant packs," fell into disorder; and a band of the citizens of Jedburgh, armed with fire-arms, opportunely arriving at that instant, the skirmish terminated in a complete victory on the part of the Scots. Sir John Heron of Chipchase was slain on the spot, to the great regret of both parties; and Sir John Foster, with many other Englishmen of rank, were made prisoners. The Scots lost but one gentleman of name. This affray was remarkable as being the last skirmish of any consequence fought on the Borders. The field of battle was called the Reidswire, a spot on the ridge of the Carter-fells which divide England from Scotland. The prisoners were sent to the Earl of Morton, then regent, who detained them at Dalkeith, and then dismissed them with presents of choice falcons, and great expressions of regard. On this a saying arose amongst the Borderers, that for this once the regent had lost by his bargain—he had given live hawks for dead herons, alluding to the death of Sir John Heron. A few years later a singular incident arose out of one of these warden meetings, which had well-nigh occasioned a war between the kingdoms.

In the year 1596 there was a meeting held on the borders of Liddisdale between the deputies of Lord Scrope of Bolton, the English warden of the west marches, and Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, the Scottish warden. The court was held at a place named the Dayholm of Kershope, where a small burn or rivulet divides the two countries. When the business of the day was over, and the meeting amicably broken up, the English Borderers happened to observe a notorious depredator called William Armstrong, but more commonly known by the name of Kinmont Willie, quietly riding home on the Scottish side of the Liddel, with three or four in company. Willie, who is said to have been a descendant of the famous Johnnie Armstrong, was a man of great personal strength and stature, and one of the most gallant freebooters in Liddisdale. He and his four sons, who were equally distinguished in their vocation, are said to have had more bills filed against them than any twenty men in the district. Although he was on Scottish ground, and protected by the truce, which lasted from the time of holding the court till next morning at sunrise, the temptation to seize an offender so obnoxious was too great to be resisted. A body of two hundred English horsemen crossed the river, chased him for some miles, and took him, and carried him in triumph to Carlisle Castle, where he was heavily ironed and cast into the common prison. Buccleuch, with whom Kinmont Willie was a special favourite, instantly complained of this outrageous violation of Border law, and demanded the release of his retainer. But the warden refused, or at least evaded this request. Buccleuch then swore that he would bring Kinmont Willie out of Carlisle Castle, alive or dead, with his own hand. Choosing a dark tempestuous night, he assembled two hundred horse at the tower of Morton, on the water of Sark, about ten miles from Carlisle. Among those selected for this hazardous enterprise were the Lairds of Harden, Bransholm, Goldielands, and Stow, the son of the Laird of Mangerton, chief of the Armstrongs, and Kinmont's four sons, all noted and daring men. With this company Buccleuch, favoured by the darkness of the night, passed the river Esk unperceived, rode rapidly through the "debateable land," forded the Eden, then swollen over its banks, and halted at a small burn named Caday, close by Carlisle. Here he caused eighty of his men to dismount, and carrying with them the scaling-ladders, crowbars, and other iron tools which they had prepared, silently led them to the foot of the castle-wall. The night was dark and rainy, and everything seemed to favour the attempt. But to their disappointment the ladders proved too short. In this extremity they undermined a postern gate in the wall, and soon made a breach sufficient to admit a single soldier. Those who entered first, disarmed and bound the watch, wrenched open the postern from the inside, and admitted their companions. Buccleuch kept the postern while a body of his men proceeded to the castle jail and released Kinmont, carrying him off in his irons, and sounding their trumpets as a signal that the enterprise was accomplished. On passing the window of Lord Scrope, Kinmont shouted a "good night" to his lordship, asking him at the same time if he had any news for Scotland. Meanwhile the alarm-bell of the castle rung, and was answered by those of the cathedral and the Moot-hall—drums beat to arms, and the beacon blazed upon the top of the great tower. But as the real strength of the enemy was unknown, all was terror and confusion both in the castle and town. Buccleuch having accomplished his purpose, rode off, the Borderers having strictly obeyed his orders in forbearing to injure the garrison, or to take any booty. Rejoining his men whom he had left on the Caday, he made an orderly retreat, carrying off his rescued prisoner in the midst of his band, and regained the Scottish border before sunrise.

This daring exploit, one of the last, and certainly most gallant achievements performed upon the Border, was loudly extolled at the time, and has been minutely recorded in the inimitable ballad of "Kinmont Willie." "There had never been a more gallant deed of vassalage done in Scotland," says an old chronicler, "no, not in Wallace's days." Queen Elizabeth was dreadfully enraged at this insult, and demanded with the most violent complaints and threats, that Buccleuch should be delivered up to the English. So deadly, indeed, was her resentment, that Buccleuch's life is said to have been aimed at, not, as was alleged, without

Elizabeth's privacy. James for a time resisted compliance with the demand of the English queen, and was zealously supported by the whole body of the nobles and people, and even by the clergy. The matter was at length arranged by the commissioners of both nations at Berwick, by whom it was agreed that the delinquents should be delivered up on both sides, and that the chiefs themselves should enter into ward in the opposite countries till this condition was complied with, and pledges granted for the future maintenance of the quiet of the Borders. Buccleuch was accordingly sent on parole to England, along with Ker of Cessford. According to ancient tradition, Queen Elizabeth sent for the intrepid chieftain, and demanded of him how he had dared to storm her castle—to which "bauld Buccleuch," nothing daunted, replied, "What is there that a man dares not do?" Pleased with the rejoinder, she turned to a lord in waiting, and said, "With a thousand such men, our brother of Scotland might shake the firmest throne in Europe."

In the reign of Elizabeth, Sir Robert Carey, warden of the west marches, made an excursion into Liddisdale, with the view of quelling the Scottish freebooters in that district. In this, however, he was far from successful. It is related by tradition, that while he was besieging the moss-troopers in the Tarras, they contrived, by ways known only to themselves, to send a party into England, who plundered the warden's lands. On their return, they sent Carey one of his own cows, telling him that, fearing he might fall short of provision during his visit to Scotland, they had taken the precaution of sending him some English beef.

After the accession of James to the crown of England, when the jurisdictions on the Border both sides acted more in unison, the most arbitrary measures were resorted to for the suppression of the Border banditti. Many of them were executed without even the formality of a trial. A band of the most desperate of these freebooters was formed by Buccleuch into a legion for the service of the estates of Holland; and the Graemes, a hardy and ferocious race, inhabiting chiefly the "debateable land," were transported to Ireland, and their return prohibited under pain of death.

But the predatory habits of the Borderers were too deeply rooted to be removed so speedily, and they broke forth again upon the slightest encouragement. During the great civil war, the moss-troopers, taking advantage of the unsettled state of the country, resumed their old profession; and frequent reference is made to their exploits in the diaries and military reports of the time. The labours of Richard Cameron, and other presbyterian ministers, are said to have been very successful in reclaiming them from their licentious habits. Colonel Cleland, the well-known Cameronian,* claims for the preachers of that sect the merit of—

"Prevailing more with words
Than dragons do with guns or swords;
So that their bare preaching now Makes the rush-bush keep the cow,
Better than Scots or English kings
Could do by kiling them with strings; *
Yea, those that were the greatest rogues,
Follow them over hills and bogs,
Crying for mercy and for preaching,
For they'll now hear no others' teaching." †

Incidents not unfrequently occurred, however, at a late date, which showed that the old spirit was not altogether extinguished.

Like the Arabs of the deserts, the Border marauders, with all their freebooting propensities, were faithful to their word. Having once pledged their faith, even to an enemy, they were very strict in observing it, and looked upon its violation as a most heinous crime. When an instance of this occurred, the injured person, at the first Border meeting, rode through the field displaying a glove (the pledge of faith) upon the point of his lance, and proclaiming the perfidy of the person who had broken his word. So great was the indignation of the assembly against the perjured criminal, that he was often slain by his own clan, to wipe out the disgrace he had brought on them. In the same spirit of confidence, it was not unusual to behold the victors, after an engagement, dismiss their prisoners upon parole, who never failed either to transmit the stipulated ransom, or to surrender themselves to captivity if unable to do so.† Thus, even among the rudest class of men, there often exist good points of character.

The history of the Borders, their wars, feuds, and the daring exploits of which they were the fertile scene, has been embalmed in a variety of ballads of great antiquity, the wreck of the legendary lore once common throughout the district. According to all accounts, the old Borderers spent much of their leisure time in listening to the traditionary stories, the songs, and the inspiring strains of minstrels who visited their secluded mountain homes. Bishop Lesley states that the Marchmen were greatly delighted with music and ballad-poetry; and, as might have been expected in such a state of society, that their songs were warlike in their nature, and celebrated the exploits of their ancestors, and the valour and success of their own predatory expeditions. Of the mass of ballads and lays which used thus to cheer the Border hearths, and have come down to the present generation, comparatively few, it is observed, belong to the English side of the boundary; nearly all are Scotch,—whether from the greater prevalence of this species of anthology among our Scottish ancestors, or from the greater industry exercised by Scotchmen in gathering together the fragments of ballads, it would be difficult to say. Unfortunately, many of the ballads once current on the Borders are now lost, and many of them have come down to us in an imperfect and mutilated state. It could scarcely have been otherwise, since they have been almost entirely preserved by oral tradition. Few of these compositions appear to have been committed to writing till within the present century. Till a very late period, the pipers, of whom there was one attached to each Border town of note, were the great depositaries of these poetical traditions. These minstrels were in the habit of itinerating through a particular district of the country, about spring-time, and after harvest; and in return for the music and the tale, were usually rewarded with their lodging and a donation of seed-corn. The ancient Scottish gaberlunzie, too, was often repaid by his night's quarters for his contributions in legendary lore. By means of these professed ballad-reciters, much traditional poetry was preserved, which must otherwise have perished. Many interesting ballads and tales have also been recovered from the recitations of shepherds and aged persons residing in the recesses of the Border mountains. From these various sources, nearly two hundred different ballads have been collected, several of which are believed to be compositions of the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries—as there is every reason to suppose that these ballads were, in almost every case, composed immediately after the occurrence of the incidents which they commemorated. It would be unreasonable to expect that compositions originating in such a state of society as we have described should exhibit either refined sentiment or elegant expression; but they abound in natural pathos and rude energy, and present a picture of the manners and feelings of the times which renders them highly valuable. Some of these ballads refer to public historical events, others commemorate real circumstances in private life, while a third class may be regarded as an embodiment of the popular superstitions of the district, a record of the fancied exploits of fairies, ghaists, brownies, and bogles—

“Of airy elves by moonlight shadow seen,
The silver token, and the circled green.”

No part of Scotland, indeed, abounded more with superstitious legends and observances than did the Borders. Superstition of the Borders.

“The Dalesmen,” says Bishop Lesley, “never count their beads with such earnestness as when they set out upon a predatory expedition.” Penances, the composition between guilt and conscience, were also frequent amongst them. The belief in ghosts, brownies, bogles, fairies, and witches, and in the efficacy of spells, charms, and exorcisms, was universal. According to Bishop Nicolson, the Borderers of his day were much better acquainted with, and more firmly believed, their old legendary stories of fairies and witches than the articles of their creed.

The present state of this celebrated district exhibits a striking contrast to its former Present state of the Borders. condition. With the introduction of law and order, and the progress of improvement, barren wastes, once the resort of freebooters, have become fruitful fields, towns, and hamlets; mansions, farmer-tendings, and cottages, now enliven those scenes which for ages had been marked by works of hostility; and in those defiles where the rude reivers found a refuge, rich and almost countless flocks have long wandered in perfect security; while the ruined towers of the Border chiefs, scattered throughout the district, present a striking memorial of times and manners that have long gone by.*

CHAPTER XLVI.

CHARLES I.

A.D. 1625—1638.

JAMES was succeeded in the sovereignty of the Accession of three kingdoms by his only surviving son, Charles, then in the twenty-fifth year of his age. Immediately on his accession, Charles dispatched a messenger to the privy council of Scotland, with instructions to make no change in the officers of state, magistrates, and other public functionaries, until his pleasure should be farther signified. A general mourning for the late king was ordered by the council; and the chapel-royal, as well as the apartments of the palace, were hung with black drapery. On the 31st of March, the new sovereign was proclaimed at the Cross of Edinburgh with the customary formalities; and next day the principal officers of state took their departure for London, in order to be present at the funeral of their late sovereign, and to congratulate his son on his peaceable accession to the throne. Emboldened by their absence, the pirates of the Western Islands once more commenced their work of depredation; but their ravages were speedily checked by the vigorous measures of Lord Lorn, who raised a force of two thousand men for the protection of the country; while two ships of war, under the command of the Baron of Kilsyth, protected the navigation of the surrounding seas.

Some hopes were entertained that the causes of Policy of the discontent, which had arisen under new king. the misrule of James, would be at least partially removed under the sway of the new sovereign; and, accordingly, the dissenters from the articles of Perth deputed Mr. Robert Scott, minister at Glasgow, to present a supplication to the king, craving redress of their grievances. Unfortunately, however, for Charles, as well as for the country, he had imbibed, as a part of his early education, all the tenets adopted by his father respecting the nature and extent of the royal prerogative, and inherited all his hostility against nonconformity; and his answer convinced the supplicants that they had no relief to expect at his hands. He was resolved to maintain prelacy, as established by his father in Scotland, in all its extent, and at all hazards; and immediately wrote to the primate, enjoining him, and the bishops under his authority, to diligence in the prosecution of the work assigned them by his father. He further issued a proclamation, commanding that all persons who should dare to disturb his government, by misleading the people into the belief that he intended to make any change in the government of the Church, should be visited with the severest penalties of the law. This rash and impolitic proclamation was succeeded by an imperative mandate to the town-council of Edinburgh to choose none of their number as magistrates of the city but such as yielded obedience to the articles of Perth.

This disclosure of his sentiments, at the very commencement of his reign, involved Charles in merited unpopularity, which was not a little augmented by his marriage with a Roman Catholic princess, Henrietta Maria of France—an accomplished and beautiful woman, but who, in consequence of her religion, ultimately became one great cause of the misfortunes of her husband, and of their posterity.

In the meantime, Charles had become involved in a contest with his English parliament, which, in the first session that had been held in his reign, manifested in a still more determined manner that spirit of independence which had embittered the latter years of his father, by disturbing his dream of unlimited and inviolable prerogative. This dispute so far engrossed the attention of the king, that he was for a time prevented from pursuing his designs with regard to the affairs of Scotland. That part of his dominions remained in consequence comparatively tranquil; and had a policy of timely concession been adopted, the spread of that spirit of resistance to arbitrary power which had begun to prevail among the people of England might have been long retarded. But the smouldering embers of discontent, which might have been so easily extinguished, were by an unwise and headstrong policy soon fanned into a flame. The revocation of tithes and benefices, which at the time of the Reformation had been usurped by the crown, but had afterwards passed by gift into the hands of the nobility, had been projected by James, and had merely been delayed in consequence of the unexpected check which he had received from the Scottish parliament. But this scheme had been bequeathed to his son, who now rashly resolved to carry it into execution.

The nobility, though they had tamely submitted to the overthrow of the Presbyterian Church, and were probably prepared to acquiesce in the introduction of the liturgy, and every other innovation in matters purely ecclesiastical, were not disposed without a struggle to give up the spoils of the Church, which they had so long enjoyed. In justice, however, the tithes ought never to have belonged either to them or to the king. They formed a peculiar species of property quite distinct from the lands out of which they were paid; and, accordingly, when at the Reformation they were no longer required for their original purpose, the clergy being otherwise provided for, they ought either to have reverted to the landed proprietors, on whom they had been originally imposed for the maintenance of the Romish priesthood, or to have been appropriated to national purposes. But whatever may be said of the policy or justice of the revocation, no doubt can be entertained of its legality. According to the law of Scotland, the patrimony of the crown was inalienable, without the previous intervention of the authority of parliament. A subsequent act ratifying a royal grant was not sufficient; and all such grants made during the reign of one sovereign, were liable to be summarily revoked by his successor, in the exercise of his prerogative alone. The same law was applicable to all grants made by the sovereign during his minority, which were in like manner liable to be resumed when he became of age; and though James had prudently deferred such an exercise of his prerogative, he had encouraged the prelates to expect that it would, at a more convenient time, be exercised on their behalf.

The Earl of Nithsdale, as royal commissioner, was now sent down to hold a convention of the Estates, and to demand an unconditional surrender of all the tithes and other church property, which had reverted to the late sovereign at the time of the Reformation, and which had by his gift passed into their possession. But this demand the nobles were prepared to resist to the last extremity. To be stripped of such valuable possessions, to which they believed they had an indisputable right, for the sake of aggrandising a body of men whose inordinate ambition and growing influence had already excited their jealousy, was beyond endurance; and so fierce and determined was their opposition, that a combination was formed among the nobility to resort to the argument of the sword, according to the ancient Scottish fashion; and in case of the persistence of the commissioner in his demand, to put to death, on the spot, both him and his adherents. Lord Belhaven, one of the conspirators, though then old and blind, resolved to have his share in the work of blood, and to make sure of at least one victim. At his own desire he was placed next to the Earl of Dumfries, whom he laid hold of with one hand, as if for support, while in the other he secretly held a dagger—in readiness, on the least disturbance arising, to plunge it into the heart of that nobleman. Fortunately, the premeditated tragedy was averted by the caution of Nithsdale, who, either forewarned of his danger, or alarmed by the hostility of his opponents, withheld the most obnoxious part of his instructions, and returned to court without being able to fulfil the object of his mission.*

The king was so enraged at this opposition that, without farther ceremony, he ordered the act, which had been already prepared, to be published—when, to the dismay of the nobles, it was found to extend beyond the Reformation to the distance of eighty-three years, and to include every grant made within the two preceding reigns. Even the privy council, and many of the ministers themselves, were secretly adverse to so sweeping a measure, by which they considered that their own interest would be seriously compromised. A partial change, however, was effected among the officers of state; and the privy council and courts of law were reconstructed in such a manner as to admit the dignified clergy to form part of these bodies. A new court, under the name of a “commission to try grievances,” was at the same time established, after the model of the Star Chamber; but so strong was the opposition of the nobility to this arbitrary tribunal, that, though not formally abolished, it was silently permitted to become inoperative, and at last ceased to exist.*

An ecclesiastical convention was now held, and, eager for the recovery of what they considered the legal patrimony of the Church, they presented an urgent application to the king for some regular legal provision for the sustentation of the clergy. Their expectation, which they scarcely attempted to disguise, was to recover the tithes through the king's assistance; and so impatient were they to seize on this valuable reversion, that they even began to declaim from the pulpits against the detention of their “inheritance.” In the meantime, a step was made in this direction. They were directed to prepare a statement of the tithes which had been appropriated in their respective parishes—a task which they no doubt executed con amore, and with no disposition to frame an estimate that should fall short of the truth. The nobles, on the other hand, were naturally desirous of estimating at the lowest possible value the property which they had surreptitiously acquired, and which they were now called on to relinquish. In the midst of these competitions, another order of men, whose interest in this matter, though great, had been hitherto overlooked, unexpectedly threw the weight of their influence into the scale of the clergy. These were the proprietors of the land, who had long suffered grievously from the arbitrary and oppressive manner in which the tithes were frequently collected by the nobility. According to the law of Scotland, the crops were not permitted to be removed from the fields until the tenth part had been collected by the titulars, or proprietors of the teinds; and this operation was often, through neglect or wanton tyranny, so long delayed that the products of the soil were damaged, or entirely destroyed, before they could be garnered by the husbandman. This grievance had attracted the attention of parliament, by whom it was partly alleviated, but was still far from being entirely removed. The landholders, accordingly, who naturally expected relief from any change that should free them from the vexatious interference of the nobility, concurred with the clergy in their application to the king for the resumption, and a more equitable distribution of the tithes.† The influence of this numerous body of men contributed not a little to strengthen the hands of the king, and to confirm him in his resolution. A commission was issued to certain noblemen and gentlemen to receive the surrender of impropriated tithes and benefices, with power to decide on any doubtful or disputed points; and prosecutions were at the same time instituted against such as had refused compliance with the king's demand. The nobles thus subjected to separate prosecutions, and no longer acting in combination, found themselves individually unable to cope with the power of the crown. The weakest or least refractory being first selected, had no alternative but submission; and the rest, intimidated by their example, and weakened by disunion, were incapable of resistance, and reluctantly yielded.* They surrendered the teinds at a valuation fixed by the commissioners; and, in the meantime, they were to receive the annual rents until these should be redeemed by the crown. The proprietors of the soil were also empowered to sue for a valuation, or modus, and to purchase such of the tithes of their own estates as had not been appropriated by churchmen. Few of them, however, were possessed of means sufficient to make such purchases, and they had, therefore, small reason to exult in a privilege which they soon found to be more nominal than real. It was not to be expected that, in a country where money was so scarce as it was in Scotland at this period, nine years' valuation, which was the rate fixed, and which was then almost equal to the price of the land, could in many instances be afforded for the purchase of tithes.† Such, indeed, was the poverty even of the crown itself, that it was unable to redeem the feu duties of the church lands, so that a small proportion of the tithes still remained unpurchased.‡ It has been well remarked, that, "if the tithes had been gratuitously restored to the landholders, their attachment would have been secured by a benefit exceeding their most sanguine expectations; and the nobles, when counterbalanced by a numerous and powerful body, must have acquiesced in the sudden loss of a recent and invidious revenue out of the estates of their neighbours."§ As it was, with the exception of the prelates, these proceedings were satisfactory to no party in the State. To

State of the organised state of society, which Highlands. had caused so much uneasiness to the government during the last reign, still continued. Deadly feuds between tribes, families, and even single individuals, were of constant occurrence, and were often attended by the most shocking barbarities, perpetrated in open defiance of the law, and with perfect impunity. While the strength of the government was exhausted in a contest with the people on the subject of ecclesiastical forms, discipline, and government, a large portion of the kingdom, in a great measure left to itself, was fast relapsing into a state of primitive barbarism and anarchy. An accidental misunderstanding, which had arisen between the Barons of Frendraught and Rothiemay, led to several atrocious murders, which were allowed to pass without any legal investigation.* Many of the friends of both parties, including the old Marquis of Huntley, subsequently became involved in the quarrel; and the vassals of that nobleman, uniting with those of Rothiemay, ravaged the lands of Frendraught, hanged one of his tenants, and carried off a large booty, which they disposed of by public sale. Frendraught having fled to Edinburgh, complained of these outrages to the privy council, who issued an order for Huntley to appear before them. He attempted to excuse himself on the plea of old age and infirmity; but the council were inexorable. He was outlawed for contumacy; and some of his friends, who appeared on his behalf, were thrown into prison. Having, however, afterwards made his appearance, his sentence was reversed, and he was about to be set at liberty on his entering into a bond to keep the peace, when he was accused by Captain Adam Gordon, who was himself deeply implicated in these lawless proceedings, of being the prime mover in all the disorders by which the peace of the north had been disturbed. On this charge he was arrested, and placed in close confinement in the castle; and though released shortly afterwards by an order from the king, his health seems to have sunk under his rigorous treatment. He expired at Dundee, on his way home, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, professing a steadfast attachment to the Roman Catholic faith.†

About this time, the restless valour of the northern population found an outlet by a new channel. Mackay, ^{Scottish troops in foreign service.} Lord Reay, had levied a regiment in the north to be employed in the service of the King of Denmark, and this band, disciplined by experienced officers, after two campaigns against the emperor, which lasted for three years, received an honourable discharge. Instead, however, of disbanding and returning home, they enlisted under the banners of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, who had already in his army several Scottish officers. Great numbers of their countrymen soon entered into the same service, and the whole were subsequently incorporated into a national brigade consisting of four regiments, and numbering upwards of ten thousand men.‡ When about to embark in the invasion of Germany, Gustavus was anxious to obtain the assistance of the British monarch, and Charles agreed to support him with a force of six thousand men, on condition of his making an effort to procure the restitution of the Palatinate. As Charles, however, was at that time engaged in a negotiation with the emperor for the same object, he considered it necessary to preserve an apparent neutrality. Instead, therefore, of openly assisting Gustavus, he made a private arrangement with the Marquis of Hamilton, then a young man, directing him to conclude, in his own name, a treaty with the King of Sweden, and to furnish him with the stipulated number of troops. and estates of the house of Hamilton.* The story, which appears to have been a malicious fabrication, was that Colonel Ramsay, the agent employed in the negotiation with Gustavus, had told Lord Reay that the troops about to be levied, instead of being destined for Germany, were to be employed in raising Hamilton to the throne of Scotland. The king heard this absurd story with scornful incredulity, and, with many expressions of affectionate regard, refused Hamilton's urgent request to be put upon his trial, as a proceeding altogether unnecessary. Ochiltree, however, was brought to task, when all he could allege in support of his accusation was a vague rumour, the truth of which Ramsay unhesitatingly denied. Ochiltree was now sent down to Scotland to be tried for leasing making, which at that time was a capital offence. He was convicted, but his punishment was commuted into perpetual imprisonment in the Castle of Blackness. He was confined there for twenty years, but was ultimately set at liberty by Cromwell. Ramsay and Lord Reay, who had endeavoured to criminate each other, were, according to a barbarous and absurd custom, long since happily abolished, adjudged a trial by judicial combat. For this purpose a stage was erected in Tothill Fields, Westminster, and the two combatants, richly apparelled, having mounted it, were on the point of commencing the fight when an order arrived from the king prohibiting the combat.†

The causes of delay being now removed, the troops sailed from Yarmouth Roads on the 16th of July, and on the 4th of August arrived in safety on the banks of the Oder. Their numbers amounted to upwards of six thousand men; but an exaggerated report, representing them as twenty thousand strong, had a very material effect on the result of the campaign. That rumour having reached the Elector of Saxony, who was hesitating what course to pursue, he immediately declared in favour of the invaders, joined them with all his forces, and encouraged all the Protestant princes of Germany to follow his example. This unexpected movement constrained Tilly, the imperial general, to draw off large detachments for the reinforcement of his garrisons; and his army being thus weakened, was signally defeated by the Swedes and their auxiliaries at the battle of Leipzie. The Scottish brigade distinguished themselves in this engagement, and contributed largely to the victory by which it was crowned. On this occasion the Scots first employed the method of platoon firing, which spread terror and amazement through the ranks of the Austrians.* By this decisive victory, the whole German empire was laid open to the invaders, from the shores of the Baltic to the Rhine, and from the mouth of the Oder to the sources of the Danube. At a conference which, a short time previous to this battle, was held between Gustavus and Hamilton at Werben, on the Elbe, a plan of co-operation was arranged by which, in order to secure a retreat in the event of a reverse, British troops were stationed at Custrin, Frankfort, and Lansberg.

Hamilton now marched with his victorious forces towards Silesia, and after taking the frontier town of Guben, advanced upon Glogau, which, as it was not in a condition to offer any effectual resistance, would in all probability have been speedily reduced. But at this crisis he was suddenly recalled by Gustavus to Custrin, and thence dispatched to assist in the reduction of Magdeburgh, which had been previously sacked by the imperialists under Tilly, when upwards of thirty thousand of the peaceable inhabitants were cruelly put to the sword. When on the point of encountering a force which was advancing to the relief of the place, he was superseded by Bannier, who arrived bringing with him an order from Gustavus to assume the command of the Dutch and German forces, but not to hazard a battle. On this Hamilton returned to Saltza, and having taken up an advantageous position, refused to abandon it. In the meantime Papenheim, the imperial general, obtained possession of Magdeburgh, but, despairing of being able to retain it, he had the dexterity to evacuate the place, and in the face of a force far outnumbering his own, to carry off unmolested a valuable booty.† Hamilton afterwards took possession of the town; but his force, wasted by pestilence, privation, and the sword, was now reduced to two regiments, which it was judged expedient ultimately to incorporate with the Swedish army. Charles now pressed for the restoration of the Elector Palatine; but Gustavus, whose ambition had expanded with his conquests, and who had begun to entertain the vast idea of subjugating all Germany to his sway, refused his concurrence except on conditions which would reduce the Elector to the rank of a vassal, and the Palatinate to a mere province of the Swedish monarchy.‡ Hamilton was in consequence recalled with disgust, and the compact with Sweden was annulled. Gustavus, a few weeks afterwards, fell in the battle of Lutzen, just as his troops were achieving their greatest and most memorable victory. After the death of Gustavus, the veteran Scots continued to follow the fortunes of his generals, and were from time to time joined by fresh bands of their countrymen, eager to participate in their life of perilous adventure, and to pursue, like them, the path of military renown.

Charles, who had now reached the tenth year of his reign, had long felt a desire to revisit Scotland, the land of his nativity, and the ancient kingdom of a long line of his royal ancestors. His visit had hitherto been delayed by the unsettled state of public affairs in his southern dominions; but a temporary calm had now ensued, of which he resolved to take advantage for the gratification of his long-cherished wish. He left London on the 17th of May, accompanied by a numerous and splendid retinue. Besides the officers of the royal household, who formed a body of no inconsiderable magnitude, he was attended by about five hundred English noblemen, gentlemen, and ecclesiastics, including the bigoted and intolerant Laud, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, who came to regulate the forms of devotion in the Scottish Church. The king's progress through England was in the style of magnificence customary at this period. On his arrival at Berwick he remained four days, and his subsequent journey to the capital of Scotland was performed with undiminished pomp and display. At Seton he became the guest of the Earl of Winton, and at Dalkeith he was entertained by the Earl of Morton; and both these noblemen emulated the English nobility in the costly grandeur of the reception which they accorded to their royal visitor. Such, indeed, was the extravagant and senseless profusion of many of the Scottish nobility on this occasion, that the embarrassment and even ruin in which some of them were thereby involved, became subsequently a partial cause of disquiet.* Charles left Dalkeith on the 15th of June, and, according to the old custom, made his public entry into the capital by the West Port. Ere he had reached this barrier, however, he was met by Drummond of Hawthornden, who welcomed him in a long congratulatory address, abounding in fulsome adulation, which did no honour to his fine poetical genius. The pageantry on this occasion exceeded in magnificence and costliness anything of that description that had ever been exhibited in Scotland. The reception which Charles met with from all ranks of his northern subjects evinced a depth and fervour of loyalty which it had been well for him, and for the country, if he had wisely laboured to conserve. On his entering the gates he was received by the magistrates and other members of the municipal council in their robes of office—those of the magistrates consisting of red velvet trimmed with fur, while the council were arrayed in black gowns faced with velvet. The provost, after a short address, presented the king with a basin of pure gold, valued at five thousand merks, and into this costly receptacle were poured from a purse, richly embroidered, a thousand double golden angels. This valuable gift, however, was claimed by the Marquis of Hamilton, master of the king's horse, as one of the perquisites of his office. The royal procession now moved onward amid the acclamations of the assembled citizens, and after a series of ceremonious interruptions at different points on the route, Charles, who rode on horseback, the better to be seen by his affectionate subjects, at length reached

“That noble, stately dome

Such was the anxiety of the Scots to efface the impression of that poverty with which they had been taunted by their English fellow-subjects, that they expended on this reception, including the present, forty-one thousand four hundred and eighty-nine pounds Scottish money.*

Next day being Sunday, the king attended the chapel-royal, where a sermon was preached by the Bishop of Dunblane. The interior of the edifice had been newly fitted up in anticipation of the royal visit, and embellished with many curious and costly ornaments.

The ceremony of the coronation took place on the Tuesday following. Charles's Coronation of popularity had reached its height. Charles.

We are now to witness its decline and utter extinction. Many circumstances which were intended to render the celebration imposing and impressive, excited in the minds of the people profound abhorrence, as well as anxiety and alarm. An altar was erected, covered with tapestry, and behind it was hung a piece of gorgeous tapestry, embroidered with a crucifix, before which the bishops, as they passed, were observed to bow the knee.† On the altar were placed two books, or something meant to resemble books, with clasps, two chandeliers, two wax tapers unlighted, and an empty silver basin.‡ The prelates were arrayed in blue silk embroidered robes reaching to the feet; and above these were worn white rochets, with lawn sleeves and loops of gold. These innovations, which were regarded as harbingers of popery, and were scarcely less offensive to the people than the mass itself, were imputed to Laud, who, by his furious zeal in the cause of episcopacy, in its most exaggerated form, had acquired an ascendancy over the mind of the king, and rendered himself odious to the great body of the Scottish people. Even the more moderate among the prelates were scandalised by the semi-Romish practices which he laboured to introduce. On this occasion, the Archbishop of Glasgow refused to officiate in the garish apparel that had been provided for him—on which Laud became so exasperated, that, laying violent hands on the recusant prelate, he dragged him from his seat by the king's side, in the presence of the whole august assembly.* The crown was placed on the king's head by Spottiswood, Archbishop of St. Andrew's; and the Bishop of Moray, who had been appointed to the office of lord-almoner, exercised his new functions in scattering among the spectators within the chapel handfuls of silver medals commemorative of the coronation of Charles as king of Scotland. The coronation sermon was preached by Laud, and consisted, for the most part, of an intemperate and declamatory harangue in favour of conformity.†

On the day after the coronation, a parliament Meeting of parliament. was held in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, whither the king proceeded in great state, surrounded by his English foot-guard, and attended by the high officers of the crown and the whole Estates. He was mounted on a chestnut-coloured horse, and was arrayed in a purple velvet robe, which had been worn on solemn occasions by his ancestor, James IV., and which was of such ample dimensions that it flowed over the tail of his charger, and was only prevented from sweeping the ground by being borne up by five grooms of honour who walked behind; on his head was a hat surmounted by a bunch of white feathers. The cavalcade proceeded from the abbey up the Canongate, Netherbow, and High Street, in the centre of which a pathway was railed in, while thousands of the assembled citizens thronged the space on each side. The sword of state was carried by the Earl of Buchan, the sceptre by the Earl of Rothes, and the crown by the Marquis of Douglas, who had on his right hand the Duke of Lennox, and on his left the Marquis of Hamilton.‡

This parliament sat only two days. The first was devoted to the election of the lords of the articles; and, to secure their subserviency to the court, a new artifice was employed. The prelates were named by the chancellor; they, in turn, nominated the temporal peers, and both conjointly selected the burgesses and lesser barons from the third estate. On the second day a subsidy was granted, the largest that had ever been voted to any king of Scotland. A land tax of thirty shillings, to subsist for six years, was agreed to, amounting in the aggregate to four hundred thousand pounds Scotch, besides the sixteenth penny of all annual rents or interest of money. In addition to this, the rate of interest, which was then at ten per cent., was reduced to eight, and the two per cent. thus kept back from the creditor were granted for three years to the government.

The Scottish parliament, shortly after the accession of James to the throne of England, had servilely passed an act extending the royal prerogative as far as the despotic tendencies of that monarch inclined him to assume; and three years afterwards they conceded to him the power of prescribing the robes to be worn by judges, lawyers, and magistrates, and of regulating the apparel of ecclesiastics. The latter, which was intended merely as a piece of courtly adulation, flattering to James's vanity and weakness, was conferred as a personal favour, but was never meant to establish a precedent. These two acts the lords of the articles now artfully combined with an act confirming all the statutes respecting religion as then established. The parliament, however, though sufficiently obsequious to have confirmed the royal prerogative to the most unlimited extent, had the sagacity to perceive the designs of the apparently harmless claim of the king to regulate ecclesiastical vestments. Judging from the gaudy trappings worn by the prelates at the coronation, they saw reason to expect the introduction of the cope and the white surplice, which were so intimately associated with the superstition and idolatry of Rome; while a confirmation of religion, as then established, would be lending the whole authority of the state to the perpetuation of all the recent changes, and, through the undefined extent of the royal prerogative, perhaps opening a door for farther innovations still more abhorrent to the people. On the reading of the act, Lord Melville, an aged nobleman, exclaimed, "I have sworn with your father and the whole kingdom to the Confession of Faith, in which the innovations intended by these articles were solemnly abjured."* The unanswerable argument contained in this brief but forcible address took the king wholly by surprise. He attempted no reply, but, evidently much discomposed, after a few moments' hesitation retired to an adjoining chamber. On his return, the members were proceeding to resume their deliberations, when the king, in contemptuous violation of the privileges of parliament, authoritatively commanded them not to debate, but to vote. Violation of the privileges of parliament by the king. The Earl of Rothes, who led the opposition, proposed that, as so much difference of opinion existed respecting the clerical habits, the acts should be considered separately. This, however, would be to traverse the subtle policy of the court. The king peremptorily refused to accept of the act confirming the prerogative apart from that for the regulation of ecclesiastical costume, and insisted that both should be passed or both rejected; and, at the same time, producing a list of the members, he exclaimed, "Your names are here, I shall know to-day who will do me service."† This undisguised attempt to overawe the members of the legislature by the threatened displeasure of the sovereign, was succeeded by an act of criminal baseness without a parallel in parliamentary history. On the vote being taken, it was found that the articles were rejected by a majority—fifteen peers and forty-five commoners having voted against them; and, amongst the minority, it was even asserted that there were several peers who had voted twice—first in their capacity as officers of state, and afterwards as members of the legislature.* Notwithstanding this, the lord-register, Sir John Hay of Landes, had the effrontery to report that the articles were carried in the affirmative. There cannot be a doubt that this outrageous and shameless violation of truth and honesty was perpetrated with the connivance of the king and the court, who had reserved it as a last resource in case of defeat. It is not to be supposed that Hay would have placed himself in such a perilous position without express authority, as a falsification of the parliamentary record was a capital crime. Hay, indeed, was a fit instrument to be employed in such a nefarious transaction. He is characterised as "a sworn enemy to religion, and a slave to the bishops." On the announcement of the register, the Earl of Rothes immediately rose and contradicted it, affirming that the votes had been either falsely reported or wrongly collected, and that the negatives were the majority. The conduct of the king, if it did not betray his complicity, fully identified him with this vile fraud. Although he had before him the list which he had previously produced, and on which he had marked the votes with his own hand, he interposed his authority to prevent a scrutiny, and declared the report of the register to be conclusive, unless Rothes should choose to appear at the bar of the house and accuse him of having falsified the parliamentary record. He at the same time warned the pertinacious earl, that as this would be tantamount to a charge of treason, he would, if he failed to prove it, expose himself to a capital punishment. With the example of Lord Ochiltree before him, Rothes prudently declined to exercise this dangerous privilege; and the acts which had just been negatived by the legislature, received the royal assent, and, being touched by the sceptre, became law.†

This infamous conduct was fatal to Charles's

popularity in Scotland. The loyal and affectionate sentiments which had pervaded the public mind on his first arrival were exchanged for feelings of disappointment, suspicion, and disgust. The parliament, though in general meanly subservient to the court, was regarded by the people as their only legal protection against the encroachments of arbitrary power; but if its members were thus to be overawed, its deliberations repressed, and its records vitiated, it was plain that even the semblance of public liberty was at an end, and that the most wanton acts of oppression might now be perpetrated, unchallenged, by the king and his council. These sentiments, which were generally entertained, and openly expressed by the people, were participated in by the nobility, including even those who had voted for the obnoxious articles. They saw that a blow had been aimed at their independence, that their voice in the legislature was about to be reduced to a mere empty form, and that their personal influence as peers of parliament, in the management of public affairs, was on the point of being extinguished. The nobles, whose opposition had been marked by the king, now dreaded the effect of his resentment. The least they had to expect was exclusion from his favour, and from all share in the titles of honour which he was now scattering with a profusion that diminished their value. During his brief residence in Scotland, he conferred the honour of knighthood on not fewer than fifty-four individuals; and at his coronation alone he created eight lords, two viscounts, ten earls, and one marquis. The king's wrath against the lords of the opposition was studiously inflamed by the bishops, who represented them as the personal enemies of the sovereign, and as the authors or abettors of schism and sedition. As they had anticipated, they were shut out from every ray of royal favour; the king took every opportunity of mortifying them by his neglect or open contempt; and, when they appeared at court, he either received them in sullen silence, or assailed them with bitter and insolent reproaches, by which he at once lowered his own dignity, and excited, as he afterwards experienced, the very enmity with which they were then falsely charged. In a tour which he made through a portion of the country, he publicly insulted them by his haughty and scornful treatment. He had visited Linlithgow, Stirling, and other places of interest; and when proceeding to Dunfermline, the place of his birth, the Earl of Rothes, then sheriff of Fife, and Lord Lindsay, acting as baillie of the regality of St. Andrew's, desirous of testifying their loyalty to their sovereign, assembled the gentlemen of the county and other friends, to the number of two thousand horsemen, to welcome the king on his entrance into the shire. Similar honours had been paid by the gentlemen of other counties, and had been graciously accepted by Charles; but on this occasion his majesty testified his contempt by changing his route, and proceeding by a private and unfrequented path, and the loyal cavalcade, after impatiently awaiting his approach for several hours, at last became aware of the insult with which they had been treated, and indignantly dispersed. Contempt is less easily forgotten or forgiven than positive injury, and not even kings can indulge it with impunity. The conduct of Charles on this occasion contributed not a little to alienate the affections of the people of Scotland. He himself was among the first to observe the alteration in their demeanour, though it was evident from the surprise he expressed that he was blind to its cause. He had been addressing himself to Lesley, the Bishop of the Isles, in terms of astonishment at his sudden loss of popular favour, when that prelate made the remarkable and well-known reply, that "the behaviour of the Scots was like that of the Jews, who one day saluted the Lord's Anointed with hosannahs, and the next cried out, Crucify him."*

On his majesty's return from Fife, he narrowly escaped being drowned in the Frith of Forth. When about half way across, a sudden squall arose, which upset the boat containing his plate, and he himself with much difficulty and danger got on board a ship of war which happened to be near, and which conveyed him in safety to Leith.†

In the midst of the dissensions regarding ecclesiastical discipline and rites, the controversy. nation was still farther agitated by a new element of contention affecting some of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion. The peculiar tenets of Arminius had found their way into the Church, and were zealously advocated by no less an authority than that of Laud, who at this time, on the demise of Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, had been promoted to the primacy. As these doctrines were generally believed to be the harbingers of popery, the excitement of the clergy still attached to presbyterianism, as well as of their adherents, who formed the great mass of the nation, was raised to the highest pitch.

Charles now began to think of terminating a visit which had lost him the confidence and affections of his Scottish subjects, without apparently producing to himself any solid or compensating advantage; but before his departure he was guilty of a piece of superstitious folly, which was regarded by every rational and well-informed person with supreme contempt. This was no other than the solemn farce of pretending to cure scrofula by the royal touch. On the 4th of June, the day dedicated to St. John the Baptist, he repaired in state to the chapel-royal, where one hundred diseased persons were assembled, awaiting the performance of the ceremony. After presenting an offering upon the altar, he condescended to touch them all individually; and in commemoration of such a remarkable event, to suspend by a white silken ribbon from the neck of each patient a gold medal coined expressly for the occasion.‡

Charles quitted the Scottish capital on the 18th of July, and proceeded directly to Berwick. Here he left his retinue, with the exception of forty individuals, attended by whom he posted precipitately to Greenwich, to visit the queen, who had recently given birth to her second son, afterwards James VII. of Scotland and Second of England.

Shortly before the departure of the king, the peers who had incurred his displeasure by their opposition in parliament, and who had been stigmatised by the prelates as enemies to the government, anxious to vindicate their characters from this unmerited reproach, prepared an humble petition to his majesty, in which they requested him, in the most respectful terms, to consider that in the deliberations of parliament on matters of public importance differences of opinion had always existed, but no prince had hitherto visited with his displeasure those peers who had voted in the minority. While they admitted the royal prerogative in its most unlimited form, they were desirous of explaining to his majesty that they had been constrained to dissent from the articles of which it formed a part, through an apprehension, which was generally entertained, that some important innovations in ecclesiastical matters were about to be introduced. They were confirmed in these apprehensions by the circumstance that divers papists had been admitted into parliament, and even chosen as lords of the articles, in contravention of the laws by which they were declared incapable of forming a part of any judicial tribunal; and they modestly complained that by the conjunction of the act of 1609 respecting ecclesiastical habits, with that of 1606 regarding the prerogative, they had been compelled either to appear to act undutifully towards his majesty by voting against the prerogative, of which they approved, or to violate their consciences by assenting to a measure which they had reason to believe was the harbinger of farther innovations in the Church. They noticed, as an evidence of their loyalty, the readiness with which they had concurred in voting the supplies; and they implored his majesty to re-consider the articles from which they had dissented, and which they conscientiously believed would in their operation be followed by most pernicious consequences, both to the government of his majesty and to the common-weal. Before formally presenting this supplication, it was prudently resolved to give intimation of it to the king. This office was devolved upon Lord Rothes, by whom the scroll was submitted to the royal inspection. While perusing it, Charles manifested strong symptoms of anger and impatience, and on returning it to Rothes, he said sternly, "No more of this, my lord, I command you." This ungracious reception, accompanied with such a peremptory order from the despotic monarch, induced the petitioners to abandon their design.

Lord Balmerino had, in consequence of his father's disgrace, long lived in retirement, and abstained from all interference in public affairs; but, on the king's visit to Scotland, he had appeared at court, and attended in his place in parliament; and being one of those who had voted against the obnoxious articles, he had been noted by the king, and excluded from royal favour. He had concurred in the petition, and it happened that after all intention of presenting it had been given up, a copy of it still remained in his possession. After the return of Charles to England, finding the public dissatisfaction daily increasing, it occurred to Balmerino, that if the terms of the petition were so softened as to render it acceptable to the king, its presentation might yet be of service to the state.

Under this impression he submitted the scroll to one Dunmoor, a notary, for his advice and assistance and allowed him to carry it home, under strict injunctions that he should not permit it to be transcribed, or even show it to any one. Notwithstanding this, Dunmoor, under a promise of secrecy, exhibited it to Hay of Naughton, Balmerino's private enemy, who surreptitiously obtained a copy, and, in violation of his promise, communicated it to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's. The crafty prelate immediately repaired to court, and laid the document before the king. He characterised it as a paper of most mischievous tendency, falsely affirmed that it was circulated throughout Scotland in order to obtain subscriptions, and urged the king to make a severe example of some of the refractory nobles as a warning to the rest, declaring that nothing but their opposition had rendered so many of the clergy averse to the surplice. Acting on this suggestion, the king issued a commission to inquire into the supposed offence. By a vague and general law, capable of being extended in the hands of the crown lawyers, so as to bring within its toils almost any individual obnoxious to the court, leasing, as it was termed, or the uttering, by speech or writing, anything tending to excite sedition, or to sow dissension between the king and his subjects, was declared to be a capital crime; and all to whose knowledge such reports should come were held to be guilty of the same offence, and liable to the same punishment, if they did not inform against the authors or propagators of the seditious libel, or cause them to be apprehended and delivered up to the public authorities. On this arrest and imprisonment of Balmerino—absurd and oppressive law it was determined that proceedings should be instituted against Balmerino, and on a warrant obtained by Spottiswood, the unfortunate nobleman was arrested and confined in the Castle of Edinburgh. The real author of the offensive petition, Haig, an advocate, having been apprised of these proceedings, escaped from the country, and took refuge in Holland.

In the meantime, diligent preparation was made for the trial of Balmerino, or perhaps, to speak more precisely, for securing his condemnation. It is not easy to see in what Balmerino's alleged crime consisted. The petition was in itself inoffensive, loyal, and respectful; it had already been shown to the king, though not formally presented, and it could not, therefore, on any principle of common sense, be held criminal in one of the petitioners to communicate a copy of it under the seal of secrecy to a confidential friend. But Balmerino had offended the king and the prelates by his opposition in parliament, and, moreover, the greater part of his estates consisted of church lands; and his enemies, led on by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, backed by the influence of the court, and instigated at once by cupidity and revenge, had recourse to the meanest and most unworthy artifices in order to crush their unfortunate victim. He was arraigned on a charge of leasing-making, as the author and abettor of a seditious petition, which was described in the indictment as a mischievous libel, "that depraved the laws, and misconstrued the proceedings of the king in the late parliament; so seditious, that its thoughts infected the very air—a cockatrice which a good subject should have crushed in the egg."* The charge of authorship, which was known to be untenable, and which is even contradicted by a subsequent part of the indictment, was founded on the slight circumstance that certain interlineations in the handwriting of the accused were discovered in the copy in his possession; while the charge of abetting proceeded on the allegation that he had concealed the petition, and suffered the author to escape. In order if possible to insure a conviction, the management of the trial, and the task of looking out for a jury adapted to the purpose, were confided to the Earl of Traquair, the lord-treasurer, a man of high ability, and of great powers of persuasion, who, as the event showed, was in league with the venal judges and officers of state for the perversion of justice. Three assessors, all known to be hostile to the accused, were appointed to the justice-general by the lords of session. These were Learmont, one of their own number; Hay, lord-register; and Spottiswood, their president, second son of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the active and zealous instigator of the prosecution.† Balmerino, who pleaded for himself, reminded the court that the act relating to the concealment of a seditious libel, or neglecting to secure its author, had never in a single instance been enforced, and must therefore, from its manifest severity and injustice, have been considered unfit for execution, and allowed to pass into abeyance. He represented that, even were this otherwise, the act could not apply to cases like the present, in which the sedition, if there was any, was so occult, that it was impossible to discover it without the decision of the court. On the contrary, he never viewed the petition in any other light than as a dutiful and respectful address to his majesty, with a view to conciliate his favour, and to exculpate the petitioners from the charge of disloyalty, by explaining the motives of their public conduct. He remarked, that while he approved of the petition in general, he was dissatisfied with some expressions, which his interlineations were intended to soften, but that such alterations could not reasonably be held to constitute the very offence they were meant to obviate. In conclusion, the matter had been communicated by Lord Rothes to the king, and his majesty having signified his displeasure, all intention of presenting the petition had been abandoned. This statement was corroborated by the Earl of Rothes; but the assessors, nevertheless, sustained the indictment, and referred it to a jury, to be selected from a list furnished mainly or entirely by the Earl of Traquair. At that time the juries in Scotland were nominated by the presiding judge from a return made by the clerk of court, and peremptory challenges were unknown to the law. On this occasion, out of fifteen jurymen who had been nominated, nine were challenged either as the personal enemies of the accused, or as having prejudged the matter they were appointed to investigate. One only of these challenges was sustained. This was in the case of the Earl of Dumfries, who had been heard to say, that if the panel were as innocent as St. Paul, he would find him guilty. The exclusion, however, of the earl was not due to the justice of the court, but to the objection of the lord-advocate. The Earl of Traquair was nominated in his stead; and it now became evident to Balmerino that his condemnation was predetermined by his judges, and that the jury had been selected either from their known subserviency to the crown, or their personal hostility to himself. But notwithstanding all the care that had been bestowed on the selection, the case for the prosecution was on the very point of breaking down from a most unexpected circumstance. Among the persons who had been chosen to serve on the jury was Gordon of Buckie, who had been concerned, about half a century before, in conjunction with the Earl of Huntley, in the murder of the Earl of Moray, and who, on that account, was regarded as one of the most unscrupulous of the number. No sooner, however, had the jury retired to deliberate, than he rose and addressed them, and, with tears streaming down his aged cheeks, and in a voice half choked with emotion, implored them to consider that the life of an innocent man was at stake, whose blood, if they should unjustly condemn him, would lie heavy on their souls to the last hour of their lives. He declared that he had, at an early period of his life, imbrued his hands in innocent blood—a crime for which, indeed, he had obtained a pardon from his sovereign, but that he had passed many sorrowful days and nights before he had obtained peace of conscience from a belief that he had received forgiveness from God. This pathetic appeal produced a visible impression on the jury; but Traquair, who acted as their foreman, remarked, that the point they were called on to determine was neither the severity of the law, which the court had no power to alter, nor the nature of the petition, which the court had already declared to be seditious, but simply whether the prisoner had known of it, and concealed the author. It was contended, on the other hand, by the Earl of Lauderdale, that the jury were judges both of the law and the fact; that a severe law, which, after subsisting for many years, had never been acted on, must be held to be annulled; and that although after the petition had been declared by the court to be seditious, it would be criminal to conceal it, yet as this could not be known until that declaration had been made, it could not be deemed necessary to make the petition known. Various other members of the jury joined in this discussion, which was warmly maintained for several hours, and at its conclusion, on the votes being taken, the jury was found to be equally divided. A verdict of guilty was, however, obtained by the casting vote —his of Traquair, their foreman, and condemnation. sentence of death was immediately pronounced on the unfortunate nobleman; but its execution, to the great dissatisfaction of the bishops, the most active agents in the prosecution, was delayed during the pleasure of the king.*

The proceedings against Balmerino excited an extraordinary ferment in the public Popular com-mind. Notwithstanding the utmost motion. efforts of the magistrates to prevent any popular demonstration, crowds assembled tumultuously in the streets during the trial. Some prayed aloud for the preservation of Balmerino, and publicly applauded the efforts of his friends in his defence, while others imprecated vengeance on the heads of his enemies. When the result became known, the indignation of the populace knew no bounds, and a most alarming crisis seemed to be at hand. Men assembled in secret to deliberate what course to pursue, and a resolution was adopted either to break open the doors of the prison and set Balmerino at liberty, or, if that attempt should fail, to avenge his death on the judges by whom he had been condemned, and the jurors who had concurred in his conviction. Nor was this determination a mere empty ebullition of impotent passion. The actors in the contemplated tragedy had their parts actually assigned to them. One party undertook to burn the houses of the obnoxious individuals, and another to put them to death. Traquair, on learning his danger, hastened to court, and represented to his majesty that although Balmerino had justly forfeited his life, it would not be advisable in the present state of Scotland to carry the sentence passed against him into execution. After a tedious imprisonment, a warrant was granted for his liberation; but it was not until some months afterwards that the doom Liberation and pardon of Balmerino. which still hung over him was cancelled by a reluctant pardon. The forgiveness thus extended to a man who had been guilty of no crime has been by some historians ascribed, though with great improbability, to the intercession of Laud, while others have absurdly imputed it to the royal clemency.† But, in point of fact, it was a concession extorted from Charles by public opinion—an element in the social system which has been subsequently more fully developed, and which no government, however strong, can now safely disregard.

The persecution of Balmerino, as impolitic as it was unjust, was fatal to the inter- Popular dis-rests of Charles in Scotland. The content. great body of the people had long beheld, with sullen though helpless discontent, the perversion of the course of justice, the gradual extinction of public liberty, the invasion of the independence of parliament, and the encroachments of arbitrary power.

The nobility, who had hitherto regarded these contents with indifference, were now constrained to make common cause with the people. They began to see that their hereditary rank, wealth, and influence, afforded them no protection from the tyranny of the crown, or the still more intolerable tyranny of the prelates. The fate of Balmerino, whose only offence was his opposition to the court in his legitimate capacity as a member of the legislature, convinced them that innocence could no longer shield them from punishment, if they should happen to incur the suspicion of the monarch or the resentment of the bishops; and that all freedom of speech or writing, in any matter of public interest, was only to be exercised at the hazard of liberty or life. An expression casually dropped in a moment of disappointment or irritation, or still worse, if merely overheard, and concealed through motives of honour, friendship, or humanity, might involve an innocent man in ruin. Even the last refuge of the oppressed, complaint and petition, were now held as crimes of the first magnitude: complaint was sedition, remonstrance and petition were treasonable offences. Were the ancient and haughty nobility of Scotland tamely to bend the neck to the double yoke of royal and ecclesiastical oppression? Were all patriotic aspirations to be stifled within their own bosoms, that a bigoted and tyrannical prince, and a body of vulgar, servile, and intolerant ecclesiastics might be left free to work their will, to trample down the liberties of the nation, and to lay its most venerated institutions prostrate in the dust? It was believed that popular indignation alone had saved Balmerino; and it was recollected that a union between the nobles and the people had in former times proved more than a match for a despotical monarch and an intolerant priesthood. Already had the nobles begun to contemplate a return to this policy of their ancestors, and to look for safety to themselves, and deliverance for the nation, to a general confederacy of all ranks of the community.

In the meantime the ambition and rapacity of the clergy became every day more offensive. They aimed at nothing less than seizing on the whole temporal as well as ecclesiastical power in the State. Not a secular office of political influence, and especially of any considerable emolument, became vacant that was not eagerly, and, in general, successfully grasped at by some aspiring churchman. None of that order had ever since the Reformation been permitted to hold the office of chancellor, but at this time, on the death of Kinnoul, who held the great seal, his office was conferred on Archbishop Spotiswood, who, though now far advanced in life, was ambitious to occupy the first position under the crown, as well as to fill the highest office in the Church. The second office in the State, that of lord-treasurer, which had been held by Traquair, was next solicited by Maxwell, Bishop of Ross; and such was the worldly ambition of ecclesiastical dignitaries, and the ready acquiescence of the king in their insatiable demands, that, of fourteen prelates, not fewer than nine had found their way into the privy council. Their influence in the management of public affairs thus became irresistible, and their presumption and arrogance, which were commensurate with their power, gave deep offence to the nobility,* and contributed, in the end, to hasten their downfall. They now proposed a revival of the order of mitred abbots, to supersede the lords of erection in parliament, and to be endowed with their impropriated tithes and revenues. They also procured a warrant from the king authorising them to establish, in the various dioceses into which the country was divided, subordinate courts, invested with all the unconstitutional and inquisitorial powers of the court of high commission. Armed with an authority almost unlimited and irresponsible, and mistaking the gloomy silence of the nation for submission or apathy, they proceeded to the most arbitrary and wanton acts of oppression. Among other instances of high-handed tyranny with which the records of that period abound, one may be cited as a specimen. The aged minister of Kirkcudbright, Robert Glendinning, then in his eightieth year, having refused either to conform, or to admit into his pulpit any of the conforming clergy, was deprived by the Bishop of Galloway in the commission court of his diocese; and because the magistrates of Kirkcudbright persisted in attending the ministrations of their pastor, and his son, who was one of their number, refused to imprison his venerable parent, the whole of them were, by an order of the bishop, consigned to the jail at Wigton.†

A crisis was now rapidly approaching, and it was not long before that point was reached beyond which endurance ceases. By a royal mandate alone, without the intervention of a General Assembly, and contrary to the advice and remonstrances of the privy council, and even many of the prelates themselves, the whole system of presbyterian polity and worship was abrogated, and the book of presbyterianism canons and the liturgy violently by royal edict.

thrust upon the people of Scotland; while the impugning of these compilations in any point, opposition to the authority of the bishops, or a refusal to conform to the new ritual, was followed by excommunication, which subjected the contumacious to the highest civil penalties. Even the rights of private citizenship were abridged, and the liberty of the press destroyed, by ecclesiastical authority, with a view to its own consolidation. No one was allowed to exercise the profession of a secular teacher, either privately or in public schools, without a licence from the archbishop of the district; and no book was allowed to be printed, unless it had been previously perused and approved of by functionaries appointed for that purpose, to whose discretion was left the penalty of disobedience.* The universal alarm and indignation of all ranks at this crisis were aggravated by the belief or suspicion that the ecclesiastical changes now sought to be effected were preparatory to the introduction of popery itself. Nor do these fears appear to have been altogether groundless, for it was held as a maxim by Laud, and many of the Scottish prelates, that the Church of Rome, though greatly corrupted, was still to be revered as the original or mother Church, to which, by mutual concessions, Protestants might eventually be reconciled.†

The great point aimed at in the meantime was, complete conformity between the two sections of the kingdom in ecclesiastical matters. This was an object which Laud had so much at heart, and to accomplish which he made such strenuous efforts, that he has been by some historians held responsible for all the fatal consequences that followed the attempt to enforce it. "His zeal for an uniformity between the two nations in point of liturgy," says Dr. Welwood, "proved the fatal torch which put the two kingdoms into a flame." During the visit of Charles to Scotland, when this important matter was under consideration, it was proposed to introduce the English Prayer-book, with a view to insure complete uniformity. This, however, was a point which the Scottish prelates, notwithstanding all their pliancy, were unwilling to concede. They were jealous of the least appearance of dependence on the Church of England, and desired a liturgy of their own. Laud endeavoured to overcome their reluctance by representing to them that uniformity was not only desirable in itself, but was necessary in order to stop the mouths of the papists, whose creed admitted of no diversity, and who, glorying in its fixed and unchangeable character, which they regarded as a consequence, if not an evidence of infallibility, taunted Protestants for admitting different liturgies.‡ The Scottish bishops, however, for once were inflexible, and the king and Laud felt constrained to acquiesce, without even obtaining any assurance of conformity. The utmost they could extort from the obstinate prelates was, a promise that the prayers should contain nothing either heretical or seditious.§ The task of com-

Compilation of a liturgy for Scotland. piling a national liturgy was devolved on the Bishops of Ross and Dunblane; but, when completed, it was found to differ from that of the English Church chiefly in the title. The substance, with the exception of a few slight variations, omissions, and additions, was identical. In proportion, however, as it had receded from the English service-book, it was found to have approached the Romish missal; and, on its being sent to London for revision, some alterations were made by Laud, which rendered the approximation still closer. The instructions which accompanied the new liturgy rendered it still more unacceptable to the people of Scotland. The alms of the congregation were appointed to be presented as an offering on the communion-table, which was decorated with a sumptuous covering, and placed in the east; and the deacon, when presenting the offerings to be placed on the altar, was to offer a memorial or prayer of oblation. In the celebration of the eucharist, the officiating clergyman was directed to pass from the north side to the front of the altar, and to stand with his back to the congregation while he consecrated the elements. The form of prayer prescribed for this occasion seems to have been purposely framed so as to express, though in a manner somewhat ambiguous, the detested doctrine of transubstantiation. "Hear us, merciful Father," so the invocation runs, "and out of thy omnipotent goodness grant that Thou mayest so bless and sanctify, by thy word and Holy Spirit, these thy gifts, these thy creatures of bread and wine, that they may be to us the body and blood of thy beloved Son." In apparent imitation of the elevation of the host, the minister was directed by a note on the margin, while pronouncing the words "This is my body," to lift up the plate containing the bread in his hands, and in like manner to elevate the cup while repeating the words, "This is the blood of the New Testament." The baptismal water poured into the font was directed to be consecrated by prayer, and the sign of the cross to be made with it in baptism. It was further enjoined that the water should be changed and consecrated twice a month, and reserved in the font for future administration. The ring was appointed to be employed in marriage, which was regarded as a religious ceremony rather than a civil contract. Finally, thanks were ordered to be offered for departed saints, in imitation of the Romish practice of praying for the dead; and several new names were, at the same time, added to the calendar. These deviations from the English ritual, instead of rendering the new liturgy more acceptable, only increased the suspicion and intensified the aversion of the people. It was reported and believed that Laud and the bishops had conspired surreptitiously to introduce the mass, of which, it was alleged, the new liturgy was a translation. The alarm thus occasioned, far from being confined to the populace, affected all ranks of the community, including nearly the whole of the nobility.

When the liturgy was in course of formation, it was impossible to expect that its observance could be enforced without some fresh show of royal authority. Accordingly a book of canons was compiled, and confirmed by the royal supremacy, which was in turn absurdly confirmed by the same code of ecclesiastical law, and extended to "whatever the kings of Israel or the emperors of the primitive Church had assumed."*

On the publication of the canons, the whole body of the presbyterians manifested unmistakable symptoms of determined and uncompromising opposition. Their objections were twofold, and applied both to the matter enjoined and to the manner in which it was imposed. It may be proper to specify at length some of the articles chiefly objected to, as they will serve to throw light on the popular commotions by which the country was shortly afterwards convulsed, and of which, in fact, they were the primary cause.

1. "That whosoever should affirm the king's majesty had not the same authority in causes ecclesiastical that the godly kings had among the Jews, or the Christian emperors in the primitive Church, or impugn in any part his royal supremacy in causes ecclesiastical, was to incur the censure of excommunication.

2. "The like censure was to pass upon those who should affirm the worship contained in the book of common prayer and administration of the sacraments, or that the government of the Church by archbishops and bishops, &c., contained anything repugnant to the Scriptures, or was corrupt, superstitious, or unlawful in the service and worship of God."

In estimating the severity of this penalty, it should be kept in mind that it involved, as its civil effects, the terrible punishment of confiscation and outlawry.

3. "That ordinations were restrained in four terms of the year, that is, the first weeks of March, June, September, and December.

4. "That every ecclesiastical person, at his admission, should take the oath of supremacy according to the form required by parliament; and the like oath for avoiding simony, required in the book of consecration.

5. "That every presbyter shall, either by himself or by another person lawfully called, read or cause divine service to be done, according to the form of the book of the Scottish common prayer, before all sermons; and that he should officiate by the said book of common prayer in all the offices, parts, and rubrics of it."

Absurd as it may seem, this canon, as well as the second and fifteenth, refer to the new liturgy, which had not only never been seen by the parties on whom it was enjoined, but which, as it was not then completed, could not have been seen even by the king himself, on whose authority it was sought to be enforced.

6. "That no preacher should impugn the doctrine delivered by another in the same church, or any adjacent one, without leave from the bishop.

7. "That no presbyter should hereafter be cautioner or surety for any person whatsoever, in civil bonds or contracts, under the penalty of suspension.

8. "That the remainder of the bread and wine prepared for the communion should be given to the poorer sort of those who received that day, and which was to be eat and drank by them before they went out of the church."

This canon gave special offence, as it was supposed tacitly to imply that the elements had been actually transubstantiated.

9. "Presbyters are enjoined to administer the sacrament of baptism without distinction of days in case of sickness and danger, and the people are required to receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper in a kneeling position.

10. "That in all sentences of separation, a thoro et mensa, there shall be a condition inserted, and security given, that the persons divorced shall live regularly and unlicentiously, and not marry again during each other's life.

11. "That no private meeting be held by presbyters, or any other persons whatsoever, for expounding Scripture or debating matters ecclesiastical; things of this nature being only to be discussed in synods of bishops.

12. "That, under the penalty of excommunication, no presbyter or layman, jointly or severally, shall be allowed to make rules, orders, or constitutions, in causes ecclesiastical, or to add or take away from any rubrics, articles, or other things now established, without the authority of the king or his successors.

13. "That national or general assemblies are to be called only by the king's authority, and that the decrees of such assemblies, in matters ecclesiastical, should bind the absent; and that it should not be lawful for the bishops themselves, in such assemblies or elsewhere, to alter any article, rubric, canon, doctrinal or disciplinary, without his majesty's leave first had and obtained.

14. "That no man should be covered in time of divine service, unless with a cap or night-coif in case of ill health; and that all persons shall reverently kneel at the reading the confession, and other prayers, and stand up at the creed.

15. "That no presbyter or reader shall be permitted to pray ex tempore, or use any other form in the public service than that prescribed, under the penalty of deprivation.

16. "That all presbyters and preachers shall exhort the people to join with them in prayer, using some few and suitable expressions, and always concluding with the Lord's Prayer.

17. "That no person should teach, either in public schools or private houses, unless licensed by the archbishop of the province, or by the bishop of the diocese, under their hand and seal; and that none are thus to be licensed, unless men of orthodox belief and conformity to the orders of the Church.

18. "That none should be admitted to read in any college without qualifying themselves by taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy.

19. "That nothing shall be printed unless first perused and allowed by the visitors appointed for that purpose, the penalty of contravention being left (as in all other cases where no penalty is expressed) to the discretion of the bishops.

20. "That no public fasts shall be appointed upon Sundays (as has been customary), and that the appointment of such humiliations be made by none but his majesty.

21. "That for administering the sacrament of baptism a font shall be prepared, and fixed near the church-porch, according to ancient usage; that a fine linen cloth should likewise be provided for this purpose, and all decently kept.

22. "That a decent table for celebrating the holy communion should be provided, and set at the upper end of the chancel or church. That, at the time of divine service, the table shall be covered with a handsome stuff carpet, and when the holy eucharist is administered, with a white linen cloth; and that basins, cups, and chalices, of some fine metal, shall be provided to furnish the communion-table, and used only for that purpose.

23. "That such bishops and presbyters as shall happen to be without issue, shall leave their effects, or a great part of them, to pious uses; and in case they had issue, they should bestow some legacies, as a mark of their affection, upon the Church, and for promoting the interest of religion.

24. "That no sentence of excommunication should be pronounced, or absolution given, by any presbyter without the leave and approbation of the bishop; and that no presbyter should discover anything told him in confession to any person whatsoever, excepting the crime is such that by the laws of the realm his own life may be in danger by concealing it.

25. "And, lastly, that no person shall be admitted to holy orders, nor suffered to preach, catechise, administer the sacraments, or perform any other ecclesiastical function without first subscribing the canons."*

The publication of these canons excited a profound sensation throughout Scotland. Even the most moderate objected to the almost absolute authority and unlimited jurisdiction which they conferred on the bishops, and saw in them either the revival, or a prelude to the revival, of popish idolatry and superstition. The authority by which they were imposed, so contrary to the usage of the Church, at once shocked and alarmed the presbyterian party. They had never been discussed, much less passed by their assemblies, which were thus virtually ignored; while the simple authority of the sovereign had usurped their place, and handed over the Church to the control of a junto of ambitious and intolerant ecclesiastics, whose tendency towards popery was painfully evident. The whole structure of ecclesiastical polity which had been established at the Reformation, and which had then and subsequently been solemnly and repeatedly ratified by the Estates in parliament, was now overturned at one blow. The convening of general assemblies now depended solely on the royal will and pleasure; while the subordinate church courts were proscribed as unlawful conventicles, and all ecclesiastical causes made cognisable by a tribunal composed of bishops alone. Even men who cared little about church government or modes of worship were now arrayed in hostility against the obnoxious canons, by which they perceived that their civil liberties were undermined, and freedom of speech and writing restrained by the dread of an ecclesiastical sentence followed by most disastrous civil penalties.

In the meantime, a proclamation had been issued, announcing the completion of the ^{Proclamation} liturgy, and enjoining universal ^{enjoining} conformity at the approaching ^{conformity.}

Easter term, to the ritual therein prescribed. All archbishops, bishops, and subordinate church functionaries were ordered, under the penalty of escheat, to provide themselves before that time with two copies of the work, and diligently to enforce conformity by bringing all recusants to condign punishment.

When the publication made its appearance, no threats could protect it from animadversion. It was keenly criticised both in public and private. Its manifest approach in various particulars to the Romish missal was openly and unsparingly condemned; and many of its clauses were boldly denounced from the pulpit, where it formed a constant theme of exciting discourse. The jealousy of the presbyterian party being now roused to the utmost, they imagined they saw, even in words and actions in themselves innocent or indifferent, some indications of that idolatry which was to them an object of unmitigated abhorrence. A general panic seized upon the ^{Excited state} nation; alarm and suspicion ^{of the public} became epidemic and contagious. ^{mind.}

Exaggerated statements were industriously circulated and greedily believed, and writings were dispersed throughout the country calculated to awaken and perpetuate the vigilance of the presbyterians, and to prepare their minds for a struggle, of the precise nature and full extent of which the most far-seeing had as yet formed only indistinct conceptions. Meanwhile the bishops, with most impolitic zeal, fanned the flame of popular indignation by demanding unreserved obedience to the new ritual in baptism, communion, marriage, burial, prayers, ordination, and preaching, and threatening the contumacious with the ecclesiastical censures inferring deprivation, confiscation, and outlawry.* The presbyterians were thus placed between two fires. To obey would have been not only to do violence to their consciences, but to expose themselves to the reproaches of their brethren, who would not fail to fasten on them the odious charge of idolatry; while to refuse compliance was to incur the risk of ruinous civil penalties, and the imputation at once of hostility to the Church and disaffection to the sovereign. The mutual antipathies of the two parties grew stronger every day; the breach was widened by misapprehensions and misconstructions; and a religious schism, at least, if not a social and political convulsion, seemed to thoughtful and discerning men to be at hand. Meantime the government appeared to exhibit symptoms of irresolution. The day appointed for the introduction of the liturgy had been allowed to pass by without any further attempt to enforce obedience. This delay has been variously accounted for, but there can scarcely be a doubt that it was mainly extorted from the fears not only of the government, but of many of the more moderate among the prelates, who were anxious that the minds of men should be gradually prepared for a change, which, if suddenly and violently thrust upon them, might arouse an opposition too strong to be resisted. The chancellor, and some of the king's faithful friends, apprehensive of the coming storm, ventured to counsel the suspension of his mandate. As far back as the time of Mary, they observed, a fire had been kindled in Scotland which was not yet quenched, and which now, by precipitate measures, might be fanned into a flame which his majesty should never see extinguished.* Others strongly advised a delay of some months, in order that in the interval measures might be concerted for crushing the recusants, and thus rendering the failure of their attempts conducive to the king's design.† Hope, the king's advocate, who was favourable to the presbyterian party, and even the Bishop of Edinburgh, threw their influence into the same scale, and laboured earnestly to obstruct the publication of the new ritual. In the meantime, the presbyterians were not idle. Attributing the delay that had taken place to the timidity and weakness of the government, they called on the nobles and all other friends to their cause, to unite in the formation of a firm league in defence of their civil and religious privileges; and many of their leaders repaired to the capital to concert measures to meet the crisis which was now evidently impending.

That crisis was unexpectedly precipitated through the cupidity of Spottiswood, who had previously manifested so strong a desire to avert it. That prelate, desirous of increasing his already ample revenues by obtaining possession of the tithes of the Abbey of St. Andrew's, which had hitherto been appropriated to the clergy of his diocese, now proposed to fix the salaries of these subordinate ecclesiastical functionaries, and to render them payable by their respective parishes. But the tithes of many of these parishes had already been sold or exhausted; and the Duke of Lennox, the titular from whom they had been purchased, having received money in advance from the tacksmen, was naturally averse to a project which would inevitably bring discredit on his own reputation and that of his family. He accordingly made application to Traquair, the treasurer, and that nobleman, who had not yet forgiven the prelates for attempting to seize upon his office, procured a warrant for the dissolution of the commission of tithes. Enraged at the frustration of his scheme, the archbishop prepared for a visit to court to lay his complaint before the sovereign; and the Archbishop of Glasgow, who had been engaged in a similar design, and had, of course, been similarly disappointed, determined to accompany him. Before setting out, however, they were anxious to do something to conciliate the favour of the king, and of the English primate, in order to obtain a more favourable reception, and a more attentive hearing to their complaint against the treasurer. Though the two Scottish prelates had hitherto, probably from caution, been averse to the precipitate introduction of the liturgy, they now rashly procured an order from the king for its immediate observance; and on the 16th of July intimation was made in all the churches in Edinburgh, that, by the express command of his majesty, the Scottish liturgy should be publicly read on the next Lord's-day. One clergyman alone, Mr. Andrew Ramsay, refused to publish this mandate—an act of disobedience for which he was immediately suspended from his office.

The king orders the immediate observance of the liturgy.

During the interval the greatest agitation prevailed throughout the city. Murmurs and complaints were heard in all quarters; meetings were held, discourses delivered, and pamphlets published, tending to inflame the public mind against the bishops, who were denounced as the authors of these innovations. Notwithstanding all these symptoms of an approaching storm, the haughty prelates, confident in their own strength, backed by the royal authority, made no effort to allay the popular ferment—no attempt, by argument or explanation, to ensure a favourable reception of the new ritual, and no provision against a popular outbreak, if such should occur. On Sunday, the 23rd of July, the Bishop of Argyre, according to appointment, officiated in the forenoon in the Greyfriars' Church. No violent commotion took place, but the voice of the prelate was frequently drowned in the audible weeping, groans, and lamentations of a great part of the audience. At the same time the Dean of Edinburgh prepared to officiate in what was then called the Great Church, now known by the name of St. Giles's Cathedral. He was attended by the chancellor, several of the lords of the privy council, many of the prelates, the judges of the supreme courts, and the magistrates of the city; whilst the vast edifice was crowded by citizens of all ranks, most of whom had probably been attracted by the novelty of the procedure. Quiet prevailed until the dean made his appearance in the pulpit arrayed in his surplice, and began to read the High Church service, when an old woman of Edinburgh.

named Janet Geddes suddenly started up, and exclaiming, "Villain, dost thou say mass at my lug!" hurled at the dean's head the stool on which she had been sitting.* In an instant the service was interrupted, and a scene of uproar and confusion ensued such as was probably never before witnessed in such a place. Many of those by whom Janet was surrounded followed her example, a promiscuous crowd, consisting chiefly of women, invaded the desk with loud execrations and menaces, and the dean, afraid of being torn in pieces, threw off his surplice and fled. The Bishop of Edinburgh then ascended the pulpit, and endeavoured to restore order, but in vain. His attempts to address the people seemed to add fresh fuel to the conflagration. Stones, sticks, and other missiles were thrown at him from every quarter, and, but for the timely interference of the magistrates, the bishop might have fallen a sacrifice to the popular fury. The most outrageous of the rioters were at length, though not without much difficulty, expelled, and the doors having been securely bolted to prevent their return, the dean, emerging from his hiding-place, resumed the service, which however was speedily interrupted or rendered inaudible by the multitude without. The doors were violently assaulted, and the windows broken, amidst deafening shouts of "A pope! a pope! Antichrist! Pull him down! Stone him!" After the conclusion of the service, the dean had the prudence and dexterity to steal away privately, and conceal himself from the infuriated multitude; but the Bishop of Edinburgh, who was an object of intense popular dislike, was either possessed of more personal courage or underrated his danger. He accordingly

Thither he was eagerly followed by some of the more daring and forward of his persecutors, who were proceeding to drag him from his lurking-place, when fortunately the Earl of Roxburgh, who happened to be passing in his coach, seeing the imminent peril to which the prelate was exposed, drove impetuously through the crowd, and succeeded, with the assistance of his servants, in pulling the hapless bishop into the carriage. But his danger was not yet over. Volleys of stones and other missiles were discharged at the vehicle, and had it not been for the earl's attendants, who with drawn swords drove back the multitude, the introduction of the liturgy would most probably have been sealed with the blood of the unfortunate prelate.

Ridiculous attempts were made at the time, and have been subsequently repeated, to represent this tumult—which undoubtedly had no parallel since the Reformation*—as the result of a regularly organised conspiracy. It has been even asserted that it originated in a consultation held in the month of April preceding, by Messrs. Alexander Henderson and David Dickson, with Lord Balmerino and Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, the king's advocate.† There is reason to believe that this statement is purely fabulous. The consternation of the bishops, and the humiliating circumstance of their having been driven from their posts by a commotion originating in the fiery zeal of an obscure old woman, naturally led them to exaggerate the whole affair. The chancellor, whose pride was deeply mortified, wrote in this strain to the king; and, at the same time, took the opportunity of aiming a blow at the credit of his old enemy, the treasurer, by partly ascribing the disturbance to his absence. On the strictest investigation, however, there was found no reason to believe that it had resulted from any preconceived plan. The rioters, it appeared, belonged exclusively to the lowest class of the populace, and of these a large proportion consisted of women. The privy council, and the town-council of Edinburgh, in their representation of the matter to the king, assured his majesty "that, after all inquiry made, it did not at all appear that any above the meaner sort were accessory to that tumult."*

On the following day, the popular ferment continued unabated, business was in a great measure suspended, and tumultuous assemblages crowded the public streets, and held the whole city in a state of feverish excitement. Alarmed by these manifestations, the privy council assembled and issued a proclamation forbidding all disorderly meetings under pain of death, and commanding the magistrates to use the utmost diligence in apprehending such as had been concerned in the uproar of the preceding day. There is no reason to believe that the magistrates yielded a lax or reluctant obedience, but the result clearly showed the spontaneous nature of the disturbance, and the class of persons mainly concerned in it. Some half-a-dozen servant girls were apprehended and committed to prison. The magistrates, who of course were responsible for the peace of the city, felt that, like the town-clerk of Ephesus, they were "in danger to be called in question for this day's uproar." They were especially anxious to deprecate the resentment of Laud, which they dreaded more than even that of the king. They accordingly wrote in abject terms to the imperious and haughty primate, expressing deep concern for what had occurred, protesting their own loyal intentions as evinced by their previous dutiful behaviour, entreating him to intercede with his majesty in their behalf, and promising active and implicit obedience for the time to come. They further offered to give additional stipends to such of the clergy as should conform to the new ecclesiastical arrangements, and to employ every means in their power to secure to them the peaceable exercise of their functions.

In the meantime the city was placed under an ecclesiastical interdict. From an act of the privy council, dated the 29th of July, it appears that the Public worship suspended. the chancellor, in his own name and the names of the other bishops, ordered the reading of the service book to be suspended until his majesty's pleasure regarding the late riots should be farther signified. And as these dignitaries would not tolerate any other than the prescribed form of worship, the week-day meetings which it had been customary to hold for prayer and preaching were prohibited; and, as if the mode of conducting religious exercises was of more importance than the exercises themselves, all public worship was suspended, even on the Sabbath, for the space of a whole month.*

The indignation which such an unusual circumstance could not fail to excite was still further inflamed by the frantic zeal of the prelatial clergy, who chose at this critical juncture to attempt to put in force the former order for the purchase of two copies of the liturgy for each parish. At the instance of the chancellor, letters of horning to that effect were raised against Mr. Alexander Henderson, minister of Leuchars, Mr. George Hamilton, minister of Newburn, and Mr. James Bruce, minister of Kingsburn; † and similar proceedings were instituted by the Archbishop of Glasgow against every presbytery within his diocese.‡ In these trying circumstances one man of equal talent and intrepidity stood forward in defence of the liberties of the Church. This was Alexander Henderson, who had been formerly an episcopalian, but whom a sermon of Bruce's had some time before been the means of gaining over to presbyterianism.§ When the time allowed had nearly expired, he presented for himself and his brethren a supplication to the privy council praying that the charge might be suspended, because the new ritual had neither been decreed by a General Assembly, nor authorised by parliament, whereas the presbyterian discipline and form of worship had been settled by the Church as the only competent authority, and confirmed by repeated statutes.|| Similar petitions were presented by the presbyteries of Irvine, Glasgow, and Ayr, and were recommended by letters from several of the principal nobility, and seconded by the personal application of many influential gentlemen to their friends in the council. To the great mortification of the bishops, these applications were favourably received, and the council decided that the purchase only, not the observance of the liturgy, was required by the charge. The order for reading the liturgy was suspended until further instructions from the king; but, in order to defray the expense of printing the books, they were ordered to be purchased.

The fears of the privy council lest a further persistence in the attempt to force the liturgy on the Church of Scotland might be productive of a dangerous disaffection to the government, were manifested by a representation which they now addressed to the king, in which they informed his majesty that the aversion of the people to the liturgy was daily increasing, and was rapidly spreading among all ranks; that the murmuring and discontent were greater than had ever before been known in Scotland; that they should be guilty of dereliction of duty were they any longer to conceal from their sovereign the alarming condition of the country; and that they durst neither investigate its causes, nor propose a remedy without his permission. They therefore prayed that his majesty would be pleased to call before him some of their number by whom he might be more fully informed on this momentous subject.

All further procedure in the matter was postponed until the 20th of September, and the council intimated to the supplicant ministers that, by that time, an answer should be returned to their petitions.* The petitioners warmly expressed their gratitude to the privy council for this welcome respite, as well as for the favourable representation which had been made to his majesty; and, in the short interval allowed them, resolved to stir up themselves and their brethren to earnest prayer for the prosperity of their cause, and the most strenuous exertions to meet the approaching crisis. The numbers of those openly opposed to the liturgy, and resolved to make a stand in defence of civil and religious liberty daily increased, and they began to exhibit a degree of zeal, activity, and boldness, that at length roused their adversaries from their dream of security. The bishops began to make some exertion to counteract the influence of the popular leaders. They now condescended to attempt a defence of the service-book, and some explanation of its more unpopular passages, in their public discourses from the pulpit. These efforts came all too late. The dignified prelates could not even obtain a patient hearing. Their lectures were interrupted by the indignant outcries of the people, and their persons exposed to insult and menace. By desire of the archbishop, Mr. William Annan, minister of Ayr, preached at the opening of the diocesan assembly of Glasgow, and attempted in his discourse to set up an apology for the liturgy, and to enter on a general defence of set forms of prayer. He was listened to with silent displeasure by the more prudent members of the synod, who judged that, as the matter was then in suspense between the king and the nation, the time chosen for such a disquisition was at least unseasonable. But the great body of the citizens, who held the liturgy in utter abhorrence,† were exasperated to the highest degree; and, when the assembly broke up, the unfortunate preacher was assailed by an infuriated mob, to whose rage he well-nigh fell a victim. He was pursued throughout the day with hootings and execrations, and, on venturing out at night, he was assailed by a multitude of women, chiefly the wives and other near relatives of respectable burgesses, and, in the very presence of the magistrates, was grossly insulted and dangerously maltreated. They beat him with their fists and with stones, and pelted him with peats and other missiles, and after tearing to pieces his hat, coat, and ruff, dismissed him in this woebegone condition to his home. A guard was placed by the magistrates for his protection during the night; and in the morning, when about to take his departure, he was accompanied to his horse by the magistrates, and several of the most popular ministers of the town, whose presence, it was hoped, would be sufficient to prevent any fresh outrage. The people collected in great numbers, and although they offered no molestation to the obnoxious clergyman, his horse, startled by their appearance, unhappily fell almost as soon as he had mounted, and rolling over him "in very foule myre," he was so besmeared with mud that the colour of his clothes could not be distinguished. This sad accident called forth a burst of most mortifying exultation and merriment among the crowd, and the hero of so many mishaps, in most undignified plight, at length made his escape out of the town, amid the unrestrained ridicule, noisy mirth, and derision of the populace.*

The determined opposition of the nation to the designs of the king and the bishops, though at first manifested in a disorderly and tumultuous manner by the lower orders, was speedily joined by the higher classes. In a short time its ranks were swelled by not fewer than twenty noblemen, a great number of barons, and many gentlemen of the first rank. Sixty-eight new supplications were addressed to the council, and among the petitioners, in addition to these noblemen and gentlemen, were nearly a hundred ministers, the provosts of Glasgow, Stirling, Ayr, Irvine, Dunbarton, Dunfermline, Culross, Kirkcaldy, Dysart, Cupar, Lanark, Inverkeithing, Burntisland, and Anstruther;† together with commissioners from sixty-eight parishes, chiefly gentlemen of influence and distinction in the counties of Ayr, Fife, Lothian, Clydesdale, and Stirling. These, without any previous concert, flocked to Edinburgh, and many of them first became aware of their common errand by meeting at the door of the council-house.‡

The king's answer to the representation of the privy council was now expected with the utmost impatience and anxiety, and had that answer been even moderately conciliatory, prelay might still have been maintained under some modification, and the public peace might have been soon restored. Charles was now in the very crisis of his fate. To retreat would have been no derogation from his dignity, for the history of the world might have taught him the utter hopelessness of attempting to coerce the will of a resolute and almost unanimous people. To proceed was, therefore, not only contrary to every dictate of sound policy, it was little less than insanity. Charles's evil genius prevailed, and he recklessly sacrificed to his pride or his bigotry his last opportunity of conciliating the affections of his Scottish subjects. His answer to the council was haughty and reproachful. He censured them severely for their lenity, upbraided them with pusillanimity, and peremptorily refused to listen to their prudent suggestion, that some of their number might be called into his majesty's presence, the better to inform him of the alarming state of the public mind. He intimated his dissatisfaction with the intermission of the service, and the remissness both of the council and the municipal authorities in regard to the punishment of those who had been concerned in the late commotions; and issued a proclamation commanding that the new ritual should be immediately resumed. He enjoined strict obedience to the canons, condemned the proceedings of the supplicants, and prohibited them, under pain of treason, from holding public meetings.

This rash and injudicious mandate, which was brought down by the Duke of Lennox, did not find the supplicants unprepared. They had been secretly apprised of its purport, and had already resolved to refuse obedience. They embodied their numerous petitions into one general supplication, in which they entreated that the execution of the order for enforcing the service should be delayed until they had liberty to state their reasons of dissent and grounds of complaint. This petition, which was signed by not less than twenty peers, was presented to the council by the Earls of Sutherland and Wemyss in the name of the nobility, barons, ministers, and representatives of burghs. These in one united body, every instant augmented by vast accessions of numbers from all quarters, had arranged themselves for the reception of Lennox, who, struck with astonishment at so unexpected a scene, indirectly apologised for the king's offensive letter by declaring that his majesty had been misinformed. In the meantime, the council delayed answering the petitions until his majesty's pleasure concerning them should be further known; but, in order to allay the excitement which prevailed, they promised to acquaint the petitioners with the king's answer so soon as it should be signified to them, and committed the general supplication, together with certain particular petitions from places which had been hitherto esteemed favourable to the innovations, to the care of the Duke of Lennox, who agreed to transmit them to the king. He was, at the same time, earnestly requested by the council to endeavour to undeceive his majesty regarding the state of public feeling in Scotland on the subject of the new ritual; to report to him the extraordinary scene he had just witnessed; to endeavour to exculpate the council, by representing the overwhelming difficulties by which they were surrounded, and to beseech him to give further instructions for their guidance in this pressing emergency.

Besides this, the council wrote to the king informing him that they had given orders to the bishops immediately to introduce the new service within their different dioceses, and to the boroughs to make choice only of such individuals for magistrates, as were ready to co-operate with the bishops in enforcing the king's order with respect to the liturgy and canons, and they professed their profound sorrow at finding his majesty still dissatisfied with their sincere and loyal endeavours.*

At the same time the magistrates of Edinburgh, partly through the influence of their provost, Sir John Hay, and still more from the dread of incurring the royal displeasure, gave a feigned and reluctant support to the measures of the prelatical clergy. On the 22nd of September, a meeting of the town-council was held by order of the provost in the Tolbooth; but the people, suspicious of their intentions, assembled in great numbers, and bursting tumultuously into the chamber, extorted from the council, by open menace, a promise that they would join the supplicants in petitioning the council against the liturgy, and that the city of Edinburgh should be the last place in the kingdom on which that book should be thrust. Conformably to this promise, the bailies and town-council concurred in a petition, in which they represented their earnest desire to carry out his majesty's intentions to the utmost of their ability; but expressed deep regret that the great confluence of nobility, gentry, ministers, and others, to the town had so encouraged and fortified the great body of the inhabitants in their opposition to the book, that the local authorities could no longer be answerable for the conduct of the citizens, or the maintenance of the public peace; and they therefore earnestly entreated the council not to urge them to attempt more than was practised by the rest of the kingdom. These requests, however, were preferred with many fears and misgivings, lest by their apparent acquiescence in the popular clamour, they should in any degree forfeit the esteem of the king, or incur the displeasure of Laud, whose very name was to them a word of terror. They accordingly wrote to that bigoted and intolerant prelate an humble letter, deprecating his wrath, explaining the difficulties of their situation, the overwhelming opposition with which they had to contend, and the compulsion under which they acted in presuming to supplicate the council; and entreating him to intercede with his majesty in their behalf, that they might still be continued in the enjoyment of his royal favour.*

As the council was not expected to meet again before the 1st of November, the supplicants were eagerly employed during that interval of suspense in augmenting their numbers; and, by means of a regular correspondence between the different parts of the kingdom, preparing for a combined opposition to the encroachments of the court and the prelates.† About the middle of October, however, the chancellor advertised the citizens of Edinburgh that an answer to their supplication might be expected on the 18th of that month. This was regarded by the leaders of the provincial petitioners, many of whom were then in town, as a piece of court intrigue to divide their adherents from the supplicants of the capital; and, under this impression, they instantly dispatched expresses throughout the length and breadth of the country, calling on their friends to assemble in full force in Edinburgh, on the day when the council was expected to meet. This summons was obeyed with the most extraordinary zeal and alacrity, "and so generally," says Bishop Guthrie, "that, besides the increase of noblemen, who had not been formerly there, there were few or no shires on the south side of the Grampian Hills from which came not gentlemen, burghers, ministers, and commons."* Commissioners from not fewer than two hundred parishes besieged the council with their supplications; and as the council-clerk, Mr. James Primrose, received a dollar for each as his fee, his gains amounted, in the course of one or two days, to what was at that period esteemed no inconsiderable sum. While all was yet uncertainty as to the king's answer, the immense multitude—dividing themselves into four bodies, the noblemen, the gentlemen, the ministers, and the burghesses— assembled separately to deliberate as to what was proper to be done. Even at this moment of intense excitement, a promise to withdraw the service-book, or even a conciliatory answer might have allayed the ferment, and saved the prelacy from destruction; but while the several bodies of the supplicants were engaged in consultation, they were startled by the intelligence that, by order of council, proceeding on the authority and by the express command of the king, two proclamations had just been read at the Cross—the one enjoining the supplicants to quit the city within twenty-four hours, on pain of treason, and transferring the seat of government and the courts of law to Linlithgow, the other postponing indefinitely the further consideration of ecclesiastical affairs by the privy council.

These proclamations, which were obviously intended by the king to divide and disperse the petitioners, served more closely to cement their union. When their first emotions of astonishment and indignation at the insane policy of Charles had subsided, they unanimously resolved, in open defiance of the king's mandate, not to separate until they had concerted measures for defeating the machinations of their enemies. They drew up a formal accusation against the bishops, as the authors of a liturgy containing the germs of idolatry and superstition, and of canons subversive of the constitution of the Church; while by their attempts to impose them, contrary to the laws of the Church and the realm, they had been the cause of all the troubles that had ensued, or were likely to follow. They therefore humbly craved, "that this matter may be put to trial, and they (the bishops) taken order with, according to the laws of the realm, and that they be not suffered to sit any more as judges, until this cause be tried and decided according to justice."* The framing of this accusation was committed to Lord Balmerino and Mr. Alexander Henderson, on the one hand, and to the Earl of Loudoun and Mr. David Dickson, on the other; and the next day, the two forms being submitted to the consideration of the supplicants, the form prepared by the Earl of Loudoun and Mr. Dickson was unanimously adopted. This remarkable document, which was addressed as a memorial to the lords of the secret council, was immediately subscribed by twenty-four noblemen, several hundred gentlemen and ministers, and most of the representatives of boroughs;† and not having been received by the council at this diet, it was shortly after subscribed by fourteen additional noblemen, by a large number of gentlemen, the great body of the ministers, and ultimately by a vast multitude of all classes in every town of the kingdom, with the exception of Aberdeen,‡ where the power and influence of Huntley checked every ebullition of popular feeling, and the most slavish principles were maintained and inculcated by the doctors. They taught that the will of the sovereign was above all law; that his authority was supreme and beyond challenge in all matters, ecclesiastical as well as civil; that even if he should please to order a universal massacre of his subjects, or to command them, under pain of being deprived of liberty, goods, or life itself, to embrace Mahometanism, they had no alternative but absolute, unconditional submission.§

While persons of all ranks were eagerly pressing forward to subscribe the accusation, a new and more formidable tumult arose in Edinburgh. The citizens, smarting under a sense of ecclesiastical tyranny, and already ripe for revolt, were still further exasperated by the intended removal of the seat of government and the courts of law. Foreseeing in this measure the degradation, if not the ruin of the capital, they assembled tumultuously, and surrounding the house where the town-council was then convened, demanded that the provost and council should appoint commissioners to unite with the rest of the country in their supplications and complaint; and afterwards reinstate their ministers, Rollock and Ramsay, together with Henderson, a reader, who had been suspended from their offices on account of their opposition to the liturgy. These demands were enforced by the threat—which in all probability would have been put in execution—that unless immediately complied with, not a member of the council should come out alive. The council having no power of resistance, and probably deeming expostulation equally vain and hazardous, quietly submitted to the dictation of the multitude, and appointed commissioners to join with the other supplicants; and passed an act which was subscribed by all the magistrates, restoring the suspended ministers and reader.

Flushed with success, and somewhat mollified by the concessions of the magistrates, the crowd were about to disperse, when their attention was attracted by Sydserf, Bishop of Galloway, who was proceeding towards the Tolbooth; and, recollecting that he had been accused some years before by the Earl of Dumfries of wearing a golden crucifix under his coat, they instantly beset the unfortunate prelate, loaded him with execrations, interrogated him respecting the possession of the forbidden symbol, and tugged and pulled him about in a violent manner. At last the zeal and curiosity of the women proceeded to a personal search, and the bishop was in danger of being denuded of his upper garments, and perhaps even more roughly handled, when some gentlemen interfered, and by their entreaties and expostulations for a moment drew off the attention of his tormentors. In the midst of this parley the bishop stole out of the crowd, and sought shelter in the privy council; but no sooner did his assailants become aware of his escape, than, roused into tenfold fury, they rushed frantically to the council-chamber, and demanded that both he and the provost should be delivered up to them. The Earls of Traquair and Wigton, on learning the perilous situation of the bishop, hastened to his relief, attended by a number of their followers. They succeeded in making their way into the council-room, but, instead of being able to rescue the terrified prelate, they found themselves involved in the same peril. The infuriated multitude, whose numbers were increasing every moment, reiterated their demands with insolent menaces, and seemed ready to burst into the chamber and proceed to acts of the utmost violence. In these alarming circumstances the council applied to the magistrates for protection; but these functionaries, who were as unpopular as themselves, and exposed to similar dangers, could render them no assistance. Despairing of aid from this quarter, Traquair and Wigton at last had the resolution to venture out, and try to prevail on the crowd to disperse. They were listened to without interruption for a few moments, but finding all their efforts ineffectual, they prepared to return to the council. This was the signal for a fresh outburst of popular zeal. They were instantly surrounded, and amidst vehement exclamations of "God defend all those who will defend God's cause!" "God confound the service-book, and all maintainers thereof!" were so pressed on and jostled, that it was with the utmost difficulty they made their way back, and not until the treasurer had lost his hat, his cloak, and his white staff. In a short time the magistrates made their appearance before the council, and declared that, although they had used their utmost efforts to restore order, they found it was not in their power to reduce the people to obedience. Thus imsoned and surrounded by an enraged multitude, the council were constrained to submit to the deep humiliation of applying for protection to those very supplicants whom they had so recently ordered to quit the city. With the utmost promptitude the popular lords dispatched some of their number to the relief of the dismayed council. Their appearance instantly allayed the fury of the populace, who, in obedience to their entreaties, began immediately to disperse. Neither insult nor injury was offered to the most obnoxious individuals while under their protection; and, after a short delay, the members of the council were permitted to retire unmolested.

It was an ominous symptom that the principal actors in this tumult did not, as on a former occasion, consist of the lowest orders of the people, but of the principal citizens, their wives, sisters, and other connexions, and even some of the near relations of the magistrates themselves.*

In the afternoon of the same day the council again met, and issued a proclamation, in which, after denouncing in strong terms the tumult that had just occurred, they prohibited, under the highest penalties, any of the inhabitants from appearing in the streets, unless in the prosecution of their necessary affairs.† On the representation, however, of Lord Loudoun, they permitted the petitioners to remain twenty-four hours longer in Edinburgh, and agreed to grant a further dispensation to all who could produce satisfactory evidence that their private affairs required them to prolong their stay.

During the brief interval thus allowed them, an important meeting of the leaders of the supplicants was held in the lodgings of Lord Balmerino. On this occasion measures were, for the first time, concerted for a combined and regularly organised opposition to the encroachments of the king and the prelacy on the civil and ecclesiastical institutions and liberties of the nation; and the project of the celebrated committees or Tables, as they were called, which had such an important influence on the subsequent destinies of Scotland, was first suggested.‡ A resolution was also passed, "That they would make the best use that wisdom and diligence could, of every occasion as it presented itself, to get free of the detested books." Before parting, they agreed to meet again on the 15th of November, to await the answer to their supplications, and to take such further steps as circumstances might render necessary to secure the great object of their union.

On the 1st of November the privy council and the court of session, in accordance with the proclamation, met at Linlithgow, and were formally constituted in the palace; but it was found to be so much out of repair that neither the council nor the court could be conveniently accommodated, and the houses in the town were so mean and uncomfortable that neither the advocates nor writers would attend. The council wrote to the king, apprising him of these circumstances, and by his order the court was adjourned to Stirling.*

The important 15th of November at last arrived; and as intelligence of the intended meeting had been diligently diffused throughout the country, and intimation of it had been made from most of the pulpits, the supplicants had the satisfaction of finding that their strength and numbers had greatly increased. "Multitudes," says Guthrie, "of all sorts of people (in greater numbers than formerly), from all quarters, came to Edinburgh with their petitions."† Among others of the nobility who had never previously attended was the Earl of Montrose, a young nobleman of great promise, who had just returned from his travels, and was hailed as a valuable accession to the popular party.

The treasurer summoned a meeting of council to be held at Linlithgow on the 14th of November, and, after some consultation, their lordships resolved on adjourning to Edinburgh to watch the course of events, and, if possible, to counteract the movements of the popular leaders. Amazed and alarmed at the increasing numbers of the supplicants, the treasurer, with the Earl of Lauderdale and Lord Lorn, wrote to the supplicant nobles with a view to persuade them that their meeting so frequently and in such numbers was informal, disorderly, and illegal, and tended to disturb the public peace. It was replied that, as the supplicants had arranged themselves into separate companies, and kept mostly within doors, their numbers could occasion little disorder; that the matter of their supplications, being of public importance, and as all his majesty's subjects had an immediate concern in it, their attendance in the capital to await the answer to their petitions was justifiable by reason, law, equity, and custom. They added, the late king had laid it down as an incontrovertible axiom that when religion or the king was in danger, no man ought to keep aloof, but that the whole commonwealth should move at once, not as separate individuals, but as one united body. Ready, however, to take advantage of every circumstance which seemed likely to promote the common cause, they signified their willingness—in order to avoid giving uneasiness by the greatness of their numbers, as well as to prevent trouble and inconvenience to themselves—to chose a limited number of the nobles, two gentlemen from each shire, one minister from each presbytery, and one burghess from each burgh, as commissioners to represent the whole body of the supplicants, to prosecute their accusation against the prelates, and to await the king's answer to their petitions.

The council, who had no instructions from the king to guide them in so unexpected an emergency, and who were probably actuated by the fear of some fresh commotion, inconsiderately assented to this proposal. From that moment a new order, an actual imperium in imperio was established in the country, and the opponents of the canons and liturgy were consolidated into one vast organised body. Commissioners were immediately appointed, and, as it was arranged that they should meet in separate bodies, each body representing the order to which it belonged, these committees received the designation of the Tables—an institution which soon exercised an important influence on the destinies of the country. To obviate the inconvenience to so large a body of commissioners of attending constantly, a committee of four from each Table was appointed to reside in Edinburgh, with power to do everything which their constituents might lawfully do for the furtherance of their common objects, and with instructions to convoke the whole Tables in any extraordinary emergency that might occur.

Thus united, organised, and subordinated to the authority of leaders in whose wisdom they could confide, and under whom they were prepared to act, the vast multitude of the supplicants separated, and returned to their homes.

In a few days afterwards the Earl of Roxburgh arrived from court with a message from the king to the privy council, and that body having assembled at Linlithgow, issued a proclamation setting forth that the petitions presented to the lords of the privy council concerning the service-book had been by them presented to his majesty, who had at first determined to take the same into his royal consideration, “and to give his gracious answer there-

The king's answer to the supplications. anent with all conveniency; but since that time his majesty finding, far contrary to his expectation, that such disorderly, tumultuous, and barbarous insolencies have been committed within the city of Edinburgh, upon the 18th day of October last, to the great contempt of his majesty's authority royal, by abusing his majesty's councillors and officers of state, and others bearing charge and authority under his majesty within the said city, his majesty, in a just resentment of that foul indignity wherein his majesty's honour did so much suffer, has been moved to delay the signification of his majesty's foresaid gracious intention, in giving to his good subjects such satisfactory answer to their petitions as would have been in equity expected from so just and religious a prince; but yet his majesty, being unwilling that his majesty's loyal and faithful subjects should be possessed with unnecessary and groundless doubts and fears, his majesty is pleased out of his goodness to declare that, as he abhors all the superstitions of popery, so he will ever be most careful that nothing be allowed within his majesty's dominions but that which shall tend to the advancement of religion, as it is presently professed within his majesty's ancient kingdom of Scotland, and that nothing is, or will be intended to be done therein against the laudable laws of that his majesty's native kingdom.”*

This answer was universally considered as equivocal and evasive. By the expression “true religion as presently professed,” it was believed nothing more was meant than prelacy as at present violently introduced into Scotland. The answer, indeed, contains within itself a striking proof of the king's utter hollowness and reckless mendacity. The petitions were presented in more than sufficient time for an answer to have been received before the riots, which took place in October; and yet his indignation at these riots, in which moreover the supplicants had no concern, is declared to have been the cause of his delay in giving his subjects a “satisfactory answer to their petitions.” Notwithstanding all these manifest proofs of insincerity, the popular leaders, more effectually to throw the blame of all the troubles that occurred on the bishops, affected to consider the answer as an explicit and unambiguous expression of his majesty's sentiments, and containing an express disavowal of the late innovations. The duplicity of Charles was further evinced by the secret instructions given to Roxburgh to tamper with the nobles individually, and to labour to corrupt or disunite them. It was found, however, that even the poorest among them were proof against the most tempting offers of posts, pensions, and preferments. To divide them was equally impossible. In vain did Traquair represent to them, in a conference held in the palace at his own request and that of the lord privy seal, that, as the liturgy had now been set aside by the king's declaration in his answer to their petitions, they had already obtained all that they craved, and ought to be satisfied. Where was the security that the service, though nominally withdrawn to-day, might not be re-imposed to-morrow? They would be satisfied with nothing less than its express and formal revocation. Nor was this all: conscious of their own strength, and feeling the advantage of the position they had already gained, they now demanded the withdrawal of the canons, and the abolition of the court of high commission, which they declared to be unconstitutional and illegal. To this the treasurer replied that, even admitting the desirableness of removing these grounds of complaint, yet, as they had to deal with a king, they ought not to presume to dictate, but should leave it to him to prescribe both the time and manner of doing so. He exhorted them, at the same time, not to attempt too much at once, lest by pushing their accusations against the bishops too far or too precipitately, they should contribute rather to their exaltation than their downfall. Their answer was no doubt intended to strengthen their accusation against the prelates. They coldly remarked that their grievances would have been redressed long ago, had the king been truly informed of the unsoundness of the books, or the wickedness of the other innovations complained of.*

Finding they made no impression by these arguments, the officers of state desired that, in order to avoid the appearance of a combination against the government, and to render their supplications more acceptable to his majesty, each order should petition separately and at different times: and that the gentry, whose order was too numerous to assemble in a body, should petition by counties.* The subtle policy of this suggestion was at once detected. Remembering the maxim, "Divide and conquer," the supplicants resisted all attempts to disunite them; while the project of seizing their leaders, which had been secretly contemplated by the council, was considered much too hazardous to be attempted.

Aware that the council was to meet at Dalkeith on the 12th of December, the commissioners proceeded thither in a body, with a joint petition.

The lords of the council, however, tried every artifice in their power to evade receiving them. They sent out a macer, desiring the supplicants to send in their petition by him; but they declined to do so. They then sent out their clerk, desiring that each order should petition separately; but the supplicants refused to comply. A third message was dispatched by the Earl of Southesk and Lord Lorn, with a view to induce the commissioners to alter certain passages in their supplication of the 18th of October; but this also was firmly refused, on the ground that they had no power to make any alteration without the authority of their constituents. In this manner were the supplicants put off with one device after another for three successive days; and being aware that the council were not again to assemble until the following week, they posted two or three of their number, accompanied by a notary, at each door of the council-house, prepared to protest in their own name, and in the name of all who should adhere to them, against the refusal to receive their petitions; against the prelates, while under accusation, being permitted to sit as judges in any tribunal, civil or ecclesiastical; against the infliction of penalties on themselves or others for the non-observance of rites which had been introduced contrary to the statutes of the realm, and without the consent of the General Assembly of the Church; and against their being held responsible for any troubles that might arise in consequence of the refusal of their supplications. The council, however, having been made acquainted with the tenor of the protest, adroitly managed to prevent its presentation by assuring the supplicants of a hearing on the 21st of December, and even so far gratifying them as formally to pass an act to that effect.

On the appointed day the deputies from the commissioners presented themselves before the privy council, which they now found to consist exclusively of laymen, the bishops having previously withdrawn. The accusation was presented by Lord Loudoun, who, in a long and eloquent address, expatiated on the grievances complained of, and especially repudiated the odious imputation of rebellion and conspiracy with which, in the exercise of their undoubted right humbly to supplicate their sovereign for relief, they had been publicly charged by the prelates. He added, in conclusion, "We declare that our desires do chiefly tend to the preservation of true religion and the subject's lawful liberty; neither do we crave the bishops' blood, nor revenge on their persons, but that the abuses and wrongs done by them may be truly remonstrated to his majesty, that, after due trial of the wrongs, such order may be taken as the evils may be remedied, and the power that they have abused may be so restrained, as the like evils may be prevented in time to come." Several of the other deputies followed in speeches less lengthened, but still more vehement; and one of the speakers so affected his auditors, that many of them could not refrain from shedding tears. When the deputies had finished, the lord-treasurer, privy seal, and register, exhorted the ministers to instruct their flocks to be loyal to their sovereign, and to think well of him, especially as regarded the matter of religion. To this admonition, one of the deputies, Mr. James Cunningham, minister of Cummoek, who had already addressed the council with great fervency, promptly replied, "Our consciences and our hearers bear witness that we endeavoured to carry ourselves suitably in this respect, neither had we ever a thought to the contrary; but his majesty was wronged after the manner that Ahasuerus was wronged by Haman, and we are looking to see the way of the Lord's righteousness in his appointed time."

The deputies having been fully heard, the lords of the council expressed a deep interest in the cause of the supplicants; but as they had been expressly forbidden by his majesty to do anything farther in relation to this controversy, they regretted their inability as yet to return any answer to the demands just made. They therefore desired the deputies to wait patiently for a short time, until they had informed his majesty of all these proceedings, and had received his instructions. In the meantime they passed an act, in which they declared that they would represent the weighty and important matters contained in the petitions and supplications to his majesty's royal consideration, and that without prejudice to the declinature given in by the supplicants, that the said supplicants should be heard in time and place convenient, and that in the interval they should "receive no prejudice."

The council now felt themselves placed in very perplexing circumstances. Any longer to conceal from the king the alarming state of the country was impossible, and yet they were keenly alive to the danger of drawing down on themselves the royal displeasure by the unwelcome intelligence which they were about to communicate. At their request, Traquair was summoned to court to lay before his majesty, without reserve, a plain statement of the grievances complained of, the increasing number and influence of the supplicants, and the determined opposition of the great body of the people to the introduction of the new ritual. As Traquair, however, was suspected of being hostile to the bishops, and even of secretly conniving with the supplicants, his representations respecting the distracted state of the country were considered as exaggerated, and his prudent counsel to withdraw the canons and liturgy was unfortunately disregarded. Traquair's endeavours to undeceive the king were still further counteracted by the President Spottiswood, as well as by his father, the archbishop, who artfully reminded the king that his grandmother, the unfortunate Mary, had succeeded in dispersing the confederated nobles who had conspired against Riccio, by simply denouncing

Rash policy them as traitors. Moved by this of the king. representation, and probably still more by the rash and violent counsels of Laud, whose furious bigotry would brook no opposition, Charles fell into the snare thus artfully laid for him, and adopted a policy which ultimately proved fatal to his own projects, and for a time distracted the country. Under strict injunctions, and, it is said, even an oath of secrecy, he transmitted by Traquair a proclamation, in which he stigmatised the accusation against the bishops as contrary to truth and justice, declared that they had done nothing without his express authority, that he himself had carefully examined the service-book and canons, and cordially approved of them, as containing much that was conducive to true piety, and nothing prejudicial to the ancient laws of Scotland, or the religion there professed; he condemned the petitions of the supplicants as derogatory to his supreme authority, and their meetings as conspiracies to disturb the public peace, and concluded by prohibiting all such meetings for the future under pain of treason.*

On Traquair's arrival, a deputation from the popular lords waited on him, to inquire what answer his majesty had returned to their petitions; but the treasurer kept his secret; no opportunity could induce him to divulge the nature of the communication which he had been charged to deliver to the privy council. He significantly hinted, however, that it would be necessary to prevent such numerous convocations of the lieges as had recently taken place in Edinburgh, and that unless these meetings were less frequent, the council would be obliged to prohibit them. In the meantime, the information withheld by Traquair reached Scotland through a different channel. By means of secret agents at court, the nobles were not only made aware of the tenor of Traquair's instructions, but had even obtained a copy of the proclamation.

Not a moment was lost in adopting measures to communicate the intelligence to the whole body of the supplicants. There was no alternative now but abject submission or open resistance. The alarm was propagated throughout the country with unprecedented rapidity; and, as it was known that a meeting of the privy council was about to be held in Stirling to receive the despatches brought by the treasurer, the supplicants from all parts of the country were summoned to repair thither for the protection of their leaders.

In vain did the officers of state then in Edinburgh endeavour to dissuade the commissioners of the Tables, for whom they sent, from collecting such an assemblage in the neighbourhood of the council. The policy of the supplicants was to be present at the reading of the proclamation, and immediately to present a protest in the name of the Church and the kingdom, and have direct recourse to the king himself with their supplications. To prevent their following this course, which was considered the only legal one left open to them for their own protection, as well as for the preservation of the liberties of the country, Traquair had no other expedient left than that of anticipating the movements of the supplicants by issuing, ere they were aware, the proclamation prohibiting their assembling. Accordingly, he and the Earl of Roxburgh set out secretly from Edinburgh about two o'clock on Monday morning, the day before the meeting of council had been appointed to be held, in order to have the proclamation published before the supplicants should have collected, or should even be aware of their departure. This undignified stratagem was defeated by a most unexpected accident. One of the servants of Traquair, before leaving Edinburgh, happening to stop for a few minutes at an ale-house to refresh himself for his journey, and meeting there with Lord Lindsay's servant, who had been carousing in the place over night, incautiously mentioned to him the object of his journey. The intelligence was immediately conveyed to Lord Lindsay, who, without losing a moment, gave the alarm to his friends, and by four o'clock the same morning he and the Earl of Home were on horseback on their way to Stirling. Pushing forward with extraordinary speed, they came within sight of the two earls near the Torwood, and, avoiding them by slightly diverging from the common road, reached Stirling an hour before them. About eight o'clock Traquair and Roxburgh made their appearance, and after waiting in vain for about two hours in expectation of the arrival of a sufficient number of the council to form a quorum, they anticipated the authority of the council, proceeded to the Cross, accompanied by the Lyon-herald, and issued the proclamation with all the customary formalities. To their utter astonishment and mortification, no sooner was the proclamation read than Lindsay and Home, attended by a notary, stepped forward, and in all due form of law protested against it,* and affixed their protest to the proclamation on the market-cross. This proceeding, which in the popular belief was legally sufficient, at least to suspend the effects of the king's order, was repeated at Edinburgh, in the presence of seventeen peers, as well as at Linlithgow, and every other town where the proclamation was published.

The affairs of Scotland were now rapidly approaching a crisis when no alternative should remain to the people but armed resistance, on the one hand, or, on the other, the entire surrender of civil and religious liberty, and the most abject and implicit submission to a tyrant's will. The sincerity of the king had been long and justly suspected, but the proclamation now issued showed the utter hollowness, as well as artful duplicity of his previous declaration, that nothing was intended against the ancient laws of the realm and the religion "presently professed" in Scotland. His stubborn temper, intractable pride, and intolerant bigotry, forbade all hope of concession. Even the last resource of the oppressed, the very humblest form of liberty—the right of complaint and petition, was now denounced as treason. Yet even in these alarming circumstances, though the utmost discontent everywhere prevailed, the people still retained a degree of respect and affection for their sovereign, and were willing to impute his flagrant misgovernment rather to the influence of evil counsellors than to his own disposition. Making every allowance for the comparative ignorance in which Charles was probably kept of the state of public feeling in Scotland, his conduct on this occasion was to the last degree rash, foolish, and unprincipled. He must have been fully aware that in attempting to impose the liturgy and canons on his Scottish subjects, he was acting in direct contravention of the statutes of the realm, trampling on every form of public liberty, and incurring what can never be safely despised—the odium of a whole nation. He had, nevertheless, made no preparation whatever for meeting an emergency which the most ordinary foresight might have seen to be all but inevitable. Wrapt up in the delusion of unlimited prerogative, and presuming on the submission of his subjects to the royal authority, he neglected those precautions without which it was impossible for him to coerce the will of a whole people. Besides this, he had by neglect, affront, and personal injury, alienated some of the principal leaders of that formidable combination with which he had now to contend. He had, as we have seen, insulted the Earl of Rothes, who had assembled a body of gentlemen to do him honour on his entrance into Fife, by contemptuously altering his route to avoid receiving their homage;* the title of earl had been promised to Lord Loudoun, but to punish that nobleman for his independent vote in the parliament of 1633, the patent was cancelled;† he had disgusted Montrose by coldness and neglect;‡ and he had treated Balmerino with flagrant cruelty and injustice.

The institution of the Tables, inadvertently conceded by the privy council, had not only led to the close union and organisation of all who were opposed to the new ritual, but had also established a power within the State stronger than the government itself. The council had no power to enforce the observance of their own edicts; while the commands of the popular leaders were met everywhere with a ready and affectionate obedience.

The functions of government being thus superseded, the arm of the law was paralysed; and the administration of justice was so far neglected, that Neglect of the administration of justice. fraudulent debtors set their creditors at defiance; and in the northern districts, especially in the Highlands, depredation and murder once more commenced, and were perpetrated openly and with impunity.*

The king, the privy council, and the bishops, were at length unable any longer to shut their eyes to the difficulties by which they were surrounded. With no support save that derived from the bare assertion of prerogative, they found arrayed against them a vast and powerful coalition—ramified throughout the whole extent of the country—fully organised, so as to be ready for instant and combined action, and subordinated to wise and determined leaders, including upwards of thirty of the highest nobility of the kingdom. It was now the policy of government to disunite a confederacy which they found themselves utterly powerless to repress. To effect this, the officers of state employed every artifice which their ingenuity could suggest; while the prelates laboured to delude the supplicants by promising to intercede with the king to withdraw the canons and liturgy, and to re-model the court of high commission.†

The nobles and other deputies assembled in Edinburgh now drew up a notice, which was rapidly circulated throughout the kingdom, calling on the whole body of the supplicants to repair with all due expedition to the capital, to concert measures for their common safety. The summons was obeyed with alacrity. Multitudes from all quarters flocked to the city; and the Tables having assembled, it was resolved that, in order to defeat the machinations of their enemies, and still farther to cement their own union by a solemn obligation, they should have recourse to the decisive measure of renewing the NATIONAL COVENANT, with an additional clause applicable to the Revival of the National Covenant. peculiar exigency of the time, binding themselves "to adhere to and defend the true religion, and forbearing the practice of all innovations already introduced into the worship of God; and to labour by all means lawful to recover the purity and liberty of the Gospel, as it was professed and established before the aforesaid innovations." This memorable compact had its origin at the commencement of the Reformation, and consisted chiefly of a solemn abjuration of popery, and an engagement to adhere to and defend the doctrine and discipline of the infant church that had just been established. It was sworn to, at that time, by the king and his household, and afterwards by all ranks of the people. It was afterwards repeatedly renewed at seasons when there appeared to be imminent danger of a revival of popery. A negative clause, which had been added during the administration of Arran, was still retained. It contained a detailed account, and a solemn renunciation, of the errors and corruptions of the Romish system, and a general profession of the reformed faith. In justification of this decisive step, a reference was made to numerous statutes which had been passed by the Scottish parliament in favour of the presbyterian form of church government and mode of worship, and which necessarily, by implication, condemned the introduction of the late innovations.

The original national covenant, and its repeated renewals, were still fresh in the recollection of the people, and were regarded with deep affection and reverence. It was therefore evident to the committees of the Tables that its revival, at this critical juncture, in a form adapted to the peculiar circumstances of the Church and the commonwealth, could not fail to be extremely acceptable to the people, who would thus be united, as one man, in defence of the common cause. On the Sabbath subsequent to the resolution of the Tables, the ministers, in their discourses from the pulpit, laboured to persuade their hearers that the breach of the former covenant had been a special cause of the grievous troubles that had recently fallen upon the Church, and that therefore its renewal might be regarded as a means of obtaining the Lord's special favour; and speaking in the language afterwards adopted by the General Assembly of 1640, they declared, "the remembrance of their breach of covenant did sting, wound, and pierce through their consciences; wherefore being moved with serious repentance, they resolved to renew their covenant or national confession."*

This celebrated bond was denounced at the time, by the prelatial party, as a treasonable compact against the just authority of the king, and its authors and adherents were stigmatised as conspirators against the State. Such sentiments have even found an echo among certain writers of our own day. Its legality, however, in point of form, as well as the lawfulness of such associations according to various acts of parliament, the repeated sanction of royalty itself, and the ancient and hitherto unquestioned usage of the kingdom, was maintained by some of the ablest lawyers of the time, including even Hope, the king's advocate. The obligation of subjects to obey the king, and defend his person, is explicitly and strongly stated in the covenant; nor does the qualifying clause, which connects this obligation with the defence of religion, liberty, and law, tend to impair, far less to neutralise the obligation itself.

The beneficial influence of this solemn compact was not confined to the age and nation in which it originated. Though little perceived and acknowledged, that influence is felt up to the present hour in the constitutional freedom enjoyed by all the subjects of the British empire. It saved Scotland from the total subversion of its liberties, and the establishment of unmitigated despotism under Charles; and it contributed largely to animate the patriotism of the sister kingdom, in its struggles against the encroachments of arbitrary power, and in the last great effort by which it shook off for ever the yoke of the house of Stewart. The bond concludes with a declaration remarkable at once for its boldness, its explicit and manly eloquence, the clear views it exhibits of the reciprocal duties of kings and subjects, and the pure and lofty-minded patriotism which it breathes:—"We, noblemen, gentlemen, burgesses, ministers, and commons, under subscribing, considering diverse times before, and especially at this time, the danger of the true reformed religion, of the king's honour, and of the public peace of the kingdom, by the manifold innovations and evils generally contained, and particularly mentioned in our late supplications, do hereby profess, and before God, his angels, and the world, do solemnly declare, that with our whole hearts we agree and resolve, all the days of our lives, constantly to adhere unto, and defend, the true religion—forbearing the practice of all novations already introduced in the matters of the worship of God, or approbation of the corruptions of the public government of the Church, or civil places or power of churchmen, till they be tried and allowed in free assemblies, and in parliaments; to labour by all means lawful to recover the purity and liberty of the Gospel, as it was established and professed before the said novations; and because, after due examination, we plainly perceive, and undoubtedly believe, that the innovations and evils have no warrant in the Word of God, are contrary to the articles of the aforesaid confessions, to the intention and meaning of the blessed reformers of religion in this land, and do sensibly tend to the re-establishment of the popish religion and tyranny, and to the subversion and ruin of the true reformed religion, and of our liberties, laws, and estates; we also declare that the foresaid confessions are to be interpreted, and ought to be understood of the foresaid novations and evils, no less than if every one of them had been expressed in the foresaid confessions, and that we are obliged to detest and abhor them among other particular heads of papistry abjured therein; and therefore, from the knowledge and conscience of our duty to God, our king, and country, without any worldly respect or inducement, so far as human infirmity will suffer, wishing a further measure of the grace of God to this effect, We promise and swear, by the great name of the Lord our God, to continue in the profession and obedience of the foresaid religion; that we shall defend the same, and resist all those contrary errors and corruptions, according to our vocation, and to the uttermost of that power that God hath put in our hands all the days of our lives; and in like manner, with the same heart we declare before God and man, that we have no intention or desire to attempt anything that may turn to the dishonour of God, or the diminution of the king's greatness or authority; but, on the contrary, we promise and swear that we shall, to the uttermost of our power, with our means and lives, stand to the defence of our dread sovereign, his person, and authority, in the defence and preservation of the true religion, liberties, and laws of the kingdom; as also to the mutual defence and assistance of every one of us of another, in the same cause of maintaining the true religion, and his majesty's authority, with our best counsel, our bodies, means, and whole power, against all sorts of persons whatsoever; so that whatsoever shall be done to the least of us, shall be taken as done to us all in general, and to every one of us in particular; and that we shall neither directly, or indirectly, suffer ourselves to be divided or withdrawn from this blessed and loyal conjunction, nor shall cast in any let or impediment that may stay or hinder any such resolution, as by common consent shall be found to conduce for so good ends; but on the contrary shall, by all lawful means, labour to further and promote the same; and if any such dangerous or divisive motion be made to us, by word or writ, we, and every one of us, shall either suppress it, or, if need be, shall incontinent make the same known, that it may be timeously obviated; neither do we fear the foul aspersions of rebellion, combination, or what else our adversaries, from their craft and malice, would put on us, seeing what we do is so well warranted, and ariseth from an unfeigned desire to maintain the true worship of God, the majesty of our king, and the peace of the kingdom, for the common happiness of ourselves and our posterity."

This notable declaration, and indeed the whole of the memorable bond of which it forms a part, was prepared by Alexander Henderson, minister of Leuchars, a distinguished clergyman, and the well-known Archibald Johnston of Warriston, an advocate. It was revised by Balmerino, Loudoun, and Rothes, was submitted for correction to some of the leading ministers during the course of its preparation, and finally received the formal approval of the committees of the Tables.

As might have been expected, there were a few influential individuals who, though friendly to the objects of the covenant, hesitated, apparently from conscientious motives, to subscribe it. Among these there were several clergymen, who had been induced by the prelates to take the oath of conformity, and others who had, by long custom, become reconciled to episcopal forms and corruptions, of which they never could fully approve. Among the nobility there were some who had during the last reign imbibed the doctrine of passive obedience, to which they were still disposed to adhere. The scruples of all these parties were, however, at last removed by means of concessions and explanations, so that not a single dissident of any note remained.

The first of March was appointed to be held as a day of solemn fasting and humiliation; and the supplicants having assembled in the Grey Friars' Church, in Edinburgh, after sermon the covenant was read, and Lord Loudoun addressed the assembled multitude in an impressive and eloquent speech, in which he expatiated on the importance of union at that critical juncture, and exhorted all to persevering zeal in the good cause in which they had embarked. Mr. Alexander Henderson afterwards offered up a fervent prayer for the Divine blessing, and immediately thereafter, the noblemen present, advancing to the table, subscribed the covenant, and, with uplifted hands, solemnly swore to observe the duties which it required. Their example was followed by the gentlemen, ministers, and burgesses, and finally by thousands of every rank, who pressed forward, subscribed and swore with the utmost enthusiasm. The vast sheet of parchment, upwards of fifteen square feet in extent, was in a short time covered with signatures, and, for want of room, great numbers were compelled to be content with signing no more than their initials.* Many were in tears, but they were tears of joy and rapture; every face was radiant with delight, and the whole city resounded with mutual congratulations. The prelates were struck with dismay at this event, which exceeded in importance all that their most gloomy apprehensions had anticipated. They already saw, in its consequences, the destruction of their own order and the ruin of the whole prelatial fabric; and Spottiswood, their primate, exclaimed in despair, "Now all that we have been doing these thirty years by past is at once thrown down!"†

Copies of the bond were immediately transmitted by the deputies to all the presbyteries of the kingdom, together with a paper entitled, "The lawfulness of the Subscription to the Confession of Faith, 1638." Commissioners were also dispatched to the west and north, in order to counteract the opposition which was expected to arise in these quarters, chiefly through the influence of the learned doctors in the colleges of Glasgow and Aberdeen. The former taught the doctrine of non-resistance, and most of them had acquiesced in the articles of Perth; the latter were avowed advocates of prelacy, and inculcated the doctrine of passive obedience. The presbytery of Glasgow, however, cordially embraced the covenant; while Aberdeen, where the baleful influence of Huntley still predominated, stood alone in its opposition. In every other town and parish throughout the country, the covenant was subscribed and sworn by persons of all ranks with the utmost zeal, and amidst the most lively demonstrations of joy. "I was present," says a contemporary writer, "at Lanark, and several other parishes, when, on Sabbath, after the forenoon sermon, the covenant was read and sworn. All the people generally and most willingly concurred. I have seen more than a thousand persons all at once lifting up their hands, and the tears falling down from their eyes; so that through the whole land, excepting the professed papists, and some few who adhered to the prelates, people universally entered into the covenant of God.*" So great was the enthusiasm of some, that they even subscribed with their blood, nor could they be deterred by the presence of prelatical clergymen, and their worthless adherents, who in many instances attempted to intimidate the people by oaths, imprecations, and menaces, and to drive them back with drawn swords.† The popular excitement spread with unexampled rapidity, penetrated the most secluded recesses of the country, and extended to the remotest districts of the west and north—where the warlike septs, so often at deadly feud, were for once united in a common bond of brotherhood. In the short space of two months, all Scotland had submitted to the covenant, with the exception of the courtiers and their minions, the papists, the prelates, and their obsequious subordinates. No compulsion was needed to procure subscriptions, and it is certain that none was employed. On the contrary, great care was taken to prevent incompetent persons from subscribing. None were permitted to enrol their names, so far as could be ascertained, but such as had previously partaken of the Lord's Supper, and many influential names were refused on account of the supposed unfitness of the parties. "Some men of no small note," says Henderson, "offered their subscriptions, and were refused till time should prove that they joined from love to the cause, and not from the fear of man;" and Rothes remarked, "The matter was so holy, that they held it to be irreligious to use violent means to advance such a work."

It has been customary with prelatical writers, and the admirers of prerogative, to represent the nation as at this period divided into parties. In a certain sense this is true, though the mode of expression is fitted, as it was probably intended, to mislead. In point of fact, the covenanters were not only the majority of the nation, but, in ordinary language, in which rigid exactness is neither professed nor expected, they may be said to have constituted the nation itself. The non-covenanters, on the other hand, were a mere faction, composed of the bishops and a few of the subordinate prelatical clergy, who were eagerly looking for preferment, together with a small junto of court officials and their retainers. It is too late now to reproduce misrepresentations, which were triumphantly exposed by those who had the most intimate personal acquaintance with the state of Scotland at this period. In vain did the deposed bishops who had fled to England labour to traduce the covenanters, by describing them as a faction composed of rebellious persons, under the guidance of a few fanatical leaders—"men of unquiet spirits and broken fortunes." It was answered by the covenanting nobility and gentry that, "It is known by all who are acquainted with this country that almost the whole kingdom standeth to the defence of this cause, and that the chiefest of the nobles, barons, and burgesses, are honoured in the places where they live for religion, wisdom, power, and wealth, answerable to the condition of this kingdom; that the meanest of the commons who have joined in this cause are content of their mean estates with the enjoying of the Gospel; and no less known, that our adversaries are not for number any considerable part of the kingdom, and that the chiefest (setting aside some few statesmen, and such as draw their breath from court) are known atheists or professed papists, drowned in debt, denounced his majesty's rebels for a long time past, are under caption of their creditors, and have already in their imaginations divided among them the lands of the supplicants, which they hoped to be possessed in by the power of England."*

The covenanters, acquiring fresh confidence from their numbers and unanimity, now ^{Hopes of the} ventured to hope that their peti- ^{covenanters.} tions to the king would be treated somewhat more respectfully than they had hitherto been. It was impossible to conceal any longer from his majesty the state of public feeling in Scotland respecting the late innovations; and though disinclined to concede anything to the importunity of what he had believed to be a comparatively small and uninfluential party, it could not be supposed that he would turn a deaf ear to the complaints of the universal Scottish nation. ^{New applica-} Accordingly, a new supplication was ^{tion.} drawn up, in which the covenanters vindicated their recent proceedings, and denounced the injustice of their prelatical opponents. This they transmitted to the Earl of Haddington by Mr. John Livingstone, minister, for presentation; and they wrote at the same time to Lennox, Hamilton, and some other noblemen then at court, requesting them to solicit his majesty to return a gracious answer to their supplication. Mr. Livingstone had not been above four hours in London, when the king, hearing of his arrival, and the object of his journey, issued an order for his apprehension. The Earl of Haddington, however, having received notice of this proceeding, immediately apprised Livingstone of his danger, who, after lurking one day in London, returned precipitately to Scotland. The supplication was contemptuously returned unopened; but Lennox, in a letter to Montrose, Hamilton, in one to Rothes, and Morton, in another to Lindsay, wrote, that the king did not think proper to look into their supplication; but having been informed of their desire by his council, he would answer them shortly by open proclamation.

The protests by which the recent proclamation had been everywhere met, so alarmed the privy council that they appointed a full meeting to be held at Stirling to deliberate concerning the state of the country; to examine into the causes of the prevailing discontent; and to transmit such information to his majesty as might appear necessary, in order that he might be prepared to meet a crisis which now seemed inevitable. All the ecclesiastical members of the council in particular were enjoined to be present, but not one obeyed the summons, with the exception of the Bishop of Brechin, who left them before they had concluded their deliberations, or had agreed upon any measure for meeting the pressing exigencies of the time. After a sitting of four days, they agreed to send Sir John Hamilton of Orbiston, lord justice-clerk, to court, with instructions to inform his majesty that, in the unanimous opinion of the members of council, the causes of the troubles that then distracted the country, and impeded the administration of the laws, were the apprehensions of innovation in matters of religion, and their forcible introduction, contrary to the laws of the realm; to represent the expediency of his majesty's quieting the apprehensions of his Scottish subjects, by declaring that he would inquire into the nature of the grievances complained of, with a view to their redress; and to recommend his forbearing, in the meantime, to press the observance of the new ritual. He was farther instructed to request that his majesty would be pleased to summon into his presence, or to permit them to send, such members of their body as might be considered best qualified for informing his majesty of the state of the country, and advising with him as to the proper course to pursue; and lastly, he was to state to his majesty that the council had employed every means in their power to prevent or disperse the meetings of the supplicants, which, nevertheless, continued to be regularly held; and that they now found they could do nothing more to allay the prevailing ferment, until it should please his majesty to signify his pleasure in answer to their humble remonstrance.

These instructions were signed by the whole of the lay lords of the council, and were afterwards sent to the spiritual lords, and received the signatures of the chancellor and the Bishops of Edinburgh, Dunblane, Galloway, and Brechin. The Earls of Traquair and Roxburgh, at the same time, addressed a private letter to the king, in which, while they fully corroborated the statements of the council with regard to the disturbed condition of the country, they recommended a base and fraudulent policy, at once discreditable to the sovereign and subversive of the peace of the nation. Their counsel was that Charles, by pretended concessions, should endeavour to allay for a time the apprehensions of the people, and by this means to satisfy the more facile and credulous, and divide the covenanters. They add, "so will your majesty be enabled with less pain or trouble, to overtake the insolencies of any who shall be found to have kicked against authority." That such advice was not rejected with indignation is a sufficient proof of the baseness and insincerity of Charles, who was ready to embrace the most unworthy artifices rather than yield to the reasonable demands of his people. A letter was also addressed by the council to the Marquis of Hamilton, who stood high in the royal confidence, entreating his serious consideration of the important business entrusted to the justice-clerk, and his utmost influence with the king in order to bring about a pacification of Scotland.

Charles found it impossible any longer to maintain his cold and haughty indifference to the discontent of his Scottish subjects. He wrote to the council, authorising them to send up the lord-treasurer and lord privy seal, and afterwards invited to court Lord Lorn, the eldest son of the Earl of Argyll. He also gave orders that the most eminent and least suspected of the Scottish lawyers should be consulted respecting the legality of the proceedings of the presbyterian party, particularly their protesting against the proclamation of his royal pleasure; their frequent meetings for deliberation; and, above all, their entering into a general covenant without his command or concurrence. Accordingly, Sir Thomas Hope, the advocate for the crown, Nicolson, a distinguished lawyer, and Sir Lewis Stewart of Blackhall, were selected, and desired to give their opinions on this important case. Hope had been all along suspected of a leaning towards the covenanters. It has even been asserted that in their most serious difficulties they had hitherto acted by his advice. The two others, however, had no such bias; but, on the contrary, would have gladly embraced any pretext through which they might, without injuring their legal reputation, have given a decision satisfactory to the king. The three lawyers, however, were unanimous. They declared that, in their opinion, the proceedings of the covenanters were for the most part expressly warranted by law; and that though in some things they seemed to have exceeded, yet there was no express law against them.

The lawyers declare the proceedings of the covenanters legal.

The three councillors who had been summoned to advise with his majesty were not long in making their appearance at court, and were soon followed by the lord-president, the lord-register, and the Bishops of Ross, Brechin, and Galloway. The chancellor had preceded them; and shortly afterwards, at the invitation of Hamilton, they were joined by the justice-clerk, who returned from Scotland, whither he had been dispatched with the king's order calling up Traquair and Roxburgh. Of all these advisers, Lorn was the only one from whom the covenanters expected any support to their cause; and they were not without apprehension that the king, impatient of his council, would either dismiss him, or find him some other occupation about the court. The treasurer, in consequence of his vacillating conduct, was mistrusted by both parties; and as for the prelates, nothing was expected from them but the worst that their perverted ingenuity could devise. Lorn did not disappoint the hopes of the covenanters. He spoke with the utmost freedom, and counselled the withdrawal of the canons and liturgy, with all the late innovations, at once and for ever. Traquair recommended a temporising and disingenuous policy; the other nobles were in favour of conciliatory measures; but advice of the Bishops of Ross

and Brechin.
The Bishops of Ross and Brechin were urgent for the adoption of a system of repression and severity. They argued that, without any assistance from the English, there was sufficient force in the kingdom to correct the insolence of the covenanters; and that the Marquises of Hamilton, Huntley, and Douglas, with the Earls of Seaforth, Nithsdale, and Abercorn, and the Lord Semple, with their followers, the citizens of Aberdeen, the Mackays, the Grants, and other clans, who had not concurred in the covenant, would be more than a match for its subscribers.

When intelligence of this pernicious counsel reached the leaders of the covenanters, they appointed a number of commissioners, chiefly lawyers and ministers, to proceed to those quarters of the country, particularly the north, where the concurrence of the people in the national covenant had been least general, in order to procure the subscription of those persons who had at first manifested a reluctance to identify themselves with a body of their countrymen openly opposed to the will of the sovereign. The success of the commissioners, while it proved highly encouraging to themselves and their brethren, at once astonished and dismayed their adversaries. The new subscribers included most of the Hamiltons and Douglasses, many of the Gordons, all the Campbells without exception, and a large proportion from those very clans on whose hostility to the covenanters the bishops had placed so much reliance. In addition to these, many persons in Glasgow and Aberdeen, who had hitherto stood aloof, and the whole of the burgesses of St. Andrew's, now signified their adherence, and subscribed the covenant. This almost universal concurrence placed the bishops, who on such slender foundation had advised the king to make war on his subjects, in a most odious light; and many who had been by no means disinclined to favour the episcopal cause, now regarded them as enemies to their king and country—men who, in the selfish pursuit of their own aggrandisement, would not hesitate to peril the safety of both.

Gaining fresh courage from these events, and still further emboldened by the absence of the bishops, most of whom had sought refuge at court, several of the presbyteries now ventured to ordain ministers without the concurrence or knowledge of the bishops. All of them removed their constant moderators, and the suspended ministers returned to their charges, which had been left vacant by the flight of the episcopal incumbents, who in dread of popular vengeance had withdrawn from the country.

The kingdom was at this period in a condition closely bordering on anarchy. For nearly a year, the courts of justice had been closed, and the judges and principal officers of state were absent in London. Fraudulent debtors continued to evade, or openly refuse, the just demands of their creditors. Some of the clans, particularly the Gordons, recommenced their work of plunder, oppression, and murder; and in the south, the Marquis of Douglas, the Earl of Abercorn, and Lord Semple, openly prepared for hostilities. But what was still more to be lamented, though in the peculiar circumstances of the country it need excite no surprise, many of the covenanters themselves, contrary to the earnest remonstrances of their leaders, were guilty of irregularities and excesses which brought reproach on the good cause, in defence of which they were leagued together. The prelatical clergy, who had been intruded into the charges from which the presbyterian pastors had been forcibly ejected, were in many instances treated with insult and injury. Mr. John Lindsay, the constant moderator of the presbytery of Lanark, and Dr. Robert Hamilton, a clergyman belonging to the same presbytery, and a zealous agent of the bishops, were subjected to gross indignity and outrage. Dr. Ogston, minister of Colinton, was assaulted in Edinburgh, because he had been in the habit of requiring the people to kneel at their examination previous to the communion; he was moreover suspected of a bias towards popery, from having spoken somewhat in favour of the Virgin Mary. Mr. Hanna, minister of Torphichen, was publicly beaten by his parishioners, though not to the effusion of blood. Various circumstances had concurred to render him an object of peculiar dislike. He had been thrust into his charge against the will of his flock, while their beloved pastor, Mr. Livingston, had been ejected to make way for him; and after his settlement he so harassed the nonconformists, that the parish was kept in a continual ferment. Dr. Munro of St. Andrew's did not escape so easily. In passing through Kinghorn he was beset by an infuriated rabble, by whom he was severely beaten and wounded. All judicious friends to the cause lamented these outrages, which it was not in their power altogether to prevent. Wherever they occurred they were denounced from the pulpit as at once criminal in themselves and tending to bring unmerited obloquy on the whole body of the covenanters; and the ministers and magistrates the most vehemently opposed to the innovations strenuously exerted themselves to preserve the public peace.

As was to be expected, these violent proceedings were turned to account by the adversaries of the presbyterian party, and the misconduct of a few individuals, chiefly women, and belonging to the lower orders of the community, was unjustly ascribed to the whole association. Exaggerated accounts of the occurrences were transmitted to London, in order to inflame the resentment of the king, and to precipitate those violent measures, of which he and his servile advisers ultimately lived to repent.

In the meantime, Charles, finding the current too strong to be directly opposed, was meditating a return to that insincere and temporising policy for which he was eminently distinguished. He was as determined as ever not to abate one jot of his cherished prerogative, but he expected to effect by artifice what it would be dangerous or impracticable to attempt by force. His plan was king. sentative, with instructions to endeavour to bring about a pacification without compromising the dignity of the crown; in other words, without any real withdrawal of those innovations which had led to all the distractions under which the country was labouring. Traquair was at first thought of as a fit person to be entrusted with this difficult task, but as he had entirely lost the confidence of the prelates, he was, through their influence, soon set aside. Hamilton was at last selected, and many circumstances concurred in recommending the choice. His great wealth and family connexions gave him an influence in some respects superior to that of any other Scottish nobleman, and having never openly connected himself with either party, it was hoped he would not be suspected by the covenanters as inimical to their cause. He was even regarded with some degree of favour by that party, although his father, by procuring the ratification of the articles of Perth, had contributed in no small degree to introduce that long train of grievances which had led to the present commotion.

Before Hamilton's departure for Scotland it was rumoured among the covenanters that the king, by pretended concessions, was about to make an insidious attempt to divide them. To anticipate any such attempt, the Earls of Rothes, Cassillis, and Montrose, wrote letters to all the Scottish noblemen then at court, enclosing a paper containing a statement of the least that, in their judgment, could be asked for establishing a durable peace in the Church and kingdom. In this document not only were all the former demands of the covenanters reiterated, but, in addition, they now required the entire abrogation of the court of high commission, abstinence from all attempts to enforce the articles of Perth, the exclusion of ecclesiastics from parliament, the revival, with all their former freedom of action, of the lawful assemblies of the Church, and the summoning of a free parliament to inquire into and redress the grievances of the nation.

Still further to counteract the artful machinations of their enemies, the leaders of the covenanters drew up, and circulated everywhere throughout the kingdom, a paper cautioning every member of the vast associated body against assenting to any proposals made to them by the government, without the common advice and consent of their brethren, or entertaining any motion tending to disunion; and reminding them that no one who had signed the covenant should rest satisfied with less than was originally demanded.

Meantime Hamilton was furnished with his commission, containing ample powers to settle the late disorders in the Hamilton—kingdom, and to that effect to convene his majesty's council at such time and place as he pleased; and with their advice to set down the means and order to be followed for the premises, and also to do and perform, as well in council as out of the same, all and everything in his majesty's name, which might tend to the effectuating of the trust of his present commission, and prosecuting thereof to the full and final end of the same siclike,* and as fully as if his majesty were present in person."

On the 10th of May, Charles addressed a letter to the privy council, acquainting them with Hamilton's commission, and requiring all the members, lay and clerical, to meet with his majesty's commissioner in council at Dalkeith on the 6th of June. Hamilton also sent a circular to almost all the nobility and gentry of note, inviting them to meet him at Haddington on the preceding day.

The private instructions given to Hamilton for the regulation of his procedure —his instructions consist of not fewer than twenty-eight articles, and furnish striking proofs of Charles's unfaltering determination to persevere in his insane projects, as well as of his inveterate insincerity. The latter is still farther manifested by a declaration, signed by the king, and committed to Hamilton to be published, in order to allay the fears of the people, and if possible break up their great national union. Alluding to that declaration in the secret instructions the king says, "You may labour to prepare any of the refractory persons to conceive aright of our declaration before it be published, so that it be privately and underhand. You are to get an act of council to pass, to declare that this declaration of ours ought to free all honest subjects from the fears of innovations of religion or laws." From some of the instructions which followed, it is evident that rather than yield to the reasonable demands of the nation, Charles had already resolved to deluge the country with blood. "If," he says, "after the limited time in our declaration, a body remain at Edinburgh, you must raise what force you can to dissipate and bring them under our obedience. You are to cause insert six weeks in our declaration for the delivering up of the covenant, and, if you find cause, less. You shall declare that if there be not sufficient strength within the kingdom to force the refractory to obedience, power shall come from England, and that myself will come in person with them, being resolved to hazard my life rather than suffer authority to be contemned. If you cannot by the means prescribed by us bring back the refractory and seditious to due obedience, we do not only give you authority, but command all hostile acts whatsoever to be used against them—they having deserved to be used no other way by us, but as a rebellious people; for the doing whereof we will not only save you harmless, but account it as acceptable service done to us.”*

Before Hamilton's departure for Scotland, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the Scottish bishops, were convened at a cabinet meeting, and introduced to his grace as his majesty's high commissioner. At this interview Hamilton insisted, that in order to aid him in the discharge of his arduous office, the bishops should accompany or precede him to Scotland. Their presence there, he said, would be necessary in order to reclaim such of the ministers as had once conformed, but had subsequently retracted. Probably, too, he was unwilling to leave the bishops at court, lest his proceedings in Scotland should be counteracted by their advice during his absence. To this movement the bishops manifested decided aversion. They represented that in the present condition of the country they could not return, unless at the peril of their lives; and that, besides, in consequence of their extreme unpopularity, their interference was most likely rather to frustrate than promote the object of his grace's mission. It was well known, also, that several of them were drowned in debt, and durst not make their appearance in Scotland for fear of the diligence of their creditors. They accordingly offered to reside at Bath, or anywhere else in England, at a distance from court; but Laud strongly urged their departure, and no one was willing to risk his resentment by refusing compliance. In dismissing them, the king signified his earnest desire that each of them should continue to live within his own diocese, and should labour to win the confidence and affection of the people, and to soften their hostility to episcopacy, which he assured them he had no intention of relinquishing, though he might for the present consent to its modification. At the same time, Hamilton promised to protect them to the utmost of his power from personal injury, and it is said that the chancellor also brought with him a protection from the diligence of his creditors.

The high commissioner now set off for Scotland, on an errand which, had either he or his master been rightly informed of the state of the country, they might well have deemed hopeless. Only three months had elapsed since the renewal of the national covenant, under circumstances of unusual solemnity, and amidst ardent and all but universal enthusiasm. Was it to be expected that a bond so recently formed, sworn to, and, in many instances, subscribed even with the blood of its votaries, was to be broken at the bidding of the king or his commissioner? Were the whole people of Scotland, united in defence of their civil and religious liberties, to surrender at discretion to the sovereign whose will they had boldly combined to oppose? And yet Hamilton, by his instructions, had no power to make any concessions, or to advance a single step towards the pacification of the kingdom, until the covenanters should disunite and renounce their bond. In vain did the Scottish primate try to persuade the king not to insist on such a hopeless preliminary. This was a point which, with fatuous obstinacy, he arrogantly scorned to yield. He regarded that hated bond as utterly inconsistent with his kingly prerogative, and declared “that as long as that covenant was not passed from, he had no more power than the Duke of Venice.”*

The deputies at Edinburgh had at first entertained high expectations from the mission of Hamilton, and had accordingly invited their brethren from all quarters to repair to the capital and await his arrival. Immediately afterwards, however, it was reported that Hamilton Alarming rumours. was empowered to grant nothing further than the recalling of the books, and some limitation of the powers of the court of high commission; that even these concessions, which were no longer sufficient to satisfy the nation, were only to be granted on condition of an entire relinquishment of the covenant, and submission to the articles of Perth; and that in case of non-acceptance, the covenanters were to be threatened with a hostile invasion of the English, on the east coast, and of the Irish on the west—while Hamilton, Huntley, Douglas, and the whole popish party, were to unite for their subjugation. A fast proclaimed. In these alarming circumstances a general fast was resolved on, and held with great solemnity on the 3rd of June.

Next day the deputies met, and entered into a serious deliberation as to the propriety of meeting the commissioner at Haddington, as he had desired. Many seemed inclined to pay him that mark of respect, while others, and particularly Lord Rothes, apprehensive that some attempts might be made, by false promises and other allurements, to sow divisions in their ranks, strongly recommended that all the adherents of the cause should abstain from attending on the commissioner, or in any way identifying themselves with such as had not subscribed the covenant, lest it should be supposed by their adversaries that they had begun to waver in their attachment to the great cause which they had bound themselves to maintain. This recommendation was so strictly obeyed, that even Hamilton's own vassals in Clydesdale would not stir to welcome their lord. The reso-

A still more inauspicious circumstance, which had occurred a few days before, excited general alarm among the citizens of Edinburgh, and such grave suspicions of treachery on the part of the king and his representative, that Hamilton, alarmed in turn, at first resolved not to enter the city. The Castle of Edinburgh having been in want of arms and ammunition, the treasurer had commissioned Patrick Wood, merchant in Edinburgh, to provide the requisite supplies. He accordingly hired a vessel, in which he conveyed to the Frith of Forth sixty large barrels of gunpowder, some hundreds of pikes, and numerous chests containing muskets and matches. This affair, though conducted with studied secrecy, soon became generally known, and, as it happened to coincide in point of time with the expected arrival of

It was at first contemplated to send a strong party to Leith roads to seize the vessel, but Traquair having received notice of this intention, had the stores privately conveyed to Dalkeith. No sooner did this become known, than it was proposed by some of the more rash and fiery of the covenanters to proceed thither in a body, and take forcible possession of these warlike materials. A less violent, though equally effectual measure, however, was ultimately adopted. A strong guard was stationed at the gates of the city to prevent the introduction of the supplies, and the castle itself was placed under blockade. In the meantime the Tables summoned Wood into their presence, and subjected him to a strict examination. At first his bearing was haughty, and his answers were evasive; but an effectual expedient was resorted to for overcoming his obstinacy. All his creditors, as if by common consent, presented their claims, and demanded immediate payment, which, at so brief a notice, he was not prepared to make. The fear of bankruptcy and ruin had the desired effect. He immediately subscribed the covenant, and a number of his friends coming forward, appeased the claimants and supported his tottering credit.

Traquair, however, was still an object of suspicion to the covenanters, and, as is usual in times of popular excitement, unfounded and improbable accusations were circulated against him, and easily obtained credit. Among other things, he was accused of having devised a plot for blowing up the Tables on their assembling at Dalkeith; and so strong a hold had this report taken on the minds of the covenanters that, in order to calm their fears and allay their indignation, he repaired to Edinburgh, and there, in presence of Rothes, Lorn, and Loudoun, denied upon oath his ever having entertained any such wicked design. He admitted, however, that he had advised the supplying of the castle with military stores, and accounted for their removal to Dalkeith by declaring that, on learning the intention of seizing them, he had ordered them to be conveyed thither in order to quiet the apprehensions of the citizens. This explanation, though plausible, was far from satisfying all parties, and the utmost distrust of the object of Hamilton's visit still continued to prevail.

In obedience to the royal mandate, the privy council attended on the lord high commissioner at Dalkeith, to assist him with their Division in the advice; but that body were now privy council. found to be much divided, and a majority of them were inclined to favour the covenanters. Bishop Burnet even asserts that the Earls of Traquair, Roxburgh, and Southesk, were the only men present who were well-affected to the king's measures;* and even his own advocate declined to defend them at the council-board. Hamilton, whose previous information regarding the condition of the country had not prepared him for what he now witnessed, felt that he had undertaken a difficult, if not an impossible task; and that his master, as ill-informed as himself, had given him instructions altogether inadequate to meet the emergency. He now clearly perceived that no alternative remained to the king, but either to yield to the demands of the covenanters, or to have immediate recourse to military coercion. These views he lost no time in communicating to his majesty. He declared that in the present disposition of the country his mission was utterly hopeless; that an armed force of twenty-three thousand men was stationed near Edinburgh, ready to support the covenanters in resisting all attempts to enforce a dissolution of their union; and that nothing could now be done, but either to accede to their claims, or to advance his hostile preparations with the utmost secrecy and dispatch. A fleet with two thousand land soldiers, he said, should be immediately sent down; a supply of arms should be forwarded to the northern counties; Berwick should be garrisoned with fifteen hundred soldiers, and Carlisle with four hundred; and his majesty himself should forthwith proceed to Scotland, at the head of a numerous and well-appointed army. While giving this counsel, Hamilton betrayed the relents of a generous nature. He humbly submitted to his majesty whether it would not be better "rather, in mercy, to connive at the folly of his poor people, than, in justice, to punish their madness."†

to induce the commissioner and the lords of the privy council to subscribe the covenant, and with this view an humble petition, prepared by Mr. David Dickson, and couched in very pathetic terms, was presented to them. Their answer was firm but conciliatory. Their great aim at present, they said, was to arrange a meeting with the covenanters, in a manner consistent with the honour of his majesty's commissioner. The deputies, however, still apprehensive of danger from the military stores collected at Dalkeith, would not venture to go thither to meet the commissioner; and he, on the other hand, though entreated to come to Edinburgh, and take up his residence in the royal palace, refused to enter the city while its castle was in a state of blockade, and its gates guarded by armed men. In this difficulty Haddington, Southesk, and Lorn, undertook to mediate between the parties, and agreed to pledge their word of honour that no ammunition, or even supplies of provisions, except such as were necessary for daily consumption, should be brought into the castle during the treaty. The commissioner, however, was still dissatisfied, and it was not until Lorn had persuaded the covenanters to agree to the dismissal of the

 —he afterwards watch, and to receive the representative of their sovereign in a manner becoming his office, that that high functionary consented to make his public entry into the capital. Such, however, was the jealous vigilance of the covenanting party, that they appointed a private watch in lieu of the public guard which had been dismissed.

Arrangements were now made for receiving the —arrangements commissioner with all the honours for his reception. which it had been customary to pay to royalty itself, but, at the same time, in such a way as to display in a most imposing manner the strength of the covenanters. Upwards of twenty thousand of them, consisting of noblemen, gentlemen, and others, on foot and horseback, from every shire in the kingdom, were stationed for his reception between Musselburgh and Leith; six hundred clergymen, arrayed in their black gowns, were conspicuously posted on a rising ground at the eastern extremity of Leith Links; and a vast number of persons of all ranks, and of both sexes, lined the entire way to the gate of the city. The whole assembled multitude was estimated at about sixty thousand individuals—a larger number than had been collected in Scotland on any single occasion for more than a century.* As he rode slowly along through this prodigious assemblage, the commissioner was assailed on every side with earnest and loud supplications that he would advise the king to deliver them from the bishops and the books, preserve their liberties, permit them the free exercise of their religion, and restore to them their beloved ministers. Hamilton was affected even to tears, and expressed a wish that the king himself had been present to witness the scene, adding, that had this been the case, he could never think of pressing his obnoxious measures on such a people. He refused, however, to listen to an address from Mr. William Livingston, minister of Lanark, a man of strong voice and venerable countenance, who had been appointed to welcome him as he passed, politely remarking that "the honour of such addresses" was "more adapted to the rank of a prince than suitable for the station of a subject."

For some days many mutual compliments were passed, and much apparent cordiality was maintained between the commissioner and the leaders of the covenanters; but during these seemingly amicable interviews each party was secretly intent on penetrating the views and designs of the other. Both, however, were on their guard, and for a time neither gained much advantage. At length, in the course of their discussions, the commissioner let fall some remarks from which the leaders justly inferred that no terms to which they could assent were intended to be proposed. He observed, that the laws made for forty years past were in force against the covenanters. It was answered that these laws were based upon the ruins of the reforming laws; that they had been established by craft and violence, in opposition to the national will; that they were destructive to religion, and subversive of public liberty; that they were the chief causes of their complaints, and ought, therefore, to be annulled. When, however, his grace hinted that the books of canons and liturgy should be withdrawn, and the court of high commission regulated so as to be no longer oppressive, provided they would, as a preliminary condition, agree to the surrender of the covenant, all hope of an amicable adjustment was at an end. The proposal was instantly and disdainfully rejected, the leaders unanimously declaring that they would as soon renounce their baptism as their covenant.

Impatient to know the nature and extent of Hamilton's commission, the deputies now drew up and presented to him a supplication, setting forth that the manifold grievances enumerated in their supplications and complaints to their sovereign having been remitted to his grace for a remedy, they had been induced to wait for a declaration of his majesty's pleasure; and as they had already waited until his grace had convened the lords of privy council, now that the council had met, and the matter required dispatch, they humbly desired a free General Assembly and a parliament, as the only means of redressing the great and daily increasing disorders of the Church and State, restoring the purity of God's worship, and establishing the peace of the Church and kingdom.

With a view to elicit a more speedy answer to this supplication, the deputies had the policy to circulate a paper, which, though apparently intended only for their friends, was meant to meet the eye of the commissioner, who could not fail, by means of some of his coadjutors, to become acquainted with its contents. It purported to be a series of articles for the consideration of the deputies, on the supposition even of force being employed against them, or of their patience being exhausted by delay. "1. Seeing the grievances complained of do concern the whole kingdom, the remedies ought to be public, and of as large extent, and must secure against the like in time coming. 2. A free General Assembly and parliament are only able to produce so good effects. 3. That the bishops could not be their judges until they were lawfully tried and purged of the crimes laid to their charge." The fourth and fifth articles were portentous, and must have prepared the minds of the commissioner and the adherents of the court for the most determined persistence on the part of the covenanters in opposing the measures of the king. They ran thus:—"4. If delays were used, it was desired that advice might be sought concerning the power of calling a General Assembly, how they should, in the meantime, behave with respect to controverted points, and that some lawful course might be thought upon how justice might have free course, and frauds be prevented. And 5. If violence were used for enforcing obedience, that a committee should be chosen to consider what was fit and lawful to be done for the defence of their religion, laws, and liberties." There are moments of difficulty and danger in which the boldest course is the wisest, because the safest. The position of the covenanters had now become more critical than ever: not only were they engaged in what is always a perilous enterprise—an open contest with the sovereign, but some of their own number, apprehensive of consequences, and impatient for peace, had begun to manifest an inclination to admit some change in the national covenant. It seemed necessary, therefore, in order to prevent defection, and confirm the waverers, to stimulate them by a new demonstration, glancing at ulterior measures of a most decisive character. It is impossible to say what influence the perusal of these ominous articles may have had on the determination of the commissioner, who was obviously labouring to gain time, until a force should be prepared sufficiently strong to repress and punish the covenanters. He, however, promised an answer to the supplicants in a few days; and in the interim sought to mollify them, and throw them off their guard, by holding private interviews with Mr. Alexander Henderson, and attending on his public ministrations. At length the deputies were invited by the commissioner to an interview, at which they were to be informed of his grace's pleasure concerning their supplication; but, to their astonishment, he told them that the only answer he could give them was contained in his majesty's declaration, which he intimated his intention of publishing by open proclamation. The deputies indignantly replied, that if his grace should persist in this intention, they would be constrained to meet the proclamation by a protest, as the only legal way of preserving their right of being heard. By abstaining from that course now, they said, they would appear to condemn all former protestations used either by their predecessors or by themselves, they would discourage many of the more timid amongst their brethren, and would tacitly acknowledge royal proclamations to have the force of laws, which it belonged exclusively to a General Assembly and parliament to enact. Besides, they added, "It is dutiful for warning of the king and his commissioner of our desires, and the lawful remedy thereof, the benefits of granting them, and evil consequences of refusing them; it is a sensible exoneration of us before foreign nations; it is a public thanking of the king's majesty for his public favour in points granted, and the most legal way in this great exigence, when we have declined the council, and are not satisfied with the declaration of his will from his commissioner, to preserve our recourse and immediate address to his majesty himself by new supplications and remonstrances."

Hamilton listened to this declaration with evident marks of displeasure; and assuming a haughty and resentful tone, he informed them that, in this matter, he would see his royal master obeyed; that he would attend personally at the Cross in support of the heralds, and would denounce as rebels all who should dare to protest. Thus forewarned, the deputies were fully prepared for the emergency; and, two days afterwards, observing preparations being made at the Cross for publishing the declaration, they ordered a scaffold to be erected for the protesters, and some thousands of gentlemen and respectable burgesses speedily convened, and, with drawn swords, held themselves in readiness to repel any sudden attack. When this resolution was perceived, the heralds were ordered to prepare horses for the purpose, as was supposed, of proceeding to some neighbouring borough to publish the proclamation. But the covenanters were not thus to be balked of their purpose. A resolute band prepared to track the footsteps of the heralds, and to protest against the declaration wherever it should be published. Meanwhile the determined attitude assumed by the covenanters at the Cross of Edinburgh induced the commissioner to postpone the promulgation of the royal edict, and revert to his soothing but deceitful policy. He desired the Earls of Traquair and Southesk, with the Lord Lorn, to intimate to the deputies his willingness that their demands for an assembly and free parliament should be acceded to, on condition that they should satisfy his mind as to certain scruples which he entertained regarding the clause in the covenant for mutual aid and defence. The Earls of Rothes and Montrose were appointed to correspond on the matter with the noblemen appointed by the commissioner, whose scruple, after some communication, was thus reduced to writing:—"His majesty may conceive that the confession is so general in the clause of mutual defence, that it may not only contain a defence for religion, his majesty's person and authority, and the liberties and laws of the kingdom, but also a combination for defending of delinquents against authority and law, even in other cases than those abovenamed." There was abundant reason to believe that this objection was started merely to excite discussion, and consequently occasion delay. Nevertheless, to avoid furnishing their enemies with a pretext for misrepresentation, the deputies took it into serious consideration, and communicated with their constituents upon the subject. The matter was warmly discussed by each of the Tables separately; and much difference of opinion at first prevailed as to the expediency of issuing any farther explanation of their views and intentions than what was already explicitly embodied in the covenant itself. It was at length agreed that a new supplication should be presented to the commissioner, in which all doubt as to the interpretation of the clause objected to should be for ever removed. This document, which is remarkable for its simplicity, perspicuity, and fulness, was presented on the 25th of June. "They declared before God and men that they were heartily grieved and sorry that any good man, and most of all that their sovereign, should so conceive of their doings; that they were so far from any thought of withdrawing themselves from their dutiful subjection and obedience to his majesty's government, that they had no intention or desire to attempt anything that might tend to the dishonour of God, or to the diminution of the king's greatness and authority; but, on the contrary, they acknowledge their quietness, stability, and happiness, depended upon the safety of the king's majesty, as upon God's vicergerent, set over them for maintenance of religion and administration of justice; that they had solemnly engaged, not only their mutual concurrence and assistance for the cause of religion, but also to the utmost of their power, with their means and lives, to stand to the defence of their dread sovereign, his person and authority, as well as the preservation and defence of true religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom; and, therefore, they did most humbly beseech his grace to esteem their confession of faith and covenant to have been intended, and to be the largest testimony they could give, of their fidelity to God and loyalty to their king; and that hindrance being removed, they do again supplicate for a free assembly and parliament to redress all their grievances, settle the peace of the Church and kingdom, and procure that cheerful obedience which ought to be rendered to his majesty, carrying with it the offer of their fortunes and best endeavours for his majesty's honour and happiness, and a real testimony of their thankfulness; and conclude with their hearty prayers to God that his majesty might long and prosperously reign over them."

missioner made no satisfactory reply. He was afraid, he said, that the explanations contained in their supplication would not satisfy his royal master, as his instructions were not sufficient to satisfy them; and he therefore proposed to proceed immediately to court, personally to inform his majesty of their wishes, and expressed a hope that he should return shortly with more ample powers and instructions. The deputies, who seem to have entertained no suspicion that this movement was made only to occasion delay, gladly assented to the commissioner's proposal, and the parties separated with a mutual agreement that no alteration of their present position was to be attempted until his return.

Relying for the present on this temporary accommodation, the greater part of the covenanters returned home; but, on the last day of June, those who still remained were astounded by the intelligence that the marquis, instead of immediately taking his departure for London, was preparing to issue a proclamation at the Cross of Edinburgh. Expecting nothing else than the publication of the king's message, a number hastily assembled in readiness to protest. Hamilton was prepared for this contingency, and instead of promulgating the king's declaration, as he had intended, he merely announced the return of the courts of law to the capital during his majesty's pleasure.

Next day, Sunday, the 1st of July, the commissioner set out, as if on his journey to court. He proceeded as far as Tranent, where he halted, and having attended church, remained for the night. On the following morning he suddenly returned to Edinburgh, and expecting to find the covenanters off their guard, he at last published the proclamation at the Cross. He reckoned without his host. Proclamation of the king's message, and protest of the covenanters.

Alexander Gibson, younger, of Durie, advocate, on the part of the barons; James Fletcher, provost of Dundee, in name of the burgesses; Mr. John Ker, minister of Prestonpans, and Mr. Archibald Johnston, advocate, on the part of all others who adhered to the covenant, having taken instruments in the hands of notaries, solemnly protested against the proclamation being ratified in council, and delivered a copy of their protestations to the herald. Many noblemen, barons, gentlemen, ministers, burgesses, and commons, were present as witnesses of this solemn act; and but for their interference, the peace of the city would have been disturbed by a serious riot, in consequence of the imprudence of some of the bishops, who, from a neighbouring window, stigmatised the protesters as rebels.

The declaration now published, though probably only a modified copy of that originally brought to Scotland by the commissioner, was dated "Greenwich, the 28th of June," an anachronism probably introduced by Hamilton himself to account for his surreptitious return to Edinburgh, and his apparent breach of faith with the covenanters, by the pretence of his having received fresh instructions from his majesty. Be this as it may, the most offensive part of the original declaration, the surrender of the covenant under pain of treason, was now omitted. The document was drawn up with consummate art, and was evidently intended to divide the covenanters by entrapping the unwary. While it professed to grant everything they desired, it was purposely so framed, that, by means of saving clauses craftily interspersed, it in reality conceded nothing. The service-book, canons, and other innovations in religion, were not to be pressed upon the people of Scotland, "but in such a fair and legal way as shall satisfy all our loving subjects." The high commission court was to be rectified, so "that it shall never impugn the laws, nor be a just grievance to our loyal subjects," but this was to be done "with the help of our privy council." The royal consideration was promised to all "that is fitting to be agitated" in general assemblies and parliament for the good and peace of the Kirk, and peaceable government of the same in the establishing of the religion at present professed."

The deceitful ambiguities of this declaration were perfectly in keeping with the underhand policy, which subsequent disclosures proved incontestibly that Charles had been pursuing throughout the whole course of these pretended negotiations. Failing in his crafty efforts to divide the covenanters, and despairing of being able to break their union without resorting to physical force, his only object was to gain time until his warlike preparations, which were secretly carried on in England, should be completed. For this purpose he sought to lull the covenanters into a false security, by pretending to submit to a treaty with men whom he was

Fresh proofs of the king's perfidy. privately denouncing as rebels, and by authorising his commissioner to make concessions which he never had the remotest intention of granting. It is impossible to read his correspondence with Hamilton, which afterwards came to light, without unspeakable disgust and indignation. Intent on carrying into effect his own despotic designs, and enraged at the opposition which they had met with, he was ready to sacrifice, not only truth and honesty, but the peace of the country and the blood of his subjects. In a letter to Hamilton, dated June 11th, while the treaty was scarcely Insincerity of the king—his letter to Hamilton. begun, much less broken off, he says, "Though I answered not yours of the 4th, yet I assure you I have not been idle; so that I hope by the next week, I shall send you some good assurance of the advancing of our preparations. This I say not to make you precipitate anything, for I like of all you have hitherto done, and even of that which I find you mind to do; but to show you that I mean to stick to my grounds, and that I expect not anything can reduce that people to their obedience, but only force. As for the dividing of my declaration, I find it most fit in that way you have resolved it; to which I shall add, that I am content to forbear the latter part thereof until you hear my fleet hath set sail for Scotland. In the meantime, your care must be how to dissolve the multitude, and, if it be possible, obtain possession of my castles of Edinburgh and Stirling, which I do not expect. And to this end I give you leave to flatter them with what hopes you please, so that you engage not me against my grounds; and in particular, that you consent neither to the calling of parliament nor general assembly, until the covenant be disavowed and given up—your chief end being now to win time, that they may not commit public follies until I be ready to suppress them, and since it is, as you well observe, my own people, which by this means will be for a time ruined, so that the loss must be inevitably mine; and this, if I could eschew, were it not even with a greater, were well; but, when I consider, not only now my crown, but my reputation for ever lies at stake, I must rather suffer the first, that time will help, than this last which is irreparable. This I have written to no other end than to show you I will rather die than yield to these impertinent and damnable demands, as you rightly call them; for it is all one as to yield to be no king in a very short time."

What the latter part of that declaration was which Hamilton had divided is explicitly stated in a postscript to the same letter:—"As affairs are now," he says, "I do not expect that you should declare the adherers to the covenant traitors, until (as I have already said) you have heard from me, that my fleet hath set sail for Scotland, though your six weeks should be elapsed. In a word, gain time by all the honest means you can, without forsaking your grounds."*

In the meantime, information of the warlike preparations going on in England had reached the ears of the covenanters, and was threatening to frustrate Hamilton's insidious policy, by destroying all confidence in his sincerity. He had therefore, it would appear, written to the king to lull their suspicions by a temporary suspension of these portentous measures. In the king's answer, dated the 13th of June, he says, "I shall take your advice in staying the public preparations for force; but, in a silent way—by your leave—I will not cease to prepare, that I may be ready upon the least advertisement. Now I hope there may be a possibility of securing my castles, but I confess it must be done closely and cunningly."† In a subsequent passage of the same letter, he suggests a new device for placing the covenanters entirely within the grasp of his vengeance. "One of the chief things," he says, "you are to labour now is, to get a considerable number of sessioners and advocates to give their opinion that the covenant is at least against law, if not treasonable."

* Burnet's Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton, p. 55

All Hamilton's efforts to persuade the college of justice, judges, and lawyers, to pronounce the covenant illegal, much less treasonable or seditious, proved abortive, and a majority even of the privy council now declared in its favour. Despairing therefore of being able either to dissolve or suppress this formidable league, Hamilton once more wrote to the king, representing to him that no alternative remained but either to admit the explanation offered by the covenanters, or to involve the nation in civil war. By adopting the former course, he said, tranquillity would be at once restored without further trouble either to his majesty or to the country, while the latter would be productive of evils of which it was impossible to calculate the amount or foresee the termination. He counselled his majesty to consider well before choosing so hazardous an alternative, and in particular to see that his preparations were thoroughly completed, as otherwise his faithful servants in Scotland might be involved in irretrievable ruin before he could come to their aid. He warned his majesty that he could in the present crisis place no reliance on his English subjects, whose present discontent would induce them rather to join the ranks of his adversaries, who had already formed the resolution of marching into England on the first hostile movement, and making that country the seat of war. Charles's reply, dated the 20th of June, sets his disposition in its true light: obstinate, self-willed, impatient of opposition, and ready and resolved to sacrifice the tranquillity of the country, and the lives of his subjects, rather than submit to the mortification of his inordinate pride, by receding a single hairbreadth from the position which, in the exercise of his fancied prerogative, he had once chosen to occupy. "What now I write," he says, "is, first, to show you in what estate I am, and then to have your advice in some things. My train of artillery, consisting of forty pieces of ordnance, with the appurtenances, all Drake's—half and more of which are to be drawn with one or two horses a-piece—is in good forwardness, and I hope will be ready within six weeks; for I am sure there wants neither money nor materials to do it with. I have taken as good order as I can for the present, for securing of Carlisle and Berwick; but of this you shall have more certainty by my next. I have sent for arms to Holland for fourteen thousand foot, and two thousand horse. For my ships, they are ready; and I have given orders to send three for the coast of Ireland immediately, under pretence to defend our fishermen. Last of all, which is indeed most of all, I have consulted with the treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer for money, for this year's expedition, which I estimate at two hundred thousand pounds sterling, which they doubt not but to furnish me. More I have done, but these are the chief heads. Now for your advice: I desire to know whether you think it fit that I should send six thousand landmen with the fleet that goes to the Frith, or not? Thus you may see, that I intend not to yield to the demands of those traitors, the covenanters."*

In reply to a subsequent letter of Hamilton's, in which he laboured indirectly to dissuade the king from his iniquitous and most impolitic enterprise, Charles writes thus: "There be two things in your letter that require answer, to wit, the answer to their petition, and concerning the explanation of their damnable covenant. For the first, the telling you that I have not changed my mind in this particular is answer sufficient; and for the other, I will only say that so long as this covenant is in force, whether it be with or without explanation, I have no more power in Scotland than a duke of Venice, which I will rather die than suffer; yet I command the giving ear to the explanation, or anything else to win time. Another I know is, to show the world clearly that my taking of arms is to suppress rebellion, and not to impose novelties, but that they are the seekers of them. Lastly, my resolution is to come myself in person, accompanied like myself, sea forces, nor Ireland shall not be forgotten."†

Hamilton, feeling it was necessary to inform the king more fully of the state of the country than he could do by writing, at last set out on his journey to London. He took his departure on the 8th of July, and, on the fifth day thereafter, presented himself at court. He represented to his majesty, in strong colours and without reserve, the formidable power and determined attitude of the people, who were nearly unanimous in their adherence to the detested covenant, which they were resolved to maintain to the last extremity. He complained of the encouragement given to the covenanters by a majority of the privy council, who manifested either a lukewarmness in his majesty's cause, or a decided leaning towards that of the covenanters, who had been incited to increased activity by an insidious report industriously circulated, that the hostile preparations being made in England for their repression were already nearly completed. This most unpromising aspect of affairs, though more than Charles had been prepared to expect, served only to deepen his infatuated determination. Hamilton, indeed, would gladly have saved his country from the miseries of civil war, but his low ambition of court favour was more than a counterpoise both to his patriotism and his loyalty. To him belongs the infamous distinction of having suggested a new, subtle, and treacherous policy for either dividing the covenanters, or at least temporising until the king's forces were ready for action. He proposed to his majesty to revive the national covenant as sworn by King James in 1580, but insidiously to substitute in place of the bond annexed by the covenanters, the original bond for the maintenance of religion, "as at present professed"—an ambiguous expression, tion, the king, by the advice of Laud, resolved on adopting this treacherous expedient, and Hamilton was sent back to Scotland with fresh and more enlarged instructions. The great object was still to gain time, and Hamilton was authorised to pursue almost any course, however deceitful, by which this object was likely to be attained. He was required to endeavour to get the privy council to subscribe the proposed covenant, with the ambiguous bond subjoined to it; and, in the event of their compliance, he was empowered—if he should find it indispensable—to summon a General Assembly at such time and place as he might consider convenient, with this sole limitation, that it should be delayed as long as possible. He was enjoined to labour that the bishops should have votes in the assembly, and, if possible, that the moderator should be chosen from their order. Failing in this attempt, he was to protest in their favour, though he was to admit their accountability to the General Assembly; and, if any charges were preferred against them, he was even to agree to their being brought to trial. If he should consider it conducive to his majesty's service, he was authorised to suspend the operation of the articles of Perth, and to publish the order made by the council on the 5th of July preceeding, for the recall of the liturgy, canons, and court of high commission. That these concessions were intended only to be temporary, there can be no doubt; and, indeed, it is evident from the concluding article of the instructions that Charles was not acting in good faith, and had no intention whatever of yielding to the demands of his Scottish subjects. "Notwithstanding all these instructions," he says, "you are by no means to permit a present rupture to happen, but to yield anything, though unreasonable, rather than now to break."

The covenanters had all along justly suspected the sincerity of Charles in all his attempts to conciliate them; and, at this very time, a circumstance occurred which still further deepened their distrust. The Tables, that still continued their sittings in the capital, anxious to gain over the people of Aberdeen, who, through the persuasion of the doctors and the influence of Huntley, were still opposed to the work of reformation, sent a deputation to that town, consisting of the Earls of Montrose and Kinghorn, and Lord Cupar, with Alexander Henderson, David Dickson, and Andrew Cant, to make one effort more in favour of the covenant. Their appearance on such an errand was the signal for a renewed and violent opposition, on the part of the doctors, who inveighed against the covenant in their discourses from the pulpit; and, though the magistrates received the deputation with courtesy, they not only refused to subscribe the covenant themselves, but passed an act prohibiting its subscription by any of the inhabitants. A request that the ministers who formed part of the deputation should be allowed to occupy the pulpits was also peremptorily refused by their brethren of the town. They were constrained accordingly to preach in the open air. Great multitudes attended their ministrations, to whom they explained the nature and objects of the covenant, which, notwithstanding the injunctions of the magistrates, was subscribed by about five hundred persons, including some of the most respectable of the citizens. In the meantime, a vehement controversy was carried on between the doctors and the three covenanting ministers; and after sundry pamphlets had been published on both sides, and the deputation had returned to Edinburgh, the doctors arrogantly claimed the victory. Huntley lost no time in reporting this assumed triumph to the king, who had the impolicy, at this critical moment, to write a letter to the provost and town-council, and another to the doctors, conveying his hearty thanks, and making large promises of future favour. Hamilton, as impolitic as his master, also wrote them in similar terms, and remitted a donation of one hundred pounds to keep the press at work for the king's cause. These marks of court favour, though they excited at the time great exultation among the enemies of the covenant, contributed largely in the end to promote the cause they were intended to frustrate.

Having received his instructions, the commissioner set out for Edinburgh, where he arrived on the 10th of August. He was immediately waited on by deputies from the Tables, to learn the result of his conference with the king. He was at first unusually reserved, but having consulted with the privy council, he, about a week after his arrival, made eleven primary demands, to which he required a categorical answer, as a necessary preliminary before summoning a General Assembly. To these demands a series of answers were returned, which convinced the commissioner they were not to be so easily imposed on as he had expected. He had recourse, therefore, to the expedient of reducing his eleven demands to two, which were so artfully framed as to comprise the greater part of the objectionable matter contained in the eleven. The two demands were—in Edinburgh.

1. "That no layman should have voice in choosing the ministers to be sent from the several presbyteries to the General Assembly, nor any but the ministers of the same presbytery.

2. "That the assembly should not go about to determine things established by act of parliament, otherwise than by remonstrance or petition to the parliament."

These demands were taken into serious consideration by the Tables, and after much discussion, in which considerable diversity of opinion was manifested, they were unanimously rejected as snares laid to entrap them, and, in fact, as precluding the accomplishment of almost every object for which a General Assembly was demanded.

Impatient of further delay, the purpose of which they now began clearly to perceive, and indignant at the ever accumulating obstructions thrown across their path, the deputies now boldly avowed to the commissioner the determination of the Church, if the royal mandate were longer delayed, to summon a free assembly by the authority inherent in themselves. A long series of reasons for this decided step was speedily drawn up, and laid before the commissioner, who, in his turn, propounded a variety of objections, which were promptly answered; and, at last, the commissioner, finding he could not move the covenanters from their purpose, had again recourse to his temporising policy. He entreated them to suspend their resolution until he should once more repair to court, and solicit in person his majesty's concurrence. Many of the ministers, gentry, and burgesses, were strongly opposed to this new delay; but at a public meeting it was agreed, on the motion of Lord Lorn, seconded by Lord Rothes, to suspend further procedure until the 20th of September, on condition that the commissioner should use his influence with the king—"1. To obtain from his majesty an assembly, free both as to the members of which it should consist, and as to the matters which should be handled therein. 2. That the time of the sitting of such assembly should be fixed to a short day. 3. That the place of meeting might be the most commodious for all concerned. And, 4. That the interrupting of their letters in England might be discharged."

Having assented to these conditions, Hamilton took his departure for London on the 25th of August. On his way he stopped for one night to hold a consultation with the Earls of Traquair, Roxburgh, and Southesk, who drew up a memorial to be presented to his majesty recommending the unconditional recall of the canons and liturgy, the abolition of the court of high commission, the suspension of the articles of Perth, and the limitation of the power of the bishops by subjecting them to the control of a General Assembly. They further expressed their concurrence in the advice of Hamilton respecting the revival of the former covenant. When his grace reached the court, he represented to his majesty that the fear of exposing the royal authority to contempt had restrained him from publishing his former instructions; and that nothing seemed so likely to remove jealousies, and restore the tranquillity of the country, as a renewal of the covenant drawn up by command of King James in 1580, and containing an express and articulate renunciation of the errors of popery, the fear of which still haunted the minds of the people, and had, in fact, been one of the principal causes which led to the establishment of the recent covenant, to which nearly the whole nation had sworn adherence.

With this counsel, though deeply distasteful, Charles, who was not yet prepared for an open rupture with the covenanters, felt himself constrained to comply, and he once more dispatched the marquis to Scotland, to negotiate with the troublesome covenanters. The declaration and instructions of which he was now the bearer would probably, if issued a few months earlier, have satisfied all concerned. They were now regarded with coldness and distrust, as concessions granted when they could no longer be withheld, and likely to be resumed on the first favourable opportunity. Hamilton was commissioned to grant nearly everything that the covenanters had originally demanded—the recall of the service-book and canons, the abolition of the court of high commission, the suspension of the articles of Perth, the summoning of a free parliament and assembly, and the subjection of the bishops to the jurisdiction and control of the latter, as the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of the country. Such were Hamilton's public instructions; but along with these he had secret directions for counteracting them. "You must," says the deceitful monarch, "by all means possible you can think of, be infusing into the ministers what a wrong it must be unto them, and what an oppression upon the freedom of their judgments, if there must be such a number of laics to overbear them, both in their elections for the General Assembly and afterwards; likewise you must infuse into the lay lords and gentlemen, with art and industry, how manifestly they will suffer if they let the presbyters get head upon them."*

This insidious injunction was punctually obeyed by Hamilton, who soon had the malevolent satisfaction to find that it was not altogether without effect. Between the ministers and the covenanting lords there appeared symptoms of discord, which he industriously laboured to foment; and, in the expectation of a complete schism taking place between the parties, he determined on summoning an assembly without a moment's delay. The commissioner had reached Edinburgh on the 17th of September, and the deputies of the covenanters, after waiting impatiently for three days, during which he kept himself secluded, at last requested to know when they might expect to be informed of his majesty's pleasure. To their great joy, he informed them that the king had been pleased to grant all they desired, though he was not at liberty to communicate the particulars until he had made them known to the privy council, which was to sit the same day. The council accordingly assembled in the afternoon, when the marquis announced to them his majesty's pleasure, that the old covenant subscribed by King James should be renewed, but that the original bond was to be retained in preference to that which had been framed and adopted by the covenanters. Anxious to secure the concurrence of the council, without leaving time for deliberation, the result of which might be doubtful, Hamilton was urgent for an immediate vote. But the matter appeared too grave to be thus surreptitiously disposed of. Many of the members expressed a desire that, as the covenant and bond involved a confession of faith, they should be maturely considered; difficulties were started; objections were raised and answered; argument was followed by counter-argument, until the time was so far spent that the council broke up for the night without coming to any decision. At an early hour next morning they again assembled, and, after a protracted debate, they agreed to subscribe the covenant with the original bond, having previously recorded an explanation that they accepted it according to its original meaning, and as referring to the religion then professed, to the exclusion of prelacy.

On the same day the council passed a number of acts of great importance, among which were the following:—An act declaring their entire satisfaction with the concessions made by his majesty, and their conviction that these ought to prove equally satisfactory to all his majesty's subjects;—an act declaring that they had sworn and subscribed the Confession of Faith, dated the 2nd day of March, 1580, together with the general bond, dated in the year 1589, for the maintenance of religion as professed at that time within this kingdom;—an act proceeding upon his majesty's appointment and order, that a free General Assembly be indicted to be held in the city of Glasgow on the 21st of November, and that proclamation of the same be made at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and at the other head boroughs of the kingdom, warning all and sundry archbishops, bishops, commissioners of kirks, and all others having place and vote in the assembly, to appear there at the time appointed;—and an act proceeding on his majesty's appointment and order, that the high court of parliament should be held at Edinburgh on the 15th day of May next to come, and that proclamation be made accordingly. Two days afterwards the council again assembled, and proceeded to still bolder measures. They passed an act ordaining all his majesty's subjects of whatsoever degree, estate, or quality, ecclesiastical or civil, to swear and subscribe the confession of 1580, and the bond of 1589, as they will answer the contrary upon their obedience, and ordaining proclamation to that effect to be made at the market-cross of Edinburgh; and also an act empowering one commissioner for every shire to exhibit the said confession and bond, and to require all his majesty's lieges to subscribe the same, as they will be answerable to his majesty.

The lords of the covenant were justly alarmed by these proceedings, the intention of which, though sufficiently obvious to themselves, might not be so easily detected by many of their adherents, who, misled by the apparent similarity of the king's covenant to their own, might be induced to acquiesce in the view of the council. In order to avert the threatened danger, Rothcs, accompanied by several of the covenanting lords, immediately waited upon the commissioner, and requested him to delay issuing the proclamation until the next day, when they would be prepared to adduce conclusive reasons against the revival of the old covenant. This request, however, Hamilton peremptorily refused, and, on the same day, ordered proclamation to be made enjoining the subscription of the king's covenant, and summoning the assembly to meet at Glasgow. Considerable diversity of opinion as to the place of meeting had at first existed among the prelatical party. The Archbishop of St. Andrew's had suggested Aberdeen, the stronghold of episcopacy; but Glasgow was at last fixed on, on account of the great family influence of Hamilton in the west.

The proclamation, which was artfully conceived in most bland and conciliatory terms, and wore an aspect of candour and generosity eminently fitted to entrap the unwary, was instantly met by a protest from the Earl of Montrose and other deputies of the Tables, in which they keenly scrutinised the royal declaration, and openly exposed its subtle and specious artifices, by which, while professing to grant everything, it in reality secured nothing. They protested against being urged to swear the king's covenant, as by such oath they would bind themselves to the maintenance of prelacy, and all those other innovations which they had already solemnly and expressly abjured. "It cannot be denied," they said, "but any oath ministered unto us must either be refused, or else taken according to the known mind, professed intention, and express command of the authority urging the same; and it is most manifest that his majesty's mind, intention, and commandment, is no other but that the confession be sworn for the maintenance of religion as it is already or presently professed (these two being coincident, altogether one and the same, not only in our common form of speaking, but in all his majesty's proclamations); and thus it includeth and containeth within the compass thereof the foresaid novations and episcopacy, which, under that name, were also ratified in the first parliament holden by his majesty. * * * If we should now enter upon this new subscription," they said, "we should think ourselves guilty of mocking God, and taking his name in vain; for the tears that began to be poured forth at the solemnising of the covenant are not yet dried up and wiped away, and the joyful noise which then began to sound forth hath not yet ceased. As we are not to multiply miracles on God's part, so ought we not to multiply solemn oaths and covenants on our part, and thus to play with oaths, as children do with their toys, without necessity. * * * We solemnly protest that we do constantly adhere to our oath and subscription of the confession of faith and covenant lately renewed and approved ;" and declining his majesty's prerogative as competent to deal with such matters, to the exclusion of the ecclesiastical courts and the legislature of the country, they added, "We also protest that none of us who have subscribed, and do adhere to our subscription of the late covenant, be charged or urged either to procure the subscriptions of others, or to subscribe ourselves, unto any other confession or covenant containing any derogation thereunto—especially that mentioned in the proclamation—without the necessary explanation and the application thereof already sworn by us, for the reasons above expressed. And because as we did, in our former protestation, appeal from the lords of his majesty's council, so we do now by these renew our solemn appeal, with all solemnities requisite, unto the next free General Assembly and parliament, as the only supreme national judicatories competent to judge of national causes and proceedings. * * * We still adhere to our former complaints, protestations, lawful meetings, proceedings, mutual defences, &c., all which, as they have been in themselves lawful, so were they to us, pressed with so many grievances in his majesty's absence from his native kingdom, most necessary, and ought to be regarded as good offices and pertinent duties of faithful Christians, loyal subjects, and sensible members of this Kirk and commonwealth, as we trust at all occasions to make manifest to good men, especially to his sacred majesty, for whose long and prosperous government, that we may live a peaceable and quiet life in all godliness and honesty, we earnestly pray." * On the reading of this spirited protest, the Earl of Montrose, in name of the noblemen; Mr. Alexander Gibson, younger, of Durie, advocate, in name of the barons; George Porterfield, merchant, burgess of Glasgow, in name of the boroughs; Mr. Harry Rollock, minister of Edinburgh, in name of the ministers; and Mr. Archibald Johnston, advocate, by whom the protest had been read, in name of all others who adhered to the covenant, took instruments in the hands of three notaries, and presented a copy to the herald, in the presence of a vast multitude of their constituents.

The protestation made in the capital, so far from inducing the commissioner to pause in the prosecution of his design, seemed to give fresh stimulus to his exertions. Orders were issued for publishing the proclamation in all parts of the country, but the Tables, justly apprehensive of a division among the covenanters, sent out deputies in such numbers, and with such despatch, that the proclamation was everywhere met with the same protest, accompanied by the same legal formalities. The deputies were further instructed to use all possible diligence in warning every presbytery and congregation against subscribing the king's covenant, which they denounced as a "cunningly devised" plot to divide them, and give the victory to their enemies. By these means a general schism, which would have otherwise been almost certain to follow, was averted, and except in Aberdeen and Glasgow, the ranks of the covenanters were maintained unbroken. In the latter the defection was but partial, though several of the ministers made their appearance at the cross with a small party of non-covenanters, and indulged in factitious and extravagant demonstrations of joy at what they termed "the grace and benignity of the king's mind," and urged the necessity and expediency of subscribing "the national covenant," in obedience to his command, and in imitation of their loyal example. When the proclamation was published at the Cross of Aberdeen, the Master of Forbes and the Lord Fraser caused the protest to be read; but such was the influence of Huntley and the doctors, that great numbers subscribed the king's covenant. The zealous doctors, however, were not contented with a simple and unqualified subscription, but manifested their sycophantic loyalty by adding an explication, that they did not by their subscribing condemn episcopacy or the articles of Perth. It is worthy of especial remark, as serving to demonstrate the base deceit both of the king and his commissioner, and to show the interpretation which they put upon the bond for the maintenance of religion as at present professed, that the subscriptions were received by Hamilton with this explication; but lest the example of annexing explications should be followed by others who might adopt a different interpretation, the matter was kept secret, and the subscriptions of the doctors were taken on a separate bond.

Hamilton, still dissatisfied with the result of the attempt to disunite the covenanters in Glasgow, soon afterwards proceeded thither in person, with a view to secure subscriptions to the king's covenant. He was accompanied by Dr. Balcanquhal, his confidential adviser, who, in a sermon which he preached in the High Church, laboured to gain over the people to his purposes; but notwithstanding Hamilton's great influence in the west, and his most strenuous endeavours to induce the magistrates to embrace the king's covenant, he had the mortification to find that they were desirous of being allowed a delay of ten days to advise on the matter. At the end of that period, a further delay of eight days was insisted on by the provost. With each delay, however, their scruples seemed to increase both in number and intensity, and even up to the meeting of the assembly they remained still undecided.

Unfortunately, considerable distrust and disunion now arose between the clergy and laity regarding the election of members of the General Assembly. The proposal of the court, "that the commissioners to the assembly should be elected by the ministers alone," and the vile intrigues practised by Hamilton in obedience to the express injunctions of the king, had not altogether failed of their intended effect. The constitution of assemblies had, moreover, from their having been long in abeyance, become almost forgotten; and the restoration of lay elders, who had been displaced by James, excited the apprehension, if not the jealousy, of many of the clergy—who erroneously considered it as an innovation, and an attempt on the part of the nobility and gentry to establish a predominance in the high ecclesiastical court, and thus usurp a position to which they were not entitled. The Tables, on the other hand, were not without some misgivings as to the policy of allowing any opportunity to the clergy of grasping at a power which had been often so tyrannically and perniciously exercised. They were by no means disposed merely to exchange the tyranny of the prelacy for that of presbyteries. By the constitution, as well as by the ancient custom of the Church, one elder from each parish was appointed to attend the presbytery, and when the clergy who appeared as candidates for election as commissioners to the assembly had, as was the practice, withdrawn, the laity were the majority. As this regulation had ceased to be generally known, a treatise was drawn up, in which it was explained and enforced. The office of ruling elder was shown to be essential to the very existence of presbyterianism, and the elder, both by the polity of the Church and the law of the land, to be a constituent part of every General Assembly. This treatise, together with instructions respecting the mode of electing commissioners, and the qualifications necessary for that important office, was circulated through all the presbyteries of the kingdom. The effect was eminently beneficial to the cause of the covenants. The ancient rule was adhered to, and under its operation the most zealous and orthodox ministers were returned as commissioners, and the leading covenanters as ruling elders. Besides these, according to the practice of the Church ever since the Reformation, forty-eight boroughs sent each one lay member to the assembly; but still the number of elders, both from presbyteries and boroughs, did not on this occasion exceed ninety-six, while that of ministers amounted to one hundred and forty.

From the presence of a large number of the most distinguished nobility and gentry as members of the assembly, its influence both with the court party and the country far surpassed that of a body composed of ecclesiastics alone; and this influence was still further increased by the assumption of four assessors to each elder—men of probity, wisdom, and experience, by whose advice, both in public and in private, the lay members were ably assisted at this difficult and important crisis.

Before the meeting of the assembly, the result of the elections had fully satisfied the covenanters that they could rely on the zeal and integrity of the majority of the members; and the only remaining difficulty was the mode of proceeding against the bishops. It was true that, by the king's proclamation, they were commanded to be in attendance at the meeting of the assembly, to whose jurisdiction and authority they were moreover declared to be subject; but still no warrant had been issued citing them to appear there as delinquents. The Tables had protested against their being allowed to sit as members of the assembly, until they had cleared themselves, by a fair and legal trial, of the accusations brought against them; but they had no authority to summon them to the bar of the assembly, and the proceedings of previous assemblies had furnished neither law nor precedent to guide them in such a conjuncture. In these circumstances, the Earl of Rothes and some other leading members of the Tables petitioned the commissioner for a warrant to cite the bishops as accused parties before the assembly. This, however, the commissioner refused, on the ground that he had no precedent for such a proceeding; and peevishly remarked that he thought he had done enough by refraining from throwing any obstacles in the way of their being brought to trial. In the meantime, however, the prelates, as Hamilton well knew, had, notwithstanding their having been declared by the king's proclamation subject to the discipline of the assembly, prepared a declinature of the authority of that body, on the ground of its being partially composed of laics; and that document had been actually revised by his majesty himself, and was intended to be produced, not to bar the trial, but as a protest for the dissolution of the assembly.*

The leaders of this great popular movement were far too able and experienced, and had already dared too much to be so easily defeated in a matter of such importance. They drew up a complaint in the form of a libel against all the bishops, in which their public offences, and private personal delinquencies, were embraced in one general and cumulative accusation. They were accused collectively of having transgressed the caveats, or cautions, by which they had been limited by the act of assembly passed in the year 1600, and ratified by the late king; of behaving themselves as lords over the Church, rather than as pastors of the flock; of publicly teaching, as well as privately defending, popish and Arminian doctrines, and indirectly encouraging, by promotion in the Church, the teachers of such tenets; and of being personally guilty of the most flagrant immoralities—of bribery, simony, lying, dishonest dealing, gambling, sabbath-breaking, profane swearing, drunkenness, fornication, and adultery. This complaint which, according to arrangement, was preferred by a large body of the principal nobility, barons, and burgesses, not members of the assembly, was in their own name, and in that of all the other covenanters, also not members, laid before each of the presbyteries within whose limits a bishop either resided at the time or held his cathedral seat; and in addition to the charges against the prelates in general, the particular offences of each bishop in particular were noticed in a blank space left for that purpose; or if, as frequently happened, that were too small to contain the enumeration of his misdeeds, these were directed to be duly recorded and complained of in a separate document. All these accusations were accompanied with a petition to the several presbyteries—as the competent judicatories for the investigation of such scandals, and the trial of the parties—that they would either take the same into their own consideration, and award such censure as the offences might appear to deserve, or otherwise refer the whole affair to the General Assembly. According to preconcerted arrangement, all the presbyteries referred these complaints to the forthcoming assembly; and in the meantime ordained them, as well as the reference thus made, to be publicly read from every pulpit within their bounds, together with a citation to all the offenders, by name, “to be present at the said assembly, to answer to this complaint in general, and to the particular heads of it; to undergo the trial and censure of it, and to bring with them the books and scrolls of the subscriptions and oaths of them who entered into the ministry, the books of the high commission, and the books of the General Assembly, which they either had or have fraudulently put away.”*

Their plans being thus far matured, the indefatigable Tables issued a requisition that all the noblemen and gentlemen who had signed the covenant should meet at Glasgow on the 17th of November, being the Saturday immediately preceding the meeting of the assembly; and that all elders chosen as commissioners should repair thither by the same day, each bringing with him four assessors to assist him with their advice. With a view to counteract this arrangement, the privy council were prevailed on to publish an act prohibiting any commissioner from carrying with him to the assembly more attendants than those of his own family and ordinary retinue. The proclamation of this order called forth a protest from the covenanters, which, according to usage, had the effect of suspending its effect, and thus rendering it inoperative. Traquair, however, had

Base artifice of Traquair. in store another device, so mean and base as to stamp with indelible infamy all concerned in carrying it into execution. This was no other than to attempt depriving the assembly of many of its members by putting to the horn all commissioners who could for any civil cause, or on any pretence, be brought within the toils of the law. For this purpose no pains were spared to discover all who happened to be involved in pecuniary liabilities, or in arrear of taxes; and even fictitious claims were artfully got up as a pretext for these oppressive proceedings. Against this insidious attempt to exclude a number of the commissioners from their seats in the assembly, a long paper of reasons was given in, in which it was triumphantly shown that, although the crime of rebellion charged in letters of horning might debar a man from sitting in a civil judicatory, nothing but excommunication could cut him off from the privilege of sitting in an ecclesiastical court. “Unless this distinction be observed,” it was remarked, “horning will be a real excommunication. * * * And the horning being used at this time rigorously, in fecundem totius ecclesie, it ought to be so far from being respected, that it is to be resented, and the urgers thereof to be ecclesiastically punished.” The commissioner and the council found it impossible to proceed in the face of this able remonstrance, and the infamous design was ultimately abandoned.*

When the court of sessions met at Edinburgh, on the 1st of November, Hamilton made an effort to prevail on the lords to subscribe the king’s covenant; and several of them having pressed for delay, a debate ensued, which lasted for three hours, when not more than nine were persuaded to adhibit their names. Two had absented themselves, and four steadfastly refused—assigning a variety of reasons, and protesting “that those doubts should be cleared by the determination of the assembly then indicted;” and that their refusal did not proceed from disloyalty or disobedience, “but merely from a solicitude to walk warrantably in a matter of so great importance.”

This partial failure did not deter the commissioner from trying a similar experiment with the privy council. Having convoked a meeting of that body, he informed them that his majesty desired to limit, but not to abolish episcopacy, and earnestly urged them to pass an act approving of the king’s will in this particular. This proposal was vigorously opposed by the lord-advocate, Sir Thomas Hope, and the council showed no inclination to comply with it. The commissioner was at no pains to conceal his resentment against Hope; but, after many bitter and reproachful speeches, commanded him, as his majesty’s servant, to proceed to Glasgow and defend episcopacy, as he should answer at his peril. This order he respectfully but firmly declined to obey, boldly declaring that he conscientiously considered episcopacy as contrary at once to the word of God and the law of the kingdom. The marquis then peremptorily discharged him from proceeding to Glasgow on this occasion—a mandate which he reluctantly obeyed.

As the time appointed for the meeting of the assembly drew near, the prelates began to tremble for themselves and their order, and earnestly advised Hamilton to frustrate the schemes and disappoint the hopes of the covenanters by a prorogation. There can be no doubt that this advice would have been eagerly followed, had it now been possible for the king to recede without precipitating a crisis which it was his policy to postpone. He resolved that the assembly should be held, though he hoped, by sowing division, and artfully interposing obstructions to their proceedings, to frustrate the objects for which the assembly had been demanded. In his secret instruction to Hamilton, his deliberate, studied treachery, notwithstanding all his specious professions, is obviously manifested. "As for this General Assembly," he says, "though I can expect no good from it, yet I hope you may hinder much of the ill—first by putting divisions amongst them concerning the legality of their elections, then by protesting against their tumultuary proceedings." * Again, in a subsequent letter, "As for the opinion of the clergy (the prelates) to prorogue this assembly, I utterly dislike them; for I should more hurt my reputation by not keeping it, than their mad acts can prejudice my service. Therefore, I command you, hold your day; but as you write, if you can break them, by proving nullities in their procedure, nothing better." † We shall afterwards see with what scrupulous punctuality Hamilton obeyed these perfidious injunctions.

The assembly had been summoned to meet on Wednesday, the 21st of November, and on the Saturday previous, the commissioner proceeded from Hamilton to Glasgow, accompanied by the lords of the privy council and a numerous train of attendants. He was met on the way by the greater part of the nobility, and other leaders of the covenanters, who were desirous of paying their respects to him as the representative of their sovereign. He received them with much courtesy and apparent cordiality. Many mutual civilities and conciliatory speeches were interchanged. On the one hand, he assured them that nothing "dissonant to scripture, reason, and law," would be asked; and, on the other, they promised that nothing reasonable would be denied. On the arrival of the commissioner in Glasgow, he found the city in a state of intense excitement, and filled to overflowing with people from all quarters of the kingdom, including nearly the whole of the commissioners to the assembly with their assessors, many of whom had, by concert, repaired thither on the previous day. Among these were the greater part of the principal nobility, a large number of the most influential barons, and many of the chief magistrates of boroughs, and other respectable burghesses, collected from every town in Scotland—all prepared to resist every attempt to subject them, either by force or fraud, to the detested yoke of episcopacy. The boldest heart might well have quailed in the face of such an opposition, and we can scarcely doubt that Hamilton must have now begun to despair of the success of his mission. He resolved, however, to try all the chicanery of which he was master, in order to bias or divide the assembly, and especially rather to dissolve it than to permit the bishops to be arraigned, much less condemned. But his chief reliance was now on the preparations which were being vigorously carried forward in England. Notwithstanding the pacific declarations of the king and his commissioner, a large naval and military armament was in course of being secretly fitted out, to compel the covenanters to submission at the point of the sword. To force episcopacy on a reluctant people, and by its means to establish an unmitigated despotism, both civil and ecclesiastical, Charles was ready and resolved to plunge the kingdom into all the miseries of civil war. But it was impossible to conceal his operations. The covenanters were fully apprised of their danger, and already began to take measures for their own defence. Arms, ammunition, and other military stores, were collected by the nobility, and by many of the towns; and General Leslie, an officer of great ability and experience, who had distinguished himself in various campaigns under Gustavus, King of Sweden, was invited to return to take the command of the patriot army, in case the king should, in pursuance of his insane and wicked policy, actually carry matters to the last extremity.

Such was the relative position of the parties when the assembly met, according to appointment, on the 21st of November, in the High Church of Glasgow. Meeting of the assembly, 21st of November. Never since the Reformation had Scotland witnessed the convocation of an ecclesiastical council so august and important. It consisted of one hundred and forty of the most distinguished ministers of the Church, with ninety-eight ruling elders, of whom seventeen were noblemen of the highest rank, nine were knights, twenty-five were gentlemen of landed property, and forty-seven were burghesses, including many of the first magistrates of boroughs, and all of them men of known talent and respectability, and well qualified to represent in parliament the communities to which they belonged. If to these we add the assessors, men selected for their wisdom and experience in the management of public affairs, as well as for qualifications still more important, and comprising in their number almost every baron of note in the kingdom, we may form some idea of the irresistible array of moral and intellectual force to which the infatuated king and his subservient commissioner had chosen to place themselves in antagonism. Such an assembly, forewarned of the treachery of their adversaries, were not to be easily circumvented; and strong in the rectitude of the cause they had embraced, and supported by the almost universal public opinion of their countrymen, who were ready to risk fortune and life itself in their defence, were not likely to be overawed. For two weeks after the first sitting of the assembly, the concourse of people was so exceedingly great, that the members could not get access to the place of meeting without the assistance of the town-guard, headed by the magistrates, and in some instances, especially at first, many of the nobility and gentry, and even the commissioner in person, lent their aid in making way for the members through the eager multitude. The vast building afforded them ample accommodation, and convenience, as well as state, seems to have been studied in the arrangements. In an elevated chair of state sat the lord-commissioner, surrounded by the lords of the privy council; at a long table occupying the central space were placed the covenanting lords and barons with their assessors, while the other commissioners occupied successive ranges of ascending seats around the table. A small table was placed in the midst for the moderator and clerk; at the end was a platform of considerable elevation, prepared for the young nobility, and a promiscuous assemblage of ladies and gentlemen crowded the galleries above.*

Mr. Bell of Glasgow, being the oldest minister, had been appointed to preach; but his sermon, which contained many pointed remarks against the late innovations, was lost to the greater part of the audience, not a sixth part of whom could hear him distinctly. Most probably this circumstance had been foreseen, and had influenced the selection—the assembly being unwilling to stir up in the outset those hostile passions, which were so likely to be aroused in the course of their subsequent proceedings.

A great part of the first day was occupied in receiving commissions, and other matters of preliminary routine. On the second, the tug of war commenced, and it became evident that the commissioner, notwithstanding all his professions of liberty and moderation, was resolved to contest every inch of ground, and to employ every artifice to defeat the objects for which the assembly had been convoked. The first business naturally was of Ross, insisted that the election of a moderator should be postponed until the commissions should be subjected to a scrutiny, under the plausible pretext of preventing ulterior confusion and difficulty, in the event of any of them being found untenable. The real object was to stamp a nullity on the very first proceeding of the assembly, by rendering its act informal and valid. The stratagem was instantly detected. It was urged in reply, that by the invariable practice of the Church, the assembly elected and installed a moderator before proceeding to any other business whatever; that until this was done the assembly could not be legally constituted, no question could be rightly discussed, and no decision could properly be regarded as embodying the opinion of a regularly organised body. After a long and keenly contested discussion, in which Lord Traquair and Sir Lewis Stewart, who acted in place of the lord-advocate, on the one side, and the Lord Rothes and Loudoun, on the other, took a prominent part, the assembly resolved to proceed in the election, and the commissioner gave way, under protest that this concession should not import his approbation of any commission to which he might afterwards object, or his acknowledgment of any delegate as a lawful member of the assembly. In like manner, he protested that the nomination of a moderator should nowise prejudice the lords of the clergy in their office, or any dignities which law or custom had given them. Having taken instruments on these protests, they were met by a counter-protest from Lord Rothes, in name of the commissioners. The assembly were now ready to constitute their meeting by the choice of a moderator, when the procedure was again interrupted by the commissioner, who now presented the declination of the bishops, and requested that it should be immediately read. A tumultuous outcry of "No reading! no reading!" instantly ensued, followed by a long and stormy discussion, which ended in the assembly's refusing to listen to the paper until they were constituted; but they professed their willingness, after that, to hear any paper which his grace might be disposed to present. Against this refusal a protest was lodged by the commissioner, which was followed by a counter-protest in name of the delegates. Much time was wasted in these preliminary skirmishes, and all were weary of protests. A new subject of contention was, however, introduced by the commissioner, who informed the assembly that his majesty had by letters addressed to six of the lords of the privy council constituted them, his assessors, not only to assist him with their advice, but to vote in the assembly. These were the lords treasurer and privy seal, Argyll, Lauderdale, Carnegie, and Sir Lewis Stewart. The letter addressed to Argyll was publicly read, and the commissioner urged the assembly to give effect to the king's desire in this matter before the transaction of any other business. This demand was refused, on the ground that the king, if present in person, would require only one vote, and that by allowing more to his representative, a precedent would be introduced fraught with danger to the freedom of the assembly. Against this refusal Hamilton lodged a protest, which was followed by an answer on the part of the commissioners.

All obstructions being at length removed, the assembly proceeded to the election of a moderator. Six individuals were put in nomination, and on the list being put to the vote, the choice fell on Mr. Alexander Henderson, without a single dissentient voice, the lord-commissioner alone declining to vote. The moderator thus chosen did then, by solemn prayer, constitute the assembly de novo, in the name of the LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Alexander Henderson elected moderator.

A motion made by the moderator for the appointment of a clerk to the assembly was the signal for a new, prolonged, and violent altercation. It was vehemently opposed by Hamilton, who seemed determined to oppose everything that did not emanate from himself, or from some of his servile adherents. In the course of the discussion which ensued, he renewed his demand that his assessors should be permitted to vote; but finding the assembly inflexible, he had again recourse to a protest, which was answered by Lord Loudoun on the part of the commissioners of assembly. Mr. Archibald Johnston was then, by an almost unanimous vote, appointed clerk to the assembly; and having been formally installed in his office, the moderator required that all who had in their possession any of the books or acts of former assemblies should put them into his hands. Such was the zeal manifested by sundry individuals into whose hands these documents had fallen, that in the course of the sederunt enough were collected to form, according to the opinion of the clerk, a complete register of the Church from the Reformation.* A committee was then appointed to examine the books, and report to the assembly as to their genuineness and authenticity.

The moderator now proposed that the assembly should proceed to the important and delicate work of scrutinising the commissions of its members. Until this was done, it was obvious that the assembly could not be fully constituted, and that its acts would remain open to challenges which might give rise to interminable discussions, confusion, and uncertainty. The lord high commissioner, however, objected to this reasonable proposal; and required that Dr. Robert Hamilton should first be permitted to read, for the information of the members, a paper with which he had been entrusted by the lords of the clergy. A lengthened debate followed, in the course of which the real nature of the paper transpired. It was nothing else than the famous declinature, which had been revised by the king, and by which he hoped to be able to neutralise his own act subjecting the prelates to the jurisdiction of the assembly. Accordingly, the assembly wisely refused to hear the paper until the commissions had been tried, but promised that after that it should have the precedence of all other business. This decision was of course followed by a protest from the pertinacious commissioner. The greater part of two days was occupied with the examination of the commissions, and, with the exception of a very few that were set aside on points of form, the whole were sustained.

Next day, the committee appointed to examine the old registers of the Church gave in their report, in which they attested before God and declared to the world, "that these registers are famous, authentic, and good registers, which ought to be so reputed, and have public faith in judgment and outliveth the same, as valid and true records in all things."† In deference to the wish of the commissioner, who professed not to be fully satisfied, the vote upon the report was deferred until the following day.

The time had now arrived for hearing the long-talked-of and often-urged declinature of the prelates. It was presented by Dr. Robert Hamilton, minister of Glassford, who appeared as their procurator, and was at length publicly read in the face of the assembly. In this document, which is much too prolix to be quoted, the prelates refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the assembly, chiefly on the ground that laymen had been permitted to have a voice in the choice of commissioners, and hold commissions as members of the assembly; and that it was contrary to reason, as well as to the practice of the Church, to require archbishops and bishops, who were superior to other pastors, to submit to the judgment of a mixed tribunal, consisting of inferior ecclesiastical functionaries and laymen, convoked without the lawful authority of the Church in an irregular assembly, at which the primate did not officiate as moderator. No sooner had Dr. Hamilton finished the reading of this paper, than an adroit movement was made, which took the whole prelatical party by surprise. Durie, one of the principal clerks of session, instantly rose and took instruments in name of the complainers, that the bishops by this declinature had acknowledged their citation, that they had appeared by their procurator, and that, therefore, their personal absence was wilful. He, therefore, craved what was no sooner sought than granted, that Dr. Hamilton should be cited apud acta, and the bishops recognised as at the bar of the assembly.* This drew forth another protest from the lord-commissioner, who keenly felt the false position in which the prelates had inadvertently allowed themselves to be placed. A committee was then appointed to draw up answers to the declinature—a proceeding against which Hamilton was careful to record his protest, which was immediately responded to by a counter-protest on the part of the covenanters.

Next day, the seventh of the assembly's meeting, was looked forward to by both parties with much anxiety. The fate of episcopacy in Scotland, as well as the peace and safety both of the Church and the State, were trembling in the balance, and who could foresee the result of that day's deliberations? Before approaching the great question, with which all minds were agitated, the committee that had been appointed to test the newly-discovered registers of the Church, produced their report, in which they pronounced these records to be genuine and authentic. This was opposed by the lord-commissioner, who protested against these books being acknowledged as sufficient registers, and that neither his royal master nor the lords of the clergy should suffer prejudice by anything contained in them.† Notwithstanding this, the assembly passed a unanimous resolution approving of these books as the true and authentic registers of the Church, and appointed the testimony of the committee, together with their reasons, to be inserted in the books of the assembly.

The momentous subject of the declinatures was now resumed; and in the answers prepared by the committee, the utter groundlessness of the objections urged by the prelates against the constitution of the assembly was triumphantly demonstrated. It was shown that the practice of admitting lay elders to have a voice in the choice of commissioners, and to take part in the deliberations of the assembly, had existed ever since the Reformation, and had never before been challenged, even under episcopacy itself; and the second book of discipline was appealed to, in which it is ordained that a moderator should be elected by common consent of the whole brethren convened, while the appointment of a constant moderator was a novelty surreptitiously introduced among other prelatical usurpations, and altogether unknown in the established order of the Reformed Church of Scotland. A keen discussion ensued, which was protracted until both parties were exhausted by the contention. The moderator at last terminated the disputation by putting the question, Whether or not the assembly found themselves competent to sit in judgment on the bishops, notwithstanding their declinature? This momentary question was about to be submitted to a vote, the issue of which could not be doubtful; but the lord-commissioner instantly rose and interrupted the proceedings. He had done his utmost to obstruct the business of the assembly, and to reserve almost every question for further deliberation by protests; but this was more than his instructions authorised him to tolerate. He was on no account to allow the bishops to be subjected to the censure of that assembly to whose jurisdiction they were by the king's public declaration to be amenable. "I should, perhaps," he said, "have continued a little longer with you, if you had not fallen upon a point which doth enforce my deserting you. You are now about to settle the lawfulness of this judicatory, and the competency of it against the bishops, whom you have cited hither, neither of which I can allow, if I shall discharge either my duty towards God or loyalty towards my gracious and just master." He declared that they had called for a free assembly, but after one most free had been granted by his majesty, they had so conducted themselves that not a shadow of freedom could be discerned in their meeting; but that as his majesty was sincerely desirous that all he had promised in his gracious proclamation should be performed by means of a lawful assembly, it was not yet too late to think whether this could not be done, even in the present assembly, such as it was, without his majesty being compromised by appearing to approve of its illegalities. He then delivered to the clerk a paper detailing his majesty's concessions as contained in the royal proclamation, and desired that it should be read to the assembly. He at the same time took instruments that, by producing and signing these, he had made known his majesty's intentions, but took care to add that in so doing he did not acknowledge the lawfulness of the assembly. The explanation of this allusion he reserved until the clerk had finished the reading of the paper, when he reiterated the objections contained in the bishop's declinature against the presence of lay elders and commissioners chosen by laymen. He declared that the assembly was thus vitiated in its constitution, and professed regret that he could no longer continue to countenance their proceedings. "If you will dissolve yourselves," he added, "and amend all your errors in a new election, I will, with all convenient speed, address myself to his majesty, and use the utmost of my intercession with his sacred majesty for the indiction of a new assembly, before the meeting whereof all these things now challenged may be amended. If you shall refuse this offer, his majesty will then declare to the whole world that you are disturbers of the peace of this Church and State, both by introducing of lay elders against the laws and practices of this Church and kingdom, and by going about to abolish episcopal government, which at this present stands established by both these said laws."

The moderator, in reply, expressed on the part of the assembly deep gratitude to his majesty for this testimony of his goodness. It had been the glory, he said, of the reformed Churches to give unto kings and magistrates what belonged to their place. Next to piety towards God, he declared that he and his brethren felt bound in loyalty and obedience to their sovereign, and now cheerfully offered to spend their lives in his service. They would do with him as the Jews did with Alexander the Great, who, when he came to Jerusalem, desired that his picture might be hung up in the Temple. This they refused, as it would be unlawful to pollute the house of the Lord; but they granted to him a mark of honour which they might lawfully bestow—that they would begin the reckoning of their years from the time of his coming to Jerusalem, and would call all their first-born sons by his name. "So whatsoever is ours," added the moderator, "we shall render to his majesty, even our lives, lands, liberties, and all; but, for that which is God's, and the liberties of his house, we do think, neither will his majesty's piety suffer him to crave, neither may we grant them, although he should crave it."*

The lord-commissioner expressed great satisfaction with these sentiments. "Sir," he said, "you have spoken as becometh a good Christian and a dutiful subject, and I am hopeful you will conduct yourself with that deference you owe to our royal sovereign, all of whose commands will, I trust, be found agreeable to the commandments of God."†

The moderator replied that the assembly, having been summoned by his majesty, and consisting of members appointed and authorised in conformity with the law and practice of the Church, they took themselves for a free assembly, and he trusted that all their proceedings would be conducted according to the law of God and reason. He then asked again if he should put the question, Whether or not the assembly found themselves competent to sit in judgment on the bishops? The commissioner urged that this question might be deferred. "Nay," answered the moderator, "with your grace's permission, that cannot be, for it is requisite that it be put immediately after the declination." The critical moment had now arrived. "If you proceed," said the commissioner, "to the censure of their persons and offices, I must remove myself."—"A thousand times," replied the moderator, "do I wish the contrary from the bottom of my heart, and I entreat your grace to continue to favour us with your presence without obstructing the work and freedom of the assembly." This request was warmly seconded both by the Earl of Rothes and Lord Loudoun; but Hamilton was only following up his pre-conceived determination, and was deaf to all argument and entreaty. He appealed to God that he had laboured as a good Christian, a loyal subject, and a kind countryman, for the good of the Scottish Church, and that there was nothing within the bounds of his commission that he would not gladly do for her. He seemed to labour under irrepressible emotion, and with tears, in which he was joined by many of his auditors, lamented that such a weighty burden was laid upon so weak a man, who was unable to bring matters to the conclusion which he wished. Several members of the assembly in vain endeavoured to shake his resolution. He interrupted them by saying, in a peremptory tone, "I stand to the king's prerogative as supreme judge over all causes, civil and ecclesiastical; to him the lords of the clergy have appealed, and, therefore, I will not suffer their cause to be further reasoned here." He desired the moderator to conclude the meeting with prayer; and, on this being refused, he repeated all his former protestations in the name of his sovereign; and, in his own name, and in name of the lords of the clergy, he protested that no act there should imply his consent, or be accounted lawful or of

dissolved, and prohibited all further proceedings.

In anticipation of such a crisis, Lord Rothes had come prepared with a protest, Lord Rothes. upon which he now took instruments, and handing it to the clerk, it was read by that functionary as the commissioner and the council were in the act of retiring. Of the latter, Argyll alone remained behind, and thus gave his countenance to the assembly at this trying moment.

After the reading of the protest, the moderator addressed the assembly in a speech abounding with encouragement and seasonable exhortation. "All who are present know," he said, "how this assembly was indicted, and what power we allow to our sovereign in matters ecclesiastic. But though we have acknowledged the power of Christian kings for convening assemblies, and their power in them, yet that must not derogate from Christ's right, for he hath given warrant to convocate assemblies, whether magistrates consent or not. Therefore, seeing we perceive his grace my lord-commissioner to be zealous of his royal master's commands, have not we as good reason to be zealous towards our Lord, and to maintain the liberties and privileges of his kingdom? You all know that the work in hand hath had many difficulties, and yet hitherto the Lord hath helped and borne us through them all; therefore, it becometh not us to be discouraged at our being deprived of human authority, but rather that ought to be a powerful motive to us to double our courage in answering the end for which we are convened." This pathetic appeal was followed by similar exhortations from several of the brethren, after which the moderator put the question, Whether they would adhere to the protestation against the lord-commissioner's departure, and continue constituted until all things needful were concluded or not? The day had now drawn to a close, and in the obscurity of the twilight, one or two of the more timid or doubtful had withdrawn. Lights were ordered to be brought in; and, on the question being put, the whole assembly rose to their feet, and, as one man, decided in the affirmative. Lest, however, any dissentient voice should have been unheard amid the tumultuous exclamations of acquiescence, the whole roll of the members' names was deliberately read, when, one by one, all declared their resolution to remain until the business on which they had met should be completely finished.*

Just before this, an incident occurred which excited very lively emotions of joy, and tended greatly to encourage the assembly in the bold course they had resolved to pursue. Lord Erskine, son of the Earl of Mar, a young nobleman of great promise, rising from his seat in the gallery, which had been set apart for the young nobility, modestly requested permission to address the assembly. In a subdued, but earnest tone, and with an utterance interrupted with tears, he said, "I request you, for the Lord's cause, right honourable and worthy members of this assembly, that ye would receive me into your number; for I have remained too long obstinate to your wholesome admonitions, being moved and stirred up by my own private ends, rather than any checks of conscience, which ends I cease to reckon before you; but I am ashamed of them, and that I should have dallied so long with God. Therefore, I request you, for Christ Jesus' sake, that ye would receive me into your number, and suffer me to subscribe your covenant." These words were uttered in so low a voice, that the moderator thought it necessary to repeat them to the assembly; and his voice, also faltering with emotion, nearly the whole audience were melted to tears. The request of the noble youth was most willingly granted: he affixed his name to the bond, and many others immediately followed his example. The moderator now found himself at liberty to put the momentous question that had so much alarmed the lord high commissioner—Whether the assembly found themselves lawful and competent judges of the pretended archbishops and bishops, with their adherents, notwithstanding their declinature? On the roll being called, this was found to be all but unanimously carried in the affirmative, there being only three or four dissentient voices.

Next day the Marquis of Hamilton issued a proclamation, which, with the concurrence of a majority of the council, was published with the usual solemnities at the market-cross of Glasgow, prohibiting all further meetings of the assembly, under pain of treason. This was promptly met by Mr. Archibald Johnston, assisted by Lord Erskine and several other young noblemen, with a protest substantially the same that had been given into the assembly, and approved by them at the lord-commissioner's departure.

When the assembly again met, they had the great gratification of finding that their resolution not to disperse had the approbation of a considerable number of the privy council, and particularly of the Earl of Argyll, who, though he had all along secretly sympathised with the covenanters, had hitherto kept aloof under the guise of neutrality. It was no small encouragement to the assembly at this trying crisis, to have the countenance of a nobleman who was, at that time, by far the most powerful subject in the kingdom, and was known to stand high in the confidence and favour of the king. On this occasion, however, the moderator wisely cautioned his brethren not to place too much reliance on this "human encouragement." "Though we had not a nobleman to assist us," he said, "our cause were not the worse nor the weaker, but thereby occasion is given us to bless God that they are coming in daily."*

The great contest was now over, and the assembly, freed from the pertinacious opposition and protests of Hamilton and his adherents, proceeded calmly, but firmly, to the completion of the vitally important business which they had met to perform. Their first step was to declare null and void the six pretended assemblies that had been held since the accession of James to the English throne, which, by the introduction of prelacy, had been the cause of all the dissensions that had so long harassed both Church and State. These were the assemblies held in the years 1606, 1608, 1610, 1616, 1617, and 1618, all of which were proved to be vitiated in their constitution, and overruled in their deliberations by the treachery and corruption of court minions, and the audacious tyranny of the crown. As a necessary consequence of these assemblies being declared "unfit, unlawful and null," all the innovations which they had introduced were at once swept away as illegal; the oaths of conformity which they had imposed on ministers at their admission, became also illegal; and the ministers were declared to be released from these obligations. Presbyteries and other church courts whose functions had been obstructed, and their independent action restrained by prelatical tyranny and injustice, were restored to their original authority. An act was passed condemning the five articles of Perth, as contrary to the original confession of faith; the book of canons, the liturgy, and the forms of ordination and consecration, as being unwarranted by either civil or ecclesiastical authority; and, finally, the court of high commission, as having neither act of assembly or of parliament to support it, and as being regulated by no law, human or divine. In short, episcopacy was utterly abolished, having been condemned and solemnly abjured by the Church in the covenant of 1581. The assembly accordingly passed an act declaring "That all episcopacy different from that of the Episcopacy abolished by the assembly, pastor over a particular flock, was abjured in this Kirk, and is to be removed out of it." Thus were the usurpations and the tyrannical and treacherous policy of two reigns at once subverted; and the whole fabric of prelacy, which it had cost so much labour and so many base and degrading artifices to rear, in one hour levelled with the dust.

The next business was the trial of the prelates, fourteen in number, who were now considered as at the bar of the assembly. Notwithstanding the notoriety of the delinquencies of which they were accused, each charge was separately examined, information was collected, and evidence weighed, with scrupulous care and accuracy. Many days elapsed ere this investigation was brought to a conclusion; but, in the end, a unanimous vote of the assembly declared all the Trial and condemnations to be fully proved, and the bishops. nothing remained but for the moderator to pronounce the sentence of the court. This he did with much solemnity, having first preached a sermon appropriate to the extraordinary occasion. Two archbishops and six bishops were excommunicated, four were deposed, and the remaining two, on making humble submission, were merely suspended from their ecclesiastical functions. The crimes of which they were in general found guilty, were the holding and teaching Arminian doctrines, the introduction and practice of superstitions and papal innovations, the usurpation or tyrannical abuse of authority, the imposition of unlawful oaths, and the suspension and deposition of ministers for their steadfast adherence to the doctrine, discipline, and forms of worship, maintained and established in the Scottish Church. In addition to these public offences, consisting in the abuse of their ecclesiastical functions, many of them were found stained with the most gross and flagrant personal immoralities—including adultery, fornication, drunkenness, simony, profanity, and sabbath-breaking.*

* Stevenson, vol. ii. p. 577.

* Hardwick's State Papers, vol. ii. p. 114.

Nor were these delinquencies perpetrated with much regard to secrecy. The fear of the imputation of puritanism had led, in many instances, to open and undisguised profligacy, an entire relaxation of morals, and an almost avowed contempt of all the decencies of social life.

One of the last acts of this memorable assembly was directed against the investiture of ecclesiastics with civil power, as inconsistent with the functions of a Christian pastor. An act was passed prohibiting ministers from holding seats in parliament, or the office of justice of the peace, lord of session, or judge of exchequer; and such of the elders present as were members of parliament, were solicited to exert themselves to obtain from the legislature a ratification of this act of the assembly.

Two days before the rising of the assembly, a proclamation, dated the 8th of December, was read at the Cross of Edinburgh, extolling his majesty's "condescension," defending the conduct of his commissioner, particularly in this assembly, and accusing the covenanters of many disorderly, disloyal, and unjustifiable actions. The assembly had happily got information of this design, and had previously prepared a protest, which, as soon as the proclamation was published, was brought forward and read; and instruments were taken upon it, in name of the commissioners from the assembly, and from the nobility, barons, gentlemen, ministers, burgesses, and commons, subscribers of the covenant.*

Before closing their labours, the assembly re-enacted what had always been one of the fundamental laws of the Church—that no minister be intruded into any parish contrary to the will of the congregation; and schools were directed to be provided in every parish, and such support allotted to the schoolmasters, as should render education easily attainable in every part of the kingdom.

At length, on the thirtieth day† after its commencement, and the twenty-ninth of its sitting, the assembly drew its arduous and important labours to a close. They appointed their next session to be held at Edinburgh, on the third Wednesday of July, 1639. This they did in virtue of the power inherent in the Church, without reference to the royal authority; but, at the same time, they ordained that, if it should please his majesty to summon a meeting of assembly on a different day, all presbyteries, universities, and burghs should depute their commissioners respectfully to attend at the time and place of his majesty's appointment. Several solemn addresses were delivered by the moderator and other members of assembly; and, after prayer, praise, and the apostolical benediction, the moderator declared the assembly dissolved, adding these remarkable words, "We have now cast down the walls of Jericho: let him that rebuildeth them beware of the curse of Hiel the Bethelite."*

Thus terminated the great assembly of 1638, to whose firm and magnanimous stand against "crowned and mitred tyranny," may, in a great measure, be traced the possession of those civil and religious liberties which are now so amply enjoyed in both divisions of the kingdom. At the present day, Englishmen in general little know how much they owe to the Scottish covenanters. Had Scotland tamely bent her neck to the double yoke that was prepared for her, England, weakened by intestine divisions, must have succumbed to that despotism, which, encouraged by the example and assisted by the power of the sister kingdom, she happily succeeded in overthrowing.

The gauntlet was now thrown down, and Charles had no alternative but an entire change of policy or civil war. With inflexible pride, and insatuated obstinacy, he chose the latter; and vigorously prepared to essay the difficult, if not impossible task, of crushing, not a mere sect or party, but a whole resolute and united people. The phantom of unlimited power lured the unhappy king onwards to his destruction; and, after a brief but troubled interval, ultimately led to the ruin of his race.

CHAPTER XLVII.

CHARLES I.

THE Marquis of Hamilton, detained by indisposition, did not take his departure for court until the 5th of January. In the meantime, he was waited on by the chiefs of the covenanters, who came to solicit his good offices with the sovereign in their behalf. He received them with taunts and menaces. "You must not," he said, "think to use your kings now as you did formerly, when they were only kings of rebels. The king now has another royal and warlike nation at his command, and you shall soon feel it to your cost."*

The covenanters again petitioned the king. sending their supplication directly to the king—a course, at such a juncture, not unattended with difficulty and danger. The hazardous duty was undertaken by Mr. George Winram, of Liberton, a gentleman well known to the marquis, to whom, on his arrival in London, he disclosed the object of his mission. Hamilton acquainted the king with the circumstance. It was not without much difficulty that the haughty monarch was prevailed on to yield so far as to receive the petition, having resolved neither to speak nor think of treating, until he should dictate terms at the point of the sword. The council for Scottish affairs having been convened, expressed their opinion that it was an humble, a dutiful, and well-written petition, and Hamilton was permitted to read it on his knees; but the best answer the king returned to it was conveyed in an old Scottish proverb—"When they have broken my head, they will put on my cowl."† Winram waited in vain, for about two months, in expectation of a more favourable reply; but, during that interval, he proved of great service to his country by his zeal and assiduity in collecting intelligence of the designs and proceedings of the court.

From the moment that intelligence had reached the court of the assembly's having continued their sittings, after being discharged by the lord high commissioner, the king abandoned all hopes of accomplishing his purpose by a pacific policy. He meditated revenge, and deliberately framed his schemes for the invasion and subjugation of Scotland. His preparations, indeed, in anticipation of this result, were already far advanced. His train of artillery had been in readiness since the month of June; troops were being levied in every county of England; his fleet was manned and fitted out; he had two hundred thousand pounds in his exchequer; loans to a large amount were obtained from the nobility, and, at the instigation of the queen and Laud, the papists and the episcopal clergy, making common cause, contributed large sums for the maintenance of a war in support of prelacy. His majesty's plan was to raise an army in England of six thousand horse and thirty thousand foot, and to lead them in person into Scotland. This formidable force was to assemble at

York, where all the nobility, with their retainers, were summoned to attend their sovereign, under pretence of repelling an invasion about to be attempted by the Scots. He farther purposed to place a garrison of two thousand men in Berwick, and another of five hundred men in Carlisle; to send a detachment of five thousand men, under the command of Hamilton, to Aberdeenshire, to form a junction with the forces under Huntley, first to secure the king's cause in the north, and then marching southward to be ready to attack the covenanters in their rear. The west coast was to be invaded by the Earl of Antrim, who was to land in Argyllshire, while Charles himself was to advance by the east coast. A powerful fleet was to be sent into the Frith of Forth, for the purpose of stopping trade, and intimidating the inhabitants of Fife and the Lothians. Lastly, the Earl of Strafford was to collect such forces as could be levied and spared out of Ireland, and sail up the Frith of Clyde, to co-operate with the adherents of Hamilton in the west; and the marquis, for his encouragement, desired him to touch at Arran, as he would be sure "of all his naked rogues there."

Of all these vast designs and formidable preparations, the covenanters* were duly apprised; but Charles found it as impossible to intimidate as it had been to deceive them. They were not insensible, indeed, to the dangers by which the country was threatened; and however reluctant, as they undoubtedly were, to appear in arms against their sovereign, they considered that the moment had now arrived when there was no choice left them but resistance or ruin. It is probable that the idea of armed resistance, at first unwillingly entertained, had, through the manifold treacheries of the king, the reports of his warlike preparations, and the perilous circumstances in which they ultimately found themselves placed, gradually become familiarised to their minds; and they now felt it to be their duty instantly to have recourse to the most vigorous measures for their own defence.

With a view, however, to vindicate their proceedings from the charge of rebellion, so pertinaciously maintained against them by their adversaries, the covenanters published a tract, entitled "Information to all good Christians within the kingdom of England"—in which they take God to witness that their only object was the maintenance of that religion which they professed, which had been established by acts of assembly and of parliament, and which they had solemnly covenanted and sworn to defend. They deny that they had ever entertained the remotest intention of throwing off their dutiful obedience to his majesty's government, and reject the imputation of intending to invade England, or in any way to molest that friendly nation, unless compelled to do so in their own defence. This paper, which was extensively circulated throughout England, contributed to the removal of many prejudices that had been industriously fomented by the prelatical party, and awakened in the minds of many a warm sympathy in the cause of civil and religious liberty in Scotland.

Mortified and irritated by the diffusion of such favourable impressions, the king directed Dr. Balcanquhal, who had been Hamilton's confidential adviser during his last mission to Scotland, to write an account of the whole proceedings which had led to the present disturbed condition of the country. From such a pen, a statement most unfavourable to the covenanters was naturally to be expected; but Charles, not satisfied with this, revised the paper himself, and ordered its publication as a royal manifesto, now well known and frequently referred to in history, under the title of "The Large Declaration." This publication, in which the covenanters are denounced as "foul traitors and rebels," was, by the king's command, read in all the parish churches in England. Not content with this, he about the same time issued a proclamation, in which a great part of the misstatements and scandalous accusations contained in Balcanquhal's paper were embodied. In answer to this document, Mr. Henderson, by order of the deputies, drew up a paper entitled, "The remonstrance of the nobility, barons, burgesses, ministers, and commons, within the kingdom of Scotland, vindicating them and their proceedings from the crimes wherewith they are charged, by the late proclamation in England, February 27, 1639." This paper, after having been revised by the deputies, was published, and industriously circulated wherever the royal proclamation had been disseminated. The result was highly favourable to the reformers. Through the agency of the Scottish pedlars, who trafficked largely in the sister kingdom, not only were the declarations of the covenanters widely dispersed, but a correspondence was opened up with many of the English puritans, who deeply sympathised with the condition of their brethren in Scotland, with whom they now hoped to find an asylum, which the foolish jealousy of the government had denied them in America.

In the appeals which the covenanters had so widely disseminated, in spite of the king's prohibition, they denied the charge of being about to invade the territory of their southern neighbours; but now that they had by royal proclamation been denounced as rebels, their great and imminent danger seemed at least to justify their having recourse to arms in self-defence.* Still, however, there were many conscientious persons among the covenanters, who entertained doubts as to the lawfulness of waging even a defensive war against their own sovereign, and not a few who deemed anything beyond petition and remonstrance to be overstepping the line of Christian duty. The superadded danger arising from division on a point so important, at a moment when the least delay might be ruinous to the cause and the country, forced on the immediate and earnest consideration of the question, Whether, in any case, resistance to the supreme magistrate is lawful? Many papers were written and circulated on the subject, which now received deep and anxious attention from ministers, lawyers, and men of all classes. The writings of eminent theologians of former times on this topic were perused with avidity; the opinions of the most distinguished jurists were considered and eagerly canvassed; and the sacred writings, the only infallible directory in cases where duty is doubtful, were examined with unusual care and diligence. At last, Mr. Henderson was requested to draw up a paper on this much controverted point. With some hesitation he complied; and the document which was publicly read from the pulpits, and which had the effect of solving the doubts of many, has been considered as proving by unanswerable argument, not only that it is lawful for a Christian people to take arms in defence of their religion when attacked, but that such is their imperative duty. The great majority of the ministers seem to have fully acquiesced in this conclusion, and they were not slow in endeavouring to impress the same conviction upon their flocks. The lawfulness of defensive war was everywhere proclaimed and enforced from the pulpit, and the people were reminded that a curse had been pronounced upon those, in olden time, who came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty. It may well be imagined that such appeals must have been peculiarly exciting at such a period, and that even among those who still wavered, there might be some who were at length reconciled to resistance from its apparent necessity. A distinction too was drawn between a monarch resident within the kingdom, who must of necessity have yielded to the almost universal wishes of his people, and paid a decent respect to the acts and opinions of the legislative body, and one whose abode was fixed in a different country, and who, relying on the aid of foreigners, was attempting to carry out a course of policy subversive of the laws, liberties, and religious institutions of the kingdom. The approach of the sovereign under such circumstances with a foreign army, could, it was argued, be considered in no other light than that of a foreign invasion, and therefore defence by armed resistance had become a duty.

Having arrived at this conclusion, the covenanters began to concert most prompt and vigorous measures for the defence of the kingdom. The deputies assembled at Edinburgh on the 7th of March, and appointed a committee of the nobles, barons, and burgesses, with two of the senators of the college of justice, in all twenty-six, to hold permanent sittings in the metropolis, to maintain correspondence with subordinate committees organised in every quarter of the kingdom, and to issue such orders as might from time to time appear necessary, which should thus be simultaneously published and obeyed as exigencies might require. Through the agency of these committees forces were levied, and arms, ammunition, and money were collected in every county. Besides this, a regiment consisting of two thousand foot soldiers was raised in the districts to the south of the Tay, and placed under the command of Monro, to be employed in training the rest of the country to arms, as well as in preventing any sudden incursion of the English across the Borders; and a force of nine hundred men was raised by Argyll to keep in check the Macdonalds of the Isles, and to oppose the movements of Antrim, their chief, who was daily expected from Ireland. To provide for the pay of the troops under Monro, the nobles borrowed from Mr. William Dick of Priestfield, the sum of two hundred thousand merks, for repayment of which they gave their joint bond until money could be otherwise raised; while Argyll undertook to maintain the troops raised within his county at his own expense. Through the influence of Leslie it was resolved to recall to the assistance of their country a number of able and experienced officers, who had served under Gustavus, and had been trained to war in the school of that great military leader. It became a matter of serious deliberation whether any assistance should be asked or accepted from foreign powers—especially as aid was expected from the French king, the Queen of Sweden, and the Dutch; but the majority were of opinion that it would be improper, in such a cause, to form any confederacy with papists or even with Lutherans; and the utmost that was resolved on was to dispatch Mr. Colvil, a gentleman of Fife, with letters from the nobles to the French king and the States, to request their intercession with Charles, that he would be pleased to listen to the supplications of his Scottish subjects; and the Laird of Meldrum with two other letters containing a similar request, one to the King of Sweden and another to the King of Denmark. And yet, even this very temperate resolution was not carried fully into effect. The letter to the King of France, though drawn out and subscribed by some of the nobles, was never forwarded to its destination; nevertheless, the fact of its having been written and signed well-nigh occasioned an open rupture between the two monarchs; and a short time afterwards exposed the Earl of Loudoun, one of the subscribers, to the imminent danger of a traitor's death. At the same time, this contemplated correspondence afforded an opportunity, which was eagerly embraced by the king, of denouncing the covenanters to foreign princes as manifest rebels against their sovereign; and, though those calumnies gained but little credit with the Swedes and Dutch, who were better informed on Scottish affairs, yet the King of Denmark, taking them for granted, and instinctively sympathising with his royal brother, seized some arms destined for Scotland, and threw his whole influence into the scale of the king.

were now carried forward with enthusiastic zeal and indefatigable diligence. In this work the veteran General Leslie was eminently distinguished. He not only sat daily with the general committee, and assisted them by his advice, but wrote to Holland, Sweden, Hamburg, and other places, for cannon, muskets, powder, pikes, and other warlike stores, all of which were supplied in great abundance before the royal fleet had reached the coast of Scotland.

Both sides had now girt on the sword, but both were unwilling to be the first to commence hostilities. This was especially the case with the covenanters, whose preparations were intended from the first to be purely defensive. In their earnest desire to postpone, or if possible to avert the horrors of civil war, they submitted for some time to many overt acts of hostility, which, though on a comparatively small scale, were a plain declaration of war on the part of the government. Many Scottish merchants, sailors, and travellers were arrested, both in England and Ireland, detained as prisoners, and treated as rebels, unless they would consent to disclaim the covenant and the assembly at Glasgow; the Earls of Airly and Southesk were arming their followers in support of the king's cause; the Marquis of Huntley seized and fortified the city of Aberdeen; the popish lords, in different quarters of the kingdom, but particularly in the south, were in a state of alarming activity; while hostile bands of the royal forces, the great body of which were assembling at York, hovered along the Scottish Borders, and the Irish were preparing to invade the western coast.

In these perilous circumstances the leaders of the covenanters considered that the time had now arrived when the safety of the country demanded a still bolder and more active policy. The general committee issued orders for putting the country everywhere into a state of defence. Every fourth man was ordered to be levied; a committee was appointed in every shire to provide munitions of war; and beacons were directed to be set up in the most conspicuous positions to warn the country of the approach of danger. These were to consist each of the trunk of a strong tree placed erect, and surmounted by a transverse iron pole supporting a large grate filled with fuel ready to be kindled, and an iron basket for holding a tar-barrel. The first signal was to be a fire lighted on the ground by the side of the beacon, and on the sight of this all were to prepare to stand to their arms, and watchmen were to be sent out in all directions to rouse the neighbourhood. The next signal was to consist of two fires, one on the ground and the other in the large grate. On perceiving this, the whole armed population were instantly to turn out, each man was to repair to the rendezvous of his company, and each company to its own proper regiment. Lastly, if the danger should be imminent, to the two former signals was to be added that of the blazing tar-barrel, when each regiment, under the direction of its officers, was to proceed to the scene of action. In addition to all these precautions, it was provided that, in the event of the signals being invisible in consequence of fog or rain, the gentlemen adjacent to each beacon should give warning to all between that and the next, going out one way and returning another. These instructions contributed to inflame the martial spirit of the people, which was soon raised to the highest pitch; and even the women, participating in the general enthusiasm, encouraged their kinsmen to make ready for the coming struggle. All who could bear arms were trained to military exercises, and the noblemen and principal gentlemen qualified themselves for command under the instruction of Leslie's skilful officers, who were distributed for that purpose among the different counties of the kingdom.

A general attack was now concerted by the popular leaders, in order to secure possession of all the strongholds of the country. This enterprise was planned and executed with admirable skill, promptitude, and success. General Leslie, with a select force of one thousand musketeers, suddenly appeared before the Castle of Edinburgh, then but feebly garrisoned and indifferently provided. After a short parley with the deputy governor, who refused to surrender, a petard was applied to the outer gate, which was instantly blown open. A vigorous assault was then made on the inner gate with axes and hammers, but these not succeeding, scaling-ladders were immediately applied; the assailants mounted sword in hand; the garrison, panic-struck, offered no opposition; and, in less than half-an-hour, the brave old general and his party found themselves in possession of the most important fortress of the kingdom, without the loss of a single man, or even the effusion of a drop of blood. The mortified governor was permitted to retire, and carry the tidings to the king; and the general, with many of the nobles, supped that night in the castle.

On the same day, a like bloodless victory placed the strong fortress of Dunbarton in the hands of the covenanters. Sir William Stewart, the governor, a man of great vigilance, and warmly attached to the royal cause, had strongly garrisoned the place, and amply supplied it with provisions and warlike stores; but, apprehensive of no danger, he had gone, accompanied by many of the garrison, to attend public worship at Dunbarton, on a day which had been set apart as a day of fasting and humiliation. To his astonishment, as he and his men were returning from church, they were met by Mr. John Semple, the provost of the town, and Campbell of Ardicaple, who, with the assistance of a few followers, took prisoners the whole party; and the rest of the garrison, few in number and without a commander, after a siege of a single night, surrendered the fortress, which was then entrusted to the Earl of Argyll.

Traquair's residence at Dalkeith, a place of some strength, then belonging to the —of Dalkeith, king, was surprised and captured Strathaven, by Monro with a party of five and Tantallon—hundred men. Here they found the arms and ammunition which had been secreted by Traquair on a late occasion, and likewise the crown, sword, and sceptre, which they carried off, and deposited in the Castle of Edinburgh. The Castle of Strathaven, belonging to the Marquis of Hamilton, and those of Tantallon and Douglas, belonging to the Marquis of Douglas, fell successively into the hands of the covenanters. The only stronghold of which they failed to obtain possession was the Castle of Caerlaverock, which being well manned and provided, and protected by the vicinity of Carlisle, baffled every attempt of Lord Johnston either to surprise or reduce it. As some compensation, however, for this failure, Johnston, having repaired to Dumfries, seized on the residences of all the gentlemen there who were suspected to be attached to the adverse party, so that all of them either fled into England or joined the ranks of the reformers.

In the meantime, Argyll, having increased his force to about nine hundred men, —of Brodick—sent about one half of them to Cantire, to oppose the designs of Antrim, while the rest were employed in watching the movements of the inhabitants of Lochaber and the Western Isles; whence, making a sudden descent on the Island of Arran, he surprised the Castle of Brodick, belonging to the Marquis of Hamilton, which surrendered without striking a blow.

The popular cause wore a less favourable aspect in the north, where the influence —of Aberdeen. of Huntley was still great, and where he had collected a considerable force. Montrose and Leslie were accordingly dispatched thither, having under their command a body of seven or eight thousand men, with whom they marched straight to Aberdeen, where Huntley then lay in fancied security. On the approach of Montrose, however, he precipitately retired northward, and the inhabitants, most of whom were non-covenanters, were compelled to surrender unconditionally. After demolishing the fortifications which Huntley had erected, and compelling the citizens to subscribe the covenant, Montrose appointed the Earl of Kinghorn, with a body of eighteen hundred men, to keep possession of the place, and proceeded northwards in search of his adversary, whom he enticed into a conference, under a safe-conduct, and surreptitiously carried as a prisoner, along with his eldest son, Lord Gordon, to Edinburgh, where they were confined in the castle until the conclusion of a peace with the king, which did not take place for upwards of a year.

While it is impossible to justify the conduct of Montrose, either in this transaction or in his compelling the inhabitants of Aberdeen to adhere to the covenant, it ought in justice to be remarked that in both cases he acted solely on his own authority, without the immediate knowledge, far less the approbation or concurrence, of the great body of the covenanters, to whose principles as well as uniform practice such modes of dealing were diametrically opposed. Prelatical writers, who have laboured to make so much of this circumstance, would do well to contrast the general moderation, and almost scrupulous conscientiousness, of the Scottish reformers with the violence, treachery, and injustice which have fixed on their own party an indelible stain of infamy.

To protect the capital from assault by sea, it was considered an object of national importance to fortify the town of Leith, and accordingly this work was now commenced, and prosecuted with an energy and enthusiasm which have few parallels in history. The nobles and other chiefs of the covenanters began the work with their own hands, and considered it no derogation from their dignity to carry baskets full of earth with other materials for the formation of the bastions. All classes vied with each other in diligence and zeal in carrying forward the labour, and even ladies of rank, partaking in the general enthusiasm, cheerfully engaged in the rough employment generally assigned to common labourers. Above a thousand persons were occupied day and night, without intermission, by whose united efforts the bulwarks were completed in an almost incredibly short period. The fortifications thus raised were planned by Sir Alexander Hamilton, according to the best rules of the art then known, and being surmounted with cannon, the port was justly considered as in a very respectable state of defence. Batteries were also erected, and planted with ship-cannon, on the most commanding positions along the coast of Fife—so that an enemy entering the Frith had little chance of being able to effect a landing, except on the islands of Inchkeith and Incheolm, which were unaccountably left unfortified.

Notwithstanding these encouraging circumstances, the covenanters were willing to give one proof more of their loyalty, and their readiness to obey the lawful commands of their sovereign. A new supplication to his majesty was agreed on, and shown to some of the lords of the privy council still remaining in the country, who offered to send any of their number to present it to the king. Accordingly, Orbiston, justice-clerk, was dispatched with it to York, but was refused an audience; and Sir James Carmichael, the treasurer-deputy, who was afterwards sent on the same errand, had no better success. The king was exasperated to the highest pitch by the bold proceedings of his Scottish subjects, and a feeling of mortified pride, a false sense of honour, and a delusive estimate of his own power, urged him on to the most violent and fatal measures.

Nevertheless there were not wanting symptoms which might well have induced him to pause and re-consider his rash resolution. The grievous oppressions practised by Strafford in Ireland, particularly on the Scotch settlers there, who refused to renounce the national covenant, had so alienated the people from their attachment to the king's government, that not more than fifteen hundred troops, and these miserably provided, could be spared from that country. There were many significant indications that an invasion of the sister kingdom, for such an object as Charles had in view, was unpopular with his English subjects, who had many grievances of their own to render them discontented. Reflecting men clearly perceived that the success of the king in his present enterprise would enable him the more effectually to carry out that system of despotic rule at home, of which they already justly complained. Even his own guards plainly intimated that they could not be legally compelled to follow him out of the kingdom. Many of the nobility entertained scruples regarding the lawfulness of the war. They admitted that such a method of raising troops had precedents in its favour, but then it was only when war had been proclaimed, or the kingdom had been actually invaded; and some of them absolutely refused to concur in the invasion of Scotland without the authority of parliament.*

All these warnings were lost on the infatuated monarch. His overweening pride would not permit him to believe that the Scots, notwithstanding all their preparations, would dare to meet their sovereign in the field. He hoped that his personal presence would be sufficient to overawe them, or that, at all events, the troops he could muster would be amply sufficient to break down their resolution, and reduce them to obedience. On reviewing his forces at York, in the beginning of April, he found them to consist of nineteen thousand six hundred and fourteen men, besides those on board his fleet, his own guards, and the garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle.† Orders were now transmitted to Hamilton, who lay with the fleet in Yarmouth Roads, to proceed immediately to the Frith of Forth, and attempt to create some "awful diversion;" but the troops he had on board were so ludicrously deficient in military exercise, that out of five thousand men there were scarcely two hundred able to fire a musket.‡ The fleet was detained in Yarmouth Roads for nearly two weeks by contrary winds; and during that interval, Huntley, for whose aid it was supposed to be principally intended, had become a prisoner in the hands of the covenanters, who thus had leisure, unmolested, to import large quantities of warlike stores.

At length Hamilton reached the Frith with his fleet, consisting of twenty large ships of war, and some smaller vessels; but no sooner did he make his appearance, than the alarm was given, the beacon-fires, blazing from the heights, announced that the invasion had commenced; multitudes of armed and zealous men rushed from all quarters towards the metropolis; in a very short time the shores of the Frith were protected by twenty thousand resolute patriots; and so far from being able to effect an "awful diversion," Hamilton found his fleet so pent up on both sides, that the troops, who had orders from the king to lay waste the country "with fire and sword,"* durst not even set foot on shore. To procure a supply of water, from want of which the crews had already begun to suffer severely, parties were landed to dig wells on the islands of Inchkeith and Inchcolm; but the supply proving inadequate, and provisions beginning to fail, many of them sickened and died, and the remainder began to exhibit symptoms of mutiny. In this miserable plight, Hamilton, unable even to attempt accomplishing the object of his expedition, adopted the hopeless alternative of sending a summons to the provost of Edinburgh, requiring him, in his majesty's name, to surrender the castle. This command being treated with contemptuous neglect, he next sent an order to the town-council, commanding them to publish a proclamation from the king, dated the 25th of April, "professing great affection for the true religion, and promising to defend it, and to allow the covenanters all the benefit of his majesty's and of his commissioner's promises and offers; and likewise proffering a gracious pardon to them, if they gave up his castles and forts, laid down their arms, and acquiesced in the above offers within eight days after that proclamation was published; but declaring all such traitors as should not within that space comply with and submit to that proclamation, and that their estates should be given to their superiors or vassals continuing loyal and contributing to suppress them."† To this order the town-council sent an answer desiring to be excused, as, in obedience to the king's command, the Estates were to assemble within a few days, when the matter would be submitted to their consideration. With this reply Hamilton affected to be content, as the time allowed by the proclamation had not yet elapsed; but he immediately wrote to the king, informing him of the condition of affairs, and advising him to negotiate. Shortly afterwards, he was summoned to attend the king near Berwick, to assist in the operations by land, since all attempts by sea seemed, for the present, to be hopeless.

The parliament met at Edinburgh on the 15th of May, but were immediately presented with a royal order for their prorogation. Contrary to the expectation, and even wish of the court party, this order was submissively obeyed, after Leslie had been appointed commander-in-chief of the army, and Lord Balmerino, governor of the Castle of Edinburgh. The powers conferred upon Leslie were of the most unlimited kind, and he was declared to be accountable for his subsequent conduct only to the civil and ecclesiastical courts. Many of the noblemen and gentlemen, however, assembling in their private capacity, passed a resolution approving of the conduct of the magistrates in refusing to publish the king's proclamation; and wrote to Hamilton, intimating "that they had perused the proclamation, and found it carried a denunciation of the high crime of treason against all such as did not accept the offer therein contained, although it was only a writing printed without the kingdom, and not warranted by act and authority of the council lawfully convened within this kingdom. That it could not stand with the laws, liberties, and customs of this kingdom, that a proclamation of so great and dangerous consequence, wanting the necessary solemnities, should be published there. That, by the laws of the kingdom, treason, and forfeiture of the lands, life, and estate of the meanest subject within the same, could not be declared, but either in parliament or in a supreme justice court, after citation and lawful probation, much less of the whole peers and body of the kingdom, without either court, proof, or trial. And since that proclamation did import in effect the renouncing of their covenant, and of the necessary means of their lawful defence, they could not give obedience thereto without bringing a curse upon the Church and kingdom, and ruin upon themselves and their posterity." Finally, they requested that a free parliament should be held for allaying the distractions of the kingdom; and, that in the meantime, a way should be opened up, whereby their humble and dutiful supplications might reach the ear of their sovereign.

The marquis would not condescend to acknowledge the subscribers in a collective capacity by returning an answer to their communication; but he opened a correspondence on the subject with the Earl of Rothes, which does not appear to have been satisfactory to either party.

In the meantime, Lord Aboyne, at the head of a party of the Gordons, who were Lord Aboyne discontented at the imprisonment gets possession of their chief, having induced a of Aberdeen. considerable body of Highlanders to join them, succeeded in gaining possession of the town of Aberdeen, where they treated the proselytes to the covenant with great rigour and injustice; and many of these, from fear and other motives, renounced their solemn obligation, and lent their aid in molesting and oppressing those who continued steadfast in their adherence.

Montrose was now a second time dispatched to this stronghold of the enemies of Retaken the covenant. Arriving suddenly by Montrose. at Aberdeen, he entered it with an army of nearly four thousand horse and foot. On his approach, Aboyne disbanded his forces, and made his escape, and the town immediately surrendered to the covenanting general. On his march, he had intercepted some letters, from which it plainly appeared that, probably with a few exceptions, the people of Aberdeen had been utterly insincere in their professions of adherence to the reforming cause, and this, joined to their recent defection, so irritated Montrose, that he proceeded to acts of most unjustifiable severity. He levied on the citizens a contribution of ten thousand merks, pillaged their houses, carried off or destroyed their corn, and plundered the fishermen of their salmon. Even the adjacent county did not escape his vengeance. The farmers and peasantry were robbed of their fowls, scarcely one of which was left; and "because the lasses, in derision of the covenant, had knit blue ribands about their messen's craigs,"* every house-dog in the surrounding district was put to death.

Having performed these exploits, Montrose next marched from Aberdeen, in order to attack the strongholds of the Gordons; but speedily retraced his steps on hearing that Aboyne had arrived with reinforcements in Aberdeen Roads. The intelligence proved too true. Having received from the king a commission of lieutenantancy, Aboyne raised an army of three thousand foot and five hundred horse, once more took possession of the town of Aberdeen, and prepared to act on the offensive; but the Highlanders, unaccustomed to artillery, fled at the first discharge from the army of the covenanters, and the unfortunate city once more fell into the hands of Montrose, who imposed a fine upon the inhabitants of sixty thousand merks sterling. He even threatened the city itself with destruction; and would probably have inflicted severe punishment upon it, had not intelligence opportunely arrived that a treaty had been signed with the king, and that the civil war was consequently at an end.†

Meanwhile the royal army, to the number of twenty-three thousand horse and foot, advanced from York to Berwick; and such was the magnificent retinue of nobility by whom the king was attended, and the studied "pomp and circumstance" by which their march was distinguished, that it is evident Charles still laboured under the delusion that the Scots would not venture to meet him in the field, but would, on the personal approach of their sovereign, supported by an English army, be overawed into an unconditional submission. Repeated deputations were sent to him by the covenanters while on his march; but he haughtily refused to listen to their supplications, and would accept of no terms short of a renunciation of the covenant, and of the assembly at Glasgow, and an implicit, unreserved submission to his royal pleasure. The crisis had now arrived. The covenanters, neither dismayed by their adversaries, nor presumptuously relying on their own strength, once more publicly and solemnly "appealed from tyranny to God." A fast was proclaimed, and from the hearts of thousands of earnest and devoted men were sent up united and importunate supplications for Divine guidance, and that "the Lord of hosts" would be pleased to crown with victory their efforts in that cause, which they believed to be his own. "They acknowledged," says an historian of the times, "with Jehoshaphat, that they had no might against this great company coming against them; but their eyes were towards the Lord." The committee now met at Edinburgh, and issued a series of orders for regulating the conduct of their adherents, and providing for the defence of the country; and the Scottish army, in two divisions, advanced to the Borders to confront the invaders. The main body, under General Leslie, halted at Dunglas, and the remainder, under Monro, stationed themselves at Kelso. The royal army had encamped on a plain called Birks, on the south side of the Tweed, nearly three miles above Berwick; but, before reaching this spot, Charles had, from time to time, received intelligence which had led him to form a higher estimate of the formidable strength and indomitable resolution of the covenanters. He felt it necessary, accordingly, somewhat to modify his imperious tone; and issued a mild proclamation, omitting the customary charges of Royal treason and rebellion, representing proclamations.

that his appearance in arms was intended only to promote peace, promising that upon a demonstration of obedience in civil matters he was ready to grant the just supplications of his Scottish subjects, but commanding their army not to approach within ten miles of the royal camp, otherwise their disobedience in that particular should be considered as a declaration of their intention to attack the person of their sovereign, and invade his English dominions. Gratified by this declaration, sincerely desirous of avoiding the effusion of blood, willing to give yet another token of their loyalty, and a proof of their entertaining no hostile designs against England, they submissively obeyed. Their motives were misunderstood by the arrogant and headstrong monarch. So far from regarding this act of obedience as an evidence of the honesty of their declarations, and the steadfastness of their allegiance, he foolishly considered it as the effect of fear; and by the advice of some of the excommunicated bishops, who were in his train, he immediately published another proclamation, commanding them to submit within ten days, under pain of rebellion, setting a price on the heads of their leaders, and offering their rents to such of the tenants and vassals as might refuse to acknowledge or assist them, or to their feudal superiors who should adhere to the royal cause.

This proclamation was published at Dunse by the Earl of Arundel, the king's general, accompanied by Lord Ruthven, and a strong detachment of English troops; and, shortly afterwards, the Earl of Holland was sent to Kelso for the same purpose, with three thousand foot and one thousand horse. Here he was met by Monro with a body of four or five thousand foot and five hundred cavalry, who stood in readiness to give them battle. Holland sent a messenger commanding them to retire, but they answered that he would do much better to retire himself. This advice was almost instantly followed. The English, notwithstanding their superiority in cavalry, were seized with a sudden panic, and commenced a disorderly retreat, which, without striking a blow, was soon converted into an ignominious flight.* In point of fact, the war was extremely unpopular, not only with the great body of the English people, but even with the army. Of this Hamilton had some time before forewarned the king, and the unwelcome truth could no longer be doubted. Charles now wrote to Hamilton declaring his conviction that what that noblemen had told him at Whitehall was perfectly correct, viz., "That the nobility and gentry of England would never incline to invade Scotland, and thereby begin an offensive war;"† and Whitelocke asserts, that although "the Scots had been proclaimed rebels in England, and a prayer was published to be read in all the churches against them, yet nothing could alter the opinion of the English officers and private soldiers, who said they would not fight to maintain the pride and power of the bishops."‡

The nature of the recent proclamation, together with the hostile incursion of a portion of the English army, was justly regarded by the leaders of the covenanters as a resiling from the peaceful terms of the former proclamation, and an unmistakable declaration of war. They felt liberated accordingly from all farther obligation to remain inactive. Their conscientious loyalty had been construed into fear, they had been alternately cajoled and threatened, and had been deceived until all confidence in the royal promises was utterly lost. They now determined to convince his majesty that they would be trifled with no longer, and that they were fully prepared to repel force by force. On

Leslie advances the 31st of May, Leslie, raising his camp at Dunse Law, advanced to Dunse Law, where he took up a strong position within sight of the English army, at a point commanding the high roads leading to the capital from Coldstream and Berwick.§ At this time the army under Leslie consisted of not more than twelve thousand men, but, in the course of a few days, it was increased to nearly double that number by accessions from all parts of the surrounding country; and as every fourth man throughout the whole kingdom had, by order of the committee, been trained to the use of arms, and all were now only awaiting the summons to rush to the point of danger, it is evident that their numbers, if necessary, might have been indefinitely augmented.

On the same day the king had held a grand review of his whole army, but scarcely had they been dismissed, when Charles and his attendants, who had been greatly elated by the gallant show, were met by the astounding intelligence that the Scottish army was approaching. In an instant the English camp was in a state of confusion and alarm. The king would hardly believe the unwelcome and unlooked-for report; but by the aid of his prospect-glass he distinctly saw the Scots, then only about six miles distant, taking up their position upon the hill. In a transport of indignation, he turned to his generals, and reproachfully asked them, "Have not I good intelligence that the rebels can march with their army and encamp within sight of mine, and I never hear of it till their appearance gives the alarm?"

The imposing spectacle of the Scottish army encamped on their native hills raised the courage of the covenanters, and excited emotions of hope and joy hitherto unfelt. Confident in the goodness of their cause, and elated with the near prospect of at last achieving their liberty from the detested thralldom of kingly and prelatical absolutism, the horrors of civil war and all apprehensions of personal danger were forgotten. Seldom, indeed, has such a sight been witnessed as that which the Scottish army presented. The hill on which they were encamped is of a conical form, about a mile in circumference at the base, but truncated at the summit, so as to afford a table-land extending over a superficies of about thirty acres. This elevated spot now bristled with cannon, while the slopes beneath were enlivened with the tents and wooden huts of the army, those belonging to each regiment being grouped in separate clusters. At the tent-door of each captain was displayed a banner bearing the national arms, and inscribed with the motto, "FOR CHRIST'S CROWN AND COVENANT," glittering in letters of gold. A minister of distinguished character and ability was attached to each regiment, and regularly at dawn of day, and on the approach of sunset, the troops were summoned by sound of trumpet or beat of drum to their devotions, and the whole camp resounded with the voice of prayer and sacred song.

The army was composed for the most part of peasantry—men of sedate demeanour and thoughtful habits, who highly prized the blessings of civil and religious liberty, and who now testified their devotion to the cause, not by a rash and ignorant enthusiasm, but by deliberately and voluntarily coming forward to fight, or, if necessary, to die in its defence. The colonels were mostly noblemen of the highest rank, the captains generally barons or principal gentlemen, while under them were placed as lieutenants veteran soldiers, who had served abroad in a similar or higher capacity, and had been selected as men of undaunted courage and eminent military skill. Over all was the sagacious Leslie, who, though old, diminutive, and distorted, was endowed with a wisdom in council, and a promptitude and vigour in action, which commanded the respect of all ranks, who obeyed his orders with a submissiveness and alacrity which the most despotic prince might have envied. He had the art of issuing his orders rather as advices than commands, so that the proudest noble felt it no derogation from the dignity of his rank to yield a ready and cheerful acquiescence. The weight of his personal influence, and the confidence in his practical wisdom, entertained by all, contributed greatly to suppress that emulation among the nobles which might have proved ruinous to the cause. "We ever feared," says an historian of the time, "that emulation among our nobles might have done harm; but such was the wisdom and authority of that old, little, crooked soldier (General Leslie), that all, with an incredible submission, gave over themselves to be guided by him, as if he had been the great Solymán.*" The ministers were, at the same time, eminently instrumental in preserving discipline by their judicious and pious exhortations, which were received with willing ears by men who not only respected their judgment, but revered their office.

Leslie's situation at this moment, while in many respects highly favourable, yet would not admit of prolonged inactivity; though, in the meantime, well supplied with provisions, he was destitute of the resources necessary for a protracted campaign, and he accordingly resolved either to secure advantageous terms by negotiation, or speedily to put all to the hazard of a battle.

The continued inactivity of the royal troops at this juncture was a source of considerable uneasiness, as it was attributed by the covenanting leaders to a subtle policy. Charles, it was imagined, having by means of his fleet stopped the trade of the country, and cut off all supplies by sea, was now desirous of allowing time for the present enthusiasm of the Scottish army to subside, and for their resources to become exhausted, in order that he might attack them on all sides at a disadvantage, and compel them to an unconditional submission. They were not yet, however, aware of the failure of the expected reinforcements from Ireland, and of the fact that there was little to dread from an irruption of the Gordons on the north—so that they were secure from all attack, except such as might be essayed by the king's troops in their neighbourhood. Their suspicions, however, operated to their advantage.

Threatened advance of the Scottish army. Leslie, judging that his safety lay in precipitating the crisis, gave plain indication of his design to approach the English army, now encamped on the opposite side of the Tweed. This movement occasioned great consternation amongst the English, who immediately began to fortify their position. They hastily threw up some advance works on the north side of the Tweed; and such was their alarm at the threatened attack of the Scots, that they wrought in their trenches night and day, not even desisting on Sabbath.†

Charles had now involved himself in a dilemma from which he felt that extrication was impossible, without incurring extreme danger, on the one hand, or humiliation, if not disgrace, on the other. In the vain hope that the rumours of his great military preparations and the influence of his personal presence and royal dignity would be sufficient, without striking a blow, to awe the Scots into submission, he had, while at York, haughtily spurned every proposal of accommodation. He would listen to no terms but an absolute surrender of their will to his own, as supreme head both of Church and State. He now found on reaching the Scottish Border that he was opposed by an army far superior to his own, not in numbers alone, but in what is of still greater importance—experienced leaders, discipline, and indomitable, enthusiastic courage. Besides this, his own troops had no heart to the contest. The war was unpopular both with the nobility and the mass of the English people, who themselves, universally discontented, had the sagacity to see in the subjugation of the Scots, a presage of their own. Their sympathies were enlisted on the side of those whose aspirations after the rights and privileges of freemen they were summoned to repress; and they naturally hoped that an example of successful resistance on the part of the Scottish nation to illegal and arbitrary power might materially aid themselves in their attempts to regain their own liberties, of which they had been unjustly deprived. The soldiers had learned to participate in these sentiments with their fellow-citizens, and at last were at no pains to conceal their reluctance to engage in the contest. In addition to all these most discouraging circumstances, the royal resources were already all but exhausted—so that it was not possible either to subdue the Scots, or to pursue that temporising policy to which Charles had so often resorted in seasons of difficulty. His idolised prerogative, dear to him as life itself, was now in the utmost danger of being brought into contempt; and it is probable that in its defence he would have adopted the desperate resolution of hazarding a battle, had not Laud, who was possessed of great influence over him, succeeded in dissuading him from an attempt in which he was almost certain to fail, and in which failure was ruin.* In this emergency, Charles was at last willing to treat, though pride still imposed a barrier. He was desirous that the first overture should come from those whom he considered as his rebellious subjects. They had continued to supplicate his attention to their claims with a perseverance that ought to have convinced him of their loyalty, as well as their sincere desire for peace; and as the gratification of their own self-importance was not their object, they were, notwithstanding their present advantages, as willing as ever to assume the attitude of supplicants, on the slightest expectation or assurance that their petitions would receive a favourable hearing. The late proclamation, however, had convinced them that any further attempts at obtaining their just rights by merely supplicating the king were hopeless, and Charles was on this occasion compelled to submit to the mortification of taking the initiative. To save his pride, however, as much as possible, the movement was made in an indirect and clandestine manner. Robert Leslie, a Scotchman and one of the king's pages, came to the Scottish camp, and, with many expressions of affection for his country, represented that the English army was increasing so fast that the Scots were in the utmost danger of being overwhelmed by them; and he, therefore, recommended a renewed supplication to be made to the king, which he said would be warmly seconded by several of the English nobility, who regarded the Scottish claims with favour, and were earnestly desirous of peace. This hint was at once understood. Robert Leslie's information regarding the additions to the English army was regarded as purely fabulous, but the suggestion which he made was referred to its true source, and looked on as an invitation which was joyfully accepted. Without further ceremony, the Earl of Dunfermline was selected as the bearer of the following petition to his majesty:—"That whereas

The covenanters again supplicate the king. the former means used by us have not yet been effectual for receiving your majesty's favour, and the peace of this, your native kingdom, we fall down again at your majesty's feet, most humbly supplicating that your majesty would be graciously pleased to appoint some few of the many worthy men of your majesty's kingdom of England, who are well affected to the true religion and our common peace, to hear by some of us, of the same affection, our humble desires, and to make known unto us your majesty's gracious pleasure; that as by the providence of God we are here joined in one island under one king, so by your majesty's great wisdom and tender care all mistakings may be speedily removed, and the two kingdoms may be kept in peace and happiness under your majesty's long and happy reign, for the which we shall never cease to pray, as becometh your majesty's most faithful subjects." *

With that silly adherence to punctilio by which Charles was characterised, before answering this dutiful supplication, which he himself had evoked, he first insisted that the proclamation which had not been suffered to be read at the Cross of Edinburgh should be published in the Scottish camp; and Sir Edmond Verney was sent with the Earl of Dunfermline to see this ceremony performed. The Scottish leaders, however, declined compliance with this demand, for the same reasons they had assigned to the Marquis of Hamilton against its being published in the capital. They so far, however, yielded to the king's humour, as to comply with the letter of his injunction, by having it read with much apparent reverence at the general's table. Here it was made the subject of comment, so that Verney, who connived at this equivocal mode of obedience, might be able to say on his return that it had been read in the Scottish camp; and the nobles, on the other hand, could say they had taken it into consideration.

With Verney's favourable account of his mission Charles was fain to appear satisfied, and immediately nominated the Earls of Arundel, Essex, Holland, Salisbury, and Berkshire, together with Secretary Coke, to treat with the commissioners appointed by his subjects of Scotland. These were the Earls of Rothes, Dunfermline, and Loudoun, Sir William Douglas, sheriff of Teviotdale, Mr. Alexander Henderson, minister, and Mr. Archibald Johnstone, advocate. So little reliance, however, did the Scottish nobles place on the king's honour, that they would not adventure their deputies within the English camp until they had obtained a safe-conduct under the king's own hand.*

On Monday, the 9th of June, the commissioners assembled, according to the king's appointment, in Lord Arundel's tent; but they had scarcely entered when the king himself most unexpectedly made his appearance amongst them. Abruptly addressing the Scottish deputies, he said, "He was informed they had complained that they could not be heard, and therefore he was now come himself to hear what they would say." Lord Rothes replied that they desired only to be secured in their religion and liberties; and Loudoun commenced an explanation and vindication of their proceedings, but was gruffly interrupted by the king, who told him he would admit of no excuses for their past conduct, but, if they had come to sue for grace, they should specify in writing all their desires, which would then be taken into consideration. After a brief consultation apart this was done. "They humbly prayed that the acts of the General Assembly passed in Glasgow should be ratified in the parliament held at Edinburgh, July 23rd; that all ecclesiastical matters should be determined by assemblies of the Kirk, and all civil by parliament, which should be held at least once in two or three years; that his majesty's ships and land forces be recalled; that all persons, ships, and goods arrested be restored, the kingdom be made safe from invasion, and that all excommunicated persons, incendiaries, and informers against the realm, who, out of malice, have caused these commotions for their own private ends, may be returned to suffer their deserved censure and punishment." The king then desired them to assign their reasons for these requests, when Lord Loudoun, on his knees, said, "That their demands were only to enjoy their religion and liberties according to the civil and ecclesiastical laws of the kingdom." The king replied, that if this was all that was desired, the peace would soon be made; nevertheless he required two days for deliberation on the matter. When the deputies again met, according to appointment, the king returned an answer in these words, in which it is difficult to detect any latent deceit, although subsequent events afford abundant evidence of his insincerity:—"That if their desires were only the enjoying of their religion and liberties according to the ecclesiastical and civil laws of his majesty's kingdom of Scotland, his majesty doth not only agree to the same, but shall always protect them to the uttermost of his power; and if they shall not insist upon anything but that which is so warranted, his majesty will most willingly and readily condescend thereunto, so that, in the meantime, they pay unto him that civil and temporal obedience which can be justly required and expected of loyal subjects."

On receiving this encouraging reply, the deputies presented a paper containing the reasons of their demands, which the king having promised to take into consideration they withdrew, after having had the honour of kissing his majesty's hand. It was remarked that his majesty appeared to show particular regard to what was said by Lord Loudoun and Mr. Henderson; and the deputies were so far misled by appearances, that they began to entertain a more favourable opinion of the king, and even to consider him as "a lover of reason and equity." * The English commissioners showed their respect to the Scottish deputies by entertaining them sumptuously, and commending them to others of the courtiers for "their wisdom, eloquence, gravity, and loyal disposition." †

This meeting took place on the Wednesday; but when, on the following Monday, the deputies returned for their answer, they found his majesty's disposition towards them had undergone a remarkable change. On the intervening Sabbath, the Bishops of Ross and Aberdeen had found access to the king, and so wrought upon his mind by their flatteries, that all his lofty notions of unlimited prerogative had returned. He demanded an answer to the following interrogatories:—

1. "Whether hath his majesty the sole indication of the General Assembly, or not?"

2. "Whether hath his majesty a negative voice in assemblies, or not?"

3. "Whether may the assembly sit after his majesty by his authority commanded them to rise, or not?"

As the assembly at Glasgow had already given a practical answer to these questions, the deputies considered them as propounded now only for the purpose of gaining time, until their provisions were exhausted, and reinforcements should arrive to the English army. They therefore resolved to bring the matter to an immediate issue, and if, after delivering a candid answer to the king's questions, they could not obtain proper conditions of peace, to advance within cannon-shot of the English camp.

Very plain answers were speedily returned, but before the arrival of the deputies entrusted with them in the English camp, intelligence of the intention to shift the position of the Scottish army had reached the king. This argument was conclusive. At the next meeting no more was heard of the queries, and the deputies were desired once more to condescend on the particulars they wanted. Their answer was substantially the same as they had already given at their previous interview; and their reasons, which were added, differed in few particulars from those formerly assigned. After consulting with his council, who were not a little perplexed by the difficulty of framing an answer which should at once satisfy the covenanters and comport with the royal dignity, his majesty issued a declaration, in Declaration of which, though he refused to ratify the king.

or approve of the acts of the "pretended" assembly at Glasgow, he yet confirmed and approved all that had been promised by his commissioner in his name. He assured the petitioners that all ecclesiastical matters should be determined by a general assembly of the Kirk, and all civil matters by parliament, and other inferior judicatories by law established; and that assemblies should be held once a year, or as often as the exigencies of the Kirk and kingdom should require; that, for settling the present distractions, a free General Assembly should be held at Edinburgh on the 6th of August, and a parliament on the 20th day of the same month, for ratifying the acts of the assembly and settling such other matters as may conduce to the peace and welfare of the kingdom, as also to pass a general act of pardon and oblivion. It was further declared that his majesty's ships and land forces should be recalled, and that all persons, goods, and ships, should be restored, on the covenanters discharging all their "pretended" tables and conventicles, and restoring to his majesty all his castles, forts, and ammunition of all sorts, as also his royal honours.

The commissioners were well satisfied with the greater part of this declaration, for which they expressed deep gratitude to his majesty; yet, as they deemed it in some particulars harsh, and in others defective, they entreated that a free conference respecting its contents should be granted. The king having agreed to this proposal, various objections were given in and answered. Both the objections and the answers were carefully recorded by the commissioners, for the satisfaction of their constituents, as they served to explain various clauses in the declaration which might otherwise be misunderstood, and thus give cause for jealousy and alarm.

With these explanations the king's declaration served as the basis of a treaty Treaty of pacification, which was concluded and signed on the 18th of June by the commissioners of both parties. Its articles were the following:—

1. "The forces of Scotland to be disbanded and dissolved within forty-eight hours.

2. "His majesty's castles, forts, ammunition, and royal honours, to be delivered as soon as his majesty can send to receive them.

3. "His majesty's ships to depart presently after the delivery of the castles, with the first fair wind, and in the meantime no interruption of trade or fishing.

4. "His majesty is graciously pleased to cause restore all persons, goods, and ships, arrested and detained since the 1st day of November last.

5. "There shall be no meetings, treatings, consultations, or convocations of his majesty's lieges, but such as are warranted by act of parliament.

6. "All fortifications to desist, and no further working therein; and they to be remitted to his majesty's pleasure. And—

7. "To restore to every one of his majesty's good subjects their liberties, lands, houses, goods, and means whatsoever, taken and detained from them by whatsoever means since the aforesaid time."

On the same day these articles, together with the king's declaration, were proclaimed in the English camp, on which occasion an Englishman jocularly remarked that "the bishops were discharged in Scotland neither by the canon law, nor the civil law, but by Dunse Law." The Earl of Morton was then sent to see the declaration and articles of peace published in the Scottish camp. This, however, was accompanied by a paper containing an "Information against mistaking of the king's declaration." In this document the expression "pretended assembly" was explained as not implying "that any of the petitioners, by their acceptance of the said declaration, should be thought to disapprove or depart from the same."

This "Information" was also repeated by Lord Lindsay when the proclamation was published at the market-cross of Edinburgh; and in all other places where the declaration was published, four of the most distinguished covenanters were appointed in name of their brethren to give his majesty hearty thanks for his favour; but, at the same time, to declare that their acceptance of the proclamation should be in no respect prejudicial to the late General Assembly at Glasgow, to which, by their covenant, they were bound to adhere.

After the conclusion of the treaty, a despatch was forwarded to the Earls of Marischal and Montrose, then at Aberdeen, acquainting them with the pacification; and, by the same vessel, letters were sent from the king to Colonel Gunn, and the city of Aberdeen, thanking them for their zeal in his service. These communications fortunately arrived in time to stay the proceedings of Montrose, who was about to inflict a terrible vengeance on the city, on account of the defection from the covenant of many of its inhabitants.*

The verbal explanations published by the Scots in connection with the royal declaration were afterwards disavowed by the English commissioners, and burned as false and calumnious. There is no reason, however, to doubt their authenticity. They are consonant to the spirit and apparent object of the treaty; the most material of them are acknowledged by Clarendon to have been admitted during the conference; they were openly published by the Scots at the very first, while the matter was still fresh in the recollection of both parties, and were not then challenged; they were in fact implied in the very nature of the pacification, in which one material stipulation is, that episcopacy and the whole train of contested innovations were to be submitted to a new assembly. Besides all this, it is impossible to believe that such men as Henderson, the ardent and intrepid moderator of the Glasgow assembly, or Johnstone, its clerk, would have been guilty of a public falsehood so open to detection and exposure; or would have acquiesced in a treaty in which, without explanation or qualification, that assembly should be ignored, and the abolition of episcopacy decidedly refused. There is no reason to doubt the fact, as stated by Baillie, Row, and others, that the apparent harshness and ungraciousness of the declaration was explained by the king as a mere colouring which he considered necessary for the sake of his honour among foreign nations; and that the assembly which he refused, as a matter of form, to acknowledge, the nation was neither required nor expected to disown.* It very soon appeared that, on the part of Charles, this treaty was entered into merely to avert a present exigency, and without the slightest intention of fulfilling any one of its stipulations; and that every concession which it contained was deliberately intended to be either counteracted by a perfidious policy, or revoked on the very first opportunity.

On the side of the Scots, their part of the treaty was promptly and honourably fulfilled. They immediately broke up their camp, burned the wooden huts of the soldiers, disbanded their troops, and placed the strongholds in the hands of the royalists.† The previous experience, however, of the king's inveterate duplicity had created a distrust which was not to be so easily removed. Justly considering the present pacification merely as an armistice, which Charles intended should subsist no longer than suited his convenience, they retained their veteran officers in pay; and preserved intact the whole of that internal organisation, by means of which they could, if necessary, once more raise and concentrate the whole military force of the kingdom. Charles, on the other hand, proceeded slowly, and with reluctance; and, after all, his troops were but partially disbanded. In the meantime, on mature reflection, the treaty just concluded was satisfactory to neither party. Charles was mortified at having been compelled to treat at all with men whom he had denounced as rebels, and felt degraded at having submitted, however insincerely, to terms which he considered derogatory to his dignity, and an impeachment of his prerogative. The Mutual jealousies of the parties to the treaty. covenanters, on the other hand, viewed with regret the unconditional surrender of the strengths of the kingdom and their military stores, and lamented the disbanding of their army, without having received complete security for their lives and property against any sudden outbreak of royal vengeance.

During these mutual jealousies and heartburnings, it became evident that the king declines to preside in the assembly. The king was anxiously looking out for some pretext for breaking with the covenanters. He complained that the Tables still continued their meetings; and some petty disturbances, which to the grief of the great body of the covenanters occurred among the populace in the capital, and which the magistrates were accused of being negligent in repressing, were made an excuse for the king's declining to fulfil his promise of presiding in the General Assembly. Hamilton was applied to to act as his commissioner, but wisely declined an office of whose embarrassing difficulties he had already had ample experience. At his request, Traquair was appointed—Traquair appointed commissioner. a man every way adapted by his ability, eloquence, far-seeing policy, and want of principle, to promote the sinister designs of his master. His secret instructions fully justify the utter distrust of the covenanters in the king's sincerity, and show that the charge of duplicity was only too well founded. He was instructed to appear to grant everything desired, but with such artful qualification as in reality to concede nothing. He was, if he could by no means avert such a result, to allow episcopacy to be abolished—not because it was unlawful, but for satisfying the wishes of the nation and allaying the present discontent. He was to consent to the subscribing of the covenant—but then it was “provided it be so conceived that our subjects do not thereby be required to abjure episcopacy as a part of popery, or against God's laws; but if they require it to be abjured, as contrary to the Church of Scotland, he was to give way to it rather than make a breach; and the proceedings of the Glasgow assembly were to be ratified, not as deeds of that illegal meeting, all mention of which was to be avoided, but as acts of this.” Finally, the whole proceedings were to be left open for future discussion, by a protest which puts the cope-stone on this fabric of dissimulation. He was instructed, “after all assembly business was ended, immediately before prayers, in the fairest way possible, to protest that in respect of his majesty's resolution of not coming in person, and his instructions being hastily written, many things may have occurred upon which he had not his majesty's pleasure; therefore, in case anything had escaped him, or been condescended upon prejudicial to his majesty's service, his majesty may be heard for redress thereof in his own time and place.”

Charles had indeed studied “king-craft” to some purpose. It is difficult to imagine a more cunning or unworthy artifice; and Traquair, if he has no claim to participation in the unenviable distinction of having contrived it, is entitled to his full share of the infamy of an accomplice. By this device, while he acted as the representative of his sovereign, he was content, by a preconcerted arrangement, to be subjected to the discredit of having his whole conduct disavowed, as resulting either from treachery or incapacity.

With regard to the parliament, the same difficulties did not exist. Traquair himself suggested a simple and comprehensive plan of nullifying all their acts by a single, but, as he deemed, an insurmountable objection. He advised his majesty to acquiesce in the meantime in the abolition of episcopacy—a measure which the parliament was certain to pass, but which must be null from the beginning on account of the absence of the prelates, who constituted one of the Estates, and, therefore, whatever acts were passed, might be easily revoked when a convenient time should arrive. The intention of the king merely to temporise until the present exigency should be past, and then to revoke every concession, was distinctly avowed in his reply to the bishops, who had written to Laud, requesting him to advise the king to prorogue the assembly and the parliament. This was a measure on which he durst not venture; but he informed the prelates that he had given special instructions to his commissioner to watch over their interests; and recommended them to give in privately to the commissioner a protest or remonstrance specifying their exceptions against the assembly, to be by him presented to the king, who would do in the matter as became his own honour and the equity of their desires. He added, “you may rest secure, that though perhaps we may give way for the present to that which will be prejudicial both to the Church and to our own government, yet we shall not leave thinking in time how to remedy both.”

Before his return, the king sent for fourteen of the leading covenanters to attend him at Berwick, with a view of trying what effect royal persuasion and promises might have upon them. Six only obeyed the summons, and of these Montrose alone was gained over to the king's cause. It is probable that disgust at the neglect with which he had been treated by the king, on his return from foreign travel, had originally thrown him into the arms of the opposite party; but being now received into royal favour, he resolved to abandon the cause of the covenanters, and henceforth to employ his great talents in supporting the designs of the king. There is no evidence, however, to support the allegations of his enemies, that he pledged himself to remain amongst the covenanters only for the purpose of betraying them. Charles now sent an express to Edinburgh, requiring the immediate attendance of the remainder of the fourteen leaders whom he had summoned into his presence, but they were forcibly detained by the populace, who apprehended that this was a trap laid to ensnare their principal leaders, and carry them to London.* Lindsay and Loudoun, however, returned to explain the matter, but the king was so highly incensed, that he would listen to no apology, and forthwith returned in deep mortification at the result of his inglorious expedition.

The General Assembly, according to appointment, met at Edinburgh on the 12th of August. Henderson, the moderator of the assembly at Glasgow, preached the opening sermon, in which he recommended to his brethren the exercise of moderation and forbearance; he cautioned them that any exhibition of intemperate zeal, so far from promoting the great cause in which they were engaged, would be eagerly laid hold of by their adversaries, and employed as a weapon of offence against the Church and themselves; and he exhorted them so to comport themselves, as practically to refute the oft-repeated calumny that presbyterianism was incompatible with monarchical government. This prudent counsel was not lost on the assembly. Throughout the whole proceedings, while a steadfast adherence to principle was maintained, the utmost care was taken to conciliate the king by every concession that could with propriety be made even to his prejudices and caprices. As his majesty was peculiarly sensitive on the subject of the last assembly, all reference to it was carefully avoided; but as the objects sought to be attained were still the same, and could in no respect be departed from, the whole were embodied in one general act, entitled, "An Act containing the causes and remedy of the bygone evils of the Church." These were enumerated as follows:—"The causes:—First, the pressing upon this Church a service-book, or book of common prayer, by the prelates, without direction or warrant from the Church, containing, beside the popish frame, divers popish errors and ceremonies, with a book of canons, establishing a tyrannical power over the Kirk in the person of bishops; a book of consecration and ordination, appointing officers in the house of God not warranted by the Word of God, and repugnant to the discipline and acts of the Kirk; and the high commission. Second, the articles of Perth. Third, the change of the government of the Kirk, from the assemblies of the Kirk to the persons of some kirkmen, usurping priority and power over their brethren. Fourth, civil places and power of kirkmen. Fifth, keeping and authorising corrupt assemblies. Sixth, the want of lawful and free assemblies, rightly constituted of pastors, doctors, and elders, yearly or oftener, pro re nata, according to the liberty of the Kirk. The remedies:—That the service-book, book of canons and ordination, and the high commission, be still rejected; that the articles of Perth be no more practised; that episcopal government, and the civil places and power of kirkmen, be holden still as unlawful in this Kirk; that the pretended assemblies, 1605 to 1618, be hereafter held as null and of none effect; and that for the preservation of religion, and preventing all such evils in time coming, general assemblies rightly constituted, as the proper and competent judges of all matters ecclesiastical, be hereafter kept yearly and oftener, pro re nata, as occasion and necessity shall require—the necessity of these occasional assemblies being first shown to his majesty by humble supplication; as also that Kirk sessions, presbyteries, and synodal assemblies, be constituted and observed according to the order of this Church." By this act, which passed without opposition, the entire liberties, discipline, and government of the Church were as effectually secured as they could have been by the recognition of the assembly at Glasgow. Agreeably to his instructions, a declaration was added by the commissioner, reserving the question regarding the unlawfulness of episcopacy, per se, and limiting the application of the condemnatory expressions in this act to the Kirk and kingdom of Scotland. With this reservation the commissioner, in his majesty's name, subscribed the act, and promised to get it ratified by parliament. This declaration, though allowed by the assembly, served to stimulate them to fresh vigilance. To prevent the re-introduction of the episcopal system under any form, an act was passed ordaining that no innovation which might disturb the peace of the Church should be proposed in a general assembly without having been previously intimated to all the synods, presbyteries, and kirk sessions throughout the country, and by them maturely considered, so that commissioners might come prepared to state the views of their constituents on the subject. By this wise and salutary regulation all surreptitious introduction of matters affecting the constitution of the Church would be effectually prevented, and the deliverance of the assembly would as nearly as possible express the judgment of the whole collective body of the Church. The most difficult and delicate part of the business of the assembly still remained. How were they, without giving mortal offence to the king, and without express reference to the Glasgow assembly, to deal with the prelates whom that assembly had condemned? They adopted the only mode of proceeding that seemed open to them. The accusations against the bishops were heard afresh, the doctrinal errors of which they were found guilty were now once more condemned; but such was the desire of the assembly to gratify the king, that all who had been convicted merely of complying with the orders of the court, and were not chargeable with immoral conduct, were, if otherwise eligible, re-admitted to the office of the ministry on evidence of their repentance and submission to the constitutions of the Church.

* Clarendon, vol. i. p. 128.

The attention of the assembly was afterwards directed to the work entitled the "Large Declaration," which though published in the king's name, was in reality the production of Dr. Walter Balcanquhal, Dean of Durham. The commissioner urged that in dealing with this matter they would give evidence of their respect to his majesty, and "that they tendered his honour as the apple of their eye." In compliance with this recommendation, the assembly laid it down as a preliminary, that they should speak very tenderly of what his majesty saw or heard himself; but in so far as he had been grossly imposed on and misinformed, as appeared from a great part of that book, it was necessary fully to clear up the matter. They accordingly appointed a committee of their number to examine the book and report. In three days afterwards, the committee produced a voluminous report, in which they condemned on eight articles of the book deemed "dishonourable to God," thirteen "dishonourable to the Church," and a like number "dishonourable to this kingdom." Twenty-six assertions contained in it were pronounced "gross lies and untruths," and four "a miserable wresting of their intentions, words, and actions." The assembly, after serious deliberation, drew up a supplication to the commissioner, to be by him represented to the king, containing an earnest request that he should manifest his disapprobation of the offensive portions of the book, by ordering its immediate suppression; and grant commission to sue all such persons as are known or suspected to be the authors of it, particularly Dr. Balcanquhal, "that by their exemplary punishment others might be deterred from such dangerous and seditious courses." This petition was received by his grace in privy council, and he promised to report the same to his majesty.*

Having now succeeded, with the full concurrence of the commissioner, in passing every measure which they deemed necessary for securing the constitution of the Church, the assembly were desirous of completing their triumph by obtaining the royal sanction to the national covenant. The concurrence of the commissioner was obtained more readily than they had anticipated; not, however, without some hesitation concerning the bond, but these scruples he said were more for the satisfaction of his royal master than for his own. As the most respectful mode of proceeding, a supplication, abounding in expressions of loyalty and affection to his majesty, was presented to the privy council, praying them to give to the covenant the sanction of an act of council, and to require it to be subscribed by all his majesty's subjects. The privy council acceded to the prayer of the petitioners, and passed an act to that effect, dated 30th August; and the commissioner immediately announced the agreeable intelligence to the assembly. The covenant was subscribed by every member of the council, including Traquair himself, who, however, subscribed with a reservation, declaring that, as his majesty's commissioner, the covenant, as understood by him, was "one in substance with that which was subscribed by his majesty's father of blessed memory, 1580, 1581, 1590, and oftener since renewed. Therefore," he concludes, "I, as his majesty's commissioner, for the full satisfaction of the subjects, and for settling a perfect peace in Church and kingdom, do, according to my foresaid declaration and subscription, subjoined to the act of this assembly of the date of the 17th instant, allow and consent that the covenant be subscribed throughout all this kingdom. In witness whereof I have subscribed the premises. (Sic subscribitur) John, Earl of Traquair, commissioner."* Even this reservation, which was declared by Traquair to be made only in his official capacity, and "in his majesty's name, and which no subject should have the benefit of, no, not even himself as Earl of Traquair," was sufficient to alarm the jealous vigilance of the assembly. They, therefore, ordered a declaration to be prefixed to the signatures in these terms:—"The article in this covenant, which was at the first subscription referred to the determination of the General Assembly, being determined, and thereby the five articles of Perth, the government of the Kirk by bishops, the civil places and power of kirkmen, upon the reasons and grounds contained in the acts of the General Assembly, declared to be unlawful within this Kirk, we subscribe according to the determination foresaid."†

Though the satisfaction of the assembly was somewhat alloyed by the caveat of the commissioner, they could not repress their exultation at the wonderful result of their important labours. Even their far-seeing sagacity was unable to penetrate the thick veil of duplicity and deceit in which the king and his commissioner had enveloped themselves, and which was very soon to be thrown aside. They publicly expressed their joy and gratification by praising God, and praying for the king and his commissioner; and the latter, having assured them that their acts would be ratified in parliament, the assembly was dissolved with apparent cordiality, and amidst universal national rejoicings.‡

When information of these proceedings reached the king, he was much dissatisfied; and he blamed Traquair for having gone beyond his commission, and thereby rendered it difficult to pursue that tortuous policy which he had meditated with regard to ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland. Traquair had subscribed and ratified an act declaring "that episcopal government and the civil places and power of kirkmen be holden still as unlawful in this Kirk." To this act, which by the treaty of pacification the parliament was appointed to confirm, the king refused to assent. He had consented to an act abolishing episcopacy as "contrary to the constitution of the Church of Scotland," but the term "unlawful" seemed to him to imply a general condemnation of episcopacy, to which he would not assent. It seems never to have occurred to the overheated mind of the monarch, that he was making a distinction without a difference, and that what is unconstitutional in a particular Church must, so far as that Church is concerned, be also "unlawful." The terms of the act neither express nor imply anything more; and yet such was his ridiculous horror of the word "unlawful," that he "absolutely commanded" Traquair not to ratify the act in parliament unless the expression were altered.* Notwithstanding all that had occurred, Charles had never receded by a single hairbreadth from his purpose of forcing episcopacy upon Scotland, and he objected to the term "unlawful" from an apprehension, most probably, that it would form a ground for repealing those acts of the Scottish parliament which his father had laboured to procure, and "which," he said, "may hereafter be of so great use to us." Perhaps, too, he apprehended that if prelacy should be declared unlawful in Scotland, it might be concluded to be equally so in England; and thus the whole ecclesiastical fabric on which he leaned, as the chief support of his arbitrary government, might be thrown to the ground. To be the sovereign of a free people was in Charles's estimation to be hardly a sovereign at all. He disdained to share his authority with any other power in the State. He claimed, as a matter of absolute and indefeasible right, to have all the power, civil and ecclesiastical, concentrated in his own person; he would be fettered in its exercise by no human law; he would have every will subjected to his own. To this dream of unlimited prerogative, he would willingly sacrifice his own reputation as well as the affection of his subjects. With the phrase "the word of a king" frequently on his lips, he showed a most flagrant disregard to truth, and his very name was almost another word for insincerity. Even while subscribing the treaty of pacification, he was resolved to break it; and he now anxiously sought to find in the proceedings of his Scottish subjects some pretext for his premeditated perfidy. Writing to Traquair he says, "If you find that what we have commanded you to do is likely to cause a rupture, their impertinent motives give you a fair occasion to make it appear to the world that we have condescended to all matters which can be pretended to concern conscience and religion, and that now they aim at nothing but the overthrow of royal authority, and, therefore, we hope and expect that, if a rupture happen, you will make this appear to be the cause thereof, and not religion, which you know not only to be true, but must see it will be of great advantage to us, and, therefore, must be seriously intended by you."

On the 31st of August, the day succeeding the rising of the assembly, parliament was opened with more than the customary solemnities. Traquair rode in great state from the palace, attended by forty-five nobles, forty-eight representatives of shires, and fifty-one representatives of burghs; the crown, sceptre, and sword of state being borne before him by the three eldest earls, Argyll, Crawford, and Sutherland.

After sermon by Mr. Alexander Henderson, the commissioner made a short address, in which he extolled "the king's goodness" to his people in convocating this parliament. His commission was then read and recorded, and the commissions of representatives of shires and burghs were given in and received.

As the absence of one of the Estates might afterwards, as was really intended, be employed as an objection to nullify the subsequent proceedings, it became necessary, before proceeding to business, and, indeed, before the house could be properly constituted, to supply this deficiency. In order to maintain the semblance of a spiritual estate, it was suggested by the court party that lay abbots should be appointed in place of the absent prelates; but as, besides objections of greater weight, the very name was abhorrent to the great majority of the members, the representatives of the lesser barons were substituted as the third estate.

The first business was the selection of the lords of the articles, without whose previous sanction, according to ancient usage, nothing could be submitted to the consideration of parliament. At first, this parliamentary committee had been freely chosen by the three Estates, separately, out of their respective orders; but afterwards, by a prelatical usurpation, the whole nomination was virtually thrown into the hands of these ambitious ecclesiastics. Eight bishops nominated eight nobles in whom they could confide; these jointly nominated eight confederate barons, and the whole collectively nominated eight burgesses. The absence of the prelates on this occasion afforded a fair opportunity of reverting to the original mode of election. Anxious, however, to avoid an acrimonious debate, the covenanters allowed, for the present, the commissioner to nominate the eight lords who had formerly been nominated by the bishops, and the other estates, apart, nominated their own representatives. Care, however, was taken to protest that the nomination by the commissioner should not be drawn into a precedent; but that in future the members of committee should be freely chosen by their respective estates, that their power should be limited to such matters as had been remitted to their consideration, and that, failing any report on these, they might again be submitted to parliament by their original proposers without the authority of the committee.

It soon became evident that the newly appointed lords of the articles would have an unusual amount of important business to prepare for the consideration of parliament. A great variety of bills for maintaining the privileges of the people, and for securing freedom of discussion, and curtailing the influence of the court in parliament, immediately poured in from all quarters. Among the most important of these were the following:—That the parliament be declared to consist of lords, barons, and burgesses only; and that all acts empowering any to sit in parliament as representatives of the Church be rescinded. That the act of assembly of the 17th of August, concerning the bygone evils of the Kirk, and their several remedies, as also the act ordaining a renewal of the national covenant, be ratified. That the power of naming the lords of the articles is in the three Estates. That the coin should be regulated by the advice of parliament. That the Castles of Edinburgh, Dunbarton, and Stirling, be entrusted only to natives of Scotland, and that these be chosen by the advice of the Estates. That the “Large Declaration” be condemned. That the privy council be subordinate to, and censurable by, the king and parliament. That no patent of honour be granted to any stranger, nor to any native, who has not at least ten thousand merks of land-rent yearly. That no commission of justiciary or lieutenancy be granted except for a limited time. And, That the president and other judges of the court of session be chosen by the advice of the Estates.* Several other important measures were in progress for reforming the abuses which had during the last forty years been accumulating in the State—particularly an act for abolishing hereditary jurisdictions, and above all an act for ratifying the measures passed by the General Assembly—when Traquair, who was still smarting under the royal displeasure to which he had been subjected on account of his conduct in the assembly, took the alarm. He considered many of the proposed measures as derogatory to the king’s prerogative, he feared that none of them would prove agreeable to his majesty, and he resolved now to act with greater circumspection. Accordingly, that he might have time to receive instructions from court, he continued the parliament by not fewer than nine several prorogations† between the period of its first sitting and the 14th of November.

In the meantime, the commissioner, anxious to regain his majesty’s favour, prevailed on the privy council to alter their acts, which had been passed at his own instigation, condemning episcopacy and renewing the covenant; and even induced them to cancel entirely that clause by which they promised the ratification of these acts in parliament.‡

Wearied out with repeated delays, convinced that the commissioner would agree to nothing without express instructions, and hopeless of obtaining a ratification of their acts by the king, parliament at last resolved to send the Earls of Dunfermline and Loudoun to the king, to implore his majesty to allow the parliament to proceed, and to determine on the important business before them. This design was intimated to Traquair, who seemed satisfied with it; and instructions were forthwith given to the two noblemen, subscribed by some of each estate, in the name and by the command of the whole parliament. At the same time the ministers who had been selected by the assembly to watch over the proceedings in parliament, appointed a day of solemn fasting and humiliation to be observed throughout the kingdom.

Before Dunfermline and Loudoun had reached the English capital, they were met by a messenger, prohibiting them in the king’s name from approaching within a mile of the court. At the same time peremptory orders were transmitted to the commissioner to to prorogue the parliament until the 2nd day of June in the following year. Traquair had not the courage to proceed in person to execute so ungracious a mandate; he transmitted the letter containing the king’s order by the lord privy seal, to the chamber where the lords of the articles were assembled. Mr. Alexander Gibson, younger, of Durie, one of the three clerks of parliament, was desired to read it, but refused. At the command of the Estates, however, he read a Remonstrance lengthened remonstrance against of the Estates. it, in which it was declared that such a proceeding was “a new and unusual way, without precedent in this kingdom; contrary to his majesty’s honour, so far engaged for present ratifying of the acts of the Kirk; contrary to the laws, liberties, and perpetual practice of the kingdom, by which all continuations of parliament once called, convened, and begun to sit, have ever been made with express consent of the Estates; contrary to the public peace both of the Kirk and kingdom, which by reason of the present condition thereof, and the great confusion like to ensue, cannot endure so long delay, and which is to the advantage of our malicious adversaries, who, for their own ends, are incessantly seeking all occasions, by dividing betwixt the king and the kingdom, to bring both to utter ruin and desolation.” It was added, that although by the example of their ancestors, his majesty’s indiction, and the articles of pacification, they might lawfully continue their sittings, yet out of their most reverend regard and humble desire to manifest their obedience, and to avoid giving his majesty the smallest discontent, they would dissolve, leaving only a small number from each estate to await at Edinburgh his majesty’s answer to their humble remonstrance, which concludes in these emphatic words:—

Dissolution of parliament. A committee appointed.

“And if it shall happen (which God forbid) that after we have made our remonstrances, and to the uttermost of our power and duty used all lawful means for his majesty's information, that our malicious enemies, who are not considerable, shall by their suggestions and lies prevail against the informations and general declarations of a whole kingdom, we take God and man to witness that we are free of the outrages and insolencies that may be committed in the meantime: and that it shall be to us no imputation that we are constrained to take such courses as may best secure the Kirk and kingdom from the extremity of confusion and misery."* In accordance with the resolution expressed in this declaration, a committee consisting of a small number from each estate was appointed, "who, or any three of each estate" were to attend at Edinburgh, to make remonstrances to his majesty, and receive his answers.

No sooner was parliament dissolved, than a request was presented by the committee to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to summon them, or some of them, into his royal presence, that they might state to him their grievances and desires. Mr. William Cunningham, of Brownhill, was dispatched as the bearer of this request, which the king received without any apparent reluctance, and on the 11th of December, liberty was granted to send up commissioners. Before the committee could take advantage of his coldly, on account of his ready compliance with the conclusions of the assembly, his vindication of his conduct at length satisfied the king of his sincerity, and restored him to his majesty's confidence. This point gained, he laboured not without success to ingratiate himself once more into the royal favour, by representing the proceedings of parliament as intolerable encroachments on the royal prerogative, and exasperating all those feelings against his Scottish subjects which his majesty was known to entertain. He endeavoured to persuade the sovereign that his Scottish subjects were now to be reduced to obedience only by force, and pointed out the methods by which he considered they might be most effectually brought to submission. These representations were seconded by Laud and Wentworth, and though opposed by Hamilton and Morton, who were better acquainted with Scottish affairs, yet such were the pride and obstinacy of the infatuated monarch that, yielding to those counsels which were most in accordance with his own headstrong and arbitrary temper, he had before the arrival of the commissioners fully resolved on of England that the war had assumed a different aspect, that ecclesiastical affairs were no longer the object of contention; but that the Scots, by the proceedings of their parliament, had made a direct attack on the royal prerogative, and had actually initiated a revolution, having for its object the destruction of royal authority. The privy council of England did not fail to countenance this delusion, and to encourage the king to persevere in his resolution, by unanimously declaring that they now considered it necessary to reduce the Scots to their duty by force of arms.

On the 19th of January, the committee of parliament appointed the Earl of Dunfermline and Lord Loudoun ^{Loudoun again sent to court.} to proceed a second time to court, and with them were joined Sir William Douglas of Cavers, and Robert Barclay, Provost of Irvine. In their instructions they were prohibited, as the representatives of a free and independent nation, from acknowledging the English council as their judges; they were required to use their best endeavours to remove from the mind of his majesty the unfavourable impressions occasioned by Traquair's aspersions on the conduct of the Scottish parliament; they were ordered to support the particular acts proposed by the lords of the articles; to insist on his majesty's assigning an early day for the assembling of parliament; and to remonstrate against the reinforcement of the Castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton with strangers, and against exacting oaths from Scotchmen resident in England and Ireland inconsistent with the national oath and covenant.*

On the 20th of February, they were admitted to an audience, and having been allowed to kiss his majesty's hand, ^{Their first audience of the king.} they represented to him that it occasioned great grief to his subjects in Scotland to find that their proceedings had been traduced, and even their loyalty called in question. They besought his majesty that he would grant them a public opportunity, in presence of the councils of both kingdoms, of vindicating themselves and their countrymen from these calumnies, and particularly from the misrepresentations of Traquair in his account of their proceedings before the council of England. They also delivered to his majesty a message of thanksgiving from the General Assembly, with a supplication for ratifying their conclusions. Before taking leave, the king commanded them in future to put in writing whatever remonstrances they might have to make to him. This course was accordingly adopted, and, in like manner, Traquair wrote and subscribed all messages which he brought them from the king.

On the 2nd of March, the Scottish deputies were summoned by a message from his majesty to attend next day at the council-chamber; but information having reached them that there was only a select committee, including Laud and Traquair, to be present, they refused to attend unless they were favoured with a hearing in the royal presence. This was conceded, but a request that, in order to assist them in their vindication, they should be furnished with a copy of the charges preferred against them by Traquair in his information to the privy council, was peremptorily refused.

* Stevenson, vol. iii. pp. 815—820.

* Stevenson, vol. iii. p. 824.

Next day the deputies made their appearance in the council-chamber, when Loudoun addressed his majesty in a long and eloquent oration. In the outset he pointedly disclaimed all jurisdiction over Scottish affairs in the privy council of England. "Because," he said, "the parliament of that, your majesty's ancient and native kingdom, is independent, and not accountable to any other judicatory, we hope your majesty will pardon us for declining to speak or answer before any of your majesty's councils or judicatories whatsoever, as these who have any power to judge of the laws, actions, or proceedings of the parliament of that kingdom." He vindicated the parliament from the imputation of an intention to diminish his majesty's authority, or to shake off their allegiance. "We do, in our own name," he said, "and in name of the parliament who sent us, declare before God and the world that we never had, nor have, any thought of withdrawing ourselves from that humble and dutiful subjection and obedience to your majesty and your government, which by the descent and reign of so many kings is due to your majesty; and never had, nor have, any intention or desire to attempt anything that may tend to the diminution of your majesty's princely power; but, on the contrary, acknowledge our quietness, stability, and happiness to depend upon the safety of your majesty's person, and maintenance of your greatness and royal authority, as God's vicegerent set over us for maintenance of religion and administration of justice; and have solemnly sworn, not only to stand to the defence of your majesty's person and authority in the preservation of religion, liberties, and laws of the Church and kingdom, but also in every cause which may concern your majesty's honour, shall, according to the laws of the kingdom and the duty of good subjects, concur with our friends and followers, in quiet manner or in arms, as we shall be required."

Having thus cleared their own loyalty, and that of the parliament and people of Scotland, he proceeded to point out the reasons of their demands, and to show the equity of the proceedings in parliament. He complained that in making this defence he was reduced to the necessity of answering objections, which, notwithstanding repeated demands, were still concealed from them—a circumstance which ought to serve as an excuse, if he should not be able to give his majesty full satisfaction. "And," he added, "if any of the propositions or articles sought or craved in parliament shall seem harsh at the first view to those who know not our laws, we do expect from them the judgment of charity; and that they would distinguish betwixt the desires and actions of a parliament, who, being convened by royal authority, and honoured with your majesty, or your commissioner's presence, are makers of laws, and against whom there is no law, and the actions of private persons, against whom laws are made."

liament, he remarked that as the assembly had, with the concurrence of his majesty's commissioner, removed episcopacy out of the Church of Scotland, and declared it to be unlawful in that kingdom for churchmen to hold civil places and power, it necessarily followed that bishops who usurped to be the Church, and did in name of the Church represent the third estate, being taken away, there must be an act of constitution of parliament without them, without which it would be impossible to have a valid parliament, or to ratify the conclusions of the assembly. "Neither," he continued, "doth the passing of these acts wrong the Church nor State; nor diminish your majesty's princely power and royal authority; nor the Church, because she hath renounced and condemned that civil power and worldly pomp conferred upon her in time of popery, esteeming the same not to be a privilege, but a detriment incompatible with her spiritual nature, and as being repugnant to the doctrine and discipline of that Church; nor is the State wronged, because the whole congregations of that kingdom, being represented by their commissioners from presbyteries in the General Assembly, have given their consent to the desires and conclusions of the Kirk, and have subscribed the confession of faith in that sense, and have always been, and are, your majesty's supplicants, that the parliament may ratify what the assembly hath found and concluded. Neither can we believe that your majesty, who we hear doth acknowledge princes to be like shining stars, which have their splendour for the benefit of the world, and who esteem the prosperity and welfare of your people your greatest content, and the having of their hearts to be your majesty's greatest security, will think that the granting of that which, upon so good reason, is so earnestly desired both by Kirk and State, to be any diminution of your majesty's royal prerogative and privilege of your crown, which doth pertain to your majesty inviolably, and is no way contingent, separable, nor mutable with the change of any of the Estates; but is that power which did justly belong to the king before any bishops were in Scotland, and which did belong to him in time of popery, when bishops were allowed, and had their dependence on the pope, and which did likewise pertain to the king in the time of Reformation, when episcopacy was abjured and removed out of Scotland."

On the 11th of March, the commissioners had another audience of his majesty, in the presence of Laud and other members of the English council. Their third audience. Objections of the king.

On this occasion they brought with them their instructions, but, before presenting them to the king, or entering on any further vindication, they desired that, although his majesty might have any of his courtiers present as auditors, such persons should not be allowed to interfere as judges, nor should the commissioners be compelled to answer any of their questions.

They further desired that nothing spoken by them, and put in writing by any person present, should afterwards have any force or credit against them, unless first read to them, and allowed by them. Both these desires were conceded, the latter, however, not without difficulty and altercation. The instructions of the commissioners being now produced and read, the king objected that these were not subscribed by the noblemen of the greatest eminence. To this it was answered, that their first commission was signed by the Estates in parliament, and the second by the committee delegated by the parliament to sit during the prorogation; and that their authority, whatever might be their personal rank, was of greater account, as representing the kingdom, than that of the most eminent in the kingdom not clothed with the same commission. Finding this objection untenable, he asked what power they had to give him satisfaction, adding that their instructions were for justifying rather than satisfying; and though some of their desires were against law, they had no power to yield to any point. It was answered that the parliament had given them power to make it clear that their desires and proceedings were agreeable to the fundamental laws and customs of the kingdom, to reason, and to the act of pacification, which they were ready to do; nor was there any further power necessary, until the exceptions and objections were known; nor was it probable that parliament would invest them with the full decisive power of the legislature. It was added, that the acts themselves were no other than what the king was obliged, by the articles of pacification, to ratify. Then Laud, who sat on the king's right hand, and had been observed to smile contemptuously, begged his majesty to inquire of the commissioners how their assertion that their desires and proceedings were agreeable to the laws and customs of Scotland, which must be the present statutes, could be consistent with their desires that existing laws should be repealed? He added, that he did not believe the king was obliged to repeal them, or to ratify the conclusions of the assembly. The commissioners answered, that their desires might be agreeable to fundamental laws, and yet they might, without any inconsistency, crave that the acts repugnant to the conclusions of the assembly might be repealed; for, as the parliament may make laws for the good of Church and State, so they may repeal such laws as are inconsistent with the welfare of either; and they undertook to show that the king was obliged to ratify these conclusions. This reply roused the ire of the haughty primate, who testily answered that he was not so grossly ignorant as not to know that parliament had power to repeal laws as well as to make them; but what he desired to be informed of was, how their desires could be agreeable to the laws, when they crave standing laws to be repealed by reason of the conclusions of the assembly, ex consequenti? for, if the convocation in England should take upon them to annul and repeal acts of parliament, what confusion would there be. To this it was answered, that acts of parliament, which depend upon acts of assembly, must necessarily fall and be repealed when an assembly had annulled those acts of the assembly of which those acts of parliament were merely ratificatory; but that the English convocation, consisting only of prelates and some of the clergy, was very different from their General Assembly, where his majesty or his commissioner sits, and where the whole congregations and parishes of the kingdom are represented by their commissioners from presbyteries, so that what is done by them is done by the whole Church and kingdom, and therefore ought to be allowed in parliament. The archbishop answered with much warmth, that the convocation in England was as eminent a judicature as theirs, and ought not to be so slighted; that himself and the clergy were members of the parliament, and no reformed Church had lay elders as they had in their assemblies, and he would lose his life before they should have them. The commissioners replied that they would not have meddled with his convocation if he had not himself introduced the subject; they denied that laics were members of their assembly, for the office of elders was ecclesiastic, and as orthodox and agreeable to Scripture as any order they had in their convocation; that what they craved was, that acts of parliament might repeal acts of parliament which had now no force. This contest was interrupted by Traquair, who remarked that all the acts referred to the lords of the articles were not consented to by the whole Estates, and he hoped that the commissioners would yield in some things to his majesty, who otherwise had more reason to inquire what authority they had. To this it was answered, that they knew well all was not determined on that was in the articles, as these were only propositions prepared for the consideration of parliament. The commissioners were now required to withdraw. After some consultation between the king and his courtiers they were recalled, and were then told, "That although his majesty in his own and the unanimous judgment of those that were with him, conceived they had no power to give them satisfaction, yet he would hear the particular reasons of their demands, and for that end his commissioner, Lord Traquair, should give them the objections thereunto;" and having thanked his majesty for this favour, the commissioners withdrew.*

Several interviews were subsequently held, which were not—and certainly on the part of the king were not intended to be—satisfactory to either party; but, in the meantime, an audacious design was being prepared for execution. The king, finding the futility of all his objections triumphantly exposed, was anxious to precipitate his premeditated rapture with the Scots, and for this purpose eagerly seized upon a pretext which he vainly hoped would interest the people of England in the quarrel. He mistook those imaginary grievances that only wounded his own vanity, and which few could understand, for something that would rouse the resentment of a whole people, whose affection he had already alienated, and would induce them to rush headlong into civil war. The pretext was no other than the letter formerly referred to, which had been written before the pacification, and addressed, though never forwarded, to the King of France. This letter had been subscribed by Loudoun and six others of the principal nobility, and was intended to vindicate their conduct in the eyes of a foreign power, and to solicit assistance in the struggle which seemed to be approaching. On this document a charge of treason was meant to be founded against the covenanters, inasmuch as it was held to furnish incontrovertible evidence that they were prepared to transfer their allegiance to a foreign prince, and introduce into Britain the ancient enemy of England. On the strength of this letter, which was without a date, and evidently addressed by a different hand, the whole of the commissioners were arrested by order of the king, and committed

Letter to the king to the Tower. The letter itself King of France. was of the following tenour:—"Sire, your majesty being the refuge and sanctuary of afflicted princes and states, we have found it necessary to send this gentleman, Mr. Colvil, to represent unto your majesty the candour and ingenuity as well of our actions and proceedings, as of our intentions, which we desire to be engraved and written to the whole world with a beam of the sun, as well as to your majesty. We therefore most humbly beseech you, sire, to give faith and credit to him, and to all that he shall say on our part, touching us and our affairs; being much assured, sire, of an assistance equal to your wonted clemency heretofore, and so often showed to this nation, which will not yield the glory to any other whatsoever, to be eternally, sire, your majesty's most humble, most obedient, and most affectionate servants."

This letter, which is said to have been written by Montrose, and transcribed by Loudoun,* was signed by both these noblemen, together with Rothes, Mar, Montgomery, Forrester, and General Leslie; but owing to an inaccuracy in the language, the word rayy, a cray-fish, having inadvertently been employed instead of rayon, a sunbeam, the transmission of the document was delayed, and, on farther consideration, the design was afterwards abandoned. By some accident it fell into the hands of Sir Donald Gorum, by whom it was given to the Earl of Traquair, who communicated the matter to the king. The address, "Au Roi," with which it had been surreptitiously subscribed, being the style appropriated by subjects to their native sovereign, was construed into an evidence of treason, and Loudoun was marked out as the first victim of royal vengeance. When that nobleman was examined before the council, he candidly admitted that the hand-writing and subscription were his, but said the letter was written before the pacification, when his majesty was on the point of invading his native country; and that in these circumstances the King of France, being the most nearly related by affinity to his majesty of all the princes of Europe, was naturally looked to as the fittest person to intercede with his majesty in their behalf, and to mitigate his resentment. The idea, however, he added, had not been suggested until his majesty had almost reached the Scottish Border, and was therefore considered too late, and consequently the letter had never been forwarded, or even addressed; besides, he argued, if he had been guilty of any crime, he had been included in the act of oblivion; or if he must be tried, it must be by his peers, and in the country where the offence was committed. The king, however, was unwilling to allow such an opportunity to pass of crushing a formidable adversary, and Loudoun was in imminent hazard of being brought to the block, not only without the benefit of his peers, but without trial or conviction. About three o'clock the same afternoon

Warrant from the king sent a warrant to Sir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, authorising and commanding him to have Lord Loudoun's head struck off by nine o'clock the following morning. This awful intimation was received by the earl with astonishing composure; but Balfour, unwilling to incur the responsibility of putting a nobleman to death without trial, carried the warrant to the Marquis of Hamilton, whom he considered bound in honour to interfere.

It was now midnight, and the marquis and lieutenant with difficulty obtained access to the king, who had retired to rest. The warrant was scarcely named when his majesty, in a violent passion, exclaimed, "By God, it shall be executed!" Hamilton, however, represented to him the odium he should incur by thus violating the safe-conduct he had granted to Loudoun, as well as all legal forms, by putting a nobleman to death without conviction or even trial. He assured him that, if he persevered in his resolution, not only would Scotland be lost for ever, but his own person would be in danger from the resentment of the populace;* and at last his majesty, calling for the warrant, tore it in pieces, and sullenly dismissed Hamilton and the lieutenant from his presence.

It was not until nearly three months afterwards that Loudoun was liberated from his confinement, and permitted to return home, on promise that he would conceal from his brethren in Scotland the hard treatment to which he had been subjected.

and contribute his endeavours to dispose them to peace.

Charles, however, was in the meantime cherishing sentiments and maturing designs far from pacific. As early as the month of November in the preceding year, when Traquair had made his report to the council of England, a renewal of hostilities had been determined on, irrespective of anything which might be urged by the Scots in

Preparations their own defence, and preparations for war. tions for the campaign had during all that time been silently advancing. The Earl of Northumberland, lord-admiral, was ordered to have a fleet ready by the 10th of April, and at the same time was appointed general of the army about to be raised. Strafford was appointed lieutenant-general, and Lord Conway was constituted his deputy. The lords-lieutenants of counties were ordered to raise a certain number of able-bodied men to be instructed, in companies of one hundred each, in military exercises until the 10th of May, when they were to proceed under their respective officers to Newcastle. A similar order was issued for raising seamen, a third for the pressing of horses and carriages for the artillery and ammunition to be at Newcastle by the middle of June, and a fourth for laying in at Berwick a large quantity of forage by the end of the same month.

These preparations were made in the face of Difficulties of very formidable difficulties. The Charles. covenanters were zealous and unanimous, and were still in such a complete state of organisation that they were ready at a moment's warning to rally in defence of the country. On the other hand, the people of England were universally discontented. The wide diffusion of the Scottish supplications had fully informed them of the real object of the contest; they considered their own grievances as in many respects similar to those of the people of Scotland; and the communications which took place between the two armies while encamped within sight of each other, had led to an increase of that mutual sympathy which a sense of common wrongs and sufferings had already excited. Above all, his last inglorious campaign had exhausted his treasury—and how could he expect the sinews of war to be furnished by a discontented people, with whom the war was unpopular? Such, indeed, was the dissatisfied state of the public mind, that for eleven years Charles had not ventured to assemble a parliament, and he was now more reluctant than ever to have recourse to that detested method of raising supplies—well knowing that, if granted at all, they would be preceded or accompanied by an importunate demand for redress of grievances. In these circumstances he once more resorted to his old method of raising money by illegal exactions, voluntary contributions, and other means equally criminal and undignified. The order for levying ship-money was renewed and executed with more than its former severity. At the instigation of Strafford, the Irish parliament voted five subsidies, amounting in all to two hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling. Strafford himself contributed twenty thousand pounds, and the Dukes of Lennox and Richmond an equal, if not a greater sum. Many others of the nobility, and not a few of the gentry, subscribed largely; and, at the desire of the queen, the papists contributed so liberally that the royal forces were subsequently styled in derision the popish army.* With the means thus furnished an army was raised, though not without difficulty; but it was plainly perceived that such resources would be quite inadequate to its continued maintenance. The council accordingly advised his majesty to summon a parliament; and never had an English parliament met under circumstances more unfavourable to the designs of the sovereign. But Charles had not the sagacity to perceive the full extent of the difficulties with which he had to contend. He was credulous enough to believe that the demands of the Scots would appear as exorbitant to the parliament as they did to himself, and that they would be ready to resent as a national indignity what appeared to no one but himself to be an attack on his royal authority. He hoped, too, that the exhibition of the letter intended for the King of France would excite a strong feeling against the Scottish leaders, upon whom he had no doubt of being able to fix a charge of treason, and of premeditated hostility against England, by attempting to introduce her ancient enemy in warlike guise into the island.

Parliament met, according to the king's appointment, on the 13th of April. Meeting of the The opening had been purposely English parliament. delayed until, as Charles supposed, the pressing urgency of his affairs was such as to leave no time for deliberation on public grievances, and to demand an immediate grant of money to meet the exigencies of the State. The session was opened by the Lord-keeper Finch in a florid speech, in which he exaggerated to the utmost all the complaints against the Scots; and, in order to stimulate their generosity, set before them the example of the Irish parliament, who had granted such liberal subsidies to his majesty. The king then produced the letter to the French king, which was read by Finch, and commented on in a manner intended to rouse the indignation of the house against the Scots. All was to no purpose; the letter was entirely disregarded. In vain did Charles insist that they should, in the first instance, grant him the necessary supplies; while he assured them, on the word of a king, that he would give them an early opportunity of inquiring into the abuses of the State, and applying such remedies as they might judge to be expedient. They considered the public grievances as claiming their first regard, and determined that the consideration of these should take precedence of the granting of subsidies, and all other business whatsoever. Agreeably to this resolution they proceeded to deliberate on the complaints of the people, which now began to pour in from all quarters; and the king at last, irritated by their refusal of his demands, and apprehensive of the gathering storm,

Its dissolution. hastily dismissed them, before they had sat much longer than a month. The abrupt termination of a parliament to which the people were fondly looking for a vindication of their just rights, and some alleviation of their sufferings, greatly increased the prevailing discontent, which was still farther augmented by the arbitrary and unconstitutional acts that immediately followed.

Arbitrary and unconstitutional proceedings of the king.

The very next day Henry Bellasis, Esq., knight of the shire for the county of York, and Sir John Hotham, were subjected to an examination before the privy council regarding their conduct in parliament; and declining to compromise the independence of parliament by answering the questions proposed to them, were both committed to the Fleet. At the same time John Crewe, Esq., afterwards Lord Crewe, who had been chairman of the committee for religious affairs, having refused to give up the names of such parties as had petitioned against innovations in religion, the high commission court, and other grievances, was committed to the Tower; and the Earl of Warwick and Lord Brooks, having been suspected of holding communication with the Scots, were subjected to the gross indignity of having their cabinets broken open, and even their pockets searched, in quest of a private correspondence, no traces of which could be discovered.*

While the nation were deeply disappointed by the sudden dissolution of the parliament, from whose proceedings they had expected to reap so many advantages, they were exasperated to find

Sitting of the that, contrary to all precedent, the convocation. convocation were allowed to continue their sittings for a month longer. During this period they passed various enactments, which occasioned many grievous complaints. They made not fewer than seventeen new canons, by one of which all clergymen and graduates in the universities were enjoined to take an oath approving the doctrine and discipline established in the Church of England, and binding themselves never to give their consent to any alteration in the government of this Church by archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. This canon, which was no doubt designed as a preventive against the spread of presbyterian principles, excited much ridicule among the Scots from the loose manner in which it was expressed. Swearing a man to an et cetera was certainly something extraordinary, inasmuch as it bound him to conditions of which he was necessarily ignorant, and which might at any time be altered at the will of those by whom the oath was exacted. What parliament would not grant, however, was granted by the servile convocation. They voted a supply to his majesty for assisting in the prosecution of the war, of twenty thousand pounds sterling annually for six years.

* Stevenson, vol. iii. pp. 852, 853.

Charles now made the most desperate efforts to recruit his finances independently of his refractory parliament; and the expedients to which he had recourse were at once illegal, dishonourable, and oppressive in the highest degree. He ordered the counties to advance coat and conduct-money for their respective troops; he purchased on credit from the East India merchants all their pepper, and re-sold it under its value for ready-money; he extorted a bonus of forty thousand pounds from the merchants who had bullion deposited for safety in the Tower, under the iniquitous threat of seizing on the whole in case of refusal; and levied a contribution to a large amount on the city of London, under pain of forfeiting its privileges as a corporation.*

Illegal and oppressive exactions of the king.

By these and other means equally discreditable, Charles at length succeeded in raising and equipping an army of nineteen thousand foot, and two thousand horse, with which he was ready to take the field by the month of July. By means of their friends in London, the Scots were from the first fully aware of these preparations. Even as early as Dunfermline and Loudoun's first mission as a deputation to the king, the resolution of Charles and his council to recommence hostilities was no secret to the Scottish leaders. Many circumstances tended to corroborate the warlike intelligence they from time to time received. The Castle of Edinburgh was repaired, and its garrison reinforced; all Scottish ships in England and Ireland were arrested; and many coming from distant ports were intercepted by English cruisers, and their owners and passengers were robbed of their property, laid in irons, and treated with shocking barbarity; and the Irish parliament, under the influence of Strafford, had publicly denounced the Scots as rebels. All these foretokens of hostility were anxiously watched by the Scottish leaders, who, at an early period, began to concert measures Preparations for the national defence. Even at in Scotland.

the time of the pacification, when they were disbanding their army, and delivering up the strongholds of the country, their oft-repeated experience of the royal treachery had completely shaken their confidence in the king's sincerity, and they accordingly still retained their veteran officers in pay—not only with a view to future service if necessary, but as an act of justice to men who had voluntarily relinquished their posts and emoluments abroad, and hastened home to the assistance of their countrymen. The zeal formerly manifested by all ranks of the people continued unabated; their organisation had never ceased to be maintained; and the brave and patriotic men who had so recently taken arms in defence of civil and religious liberty, were ready once more, at the call of their leaders, to range themselves under the banner of the covenant. Meanwhile, preparations were silently in progress: persons possessed of wealth contributed their money and their plate, and in many instances their personal guarantees to the public service; women cheerfully brought their gold and silver ornaments and most costly jewels to the public treasury, and provided cloth for the tents of the soldiers; the collections at the church-doors were greatly increased, not merely by the large donations of the rich, but by the gifts, though small individually, which poured in incessantly from the lower and middle ranks of the community; and the merchants busied themselves in the importation of arms and ammunition. All these measures, however, were merely precautionary, and the leaders resolved to abstain from all hostile demonstrations until these should be resolved on and authorised by parliament, which was expected to meet as soon as the prorogation had expired. In the meantime remonstrances and informations were printed, and extensively circulated throughout England, with a view of counteracting the insidious misrepresentations of the government, and securing the sympathy, if not the co-operation, of the English people in the impending crisis.

Parliament met on the 2nd of June, the day to which it had been prorogued from the last meeting in November. Traquair had received a commission under the great seal to represent his majesty, but having rendered himself extremely odious to the people of Scotland by his report to the English council, and the encouragement he had given the king to recommence the war, he durst not venture to make his appearance amongst them. In consequence of this, commissions under the quarter seal were issued to the Lords Elphinstone and Napier, the lord justice-clerk, and the king's advocate, who, or any three of them, were empowered to act as commissioners to prorogue the parliament in Traquair's absence and upon his order.* By some oversight, Traquair had omitted to forward this authority to his substitutes, and consequently, when the warrant to prorogue was read before parliament, Elphinstone and Napier, doubtful of the legality of proceeding, refused to act without Traquair's authority; and the other two, unable to proceed without their concurrence, or that of one of them, could only enter their protest. By this omission of Traquair's, the policy of Charles was defeated. The parliament having been at first convoked by the king's authority, and afterwards by the same authority adjourned to that day, voted themselves a lawful parliament, and having made choice of Lord Burleigh as their president, proceeded to business. The acts which had been prepared in the preceding year by the lords of the articles were now submitted to the consideration of the house, and, with slight variations, were all passed. The principal of these were—An act settling the constitution of parliament, which was henceforth declared to consist of nobles, barons, and burgesses, and rescinding all former acts in favour of bishops and other ecclesiastics, particularly those of 1597

and 1606;—an act declaring that all subsequent parliaments should be at liberty either to choose committees for articles or not, as they should think fit, and that when it should be judged expedient to appoint such committees, each estate should choose out of its own number only so many as should be allowed by the parliament;—an act ratifying, approving, and perpetually confirming the act of the General Assembly of the 17th of August, 1639, entitled, “Anent the six causes of our bygone evils;”—an act ratifying and approving the supplication of the General Assembly to the privy council, praying them to enjoin the renovation of the national covenant;—the answer of the council to that supplication;—the act of the General Assembly ordaining the subscription of the confession of faith and covenant, and the said confession of faith and covenant itself, as first sworn in the year 1580, together with the bond adapting it to their circumstances in the year 1638, and the assembly's explication of the whole as excluding the articles of Perth and the other innovations intended upon the Church;—an act declaring that the sole and only power of jurisdiction within the Church stands in the Church of God as it is now reformed, and in the general, provincial, and presbyterial assemblies and kirk sessions—and rescinding all acts conferring on archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, and other ecclesiastics, civil places, and the power of representing the Church in parliament;—an act approving the supplication of the assembly in 1639 against a book called “A Large Declaration,” with the assembly's act relative thereto, and ordaining the authors and spreaders thereof to be most severely punished, as leasing-makers and raisers of division and discord betwixt the king and his subjects;—an act appointing a full and free parliament to be held at least once in three years, or oftener, as his majesty shall be pleased to call them;—an act ordaining that the Castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dunbarton, be kept only by natives, true and faithful subjects to his majesty, and well-affected countrymen;—an act discharging any to vote by proxies in parliament, and ordaining that none be raised to the rank of nobility in Scotland unless they have at least ten thousand merks of yearly rent within the kingdom;—an act appointing that instead of giving in grievances to the clerk-register, as was the former practice, through which many of them were suppressed, the same be given in and presented openly in parliament;—an act declaring the privy council subordinate to the king and parliament, accountable to them, and in case of giving wrong counsel to be punished as leasing-makers;—an act annulling all unjust and unlawful proclamations issued since the commencement of the late troubles;—an act declaring that the former laws prohibiting bonds and covenants amongst the subjects do not extend to nor include any bonds, leagues, councils, conventions, assemblies, committees or meetings, made, holden, and kept by the subjects, for maintenance and preservation of the king's majesty, the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom;—an act concerning the common relief—in other words, to meet the expenses of the war—approving an offer made of the tenth part of all rents, in burgh and land, and further appointing a twentieth part of all annual rents to be applied in like manner (the act contains directions for ascertaining the due extent of the rents and annual rents, and for the collecting of the tenths, and ordains that bonds shall be given by the shires for the same until paid; and because money would be required before these supplies could be raised, the committee were authorised to borrow of any who had money, and to give their own security for it in the meantime; and if any refused to lend, they were, upon proof of their having money, to be constrained to lend it upon such security);—an act ordaining the whole subjects and lieges of this kingdom to obey, maintain, and defend the conclusions, acts, and constitutions of this present session of parliament, and to subscribe a bond to that effect;—and, finally, an act declaring the parliament current, and continuing the same until the 19th day of November next, and ordaining all the acts passed during the session now terminated to be printed and published.

Thus were the constitution and independence of the parliament secured, provision made for its frequent convocation, its power declared paramount over the privy council and incapable of being superseded by arbitrary proclamations, and its enactments supported by a national bond declared to have the force of laws with or without the royal assent; while in the present exigencies of the country, when the royal authority had been employed to trample on the privileges of parliament, and the laws and liberties of the nation, it was deemed necessary to transfer the whole executive power to the committee of Estates.*

Besides the important public acts just enumerated, decree of forfeiture was pronounced against General Ruthven, for refusing to surrender the Castle of Edinburgh after being duly summoned to do so, and for killing certain of the citizens and destroying their houses by the discharge of musketry and ordnance from the batteries. The conduct of Sir Alexander Leslie, as general of the Scottish forces, during the preceding campaign was formally approved of, and his commission as commander-in-chief of the army for this year was confirmed.

Parliament rose on the 12th of June, and on the 17th the general committee transmitted a copy of the acts that had just been passed to Lord Lanark, the secretary, to be presented to his majesty, together with an humble supplication praying for the royal approval. A letter was at the same time addressed to his lordship, containing a vindication of the proceedings of parliament, as the conclusions of a free national assembly convoked and continued by his majesty's authority. They desire him to represent to his majesty that they continue steadfast in their loyalty to his person and government, and are seeking nothing but to be allowed the peaceable enjoyment of their religion and liberties. They conclude, however, with a remark which ought to have convinced Charles and his reckless advisers that they were dealing with a people not to be overawed either by the assertion of prerogative or the fear of hostilities, but who, knowing their just rights, had resolved to defend them to the last extremity. They could no longer endure, they said, the violence offered to them in their persons and goods by castles within and ships without the kingdom, and they concluded by praying for a speedy redress, adding, significantly, otherwise they must provide for their own deliverance and safety. These representations Charles affected to consider as striking at the very root of his royal authority; he did not deign to return an answer, but wrathfully denounced them as treasonable. At the same time, the Irish parliament declared the Scots to be rebels, and authorised every attempt to reduce them to subjection by force of arms.

As the trade of the country was everywhere obstructed by English cruisers, the Commencement war was justly considered as al- of hostilities.

ready commenced; and the general committee accordingly issued orders to the freeholders of the counties and the magistrates of burghs to embody every fourth man capable of bearing arms, and immediately to take the measures appointed by parliament for raising the necessary supplies. Lord Almond, brother to the Earl of Linlithgow, was appointed lieutenant-general under Leslie, who had now assumed the chief command; W. Baillie was nominated major-general; Colonel A. Hamilton, general of artillery; Colonel John Leslie, quartermaster-general; and A. Gibson, younger, of Durie, commissary-general. The nobles, as in the former campaign, held the rank of colonel; but being still deficient in military experience, they were assisted as before by veteran officers, who ranked as lieutenant-colonels. The Earls of Argyll and Eglinton were dispatched to the west coast, to be in readiness to repel the threatened invasion from Ireland. Argyll was subse- Argyll sent the Murrays, Ogilvies, and other disaffected clans and chieftains in the north, while the inhabitants of Cantire and Mull were left to defend their own shores; and Eglinton, assisted by the people on the coasts of Ayr and Galloway, guarded the country in these districts. Argyll, with a force of about five thousand men and a small train of artillery, now penetrated into the wild and unfrequented districts of Badenoch, Mar, and Atholl, levied the taxation decreed by parliament, and reduced the refractory inhabitants to submission. Some opposition, however, being manifested by the Earl of Atholl at the ford of Lyon, he was apprehended by order of Argyll, together with Sir Thomas

Stewart, younger, of Grandtully, Mr. John Stewart, the earl's factor, and twelve others of the leading men of Atholl. The earl was sent prisoner to the Castle of Stirling, and the rest to Edinburgh, to be detained until they should find security for their good behaviour, and pay a fine of ten thousand pounds Scots for support of the army raised on their account. Marching eastward into Angus, Argyll demolished the house of the Earl of Airlie, who had fled on hearing of his approach. Here Argyll permitted his men to live at free quarters on such of the tenantry as had joined their lord in opposition to the national cause; and having secured the submission and tranquillity of the district, he returned to Argyleshire in time to relieve the soldiers in that quarter, who had been ordered to march eastward and join the main army.

The conduct of Argyll in this expedition, though maligned by Bishop Guthrie* and subsequent party writers, is susceptible of an easy and complete vindication. That he suffered his men to ravage the surrounding country, and return home laden with plunder, is contradicted by Sir James Balfour,† who represents the soldiers as under the strictest discipline, in proof of which he informs us that four of them were hanged for stealing. That he subsisted his army for a short time on the tenantry of Atholl was not only in accordance with the rules and practice of war, but was in itself perfectly legal, as they had resisted the authority of parliament, which, during the suspension of the regal functions, was the only competent authority that remained in the country. The conduct of severities of Monro.

Monro does not admit of the same justification. Having been sent to Aberdeen with one thousand foot soldiers to suppress the Marquis of Huntley, the Earl of Aboyne, and others, who were raising forces in support of the royal cause, he treated the king's adherents with all that relentless severity to which he had become habituated in the wars of Germany, under the stern dictation of the Swedish monarch. One of his first acts on his arrival at Aberdeen was to impose the covenant on all whom he suspected of disaffection; and for disobedience to this arbitrary requirement twenty-six burgesses of that city, together with Sir Alexander Irvine of Drum, his brother, and about twelve other country gentlemen, were arrested and sent prisoners to Edinburgh. For this proceeding, although he had the example of Montrose, he certainly "had no authority either from Church or State."‡ Having received some accessions to his army, he next marched against Strathbogie, where he encamped, and made no scruple of cutting down the trees in the neighbourhood to form huts for the soldiers. He next took possession of the Bog, now Castle Gordon, where the men were permitted to riot at will on the best cheer the place afforded, and to supply themselves with beef, mutton, and poultry from the stocks of the neighbouring tenantry.

Here he left the main body of his army, while he proceeded with a force of three hundred men and some fieldpieces to Spynie, the residence of Guthrie, Bishop of Moray, where he seized and appropriated a quantity of military stores. Leaving a garrison of twenty-four men at Spynie, he returned to Strathbogie, and taking possession of the residence of the Marquis of Huntley, he placed a garrison there, set fire to his camp, and marched with the remainder of his army to Banff, where he destroyed the magnificent mansion and fine garden of Sir George Ogilvie. In allusion to the latter, Sir George, who was then at court, on hearing of the disaster remarked, "As for the house, it mattered not much—money could build it up again in a short time; but it was cruel to destroy his garden, which years could not repair." These severities, while they contributed to the advancement of the national cause by crushing the power and intimidating the adherents of the adverse party, were regarded with disapprobation by the popular leaders and the great body of the covenanters, and would no doubt have subjected their author to merited punishment, had the troubled state of the country not prevented any rigid inquiry into the misconduct of those intrusted with the command of the national forces.

On the 28th of July, the General Assembly, according to appointment, met at Aberdeen, and, after waiting for Meeting of the General Assembly. one day in expectation of a commissioner from the king, proceeded to business in virtue of the authority vested in them as the representatives of the Church.* The cordiality and unanimity of this assembly were unhappily disturbed by a keen discussion respecting private meetings. While the articles of Perth and other prelatical innovations continued to be forced on the people of Scotland, it became customary for many religious people, particularly in Edinburgh, and in the south and west parts of the kingdom, to absent themselves from the places of worship where these had been introduced, and to meet together in private for the reading of the Scriptures, prayer, and other religious exercises. This practice had become still more general in the north of Ireland; for the presbyterian ministers having been expelled from their charges by the bishops, many pious persons found these social meetings a means of mutual support and edification. Some of them, however, from having become attached to a practice so similar to that of the independents, began to imbibे similar principles, in which they were still farther confirmed by some Brownists, as they were called, from England, who at that time paid them a visit, carrying with them many of the peculiarities by which their sect was distinguished—such as refusing to worship with the congregation, meeting during the night, discussing curious questions, and censuring others as less holy than themselves. When at last the persecution waxed hot in Ireland, great numbers of them sought refuge in Scotland, where, notwithstanding their peculiarities, they were regarded as men of exemplary piety, and were affectionately welcomed. At this time, the Laird of Leekie, who had previously suffered much from prelatical persecution, and was esteemed an intelligent, good man, attracted around him at Stirling, where he had fixed his residence, a number of the lower orders, whom he encouraged to associate for religious exercises; and many of them who were unable to read, were in the habit of assembling in his house at family worship, often to the neglect of that exercise in their own homes. Some who were afterwards supposed to have attended as spies, carried to the minister, Mr. Henry Guthrie, subsequently better known as Bishop of Dunkeld, some expressions which were said to have been employed by Leekie in prayer, and were represented as casting reflections upon him. Guthrie, without delay, cited Leekie before the presbytery, by whom he, and those who attended the meetings at his house, were condemned as encroaching on the office, and bringing into contempt the ministers of the Church; and on this sentence the magistrates, urged on by Guthrie, expelled them from the town.* Not satisfied with this flagrant act of persecution, Guthrie, with a view to root out a party whom he stigmatised as heretics, collected every report he could hear to their prejudice, and brought the matter under the notice of the assembly of 1639, for the purpose of getting these private meetings prohibited. His attempt was frustrated, however, chiefly through the instrumentality of Mr. Samuel Rutherford and Mr. Dickson, who, afraid lest the reputations of innocent persons, and even religion itself, should suffer for the peculiarities or imprudence of a few individuals, succeeded for the time in quashing the proceedings. Guthrie was still bent on his purpose, and studiously laboured to fan the flame; but some of the more cautious and moderate of his brethren procured a conference, to be held in Edinburgh, between the leaders on both sides. These were Mr. Alexander Henderson and Eleazer Borthwick, who were opposed to these private meetings, and Mr. David Dickson and Mr. Robert Blair, who were favourable to them. Their deliberations terminated in the drawing up of certain caveats to prevent abuses. The people were admonished to beware of doing anything to induce others to abstain from public worship, as well as to avoid abstaining themselves; it was recommended that the numbers assembled should be few, and that unseasonable hours should be avoided, particularly the time of public or family worship, or the night season; that their meetings should not interfere with their relative duties or necessary secular employments; that they should only be occasional, and should not be a cause of division in esteem or affection between those by whom they were attended, and the other members of their respective congregations; that if they have any doubts regarding the established order, they should communicate these to the ministry and the assemblies of the Church; that the exercises be confined to prayer and conference, and the proper distinction be observed between what belongs to private Christians, and what belongs to the function of the ministry; and, finally, that all things be done with prudence, humility, and charity, that the Church may be built up in one body, and not divided or destroyed.*

This paper was extensively circulated throughout the country, and as it appeared to give general satisfaction, it was hoped that the matter was now finally disposed of. Guthrie, however, was not so easily satisfied. He would be contented with nothing short of an entire suppression of private religious meetings; and having gained over to his views a number of the ministers and elders in the north, he brought the subject by overture before the assembly now met at Aberdeen. A protracted and stormy discussion ensued, in the course of which Guthrie and others of his party attacked Leekie and the private meetings with great virulence, and insisted that such convocations should be entirely prohibited. Unfortunately, they were supported in this attempt by several influential men, who appear to have conscientiously believed that the encouragement of such meetings might open a door for the introduction of many errors and extravagances, and ultimately lead to a schism in the Church. Among these was Mr. David Calderwood, who, while in Holland, had witnessed among the independents, who abounded in that country, many things of which he could not approve, and he consequently entertained a great dread of the rise of that sect at home. The meetings, however, were ably defended by Mr. David Dickson, Mr. Robert Baillie, and others. The discussion waxed hotter every instant, and the moderator, Mr. Andrew Ramsay, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, no longer able to control the meeting, "the clamour and noise," it is said, "were shameful."† At this climax, Mr. Samuel Rutherford, who had hitherto remained silent, and indeed was seldom disposed to say much in the church courts, threw in a syllogism, and required them all to answer it:—"What Scripture does warrant," said he, "an assembly may not discharge; but privy meetings for exercises of religion, the Scripture does warrant: Malachi iii. 16, 17—"Then they that feared the Lord, spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard it," &c.; James v. 16—"Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another." These things cannot be done in public meetings, ergo, &c." No satisfactory, much less formal answer was given to this argument, though Mr. Rutherford was subjected to many bitter taunts and reproaches, and Lord Scaforth jeeringly remarked he "would not have Mr. Samuel trouble them with any of his logic syllogisms."‡

Protracted and warm discussion.

‡ Baillie, vol. i. p. 20.

The noisy discussion at length terminated in the passing of an act, in which one party, for the sake of peace, conceded more than was warrantable, while the other still felt dissatisfied. It was drawn up by Mr. Guthrie, and entitled, "Act anent the ordering of family worship." Its principal provisions were, that none should be admitted to family worship but the members of the family in which it is held; that the reading of prayer is lawful when no member of the family is qualified to pray ex tempore; and that none be permitted to explain the Scripture but ministers and expectants approved by the presbytery.

Having appointed their next meeting to be held at St. Andrew's, on the third Tuesday of July, 1641, the assembly dissolved after a sitting of ten days. At the same time, the moderator was instructed, either through the privy council or in some other convenient way, to request his majesty to send his commissioner to the next assembly; and it was arranged that, if any extraordinary emergency should in the meantime arise, the presbytery of Edinburgh should be authorised to convoke a pro re nata meeting. During the sitting Tumults of the assembly, a tumultuous in Aberdeen. rabble congregated in the town, and manifested their zeal against popery by pulling down or defacing many of the remnants of idolatry which had survived the Reformation.* More has been made of these violent proceedings than perhaps their importance deserved; but whatever may be said of them, they are certainly not chargeable on the great body of the covenanters, by whom they were neither authorised nor approved.

About the end of July, the advance of the Assembling English army towards the Border of the gave warning for the Scots to Scottish forces. assemble. The general committee at Edinburgh immediately issued orders to the various sub-committees throughout the country to dispatch the regiments from each county with all expedition to the general rendezvous, with provisions for thirty or forty days. Each regiment was, as formerly, attended by a chaplain, generally one of the most eminent clergymen of the district in which it was raised. As a proof of this, it may be sufficient to mention that among others there were Mr. Alexander Henderson, Mr. Robert Baillie, and Mr. George Gillespie.† In the begin-

Their arrival at ning of August they arrived at Dunse. Dunse, where they took up their former station on the hill. Their numbers amounted to twenty-two thousand foot, three thousand horse, and a train of heavy artillery. They had besides a number of cannon formed of tinned iron, bound round with leather, and capable of sustaining twelve successive discharges. This species of artillery had been invented, or at least first employed by Gustavus in the German wars, and was so light that it could be carried on horseback.‡

For nearly three weeks the army lay upon the Borders, receiving from their officers daily instructions in the art of war; and from their revered chaplains those still higher instructions, seasonable at all times to all, but especially to men who had taken up arms to conquer or die in defence of their country, their civil liberties, and their religious privileges. Nor were the exercises of prayer and praise neglected. "It was refreshing," says one of their chaplains, "to remark that, after we came to our quarters at night, there was nothing to be heard through the whole army but singing of psalms, prayer, and reading of Scripture, by the soldiers in their several tents."*

Their resources, however, were too limited to admit of their remaining much longer inactive, and it began to be seriously deliberated whether under such circumstances they should wait until the country was actually invaded, or anticipate the movements of the royal army by boldly marching into the English territory. Various circumstances conspired to recommend the latter alternative. A very brief space of time would apparently leave them no choice between this decisive measure on the one hand, and the disbanding of their forces, with all its miserable train of consequences, on the other. But their decision on this important point was precipitated by the receipt of a letter from an English nobleman, Lord Saville, inviting and encouraging them to march immediately into England. bore also the names of Bedford, Essex, Broke, Warwick, Saye and Sele, and Mandeville; and though it was afterwards found to be a forgery, it does not appear that at the time any suspicion of this was entertained by the Scottish leaders. At all events its authenticity appeared to be confirmed by the intercourse which the Scottish commissioners, when in London, had had with these noblemen, as well as with Hampden, Pym, and others of the leading patriots, who represented to them the extreme reluctance of the English people to assist the king in the war, and encouraged them to stand resolutely to the defence of their liberties, hoping that their successful resistance might contribute towards the emancipation of England from royal and prelatial tyranny. Lord Saville also wrote to Lord Loudoun, while in confinement in the Tower, assuring him that the advance of the Scots into England would be cordially welcomed by the friends of liberty in that country, who would unite with them in a remonstrance comprehending the grievances of both nations, with a demand for redress, which it would be impossible to resist. He declared that the people of England looked to the Scottish army as the chief instrument for effecting their own liberation, and he promised them reinforcements of men, supplies of money, and abundance of provisions.† With such assurances of support, and in the critical circumstances in which they were placed, it is not improbable that the Scottish leaders, even without Saville's spurious letter, would have adopted the course to which it invited them.

This bold measure was still further recommended by the following letter, which had been received at head-quarters:—"Such is our affection to your cause, and care of your affair, that nothing hath been omitted which might conduce to the furtherance of your design, nor the discharge of our own promises; but your often failing in point of entrance, after solemn engagements, by word and write, hath deadened the hearts of all your friends, disabled the most active to do you further service, and disappointed yourselves of near ten thousand pounds, which was provided and kept for you till you had twice failed, and that there was little or no hope of your coming. The Lord hath given you favour in the eyes of the people, so as I know not whether there are more incensed against our own soldiers or desirous of yours. If you really intend to come, strike while the iron is hot; if you be uncertain what to resolve, let us know, that we may secure our lives, though we hazard our estates by retiring. There is no body of an army to interrupt you, no ordnance to dismay you, no money to pay our own; the city hath once more refused to lend the trained bands to be pressed, the country storms at the billeting of soldiers, quarrels arise every day about it. If you have a good cause, why do you stand still? If a bad, why have you come so far? Either die or do, so shall you be sons of valour.—P.S. If there be anything of consequence, you shall have speedy intelligence of it."

Thus encouraged, and considering that by adopting this advice they would transfer the seat of war from their own country, where the army could not much longer be maintained, into England, where they had the prospect of abundant supplies, it is not wonderful that the leaders should be induced to embrace the only course of action that seemed open to them, except the abandonment of their great enterprise. The step, however, was not taken without solemn deliberation. On the 3rd of August, the committee attending the general met, and having summoned to their assistance the whole noblemen, barons, ministers, and burgesses, who were with the army, it was, after a long debate, resolved unanimously to carry the war into England. This resolution was immediately transmitted to the committee at Edinburgh, where it was agreed to on the following day, and an act to that effect was formally drawn up and signed by both committees.* The committee at Edinburgh further prepared, printed, and widely dispersed two papers explanatory of their views and motives, and defending the expedition in which they had resolved to embark. One of these was entitled,

The Scottish "Six considerations, manifesting manifestoes. the lawfulness of their expedition into England;" the other, "The intentions of the army of the kingdom of Scotland, declared to their brethren of England." In the former of these, their first plea was necessity, which they affirm "justifies actions otherwise unwarrantable." Either, they said, they must seek their peace in England, or undergo burdens they were unable to bear; they must maintain an army on the Border to protect the country from invasion; they must submit to a continued obstruction to their trade, to the ruin of the commercial interests of the kingdom, and to the suspension of the administration of justice, and the consequent introduction of anarchy and confusion. The expedition they declared was, on their part, purely defensive. His majesty, not they, had violated the articles of pacification; he had refused to ratify the acts of their parliament, denied an audience to their commissioners, and, without listening to the dutiful representations of the Scottish parliament, resolved to renew the war, and entrusted the Earl of Northumberland with the command of the army. The parliaments of England and Ireland were required to grant subsidies for the prosecution of the war; Scottish merchant vessels were seized at sea, their cargoes confiscated, their crews and passengers stripped of their property, and treated with revolting barbarity; and numbers of the citizens of Edinburgh, including women and children, were killed by the garrison in the castle. They protested their readiness to lay down their arms so soon as they should obtain a sure peace, and be satisfied in their just demands; and they vindicated their own conduct by quoting the sentiments of the royalists themselves, who held the wars of the protestants of France against the king and the Guisian faction to be lawful defensive war, because they were ready to disband their forces on assurance being given of peace and religious liberty. In all their remonstrances they affirmed that there was not one word against a defensive war, which they conceived to be as lawful for a nation when invaded or blocked up, as for a private man when his house is blockaded, so that he is unable to procure the necessary supplies for himself and his family. They maintained that they were called on by Divine Providence to engage in this expedition for the glory of God, the good of the Church, the advancement of the Gospel, and their own peace; that they had received manifold encouragements from Providence to go on with it, particularly through the proceedings of the last parliament in England, whose grievances so much resembled their own; that they had earnestly sought by supplications and all other means to avoid this expedition, but were constrained to it by their enemies; they professed their hope that their coming into England, so far from producing a national quarrel, which was what their enemies aimed at, would link the two nations together in a closer bond; and they declared that they considered their national covenant as binding them to this course. They vindicated their expedition by the consideration of the party against whom it was directed, not the people of England, but the Canterbury faction of papists, atheists, Arminians, prelates—the misleaders of his majesty, and the common enemies of both kingdoms; and they hoped their brethren in England, so far from making themselves parties against them, would furnish them with victuals and such other necessities as they might require—not indeed for nought, but on payment, or on security, if money should fail. The object of their advance into the sister kingdom, they declared to be, not to do any act of disloyalty against his majesty, or to enrich themselves with the wealth of England, but to do that kingdom all the good in their power. The blessed effects which they expected to flow from this expedition, they sum up in these concluding words:—“Scotland reformed as at the beginning; the reformation of England so long prayed for, brought to pass; papists, prelates, and all other members of the antichristian hierarchy packed away; the names of sectaries and separatists no more mentioned, and the Lord One, and his name One throughout the whole island.”*

The other paper, which embodied many of the sentiments and declarations contained in that of which we have just given an epitome, was intended as a species of manifesto from the Scots to their brethren of England. They begin by observing that in all ages the best and greatest works have been censured and condemned by the ignorant and malicious, and express their conviction that no calumny which perverted ingenuity could devise would be wanting, in order to bring into discredit the good work in which they were engaged, and to render them odious. To some of these groundless charges they reply by anticipation. One of the most obvious of these was, that, by their entering England they intended an invasion, and to enrich themselves with the possessions and goods of their dear brethren. In answer to this accusation, which was naturally to be expected, they refer to their hitherto peaceable demeanour, their declarations and remonstrances, their willingness to lay down their arms on some small hopes of enjoying their religion and liberties, and their forbearing to make reprisals on the ships and goods of the English for the seizure of their own vessels, with their cargoes, and the injuries inflicted on their crews and passengers. They express, in strong terms, their gratitude to the English parliament, as well as to the City of London, for having refused to grant subsidies for carrying on the war against them, and they solemnly protest that they should look for vengeance from God if they should move hand or foot against the English nation. They take God to witness that they intend no enmity or rapine, and that they shall not proceed to the shedding of blood by fighting, unless forced to do so by papists and prelates, by whom alone they expect to be opposed; and they warn their brethren, that by taking part with the common enemy they might with their own swords extirpate their own religion, lay a foundation for the building of Rome in the midst of them, and be made the authors of their own perpetual slavery. They proceed to an enumeration of the wrongs they had sustained, and refer to the peaceable manner in which they had until now sought redress. To send new commissioners and petitions they declare to be against sense and experience, while to sit still in security and wait for their own destruction, at the mercy of their enemies, would be against religion and nature. They admit that although they had many encouragements to persevere in their expedition, they could not justify their entering into England if they could have found peace at home, but being no longer able to endure threatenings and invasions year after year, they saw no alternative but to seek peace where they could find it; and that being once secured to them, they would by laying down their arms make it manifest to all the world that they had taken them up not for invasion but defence. They protest that what they were about to do was under the compulsion of necessity, for which, they add, “no positive law need be pleaded, it being written in every man’s heart by nature; and no greater necessity can there be than the preservation of religion, their country, their lives, all which are in hazard. The question is not,” they continue, “whether they shall content themselves at home with their own poverty, or enrich themselves in England? nor whether they shall defend themselves at home or invade their dearest brethren? but whether they shall keep themselves at home till their throats be cut, and their religion, laws, and country destroyed, or seek their safety, peace, and liberty in England? and whether they, a whole kingdom, shall lie under so many accusations, receive the service-book and the whole body of popery, embrace the prelates and their abjured hierarchy, renounce their solemn oath and covenant, forget their former slavery, fill the hearts of their enemies with joy and of their friends with sorrow, dishonour the Son of God, whose cause they had undertaken, draw on themselves the judgments due to apostates, and wait for their own slavery in souls, bodies, and estates, by basely standing to their defence, which they know is impracticable?” In conclusion, they exhort all who loved their religion and liberty to unite with them against the common enemies, who intended nothing less than the ruin of both kingdoms. They “attested the God of heaven,” that their intentions were such as they had declared, and that, for obtaining those ends, they would not “spare their pains, fortunes, or lives.” They solemnly declared that they would not without price or security, if money should fail, take from their brethren “from a thread even to a shoe-latchet;” that they should demand nothing of his majesty, but the securing of their religion and liberties; that their abode in England should be no longer than was necessary in their parliament for effecting this end, redressing their just grievances, and giving assurance of the trial and punishment of the authors of their evils; that their return should be peaceable, and that they hoped the effect should be "the extirpation of popery, reformation of the Church, flourishing of the Gospel, and a durable union between the two kingdoms."*

When intelligence of the diffusion of the papers The Scots declared rebels. declared false and treasonable, the Scots were pronounced rebels; and, on the 20th of August, the king set out to place himself at the head of his army, a considerable portion of which had already reached Newcastle, while the remainder were on their march between that town and York.†

As the resources of the Scottish army were beginning to fail, Rothes and Loudoun, accompanied by Mr. Alexander Henderson and Mr. Archibald Johnston, were dispatched to Edinburgh to use their influence with the citizens, in order to procure an advance of money; and as it would probably give offence to the people of England if their plantations were to be cut down to form huts for the soldiers, the deputation were desired to endeavour to procure as much coarse cloth as would be necessary to form tents during their encampments. They did not reach Edinburgh until a late hour on Saturday evening, but their errand was proclaimed next day from the pulpit, accompanied with many fervid exhortations; and so strongly were the people impressed with the importance of the crisis, and so eager were they to manifest their zeal in the national cause, that on Monday the women brought supplies of coarse linen and other cloths sufficient for the whole army, and the men, with equal alacrity, advanced on security one hundred and twenty thousand pounds Scots, with a promise, which was faithfully fulfilled, of sending as much more without delay.

Being now fully prepared for their great enterprise, the Scottish army, in high spirits, broke up their encampment at Dunse, and on the 21st of August crossed the Tweed at Coldstream. It had been previously arranged that the different regiments should take the van and rear by turns, and the lot on this occasion fell on the regiment under Montrose. He dashed fearlessly into the river, which he crossed first on foot and alone, and then returning, marched through at the head of his men. All the other colonels with their respective regiments immediately followed his example—the College of Justice troop, consisting of one hundred and sixty gentlemen, under Sir Thomas Hope, being stationed in the river on the right wing until all had passed over. The passage was effected with the loss of only one man, belonging to the regiment of Montrose. After prayer for guidance and protection from the Lord of Hosts, the army was separated into three divisions, the first being headed by Lord Almond, the lieutenant-general; the second or middle division by Major-general Baillie; while the brave General Leslie brought up the rear. They halted on the 22nd near Woolwich, where they were attacked during the night by the garrison of Berwick, who, falling suddenly upon the outposts, succeeded in capturing three fieldpieces; but, the alarm being given, these were speedily retaken, and the assailants were driven back, with the loss of several prisoners.*

Maintaining a distance of eight or nine miles apart, the divisions proceeded by easy marches through Northumberland, and met by appointment on the 26th at a place called Frewick, on Newcastle Moor,† where they encamped. Thence the committee dispatched two letters, one to the commander-in-chief of the English army at Newcastle, and the other to the mayor and aldermen of that town, enclosing copies of their manifestoes, and declaring that they had no intention of doing injury to any one, though they were ready to defend themselves against all who should attempt to bar their access to their sovereign, before whom they designed to lay their grievances; and, therefore, desired that a free passage should be allowed them by the king's highway, which lay through the town. These letters, which were transmitted by the drum-major of Lord Montgomery's brigade, were returned unopened, and their messenger was desired to inform them that no sealed communications would in future be received.

Thus repulsed, the army next day turned to the right, and marching to Newburn, posted themselves on an eminence behind that village. During the night they kindled large fires at a considerable distance around their camp, and thus deceived the enemy into the belief that their numbers were much greater than they really were.

Meanwhile discontent and insubordination had begun to manifest themselves to an alarming extent in the main body of the English army stationed at York. A party of the soldiers had risen upon their officers, one of whom, a suspected papist, they put to death. Others had broken into a church, and after demolishing the altar, had torn up the rails by which it had been surrounded, and burned them before the minister's door; while the officers durst not interfere either to prevent those outrageous violations of military discipline, or punish those by whom they had been committed. Such was the state of the English when Charles, who had left London on the same day that the Scots entered England, was on his way to place himself at their head. Nor was this the only discouragement which awaited the infatuated monarch. In expectation of his arrival, the gentlemen of the county had assembled at York to present him with a petition praying for relief from the billeting of soldiers, and for an advance of fourteen days' pay to the troops levied within the county, as without this they should not be able to prevail on them to join the army. In addition to these sources of anxiety and distraction, he was met by dispatches from Lord Conway, who, with strong detachments of horse and foot, had advanced to guard the passage of the Tyne, informing him of the approach of the Scottish army, and desiring instructions. Immediately on his arrival at York, the king summoned the gentlemen of that county into his presence, and informed them that the country being now actually invaded, this was no time to dispute about pay, as all persons were bound to serve his majesty at their own proper costs and charges. This unwelcome announcement excited general irritation, if not positive disaffection, which was unnecessarily increased by the harsh and offensive manner in which it was delivered by Strafford, who acted as the king's mouthpiece on this occasion.*

Conway was still at Newburn with a force consisting of four or five thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse. Here he had erected two four-gun batteries, one opposite each ford on the south side of the river, and had placed in them five hundred select musketeers. The rest of his troops were stationed about a mile in the rear at the foot of a small eminence. The Scottish army were encamped on the opposite side of the river on a rising ground, from which they could easily see the exact position of the English trenches. Taking advantage of this circumstance, they planted their heavy cannon immediately opposite, which they were happily enabled to do without being observed, under cover of the houses of Newburn, and the trees and shrubs which grew in the neighbourhood. Cannon were also placed on the steeple of the church, the body of which was occupied by a party of the musketeers, while others were dispersed throughout the streets, lanes, and hedges of the town and its environs.

Such were the relative positions of the two armies on the 28th, when an engagement at Newburn. press reached Conway ordering him to prepare for an engagement. When the messenger arrived he was holding a council of war with his general officers at Stella, about half a mile distant from the army, but scarcely had he time to peruse the despatches, when another messenger arrived informing him that the two armies were already engaged. About noon, a Scottish officer, while watering his horse in the river, happening to fix his eyes inquiringly on the English intrenchments, was observed by a sentinel, who instantly shot him dead. The Scottish musketeers, seeing him fall, immediately commenced firing, and a well-directed volley from the concealed artillery threw the English into consternation and disorder, and made a breach in their works, which were in consequence speedily abandoned. As it happened too at the time to be low water, the general's guard, or College of Justice troop, under the command of Sir Thomas Hope, younger, of Craighall, were ordered to march through the river and take possession of the batteries. This was effected without opposition, and all the men who had the courage to remain in the trenches were made prisoners. The guard being speedily joined by four troops under Colonel David Leslie, and one troop under Sir Patrick M'Ghie, set out in pursuit of the fugitives, who were making their way towards the main body. Arriving at a narrow pass, however, the English rallied, but being vigorously attacked by Sir Thomas Hope, supported by Leslie, were again driven back, and were on the point of being completely routed, when they were joined by twelve troops of English cavalry, and once more faced about on their pursuers. These having incautiously advanced too far were in danger of being overwhelmed by the main body of the English, who were rapidly advancing towards the scene of conflict. In these critical circumstances the Scots thought it prudent to retire, under the protection of their own cannon, until a sufficient number of foot should come up to their support. The English, however, in turn advanced too far, for a battery of cannon, which they had not perceived, having suddenly opened fire upon them, they were thrown into the utmost disorder, and compelled to seek for safety in a precipitate retreat. The whole Scottish army was now in motion, the men, scarcely waiting for orders, rushed impetuously forward; but before the brigades under the command of Lords Loudoun, Lindsay, Queensberry, and Montgomery, who were in the van of the infantry had time to reach their comrades, victory had declared in favour of the Scots. The English foot threw down their arms* and fled in disorder to the shelter of a neighbouring wood; and the horse, attempting to cover their retreat, were attacked by a fresh body of the Scots, and completely defeated. The commanders were taken prisoners, and the men, dispersed in all directions, escaped under cover of night, to carry to the main body the intelligence of their disaster. The loss of life on both sides was inconsiderable, but the rout of the English was complete. Their whole army was panic-struck; their cavalry retired to Durham, and their foot to Newcastle; but not considering themselves safe within these towns, the entire force, early next morning, was in full retreat into Yorkshire,† leaving their dead unburied behind them. The Scots, however, performed with decent solemnity the last rites to their fallen enemies.‡

The 28th of August, on which this victory was gained, was a happy day to the Scots on two other accounts. The scurvy having broken out in Dunbarton Castle, cut off a large portion of the men and the remainder, being through sickness unable to continue the defence, surrendered the place by capitulation. The possession of this fortress, by far the strongest at that time in Britain, was an important acquisition to the national cause; and as it was found to be amply stored with provisions and ammunition, it might but for this providential interposition have continued for an indefinite period to resist all attempts at reduction. The other incident was the defeat by the Earl of Haddington of an attempt made by a party from the garrison of Berwick to surprise the Scottish depot at Dunse. They had succeeded in getting possession of a number of cannon and a quantity of ammunition, which they were carrying off in triumph, when they were attacked and stripped of their spoil; and in the carts and waggons which they had brought to transport it, they carried nothing back but their wounded men and the bodies of their slain.* A melancholy catastrophe

Blowing up of the Castle of Dunglas.

moderated the joy which these events had diffused. This was the explosion of a powder-magazine under the Castle of Dunglas, which, falling upon its hapless inmates, buried in its ruins the Earl of Haddington, two of his brothers, a number of gentlemen, and about eighty other persons of inferior rank. This dreadful calamity was suspected at the time to have been occasioned by a servant of the Earl of Hamilton, Edward Paris, an Englishman, who, it was supposed, had been induced by the desire of revenge for a personal injury to fire the train which led to his own destruction.†

This terrible misfortune was, however, soon after partly compensated by the surrender of the Castle of Edinburgh—an event which it indirectly contributed to bring about. During the sitting of parliament in July, the garrison had commenced firing upon the town, occasioning considerable destruction of property and loss of life. When required in the name of the parliament to desist or surrender, the captain continued obstinately to persist in his hostility, and refused to give up his charge, except on an order from the king. An attempt was then made to besiege the place. Batteries were erected on the Castle Hill, in the Grey Friars' churchyard, and at the West Kirk—but as the cannon of the besiegers were light, little progress was made in the work of destruction. At last, towards the end of July, a mine was sprung, by which part of the wall was blown down, and a breach effected. An assault was then made, but some of the leaders being wounded, and a number of inferior rank slain, the assailants were obliged to retire, and the breach in the wall was speedily repaired by the garrison. The siege was now turned into a blockade, and the covenanters looked to the gradual approach of famine as the only means of inducing the garrison to surrender. The terrific explosion at Dunglas, however, having alarmed the inhabitants of the surrounding districts, the beacons were immediately lighted up, and, in a very brief space, those warning signals were seen blazing from every eminence, both in Fife and the Lothians. The garrison of the castle, who had been for some time in daily expectation of being relieved by the English fleet, mistaking the beacon-fires of the covenanters for an announcement of the arrival of the king's ships, were so overjoyed that they made a great feast, in which they consumed nearly the whole of their remaining stock of provisions in a single day, in the confident expectation that an abundant supply was at hand. The mortifying mistake was soon discovered, and, finding it impossible any longer to hold out, they proposed to capitulate. Honourable conditions were allowed them in consideration of their gallant defence, and this important fortress, commanding the capital, was once more in the hands of the patriots.* During the various military operations preceding the surrender, the English lost about sixty killed and three hundred prisoners, while the total loss of the Scots did not exceed twelve.†

Unfortunately, the Scottish commanders were in no condition to follow up their victory at Newburn. Their provisions were nearly exhausted, and there was little prospect of a speedy supply. The surrounding country was in a great measure deserted by its inhabitants, who carried with them almost everything of value which they had the means of transporting; and the king, in expectation of the advance of the invaders, had given orders that all the cattle and horses should be taken out of their way, and that all the millstones should be concealed or broken. The night after the battle was spent by the Scottish army under arms, in readiness to repel any sudden attack from Newcastle, where they understood eleven thousand of the English were still quartered. On learning, however, that these troops had evacuated the town, the Scots sent Sir Archibald Douglas of Cavers, with a trumpeter, and not more than two gentlemen as witnesses, to assure the mayor and aldermen of their friendly disposition, and to advise the inhabitants to remain at home and prosecute their usual avocations,—as the Scottish army, so far from offering them any violence, would not even enter the town, but would encamp on the neighbouring heights; while guards should be placed in and around the town to prevent any stragglers from committing depredations during the night.

Next day the general, escorted by his life-guard, and accompanied by the lieutenant-general, a considerable number of the committee, with several other nobles, and a troop of horse under Sir William Douglas, entered the town by the bridge. They were received with great respect and cordiality by Sir Peter Riddell, the mayor, and aldermen—by whom they were invited to a sumptuous entertainment, at which they drank the king's health with the customary demonstrations of loyalty and affection. They afterwards went to church, when Mr. Alexander Henderson preached an eloquent discourse adapted to the occasion. Leaving Sir William Douglas and his troop in the town, the general and —their entrance attendants returned to the camp. into Newcastle— Next day, with the concurrence of the authorities, the whole army advanced into the town, where they found five thousand stand of arms, together with a large supply of biscuits, cheese, and other provisions, which the English, in their haste, had left behind. The Earl of Lothian, with a body of two thousand men, having been left to occupy the town, the rest of the army encamped on Gateside Hill, about half a mile to the south, —they take pos- whence, stretching downward, they session of Tyne- took possession of Tynemouth and mouth, Shields— Shields, where some vessels containing stores for the royal army fell into their hands. Here a favourable opportunity occurred for the Scots to manifest their friendly disposition to the people of England, and they did not fail to improve it. The coal mines in that district, which had given constant employment to about ten thousand men, were left deserted—the colliers having been terrified by an absurd rumour industriously propagated, that the Scottish army would put them all to the sword and grant no quarter; and out of four hundred vessels that had been employed in conveying coals to the city of London very few would venture to come in, and the greater number had actually left the port without completing their cargoes.* Two noblemen were deputed to invite the workmen to return to their employment, under an assurance that they would not be molested; and to inform the masters of the coal vessels still in the river that they had nothing to fear in remaining and transacting their business, as the Scottish army had come to assist, not to molest their brethren in England. A letter was also dispatched to the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, abounding in protestations of friendship and affection, and assuring them that the trade in coals for the supply of the capital should suffer no interruption from the army, although they had found it necessary for their own security to occupy the town of Newcastle.

The ease with which they had gained possession —and Durham. of Newcastle encouraged the Scots to make an attempt on Durham, which also surrendered without resistance; and the Earl of Dunfermline was appointed governor, and left there with a brigade.

Accounts of these disasters reached Charles at Northallerton, whither he had advanced in expectation of being able to join the army before any engagement should take place. He now hastened back to York, where he found the scattered fragments of his army once more united after their disorderly retreat.

* Rushworth, vol. iii. p. 1239.

With most remarkable moderation and praiseworthy consistency the Scots, though no doubt elated by their recent successes, ^{The Scots} once more assumed the attitude ^{again petition} of suppliants. They prepared an humble petition to his majesty, which they enclosed in a letter to Lord Lanark, the secretary, and transmitted from Newcastle by Mr. Hugh Cathcart of Carleton. It was dated the 2nd of September, and was to this effect:—That, after their many sufferings, they had been at last constrained by necessity to come into England, where they had lived on their own means and provisions, harming no one, either in person or goods, until, pressed by strength of arms, they had been obliged to disperse such forces as, against their own conscience and inclination, had opposed their peaceable passage of the Tyne, and thus brought their blood upon their own heads; and that they had resolved to persevere in maintaining the humble and submissive attitude of petitioners, from which no provocation, prosperity, or adversity, should divert them. They therefore entreated his majesty that he would at last consider their pressing grievances, provide for redressing their wrongs and repairing their losses, and, with the advice of a parliament in England, settle a firm and durable peace, that they might cheerfully pay their duty to his majesty as their native king, and his throne might be established in the midst of them.*

A few hours after the presentation of this petition, a supplication was given in from the Lords Bedford, Essex, Hertford, Warwick, Rutland, Bolingbroke, Exeter, Mountgrave, Saye, and Sele, Mandeville, Howard, and Brook, complaining of their own grievances, and praying that a parliament should be summoned to redress them. This was speedily followed by similar ^{Petitions from the English nobility, the city of London, and other places.} petitions from the city of London, the county of York, and some other counties. The court party had hitherto laboured but too successfully to prevent the voice of the people from reaching the royal ear. The privy council, on learn-

A council of war was held to consider their conduct, and, on the motion of Strafford, it was ordained that they should be shot at the head of the army as movers of sedition. The execution of this iniquitous sentence was prevented through the address of the Marquis of Hamilton, who, after the rising of the council, drawing Strafford aside, asked him if he was sure of the army. The question took Strafford by surprise, but on inquiry the astounding fact was disclosed that an attempt to carry the sentence into effect would most probably be followed by a general mutiny, if not a universal revolt throughout the army.*

To the supplication of the Scots, Charles paid comparatively little regard; he was probably rather pleased than otherwise to find them still inclined to be submissive, but the petitions from his English subjects affected him very deeply. These seem to have given him the first decided intimation of the general discontent that prevailed in his southern dominions, and to have awakened him to a sense of the difficulties and perils in which he had so rashly involved himself. But it has been remarked "he had not the dexterity to extricate himself. He loved high and rough methods, but had neither skill to conduct them nor genius to manage them. He hated all who offered prudent and moderate counsels; he thought it flowed from a meanness of spirit, and a care to preserve themselves by sacrificing his authority, or from republican principles. And even when he saw it was necessary to follow such advices, yet he hated those that gave them; and, therefore, it seems he would not deign to answer to any of them except the lords' petition, and to theirs in such a way as showed his contempt of it."†

In order, however, to stay the advance of the
The king's Scottish army, he returned, by the answer. Earl of Lanark, an answer to this effect, dated at York, September 5th:—"That their petition being only in general terms, he requires them to set down their particular demands, he having been always willing to hear and redress his people's grievances. And for mature deliberation therein, he hath given out summons for the meeting of the English peers at York, the 25th of this month, that, with their advice, they may receive an answer to their petition. He commands them, in the meantime, to advance no further with their army, which is the way to a reconciliation, of which he assured them they were not more desirous than himself."‡

By this device Charles hoped to soothe, if not to satisfy, the Scots without convoking the English parliament—a measure with which he was to the last degree reluctant to comply. The covenanters, however, had now lost all faith in the royal promises, however solemnly made, and would not be satisfied with any arrangement not guaranteed by the representatives of the English people, who were labouring under grievances similar to their own.

Reply of the The committee lost no time in pre-

They reminded his majesty that their particular desires were contained in the conclusions of their last parliament, which he had declined to ratify, and in their own printed declarations; nevertheless, in compliance with his majesty's desire, they proceeded briefly to enumerate them:—1. That the acts of the last parliament should be ratified. 2. That the Castle of Edinburgh and fortresses of Scotland should be occupied exclusively for the defence and security of that kingdom. 3. That their countrymen in England and Ireland should be free from molestation on account of having subscribed the covenant, and from all attempts to force on them oaths and subscriptions contrary to that engagement. 4. That the common incendiaries, the authors of the conflagration in which both kingdoms were involved, should be subjected to merited punishment. 5. That the ships and goods taken from their countrymen should be restored, and indemnification made for the losses occasioned by these seizures. 6. That the losses sustained and the charges incurred in the prosecution of the war be repaid. 7. That the proclamation in which they are denounced as traitors be recalled. And, finally, that his majesty would, by the advice and consent of parliament, remove the garrisons from the Borders, and all other obstructions to free trade; and, with the same advice and concurrence, "condescend to all things which may establish a firm and well-grounded peace." They express regret that the meeting of his majesty with his nobility should be so long delayed, and assure him that the more time can be saved they will be the better able to obey his majesty's injunction not to advance with their army—a command which they will observe, unless compelled to act otherwise from invincible necessity.*

The boldness of this reply must have been deeply mortifying to the haughty spirit of Charles, but he was in no position to manifest his resentment; and though Strafford advised him to resort to the most desperate measures, he thought it prudent to yield to the milder counsels of Hamilton, who dreaded the disaffection of the nobles and the army.

The fidelity of Montrose, notwithstanding all his apparent zeal in the national cause, had been for some time the stance now brought his defection clearly to light. An act had been passed by the committee in the army, that no individual, of whatever rank, should send any letter to court unless it had first been seen and approved by three of their number. In obedience to this order, Montrose submitted to the inspection of the committee several letters which he had written to friends at court. These were passed without exception, but, before sealing them, he enclosed within one addressed to Sir Richard Graham another, which had not been shown to the committee, addressed to the king. On Sir Richard opening his letter, the enclosure accidentally fell out, and the Scottish envoy, Sir James Mercer, who happened to be near, politely stooping down to pick it up, observed the address. On his return, he informed the general of this discovery, and the cautious old soldier adopted an indirect method of: impeaching the delinquent. Without explaining his motive, he proposed, in a meeting of the committee of which Montrose happened to be president, that they should send for the gentlemen who had been entrusted with the conveyance of their letters to court. Sir James was immediately in attendance, and, on being interrogated, frankly related to the committee what he had observed. Montrose at once confessed what he found it now impossible to deny; but apologised by saying that others were guilty of the same offence. Whether this was really the case does not appear, but it is certain that suspicion, at least, had been attached to the Lords Drummond, Fleming, Boyd, and some others. He was reminded, however, that the guilt of others, even if established, could not exculpate him; and he was ordered, in the meantime, to confine himself to his chamber. While this delicate and important matter was under consideration, Montrose was detected in endeavouring to form a party in his favour, but a hint from Leslie that he might by such a proceeding expose himself to a trial and a capital conviction by a council of war, induced him to relinquish his intrigues and to seek for safety in submission; and on production of what he alleged to be a copy of the letter he had sent to the king, expressing sorrow for his offence, and humbly craving pardon, it was thought prudent not to risk a breach in the army at this critical juncture by inflicting punishment upon an influential and powerful offender.

Unfortunately, this was not the only untoward circumstance with which the Scottish leaders had at this time to contend. The provisions which they had brought with them were nearly exhausted, and those offered for sale by the English were often rated at double their value; their ready-money was almost all expended, their credit was low, and they had as yet received none of that assistance which they had been led to expect from their friends in England. In these trying circumstances they had no resources left but to levy contributions on the inhabitants of the towns and the surrounding country—a harsh and oppressive measure, which they had at first resolved at all hazards to avoid, and to which they now resorted with extreme reluctance. The property of the Canterburian faction, the common enemies of both kingdoms, was indeed considered lawful prey, but it was found totally inadequate to supply the wants of the army. Their expenses, at the lowest estimate, amounted to eight hundred and fifty pounds per day; and of this sum the town of Newcastle was required to furnish two hundred; the county of Northumberland, three hundred; and the bishopric of Durham, three hundred and fifty.

It was not to be expected that such heavy imposts should be borne without a murmur, and the manner in which they were exacted soon began to exasperate the minds of the people against the Scots. Notwithstanding the utmost care and vigilance of the committee, many abuses crept in, of which the people justly complained. The cattle of such as were unable to furnish their proportion of the sum levied were in many instances seized, and either turned into money, or, without any accurate valuation, appropriated to the use of the army. Many of the persons employed in the collection fraudulently exacted double the authorised amount, and kept one half to themselves; and it not unfrequently happened, that, through ignorance or error, friends and enemies suffered indiscriminately. The town of Newcastle having entreated for some alleviation, on the plea of inability, a guard was placed upon the town-house until the required sum should be raised. But the greatest and most flagrant abuses and extortions were perpetrated by some of the English themselves. Numbers of the lower orders having procured blue bonnets, in order to personate Scotchmen, went about robbing and plundering their own countrymen; and many of the servants of the fugitive clergy carried off the property of their masters, and laid the blame upon the Scots.* These multiplied grievances occasioned loud complaints against the Scots, but it is to be remarked, in exoneration of the commissioners, that security was offered for all the money levied, which was thus considered in the nature of a loan.†

Their experience of the king's duplicity had long since taught the Scots that he was not to be depended on, and they, therefore, wisely prepared for the worst. Leslie wrote to the committee at Edinburgh, requiring a reinforcement of four or five thousand men; and as the country was now happily free from intestine commotions, there was little difficulty in complying with this demand. Accordingly, the Lords Marischal, Home, and Lindsay, and Major-general Monro, were dispatched with about four thousand foot, who had been employed in the north. Shortly afterwards Argyll followed with a numerous and resolute band of gentlemen and vassals belonging to his clan; and the Earl of Eglington, who had been employed in guarding the west coast, in expectation of an invasion from Ireland, was ordered to hold himself in readiness, with all the troops under his command, to march at a moment's notice to the assistance of their brethren in England. Nor were these preparations unnecessary, for, amidst all his pacific declarations, Charles was anxiously preparing for a renewal of the contest. He ordered all the train-bands north of the Trent to be ready to march at a day's warning; the counties were required to furnish provisions with the utmost dispatch; and all the garrisons were reinforced with fresh troops, and supplied with arms and ammunition.

The king makes preparation to renew the war.

On the 7th of September the king issued writs convoking the peers of the kingdom to meet him in full council at York, on the 24th of the same month. At the time and place appointed, sixty of them assembled in the dean's house near the minster; and the king, who arrived at nine o'clock in the morning, having seated himself in a chair of state prepared for him, addressed them to the following effect:—"That it having been the custom of his predecessors, upon sudden invasions, which would not admit of the delay of calling a parliament, to assemble the great council of peers for their advice and assistance; and an army of rebels being now lodged within the kingdom, he thought fit to conform himself to the custom of his predecessors. He said he desired nothing more than to be rightly understood of his people, and to that end had resolved to call a parliament, and had ordered writs to be issued out for their assembling the 3rd of November. In the meantime, he desired their advice in two points: 1. What answer he should give to the petition of the rebels, and in what manner he should treat with them. And, 2. How his army should be maintained till parliamentary supplies might be had.*"

On the first point it was resolved to send to Northallerton, by the 1st of October, sixteen English peers, as commissioners to treat with the Scots; but as these noblemen were comparatively unacquainted with the laws and present condition of Scotland, it was thought advisable to send as their assistants the Earls of Morton, Traquair, and Lanark, the Secretary Vane, Sir Lewis Stewart of Blackhall, and Sir John Borrough. On the same day, Lord Lanark was instructed to write to the committee at Newcastle, acquainting them with the nomination of the commissioners, without, however, naming their assistants; and offering a safe-conduct to such persons as the committee on their part should appoint. The council met again the next day, when the king, by their advice, altered the place of meeting to Ripon, a town about fifteen miles from York, and intimation of this change was immediately forwarded to the committee. With regard to the second point on which the king required advice, Stafford represented that the army, consisting of twenty thousand foot, two thousand three hundred horse, and three regiments of loyal Scots, required sixty thousand pounds a month for their maintenance, and, besides, were in arrear of a fortnight's pay; and, as the royal treasury was completely drained, it was proposed to borrow from the city of London two hundred thousand pounds, so as to maintain the army, if necessary, three months in the field. This motion having been agreed to, six peers were deputed to the capital to negotiate the loan, which was ultimately obtained on the faith of the security given for its repayment by the noblemen present.

The Earls of Rothes, Dunfermline, and Loudoun, Sir Patrick Hepburn of Wauchton, Sir William Douglas of Cavers, William Drummond of Riccar-

ton, John Smith of Edinburgh, Alexander Wedderburne of Dundee, Hugh Kennedy of Ayr, Mr. Archibald Johnston, advocate, and Mr. Alexander Henderson, minister, were appointed by the committee to meet with the English noblemen at Ripon. When the representatives of the two belligerent parties had exchanged commissions, the English commissioners were desirous of immediately proceeding to business, but the Scots objected, in limine, to the assistants, who had not been named in the commission, being any way parties to the treaty. Above all, they insisted on the removal of Traquair, who was one of the incendiaries for whose punishment they had prayed in their last supplication. The English commissioners represented that in consequence of their ignorance of the Scottish constitution and laws, it was necessary that they should be assisted in their deliberations by persons acquainted with these subjects. The Scottish commissioners, however, were inflexible, and the matter was at last referred to the king, who agreed that the functions of the assistants should be limited, as, he affirmed, was originally intended, to private advice and consultation.

In some desultory conversation that passed between the parties, while awaiting the king's decision on this preliminary point, the English took occasion to rally the Scots on their extreme caution. The Scots retaliated by accusing the English of indecision in delaying so long the fulfilment of the promises which had contributed not a little to determine the advance of the Scottish army into England. This accusation excited the astonishment of the English noblemen; and, on an explanation being demanded, the letter of Lord Saville was produced, which was instantly pronounced to be a forgery. So accurately, however, had the various signatures of the noblemen present been imitated, that they confessed had it not been for the circumstance of their never having before seen the document to which they were appended, they durst not have affirmed that they were not in their own handwriting. This explanation, however, led to very beneficial results. From that instant a more friendly feeling was established between the English and Scottish commissioners, and a mutual understanding afterwards issued in united action.*

The difficulty respecting the assistants having been got over, the commissioners now proceeded to the transaction of the important business assigned to them. The English deputies commenced with proposing an armistice. To this the Scots signified their readiness to agree, but on one startling condition, that during its subsistence they should be supplied with money for the maintenance of the army. They frankly admitted that their own resources were exhausted, and that as the districts in their occupation were incapable of furnishing them any longer with the necessary supplies, and his majesty had prohibited them from advancing farther, they could neither remain where they were during a protracted negotiation, nor return with safety to their own country, until they had concluded a treaty securing an honourable and durable peace. It became, therefore, indispensably necessary as a preliminary to a cessation of hostilities, that provision should be made for the daily subsistence of their army. The English commissioners acknowledged the reasonableness of this demand, which, however, before coming to any decision, they referred to the great council of the nobility. The demand of the commissioners was forty thousand pounds a month—a sum which, in addition to that necessary for the maintenance of their own army, the English treasury, in its present impoverished state, could not possibly supply. The council were placed in a dilemma between the difficulty of meeting such a claim and the ruin which, in the event of its being denied, would inevitably be brought on the country by the farther advance of the Scottish army. Much difference of opinion prevailed in the council. Lord Herbert alone, however, flattered the obstinacy and pride of the king by counselling determined resistance. His advice was either to obstruct the progress of the Scots by fortifying York, or else to disband both armies until a treaty should be concluded; but he argued, to maintain a rebel army during the dependence of negotiations which, after all, might have no beneficial result, was a thing altogether unprecedented, and at once disgraceful to the country and derogatory to the honour of his majesty. "Let the money," he said, "be retained for the subsistence, and, if necessary, for the reinforcement of the king's troops."* The wholesome terror of the Scottish arms proved more than a counterpoise to this piece of bravado. The majority of the council admitted the justice, or, at least, the necessity of yielding, and objected only to the Preliminaries amount of the demand. At length agreed on.

it was agreed that twenty-five thousand pounds a month should be granted until the middle of December, together with suitable lodging and fuel; that the provisions requisite for the army should be allowed to be imported from Scotland duty free; that competent persons should be nominated on both sides to regulate the price of such supplies as might be procured in the counties occupied by the Scots; and that a committee named by the council should be empowered to levy a contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day on the county of Northumberland, the bishopric of Durham, and the town of Newcastle, and to take measures for their relief from the rest of the nation. The Scottish commissioners acquiesced in this arrangement, and engaged that so long as these conditions were punctually fulfilled, they would molest neither papists, prelates, nor their adherents—would abstain from levying contributions, and would take measures to prevent all plundering on the part of the army.†

It has been supposed that a secret understanding existed between the commissioners to protract their negotiations until the meeting of parliament, for in the conferences which followed, the whole of October was permitted to elapse before arriving at any definite conclusion. As the time appointed for the assembling of the parliament was now at hand, and the presence of most of the English commissioners was required there, the king, at their request, allowed the treaty to be transferred from Ripon to London, and agreed that the Scottish army should remain in England until its conclusion. In granting this request, Charles acted without his accustomed caution, and with an absence of foresight which the enemies of civil and religious liberty have never since ceased to lament. The proud claim of exclusive and indefeasible prerogative was thereby virtually abandoned, and the people by their representatives in parliament very soon wielded the whole power of the State. The public discontents, of which London was the focus, were cherished and extended by the eminent Scotchmen whom the negotiations drew thither; and the continued presence of the Scottish army, on whose support the parliament placed their main reliance, encouraged that body to assume an attitude of most determined resistance to the unconstitutional powers arrogated by the crown. The nation now looked to the parliament for the redress of grievances of which they had long and justly complained; and one of the strongest proofs of the almost universal disgust which the arbitrary rule of Charles had excited, may be found in the patient acquiescence of a brave and high-spirited people in the continued occupation of a portion of their territory by a hostile army.

In agreeing to the transference of the conference to London, the Scottish leaders were naturally anxious to obtain a renewed and unquestionable security for the maintenance of their army during the negotiations. This the English commissioners were by no means indisposed to grant, and accordingly agreed to the ratification of a truce, by which the previous demands of the Scots were fully allowed and guaranteed. It was signed by the commissioners on both sides on the 26th of October, and consisted of the following articles:—"1. That from this time there be a cessation of arms both by sea and land; and that all acts of hostility shall cease. 2. That during the treaty both parties retain what they now possessed. 3. That those in his majesty's forts beyond the Tees should not exempt their lands in Northumberland and the bishopric of Durham from the contributions agreed on. 4. That the king's forces in those bounds should not hinder the contribution, or take anything but what the owners voluntarily bring them; and that any detention of victuals, &c., made by the Scots for their maintenance shall be no breach. 5. That no recruits shall be brought to either army during the treaty. 6. That the eight hundred and fifty pounds a day shall be raised only out of Northumberland, the bishopric of Durham, Newcastle, Cumberland, and Westmoreland; and that the non-payment thereof shall not be a breach of the treaty, only the Scots shall have power in case of failure to raise the same, with allowance for the expenses of driving to be fixed by the commissioners of the forage. 7. That the river Tees shall be the boundary for both armies, with liberty nevertheless to the Scots to send out necessary convoys to gather their contributions if unpaid. 8. That private insolencies committed shall be no breach, provided on complaint reparation shall be granted. 9. If victuals be refused on the agreed price, it shall be no breach to take the same on payment thereof. 10. No new fortifications to be made on either side during the treaty. 11. The subjects of both kingdoms to go freely to and fro, but not the soldiers without a formal pass under the hand of the chief commander. And, 12. That the ports be opened and free trade permitted.”*

These advantageous terms, as well as the transference of the treaty to London, greatly elated the Scottish leaders, and were a source of much joy to the whole nation. The increase, if not the ultimate ascendancy of presbyterianism in England—a consummation eagerly desired by the covenanters—seemed now in the fair way of being accomplished. The committee at Newcastle ordered three of their ablest ministers to proceed to London as chaplains to the commissioners, taking care to select such as had already distinguished themselves in the religious controversies of the times. Mr. Robert Blair was chosen for his dexterity in combating the independents, Mr. Robert Baillie for his skill in confuting the Arminians, and Mr. George Gillespie for his ability in exposing the errors of episcopacy.

On the Friday, the 5th of November, they set out with the commissioners, in high spirits, for London, and halted on Sabbath at Darlington, where they received their safe-conduct, together with a letter from the Earl of Bristol urging them to proceed without delay.†

The English parliament, afterwards known in history as “the Long Parliament,” met on the 3rd of November; and, as might have been expected in the circumstances of the country, consisted for the most part of men whose reputation both for piety and patriotism had marked them out as fitting representatives of a people burning to shake off the double bondage of civil and ecclesiastical tyranny. Charles, in his opening speech, betrayed, as usual, a fatal blindness to the real nature of his situation. He appears not to have been aware of the extent to which disaffection had spread among his subjects, or the character and temper of the men whom they had selected as their representatives. But, in fact, the evident design of Laud to introduce popery had alarmed and disgusted many of the stanchest adherents of episcopacy; the arbitrary and shocking cruelties of the Star Chamber had roused the indignation of the whole kingdom; while the systematic oppression of the religious puritans, who were adverse to the discipline and presumptuous claims of the Church, and of the political puritans, who aspired after civil liberty, had led to a union between these two bodies, who now presented a most formidable opposition both to the prelates and the court. Nor was this all: the presbyterians, who had already become a numerous and powerful body, contributed to swell the general discontent; so that a speedy redress of grievances, or the entire overthrow both of Church and State, seemed to thoughtful men to be inevitable. The king was among the last to perceive the difficulties in which his policy had involved him, or the perils by which he was surrounded. He commenced his address in a conciliatory tone, expressing his reliance on the loyalty and affection which he did not seem to know he had forfeited;

and claimed the first attention of parliament to the chastising of “the rebels,” on whose support and co-operation that very parliament depended for their continued existence. On their providing for the common safety, by assisting him to expel the invaders, he promised that he would then most cordially concur in the redress of every grievance of which they could justly complain. Taught by repeated experience, the parliament set no value on such promises. They were persuaded that, but for the pecuniary embarrassment to which the king was reduced by his own rash and iniquitous policy, they would never have been convoked; and they were firmly resolved not to disappoint the long-cherished hopes of the nation by permitting such an opportunity to pass unimproved of—at once relieving the people of their burdens, and punishing the authors of the public calamities. They accordingly commenced, contrary to his majesty’s recommendation, with the consideration of grievances, against which petitions now poured in from almost every county of the kingdom, attended by multitudes of gentlemen of the first rank.* They next proceeded to extend and consolidate their own powers—a measure in which the pressing exigencies of the king induced him reluctantly to concur. They were willing to vote a subsidy for the sustentation of the two armies, but persons possessed of money, afraid of an abrupt dissolution, refused to lend, unless an act was passed securing the continuance of parliament until they should think fit to dissolve themselves. An act to that effect was accordingly drawn up and passed, to which the king, rather than want money, gave his assent. This was followed by an act ordaining that a parliament should be held every year, and directing that in case three years should at any time be suffered to elapse without the assembling of parliament, the lord-chancellor or keeper of the great seal should issue writs according to a certain prescribed form. If he should fail to perform this duty, a certain number of lords were empowered to summon a parliament; and, in the event of their neglecting to do so, the sheriffs and constables were invested with the same authority. Finally, if all these should be wanting in their duty, the people of England were authorised to meet and elect members to serve in parliament, though not summoned by any officer appointed for that purpose.*

These important measures, by which the parliament was rendered independent of every other power in the State, and which, in fact, tended directly to the introduction of democracy, were followed by an act abridging the illegal and unconstitutional powers assumed by the convocation.

Resolution of parliament condemnatory of the illegal powers assumed by the convocation.

A resolution was passed that the clergy had no power to make canons binding either clergy or laity, and that the canons promulgated by the late convocation were contrary to the laws of the land, and tended to faction and sedition. The subsidies also granted by that convocation were voted illegal, and a committee was appointed to examine who were the parties chiefly implicated in these unlawful proceedings; and, in particular, how far the Archbishop of Canterbury had been engaged in promoting the treasonable design of subverting the laws and religion of the realm, and to draw up and prepare a charge against him.†

To assist the parliament in this investigation, the Scottish commissioners drew up and presented to the House of Lords a series of charges against the archbishop, whom they accused as the principal author of the late troubles in Scotland. They complained of his having introduced into that country innovations in religion at variance with the laws of the land and the established order of the Church; of his having ordered a list of such of the senators of the College of Justice as refused to communicate according to a form not received in their Kirk to be sent up to him, that they might be punished; of his having warrants for the sitting of a high commission court in Edinburgh once a week; of his having obtruded a book of canons and ecclesiastical constitutions, devised for the establishment of a tyrannical power, in the persons of the prelates, over the consciences, liberties, and goods of the people, and for abolishing the discipline and government of the Church as settled by law; of his having violently introduced the book of common prayer, and alterations in the mode of administering the sacraments and other parts of divine worship, and, without warrant from the Church, ordered these to be universally received as the only form of divine service, under the highest penalties, both civil and ecclesiastical. They further complained that, on their refusal to receive the service-book, the Scots were by Laud's instigation declared rebels and traitors; an army was raised to subdue them; and a prayer was composed and printed by his direction to be read in all the parish churches in England, in which prayer they are called traitorous subjects, who have cast off all obedience to their sovereign, and supplication is made to the Almighty to cover their faces with shame as enemies to God and the king. The commissioners, therefore, pray that the archbishop may be immediately removed from his majesty's presence, and that he may be brought to a trial, and receive such censure as he deserved, according to the laws of the kingdom.*

In the meantime, the House of Commons proceeded to take measures for bringing to justice another incendiary, of Strafford—

whose punishment seemed necessary for securing the tranquillity of both nations. This was Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, who, from being a strenuous opponent of the measures of the court, had become one of its most zealous and unscrupulous supporters; and from the great talents and remarkable decision of character which he undoubtedly possessed, was perhaps of all the public men of his time the most formidable and dangerous enemy of the laws and liberties of the country. In the month of November he had been impeached by Mr. Pym, in name of the commons of England; and a committee, consisting of some of the leading members of the house, was subsequently appointed to prosecute him. On the 22nd of March —his trial—

he was brought to trial before the House of Peers. None of the charges were sufficient per se to constitute treason, but they were held to amount to that crime by accumulation. Strafford was found guilty and condemned to death. Charles would most willingly have interposed to save his favourite minister, but was deterred by the fear of a rupture with parliament at this critical juncture; and on the 12th of May, the unfortunate nobleman was beheaded on Tower Hill.

Laud was marked out as the next victim, though his fate was longer delayed. When the charges brought against him before the upper house were reported to the commons, their long-smothered resentment was kindled into a flame; and, on the motion of Mr. Grimstone, it was resolved that these charges should be supported by an impeachment of his own. Accordingly, Mr. Hollis was immediately sent up to the bar of the House of Lords to impeach the archbishop in the name of all the commons of England. Laud was, in consequence, immediately taken into custody; but matters of greater moment prevented his being brought to trial at this juncture.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

THE helpless condition in which the king was now placed, and the prodigious advance which parliament had recently made in power and independence, gave a fresh impulse to the aspirations of the people of England for the attainment of civil and religious liberty. Complaints and petitions without number were presented from all quarters to the first English parliament in which the national voice could be heard, and the national grievances freely discussed. Intent on the investigation of these, and unwilling to lose the support which they derived from the presence of the Scottish army in the north, and the Scottish commissioners in London, the parliament were in no haste to conclude the treaty; nor, on the other hand, were the Scots, who now began to entertain hopes of the entire overthrow of episcopacy and the establishment of presbyterianism in England, at all anxious to bring the negotiations to an immediate close. The commissioners and the distinguished men who accompanied them as chaplains had been received in London with a cordial, respectful, and affectionate welcome. Ever since their arrival they had been entertained at the public expense, and had been provided with a suitable residence and a place of worship. Here they had an opportunity, but lately far remote from expectation, of publicly, and without fear or restraint, exemplifying, defending, and inculcating the presbyterian mode of worship in the heart of the great metropolis of England—the very focus of prelatical pride, power, and influence, and in the immediate vicinity of the court itself. That opportunity was joyfully embraced. Vast crowds of the citizens attended their ministrations from Sabbath to Sabbath, filling the very passages of their place of worship, and even surrounding the doors and clambering up to the windows. The discourses of these able and zealous men were not confined to a mere defence of the system of presbyterian church polity: the corruptions of the Church of England, its Romanising tendencies, the tyranny, worldly-mindedness, indolence, and lax morality of the prelates, were exposed and denounced with unrestrained freedom, and with a warmth to which the people of England had been but little accustomed in discourses from the pulpit. Besides this the Scotch ministers published a variety of tracts, many of which are still preserved, and are still regarded as remarkable for acuteness, close reasoning, learning, and eloquence. The effect produced on the public mind was great and immediate. A petition from the citizens of London was presented to parliament, praying for the reformation of the liturgy, ceremonies, and discipline of the Church of England; and shortly afterwards another supplication, signed by fifteen or twenty thousand persons, was presented, craving a total extirpation of episcopacy. These were speedily followed by great numbers of petitions from other quarters of the country, complaining of the tyranny and usurpations of the clergy, and craving redress. The favourable reception which these petitions met with in the House of Commons endeared that branch of the legislature to the hearts of the people, and led them to regard it as the last remaining bulwark of national liberty.

London.

The vast accession of power which the parliament had now acquired, the universal discontent of his subjects, and the boldness of their petitions and complaints, began to give Charles serious uneasiness, and he clearly perceived that the support derived from the continued presence of the Scottish army in the north had contributed greatly to these results. In the hope of being able to put an end to this state of matters, he sent a message to both houses of parliament, requiring their attendance upon him at Whitehall. In his address, he expatiated on the inconvenience of continuing to maintain two armies at the same time, and urged them to bring their business to a speedy termination, assuring them that he would afterwards willingly concur with them in removing every cause of complaint, and promoting reformatations both in Church and State; but at the same time reminding them that there was a great difference between reformation and alteration—to the latter of which he would never be willing to agree. Despite this remonstrance, and the king's promises, the parliament resolved to persevere in the course they had begun; and not until they had discussed nearly the whole list of grievances did they apply themselves to the task of concluding the treaty. The articles had already been separately and carefully debated by the commissioners, and when at length submitted to parliament, were found to be substantially the same as those contained in the specification given in to the king at York. The ratification of the acts of the Scottish parliament was at first resisted by the king, because, implying, as it undoubtedly did, the total abolition of episcopacy, it might at that peculiar crisis be regarded as a precedent for the subversion of the same system in England; but the English commissioners having concurred with the Scots in urging this measure, the king was constrained, though with great reluctance, to consent "That the acts of the parliament assembled by his authority at Edinburgh, 1640, should be proclaimed along with those of the next session of the same parliament." The second article, that the Castle of Edinburgh, and the other strongholds of the kingdom, should be garrisoned according to the original intention, and the third, by which Scotsmen in Ireland were liberated from the imposition of oaths inconsistent with the covenant, were agreed to with little opposition. The fourth, however,—requiring that the public incendiaries, the authors and principal promoters of the late troubles, the sowers of discord between the king and his subjects, should be brought to trial and punished according to the sentences pronounced by the parliaments of their respective countries,—gave rise to a protracted discussion; and the king who, warned by the fate of Strafford, now trembled for that of Traquair, strove hard to evade giving his consent. He conferred first with the nobles alone, then with the whole of the commissioners, and finally with such of the nobles as he hoped to be able to gain over to his purpose,—particularly with Rothes, —urging them to employ their influence either to obtain the omission of that article, or a reference of the matter to his own decision. The commissioners were inflexible, and the unhappy king was obliged to submit. The fifth article, that ships and goods detained should be mutually restored, and that mutual indemnification should be made for damages, was agreed to; and four thousand pounds were allowed for the refitting of eighty Scottish vessels that had been damaged during their detention in English harbours. The sixth article was one of considerable difficulty and delicacy. It referred to the losses which the kingdom of Scotland had sustained by the war, and especially the amount of indemnification for the expense incurred during the two campaigns. Unwilling to run the risk of occasioning any disunion between the Scots and their friends in parliament, the commissioners agreed to refer the matter to the decision of the house. The Scottish commissioners, however, thought proper to give in a detailed specification of the expenses, amounting in all to five hundred thousand pounds, a sum which some of the members considered quite exorbitant. The Scots insisted that as the whole of that sum had been expended in resisting the common enemy, they were in justice entitled to its restitution, but declared themselves willing to submit to the arbitrament of parliament; adding that, but for the poverty of their country, they would cheerfully have borne the whole expense. After considerable discussion, the sum of three hundred thousand pounds was allowed, under the name of a brotherly assistance, which was accepted by the Scottish commissioners with protestations of affection and gratitude. By the seventh article, all declarations, acts, books, libels, and whatever had been published by either side to the disparagement of the other, were recalled and suppressed; and by the eighth and last, it was agreed that the garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle should be placed on the same footing as before the commencement of the late troubles. To these articles the Scots proposed to add another for securing unity in religion and uniformity in church government; but, though it does not appear that parliament were averse to this proposal, it was one of too great importance to be summarily disposed of, and accordingly was not allowed to be inserted in the treaty. The king's answer to this proposed article stands in strong contrast with many of his former haughty and imperious declarations, and shows that he was not without a humiliating perception of the altered circumstances in which he was placed. He had seen enough of the steadfast adherence of the Scots to the principles they professed to convince him that, by unity in religion and uniformity in church government, they could only mean presbyterianism—by the attempts to suppress which he had rashly hazarded the peace of both nations, as well as the security of his crown; yet his answer is at once cautious and conciliatory. “His majesty, with the advice of ^{Conclusion of} both houses of parliament, doth ^{the treaty.} approve of the affection of his subjects in Scotland, in their desire of having conformity of church government between the two nations; and as the parliament hath already taken into consideration the reformation of church government, so they will proceed thereon, in due time, as shall best conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the Church, and of both kingdoms.”

The treaty thus concluded and ratified was accompanied with an act of obli- ^{Act of oblivion.} vion, from the benefit of which Charles, however reluctant, was constrained to exclude the Earl of Traquair, Sir Robert Spottiswood, Sir John Hay, Mr. Walter Balcanquhal, and the Scottish bishops. With regard to the latter, the exclusion was of little consequence, as they were now reduced, both spiritually and temporally, to their former level, and were not likely to return to Scotland, or if they did, were probably now too insignificant to be molested; but it was different with the others, and especially with Traquair, whose offences had chiefly originated in his zeal to obey the royal commands, and whom therefore Charles manifested such painful anxiety to save that their punishment was, though not nominally, at least virtually left to himself.

The unhappy king, finding his authority almost annihilated by the increasing power of the parliament, and being baffled in an attempt to gain over the army to his support—an attempt which rendered him still more suspected and disliked—now bethought him of making a strenuous endeavour to conciliate the Scots, and, if possible, break up that unity of purpose that he now clearly perceived to exist between them and his English parliament. He had already, as we have seen, gained over Montrose; his next attempt was ^{Defection of} on the Earl of Rothes, who, though ^{Rothes.} one of the most popular and able of the Scottish leaders, appears to have been destitute of principle, and to have joined the covenanters rather from personal than from public motives. He fell into the snare which Charles had laid for him, and but for his sudden death would have sacrificed, for the promise of a rich marriage and the offer of a post in the king's bedchamber, all claim to consistency or patriotism. The popular cause, however, was now too strong to suffer much from his defection. He was despised and soon forgotten.

Still further to ingratiate himself with the Scots, Charles once more determined to try the influence of his personal presence in his native country. That all might be in readiness for his speedy departure, he required the parliament to be prepared within fourteen days to present him with such bills as required the royal assent. This undoubtedly precipitated the conclusion of the treaty. Parliament, taking the alarm lest this movement of the king should be merely a feint to conceal the purpose of putting himself at the head of the army in the north, immediately dispatched Lord Holland with money to pay them off and disband them. A fourth part of the "brotherly assistance" was advanced, with an assurance that the arrears should be paid by equal instalments within two years; and the Scots returned home, elated with the result of their expedition, and bound more closely than ever to their English brethren.

The Scottish parliament of 1640, after several adjournments, at length met for the dispatch of business on the 15th of July, 1641. Lord Loudoun, however, having represented to them that his majesty would be in Scotland about the middle of

Meeting of the Scottish parliament. Secret correspondence of Montrose—his imprisonment.

August, they thought proper to defer the concluding of any important business until his arrival, and in the interval continued their sittings, which were mostly occupied in preparing and arranging matters for subsequent deliberation.

In the meantime an intercepted letter of Montrose's revealed a new secret correspondence on the part of that nobleman, upon which he and a number of his friends, who were implicated or suspected, were arrested and closely confined in the Castle of Edinburgh.

On their leaving London, Dunfermline and Loudoun received instructions from the king desiring a further prorogation of parliament, and requiring them to insist that the parliament would be content with such a share in the nomination of the officers of state as he had expressed in his answer to the fourth article of the treaty; that they would accept of Traquair's submission, and pass from all who had been cited to appear before the parliament until some crime should be proved against them; that they would restore the keepers of Edinburgh and Dunbarton castles to their dignities and estates; and that no new acts should be proposed derogatory to his royal power, honour, and benefit. Parliament, however, resolved that their meetings could be no longer prorogued, though, for the king's satisfaction, they promised that, until the 17th of August, they should pass no definite sentence on any matter of weight unless constrained by necessity. Traquair's submission they rejected; and to the king's other demands they thought fit to delay giving any particular answer until his majesty should appear in person or by his commissioner. A copy of the treaty was at the same time delivered to each estate for their deliberate consideration, before they should be called on to approve of it.*

A committee was now appointed to regulate the order of the house. They ordered that fines should be imposed for absence or for coming too late, varying in amount according to the rank of the parties. Lords Durie and Craig-hall entreated that the lords of session, the supreme judges by whom the laws were administered, should be present to assist in framing them; but this the house would not allow. The lord-advocate insisted on being present, as a privilege belonging to his office. This gave rise to a keen debate, which resulted in the concession of the privilege under certain restrictions. An attempt was also made to insure to some of the ministers, commissioners of the General Assembly, the privilege of being present to hear the debates. This, on the motion of Argyll, was peremptorily refused, as being likely to pave the way for the introduction of churchmen into parliament. A like claim on the part of the eldest sons of the nobility was also to their great chagrin disallowed, and a general order was passed that none but the regular members of the house should be suffered to enter. Finally, it was ordered that an oath should be administered to the members of this and all subsequent parliaments, as a security against "tentation and court corruption."

The king left London for Scotland on the 10th of August; but instead of being attended as formerly by a numerous and brilliant retinue of obsequious courtiers, he was accompanied by a committee of parliament, ostensibly appointed as commissioners to the Scottish Estates, with instructions to transmit information of the proceedings of the house, but in reality to act as spies on the conduct of the king, who had by his systematic duplicity rendered himself an object of suspicion. He was received during his progress with the greatest coldness, and everywhere the marks of discontent were visible. He halted on the 13th at Newcastle, where he dined with General Leslie. Here numbers of the Scottish officers were introduced to him, all of whom he received with unwonted condescension and affability. On reaching the Scottish Borders he was attended by numbers of the neighbouring gentlemen, and on his arrival at Gladsmuir he was welcomed by a deputation from the Estates, consisting of the Earl of Argyll and Lord Almond, the Barons Innes and Ker, and the burgesses of Aberdeen and St. Andrew's. On the evening of the 14th he found himself once more in his royal palace in the capital, his whole retinue amounting to not more than three persons—his nephew, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Lennox, and the Marquis of Hamilton. Notwithstanding the fatigue of his long journey, he held a levée the same evening in the long gallery, where he received the compliments of the nobility and barons, all of whom were allowed the honour of kissing his majesty's hand.

The manner in which he felt constrained by his altered circumstances to receive the homage of men whom he had denounced as rebels must have been deeply afflicting to the mind of Charles—especially when he traced, as he could scarcely fail to do, his present humiliation to his own overweening pride, his insane persistence in a project at once flagitious and hopeless, and his own systematic duplicity and perfidy. These men, so lately in arms against him, he now courted as the last support of his tottering throne; and with this view, probably rather than from any other motive, the intolerant upholder of prelacy was fain to affect a respectful homage to the church that he had so long laboured to subvert. On the first Sabbath after his arrival he attended the chapel-royal, where Mr. Alexander Henderson had been appointed to preach, and the service was conducted entirely after the presbyterian form. During the whole of his residence in Scotland he persevered in the same course, nor did he evince either disgust or impatience, though the discourses sometimes extended to a length that many of the presbyterians themselves complained of as tedious.

On Monday the king remained within doors, and held a close consultation with his privy council. It was now no time to stand on his prerogative, to yield had become a necessity, and the only question was how this was to be done without the appearance of yielding. Some discussion arose as to the manner of his proceeding to the opening of parliament. The ceremony of riding was urged by the advocate, who adduced several precedents in its favour; but as this might be supposed to cast some doubt on the legality of their former meetings, it was thought better to omit it on this occasion. Accordingly next day, after hearing sermon, his majesty, as had been previously arranged, drove up the Canongate and High Street in a coach, and alighting at the Ladies' Steps, walked to the house, preceded by the Marquis of Hamilton carrying the crown, the Earl of Argyll bearing the sceptre, and the Earl of Sutherland the sword of state. The king entered the house about eleven o'clock, attended by the Elector Palatine, for whom a richly embroidered seat was prepared on the left of the throne. Having courteously saluted the members, the king then addressed them in the following words:—"My Lords and gentlemen, there has been nothing so displeasing to me as those unlucky differences which have of late happened between me and my subjects, and nothing I have more desired than to see this day, wherein I hope not only to settle these unhappy mistakings, but rightly to know and be known of my native country. I need not tell you, for I think it is well known to most, what difficulties I have passed by and overcome to be here at this time; yet this I will say, that if love to my native country had not been a chief motive to this journey, other respects might easily have found a shift to do that by a commissioner which I am come to perform myself. All this considered, I cannot doubt but to find such real testimonies of your affection for the maintenance of that royal power which I do enjoy after one hundred and eight descents, and which you have so often professed to maintain, and to which your own national oath doth oblige you, that I shall not think my pains ill bestowed. Now the end of my coming is shortly this, to perform whatsoever I have promised, and withal to quiet these distractions which have and may fall out amongst you; and this I mind not superficially, but fully and cheerfully to do—for I assure you I can do nothing with more cheerfulness than to give my people contentment and a general satisfaction; wherefore not offering to endear myself to you in words, which, indeed, is not my way, I desire in the first place to settle that which concerns the religion and just liberties of this my native country before I proceed to any other act."*

To this address the president replied, thanking his majesty for all the former demonstrations of his goodness, and for the present expressions of his love to this his ancient and native kingdom. The president was followed by Argyll, in an eloquent speech, in which he compared the kingdom for some years past to a vessel tossed in a tempestuous sea, and congratulated his majesty on having, like a skilful pilot, steered her in safety through many rocks and shelves during seasons of the greatest difficulty and danger; and he humbly entreated that his majesty would not desert her until he had brought her safely to anchor, and settled her in the haven so ardently longed for.†

The king was about to evince his sincerity and zeal by touching with the sceptre the acts of the parliament of 1640; but the house in the exercise of a wise caution interfered to prevent this proceeding, on the ground that it was unnecessary. The real reason, however, was a suspicion that the king had some latent intention of destroying the previous validity of these acts, by making it appear that they had not the force of law until this ceremony was performed, and thus bringing in question the legality of all that had been done in virtue of them during the past year. This it was evident would be to unsettle even the treaty itself, as it was only from that parliament that the commissioners had derived their authority to treat at all. It was represented to his majesty that, having already confirmed these acts by treaty, no farther ratification was requisite than their publication in his name.

On the afternoon of the same day, a committee consisting of two members from each estate were appointed to wait on the king, to remonstrate against a breach of the privileges of parliament in his having confined one of the members.

Encroachment
of the king on the privileges of parliament—

* Stevenson, vol. iii. p. 998.

† Ibid., p. 999; Balfour's Memorials, p. 44.

A contest having occurred between the Earl of Wigton and Sir William Cockburn of Langton, regarding the office of hereditary usher to the parliament, Cockburn, whose title was afterwards sustained, had, before the case was decided, seized the mace and carried it before the king at his entrance into the house. A complaint having been made, his majesty, without investigation, issued a warrant for taking Cockburn into custody, and confining him in the castle. On the representation of the committee the king apologised,

—his apology. and two days afterwards declared

before parliament that he was not aware when he issued the warrant of Cockburn's having been a member of the house, and promised for himself, his heirs, and successors, that they should never commit any member during the sitting of parliament without the consent of the house. This declaration gave universal satisfaction, and it was ordered to be inserted in the record.

On the following day the national covenant, with Oath to be taken by members of parliament. the bond of obedience to the acts of the parliament of 1640, was approved by the king and the Estates, and, with a view to exclude from the house all who were unfriendly to these bonds, the following oath was appointed to be taken by every member before being admitted to his seat:—"We, undersubscribers, and every one of us do, in the presence of Almighty God, promise and vow that in this present parliament we shall faithfully and freely speak, answer, and express ourselves upon all and everything which is or shall be proposed, so far as we think in our conscience may conduce to the glory of God, the good and peace of the Church and State of this kingdom, and employ our best endeavours to promote the same, and shall in no ways advise, vote, or consent to anything which to our best knowledge we think not most expedient and conducive thereto; as also that we shall respect and defend, with our life, power, and estate, his majesty's royal person, honour, and estate, as is expressed in our national covenant, and likewise the power and privileges of parliament, and the lawful rights and liberties of the subjects, and by all good means and ways oppose and endeavour to bring to exact trial all such as either by force, practice, counsel, plots, conspiracies, or otherwise have done, or shall do, anything in prejudice of the purity of religion, the laws, liberties, and peace of the kingdom; and, farther, that we shall in all just and honourable ways endeavour to preserve union and peace betwixt the three kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland, and neither for hope, fear, nor other respects shall relinquish this vow and promise." One member only, the Earl of Carnwath, refused to take this obligation.

While the Scots were thus anxious to secure for themselves the blessings of civil and religious liberty, they were not indifferent to the claims of their brethren abroad on their sympathy and support. The king laid before parliament his manifesto in favour of his nephew, the Elector Palatine, with the resolution of the English parliament to support it; and the Estates having taken the matter into consideration, in a few days unanimously resolved to raise and maintain ten thousand men to unite with the English in endeavouring to recover the inheritance of the prince, and restore peace to Germany. Both the king and the elector warmly thanked the house for this resolution; and, although the troubles in which both kingdoms were shortly afterwards involved prevented its being carried into effect, yet the prince ever after entertained sentiments of high respect and gratitude both to the Scots and to the English dissenters, and could never be induced to take part with his uncle in the civil war raised against them.

When the treaty had been confirmed, an act was passed by previous arrangement similar to one that had been passed by the English parliament, having for its object to provide some effectual security for the tranquillity of both kingdoms. Its provisions were:—that neither kingdom should declare war against the other without giving three months' warning, nor without the consent of parliament; that each parliament should assist the other to prevent or repel foreign invasion, and suppress internal disturbance; and, lastly, that during the interval between triennial parliaments commissioners should be intrusted with the preservation of the peace. The first of these provisions was wise and salutary; the second occasioned some animosity by leading to the interposition of the Scots in the dissensions of England; and the third led to the total, though temporary, subversion of the monarchy.

With consent of the Estates, the king now ordained that the thirty-nine acts of the parliament of 1640 should, in conformity with the treaty, be published in his majesty's name as laws in force from the time of their enactment; and they were proclaimed accordingly on the first day of September following. Orders were also given by the king and parliament for disbanding the army, paying up their arrears, a mutual exchange of captures between the Scots and the English, and the demolition of all intrenchments thrown up on the Borders; and the 7th of September was appointed to be observed as a day of public thanksgiving in all the churches of the kingdom for the many blessings the Almighty had bestowed on both nations, and, in particular, for the happy cessation of hostilities granted by the treaty.

There was one point of great importance, which had occasioned much dissension at the framing of the treaty in London, and which, being then referred to the consideration of the Scottish parliament, was now resumed and contested with unabated obstinacy on both sides. This was the right of appointing the officers of State. The king insisted that the nomination of these officers was an unalienable part of his prerogative, and one of the principal supports of his government. This he maintained was a right which had at all times been exercised by the kings of Scotland, and had never before been called in question, either there or in England. The parliament, on the other hand, adduced a variety of instances, both in law and ancient usage, in which these functionaries had been chosen with advice of the Estates; and maintained that their election by the king alone had already occasioned many evils, and was likely to continue to do so, while the king from residing at a distance was necessarily but little acquainted with the state of the country, and consequently liable to be misled by the misrepresentations of selfish and designing parties. In justice to Charles, it must be admitted that this was an invasion of that prerogative which, even according to our modern notions, ought to belong inalienably to the crown. Deprived of this, indeed, it is difficult to conceive how a monarchical government can exist; and it affords a striking proof of the king's conviction of the helplessness of the position into which he had fallen from his own perversity, and through the influence of evil counsel, that he was at last prevailed on to surrender this last shadow of that kingly power, which he had vainly imagined to be unlimited. When he intimated his acquiescence to the house every member, rising from his seat, bowed reverentially to the throne in gratitude to his majesty for his condescension to the desire of his parliament. An act was then framed and passed, with one dissentient voice, proceeding upon the narrative of this concession on the part of the king, who now declared for himself and his successors that they would make choice of their counsellors with the advice and approbation of the Estates during their sitting, and in the intervals that might occur, only by the advice of their privy council, to be warned fifteen days previous to their assembling.

In return for these concessions, the Estates gratified the king by agreeing to liberate the "incendiaries and plotters," whose number was reduced to five. Their trial was referred to the committee during the recess, and their punishment was left to the determination of the king. Considerable difficulty was felt in making the appointments to the high offices of State, which were nearly all vacant, and for the more lucrative of which there was some competition. At length, however, it was arranged that the office of treasurer should, in the meantime, be put in commission, while Lord Loudoun was appointed chancellor; Gibson of Durie, clerk register; Roxburgh, lord privy seal; Sir Thomas Hope, lord-advocate; and Sir John Hamilton of Orbiston, lord justice-clerk. The Earl of Lanark was continued as secretary. Mr. Archibald Johnston received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed one of the lords of session, under the title of Lord Warriston. These offices were confirmed to their respective holders during good behaviour or life. Sir Robert Spottiswood, the president of the court of session, and three of the judges were, on account of certain alleged offences, removed from the bench; and, at the request of the Estates, eight of the privy counsellors were struck off the roll.

It was scarcely to be expected that the arrangements now completed would please all parties. The ultra-royalists and the less moderate of the presbyterians were both dissatisfied—the former with the concessions extorted from the king and the favours bestowed on the covenanters,* the latter with the leniency with which their enemies had been treated. The covenanters became reconciled to the Marquis of Hamilton on account of the moderation of his counsels, and consented to the withdrawal of his name from the list of "incendiaries;" and he soon rose to such influence among them that, in conjunction with Argyll, he in a great measure directed their councils. Falling in consequence under the suspicion of the king, he became an object of dislike and calumny to the royalists, who now meditated vengeance against both him and Argyll. The open reproaches and insults to which they were daily subjected at length attracted the attention of parliament, and led to an inquiry, in the course of which Lord Carnwath was accused of having said, "Now there are three kings in Scotland, but by God two of them" (naming Hamilton and Argyll) "shall lose their heads!" The charge, however, was dropped, as only one witness was adduced in its support. But Lord of the king.

Henry Ker, eldest son of the Earl of Roxburgh, accused Hamilton of being a juggler with the king, and a traitor both to him and his country; and, in a fit of intoxication, sent Lord Crawford, who was in the same condition, to deliver a message to that effect, together with a challenge to the marquis, who was at the time closeted with the king. Crawford burst furiously into the chamber, and, in the presence of the king and all around him, delivered his message in a most insolent and outrageous manner. Hamilton mildly replied, that if he would return on the morrow he would give him an answer; but the indignation of parliament was roused at such an insult having been offered to one of their members in the very presence of the sovereign. They accordingly complained to the king, but Hamilton interposed on behalf of the offender, to whose father he acknowledged he owed many obligations, and, on his knees, supplicated forgiveness for both him and Carnwath, to whose condition at the time he imputed the indiscretion. Parliament, however, refused to be satisfied until Ker had publicly acknowledged his fault, and sued for pardon both from them and the king.*

Hamilton embraced this favourable opportunity of applying to parliament for a public exoneration from all the charges that had been made against him, and the suspicions with which he was still haunted; and he had the gratification to obtain from the house a unanimous deed clearing him from all imputations of disloyalty to his king or country, and declaring him to be a true patriot and a faithful and loyal servant to his majesty.†

Not long after this a mysterious and alarming plot came to light, which, from its apparent want of connection with the leading events of the period, has been denominated "the Incident." The alleged principal conspirators were the Earl of Crawford, Colonel Cochrane, and Lieutenant-colonel Alexander Stewart; but several other persons, including the king himself, were said to have been in the secret. The object was to entrap the Marquis of Hamilton, his brother, Lord Lanark, and the Marquis of Argyll, and either to put them to death or hurry them on board a ship of war in Leith Roads, there to be detained until measures were taken to bring them to trial on a charge of treason. Colonel Cochrane was to have brought his regiment from Musselburgh to command the capital, and to secure some other of the leading members of parliament; many of the Kers, Homes, Johnstones, and other borderers were to repair to Edinburgh, and a strong effort was to be made to liberate Montrose and his fellow-prisoners, and give them the command of the castle. Fortunately, however, the secret transpired, and on the night in which the plot was to have been executed, the intended victims made their escape to Kinniel, a place of some strength, belonging to the Earl of Lanark, and situated near the confluence of the Avon with the Forth. Meanwhile, the report spread, the whole city was speedily in an uproar, and armed bands of the citizens kept watch during the night to preserve the peace and protect the popular nobles.

Next day the king repaired to parliament attended by about five armed men, who entering in a menacing way into the outer hall, excited great confusion and alarm among the members, who refused to proceed to business until General Leslie was commissioned to protect them with all the train-bands and other troops in the town and its neighbourhood, and every stranger who could avouch no lawful business was dismissed from the court and the city. When the house proceeded to investigate this extraordinary affair, the king expressed strong, and not unnatural, indignation against Hamilton, whom he accused of cowardice for having fled from the city, thereby, he alleged, giving rise to false and injurious reports dishonouring to himself and prejudicial to his government. He declared he had turned a deaf ear to insinuations made against Hamilton by persons of the first rank and greatest trust about him, but he would not interfere to screen from justice the best subject in all his dominions; and had Hamilton not been secured by the late declaration of parliament, he would himself have impeached him of treason. He professed an utter abhorrence of all plots, and swore by God that the parliament and the fugitive lords too behoved to clear his honour.*

A committee, consisting of the Lord-president Balmerino, the lord-chancellor, the Duke of Lennox, four barons, and four burgesses, were appointed to investigate the whole affair. But no two of the witnesses examined agreed in their depositions, and the whole affair is still involved in impenetrable obscurity. There is reason to suspect, however, that a plot of some kind had been formed against Hamilton and Argyll, whose ulterior views had now been made known to the king. It was, therefore, declared that they had good reason for withdrawing themselves, and they were requested to resume their places.

Intelligence of these events was transmitted by the English commissioners to London, where it excited considerable alarm among the members of the English parliament, who thought they saw in the Scottish conspiracy evidence of a design on the part of the king to interrupt the proceedings of the Estates; and as a rumour prevailed that a similar attempt was in contemplation in England, it was judged necessary to take immediate measures for the protection of the capital and of the parliament. A message was at the same time sent express to Scotland, offering to grant assistance for suppressing any internal disturbance.†

At this time a general apprehension was felt by the Protestants of both countries, arising from some vague reports of a secret correspondence indicating some movement on the part of the Romanists. It is impossible to say how far these surmises were connected with the Irish massacre, intelligence of which reached the king by express from the lords-justices of Ireland, on the 1st of November. With the exception of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, history affords no parallel to this horrible transaction. The Irish people, though conquered, had never been civilised by their conquerors, and had consequently never been completely subdued. From the first they entertained feelings of hostility against the Scotch and English settlers, whom they considered as intruders. These feelings, natural to all men, but particularly intense in a brave and semi-barbarous population, were aggravated to the highest degree by religious fanaticism. The new settlers were hated by the natives, because they belonged to a race that had conquered their country, and held them under the iron rule of despotism; but still more because most or all of them professed a creed adverse to their own, and which, in their estimation, rendered them fit objects of vengeance both human and Divine. This animosity was kept alive and exasperated by the priests, who, though tolerated in the exercise of their religion, and favoured by the government, notwithstanding the penal laws, viewed with indignation the appropriation of the ecclesiastical revenues to the maintenance of a worship which they denounced as heretical. In these circumstances there wanted but a spark to explode the mine that lay beneath the whole fabric of Irish society. Encouraged by the example of successful resistance on the part of the Scots, and the sturdy opposition of the English to the measures of government, it was at length considered that now was the time for re-asserting their national independence, reclaiming the revenues of their church, and sweeping the detested invaders from their soil. Accordingly a conspiracy was formed, having for its object the utter extermination of the intruders by one simultaneous and indiscriminate massacre. At the head of this atrocious combination were Lord Macguire and Sir Phelim O'Neale, men of great influence from their wealth and their ancient lineage, together with Roger More, a gentleman held in high reputation for his ability and courage. A certain day towards the end of October was fixed on for the commencement of the work of carnage. To O'Neale and his associates, who were ramified throughout the country, was assigned the task of making a simultaneous attack on the whole of the English settlements in the provinces, while Macguire and More were to surprise the Castle of Dublin. The discovery of the plot prevented the principal stronghold of the country, as well as the capital itself, from falling into the hands of the insurgents; but the work of death commenced on the appointed day throughout the whole provinces of the country, and was pursued with a fiendish cruelty, from the bare recital of which human nature recoils.

The details of this dreadful insurrection do not properly belong to Scottish history; but it may be proper to mention that every form of cruelty which the perverted ingenuity of the infuriated natives could devise was perpetrated upon the unfortunate settlers. No age, sex, or condition was spared. Husbands and wives, parents and children, were butchered in each other's sight, and in many instances subjected to the most lingering agonies. Whole families were stripped naked, and driven from their homes, to perish of cold and hunger on the hills or in the morasses. Children were induced in their terror to murder their parents, and parents their children, and then put to death themselves, while writhing under the agonies of remorse. Many were invited to mass, and being induced by promises of safety to renounce their profession, were then murdered lest they should relapse. It is shocking to think that these hellish cruelties were encouraged by the priests as meritorious acts in the sight of heaven, and that before the work of carnage began they administered the sacrament to the people, and over the elements exacted an oath to exterminate every Protestant in the island.

The numbers who perished in this massacre have been variously estimated, but have never been ascertained with any approach to accuracy. The episcopalians, with an evident desire to extenuate the horrors of the fearful tragedy, reckoned the number of the victims about forty thousand; while the papists, who gloried in it as a work of merit, boasted that they had slaughtered two hundred thousand persons.

It is painful to be obliged to record that suspicions were entertained that Charles himself was implicated in this shocking transaction. The rebels affirmed that they had acted under the king's authority, and, in proof of this, actually produced a commission, dated from Edinburgh, and sealed with the great seal of Scotland. It was alleged, however, that this document was a forgery, and no satisfactory evidence regarding it has ever been produced. Subsequent events contributed to strengthen the suspicions which were entertained of the king's complicity. Attempts have been made, not unsuccessfully, to throw the odium upon the queen; but these served only to deepen the suspicions against her husband, who seems to have been greatly swayed by her counsel.*

The first despatches received by the king related only to the province of Ulster, where the settlers being more numerous were not so easily attacked. Numbers of them had time to withdraw from the country, and those who remained combined for their own defence. Nevertheless many of them suffered the same dreadful calamities that befell so many of their countrymen; but the extent and revolting barbarities of the rebellion were not yet disclosed. The king hastened to submit his despatches to the consideration of parliament, and in doing so expressed a hope that the rising was but partial, and would be easily suppressed; but he added, that if he should have occasion to apply to them for assistance, he fully relied on their cordial support. A committee was appointed, who, after taking the matter into consideration, reported that they considered it would not be proper in the Scottish parliament to interfere at present—lest their motives should be mistaken, and a jealousy might thus be occasioned between them and the parliament of England, of which country, rather than Scotland, Ireland was a dependency; but they recommended, that in the event of the insurrection proving so serious as to call for assistance, the Scottish forces should be ready to co-operate with those of England in its suppression. When at last intelligence arrived of the extent and enormity of the rebellion, they made an offer of an immediate force offer of assistance, which was gratefully accepted, and the commissioners were directed to employ the aid thus granted for the relief of those parts of Ireland which lie nearest to Scotland. At the same time the English parliament plainly intimated their suspicion that the outbreak in Ireland had originated in the councils of the king himself, and was only part of a scheme for subverting the liberties of the three kingdoms. In making this startling declaration, however, they were careful not to impeach the honour of the king himself. "They had just cause," they said, "to believe that these conspiracies and commotions in Ireland are but the effect of the same councils, and if persons of such aims and conditions shall continue in credit, authority, and employment, the great aid which we shall be forced to draw from his people for subduing the rebellion in Ireland will be applied to the fomenting and cherishing of it there, and encouraging some such like attempt by the papists and ill-affected subjects in England; and, in the end, to the subversion of religion and destruction of his loyal subjects in both kingdoms." They therefore humbly entreated his majesty to dismiss these evil counsellors, and to employ such ministers only as should be approved by parliament.

The king now became suddenly impatient to leave Scotland, and parliament began to draw their sittings to a conclusion. Before rising, however, they passed a number of salutary acts, among which were—an act providing that each of the commissioners of shires should have a separate vote, instead of only one vote for each county, as had formerly been the practice, and that every one of them should be paid the sum of five pounds Scots daily during the sitting of parliament;—an act for regulating the commissary courts and fixing their fees;—and an act for the better administration of justice and the encouragement of learning. A commission of justiciary was also appointed to proceed, under the protection of a hundred and twenty armed men, to take order with the troublesome banditti who still continued their depredations in the north Highlands.

This parliament, the longest that had ever been Rising of parliament. held in Scotland, rose on the 17th of November, after having appointed another to meet on the first Tuesday of June, 1644; and in the evening the members were entertained by the king at a sumptuous banquet in the great gallery of the palace. The results of the session seemed to be satisfactory to all parties, with the exception of the king, who, with that infatuation which had already involved both himself and the nation in so many calamities, was, at the instigation of the lord-advocate, on the point of protesting that nothing done by the parliament should be injurious to his royal prerogative; and he already began to cherish hopes, secretly suggested by some of his pernicious counsellors, that all the acts to which he had reluctantly assented might be safely annulled so soon as the present excitement of the public should be allayed, and his apparent acquiescence should lull the covenanters into fancied security.* Before taking his departure, the king seemed anxious to conciliate some of the leading Scottish nobility. By a patent passed under the great seal, and bearing date at "Holyrood House, 15th of November, 1641," Archibald, Earl of Argyll, was created a marquis, with the superadded titles of Earl of Kintyre and Lord of Lorn; Lords Loudoun and Lindsay were raised to the rank of earls; and the brave old General Leslie was created Earl of Leven, and had a handsome pecuniary recompense bestowed upon him. Some provision was also made for the more regular and adequate maintenance of ministers, and for the support of the universities—a provision, however, which was never punctually realised.

The General Assembly, according to appointment, had met at St. Andrew's on the 20th of July; but as parliament was to meet about the same time, and as many of the commissioners to the assembly were also members of parliament, it was judged expedient to adjourn until the 27th of July, and to transfer the meetings to Edinburgh. Both of these great councils accordingly were convened in the capital, the assembly holding its sittings in the forenoon of each day, and the parliament in the afternoon. The assembly was opened by the Earl of Wemyss, as the king's commissioner, who delivered a message from his majesty, in which he intimated an intention to secure the liberties of the Church, and, in the exercise of the patronage of the crown, to appoint none to the vacant parishes but able and efficient ministers. He promised also to concur in every measure tending to the encouragement of learning, by the supporting of schools and colleges; and in return requested their prayers in his behalf, and their endeavours to inculcate upon the people the duty of paying honour and obedience to him as "God's vicegerent for good." The assembly, in their reply, assured his majesty of an interest in their prayers, of their exertions to preserve tranquillity, and to enforce both by precept and example the duty of paying that honour to his majesty to which he was entitled by all laws human and divine. Henderson was once more chosen moderator, as several difficult and important matters, requiring much prudence and ability in their management, were expected to occupy, and possibly to divide, the assembly.

The decision of the assembly at Aberdeen regarding private meetings, so far from setting that question at rest, had been satisfactory to neither party, and the contest between

Mr. Henry Guthrie and the Laird of Leekie was now renewed with greater warmth than ever. Guthrie was still bent on the entire suppression of these meetings, while Leekie and his adherents were urgent for the abolition of the act of Aberdeen, as still laying an injurious restriction on the liberty of private Christians. The contest was not confined to the assembly: many of the private citizens of Edinburgh still kept up the meetings in defiance of the act of Aberdeen, and demanded its repeal. This dispute, both sides of which were supported by able and distinguished men, threatened to introduce disunion into the assembly, and to be productive of serious injury to the cause of religion, if not to the stability of the Church. It was in a great measure owing to the management of Henderson that the question was at last brought to a satisfactory solution. The act of Aberdeen was set aside, and a new act passed, securing to private Christians the privilege of holding unmolested, meetings for prayer, exhortation, and religious conference; and simply guarding against particular dangers and abuses to which such meetings might be liable. It is but justice to many of the distinguished men who were opposed to these meetings, except in the family circle, to observe that they seem to have been in a great measure influenced by the fear of the spread of independency to which such meetings were supposed to tend, and to which, as presbyterians, they had strong conscientious objections.

The efforts of the Scottish ministers in London to propagate presbyterian principles had been attended with a large measure of success; and now that prelacy was on the eve of being subverted in England, it became a question of grave importance what form of church government should be adopted.

Communication from English churches. A communication was at this time received from several ministers in England, particularly in London and its neighbourhood, requesting the opinion of the assembly on this subject. They expressed a hope of getting presbyterian discipline ultimately established in England, but added, "Almighty God, having now of his infinite goodness raised up our hopes of removing the yoke of episcopacy under which we have so long groaned, sundry other forms of church government are, by sundry sorts of men, projected to be set up in the room thereof, the chief of which is independency—a system which asserts that every separate congregation forms a complete Church within itself, subject to the authoritative influence of no other, and possessing all the powers requisite for conducting the spiritual concerns of its members." It would not appear from the request they made to the assembly that they were much disinclined to independency themselves, or, at all events, that they considered the choice between it and presbyterianism to be of vital importance; and they seemed to have been under the impression that the party in the assembly favourable to the religious meetings viewed the matter as one nearly of indifference. In requesting the opinion of the assembly they indirectly apologised by saying, "as some famous and eminent brethren among yourselves do somewhat incline unto an approbation of that way of government." The assembly unanimously rejected independency as being contrary to the national covenant, and directed the moderator to write a courteous letter to their English brethren, informing them of their unanimous decision against independency as well as episcopacy.* They expressed, however, an earnest desire "that there might be in both kirks but one confession, one directory for public worship, one catechism, and one form of kirk government," as laying "a sure foundation for a permanent peace." The last act of this assembly was to appoint the next to be held at St. Andrew's, on the 27th July, 1642.

The king's visit to Scotland had in some degree retrieved his lost popularity. He left behind him a government in whose integrity and ability the nation had confidence; every concession that had been demanded had been made to the Church; and parliament, now in a great measure reformed, was rendered free and independent. There still existed, however, two hostile parties in the State—the ultra-royalists, or the advocates of unlimited prerogative; and the constitutional party, who approved of a limited monarchy, and were contented with the order of things that had now been established.

State of the nation. Political and ecclesiastical parties.

At the head of the former were Traquair and Montrose; the principal men among the latter were Argyll, Loudoun, and Balmerino—noblemen of tried patriotism, ardent love of liberty, and distinguished talents. Nor was the Church undivided. The zealous conscientious presbyterians, anxious for the preservation of their church polity, because they considered it most in accordance with scriptural example and conducive to the interests of religion, or what in later times has been denominated the evangelical party, formed one section; while another was composed of men who were violent sticklers about outward forms, but were reputed to be less solicitous about practical piety. These were the "moderates" of that time—a name which they assumed to themselves, and which has survived even to the present day. Among the former were Rutherford, Blair, Gillespie, and Cant, who afterwards became martyrs to their principles; among the latter, Guthrie, Dalgleish, and Colville, whose inconstancy was subsequently rewarded with a mitre. For the present, however, they acted in concert; the evangelical party submitting, for the sake of peace, to many things of which they did not altogether approve.

No sooner had the king returned to London than the bishops, who could not penetrate his motives or his secret designs, loudly reproached him for having conceded to the Scots all their demands, and thus undone in a day all that his father and himself had been labouring for forty years to establish. Charles was deeply affected by these remonstrances, but suppressing for the present his real sentiments, he accepted of a splendid entertainment given him by the city of London, in testimony of their grateful approbation of the concessions he had made to the Scots; and he even issued orders that in all the parish churches in England the Scots should be declared his faithful and loyal subjects.*

The example of Scotland had contributed not a little to rouse the spirit of the English nation; and their representatives in parliament were now fully resolved to impose such limits on the royal prerogative as should for the future secure the liberties of the country from arbitrary invasion. One of

The remonstrance. their first steps was to frame the celebrated remonstrance, in which they exhibited an appalling picture of the state of the kingdom. The grievances of the people were painted in the strongest colours; the whole history of Charles's reign up to that time was passed under review; every act of misgovernment, with its calamitous consequences, was strongly depicted, and the whole traced to the influence of evil counsellors, many of whom were still retained about the royal person. For these complicated evils they pointed out as an effectual remedy the removal of his majesty's present advisers, and the appointment of others possessing the confidence of the parliament and the nation. In this demand, which seemed necessary for their own safety, they were encouraged by the concession already made to the Scottish parliament of a potential voice in the nomination of the high officers of the State; and their well-grounded distrust of the king's sincerity, led them to look on a similar concession to themselves as a measure without which every other would be nugatory.

The commission of the Earl of Essex, as captain-general of the army, having expired on the king's return, that nobleman hastened to return it into his majesty's hands, and intimated to the house of peers that the army was no longer under his command. The king now sent for the lord-keeper, and ordered him to inform the parliament that as he considered his personal presence a sufficient safeguard, he had dismissed the guard which had been appointed to protect them during his absence; but, at the same time, assured them that if he should see any necessity for further security it should be at once provided. This unexpected message excited the jealousy and alarm of parliament, and an answer was instantly returned in the name of both houses, praying that the guard should be continued until they should have time to convince the king of its necessity. The king's reply, which was sent down the next day, did not serve to quiet their apprehensions. He told them, "That he had commanded the guards to be dismissed, because he knew no cause they had to fear, and because it was a great trouble to his subjects that were to perform that service, besides disquieting the people with strange apprehensions and jealousies; and that his majesty expects, when the parliament shall require anything extraordinary, as this is, they shall give particular reasons for it; yet his majesty is so tender of the parliament's safety that he will command the Earl of Dorset to appoint some of the train-bands, only for a few days, to wait on both houses, and if in that time he should be satisfied there is just reason, shall continue them, and likewise shall take such a course for the safety of his own person as shall be fit, of which his majesty doubts not they will be as careful as their own."

Any feeble remains of mutual confidence between the king and the parliament were now extinguished, and a mutual distrust and jealousy had succeeded, which could not long subsist with safety to the State. The "Incident" in Scotland had made a deep and lasting impression on the English parliament, and among their reasons for desiring a continuance of the guard, the dread of a similar attempt being made upon some of themselves was freely expressed. Their apprehensions, they acknowledged, were heightened by the numbers of suspicious and desperate characters who were known to be lurking about Westminster; they referred to the circumstance of the plot in Scotland having been known in London several days before its discovery in that country, as a proof of its having originated in no casual or sudden impulse; as a further ground of alarm, they instanced the declaration of some of the leaders of the Irish rebellion, that a similar outbreak was in contemplation both in England and Scotland, the threatening speeches and secret meetings of papists in different parts of the kingdom, and the rumours that had reached England from the Continent, that a general expectation prevailed among the Roman Catholics of foreign countries of a great religious and political change being about to take place, in which "the necks of both parliaments should be broken."

Immediately after the transmission of this reply a committee was appointed to present the remonstrance, together with a petition to the king. His answer was evasive, and expressive of so strong a resolution not to abridge the power of the bishops,—for some modification of which the parliament had supplicated,—that the jealousies of both parties were rather fomented than allayed. During this interview an expression dropped from the king which served to corroborate the suspicions that were entertained of his having been privy to and encouraged the Irish rebellion. He had been requested to reserve the lands which might be forfeited by the Irish rebels for the support of the crown and the indemnification of the people of England for the expense of suppressing the rebellion, on which he remarked, "We must not dispose of the bear's skin until the bear be dead." The contrast of the indifference and levity thus manifested, with the ready offer of the estates of the Scottish nobility and gentry to such of their vassals and tenants as should attach themselves to the royal cause, was regarded as affording a strong presumption of his guilt.

On the first intelligence of the rebellion the parliament had resolved to borrow money and raise troops for its suppression; and a message on that subject now arriving from the king, a bill was introduced for a compulsory levy of men for this service; but this urgent measure was obstructed by the mutual distrust of the commons and the king, each of whom, anxious to obtain the command of the army, contended for the right of appointing the officers. In the meantime, the protestants in Ireland still continued to suffer from the fanatical cruelty of their persecutors; and the Scots having sent commissioners to concert measures with the English parliament for sending forces to the relief of their brethren, the commons passed a vote that the offer of the Scots to raise ten thousand men should be accepted; but to this the House of Lords refused to assent unless an English army equal in amount should be sent—the ostensible reason being that the Scots if successful might take possession of the island for themselves.

This was not the first occasion on which important measures passed by the commons had been delayed, mutilated, or rejected by the House of Lords; and the former, strong in the support of the nation, and emboldened by their success in grappling with the illegal powers usurped by the crown, were now in no humour to submit to be baffled by the nobility. A committee was accordingly appointed to draw up the basis of a conference between the two houses, the object being to represent the dissatisfaction of the commons with the rejection by the peers of many measures which the former had deemed of essential importance to the public weal; and to intimate that, if this course should be persisted in, the commons would be constrained, in conjunction with such of their lordships as might be disposed to co-operate with them, to represent the matter to the king, in order that some means might be adopted to prevent interruption to the public service. These obstructions were chiefly owing to the lords spiritual, who, in combination with a small body of the peers, could at any time form a majority, and thus nullify any measure displeasing to the court. Various indirect attempts had been made by the commons to remove the bishops from the House of Lords—a measure now ardently wished by the great body of the citizens of London, and, indeed, by the majority of the nation. The imprudence of the rash conduct of the bishops contributed to bring about of the bishops. this event sooner than had been expected. In passing to the House of Lords through a tumultuous assemblage of the citizens, Williams, Archbishop of York, having been assailed by the cry of "No bishops!" rashly turned aside to seize with his own hands a young man who had been particularly loud and forward in his vociferations. The youth was rescued by the crowd, but some of the king's attendants, having with inconsiderate zeal attacked them with drawn swords, a tumult ensued, which soon spread through the whole of London and Westminster; and the bishops, seizing the opportunity, withdrew from parliament under the pretence that their persons were in danger, at the same time protesting against the validity of all acts which might be passed in their absence. The object of this adroit movement was to interrupt the progress of a bill then actually in dependence for the abolition of episcopacy. When information of the protest reached the commons, they immediately impeached of high treason all who had signed it, and the prelates were forthwith committed to the Tower. Their impeachment by the commons.

Charles was impatient to get rid of the parliament, which, however, he could not dissolve without their own consent; but enraged at the boldness of some of the leading members of the House of Commons, he ordered the attorney-general to enter an accusation of high treason against five of their number in the House of Peers. A sergeant-at-arms was accordingly sent down to the commons to demand that the accused might be delivered up. This demand was resisted by the Speaker until the house should have time to consider a matter of such grave importance. Impatient of delay, Charles the day after hastened to the house, attended by a body of five hundred armed men, for the purpose of arresting the obnoxious members, but they had received private information of the king's intention, and had sought refuge in the city. This rash and most culpable step put an end to all hope of reconciliation, and may be regarded as the final cause of the civil war. The next day the king ordered the lord-mayor to summon a meeting of the common council at Guildhall, and having proceeded thither in person, he commanded them to take measures for the arrest of the fugitives. His order was disregarded, and his authority was treated with contempt. It is worthy of remark that only a day or two before, in answer to a petition from the commons for a guard to be selected from among the citizens of London, and commanded by the Earl of Essex, he had protested before almighty God that he had neither knowledge or belief of any violence being intended against them, and assured them, on the word of a king, that he should ever be as solicitous about their security as about that of himself or his children. The breach between the king and the commons was now complete. This unconstitutional proceeding was justly regarded as an attempt to re-establish his power on the ruins of parliament. The cry of "Privilege!

Agitation and privilege!" was raised by the alarm of the members and echoed by the nation, country. and the whole country was agitated and alarmed. The commons voted that they could sit no longer without a guard in whom they could confide, and an ample vindication of their outraged privileges; and, having appointed a committee of their number to meet at Guildhall, they immediately adjourned. The citizens of London presented a petition to the king, in which they freely expressed their alarm at the attack which he had made on the privileges of parliament; but Charles obstinately persisted in the fatal course he had begun. He fortified Whitehall, supplied it with men and ammunition, placed a garrison in the Tower, with orders to employ violence if there should be occasion, and issued a proclamation for the apprehension of the accused members. But the current of popular feeling was too strong to be resisted. The five members re-

He could not then foresee that in a short time he should return as a prisoner. He removed with the queen and the whole royal family first to Hampton Court, and two days afterwards to Windsor. Here, in presence of the queen, he held a cabinet council, at which it was resolved that her majesty should proceed to Holland, taking with her the Princess Mary, who, though quite a child, had been for some time affianced to the

It was further arranged that she was to endeavour to secure foreign assistance, and to carry with her the crown jewels, which she was to pledge for ready money, for the purchase of arms and ammunition to assist the king in a contest with the parliament—a measure on which he had already secretly determined. It was farther agreed that his majesty should come to no terms with the parliament until the result of the queen's expedition should be known, and that, in the meantime, he should endeavour to gain possession of the important fortresses of Portsmouth and Hull, where the arms and artillery of the army of the north had been deposited.

Parliament soon became aware of these hostile machinations, and immediately adopted measures for their frustration. Orders were dispatched to Colonel Goring, governor of Ports-

without express authority, not merely from the king, but from both houses of parliament. Sir John Hotham was sent to Hull to secure the magazines there, under orders similar to those given to Goring; and the lieutenant and deputy-lieutenant of the Tower were commanded to prevent the removal of any arms and ammunition without authority from the king signified by both houses of parliament. The king, on the other hand, set about attempting to gain over the officers of the disbanded army, and assembled troops and collected warlike stores at Windsor, so that no doubt remained of his intention to carry matters to the last extremity.

indeed was the intimate connection between the two kingdoms that neutrality was impossible. The Scottish commissioners, accordingly, anxious to prevent a civil war, presented a respectful address to his majesty, in which they expressed deep concern at the dissensions that had arisen between him and his English subjects, which they attributed to the machinations of papists, prelates, and other enemies, alike to his majesty and the common weal, and humbly offered their services for bringing about a reconciliation by clearing up those mistakes, and removing those causes of mutual distrust, which had led to such unhappy differences. They besought him to rely with confidence on the wisdom of parliament, and to follow their advice as a means of re-establishing the tranquillity of the kingdom; they acknowledged the obligations they were under to his majesty for the favours he had conferred upon them on his late visit; they expressed their gratitude to the English parliament for the assistance they had given in settling the troubles by which Scotland had been distracted; and implored "the most honourable house, in the depth of their wisdom, to think timeously upon the fairest and fittest ways of composing all present differences, to the glory of God, the good of the Church and State of both kingdoms, and to his majesty's honour and contentment, wherein," they add, "if our faithful endeavours may be any way useful, we shall be most ready at all occasions to contribute the same." But the plan suggested by the Scots for the purpose of averting the horrors of civil war, and composing the differences which had arisen between the king and the parliament, did not meet with his majesty's approval, and he expressed his strong displeasure that they should have thus interfered with public affairs, without first acquainting him in private with their intention.

A crisis was now at hand, which speedily led to an open declaration of hostilities between the king and the commons. The whole tenor of his government had produced in the parliament a deep distrust of his sincerity, and a conviction that the concessions extorted from him would be resumed on the first favourable opportunity. They felt constrained, therefore, by a regard both to the public welfare, and to their own safety, to abridge those regal powers which the king had hitherto employed to violate the rights and liberties of the nation, and demanded that the command of the militia should, for a time at least, be entrusted to officers possessing the confidence of both houses. thing remained, therefore, but an appeal to arms. From the time, indeed, of his majesty's attempt to seize the five members war had clearly been inevitable; and, though negotiations were still carried on between the king and the parliament, both parties were making active preparations for the impending struggle. At length, on the 25th of August, 1642, the royal standard was raised at Nottingham. The first encounter between the two parties in this disastrous contest took place at Edgehill, in Warwickshire, on the 23rd of October, in which above five thousand men fell, and both sides claimed the victory. The war was carried on for some time in a languid and desultory manner. In the interval between the close of the Resumption first and the commencement of the of negotiations. second campaign, the two houses sent commissioners to Oxford, where the king had established his head-quarters, with proposals of peace. The terms which they offered were that the militia should be left to the disposal of parliament, and the high officers of State appointed with their approbation; that papists should be disarmed, delinquents brought to trial, episcopacy abolished, and ecclesiastical controversies settled by an assembly of divines. The king, on the other hand, demanded that his towns, forts, ships, and revenues should be restored; the illegal power usurped by parliament disclaimed; the Book of Common Prayer authorised; and a free trade allowed till the treaty was concluded—for the purpose, no doubt, of procuring from the north the supplies and stores which the queen had imported. When their proposals were so widely different, it was evidently impossible to effect any satisfactory arrangement between the hostile parties. An attempt, however, was made by the Scots to mediate between them, but it soon became apparent that though both parties were anxious to obtain their aid, neither wished their intercession.

At this juncture the Chancellor Loudoun was dispatched by the Scottish council to the king at York, to renew their offer of mediation, but he found his majesty altogether indisposed to listen to any conciliatory advice. Loudoun was speedily sent back to Scotland with instructions to lay before the privy council a full statement of the injuries which the English parliament had inflicted upon the king, and the encroachments which they had made on the royal prerogatives, and to procure from them a declaration in his favour. Accordingly, on the return of the chancellor, a meeting of the privy council was summoned, which was numerous attended, both by the nobles who were attached to the king's party, and by the friends of the parliament. The former expected to carry "some solid and vigorous resolution for re-establishing and maintaining his majesty's authority and royal power," which "had of late suffered detriment and diminution;" but, finding themselves outnumbered, they allowed the proposal to drop, and, at the request of the king, the council resolved not to interfere in the matter.

Shortly after this occurrence, the General Assembly met at St. Andrew's, on the 27th of July, and strenuous efforts were made, both by the king and the parliament, to secure its support. His majesty's letter, which was delivered by Lord Dunfermline, the commissioner, expressed his resolution to govern the people of Scotland "only by their own laws," and the Church "by its own canons and constitutions;" and promised that where anything was amiss it should be reformed "in a fair and orderly way," or where a reformation was settled it should be maintained and defended against all trouble from without, and all heresies, sects, and schisms arising within. The parliament, on the other hand, expressed their sorrow that their labours for a due reformation in the Church and State had been interrupted by the "plots and practices of a malignant party of papists and ill-affected persons, especially the corrupt and dissolute clergy." A letter was at the same time received from some of the English ministers, declaring that it was the earnest desire of "the most godly and considerate part of them, that the presbyterian government, which hath just and evident foundation, both in the Word of God and religious reason, might be established among them, and that they should have one Confession of Faith, one directory of worship, and one form of church government."

The assembly caught eagerly at this proposal. They entertained an inveterate antipathy to prelacy, not only on account of the unconstitutional and tyrannical manner in which it had been forced upon the people of Scotland, but because they regarded this system as the great bulwark of despotism, and as the main obstacle in the way of the reformation of religion, the preservation of their own hard-won rights, and of a permanent and cordial union between the two kingdoms. Without a uniformity of ecclesiastical polity, they say, "We cannot hope for any long time to enjoy our purity and peace, which hath cost us so dear, and is now our chiefest comfort and greatest treasure. For what hope can the kingdom and Kirk of Scotland have of a firm and durable peace till prelacy, which hath been the main cause of their miseries and troubles, first and last. be plucked up root and branch as a plant which God hath not planted, and from which no better fruits can be expected than such sour grapes as this day hath set on edge the kingdom of England?"* They accordingly drew up a supplication to his majesty, earnestly entreating him to establish "throughout all his dominions unity in religion and uniformity of church government;" and they appointed Lord Maitland, afterwards the notorious Duke of Lauderdale, the persecutor of the covenanters, to present this supplication to the king, and to carry their answer to the English parliament. They also petitioned the privy council and the conservators of the peace to concur with them in their addresses to the king and the parliament, appointed a fast to implore the Divine blessing upon their exertions, and nominated a commission to sit during the intervals of the meetings of assembly, and to use every effort to promote the important object they had in view.

The king returned an evasive answer to this supplication, but the English parliament, in their reply to the friendly letter of the assembly, expressed their determination to overthrow the prelatial form of church government, as "evil, justly offensive and burdensome, a great impediment to reformation and the growth of religion, and very prejudicial to the kingdom." They cautiously avoided, however, giving any distinct pledge that they would establish one form of church government in all his majesty's dominions; but contented themselves with expressing a hope that they would be so directed as to cast out whatever was offensive to God, or justly displeasing to any neighbouring Church; and they concluded by inviting the Church of Scotland to send some of their learned and godly ministers to the assembly which they had resolved to call for the purpose of reforming the doctrine, worship, and discipline of the Church. The commission received this communication with great satisfaction, and immediately proceeded to choose the delegates, who afterwards met with the assembly of divines at Westminster.

Hostilities having now actually commenced between the king and the commons of England, the Scottish privy council, and the commissioners whom the late parliament had appointed for the conservation of the peace, renewed their offers of mediation. After various intrigues, and petitions, and counter petitions to the council, for the purpose of eliciting a declaration in favour of one or other of the hostile parties, commissioners were at length selected to proceed to Oxford, to mediate between the king and the parliament. Their intercession, however, was again declined by his majesty, who probably regarded them as very unlikely to prove impartial umpires. They then requested the royal authority to call a parliament in Scotland, but this was also refused by the king, who assured them that the great mass of the English nation did not desire a —rejected by the change of church government, and the king. that those who did were equally averse to presbytery as to episcopacy, and if they should succeed in abolishing the latter, would certainly not consent to the establishment of the former in its room. The commissioners, after spending nearly four months in a fruitless interchange of remonstrances and answers, finding that their efforts had entirely failed, and that their letters were intercepted, their persons ridiculed, and even threatened by the courtiers, returned home in disgust.*

Immediately on their arrival, a meeting of the privy council, and of the conservators of the peace, was held, and the Estates. as the king's sanction for the assembling of a parliament could not be obtained, it was resolved to summon a convention of the Estates without his authority. Unable to prevent this meeting, for which several precedents could be pleaded, the king endeavoured to limit its powers to the specific objects of providing supplies for the army in Ireland, and procuring payment of the brotherly assistance, which had been delayed on account of the civil war in England. But the Estates declared themselves a free convention, on which Hamilton, with his brother, the Earl of Lanark, and several other noblemen, protested against the authority of the meeting, and withdrew.

Ambassadors from the English parliament had for some time been anxiously expected. Their affairs had now begun to assume an unfavourable aspect. The northern counties had been freed from the parliamentary troops by the queen parliament— and the Marquis of Newcastle, who pressed hard upon Lord Fairfax and his son in Yorkshire. The forces of Essex had suffered severely from sickness; the army of Waller in the west was annihilated; and Bristol, then the second city in the kingdom, had been taken by Prince Rupert. In this critical position of affairs, the parliament turned their eyes towards Scotland, and in the beginning of August, 1643, sent Sir William Armyne, Sir Harry Vane the younger, Thomas Hatcher, and Henry Darley, Esqs., with the Rev. Stephen Marshall and Philip Nye, the former a presbyterian, the latter an independent minister, who appeared for the assembly of divines, as commissioners to the convention and the General Assembly, which had met on the 2nd of the month, earnestly to entreat their speedy assistance "in the straits and perplexities of want and danger by which they were surrounded." The arrival of these commissioners at this juncture excited a deep interest throughout the whole community, and they received a cordial welcome from the covenanters. It soon became evident that they were prepared to give the succour which their brethren of England solicited. In vain did the royalists urge the allegiance which the Scottish nation owed their native king; the favours which he had conferred upon them; his compliance with all their demands; his formal ratification of their rights and privileges; and the clause in the late treaty which provided that neither kingdom should declare war against the other without the previous consent of parliament. In vain did Charles himself privately promise that he would bestow large revenues on the leaders of the covenanters, and confer every third office of emolument or trust upon a Scotchman, if they would declare in his favour, or at least remain neutral in the struggle. The covenanters

They entertained a profound conviction, founded alike on their knowledge of the character of the king, and observation of his treatment of the Scottish Church and nation, that his recent concessions were insincere, that they were made not from any conviction of their reasonableness or justice, but from necessity, and that they would be revoked the moment this pressure was removed and the English parliament crushed.* On the broad basis, therefore, of self-preservation, they considered themselves justified in making common cause with the commons of England in their efforts to maintain their rights, and to extirpate that system of church government which was the great bulwark of absolute power. "Necessity," said the famous Alexander Henderson, in a speech to the English parliament, September, 1643, "necessity, which hath in it a kind of sovereignty, and is a law above all laws, and, therefore, is said to have no law, doth mightily press the Church and kingdom of Scotland at this time." The northern counties of England were already the seat of war; a Scottish army was, therefore, required to protect the Border districts from the depredations of the hostile parties; and as the poverty of the country must have rendered the maintenance of a large body of troops pecuniary burdensome, and the brotherly assistance had been intercepted by the war, neutrality was all but impossible. The commissioners from the English commons pleaded, that by a clause in the treaty of peace made in 1641, the parliament of either country was to send reciprocal assistance to repel invasion, or to suppress internal disturbances; and both inclination and policy induced the covenanters to lend a ready ear to the request of their southern friends, who, after all, were only following the lesson which they had taught them. "If, now," they said, "we forsake them, we forsake our dearest friends, who can best help us should we be reduced to the like straits hereafter by the common adversary; by suffering them to sink, we not only betray their safety, but our own. If we suffer the parliament of England to be cut off, we have lost our peace with England, because after our disappointment, through breach of the declaration at Dunse, we resolved to seek not a present, but a durable peace for ourselves and our posterity. The surest means we could pitch on was to settle our demands by advice of the parliament of England as the best caution and warrant of our peace; but if they be destroyed, and the prelatical faction, the workers of our woe, obtain the power, we may expect war from them and the king ere three months pass; nor will they want pretences. They know all their disappointments have proceeded from Scotland. Resistance to the king they call rebellion and treason, and they have already ventured to assert that the king was not bound to preserve what he had granted us, because by keeping this convention we have first broken with him. So long as our enemies sit at the helm," they go on to say, "so long as the king's council and conduct are governed by those who make him by extra-judicial declarations weaken or destroy whatever is enacted by an assembly or parliament," they could have no security for their liberties; "but, above all," they add, "if the English parliament were put down, what security would they have against such plots as the Irish, and those lately detected?"

The statement respecting the Irish plots refers to the discovery of a dangerous intrigue, concocted by the Earl of Antrim, for the purpose of inducing General Munro, the commander of a strong force which the Scottish parliament had sent to the assistance of the Irish Protestants, to betray his trust, and to transfer his troops to England to the assistance of the king.* The plot was brought to light by the apprehension of the earl, and the seizure of his papers, among which were found a plan for the seduction of the Scottish army, and a commission from the king to treat with the Irish rebels. The alarm which this discovery excited contributed not a little to promote the union between the English parliament and the Scottish covenanters.

It was at first proposed by the English commissioners that there should be merely a civil league between the kingdoms, for the purpose of securing mutual support against the common enemy, but the assembly urged that there should be a religious union for the abolition of prelacy, and the establishment of uniformity in religion throughout both countries. This proposal was ultimately agreed to, and the covenant was renewed under the title of the Solemn League and Covenant, and embraced by England as well as Scotland. This famous document consisted in an oath, to be subscribed by all persons in both kingdoms, whereby they bound themselves to preserve the reformed religion in the Church of Scotland, in doctrine, worship, discipline and government, and to promote its reformation according to the Word of God and the example of the best reformed Churches, and to endeavour to bring the Churches of God in the three kingdoms to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, confession of faith, form of church government, directory for worship, and catechising—to endeavour, without respect of persons, the extirpation of popery, prelacy (that is, church government by archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans and chapters, archdeacons, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy), and whatsoever shall be found contrary to sound doctrine and the power of godliness—to preserve the rights and privileges of the parliaments, and the liberties of the kingdoms, and the king's person and authority in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms—to endeavour the discovery of incendiaries and malignants, who hinder the reformation of religion, and divide the king from his people, that they may be brought to punishment—to endeavour to preserve to all posterity a firm peace and union between the two kingdoms; finally, to assist and defend all such as should enter into this covenant, and not suffer themselves to be withdrawn from it, whether to revolt to the opposite party or to give in to a detestable indifference or neutrality.*

The covenant, which was drawn up by Henderson, was adopted by the assembly with remarkable unanimity and cordiality. "It was so heartily embraced," says an eye-witness, "and with such a torrent of affectionate expressions as none but eye and ear-witnesses can conceive. When the vote of some old ministers was asked their joy was so great that tears did interrupt their expressions."† —ratified by the English parliament. It was immediately presented to the convention of Estates, by whom it was received and ratified with the same cordiality. It was then transmitted to London by commissioners appointed for the purpose; and on the 25th of September it was solemnly confirmed and sworn by the lords and commons, and the assembly of divines in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster.‡ Having been thus adopted by the English parliament, and ordered to be subscribed by the nation, the solemn league was sent back to Edinburgh, where it was ordained by the commission of the Church and the committee of Estates to be sworn and subscribed throughout the kingdom, and the recusants were threatened both with ecclesiastical censures and civil penalties, as enemies to religion, his majesty's honour, and the peace of these kingdoms.

It has been frequently asserted that the independents overreached the Scottish clergy in the framing of the solemn league, by procuring the insertion of the clause which binds them to reform the Church of England "according to the Word of God and the example of the best reformed Churches," and that this equivocal clause, which was introduced by the dexterity of Sir Harry Vane, completely blinded the presbyterians, who, assuming their own to be the purest Church, never doubted that it was intended to serve as a model for England; while some, at least, of the English commissioners tacitly reserved the right of explaining the clause in a sense applicable to their own ideas of church government. The independents, however, could not allege that any of the reformed Churches were at this time constituted in accordance with their principles; and the covenanters, though they certainly regarded presbytery as the system most agreeable to the Word of God, and to the example of the best reformed Churches, were far from insisting that their Church should be the only model followed in the reformation of the Church of England. They entertained the hope, indeed, in entering into this league, that the blessings of a purer worship and more scriptural form of polity which they enjoyed might be extended also to England, but they never supposed that the Scottish form of church government would be adopted by their brethren in the south, without some alteration suited to their circumstances. "We are not to conceive," says Henderson, in a letter dated 1642, "that they will embrace our form. A new form must be set down for us all. And although we should never come to this unity in religion and uniformity of worship, yet my desire is to see what form England shall pitch upon before we publish ours."*

Having entered into this treaty of alliance, the covenanters lost no time in adopting vigorous measures to carry it into effect. On the 24th of August the convention issued a proclamation in the king's name, ordering all "the fencible men" of the kingdom, from sixteen to sixty, to provide themselves with forty days' provision, and with ammunition and arms, and to be in readiness to repair to the place of rendezvous appointed by the Estates. The call was so cordially responded to by the country, that before the close of the year, a well-disciplined army of upwards twenty thousand men was assembled on the Borders, under the command of Alexander Leslie, Earl of Leven. An experienced officer, named William Baillie, was appointed his lieutenant, and David Leslie major-general. The Earl of Leven was severely blamed for having accepted the command of the army on this occasion, after having promised the king that he would not again take up arms against him; but he alleged, in his own vindication, that his promise was given "with the express and necessary condition that religion and the country's right were not in hazard."† The Scottish generals were to be subjected to the orders of a committee in both kingdoms. The pay of the army was fixed at thirty pounds a month. It was stipulated that no separate peace should be made by either kingdom—that the auxiliaries should not be employed for any other purpose than that for which they had entered England, and that they should evacuate the country at the close of the war.

‡ "The manner of taking of it was this—The covenant was read [article by article], and then notice was given that each person, by immediately swearing thereunto, worship the great name of God, and testify so much outwardly by lifting up their hands, and then they went up into the chancel, and there subscribed their names in a roll of parchment in which the covenant was fairly written."—Rushworth, vol. v. p. 475.

Before crossing the Border, the convention published a manifesto to explain the object for which they had taken up arms. After adverting to the attempts which had been made against their own religion and liberties, and to the machinations of their enemies—"the papists, prelates, and malignants" in England and Ireland—they notice their ineffectual efforts to mediate between the king and the parliament, and vindicate the solemn league and covenant, as "the best and most effectual means for preserving religion and both kingdoms from utter ruin and destruction." "The question is not," they say, "whether we may propagate our religion by arms, but whether according to our power we ought to assist our brethren in England, who are calling for our help, and are shedding their blood in defence of that power without which religion can neither be defended nor reformed, nor uniformity of religion with us and other reformed Kirks be attained. Neither," they add, "is the question whether we should enter England and lift our arms against our own king, but whether we be not bound to provide for our own preservation;" and they urge as a conclusive argument for their interference, the fact that his majesty had concluded a truce with the Irish rebels, and was about to call in the assistance of these savage miscreants so deeply stained with the blood of their protestant countrymen.

The king, in reply, issued a counter manifesto, recapitulating the acts of "princely grace and fatherly indulgence" which he had shown to the kingdom of Scotland, and representing the recent proceedings of the Scotch as the work of a few factious spirits, and the invasion of England as an express violation of the treaty of peace between the two kingdoms. He declared that as he had been compelled to take arms for the defence of his person, family, and crown—for the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom—for the maintenance of the privileges and being of parliament,* which he should always hold in high value and estimation; so he should use and employ these arms to no other end than the security of all these, and should never suffer himself to be tempted by any success or victory to infringe the laws of the one, or violate the laws of the other country. But if, after all this, they should still persist in entering England, then he doubts not but the hearts of all true Englishmen will rise with indignation at the unheard-of insolence, and easily conclude that neither conscience nor brotherly affection engages them in this ungodly errand, but a hope and resolution to make a conquest by the help of their civil dissensions, and to inhabit their fruitful and most pleasant places."

Meanwhile, the famous Westminster assembly, convened by authority of the two houses of parliament, had met on the 1st of July, to settle the government and liturgy of the Church of England. It was to consist of one hundred and twenty divines with thirty lay assessors, of whom ten were lords and twenty commoners. The Scottish Church was represented by the Rev. Alexander Henderson, Samuel Rutherford, George Gillespie, and Robert Baillie, with the Earl of Cassilis, Lord Maitland, and Archibald Johnston of Warriston, elders. "A convocation of more grave, judicious, and learned divines," it has been justly said, "was never perhaps collected in Christendom. Their theological writings, which still continue to be standard works, amply confirm this commendation; and, above all, the "Westminster Standards," as presbyterians have denominated the Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, and other formularies of the Church of Scotland, which were the result of their labours, would be alone sufficient to entitle their memory to the veneration and respect of all who love the truth."* Of the hundred and twenty divines summoned, sixty-nine assembled in Henry the Seventh's Chapel on the first day of meeting, but among these were only a few of the episcopal divines who had been summoned, and even these speedily withdrew, assigning as their reason for withdrawing, "that the assembly was forbidden by the king's proclamation; that they were not chosen by the clergy, and therefore could not represent them; that the clergy and laity were mixed together, and that their apparent design was to pull down the hierarchy."

There was little or no difference of opinion among the members respecting doctrinal points; they were generally agreed in holding the creed usually termed Calvinistic, but they were divided respecting the thorny question of church government. After the secession of the episcopalians, the assembly was composed of three distinct parties—the presbyterians, Erastians, and independents. The great majority were in favour of the presbyterian system, which they regarded as of divine appointment. The Erastians—who derived their designation from Erastus, a German physician of the preceding century—maintained that the Church possesses no inherent legislative power of any kind, but both in its form and discipline is in all respects the mere creature of the civil magistrate, and is entirely dependent on him, in the exercise of his judicial authority, and that he alone possesses the power to inflict any censure, religious or civil. Selden, White-lock, Oliver St. John, and other eminent laymen were of this party. The independents were a very small body, consisting of the following ministers—Goodwin, Nye, Simpson, Burroughes, Bridge, Greenhill, and Carter; but they were eminent for their learning and their talent for public speaking and debate. They maintained that every particular congregation of Christians has an entire and complete jurisdiction over its members, to be executed by the elders of the congregation, without any superiority or control of church courts; and strenuously opposed the establishment of a presbyterian government. Besides these parties, there were some—probably a considerable number—of the members, such as Arrowsmith, Burgess, and Gatakar, who at the outset were inclined towards a limited episcopacy, such as that which was proposed by Archbishop Usher, or perhaps rather some such a combination of episcopacy and presbytery as had been established by Knox, and the other early Scottish reformers, in which bishops without any secular rank or authority should be associated with a system of diocesan and provincial church courts. But this party ultimately adopted the presbyterian theory, and united with the Scottish commissioners in pressing its adoption on the assembly and the parliament.

A directory for public worship, instead of the liturgy, was speedily drawn up by the assembly, and was sanctioned by the parliament on the 3rd of January, 1645, and enforced by heavy fines; but when the form of discipline and government for the Church of England came on for discussion, many keen and protracted debates took place. Many days were spent on the question of ruling elders—an important peculiarity of the presbyterian system; but in spite of “the great learning, quickness, and eloquence, together with the great courtesy and discretion” of the independents, the assembly declared that “Christ hath furnished some in his Church besides the ministers of the Word with gifts for government, and with commission to execute the same when called thereunto, who are to join with the minister in the government of the Church.”* “On no other point,” says Baillie, “expect we so much difficulty, except alone on independency, wherewith we purpose not to meddle in haste till it please God to advance our army, which we expect will much assist our arguments.”† No less than three weeks were occupied in debating the point of sitting at a communion table. “The unhappy independents,” says Baillie, “would mangle that sacrament. No catechising nor preparation before; no thanksgiving after; no sacramental doctrine or chapters in the day of celebration; no coming up to any table; but a carrying of the elements to all in their seats athort the church: yet all this, with God’s help, we have carried over them to our practice. We must dispute every inch of ground. Great need had we of the prayers of all God’s people.”*

The main trial of strength, however, took place on the question of the divine right of presbytery, which was debated for thirty days. The presbyterians and independents agreed that there was a form of church government laid down by divine institution in the New Testament, but they differed as to what that form of government was—the former insisting on the divine right of presbytery, the latter maintaining that every congregation possessed complete authority over its own members. The Erastians, on the other hand, while admitting that many congregations may, and ought to be, under one presbytery, denied that any form of church government was of divine appointment, and affirmed that the Scripture merely enjoined in general terms that all things should be done decently and in order. In the end the assembly, by an overwhelming majority, declared sessions, presbyteries, synods, and assemblies to be of divine authority.†

A long and keen discussion took place between the presbyterians and independents, on the question of tolerating Churches that dissented from the presbyterian model. The former, alarmed at the propagation of the most monstrous heresies, and the rapid and unprecedented growth of sects of every conceivable grade,—from papists down to fifth-monarchy men and ranters,—implored the parliament to endeavour to arrest their progress by the adoption of coercive measures, while the latter pleaded for liberty of conscience to what they called the “fundamentals” of religion. Others, however, among whom were Vane and Cromwell, went further, and insisted on full toleration to all sects, “even Turks, Jews, and papists.” “It is the will and command of God,” they affirmed, “that since the coming of his Son a permission of the most paganish, Jewish, Turkish, or antichristian consciences and worships be granted to all men in all nations.” The more moderate of the presbyterians contented themselves with protesting against the government giving a positive sanction to heresy and schism by the enactment of a formal law of toleration; but the extreme party condemned the doctrine of toleration itself in no measured terms, and denounced the claim of the independents—that uniformity ought to be urged no farther than is agreeable to all men’s consciences, and to their edification—as inconsistent with the covenant which they had solemnly sworn to maintain. The majority of the assembly declared against toleration, but the parliament firmly refused to grant them the power to enforce their principles by the sword. It is only fair to state that whatever may be thought of the principles of the presbyterians on the subject of toleration, it is undeniable that their practice when in power was marked by the most exemplary forbearance. "As for the Church of Scotland," says Baillie, "that it did ever intermeddle to trouble any in their goods, liberties, or persons, it is very false. What civil penalties the parliament of a kingdom thinks meet to inflict upon those who are refractory and unamenable by the censure of a Church, the State from whom alone these punishments do come is answerable, and not the Church. That excommunication is inflicted on those who cannot assent to every point of religion determined in their confession, there is nothing more untrue; for we know it well, that never any person in Scotland was excommunicate only for his difference of opinion in a theological tenet. Excommunication there is a very dreadful sentence, and, therefore, very rare. These last forty years, as far as I have either seen or heard, there has none at all been excommunicated in Scotland but some few trafficking papists, and some very few notorious flagitious persons, and five or six of you (the prelates) for your obstinate impudence after your overturning the foundations both of our Church and State."*

Another ground of jealousy between the parliament and the presbyterian party was the question respecting what was termed the "power of the keys," in other words, the power of administering the discipline of the Church, of keeping back unworthy persons from the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. The presbyterians maintained that the power of admonition, suspension, and excommunication belonged to the eldership or presbytery; the independents claimed the power for every particular congregation; while the parliament, under the guidance of the Erastians, insisted on retaining in their own hands the supreme power in ecclesiastical matters. "In the assembly," says Baillie, "we are fallen on a fashious† proposition, that has kept us divers days to oppose the Erastian heresy, which in this land is very strong, especially among the lawyers. We find it necessary to say that Christ in the New Testament has instituted a church government distinct from the civil, to be exercised by the officers of the Church without commission from the magistrate. Albeit, we fear the houses, when it comes to them, will scrape it out of the confession, for this point is their idol. The pope and king were never more earnest for the headship of the Church than the plurality of this parliament." In another letter, he says the assembly "at last framed a most zealous, clear, and peremptory paper, wherein they held out plainly the Church's divine right to keep off from the sacrament all who were scandalous; and if they cannot obtain the free exercise of that power which Christ hath given them, they will lay down their charges, and will rather choose all afflictions than to sin by profaning the holy table."* In spite of these earnest and well-founded remonstrances, the parliament reserved to itself the final authority in ecclesiastical offences, and allowed an appeal from the decisions of the church courts either to parliament or to commissioners appointed by it.†

In 1646 the parliament, in compliance with the strenuous exhortations of the Scottish Church, and of the West-^{Presbytery established by the parliament.}minster assembly, supported by petitions from various parts of England, partially established the presbyterian form of church government, by way of experiment,—the preamble of the act declaring "that if upon trial it was not found acceptable, it should be reversed or amended." Ultimately, however, it was declared, without qualification, that presbytery should be the established religion, and the Church was divided into provinces, each of which was to hold a provincial assembly or synod composed of representatives from the several presbyteries or classes, as they were called, within the district, the supreme court being a national assembly formed of deputies from the various provincial assemblies. This arrangement, however, was carried fully into effect only in London and Lancashire; in other parts of the kingdom the ministers held meetings for Church affairs, but without any legal authority or jurisdiction.

After the settlement of the vexed question of church government, the assembly proceeded to frame a Directory for^{Directory, confession, and catechisms prepared—}Worship, a Confession of Faith, and the Larger Catechism for exposition and the pulpit, and the Shorter Catechism for the instruction of children, which, though they cost much labour, excited comparatively little controversy. The first draught of the Confession was prepared chiefly by the Scottish commissioners. The Shorter Catechism it is generally believed was drawn up by Dr. Arrowsmith, "a holy and learned divine; firm and zealous in his attachment to the cause of Christ, from which no worldly allurements would shake his faith or move his confidence."‡ The Catechisms and the doctrinal part of the Confession of Faith were approved of by the English parliament, but those portions which related to discipline were rejected.§ The Scottish commissioners had now been absent from their own country upwards of four years, which had been spent in incessant labours. The chief burden of the public discussions in the assembly fell upon them; and after the labours of the day they were frequently engaged till midnight on committees, or in writing letters and pamphlets. They often pleaded that they might be allowed to return to the discharge of their ministerial duties in their own quiet parishes, but duty to the cause of religion and to their country kept them at their post. the Scottish convention, who followed up with such ardour their resolution to support the English parliament, that by the middle of January, 1644, they assembled in the neighbourhood of Berwick a force of eighteen thousand foot and three thousand five hundred horse. On the 19th they crossed the Tweed during a severe frost and deep snow, and advanced without opposition through roads almost impassable to the banks of the Tyne. Newcastle was summoned to surrender, but the town was well fortified and garrisoned, and, finding they could make no impression upon it, they crossed the river and marched upon Sunderland. Their motions were watched by the Marquis of Newcastle at the head of an army of fourteen thousand men; but as they were advantageously posted he did not venture to attack them. They suffered severely, however, from the want of provisions; three of the five vessels which had been sent from Scotland to supply them having been shipwrecked, and the other two, driven by stress of weather into the Tyne, were seized by the enemy. Leslie was, therefore, obliged to lie inactive between Sunderland and Durham, waiting for the co-operation of a parliamentary army, or a sufficient supply of provisions to enable him to advance into the country.

Meanwhile, the royalists had met with severe reverses in other parts of the kingdom. In consequence of the cessation of arms which the king had concluded with the Irish rebels, he had recalled a considerable part of the troops, which had been sent to Ireland for the purpose of crushing the rebellion, to aid him in his contest with the parliament. A large body of native Irish had been introduced into their ranks, and began to practise the same cruelties and disorders to which they had been accustomed in their own country. They landed in North Wales, and enrolling themselves under Lord Byron, the royalist governor of Chester, enabled him to resume the offensive, and to gain several advantages over the parliamentarians. But about six weeks after their arrival, while engaged in the siege of Nantwich, they were attacked (January 25th) by Sir Thomas Fairfax, and completely overthrown. Two hundred were killed, fifteen hundred taken prisoners; and thus the Irish auxiliaries, whose accession had alienated not a few of the king's friends, were entirely dispersed. Returning from Cheshire with his victorious forces, Fairfax effected a junction with his father, and attacked and totally defeated Bellasis at Selby, in Yorkshire, and took him prisoner, with fifteen hundred of his men, together with all their baggage and military stores.

On receiving intelligence of these disasters, the Marquis of Newcastle collected all the forces that could be spared out of the northern garrisons, and returned with all haste to York, closely followed and harassed on his march by the Scottish army. Fairfax and Leven, uniting their forces at Tadcaster, proceeded to York, which they immediately invested. The Earl of Manchester, at the head of fourteen thousand men, with Oliver Cromwell as his lieutenant-general, was sent northward to co-operate in the siege of that important town, which was now closely environed, and, though vigorously defended by Newcastle, was reduced to great extremity. Prince Rupert, however, hastened to its relief at the head of a powerful army, and with a numerous and well-appointed cavalry. On his approach the three generals—Manchester, Leven, and Fairfax—abandoned the siege; and, on the last day of June, drew up in order of battle on Marston Moor, on the banks of the Ouse, about five miles to the south-west of the city. By a dextrous manœuvre the prince deceived the enemy as to his movements, and, crossing the river, threw a supply of military stores and provisions into the city, and united his forces with those of Newcastle. Having effected this important object, he was earnestly entreated by the marquis to wait the arrival of reinforcements, which were daily expected from the north, and the issue of the dissensions which were known to exist in the enemy's camp. But the hot-headed, imperious prince rejected this prudent advice, and gave orders for battle next day, July 2nd. The parliamentary armies had already begun to retire to Tadcaster, when they Marston Moor—were recalled by the appearance of the royalist cavalry on the moor. The greater part of the day was spent in manœuvring and making preparations for the engagement, and for some time the two armies, containing nearly fifty thousand men stood fronting each other in silent and awful suspense. At length, about seven o'clock in the evening, the signal was given. The left wing of the parliamentary army, under Cromwell and David Leslie, charged the right wing of the royalists with great fury, and, after a fierce struggle, drove them from the field in irretrievable disorder. The Marquis of Newcastle's regiment, composed of his own tenants and retainers, alone stood firm, and after a desperate resistance was cut to pieces on the spot. But, on the other hand, the right wing of the parliamentarians, commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax and the old Earl of Leven, was overpowered by the fiery charge of Prince Rupert and his cavalry, and, breaking their ranks, trode down the Scottish reserves, and fled from the field in the direction of Tadeaster, spreading in their flight the news of a total defeat. Each victorious wing then wheeled round upon its own centre, right and left, and were not a little surprised to find "that they must fight it over again for that victory which each thought they had already gained." The encounter was dreadful, and, for a time, the issue was doubtful. Cromwell received a wound in the neck, and his famous regiment of Ironsides, in consequence, wavered for a moment; but, backed by some reserves of horse and foot, and by David Leslie's royalists from the field with great slaughter. Three thousand of the vanquished were slain, and fifteen hundred prisoners, including about a hundred officers, together with their artillery, ammunition, and baggage, and a hundred colours, among which was the prince's own standard, fell into the hands of the conquerors.

The battle of Marston Moor may be regarded as the crisis of the civil war. It gave the parliament the command of the entire north. Next day the Marquis of Newcastle quitted the country in disgust, and fled to the Continent. Prince Rupert, with the shattered remains of his army, retired into Lancashire. York surrendered on the 16th of July, and the Scots soon afterwards took Newcastle by storm. These severe blows to the royal cause were somewhat counterbalanced by an advantage which the king gained over Waller at Copredy Bridge, and still more by the surrender of Essex's forces at Fowey, in Cornwall, which took place on the 1st of September. Essex himself, with Lord Roberts, Sir John Merrick, and other officers, fled to Plymouth by sea; the cavalry, under Sir William Balfour, broke through the royal lines, and, aided partly by the darkness of the night, partly by the disgraceful misconduct of Goring, succeeded in making their escape; but the infantry surrendered on honourable terms. All their artillery and ammunition, consisting of forty pieces of ordnance, about a thousand stand of arms, and two hundred barrels of gunpowder, fell into the king's hands; but the men were allowed to march out with their colours, the officers to wear their swords, and to be accompanied by their servants, horses, and baggage. By a strange oversight, no stipulation was made that they should not bear arms against the king within a limited time, and in the course of a few weeks they were armed and equipped anew, and reorganised under a new leader, the Earl of Manchester. On the 27th of October the royalists were worsted in a second battle fought at Newbury, but their honour was retrieved by his majesty's successful retreat from Donnington Castle, which terminated the campaign of 1644.

CHAPTER XLIX.

CHARLES THE FIRST.

AT this critical period, when the affairs of the Early career of king seemed at the lowest ebb, a Montrose—succession of brilliant exploits on the part of the Earl of Montrose once more raised the hopes of the unhappy monarch, and promised to retrieve his almost desperate fortunes. This young and high-spirited nobleman, as we have seen, had at the commencement of these commotions embraced the cause of the covenanters, and had been sent to chastise the prelatie town of Aberdeen—"that unnatural town," as Baillie terms it—and to disperse the Gordons, who had taken up arms for the king. He was the first man who forded the Tweed, at the head of his own battalion, when the Scottish army entered England in 1640, and a few days after routed the vanguard of the English cavalry at Newburn, on the Tyne. Like Falkland, Hyde, and other moderate reformers in the English parliament, Montrose, however, soon became dissatisfied with the proceedings of his more extreme associates; and partly from an apprehension that the final views of the covenanters were inconsistent with the rights and just authority of the sovereign, and partly also from resentment on account of the preference shown by the party to the Marquis of Argyll, the hereditary rival of his family, he espoused the cause of the king. "Montrose," says Clarendon, "had always a great emulation or rather a great contempt of the Marquis of Argyll, as he was too apt to condemn those he did not love;" and again, "the people looked upon them both as young men of unlimited ambition, and used to say that they were like Cæsar and Pompey—the one would endure no superior, and the other would have no equal." Baillie alleges that Montrose expected to be appointed commander-in-chief of the Scottish covenanting forces, and was mortified to see that office bestowed upon Alexander Leslie. The first advances were made—he is gained over by the king in July, 1639, when by the king—his majesty summoned several of the leading Scottish nobles, among whom was Montrose, to attend him at Berwick. But no decided step appears to have been taken by the earl in favour of the royal cause until July, 1640, when the covenanting army was encamped on Dunse Law. At this period, according to Montrose's judicial deposition, a bond was privately offered for his signature, proposing that some person should be appointed captain-general of the country north of the Forth, and implying that this person should be the Earl of Argyll. Montrose declared that he would rather die than subscribe such a bond, and indignant at this proposal he immediately proceeded to Cumbernauld House, the seat of the Earl of Wigton, where he met by appointment the Earls of Marischal, Home, Atholl, Mar, and other influential noblemen, including Lord Almond, who was second in com—signs the Cumbernauld bond.

mand of Leslie's army. After consultation a bond was prepared and subscribed, acknowledging their obligation to "that covenant already signed," but stipulating for their mutual aid and defence in case of need, that, "in as far as may consist with the good and weal of the public, every one of us shall join and adhere to each other, and their interests, against all persons and causes whatsoever. After the return of the covenanting army to Scotland this bond was discovered by Argyll, and immediately denounced before the committee at Edinburgh. The subscribers, according to Guthrie, "acknowledged the bond, and gave their reasons why they had joined in it—all which were rejected by the committee, and they declared censurable." Ultimately, however, the committee agreed to rest satisfied with the surrender and formal renunciation of the bond. But shortly after, in the spring of 1641, some conferences which Montrose had held with two influential clergymen in his own neighbourhood, respecting the conduct of the leading covenanters, were made known to the committee of Estates. The earl was immediately summoned, and several times examined before them, when he openly acknowledged, and resolutely adhered to, the statements that he had made. There His defence were four circumstances, he said, of this step. which had induced him to frame the Cumbernauld bond:—"First there was the intention to create a dictator, and, although I did not implicitly rely upon the evidence offered me of that, yet I considered it incumbent on me to think of all means to prevent it. My next reason was, that I heard of various bonds pressed upon the country of different tenors, indeed, but all intended to tie the subjects in subjection to particular persons. My third reason was, because of an intention to canton the country. And my fourth reason was, a discourse related to me to this effect, that, at the sitting of the parliament in June last, it was intended to depose the king, and that, although the matter was then postponed, it would be the first act of the ensuing session. Moreover, my relator added that it was said to have been resolved by lawyers and divines that there were grounds in law for such a measure: to wit, selling, deserting, or invading the country." Montrose was then asked whether he had named the Earl of Argyll. "I did name the Earl of Argyll," he replied; "I named Argyll as the man who was to rule be-north Forth, and as the man who discoursed of deposing the king. I am not the author or inventor of these things. I will lay it down at the right door." John Stewart of Ladywell, commissary of the consistorial court of Dunkeld, was produced by Montrose as the author of the report that the statement referred to had been made by Argyll at the ford of Lyon, in the presence of the Earl of Atholl, and several gentlemen of that district. The truth of the report was vehemently denied by Argyll, and was subsequently retracted by Stewart, who was ultimately arraigned and convicted on the old and sanguinary statutes against leasing-making.

The supplication of the unhappy man for mercy was inhumanly rejected on the plea, that if his life were spared it would have been given out that his confession had been procured by the undue practices of Argyll, and he was accordingly executed on the 28th of July.*

messenger by whom Stewart's information had been secretly transmitted to the king was intercepted on his return, and searched by Argyll and his associates. A letter from his majesty to Montrose was discovered in the pannel of this messenger's saddle, and in his pockets were found some obscure documents in cipher, which he alleged were written in the presence and by the desire of Montrose, Lord Napier, and Stirling of Keir; and that their object was to induce the king to visit Scotland, and bestow upon them the vacant offices of estate. This story was denied by Montrose and his friends, as well as by the king himself, and does not seem entitled to much credit. But the committee imprisoned—were evidently alarmed by these proceedings, and immediately sent the earl and his three friends—Napier, Stirling, and Stewart of Blackhall—to the Castle of Edinburgh as state prisoners.†

Two months after this, the king's promised visit to Scotland took place, but so low had his power sunk at this period, that his efforts to obtain the immediate release of Montrose and his friends were entirely unsuccessful.‡ Only the day but one before his return to England (November 16), he so far prevailed as to obtain that Montrose and his friends should be set free, on caution—his release—“that from henceforth they carry themselves soberly and discreetly;” his majesty on his part promising, as the price of their release, that he would not employ any of them in offices of court or state without the consent of parliament, nor grant them access to his person.”§

On the termination of the proceedings against him, Montrose withdrew to one—offers his services to the king—where he spent several months in retirement. But in May, 1642, attended by his nephew, Stirling of Keir, and Lord Ogilvie, he rode to York, then the residence of the king, apparently for the purpose of holding some communication with his majesty. Charles, however, in accordance with his recent promise, forbade their approach to him nearer than one post; “but,” says Spalding, “it was thought that they had conference with some of the king's servants, wherewith they were content, and so returned home again.” To soften this repulse, his majesty took care to inform the earl that he still retained the royal favour and friendship: “I know,” he says in a letter dated 7th of May, “I need no arguments to induce you to my service: duty and loyalty are sufficient to a man of so much honour as I know you to be. Yet, as I think this of you, so will I have you to believe of me that I would not invite you to a share of my hard fortune if I intend you not to be a plentiful partaker of my good.”

After the breaking out of the civil war in England, Montrose resolved to —renewal of the offer. king to follow his council in regard to the management of affairs in Scotland, and to throw aside the timorous and trimming policy of Hamilton. In February, 1643, having learned that the queen was at Burlington, on her return from Holland, he waited upon her majesty, and laid before her his opinion respecting the course to be followed at this critical juncture. The conference was continued at York, where they were joined by Hamilton. Great, and as it proved, well-founded apprehensions were entertained that the Scottish covenanters would make common cause with the parliament of England. “What is to be done,” inquired the queen, “to prevent this result?”—“Resist,” exclaimed Montrose, “resist force with force. The king has loyal subjects in Scotland; they have wealth, and influence, and hearts stout and true; they want but the king's countenance and commission. The only danger is delay. If the army of the covenant be allowed to make head, loyalty will be overwhelmed. The rebellious cockatrice must be bruised in the egg; physic is too late when the disease has overrun the body.” But Hamilton recommended a cautious and temporising policy. “That stout and warlike nation,” said he, “is not to be reduced by force of arms, but with gentleness and courtesies. Civil war is a thing to be avoided by all means. It would be a sorry triumph should the king succeed, and my soul abhors to speak the consequences if he fail. Let there be peace by all means. Nor ought the king yet to despair of amity with Scotland. If his majesty will invest me with sufficient authority, and trust the conduct of affairs to me, I will take their settlement upon my own responsibility.”—“I see,” replied Montrose, “what the end of this will be: the traitors will be allowed time to raise their armies, and all will be lost.”* When the case was referred to the king, who was then negotiating at Oxford, he approved of the pro-

‡ The story that Montrose came privately to the king, and offered to assassinate Hamilton and Argyll, is totally unworthy of credit. There can be little doubt, however, that the earl did in some way convey information to his majesty respecting the practices and designs of these nobles, and that he laboured to convince the king that “Hamilton was no less faulty and false towards his majesty than Argyll.” (See Life and Times of Montrose, p. 220, and Memorials of Montrose and his Times, vol. ii. pp. 2—16, published by the Maitland Club.)

posals of Hamilton, and conferring a dukedom on that noble as a mark of his confidence, sent him back to Scotland with large powers. Montrose, disappointed in his expectations, and weighed down by sad forebodings, returned once more to his estates.

The policy recommended by Hamilton proved completely unsuccessful. The Scottish covenanters, as we have seen, were induced to declare in favour of the parliament of England, and to send to their assistance a powerful army, which speedily turned the scale in their favour. The unfavourable reception which Montrose had met with at York was known to the leading covenanters, and they seem to have thought it likely to alienate him from the royal cause, and to render him more favourable to their views. Attempts were accordingly made to draw him once more into their party; and it was intimated to him that his debts would be discharged, and a command in the army bestowed upon him, second only to Lord Leven's. Whether or not Montrose wavered in his attachment to the king at this juncture cannot now be ascertained. His friends undoubtedly entertained suspicions of his fidelity, for Lord Nithsdale, in a letter to the queen, of date May 8th, says, "I am not altogether desperate of Montrose; but say he were changed, I am in good hope you will not lack well-affected subjects in Scotland to prosecute that point we resolved on."*

middle of June, Montrose, at his own desire, obtained an interview with the celebrated Alexander Henderson, moderator of the General Assembly, and Sir James Rol-lock, the brother-in-law both of Montrose and Argyll. The conference, which lasted for two hours, took place in the open air, on the banks of the Forth, close to Stirling Bridge, in the presence of Lord Napier, Stirling of Keir, and other friends of Montrose. The real object of the earl, as his eulogists allege, was to obtain information respecting the ulterior views and designs of the covenanters; but he professed to be in a state of hesitation as to the course which he ought to follow, and after a high compliment to Henderson, upon whose faith, honesty, and judgment he declared he placed great reliance, he said, "To allow the ill opinion of my enemies to breathe itself after some little mistakes, I have been contented to remain in domestic retirement, and am altogether ignorant of your parliamentary affairs; indeed, I am at a loss how to comport myself in these ticklish times, and must beg of you, for old acquaintance' sake, to tell me frankly what it is you mean to do." Henderson unhesitatingly replied that it was their intention to send as strong an army as they could raise in aid of their brethren in England. He then expressed his satisfaction at the supposed accession of such a distinguished convert to the good cause, and spoke of the honours and rewards which Montrose would receive from the parliament. The earl on this asked Sir James Rollock if their present proposals were authorised by the committee, or proceeded only from their own goodwill. "I conceive," said Sir James, "that Mr. Henderson is commissioned from the parliament to this effect."—"Not exactly so," replied the moderator; "but I doubt not the parliament will make good whatever I promise."—"Gentlemen," rejoined Montrose, "I wish you good evening: in a matter of so high importance I can form no positive resolutions where there is not the public faith to build upon, and where the messengers disagree among themselves."*

In December, 1643, the Duke of Hamilton and his brother, the Earl of Lanark, hastened to the court at Oxford, "to tell a fair though lamentable tale" respecting the ill success which had attended their counsels. Montrose was already there, and no doubt contributed greatly to heighten the king's displeasure at Hamilton's miscarriages. The duke was immediately put under arrest,

The confidence which had been placed in him was now transferred to Montrose, who was anxiously asked by the king if anything could yet be done to retrieve the Scottish affairs. In reply the earl observed that the state of matters was now much altered; that the favourable opportunity of arresting the progress of the covenanters had passed away; the strongholds of the country were in their hands; a numerous and well-disciplined army had been raised by them, and was now on its march into England, while the friends of the king were disheartened and unorganised. Still the case was not altogether desperate; and the scheme suggested by Montrose was that the Earl of Antrim should dispatch a body of two thousand wild Irish from Ulster to the West

Highlands, while arms and warlike stores should be obtained from abroad. Montrose himself was to be provided with a small escort of horse, with which he was to cross the Borders, and force his way to Stirling. This important fortress he expected to be given up to him by Major Turner, the well-known prototype of Captain Dugald Dalgetty, who, after his return from the wars of Gustavus Adolphus, had accepted a command in the army of the covenanters, but now felt dissatisfaction, or, as he professed, scruples of conscience at their service. This plan was certainly daring in the extreme, if not desperate; but the necessities of the king made him readily consent to it. On the 1st of February, 1644, he signed a commission appointing Montrose his lieutenant-general in Scotland, and he shortly after advanced him to the dignity of marquis.

In the month of April, accordingly, Montrose appeared on the banks of the Aunan at the head of about two hundred horse, along with eight hundred foot, and three troops of horse belonging to the northern militia of England. He was joined by the Earls of Crawford, Nithsdale, Traquair, and other influential noblemen, and succeeded in seizing the town of Dumfries. Here, however, he encountered a superior force under the Sheriff of Teviotdale, while at the same time tidings reached him that the Earl of Callender was approaching to attack him at the head of five thousand men. The greater part of the militia mutinied and deserted, and Montrose was compelled to fall back upon Carlisle. He carried on a desultory warfare for some time in the counties of Northumberland and Durham, took the Castle of Morpeth after a siege of twenty days, stormed a fort at the mouth of the Tyne, and succeeded in throwing a plentiful supply of provisions into Newcastle, which was besieged by the Scottish army.

The fatal battle of Marston Moor, however, which was fought in the beginning of July, rendered abortive all his efforts to retrieve the royal cause. He lingered for some time in the north of England, in the vain hope of obtaining from Prince Rupert a body of cavalry, with which, as he expressed it, he might cut his way into the heart of Scotland. At length, about the end of July or beginning of August, 1644, he directed his little band of horsemen to make their way to the king, or to the nearest body of men in arms for the royal cause, while he himself, with two of his trusty friends, Sir William Rollock and Colonel Sibbald, adopted the daring plan of attempting to reach the Highlands in disguise. In the garb of a groom, mounted on a sorry nag, and leading another in his hand, he rode behind his associates, who called themselves officers belonging to

Lord Leven's army. On reaching the Borders he narrowly escaped detection. A common soldier who had served in the army of Newcastle passed by on the road, and approaching the marquis, saluted him respectfully by his name and title. Montrose in vain endeavoured to persuade him that he was mistaken. "What!" exclaimed the soldier, "do I not know my noble Lord of Montrose! But go your way, and God be with you wheresoever you go." This circumstance alarmed Montrose and his companions, although the poor man faithfully kept their secret. Making all possible speed, they scarcely drew bridle till they arrived at Tillibeltin, the house of his kinsman, Patrick Graham, of Inchbrakie, on the verge of the Highlands. Here the marquis lay concealed for some time; afterwards, for greater security, he removed to a solitary hut in the neighbourhood, while he sent messengers in every direction to bring him intelligence respecting the state of affairs in the north. Evil tidings came to him from all quarters. The Marquis of Huntley had taken arms in behalf of the king, rashly and without due preparation, and had been defeated, and compelled to seek refuge in the wilds of Caithness. Irvine of Drum was in exile, and his sons in prison; while Gordon of Haddo, the ancestor of the present Earl of Aberdeen, had been taken prisoner, and inhumanly executed by order of the Scottish parliament. The spirit of Montrose, however, was not daunted by such news. A vague rumour reached him at this juncture that ^{Arrival} a body of soldiers from Ireland had ^{of the Irish} landed in the West Highlands; auxiliaries. and a letter which was soon after secretly placed in the hands of his host confirmed the report, and made Montrose aware that this was the body of auxiliaries whom the Earl of Antrim had promised to send from Ulster. They had landed at Ardnamurchan early in July, and were commanded by Allaster or Alexander Macdonald,* better known by the corrupted patronymic of Colkitto, who, though a brave and active man, was vain, self-willed, and uneducated, and altogether unequal to such an enterprise. The flotilla in which they had made the voyage from Ireland was destroyed by a fleet of English and Scotch vessels, so that Colkitto was left without the means of re-embarking his army. Thus hemmed in, he wreaked his vengeance on the estates of the Campbells, with whom his clan had an hereditary feud, and then made a preposterous attempt to raise the country in the name of the king and of Montrose. On receiving intelligence of these movements, Argyll, with a strong body of his clan, followed and watched the Irish forces; while the committee of Edinburgh summoned a general muster of the fencible men north of the Grampians, in order to destroy the invaders. Thus hemmed in, Colkitto was on the brink of destruction, when his despatch came into the hands of Montrose, who immediately sent him instructions to march into Atholl, and set out on foot to meet him, attired in the dress of an ordinary Highlander, and intended by Inchbrakie alone. He found Colkitto at Blair, in Atholl, at the head of about fourteen hundred men, indifferently armed and appointed, and worse disciplined. The Irish regiments were about twelve hundred strong; the remainder of the force consisted of Highlanders from Atholl and Badenoch.

In spite of those untoward circumstances, Montrose immediately displayed his ^{Montrose} commission from the king, and ^{raises the royal} raised the royal standard. Great ^{standard.} numbers were speedily attracted to it by the presence of the king's lieutenant. The day after his arrival, Montrose was joined by eight hundred Atholl men, including the Robertsons of Strowan. They were followed by three hundred of the "galant Gordons" from Badenoch, and the marquis soon found himself at the head of a considerable force. He lost no time in directing their march upon Perth, and on the 31st of August led his whole army across the Tay, near Dunkeld. He was joined on the hill of Buchanty by Lord Kilpont, eldest son of the Earl of Monteith, by the Master of Maderty, and Sir John Drummond, with about four hundred men. This reinforcement came most opportunely to hand, for the situation of Montrose was exceedingly critical. Behind him was Argyll, who, at the head of a large body of his clansmen, had followed in the track of the Irish. Lord Elcho, the Earl of Tullibardine, and Lord Drummond, were in front with an army of above six thousand men, hastily levied for the protection of Perth; so that the invaders were in imminent danger of being hemmed in and destroyed. In this emer-

Tippermuir—gency Montrose resolved to attack Lord Elcho's army before he could be joined by Argyll; and on the 1st of September he came in sight of the covenanting forces, whom he found drawn up on a wide open heath at Tippermuir, three miles from Perth. The main body was commanded by Tullibardine, the right wing by Elcho, and the left by Sir James Scott, an officer of great experience. They had about seven or eight hundred horse, under Lord Drummond, who were stationed at either extremity of the line, and there were nine pieces of artillery placed in front. Montrose had neither cavalry nor artillery, and only three horses in his army. In order to sustain the charge of the enemy's horse, he extended his front as far as possible, and drew up all his men in one line three deep. The front rank knelt upon one knee, the second rank stooped forward, and the rear, composed of the tallest men in the army, were ordered to stand erect. The Irish auxiliaries were placed in the centre; Lord Kilpont and his men, who were principally bowmen, on the left; while Montrose himself, on foot, and armed with a target and pike, took his station on the right, at the head of the Atholl men, who were opposed to the most formidable division of the covenanting forces. "Be sparing of your powder," he said to his troops, "we have none to throw away. Let not a musket be fired except in the very face of the enemy. Give but a single discharge, and then at them with the claymore in the name of God and the king."

The battle commenced by a skirmish with the cavalry, who were driven back by the Highlanders, and created some confusion among the ranks of the infantry. Montrose seized the favourable moment, and commanded his whole line to advance. The cavalry of the covenanters, after a brief struggle, were completely routed—the Highlanders, it is said, pouring in volleys of stones after their ammunition

The left wing, indeed, under Sir Sir James Scott, made a stout resistance, but their ranks were speedily broken, and the rout became irretrievable. Three hundred were left dead upon the field, and all their artillery, arms, and baggage, fell into the hands of the victors.*

* Baillie imputes the loss of the battle to "the villainy of Lord Drummond," who, he says, exhorted those under his command to flee when on the point of joining battle. Drummond's heart was undoubtedly with the enemy, whom he not long after openly joined. (Baillie's Letter to Spang; Brodie, vol. ii. p. 532.)

tion, and arms for his men. An interesting document, entitled "Reasons for the Surrender of Perth," which was drawn up by the ministers of that town, presents a curious view of the state of Montrose's army, and the panic that had seized the forces of the covenanters. So great was the terror of the citizens, and of the friends who had come to their aid, that the provost, accompanied by a minister, after traversing the street three times with sound of trumpet, could not collect a sufficient number to guard three of the gates alone. Only about twelve of the Fifeshire men, it is alleged, out of the defeated army offered to assist in the defence of the town, unarmed, and some of them intoxicated. The fugitives "were all forefainted and bursted with running, insomuch that nine or ten died that night in town without any wound." * Great numbers concealed themselves in cellars and vaults, where they lay panting and breathless; and on being desired by the provost to rise and defend themselves, they answered that "their hearts were away, and that they would fight no more, though they should be killed." Farther, the letter states that even if they had been willing to fight, they had no means of resistance, for they had flung away their weapons in their flight. "Our enemies that before the flight were naked, weaponless, ammunitionless, and cannonless men, and so unable to have laid siege to the town, by the flight of our friends were clothed, got abundance of arms, and great plenty of ammunition, with six pieces of cannon." Finally, it was declared that the courage of the citizens was overpowered by the sight of the enemy drawn up like so many hell-hounds before the gates of the town, bathed in blood and "routing (bellowing) with hideous cries for more;" and, in the meantime, all the gentlemen of Fife had abandoned the bewildered and terror-stricken inhabitants, save one, "who," as the apologists rather ungratefully allege, "is an useless member among themselves at home, and, consequently, could not but be useless to us. Neither a gentleman of our own shire, except Balhousie. So, exanimate with fear, and destitute of counsel, we could not stand out." † In such circumstances, it is evident that no further defence could well be made; but the behaviour of the covenanting forces, on this and subsequent occasions, shows the great revolution which half a century of uninterrupted peace had brought about in the character and habits of the Lowland peasantry and burghers, while the hardy and active mountaineers were still familiar with the use of arms, and retained all their hereditary fondness for war and plunder.

Montrose, however, found it impossible to retain possession of Perth, or to encounter Argyll, who was now approaching at the head of a large force,

Habits of the recently augmented by a considerable body of cavalry. The Highlanders, according to their immemorial custom, abandoned his standard, and returned home in great numbers, to secure their spoil and to get in their harvests. Threats and persuasions were equally ineffectual to prevent this desertion, which often rendered fruitless the most brilliant victories. "Even so late as the year 1745-6," says Sir Walter Scott, "when the Chevalier Charles Edward, by way of making an example, caused a soldier to be shot for desertion, the Highlanders who composed his army were affected as much by indignation as by fear. They could not conceive any principle of justice upon which a man's life could be taken for merely going home, when it did not suit him to remain longer with the army. Such had been the uniform practice of their fathers. When a battle was over, the campaign, in their opinion, was ended: if it was lost, they sought safety in their mountains; if won, they returned there to secure their booty. At other times they had their cattle to look after, and their harvests to sow or reap, without which their families would have perished for want. This circumstance serves to show, even if history had not made us acquainted with the same fact, that the Highlanders had never been accustomed to make war with the view of permanent conquest, but only with the hope of deriving temporary advantage or deciding some immediate quarrel."*

At this period, also, a tragical occurrence deprived Montrose of another considerable body of his best troops. Murder of Lord Kilpont. After remaining three days in Perth, the marquis crossed the Tay on the 5th of September, and encamped in the open fields near the Kirk of Collace. At daybreak next morning his attention was attracted by an uproar in the camp, and on rushing into the midst of the crowd in order to quell the tumult, he saw his gallant friend, Lord Kilpont, weltering in his blood. The assassin was Stewart of Ardvorlich, an intimate friend of the murdered nobleman, whose bed he had shared on the previous night. According to one account, Stewart had resolved to abandon the royal cause, and had used all his influence with his friend to induce him to take the same step; but Lord Kilpont rejected the proposal with abhorrence, when, either dreading discovery or enraged at his expressions, Stewart stabbed the unsuspecting nobleman to the heart, and killing a sentinel who attempted to detain him, effected his escape through darkness so thick, says Wishart, that the soldiers could scarcely see the length of their spears. The descendants of the assassin, however, allege that the tragical incident arose out of a quarrel between Stewart and Colkito, respecting some excesses committed by the Irish on the lands of the former; that Montrose, by advice of Kilpont, had placed them both under arrest, and compelled them to shake hands in his presence; that some days after, on returning together from an entertainment given by Montrose to his officers, high words arose between them respecting Kilpont's share in the above transaction; and, finally, from the state they were both in, by an easy transition they came to blows, when Stewart with his dagger struck his friend dead on the spot.* The assassin immediately joined the adherents of the parliament, by whom, to their great disgrace, he was welcomed, and afterwards promoted. The followers of Lord Kilpont, on the other hand, returned home to convey the body of their hapless chief to the sepulchre of his ancestors.

With a force diminished to less than two thousand men, Montrose proceeded northward to Aberdeenshire, in the hope of attracting the Gordons to his standard. In his march through Angus and the Mearns, he was joined by the veteran Earl of Airlie and two of his sons, and by Colonel Nathaniel Gordon, at the head of about thirty well-appointed horsemen. On the banks of the Dee he found the covenanting general, Lord Burleigh, who, with Lord Lewis Gordon, one of Huntley's sons, attached to the cause of the parliament, occupied Aberdeen with about two thousand five hundred foot and three hundred horse. The covenanters held the Bridge of Dee, but Montrose crossed the river at a ford above, and descended on their flank. Lord Lewis Gordon, who commanded the left wing, charged at the head of a large body of horse, including his own retainers. But Montrose, by a judicious intermixture of bowmen and musketeers with his handful of cavalry, first checked and then routed the Gordons. Before they could rally, his voice was heard, "To close quarters—we do no good at a distance. Give them the broadsword and but-end of your muskets. Spare them not, and make them pay for their treachery and treason." His men, thus encouraged, rushed forward with irresistible fury, broke the ranks of the covenanters, and pursued them into the town, which victors and vanquished entered together in one confused mass. Aberdeen suffered cruelly from the excesses of the Irish, who put to death without mercy all whom they found in the streets, and, in some cases, even compelled their victims to strip themselves of their clothes before they killed them, lest they should be soiled by their blood. * The use made of this melancholy story by Sir Walter Scott, and the romantic circumstances connected with Stewart's birth, after the murder of his maternal uncle by the Macgregors, must be familiar to all the readers of the "Legend of Montrose." See also "Montrose and the Covenanters," vol. ii. pp. 317—326. The ratification of Stewart's pardon by the committee of Estates mentions that Stewart's son and four of his friends were present at the murder, and that "two Irish rebels, who resisted his escape, were also killed."

buried in the streets until the Irish departed.* It has been urged as some palliation of these shocking cruelties, that Montrose had no other way of paying his half-barbarous troops than by giving up the town to pillage, and that they were incensed by the slaughter of a drummer sent that morning with a flag of truce, and who had been killed accidentally, as the covenanters allege, by some men of the Fife regiment;† but such an apology cannot be received as valid; and, as it has been remarked, the people of Aberdeen had a right to expect very different treatment, for they had always been favourable to the king's party; and Montrose himself, when in the service of the covenanters, had been the agent in oppressing, for its devotion to the royal cause, the very city which his troops so cruelly plundered on account of its adherence to the parliament.

On the approach of Argyll at the head of a superior force, Montrose recalled —his fruitless attempt to raise the Gordons— his troops from the pillage of Aberdeen; and, having destroyed his heavy baggage, and concealed in a morass the cannon he had taken at Tippermuir, he proceeded up the Spey, in the hope of raising the retainers of Huntley. But the Gordons remembered with strong resentment the conduct of the king's lieutenant during his former campaign against them in the service of the covenant, as well as their recent defeat at the Bridge of Dee, and therefore declined to join him. On the other hand, he found the northern bank of the Spey was occupied by about five thousand of the men of Moray, who had taken up arms to oppose his progress, and to hem him in between two superior armies. In this dilemma Montrose continued his march up the Spey as far as the Castle of Rothiemurchus, then suddenly doubling back from the head of Strathspey, he plunged into the wilds of Badenoch, and thence into Atholl, always pursued, but never overtaken by his enemy. "That strange coursing," as Baillie terms this series of marches and countermarches, "thrice round about from Spey to Atholl, wherein Argyll and Lothian's soldiers were tired out, and the country, harassed by both, and no less by friends than foes, did nothing for their own defence."

From Blair Atholl, Montrose dispatched Macdonald, with a division of his Irish troops, to the western Highlands, to relieve the garrisons left in the Castles of Mingarry and Langhaine, and to raise recruits; while the marquis himself marched through Angus and Mearns, and a second time presented himself at the Bridge of Dee, where he found fourteen troops of horse waiting to oppose his further progress. He forded the river, however, higher up, at the mills of Drum, and, wasting the country as he went, once more crossed the mountains, and passed into Strathbogie. But all his efforts to attract the Gordons to the royal standard completely failed; and at length, abandoning all hope of aid from Huntley and his son, Montrose marched eastward to the Ythan, and took possession of Fyvie Castle about the 28th of October. Meanwhile, Argyll was following on —baffles his opponents at Fyvie Castle— his traces, and overtook him while encamped in the wood of Fyvie. The army of the parliament was superior in numbers and equipments, and, besides, contained a strong body of cavalry, commanded by the Earl of Lothian, while Montrose had only about fifty horse. His situation was exceedingly critical. A part of the enemy's troops had already occupied the hedges and ditches which flanked his position. His single company of Gordons deserted him at this juncture, and the remainder of his troops appeared anxious and disheartened. But the marquis, concealing his apprehensions, and assuming an appearance of perfect unconcern, called to a gallant young Irish officer, "What are you about, O'Kyan? Can you not drive those fellows from our defences, and see that they do not molest us again?" O'Kyan immediately obeyed this command with the utmost alacrity and confidence, and drove the assailants in confusion down the hill. His men, having obtained possession of some bags of gunpowder, which was much needed by the royalists, made a humorous complaint of the neglect of the enemy in omitting to leave the bullets with the powder. The Earl of Lothian then advanced with five troops of horse against Montrose's handful of cavalry; but the marquis on this occasion, as at the Bridge of Dee, had mingled with his horsemen a band of musketeers, who poured upon the enemy such an unexpected and galling fire that they were driven back in great confusion. Several days were spent in similar skirmishes without much advantage on either side; and at length Montrose, having baffled his adversaries, thought it advisable to retreat from Fyvie to Strathbogie.

These rapid and harassing marches wore out the strength and spirit of many of the Lowland gentlemen who had embraced the royal cause. Winter —his rapid and harassing marches— was now approaching, when it would be almost impossible to provide subsistence for man or horse among the wild fastnesses which had hitherto afforded them shelter. Lord Kinnoul, Sir John Drummond, his old companion, Colonel Sibbald, and all the other Lowland cavaliers, except the veteran Earl of Airlie and his two sons, now abandoned Montrose, promising, however, to return next spring. In these disheartening circumstances, the marquis retreated to the wildest districts of the north; but having learned in the end of November that the cavalry of the covenanters was sent into winter quarters, while the infantry was stationed at Dunkeld, under Argyll, he immediately turned towards the Grampians, and in one night brought his whole army a march of twenty-four miles over mountains and morasses, with the hope of surprising his enemy. His approach, however, became known while he was still sixteen miles distant from Dunkeld, and Argyll lost no time in retreating to Perth. From thence he proceeded to Edinburgh, and laid down his commission as general, complaining that he had not been adequately supported. It was supposed that Montrose had taken up his winter quarters in the district of Atholl, and must remain cooped up there until the return of spring.

The intentions of Montrose, however, were far different. At Blair Atholl he was joined by Colkitto, who returned from his recruiting expedition, bringing with him the Captain of Clanranald, and five hundred of his clan; the Macdonalds of Glengarry, Keppoch, and Glencoe; the Stewarts of Appin, with the Camerons and Farquharsons. On the arrival of this seasonable reinforcement, it was proposed by the assembled chiefs to promote both their public and private ends by invading the country of Argyll. "But how shall we find a track?" asked Montrose; "or how obtain subsistence at this season?" A clansman of Glencoe offered himself as a guide. "There is not," said he, "a farm, or half a farm, under Macculummore but I know every foot of it; and if good water, tight houses, and fat cows will do for you, there is plenty to be had." Montrose at once accepted the proffered services, and stimulated by revenge, both personal and hereditary, marched to attack Argyll in his native strongholds. This powerful and politic chief was accustomed to say, that he would not for a hundred thousand crowns that any one knew the passes which led into his country from the east. It was now about the middle of December, and Gillespie Grumach* was residing at Inverary, in fancied security, when he received the astounding intelligence that his vindictive adversary, with an army of savage Irishmen and ruthless Highlanders, had forced an entry into Argyleshire, through paths hitherto deemed inaccessible, and was plundering and laying waste the whole country with merciless severity. There was no time for defence—scarcely for flight. Argyll threw himself into a fishing-boat, and escaped by sea, leaving his unfortunate clansmen to the tender mercies of his enemy. Dividing his army into three bodies, to make the work of devastation more complete, Montrose traversed the whole of the devoted districts for the space of a month,—killing the able-bodied men, driving off the flocks and herds, and laying the houses in ashes. The thirst of feudal vengeance, it has been justly said, may explain, but can in no degree excuse these severities.† On leaving the country which he had so cruelly devastated, Montrose withdrew towards Lochaber, for the purpose of organising a general

† "Ye hear before of Montrose's progress to the Glenorchies' lands. gathering of the clans. Meanwhile, General Baillie, who had been appointed commander-in-chief of the parliamentary forces in Scotland, had collected a considerable army, with which he marched through Angus towards Perth. Another strong body was stationed at Inverness, under Lord Seaforth; while Argyll had collected his scattered clan, to whom were added some battalions from the Lowlands, amounting in all to three thousand men, and placed them under the command of his kinsman, Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchinbreck, a stout soldier, who was recalled from Ireland for this purpose. Their plan of operations was by a combined movement from different points to surround and overpower their active enemy. Argyll accordingly marched through Lochaber to the old Castle of Inverlochy, near the place where Fort William now stands. Montrose was on his march towards Inverness, probably with the view of attacking Seaforth, but he no sooner received intimation that Argyll was on his track, than he resolved to forestall the operations of his enemies by attacking the Campbells before fresh reinforcements should arrive. He therefore retraced his steps by the most unfrequented route, over a succession of mountains covered with snow, and on the second evening came in sight of the enemy's camp. "My design," he says, in his letter to the king (February 3rd, 1645), "was to fall upon Argyll before Seaforth and the Frasers could join him. My march was through inaccessible mountains, where I could have no guides but cowherds, and they scarce acquainted with a place but six miles from their own habitations. If I had been attacked but with a hundred men in some of these passes, I must have certainly turned back, for it would have been impossible to force my way, most of the passes being so strait that three men could not march abreast. I was willing to let the world see that Argyll was not the man his Highlandmen believed him to be, and that it was possible to beat him in his own Highlands. The difficultest march of all was over the Lochaber mountains, which we at last surmounted, and came upon the back of the enemy when they least expected us, having cut off some scouts we met about four miles from Inverlochy."*

The privations borne by the Highlanders upon this march must have been very great. "That day they fought," says a contemporary writer, "the general himself and the Earl of Airlie had no more to break their fast upon before they went to battle but a little meal mixed with cold water, which out of a hollow dish they did pick up with their knives; and this was those noblemen's best fare. One may judge what wants the rest of the army must suffer; the most part of them had not tasted bread these two days, marching over high mountains in knee-deep snow, and wading brooks and rivers up to their girdles."†

It was on the evening of the 1st of February, 1645, that Montrose came in sight of Inverlochy. The Campbells were soon aware of his approach as "it was moonlight, and very clear," and some skirmishes took place between the hostile forces, who lay upon their arms all night. Argyll, who had lately hurt his arm by a fall from his horse, and wore it in a sling, embarked in his barge, and "lay there till next morning, sending his orders of discipline to Auchinbreck and the rest of his officers there commanding the battle." * At sunrise the next day the hostile armies put themselves in motion. The centre and reserve of Argyll's army were composed of his own clan, the Lowland troops were placed on either wing, and a garrison of forty or fifty men was thrown into the Castle of Inverlochy. Montrose stationed one of the Irish regiments on each flank, and the third in reserve, while the Highlanders with his few horse occupied the centre. The first onset was given by the Campbells, who, says Montrose, "fought for some time with great bravery." But he adds, when "after the first firing it came to push of pike and dint of sword, they could not stand it," but broke in irretrievable confusion. Auchinbreck and many of his principal officers fell on the field of battle, and fifteen hundred were killed in the conflict or in the pursuit, which lasted for nine miles—"a great slaughter," says Montrose in his letter to the king, "which I would have hindered if possible, that I might save your majesty's misled subjects, for well I know your majesty does not delight in their blood, but in their returning to their duty." The number killed on the side of Montrose was exceedingly small, but among them was Sir Thomas Ogilvie, the second son of Lord Airlie, who had greatly contributed to the victory.

In the despatch which Montrose sent to the king, he expresses his apprehension lest his majesty should enter into a treaty with the parliament, unless they should disband their forces, and submit themselves to the royal goodness and pardon. "Give me leave," he adds, "with all humility to assure your majesty that, through God's blessing, I am in the fairest hopes of reducing this kingdom to your majesty's obedience * * and to come to your assistance with a brave army, which, backed with the justice of your majesty's cause, will make the rebels in England, as well as in Scotland, feel the just rewards of rebellion. Only give me leave after I have reduced this country to obedience, and conquered from Dan to Beersheba, to say to your majesty then, as David's general did to his master, 'Come thou thyself, lest this country be called by my name.' " †

After his victory at Inverlochy, Montrose marched to the north-east, destroying the country as he proceeded; and had the gratification to find that his continued successes at length induced the long-desired Gordons to repair to his standard. At Elgin he was joined by Lord Gordon, Huntley's eldest son, with a select body of cavaliers; and soon after the younger son, Lord Lewis, who had formerly opposed him at the bridge of Dee, also gave in his accession. The northern army, under the Earl of Seaforth, dispersed of itself; and the earl himself soon afterwards joined Montrose. Great ravages of Thus reinforced the marquis in- the royalists.

inflicted the most unsparing vengeance on the districts supposed to be favourable to the parliament. He issued orders for all who were capable of bearing arms, between the ages of sixteen and sixty, to join his banner under pain of military execution; and those who did not immediately comply he treated as rebels, "plundering, burning, and spoiling the houses, biggins, and corn-yards, of the haill lands of the gentry; carrying off the horses, milt, sheep, and plenishing * from others, laying the villages in ashes, and destroying the fishermen's boats and nets." The Lowlands of Aberdeenshire and Moray were laid waste with fire and sword; Elgin and Banff † were given up to pillage; Brechin, Stonehaven, and Cowie, with the shipping and the buildings on the estate of Dunnotar, were successively consigned to the flames, amidst the tears and lamentations of the wretched inhabitants. On the other hand, a party whom Montrose had sent under Nathaniel Gordon, to negotiate with the town of Aberdeen respecting a supply of horses and arms, were surprised by Sir John Urrey, an active dashing soldier, who had changed sides more than once during the civil war. Farquharson of Braemar, one of the best of the Highland chieftains, and some other cavaliers, were killed, and a number were taken prisoners. Lord Graham, the eldest son of the marquis, a youth of great spirit and promise, who was only in his fifteenth year, had been for some time with his father, but, unable to bear the fatigue of this harassing campaign, at this period fell sick and died. James, his second son, "a young bairn about fourteen years," says Spalding, "learning at the schools in Montrose," attended by his pedagogue in a quiet manner, "was soon after seized by Sir John Urrey, in a spirit of petty revenge, and confined with his tutor in the Castle of Edinburgh. The health of the Earl of Airlie, too, gave way at this juncture, and he was obliged to be conveyed for security to Strathbogie. The activity of Montrose, however, did not relax even amidst these severe trials, and he continued with unabated severity to lay waste the country, and to plunder the estates of all who had not openly espoused the royal cause.

Alarmed by these successes, the committee of Estates at Edinburgh raised a considerable body of cavalry, under Sir John Urrey, and sent them to the aid of their general, Baillie. Montrose was not strong enough to keep the field against their combined forces, and his army was still further weakened by the departure of Lord Lewis Gordon, who, either from jealousy, or, as some allege, in consequence of secret advices from his father, withdrew from the royal forces, and carried off a considerable portion of the cavalry with him. Montrose was therefore compelled to abandon the open country, and once more to retire to the mountains. But before carrying this movement into effect he resolved to strike a blow at Dundee, as a punishment for its steady adherence to the cause of the covenant. Suddenly leaving Dunkeld about midnight, with a detachment of nine hundred men, and turning to the east, he hastened towards

Dundee—

Dundee, which he reached about ten o'clock on the morning of the 4th of April. The town was immediately summoned to surrender, and having refused, was stormed in three quarters at once. After a stout resistance the place was carried. Before evening it was set on fire in several districts; the assailants were already dispersed in quest of liquor and plunder, and the usual scenes of rapine and pillage had commenced, when Montrose, who was standing on a hill which overlooks the town, superintending the work of destruction, received intelligence that Baillie and Urrey, with nearly four thousand men, were within a mile of Dundee. This perilous crisis required all his characteristic energy and activity to extricate himself from total ruin. He instantly called off his soldiers from the plunder, put them in order, and began his retreat at sunset, sending away the foot in two separate bodies, and covering the rear himself with his horse. By a series of skilful manœuvres he kept the enemy at bay till darkness closed upon them. The pursuit continued all next day. In the evening Baillie and Urrey having divided their forces for the purpose of intercepting his retreat, and commanding the various routes which led from the sea-coast to the Grampians, he suddenly altered his line of march, and turning to the north-west, slipped between the hostile bodies, and, after a retreat of three days and two nights, at last secured himself in the mountains. "I have often," says his biographer, Dr. Wishart, "heard those who were esteemed the most experienced officers, not in Britain only, but in France and Germany, prefer this march to his most celebrated victories."

After this unsuccessful pursuit, the two generals of the parliament divided their forces. Baillie was directed to proceed to the district of Atholl, which he laid waste with fire and sword, in retaliation of the injuries which the Atholmen had assisted in inflicting upon other districts. Urrey marched northwards to Inverness, where he was joined by the Frasers and other friendly clans, under the Earls of Seaforth and Sutherland. Meanwhile Montrose, at the head of a small body of troops, traversed the hill country in all directions, levying contributions, wasting the districts unfriendly to his cause, and occasionally skirmishing with the forces of the enemy. At this period he was joined by Lord Aboyne, Hantley's second son, who had made his way from Carlisle, with the Lairds of Dalgetty and Keir the younger, at the head of only twenty horsemen, and by the Master of Napier, who had escaped from his confinement in Holyrood House, and succeeded in reaching his uncle Montrose in Menteith. While in this neighbourhood the marquis learned that Urrey, with an overwhelming force, was threatening Lord Gordon at Auchindown. With his characteristic rapidity of movement, he immediately retraced his steps along the Braes of Balquhider, thence passing down the side of Loch Tay, and through Atholl and Angus, he traversed the Grampian mountains, and effected a junction with Lord Gordon on the Dee. Urrey, after his junction with the Frasers and the garrison of Inverness, was superior in numbers to the royal army, and, without awaiting Baillie's co-operation, he sought out Montrose, and offered him battle. The marquis was encamped at the village of Auldearn, in the vicinity of Nairn, and he skilfully availed himself of the nature of the ground to draw up his men in a most advantageous position. The village stands on an eminence, overlooking a valley, with several small hills behind. In front it was covered by enclosures, which concealed the troops from the view of the enemy. Montrose stationed Colkitto with four hundred men among the broken ground on the right, protected by some dykes and brushwood, with strict injunctions that they should on no account quit their position. In this, as by much the strongest point, he placed the royal standard, usually carried before himself, in order to draw the main attack of the enemy on this quarter. On the left of the village he drew up the principal part of his force, he himself commanding the infantry, and Lord Gordon the cavalry. He had neither centre nor reserve, but this defect was artfully concealed from the enemy by placing his cannon there, and showing a few picked men from behind the houses and enclosures.

As Montrose had expected, Urrey directed his principal attack against the position occupied by Macdonald on the right, where the royal standard was seen waving. Colkitto succeeded at first in repelling the assailants, but irritated by the taunts of cowardice which they threw out against him on renewing the attack, he forgot his instructions, and sallied forth from his intrenchments to show that he was not afraid to fight on equal ground. He was immediately surrounded, and nearly overborne by the superior numbers of the enemy. With great difficulty, and not without considerable loss, he succeeded in regaining the shelter of the enclosures, having by his feats of personal prowess contributed not a little to extricate his men from the perilous position into which his rashness had brought them.

At this critical moment, when Montrose was about to lead on his left wing to the attack, he was informed that Macdonald was defeated. With great presence of mind, he immediately turned round to Lord Gordon, and exclaimed, "What are we doing! Macdonald is gaining the victory single handed. If we do not make haste, he will carry off all the honours of the day." Lord Gordon instantly charged the main body of Urrey's dragoons, and after a fierce struggle drove them off the field. The foot, however, stood firm, and were nearly all cut to pieces. Macdonald was still carrying on an unequal conflict on the right; and Montrose, victorious over his immediate opponents, hastened to his assistance, and assailed the covenanters in the flank. The veteran regiments of infantry, however, which formed the left wing of Urrey's army, led on by the gallant Campbell of Lawers, stood firm, until Colonel Drummond, one of Urrey's officers, either by unskillfulness or treachery, wheeled his horse into the midst of the foot, and trampled them down.* No quarter was given by the royalists. Campbell of Lawers, Sir John and Sir Gideon Murray, with many other brave and distinguished officers, and nearly two thousand men, were slain in the battle or the pursuit; and sixteen colours, together with their whole baggage, ammunition, and money, fell into the hands of the victors.

After this signal victory, Montrose marched to Elgin, laying waste the country, as usual, with fire and sword. Nairn and Elgin were plundered, and the principal buildings set on fire. Cullen was reduced to ashes, and "sic lands as were left unburnt up before were now burnt up."† The apologists of the marquis allege that this merciless devastation was provoked by the cruel murder, some time previously, of young Gordon of Rynie, who, while lying severely wounded in the house of a friend, was put to death by a party of soldiers sent out from Elgin. But it was the uniform policy of Montrose to treat as rebels all who did not repair to his standard.

On the day on which the battle of Auldearn was fought, Baillie crossed the Grampians on his way to co-operate with Urrey, and while encamped in a wood near Strathbogie that luckless officer crossed the Spey with the remnant of his horse, "made his way," says Spalding, "through the Marquis of Montrose's watches, saying he was Lord Gordon's man," and succeeded in reaching the camp of the covenanters. Montrose lay at no great distance, but as his army was now diminished in numbers, he resolved to avoid a battle; he therefore harassed the parliamentary forces by forced marches and continual skirmishes, and by beating up their quarters in the night time; till at length, finding that it was impossible to force them to an engagement, and being reduced to great straits for want of provisions, they were forced to retire to Inverness.

No sooner was Montrose freed from the presence of Baillie's army than he resolved to strike a blow at Lord Lindsay, who, with a body of raw levies, was lying at the Castle of Newtyle, in Angus. Accordingly, issuing from the recesses of Badenoch, he once more crossed the Grampians, and by forced marches arrived within seven miles of Lindsay, who was quite unconscious of his danger. At this point, however, the Gordons suddenly deserted his standard, and returned home in spite of the exertions of their commander, Lord Gordon. Montrose was therefore compelled to retrace his steps with all speed. Meanwhile, Baillie was ravaging the estates of Huntley, and even threatened his stately castle of the Bog, which was held for the king by the aged Gordon of Buckie, the murderer of the "Bonnie Earl of Moray." This state of affairs induced Montrose, who had now succeeded in recalling the Gordons to his standard, to march northward, with the view of bringing the covenanting general to action; and after some marching and countermarching, the hostile armies encountered near to the village of Alford, on the Don, July 2nd, 1645. Montrose occupied an advantageous position on a hill, Alford—strengthened by a marsh in his rear, and having his front covered by another hill, which concealed his troops from the view of the enemy. His cavalry was stationed on the wings, the right under Lord Gordon and Nathaniel Gordon, the left commanded by Aboyne and Sir William Rollock. The main body, drawn up in line six file deep, was under the charge of Glengarry, while the reserve concealed behind the brow of the hill was entrusted to the Master of Napier. Baillie, it is said, would have avoided the encounter. Twelve hundred of his veteran soldiers had recently been withdrawn from his army, and a number of raw recruits sent to supply their place. But he was induced to quit an advantageous position at the Kirk of Keith by a manœuvre of Montrose, which led the covenanting general to cross the Don, in the belief that his enemy was in full retreat, and he did not discover his mistake till it was too late to decline battle. His infantry, like the royalists', were drawn up in line, but to meet the extent of the enemy's front he could only form three file deep. His cavalry was commanded by Lord Balcarres, a gallant young nobleman whose impetuosity is said to have precipitated the engagement in opposition to Baillie's judgment. The covenanting horse charged the Gordons with great bravery, and the issue was for some time doubtful; but the fleet musketeers, whom Montrose had intermingled with his cavalry, threw down their muskets and hamstrung the enemy's horse with their swords. The squadrons of Balcarres then fled —and defeat the Gordons with great slaughter. But the infantry commanded by Baillie in person fought desperately, and did not give way till they were attacked in the rear by the victorious cavalry, and by the reserve under the Master of Napier. The victory, however, was embittered by the death of Lord Gordon, who fell from his horse mortally wounded, it is said, while he was in the act of seizing General Baillie by the sword-belt, and his fall put a stop to the pursuit.*

Scotland was now reduced to the lowest extremity. In addition to the devastation occasioned by this destructive civil war, a wasting pestilence now raged throughout the country, but especially in the metropolis. These repeated disasters, however, did not dishearten the convention of Estates.

Vigorous measures adopted by the parliament. Animated and sustained by the counsels of Argyll, whose talents were better adapted for the cabinet than the field, they showed the utmost determination to resist the progress of Montrose. Driven from Edinburgh by the plague, they convened a parliament first at Stirling and then at Perth, ordered a new levy of men throughout the kingdom, enjoined the nobles and gentry to arm, and prohibited emigration to Ireland or England under severe penalties. At the same time they returned thanks to their generals, Baillie, Balleares, and Urrey, for their good service to the country, although they had been unfortunate. Baillie was reluctantly prevailed upon to assume the command of the new levies, but a committee of Estates, consisting of Argyll, Lanark, and Crawford-Lindsay, were appointed to assist him with their advice; and, as he alleged, distracted his counsels and controlled his movements. Meanwhile, the fame of Montrose's victories had attracted to his standard not only great numbers of the Highland clans,—including the Macleans, Macgregors, and Macnabs,—but many of the Lowland cavaliers, who had hitherto held back from doubts of his ability to maintain the contest against the power of the parliament. He was rejoined also by Lord Aboyne and Nathaniel Gordon, at the head of a considerable body of horse, and by the Earl of Airlie and his son, Sir David Ogilvie, with a troop of eighty gentlemen of the same name. Thus reinforced, he descended from the mountains at the head of nearly six thousand men, and approached Perth, where the parliament was then assembled. The newly levied army, however, had taken up a strong position in that neighbourhood, in the expectation of reinforcements, and declined a battle. Montrose, therefore, directed his march towards Stirling, and on his way passed through the parishes of Muckhart and Dollar, belonging to Argyll. The vindictive hatred both of the general

The country laid waste by Montrose. and his men against the great covenanting leader showed itself in the merciless severity with which they laid waste his estates, burnt the cottages, and massacred the defenceless inhabitants. Castle Campbell, a noble antique edifice, situated on an eminence in the Ochil chain of hills, was dismantled and left in ruins. "The destruction of many a meaner habitation," says Sir Walter Scott, "by the same unscrupulous and unsparing spirit of vengeance has been long forgotten, but the majestic remains of Castle Campbell still excite a sigh in those that view them over the miseries of civil war."* Even the town and lordship of Alloa, belonging to the Earl of Mar, did not escape the ravages of the savage Irish kerns under Macdonald, though the earl was now favourably inclined to the royal cause, and entertained Montrose and his chief officers at dinner in his castle. Proceeding westward, and passing by Stirling, which was strongly garrisoned and defied their attack, the royalists crossed the Forth by a ford a few miles above the town, and, continuing their march to the south-west, they encamped at Kilsyth, a village near the old Roman wall in the extremity of Stirlingshire.

The army of the covenanters had by this time quitted Perth, and, following the footsteps of Montrose, had also crossed the Forth at the bridge of Stirling, and halted at a place called Helland-Bush, about two miles and a half from the enemy. Baillie, who was well aware that the raw and undisciplined troops whom he commanded could not be relied on to sustain the headlong attack of Montrose's veterans, wished to avoid an immediate action, but his prudent counsels were overruled by the committee of Estates, who ordered the troops to approach nearer to the enemy. He accordingly marched over corn-fields and broken ground, and took up a strong position, which would have afforded him great advantages in case of an attack. He was urged to draw towards a hill on the right, but refused, saying, "If the rebels engage us there, I conceive they will have the advantage; if we beat them to the hills, that will be little advantage to us; to lose the day will be to lose the kingdom." His remonstrances, however, were disregarded. The lords were afraid that Montrose would carry his ravages into the western districts of the country, which had hitherto escaped his fury, or that he would again seek refuge in the mountains, and, therefore, insisted on an immediate attack. The troops accordingly proceeded to take up their new position, but in a very confused and irregular manner, the officers of the different regiments in several instances acting in opposition to the orders of the general.

When Montrose perceived from the forward movements of the covenanters that they were willing to engage, he exclaimed, "It is the very thing I want; and as for their numbers, we have the best ground, which is more than half the battle." He then ordered his men, both horse and foot, to strip off their upper garments and to fight in their shirts. The royalists were drawn up on a meadow which was

* It is difficult, if not impossible, to obtain anything like an accurate estimate of the loss sustained by Montrose in this and other engagements, as the statements made by Wishart, Bishop Guthrie, and other eulogists of the marquis, are utterly incredible. According to the bishop, in the fiercely-contested battle of Alford, Montrose did not lose one private.

separated from the hill on which the covenanters were now posted by a ravine, whose rugged sides were covered with underwood. Near the upper end of the glen, at the foot of the declivity, were a few scattered cottages and gardens, which were occupied by the Highlanders. The battle began by an attempt on the part of Baillie's vanguard to dislodge the royalists from these enclosures. They were beaten off with loss, and this success excited the mountaineers to such a degree that a thousand of them, without orders, rushed out to pursue the fugitives, and charged up the hill against the troops advancing to their assistance. The Earl of Airlie, at the head of the Angus cavaliers, immediately charged the enemy's horse, and drove them back upon the infantry, whom they were directed to support. The confusion became at once irremediable. Montrose saw the decisive moment, and ordered a general attack of his whole army. The half-naked mountaineers and Irish rushed sword in hand, with hideous outcries, on the wavering ranks of the covenanters, who gave way on all sides, and, throwing away their arms, sought to save themselves by flight. They were pursued with indiscriminate slaughter for fourteen miles. No quarter was given by the savage pursuers, and according to the most moderate calculation from four to five thousand perished in the field and in the pursuit.*

The crowning victory at Kilsyth made Montrose, for the time, master of Scotland. The leaders of the parliament fled for safety to Berwick and to Ireland; the towns endeavoured to propitiate the victor by a timely submission; many of the professed friends of the king who had hitherto remained inactive now openly embraced his cause; and the "waiters on Providence," as Cromwell termed those who always support the strongest side, flocked in considerable numbers to his standard. Among others who now eagerly proffered their services were the Marquis of Douglas, the Earls of Linlithgow, Annandale, and Hartfell, the Lords Seton, Drummond, Erskine, Fleming, Maderty, and Carnegie, Hamilton of Orbiston, lord-justice-clerk, and Archibald Primrose, an eminent lawyer, at that time clerk of the council. The day after the battle Montrose marched into Clydesdale, to disperse the levies of the Earl of Lanark, who fled at his approach. He then proceeded to Glasgow, which he entered in triumph. The city was saved from pillage by the payment of a considerable ransom; but a few of the principal citizens were put to death as incendiaries, probably for the purpose of intimidating the rest. At the same time no effort was left untried to conciliate the great body of the people, and to gain them over to the royal cause. Montrose fixed his head-quarters at Bothwell, whence he sent out his officers into the neighbouring districts to receive the submission of the inhabitants. The Master of Napier and Nathaniel Gordon, with a strong body of troops, were dispatched to Linlithgow, where they proclaimed a meeting of parliament in the name of the king, and released from prison the venerable Lord Napier, with his two daughters and his son-in-law, Stirling of Keir, who had been removed thither from Edinburgh Castle, where the plague was then raging. Pushing forward to the metropolis, which the dread of infection probably prevented them from plundering, Napier and Gordon halted within four miles of the city, and summoned it to surrender. The magistrates, in great terror, made an unconditional submission, and immediately released the Earl of Crawford, Lords Ogilvie and Reay, and other royalists, who, including Wishart, the chaplain and biographer of Montrose, were confined in the Tolbooth as prisoners of state. But Lord Graham, the eldest surviving son of Montrose, having been removed for greater security into the castle, still remained in the hands of his enemies.

While Montrose lay at Bothwell, Sir Robert Spottiswood, formerly president of the court of session, and now secretary of state for Scotland, appeared in his camp, bringing with him a commission from the king, dated at Hereford, 25th June, 1645, appointing the marquis lieutenant-governor and captain-general of Scotland, with new and extended powers. It was publicly, and with all due solemnity, read to the troops, at a grand review at Bothwell, by Archibald Primrose, clerk of the council. Montrose next addressed his soldiers in a short and stirring speech, and then, in virtue of the new powers entrusted to him, he conferred the honour of knighthood on Colkitto.

The success of Montrose, however, was more apparent than real. His victories had, indeed, given him possession of the open country; but Edinburgh, Stirling, Dunbarton, and the other strong fortresses of the kingdom were still in the hands of the covenanters, and he had neither the disciplined troops nor the heavy artillery which were indispensably necessary to enable him to undertake the reduction of these places of strength, and thus to obtain a firm hold of the country. This, however, formed no part of his plan. From the outset of his career, he had entertained the hope of clearing Scotland of the covenanting forces, and then leading his victorious army into England to the assistance of his sovereign. He represented to Charles that if he were only supported by a small body of cavalry, he might hope to bring twenty thousand men to his majesty's rescue. In accordance with this plan, the marquis was ordered to form a junction with the Earls of Roxburgh and Traquair, and to march with all expedition to the Tweed, in order to co-operate with a body of one thousand five hundred horse under Lord Digby, who were dispatched to the north to meet him upon the Borders.

No sooner, however, did Montrose announce his intention to march southward than the Highlanders, as usual, applied for leave to return home for the purpose of depositing their plunder in a place of security, and of cutting down and gathering in their crops. Macdonald, at his own earnest desire, was appointed their commander, professedly for the purpose of bringing them back to the standard, but his real object was to avenge some paltry feud of his own clan in Argyleshire. The Gordons, with their leader Aboyne, soon after followed this example; so that when Montrose began his ill-fated march to the Borders, his forces had dwindled down to a body scarcely more numerous or effective than when he was wandering through Atholl and Badenoch.

Marching through the Lothians, he encamped at Cranston Kirk, on the 6th of September. Next morning he received intimation that Leslie was already at Berwick, with those iron brigades which had contributed so powerfully to turn the tide of battle on Marston Moor. Montrose was advised by Lord Erskine to effect a timely retreat; but disregarding this prudent counsel, he pressed onwards to the Tweed, with the expectation of obtaining considerable reinforcements from the Border nobles favourable to the royal cause. He was joined on his march by the Marquis of Douglas and Lord Ogilvie with some raw levies and a few troops of irregular horse, whom Bishop Guthrie designates as "truthless trained bands." Traquair, with many promises of support, sent his son, Lord Linton, to the royal standard at the head of a troop of cavalry; but the Earls of Roxburgh and Home, who affected great zeal for the royal cause, and had invited the marquis to repair to the Borders, had been surprised by a party of Leslie's men, and carried prisoners to Berwick. It is said, and not without probability, that on discovering the weakness of the royal army, they considered the cause hopeless, and therefore thought only of providing for their own security. It is certain that owing to the changes which had taken place on the Borders, and the strong feeling which prevailed there in favour of the covenant, these nobles, even though they had been inclined, had not the power to bring any considerable body of retainers to the support of the northern clans. The feelings of Montrose at this juncture, and the difficulties with which he had to struggle, are strikingly described in a letter which, on the 10th of September, Sir Robert Spottiswood addressed to Lord Digby from Kelso:—"We are now arrived ad columnas Herculis to Tweedside, dispersed all the king's enemies within this kingdom—some to Ireland, most of them to Berwick—and had no open enemy more to deal with, if you had kept David Leslie there, and not suffered him to come in here to make head against us of new. It is thought strange here that at least you have sent no party after him, which we expected, although he should not come at all. You little imagine the difficulties my lord marquis hath had to wrestle with. The overcoming of the enemy is the least of them; he hath more to do with his seeming friends. Since I came to him (which was but within these ten days, after much toil and hazard) I have seen much of it. He was forced to dismiss his Highlanders for a season, who would needs return home to look to their own affairs. When they were gone, Aboyne took a caprice, and had away with him the greatest strength he had of horse. Notwithstanding whereof he resolved to follow his work, and clear this part of the kingdom of the rebels that had fled to Berwick, and kept a bustling there. Besides, he was invited hereunto by the Earls of Roxburgh and Home, who, when he was within a dozen miles of them, have rendered their houses and themselves to David Leslie, and are carried in as prisoners to Berwick. Traquair has been with him, and he promised more nor (than) he hath yet performed. All these were great disheartenings to any other but to him whom nothing of this kind can amaze. With the small forces he hath presently with him he is resolved to pursue David Leslie, and not suffer him to grow stronger."†

It is evident from the above letter that Montrose was already aware of the approach of Leslie. Upon the first news of the defeat at Kilsyth, that able officer left the Scottish army before Hereford, and hurried northwards at the head of four or five thousand men, chiefly cavalry, for the purpose of checking the progress of the royalists. His first intention seems to have been to intercept Montrose at the Forth, and to cut off his retreat to the mountains. Accordingly, he marched along the eastern coast from Berwick to Tranent; but there he appears to have learned that Montrose was lying encamped in profound security in Ettrick Forest. He therefore suddenly altered his course, and, crossing the country to Middleton, turned southward, and descended the vale of Gala to Melrose, where he quartered his troops for the night.

Meanwhile Montrose had marched on that day (the 12th of September) from Kelso to Selkirk, and now lay encamped within five miles of his adversary in total ignorance of his approach. It has been justly remarked that the fact that he should have received no notice whatever of the march of so large a body of troops proves that he must have been very ill served by his own patrols, and that the country was strongly disaffected to the royalist cause. He had posted his infantry on a level plain called Philiphaugh, upon the northern side of the river Ettrick, immediately after its junction with the Yarrow. It was protected in the rear by a range of hills, and in front by the river, and to render the position more secure some trenches were thrown up on each flank. The town of Selkirk, in which Montrose himself took up his quarters with the cavalry, stands on a lofty bank on the opposite side of the Ettrick, and there, in conjunction with his friends the Lords Napier, Airlie, and Crawford, he was occupied most of the night preparing despatches to the king. surprisal was complete. The noise of the conflict conveyed to Montrose the first intimation of the approach of the enemy. Throwing himself upon his horse the instant he heard the firing, and hastily collecting his cavalry, he galloped across the river to the scene of action, where he found matters in a state of hopeless confusion. Surprised and outnumbered as they were, the right wing of the infantry stood firm for some time, and, protected by their intrenchments and by the thickets of Harehead wood, twice repulsed the attacks of the covenanters. But Leslie had detached two thousand of his horse, who, crossing the river higher up, attacked the rear of the Irish troops, and routed them with great slaughter. The marquis, after repeated and desperate attempts to retrieve the fortune of the day, was at length compelled to make his escape, and, cutting his way through the midst of his enemies, followed by the Marquis of Douglas, Lord Napier, and about thirty horsemen, he fled up the vale of Yarrow and over Minchmoor, reaching at sunset the ancient burgh of Peebles. Next day he was joined by the Earls of Crawford and Airlie, accompanied by about two hundred of the fugitive cavalry, and with these scanty remains of his army he succeeded in regaining his Highland fastnesses. The fruits of his six splendid victories were thus swept away at one blow, and though he soon after assembled once more an army of mountaineers, and strove with indomitable courage and perseverance to make head against the now triumphant covenanters, yet all hope of retrieving the royal fortunes was now extinct, and he never again became formidable to the cause of the parliament.

* The reason of this "caprice" probably was that Huntley, his father, could not forget or forgive his defeat by Montrose when the Gordons first took up arms for the king, and Montrose embraced the covenant; and knowing himself to be equal in rank and superior in power, as well as more consistent in loyalty, Huntley was jealous of Montrose's ascendancy, and of the marks of royal favour which he received.

them were shot in the court-yard of Newark Castle, on the Yarrow; others were probably slaughtered by the peasantry, who had suffered from their outrages. Wishart affirms that many of the fugitives were precipitated from a high bridge into the river and drowned, and a number of the wives and children of the Irish soldiers were subsequently put to death in this way at Linlithgow. The Irish, indeed, seem to have been excepted from quarter in both kingdoms, probably because their atrocities had placed them beyond the pale of civilised warfare.* Hence the parliament subsequently ordered the Irish prisoners taken at Philiphaugh, "to be executed without any assize or process, conform to the treaty betwixt both kingdoms." The captives of higher rank were reserved for a public trial. Colonel O'Kyan and Major Lauchlin, two of the Irish officers, were hanged upon the Castle Hill, Edinburgh. Sir William Rollock, the constant attendant of Montrose from the commencement of his enterprise, Ogilvie of Inverquhar, a youth of only eighteen years of age, and Sir William Nisbet, were executed at Glasgow in the end of October. The fate of the others was deferred till the meeting of parliament. Montrose made a vigorous effort to save the lives of his friends, and in the month of October appeared at the head of fifteen hundred men in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, where Sir Robert Spottiswood and other of the principal prisoners were then confined, and remained there for nearly a month, threatening the town, and endeavouring to provoke Leslie, by whom it was guarded, to encounter him without its walls. But that cautious general contented himself with remaining upon the defensive, and Montrose was at length compelled to return to Atholl, leaving the surviving captives to their fate. They were removed to St. Andrew's, where the parliament met for their trial on the 20th of November. There is no reason to suppose that the leading noblemen of the convention were disposed to mercy, for they had suffered severely from the ravages of Montrose and his savage soldiery; and, as it has been justly remarked, the desire of revenge was so common to the age that it would have been accounted neglect of their duty to their slain kinsmen and plundered vassals if they had let slip the favourable opportunity of exacting blood for blood; besides, they had all been greatly alarmed at the success of the royalists, and nothing makes men more pitiless than the recollection of recent fears.* Their thirst for vengeance, however, was stimulated by the exhortations of the clergy, whose conduct deserves the severest reprobation. Upon the 5th of December "a remonstrance from the commissioners of the General Assembly to the high court of parliament, for justice upon delinquents and malignants who have shed the blood of their brethren," was read in the house, and at the same time petitions to the same effect from the provincial synods of Dumfries, Merse, and Teviotdale, Galloway and Fife, were presented by about two hundred persons, praying that the parliament would hear the voice of their brethren's blood, the cry of the widow and fatherless, and execute impartial justice on the incendiaries and malignants now in bonds, and purge the land from blood-guiltiness.† Six of these unfortunate royalists, the Lords Ogilvie, and Hartfell, Sir Robert Spottiswood, Nathaniel of the principal prisoners. Bishop of Moray, were condemned to death; but Lord Ogilvie escaped from prison in his sister's clothes, it was supposed through the connivance of the Hamiltons, and Hartfell was pardoned through the intercession of Argyll. The other four were executed at St. Andrew's. The fate of Sir Robert Spottiswood was regarded with peculiar grief. He had been president of the court of session, and afterwards secretary of state, and was possessed of great talents and learning. He had never borne arms, but the crime of having brought from England the royal commission to Montrose, and of having accepted the office of secretary, which the parliament had formerly conferred upon the Earl of Lanark, appears to have given great offence, and was thought quite worthy of death.*

While these events were taking place in Scotland, the affairs of the king in Treaty land, of Uxbridge— England were rapidly going to ruin. Negotiations for peace were renewed about the beginning of 1645, and commissioners appointed by the king and the parliament met at Uxbridge, on the 27th of January, to discuss the terms of accommodation. It was soon found, however, that neither the king nor his adversaries were sincerely desirous of peace; and the demands of the parliament were most exorbitant. The leading topics of discussion were arranged under three heads—religion, the militia, and the state of Ireland. Under the first head the parliament demanded the abolition of episcopacy; the establishment in its room of the presbyterial form of church government; the substitution of the directory of public worship for the Anglican liturgy; the confirmation of the acts of the assembly of divines at Westminster; and that the king himself should take the covenant. Charles, however, was strongly attached to episcopacy, and refused to consent to its abolition, though he was now willing to accept of the moderate scheme of prelacy recommended by Archbishop Usher. But the parliamentary commissioners refused even to enter into discussion upon it. The second article of the treaty was the command of the militia. The parliament at first demanded for an unlimited time the appointment of all the commanders by sea and land, including the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and all governors of garrisons. The king, on the other hand, was reluctantly induced to offer to resign the command into the hands of commissioners, half of whom should be named by himself, half by the parliament, for the space of three years, which he afterwards extended to seven. But the parliamentary negotiators peremptorily declined this proposal, and offered as a compromise to limit their demand of exclusive control to seven years, leaving the matter to be again adjusted between the king and the parliament at the termination of this period. With regard to the third proposition, which referred to the state of Ireland, the parliament required that the cessation of arms should be declared void; that the direction of the war should be entrusted to them; and that obtaining assistance from the Continent, are alleged to have rendered his majesty more obstinate in his refusal to accede to the demands of the parliament. The time allotted for treaty was spent in debate and wrangling without settling a single point; and at the expiry of twenty days, the period originally fixed for the duration of the negotiations, the parliament recalled their commissioners.

The failure of the negotiations at Uxbridge made it clear to both parties that they must once more try the fortune of war. The parliament prepared for the renewed struggle by passing the memorable self-denying ordinance, by which the members of both houses were excluded from every civil and military employment. The army was new modelled; the ablest and fittest men were drafted from the old regiments, and placed under new officers, selected for their courage and skill. The discipline introduced among them was of the most exact and rigid kind; "for the usual vices of camps were restrained among them; no theft, no wantonness, no oaths, nor any profane words, could escape without the severest castigation, by which it was brought to pass that in this camp, as in a well-ordered city, passage was safe, and commerce free."* Their new officers united in their persons both the spiritual and the military functions, and prayed with and exhorted as well as drilled their troops. The private soldiers caught the spirit of their leaders, and their religious enthusiasm, combined with their valour and discipline, speedily rendered them one of the most formidable armies that the world has ever seen. The royalists, on the other hand, became as notorious for their blasphemy and swearing, drinking, gambling, and other vices, as their adversaries were remarkable for their sobriety and decency. "The officers prided themselves in their profligacy, considering all decency of behaviour the merest hypocrisy, and altogether unfit for soldiers, and their men showed a great aptitude in following the example of their superiors." The whole country was laid waste by their excesses, so that in the end they became more formidable to their friends than to their enemies.

At the opening of the campaign the king to all appearance had many advantages over his opponents; but the effects of the new modelling of the parliamentary army soon became apparent. The siege of Taunton was raised by Fairfax, and Cromwell defeated a portion of the royal forces at Islip Bridge, in Oxfordshire, and took Bletchington House, in which a portion of the fugitives had sought refuge. On the other hand, the king relieved Chester, which was besieged by Sir William Brereton; and, after an obstinate resistance, took the import-of age or sex, of royalist or republican, though the king had many adherents within the town: even the churches and hospitals were not exempted from the general pillage. One of the most zealous partisans of the royal cause is compelled to acknowledge that "Leicester presents but one among many instances which show that the cavaliers, and the royalist soldiers generally, assumed after the adoption of the new model a greater height of licen-tiousness, as if in scornful contrast with their enemies, who affected to regard themselves as the soldiers of God, and to observe a severity of discipline as well as a gravity of demeanour consistent with that lofty claim."

On receiving intelligence of this disaster, Fairfax abandoned the siege of Oxford, and marched towards the royal army. A few days after (June 13th), he came up with the king at Harborough, in Leicestershire, and spread an alarm through the royal camp by falling suddenly on the outposts at eleven o'clock at night, and killing or making prisoners the sentinels. On this unexpected occurrence, his majesty immediately assembled a council of war, at which, with the rash, impetuous gallantry that characterised the royalist officers, it was resolved to advance and offer battle.* Early next morning the parliamentary forces put themselves in motion, with the view of bringing the royalists to action, but on approaching the village of Naseby, near the borders of Northamptonshire, they found the king's army drawn up in battle array on a rising ground about a mile south

 for a retreat, the royalists quitted the advantageous position which they had occupied, and advanced into the plain, a fallow field about a mile broad, on the north-west side of Naseby. The battle was begun by Prince Rupert, who, with his characteristic impetuosity, charged the left wing of the parliamentary army commanded by Ireton, threw them into disorder, and, in spite of a desperate resistance, drove them from the field. Ireton himself was severely wounded, and taken prisoner.
 His reserves also were routed, and some of the guns fell into the enemy's hands. While this was going on, the royal centre, commanded by the king in person, advanced at a rapid pace up the hill, and made a fierce onset upon the main body of the parliamentary army under Fairfax, and compelled them to give way. Fairfax, however, and brave old Skippen rallied their broken ranks, and renewed the fight. Meanwhile, Cromwell, at the head of his famous Ironsides, had completely routed
 the left wing of the royalists, under Sir Marmaduke Langdale; and leaving four squadrons to continue the pursuit, and prevent the broken enemy from rallying, with the remainder of his victorious troops

he wheeled rapidly round to the centre, where the battle still raged with doubtful success, and attacked the royal forces in the flank and rear. This movement decided the victory. The king's battalions, already hard pressed, gave way on all sides, threw down their arms and fled, or yielded themselves prisoners. One regiment alone stood its ground, and, though twice furiously assailed, would not move an inch. A third charge, however, made simultaneously in front and rear, threw them into confusion; the standard was taken by Fairfax himself; and the devoted band, cut through in all directions, were at length driven from the field. By this time Prince Rupert had returned from his pursuit of the parliamentary left wing, which, with his habitual rashness, he had carried too far, but the battle was irretrievably lost. The king, indeed, who had shown great gallantry throughout this fatal day, endeavoured to rally his broken squadrons, and to restore the fight. "One charge more," he exclaimed, "and we recover the day!" But the effort was in vain. The cavalry felt it was hopeless to contend alone against the enemy's horse, foot, and artillery, and could not be induced again to form and renew the contest.

the hands of the victors, all their artillery, with eight thousand stand of arms, all their baggage, including the rich plunder they had carried off from Leicester a few days before, the royal standard, and a hundred other colours, together with the king's baggage and his private cabinet of papers and letters.* These important documents were soon after published by command of parliament; and by the incontestable proofs which they offered of his majesty's systematic insincerity and double-dealing, contributed largely to the ruin of his cause.

After this fatal battle the king returned to Wales, in the vain hope of raising Ruin of the

 He spent about three weeks with the Marquis of Worcester, in Ragland Castle, where, strange to say, his time was principally passed in sports and entertainments, "as though," says his military historian, "no crown had been at stake or in danger to be lost." Meanwhile, his affairs were going to ruin in all quarters, and his indefatigable adversaries were diligently improving their victory. Fairfax re-took Leicester on the 17th of June. On the 10th of July he raised the siege of Taunton, and shortly after defeated Goring at Langport, in Somerset, and took fourteen hundred prisoners. The strong and important town of Bridgewater surrendered to him on the 23rd of July. A fortnight later Sherborne Castle was taken by storm. The siege of Bristol immediately followed. Prince Rupert occupied that city with a strong garrison; it was well stored with provisions, and he had boasted, in a letter to the king, that he would defend the place against all attacks for four months at least;

but he hardly held it four days, and capitulated as soon as his lines were forced, while the walls of the city were yet entire. The king was so provoked at his nephew's precipitate surrender of this important fortress, that he immediately recalled all the prince's commissions, commanded him to quit the country, and sent him a pass to go beyond sea. Separating from the main army, Cromwell proceeded to reduce the strongholds in the western counties, which still held out for the king. Devizes, Berkley, and Winchester Castles, Basing House, and other fortified places, were successively surrendered or carried by storm. Lord Wentworth was defeated near Ashburton, with the loss of four hundred men. Hopton was overthrown at Torrington, and, followed by some broken squadrons of cavalry, took refuge in Cornwall, where his disorganised troops mutinied and laid down their arms.

In the meantime the Scots, having after an obstinate siege made themselves masters of Carlisle, marched southward and invested Hereford. On the approach of the king, however, they raised the siege, and fell back toward the Borders. Previous to this, Charles had entertained the project of marching to the north with his cavalry, and effecting a junction with Montrose, but after advancing as far as Doncaster, he wavered, and then renounced the scheme as hopeless. At this juncture he again resolved to adopt this expedient, and, starting from Hereford, he proceeded to Chester by a circuitous rout over the Welsh mountains, with the view of avoiding any interruption from the enemy, intending to make his way from Chester northward by Lancashire and Cumberland. The city of Chester was of great importance to him, as no other port remained open by which the expected reinforcements from Ireland could land. It was at this time besieged by the parliamentary forces under Colonel Jones, who had obtained possession of a portion of the suburbs. While engaged in an attempt to dislodge the besiegers, the royal forces were attacked by Colonel Poyntz, who had received orders to follow the king in his march, and after a desperate engagement the royalists were completely defeated, with the loss of six hundred killed and a thousand taken prisoners. The king, with the remains of his army, fled to Newark, and thence escaped to Oxford, where he shut himself up during the winter season. From Newark Lord Digby and Sir Mar-maduke Langdale were dispatched, at the head of fifteen hundred cavalry, to the assistance of Montrose, but the attempt completely failed. At Sherborne they were defeated with considerable loss by Colonel Copley, and the misfortune was greatly aggravated by the capture of Digby's cabinet, containing his official correspondence with the king, which, as in the case of Charles's own correspondence at Naseby, proved highly injurious to the royal cause. Rallying his dispersed followers at Skipton, Digby continued his march through Westmoreland and Cumberland as far as Dumfries, but having failed there to obtain intelligence of Montrose, he retraced his steps to the neighbourhood of Carlisle, and there disbanded his troops. He and his officers sought shelter in the Isle of Man, whence they ultimately proceeded to Dublin.

To crown the misfortunes of the king, his intrigues with the Irish rebels were brought to light at this juncture, and completed the ruin of the royal character and interests. The cessation of arms with the Roman Catholic insurgents in Ireland was agreed to by the king, for the purpose of enabling him to recall his own troops, and to avail himself of the services of such of the rebel party as might be willing to follow the royal standard. At first the negotiations with the insurgents had been carried on at Oxford by means of deputies from Ireland, but they were subsequently entrusted to the management of the royal lieutenant, the Marquis of Ormond, at Dublin. The demands of the rebels were exceedingly extravagant. They knew their own strength and the king's weakness, and insisted on the public recognition and establishment of their religion, in return for their support of the royal cause. Finding that their scruples in regard to this point were not to be overcome, the king authorised Ormond to agree to the repeal of the penal laws against the Roman Catholics. But it soon became apparent that this concession was not regarded as sufficient to satisfy their demands, and the impatience or necessities of the king induced him to employ another negotiator, who could secretly offer such terms to the rebels "as it were unfit for the king at present to acknowledge publicly, and in which his lieutenant Ormond could not be seen." The person selected for this delicate mission was Lord Herbert, eldest son of the Marquis of Worcester, himself a papist, who was created Earl of Glamorgan, and secretly invested with extraordinary powers for the purpose of negotiating with the confederate Irish. The commission was granted to him under his majesty's privy signet, without the knowledge of his council; and it was arranged that, in case of discovery, the commission was to be disavowed by the king, and the whole blame thrown upon the agent. Discovery of the king's intrigues with the Irish rebels. Treaty of Lord Glamorgan— Furnished with this authority, Glamorgan proceeded to Kilkenny, and there concluded a treaty with the confederates, by which it was virtually stipulated that popery should become the established religion throughout the greater part of Ireland. In return for this concession, the Irish rebels agreed that they should furnish ten thousand men in aid of the royal cause, and should assign to the king's use for three years a large proportion of the ecclesiastical revenues.

Scarcely was this nefarious transaction completed, when it was brought to light by the discovery of a duplicate of the treaty, which was found on the person of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, who was killed at the siege of Sligo by the Scottish army. It produced the most extraordinary excitement in both countries, and, to avert the obloquy which was in consequence thrown upon the king, Glamorgan was arrested by Ormond on a charge of treason. His com-

—its disavowal mission was publicly disavowed by the king. Charles, who denied that he had authorised the earl to enter into any treaty whatever with the rebels, and affirmed that he had merely furnished him with a commission to raise troops for his service. No credit, however, was given to these professions, and their insincerity soon became painfully manifest. Glamorgan, after the lapse of a few weeks, was liberated upon bail, and, with the approbation of the lord-lieutenant, returned to Kilkenny, to continue his negotiations with the confederates. He at length succeeded in concluding a treaty with them, and received an immediate aid of five or six thousand men, whom he led to Waterford, in order to relieve the city of Chester, which was reduced to great extremities by the parliamentary forces. But before he could obtain shipping for his troops, he received the unwelcome news that Chester had fallen, so that there was now no longer a port open for their landing in England. Upon this intelligence Glamorgan dispersed his now useless forces—"all these devices, therefore, nothing availed the king, all his designs were frustrated."*

The affairs of the king had now become desperate. His last hopes of success were extinguished by the overthrow of Montrose at Philiphaugh, and on the defeat of Lord Astley at Stowe, the last royalist army was dissolved. Fairfax was advancing with his victorious army to invest Oxford, and the king was in imminent danger of being shut up in that city. In these distressing circumstances Charles made repeated but unsuccessful attempts to open negotiations with the parliament. He even offered to proceed to London, and there conduct a personal treaty; but this proposal was refused by the parliament, on the ground that the king's presence in London would neither be safe for him nor convenient for themselves. They evidently distrusted his sincerity, and not without reason,—for his design, as expressed in a confidential letter to Lord Digby, was to get to London with the expectation "of drawing either the presbyterians or independents to side with him for extirpating each other, so that I shall be really king again."* An attempt was then made to procure more favourable terms by his surrender to the parliamentary forces engaged in the siege of Woodstock; but this also failed, as neither Ireton nor Rainsborough, who commanded these troops, would engage to protect their sovereign, and conduct him in safety to the parliament. In this extremity the king turned to the Scots, who had never manifested such implacable animosity against him, and opened negotiations with them through Montreuil, the French envoy; but the Scottish officers would promise nothing beyond the safety of his person. It was impossible, however, for the king to remain much longer in Oxford without the certainty of falling into the hands of his enemies; and on the night of the 27th of April he quitted that ancient city habited as a groom, and accompanied only by his chaplain, Dr. Hudson, and Mr. Ashburnham.

Notwithstanding this decisive step, Charles was still unresolved whether to cast himself upon the protection of the Scots, to endeavour to join Montrose, or to proceed at once to the metropolis. Passing through Henley, Slough, and Uxbridge, the king and his two companions reached Harrow, within an hour's ride of London, "much perplexed," says Hudson "what course to resolve upon—London or northward." But having learned that the parliament had issued a proclamation, declaring that if the sovereign should appear in the capital without their consent his person should be apprehended, and his followers imprisoned, his heart failed him, and he turned northward through St. Albans towards the Scottish camp. After passing in disguise through many by-ways and cross-roads, and lingering for some days at Downham, in Norfolk, "purposely," says Clarendon, "to be informed of the condition of the Marquis of Montrose, and to find some secure passage that he might get to him," he at length reached the Scottish army before Newark (5th May), and immediately discovered himself to their general, Lord Leven.

The Scottish officers and commissioners expressed great surprise that the king "had so far honoured their army as to think it worthy his presence after so much opposition." They treated him with great respect, and assigned him a guard ostensibly for his protection, but in reality for his security as a captive, and to prevent all private communication with the officers. The parliament was startled by the intelligence, which reached them on the 6th of May, of the king's arrival in the Scottish camp, and after a protracted debate, carried resolutions declaring that his majesty's person should be at the disposal of both houses of parliament; that the Scots should conduct the king to Warwick Castle; and that Ashburnham and Hudson should be delivered up to the parliament as delinquents. The Scots refused to comply with these demands, alleging that as Charles was the sovereign of Scotland no less than of England,

* May, Brev. Hist. Parl. Hume and other defenders of the king have sought to extenuate or deny the king's share in these disgraceful transactions, but his majesty's letters are quite decisive on the subject. (See Dr. Birch's Inquiry). The testimony of Clarendon is of itself sufficient to settle the question. "I must tell you," he says in a letter to Secretary Nicholas, "I care not how little I say in that business of Ireland, since those strange powers and instructions to your favourite Glamorgan, which appear to me so inexcusable to justice, piety, and prudence. And I fear there is very much in that transaction more than you or I were ever thought wise enough to be advised within. Oh, Mr. Secretary! these stratagems have given me more sad hours than all the misfortunes that have befallen the king, and look like the effects of God's anger towards us." they had an undeniable right to share in the disposal of his person; and that he had established an additional claim to their protection by having come voluntarily into their camp—a plea which they likewise extended to the persons who had accompanied him. Ashburnham, however, in compliance with the king's command, made his escape to the Continent, but Hudson was intercepted, and ultimately carried to Westminster and imprisoned.

As there was now no longer any motive for prolonging the struggle, the king ordered the war. Lord Bellasis to surrender Newark to the parliament, and disband his troops. Shortly after, similar orders were sent to the governors of Oxford, Lichfield, Worcester, and all other fortresses which held out for him in England. Ormond was commanded to deliver Dublin, and the other strongholds in Ireland, into the hands of the parliamentary officers; and finally Montrose, who had hitherto kept together a small body of troops in the Highlands, laid down his arms and sought shelter on the Continent. The day following the surrender of Newark, the Scottish army, probably with the view of preventing any attempt on the part of the parliament to intercept their return, marched rapidly northward to Newcastle, where they halted to await the progress of their negotiations with the king and the parliament.* It is said that the English commons were so enraged at this step on the part of their allies, that at one moment they entertained the notion of dispatching Cromwell, at the head of their whole cavalry, to fall upon the Scots by surprise, and to take the king away from them by force; but ultimately they contented themselves with detaching Poyntz with a party of dragoons to follow the Scots, and watch them on their march northward from the Trent.

For some time previous to the termination of the war, the Scots had been declining in favour as their services had become of less importance to the parliament. Their pay was in arrears; their supplies were neglected, while the wants of the English forces were carefully provided for; their free quarters were refused; their cautionary garrisons in the north were demanded back. On the 29th of June the parliament voted them a grant of £100,000 for unsettled claims, provided they immediately surrendered these towns,—Newcastle, Berwick, and Carlisle,—and returned to their own country. A week later the vote of dismissal was repeated in more peremptory terms, and it was declared “that the kingdom had no further need of the Scotch army, and was unable to pay them longer.” The Scotch, on the other hand, mildly reminded their allies that they had come into the kingdom at the earnest desire of their brethren, and had faithfully given their assistance to promote the ends expressed in the covenant, and declared that they were willing to surrender the garrisons possessed by them, and without delay to recall their army, provided that reasonable satisfaction were given them “for their pains, hazards, charges, and sufferings,—a competent portion to be presently paid, and security to be given for the remainder.”* After many discussions, it was at last agreed that in lieu of all demands the sum of £400,000 should be accepted by the Scotch, of which one half was to be paid before the army left England, and the remainder within two years, “on the public faith of the nation.”

Other and more important negotiations were at the same time in progress. The Terms offered Scotch, along with the presbyterian party in England, offered terms of peace which were not materially different from those proposed at the treaty of Uxbridge. The parliament demanded the power of the sword for twenty years instead of seven, which the king now offered; the right to levy whatever money should be thought necessary for the support of their armies, together with the abolition of episcopacy, and the subscription of the solemn league and covenant by the king. The Scottish leaders, in particular, earnestly pressed him to take the covenant as the only means that now remained of settling the kingdom. Charles pleaded his conscience; he was bound by his coronation-oath to uphold episcopacy, which had been established in England since the Reformation; but he expressed his willingness to comply with the demands of parliament, if they could only satisfy his mind upon two points—first, that episcopacy was not of divine institution; secondly, that his coronation-oath did not bind him to support and defend the Church of England as it was then established. To remove, if possible, his majesty's scruples, the celebrated Alexander Henderson, though labouring under a mortal disease, left London, and hastened to Newcastle about the close of May. A controversy in writing ensued, which continued to the end of July, and was terminated by the illness of Henderson, who retired to Edinburgh, and died there on the 19th of August, worn out with his many and arduous labours. “Some said,” records Whitelocke, “he died of grief because he could not persuade the king to sign the propositions.”

On the 23rd of July the final propositions of the parliament were presented to the king by commissioners appointed for the purpose. His majesty inquired if they had any power to treat, and being answered in the negative, he replied as he had done on a former occasion, “Then, saving the honour of the business, an honest trumpeter might have done as much.” When the proposals were read he requested time for deliberation, as they involved changes of great importance: the Earl of Pembroke replied that he must give his answer in ten days.† “The commissioners of the parliament of England,” says May, “stayed long with the king at Newcastle, humbly entreating him that he would vouchsafe to sign and establish those propositions. The same thing did the commissioners of the parliament in Scotland humbly entreat; and the like did others daily who came with renewed supplications to that end from the parliament sitting at Edinburgh. But in vain

He refuses the terms offered him. were the supplications of both kingdoms; the king persisted obstinately in denial of his assent; but daily he seemed to take exception at some particulars, whereby time was delayed for some months, and the affairs of both kingdoms much retarded, which happened at an unseasonable time, when not only dissensions between the two nations about garrisons, money, and other things were justly feared, but also in the parliament of England, and city of London, the divisions were then increasing between the two factions of the presbyterians and the independents, from whence the common enemy began to swell with hopes not improbable. And this, perchance, was the cause of the king's delay.*

Both the Scotch and English presbyterians were convinced that the king's acceptance of the parliament's propositions was the only means of saving the throne; and as they loved monarchy, though they did not love Charles personally, they employed both prayer and threats to induce him to comply with their demands. The Earl of Loudoun, Chancellor of Scotland, assured his majesty in emphatic terms, that his assent to the proposals now offered him was indispensable for the preservation of his crown and kingdoms, and that a refusal would bring on sudden ruin. "The parliament," he said, "is in possession of your navy, of all the towns, castles, and forts of England. They enjoy (besides sequestration) your revenue. Soldiers and monies are raised by their authority; and after so many victories and successes, they have a standing army so strong as to be able to act anything in Church or State at their pleasure." Refusal, or even delay, therefore, to accept of the terms now offered might provoke the parliament, who had the power, to adopt the determination of excluding the king and his posterity from the throne.

These urgent representations were supported by —and of the French ambassador and the queen. M. de Bellièvre, the new French ambassador, who implored the king to accept the propositions, and presented letters from the queen to the same effect. Sir William Davenant was sent over by her majesty to enforce her advice and entreaty, that the king "should part with the Church for his peace and security." All was of no avail. "Charles," says one of his apologists, "had strong reasons of a political nature for rejecting this advice. His distrust of the presbyterians was hereditary and profound, and he could not fail to bear in mind the sad confirmation afforded in his own career of his father's maxim—'no bishop, no king.' He still clung to the belief that notwithstanding the seeming unanimity of the two great factions, they would presently be divided even on the one question that most nearly concerned himself, and that the royal authority was still sufficient to adjust the balance between the presbyterian and commonwealth factions." He, therefore, declared to the courtiers who urged him to agree to the proposals of the parliament, that their arguments "were not only against his conscience,* but absolutely destructive to the end" of those who adduced them—"viz., the maintenance of monarchy;" and he assured them that "the more they pressed him on this subject, the more they would contribute to his ruin." Finally, he informed the commissioners that he was anxious to obtain a personal conference with the parliament, and for this purpose he desired to repair to London as soon as he had the assurance of the two houses, and of the Scotch commissioners, that he might appear there with freedom, honour, and safety. This answer, which was regarded by the parliament as a refusal of their demands, was received with grief by the king's friends, and with open exultation by his enemies. "What will become of us," said a presbyterian member, "since his majesty refuses the propositions?"—"Nay, what would have become of us," replied an independent, "if he had granted them?"

Many months had now been spent in negotiations and discussions without any Final decision satisfactory result. At length, of the Scots. about the middle of December, the Scotch commissioners laid before the king the resolution of the parliament at Edinburgh not to allow him to enter Scotland. Charles, on this, once more renewed his request for "a personal, free debate with his two houses of parliament upon all the present differences." The parliament took no notice of this message, but resolved that the king should be allowed to come to Holmby, or Holdenby House, in Northamptonshire, "with all respect to the safety and preservation of his majesty's person, and in preservation and defence of the true religion, according to the covenant." On the 14th of January, 1647, the king submitted a paper to the Scottish commissioners, desiring to know whether he was a free man or a prisoner; adding, it is a received opinion by many that the engagements, acts, or promises of a prisoner, are neither valid nor obligatory, though he did not assert that to be his own opinion; and next whether he might go to Scotland with honour, freedom, and safety, or not. After a discussion of several hours, the commissioners returned the following answer to these queries:—"To the first, in what state you stand as in relation to freedom, the parliaments of both your kingdoms have given such orders and directions as they have thought fittest for the good and safety of your majesty and the kingdoms to the general and governor. To your majesty's second query of your going into Scotland, we shall humbly desire that we may not be put to give any answer; but if your majesty shall either deny or delay your assent to the propositions, we are in that case to represent to your majesty the resolution of the parliament of England." Two days after (January 16), the Scottish parliament, in spite of the opposition of the Duke of Hamilton and his friends, agreed to deliver up the king's person to the English parliament. When this resolution was carried, the duke gave a decided negative, the Earl of Crawford-Lindsay, president of the parliament, in signing officially the public warrant of surrender, recorded his solemn protest against it as an individual;* and the Earl of Lanark, Hamilton's brother, vehemently declared, "As God shall have mercy on my soul at the great day, I would choose rather to have my head struck off at the mereat (market) Cross of Edinburgh than give my consent to this vote."†

In vindication of this resolution, the Estates issued a declaration, narrating "that when the king came to the quarters of the Scottish army before Newark, he professed that he came there with the full and absolute intention to give all just satisfaction to the joint desires of both kingdoms, and with no thought either to continue this unnatural war any longer, or to make division betwixt the kingdoms; and in confidence of the reality of his intentions and resolutions, which he declared did proceed from no other ground than the deep sense of the bleeding condition of his kingdoms; and on these terms alone did the committees of the kingdom of Scotland, and the general officers of the Scottish army, declare to himself and to the kingdom of Scotland that they received him; and represented to him that the only way of his own happiness and peace of his own kingdom under God, was to make good his professions so solemnly renewed to both kingdoms, and the prejudice and inconvenience that would arise from delay; but that, notwithstanding, these promises remained unfulfilled; and as their army was now about to leave England, and the king had expressed in his answers to the propositions submitted to him his desire to be near his two houses of parliament, and the two houses had appointed Holmby House for his reception, the Estates of the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland concurred in his majesty's going to Holmby House, or some other of his houses in or about London, there to remain until he give satisfaction to both kingdoms in the propositions of peace; but, in the interim, that there be no harm, prejudice, injury, nor violence, done to his person; that there be no change of government, other than that hath been these three years past, and that his posterity be in no way prejudiced in their lawful succession to the crown and government of these kingdoms."

On the 23rd of January the commissioners appointed to take charge of the king arrived at Newcastle, and were received by his majesty with great cheerfulness and affability. He was well pleased, he said, to part from the Scots, and to come nearer to the parliament. On the 30th he set out for his new residence at Holmby Park, escorted by nine hundred horse, and on the same day the Scots evacuated Newcastle, and began their march to their own country.

It has often been asserted that the payment of the arrears due to the Scots was given as an equivalent for their surrender of the king's person; but this misstatement of facts is as gross as the stigma attached to the Scottish nation is undeserved. The amount of the arrears was fixed in August, the payment of the money was voted by the parliament on the 5th of September; the negotiations respecting the king were not concluded till the 10th of January following. On the 21st of September, a month after the settlement of the arrears, the English parliament passed a vote claiming the sole disposal of the king's person. The Scots instantly remonstrated against this vote, and urged that as Charles was sovereign of both countries, as both nations had taken part in the contest, and had an equal interest in its settlement, so both had a right to be consulted respecting the disposal of his person. The English, on the other hand, maintained that the king being in England was comprehended within the jurisdiction of that kingdom, and could not be disposed of by any foreign nation. On the 10th of December the Scottish parliament, through the influence of the Hamiltons, resolved to maintain the freedom of the king, and to assert his right to the English throne; and though this vote was rescinded next day, on the ground that it amounted to an abandonment of the solemn league and covenant adopted in concert with the English presbyterians, yet the Scotch still offered to reinstate the king on the throne, and to obtain for him a favourable settlement with his English subjects, provided he would consent to take the covenant. The Duke of Hamilton, one of his principal friends in Scotland, who had obtained his freedom on the surrender of Pendennis Castle, united with the covenanters in urging him to take this step as the only means of saving himself and the monarchy. But the king remained inflexible, and all that could be obtained from him was a dubious consent to tolerate presbytery for three years; and, in making even this concession, he declared privately to the Bishop of London his resolution to restore and uphold episcopacy. At the very last moment the Earls of Lauderdale and Traquair renewed with greater earnestness their efforts to induce the king to give his consent to the establishment of presbytery, undertaking, on this condition, to conduct him to Berwick, and to procure more favourable terms from the English parliament; and a bribe of twenty thousand Jacobuses was offered to Montreuil to obtain from Charles even a bare promise of his compliance with their demands. It could scarcely be expected, as Sir Walter Scott has justly remarked, that the Scottish convention of Estates should resign the very point on which it had begun and continued the war. The king's obstinate refusal to accede to the terms proposed to him rendered it impossible for the Scots to support his cause, or even to retain possession of his person. He was not given up to his English subjects till he had not only positively refused to comply with the terms which the Scots had urgently pressed upon him, but had written repeatedly to the English parliament, expressing his desire to be near them, the more speedily and effectually to conclude the long-continued negotiations. To have attempted to retain him in these circumstances would have led, not merely to a breach of the league with England, but to a civil war.

"It would have shown more generosity," says Mr. Hallam, "to have offered the king an alternative of retiring to Holland; and from what we now know, he probably would not have neglected the opportunity. But the consequence might have been his solemn deposition from the English throne; and, however we may think such banishment more honourable than the acceptance of degrading conditions, the Scots, we should remember, saw nothing in the king's taking the covenant, and sweeping away prelate superstition, but the bounden duty of a Christian sovereign, which only the most perverse self-will induced him to set at nought. They had a right also to consider the interests of his family, which the threatened establishment of a republic in England would defeat. To carry him back with their army into Scotland, besides being equally ruinous to the English monarchy, would have exposed their nation to the most serious dangers. To undertake his defence by arms against England, as the ardent royalists desired, and doubtless the determined republicans no less, would have been, as was proved afterwards, a mad and culpable renewal of the miseries of both kingdoms. He had voluntarily come to their camp; no faith was pledged to him; their very right to retain his person, though they had argued for it with the English parliament, seemed open to much doubt. The circumstance, unquestionably, which has always given a character of apparent baseness to this transaction, is the payment of £100,000, made to them so nearly at the same time, that it has passed for the price of the king's person. This sum was part of a larger demand on the score of arrears of pay, and had been agreed upon long before we have any proof or reasonable suspicion of a stipulation to deliver up the king. That the parliament would never have actually paid it on any other consideration, there can be, I presume, no kind of doubt, and of this the Scots must have been fully aware. But whether there were any such secret bargain as has been supposed, or whether they would have delivered him up if there had been no pecuniary expectation in the case, is what I cannot conceive sufficient grounds to pronounce with confidence; though I am much inclined to believe the affirmative of the latter question. And it is deserving of particular observation, that the party in the House of Commons which sought most earnestly to obtain possession of the king's person, and carried all the votes for payment of money to the Scots, was that which had no further aim than an accommodation with him, and a settlement of the government on the basis of its fundamental laws, though doubtless on terms very derogatory to his prerogative; while those who opposed each part of the negotiation were the zealous enemies of the king, and, in some instances at least, of the monarchy.*

* The following defence of the Scots against the accusations which have been so freely preferred in consequence of the transactions at Newark, will be read with interest, as proceeding from a writer who will not be suspected of an undue partiality to the covenanters, namely, Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh, Lord-Advocate of Scotland in the reign of Charles II. and James VII. "The parliament of Scotland (1661)," says he, "taking to their consideration how much, and how unjustly this kingdom was injured by an aspersion cast upon it for the transactions at Newcastle in anno 1647, at which time the king was delivered to the parliament of England, which was called in some histories a selling of the king, did, by an express act condemn and reprobate all that treaty, and declare that the same was no national act, but was only carried on by some rebels who had falsely assumed the name of a parliament. Nor wanted there many, even in that parliament, who protested against all that procedure, and who had the courage and honesty to cause registrate that protestation. And I must here crave leave to expostulate with our neighbours of England, for inveighing so severely against our nation for delivering their king, seeing he was only delivered up to the then parliament, who first imprisoned, and then murdered him; whereas, how soon even our rebels discovered their design, they carried into England a splendid mighty army for his defence, and when his murder came to their ears, they proclaimed his son their king, and sent commissioners to treat with him, and bring him to Scotland; and when he was arrived, they did contribute their lives and fortunes for his safety. And albeit some bigot presbyterians did use him unkindly out of too much kindness to their own principles, yet even these did very generously oppose Cromwell, and such as had murdered the king, as is clear by the attack made by Major-general Montgomery at Musselburgh, and by the remonstrators at Linlithgow. They fought also two battles for him at Dunbar and Worcester, and suffered the greatest imaginable hardships." (Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland from the Restoration of King Charles II. A.D. 1660. By Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh.)

CHARLES THE FIRST.

SOON after the return home of the Scotch, the presbyterians perceived that the maintenance of their own power, as well as the public safety and convenience, required the reduction of the army. They proposed, therefore, at once to disband the greater part of the troops, and to send another portion over to Ireland. This proposal excited great dissatisfaction throughout the army, and instead of preparing to disband, the soldiers presented a petition demanding an indemnity, ratified by the king, for their conduct during the war, payment of their arrears, exemption from being compelled to serve in Ireland, compensation for the maimed, pensions for the widows and families of those who had been killed, and weekly pay as long as they should remain embodied. The parliament denounced this petition as mutinous, and threatened to proceed against its promoters as enemies to the State and disturbers of the public peace. The soldiers, irritated at this harsh treatment, complained that while petitions against them were encouraged, they whose valour had preserved the liberties of the nation were denied the common right of subjects to represent their own wrongs; and, in order effectually to procure the redress of their grievances, they organised a military council in opposition to the parliament at Westminster. The commons, who perceived when too late the spirit which they had provoked, were obliged to yield every point. The demands of the agitators, as the military deputies were called, rose in proportion to the concessions of the parliament. Besides the loss of pay and influence which they would incur by being compelled to lay down their arms and return to their original occupations, they dreaded the imposition of the presbyterian doctrine and discipline, to which their independent principles rendered them exceedingly averse. Having discovered their strength, they soon made it evident that they were determined not to submit to the tyranny of the parliament. Cromwell, Fleetwood, and Ireton, by whom the mutinous spirit of the troops was fomented, were by an unaccountable infatuation sent down by the parliament to pacify the agitators, and to "settle the distempers in the army." "We know of no distempers," was the reply of the representative tribunes, "but we do know of many grievances, and of these we demand immediate redress." The parliament offered the indemnity which had been required, together with payment of arrears for eight weeks and security for the remainder, accompanied, however, by a confirmation of the previous orders to proceed with the disbanding of the troops; but the council of officers resolved that these concessions were wholly insufficient to satisfy the soldiers. The crisis was now rapidly approaching. The lords voted that the king should be brought from Holmby to Oatlands, near the capital, and that a fresh treaty should be opened with him, but the army resolved to forestal this movement by seizing his majesty's person. Accordingly, a party of five hundred horse suddenly appeared, on the 3rd of June, at Holmby House, under the command of a cornet named Joyce, originally a tailor. On obtaining admission to the royal presence, after some explanation as to the object of his abrupt intrusion, he was asked by the king what authority he had to secure his person? "The soldiers of the army," was the prompt reply.—"That," objected Charles, "is no lawful authority. Have you nothing in writing from Sir Thomas Fairfax? Deal with me ingenuously, Mr. Joyce. What commission have you?"—"Here is my commission," answered Joyce, "here, behind me," pointing to the troops who accompanied him. The king smiled, and said, "It is as fair a commission, and as well written, as I have ever seen in my life—a company of handsome, proper gentlemen as I have seen a great while. But what if, nevertheless, I refuse to go with you? I am your king. I hope you would not force me." On receiving assurance that he would be treated with due respect, that he should not be forced in any thing against his conscience, and that he should be free to see his friends, he agreed to go with them. It was not their principle, Joyce remarked, to force any man's conscience, least of all their king's. It was their enemies who used that practice.* The king was conveyed to Newmarket; and on the same day that he was removed from Holmby, Cromwell, who had secretly dictated the measure, hastily quitted London, having learned that a resolution had been privately taken by the parliament to commit him to the Tower. He was welcomed by the soldiers with acclamations of joy, and they immediately entered into a solemn engagement not to disband without redress of grievances, security against oppression to the whole people of England, and the dismissal from power of the leading presbyterians. They then immediately began their march to London. At every step in their advance towards the capital some fresh petition or remonstrance was issued by them. A demand was made that the House of Commons should be "purged" of all persons who had acted in opposition to the army, and, in particular, that eleven members mentioned by name, and consisting of Hollis, Stapleton, Glyn, Maynard, and other heads of the presbyterian party, should be excluded until they had been legally acquitted of certain charges which the soldiers were prepared to prove against them. As the commons, though willing, were totally unable to protect the obnoxious members, they voluntarily left the house. Satisfied with this and other concessions, the army retired to Reading; but in a short time a mob of royalists and presbyterians, enraged at the tame submission of the parliament to the demands of the army, besieged the doors of the house, and demanded the instant repeal of the law transferring the command of the militia to the independents, together with the restoration of the eleven impeached members. The majority of the members readily yielded to this demand, which was in accordance with their own wishes, but the minority of sixty-two members, with the two speakers, Manchester and Lenthall, secretly quitted the city, and threw themselves on the protection of the army, which was then at Hounslow Heath.

The majority proceeded to elect new speakers, and resolved to make every effort to resist the encroachments of the army. Troops were ordered to be raised and disciplined; the train-bands were directed to man the lines; and other measures were adopted to provide for the defence of the city. But these warlike demonstrations were hastily laid aside on the approach of Cromwell with his veteran troops; the gates were promptly opened, and the speakers, with the seceding members, were escorted in triumph to Westminster. The eleven impeached members retired to the Continent; the lord-mayor, one of the sheriffs, and four aldermen, were sent to the Tower; the lines about the city were levelled with the ground; and the ascendancy of the army was completely established. During the contentions between the parliament and the army negotiations continued to be carried on with the king.

He was treated with a degree of respect and attention to which he had for some time been a stranger. His friends and domestics were now freely admitted to his presence; he was allowed the full enjoyment of his favourite exercises—tennis or riding; and the gentry of the neighbouring counties thronged his presence chamber. In his public progress with the army an officer of rank rode bare headed before him, and he was permitted without interference to reply to the acclamations and addresses of the people and the troops. Above all, his younger children were allowed to pay him a visit;* and, in spite of the intolerant remonstrances of the parliament, his chaplains, Sheldon and Hammond, were restored, and were once more allowed to celebrate divine service after the forms of the English Church. The interview between the royal parent and his children was so touching that Cromwell, who happened to be present, could not help being moved, and afterwards declared that it was “the tenderest sight that ever his eyes beheld.”

The demands made by the army were singularly moderate. The Church was to be protected in all its legal rights; liberty of conscience was to be secured; the liturgy and the covenant were to be put on the same footing, and all penalties for the neglect of either abolished. The article relating to the command of the militia was modified in favour of the crown; the number of the king's adherents who were not to be admitted to pardon was limited to seven; the House of Commons was to be reformed by abolishing small boroughs and augmenting the number of county members, and by limiting the sittings and the duration of parliament. It was further stipulated that none of the king's friends should be allowed to sit in the next parliament.* Unfortunately the king imagined—their rejection that the liberality of the terms by the king.

offered by the army only proved how important his support was to their own interests. He expected to hold the balance between the two great parties by whom he had been defeated, and had sometimes even hoped that in their contest for supremacy he might be chosen mediator between the parliament and the army. “Sir,” said the acute and fearless Ireton, “you have an intention to be the arbitrator between the parliament and us, and we mean to be arbitrators between your majesty and the parliament.”† The king, therefore, expressed himself disappointed and displeased with the terms proposed by the army, when the rough draft of them was submitted to him by Sir John Berkley. In vain did that shrewd and practical royalist represent to him that better terms could scarcely be expected from men “who had through so great dangers and difficulties acquired so great advantages;” that the king by his return to power would be able to alleviate, or even to recompense, the exile of the seven persons excepted from pardon; and that a crown so nearly lost could never be retrieved on easier conditions. With his characteristic obstinacy, his majesty adhered to his own opinion. The army he said could not stand without him, and he doubted not very shortly to see them glad to make larger concessions. When the proposals were formally submitted to him for his concurrence, he not only refused his consent, but addressed ungracious, and even scornful, remarks to the deputies of the army, who listened to them with mingled astonishment and regret. No man, he declared, with repeated allusions to the fate of Strafford, should suffer for his sake. He would have the Church, he said, established by law. To obtain the re-establishment of the Church, it was answered, was not the army's province, they deemed it sufficient to waive that point. On being reminded that he had consented to the abolition of episcopacy in Scotland, he expressed his hope that God had forgiven him that sin, and repeatedly declared, “You cannot do without me. Unless I sustain you, you must fall to ruin, and I will not afford you my support at so mean a price.”‡

The discovery of the secret negotiations which his majesty was at the same time carrying on with

* When he formerly besought the parliament to restore to him his children, the heartless answer was, that “they could take as much care at London both of their bodies and their souls as could be done at Oxford.”

His secret negotiations with the Scots. army, and to confirm their conviction of his incurable propensity for double-dealing. "Being commanded by his majesty," says his confidential agent, Ashburnham, "to desire from Cromwell and Ireton that he might go from Stoke to one of his own houses, they told me with very severe countenances he should go if he pleased to Oatlands; but that they had met with sufficient proof that the king had not only abetted and fomented the differences between them and their enemies, but that likewise he had at that instant a treaty with the Scots, when he made the greatest profession to close with them; for the justification of which they affirm that they had both his and the queen's letters to make it good, which were great allays to their thoughts of serving him, and did very much justify the general misfortune he lived under, of having the reputation of little faith in his dealings."*

Notwithstanding this repulse, attempts were still made to bring the king to terms. After some delay, the proposals of the army were brought before the two houses of parliament for their approbation; but they were set aside by the majority, and the Newcastle propositions, modified by some slight changes, were adopted in their stead. The king, however, declared his inability to consent to these propositions without violence to his conscience and his honour, and expressed his preference for the proposals of the army, "as much more calculated to conduce to the satisfaction of all interests, and to be the basis of a lasting peace, than the propositions now tendered." This answer, which was presented to the commons on the 15th of September, raised a violent flame in the house. The king was denounced as an obstruction in the way of all good, and it was publicly declared that they ought to think no more of him, but to proceed as if no such person existed. In the meetings of the army

—he is denounced by the troops. agitators, the fiercest invectives were launched against the king. He had rejected their proposals;

they were no longer to regard either them or the king himself, but to consult their own good and the safety of the kingdom, which indeed was theirs by conquest, "and to use such means towards both as they should find rational." The respectful treatment hitherto given to the king was now exchanged for disrespect and rudeness, and he was even kept in alarm for his personal safety. His friends were excluded from his presence, and the guards were doubled about the palace.

In these circumstances the king resolved to make his escape, and on the 11th of November, accompanied only by Sir John Berkley, Ashburnham, and Colonel Legge, he privately left Hampton Court,† and ultimately sought refuge in the Isle of Wight, where he was kept as a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle, by Colonel Hammond, the governor of the island. Meanwhile, the agitation in the army still continued, and on the king's escape broke out into open mutiny against their officers, whom they suspected of collusion with his majesty for their personal aggrandisement. But the "levellers," as they were termed, were soon quelled by the vigorous measures of Cromwell. At the head of a body of faithful adherents, he required them to remove some offensive and seditious badges, and on their refusal, he drew his sword, charged into the midst of the mutineers, seized a dozen of the ringleaders, caused one of them to be instantly shot, and handed over the rest to be tried by a court-martial. The others then returned to their obedience, but these proceedings showed Cromwell and Ireton the danger they incurred by their friendly negotiations with the king, and contributed to the change of policy which they soon after avowed. "If we cannot bring the army to our sense," said Cromwell, "we must go to theirs: division would ruin all."* Charles now attempted to open fresh negotiations with the parliament, and offered to resign the command of the militia during his reign; to consent to the establishment of presbytery for three years; to allow liberty of conscience; to pass an act of oblivion; to pay up the arrears due to the army, and to give up the courts of wards and liveries for a recompence to be settled by the parliament. In answer to these offers, the parliament sent to him four propositions or bills, to which the king was required to give his assent as the preliminary condition of a personal treaty. They demanded that the command of the militia should be vested in the two houses for twenty years, and that it should not afterwards be settled without their consent; that all the acts and patents passed under the great seal since it was carried off from London by the Lord-keeper Littleton, in 1642, should be annulled; that all proclamations against the parliament should be recalled; and that the parliament should be empowered to adjourn from place to place.

—he escapes from Hampton Court to the Isle of Wight—

The preliminary conditions required by the parliament—

These propositions were opposed at every step by the Scottish commissioners, who complained that the interests of their nation, and all respect to the presbyterian system, were by this vote wholly set aside. They argued that as they had been invited to take part in the war, on the ground of common interest, so it was reasonable in itself, agreeable to the law of nations and the rule of equity, to the express conditions of the solemn league and covenant, the duty of their allegiance, and the treaties between the kingdoms, that in making peace they ceived a letter from Cromwell, informing him of the risk he would incur by staying any longer in that palace. Ludlow says, "It was evident that the king had escaped by Cromwell's advice."

* The Great Civil War, by the Rev. R. Cattermole, vol. ii. p. 252.

* Ashburnham's Narrative.

† Shortly before leaving Hampton Court the king reshould be consulted, and their common welfare provided for. The English parliament, they alleged, had frequently professed that the chief object for which they took up arms was to procure the reformation and establishment of religion according to the covenant, and they had often solemnly declared that no success would ever induce them to encroach on the lawful prerogatives of the crown. And it was by these motives and arguments that they had induced the Scottish people to take part in the contest. "Let it therefore be evident now," they continued, "that you are not unmindful of the solemn vows you made to God in the time of distress for the reformation of religion, and let it really appear that the advantages and power which success hath put into your hands have not lessened your loyalty to the king."* They protested, therefore, in high and uncompromising terms against the whole proceedings as unjust in themselves, and as a violation of the covenant.

The parliament rejected with scorn this claim of the Scottish commissioners to be consulted in regard to the treaty with the king, and voted the interference of any foreign nation in their proceedings an invasion of the independence of the kingdom. An elaborate answer to the remonstrances of the Scots was composed by Henry Marten, "the buffoon of the house," as he was termed, in which their remonstrances were ridiculed, their claims repelled with contempt, and the covenant termed an almanack of the last year; and they were plainly told that, as their assistance was no longer needed, there was now no motive to induce the parliament to consult them, or to treat them with respect. "When," says he, "you ask why we do not observe the same forwardness in communicating our matters to you, the same patience in expecting your concurrence with us, and the same easiness of admitting your harangues and disputations among us, which you have heretofore tasted at our hands, and how we have become less friendly than we were? I have this to say, there is some alteration in the condition of affairs; so long as we needed the assistance of your countrymen in the field, we might have occasion to give you meetings at Derby House, and now and then in the painted chamber, it being likely that the kingdom of Scotland might then have a fellow-feeling with us for the wholesomeness or perniciousness of your counsels: whereas now, since we are able by God's blessing to protect ourselves, we may surely with his holy direction be sufficient to teach ourselves how to go about our own business, at least, without your tutoring, who have nothing in your consideration to look upon, but either your particular advantage, or that of the kingdom whence you are."

Commissioners from the parliament were sent down to the Isle of Wight with the four propositions or bills, and were ordered to wait only four days for the king's answer. This brought matters to a crisis. The Scottish commissioners followed next day, ostensibly for the purpose of presenting their protest against the proposals of the parliament, but in reality to conclude a secret treaty with the king. Charles, on his part, consented in this treaty to confirm the covenant, and to establish presbyterianism in England for three years, till it was revised, or another form prepared by the assembly of divines; to concur in the suppression of schism and heresy; and to admit the Scots to a share in all the commercial privileges of the English, and in all the emoluments and honours conferred by the crown—concessions which, if they had been made at Newcastle, would have secured to him the possession of his throne; but, like every other concession made by this unhappy monarch, they were delayed until they came too late to be of any service. The commissioners, on the other hand, agreed that if all peaceful endeavours should fail, the Scots should send an army into England for the restoration of the king to the full enjoyment of his rights and revenues. The document was enclosed in a sheet of lead, and buried in a garden, till some safe opportunity occurred for conveying it to the Scottish commissioners on their return to London.*

To the two houses Charles replied that "neither the desire of being freed from his tedious and irksome condition of life, nor the apprehension of worse treatment, should ever prevail with him to give his assent to any bills as part of the agreement until the whole had been concluded in a personal treaty." As soon as this answer was delivered to the commissioners, the king's chaplain and attendants were ordered to quit the castle, the gates were locked, the guards doubled, and effectual precautions taken to prevent his majesty's escape. A rash and feeble attempt of Burley, an old royalist officer resident in the island, to raise a party for the king's rescue completely failed, and Burley himself was tried, found guilty of treason, and executed.

On the return of the commissioners to Westminster, a resolution was proposed to the commons by Marten (January 4th, 1648), and agreed to by a majority of 141 to 91, declaring that no farther addresses should be made to the king, nor any message received from him; and that if any person without their leave contravened this order, he should be liable to the penalties of treason.† A meeting of the general officers and chief agitators was held at Windsor, to deliberate concerning the future disposal of the king; and there was first formally broached the daring proposal, which no doubt had been previously discussed in their secret conclaves, to bring their sovereign to justice, and to punish him by a judicial sentence, as a shedder

of his people's blood. "We declare," say these military agitators, in their resolution adopted at this meeting, "that we are resolved firmly to adhere to, and stand by, the parliament in their vote not to make any farther addresses, &c., and in what shall be farther necessary for prosecution thereof, and for the settling and securing of the parliament and kingdom without the king, and against him or any other that shall hereafter partake with him." A very striking account of this remarkable meeting, given by Adjutant-general Allen, throws considerable light on the character of the military leaders at this juncture, and the fanatical motives by which they were actuated. "We met at Windsor Castle about the beginning of forty-eight, and there we spent one day together in prayer; inquiring into the causes of that sad dispensation; coming to no further result that day, but that it was still our duty to seek. And on the morrow we met again in the morning, where many spake from the Word and prayed; and the then Lieutenant-general Cromwell did press very earnestly on all there present to a thorough consideration of our actions as an army, and of our ways, particularly as private Christians, to see if any iniquity could be found in them, and what it was; that, if possible, we might find it out, and so remove the cause of such sad rebukes as were upon us at that time. And to this end he added, 'Let us consider when we could last say that the presence of the Lord was among us, and rebukes and judgments were not as then upon us.' We concluded this second day with agreeing to meet again on the morrow; which accordingly we did, and were led by a gracious hand of the Lord to find out the very steps by which we had departed from Him, and provoked Him to depart from us; which we found to be those cursed, carnal conferences our own conceited wisdom, our fears, and want of faith had prompted us, the year before, to entertain with the king and his party. And on this occasion did the then Major Goffe make use of that good word, Proverbs i. 23—'Turn you at my reproof: behold, I will pour out my Spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you.' And the Lord so accompanied this invitation by His Spirit that it had a kindly effect, like a word of His, upon most of our hearts that were then present, which begot in us a great sense of shame, and loathing of ourselves for our iniquities, and a justifying of the Lord as righteous in His proceedings against us. He led us not only to see our sin, but also our duty, and this so unanimously set with weight upon each heart that none was able hardly to speak a word to each other for bitter weeping, partly in the sense and shame of our iniquities, of our unbelief, base fear of men, and carnal consultations with our own wisdom, and not with the Word of the Lord. . . . And yet we were also helped, with fear and trembling, to rejoice in the Lord, who no sooner brought us to His feet but He did direct our steps, and we were led to a clear agreement amongst ourselves, that it was the duty of our day, with the forces we had, to go out and fight against our potent enemies with an humble confidence in the name of the Lord only. And we were also enabled then, after seriously seeking the Lord's face, to come to a very clear and joint resolution that it was our duty to call Charles Stewart, that man of blood, to an account for that blood he had shed and mischief he had done to his utmost against the Lord's cause and people in these poor nations."*

As the parliament by this vote of non-address, as it was called, had formally over-Declaration of thrown the constitution, and virtually dethroned the king, it was considered necessary to issue a declaration for the purpose of vindicating the justice and propriety of this measure.
 In this famous document they not only brought together all the errors and crimes with which Charles was really chargeable, but they heaped upon him accusations hitherto unheard of, and utterly incredible, and even charged him with the poisoning of his own father. Charles from his own hand, in answer to these atrocious calumnies, in which, after a statement of his patience under the severe treatment he was then suffering, he says, "That, by the permission of Almighty God, I am reduced to this sad condition, as I in no way repine, so I am not without hope but that the same God will in due time convert these afflictions unto my advantage. In the meantime, I am content to bear these crosses with patience and a great equality of mind." Then, after vindicating his desire and his frequent endeavours to settle a peace, he adds, "And now I would know what it is that is desired: is it peace? I have shown the way, being both willing and desirous to perform my part in it, which is a just compliance with all chief interests. Is it plenty and happiness? They are the inseparable effects of peace. Is it security? I, who wish that all men would forgive and forget like me, have offered the militia for my time. Is it liberty of conscience? He who wants it is most ready to give it. But if I may not be heard, let every one judge who it is that obstructs the good I would or might do. What is it that men are afraid to hear from me? It cannot be reason (at least none will declare themselves so unreasonable as to confess it), and it can less be impertinent or unreasonable discourses; for thereby peradventure I might more justify this my restraint than the causes themselves can do; so that of all wonders yet, this is the greatest to me. But it may easily be gathered how these men intend to govern who have used me thus: and if it be my hard fate to fall, together with the liberty of this kingdom, I shall not blush for myself, but much lament the future miseries of my people, the which I shall still pray God to avert, whatever becomes of me."†

Upon the return of the Scottish commissioners, every effort was made by the Duke of Hamilton and his party to obtain the consent of the parliament of Scotland to the treaty or Engagement, as it was termed, which had been made with the king. It was readily supported by the ultra-royalists or "Malignants," as they were termed—an inconsiderable party, headed by Traquair and Callender, who were eager to restore the king without any restrictions. The moderate presbyterians, who dreaded the ascendancy of the independents, and felt compassion for the sufferings of the king, were willing to join in an effort for his restoration. But the covenanters, led by Argyll and Warriston, and including in their ranks the great body of the clergy, suspected, not without cause, the sincerity both of the king and of the commissioners who had entered into the engagement with him, and declared that the concessions made by Charles were totally insufficient to engage the country in a new war on his behalf. The General Assembly, which met at Edinburgh on the 12th of July, by the Church—denounced the engagement as a violation of the covenant—as inconsistent with the safety of religion and the welfare of the country, and as certain to draw down the Divine displeasure on both Church and State; and an act was passed censuring those ministers who either openly favoured the engagement, or abstained from pointing out its sinfulness, and warning their people against taking part in it.* Their dislike to the terms of the treaty with the king was farther increased by their natural reluctance to unite with the malignants, whose principles and conduct they held in merited detestation. It is highly probable, also, that they may have had fears for their own safety, and not without reason, if the king should be restored by force of arms to his original privileges and power.† They insisted, therefore, that before commencing hostilities against England the grounds of the war should be first explained, that malignants should be excluded from the national councils, and that his majesty should promise on oath to confirm the covenant and the presbyterian religion when restored to his throne.

In spite of the opposition of this numerous and formidable party, the parliament which met on the 2nd of March, 1648, determined on war. A committee of danger was appointed to watch over the safety of the kingdom, and to manage the public business; and it was resolved to put the country in a posture of defence. A series of resolutions were agreed to, enumerating all the breaches of the covenant of which England had been guilty, the various wrongs done to Scotland in violation of the treaty, and the slights shown to the Scottish commissioners. These resolutions were followed up by certain demands made to the English parliament:—that the covenant should be taken by all the subjects of the English crown, in conformity with the treaty between the kingdoms, and all who refused to comply should be punished as public enemies and malignants, and that measures should be taken for the suppression of heresies and schisms; that the king should be recalled with honour, freedom, and safety to some of his houses in or near London; that the members who had been expelled from parliament should be permitted to return, and that the army of sectaries should be disbanded. Fifteen days were assigned for receiving a definite answer to these requisitions, which it is evident from their nature were not expected to be listened to.* A declaration was at the same time drawn up, embodying the substance of these resolutions, bewailing the sinful violation of the covenant by the sectaries and their adherents, and expressing their determination to enter into no alliance with those who should refuse to subscribe the solemn league and covenant, and not to make any agreement with his majesty until he should solemnly swear to give his assent to such acts as the parliament should prescribe in favour of the covenant and the presbyterial form of worship.†

In spite of these protestations, which were manifestly insincere, the covenanters resolutely opposed the war with England. The line of policy which they recommended was unquestionably that which prudence would have dictated. They advised that the army should be kept up; that the kingdom without declaring war should remain united in adhering to the public interests, which the parliaments of both countries were solemnly pledged to support. Thus the Scottish nation would present a commanding attitude, both

In a letter to a friend in London Lanark says, "We have presented to the parliament a large declaration, to be emitted to the kingdom, containing the breaches of covenant and treaties, the demands which upon them we mean to make to the two houses, and our resolutions in case of a refusal. I confess it is clogged with many impertinences, to which we are necessitated for satisfying nice consciences; yet it drives at a right end." In another, to the king, respecting the declaration, he observes, "We have passed a declaration, which is full of many rude restrictions, both in order to your majesty and your faithful servants, but we are forced to them for the satisfaction of the consciences of the clergy and their proselytes." † Severe vengeance had been taken, after Montrose's army was disbanded, on the Macdonalds, and other clans who had assisted him in laying waste Argyleshire. The stronghold of Dunavertie, which Colkitto had garrisoned, was taken by Leslie, and the greater part of the defenders were put to the sword. The MacDougalls and the Lamonts were almost exterminated, and old Colkitto, who was taken prisoner in the fortress of Dunavertie, was tried by the sheriff-substitute of Argyll, and condemned and executed. These sanguinary proceedings must have given deep offence to the royalist clans, among whom revenge was considered as both a duty and a virtue. It is no wonder, therefore, that the perpetrators of such atrocities should have dreaded the restoration of the king. (See Memoirs of Sir James Turner.)

morally and physically, which would not fail to give weight to their representations. This would encourage the English parliament to resist the unrighteous and unconstitutional demands of the army, and it would deter any party from doing violence to the person of the king, while it allowed him time to be undeceived, and to consult his true interest. These representations, however, of the patriotic party were entirely disregarded,* and the nomination of Hamilton as general, and Callender as lieutenant-general, served to widen the breach between them and the promoters of the Engagement. The vote which had been carried in the parliament was for thirty thousand foot and six thousand horse, but the levies, in consequence of the hostility of the Church, advanced very slowly, and only ten thousand foot and one thousand horse could be raised, —nor even these until the month of July, when the opportune moment for action was irretrievably lost.

Meanwhile, the English royalists, impatient of delay, had taken up arms in Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Kent, Wales, and other districts of the country; and the fleet in the Downs suddenly hoisted the royal colours, weighed anchor, and stood over for Holland, to take on board the Duke of York, whom they chose for their admiral. But these desultory unconnected risings were everywhere unsuccessful. The insurgents in the neighbourhood of the capital were defeated by Fairfax. Unable to cope with the parliamentary army in the field, a body of about three thousand horse and foot threw themselves into Colchester, which was immediately besieged by Fairfax and Ireton, and taken after a protracted and obstinate defence. The Earl of Holland was routed at Kingston, and taken prisoner. Cromwell, in person, marched against the Welsh insurgents under Langhorne, Powell, and Poyer, who had formerly borne arms for the parliament. Langhorne, who had taken Chepstow and laid siege to Caernarvon, was at once defeated, and his army destroyed; but Poyer, in spite of the most furious assaults, held out Pembroke Castle for more than six weeks.

At length the Scottish levies took the field, and the Scottish army crossed the Borders. Hamilton, with an ill-equipped and badly disciplined army of about fifteen thousand men, entered England by the west Border. The important fortresses of Berwick and Carlisle had been previously seized by Sir Marmaduke Langdale and Sir Philip Musgrave, who had agreed to co-operate with the Scots in the north of England; and the loyal inhabitants of Northumberland, and the adjoining counties, instantly appeared in arms. Hamilton was followed in a few days by Munro with two thousand foot and a thousand horse, whom he had brought back from Ireland. The English royalists were not permitted openly to join the Scottish army, and to save appearances, Langdale, at the head of four thousand men, always kept a day's march in advance of the Scots, although they acted in concert with them, and received their orders from the Duke. Munro encamped at an equal distance in the rear.

It soon became evident that Hamilton had undertaken an enterprise to which his abilities were altogether unequal.* A rapid march on London might have crushed the independents and saved the king—for Fairfax was still occupied with the siege of Colchester, and Cromwell lay before the walls of Pembroke; but the duke loitered away more than forty days on a march of only eighty miles. Instead of advancing through Yorkshire, as Baillie advised, where he would have found the population friendly, he marched into the hostile county of Lancashire. His forces, instead of being concentrated, were scattered over many miles, so as to be incapable of giving mutual support; and when the main body reached the banks of the Ribble, near Preston, Langdale was far in advance, while Munro, with the vanguard, consisting of the best soldiers in the army, lay thirty miles off at Kirby, in Westmoreland. So defective was the duke's intelligence that he remained in ignorance of the surrender of Pembroke and the approach of Cromwell at the head of his victorious troops, and his junction with Lambert, until the whole united force fell upon the royalists under Langdale (August 17th). After an obstinate resistance against overpowering odds, during which he repeatedly sent pressing messages to the Scottish army for support, but without effect, Sir Marmaduke was obliged to fall back upon Preston. town he was joined by Hamilton with a few horse, but in such disorder as merely to add to the confusion of the retreat. The fight was renewed in the streets, and continued to the bridge, where a determined stand was again made by the royalists, "but, at length," says Cromwell in his despatch, "they were beaten from the bridge, and our horse and foot, following them, killed many and took divers prisoners, and we possessed the bridge and a few houses there, where we lay that night." The Scottish army, superior in numbers to their assailants, might still have made a vigorous resistance, but "head and heart seemed alike to have failed the unfortunate duke." In the course of the night he commenced a hasty retreat through bad roads and in the midst of rain, the whole army in a state of the greatest disorder and dismay, and leaving behind their artillery and baggage. At Warrington the foot, under Baillie, being deserted by the horse, surrendered to Cromwell on condition that their lives should be spared. The duke, accompanied by his principal officers and about three thousand cavalry, fled to Uttoxeter, where he was intercepted by Lambert, and compelled to lay down his arms. None escaped save a resolute body of men under the Earl of Callender, who, exasperated at the conduct of their incapable general and disdaining an ignominious surrender, broke through the enemy, and forced their way back to their own country.*

When the news of this disaster reached Scotland, the leaders of the covenanting party resolved to take advantage of it to eject the committee of Estates from the government. Argyll took up arms in the Highlands, and the peasantry in the western counties broke out into open insurrection, and, headed by their ministers, marched to Edinburgh. On their approach the committee withdrew, and allowed them to take undisputed possession of the capital.† Munro's division, which remained entire after the defeat of Hamilton, was recalled to Scotland, and conjoined with some new levies under the Earl of Lanark for the protection of the Engagers. But Argyll and the other covenanting nobles placed their forces under the Earl of Leven and David Leslie, and made application to Cromwell for assistance to repress the disorders of the country. With this request the lieutenant-general immediately complied, and advanced with his forces towards Scotland. He was cordially welcomed by the covenanters, who had once more obtained possession of the government, and was magnificently entertained at the public expense. Lanark, afraid probably of exasperating the English against his brother, now a prisoner in their hands, agreed to disband his forces. Munro was permitted to return to Ireland. The Engagement was abandoned; its supporters were excluded from the municipal offices in the metropolis and from the next parliament, and were compelled to do solemn and public penance for their violation of the covenant in taking up arms for the king.‡

Advantage was taken by the English parliament of the absence of the army to enter upon a new treaty with the king at Newport, in the Isle of Wight. The expelled members were permitted to resume their seats, and on the 30th of June the vote prohibiting any further addresses to his majesty was rescinded. Growing daily more and more alarmed at the success of the army, it was resolved (July 29th) that the house should not persist in requiring from the king his assent to the four preliminary bills, and that fresh negotiations should be immediately opened with him. Fifteen commissioners were appointed to lay before his majesty the new proposals of the parliament, which were substantially the same as those that had been discussed at Uxbridge and Newcastle. The interests of both parties required that no time should be lost in coming to a conclusion, and if anything could still have saved the throne and the life of the unhappy monarch it would have been the acceptance of the parliament's proposals—rigorous though they were—while the Scottish army was yet entire, and the insurrection of the English royalists unsubdued. But in spite of the urgent representations of the parliamentary commissioners, who on their knees, and with tears, implored him to conclude the treaty with all possible haste, Charles protracted the conferences for more than two months—till Hamilton was defeated and Colchester taken. Then when the army had returned, flushed with victory and denouncing vengeance on his head as the sole author of the civil war, he consented to recall every hostile proclamation against the —terms agreed parliament, and to acknowledge to by him.

that they had taken up arms in self-defence. He agreed also to surrender the command of the militia and the nomination of the chief officers of state for twenty years; to accept a hundred thousand pounds a year in lieu of the court of wards; to acknowledge the parliamentary great seal, and to give full satisfaction respecting Ireland.* But there were two points on which he remained inflexible—the exemption from pardon of seven delinquents, who were to be included in a bill of attainder and banishment, and the abolition of episcopacy. But all these concessions came too late. The parliament were indeed The treaty anxious to conclude their negoti- obnoxious to the army—ations with the king, and would the army—now, in order to free themselves from the dominancy of the army, have accepted terms which they formerly spurned. But a remonstrance against the treaty was presented to the House of Commons,

* It is most painful to discover that Charles's incurable duplicity was not laid aside even in the critical position in which he was placed, and that there can be no doubt of his insincerity in making these concessions. Ormond had gone to Ireland to negotiate a peace with the insurgents, and prepare them for receiving and aiding the king, who was anxious to escape to Ireland in order to renew the war. Charles not only assured the commissioners that he had transacted nothing respecting Ireland except with themselves, but wrote to Ormond (October 11th) in the following terms:—"I must command you two things, first to obey all my wife's commands, then not to obey any public command of mine until I send you word that I am free from restraint; lastly, be not startled at my great concessions concerning Ireland, for they will come to nothing." Again, on the 28th of the same month, he says, "though you will hear that this treaty is near, or at least most likely to be concluded, yet believe it not, but pursue the way you are in with all possible vigour. Deliver thus also my command to all my friends, be not in a public way, because it may be inconvenient to me." In a letter to Sir William Hopkins (October 9th) he says, "To deal freely with you, the great concessions I made to-day was merely in order to my escape, of which if I had not hope, I had not done." In acknowledging the parliaments great seal he made this mental reservation:—"This part of the propositions we understood made not the grants under it valid if they were not so before." —approved of by the parliament. opposite the Isle of Wight. The parliament, though hopeless of success, had still the courage to resist the dictation of the troops.

They protested against the seizure of the king as unwarranted, and, after a violent debate, which lasted three days, voted by a majority of 140 against 104 that the concessions of his majesty furnished a sufficient ground for the houses to proceed upon in settling the affairs of the nation. But this was the last effort they were permitted to make in his favour. Next morning (December 6th), Colonel Pride, at the head of two regiments, surrounded the House of Commons, and arrested and placed in confinement forty-one members of the presbyterian party. Above a hundred more were excluded on the two following days, and the number of members was reduced to about fifty, all known friends of the republican party. This infamous invasion of the rights of parliament was long familiarly known as "Pride's Purge," and the remaining members who usurped the name of parliament bore the appellation of "the Rump."

The commons thus "purged" repealed the late

Proceedings resolutions, declared the king's conduct of "the Rump," sessions unsatisfactory, confirmed the vote against more addresses, and resolved that by the fundamental laws of the realm it is treason in the sovereign to levy war against the parliament and kingdom of England. The lords unanimously rejected the ordinance, and adjourned for a week. But the leaders of the republican party were quite willing to break in pieces every part of the machinery of government in order to accomplish their purpose, and they speedily resolved that the House of Peers was useless and dangerous, and ought to be abolished. Its existence, indeed, as well as that of the crown, was entirely incompatible with the next vote of the residue of the commons: "That the people are under God the origin of all just power; that the House of Commons of England, being chosen by and representing the people, have the supreme authority; and that whatsoever is enacted and declared for law by the commons in parliament hath the force of a law, and the people are concluded thereby, though the consent of the king and the peers be not had thereto."* As no

Court appointed court recognised by the law would to try the king. take on itself the office of judging the sovereign, it was necessary to create a tribunal for the express purpose. A high court of justice was, therefore, constituted for the trial of the king; it consisted of a hundred and thirty-three persons, including all the great officers of the army, four peers, the Speaker, and the other principal members of the expurgated House of Commons, with the exception of Sir Harry Vane; but seventy-one was the largest number ever assembled at a time; forty-eight only were present on the day when the king's execution was pronounced, and the warrant for his decapitation was signed by fifty-nine. The twelve judges unanimously refused to sit on the tribunal, declaring its whole purpose and constitution to be contrary to every principle of English law.

"Several motives, springing from the respective tempers and views of the men, had Motives of the conspired to unite this band of republicans.

daring and enthusiastic spirits, acting in the name of a nation which viewed their deeds with astonishment and abhorrence, in the terrible resolution to offer to the world the spectacle, then unexampled in its annals, of a sovereign prince arraigned before a tribunal of his subjects, and led forth to public execution. Some few fell into the design from policy; they had offended beyond the rational hope of forgiveness, and now covered their just dread of retribution under an exaggerated alarm at the king's want of good faith in his engagements, should he ever be restored to power; or sought to avert the eyes of justice and the world from the guilt themselves had hitherto incurred by rendering the whole nation accessory to a deed which might paralyse vengeance itself with horror. Others were actuated by malignant thirst of revenge on one whom they had so long regarded as an enemy; again, others were impelled by a burning desire to carry out some generous, perhaps, but visionary scheme of government; and both these classes justified their ends, wholly or in part, on religious grounds, which, in wild variety, constituted, in those times, the real or pretended basis of almost all men's more serious public actions. It was held by many that historical incidents in the Old Testament, or the oracles of the Hebrew prophets, distorted by ignorance and misapplied by passion, furnished not hints and examples alone, but authoritative rules and precepts for the political conduct of Englishmen; and that to shrink from any act necessary to the establishment of the kingdom of Christ and his saints upon the ruins of temporal authorities, was to incur the terrible execrations denounced against the enemies of God. Of such enthusiasts Harrison was among the fiercest; Hutchinson and Ludlow among the most honest and sober-minded. 'I did it all,' declared the first, according to the best of my understanding, desiring to make the revealed will of God in his holy Scriptures my guide.' Ludlow has left on record, as his ample justification, that he was fully 'persuaded that an accommodation with the king was unsafe for the people of England, and unjust and wicked in the nature of it. The former, besides that it was obvious to all men, the king himself had proved by the duplicity of his dealing with the parliament, which manifestly appeared in his own papers, taken at Naseby and elsewhere. Of the latter I was convinced by the express words of God's law—that blood defileth the land, and the land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it. (Numbers xxxv. 33.) And, therefore, I could not consent to the counsels of those who contented to leave the guilt of so much blood upon the nation, and thereby to draw down the just vengeance of God upon us all, when it was most evident that the war had been occasioned by the invasion of our rights, and open breach of our constitution, on the king's part.' Similar is the vindication offered by Mrs. Hutchinson of her husband's conduct as a regicide:— 'Although he did not then believe but it might one day come to be again disputed among men, yet both he and others thought they could not refuse it without giving up the people of God, whom they had led forth and engaged themselves unto by the oath of God, into the hands of God's and their enemies; and, therefore, he cast himself upon God's protection, acting according to the dictates of a conscience which he had sought the Lord to guide.'

While these transactions were taking place at Westminster, the king was brought from Hurst Castle to Windsor, on the 23rd of December, by a party of horse under the command of Colonel Harrison. On their march, Charles, who for some time had expected a death like that of his unhappy predecessors, Edward II. and Richard II., mentioned to the republican soldier that he had been warned that he meant to assassinate him. Harrison repelled the charge with honest indignation, but told his majesty that he had said, "the obligations of the law were equally binding on the great and small, and that justice had no respect of persons." He further assured the king "that he needed not to entertain any such imagination or apprehension—that whatever the parliament resolved to do would be very public and in a way of justice, to which the world should be witness." "What these men did, indeed, they did in order that it might be a spectacle to heaven and earth, and that it might be held in everlasting remembrance." But "his majesty could not persuade himself to believe this, nor did he imagine that they durst ever produce him in the sight of the people under any form whatsoever of a public trial."† At Windsor, Charles enjoyed the melancholy consolation of a brief interview with the Duke of Hamilton, who was there detained a prisoner. Falling on his knees, Hamilton passionately exclaimed, "My dear master!"—"I have indeed been so to you!" replied the king, embracing him. His majesty was instantly hurried away, and no farther intercourse was allowed between them.

All the preliminary arrangements having now been made, this unprecedented trial commenced on the 19th of January, 1649. The court sat in Westminster Hall. John Bradshaw, a lawyer, was chosen president; John Coke was nominated solicitor-general for the people of England; and Dorislaus, Steele, and Aske, were appointed his assistants. When the king was brought forward before this court, he was conducted by the mace-bearer to a chair placed within the bar. His "gray discrowned head"* bore testimony to the sorrows and cares which he had endured in his confinement; but though long detained a prisoner, and now produced as a criminal, he still maintained the dignity of a king. After sternly eyeing the court and the spectators, he sat down without moving his hat, then, rising hastily, he cast a haughty glance at the guards and the crowded galleries, and again sat down. Sixty of the commissioners only answered to their names. When the crier pronounced the name of Fairfax, which had been inserted in the number, a voice from one of the galleries exclaimed, "He has more wit than to be here!" At a subsequent stage of the proceedings, when the charge against the king was stated to be in the name of the people of England, the same voice exclaimed, "Not a tenth part of them!" Axtel, the officer who commanded the guard, giving orders to fire into the gallery from which the interruption came, it was discovered that these speeches proceeded from Lady Fairfax, daughter of Horace Lord Vere, and wife of Sir Thomas Fairfax, general of the forces, who in this manner declared her resentment at the conduct of the king's enemies.

The charge, which was read by Coke, accused the king of having been the cause of all the blood which had been shed since the commencement of the war; of the divisions among the people; invasions from foreign parts; the waste of the public treasury; the decay of trade; the spoilation and desolation of great part of the country; the continued commissions to the Marquis of Ormond and other rebels; taxed him with a wicked design to erect an unlimited and tyrannical government, and to overthrow the rights and liberties of the people; and, therefore, impeached him as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth. Charles began his defence by declining the authority of the court. He represented that having been engaged in treaty with his two houses of parliament, and having finished almost every article, he expected a different treatment from that which he had now received. He saw no appearance, he said, of the upper house, which was necessary to constitute a just parliament; and even both houses, though free and united, were not entitled to try him, who was their native hereditary king, and derived his authority from God. He was himself, he alleged, the fountain of law, and, consequently, could not be tried by laws to which he had never given his assent; that having been entrusted with the liberties of the people, he would not now betray them by recognising a power founded on usurpation; that he was able, by the most satisfactory reasons, to justify the measures which he had been compelled to adopt; and that he was desirous, if called upon in another manner, to enter into the particulars of his defence, and to prove to the whole world the integrity of his conduct, but that until then he must decline any apology for his innocence, lest he should be justly branded as the betrayer of the constitution. Bradshaw endeavoured to support the authority of the court by insisting that they were delegated by the people, the only source of lawful power, whose elected king Charles was. "England was never an elective kingdom," was the spirited reply, "but an hereditary monarchy for near three thousand years. I stand more for the liberties of my people than any here that come to be my pretended judges." He insisted that the court could plead no power delegated by the people; and that even admitting that the people had the power and right to bring him to account, it could not be lawfully done unless the consent of every individual, down to the meanest subject, had been previously asked and obtained. Bradshaw still pressed the king not to decline the authority of the court, and told him that when he had once pleaded, he should be allowed to make the best defence he could against the charge. "For the charge," cried Charles, "I value it not a rush; it is the liberty of the people of England that I stand for. I cannot acknowledge a new court that I never heard of before. I am your king, bound to uphold justice—to maintain the old laws; therefore, until I know that all this is not against the fundamental laws of the kingdom, I can put in no particular answer."

In this manner the king was three times produced before the court, and as often persisted in declining its jurisdiction. His judges now examined some witnesses, by whom it was proved that the king had appeared in arms against the forces commissioned by parliament, and then drew up the sentence of death, which they had determined to pronounce against him. These proceedings occupied the fourth, fifth, and sixth days of this remarkable trial. On the seventh (27th of January) the king was brought for the last time before this self-elected tribunal. As he passed up the hall he was insulted by "some soldiers and others of the rabble," who cried out "Justice! justice! Execution! execution!"—"Poor souls!" said the king to one of his attendants, "for a little money they would do as much against their commanders." On taking his place at the bar the king earnestly desired to be heard. Bradshaw told him he should be heard in his turn, but that he must hear the court first. Charles still more eagerly renewed his request for a first hearing, urging repeatedly that hasty judgment was not so soon recalled. Bradshaw repeated he should be heard before judgment was given. The king then expressed an earnest desire that before sentence was pronounced he might at least be heard before the lords and commons, in the painted chamber, upon a subject which he said highly imported the lasting peace of the nation. This request was sternly rejected by Bradshaw; but one of the judges, John Downes, a citizen of London, having objected to this decision, the court adjourned in some confusion to deliberate. In about half-an-hour they returned with a refusal to the king's request, which they alleged tended to set up a co-ordinate jurisdiction in derogation of the authority of the court. Bradshaw, who throughout the trial had interrupted, overruled, and browbeat the hapless monarch in the rudest and most unfeeling manner, proceeded to deliver a long and abusive speech, in justification of the sentence of the court, denouncing the king as a tyrant, traitor, and murderer. Charles then said hurriedly, "I would desire only one word before you give sentence—only one word." Bradshaw told him that his time was now past. Again the king pressed that they would hear him a word—at most, a very few words. Bradshaw again told him that he had declined the jurisdiction of the court, and spoke of the language they had received from the royal party. The king said he knew nothing of that, and once more begged to be heard. Bradshaw replied that they had given him too much liberty already, and called upon him to hear "what sentence the law affirms to a traitor, a tyrant, a murderer, and a public enemy." The clerk then read the sentence of the court, adjudging "Charles Stewart" to be "put to death by severing his head from his body." Charles raised his eyes to heaven, and said, "Will you hear me a word, sir?"—"Sir," replied Bradshaw, "you are not to be heard after sentence." Charles, greatly agitated, said, inquiringly, "No, sir?"—"No, sir, by your favour," rejoined the harsh and inflexible president. "Guards, withdraw your prisoner." Still struggling to be heard, Charles said confusedly, "I may speak after the sentence, by your favour, sir. I may speak after the sentence, ever. By your favour—" "Hold!" cried Bradshaw—"The sentence, sir," persisted Charles. "I say, sir, I do—" Again Bradshaw interrupted him with his insolent "Hold!" And then the unhappy monarch, muttering, "I am not suffered to speak—expect what justice other people will have," relinquished his fruitless efforts, and turned away with his guard.

The behaviour of Charles throughout this trying scene was manly, firm, and dignified. In leaving the hall, the soldiers and rabble were again instigated to cry out "Justice!" and "Execution!" and to revile him with the most bitter reproaches. Among other insults, one miscreant presumed to spit in his face. All this brutal insolence the king bore with the most exemplary meekness and patience. The "vulgar spirits," as Whitelocke terms them who exhibited this "abject baseness," appear, however, to have been but few in number. Many of the spectators expressed, by sighs and tears, their sympathy for oppressed and fallen majesty, and poured forth their prayers for his preservation. One soldier, more compassionate than some of his fellows, could not refrain from imploring a blessing on his royal head. An officer, overhearing this prayer, struck the honest trooper to the ground in the king's presence. "Methinks," was the observation of Charles, "the punishment exceeds the offence."*

As soon as the intention of trying the king became known, the Scottish parliament energetically protested against this step, and directed their commissioners in London to use every exertion to save his life. Not only did they warmly remonstrate with the English parliament, but they made urgent application to Fairfax and Cromwell in the king's behalf, imploring them to consider "what an unsettled peace it is likely to prove which shall have its foundation laid in the blood of our king; what dangerous evils and grievous calamities it may bring upon us and our posterity; what reproaches upon religion and the work of reformation; and what infamy abroad in other nations."† The great body of the English people looked on in bewilderment and terror. The crowned heads of Europe, who might have been expected to feel alarm, if not sympathy, for the misfortunes of a brother sovereign, were engrossed with their own cares and projects, and regarded the downfall of the English monarchy with indifference. The government of the United Provinces of Holland alone sent over ambassadors to intercede for the king's life, but they were not allowed to see his majesty, or to obtain an audience of the parliament until the tragical catastrophe had taken place. The queen, though she had not behaved like an affectionate, dutiful wife, wrote a pathetic letter to the parliament, in her husband's behalf, which was laid aside unread; and Prince Charles sent a carte blanche, signed and sealed, offering any conditions provided only the life of his father were spared. Four of Charles's friends—Richmond, Hertford, Southampton, and Lindsay—wrote to the commons representing that they were the king's councillors, and, therefore, responsible in the eyes of the law for the offences imputed to him, and offering to save his life by the sacrifice of their own.‡ But no solicitations or remonstrances could deter the inexorable republicans from the execution of their designs.

Three days were allowed the king to prepare for death. This interval he passed chiefly in reading and devotion, assisted by Bishop Juxon, who at his special request was allowed to attend him. He was also permitted to enjoy the society of the only children he had in England—the Princess Elizabeth, then in her thirteenth, and the Duke of Gloucester, in his ninth year. His last interview with them was deeply affecting. Placing them on his knees, he gave them such advice as was suitable to their years and the solemnity of the occasion. He charged the princess to tell her mother that his thoughts had never strayed from her, and that his affection should be the same to the last; and begged her to remember that she and her brothers and sisters should love one another and forgive their father's enemies. Then, addressing little Gloucester, he said, "Now they will cut off thy father's head." At these words the child looked very steadfastly at him. "Mark, child," he continued, "what I say; they will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee a king; but, mark what I say, you must not be a king so long as your brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off your brothers heads when they can catch them, and cut off thy head, too, at last; and, therefore, I charge you do not be made a king by them." At which the child said earnestly, "I will be torn in pieces first!" Such a reply from one so young filled the father's eyes with tears of joy. He then prayed God Almighty to bless them, and desired the princess to convey his blessing to the rest of her brothers and sisters, with commendations to all his friends; and dividing a few jewels among them, he kissed and again blessed them, and then hastily returned to his devotions. According to Herbert, who was present, this touching scene moved those to pity who had been most hard-hearted before.

The fatal day having at last arrived (Tuesday, January 30th), Charles rose about two hours before daybreak, and calling Herbert, one of his attendants, who slept on a pallet by his side, he bade him employ more than usual care in dressing him, and preparing him for so great a solemnity. He then called Bishop Juxon, who remained an hour with him, and assisted him in his devotions. At ten o'clock the king left St. James's, and, accompanied by a guard of halberdiers, and by some of his own gentlemen and servants, he walked through the park to Whitehall, in front of which the scaffold had been erected. As the preparations were not completed, he waited at Whitehall for some time, which he spent in prayer with the bishop in his own old cabinet chamber. About twelve o'clock he was summoned by Colonel Hacker, and passed through the banquetting room to the scaffold, which was covered with black, and on it were to be seen the block, the axe, and two executioners in masks. Companies of horse and foot guarded the scaffold on every side, and, at a distance, stood an immense crowd of spectators, all silent as the grave. The king surveyed all these solemn preparations with dignified composure, and was to the last undisturbed, self-possessed, and serene. As he could not expect to be heard by the people at a distance, he addressed himself to the few persons who stood around him. He felt it to be his duty, he said, as an honest man, a good king, and a good Christian, to declare his innocence in the late fatal wars; he observed that he had not taken up arms till after the parliament had set him the example, though he believed that ill instruments between them and him had been the chief cause of all this bloodshed; and declared that he had no other object in his warlike preparations than to preserve that authority entire which had been transmitted to him by his ancestors. But though innocent towards his people, he acknowledged the equity of his condemnation in the eyes of his Maker, and owned that the unjust sentence which he suffered to take effect against the Earl of Strafford was now punished by an unjust sentence upon himself. He forgave all his enemies, exhorted the people to return to their allegiance and acknowledge his son as his successor, and declared his attachment to the Protestant religion as professed by the Church of England. Turning to Bishop Juxon, he said, "I have a good cause and a gracious God on my side."—"You have now," said Juxon, "but one stage more; the stage is turbulent and troublesome, but it is a short one."—"I go," was the response, "from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be." The king then took off his cloak, and, giving his

George to Dr. Juxon, said in a low tone, "Remember!" Laying his neck upon the block, he gave the signal by stretching out his hands, and at one blow one of the executioners severed his head from his body. The other executioner, then holding it up, exclaimed, "This is the head of a traitor."* The soldiers shouted in triumph, but a "dismal, universal groan" issued from the crowd, and the tidings of the tragic event excited deep indignation and grief throughout the whole nation.

Thus perished, in the forty-ninth year of his age, Character of and the twenty-fourth of his reign, Charles, the most unfortunate prince of a race singularly marked by misfortune. It would be unjust to deny that Charles possessed not a few of the qualities which adorn private life. He was an affectionate husband, a good father, and a kind relative. His abilities were good, and he had a refined taste in literature and art; his accomplishments were numerous; and, in his youth, he exhibited great diligence in the acquisition of knowledge. "He was addicted to no vicious excess; he was moderate in his expenses, decorous in his conduct, and regular in his devotions." Lilly, the astrologer, who was not disposed to flatter, says in his curious memoirs, "the king had many excellent parts in nature, was an excellent horseman, would shoot well at a mark, had singular skill in limning, was a good judge of pictures, a good mathematician, not unskilful in music, well-read in divinity, excellent in history and law; he spoke several languages, and writ well—good language and style." Perinchieff corroborates the statements of Lilly regarding the universality of the king's acquirements, and states, in addition, that he was an antiquarian, a judge of medals, and understood fortification, gunnery, and naval architecture. "He delighted to talk with all kinds of artists, and with so great a facility did apprehend the mysteries of their professions, that he did sometimes say 'he thought he could get his living, if necessitated, by any trade he knew of but making of hangings,' although of these he understood much." Whitelocke also speaks of his majesty's "great abilities, strength of reason, quickness of apprehension, with much patience in hearing what was objected against him, wherein he allowed all freedom, and would himself sum up the arguments, and give a most clear judgment upon them."* In spite of all this, however, he was eminently deficient in the qualities of a good prince. Of the art of "kingcraft" he was entirely ignorant. He neither knew how to gain the hearts of his people, nor to float with the current of national feeling. His manner was reserved and cold, while his temper was naturally passionate—a fault which had been aggravated by want of restraint. "The more humbly," says Lilly, "any made their addresses to him, by so much the more was he imperious, lofty, and at a distance with them." "He loved state too well," says a friendly commentator, "and carried it to too great a height;" and in the steps which he took to "keep up the dignity of a prince, and command the veneration of subjects," showed himself imperious, harsh, and unmindful of what was due to his inferiors. Carte, who calls him "the worthiest person, the best man in all relations of life, and the best Christian that the age produced," was yet constrained to acknowledge that "he was stiff and formal, and received people with such an air of coldness that it looked like contempt. He was ungracious even in conferring favours upon those whom he loved and intended most to oblige."† In his youth he imbibed the lessons of arbitrary power in the profligate and servile court of his father, and he resolutely attempted throughout his reign to carry his father's political theories into practice. His treatment of his first three parliaments; his illegal and arbitrary proclamations; his forced loans and billeting of soldiers upon the people; his cruel imprisonments and mutilations of those who ventured to oppose, or murmur at, the acts of his government; his conscious violation of the laws, and wanton and foolish innovations upon the religious establishment of Scotland,—all clearly indicated his determination to overthrow the constitution of the country, and to destroy the liberties of his people. But the quality that mainly precipitated his downfall, and brought him to the scaffold, was his duplicity. Some of his apologists, who have not ventured to deny the existence of this fault, plead in excuse the difficulties by which he was surrounded, and the violence and hypocrisy of his enemies. But such persons forget, or overlook, the fact that insincerity was the besetting sin of Charles in the early years of his reign, and in the days of his prosperity, as well as amid the difficulties and perplexities which marked the close of his career. "He had," says Lilly, "much of self-ends in all that he did; and a most difficult thing it was to hold him close to his own promise or word."

Charles was of middle stature, robust, and well proportioned. His countenance was pleasant, but melancholy—an expression which it is probable may have been given to his features by the continual troubles in which he was involved. He left six children—three sons, Charles Prince of Wales, James Duke of York, and Henry Duke of Gloucester; and three daughters—Mary Princess of Orange, Elizabeth, and Henrietta, afterwards Duchess of Orleans.*

* Shortly after the death of Charles a work was published purporting to be from his pen, and entitled "Eikon Basiliké; or a Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings." It attracted universal attention, and produced a most powerful impression in favour of the deceased monarch. "It is not easy," says Hume, "to conceive the general compassion excited towards the king by the publishing, at so critical a juncture, a work so full of piety, meekness, and humanity. Many have not scrupled to ascribe to that book the subsequent restoration of the royal family. Milton compares its effect to those which were wrought on the tumultuous Romans by Antony's reading to them the will of Cæsar." The work was long believed to be authentic, but Charles II., his brother James, and Clarendon, knew at the Restoration, if not sooner, that it was not the composition of the king; and it has now been proved beyond a doubt to have been written by Dr. Gauden, afterwards Bishop of Worcester. In 1786 there was published, in the third volume of the Clarendon State Papers, several letters addressed by Gauden to the chancellor, in which he explicitly grounds his claim to preferment on the fact that he was the author of the book which "goes under the late blessed king's name, the 'Eikon, or Portraiture of His Majesty in his Solitudes and Suffer-was retaken in Southwark, next morning, by three troopers, and on the 6th of February was tried before a new high court of justice, of which Bradshaw was president. He pleaded that he was a native of another kingdom, born in Scotland before the naturalisation of his father, and, therefore, owed no allegiance to the parliament of England; that he had acted in obedience to the highest judicature of his native country; and that he was a prisoner of war, and had surrendered upon articles by which his life had been guaranteed. These pleas, however, were overruled, and he was found guilty of treason, and condemned to death. His sentence was remitted to the House of Commons, but a majority voted that it should be carried into execution. Both the house and the high court rejected the petitions for mercy which were presented in his behalf; and on the 9th of March the duke, along with the Earl of Holland and Lord Capel, were beheaded in Palace Yard.

ings." "This book," he adds, "was wholly and only my invention, making, and design." Clarendon had before this learnt the secret from Morley, Bishop of Worcester; and in his reply to Gauden he fully acquiesces in the truth of the unpalatable statement. CHAPTER LI.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

THE execution of Charles I. was deeply resented by the people of Scotland, who had long felt aggrieved by the proceedings of the English parliament and army. Republican principles had taken no hold upon any portion of the Scotch nation. Their covenant recognised in the most solemn manner the royal authority, and the opinions of the English sectaries were regarded with abhorrence even by the extreme presbyterian party. The national pride of the Scots was hurt by the contemptuous disregard which had been shown to their remonstrances in favour of the king; and they were galled by the reproaches cast upon them on account of the surrender of his person by their army at Newcastle—an event to which, their enemies alleged, the death of the king was to be ascribed. Their resentment at the execution of their sovereign was increased by the contumelious treatment given to their commissioners, who were arrested, conducted by a guard to the Borders, and ignominiously dismissed. There can be little doubt that if the Scots had possessed the power they would immediately have declared war against the dominant party in England; but in the exhausted state to which the country was reduced they felt that they were unable to enforce the claims of the Stewart family upon the English throne, and were, therefore, obliged to content themselves with proclaiming Prince Charles, the eldest son of the deceased monarch, King of Scotland in his stead. But the covenanters, who since the Whigamores' Raid had possessed the supreme power in the country, refused to admit him to the actual possession of the sovereignty until he should give security for the religion, the unity, and the peace of the kingdom, according to the national covenant. Commissioners were accordingly sent to the Hague, where Charles then resided, to offer him the crown on these terms. The young prince, however, was already surrounded with counsellors, whose advice was more agreeable to his inclinations. The Marquis of Montrose and other exiled royalists urged him to reject the crown on the proposed conditions, and offered to place him by force of arms on the throne of his ancestors; while his English advisers recommended him to repair to Ireland, where Ormond and the Romish party still held out against the parliament. All hope of assistance from Ireland, however, was soon extinguished by the decisive victories of Cromwell; so that Charles was compelled to choose between the project of Montrose and the proposals of the Scottish parliament.

—his duplicity. With characteristic duplicity he entered into negotiations with both of these parties at one and the same time. While these were pending, Dorislaus, the English ambassador at the Hague, was assassinated by some of the retainers of Montrose; and so violently was this foul deed resented by the English government that Charles was obliged to leave Holland, and to repair first to Paris and then to Jersey.

Meanwhile the impatience of the ultra-royalists in Scotland led them to adopt some rash and ill-concerted measures for the unconditional restoration of the young king. A mutiny was excited in the garrison of Stirling, while the royal partisans in the north, under General Middleton and Lord Reay, with the knowledge and approbation of Charles himself, took up arms and seized upon Inverness, which they held for several months, till at length, in the month of May, they were attacked and completely routed by a party of the covenanters under Kerr, Hackett, and Strachan. This ill-judged insurrection accelerated, if it did not occasion, the execution of the weak though consistent Marquis of Huntley, who had remained in prison for sixteen months. He had rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to the covenanters, and was now put to death in pursuance of a former sentence, in spite of the exertions of his brother-in-law, the Marquis of Argyll. The parliament had shortly before this passed an "Act of Classes," excluding from public office the authors and abettors of the Engagement, as well as the friends and supporters of Montrose; and the General Assembly, which met in July, followed up this step by fulminating ecclesiastical censures against the Engagers; and at the same time issued "a seasonable and necessary warning" against those who were threatening to invade the kingdom for the purpose of restoring the king to unconditional sovereignty.

In language which reflects equal honour on their wisdom and patriotism, they declared that, "as magistrates and their powers are ordained of God, so are they in the exercise thereof not to walk according to their own will, but according to the law of equity and righteousness, and, therefore, a boundless and unlimited power is to be acknowledged in no king or magistrate; that there is a mutual obligation and stipulation betwixt the king and his people; that arbitrary government and unlimited power are the fountains of all the corruptions in Church and State; and that it is no new thing for kingdoms to preserve themselves from ruin by putting restraint upon the exercise of the power and government of those who have refused to grant the things that were necessary for the good of religion and the people's safety."*

While Charles was residing in Jersey, the Scottish parliament dispatched Sir George Winram to renew the negotiations which had been broken off at the Hague. The king soon after removed to Breda, where, early next year, the treaty for his return was concluded by the Earls of Lothian and Cassillis. It was stipulated that Charles should acknowledge the solemn league and covenant, and confirm the presbyterian government and worship; that all civil matters should be determined by the parliament, and all ecclesiastical affairs by the General Assembly; that popery should not be tolerated; and that all proclamations inconsistent with the covenant, and all commissions hostile to the kingdom, should be recalled. These terms were in the

sion to Mont-

prolong the treaty till the result of Montrose's intended invasion should be determined. While the negotiations with the covenanters were pending, he wrote to that gallant and ill-used nobleman, urging him to accelerate his preparations for a descent upon Scotland. Referring to the invitation given by the Scottish parliament, he says, "We have appointed a speedy time and place for their commissioners to attend us; and to the end you may not apprehend that we intend, either by anything contained in these letters, or by the treaty we expect, to give the least impediment to your proceedings, we think fit to let you know that as we conceive that your preparations have been one effectual motive that hath induced them to make the said address to us, so your vigorous proceedings will be a good means to bring them to such moderation in the said treaty as probably may produce an agreement and a present union of that whole nation in our service. We assure you, therefore, that we will not before or during the treaty do anything contrary to that power and authority which we have given you by our commission, nor consent to anything that may bring the least diminution to it." In reference to an advice which Montrose had given him not to acknowledge any commission emanating from what he esteemed an unlawful convention, his majesty, treading closely in his father's footsteps, says, "In the meantime we think fit to declare to you that we have called them a 'Committee of Estates' only in order to a treaty, and for no other end whatsoever, and if the treaty do not produce an agreement,—as we are already assured that the calling of them a committee of Estates in the direction of a letter doth neither acknowledge them to be legally so, nor make them such,—so we shall immediately declare to all our subjects of Scotland what we hold them to be, notwithstanding any appellation we now give them." The disreputable document concludes with reiterated injunctions to Montrose "to proceed vigorously and effectually" in his undertaking.*

* Life and Times of Montrose, p. 465. In a private letter which accompanied this paper of instructions (dated Jersey, 22nd Jan., 1650) Charles, evidently anticipating that some report of his treaty with the covenanters might reach his zealous partisan, whom he was thus basely misleading, says, "I conjure you not to take alarm at any report or messages from others, but to depend upon my kindness, and

burgh, early in the spring of 1650, with some arms and treasure supplied by the courts of Sweden and Denmark. He landed at one of the Orkney Islands, where he remained for a few weeks, and by forced levies constrained a few hundreds of the unwarlike fishermen to take up arms. He then passed over to the main land of Scotland near the extremity of Caithness, with the design of penetrating into the Highlands. But just as he advanced beyond the pass of Invercarron, at a place called Drumcarbisdale, on the river Kyle, near the confines of Ross-shire (27th April), he fell into an ambuscade laid for him by Colonel Strachan, who had been sent forward in all haste with a body of horse to obstruct his progress.* The covenanting troops issued from the pass in three divisions. The first was repulsed by Montrose in person, who led the van of his army; but when the second division, headed by Strachan himself, sounded the charge, the unwarlike Orkney men threw down their arms and called for quarter, and the Germans retreated to a wood, and there, after a short defence, surrendered themselves prisoners. Montrose's few Scottish followers made a desperate but unavailing resistance. Young Menzies of Pitfoddeis, his standard-bearer, was killed by his side. Lord Frendraught and Sir John Urrey were made prisoners, and the rout became complete. Montrose himself was wounded, and his horse killed under him, but he was generously remounted by his friend, Lord Frendraught, who was also severely wounded. Seeing the day irretrievably lost, he fled from the field in company with the Earl of Kinnoul, and escaped into the wild mountain district of Assynt. His standard, which was of black, and represented the bleeding head of Charles I. on the block, with the

to proceed in your business with your usual courage and alacrity, which I am sure will bring great advantage to my affairs and much honour to yourself. I wish you all success in it." And in a letter of September the 19th, 1649, he says, "I entreat you to go on vigorously and with your wonted courage and care in the prosecution of those trusts I have committed to you, and not to be startled with any reports you may hear, as if I were otherwise inclined to the presbyterians than when I left you. I assure you I am still upon the same principles I was, and depend as much as ever upon your undertaking and endeavours for my service; being fully resolved to assist and support you therein to the uttermost of my power."—Ibid., pp. 462, 465.

* "The ardent and impetuous character of this great warrior corresponding with that of the troops which he commanded, was better calculated for attack than defence—for surprising others rather than for providing against surprise himself. Thus he suffered loss by a sudden attack upon part of his forces stationed at Aberdeen, and had he not extricated himself with the most singular ability, he must have lost his whole army when surprised by Baillie during the plunder of Dundee. Nor has it escaped an ingenious modern historian that his final defeat at Dunbeith, so nearly resembles in its circumstances the surprise at Philiphaugh, as to throw some shade on his military talents."—Sir Walter Scott's Border Minstrelsy, vol. ii. p. 276.

inscription, "Judge and avenge my cause, O Lord!" was found on the field, and his cloak with the star of his newly obtained garter, and the George, were afterwards discovered hidden at the root of a tree.

"Montrose and the very few adherents who—his flight joined him in his flight, being com-
and sufferings. pelled by the boggy and broken high ground in which they obtained temporary safety to relinquish the horses that carried them from the field of battle, and, judging that all the surrounding inhabitants were opposed to them, wandered into the most desolate and retired parts of the wide, extended, and mountainous region that separates Assynt from the Kyle of Sutherland—the object being to pass through the hills into the Reay country, then possessed by Lord Reay and the cadets of the Mackay family, who were friendly towards the marquis and the cause in which he suffered. The privations of food, and the distress and fatigue endured by these strangers in their wanderings, soon became insupportable; and by the evening of the second day after the battle, Montrose's companions, with the exception of the Earl of Kinnoul and Major Sinclair, left him and returned to the eastward, preferring the certainty of being taken prisoners to the risk of perishing in the wilderness. On the morning of the third day, Lord Kinnoul became so faint, and his strength was so exhausted by hunger, cold, and fatigue, that he could move no farther. He was therefore necessarily left by his distracted and enfeebled companions, without shelter or protection of any kind, on the exposed heath; but Major Sinclair volunteered to go in search of, and return with, assistance; while Montrose, still moving westward, and now alone, endeavoured to effect his escape to the Reay country. In the course of the same day he came in sight of a small hut, occasionally occupied for dairy purposes by one of the Laird of Assynt's tenants, at a grazing farm, known by the name of Glaschyle. Before leaving Drumcarbisdale the marquis disguised himself in a coarse woollen short coat or jacket of a countryman; and now, pressed with hunger, he ventured to approach the solitary hut before him, with the view of obtaining, if possible, some food, and of being directed in his proper course to the Reay country. The tenant of the farm chanced to be there alone; and the tradition still is, that Montrose very modestly asked if a stranger who had lost his way among the hills could be supplied with food of any description, and that the countryman viewed him, without any suspicion of his rank, as a respectable and civil stranger. This temporary place of residence was almost destitute of provisions, but its owner had a supply of whiskey in his possession, of which he gave some to the marquis.

"The marquis asked for a second supply of the spirit, and then, appearing active and vigorous, made inquiry as to the proper direction towards the Reay country, through the mountain passes to the north. The course to be taken was pointed out to him; and in answer to a remark that no stranger could find out the most accessible openings through the mountains without a guide, he said he regretted that he was too poor a man to pay any guide. The countryman's curiosity and suspicions were, however, roused by this time; for while Montrose had been drinking the whiskey, the breast of his coat, opening partially, displayed to the astonished eyes of the countryman the glitter either of a star or rich metallic embroidery on the waistcoat. Montrose proceeded in a north-west direction from Glaschyle, followed at a little distance by his recent host, who seemed disposed to become better acquainted with the mysterious stranger. But as Montrose was ascending a hill situated a few miles to the north of Glaschyle, he was met by a servant or scout, sent by the Laird of Assynt to learn if any strangers were wandering through that part of the country. When observed by this man, Montrose endeavoured to proceed in another direction; but finding it impossible to escape, he sat down until both the men overtook him, having previously scattered all the money in his possession among the heather, a few coins of which are said to have been picked up within the last ten years.

"Niel Macleod, the Laird of Assynt, then resided at Ardvrack Castle, situated on a peninsula in Loehassynt, in the interior of the parish. He was married to a daughter of Colonel John Morss of Lumlair, a military officer of some repute in the north of Scotland, and commander of a Sutherland regiment of foot, and who had acquired the character of a stern and cruel man. He was nicknamed, and is still spoken of by the country people as "Ian Dhu na Circh" (Black John of the Breast), in consequence of having been accessory to a barbarous mutilation of some women. He and his son, Captain Andrew Morss, served under Strachan at the battle of Drumcarbisdale, and the ambuscade so successfully resorted to was effected through the intimate knowledge possessed by these officers of the localities of the ground. Immediately after the engagement, Colonel Morss forwarded an express to his son-in-law, Macleod of Assynt, and directed him to secure such strangers as might escape to the west coast; and the servant who fell in with Montrose near Glaschyle was one of the men dispatched accordingly to watch the different passes into Assynt.

"In answer to questions by Macleod's servant, Montrose said that he was going into the Reay country, but had lost his way, and begged to be conducted there. To his request both the men seemed to agree, and promised to conduct him there; but instead of doing so, they conveyed him to Macleod's Castle of Ardvrack, distant about nine miles from the place where they met him. When he came in sight of the castle, its peculiar situation on a peninsula, so nearly surrounded with water as to appear to be what the old chroniclers call it—the Isle of Assynt, and of which Montrose had previously heard, convinced him that he was betrayed, and was now in the power of Macleod of Assynt. He anxiously inquired if it was Ardvreck Castle to which he was conducted; when his guides acknowledged that it was, and that he might observe Macleod's lady at its gate waiting to receive him. He hurriedly asked her father's name, and was told, as if to inspire terror, that she was the daughter of Black John, of the Breast. Tradition bears that Montrose, on receiving this information, stood for a while motionless and aghast, and then exclaimed that his destiny was fulfilled, and his fate certain.*

On his arrival within the castle, the unfortunate —his capture by Macleod of Assynt— Montrose was compelled to rest over his situation, in one of the strong vaulted cellars still to be seen in the ruins of the building. There he was closely confined and constantly watched, and notice of his capture instantly forwarded to Strachan. He, however, used every exertion to induce Macleod to consent to his liberation, by the promise of great rewards, and the countenance of the king, if he should be permitted to retire to the Reay country, or to Orkney. This Neil Macleod is said to have been a man of no great decision; but his lady is represented by the country people as having inherited the stern, unrelenting disposition of her father, and as the active person who kept Montrose in close confinement, and delivered him up to his enemies; and it is even supposed that had Macleod not been influenced by her, he would have permitted the marquis to escape.† Major Sinclair was also found traversing the hills, and was conducted to the prison of his leader; but as no accurate directions could be given by them to where the Earl of Kinnoul had been left, that nobleman, whose body was never discovered, must have perished miserably in some solitary recess among the mountains.‡

Montrose was shortly afterwards conveyed from —he is delivered up to his enemies— Assynt, and escorted to the south by a troop of soldiers under Major-general Holburn. They treated him in the most ungenerous manner, heaped reproaches and outrages upon him, meanly refused to allow him any change of dress, and led him from place to place in the same peasant's habit in which he had disguised himself. In the words of an eye-witness,* "he sat upon a little shelly horse without a saddle, but a quilt of rags and straw, and pieces of ropes for stirrups, his feet fastened under the horse's belly with a tether,† and a bit halter for a bridle; a ragged old dark-reddish plaid, and a Montrer cap upon his head, a musketeer on each side, and his fellow-prisoners on foot after him. At the bridge of Inverness an old woman stepped forward and exclaimed, 'Montrose, look above, view these ruinous houses of mine which you caused to be burned down when you besieged Inverness.' Yet he never altered his countenance. At the end of the town the provost, —his journey Duncan Forbes, taking leave of to Edinburgh— him, said, 'My lord, I am sorry for your circumstances.' He replied, 'I am sorry for being the object of your pity.' The prisoner and his guard spent the Sabbath at Keith, and heard a sermon there. A tent was set up for him in the fields, in which he lay. The minister, Master William Kinninmond, chose for his text the words of Samuel the prophet to Agag, the king of the Amalekites— 'As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women.' This unnatural, merciless man so rated and railed at Montrose that some of his hearers, who were even of the opposite party, condemned him. Montrose heard him patiently for a long time, and at length said, 'Rail on, Raca,‡' and so turned his back to him in the tent. But all honest men hated Kinninmond for this ever after." At Kinnaird, the house of his father-in-law, the Earl of Southesk, Montrose met with his two sons, but neither at meeting nor parting could "any change in his countenance be seen." At the house of the Laird of Grange, where he spent one night, he nearly effected his escape by a stratagem of the lady, who "plied the guards with intoxicating drink until they were all fast asleep, and then she dressed the marquis in her own clothes. In this disguise he passed all the sentinels, and was on the point of escaping when a soldier, just sober enough to mark what was passing, gave the alarm, and he was again secured.§ The citizens of Dundee, greatly to their honour, although they had suffered severely from his arms, expressed deep sympathy for their fallen foe, and supplied him with clothes and other necessities suitable to his rank. "The marquis himself," says Sir Walter Scott, "must have felt this as a severe rebuke for the wasteful mode in which he had carried on his warfare; and it was a still more piercing reproach to the unworthy victors who now triumphed over an heroic enemy in the same manner as they would have done over a detected felon."

* Montrose is supposed to have alluded to a legend of an old beldame's warning to Montrose in his youth, to beware of a black lake and the daughter of a black-visaged man. Bishop Burnet states that when Montrose was beyond sea he travelled with the Earl of Denbigh, and they consulted all the astrologers they could hear of. "I plainly saw the Earl of Denbigh relied on what had been told him to his dying day, and the rather because the Earl of Montrose was promised a glorious fortune for some time, but all was to be overthrown in conclusion." Montrose is also said to have been encouraged to undertake his last desperate enterprise by a prophecy that to him, and him alone, it was reserved to restore the king's authority in all his dominions. Montrose's mother was a daughter of William first Earl of Gowrie, in whose family a fondness for magical pursuits seems to have been hereditary. (See supra, p. 388, note.)

† This mean and sordid chief was rewarded by the committee of Estates, for giving up Montrose, with a present of four hundred bolls of meal. After the Restoration he was tried for his treachery, but by means of bribery, and the interest of Lauderdale, he escaped the punishment which he deserved. Before Montrose reached Edinburgh his doom had been decided by the parliament. It was resolved to dispense with the form of a trial, and to proceed against him upon an act of attainder passed in the winter of 1644, while he was ravaging the country of Argyle. The barbarity of his sentence was studiously aggravated by every species of insult. He was appointed to be hanged for three hours on a gibbet thirty feet high, his head to be affixed to an iron spike on the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, his body to be quartered, and his limbs to be placed over the gates of the four principal towns in Scotland—Perth, Stirling, Aberdeen, and Glasgow; and his body (unless he should be released from the excommunication of the Kirk) to be interred in the Boroughmuir, under the gallows.*

Montrose reached Edinburgh on Saturday, the 18th of May, and it was resolved by his ungenerous enemies to celebrate his entrance into the capital with a kind of mock procession. At the end of the Canongate he was received by the executioners, with the magistrates and the town-guard. His officers walked on foot bound with cords; then came the marquis himself placed on a high chair in a cart, bareheaded and bound to the seat with cords; the hangman, wearing his bonnet, rode on the foremost of the four horses that drew the cart. "In all the way," says a contemporary chronicler, "there appeared in him such majesty, courage, modesty—and even somewhat more than natural—that those common women who had lost their husbands and children in his wars, and who were hired to stone him, were upon the sight of him so astonished and moved that their intended curses turned into tears and prayers." As the melancholy procession moved slowly up the Canongate, it stopped opposite Moray House, where the Marquis of Argyll, his son, Lord Lorn, and his newly-married wife—a daughter of the Earl of Moray—with the chancellor and Warriston, appeared at a balcony for the purpose of gratifying their resentment by gazing on their captive enemy, but on Montrose "turning his face towards them, they presently erept in at the windows; which being perceived by an Englishman, he cried up it was no wonder they started aside at his look, for they durst not look him in the face these seven years bygone." On reaching the Tolbooth a deputation from the parliament waited upon him to interrogate him; but he refused to answer them until he knew on what terms they stood with the king, his royal master. They told him, the king and they were agreed. "Then," said he, "I desire to be at rest, for the compliment you put upon me this day was a little tedious."

At eight o'clock on Monday morning the Rev. James Guthrie, Robert Trail, and other clergymen, appointed for that purpose by the General Assembly, waited on Montrose in the prison. They began by admonishing him on his natural temper, which they said was too "aspiring and lofty;" and on his "personal vices," which they alleged were notorious.* On these points Montrose replied to them with much humility, "and discoursed on them handsomely, as he could well do, intermixing many Latin apothegms. He granted that God had made men of several tempers and dispositions, and he confessed he was one of those who love to have praise for virtuous actions. As for his personal vices, he did not deny but he had many; but if the Lord should withhold light on that account, it might reach unto the greatest saints, who wanted not their faults and failings." But though before God, and as an erring creature, he freely admitted the justice of all that had befallen him, yet before man he firmly vindicated his character and proceedings when his censors arraigned his public conduct in the king's service. With regard to his enlisting Irish and popish rebels, "he said it was no wonder that his majesty should take any of his subjects who would help him, when those who should have been his best subjects deceived and opposed him. 'We see,' he added, 'what a company David took to defend him in the time of his strait.'" As to the ravages which his soldiers committed in plundering the country, he reminded them that "soldiers who wanted pay could not be restrained from spoilzie, nor kept under such strict discipline as other regular forces. But he declared that he did all that lay in his power to keep them back from it; and as for bloodshed, if it could have been thereby prevented, he would rather it had all come out of his own veins." They then proceeded to the main point, the breach of the covenant, with which they charged him. He declared that he still adhered to the covenant which he took. "Bishops," he added, "I care not for them; I never intended to advance their interest. But when the king had granted you all your desires, and you were every one sitting under his vine and fig-tree—that then you should have taken a party in England by the hand, and entered into a league and covenant with them against the king, was the thing I judged my duty to oppose to the yondmost." He reminded them further that the course which they had followed had terminated in the death of the king, and the overthrow of the constitution. "That," rejoined one of the ministers, "was the work of a sectarian party that rose up and carried things beyond the true and first intent of them."—"Error is infinite," was the brief reply of Montrose. At the close of this lengthened conference, Mr. Guthrie expressed their deep grief that in consequence of the impenitence of the marquis, they could not release him

* Patrick Simpson, minister of Renfrew, who was present during this interview, and gave an account of it to Wodrow, says, by these "personal vices" was meant that Montrose was "given to women." It is but fair to state, however, that, as Mr. Napier remarks, "with no particular scandal of this kind was Montrose upbraided."

from the sentence of excommunication. "I am very sorry," was his firm and dignified rejoinder, "that any actions of mine have been offensive to the Church of Scotland, and I would with all my heart be reconciled to the same. But since I cannot obtain it on any other terms, unless I call that my sin which I account to have been my duty, I cannot for all the reason and conscience in the world."*

This conference over, Montrose was summoned—his dignified appearance before the parliament—before the parliament to hear his sentence read. He was richly dressed, but "looked somewhat pale, lank-faced, and hairy."† The chancellor, the Earl of Loudoun, in a long and vituperative speech, upbraided him for his violation of the covenant, his league with the Irish rebels, his invasion of the country, and his blood-guiltiness; for which God, he said, had now brought him to just punishment. Montrose then requested leave to speak, and vindicated his conduct with great courage, temper, and dignity. He declared—his defence of his conduct—that it was solely in consequence of their agreement with the king, of which they had informed him, that he submitted to appear uncovered before them. His care, he said, had always been to act as a good Christian and a loyal subject. He engaged in the first covenant, and was faithful to it until he perceived that certain persons, under colour of religion, intended to wrest the royal authority from the king. "As for that you call the league and covenant, I thank God I was never in it, and so could not break it. How far religion has been advanced by it, and what sad consequences followed on it, these poor distressed kingdoms can witness. . . . His (late) majesty gave commission to me to come into this kingdom to make a diversion of those forces which were going from home against him. I acknowledge the command; it was most just, and I conceived myself bound in conscience and duty to obey it. What my carriage was in this country many of you may bear witness. Disorders in arms cannot be prevented, but they were no sooner known than punished. Never was any man's blood spilt but in battle, and even then many thousand lives have I preserved; and I dare here avow that never a hair of Scotsman's head that I could save, fell to the ground. And as I came in upon his majesty's warrant, so upon his letters did I lay aside all interests (of my own) and retire. And as for my coming at this time, it was by his majesty's just commands, in order to the accelerating of the treaty betwixt him and you—his majesty knowing that whenever he had ended with you, I was ready to retire upon his call. I may justly say that never subject acted upon more honourable grounds, nor by so lawful a power, as I did in these services. And, therefore, I adjure you to lay aside prejudice, and consider me as a Christian in relation to my cause—as a subject in relation to my royal master's command—and as your neighbour in relation to the many of your lives I have preserved in battle. And be not too rash, but let me be judged by the laws of God, the laws of nature and of nations, and the laws of this land. If otherwise, then I do here appeal from you to the righteous Judge of the world, who one day must be your judge and mine, and who always gives out righteous judgment."

To this address the chancellor Loudoun rejoined with much heat and virulent abuse, Brutal behaviour of the chancellor. "Proving," says his friend, Sir James Balfour, "Montrose, by his acts of hostility, to be a person most infamous, perjured, treacherous, and of all this land ever brought forth the most cruel and inhuman butcher of his nation, a sworn enemy to the covenant and the peace of his country."* After this brutal invective Montrose was compelled to kneel while his sentence was read. He heard it with an unmoved countenance, and at the close merely remarked, "That, according to our Scots proverb, a messenger should neither be headed nor hanged." "He behaved himself all this time in the house," says Sir James Balfour, a hostile witness, "with a great deal of courage and modesty, unmoved and undaunted as appeared, only he sighed two several times, and rolled his eyes alongst all the corners of the house; and at the reading of the sentence he lifted up his face without any word speaking." He was then conveyed back to Montrose's second conference with the clergy. prison, where another deputation of ministers waited upon him by appointment of the commission of assembly. They endeavoured to shake his resolution by descanting on the horrors of his barbarous sentence; but he told them he considered it a greater honour to have his head fixed on the top of the prison for this quarrel, than that his picture should hang in the king's bedchamber; and so far from being troubled at the members of his body being dispersed among the four principal cities, as memorials of his loyalty, he only wished that he had limbs enough to send to every city in Christendom, as testimonies of his unshaken attachment to his king and country. The ministers continued to urge upon him his guilt in taking up arms in behalf of the king, and endeavoured to draw from him some expressions of penitence; but he at last put a stop to their exhortations with the words, "I pray you, gentlemen, let me die in peace."

Before they took their leave he drew aside the well-known Robert Baillie, and conversed with him for some time in the corner of the room; but

* The inveterate enmity of Loudoun, and his violent behaviour on this occasion, so unbecoming his high office, may be accounted for by the slaughter of the clan Campbell, of which he was a cadet, at Inverlochy, where his elder brother, the Laird of Lawers, fell.

† It appears that the permission to shave had been refused to Montrose. "I could not think," was his remark, "but they would have allowed that to a dog." This refusal probably proceeded from the apprehension that he might anticipate his ignominious death by committing suicide, for we are told that "the parliament would allow him no knife nor weapon in the room with him, lest he should have done harm to himself." Montrose indignantly disclaimed the imputation.

Mr. Baillie afterwards stated that "what he spoke to him was only concerning some of his personal sins in his conversation, but nothing concerning the things for which he was condemned."*

That evening, when left alone, he wrote with the point of a diamond on his prison window the following lines:—

"Let them bestow on every airth† a limb,
Then open all my veins—that I may swim
To thee, my Maker, in that crimson lake—
Then place my parboil'd head upon a stake;
Scatter my ashes—strew them in the air;
Lord! since thou knowest where all these atoms are,
I'm hopeful thou'lt recover once my dust,
And confident thou'lt raise me with the just."

The next day, Tuesday, May 21st, was fixed for his execution. Early in the morning he was awakened by the noise of drums and trumpets calling out the guards and citizens to arms; for the parliament, it seems, were apprehensive that a tumult might be excited by the royalists, and an attempt made to rescue him. "Do I," he said, "who have been such a terror to these good folks during my life, continue still so formidable to them now when about to die?" Soon after, Sir Archibald Johnston of Warriston, then clerk-register, entered the prisoner's cell while he was combing the long curled hair which he wore, according to the fashion of the cavaliers, and asked him what he was about, in a tone which implied that he regarded this as but an idle employment at so solemn a time. "While my head is my own," replied Montrose with a smile, "I will dress and adorn it, but when it becomes yours, you may treat it as you please."‡

All preparations being now complete, at two o'clock in the afternoon Montrose on the scaffold—walked on foot from the prison to the place of execution in the middle of the market-place, between the Cross and the Tron, where a large square scaffold, covered with black cloth, had been erected, from which arose a gallows thirty feet high. He was clad in rich attire, "more becoming a bridegroom," says a contemporary chronicler, "than a criminal going to the gallows."§ His firm and dignified bearing produced a deep impression upon the spectators, who were heard to exclaim, "There goes the finest gallant in the realm." None of his friends or kinsmen were allowed to accompany him; neither was he permitted to address the people from the scaffold, but the speech which he uttered to those around him, and in the midst of frequent interruptions, was

"I am sorry," he said, "if this manner of my end be scandalous to any good Christian. Doth it not often happen to the righteous according to the ways of the wicked, and to the wicked according to the ways of the righteous? Doth not sometimes a just man perish in his righteousness, and a wicked man prosper in his malice? They who know me should not disesteem me for this. Many greater than I have been dealt with in this kind. Yet I must not say but that all God's judgments are just. For my private sins I acknowledge this to be just with God—I submit myself to Him. But in regard of man, I may say they are but instruments—God forgive them—I forgive them. They have oppressed the poor and violently perverted judgment and justice; but he that is higher than the highest will regard. What I did in this kingdom was in obedience to the most just commands of my lawful sovereign; for his defence in the day of his distress against those that did rise up against him. I acknowledge nothing, but to fear God and honour the king, according to the commandments of God, and the laws of nature and nations. I have not sinned against man, but against God; and with Him there is mercy, which is the ground of my drawing near unto Him. It is objected against me by many, even good people, that I am under the censure of the Church. This is not my fault, since it is only for doing my duty, by obeying my prince's most just commands, for religion, his sacred person, and authority. Yet I am sorry they did excommunicate me—and in that which is according to God's laws, without wronging my conscience or allegiance, I desire to be relaxed. If they will not thus do it, I appeal to God, who is the righteous judge of the world, and who must now be my judge and saviour. It is spoken of me that I blame the king! God forbid. For the late king—he lived a saint, and died a martyr. I pray God I may end so. If ever I would wish my soul in another man's stead, it were in his. For his majesty now living, never people, I believe, might be more happy in a king. His commands to me were most just. In nothing that he promiseth will he fail. He deals justly with all men. I pray God he be so dealt with, that he be not betrayed under trust as his father was. I desire not to be mistaken, as if my carriage at this time, in relation to your ways, were stubborn. I do but follow the light of my own conscience, which is seconded by the working of the good spirit of God that is within me. I thank him I go to heaven's throne with joy. If he enable me against the fear of death, and furnish me with courage and confidence to embrace it, even in its most ugly shape, let God be glorified in my end, though it were in my damnation. Yet I say not this out of any fear or distrust, but out of my duty to God, and love to his people. I have no more to say, but that I desire your charity and prayers. I shall pray for you all. I leave my soul to God, my service to my prince, my goodwill to my friends, and my name and charity to you all. And thus briefly I have exonerated my conscience." Being desired to pray apart, he said, "I have already poured out my soul before the Lord, who knows my heart, and into whose hands I have commended my spirit; and he hath been graciously pleased to return to me a full assurance of peace in Jesus Christ my Redeemer."

To add to the ignominy of his punishment, the —his executioner brought Dr. Wishart's execution— narrative of Montrose's exploits, and his own manifesto to hang around his neck; but the marquis himself assisted to fasten them, merely saying, with a smile at this new token of his enemies' malice, "I did not feel more honoured when his majesty sent me the Garter." He then asked if they had any additional indignities to put upon him, as he was ready to submit to them. Before ascending the ladder he prayed for some time with his hat before his eyes, "being observed to be mightily moved all the while." Two of the ministers, Messrs. Trail and Law, were present according to the appointment of the commission of the General Assembly, in order that they might release him from the sentence of excommunication, if he could express penitence for his offences. "But," says the former, "he did not at all desire to be relaxed from his excommunication in the name of the Kirk—yea, did not look towards that place on the scaffold where we stood, only he drew apart some of the magistrates, and spake awhile with them; and then went up the ladder in his red scarlet cassock in a very stately manner, and never spoke a word; but when the executioner was putting the cord about his neck, he looked down to the people upon the scaffold, and asked, 'How long shall I hang here?' When my colleague and I saw him casten over, we returned to the commission, and related the matter as it was."*

Another eye-witness of this sad catastrophe says, "he was very earnest that he might have the liberty to keep on his hat—it was denied: he requested he might have the privilege to keep his cloak about him—neither could that be granted. Then, with the most undaunted courage, he went up to the top of that prodigious gibbet, where, having freely pardoned the executioner, he gave him three or four pieces of gold, and inquired of him how long he should hang there, who said three hours; then commanding him at the uplifting of his hands to tumble him over, he was accordingly thrust off by the weeping executioner. The whole people gave a general groan; and it was very observable that even those who at first appearance had bitterly inveighed against him could not now abstain from tears. 'Tis said that Argyll's expressions had something of grief in them, and that he did likewise weep at the rehearsal of his death, for he was not present at the execution. But they were by many called crocodile's tears; how truly I leave to others' judgment. But I am sure there did in his son, the Lord Lorn, appear no such sign, who neither had so much tenderness of heart as to be sorry, nor so much paternal wit as to dissemble—entertaining his new bride, the Earl of Moray's daughter, with this spectacle, he mocked and laughed in the midst of that weeping assembly, and, staying afterwards to see him hewn in pieces, triumphed, at every stroke, that was bestowed upon his mangled body." According to his sentence, the head of Montrose was affixed to an iron spike on the west end of the Tolbooth, his legs and arms were cut off and sent to the four principal towns of Scotland, and the trunk was thrown into a hole in the Borough-muir, under the gallows.* Eleven years later, at the Restoration, the head was taken down in the presence of Lord Napier and a number of the leading barons of the house of Graham, and the scattered limbs were re-assembled, and interred with great pomp and ceremony in St. Giles's Church, in the tomb of his grandfather. A few weeks after, the head of Argyll was affixed to the spike from which the head of Montrose had just been removed.†

Thus perished at the age of thirty-seven one of the most distinguished Scotchmen —his character. whom the seventeenth century, fertile in great men, produced. His talents for irregular warfare were certainly of the highest order; and he possessed beyond most men that indomitable energy which fearlessly grapples with the greatest difficulties, and by boldly confronting so often overcomes the most formidable obstacles. He was a poet and a scholar, as well as a soldier, and wrote and spoke clearly and eloquently. His genius was of the heroic cast, and, in the opinion of the celebrated Cardinal de Retz—no mean judge of character—closely resembled that of the ancient heroes of Greece and Rome. "Montrose," says Lord Clarendon, "was in his nature fearless of danger, and never declined any enterprise for the difficulty of going through with it, but exceedingly affected those which seemed desperate to other men; and did believe somewhat to be in himself above other men, which made him live more easily towards those who were, or were willing to be, inferior to him (towards whom he exercised wonderful civility and generosity) than with his superiors or equals. He was naturally jealous, and suspected those who did not concur with him, in the way, not to mean so well as he. He was not without vanity, but his virtues were much superior, and he well deserved to have his memory preserved and celebrated

* "Two days after the murder, the heart of this great hero, in spite of all the traitors, was by conveyance of some adventurous spirits, appointed by that noble and honourable lady, the Lady Napier, taken out and embalmed in the most costly manner by that skilful chyrurgeon and apothecary, Mr. James Callender, and then put in a rich case of gold."—Relation of the True Funeral of the Great Lord Marquis of Montrose, in the year 1661. For an account of the further fortunes of this curious relic see Appendix H.

among the most illustrious persons of the age in which he lived." Montrose was undoubtedly ambitious and fond of applause; as he himself frankly acknowledged, "he was one of those that loved to have praise for virtuous actions." Clarendon notices the contrast between his behaviour at Oxford in 1642, "when he seemed to have very much modesty and deference to the opinions and judgment of other men," and his deportment at the Hague in 1649, after "he had done so many signal actions, won so many battles, and, in truth, made so great a noise in the world that there appeared no less alteration to be in his humour and discourse than there had been in his fortune."* But he frankly admits that Montrose was a man of "a clear spirit"—"a man of the clearest honour, courage, and affection to the king's service"—"a person of as great honour, and as exemplary integrity and loyalty as ever that nation (the Scottish) bred."† His enemies have pertinaciously accused him of treachery and cruelty. The former appears to rest on no valid foundation; but it is impossible to deny that he waged war in a sanguinary spirit, and that he permitted, if he did not authorise, his troops to lay waste the country in a cruel and vindictive manner.‡ It can only be pleaded in extenuation, that this was "the fault of his country and his age, and that his enemies showed as little of mercy and forbearance." In his personal deportment Montrose was dignified yet graceful. Burnet says, "his whole manner was stately to affectation." His features, though not handsome, were singularly expressive. "His hair was of a dark brown colour, and a high nose, a full, decided, well-opened, quick grey eye, and a sanguine complexion, made amends for some coarseness and irregularity in the subordinate parts of the face. His stature was very little above the middle size; but in person he was uncommonly well-built, and capable both of exerting great force and enduring much fatigue." "He was a man of a very princely carriage and excellent address, which made him be used by all princes for the most part with the greatest familiarity. He was a complete horseman, and had a singular grace in riding." "As he was strong of body and limb, so he was most agile, which made him excel most others in those exercises where these two are required. His bodily endowments were equally fitting the court as the camp."*

Montrose was followed to the scaffold by his principal officers. Colonel Sibbald, Execution of one of his attendants from England; Sir Francis Hay Dalgetty; Spottiswood, a youth of eighteen, a grandson of the primate; and Sir John Urrey, who had repeatedly changed sides during these unhappy commotions, were beheaded by the "maiden,"† a less ignominious mode of death than that which was inflicted on their gallant commander. His friend, Lord Frendraught, anticipated the public vengeance by a death "in the old Roman way."

Meanwhile the negotiations between Charles and the Scottish parliament were brought to a termination. On the discovery of the prince's duplicity, Warriston, Hope, and other leaders of the covenanters, proposed to break off the treaty and to recall their commissioners, but this proposal was overruled mainly by the influence and address of Argyll,‡ and the only alteration made in the terms consisted in a statement that the Act of Classes, excluding certain persons from the court, applied to the authors of the Engagement, as well as to the malignants. The king is said to have expressed strong displeasure at the execution of Montrose, as a violation of the treaty; but his complaints were silenced by an intimation that certain facts were known to the parliament, which were likely to affect his honour. Charles must thus have been made aware that his commission to Montrose had been discovered. He, therefore, Charles's arrival in Scotland—no longer hesitated to accept the crown on the terms offered, and having embarked with his court in a Dutch fleet, he arrived at the mouth of the Spey on the 23rd of June, 1650, only one month after the execution of Montrose. But as the suspicions of the people had been roused by his double-dealing, he was required

‡ Clarendon has given an account of a remarkable conversation which he had on this point at the Hague with the Earl of Lauderdale, one of the most vindictive of Montrose's enemies. On being asked what "foul offence" the marquis had committed that should prevent the Scottish presbyterians from uniting with him to restore the king, Lauderdale told the historian "calmly enough that he could not imagine or conceive the barbarities and inhumanities Montrose was guilty of in the time he made a war in Scotland, and that he never gave quarter to any man, but pursued all the advantages he ever got with the utmost outrage and cruelty; that he had in one battle killed fifteen hundred of one family, of the Campbells, of the blood and name of Argyll; and that he had utterly rooted out several names and entire noble families. The other told him that it was the nature and condition of that war that quarter was given on neither side; that those prisoners which were taken by the Scots, as once they did take some persons of honour of his party, were afterwards in cold blood hanged reproachfully, which was much worse than if they had been killed in the field; and asked him if Montrose had ever caused any man to die in cold blood, or after the battle was ended? since what was done in it flagrant, was more to be imputed to the fierceness of his soldiers than to his want of humanity. The earl confessed that he did not know he was guilty of anything but what was done in the field; but concluded with more passion, that his behaviour there was so savage that Scotland would never forgive him. And in other company, where the same subject was debated, he swore, with great passion, that though he wished nothing more in this world than to see the king restored, he had much rather that he should never be restored, than that James Graham should be permitted to come into court."—Clarendon's History, vol. vi. p. 290. † A kind of guillotine, which appears to have been used for the first time in the execution of some of the inferior agents in the murder of Riccio.

‡ Charles had the baseness to disown the conduct of his ill-starred and devoted follower, and authorised Lothian to report to the parliament "that his majesty was no ways sorry that James Graham was defeated, in respect, as he (Charles) said, he had made that invasion without, and contrary to, his commands." But the parliament, though they appeared to credit the royal statement, were well aware of its falsehood.

to sign the covenant before he was permitted to land; the greater part of his English adherents were dismissed; and Hamilton, Lauderdale, and other leading engagers, were compelled to leave the court, and retire to their own homes. Charles himself was received with all the outward marks of respect, but he was carefully excluded from all power, and treated as a mere pageant of State.

They were especially careful to disclaim all sympathy with the principles of the old royalist party, and both the General Assembly and the committee of Estates set forth a public declaration, in which they protested "that they did not espouse any malignant quarrel or party, but fought merely on their former grounds or principles; that they disclaimed all the sins and guilt of the king and of his house; nor would they own him or his interest otherwise than with a subordination to God, and so far as he owned and prosecuted the cause of God and acknowledged the sins of his house and of his former ways."*

As soon as the English parliament learned that Charles had arrived in Scotland, and that the Scots had raised a considerable army in support of the royal cause, they resolved to prevent the dangers which thus menaced their newly-formed republic by invading Scotland, while still weakened by her domestic dissensions; and in a month from the time of the king's arrival, Cromwell was on the banks of the Tweed at the head of sixteen thousand veteran troops. The Scots made vigorous preparations for his reception. On the first notice of this movement a general levy had been appointed throughout the kingdom, and on the approach of the enemy the open country between Berwick and Edinburgh was swept of every article of subsistence. "The

the Estates of Scotland, upon penalty if they did not remove; so that mostly all the men are gone. But the wives stay behind, and some of them do bake and brew to provide bread and drink for the English army."† Cromwell made a speech to his men "as a Christian and a soldier,"‡ exhorting them "to be doubly and trebly diligent, to be wary and worthy, for sure enough they had work before them; and then not to doubt of a blessing from God, and all encouragement from himself." The soldiers answered with loud acclamations, and, advancing along the coast, quartered on the first night in the fields near Mordington, where Cromwell proclaimed throughout the camp that none, on pain of death, should offer violence or injury to the persons or goods of any in Scotland not in arms, and that no soldier should presume, without special licence, to stray half a mile from the army.

Meanwhile David Leslie, who commanded the Scottish army, had established a fortified camp between Leith and Edinburgh, flanked by the fortifications of Leith, and by batteries erected on the Calton Hill. Cromwell advanced towards his lines, and tried every expedient to draw him out to action; but Leslie kept his position at "Bruchton village,"* his right wing resting upon the eastern slope of Salisbury Craigs and Arthur's Seat, and his left wing posted at Leith, and remained resolutely on the defensive. He was well aware that his army, though superior in numbers, was greatly inferior in discipline to the English, and that his raw levies were unable to encounter the veteran troops of Cromwell: he therefore prudently avoided a battle, and by frequent skirmishes tried to confirm the courage of his soldiers, and to harass and wear out the enemy. The English —their success.

made an attack upon Arthur's Seat, which was partially successful, but "upon the whole," says Cromwell, "we did find that their army were not easily to be attempted. Whereupon we lay still all the said day,† which proved to be so sore a day and night of rain as I have seldom seen, and greatly to our disadvantage—the enemy having enough to cover them, and we nothing at all considerable. In the morning, the ground being very wet and our provisions scarce, we resolved to draw back to our quarters at Musselburgh, there to refresh and revictual."‡ His retreat was harassed by the Scots, and Major-general Lambert was wounded in two places, and taken prisoner, but was ultimately rescued. In the course of the night, a select body of troops under Montgomery and Strachan attacked the English at Musselburgh, beat in their guards, and threw their cavalry into disorder, but were ultimately repulsed with considerable loss.§

Cromwell on entering Scotland had published a manifesto, or "declaration of the English army to all the saints in Scotland." A counter declaration had been prepared by the Scottish clergy, to which some "godly ministers" who accompanied the invading army composed a reply. Cromwell himself took part in this controversy, and in letters addressed to the General Assembly and to David Leslie, earnestly entreated "the honest people in Scotland" to desist from "espousing a malignant-party's quarrel or interest," to give "some satisfying security" to the English parliament, and not to allow themselves to be deceived "by a few formal and feigned submissions from a person that could not tell otherwise how to accomplish his malignant ends."* Hopes were at one time entertained that "the godly party in Scotland" would abandon the "malignant king's interests, and make bloodless peace" with the English. The extreme presbyterian party had recently expelled from the army eighty officers, who were accused of "malignancy," and the refusal of the king to sign a declaration which they had prepared seemed likely to lead to an open rupture. Charles,

however, dreading that his refusal would provoke the covenanters to disavow his cause, consented, with some qualifications, to sign a declaration that "although he was bound as a dutiful son to honour his father's memory, and to hold his mother in estimation, yet he desired to be deeply humbled and afflicted in spirit for the adherence of the former to evil counsels, and his opposition to the covenant; and for the idolatry of the latter, the toleration of which was a matter not only of offence to the Protestant churches, but undoubtedly of high provocation to a jealous God. He declared that he received the covenant with no sinister nor improper design; professed to have no enemies but in common with it; exhorted his subjects to receive it as they valued his protection or favour; annulled his treaties with the Irish catholics; recalled his commissions against the English trade; promised to confirm the propositions of the two kingdoms presented to his father, and to grant an indemnity to all but the authors of his murder; and since the sectaries had invaded Scotland, he required the well affected in England not to omit the opportunity of re-establishing their ancient government."† Still the facility with which Charles yielded to the demands of the covenanters did not remove their suspicions that all his declarations were regarded by him merely as an empty form; and as a further test of his sincerity, as well as a public penance, they appointed a day of humiliation to be observed by his household, and by the whole kingdom, and required him on that occasion anew to express his penitence for the various transgressions of his father and grandfather, the idolatry of his mother, and his own early connection with inveterate malignants.

Cromwell meanwhile had tried every military stratagem to bring the Scots to action, but in vain. Leslie prudently adhered to his defensive policy. Foiled in their attempts to force the Scottish lines on the east of the capital, the English army marched inland to the Braid Hills, Colinton and Redhall, and formed an encampment on the eastern extremity of the Pentland Hills, to advance on Edinburgh from that side, and threatened to cut off the supplies which the Scots received from Stirling and the western districts of the country. But Leslie, perceiving their intention, immediately quitted his intrenched camp, and took up a new position to the westward, protected by the water of Leith and the drains and mill-leads at Saughton and Coltbridge. On Tuesday, October 27th, both armies marched to the vicinity of Gogar, but after a distant cannonade the English, finding that they could not dislodge the Scots, were compelled to withdraw next day "to their leaguer at the Braid Hills," and thence to Musselburgh. The situation of Cromwell had now become critical. He had no provisions except what he obtained from his ships with considerable difficulty and in insufficient qualities. The communication with the fleet grew daily more precarious, sickness broke out among his troops, and the weather became exceedingly inclement. It was —he is clearly impossible that the army compelled to could remain in its present position retreat. and on the evening of Saturday, the 31st (old style), they fired their huts, and marched towards Dunbar. Leslie immediately left his encampment, for the purpose of harassing the retreating enemy, and hung closely upon their rear. Marching along the skirts of Lammermoor, he took up a strong position on the Doon Hill, which overhangs the town of Dunbar, and seizing the difficult passes which lay between that town and Berwick, completely intercepted the retreat of the English. The Scottish army continued to gather and increase on the adjacent hills, "like a thick cloud, menacing such a shower to the English as would wash them out of their country, if not out of the world; and they boasted that they had them in a worse pound than the king had the Earl of Essex in Cornwall." The situation of Cromwell was indeed apparently desperate. His army was now reduced to twelve thousand men, who were drawn up along the base of the peninsula on which the town of Dunbar stands, in a line extending from Belhaven Bay on the west, to Brocks-mouth House on the east, "about a mile and a half from sea to sea." Critical situation of the English army.

Directly in front of them, on the top and slope of Doon Hill, with the barren heaths of Lammermoor behind, lay the Scottish army, three and twenty thousand strong, and in high spirits. It was impossible to attack them but at the most imminent hazard. On the east the English were hemmed in by a tremendous ravine or pass, called the Peath or Pease, which Leslie had occupied, and where, according to Cromwell's own description, "ten men to hinder is better than forty to make way." Behind them was the sea, their ships lying in the offing with their supply of provisions daily growing more scanty. The English general, however, in the words of one who knew him well, "was a strong man—in the dark perils of war, in the high places of the field, hope shone in him like a pillar of fire when it had gone out in all the others." In a letter, written on Monday, September 2nd, to Sir Arthur Haselrig, governor of Newcastle, he says, "We are upon an engagement * very difficult. The enemy hath blocked up our way at the pass at Copperspath,* through which we cannot get without almost a miracle. He lieth so upon the hills that we know not how to come that way without great difficulty; and our lying here daily consumeth our men, who fall sick beyond imagination. I perceive your forces are not in a capacity for present release; wherefore, whatever becomes of us, it will be well for you to get what forces you can together, and the south to help what they can. The business nearly concerneth all good people. If your forces had been in a readiness to have fallen upon the back of Copperspath, it might have occasioned supplies to have come to us. But the only wise God knows what is best. All shall work for good. Our spirits† are comfortable, praised be the Lord, though our present condition be as it is. And indeed we have much hope in the Lord, of whose mercy we have had large experience.†

committee. and of endeavouring to cut his way through, at all hazards, with his cavalry. But the folly of the committee of Estates and Kirk, and the national precipitancy of the army, destroyed this fair prospect of success, and extricated the English from their perilous position. They were under the impression that Cromwell had embarked half of his men and all his great guns, and therefore could not fight, and fearing that he would escape, they resolved to descend into the plain, and attack the English in their retreat.§ Their object

Position of the was, in the first instance, to seize hostile armies. Brocksmouth House, where Cromwell had his head-quarters, and then pass over the brook or 'burn' there, so that they might attack the enemy at their will. The Brocks burn, or rivulet, has its source in the Lammermoor Hills, and, skirting the Doon Hill, falls into the sea at Brocksmouth House. Its course is through a rugged glen forty feet in depth, and about as many in width; from the base of Doon Hill to the sea it formed the boundary of Cromwell's position; and on Monday his troops were arranged in battle order along the left bank of the burn and glen. Before sunrise on that day Leslie sent down his horse to occupy the other side of the brook; about four in the afternoon his train came down, gradually followed by his whole army. The space between the hill and the sea was at that time a low uneven tract of ground, only partially cultivated, and in some places marshy and covered with rough bent grass. There was only one farmhouse on this tract, and thither Cromwell's cannon, which had at first been placed in the church, were sent on Monday morning. Nearly opposite the centre of Doon Hill, in the bottom of the glen, at a place where the banks of the brook are depressed into a slope passable for carts, stood a small shepherd's house,* in which Pride and Lambert had, early in the morning, placed six horse and fifteen foot. But they were driven out by Leslie's horse, and three of them taken prisoners. About a mile to the east of this spot, and a little to the west of Brocks-mouth House, was the only other pass across the Brocks burn,† and from its southern bank the ground gradually rises up into the high tableland, out of which the Doon Hill springs. At this spot the brunt of the battle took place.

In the afternoon of Monday, Cromwell, walking with Lambert in the grounds of Brocksmouth House, perceived Leslie's movements on the slope of the hill, and, instantly penetrating his design, remarked that it would give them a great advantage if they were to become the assailants, cross the brook, and attacking Leslie's right wing in flank and front with an overwhelming force, drive it back upon its own battle, which, hampered in the narrow sloping ground between the Doon Hill and the brook, had no room to manœuvre or deploy itself. In this way, by defeating the right wing, the whole army would be beaten. Lambert and Monk, who came up at this moment, cordially approved of the plan, and it was resolved to put it in execution early next morning. The night proved wet and tempestuous; and the Scots, who were entirely without shelter, suffered severely from the storm. About three o'clock in the morning, by order of Major-general Holburn, they extinguished their matches, all but two in a company, and, cowering under the corn-shocks, endeavoured to obtain some partial shelter and sleep. An hour later, the English horse were ordered to march towards the pass over the brook. Lambert, who was appointed to lead the attack, was ordering the line far to the right, and was impatiently expected by Cromwell. Owing to this delay Battle of the attack did not take place till Dunbar.
six o'clock, instead of at daybreak, as originally intended. The watchword of the Scots was "The Covenant;" that of the English, "The Lord of Hosts." "The contest," says an eye-witness, "on this right wing was hot and stiff for three quarters of an hour." The Scottish force, though taken at a great disadvantage, made a gallant resistance, as § "A vague story, due to Bishop Burnet, the watery source of many such, still circulates about the world, that it was the Kirk committee who forced Leslie down against his will, that Oliver at sight of it exclaimed, 'The Lord hath delivered,' &c., which nobody is in the least bound to believe. It appears, from other quarters, that Leslie was advised or sanctioned in this attempt by the committee of Estates and Kirk, but also that he was by no means hard to advise; that, in fact, lying on the top of Doon Hill, shelterless in such weather, was no operation to spin out beyond necessity; and that if anybody pressed too much upon him with advice to come down and fight, it was likeliest to be royalist civil dignitaries, who had plagued him with their cavillings at his cunctations, at his 'secret fellow-feeling for the sectarians and regicides' ever since this war began. The poor Scotch clergy have enough of their own to answer for in this business: let every back bear the burden that belongs to it." Cromwell himself admits. Their horse, "with lancers in the front rank," charged desperately, and drove the English back across the hollow of the brook; but the charge was renewed by the latter with great enthusiasm, and was completely successful:

Complete defeat of the Scots. the Scottish horse fled in disorder, some to Cockburn's Path, but the greater part across their own foot. The infantry, consisting entirely of raw, undisciplined levies, and trampled down by their own horse, were unable to resist the shock of Cromwell's veteran troops, and after a brief struggle gave way on all sides. When the Scots began to waver, Cromwell was heard to say, "They run—I profess they run!" At this moment the sun showed his broad disk on the surface of the German Ocean, and the victorious general exclaimed with enthusiasm, "Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered." He then commanded a halt, and "sang the hundred and seventeenth Psalm,"* says one of his officers, "till our horse could gather for the chase." Two regiments only of the Scottish foot maintained their ground, but they were cut off as they stood almost to a man. The fugitives fled to Belhaven, or in their distraction even to Dunbar. The pursuit, led by Haeker, extended as far as Haddington. Three thousand were slain, including a number of the officers and several ministers, and nearly ten thousand were taken prisoners. About half of the number, "almost starved, sick, and wounded," says Cromwell, were dismissed from the field; the remainder were sent under a convoy to England, and were treated with the greatest barbarity. Some of them on their journey southward, for sheer hunger, ate raw cabbages in the "walled garden at Morpeth." They suffered grievous hardships at Durham, where they were imprisoned in the cathedral, and many of them died of pestilence there.† The survivors, with a cruelty hitherto unknown in Christian countries, and most dishonourable to Cromwell and the parliament, were transported to the English settlements in America, and there sold for slaves.‡

The immediate result of the defeat of Dunbar was the surrender of Edinburgh, with the exception of the castle, in which some of the clergy had taken refuge. Cromwell offered them liberty to preach in the several churches of the city, but this offer was at once declined, and a lengthened, but unsatisfactory,

correspondence took place between them and the English general respecting the violation of the covenant; the restrictions he had placed upon the ministers of Christ in England and Ireland; the rights and qualifications of regular pastors, and the abuse of unlicensed persons usurping the work of the ministry.* Meanwhile various soldiers and other lay preachers occupied the vacant pulpits, and held forth to crowded auditories.

Leslie, with the wreck of his army, retired upon Stirling, where the committee of Estates and the commission of the Church were assembled. In spite of the disaster that had befallen them, they presented an unyielding front to the enemy; and the commission issued a short declaration and warning to all the congregations of the Kirk of Scotland, acknowledging the hand of God, whose judgments are unsearchable, and whose ways are past finding out, in the calamities which had brought the land very low; admonishing all classes to be humbled for their sins before the Lord, that He might turn away his wrath from them; and to beware of murmuring and complaining against his dispensations, and questioning the truth and goodness of their cause on account of anything that had befallen them. "Let us bear the indignation of the Lord," they said, "because we have sinned against him, until He plead our cause and execute judgment for us." They strenuously exhorted the people to be no less vigorous in resisting the enemy than they had been in opposing malignants; warned them not to imagine that all danger from this party was now over, but to be on their guard, lest, under the pretence of supporting the royal cause and the welfare of the country, they should obtain the power to promote their old designs. The warning of the commission was followed up by a peremptory order from the committee of Estates, requiring a number of the king's attendants, who were denounced as profane, scandalous, and disaffected persons, to quit the court within twenty-four hours, and to leave the kingdom in twenty days.

Charles was exceedingly provoked at this resolute behaviour, and made a strenuous but fruitless attempt to obtain a delay of these proceedings till the parliament met. According to Clarendon the defeat of the Scottish army, though disastrous to the country, was by no means unacceptable to the king and his courtiers. They imagined that the power of the strict presbyterians would thereby be shaken, and that in order to provide for the national defence the committee of Estates would now be constrained to accept the assistance of those whom they had formerly excluded from the army, and from all places of trust. But the firmness which the government displayed in the midst of all their difficulties, and their resolution to enforce the act of parliament against the obnoxious attendants of the king, convinced the courtiers that their expectations were likely to be disappointed. In conjunction with his majesty, therefore, they entered into a conspiracy for the overthrow of the dominant party. It was proposed that Charles should make his escape from Perth, where he was then residing; and that on the same day a strong body of Highlanders should rush down from Atholl, and seize the committee of Estates. The town of Dundee was to be secured by Lord Dudhope, its constable; Lord Ogilvy was to take arms in Angus; while Middleton and Huntley were to raise the north. But this foolish and ill-concerted plot was completely marred in the execution. Leaving

Perth under the pretext of hawking, Charles, attended only by some of his domestic servants, galloped to Dudhope, near Dundee, whence he was conducted by the Earl of Buchan, and Viscount Dudhope, to a seat of the Earl of Airlie. But, to his great disappointment, instead of being welcomed by the gentry of Angus, he was received only by some sixty or seventy Highlanders, who escorted him to a miserable cottage at Clova,* where, after the fatigue of his journey, he was fain to repose upon an old bolster above a mat of sedges and rushes. A party of horse, under Montgomery, sent after him by the committee, found him in this wretched plight, and easily persuaded him to return with them next day to Perth.

This incident, which is usually termed the improvement in his situation. "Start," alarmed the committee, and, though ignorant of the extent of the conspiracy, they were induced by their fears to make some changes in the king's situation. Believing that his flight was to be attributed to the rigour with which he had been treated, they now permitted his friends to have free access to his presence; and, at his request, granted an indemnity to the Highlanders who had taken up arms by his orders. He was invited to preside in the council; and they received without hesitation the apology made by the chancellor, in his name, for his conduct in the recent "Start," which he attributed to the "wicked counsel of evil men, who had deluded him and deceived both him and themselves." These proceedings, however, excited great dissatisfaction among the stern presbyterians of the south and west, who were from the first averse to a war with England, and had no confidence in the king's sincerity. Immediately after the defeat at Dunbar, an association was formed in these districts for the defence of the country, and a strong body of about three or four thousand horse levied and placed under the commands of Colonels Strachan and Ker. Strachan had originally served in the English parliamentary army, and still felt a strong leaning towards his former friends. His present associates, including the greater part of the gentry and ministers of the western shires, though hostile to the sectaries, were still more opposed to the malignants, and were rather inclined to abandon the cause of the king, than to sacrifice the interests of the presbyterian Church and the welfare of the country. They openly denounced the temporising conduct of the committee of Estates, and the duplicity of the king; and, especially after the proof of his treachery, and of the insincerity of his repentance, afforded by his flight from Perth, they advocated the immediate and public disavowal of his cause.

While the unhappy country was torn by these dissensions, Cromwell, after an unsuccessful attempt upon Stirling, advanced towards the west with the greater part of his forces. His main object in this movement was to gain over the extreme presbyterian party, who had manifested their distrust of the king's honesty, and their reluctance to carry on a war with England for his sake. "I am in great hopes," writes the general to the president of the English council of state, "that through God's mercy we shall be able to give the people such an understanding of the justness of our cause, and our desire for the just liberties of the people, that the better sort of them will be satisfied therewith."

For this purpose, on the 9th of October, he addressed a letter to the committee of Estates, reminding them of his previous statement of the grounds of his invasion of Scotland; of his earnest desire that the end he had in view might be accomplished without blood; and of the difficulties in which they had involved themselves by "taking into their bosom that person in whom, in spite of his hypocritical and formal show of repentance, that which is really malignancy, and all malignants, do centre. The daily sense," he goes on to say, "we have of the calamity of war lying upon the poor people of this nation, and the sad consequences of blood and famine likely to come upon them; the advantage given to the malignant, profane, and popish party by this war; and that reality of affection which we have so often professed to you, and concerning the truth of which we have so solemnly appealed—do again constrain us to send unto you to let you know that if the contending for that person be not by you preferred to the peace and welfare of your country, the blood of your peoples, the love of men of the same faith with you, and (in this above all) the honour of that God we serve, then give the state of England that satisfaction and security for their peaceable and quiet living beside you, which may in justice be demanded from a nation giving so just ground to ask the same from those who have, as you, taken their enemy into their bosom while he was in hostility against them. Do this and it will be made good to you, that you may have a lasting and durable peace with them, and the wish of a blessing upon you in all religious and civil things."*

This appeal, as might have been expected, produced no effect upon the committee of Estates at Stirling; but it was taken into consideration by the western army under Ker and Strachan, and some correspondence regarding it took place between them and Cromwell. It was mainly with the hope of a closer communication with this party that the English general advanced to Glasgow, which he reached on the 18th of October. He behaved there with great moderation, though the well-known Zachary Boyd "railed" on him and his officers "to their very face in the high Church,"* calling them sectaries and blasphemers, and inveighing in no measured terms against the sins of the day, the prevalence of sectarianism, and the violation of the covenant.† Cromwell even invited the clergymen to meet him next day, and, accompanied by some of his officers, held a discussion respecting the disputed points with some of the presbyterian divines. His first visit to Glasgow lasted only two days, for a movement of the western army towards the capital caused him to return thither with all speed. He was for some time occupied in rooting out various nests of moss-troopers, who infested the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and waylaid and destroyed the stragglers from his army. "One Watt," says a contemporary chronicler, "a tenant of the Earl of Tweeddale's, being sore oppressed by the English, took to himself some of his own degree, and by daily incursions and infalls on the English garrisons and parties in Lothian, killed and took of them above four hundred, and enriched himself by their spoils. The like did one Augustin, a high German, who was purged out of the army before Dunbar Drove; but a stout and resolute young man, and lover of the Scots' nation, imitating Watt, in October or November this year annoyed the enemy very much, killing many of his stragglers, and made nightly infalls upon their quarters, taking and killing sometimes twenty, sometimes thirty, more or less of them, whereby he both enriched himself and his followers, and greatly damnnified the enemy. His chief abode was about, and in, the mountains of Pentland and Soutra."‡ To put a stop to these excesses, which, if persevered in, must have greatly increased the horrors of this warfare, Cromwell issued a proclamation complaining that "divers of the army under his command had been not only spoiled and robbed, but also sometimes barbarously and inhumanly butchered and slain, by a sort of outlaws and robbers not under the discipline of any army," many of them inhabitants of the places where the outrage was committed, and their movements being almost always guided by intelligence furnished by their countrymen. He therefore expressed his determination whenever, in future, any of his soldiers were robbed or spoiled by such parties, to "require life for life, and a plenary satisfaction for their goods from those parishes and places where the deed had been committed, unless they discovered and produced the offender."*

On the approach of Cromwell the western army retired to Dumfries, where their officers and ministers prepared the first sketch of their famous remonstrance against the policy adopted by the ruling party in their lenient treatment of the malignants, and their proposal to crown the king, and admit him to the full exercise of royal authority. In this paper the most flagrant instances of Charles's insincerity were enumerated: his pretended repentance denounced as hypocritical; the haste with which the treaty of Breda was commenced, and the "unaccountable folly" of continuing it after the king's duplicity was discovered, and his commission to Montrose actually in the hands of the parliament were denounced in no measured terms. Notwithstanding of this behaviour, they waited they said to discover whether Charles had at last really embraced the national cause; but now his union with the malignants at home, and his correspondence with those abroad, his steady prosecution of his original designs, and his recent flight for the purpose of joining their enemies, who were about to rise in arms for the overthrow of the government, all afforded clear evidence that the Estates had been deceived and ensnared by his dissembling. They therefore disclaimed all the guilt of the king, and of his house; declared that they could not own him, or his interest, in the state of the quarrel betwixt them and the enemy; and proposed that he should not be entrusted with the exercise of sovereign power till he should show by his conduct that his professions of repentance were sincere. And they implored the committee of Estates to consider that if it were a sin in them to entrust power to a sovereign unworthy to reign over their own nation, how much more aggravated the guilt would be of endeavouring by force of arms to impose such a ruler upon England.†

The committee of Estates were greatly divided in opinion respecting this remonstrance; but, after some discussion, they agreed to condemn it as scandalous and injurious to his majesty's person, and prejudicial to his authority;

Augustin, however, seems like others of his class to have preyed both upon friends and foes, for Whitlocke mentions, in November, 1651, "That the Scots themselves rose against Augustin, killed some of his men, and drove away the rest;" and in January following he states that "Augustin, the great robber in Scotland, went into the Orcaades, and there took ship for Norway." as calculated to breed dissension among the people; and as dishonourable to the kingdom—in as far as it tended to produce a breach of the treaty with his majesty, and was fitted to strengthen the hands of the enemy, and to weaken the hands of honest men. The commission of the assembly, at the request of the committee of Estates, expressed their opinion also respecting the remonstrance; and while satisfied as to the facts and principles stated in it, they had doubts as to the propriety of openly declaring them at this juncture; and objected to certain expressions contained in it, which seemed to reflect upon the General Assembly, and were so incautiously framed as to have given advantage to the enemy. They had found, they said, that the remonstrance contained many sad truths in relation to the sins charged upon the king, his family, and the public judicatories; but they disapproved of it “as apt to breed division in Kirk and kingdom, as we do find already in part by experience.”* The remonstrance of the western army, indeed, met with the cordial approval of a large portion of the strict presbyterians in all parts of the country; and not a few were ready to say with the minister of Kirkcaldy, that “a hypocrite ought not to reign over them; that they should treat with Cromwell, and give him assurance not to trouble England with a king; and that whoever should mar such a treaty, the blood of the slain should be on his head.”† “Nothing but remonstrating, protesting, treatying, and mistreaty-ing from sea to sea. To have taken up such a remonstrance at first, before the war began, had been very wise, but to take it up now, and attempt not to make a peace by it, but to continue the war with it, looks mad enough. Such nevertheless is Colonel Gibby Ker’s project—not Strachan’s, it would seem. Men’s projects strangely cross one-another in this time of bewilderment; and only perhaps in doing nothing could a man in such a scene act wisely.”‡ The forces levied in the five associated counties§ were lying at a place called Carmunnock; and as Strachan, who was decidedly opposed to the treaty with the king, had now laid down his commission, the sole command had devolved upon Ker. Colonel Montgomery had been ordered by the committee of Estates to march to the west with four or five regiments of horse, to take charge of the western levies, and to lead them to the main army. But on his approach, Ker, apparently with the desire of distinguishing himself by some exploit before resigning his command, attacked an English force under Lambert, which had been sent against him, and was, as he had been informed, lying in unsuspecting security at Hamilton. Lambert, however, was on the alert, and in much greater strength than the Scots supposed. The attack, which was made early on the morning of December the 1st, 1650, was so warmly received, that, after a brief contest, the assailants, though at first successful, were repulsed with the loss of about a hundred men; Colonel Ker himself was wounded and taken prisoner, along with several of his officers; his forces were dispersed all over the country, a small body who rallied were persuaded by Strachan to disband, and he himself soon after went over to the enemy.*

Meanwhile a meeting of the parliament was held at Perth; and, after a plausible but hypocritical speech from his ^{Meeting of} parliament. majesty, professing his deep penitence for the folly and sinfulness of his conduct in the late “Start,” a committee was appointed to make preparations for the coronation of the king, and to consider the propriety of accepting the assistance of those who had formerly been excluded or dismissed from the public service. It was resolved that the coronation should be preceded by a fast for the sins of the king, of his family, and of the nobility; and by another for the contempt of the Gospel displayed by vast multitudes of the people. The commissioners of assembly were required to consider what persons should be admitted to take up arms in defence of the kingdom; and returned for answer, that “in this case of so great and evident a necessity” all fencible persons should be permitted to fight against the enemy, “except such as are excommunicated, forfeited, notoriously profane or flagitious, or obstinate enemies of the covenant and cause of God.” On receiving this reply, the Estates passed resolutions declaring that those who had made defection or maintained a “detestable neutrality” should, on making a profession of their repentance, be admitted to share in the service and defence of the nation; and ordered all the fencible men in the country, from sixteen to sixty, to be embodied for the protection of the kingdom. The more strict of the presbyterians protested against these resolutions, maintaining that to accept the aid of those who had proved unfaithful to the covenant was to betray their cause, and that their pretended repentance was a profane mockery, which must provoke the Divine displeasure, and be followed by the most disastrous consequences. In spite of their opposition, however, a coalition of all parties for the public defence was carried into effect. ^{Readmission} of the excluded royalists and engagers.

The malignants, engagers, and others who had been excluded by the Act of Classes, hastened with hypocritical professions of penitence to obtain readmission into the Church, in order that they might be qualified to resume their situations in the army, or in the public service; and on the nomination of the colonels, not only the lords of the Engagement, but a number of royalists were appointed, who had fought under the banner of Montrose, and who had within the last twelve months been twice declared rebels for their share in the northern insurrections.

While the Scottish parliament was engaged in these preparations for the defence of the kingdom, Cromwell was employed in the reduction of the Castle of Edinburgh, which still held out against his victorious arms. After a blockade of three months, and a fruitless attempt to reduce it by mining, the lord-general got his batteries ready on the 12th of December, and summoned the fortress to surrender. It had been well provisioned for a siege; and Augustin, the German moss-trooper, on the 13th, gallantly broke through the besieger's lines with a party of one hundred and twenty horse, killed eighty of the enemy, took several prisoners, and strengthened the garrison with a reinforcement of thirty-six men.* But the governor, Walter Dundas, and his officers belonged to the party of the remonstrants or protesters, and were far from being hearty in the cause—most of them, indeed, ultimately went over to the enemy; and, either through cowardice or disaffection, after some interchange of letters, which occupied several days, Dundas agreed to surrender the castle, on condition that the garrison should march out with the honours of war, and be at liberty to retire whence they pleased; that the public registers and all public property should be safely conveyed to Stirling; and that all private property lodged in the castle for security should be faithfully restored to its owners. There were sixty-seven guns of various sizes in the castle at the time of its surrender—a greater amount of brass ordnance, Cromwell says, than all the rest of Scotland contained. In announcing the fall of this fortress to the parliament, he describes it as “a very great and seasonable mercy.” “I need to say little,” he adds, “of the strength of this place, which, if it had not come in as it did, would have cost very much blood to have attained, if at all to be attained; and did tie up your army to that inconvenience that little or nothing could have been attained while this was in design, or little fruit had of anything brought into your power by your army hitherto without it.”†

After the surrender of Edinburgh Castle, Roslin, Reduction of other fortresses. Tantallon, Hume, ‡ and other fortified places successively fell into the hands of the enemy; so that in the course of the winter the whole of Scotland south of the Forth submitted to Cromwell. The moss-troopers, however, still continued their desultory and harassing warfare, and, assisted by the country people, cut off numbers of stragglers and detached parties of the English.* A miserable state lancholy and affecting picture of the country. the miserable state of the country at this time is given by Baillie, who says, “It cannot be denied but our miseries and dangers of ruin are greater than for many years have been; a potent, victorious enemy, master of our seas, and for some good time of the best part of our land; our standing forces against this his imminent invasion few, weak, inconsiderable; our Kirk, State, army, full of divisions and jealousies; the body of our people besouth Forth spoiled and near starving; the benorth Forth extremely ill used by a handful of our own; many inclining to agree and treat with Cromwell without care either of king or covenant; none of our neighbours called on by us, or willing to give us any help, though called.”†

The coronation of Charles took place at Scone, near Perth, on the 1st of January, 1651. Coronation of Charles. The ceremony was performed with the usual regal solemnities, but mingled with rites which must have been highly distasteful to the libertine monarch. Clad in a prince's robe, he walked in procession from the hall of the palace to the church; the spurs, sword of estate, sceptre, and crown being carried before him by the principal nobility. The sermon was preached by Robert Douglas, one of the ministers of Edinburgh and moderator of the General Assembly, from the strikingly appropriate text—“And he brought forth the king's son, and put the crown upon him, and gave him the testimony; and they made him king, and anointed him; and they clapped their hands, and said, God save the king. And Jehoiada made a covenant between the Lord and the king and the people, that they should be the Lord's people; between the king also and the people.”‡ The sermon, which has been printed, contains an able and faithful exposition of the reciprocal duties of kings and subjects, and of the nature of the compact between a sovereign and his people in a limited monarchy. At the close of his discourse the plain-spoken preacher, with almost prophetic sagacity, earnestly warned the youthful prince against imitating the sins of his grandfather, James VI., “the guiltiness of whose transgression lieth on the throne, and on the family.” “Many doubt of your sincerity in the Faithful covenant,” he adds, “let your sin- address of Robert Douglas. cerity and reality be evidenced by your steadfastness and constancy; for many, like your ancestors, have begun well, but have not been constant.
